YAHOO! INC.'S PROVISION OF FALSE INFORMATION TO CONGRESS

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 2007

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC.

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 10 o'clock a.m. in room 2172, Rayburn House Office Building, Hon. Tom Lantos (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Chairman LANTOS. The committee will come to order.

When the news broke in August that this committee was investigating officials at Yahoo! Incorporated in connection with repression in China, CNN International carried the story, but nobody in China saw it. As soon as the anchors started discussing this case, the screen faded to black. And that is typical. State control over media in China, from the printing press to the airwaves to the Internet, is practically absolute.

Those who manage occasionally to pierce the veil of secrecy pay a heavy price. Such is the case with the young journalist named Shi Tao who is languishing in a Chinese dungeon on a 10-year sentence because he pierced the veil and the huge United States-based multinational company practically led the police to his door.

On the eve of the 15th anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre 3 years ago, the Chinese Government issued the directive forbidding journalists from covering anything related to this anniversary.

In a brief second that would have a momentous impact on the rest of his life, Shi Tao hit the Forward button on his the Yahoo! e-mail account and sent the government's message to an NGO overseas advocating for democratic change in China.

When the Chinese Government set out to unlock the mystery of who had publicly disclosed this document, they went to the offices of Yahoo! China to provide the key.

The flagship American company, represented by our two witnesses today, Chief Executive Officer Jerry Yang and General Counsel Michael Callahan, complied with the request from the Chinese political suppression apparatus and provided the necessary identifying information to track down Shi Tao.

If you think our witnesses today are uncomfortable sitting in this climate-controlled room and accounting for their company's spineless and irresponsible actions, imagine how life is for Shi Tao spending 10 long years in a Chinese dungeon for exchanging information publicly, exactly what Yahoo! claims to support in places like China.

In February 2006 under the then-Republican majority, this committee convened the hearing on, and I quote, “The Internet in China: A Tool For Freedom or Suppression.” The hearing was chaired by my good friend and distinguished colleague, Representative Chris of New Jersey. Witnesses included representatives from the State Department, Yahoo! and Microsoft, Google, Cisco Systems, and several NGOs.

Yahoo! had been invited to testify specifically to address the facts of the Shi Tao case. They did so under oath, swearing to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Michael Callahan, the general counsel of Yahoo!, gave sworn testimony about the case and Yahoo!’s operations in China.

Mr. Callahan has not been accused of perjury. That would be the willful violation of an oath either by swearing to what is untrue or by deliberately admitting information that is material. But as general counsel for Yahoo!, he did provide false information to this committee in this critically important hearing 18 months ago.

In an effort to convince this committee that Yahoo! was not a knowing agent of the Chinese Government repression, Mr. Callahan testified that Yahoo! had no knowledge of the facts surrounding the Shi Tao case at the time the company provided information to the Chinese authorities.

Let me quote from what Mr. Callahan said:

“When Yahoo! China in Beijing was prepared to provide information about the user who we later learned was Shi Tao, we had no information about the nature of the investigation. Indeed, we were unaware of the particular facts surrounding the case until the news story emerged.”

Based upon a thorough investigation by the staff of this committee, we now know that while Mr. Callahan may not have known the relevant facts personally, other Yahoo! employees, in fact, did know the nature of the Chinese investigation against Shi Tao prior to our committee hearing.

Specifically, the document provided to Yahoo! China on April 24, 2004 by the Beijing State Security Bureau stated, and I quote:

“Your office is in possession of the following items relating to a case of suspected illegal provision of state secrets to foreign entities, and so on.”

Now let me deal with the—what the issue of what this means in a Communist police state.

The term “state secrets” is commonly used in China when a phony criminal case is concocted against political activists. A reasonable person who receives such an order would immediately note that the case in question involves either a political or a religious dissident.

Even an unsophisticated person operating in the context of the Chinese police state would know full well that “state secrets” is a trick phrase used to fabricate a phony but devastating legal case against an innocent person who shares our values in an open and free society.

A key member of the Yahoo! briefing team that prepared Michael Callahan for his appearance before our committee had a copy of the Beijing authority's document.

Yahoo! China lawyers also had a copy of the document.

Yet, somehow, incredibly, Mr. Callahan apparently was not informed of these critical facts and the fundamental nature of Yahoo!'s complicity with the persecution of Shi Tao.

Yahoo! claims that this is just one big misunderstanding, that Yahoo!'s false testimony was really just a matter of an internal miscommunication.

Let me be clear: This was no misunderstanding. This was inexcusably negligent behavior at best and deliberately deceptive behavior at worst. I wish to repeat this: This was inexcusably negligent behavior at best and deliberately deceptive behavior at worst.

In preparing for testimony before this committee, Yahoo! did not seek fit to hire a translator to make sure the document upon which it relied for its entire defense was translated properly. Mr. Callahan never asked to see the document and the Yahoo! lawyer who had it, by Yahoo!'s own explanation, failed to consider the document significant even after Congress ordered Yahoo! to appear to answer directly on this outrage which landed an innocent Chinese journalist in prison for a decade.

Yahoo!'s own lawyers in Beijing also had the document and pulled out its meaning. Either Yahoo! has little regard for providing complete and full information to a duly constituted committee of the Congress, or it has little regard for the issue of perfecting human rights.

Based upon the committee's bipartisan investigation of the Yahoo! testimony, we have reached the following conclusion: Yahoo! provided false information to Congress. Despite the sworn testimony before the committee that Yahoo! did not know the nature of the investigation into the Shi Tao case, Yahoo! employees did know that the Chinese Government wanted the information related to Shi Tao because of a so-called state-secrets investigation in order to imprison him.

When Mr. Callahan later discovered that he had provided false information, he did not make the slightest attempt, not the slightest attempt, to correct the information he had given to Congress under oath.

Six months after his testimony, Mr. Callahan became aware that some officials of Yahoo! did know the nature of the investigation against Shi Tao at the time it complied with the Chinese request for information. Despite Mr. Callahan's explicit recognition that his previous testimony was inconsistent with the facts, neither Mr. Callahan nor anybody at Yahoo! contacted the committee orally or in writing to advise us that Yahoo! had provided false information to the committee.

Inexcusably, there was no effort whatsoever by Yahoo! to set the record straight after providing false information to a duly constituted committee of Congress.

Mr. Callahan did, however, tell his public relations operatives to spin the Shi Tao story in a different direction.

After discovering that his general counsel had provided false information on this critical manner, Yahoo! did not conduct an internal investigation into the circumstances under which false information was provided to Congress. Yahoo! tried to sweep this grave transgression under the rug. No internal review of the matter took place. No change in company policy was instituted. Nobody at Yahoo! has been disciplined for providing false information to Congress.

Key employees related to the provision of false information to Congress remain at their posts.

Yahoo! had no means or possible intent to prevent Yahoo! China from being a willing participant in political witch hunts emanating from Beijing. Yahoo! incorporated no American lawyers in Beijing; there was no mechanism in place for Yahoo! headquarters to review Chinese efforts to ferret out individuals who wish to see a more open and a more democratic China.

A company of Yahoo!'s resources and sophistication operating in the Chinese milieu should have taken every conceivable step to prevent the automatic compliance with a request from the Chinese police apparatus, and to this day, Yahoo! has failed to change any of its practices in order to prevent such collaboration in the future.

Yahoo! Incorporated is now a minority shareholder in Yahoo! China. But one of our witnesses today, CEO Jerry Yang, sits on the board of Alibaba, the parent company of Yahoo! China. If Chinese police today request that information from Yahoo! China related to political dissidents, Yahoo! China would turn over the individual's e-mail records identity, who might be subsequently sent to prison perhaps for 10 long years.

My colleagues, I do not deliver these conclusions lightly. High-tech companies like Yahoo! are enormously important to the American economy as well as to the global economy, and they have transformed the way in which information is conveyed worldwide.

That said, I do not believe that America's best and brightest companies should be playing integral roles in China's notorious and brutal political repression apparatus.

I will ask our witnesses today, in light of these embarrassing, appalling facts, whether Yahoo! is now prepared to endorse legislation offered by Congressman Chris Smith and approved by this committee to ensure that American complicity with high-tech repression ends.

It should be self-evident that companies cannot get away with providing false information to Congress.

So today I will call on Yahoo!'s stock corporate executives to apologize to this committee, the Congress of the United States, and the American people.

But first and foremost, I urge our two witnesses to face the family of the Chinese journalist who, as a result of Yahoo!'s actions, has been thrust into a Chinese prison. When he first appeared before this committee, I asked Mr. Callahan whether he had reached out to Shi Tao's family to offer an apology and to provide assistance. The answer was a resounding no.

Fifteen months later, Yahoo! has yet to provide any aid to Shi Tao's family. Mr. Yang, Mr. Callahan, Shi Tao's mother is sitting in the first row behind you. I would urge you to beg the forgiveness of the mother whose son is languishing behind bars due to Yahoo!'s actions.

It is now my pleasure to call on my friend and colleague Ileana Ros-Lehtinen for any opening comments she might wish to make.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Thank you as always, Mr. Chairman.

The greatest threat to repressive societies and repressive regimes is access by their subject populations to uncensored information, because independent information results in independent judgment which leads directly to independent action.

For that reason, these regimes can never feel truly secure without complete control over all aspects of their people's lives, none being more important than the flow of facts and the exchange of opinion.

Yet even with the increasingly strenuous efforts to choke off uncontrolled connections to the wider world, news sources appear, autonomous networks spring into being, and electronic walls erected with great effort begin to crumble. Light still manages to seep in through the darkest of barriers.

Among the most threatening of these new sources is the Internet and the ever easier access to the rapidly growing universe of unfiltered data and unconstrained world views that it makes possible. The Internet's potential to undermine the control of these regimes over information is why blocking of the Internet has become a vital task for the maintenance of repression from Cuba to China, from Syria to North Korea.

Regimented societies, such as Cuba's and North Korea's, have largely succeeded in their efforts to quarantine this deadly intrusion by the simple means of denying any and all unsupervised access by their populations.

In my native homeland of Cuba, a 5-year prison sentence awaits those who somehow manage the nearly impossible task of connecting to the Internet. If they go so far as to actually post information, the sentence increases to 20 years imprisonment.

Yesterday, President Bush bestowed the Medal of Freedom in absentia to Dr. Oscada Leos Biscet, a Cuban political prisoner languishing in a filthy dark dungeon.

When not in solitary confinement, many of Dr. Biscet's cellmates in Cuba may very well have been there for crimes regarding dissemination of freedom information.

In the year 2000, an opposition activist, Jose Orlando Gonzelez Bridon, Secretary General of the illegal Cuban Democratic Workers Confederation, was sent to prison merely for publishing unauthorized information on the Internet. Many others have since followed.

In Syria, Ali Said al-Shahadi, an English language-speaking teacher, was arrested in August of last year for the crime of posting articles on an unauthorized Web site. He was released after 5 months, but a steady stream of Syrians have already been imprisoned for similar online activities that the authorities deemed subversive.

In rapidly developing countries such as China, some experts believe that extreme isolation of citizenry is not possible. Along with the economic development, the context between individuals and groups both within the country and with the outside world, they are expanding exponentially, so it can happen. However, the Chinese regime has proven that to be wrong.

Its array of tools include an army of Orwell's "thought police" who monitor users and block offending sites, backed up by the arrest and imprisonment of those who successfully evade the system of control.

Among the most harshly targeted are democracy activists of all types, as well as individuals in Tibet and other areas who are seeking greater freedom from control by Beijing. Even those who have defied the government's efforts to prevent news of severe threats to public health from being circulated, such as the deadly outbreak of the SARS epidemic in 2003, have been imprisoned for publishing "state secrets."

As the effectiveness of these regimes' censorship declines, the prospects for freedom for their peoples will increase. For this reason, the U.S. Government must actively engage in overcoming Internet censorship by these regimes and ensure that their populations have access to unfiltered information beyond the strait-jacket of propaganda.

But our efforts are still in their infancy. For many years, I have introduced and supported legislation to strengthen the ability of the U.S. to overcome efforts by repressive regimes to censor the Internet and other media. I am confident that the Global Online Freedom Act of 2007, sponsored by my good friend, Chris Smith of New Jersey, that was recently approved by this committee, will be an important enhancement of that effort.

But the U.S. Government cannot accomplish this task alone. Only with the assistance of the private sector can these regimes' efforts to censor and control the Internet be overcome. However, private companies operate within significant constraints and must walk a fine line between cooperating with the authorities in these countries and respecting the fundamental rights of individuals there and elsewhere.

This is made more difficult by the arbitrary rules and actions of the various regimes and by the absence of clear international standards to use as guidance.

Thus, one of the most welcome advances is the development by the leading Internet-related companies such as Yahoo! of a code of conduct for operating in repressive countries, such as China, a code that is being created with consultation of human rights and other organizations.

Congress has an important role to play in ensuring that U.S. companies maintain these standards by making clear what the law will and will not allow these companies to do in their operations overseas.

The power represented by the often quoted words that "the truth shall set you free" was dramatically demonstrated by the collapse of the Soviet Empire when the grip of the regimes on their societies' connections to the outside world was finally pried loose.

The United States was an indispensable element in that liberation, patiently working through the decades to ensure that light continued to pierce those walls.

We must continue that dedication of purpose for all those who remain imprisoned, and provide them the tools by which they can liberate themselves. And the most powerful truth, the most powerful of these tools, Mr. Chairman, is the truth. Let us hear some of that today in our hearing.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. Thank you very much.

It is my pleasure now to call on my friend and colleague from New Jersey who chaired the original hearing on this subject, Mr. Smith.

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

First of all, let me begin by thanking you for your genuine, authentic, ongoing and persistent commitment to truth and the integrity of this committee in calling this hearing today, and for speaking just a moment ago, as you so often do, so eloquently and so boldly on behalf of victims. And that is what this hearing is all about, the victims.

I have taken a great personal interest in not just this hearing but this entire issue. It was in large measure response to Yahoo!'s cooperation with the Chinese infamous secret police hunt for democracy, as it did against Shi Tao, that I called the hearing in February 2006 that you have referred to earlier, as well as the distinguished ranking member, Ileana Ros-Lehtinen.

The committee is honored and privileged, as you also welcome them to have in our presence today Gao Qinsheng, mother of Shi Tao, and Yu Ling, wife of Wang Xiaoning, and both of these individuals have suffered enormously. In the case of Wang, he got 10 years, just like Shi Tao. Yahoo! also participated or was complicit in providing information in his arrest and incarceration. And based on the best available information, he is being tortured. Obviously, torture is endemic in the Chinese system, in the laogai and with their secret police. That is how they get confessions.

These individuals are joined by Harry Wu. Harry Wu some years ago stood right where Mr. Callahan and Mr. Yang sit, and brought with him five other survivors of the laogai. Mr. Wu spent in excess of 20 years in the laogai system.

I will never forget when Palden Gyatso, a Tibetan Monk, brought in the implements that are used to torture. He couldn't get through security downstairs because he was carrying cattle prods and the kind of implements that are used routinely, systematically, and with great malice and with great cruelty against political and religious prisoners in China.

Harry told us about Catherine Ho and a whole group of survivors of the laogai and just what kind of horrific treatment, mistreatment, was endured by somebody once they go to the Chinese prison systems. They are concentration camps; we should make no mistake about it.

Yahoo! provided, as we all know, China's police information leading to Shi Tao's arrest, and the words that were used were "inciting state subversion." That is, he was promoting democratic reform on the Internet.

For the benefit of those who weren't at the February 2006 hearing, and we will be providing copies to members of the press so they can see exactly who said what and when at that hearing, we swore in Mr. Callahan and asked him to proceed as he would like.

In his opening statement, before I or anyone else had asked any questions, he brought up Shi Tao and said that Yahoo! had “no information”—let me read it so it is right from the hearing record—“had no information about the identity of the user or the nature of the investigation. Indeed, we were unaware,” he went on, “of the particular facts surrounding this case until the news story emerged.”

This was not a casual remark. The written statement Mr. Callahan submitted to the committee said the exact same thing.

Recently, as the chairman has pointed out, we have learned from Reporters Without Borders that when the Chinese police came to Yahoo! looking for Shi Tao, their request for information had specified that they were investigating someone who had “violated state secrets.”

Unless one is incredibly naive or willfully ignorant, everyone involved with China knows that when democracy and human rights activists, religious believers, and members of the religious or persecuted nationalities, including Uighurs and the Tibetans are arrested, it is often for “violating state secrets.”

Just like in the Soviet Union, it is a nebulous, completely elastic term. It is a modus operandi of dictatorship. In effect, this charge means nothing more than they told the truth about some misdeed of the Chinese Government.

And if the Chinese Government would prefer that people not know something about life in China, then they make that something a state secret. The so-called state secret the Chinese Government accused Shi Tao of violating was to pass on a directive calling for censorship of news on the 15th anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre.

I look over at the press sitting to our left. If any of you passed on that information and you were in China, you would be in prison for 10 or more years.

Mr. Callahan, what you write today would certainly fetch you 15 to 20 years. Mr. Callahan now claims that when he testified in 2006, he did not have personal knowledge of the contents of the Chinese police request and that he and the company he works for made a good-faith effort to inform themselves of the matter about which he was called to testify.

Mr. Chairman, Yahoo! lawyers have told our staffs that almost a dozen people prepared Mr. Callahan for his testimony. How could a dozen lawyers prepare another very smart and very savvy lawyer to testify before Congress without anyone thinking to look at the document that had caused my hearing to be called in the first place? This is astonishing.

It is even more incredible that Yahoo! claims that after his testimony before the committee, Mr. Callahan later found out that Yahoo! knew that the police request had to do with state secrets. He forgot to inform the committee. It is one thing not to know something. It is another thing altogether to choose not to know.

I would like to find out at this hearing whether the corporate culture of Yahoo!, in whole or in pertinent part, was and is shaped by a fundamental decision not to look too closely into what their employees are doing in China.

