

CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE
NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

HEARING
BEFORE THE
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY
UNITED STATES SENATE
ONE HUNDRED FIFTEENTH CONGRESS
SECOND SESSION

SEPTEMBER 4, 5, 6, 7, and 27, 2018

Serial No. J-115-61

PART 1 OF 2

Printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary

CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—PART 1 of 2

CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE
NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

HEARING
BEFORE THE
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY
UNITED STATES SENATE
ONE HUNDRED FIFTEENTH CONGRESS
SECOND SESSION

SEPTEMBER 4, 5, 6, 7, and 27, 2018

Serial No. J-115-61

PART 1 OF 2

Printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, Iowa, Chairman

ORRIN G. HATCH, Utah	DIANNE FEINSTEIN, California, Ranking Member
LINDSEY O. GRAHAM, South Carolina	PATRICK J. LEAHY, Vermont
JOHN CORNYN, Texas	RICHARD J. DURBIN, Illinois
MICHAEL S. LEE, Utah	SHELDON WHITEHOUSE, Rhode Island
TED CRUZ, Texas	AMY KLOBUCHAR, Minnesota
BEN SASSE, Nebraska	CHRISTOPHER A. COONS, Delaware
JEFF FLAKE, Arizona	RICHARD BLUMENTHAL, Connecticut
MIKE CRAPO, Idaho	MAZIE K. HIRONO, Hawaii
THOM TILLIS, North Carolina	CORY A. BOOKER, New Jersey
JOHN KENNEDY, Louisiana	KAMALA D. HARRIS, California

KOLAN L. DAVIS, Chief Counsel and Staff Director
JENNIFER DUCK, Democratic Chief Counsel and Staff Director

CONTENTS

September 4, 9:35 a.m.; September 5, 9:35 a.m.; September 6, 9:33 a.m.; September 7, 9:30 a.m.; and September 27, 2018, 10:05 a.m.

STATEMENTS OF COMMITTEE MEMBERS

	Page
Blumenthal, Hon. Richard, a U.S. Senator from the State of Connecticut	72
prepared statement	939
Booker, Hon. Cory A., a U.S. Senator from the State of New Jersey	86
Coons, Hon. Christopher A., a U.S. Senator from the State of Delaware	66
prepared statement	943
Cornyn, Hon. John, a U.S. Senator from the State of Texas	36
Crapo, Hon. Mike, a U.S. Senator from the State of Idaho	83
Cruz, Hon. Ted, a U.S. Senator from the State of Texas	51
Durbin, Hon. Richard J., a U.S. Senator from the State of Illinois	39
prepared statement	948
Feinstein, Hon. Dianne, a U.S. Senator from the State of California:
September 4, 2018, opening statement	10
September 4, 2018, prepared statement	952
September 7, 2018, opening statement	516
September 27, 2018, opening statement	630
Flake, Hon. Jeff, a U.S. Senator from the State of Arizona	70
Graham, Hon. Lindsey O., a U.S. Senator from the State of South Carolina	99
Grassley, Hon. Charles E., a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa:
September 4, 2018, opening statement	1
September 4, 2018, prepared statement	955
September 5, 2018, opening statement	115
September 6, 2018, opening statement	321
September 7, 2018, opening statement	515
September 27, 2018, opening statement	627
Harris, Hon. Kamala D., a U.S. Senator from the State of California	95
prepared statement	960
Hatch, Hon. Orrin G., a U.S. Senator from the State of Utah	28
Hirono, Hon. Mazie K., a U.S. Senator from the State of Hawaii	79
prepared statement	965
Kennedy, Hon. John, a U.S. Senator from the State of Louisiana	77
Klobuchar, Hon. Amy, a U.S. Senator from the State of Minnesota	57
prepared statement	970
Leahy, Hon. Patrick J., a U.S. Senator from the State of Vermont	32
prepared statement	974
Lee, Hon. Michael S., a U.S. Senator from the State of Utah	43
Tillis, Hon. Thom, a U.S. Senator from the State of North Carolina	93
prepared statement	977
Sasse, Hon. Ben, a U.S. Senator from the State of Nebraska	60
Whitehouse, Hon. Sheldon, a U.S. Senator from the State of Rhode Island	47
prepared statement	994

IV

Page

INTRODUCERS

Blatt, Lisa S., Partner, Arnold & Porter, Washington, DC, introducing Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh, Nominee to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States	107
Portman, Hon. Rob, a U.S. Senator from the State of Ohio, introducing Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh, Nominee to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States	104
Rice, Hon. Condoleezza, Ph.D., former U.S. Secretary of State, Senior Fellow at Hoover Institution, and Professor at Stanford University, Stanford, California, introducing Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh, Nominee to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States	103

STATEMENTS OF THE NOMINEE

Witness List	734
Kavanaugh, Hon. Brett M., Nominee to serve as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States:
September 4, 2018, statement	109
September 27, 2018, statement	681
September 27, 2018, prepared statement	740
questionnaire and biographical information	742
attachment: supplemental statement of net worth	852
attachment: appendix 11(c)	855
attachment: appendix 12(d)	881
attachment: appendix 12(e)	883
attachment: appendix 13(b)	887
attachment: supplemental appendix 13(b)	905
attachment: appendix 13(c)	907
attachment: appendix 13(f)	908
attachment: appendix 14	934

STATEMENTS OF THE WITNESSES

Amar, Akhil Reed, Sterling Professor of Law and Political Science, Yale Law School, New Haven, Connecticut	542
prepared statement	1000
Baker, Alicia Wilson, Indianapolis, Indiana	536
prepared statement	1024
Christmas, Kenneth C., Jr., Executive Vice President, Business and Legal Affairs, Marvista Entertainment, Los Angeles, California	584
prepared statement	1029
Clement, Hon. Paul D., Partner, Kirkland & Ellis LLP, and former Solicitor General of the United States, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC ..	602
prepared statement	1032
Corbin, Jackson, Hanover, Pennsylvania	577
prepared statement	1038
Dean, John W., former Counsel to the President, President Richard M. Nixon, Beverly Hills, California	600
prepared statement	1041
Eastmond, Aalayah, Parkland, Florida	572
prepared statement	1047
Ford, Christine Blasey, Ph.D., Professor of Psychology, Palo Alto University, Palo Alto, California, and Research Psychologist, Stanford University School of Medicine, Stanford, California	634
prepared statement	1052
Garry, Louisa, Teacher, Friends Academy, Locust Valley, New York	529
prepared statement	1061
Garza, Rochelle M., Managing Attorney, Garza & Garza Law, Brownsville, Texas	527
prepared statement	1063
Heinzerling, Lisa, Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., Professor of Law, Georgetown University Law Center, Washington, DC	607
prepared statement	1070