Mr. Chairman, 2 weeks ago, this committee—and I thank you, you know—the take on this Congress is that we are not bipartisan. You have really shown that that is not the case. You marked up our bill, the Global Online Freedom Act, H.R. 275. This legislation was authored and put together precisely to prohibit exactly what Yahoo! did to Shi Tao.

The Global Online Freedom Act would prohibit United States companies like Yahoo! from disclosing personally identifying information to officials of countries like China unless the Department of Justice determines it is for a legitimate law enforcement purpose.

The act would require other United States companies working in countries like China to disclose Internet contents that they remove or block. We know what Google has done in becoming part of the state propaganda efforts.

Dictatorships need two things to survive and prosper: A secret police that routinely rounds up and cruelly mistreats especially the dissidents, and they need to control the message, the propaganda message.

The act would also create an amended Act of Freedom at the State Department and develop a global strategy to combat attempts from countries like China, North Korea, Syria, Vietnam and Cuba to transform the Internet into a tool of surveillance and repression.

I would like to remind my colleagues and everyone here today that Yahoo!'s failure to provide this committee with accurate information about its sad betrayal of Shi Tao is powerful evidence that we cannot entrust the human rights of vulnerable people living under repressive regimes like China to the industry code of conduct that is being formulated by the IT companies. A Yahoo! code of conduct would be cold comfort to people like Gao Qingsheng, Shi Tao's mother. The fact that we are here today is evidence that we need the Global Online Freedom Act. And, again, I think we need it now.

I thank you again, Mr. Chairman, for calling this important, and, I would say, historic hearing.

Chairman LANTOS. Thank you, Mr. Smith.

It is the intention of the chair to allow every member of the committee to make a brief statement if she or he desires to do so.

Mr. Sherman.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for holding this hearing.

I look forward to finding out what Yahoo! is doing not only for the one journalist in question, but for all dissidents in China. It seems to me that if Yahoo! is going to atone for the misinformation they gave to this committee, it should be more than bowing to the journalist's wife, but rather strong support for the legislation Mr. Smith has put forward, and a large fund available to help with the humanitarian needs of dissidents in China.

I think anything else is an insincere vow.

I yield back.

Chairman LANTOS. Mr. Rohrabacher.

Mr. ROHRBACHER. I was just walking through Congress to the Capitol there on the way over here, and I couldn't help but notice the statue of Raoul Wallenberg in the Capitol.

I know there are heroes in this world like Raul Wallenberg, and America needs to be on their side. Those people who are not on the side of the Raul Wallenbergs, but who would facilitate the imprisoning of people like this, are not Americans. I mean, they may be profit-seeking people who reside here, but America has to be more than just searching for money and markets. There are some more fundamental values to being an American than that.

It is repugnant, if not surprising, to learn that American business people in China are assisting the Chinese Communist Party in its brutal repression of Chinese citizens and their desire for democracy. It would be funny, if it wasn't so sickening, that Internet companies which supposedly pride themselves on facilitating the free exchange of ideas are helping to throw in jail the very people who they claim to be their most loyal clients.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we hear over and over every time we have these hearings about China, from the business community, that they believe that by being more engaged in China that they will in some way liberalize that country, and it will become freer because of their association. And now we hear that American corporations are doing just the opposite in order to gain a bit of momentary profit.

Well, we also hear these same companies saying well, don't control us. You know, we shouldn't—you know, we shouldn't have—we should not be the ones to control ourselves, but Congress has to set limitations. And then they lobby Congress in order not to set limitations, the very same people who are saying, well, we are free to do what we want; you have to set the fundamental policies. And then they lobby against, for example, the legislation.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROHRBACHER. Thank you very much.

The very final thing. I have never been prouder to serve with you than I was today during your opening statement.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Florida, Mr. Wexler.

Mr. WEXLER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would echo the comments of the previous speakers with respect to the obligation to tell the truth. Yahoo! has an obligation to tell the truth. They need to tell it today, and everyone needs to be accountable.

There are broader issues, however, and I think this is also an opportunity to respectfully suggest possibly the need for some self-reflection in the context of the United States Congress.

We are talking about complicity with human rights abuses. Well, today there are enormous human rights abuses going on in Pakistan and we, the United States Government, send hundreds of billions of dollars to Pakistan. We are about to consider an enormous arms package to Saudi Arabia and other Gulf States that don't do one bit of respect for human rights. And with respect to China itself, the policy of this Government is that we granted China "Most Favored Nation" trading status and we welcomed—the United States Government welcomed—China into the WTO.

Now I may agree or disagree with those statements, but there is a level of complicity, yes, with Yahoo!, but also with this government, that ultimately is the responsibility of this Congress.

So I would respectfully suggest if we are going to delve into these issues, that it is terrific that we do. Let us not just talk about one company. Let us talk about the role of the United States Government and whether or not we legitimately do or do not inhibit freedom or democracy and the role that the Internet plays.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman's time has expired.

The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chabot.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank you for holding this hearing, and I want to commend you on your remarks as well as the gentlelady from Florida for her remarks.

She brought attention to Dr. Biscet in Cuba. And I would highly commend people to read an article, I believe in it is in the Wall Street Journal, I think it was yesterday, talking about another prisoner of conscience in Cuba who rots in the jail—if you want to call it a jail—in the most inhumane conditions under Castro.

And one of my most frustrating things in this Congress that I have had is when you realize how many people rot in jails, who basically have done nothing except to try to express human rights, basic dignity for people around the globe. And you see it in China today, you see it in Cuba, you see it in Iran, North Korea, and Syria and many other countries.

And the world needs to act. The freedom-loving nations of this world have to find some way to deal with this problem and do something about these people that rot in jails all over the world for literally trying to help others in their nations to be free. We have not done much about that. This committee has tried. We need to do much more.

Thank you.

Chairman LANTOS. Thank you.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Delahunt.

Mr. DELAHUNT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And let me indicate that I agree with everything that has been said by my colleagues on the dais.

I have heard references to a code of conduct. I would suggest that the issue before this committee is whether a code of conduct, to be policed by Corporate America, is sufficient.

And as my ranking member on the Subcommittee on Oversight knows, we are reviewing corporate behavior in the country of Colombia where American corporations, one specifically, was charged with and paid a $25 million fine for providing or paying, making payments to paramilitary groups. I think my own sense is that we as a Congress need to define what public policy is or should be in terms of the relationship with Corporate America in doing business overseas. And with that I yield back.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Pence.

Mr. PENCE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to associate myself strongly with the bipartisan comments made today about your moral leadership on this committee, and especially so today in describing Yahoo!'s behavior as "inexcusably negligent at best or deliberately deceptive at worst.” I think you summarized the sentiment of most of us on this committee.

The price of freedom, freedom of the press, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, is eternal vigilance. And that is vigilance by people who possess political power, but it is also vigilance by those who possess economic power.

And I can’t help but think today, Mr. Chairman, of the words of Lenin, who used to describe capitalists as dupes who would “sell us the ropes with which to hang them.” And he would no doubt describe the high-tech rope that seems to be being used to strangle freedom in China today among his references.

I want to know what happened in this case. But more than that, Mr. Chairman, I am interested to know what Americans overseas, Americans who are operating in totalitarian companies, are prepared to do to hold up the ideas of freedom.

And I especially want to acknowledge the presence of Gao Qinsheng, the mother of Shi Tao, and one of freedom’s heroes in the world, Harry Wu, who is with us in this room today. I thank you for your leadership and your sacrifice. You will be in my prayers, and with that I yield back.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentlewoman from California, Ambassador Watson.

Ms. WATSON. I want to thank you so much, Mr. Chairman, for your integrity, your honesty, and the example you set for all of us.

The specific issue we are here today to discuss, allegations of the provisions of false information by Yahoo!’s general counsel in a February 2000 hearing, are serious. And I really commend the two of you for being here for the committee today to tell the sides of the stories—of this story that you interpret.

The important issue of Internet freedom and the promotion of free flow of information through this most powerful medium still is in its infancy, and it is also at the heart of the matter that we are here to discuss this morning.

It raises an important issue of how U.S.-based and -owned companies conduct their affairs in countries that operate under a set of laws and institutions that are not only different, but in some cases an anathema of our way of doing business and our notions of rule of law, equity, and fairness.

So I will be very intently listening to the testimony that we get today so that we can raise the questions, Mr. Chairman. And based on the responses, we can set the policy that will lead our country forward.

Thank you very much for this opportunity.

Chairman LANTOS. Thank you.

The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And ladies and gentlemen, it is really extraordinary today that we would have leading our committee the chairman, Tom Lantos, who is in America because he and his family fled from Fascism and from Communism, leaving totalitarian Hungary. And indeed the ranking member, Ms. Ros-Lehtinen, is in America because her family fled totalitarianism in Cuba.

I know that I have been really hoping that advances in technology would promote democracy and freedom around the world.

Indeed, that has been achieved in Hungary. We all are very hopeful about a free Cuba. But I want to hear today what can be done not to reinforce totalitarianism, but to promote the very exchange of concepts and ideas which I think will promote democracy and freedom.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. Green.

Mr. GREEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I want to associate myself with all of our colleagues that talked about the issue of our chair and our ranking member. And the other committee I serve on, Mr. Chairman, is the Energy and Commerce Committee, and Telecommunications and the Internet Subcommittee. So I have a particular interest in our hearing today and what our telecom aspect in international relations is.

But the reason we are all here is why we received false testimony earlier.

Mr. Chairman, the Internet is an advanced technology. It should be a tool for good, and one that promotes our values around the world. American companies should, like the American Government, stand with those promoting freedom, rather than the police who seek to shut down dissidents in their best interest of democracy. This committee has held several hearings on the practice of American firms supporting censorship in China.

Yahoo! turned over to Chinese police a dissident's name, the contents of e-mails he sent to the United States, and other information associated with his e-mail account. The burden of sentencing him for leaking state secrets, citing information provided by Yahoo, is critical to this conviction.

What is so troubling is what we are here today to address is that we now have our witness, Mike Callahan, who was called before the committee to testify on the case. The witness provided false testimony. I believe it has been determined that he had not knowingly lied to the committee, but other officials at Yahoo! knew the details of the case in China, including those who had briefed Mr. Callahan prior to the hearing. As became apparent, Yahoo! was involved in providing this information, and the company took proactive steps to determine what happened or what it knew.

Although Mr. Callahan directed his staff to stop their denials that Yahoo! did not know the nature of the investigation, Yahoo! failed to correct this statement publicly or clarify its previous position.

I hope the witnesses can answer why Mr. Callahan is not giving us the information and why there is no attempt to correct these false statements when it became widely known.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GREEN. Thank you. I yield back my time.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentlelady from California, Ms. Woolsey.

Ms. WOOLSEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, global trade should be about exporting the high ideals of American entrepreneurship and about the advancement that we are seeing.

It should help to spread the growth of human capacity, in its very highest levels. Yahoo! stands for innovation and the power of creativity. The company and the founders are an absolute inspiration to inventors here at home and throughout the world. That means Yahoo! has a huge responsibility. And that is why I, for one, and all of us up here are so very troubled about today's hearing.

How can Yahoo! live up to its commitments with the world community, not just to China or the United States, but to a world where we are no longer country to country, we are a globe, a world who is expecting the best of Yahoo!, a new generation of thinkers, and really make it happen?

So that is what I am hoping to learn from the mistakes that happened in the past testimony.

I yield back.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Oregon, Mr. Wu.

Mr. WU. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As Congress debated granting "Most Favored Nation" trading status to China in 1999 and 2000, proponents argued that business engagement would open China and other closed societies, and the proponents of that argument won the day. And time will tell whether that argument was true or whether it was public relations fluff.

This hearing is not about engagement or not engagement. That issue was decided by votes in this Congress in 1999 and 2000. This hearing, in a broader sense, is not about Yahoo! because there are other companies and other incidents which have also occurred.

In the broadest sense, this hearing is about standards of conduct to guide some of our best companies operating in very difficult environments and what to do in the future. Does doing business in China open an authoritarian society? Does it infect China with the democracy bug? Or does doing business in China change the conduct of American businesses for the worse and infect some of our best companies with an authoritarian tick?

I hope we can work hard together to appeal to the better angels of our collective nature, to determine what went wrong in this case and fix it, and to develop a collective approach, especially among high-tech companies, to do better in the future, not if, but when similar cases occur, wherever they occur, in China, in the United States, or elsewhere in the world.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. Poe.

Mr. POE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Free speech is one of the most fundamental of all human rights, no matter where a person lives in this planet.

The story of democracy in our own country began with disagreement over whether a person had the right to say something or not, one of the basic reasons we are now an independent country and not a part of the United Kingdom.

Our Founding Fathers lived under a tyranny that controlled information and controlled the freedom to exercise one's belief politically. And the framers of this country intended free speech to include criticism of the government and the advocacy of unpopular ideas. I think the right to criticize the government is a human right, no matter where that person lives in the planet.

We value this right because it allows individuals to express themselves without interference or restraint from this Government and burst into and nurtured a country that not only values but pro-protects independent thought and protects free speech of individuals. I hope that Yahoo! does the right thing and takes these rights, the rights of men and women all around the world, very seriously.

I look forward to the testimony.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. Thank you.

The gentleman from Washington, Mr. Smith.

Mr. SMITH OF WASHINGTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I do think it is a very important topic for a hearing. There are two big questions we are trying to get at, and certainly the gentleman from Yahoo!, when we give you the chance to speak, we will be interested to hear your perspectives on that.

One, how do we change the behavior of repressive regimes? It is not an easy thing to do. It is something we could all agree that we all want to do. But I think Cuba was mentioned earlier, and certainly we have taken a very, very tough tack with them for well over 40 years, and they are no less repressive today than they were over 40 years ago.

And in other countries I think it is probably true. We have engaged too much without too much success. But it is not as simple as a black-and-white decision that we simply stand up to it, we will make it better. It is a more complex question.

And the second is what laws can companies choose to not obey in China or the United States or wherever. If it is a law on the books in a country where they are doing business, when can they say we are not going to follow it? Because it is not just in China where these questions come up; they come up in the United States, they come up in Europe, where free speech is not protected in many instances. There are many examples of that.

Those are two good questions. I hope we get to that, and I hope we get to a chance to discuss how to make progress in those two areas, and I thank the chairman for having this hearing.

Chairman LANTOS. And the gentleman from Florida, Mr. Kline.

Mr. KLINE. I would like to express appreciation for many companies, Yahoo! being one of them, for great innovation and creativity and science and technology. At the same time, I think we also understand technology has allowed us to expand the free expression of information and ideas. It could be used in a very positive way to better people's lives; it could be used in a very negative way in the case of a government using a free expression or expression of information to oppress or suppress or do things, as certainly has been represented here in China.

But the bottom line is what are the standards of ethics and responsibilities and obligations that businesses, that American businesses have overseas and other countries. That is the discussion that we are very interested in hearing what your thoughts are. I think many people around the country have some specific ideas. As was expressed today, this is going to be a very big issue as we go forward.

Information and technology don't have founders. But we as Americans do believe in certain standards of ethics and conduct, and I think that we will be very interested to make sure our American businesses uphold very high standards.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. Thank you very much.

My understanding is the gentleman from Illinois doesn't wish to make an opening statement.

We have two witnesses today, both of whom are senior executives at Yahoo!, a Fortune 500 company that describes itself as the world's largest global online network of integrated services.

Michael J. Callahan who first joined Yahoo! in 1999 has served the company since 2003 as senior vice president, general counsel, and secretary of the corporation. This year Mr. Callahan became executive vice president. Mr. Callahan is responsible at Yahoo! for worldwide legal affairs and public policy. He also advises Yahoo! management on strategic and corporate governance issues. Mr. Callahan is on the register at Georgetown University and holds a law degree from the University of Connecticut.

Mr. Jerry Yang in 1994 co-created the Yahoo! Internet Navigational Guide, and a year later co-founded the company. In June of this year, he became chief executive officer. Mr. Yang displayed a key role in building Yahoo! over the years. He has developed Yahoo!'s corporate strategy, technology vision, strategic business partnerships and international joint ventures. Mr. Yang holds a B.S. and M.S. degree in electrical engineering from Stanford. Currently he is on a leave of absence from the Ph.D. program.

At this time, I ask Mr. Yang and Mr. Callahan to please stand and raise your right hand to take the oath.

[Witnesses sworn.]

Chairman LANTOS. Let the record show that each of the witnesses answered in the affirmative.

We will first hear from you, Mr. Yang.

STATEMENT OF MR. JERRY YANG, CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER, YAHOO! INC.

Mr. YANG. Chairman Lantos—you would think I would know how to operate a mike.

Chairman Lantos, Ranking Member Ros-Lehtinen, members of the committee, I am Jerry Yang, co-founder and board member of Yahoo! Inc. since its inception in 1995, and since last June, this June, 4 months ago, as chief executive officer.

I appreciate the opportunity to come before you today to address our role as a global business in the complex human rights and other issues at stake, and our commitment to free expression and privacy.

Before I begin what I hope will be an ongoing and constructive dialogue about the roles and responsibilities of companies and the U.S. Government on these issues, I would like to make two points clear at the outset: First, Yahoo! has been open and forthcoming with the committee at every step of this investigative process. We have answered every question, provided every requested piece of information, and worked with you in good faith. Mike will talk more about the facts in a minute.

I, in turn, look forward to a productive and working relationship with all of you as we collectively tackle this very difficult set of broader issues.

Second, Yahoo! is a company committed to doing the right thing to protect human rights globally. We are a company founded on openness and an exchange of information and trust. And we deeply believe—believe deeply in freedom of expression and privacy.

On a personal level, this very serious human issue at stake caused me great concern. I have invested my professional life in this company, and I believe in the Internet and its present power. I also know that governments around the world have imprisoned people for simply speaking their mind online. That runs counter to all of my personal and professional beliefs.

I want to take a moment to recognize the families of the dissidents who sit behind me, and I want to say that we are committed to do what we can to secure their freedom. And I want to personally apologize to them for what they and their families are going through.

Since this is my first opportunity to meet with many of you, I would like to share a bit about myself and our company. As with all of us, our life experiences change our perspectives, our beliefs, and our vision for the future.

Like many who came to America with the hope of a better life and opportunity, my mother brought my family here from Taiwan when I was 10. We settled in California, and I grew up like many other American boys, playing sports, studying hard and devoting my time to my family. I also did this with a keen appreciation at an early age that this is the land of opportunity and freedom and the many opportunities America offered. I believe then, as I believe now, that this country is a beacon of freedom for the rest of the world.

I dedicated long hours to studies, and I was fortunate to attend Stanford University, where I focused on electrical engineering, and while there the World Wide Web and Internet began to take off. And my fellow graduate student David Filo and I, while messing around on the Internet, became fascinated with its incredible power and the opportunity it presented to people everywhere.

We also recognized and realized the vastness of information on the Internet would be overwhelming without a sensible system to organize it. That is essentially how Yahoo! was born. What started out as a simple list of interesting Web sites has evolved into one of the world's most popular Internet destinations.

When we founded Yahoo! in 1995, we wanted to create a business and expand access to information to improve people's lives. Today with nearly 14,000 employees operating in over 20 countries, we have more than 500 million people around the world use Yahoo! per month, roughly half of all the Internet users globally.

Yahoo!'s communication tools, like Yahoo! Messenger and Yahoo! Mail, which is the most popular Web-based mail service in the world, helped friends, families, workers, colleagues and people to share interest, communicate and stay connected in unprecedented ways. Our many services also help people to find, keep up with, comment on, even create content around the latest in news, finance, politics, education, sports, lifestyle and many other developments around the world.

Our company is centered around empowering our customers. We never lose sight of the fact that our success as a business is built upon the trust we maintain with our community of global users, including citizens from around the world, our advertisers, publishers and business partners.

I would like to take a minute and give you some context about our global business and our entry into foreign markets, including China. As our young company grew quickly in the late 1990s, the United States Government, including Congress, made the decision to normalize trade relations with China. Since then, across Democratic and Republican administrations, the U.S. Government has encouraged American businesses, including technology companies like ours, to engage with China in an enormous market and one focused on modernization. With this backdrop, Yahoo! made the choice, like many other companies across many other industries, to engage in the Chinese market by establishing local operations providing services to Chinese citizens.

To provide historical perspective, at the time we entered the market in China, China was just emerging from decades of closure to the outside world. Even as recently as the mid-'90s, very few Chinese people had telephones in their homes. All media, as it was mentioned, was controlled by the state, and there was no platform for public discussion or news or social issues.

Today despite broad limitation on discussion of sensitive political subjects, Chinese citizens know more than ever before about local public health issues, environmental causes, politics, corruption, consumer choice, job opportunities and even foreign affairs. Much of this change is due to the Internet. There are now over 150 million Internet users in China, second in number only to the United States, and with double-digit growth rates over the last 3 years. An estimated 16 million bloggers are active in China today. There are approximately 500 million mobile phone subscribers in the country.

Let me take you back a little bit into the Internet industry in late 1999 and the early years of the 2000, 2001. You have an Internet industry that was very dynamic going through the boom and the bust of the Internet cycle, as well as, in China, a country that was going through its growth rate.

We operated in China for about 6 years, and we decided to focus our strategic direction on leveraging the best local Chinese management and expertise and entrepreneurship. Therefore, in the summer of 2005, we announced the sale of Yahoo! China to a Chinese company called Alibaba in exchange for 40 percent stake in Alibaba. While I hold one of the four board seats on the parent company, we are now a minority shareholder and do not control Alibaba or Yahoo! China's day-to-day operations. Alibaba is a leader in e-commerce and electronic payments in China and runs the Yahoo! China business.

In addition to the clear business opportunities in China and other emerging markets, we know the presence of technology companies in markets abroad can have a transformative effect on people's lives and local and national economies. Access to information has and will continue to change what people know about the world around them. For a company founded on the principle of increased access to information, these markets hold enormous promise. These markets also present companies like ours with challenges in areas of free expression and privacy.

As I said earlier, we take these issues very seriously as a company. Let me describe to you some of the concrete steps we have taken independently as a company and also in working with our industry peers and human rights groups. To begin, I should note that I personally met with senior State Department officials, Members of Congress and others to discuss these issues of freedom, expression and privacy.

In the last year Yahoo! has established a cross-functional team internally of senior employees worldwide to coordinate our efforts to address privacy and freedom of expression issues. This team consists of employees from a variety of disciplines and departments, including our legal, public, government relations, privacy, community affairs, law enforcement, compliance, security, emerging markets and operational and engineering.

Members of this team also consult with the U.S. Government agencies and outside professionals and authorities including experts at academic institutions. This team, learning from our experience in China, also conducted a formal human rights assessment of the impact of new products and market entry plans, designing strategies that limit risks around challenges of freedom of expression and privacy in new markets.

We've also supported independent research on these tough human rights issues involving technology and the Internet. Last year Yahoo! funded a Knight Fellowship at Stanford University to bring in journalists from countries where freedom of press is limited. The first journalist was from Pakistan, and this year's Yahoo! Fellow is from Zimbabwe. We also funded a Yahoo! International Fellowship on Global Values and Technology at Georgetown University School of Foreign Service.

For the past year and a half, we have been actively engaged in a formal human rights dialogue, co-facilitated by two nonprofits, Business for Social Responsibility in San Francisco and Center for Democracy and Technology here in DC. This is a formal process to design an industry code of conduct with other leading global Internet technology and communication companies. We're working closely with a number of the most prominent human rights groups.

Also included in the formal groups are academics and socially responsible investors. We're all focused on protecting and promoting free expression and privacy in the on-line world. These diverse groups of NGOs, companies and others made a public commitment to create a set of global principles and operating procedures on freedom of expression and privacy to guide company behavior when faced with laws, regulations and policy that interfere with human rights.

The group's goal also includes creating an implementation, accountability, and governance framework, as well as a forum for sharing ideas. The companies are driving to complete this human rights code of conduct in early 2008.

We also believe governments ultimately have the most leverage in this field. The State Department's engagement and support through their global initiative, including the Global Internet Freedom Task Force announced in February 2006, reinforces our belief that governments, through trade relationships, bilateral or multilateral forums, and other diplomatic means, should be a powerful force of creating a global environment where Internet freedom is a priority and where people are not in prison for expressing their political views on line.

We have been and will continue to be actively engaged for the long term. As a company entering its teenage years now, with hundreds of millions of users, and human stakes more challenging than ever, we know that we must work collectively to find approaches that maintain engagement in markets like China and also put companies in the position to act responsibly.

Mr. Chairman, I hope my testimony helps to illustrate some of the global challenges and even opportunities American companies face in the markets abroad. I also hope you understand our commitment to work in good faith with the committee and the deep belief among Yahoo! employees in free expression and privacy. I would like to express my own personal commitment to human rights. I understand, I respect and share the committee's intense interest in these issues and welcome your collective efforts to help address them.

Thank you. I look forward to answering questions you may have.
[The prepared statement of Mr. Yang follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MR. JERRY YANG, CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER, YAHOO! INC.

Chairman Lantos, Ranking Member Ros-Lehtinen and members of the Committee, I am Jerry Yang, co-founder and board member of Yahoo! Inc. since its inception in 1995, and since this past June, Chief Executive Officer. I appreciate the opportunity to come before you today to address our role as a global business, the complex human rights and other issues at stake, and our commitment to free expression and privacy.

I should note for the Committee that Yahoo! Inc. no longer operates a local subsidiary in China. In 2005, Yahoo! Inc. sold its Yahoo! China operations and in exchange became a shareholder in a Chinese company called Alibaba. We own approximately 40 percent of Alibaba. Alibaba now has management control over the Yahoo! China business. While I hold one of four seats on the board of the parent company, we are a minority shareholder and we do not control Alibaba or Yahoo! China's day-to-day operations.

In addition to the clear business opportunities various American companies recognize in China and other emerging markets, we know the presence of technology companies like Yahoo! in markets abroad can have a transformative effect on people's lives and on local and national economies. Access to information has and will continue to change what people know about the world around them. For a company founded on the principle of increased access to information, these markets hold enormous promise.

These markets also present companies with challenges in the areas of free expression and privacy. In response to these challenges, let me describe to you some of the concrete steps we've taken independently as a company and then also in working with our industry peers and also with human rights groups and others.

I have personally met with senior State Department officials, Members of Congress and others to ask for help with this challenge.

In the last year, we established a cross-functional team of senior Yahoo! employees worldwide to coordinate our efforts to address privacy and freedom of expression issues. This team consists of Yahoo! employees from a variety of disciplines and departments, including our legal department, public and government relations, privacy, community affairs, global law enforcement and compliance, security, emerging markets and our international operations.

Members of the team also consult with U.S. government agencies, like the State Department, and outside professionals in the field, including experts at academic institutions. Last year Yahoo! funded a Knight fellowship at Stanford University to bring in journalists from countries where press freedoms are limited. The first journalist was from Pakistan, and this year's Yahoo! Fellow is from Zimbabwe. We also funded a Yahoo! international fellowship on global values and technology at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service, and the first Yahoo! Fellow recently began her academic work.

For the past year and a half, we have been actively engaged in a formal human rights dialogue co-facilitated by two non-profits—Business for Social Responsibility in San Francisco and the Center for Democracy & Technology in Washington, D.C. This is a formal process to design an industry code of conduct with other leading global Internet, technology and communications companies. We're working closely with various NGOs, including the most prominent human rights groups. Also included in this formal group are academics and socially responsible investors. We're all focused on protecting and promoting free expression and privacy in the online world.

This diverse group has made a public commitment to creating a set of global principles and operating procedures on freedom of expression and privacy to guide company behavior when faced with laws, regulations, and policies that interfere with human rights. The group's goals also include creating an implementation, accountability and governance framework—real teeth—as well as a forum for sharing ideas. The companies are driving to complete this human rights code of conduct in early 2008.

We believe governments, because of their enormous leverage, have a vital role to play independently, teaming with other governments and international institutions, and working with companies. The State Department's engagement and support through their global initiatives, including a Global Internet Freedom Taskforce or GIFT announced in February 2006, reinforces our belief that governments—through trade relationships, bilateral and multi-lateral forums, and other diplomatic means—should be a powerful force for creating a global environment where Internet freedom is a priority and where people are not imprisoned for expressing their political views online.

We continue to believe in engagement in markets like China. Why? Today, despite broad limitations on sensitive political subjects, Chinese citizens know more than ever before about local public health issues, environmental causes, politics, corruption, consumer choice, job opportunities, and even some foreign affairs. According to a 2007 Pew Internet study, there are 137 million Internet users in China—second in number only to the United States—with double digit growth rates over the last three years. An estimated 16 million bloggers are active in China today. The Internet drives innovation across sectors, including in science, medicine, business, and journalism just to name a few.

Information is empowering in both ordinary and extraordinary ways. It can be disruptive or even revolutionary. It's the single greatest reason certain governments fear open use of the Internet and the free flow of information. We also know we must work collectively to find approaches that maintain this engagement in markets like China and also put companies in the position to act responsibly.

Mr. Chairman, I hope my testimony helps illustrate some of the global challenges, and even opportunities, American companies face in markets abroad. I also hope you understand our commitment to continue to work in good faith with the Committee and the deep belief among Yahoo! employees in free expression and privacy. I would like to express my own personal commitment to human rights. I understand, respect, and share this Committee's intense interest in these issues, and welcome your constructive efforts to address them.

We have been and will continue to be actively engaged for the long-term. As a company entering its teenage years now, with hundreds of millions of users, and with the human stakes more challenging than ever, we remain fully committed to protecting human rights in the business world's most challenging markets.

Thank you. I look forward to answering any questions you have today.

Chairman LANTOS. Mr. Callahan.

STATEMENT OF MICHAEL J. CALLAHAN, ESQ., GENERAL COUNSEL, YAHOO! INC.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Lantos, Ranking Member Ros-Lehtinen, and Congressman Smith and members of the committee, I'm Mike Callahan, executive vice president, general counsel and secretary of Yahoo!. Mr. Yang has described for you the opportunities and challenges that Yahoo! faced when entering the China market and Yahoo!'s approach to human rights issues going forward.

I welcome the opportunity to address directly the allegations that have been lodged against Yahoo! concerning my testimony in February 2006. Obviously following my first opportunity to testify to Congress in February 2006, to have the result be to come back to this committee to explain my prior testimony is not how I would have liked things to come out. I am not proud of that fact, and I do welcome the opportunity to discuss with you today.

I understand that my testimony in 2006 has caused confusion about what Yahoo! knew and didn't know about the contents of a demand for information that Yahoo! China received from the Chinese Government in the Shi Tao case. This confusion and my statements at the 2006 hearing stem from a lack of information on my part, which I sincerely regret.

At the time of my testimony in 2006, it was my understanding that the Shi Tao demand did not contain specific details of the investigation, including no details regarding the name, profession, activities or charges under investigation, and that is how I testified. I now know that the demand did contain additional information; that the investigation related to "state secrets." If I had had this additional information, I would have made it clear that we were aware of the general law in question, though not the specific nature of the case and not the political nature.

I apologize to you today, Mr. Chairman, as I have previously apologized to you and to the staff, and I apologize now to the full committee for not coming back to the committee once I realized in October 2006 that the demand did contain this additional information.

There are major disagreements over whether the reference to state secrets was significant enough to tell Yahoo! anything material about the case. I believe that while my testimony should have been more precise, the fundamental point remains unchanged, that we did not know the case related to a journalist, we didn't know it was dissident activity, and we did not know this was a political case when Yahoo! China was required to provide the demanded information.

But again, it is clear that this prior testimony has caused a great deal of concern expressed obviously by you, Mr. Chairman, and by other members, and by the staff, and I sincerely regret that I didn't have the full information to make the facts completely clear in my prior testimony.

Beyond this concern over my prior testimony, the underlying issue here from our perspective is it better for United States Companies to engage in China or to disengage? I recognize that some may disagree, but our view is that engagement in China is the better course. That is why Yahoo! opened local operations in China.

A by-product of opening local operation, however, is that local companies are subject to local law. I cannot ask our local employees to resist lawful demands and put their own freedom at risk even if in my personal view the local laws are overbroad. And while I am no expert in Chinese law, it is my understanding from consulting with lawyers who are experts in this area that the Chinese law regarding disclosure of state secrets is just that, overbroad. And as I understand it, the law is vague and broad, and it covers such areas as military information, economic information, and science and technology, as well as being used to prosecute political dissidents.

Over the past 3 months, Yahoo! and I personally have cooperated fully with your staff regarding its inquiry into my testimony before this committee in February 2006, and I explained why I testified as I did. In a series of meetings we actively engaged with your staff to explain the detail surrounding the demand Yahoo! China received from the Chinese Government for certain information regarding the user we had later learned was the journalist Shi Tao.

I came to Washington to meet with the committee staff in early October, and I presented my understanding of what happened and answered your questions. Additionally at the staff's request, a regional counsel from Hong Kong made a special trip to Washington for an additional meeting with the committee staff.

Following these meetings I understand that the committee's lead investigator has expressed privately to our attorneys that he was satisfied I did not intend to mislead the committee, and I had testified truthfully in February 2006 as to the information I had at the time. Because of your concern, I would like to take this chance to go into the details of what happened.

I first learned of Yahoo! China's role in the Shi Tao case after the press reports in September 2005. The press reported that Shi Tao had been convicted of divulging state secrets abroad, and that the verdict stated Yahoo! Hong Kong had provided the Chinese authorities with the information in this case. Prior to those press reports, I was not aware of the Chinese Government demand for information in this case, and I was not directly involved in or informed of Yahoo! China's response to the law enforcement order.

After the press reports, Yahoo! employees contacted employees at Yahoo! China to determine what happened in the case. Yahoo! China confirmed that it had responded to a lawful demand for information concerning the Yahoo! China subscriber with the user ID that was listed in the verdict. As far as I know, this response was handled directly by Yahoo! China's Beijing office upon determining that it met the applicable legal requirements. From that point forward, Yahoo! publicly acknowledged that Yahoo! China had responded to a lawful order for information concerning the user ID that was listed in the verdict.

In February 2006, I testified before two subcommittees of the committee along with several other Internet companies in the hearing entitled, The Internet in China: A Tool for Freedom or Suppression, called by Congressman Smith. In my testimony I stated when Yahoo! China in Beijing was required to provide information about a user who we later learned was Shi Tao, "we had no information about the identity of the user or the nature of the investigation. Indeed we were unaware of the particular facts surrounding this case until the news story emerged."

It may help to take a step back and explain my perspective of the purpose of my February 2006 testimony. At the time of the hearing, there were press reports and public concerns suggesting that Yahoo! China was cooperating knowingly and voluntarily with the Chinese Government to target dissidents. These were very serious and very inaccurate allegations.

In my testimony I tried to make clear that when Yahoo! China responded to the lawful demand for information, it did not know the identity of the user and did not know that the person targeted was a reporter or that it involved political activism. That was my point in making the statements in my prior testimony. The point is unchanged by that additional information I now know. And I also emphasized my understanding that failure by the Yahoo! China operation in Beijing to comply with these lawful orders from government authorities may have subjected local employees of that company to civil and criminal penalties, including imprisonment.

Chairman LANTOS. Why do you insist on repeating the phrase “lawful orders”? These were demands by a police state to make of an American company a co-conspirator in having a freedom-loving Chinese journalist put in prison. By what judgment do you call these orders lawful? These are the orders of a police state demanding cooperation of an American company.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, Mr. Chairman. And we sincerely regret the consequences, as you point out, of the Yahoo! China operation having complied with those orders.