	Page
Ingber, Rebecca, Associate Professor of Law, Boston University School of Law, Boston, Massachusetts	604
prepared statement	1079
Kramer, A.J., Federal Public Defender, Office of the Federal Public Defender for the District of Columbia, Washington, DC	570
prepared statement	1088
Lachance, Hunter, Kennebunkport, Maine	579
prepared statement	1094
Mahoney, Maureen E., former Deputy Solicitor General of the United States, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC	580
prepared statement	1097
Mascott, Jennifer L., former Law Clerk, and Assistant Professor of Law, George Mason University Antonin Scalia Law School, Arlington, Virginia	609
prepared statement	1102
Mastal, Monica, Real Estate Agent, Washington, DC	599
prepared statement	1106
McCloud, Luke, former Law Clerk, and Associate, Williams & Connolly LLP, Washington, DC	526
prepared statement	1108
Moxley, Paul T., Chair, American Bar Association, Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary, Salt Lake City, Utah	517
prepared statement	1110
Murray, Melissa, Professor of Law, New York University School of Law, New York, New York	540
prepared statement	1134
Olson, Hon. Theodore B., Partner, Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, and former Solicitor General of the United States, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC	535
prepared statement	1143
Richmond, Hon. Cedric L., a Representative in Congress from the State of Louisiana, and Chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, Washington, DC	532
prepared statement	1149
Shane, Peter M., Jacob E. Davis and Jacob E. Davis II Chair in Law, Ohio State University Moritz College of Law, Columbus, Ohio	611
prepared statement	1157
Sinzdak, Colleen E. Roh, former Harvard Law School Student, and Senior Associate, Hogan Lovells LLP, Washington, DC	538
prepared statement	1167
Smith, Melissa, Social Studies Teacher, U.S. Grant Public High School, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma	582
prepared statement	1170
Taibleson, Rebecca, former Law Clerk, Eastern District of Wisconsin, Foxpoint, Wisconsin	574
prepared statement	1178
Tarpley, John R., Principal Evaluator, American Bar Association, Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary, Nashville, Tennessee	518
Weintraub, Elizabeth "Liz," Advocacy Specialist, Association of University Centers on Disabilities, Silver Spring, Maryland	531
prepared statement	1181
White, Adam J., Professor and Executive Director, The C. Boyden Gray Center for the Study of the Administrative State, George Mason University Antonin Scalia Law School, Arlington, Virginia	606
prepared statement	1187

QUESTIONS

Questions submitted to John W. Dean by Senator Grassley	1318
Questions submitted to Professor Lisa Heinzerling by Senator Grassley	1319
Questions submitted to Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh by:
Senator Blumenthal	1205
attachment	1213
Follow-up questions submitted by Senator Blumenthal	1237
Senator Booker	1239
Senator Coons	1257
Senator Durbin	1270

VI

	Page
Questions submitted to Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh by—Continued
Senator Feinstein	1290
Senator Flake	1315
Senator Grassley	1316
Senator Harris	1320
Senator Hirono	1334
Senator Klobuchar	1350
Follow-up questions submitted by Senator Klobuchar	1352
Senator Leahy	1357
Senator Whitehouse	1379
Questions submitted to A.J. Kramer by Senator Durbin	1288
Questions submitted to Professor Peter M. Shane by Senator Whitehouse	1393

ANSWERS

Responses of John W. Dean to questions submitted by Senator Grassley	1655
Responses of Professor Lisa Heinzerling to questions submitted by Senator Grassley	1656
Responses of Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh to questions submitted by:
Senator Blumenthal	1565
Senator Booker	1609
Senator Coons	1537
Senator Durbin	1474
Senator Feinstein	1398
Senator Flake	1396
Senator Grassley	1394
Senator Harris	1632
Senator Hirono	1582
Senator Klobuchar	1532
Senator Leahy	1442
Senator Whitehouse	1503
Responses of A.J. Kramer to questions submitted by Senator Durbin	1657
Responses of Professor Peter M. Shane to questions submitted by Senator Whitehouse	1668

LETTERS RECEIVED WITH REGARD TO THE NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M.
KAVANAUGH TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Aaronson, Russell, et al., high school friends of Judge Brett M. Kavanaugh, September 26, 2018	2011
Aberly, Naomi, Boston, Massachusetts, et al., business owners, entrepreneurs, philanthropists, and leaders	2239
Abramowicz, Michael B., et al., legal scholars, August 28, 2018	2083
Abrams, Jamie, University of Louisville Brandeis School of Law, et al., law professors, letter to Hon. Susan M. Collins, a U.S. Senator from the State of Maine, and Hon. Lisa Murkowski, a U.S. Senator from the State of Alaska, August 29, 2018	1729
A Critical Mass: Women Celebrating Eucharist (ACM), Oakland, California, et al., religious and faith-centered organizations and communities, August 31, 2018	2270
Action NC, Charlotte, North Carolina, et al., July 20, 2018	1747
ADAPT, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, et al., national healthcare organizations, August 20, 2018	1750
Advocates for Youth, Washington, DC, et al., organizations in support of women's health, August 21, 2018	2338
Advocates for Youth, Washington, DC, et al., reproductive justice organiza- tions, August 31, 2018	2273
Advocates for Youth, Washington, DC, et al., reproductive rights organiza- tions, September 4, 2018	1725
Advocates for Youth, Washington, DC, et al., youth-led and youth-serving organizations, September 18, 2018	1756
African American Ministers in Action, Washington, DC, et al., faith-based, nontheist, and religious liberty organizations, August 27, 2018	1742
Agarwal, Amit, et al., former law clerks of Judge Kavanaugh, July 9, 2018	1966
Agarwal, Amit, et al., State Solicitors General, September 6, 2018	2290