Chairman LANTOS. So will you continue to use the phrase “lawful orders,” or will you just be satisfied saying “orders” or “requests”?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I can refer to it that way if you like, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. No. I’m asking you whether you consider it lawful to have the Chinese Communist police demand that Yahoo! become a co-conspirator in sending a Chinese journalist to prison.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I’m sorry, I didn’t understand what you were saying before. It is my understanding that under Chinese law these are lawful. I understand that they do not meet the norm certainly of what the United States would consider to be lawful, but my understanding is that they were lawful orders in China, recognizing the distinction between that and your point, sir.

Chairman LANTOS. Please proceed.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Thank you.

At the time of my testimony, I did not know that the order referenced a state secrets investigation. I realized that only in October 2006, 8 months after appearing before your subcommittees. And though the reference to state secrets is not information I had at the time at the February 2006 hearing, in my view this additional information does not support that Yahoo! provided false information to Congress.

Please let me describe to the full committee, as I did to some of the committee staff several weeks ago and to some members of the committee previously, how I became aware of this new information. In response to a complaint, the Hong Kong Privacy Commissioner’s Office had opened an investigation into whether Yahoo! Hong Kong had disclosed the information demanded in this order in violation of certain privacy regulations in Hong Kong.

In October 2006, I reviewed draft materials prepared for response by Yahoo! to this investigation, and I noted a statement that the order referenced state secrets. When I inquired about the language, a regional lawyer in Hong Kong indeed confirmed that the order said state secrets.

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised to hear this additional information, as I have expressed to your staff, because it was different than my understanding from February 2006. Although I did not understand the reference to state secrets to reveal the investigation was for pro-democracy activities, nonetheless I recognized in October 2006 that this was additional information about this case.

Once I became aware of the additional information, Yahoo! made no effort to conceal it. Indeed, shortly thereafter, over 1 year ago, Yahoo! filed a sworn statement with the Hong Kong Privacy Commissioner under my signature that included a direct reference to the fact that this order contained the state secrets language appearing in the demand. Furthermore, the Commissioner's subsequent report publicly issued in March 2007 references the state secrets language appearing in the order as well, as well as the language from my submission in October 2006. I believe this report has been publicly available on line and in English since March 2007. And in addition, Yahoo! stated publicly after October 2006 that the case involved the state secrets investigation.

It is clear from the company's continuing action that there was never an intent or plan to conceal this information, Mr. Chairman. And this includes my prior testimony.

Please let me once again express my regret that in October 2006, when I realized the state secrets language was included in the order, that it did not occur to me to contact the committee about this information. Given what I now know about the misunderstanding and the concern created, I deeply regret that I did not think to contact you. I have apologized for that oversight to you, Mr. Chairman, through the committee staff and directly, and I have reiterated it publicly here today.

Engagement in China raises difficult and complex issues and issues upon which there should be serious debate. As a company founded on openness and user trust, we are committed to free expression and privacy. We continue to believe that engagement in China is the better course, and that disengagement would not further the goal of a more open and informed society in China. I hope that this hearing provides an opportunity to address these important issues.

I would be happy to answer your questions, sir.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Callahan follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MICHAEL J. CALLAHAN, ESQ., GENERAL COUNSEL, YAHOO! INC.

Chairman Lantos, Ranking Member Ros-Lehtinen, former Chairman Smith, and Members of the Committee, I am Michael J. Callahan, Executive Vice President, General Counsel and Secretary of Yahoo! Inc. Mr. Yang has described for you the opportunities and challenges that Yahoo! faced when entering the China market and Yahoo!'s approach to human rights issues going forward. I welcome the opportunity to address directly the allegations that have been lodged against Yahoo! concerning my testimony in February 2006.

I understand that my testimony in 2006 has caused confusion about what Yahoo! knew and didn't know about the contents of a demand for information that Yahoo! China received from the Chinese government in the Shi Tao case. This confusion, and my statements at the 2006 hearing, stem from a lack of information on my part, which I sincerely regret. At the time of my testimony in 2006, it was my understanding that the Shi Tao demand contained no information regarding the specific details of the investigation, including no details regarding the name, profession, activities, or even charges under investigation, and that is how I testified. I now know that the demand did contain additional information—that the investigation related to disclosure of state secrets. If I had had this additional information, I would have made it clear that we were aware of the general law in question though not the specific nature of the case and not the political nature of the case. And I apologize to you today, as I have apologized to your staff a few weeks ago, for not coming back to the Committee once I realized in October 2006 that the demand contained this additional information.

There remains a disagreement over whether the reference to "state secrets" was significant enough to tell Yahoo! anything material about the case. I believe that while my testimony could have been more precise, the fundamental point of my testimony remains unchanged—we did not know that the case related to a journalist, dissident activity, or that it was a political case when Yahoo! China was required to provide the demanded information.

But again, it is clear that this prior testimony has caused a great deal of concern among some members of the Committee and its staff, and I sincerely regret that I did not have full information to make the facts completely clear in my prior testimony.

Beyond this concern over my prior testimony, the underlying issue here from our perspective is whether it is better for U.S. companies to engage in China or to disengage. I recognize that some may disagree, but our view is that engagement in China is the better course, and that is why Yahoo! opened local operations in China. A byproduct of opening local operations, however, is that local operations are subject to local law. I cannot ask our local employees to resist lawful demands and put their own freedom at risk, even if, in my personal view, the local laws are overbroad. And while I am no expert in Chinese law, it is my understanding from consulting with lawyers who are experts in this area, that Chinese law regarding disclosure of state secrets is just that—overbroad. As I understand it, the law is vague and broad, and it covers areas such as military information, the economy, and science and technology.

Over the past three months, Yahoo! and I have cooperated fully with your staff regarding its inquiry into my testimony before this Committee in February 2006 and explained why I testified as I did. In a series of meetings, we actively engaged with your staff to explain the details surrounding the demand Yahoo! China received from the Chinese government for certain information regarding a Yahoo! China user in China who we later learned was the journalist Shi Tao. I came to Washington to meet with the Committee's staff in early October, and I presented my understanding of what happened and answered your questions. Additionally, at the staff's request, a Yahoo! regional counsel working in Hong Kong made a special trip to Washington for an additional meeting with the Committee's staff. Following those meetings, I understand that the Committee's lead investigator stated privately to our attorneys and consultants that he was satisfied that I did not intend to mislead the Committee and that I testified truthfully in February 2006 as to the information I had at the time.

I welcome the opportunity to present to the Committee the information that I shared privately with your staff—namely, my full understanding of the facts surrounding the Shi Tao order and my February 2006 testimony.

A. Events Leading to the February 2006 Hearing

I first learned of Yahoo! China's role in the Shi Tao case after the press reports in September 2005. The press reported that Shi Tao had been convicted of divulging state secrets abroad, and that the verdict stated that Yahoo! Hong Kong had provided the Chinese authorities with information in the case. Prior to those press reports, I was not aware of the Chinese government's demand for information in the Shi Tao case, and I was not directly involved in—or informed of—Yahoo! China's response to this law enforcement order.

After the press reports of the Shi Tao conviction, Yahoo! Inc. employees contacted employees at Yahoo! China, to determine what had happened in the case. Yahoo! China confirmed that it had responded to a lawful demand for information concerning the Yahoo! China subscriber with the user ID that was listed in the Shi Tao verdict. As far as I know, this response was handled entirely by Yahoo! China's Beijing office upon determining that the demand met applicable legal requirements. From that point forward, Yahoo! Inc. publicly acknowledged Yahoo! China had responded to a lawful order for information concerning the user ID that was listed in the Shi Tao verdict.

On February 15, 2006, I testified before two subcommittees of this Committee, along with several other Internet companies, at the hearing titled "The Internet in China: A Tool for Freedom or Suppression." In my testimony, I stated: "When Yahoo! China in Beijing was required to provide information about a user, who we later learned was Shi Tao, we had no information about the identity of the user or the nature of the investigation. Indeed, we were unaware of the particular facts surrounding this case until the news story emerged."

It may help to take a step back and explain my perspective of the purpose of my February 2006 testimony. At the time of the hearing, there were press reports and public concern suggesting that Yahoo! China was cooperating knowingly and voluntarily with the Chinese government to target dissidents. These were very serious—and very inaccurate—allegations. In my testimony, I tried to make clear that, when Yahoo! China responded to the lawful demand for information concerning the user we later learned from the press reports to be Shi Tao, it did not know the identity of the user, that the person targeted was a reporter, or that the case involved political activism. This was my point in making the statements in my prior testimony, and the point is unchanged by the additional information I now know. I also emphasized my understanding that failure by the Yahoo! China operation in Beijing to comply with lawful orders from government authorities may have subjected the Chinese employees of that company to civil and criminal penalties, including imprisonment.

B. Events After the February 2006 Hearing

At the time of my testimony, I did not know that the order referenced a “state secrets” investigation. I realized that only in October 2006, eight months after appearing before your subcommittees. Although the reference to state secrets is not information that I had at the time of the February 2006 hearing, in my view this additional information does not support the contention that Yahoo! provided false information to Congress.

Please let me first describe to the full Committee, as I did to the Committee’s staff several weeks ago and to some members of the Committee previously, how I became aware of this new information. In response to a complaint, the Hong Kong Privacy Commissioner opened an investigation of whether Yahoo! Hong Kong had disclosed the information demanded in the Shi Tao order in violation of certain privacy regulations in Hong Kong. In October 2006, I reviewed draft materials prepared for response by Yahoo! to this investigation, and I noted a statement that the order referenced a “state secrets” investigation. When I inquired about this language, our regional lawyer in Hong Kong confirmed that the order said “state secrets.”

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised to hear this because that was different from my understanding at the time of my February 2006 testimony.

Although I did not understand the reference to “state secrets” revealed that the investigation was for pro-democracy activities, nonetheless, I recognized in October 2006 that it was additional information about the Shi Tao case. Once I became aware of this additional information about the Shi Tao case, Yahoo! made no effort to conceal it. Indeed, shortly thereafter—over one year ago—Yahoo! Inc. filed a sworn statement with the Hong Kong Privacy Commissioner under my signature that included a direct reference to the fact that this “state secrets” language appeared in the demand made upon Yahoo! China by the government. Furthermore, the Commissioner’s subsequent report publicly issued in March 2007 clearly references this “state secrets” language appearing in the order, as well as the language from our submission. I believe this report has been publicly available online and in English since March 2007. In addition, Yahoo! stated publicly after October 2006 that the case involved a “state secrets” investigation. It is clear from the company’s continuing actions that there was never an intent or plan to conceal this information in any way, and this includes my prior testimony.

Please let me once again express my regret that in October 2006, when I realized that this “state secrets” language was included in the order, it did not occur to me to contact the Committee about this additional information. Given what I now know about the misunderstanding and concern created, I deeply regret that I did not think to contact you, and I have apologized for that oversight to you, Mr. Chairman through the Committee’s staff, and I have reiterated it publicly here today. But, in my view, this is not, Mr. Chairman, the provision of false information to Congress. I understood the fundamental point of my February 2006 testimony remains the same today: The order did not reveal the name of the individual, that the case targeted a reporter, or that the investigation was related to political activities.

Engagement in China raises difficult and complex issues—issues upon which reasonable minds can differ, and issues worthy of serious debate. As a company founded on openness and user trust, we are committed to free expression and privacy globally. We continue to believe that engagement with China is the better course, and that disengagement would not further the goal of a more open and informed society in China. I hope that this hearing provides an opportunity to address these important issues.

I would be happy to answer your questions.

Chairman LANTOS. I want to thank both of our witnesses for their testimony, and I would like to begin with you, Mr. Yang.

I described in some detail, and I trust with some clarity, what in our view Yahoo! did wrong. Yahoo! collaborated with the Chinese police apparatus in the imprisonment of a freedom-loving Chinese journalist. Did you agree with that?

Mr. YANG. Mr. Chairman, I—I—I understand where you’re coming from. We—

Chairman LANTOS. No, I'm not asking you to understand where I'm coming from. I am asking you: Do you agree with my characterization of what Yahoo! did?

Mr. YANG. I think Mr. Callahan was clear in that—

Chairman LANTOS. No, I'm asking you, not Mr. Callahan.

Mr. YANG. I—what I—I—what Mr. Callahan said was clear, was that we believe that, based on the information we have at the time of the order and subsequently, we did not have sufficient information to determine that this was a political case. And you have to just allow us to describe to you that.

Chairman LANTOS. Could you put the microphone closer to you?

Mr. YANG. Yes, sorry.

As Mr. Callahan detailed both at the time of the order as well as subsequently, until very recently, we feel until the case came out in the news, we did not have sufficient information to know that this was a political case. We have a local operation. We have chosen to engage—that is an issue fundamental to all of this—that we've chosen to engage. We have employees on the ground that will comply with what looks like, subject to ideological debate, what are legal orders from the government. And we did not know at the time and until it was surfaced in the post prosecution documents that this was a political case.

Chairman LANTOS. In my opening statement, Mr. Yang, I said the following, this—namely Yahoo!'s behavior was inexcusably negligent behavior at best or deliberately deceptive behavior at worse. Do you agree with that characterization?

Mr. YANG. I think we made some errors in preparing and obviously gathering the facts for the February '06 testimony. I think that we could have done that better, and we are not proud of that. We have apologized for providing information at the time that we—and we didn't know we had full information. And I feel that we're having a dialogue now about how to move forward and understand the impact of government-to-company as well as multiparty discussions with our industry peers. And my interest, Mr. Chairman, I do believe it is very important that we figure out how to move forward here as a country and as well as an industry.

Chairman LANTOS. What is your view, Mr. Yang, of the fact that once Mr. Callahan discovered that he provided a duly constituted congressional committee with wrong information, inaccurate information, he failed or anyone else at Yahoo! failed to advise the congressional committee that the original testimony given under oath was inaccurate?

Mr. YANG. Mr. Chairman, I think we've recognized that inaccuracy in our testimony, and we have apologized for not providing that update to the committee. I would say we made no effort to conceal it. We filed it in the Hong Kong Privacy Commission, a filing in October of '06.

Chairman LANTOS. It is not the Hong Kong Privacy Commission that held the hearing, it is the Foreign Affairs Committee of the United States Congress that held the hearing, and it was the Foreign Affairs Committee of the United States Congress which was misled by your chief counsel. Once your chief counsel discovered that he misled this committee, was it his responsibility, was it

Yahoo!'s responsibility to set the record straight with this committee?

Mr. YANG. We should have come back to the committee with the facts. All I'm saying is that we made no effort to conceal it, and that as we—

Chairman LANTOS. You made no effort to reveal that fact.

Mr. YANG. As we studied the order and really asked ourselves the questions of whether we considered state secrets to be political or not, we were certainly made aware that the state secrets is a very broad and vague set of things. And I—as I say, we—we—we clearly should have come back to the staff and to the committee and updated the committee.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Chairman, if I may.

Chairman LANTOS. Please.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I take responsibility for the fact that we did not come back to talk to the committee.

Chairman LANTOS. Has it occurred to you at the time that you should do that? Has that been a subject of discussion within the Yahoo! community, or it never occurred to anybody to say, "Hey, we misled the committee; now we know that we misled the committee, so we better advise them that the original testimony given under oath was totally misleading."?

Mr. CALLAHAN. There was not a discussion about—

Chairman LANTOS. At no time was there a discussion?

Mr. CALLAHAN. No, sir. And I should have realized that would cause a significant amount of concern and to come back to the committee. And I regret that I did not do that, but I did not come to a decision of whether we should come back, should we not come back. It didn't occur to me to do so, and I sincerely regret that, and I wish that I had.

Chairman LANTOS. I understand.

Was there any Yahoo! employee with whom you were discussing this matter once you discovered that you gave misleading and false information under oath? How many people were involved in these discussions with you, Mr. Callahan?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I recall there were two others on the legal staff that were involved in the Hong Kong Privacy Commissioner submission, and that's who I asked my questions of when I noticed the state secrets language.

Chairman LANTOS. So there were just three of you who were involved in this?

Mr. CALLAHAN. As it relates to the—

Chairman LANTOS. In discussing this whole matter. I mean, your testimony before this committee initially was a matter of some interest within Yahoo!.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I'm sorry, sir, I misunderstood that question.

Chairman LANTOS. Now, when it became apparent to you and to others at Yahoo! that you gave misleading information, false information, did any of the people who were participating in these discussions raise the point that you should have come back to this committee to correct the misleading information?

Mr. CALLAHAN. We did not have a discussion about coming back to the committee, sir.

Chairman LANTOS. At no time?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I wish that we had, and I wish that I had come back to the committee.

Mr. Yang, why is it that after craven cooperation with the Chinese state security apparatus, the provision of false information to Congress, the failure to correct the record with this committee after all this, the only person punished is an innocent journalist who has been sentenced to jail for a decade? No one else has been punished in this case except the innocent. Explain to me.

Mr. YANG. Mr. Chairman, as I have said in my statement, I—I deeply regret the consequences of what the Chinese Government has done to our dissidents. My heart goes out to the families.

I also looked at this matter, and, again, I was not involved in the original testimony, and I obviously was aware of what happened last year, but I really don't believe that our employees acted in a way that was meaning to conceal or mislead or there was an intent to deceive, and those were the bases in which we look at our employees. It is not to say that we haven't tightened up our process, it is not to say that we need to do a whole lot better in the future. You have shown reliance upon something that we need to do a whole lot better and improve in the future. So I understand and take your comments very, very seriously. But at the end of the day, I feel everybody was doing the best they can given the situation, which I just have to highlight it is a difficult situation in an environment that is very fluid. And I don't feel anybody was trying to do anything wrong, they were doing the best they can.

Chairman LANTOS. This committee approved legislation unanimously that will prohibit American high-tech companies from providing personal information to politically oppressive governments such as the Government of China. Isn't this just the type of leverage that Yahoo! needs to fight against future Chinese Government requests for information about political dissidents? Do you welcome the ability, should this legislation become law, to tell the Chinese that American law prohibits you from complying with such requests from Chinese authorities, Mr. Yang?

Mr. YANG. I think we welcome, as I said in my statement, any government to government.

Chairman LANTOS. That is not my question.

Mr. YANG. I think that the Congress, the executive branch, can do a lot to—

Chairman LANTOS. That is not my question, Mr. Yang. Let me rephrase it so you will answer the question I'm asking.

What I'm asking is as follows: This committee unanimously approved legislation that will prohibit American high-tech companies from providing personal information to politically repressive governments such as that of China. Isn't this the type of leverage Yahoo! and others need to fight against similar Chinese Government requests for information against political or religious dissidents? Wouldn't you welcome the ability in future, once this legislation becomes a law, to tell the Chinese that American law prohibits you from complying with their requests? This is my question.

Mr. YANG. I welcome—as you know, I support the goals of the bill. I do think—don't think I understand the details of how to operationalize a bill for companies like ours. But I think it is the thesis and the theme of the committee around human rights and around repressive regimes is something that I understand and support, but I don't know the details.

Chairman LANTOS. Mr. Callahan, would you like to expand on that?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, certainly, Mr. Chairman. And thank you, Mr. Smith. I had reviewed the bill following the last committee hearing when it was introduced, and it has been some time since I looked at the new, and I have not reviewed in detail the new version that has come out, but I know members of our team are doing so. And to reiterate the point that Mr. Yang made, the engagement with United States Congress around a bill that looks to the important issues of censorship and to day of disclosure, these are the two challenges going forward that are part and core of that human rights dialogue that we mentioned, but also engagement with the State Department. And we very much would look forward to engaging with the committee on that bill. Again, I don't know enough about the details as I sit here today, but our staff is in the process of reviewing it and indeed encouraged.

Chairman LANTOS. Now, as I recall, during the course of the first hearing, which is almost 2 years ago now, a year and a half plus, I asked you whether Yahoo! has reached out to the family of this courageous freedom-loving journalist. What have you done to help them since he is in prison? And as I recall, you said, "Nothing," that Yahoo! had done nothing to assist the family. Have you done anything since?

Mr. CALLAHAN. We have not reached out directly to the family.

Chairman LANTOS. Mr. Yang, would you explain to me why after all this time has expired, and as a Member of Congress, as your representative, in a public hearing almost 2 years ago, what have you done to help this family whose breadwinner is in prison? You still have done nothing to attempt to help them.

Mr. YANG. Mr. Chairman, I feel that we—um—that Yahoo! are most interested in making sure we can secure somehow the freedom of the dissidents that we were involved in.

Chairman LANTOS. I'm sorry, I didn't hear you.

Mr. YANG. We are very focused on understanding how we can be helpful in securing the freedom of the dissidents that we were involved in.

Chairman LANTOS. That is not the question. The question I am asking, Mr. Yang—

Mr. YANG. I want to be—

Chairman LANTOS. Almost 2 years ago I asked your chief counsel what has Yahoo! done to reach out to the family and to help the family whose breadwinner your behavior put in a Chinese prison. Now, in February 2006, Mr. Callahan said, "Nothing." Another 18 months have passed by, and the answer is you have still done nothing. Can you explain why?

Mr. YANG. What I was trying to say, Mr. Chairman, was that while we have not directly met the family, and it is my honor to meet them today, we have been doing work more broadly.

And I understand your point is well taken, but, as I said, let me be precise, I'm interested in making sure that we are trying to do our best to help secure the freedom of these prisoners, and that involves many different means. And I've been in many different dialogues, but I welcome the opportunity going forward and to meet with the family, to reopen as I have understood this case. Since I've become CEO in June, it is one of my priorities to understand how I can be open to help.

And I want to thank you, Chairman Lantos, for having them here today, and I do hope this does bring a level of dialogue that we haven't had. It is not because we don't want to help them; it is obviously a very complicated issue. But I thank you.

Chairman LANTOS. Why is it such a complicated issue to help a family whose breadwinner has been imprisoned because of Yahoo!'s cooperation with the Chinese police? What is so complicated about that?

Mr. YANG. Mr. Chairman, as I said to you, I think that Yahoo! should do more. I personally should do more.

Chairman LANTOS. You couldn't do less, you couldn't do less.

Mr. YANG. I take your point, and we will do more as we go forward in helping and understanding what is our role in this.

Mr. CALLAHAN. If I may, sir.

Chairman LANTOS. Yes.

Mr. CALLAHAN. In addition to the efforts that Mr. Yang described, we have advocated with human rights groups and with the State Department specifically for the release of the dissidents in question.

Chairman LANTOS. That is not help to the family. You are not viewed as the champion human rights advocates in the world in view of this episode, so your chiming in with people who are devoting their lives to human rights is not that impressive.

My question was a very specific question: Why hasn't this gigantic corporation of enormous wealth reached out to the family to help the family? And I have no answer. I just get equivocation.

Mr. CALLAHAN. We have pursued advocacy through other channels, but not directly through the family, sir, you are right.

Chairman LANTOS. Ms. Ros-Lehtinen.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Thank you so very much, Mr. Chairman.

You use the words "police state," and that certainly applies to China, Cuba, North Korea, Syria, Myanmar, and you discussed—our witnesses discussed—censorship and data collection as being two of the biggest obstacles in relation to the freedom of information and the right of privacy.

When you decide to engage with repressive regimes like the ones the chairman noted and I have mentioned, what conditions do these regimes place on your company? How much freedom do companies such as Yahoo! have regarding the demand for information by authoritarian governments in light of the Chinese case? Also what will you do or not do in the future should other repressive regimes make similar demands?

For example, I understand you're negotiating with the Vietnamese Government for entry into that country. What specific requests are you making of the Vietnamese regime to prevent a repetition of the Shi Tao incident? In what other countries that we normally refer to as authoritarian regimes or totalitarian governments are you engaged in or will you be engaged in? And what conditions are you placing on those governments or those governments are placing on you to ensure that information is not given to those regimes which will cause imprisonment, harassment, or great hardship for the families? And how often and to what extent do Chinese authorities demand information on individual users? How isolated is this case?

The phrase “state secrets,” as I said, is too slippery. In Cuba everything is a “state secret,” and people are jailed for giving information on “state secrets.” A “state secret” is whatever the regime deems it to be, anything and everything. Castro’s health is a “state secret.”

Is there information that Yahoo! will not provide to the Chinese authorities? Has this case caused you to change your practices in China and elsewhere? How has it changed? What will we expect from companies such as yours as you, in your phrase, choose to engage with these repressive regimes and possibly cause great harm to religious activists, human rights dissidents, opposition leaders, student groups, anyone who has a thought that runs contrary to these authoritarian regimes? So it is a host of questions that I have that I would appreciate your answering.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Certainly. Thank you for the questions.

When our company established operations in China, my understanding of the regime from a legal perspective at the time was that in order to get the license to operate in that country, the company had to agree to comply with Chinese laws, which included censorship, which was a subject of Mr. Smith’s hearing, and other companies were involved, and it also included compliance with law enforcement demands. Whether that regulation was specific as to what kinds of law enforcement demands, I’m not aware of that. I think it was general compliance with Chinese law.

And looking ahead, what you mentioned and what I described in an earlier remark, the two key challenges—and I think it is part of Representative Smith’s bill, and it is also part of the human rights dialogue—is just what you identified, Congresswoman. It is date of disclosure and it is censorship. And as I understand, the way Yahoo! is looking forward at this issue, and not just Yahoo!, because there are other leading companies that are a part of this dialogue, it is how can we structure operations in other markets that are known to be restrictive of free expression or personal privacy in order to be able to operate in those markets, because we do believe there are benefits, and obviously there is a business opportunity, too, but to either segment data through its access to the data or through operational or legal frameworks that would place it out of the reach of those law enforcement authorities.

For obvious reasons, about negotiations or plans that may be looking at other markets, and you mentioned Vietnam, it is better if I talk in broad strokes about how that might occur, and just what you’ve identified is that, which is as companies think about the future, we’ve learned lessons from the past.

And Jerry mentioned the internal group of executives who focus on this issue at Yahoo, and I expect that probably the other leading companies that are involved in this as well, and perhaps the telecommunications companies also are thinking just about this issue, which is as new markets open up, how can we address that? And I think the committee’s bill is one step; the GIFT at the State Department is another step. But, frankly, I think it was another member in their opening statement asked, what is the company's responsibility in this?

I made this point in the February 2006 hearing, and I would like to make it again today, which is we haven't come here to throw out this problem and say, "Someone else has to deal with it." We recognize that as some of the industry's leaders, we have an obligation and opportunity to try to effect change here. Has the past been perfect? Obviously not, given the situation that we've talked about. But I would like to think that there is a real opportunity with the collaboration that's ongoing between the human rights groups and the leading companies in partnership with the Congress on the new bill, in partnership with the State Department to try to make real progress on these issues.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Although you say you prefer to answer it in broad terms, what about the case of Vietnam? What restrictions are being placed on you? What information are you going to have to comply to that regime? How similar are these repressive regimes and the conditions that they place?

Mr. CALLAHAN. My understanding is—we're in the process of evaluating that. I'm not aware of what the specific restrictions would be; however, I am aware of certainly press reports. And I think, if I'm not mistaken, a subcommittee of this subcommittee is having a hearing on Vietnam this afternoon. So I'm not exactly aware of what specific restrictions, but obviously have seen the press reports about similar concerns.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. And you would think that based on the committee's interest with the case in China that we would like to have that not repeated elsewhere, so it would be helpful if you could let us know what you will be doing with these repressive regimes. And certainly Mr. Smith's bill gives you the opportunity to say to these governments, we can't give you that information. We will be in—not in compliance with U.S. laws. And I would think that you would welcome such a restriction because it would get you out of legal problems in the U.S., and at the same time you would sleep better at night because you would know that you would not be giving an authoritarian regime information that they will then use to harass, imprison, prosecute, persecute people who are just speaking out for freedom and democracy.

In what other countries do you operate that you sign such agreements about complying with not divulging—not giving information on—or having to give information on who the users are that the regime could then use to harass those dissidents?

Mr. CALLAHAN. As for China, I think, as the chairman mentioned, that we had merged our operations, so Yahoo! China is not controlled by Yahoo! Inc. anymore, but that is obviously one significant market where the legislation as proposed would have an impact on our industry.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. So you have China and you have Vietnam. Are you operating in Vietnam already, or are you in negotiations?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I believe it is a current—a work in progress, I don't think firmly established yet.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. This is a good opportunity for you to put your beliefs in writing and make sure that you don't find yourself in this situation again.

What other regimes?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I'm not aware of other markets that we are operating in that have similar restrictions, but I think one of the enlightening parts of the entire episode around Yahoo! and China and dissident activity is that there are many markets around the world where the information industry like Yahoo!, and Google, and Microsoft and other companies are not yet operating, but may someday in the future.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. One more question. Saudi Arabia is a very repressive regime.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. I'm trying to get a sense of what other countries do, and it is so difficult for you to tell me what other regimes are you dealing with and what information must you provide to those governments.

Mr. CALLAHAN. We are not currently operating—

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Not in any of the Middle East countries?

Mr. CALLAHAN. No, we don't have operations there. Certainly as we look ahead as an industry and as a company, as part of the framework that we've talked about with the other companies and also legislative and State Department efforts, I agree with what you said. This is a very good opportunity for our company and others to learn from the lessons of the past.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. We look forward to getting more details about your agreement with Vietnam, and we hold you to your word, and we will follow through with that agreement on Vietnam.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Thank you.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. Mr. Sherman.

Mr. SHERMAN. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, when the issue is taxation, the companies are here to tell us that the Internet should be a bastion of freedom. When we consider the Global Online Freedom Act, we are told by the companies, not that kind of freedom.

I've got a couple of quick yes/no questions. Mr. Callahan, you discovered that, as to your testimony on Shi Tao, that there were some inaccuracies in your testimony in February 2006. Are you currently aware of any other material inaccuracies in the testimony that you gave this committee February '06?

Mr. CALLAHAN. No. We are obviously concerned about the prior testimony and the concern that was created, and to the extent we do have other issues, I absolutely would bring it to the committee, sir, yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. And you have brought nothing else. So as of now, after careful review of your testimony, you are not aware of any other material inaccuracies?

Mr. CALLAHAN. That's correct, and we are looking at other areas.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask both witnesses, if either of you become aware that your testimony here today is materially inaccurate, will you bring that information to the attention of this committee in writing?

Mr. Yang, it is a yes/no question.

Mr. YANG. Yes. I think—

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. Callahan?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think you showed considerable generosity in accepting Mr. Callahan's explanation of what a harsher chairman would have said was a reason to pursue a perjury investigation. Unfortunately I didn't hear any generosity from our witnesses when it came to those who had been imprisoned in China. We had heard the witnesses say they regret the effects of their action, and we're told—I think I saw Mr. Yang bow to the victims of his company's actions. But we're not just concerned with Shi Tao, we also have three others who are in jail now because, in part, of the actions of Yahoo!, Mr. Wang, Mr. Cheng and Mr. Li.

Let me ask Mr. Yang—well, let me preface this. One of the most hypocritical things you can do is refuse to do what you are able to do and say—and distract us by talking about what's not in your power. You do not have within your power the ability to free Shi Tao, Mr. Wang, Mr. Cheng or Mr. Li, but you do have it within your power right now to tell this committee that Yahoo! will meet their humanitarian needs. Sir, are you willing to see Yahoo! meet the humanitarian needs of any one of these four prisoners?

Mr. YANG. Congressman Sherman, I appreciate your comments, and I understand your point of view. I feel we have—we understand we were involved in Mr. Wang and Mr. Shi Tao's cases. Quite frankly, we don't know what we don't know, so there might be more. I just said to—

Mr. SHERMAN. Sir, I asked you a very simple question. Are you going to meet their humanitarian needs? Or are you going to come before this committee and say, "Don't hold us accountable for meeting their humanitarian needs because we will continue to pontificate ineffectually," advocating your freedom, where the chairman indicates that your pontification is of only slight interest?

Mr. YANG. I just said to the chairman of the committee I am very open to understanding how we can be helpful.

Mr. SHERMAN. I told you how you can be helpful. You can meet their humanitarian needs. Give me a yes or no, are you going to do it, or are you not going to do it?

Mr. YANG. I'm willing to consider it, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. SHERMAN. You're willing to consider it. That's a "no" by any other standard. You are going to go home tonight and go to sleep knowing that these four individuals are in prison, knowing that you could do something to meet their humanitarian needs, and try to distract the committee by saying, well, you will come here and advocate their release. Well, I will, too, but I don't think that's going to lead to their release.

Do you have any further comment, Mr. Yang?

Mr. YANG. Congressman Sherman, I would just say that we certainly understand that we are involved in two. You named four, and I don't mean to agree or disagree with that. I don't want to answer the question with regards to necessarily all four because I'm not sure of our involvement in all four. What I am saying is I am very open—

Mr. SHERMAN. Will you—now you're shifting off and saying you don't want the other three. Well, you certainly know about the one that brought you here. Are you going to meet his family's humanitarian needs—

Mr. YANG. We're going to do our best.

Mr. SHERMAN [continuing]. Or have you not studied that case enough?

Mr. YANG. We know we are involved in two and believe we are going to do the best we can to understand what that means and have offered to meet with the families—

Mr. SHERMAN. You offered to meet with the families? Why would they want to meet with you, sir? You have led the imprisonment of their relatives, and you have come before a committee and said you will not help. Why would they give you that dignity?

Mr. YANG. We have been clear and respectfully told the committee that we believe our role was not knowing and not intentional. We understand that we have responsibilities as a global company when these things happen. We regret what's happened.

Mr. SHERMAN. You have a responsibility, but not to do anything substantive. You have a responsibility to come here before this committee, but not to do anything that you're capable of doing.

Mr. YANG. Congressman Sherman, I did not say we won't do anything. I am very deliberate in making sure that you understand that we will—

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, you haven't done anything yet, you're not willing to commit to doing anything now, and you're going to leave this room, and I'm supposed to think you're going to decide to do something next week?

Mr. YANG. Congressman, maybe we'll disagree on what we have done and what we haven't done.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, no, no, we are in full agreement on what you have done and what you haven't done. You have taken action that has led to the imprisonment of you say two, I say four individuals. You have advocated their freedom after taking action that has led to their imprisonment, and you have come before this committee to say, "I will provide not 1 penny to meet their humanitarian needs." As of now you are committed to not 1 penny. So we've got clear agreement on the facts. Are there any facts that I stated that you disagree with?

Mr. YANG. Mr. Sherman, I would just say that we are understanding and we want to make sure that our involvement in helping with the dissidents is something that we can really have an impact. And we believe—

Mr. SHERMAN. Sir, you are one of the richest companies in the country, and you don't know whether you can provide for the humanitarian needs of a couple of families? Do you have a report to make to shareholders that you are near bankruptcy and can't take on the smallest additional cash flow problem?

Mr. YANG. I understand what you are asking, and we will absolutely study it, and make sure that we understand how to help them. It is my commitment to you and the committee that we will do that.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Smith.

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Let me just say one thing you can do right away, and I appreciate you saying you will look into it and you want to be helpful. As you know, there's a case in the Northern District Court in California. The plaintiffs are Shi Tao and Wang Xiaoning and others, and you can settle that in a very favorable way to the families. It is not like there is not a pending court case that is directed at Yahoo!. You can settle it; you can announce today that you will work with and not in an adversarial position vis-à-vis the families. I would implore you to do that, to provide some sense of providing for their well-being. So you have a case right now in court and, it is my understanding, Yahoo! is going to be contesting. So settle it and settle it, I would say, generously in their favor. That would be one way you could convey to the committee and I think to your shareholders, the American people, and especially to the victims that you want—you recognize that there are true victims because of this complicity. So perhaps you could answer that first.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Thank you, Congressman Smith.