VII

	Page
Ahearn, Beth, et al., attorneys practicing in the State of Maine, letter to Hon. Susan M. Collins, a U.S. Senator from the State of Maine, and Hon. Angus S. King, a U.S. Senator from the State of Maine, August 28, 2018	2100
Alaska Wilderness League, Washington, DC, et al., environmental groups, August 10, 2018	1716
Alicea, J. Joel, et al., former Harvard Law School students of Judge Kavanaugh, July 19, 2018	1964
Allen, Bertrand-Marc, et al., former law clerks of U.S. Supreme Court Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, August 2, 2018	1968
Alliance for Justice, Washington, DC, September 1, 2018	1760
American Association for Justice (AAJ), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018 ..	1762
American Association of People with Disabilities (AAPD), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018, letter and attachment	1765
American Association of University Women (AAUW), Washington, DC, August 30, 2018	1776
American Association of University Women (AAUW), Washington, DC, September 17, 2018	1780
American Bar Association (ABA), Chicago, Illinois, September 27, 2018	1784
American Bar Association (ABA), Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary, Paul T. Moxley, Chair, Salt Lake City, Utah, September 28, 2018	1786
American Center for Law & Justice (ACLJ), Washington, DC, August 31, 2018	1787
American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), Washington, DC, October 1, 2018	1788
American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO (AFGE), Washington, DC, Federal and District of Columbia workers, September 13, 2018 ..	1745
American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO), Washington, DC, September 10, 2018	1792
American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO (AFSCME), Washington, DC, August 28, 2018	1794
American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC), Arlington, Virginia	1796
American Network of Community Options and Resources (ANCOR), Alexandria, Virginia, August 3, 2018	1802
American Public Health Association (APHA), Washington, DC, July 26, 2018 ..	1804
American Public Health Association (APHA), Washington, DC, September 28, 2018	1805
Americans for Financial Reform, Washington, DC, September 3, 2018	1806
Americans United (AU), Washington, DC, September 10, 2018	1808
Aniskovich, Jennifer Slye, et al., women friends of Judge Kavanaugh since high school, September 14, 2018	2009
Anti-Defamation League (ADL), New York, New York, August 30, 2018	1810
Arends, Jackie, et al., women who are former White House staff members, President George W. Bush administration, August 29, 2018	1833
Asbestos Disease Awareness Organization (ADAO), Redondo Beach, California, September 3, 2018	1823
Assaf, Eugene F., et al., former Kirkland & Ellis LLP coworkers of Judge Kavanaugh, August 27, 2018	2023
Bartolomucci, H. Christopher, et al., former lawyers of the White House Counsel's Office, August 28, 2018	1971
Bash, Zina, et al., former women law clerks of Judge Kavanaugh, July 12, 2018	1973
Batlan, Felice, Professor of Law, Chicago-Kent College of Law, et al., women law faculty members, October 4, 2018	2343
Beason, Hilary H., M.D., Alabama, et al., women physicians, September 20, 2018	2376
Bennett, Robert S., Washington, DC, August 28, 2018	1826
Bergdolt, Rob, et al., Yale Law School classmates of Judge Kavanaugh, August 27, 2018	2394
Bergman, Allyson Abrams, et al., Holton Arms Class of 1984 classmates of Christine Blasey Ford, Ph.D., September 17, 2018	2001
Bidwill, Michael J., Esq., President, Arizona Cardinals, Paradise Valley, Arizona, et al., classmates of Judge Kavanaugh and alumni from Georgetown Preparatory School, July 9, 2018	1986
Black Farmers and Agriculturalists Association, Inc. (BFAA), Memphis, Tennessee, August 15, 2018	1828
Blatt, Lisa S., Partner, Arnold & Porter, Washington, DC, et al., members of the Supreme Court Bar, August 27, 2018	2301

VIII

	Page
B'nai B'rith International, Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	1830
Bond, Heidi Sacha, September 22, 2018	1831
Center for Biological Diversity, Tucson, Arizona, September 1, 2018	1836
Center for Law and Social Policy (CLASP), Washington, DC, August 31, 2018	1838
Center for Popular Democracy, The, Brooklyn, New York, September 4, 2018 .	1840
Center for Reproductive Rights, New York, New York, August 31, 2018, letter and report	1842
Chicago Council of Lawyers, Chicago, Illinois	1865
Chin, Kari, L.C.S.W., St. Petersburg, Florida, September 10, 2018	1866
Chu, Hon. Judy, Ph.D., a Representative in Congress from the State of California, and Member, Congressional Pro-Choice Caucus, et al., additional Members of Congress, October 2, 2018	2254
Cicilline, Hon. David N., a Representative in Congress from the State of Rhode Island, et al., additional Members of Congress, September 13, 2018 ..	2128
City of West Hollywood, Hon. John J. Duran, Mayor, West Hollywood, Cali- fornia, August 14, 2018, letter and City of West Hollywood City Council Resolution No. 18-5095	1878
Coghill, Hon. John, State Senator of Alaska, Juneau, Alaska, July 30, 2018	1888
Committee for Justice, The (CFJ), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	1890
Common Cause, Washington, DC, August 31, 2018	1894
Conaghan, Stephanie and Tom, et al., parents of 4th- and 5th/6th-grade girls' basketball team players, Parish of the Shrine of the Most Blessed Sacrament, Washington, DC, August 10, 2018	1824
Concerned Women for America Legislative Action Committee (CWALAC), Washington, DC, August 29, 2018	1898
Congressional Black Caucus (CBC), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	1900
Congressional Hispanic Caucus, Washington, DC, September 6, 2018	1904
Constitutional Accountability Center (CAC), Washington, DC, September 13, 2018	1906
Dargan, Gayle Connors, et al., women who attended Yale Law School with Judge Kavanaugh, August 30, 2018	2404
Davis, Angela J., American University, Washington College of Law, et al., coalition of law professors	2042
Dellinger, Walter, Douglas B. Maggs Professor Emeritus, Duke University School of Law, et al., former attorneys in the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Legal Counsel	1959
Doctors for America (DFA), Washington, DC, August 30, 2018	1916
Dreher, Will, Bridget Fahey, and Rakim Brooks, former law clerks to Judge Kavanaugh, October 1, 2018	2413
Earthjustice, Washington, DC, August 30, 2018	1918
Electronic Privacy Information Center (EPIC), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	1923
Enzler, Monsignor John J., President and Chief Executive Officer, Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of Washington, DC, August 23, 2018	2136
Equality California, Los Angeles, California, September 13, 2018	1928
Everytown for Gun Safety Action Fund, New York, New York, September 5, 2018	1931
Families USA, Washington, DC, et al., national and State healthcare organi- zations, August 14, 2018	1933
Family Equality Council, New York, New York, August 31, 2018	1938
Feinstein, Hon. Dianne, a U.S. Senator from the State of California, and Ranking Member, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, et al., the Democratic Members of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, letter to Hon. Charles E. Grassley, a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa, and Chairman of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, September 18, 2018	2967
Feinstein, Hon. Dianne, a U.S. Senator from the State of California, and Ranking Member, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, et al., the Democratic Members of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, letter to Hon. Christopher Wray, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and Donald F. McGahn, II, Counsel to the President, President Donald J. Trump, September 18, 2018	2970
Feinstein, Hon. Dianne, a U.S. Senator from the State of California, and Ranking Member, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, et al., the Democratic Members of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, letter to U.S. President Donald J. Trump, September 26, 2018	2975