We absolutely will consider that. I think it is obviously an ongoing piece of litigation, but we absolutely would be open to opportunities to do that. I think we have already met with the counsel for the plaintiffs, and our outside counsel has done that and will continue to do that and follow up on that.

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. Again, I would say to you that this could never make it whole, but it would be a very important gesture on the behalf of Yahoo! to take this step forward. And I think it would provide leadership for others who are similarly offended.

One of the aspects of our bill is that it provides the right of an individual who has been offended, particularly when personal or identifying information has been disclosed, to sue, because it is important that a victim have recourse through our courts to get some kind of compensation to make it whole.

So, again, you have a case with very few people and others who are sitting in this committee room, the wife of and the mother of two victims who each got 10 years in a harsh, cruel prison in China. You can settle that tomorrow, if you would like. And I would tell you—and I am sure the committee would back this fully—that that would send a very clear and unambiguous message of true concern for their well-being. All of us can express concern verbally and orally, but it would seem to me that a settlement of that suit would express it tangibly.

Let me ask you, if I could, Mr. Callahan—and I do take you at your word, that you apparently did not know when you appeared before our committee that this was a political show trial, but there were red flags all over the place.

I have a copy of the actual verdict, and it makes it very clear that Yahoo! provided the information, rather than the original information emanated from Contemporary Business News, a newspaper in Hunan. I mean, there are red flags all over the request that was made that someone, clearly—and the state secrets, we all know what that is all about. That is about the public security police, which we all know are the enforcers of the political regime. They are the ones; they are the secret police. So any time they make any request, I think there ought to be a red flag as high as it can be hoisted that there is a problem with that request.

So my first question, in addition to the other, if you wanted to elaborate on it, who were the ones at Yahoo! who knew about this request—you were improperly briefed, it would appear, but there were people who did know. Were they reprimanded? Did they get promoted at Yahoo!?

If you did know at the time what you know now regarding these individuals, like Shi Tao, would you deny their request in China today if the police made that request? And are there any similar requests being made as we meet? Are we going to discover 6 months from now somebody else has been thrown into the prison or about other individuals under circumstances that approximate what happened to Shi Tao?

You talked, Mr. Yang, about tightening up the process. If you could elaborate, does that mean disclosure of information is denied to the security agents when they make that request? Are there any examples of that?

You might recall, Mr. Callahan, when I asked you during the hearing in February 2006 how many times and how many people have been investigated, prosecuted and incarcerated because of information provided by Yahoo! to Chinese officials. If you could provide that to us today. You said, at the time, that information would violate Chinese law.

Well, that begs too much, and that certainly begs the question, it seems to me, that you can't even tell us how many times Yahoo! has cooperated with the officials to put people in prison, whether it is wittingly or unwittingly. We all know the consequences. They go to jail; they are tortured. You can take that to the bank. Once they are in jail, they will be so cruelly treated. And Harry Wu knows that so well, having lived through it.

I do have some additional questions, but maybe you could start on those.

MR. CALLAHAN. As to whether or not there are current law enforcement demands at Yahoo! China, because of the operational situation I mentioned, we wouldn't be aware of that at this time. But—

MR. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. Could I just interrupt?

In Hong Kong's debut of Alibaba, the AP is reporting that the stock is sizzling. It has gone up three times its asking price, or something of that order. Great amounts of money are being made.

As you said, Mr. Yang, 40 percent of ownership is still vested in Yahoo!, if I heard you correctly, 39 to 40 percent, whatever it might be—a major, although minority, major shareholder.

I said at the time, 2 years ago, almost 2 years ago, that it does give you a plausible deniability to say, "Oh, our affiliate is doing it, but not us." You still are major shareholders. But it, again, says too much.

And I put it out, Mr. Chairman, during the horrific Holocaust, IBM Germany, with some help from IBM United States, were providing the whereabouts of the Jews throughout all of Europe, especially in Germany, in Poland and elsewhere. They just honored a lawful request that was being made of them and said, "Oh, who do you want to know about now?", and they gave them lists of Jews who then went to the concentration camps.

There certainly is a parallel here, and I don't think it is in any way hyperbole to suggest that people are being tortured and mistreated today because of that complicity and that cooperation.

So, Alibaba is not a dodge. It has plausible deniability; it has surface appeal. But it seems to me that there is still—if you really care about the victims, really care, if it was your wife or your husband or your child, would the model then fit? “Oh, it is Alibaba,” or “We are just complying with a lawful request.”

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman's time has expired.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Chairman, is it possible, just because it is Mr. Smith's bill, the Global Online Freedom—

Chairman LANTOS. I will be happy to return to Mr. Smith, but I want my other colleagues to have a chance.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Thank you.

Chairman LANTOS. Ms. Woolsey?

Ms. WOOLSEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am sitting here listening to all of this, because I knew everybody ahead of me would ask a lot of the wonderful major questions that have to be asked.

But I have a human resources hat on. I grew up through telecom in a start-up company as the human resources manager. So I am looking at the culture of Yahoo!, and it is absolutely clear—I mean, my company that I was a part of was successful but not anything like what you are doing. It is hard to hold on to your culture as an organization when you grow as fast as you are growing.

And so, as part of that culture, I mean, are you paying attention to the difference between making money and doing the right thing? I mean, you can let go—that can just go out the window so quickly.

So one of the ways, for me, of judging the sincerity of your statements today—and Mr. Smith asked this, so I will follow up, because I really want the answer. Who has been held accountable in your organization for not—not who by name—but have individuals been held accountable for not giving you the information you needed when you came here before us?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, Congresswoman. The individuals involved have apologized. They obviously feel terrible that that had happened, that Mr. Yang and I are here today to explain my prior testimony.

I have been very open with the fact that preparation should have been done better. As the responsible executive for the preparation in February 2006, I take responsibility for that, but I don't try to share with this committee that I am proud of what the outcome was. I wouldn't—I am not pleased to be back here to talk about my prior testimony.

Ms. WOOLSEY. So, now, do they get to prepare you for this one? I mean, there is something about a start-up culture that doesn't see the value of the House of Representatives. Is that part of it?

Mr. CALLAHAN. No, not at all, Congresswoman. We took our preparation very, very seriously. We had retained very strong outside counsel at Covington & Burling. We worked with both inside and outside advisors to Yahoo!. I can only say that I wish it had been done better and that I wish I had all of the facts.

Ms. WOOLSEY. I know you have told us that, but wishing and doing are—when you have a company culture, it starts from the top and it goes down. So you guys have set a pretty poor example, not just for your employees but for the rest of the industry that is successful and wants to be, as you are.

When you talk about disengagement with China not furthering the goal of a more open and informed society in China, I find that very contradictory with the fact that we can't ensure that the Internet industry can provide them with freedom of expression and privacy. I mean, what good are we doing them if we are just making money off of the people in China but they still don't have freedom? What does that solve, Mr. Callahan?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I do think that, notwithstanding the issues around my prior testimony, that it is my firm belief that the industry as a whole, and Yahoo! in particular, has done good in markets where free expression—even a censored Internet and opportunities for communication, in my opinion, do provide benefits.

But as I mentioned earlier, I share your concern about the prior preparation.

Ms. WOOLSEY. Well, as part of your company culture, it better be really clear to people that they can express themselves but they could get in trouble. They have to know that.

And one of my other thoughts—and, Mr. Yang, maybe you could help with this one. When we are trading partners—and Yahoo! is a huge trading partner with China—doesn't China benefit as well? The Chinese businesses and the Government, aren't they benefiting financially from your partnership? Or are they just letting you in for the good of their heart?

Mr. YANG. Congresswoman, I would comment by saying that I think there is a drive in China to become a more market-based economy. And I think if you look at the Internet industry, China—most of the leading companies in the industry are Chinese companies. And what I will say is our participation in that market, both while we were there as an operating company and now as an investor, perhaps, ironically, is the reason we are here discussing this. I would say that if it weren't for American companies there and engaging and participating and going through the challenges—we admit and have been very open about our challenges there. These are the discussions that I think are, to date, are being held.

Ms. WOOLSEY. Then what I would like to say—because I am going to get cut off; my time is running out—if we are important to them, I would suggest that we withhold what we are doing until they do the right thing with these dissident folks that they have put in prison—prisoners. That you have you have the power; use it.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentlewoman's time has expired.

Mr. Rohrabacher?

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Again, I would like to—I say this so often, how much I admire your leadership of this committee. And, again, I have never been more proud to be with you than today.

You mentioned, Mr. Callahan, you kept talking about how sorry you were about the inaccuracies in your testimony. And you just stated that the people who work for you, who briefed you, who, obviously, if we are taking everything at face value, did such a miserable job, about how they apologized.

Were any of those people who set up this scenario for you and put you through all of this, were any of them fired?

Mr. CALLAHAN. No, sir, they were not.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Okay. And given corporate culture what it is, you think that that sends the right kind of message to your employees or other corporate leaders if someone who made a mistake of this magnitude would not lose their job?

I don't think you can take people's apologies, even this apology you are giving us today, seriously if your corporation has not even fired those who were responsible for this "mistake."

Again, Mr. Smith mentioned if the Chinese were to make a similar demand today, or the Vietnamese or another totalitarian government, would your corporation say no to that?

And I know you have set up this legal way of saying, "Well, somebody else has the responsibility, because now it is Yahoo! China. We are only going to make a profit from that, but we are not going to take any responsibility for that."

Is it your corporate position that you will say no to requests of authoritarian governments when they ask for such help in the future?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Compliance with local law in markets like China or Vietnam or others that may restrict free expression is complicated for a couple of reasons. First and foremost, if I was—

Mr. ROHRABACHER. So the answer is, you will comply.

Mr. CALLAHAN. No, sir.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. I mean, that is a yes or no question. Are you going to comply with requests from authoritarian governments like China in the future if they have similar requests for cooperation in order to suppress a dissident?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I am sorry. I was trying to explain some of the complexity around the issue, which is—

Mr. ROHRABACHER. I know about the complexity. I want to know what your position your company has.

Mr. CALLAHAN. The position is that, as we look forward into other markets—and you mentioned Vietnam, and there may be others in the future—we are looking at ways to operationally and legally structure the entity so they would not be placed in a position to do that.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. So the answer is yes, you would cooperate by setting up a Yahoo! Vietnam who will then cooperate with the tyrant, a Yahoo! China, but you will profit from those corporations nonetheless. But you have shielded yourself from this type of moral responsibility that you are being held accountable for today.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I—sir—

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Let me go on.

Mr. Yang, you use the word "we" a lot. When you were asked direct questions about you, you kept using the word "we." Was that the corporate "we," or are you talking about your family or other people?

Mr. YANG. If you can refer to—

Mr. ROHRABACHER. You have used the word "we" when answering specific questions about yourself.

For example, let me just ask you this. You obviously are a person of great wealth. I don't know if it is proper for me to ask, but you are probably a billionaire several times over. But yet today you have been unable to answer, rather, whether you, as a person, will help people who were hurt during your acquisition of billions of dollars for your own family.

Now, are you personally—do you believe that you are personally responsible in some way for the actions of those corporations, especially Yahoo!, if they have committed crimes that have hurt other individuals? Are you personally responsible at all?

Mr. YANG. Thank you, Congressman. Let me try to do this as precise as I can.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. You have to hurry.

Mr. YANG. I understand.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. You could give me a yes or no on this, as well.

Mr. YANG. I do wear two hats. And I, as a person—and I just I have to remind people that I was very involved in the company but I was not the CEO at the time. But as a person, I feel that, terribly—I forget the way you asked the question—I feel I have some responsibility. I personally would like to help.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. How you feel is irrelevant. How you feel is irrelevant.

Mr. YANG. You asked me if it was “we” or “I.” It is “I” personally, rather than the company. I want to make sure that is clear. The company clearly needs to do what I think we ought to do now that I am CEO.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. What about you personally? Should you do that?

One last question. Have you personally met with President Hu or some of the top leaders of China?

Mr. YANG. I believe I have shaken President Hu’s hand once.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Have you been in meetings with President Hu or some of the top leaders of China?

Mr. YANG. No.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. So you have never been in a meeting?

Mr. YANG. We were in a greeting line, sir.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Okay.

Has your company, then—have you personally or has your company ever brought up the issue of human rights with the top leaders in official meetings between your company and the leader of China?

Mr. CALLAHAN. If I can jump in, Congressman. Prior to the February 2006 hearing, representatives of Yahoo! did meet with high-ranking Chinese officials to express our concern about this issue and to ask for release.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. We are not talking about this issue. We are talking about human rights.

Mr. CALLAHAN. The human rights issue and the dissident activity.

Mr. ROHRABACHER. One last note, and I respect that I only have a little bit of time.

Today we have heard testimony that you believe things are actually getting better in China. And let me just note that I don’t know if you two are religious people or not, if you have any religious convictions or not, but there are people who believe in God who are being thrown into prison and tortured because of that in China. The Falun Gong are being arrested by the thousands and tortured in China. And there is a lot of evidence to suggest that China is not going in the right direction.

And it must demoralize the people who want to take China in the right direction to see Americans, American corporations, making billions of dollars off of China trade and not bringing up and not standing clearly for the side of the freedom-lovers rather than the oppressors.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman's time has expired.

The gentleman from Oregon, Mr. Wu.

Mr. WU. Something didn't feel right when I first heard about this hearing—and, Mr. Callahan, you contacted me, and it was the first I paid attention to this, although I had heard about the prior hearings. The former dean of my law school said when something doesn't feel right in your gut, keep on digging until—keep on digging.

And about 11 o'clock p.m. last night, I found a New York Times story that really set the bells ringing in my head. The entity that contacted Yahoo! China was the Beijing State Security Bureau. It was the Beijing State Security Bureau. And that set of words makes me think that Yahoo!'s entire defense in this case just doesn't hang together.

You all are saying the law was unclear, and we have to obey local laws, and we didn't know. I mean, that is the core of your defense. But, as you know, there are several different state security apparatuses in China. One is the Public Security Bureau, and that is, like, you know, the cop on the street. But the Beijing State Security Bureau, the Guoanbu—as opposed to the Gong'anbu—the Guoanbu is the equivalent of the KGB. And, fortunately, we don't have something like that here in the United States. And this was not just any office of the Guoanbu. This was the Beijing office of the Guoanbu.

The closest that I can analogize this as to an American situation is if one of my constituents got a call from the IRS and said, "We would like you to come in and bring some documents with you," and the reaction was that is business as usual and it doesn't set off a whole bunch of alarm bells and red flags. From a corporate perspective, it would be as if you received an inquiry from the SEC or the Department of Justice, and you didn't bring that to the attention of the board of directors and set off a whole bunch of bells.

So I have a whole set of questions about corporate procedure which I will line out orally, and then ask the staff to present it with more precision in writing. And I would like to have your answers in writing.

What are the standards of due diligence for answering questions to this committee and the Congress? What due diligence did you all perform in this case, and what will you do in the future? Did you form a separate unit to investigate what the corporation did? Did you inform the board of directors of either Yahoo! China or Yahoo! USA? Did the board look into forming an independent panel to look into this matter? And if not, why not?

And I think that I am very, very concerned about what your internal procedures are, because the whole defense here seems to hang on “the law is vague, and we didn’t know,” but the fact of the matter is that there are 1.3 billion people in China. And if there is anything that I learned in my trips to China from 1978 to 1989, and then once again when I was in Congress, is that just about any child who is over the age of 5 will hit the red button, will poop in their pants if they get an inquiry from the Guoanbu, the State Security Bureau. And a corporate entity would react very, very strongly and perform very strong due diligence to find out what went on and to respond appropriately.

And then I guess the last follow-up question I have for you is, there are allegations that Yahoo! has a liaison officer with the State Security Bureau, and I would like to know if that is true or not.

The question I would like Mr. Yang to answer is: What have you all learned from this episode? And if the same thing happened again tomorrow, what, if anything, would you do differently?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Thank you, Congressman Wu, for the questions.

Taking your second question first, I am not aware of any liaison officer that Yahoo! has ever had to the SSB.

In terms of the preparation process for the February 2006 hearing, we retained outside counsel, as well as we worked with a team of inside lawyers and others who were advising and preparing for the hearing. I was prepared with draft testimony, and we obviously worked through possible questions and issues to make sure we could understand those. And it was my understanding at the time that the team had, in fact, done all of the due diligence and gotten all of the documents.

Mr. WU. But, Mr. Callahan, I think that I would like to know with precision exactly who was asked what all through the chain, not just at the corporate high level, 35,000-foot level, but also going back all the way to where the document came over the transom into the company.

Chairman LANTOS. You will have to submit those answers in writing, because we have to move on.

Mr. WU. Would it be all right if Mr. Yang were permitted to answer?

Chairman LANTOS. Yes.

Mr. YANG. Thank you, Congressman Wu.

We clearly learned we need to do a better job in congressional testimony. We clearly understand the seriousness and the gravity of these concerns and these issues.

As I have said, we believe that our China experience has taught us that, as we think about markets and different market entries, we need to conduct both business and operational but also more human rights and other types of assessments. We, as Mr. Callahan has talked about, are more rigorous around that. And I would say that we need to make sure that we can and should have better a process to understand the nature of law enforcement, to the extent we can.

And I would just say that not everything is knowable. Sometimes, in retrospect, we certainly can find out what has happened, so we now understand what kinds of things we can put in place so that we don’t find out after the fact necessarily.

So we have learned a lot, and I really do think that this kind of discussion helps us be a better company, and I appreciate that.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you for being here today.

I actually have a very positive hope for the people of China. My dad served in the Flying Tigers during World War II. He served in Kunming and Seyoung. And I have been very grateful to have the opportunity to visit China several times, and what an extraordinary country. But it could be even better, indeed, if they had a fully free political system. And I hope somehow that the evolution continues. And, certainly, you are in a position to help promote an evolution toward a fully free country where people would feel free to communicate with each other.

As we discuss this issue—and I was called away to another meeting—but I want to know how often and to what extent do Chinese authorities demand information on individual users?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I don't know the specifics on that, sir, but we obviously are aware of the case that we have been discussing here.

Mr. WILSON. And—

Chairman LANTOS. You will submit the answer in writing once you find out from your colleagues in the committee.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes. We will look into that.

Chairman LANTOS. No. You are directed to answer that question in writing once you consult with your colleagues who know the answer.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

There is, if I may point out, there is a challenge to answering that question, because we no longer control Yahoo! China. And the legal complexity of the fact that those documents themselves, as I understand it, are considered to be confidential and state secrets of themselves, it may be difficult to get those. But I obviously will do the best I can.

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. That is precisely the answer, or certainly you said, "It is my understanding, sir"—you were speaking—"that those records are prohibited from being disclosed under Chinese law because they are demands from Chinese law enforcement."

What have you done to change that? I mean, you said that almost 2 years ago. And we still, as the chairman has pointed out, we want that information: How many times, how often, who is going to jail in whole or in part because of Yahoo! or Alibaba's complicity?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Recognizing that there is the complexity that you note, Congressman Smith and Congressman Wilson, I have asked our outside counsel to conduct that kind of investigation, and we will do the best we can. And to be sure, Mr. Chairman, to your directive.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you.

And, Mr. Yang, you are certainly an international model of a person who has been very creative, phenomenally successful, and you, indeed, embody the American dream.

Is there a technology which can be developed which would promote privacy that can be established in closed societies, whether it is Cuba, Syria, China? Is there such technology that can be developed where privacy can be promoted?

Mr. YANG. Congressman Wilson, I think you are asking a question that is at the heart of the spread of the Internet and our debate here, about whether we are doing more to open societies versus than closing them. The irony is the same tools that help open up societies and same tools that enable a blogger and the same tools that access to billions of documents online can be produced, whether it is by us or by governments within the countries and the industries themselves, to do both. And I think we certainly advocate and want to do more to promote the freedom, and our deep belief is that. But, certainly, technology has and can be used in both ways.

Mr. WILSON. Well, with your extraordinary abilities and with the research capabilities that your so-well-respected company has, I just, again, hope the best for using technology to promote freedom and democracy as opposed to oppression.

And I, again, appreciate so much the efforts of our chairman and ranking member at this committee today. Thank you very much.

I yield the balance of my time.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Florida, Mr. Wexler.

Mr. WEXLER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think the more this hearing goes on, to me it suggests just how important the issues that are being talked about are and the dilemma that both the committee and companies face.

As to what precipitated this hearing, it seems to me none of us are perfect. We all make mistakes. You made mistakes. Glaring ones. You have come here; you have acknowledged them; you have apologized for them. I think that should be acknowledged by us. And you have said that you are in the process of learning lessons of the past and, I presume, applying them.

Respectfully, however, the question that the chairman asked, in terms of what has been done with respect to the family that has been victimized, and then the response, which is "nothing," is a bit chilling. It is a bit chilling to me because, given the sensitivity of these circumstances, it would seem to me that there would have been an overreaction of sorts to try to respond in any appropriate way.

I am not the CEO of a company, and I don't pretend to know how to run a company. And, Mr. Yang, I have nothing but enormous respect for what you have accomplished.

It would seem to me that, as you consider lessons learned, that one of the things you might consider is the fact that Yahoo! is not an insignificant company, that there are equities involved in terms of what benefit you bring to China, and how much Yahoo!, as a company, stands to gain by engagement in China. And there are also, of course, equities that the Chinese will judge in terms of what value Yahoo! being in China presents to the Chinese.

And it would seem to me entirely appropriate that the CEO of Yahoo! can engage in a very high-level, significant discussion with Chinese authorities and lay out what Yahoo! is comfortable doing and not doing, in terms of the lessons of this experience.

And I would think it would be greatly beneficial to this committee if, rather than taking a somewhat backseat approach, that if Yahoo! engaged directly with the Chinese Government on these very issues. I don't think it is Yahoo!'s responsibility—and I think I may certainly be in the minority here—I don't think it is Yahoo!'s responsibility as an individual company to determine the answers to all of these questions.

But given the facts of these circumstances and the position that you have found yourselves, it would seem to me reasonable that this type of engagement occur directly and use your own marketability to effect positive change.

And unless I missed it here, we have not heard that directly today. And it would give me some positive feedback if I heard that the company, after self-reflecting on what lessons have been learned, was engaging in this type of activity.

I would like to repeat, if I could, Mr. Wu's question, because I think it goes to the heart of where we stand today. And that is, if I may, if the same set of circumstances were presented to the company in China today that precipitated this whole affair, what would the response be today? Understanding that you are not the majority shareholder, but what would the company's response be today?

Mr. CALLAHAN. As to Yahoo! China, obviously the company that controls that would make that decision, as to China. But let me say that, as to future markets and as we look ahead, I would hope that we would have a structure in place and, as an industry, a framework in place or perhaps legislation in place that would accomplish just what you have noted, Congressman, that we would be able to resist these demands or have the data not be accessible.

But to your direct question, China is a different situation for us. But looking ahead, we certainly have learned from this and are working hard with industry peers and others to try to address these issues going forward.

Mr. WEXLER. Just for the record, Mr. Chairman, the state secret statute in question, if I understand it, is, in fact, a very broad statute that, in fact—if my understanding is correct—that the State Security Bureau in China, in effect, designates whatever it wishes to designate as a state secret. So if that bureau designates the color of my eyes as a state secret and then someone asks what is the color of Wexler's eyes and then somebody talks about it, then that person could be in violation of the state secret statute.

Now, that doesn't give anyone here any cover, in my mind, but in fairness, I think it needs to be brought out that companies like Yahoo!, as well as the Congress, in engaging in China on their homeland turf, are engaging in a totally unfamiliar venue. And these companies are going to have to chart their course.

And I would hope—and I will stop at this, Mr. Chairman—that the lesson learned from this process is that simply nonengagement is not good enough and that companies like Yahoo! need to be far more proactive than they apparently have been in trying to anticipate the horrific consequences that, at times, will occur from what otherwise would have been normal business behavior.

Chairman LANTOS. Thank you very much.

Much of the testimony sort of reveals that, while technologically and financially you are giants, morally you are pygmies.

This testimony this whole morning has been an appallingly disappointing performance. I simply cannot begin to tell you how disappointing Mr. Yang's and your testimony was. The attempt to obfuscate, divert, to describe this as a dialogue—this is a congressional testimony, under oath, precipitated by the outrageous behavior of the company. And apparently not much has been learned in the process.

The gentleman from Florida, Mr. Bilirakis.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I would like for both to answer this. I have two questions, quick questions.

Is your reluctance to commit any type of assistance to the family of the jailed dissident linked to the possibility of a negative reaction from the Communist Party?

And the second question is Federal records show that Yahoo!, Inc., has spent millions of dollars in recent years to lobby Congress on a host of issues.

What role did Yahoo, Inc., and its affiliates play in lobbying the Congress regarding the Global Online Freedom Act and other pieces of legislation dealing with online freedom and privacy? And if you don't know the specifics, what role would you have had Yahoo! play in this effort?

Mr. YANG. Congressman, I appreciate the question.

I have said today and in the past that we are concerned about the release of these dissidents. And I understand the moral call for myself personally, as well as the company, to do more, and we will try to do more.

But to your point, I do think the safe release of the dissidents is of key concern for us.

Mike, do you want to talk about the—

Mr. CALLAHAN. Certainly.

Sorry. I was just asking for some assistance to answer your question, sir.

As far as I am aware, Yahoo! has not lobbied directly regarding the Global Online Freedom Act. There may be trade associations that we are members of that have expressed an opinion on it. I am not aware of what their opinion was. We are a member of CCIA. We are not actively lobbying on this piece of legislation.

But as I mentioned to Congressman Smith, we absolutely would look forward to the opportunity to address it.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. The first question, the dissidents, the first question, can you answer that as well?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Do you mind repeating the question, sir?

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Okay. Is your reluctance to commit any type of assistance to the family of the jailed dissident linked to the possibility of a negative reaction of the Communist Party?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I think as Mr. Yang had expressed previously, there are some complications to direct action either—

Chairman LANTOS. Would you share with us those complications?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Sir, I am not an expert on this topic, but I do believe that—for example, I understand that when there was recognition of one of the journalists for receiving a journalism reward, my understanding is that the location of incarceration was changed to be substantially worse, related to where the person's family lives. So there is some concern and reluctance, I think, based on that point, not in terms of complications of doing direct action.

In terms of the Communist Party, I wouldn't be able to comment on that, sir. But I think there are complications related to the individuals, I think.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Crowley.

Mr. CROWLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It has been a very enlightening hearing, quite frankly. And I remember, I guess it was some—almost 19 or 20 months ago, 21 months ago, we had the initial hearing on this.

Mr. Callahan, I will start with you. I wasn't here for your testimony, but I found, in terms of your response to some questions about your past testimony—and I think, as far as I am sitting here listening to you, you come across as forthright and as earnest and contrite, in terms of your own shortcomings and those of the employees below you. And I wanted to state that for the record.

I am not as familiar with Mr. Yang, and this is the first time I have heard his testimony.

A question that—I have been sitting here talking to my friend, Mr. Wu, and it is kind of formulating as it is going along. If the Chinese Government were to come to—and this is not necessarily for Mr. Callahan, maybe for Mr. Yang.

If the Chinese Government were to come to you, or the State Security Bureau, and say, "You will lose your license to conduct business in China unless you provide information to us about activities taking place on your service in the United States," what would your reaction be? "You can't do business in China unless you tell us about activities taking place in the United States." What would your reaction be?

Mr. YANG. That we can't do business in China unless we what?

Mr. CROWLEY. Unless you provide the Chinese Government information about activities taking place in the United States about certain individuals or information they would require. What would the position of your company have been then, understanding now that there are certain firewalls that have been created?

Mr. YANG. I would say if it is information about U.S. matters, I believe that we wouldn't have to provide that information.

Mr. CROWLEY. If they said to you, "Your failure to provide to information would result in the revoking of your license," what would you say then, to do business in China?

Mr. YANG. Again, I am not sure if I understand it. I think that if it is not within—if they're making up a new law to say that, or what is—

Mr. CROWLEY. State secret police or whoever says, you know, I can't tell you, it's a secret.

Mr. YANG. I think that we, if we know it's a specific issue and that has certain specificity to it that clearly involves the U.S. or matters that we understand are interpreted to be under the scope—and, again, this is on-the-ground interpretation—we would clearly make sure that we understand the nature of it before either complying or not complying.

Mr. CROWLEY. I think the complexity of your answer is probably demonstrative of the complexity of the world we are living in today—something that can be declared a secret, the color of my eyes, the color of the suit that I am wearing, the conversation you can or can't have, whether or not you can communicate with your government in fear of losing your opportunity to do business somewhere. I think, really, it's almost like a new form of espionage that is taking place, cyber espionage, that the secret police are engaged in.

I don't envy the position that you are in. I think that part of the side here is, if you are not doing it, someone else will step in your shoes and do that for them.

Let me just switch just for a moment and ask Mr. Callahan, if you could, what steps have you all taken in terms of meeting with human rights groups, listening to their concerns? And what further steps are you taking in terms of communicating with the Chinese Government about your concerns as a corporation as well?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Certainly, with respect to the meetings with human rights groups, as part of the industry group, which includes several other leading companies including others that testified at the hearing in February 2006, which Mr. Yang mentioned was facilitated by the Center for Democracy and Technology in the Berkman Center at Harvard, there are several human rights groups—I believe Amnesty International and Human Rights in China are associated with that effort. And representatives of my team—our head of International Legal—are a part of that core group. They have regular meetings, I believe weekly conference calls. And there is a lot of activity around that effort, and that's a participatory—

Mr. CROWLEY. Has that increased since your testimony over a year ago?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes. And I would say that in—Congressman Smith, in the prior hearing, deserves the credit for getting the industry to move on this issue; that the entire human rights dialogue around the new framework started after the February 2006 testimony, and, as Mr. Yang mentioned, is expected to roll out after the first of the year.

And I recognize comments of others in the industry were maybe just as good as that. But I do think it has been a lot of progress.

In addition to the dialogue with the human rights groups, there has been an ongoing dialogue with the State Department and the Global Internet Freedom Task Force that was established there. Mr. Yang has met with senior members of the State Department, as well.

And then, previous to that, there were meetings between a high-ranking Chinese Government official and a member of my team to express concerns about this issue, as well.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I could make one point, and that is Mr. Yang is of Chinese descent, and I would hope that he would have some unique insight in terms of the history that has transpired of his own people in terms of yearning for the freedom of those within Communist China.

But I would also like to point out, as it pertains to Mr. Smith's legislation, it is my understanding that it would require Yahoo! or any other company doing business in China to report to our State Department when they have an inquiry from the secret police. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. That is correct.

Mr. CROWLEY. I think that is a very well part, portion of this bill. And I yield back. Thank you.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Manzullo.

Mr. MANZULLO. Thank you very much.

This is all very interesting. Sometimes you have to scratch your head, because at one time knowledge was discovered and now it's invented; to try to keep up with the technology is astounding.

Mr. CALLAHAN, what if the Department of Justice here in the United States asked you to reveal the screen name and information about somebody here in the United States? What would be your response to that?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Sir, we, on a global basis, we obviously respond to law enforcement demands in compliance with law but also in compliance with our privacy policy and our terms of service. So any interaction with the Department of Justice would be on that basis.

Mr. MANZULLO. So would that mean you would turn over the information?

Mr. CALLAHAN. If the information was backed up with proper legal process and similar to the way the company works in other markets.

Mr. MANZULLO. So it would be in the form of a search warrant?

Mr. CALLAHAN. There is a significant amount of complexity to law enforcement compliance globally. And we absolutely—our firm policy is to work with law enforcement consistent with the law, in compliance with the law and our privacy policy. We don't get into all of the specifics. And then, as not being the expert in it, I would be loath to sort of discuss all specifics. But, in general, that is our policy.

Mr. MANZULLO. But you have a policy, you have a procedure for when that subpoena comes; is that correct?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, sir, that's correct.

Mr. MANZULLO. From what I can tell here, in listening to this testimony, is that the correct information did not come to you from China before you testified. Is that correct?

Mr. CALLAHAN. That's correct.

Mr. MANZULLO. What happened? Can you elaborate on that?

Mr. CALLAHAN. My understanding of the situation—and, obviously, we spent some time looking into it—is that a member of the briefing team had information in question, made a good-faith judgment that they did not consider it to be material or significantly new information or different than in terms of providing circumstances or details of the case.

And I understand, in hindsight, given the concern that has been caused by the fact that I testified that we had no information about the nature of the investigation, that that judgment is, while made in good faith, was the wrong—

Mr. MANZULLO. I guess my question is: Did you actually see the communication that came from the Chinese Government with your own eyes?

Mr. CALLAHAN. No, sir. I don't recall asking for or reviewing those documents.

Mr. MANZULLO. Then who did? Was it your lawyers here, or was it the lawyers in China?

Mr. CALLAHAN. My understanding was that—obviously, the document was at the China office and that a member of the briefing team, which is a part of our legal team, regional counsel in Hong Kong, also had that information.

Mr. MANZULLO. So they never sent you a word-for-word translation of what would be the equivalent of our search warrant. Is that correct?

Mr. CALLAHAN. My team sent—no, sir. What I was told, in preparations, was that I did not—we did not have the specific details or nature of the investigation. And, obviously, we have subsequently found out that the order did, in fact, say state secrets. And—

Mr. MANZULLO. So that person with your company in China knew the information, but, either through negligence or intentionally or whatever word would be used under the circumstances, you were unaware that this was coming from this particular Chinese agency. Is that correct?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I was not aware of the specific details, and my understanding was that the order didn't share any information about the case. And my understanding, again, is that the person who had the information made that good-faith judgment.

Mr. MANZULLO. Why would that person make a good-faith judgment when it was their job simply to report to you what the communiqué was? Was this a lawyer back in China that was doing that?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I believe that the legal team at Yahoo! China had the document because they had responded to the demand from the Government. And then, as part of the preparation, other information was gathered by members of the team, but it did not make its way up the chain.

Mr. MANZULLO. So it was sloppy investigation by your part?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I absolutely agree, sir, that my preparation could have been done better.

Mr. MANZULLO. Mr. Callahan, if you had the equivalent of a search warrant that came from the Beijing State Security Office in your hand when you testified on February 15, 2006, would you have said more than what you did at that time?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Absolutely, sir.

Mr. MANZULLO. What would you have said?

Mr. CALLAHAN. If I had had that information, I would have wanted to share it with the committee, that, in fact, we did know what the order had said. I would have absolutely done that. And I wish that I had had that information to be clear in my prior testimony.

Mr. MANZULLO. There is a further problem that is coming down the line, it is that when you no longer have a controlling interest in that new company, Alibaba. So, if a similar request came today, you wouldn't even know about it. Is that correct?

Mr. CALLAHAN. That is correct.

Mr. MANZULLO. Is there something that you can do with regards to your relationship with Alibaba? Because you still own all of the software, don't you?

Mr. CALLAHAN. The business is operated by Alibaba, and I have personally impressed upon their management team that we wanted them to follow the sort of law enforcement procedures that would, you know, only respond to demands that they have to.

But to your point, sir, we wouldn't be notified if, in fact, the Yahoo! China operation, as it currently exists, received those documents.

Mr. MANZULLO. Does that come up for renewal, your licensing agreement with Yahoo! and Alibaba? Or is that a lifetime—

Mr. CALLAHAN. I am not familiar directly with the terms in the agreement.