IX

	Page
Feminist Majority Foundation, Arlington, Virginia, August 31, 2018	1946
Feminist Majority Foundation, Arlington, Virginia, September 20, 2018	1957
Ford, Russell, et al., family members of Christine Blasey Ford	1829
Frankel, Hon. Lois, a Representative in Congress from the State of Florida, and Chair, Democratic Women's Working Group, et al., additional Members of Congress, September 17, 2018	2108
Garner, Bryan A., Editor in Chief, "Black's Law Dictionary," and Disting- uished Research Professor of Law, Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Texas, September 2, 2018	1975
Goldscheid, Julie, et al., gender violence law professors and lawyers rep- resenting gender violence survivors, September 26, 2018	1977
Graves, Lisa, September 10, 2018	1996
Haslam, Hon. Bill, Governor of Tennessee, Nashville, Tennessee, et al., coal- ition of State Governors, July 25, 2018	1885
Huffman, Hon. Jared, a Representative in Congress from the State of Cali- fornia, et al., additional Members of Congress, September 6, 2018	2122
International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP), Alexandria, Virginia, August 31, 2018	2002
International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftworkers (BAC), Wash- ington, DC, September 21, 2018	2003
International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Imple- ment Workers of America (UAW), Detroit, Michigan, July 26, 2018	2305
Kapczynski, Amy, et al., faculty members of Yale Law School, September 21, 2018	2414
Kemp, Hon. Brian P., Secretary of State of Georgia, Atlanta, Georgia, Au- gust 2, 2018	2013
Kemp, Paul F., Rockville, Maryland, August 24, 2018, letter and attachment ..	2015
Kinkopf, Neil J., Professor of Law, Georgia State University College of Law, and Peter M. Shane, Jacob E. Davis and Jacob E. Davis II Chair in Law, Ohio State University Moritz College of Law, August 10, 2018	2019
Kuster, Hon. Ann McLane, a Representative in Congress from the State of New Hampshire, et al., additional Members of Congress, September 26, 2018	2118
Lalla, Deepa, et al., friends of Christine Blasey Ford, September 18, 2018	1673
Lambda Legal, Washington, DC, et al., national, State, and local advocacy organizations, July 31, 2018	2028
Lambda Legal, Washington, DC, et al., national, State, and local advocacy organizations, September 18, 2018	2025
LatinoJustice PRLDEF, New York, New York, August 6, 2018	2037
Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, Washington, DC, et al., civil rights organizations, September 5, 2018	1881
Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights, The, Washington, DC, and National Women's Law Center (NWLC), Washington, DC, Septem- ber 18, 2018	2303
Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights, The, Washington, DC, et al., September 3, 2018	2056
League of Conservation Voters (LCV), Washington, DC	2075
Lefkowitz, Jay P., P.C., Kirkland & Ellis LLP, August 29, 2018, letter and article	2077
Legal Momentum, New York, New York, September 26, 2018	2081
Levi, David F., former U.S. District Judge, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of California, August 7, 2018	2098
Livas, Athanasia, Yale Law School student, et al., students, alumni, and faculty members of Yale University in support of Judge Brett M. Kavanaugh, July 12, 2018	2396
Mac Avoy, Janice, Partner, Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson LLP, et al., women lawyers who jointly submitted an amicus brief in support of petitioners in Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt , September 1, 2018	2331
Martin, Ed, President, Phyllis Schlafly Eagles, St. Louis, Missouri, August 31, 2018	2105
Masagatani, Jobie M.K., Chairman, Hawaiian Homes Commission, Depart- ment of Hawaiian Home Lands, State of Hawaii, Honolulu, Hawaii, Sep- tember 18, 2018	2106
Mead, Hon. Matthew H., Governor of Wyoming, Cheyenne, Wyoming, July 26, 2018	1995
Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF), Los Angeles, California, September 5, 2018	2134

	Page
Monck, Nicholas, President, Student Bar Association, University of Colorado School of Law, et al., student bar association presidents, October 2, 2018	2295
Morrissey, Hon. Patrick, Attorney General of West Virginia, Charleston, West Virginia, et al., State Attorneys General, July 12, 2018	2292
Moschella, Hon. William E., Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legislative Affairs, U.S. Department of Justice, letter to Hon. Joseph R. Biden, Jr., a U.S. Senator from the State of Delaware, and Member, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, August 5, 2005	2946
Muslim Advocates, Oakland, California, August 31, 2018	2137
National Abortion Federation (NAF), Washington, DC, August 31, 2018	2145
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), Washington Bureau, Washington, DC, August 13, 2018	2141
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc. (LDF), New York, New York, August 31, 2018	2143
National Association of Federal Defenders (NAFD), September 12, 2018	2147
National Cattlemen's Beef Association (NCBA), Washington, DC, and Public Lands Council (PLC), Washington, DC, August 30, 2018	2148
National Center for Lesbian Rights (NCLR), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	2149
National Center for Special Education in Charter Schools (NCSECS), New York, New York, September 3, 2018	2151
National Center for Transgender Equality (NCTE), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	2153
National Coalition on Black Civic Participation, Washington, DC, et al., civil rights organizations, August 16, 2018	1883
National Congress of American Indians (NCAI), Washington, DC, and Native American Rights Fund (NARF), Boulder, Colorado, September 12, 2018	2157
National Congress of American Indians (NCAI), Washington, DC, and Native American Rights Fund (NARF), Boulder, Colorado, September 28, 2018	2159
National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), New York, New York, August 22, 2018	2160
National Education Association (NEA), Washington, DC, August 30, 2018	2161
National Education Association (NEA), Washington, DC, September 27, 2018	2164
National Employment Lawyers Association (NELA), Oakland, California, September 28, 2018	2168
National Immigration Law Center (NILC), Los Angeles, California, September 3, 2018	2170
National Latino Farmers and Ranchers Trade Association (NLFRTA), Washington, DC, August 31, 2018, letter and attachment	2172
National LGBTQ Task Force Action Fund, Washington, DC, September 12, 2018	2191
National Organization for Women (NOW), Washington, DC, September 25, 2018	2194
National Partnership for Women & Families, Washington, DC, September 13, 2018	2196
National Partnership for Women & Families, Washington, DC, September 28, 2018, letter and attachment	2202
National Shooting Sports Foundation, Inc. (NSSF), Newtown, Connecticut, August 30, 2018	2216
National Task Force to End Sexual and Domestic Violence (NTF), Seattle, Washington, September 4, 2018	2218
National Task Force to End Sexual and Domestic Violence (NTF), Seattle, Washington, September 18, 2018	2222
National Women's Law Center, Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	2224
Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC), New York, New York, September 4, 2018	2210
Network Lobby for Catholic Social Justice, Washington, DC, and Suzanne Strisik, Ph.D., Anchorage, Alaska, et al., Catholic faith leaders, September 4, 2018	1678
OCA—Asian Pacific American Advocates, Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	2229
Office of Hawaiian Affairs (OHA), State of Hawaii, Honolulu, Hawaii, September 24, 2018	2230
Pacific Palisades Democratic Club (PPDC), Pacific Palisades, Los Angeles, California, September 6, 2018	2238

	Page
Pearson, Myra, Chairwoman, Spirit Lake Nation, et al., Native women leaders of North Dakota, September 4, 2018	2226
People For the American Way, Washington, DC, August 30, 2018	2244
Physician Women for Democratic Principles (PWDP), September 21, 2018	2246
Physicians for Reproductive Health, New York, New York, September 26, 2018	2247
Planned Parenthood Action Fund, New York, New York, et al., reproductive rights, civil rights, health, justice, and advocacy organizations, September 7, 2018	1671
Planned Parenthood Federation of America and Planned Parenthood Action Fund, New York, New York, September 28, 2018	2250
Pough, Bradley, et al., members of Harvard Black Law Students Association (HBLSA), August 29, 2018	1999
Prairie Band Potawatomi Nation, Mayetta, Kansas, September 10, 2018	2252
Proctor, Michael J., and Mark Osler, Yale Law School classmates of Judge Kavanaugh, October 2, 2018	2411
Reeves, Mona, resident of California, September 18, 2018	2265
Religious Coalition for Reproductive Choice (RCRC), Washington, DC	2266
Religious Coalition for Reproductive Choice (RCRC), Washington, DC, September 20, 2018	2268
Safer, Debra, M.D., et al., supporters of Christine Blasey Ford, Ph.D.	1710
Schumer, Hon. Charles E., a U.S. Senator from the State of New York, and Minority Leader, U.S. Senate, and Hon. Dianne Feinstein, a U.S. Senator from the State of California, and Ranking Member, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, letter to U.S. President Donald J. Trump, September 21, 2018	2973
Secular Coalition for America, Washington, DC, et al., secular and religiously unaffiliated organizations, July 26, 2018	2277
Service Employees International Union (SEIU), Washington, DC, August 29, 2018	2284
Sexuality Information and Education Council of the United States (SIECUS), Washington, DC, September 4, 2018	2286
Shoemate, Scott, San Diego, California, et al., fathers and friends supporting victims of sexual assault, October 1, 2018	1941
Sierra Club, Washington, DC, July 24, 2018	2288
Sullivan, William M., Jr., Partner, Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman LLP, Washington, DC, Counsel for Christopher C. Garrett, September 26, 2018 ...	2298
Turkos, Alison, resident of New York, et al., survivors and victims of sexual assault and rape	1721
UltraViolet, survivors of sexual assault, survivors of domestic violence, and their loved ones, September 21, 2018	2307
Upmeyer, Hon. Linda, Speaker of the House, Iowa House of Representatives, Des Moines, Iowa, et al., Iowa House Republican Caucus, August 20, 2018 ..	2005
Voto Latino, Washington, DC, August 31, 2018, letter and attachment	2308
Wagner, William, President, Great Lakes Justice Center, and Distinguished Professor Emeritus, constitutional law, Lansing, Michigan	2327
Whitaker, William B., Founding President, Washington Jesuit Academy, Washington, DC, August 29, 2018	2329
Williams, Carolyn H., Williams & Connolly LLP, Washington, DC, August 28, 2018	2336
Women Lawyers On Guard Action Network, Inc., Arlington, Virginia, September 4, 2018	2368
YWCA USA, Washington, DC, August 6, 2018	2406
Zaun, Hon. Brad, State Senator of Iowa, and Chairman, Iowa Senate Judiciary Committee, Des Moines, Iowa, et al., August 17, 2018	2007

MISCELLANEOUS SUBMISSIONS FOR THE RECORD

#1600men, a list of 1,600 names of men who support the statements of Christine Blasey Ford, Ph.D., and Professor Anita Hill, The New York Times , full-page newspaper advertisement	2428
Aaron, Marjorie Corman, Cincinnati, Ohio, et al., professors of law and scholars of judicial institutions, statement	2415
Alaska Federation of Natives (AFN), Anchorage, Alaska, statement and attachment	2434

	Page
Amar, Akhil Reed, "A Liberal's Case for Brett Kavanaugh," The New York Times , July 9, 2018, op-ed article	2448
America Magazine , "The Editors: It is time for the Kavanaugh nomination to be withdrawn," September 27, 2018, editorial	2451
American Association of People with Disabilities (AAPD), Washington, DC, statement	2455
Arc, The, Washington, DC, statement	2921
Arnold, Carrie, "Life After Rape: The Sexual Assault Issue No One's Talking About; The sickening truth about PTSD among survivors," Women's Health , September 13, 2016, article	2457
Association of University Centers on Disabilities (AUCD), Silver Spring, Maryland, statement	2463
Batlan, Felice, Professor of Law, Chicago-Kent College of Law, et al., U.S. women law professors, October 3, 2018, press release	2432
Bazelton, Emily, and Eric Posner, "Who Is Brett Kavanaugh? Contrary to what supporters say, he's no originalist," The New York Times , September 3, 2018, op-ed article	2465
Blatt, Lisa, "I'm a Liberal Feminist Lawyer. Here's Why Democrats Should Support Judge Kavanaugh," Politico , August 2, 2018, article	2469
Boston Herald , "Editorial: Nix the toxic, give Brett Kavanaugh a shot," July 10, 2018, editorial	2471
"Brett Kavanaugh: Delivering for Right-Wing and Corporate Interests," report "Brett Kavanaugh in Partisan 2-1 cases: Advancing Right-Wing and Corporate Interests 91% of the Time," factsheet	2708
"Brett Kavanaugh: Siding with Conservative Amici Curiae 91% of the Time," Paul M. Collins, Jr., Ph.D., Judicial Analytics LLC, report	2429
Brettschneider, Corey, "Brett Kavanaugh's Radical View of Executive Power," Politico , September 4, 2018, op-ed article	2707
Bryant, Hon. Phil, Governor of Mississippi, Jackson, Mississippi, and Guest Columnist, "Gov. Phil Bryant: Brett Kavanaugh best choice for Supreme Court," The Clarion-Ledger , July 26, 2018, op-ed article	2726
Campaign Legal Center (CLC), Washington, DC, and Dēmos, New York, New York, July 13, 2018, statement and factsheet	2472
Center for Public Representation (CPR), Northampton, Massachusetts, statement	2950
Center for Reproductive Rights, New York, New York, "An Analysis of the Testimony of Judge Brett Kavanaugh on Issues Relating to Reproductive Rights Before the Senate Judiciary Committee," analysis	2474
Chicago Tribune , "Judging Judge Kavanaugh," July 9, 2018, editorial	2477
Chua, Amy, "Kavanaugh Is a Mentor To Women: I can't think of a better judge for my own daughter's clerkship," Wall Street Journal , July 12, 2018, op-ed article	2507
Cope, Kevin, and Joshua Fischman, "It's hard to find a federal judge more conservative than Brett Kavanaugh," The Washington Post , September 5, 2018, op-ed article	2509
Council for Native Hawaiian Advancement (CNHA), Kapolei, Hawaii, statement	2511
Detroit News, The , "Our editorial: Kavanaugh's record defies challenge," July 10, 2018, editorial	2514
Disability Rights Education and Defense Fund (DREDF), Berkeley, California, statement	2519
Earthjustice, San Francisco, California, statement	2521
Email correspondence in order of "REV" identification number:	2553
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "4A issue," message to John C. Yoo and Timothy Flanigan, September 17, 2001, email, REV_00023540	2804
Don Willett, subject: "Re: Owen/Money," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh et al., July 21, 2002, email, REV_00097139 to REV_00097140	2805
David G. Leitch, subject: "FW: Signing Statements," message to Alberto R. Gonzales et al., March 6, 2003, email, REV_00111240	2807
Benjamin A. Powell, subject: "4pm conference number," message to William Smith et al., June 5, 2003, email, REV_00120822	2808
Benjamin A. Powell, subject: "Pryor Working Group Contact List," message to William Smith et al., June 5, 2003, email, REV_00120849	2809
David G. Leitch, subject: "RE: revised draft Rehnquist statement," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh, June 26, 2003, email, REV_00124536	2810