Mr. MANZULLO. If that came up for renewal, the licensing agreement, would you consider what happened here today, and make sure that the software was so configured or that the terms of your contract with Alibaba were so stated that you would be made aware of future requests, and that the request would not be honored?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I think, as we have the opportunity to look at our relationship with that company, being informed by all of these proceedings and the knowledge that we have learned about this kind of activity in China, that would be absolutely something that we would want to address.

Mr. MANZULLO. Thank you.

Chairman LANTOS. Would you submit all of that to the committee so we can ascertain whether, in fact, Yahoo! has any continuing control capability?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Certainly, I would be willing to look into those agreements, sir.

Chairman LANTOS. That is not my question, that you are willing to look into those. Will you submit those to the committee?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Certainly. I will look at the agreements and submit them to your requests, sir.

Chairman LANTOS. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Delahunt.

Mr. DELAHUNT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for calling this hearing. I think this is very significant and very important.

You know, Mr. Callahan indicates that he would consider—I would suggest to the chair that the committee submit legislation that takes it out of the decision-making process of Mr. Callahan.

And I understand that there is a conflict, an inherent conflict. He has a responsibility to shareholders. We have a responsibility to the American people.

The transfer of the software, as described by Mr. Manzullo, in terms of Alibaba and Yahoo!, there ought to be conditionality, so that if it is a transfer without the kind of safeguards to protect dissidents and others, then there ought to be some sanction or some penalty on the transferor. That would be my recommendation.

I found it interesting that Mr. Callahan, in response to the question posed by the chair about complications, was suggesting that it was concern about the victim in this case.

Mr. Callahan, is that what the complications are about, concern for the victim? Or is it concern about liability and establishing a precedent in other cases?

Mr. CALLAHAN. What I was referring to, sir, in the question to the chair was about individuals, sir, yes.

Mr. DELAHUNT. I want to be really clear about this. The chair posed to you a question about direct action, about contact with the victims in this case, relative to a possible settlement, and your response is that it's out of your concern for the victim and the victim's family that you are not taking that step. Am I portraying that accurately?

Mr. CALLAHAN. With all due respect, sir, no. I was responding to a question from Congressman Bilirakis about, was the concern of complications of reaching out to the families related to activity or concern about the Communist Party. And then the chair respectfully asked if I would explain the complications, and it was sort of a response to both.

Mr. DELAHUNT. Well, explain; let's go down that road again. Explain what the complications are.

Mr. CALLAHAN. As I mentioned to Chairman Lantos, as I understand it, when one of the dissidents that we were talking about today, Mr. Shi Tao, was recognized with the journalism award some time this past year, an assignment of his incarceration was changed to be materially farther from—

Mr. DELAHUNT. Is that the complication, or are there other complications?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I was merely referencing that, sir, as an example of why I understand—

Mr. DELAHUNT. What are the other complications then, Mr. Callahan?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I was referring to that as an example, sir. I am not aware of any other complications, and we certainly, I think, as Mr. Yang has mentioned, that we will consider that and look at opportunities to try to do as the chairman as asked.

Mr. DELAHUNT. Well, I mean, you have members of the family sitting here behind you. You are to consider it right now, and I don't think there's any reason for any delay. Clearly they have the best interest of their family member, and I would dare say that it would go a long way to assuage the hurt, and pain, and anguish that all of them have experienced if you and Mr. Yang turned around, had a conversation with them in private, and allowed them to express their views.

With that I yield back.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, sir.

Chairman LANTOS. Mr. Smith.

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Let me just begin on the victims who really have been harmed, maybe irreparably. Again, I want to suggest and ask you, Mr. Callahan, because obviously your office plays the lead role in the court case of Wang Xiaoning, Shi Tao, Yu Ling, and as yet unnamed plaintiffs v. Yahoo! Inc. and Yahoo! Hong Kong. Obviously, some of the remedies would be the best efforts to get the detainees out of jail, stop the disclosure policy, and identify all others detained af-fectured by Yahoo!'s disclosure policy. I've asked you a number of times; we need that information, at least the number. That can't be a state secret for which Yahoo or Alibaba could be punished. And then to provide certain monetary award for legal needs as well as humanitarian needs of the families, that could be settled today, certainly by week's end, and I would again ask you to do so.

Secondly, Mr. Yang, if you could tell us exactly what you've done on the Alibaba award to protect people like Shi Tao so we don't have more cases like that in the future.

Let me ask you again to support our Global Online Freedom Act. It has been my experience with human rights legislation that very often that at the time of the hearing, and I say this with respect, there is an earnestness to try to find some consensus, but after the fact the lobbying arm, especially in association, goes into overdrive to kill the bill.

I've had so many of my human rights bills killed in the Senate with holds over the years, including the Ethiopian Human Rights Act, the Vietnam Human Rights Act, and legislation dealing with child labor. Many have gone on to become law, but it was not without Herculean efforts. It is always a group of corporate Americans who step up and say, That can't happen, and they kill it.

I would say that our minimum corporate standards, Title II in the bill, which is the essence of the bill, actually protects you, actually will give you, like the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, the ability to say, Okay, we don't have to provide bribes to government officials to do business because it is against U.S. law. It is a Great Wall to protect corporate America from being complicit. I know you don't want to be involved with this, I can see the anguish you feel for Shi Tao and others. This would give you a legal safeguard so that complicity becomes very, very remote in terms of its probabilities.

I would also ask you again as you go into Vietnam, a couple of years ago I meet with Vu Thu Ha, the wife of Dr. Pham Hong Son in Hanoi. I offered a resolution on Dr. Son's behalf. At first he got 13 years, then 5 years; now he's under house arrest.

When I met with his wife, the secret police were one table away taking her picture. She, on her way to meet Ambassador Marine in Hanoi, was actually hit by a car. They were sending a message that they didn't like his or her democracy promotion. But what was his crime? He took from the United States Embassy, Hanoi, our Embassy in Hanoi, an essay called What Is Democracy?; translated it in Vietnamese, posted it on the Net, sent it to friends, but also sent it to Communist Party officials. That's how open and transparent the guy is. But the clenched fist of the Vietnamese Government comes pounding down on his head, 13 years. We made a big deal as did other human rights activists. It was reduced to 5, and now thankfully—not thankfully, he should be free—he is under house arrest.

We don't want any kind of complicity in that. That's what this is all about. Again, I've told you before, I have a Yahoo! account. I think the Internet is a great, great potential, but if it is used by a repressive regime, obviously it becomes a tool in their tool box to hurt the dissidents and the best and bravest and brightest of a country.

We will not see a matriculation to democracy like we saw in Eastern Europe. If the Internet is used to find and capture and incarcerate all of the dissidents, they are the ones who bring freedom and hope, which means you will do more business, not less, going forward. So if you could answer those questions, I would deeply appreciate it.

Mr. YANG. Congressman Smith, I'll—first by saying that I thank you and welcome the efforts that you are doing on the Global Online Freedom Act. I feel that to hear it firsthand today is extremely important for our understanding, and obviously we understand the process of trying to understand all sides of a bill, but as a CEO of Yahoo!, I want to let you know that I think it's definitely one of the things that Congress can do to help facilitate, if not help clarify, what our roles are for companies. So I welcome that, and I look forward to some good debate about the implementation and the ability to compete.

I would just say that I think we're in a—not only sequencing of events has led us here, but also in an industry at a time in our world that I think is very interesting and, in fact, sometimes challenging. My own personal view, if you allow it, is that I think when companies operate, and when we have the government basically really creating an economic environment for us to—to—to go into places, and whether it's Vietnam or China, and China has more history for us than Vietnam coming up, I've learned now—and thank you for the opportunity to speak in front of you today—to really be more thoughtful and understand all the issues better.

I, frankly, will tell you that in 1999 when we went into China, it was a young company going into a young market, and the consequences are big if we don't really think through it. So I think to many of your members' points today, we learned we need to be a lot more deliberate and will take more responsibility both morally and ethically.

At the same time I think that the challenges are not—I understand that as a group and as a group of companies and individuals and as a group of Americans, we can do more, and I truly do believe the power of doing things together.

So thank you for opening the bill up, and I think that is something that we really do look forward to understanding more and help understand how we can do more business.

Mr. SMITH OF NEW JERSEY. And if you did endorse it, that would be very helpful.

Chairman LANTOS. Mr. Wu.

Mr. WU. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Callahan, we spent about 1 hour and 15 minutes, 1 hour and a half talking, and that's an unusual amount of time in this institution for personal meetings. And I, quite frankly, came away with a very positive impression of you, and I have nothing but admiration for a very successful company. And it is in that vein that I'm going to offer you the opportunity to answer again one of the questions that I asked earlier. And I want to say first that you are currently under oath, and the other person whose testimony I'm about to mention, that testimony is covered by the False Statements Act, 18 U.S.C. 1001, where material misrepresentation to a congressional investigator is a crime.

In answer to a committee investigator's question, Mr. Eugene Lao, I believe the counsel for Asia or general counsel for Asia, counsel in Hong Kong, said to committee staff that Yahoo!—that Yahoo! has two liaison officers or designated points of contact, one with the State Security Bureau, Guoanbu, and another liaison officer or designated point of contact; the other with the Gongganbu or the Public Security Bureau. You said in your earlier answer that there are no liaison officers with the State Security Bureau, the Guoanbu. Would you care to answer that question again? The two statements seem to be diametrically opposed, and I would hate to be in a situation where a few months from now we are holding this hearing again about contradictions from different parts of the organization.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, sir. When I answered your question before, I obviously had no knowledge of the testimony or the meeting that Mr. Lao had had, and to my knowledge until you just said that today, that's the first that I've heard of that, sir, of liaison officers, to answer your question. I was not aware of that, and certainly not aware that Mr. Lao had said that in that meeting, which I was not a part of, as you know, and there are others here who were.

Mr. WU. So is there someone in the room who can inform you now whether Yahoo! has a designated point of contact or liaison officer, one with the Gongganbu, the Public Security Bureau, and one with the Guoanbu, the State Security Bureau.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I'm not aware of anyone here in the room that does, but I will absolutely find out the answer to that question, Congressman, and get back to you on that.

Mr. WU. Are you retracting your earlier answer?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Well, I was not aware of the fact that—I have no knowledge that this officer or liaison office does exist and so—but I absolutely will check on it.

Mr. WU. Mr. Callahan, if you have no knowledge, then why did you answer that none existed?

Mr. CALLAHAN. My belief is that none did exist, sir. I'm sorry to create a misimpression.

Mr. WU. Well, don't—it seems to me that for any answer, as general counsel of the corporation, there should be a factual basis for your answer to a congressional committee.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WU. So are you saying that you answered that question without a factual basis for that answer?

Mr. CALLAHAN. I'm sorry. Congressman, having not participated in the meeting with Mr. Lao, I wasn't aware that he had indicated that there is an office as you described, and as I mentioned, that was the first I heard of it. And I am more than willing to work and understand what the facts are and come back with an answer, direct answer, to your question.

Mr. WU. As described to me by the committee staff, I think they actually intentionally interviewed you and Mr. Lao separately.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes.

Mr. WU. And—but that returns us to your prior answer.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I—

Mr. WU. And the reason for offering an answer for which may be incorrect—

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WU [continuing]. But at least for which you now assert you have no factual basis, which is what got us here to this point in the first place.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Sir, I apologize if I say this badly. I would like to correct the prior answer that I gave that there is no liaison office. I wasn't aware—I'm sorry.

My counsel is indicating—

Mr. WU. Take as much time as you want.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Apparently my prior answer was that I was not aware of such an office, and I am not aware of such an office.

Mr. WU. You have got a good counsel there.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Obviously I will find out the right answer to this question and be happy to get back to you on all the facts, Congressman Wu.

Mr. WU. I look forward to the answer to the questions I just asked and the questions that I asked previously.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WU. I yield back to the chairman.

Chairman LANTOS. Before closing this meeting, I want to do two things. I want to express my deep appreciation to the extraordinary staff work lead by Peter Yeo and the rest of the bipartisan staff which prepared this hearing.

I want to express respectful solidarity with members of the family. We will be there with you and for you irrespective of what Yahoo! will do. And before I close, I would like to turn to my friend and colleague from Florida.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Thank you for your kindness, Mr. Lantos.

I know that Mr. Callahan was about to answer Mr. Smith's question regarding the lawsuit settlement, and I wanted to give you the opportunity to answer.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Thank you.

Congressman Smith, as I expressed earlier, and I think as Mr. Yang has expressed, we absolutely will look at the opportunity as you suggest. I understand the importance to the committee and understand the importance to the issue, and I will commit to consult with our counsel about it.

Chairman LANTOS. It is mainly important to the committee, gentleman, but it ought to be a great deal more important to your own conscience. Don't accommodate the committee. Look into your own soul and see the damage you have done to an innocent human being and to his family. That is what you should respond to. Don't propitiate the committee. It will make no difference to the committee what you do, but it will make you better human beings if you recognize your own responsibility for the enormous damage your policies have created. That should be your guide.

This hearing is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 1:29 p.m., the committee was adjourned.]

MATERIAL SUBMITTED FOR THE HEARING RECORD

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE SHEILA JACKSON LEE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for convening today's important hearing. We all share a concern for the state of human rights and democracy in China, and we rely upon the expert witnesses who come before our committee to provide us, in good faith, with accurate and reliable information. If they knowingly fail to do so, this committee will take steps to follow up. I would like to thank Mr. Jerry Yang, Chief Executive Officer, and Michael J. Callahan, Esq., General Counsel, both of Yahoo! Inc., for appearing before our committee today.

Throughout its history, the People's Republic of China (PRC) has made a concerted effort to manipulate and limit the free flow of information, stifling the dissemination of dissident viewpoints. Though the advent of Internet technology initially presented a challenge to government control, and it has broadened access to news and facilitated mass communications, China has one of the most sophisticated content-filtering Internet regimes in the world, and continues to stifle online expression.

Though many in the United States have argued that, together with increasing economic openness, the growth of the Internet in China can play an important role in facilitating political liberalization in China, some private U.S. companies have been charged with aiding or complying with Chinese Internet censorship. On February 15, 2006, this Committee, then known as the International Relations Committee, held a hearing on this issue, listening to testimony from witnesses representing the State Department, Yahoo!, Microsoft, Google, and Cisco Systems, as well as several NGOs.

Mr. Callahan, you testified at this hearing, entitled "The Internet in China: A Tool for Freedom or Suppression." As Chief Counsel for Yahoo! Inc., your testimony centered on Yahoo's policies in China, as well as on the particular case of Shi Tao, a Chinese journalist and writer who was arrested for disclosure of state secrets and sentenced to 10 years in prison.

Shi Tao was arrested and imprisoned after Yahoo! China provided key information to the Chinese government. Shi, an editor at Contemporary Business News in Hunan province, had attended an editorial meeting where government officials read an internal document outlining media restrictions that would be in place before the 15th anniversary of the 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown, to occur in June 2004. After the meeting, Shi sent copies of his notes via his personal Yahoo email account to a pro-democracy group in the United States.

Subsequently, the Chinese government used a subpoena-like document to request information from Yahoo that enabled state security authorities to identify Shi, and then to arrest him in 2004 and convict him in 2005. Shi Tao is now serving a 10 year prison sentence.

Jerry Yang, co-founder and senior executive of Yahoo, has confirmed that his company gave information to the Chinese authorities. Mr. Yang has characterized his company's actions as part of the legal burden of doing business in China.

When Mr. Callahan testified before this committee last year on this case and other issues of Internet freedom in China, he stated, "When Yahoo! China in Beijing was required to provide information about the user, who we later learned was Shi Tao, we had no information about the nature of the investigation. Indeed, we were unaware of the particular facts surrounding the case until the news story emerged."

This Committee now knows that, while Mr. Callahan may not have personally known the nature of the Chinese investigation into Shi Tao, Yahoo! Inc. employees did know. A key member of the Yahoo briefing team that prepared Michael Callahan for his testimony before the committee had a copy of the subpoena-like document, which read "Your office is in possession of the following items relating to a case of suspected illegal provision of state secrets to foreign entities . . .," during the hearing preparations. In addition, Yahoo! China lawyers had a copy of the document. A "state secrets" investigation is the term commonly used by the PRC against political dissidents.

Because Mr. Callahan was testifying as an officer of Yahoo! Inc., Yahoo! itself provided false information to the United States Congress and must be held accountable for its actions. Because the terms employed by the Chinese government, when they asked for information on Shi Tao, are commonly recognized as those used against political dissidents, Yahoo! Inc. should have used some discretion in their provision of information that cost Shi Tao a 10 year jail sentence, which he is currently serving.

If Mr. Callahan truly did not know the nature of the government's inquest at the time he made his statement before this committee, it would have been his responsibility to contact the Committee and inform them that the company had provided false information upon learning the truth. However, the Committee has not been contacted by any member of Yahoo! Inc., either orally or in writing, to inform the Committee that Yahoo had provided false information to the Congress. Yahoo! Inc. has failed to take responsibility, before this Congress and the American people, for its mistakes.

In addition, even after discovering its error, the company has not conducted an internal investigation into the circumstances that led to the provision of false information to the U.S. Congress, nor has it disciplined anyone within the company for their part in the provision of false information. Perhaps the most irresponsible action, or in this case inaction, on the part of Yahoo! Inc is that to date Yahoo! China has still not changed its policies to avoid the repetition of this issue. Should the Chinese government today ask for information regarding an investigation on "state secrets," Yahoo! China would again comply.

Mr. Chairman, the facts clearly illustrate that Yahoo! Inc. provided false information to Congress in sworn testimony. Even if the witness testifying before the Committee, Mr. Callahan, did not know the nature of the Chinese government's requests, it is clear that his company did. Yahoo! Inc. had full knowledge that the investigation by the Chinese government was likely done to suppress opposition, and the company still cooperated with the government. Yahoo! Inc must take responsibility for its actions, for the 10 year sentence Shi Tao is now serving as well as the provision of false information to the Congress of the United States of America.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back the balance of my time.