XIII

	Page
Email correspondence in order of "REV" identification number—Continued
Bradford A. Berenson, subject: "Re: Adarand -- other considerations," message to Courtney S. Elwood et al., March 27, 2001, email, REV_00125571 to REV_00125573	2811
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "RE: Owen," message to Viet Dinh, April 3, 2002, email, REV_00214620 to REV_00214621	2814
Helgard C. Walker, subject: "Re: Removal," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh, May 6, 2002, email, REV_00215784	2816
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "Re: Justice Owen," message to H. Christopher Bartolomucci, May 15, 2002, email, REV_00216043	2817
Manuel Miranda, subject: "Highly confidential" [sic], message to Viet Dinh, Don Willett, and Brett M. Kavanaugh, July 18, 2002, email, REV_00217778	2818
Adam Charnes, subject: "Re: CA11," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh, Benjamin A. Powell, and Alberto R. Gonzales, December 11, 2002, email, REV_00223834 to REV_00223835	2819
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "Re: CA11," message to Kyle Sampson, December 16, 2002, email, REV_00223960	2821
Manuel Miranda, subject: "RE: Judiciary Dems obstruct on reorganization," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh, January 13, 2003, email, REV_00224790 to REV_00224792	2822
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "Re: Kuhl/For your prep," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh and Manuel Miranda, March 8, 2003, email, REV_00230675 to REV_00230676	2825
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "From Manny on Frist's staff," message to Wendy J. Grubbs, April 9, 2003, email, REV_00233594	2827
Joel Pardue, subject: "Emergency Umbrella Meeting Tomorrow," message to Joel Pardue and Brett M. Kavanaugh, June 5, 2003, email, REV_00237179	2828
Manuel Miranda, subject: "Help requested," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh et al., July 28, 2002, email, REV_00348846	2829
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "Re: Help requested," message to Manuel Miranda et al., July 28, 2002, email, REV_00348848 to REV_00348849	2830
Manuel Miranda, subject: "Biden and Feinstein, etc.," message to Don Willett and Brett M. Kavanaugh, July 28, 2002, email, REV_00348850	2832
Manuel Miranda, subject: "Re[2]: NEWS," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh et al., July 30, 2002, email, REV_00349085 to REV_00349086	2833
Manuel Miranda, subject: "Re[2]: Biden and Feinstein, etc.," message to Don Willett and Brett M. Kavanaugh, July 30, 2002, email, REV_00349088 to REV_00349089	2835
Manuel Miranda, subject: "Sept 5th," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh and Don Willett, August 13, 2002, email, REV_00350167	2837
Nathan Sales, subject: "Re: Estrada event on Tuesday," message to Manuel Miranda, Brian A. Benczkowski, and Brett M. Kavanaugh, February 14, 2003, email, REV_00368977 to REV_00368981	2838
Manuel Miranda, subject: "For use and not distribution," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh, March 18, 2003, email, REV_00379743 to REV_00379750	2843
Manuel Miranda, subject: "For use and not distribution," attachment to message to Brett M. Kavanaugh, March 18, 2003, email, REV_00379751 to REV_00379757	2851
James Ho, subject: "RE: Pro-choice op-eds in support of Justice Owen?," message to Brett M. Kavanaugh and Barbara Ledeen, March 24, 2003, email, REV_00381149 to REV_00381155	2858
Brett M. Kavanaugh, subject: "Sct -- interest groups intel," message to Ashley Snee et al., June 5, 2003, email, REV_00402347 to REV_00402348	2865
End Violence Against Women International (EVAWI), Colville, Washington, statement	2555
Epps, Garrett, "Brett Kavanaugh Is Devoted to the Presidency," theatlantic.com , July 10, 2018, article	2556
Ford, Christine Blasey, Ph.D., Palo Alto, California, materials submitted for the record	2524

	Page
Ford, Christine Blasey, Ph.D., Palo Alto, California, supplemental materials submitted for the record [secured file]	2548
Friedman, Richard A., M.D., “Why Sexual Assault Memories Stick: Christine Blasey Ford says she has a vivid memory of an attack that took place when she was 15. That makes sense,” The New York Times , September 19, 2018, article	2960
Grassley, Hon. Charles E., a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa, and Chairman, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, correspondence regarding allegations against Judge Kavanaugh sent to Hon. Jeff Sessions, Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, and Hon. Christopher A. Wray, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Washington, DC, November 2, 2018	2558
Grassley, Hon. Charles E., a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa, and Chairman, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, correspondence regarding allegations against Judge Kavanaugh sent to Hon. Jeff Sessions, Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, and Hon. Christopher A. Wray, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Washington, DC, October 26, 2018	2567
Grassley, Hon. Charles E., a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa, and Chairman, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, correspondence regarding allegations against Judge Kavanaugh sent to Hon. Jeff Sessions, Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, and Hon. Christopher A. Wray, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Washington, DC, October 25, 2018	2583
Grassley, Hon. Charles E., a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa, and Chairman, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, correspondence regarding investigation of potential violations for false allegations against Judge Kavanaugh sent to Hon. Jeff Sessions, Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, and Hon. Christopher A. Wray, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Washington, DC, September 29, 2018	2612
Graves, Lisa, “I Wrote Some of the Stolen Memos That Brett Kavanaugh Lied to the Senate About: He should be impeached, not elevated,” slate.com , September 7, 2018, op-ed article	2701
Heiman, Matthew, “Kavanaugh Deserves a Quick Hearing and a Favorable Vote,” insidesources.com , August 6, 2018, op-ed article	2705
Kavanaugh, Hon. Brett M., Nominee to be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Summer 1982 calendar pages	2712
Klein, Roger D., M.D., J.D., “Judge Brett Kavanaugh is the right Supreme Court appointment at the right time,” The Hill , August 15, 2018, op-ed article	2717
Las Vegas Review-Journal , “Editorial: Donald Trump nominates Brett Kavanaugh to the Supreme Court,” July 11, 2018, editorial	2722
Lopez, German, “Why didn’t Kavanaugh’s accuser come forward earlier? Police often ignore sexual assault allegations: When even those in charge of public safety don’t take sexual assault seriously, victims are going to be very cautious,” Vox.com , September 19, 2018, article	2962
Los Angeles Times , “Can the Supreme Court confirmation process ever be repaired?”, July 9, 2018, editorial	2719
Lowell Sun, The , “Editorial: Senate approval of Kavanaugh makes sense—even for Democrats,” July 12, 2018, editorial	2724
Maleck, Marisa, “Marisa Maleck column: Kavanaugh has a proven track record, Democrats should take an honest look,” Richmond Times-Dispatch , August 21, 2018, article	2729
Mayer, Jane, and Ronan Farrow, “The F.B.I. Probe Ignored Testimonies from Former Classmates of Kavanaugh,” The New Yorker , October 3, 2018, article	2731
Mormon Women for Ethical Government (MWEG), Riverton, Utah, statement	2736
NARAL Pro-Choice America, Washington, DC, statement	2764
National Alliance to End Sexual Violence (NAESV), Washington, DC, “Costs, Consequences and Solutions,” endsexualviolence.org , briefing paper	2768
National Archives News Staff, “National Archives Works to Release Records Related to Judge Kavanaugh,” archives.gov , Washington, DC, August 15, 2018, article	2771
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), Washington Bureau, Washington, DC, statement	2737

	Page
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc. (LDF), New York, New York, September 14, 2018, supplement to August 30, 2018, 94-page report on civil rights record of Judge Brett Kavanaugh	2747
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc. (LDF), New York, New York, second supplement to August 30, 2018, 94-page report on civil rights record of Judge Brett Kavanaugh	2754
National Network to End Domestic Violence (NNEDV), Washington, DC, statement	2774
National Review , “A Worthy Pick,” July 10, 2018, editorial	2777
National Sexual Violence Resource Center (NSVRC), Enola, Pennsylvania, “The Impact of Sexual Violence,” factsheet	2778
New Hampshire Union Leader , “Qualified Kavanaugh: A prudent pick for the court,” July 10, 2018, editorial	2780
New York Post , “Democrats’ demented assault on Brett Kavanaugh,” July 10, 2018, editorial	2785
Niemi, Laura, and Liane Young, Department of Psychology, Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts, “Blaming the Victim in the Case of Rape,” Psychological Inquiry: An International Journal for the Advancement of Psychological Theory , Taylor & Francis Group, LLC, Volume 25, pages 230–233, May 20, 2014, article	2781
O’Brien, Julie, “I don’t know Kavanaugh the judge. But Kavanaugh the carpool dad is one great guy,” The Washington Post , July 10, 2018, op-ed article	2787
Orange County Register and San Bernardino Sun , “Brett Kavanaugh nomination might be the calm before the storm,” July 10, 2018, editorial	2788
Orfield, Gary, Distinguished Research Professor of Education, Law, Political Science and Urban Planning, University of California, Los Angeles, California, statement	2790
Planned Parenthood Federation of America and Planned Parenthood Action Fund, New York, New York, and Washington, DC, statement	2794
Podesta, John, and Todd Stern, “Staff secretaries aren’t traffic cops. Stop treating Kavanaugh like he was one,” The Washington Post , July 30, 2018, op-ed article	2798
Post and Courier, The , “Kavanaugh the right choice,” July 10, 2018, editorial ..	2505
Public Citizen, chamberofcommerceswatch.org , Washington, DC, “Judge Brett Kavanaugh’s Decisions in Cases With Leading Business Association Involvement,” August 30, 2018, report	2800
Richmond Times-Dispatch , “Editorial: A good and decent choice for Supreme Court justice,” July 11, 2018, editorial	2867
Rivkin, David B., Jr., and Andrew M. Grossman, “Kavanaugh and the Ginsburg Standard,” Wall Street Journal , September 3, 2018, op-ed article	2868
Rizzo, Salvador, “Does Brett Kavanaugh think the president is immune from criminal charges?,” The Washington Post , July 11, 2018, analysis	2870
“The Roberts Five: Advancing Right-Wing and Corporate Interests 92% of the Time,” report	2876
“The Roberts Five: Siding with Conservative Amici Curiae 92% of the Time,” Paul M. Collins, Jr., Ph.D., Judicial Analytics LLC, report	2883
Rosenzweig, Paul, “Kavanaugh’s Exercise of Discretion,” The Atlantic , July 11, 2018, op-ed article	2884
San Diego Union-Tribune, The , “Why Supreme Court nominee Brett Kavanaugh may be more independent than you expect,” July 9, 2018, editorial	2886
Schwartz, Brian, “Trump lawyer Marc Kasowitz denies Kavanaugh ever spoke to anyone at the firm about Mueller probe, contradicting Sen. Kamala Harris claim,” CNBC.com , September 6, 2018, article	2944
Shugerman, Jed, “Brett Kavanaugh’s Legal Opinions Show He’d Give Donald Trump Unprecedented New Powers,” slate.com , July 19, 2018, article	2888
Smith, Daniel W., et al., “Delay in disclosure of childhood rape: results from a national survey,” sciencedirect.com, Child Abuse & Neglect , Volume 24, Issue 2, pages 273–287, February 2000, research article	2894
Strand, Russell W., Special Agent, retired, and Lori D. Heitman, former Supervisory Special Agent, Independent Consultants, “The Forensic Experimental Trauma Interview (FETI),” report	2897
TIME’S UP, Washington, DC, September 17, 2018, Twitter posting	2923

	Page
Tribe, Laurence H., Timothy K. Lewis, and Norman Eisen, “The Kavanaugh Nomination Must Be Paused. And He Must Recuse Himself,” Politico , September 4, 2018, op-ed article	2924
Turley, Jonathan, “No one can use Mueller probe to hold up Supreme Court nominee,” The Hill , July 3, 2018, op-ed article	2927
United States Senate Committee on the Judiciary, “Actions by Chairman Grassley and the Senate Judiciary Committee Related to Allegations Made and Disputed Regarding Judge Brett Kavanaugh,” a summary of Senate Judiciary Committee investigation of allegations, report	2907
United States Senate Committee on the Judiciary, “Allegations Against Judge Kavanaugh,” documented response and status log	2444
United States Senate Committee on the Judiciary, interview with Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh for background investigation, Washington, DC, September 17, 2018, transcript	2662
United States Senate Committee on the Judiciary, interview with Hon. Brett M. Kavanaugh for background investigation, Washington, DC, September 26, 2018, transcript	2682
United States Senate Committee on the Judiciary, “Summary of Senate Judiciary Committee Investigation,” October 4, 2018, report	2918
Walker, Justin, “Brett Kavanaugh is a great judge, a good man and great nominee,” The Courier-Journal , August 3, 2018, op-ed article	2930
Wall Street Journal , “Kavanaugh for the Court: Trump’s second nominee will be an intellectual leader on the bench,” July 9, 2018, editorial	2932
Wall Street Journal , “The Kavanaugh Hazing,” September 3, 2018, editorial ..	2935
Weekly Standard, The , “Editorial: Justice Kavanaugh?” July 10, 2018, editorial ..	2937
Wheeler, Lydia, “Sex assault survivors urge Senate to reject Kavanaugh,” The Hill , September 18, 2018, article	2939
Whelan, Ed, “Dems’ Latest Documents Hullabaloo,” National Review , September 3, 2018, article	2940
Wisconsin Coalition Against Sexual Assault (WCASA), Madison, Wisconsin, statement	2943

ADDITIONAL SUBMISSIONS FOR THE RECORD

Submissions for the record not printed due to voluminous nature, previously printed by an agency of the Federal Government, or other criteria determined by the Committee, list	2977
Ash, Elliott, and Daniel L. Chen, “Kavanaugh is radically conservative. Here’s the data to prove it: He’s to the right of, and much more political than, his peers on the federal bench,” The Washington Post: PostEverything Perspective , July 10, 2018, op-ed article	2977
Briere, John, and Diana M. Elliott, Department of Psychiatry and the Behavioral Sciences, Keck School of Medicine, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, California, “Prevalence and psychological sequelae of self-reported childhood physical and sexual abuse in a general population sample of men and women,” Child Abuse & Neglect , Volume 27, 2003, pages 1205–1222, March 2, 2002, research article	2977
Burgess, Sarah, Holton-Arms School Class of 2005, et al., “Holton-Arms Alumnae in support of Dr. Christine Blasey Ford,” letter to Hon. Charles E. Grassley, a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa and Chairman of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, and Hon. Dianne Feinstein, a U.S. Senator from the State of California and Ranking Member of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, September 25, 2018, letter	2977
Giles, Nancy R., Arizona, et al., “From Mothers in the Legal Profession: An Open Letter to Dr. Blasey Ford,” September 20, 2018, letter	2977
Goodman-Brown, Tina B., Private Practice, Newbury Park, California, et al., “Why children tell: a model of children’s disclosure of sexual abuse,” Child Abuse & Neglect , Volume 27, 2003, pages 525–540, September 9, 2002, research article	2977

	Page
Grassley, Hon. Charles E., a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa, and Chairman of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, memorandum to Senate Republicans, “Re: Senate Judiciary Committee Investigation of Numerous Allegations Against Justice Brett Kavanaugh During the Senate Confirmation Proceedings,” various exhibits include statements from witnesses Mark Judge, Leland Keyser, and Patrick Smyth, November 2, 2018, memorandum	2977
Heller v. District of Columbia , United States Court of Appeals, The District of Columbia Circuit, Decided October 4, 2011, Opinion of the Majority, Conclusion and Appendix	2977
Lawyers’ Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, Washington, DC, “Report on the Nomination of Judge Brett Kavanaugh as an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court,” 2018, report	2977
NARAL Pro-Choice America, Ilyse G. Hogue, President, Washington, DC, “In Opposition to the Confirmation of Brett Kavanaugh to the U.S. Supreme Court,” statement	2978
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc. (LDF), New York, New York, “The Civil Rights Record of Judge Brett Kavanaugh,” 94-page report	2978
People For the American Way (PFAW), Washington, DC, “The Dissents of Judge Brett Kavanaugh: A Narrow-Minded Elitist Who Is Out of the Mainstream,” report	2978
Public Citizen, Robert Weissman, President, Washington, DC, “An Analysis of Judge Kavanaugh’s Opinions in Split-Decision Cases,” August 29, 2018, report	2978
Sobel, Richard, Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race & Justice, Harvard Law School, Cambridge, Massachusetts, “The High Cost of ‘Free’ Photo Voter Identification Cards,” June 2014, research article	2978
Wenisch, Amanda Riddle, California, et al., “Open Letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee: Women Attorneys for an Honorable Judiciary,” letter to Hon. Charles E. Grassley, a U.S. Senator from the State of Iowa and Chairman of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Hon. Dianne Feinstein, a U.S. Senator from the State of California and Ranking Member of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, and Members of the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, September 25, 2018, letter	2978

CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE
NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 2018

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC.

The Committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:35 a.m., in Room SH-216, Hart Senate Office Building, Hon. Charles E. Grassley, Chairman of the Committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Grassley, Hatch, Graham, Cornyn, Lee, Cruz, Sasse, Flake, Crapo, Tillis, Kennedy, Feinstein, Leahy, Durbin, Whitehouse, Klobuchar, Coons, Blumenthal, Hirono, Booker, and Harris.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF IOWA

Chairman GRASSLEY. I welcome everyone to this confirmation hearing on the nomination of Judge——

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. Brett Kavanaugh——

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. To serve as Associate Justice on the Supreme Court of the United States.

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for a question before we proceed.

Senator HATCH. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I'd like to be recognized to ask a question before we proceed. The Committee received just last night, less than 15 hours ago, 42,000——

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. Pages of documents that we have not had an opportunity to review, or read, or analyze.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You are out of order. I will proceed.

Senator HARRIS. We cannot possibly move forward, Mr. Chairman, with this hearing——

Chairman GRASSLEY. I extend a very warm welcome——

Senator HARRIS. We have not been given an opportunity——

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. To Judge Kavanaugh——

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. To have a meaningful hearing——

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. To his wife, Ashley——

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. On this nominee.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. Their two daughters—
 Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my colleague,
 Senator Harris.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. And their family and friends—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mr. Chairman, we received 42,000 documents—

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. Judge Kavanaugh's many law clerks—

Senator KLOBUCHAR [continuing]. That we have not been able to review last night.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. And everyone else joining us today.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And we believe this hearing should be postponed.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I know this is an exciting day for all of you here—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. And you are rightly proud of Judge—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, if we cannot be recognized,
 I move to adjourn.

Chairman GRASSLEY. The American people—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to adjourn.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. Will hear directly from Judge
 Kavanaugh later this afternoon.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to adjourn.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, we have been denied—we have been denied real access to the documents we need to advise and consent—

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, regular order is called for.

Senator BLUMENTHAL [continuing]. Which turns this hearing into a charade and a mockery of our norms.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And, Mr. Chairman, I, therefore, move to adjourn this hearing.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a roll call vote on my motion to adjourn.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to adjourn. I ask for a roll call vote.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are not in executive session. We will continue as planned.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized, sir? Mr.
 Chairman, I appeal to the Chair to recognize myself or one of my colleagues.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You are out of order.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to be recognized on your sense of decency and integrity. Even the documents you have requested, Mr. Chairman, even the ones that you said, the limited documents you have requested, this Committee has not received. And the documents we have, you, sir, have——

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for regular order.

Senator BOOKER [continuing]. Should be transparent. This Committee, sir, is a violation of even the values I have heard you talk about time and time again, the ideals that we should have. What is the rush? What are we trying to hide by not having the documents out front? What is with the rush? What are we hiding by not letting those documents come out?

Sir, this Committee is a violation of the values that we, as the Committee, have striven for, transparency. We are rushing through this process in a way that is unnecessary. And I appeal for the motion to at least be voted on.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman——

Senator BOOKER. At least let us have a vote because when we wrote you a letter on August 24th——

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator——

Senator BOOKER [continuing]. Asking to have a meeting on this issue, you denied us even the right to meet, so here we are having a meeting. Let us at least debate this issue. Let us at least call this for a vote.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator——

Senator BOOKER. I appeal to your sense of fairness and decency, your commitments that you have made to transparency. This violates what you have even said and called for, sir. You have called for documents, you yourself, limited documents. We thought there should be more. We have not received the documents that you have even called for. So, sir, based upon your own principles, your own values, I call for, at least, to have a debate or a vote on these issues and not for us to rush through this process.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator——

Senator HIRONO. I have heard calls for regular order.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would like to respond. I would like to respond to Senator Booker. Senator Booker, I think that—I respect very much a lot of things you do, but you spoke about my decency and——

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. You spoke about my decency and integrity, and I think you are taking advantage of my decency and integrity, so.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, I heard calls for regular order. It is regular order for us to receive all the documents—to receive all the documents that this Committee is entitled to.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, it is also——

Chairman GRASSLEY. I think I——

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, it is also not regular order for the Majority to require——

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hirono—

Senator HIRONO [continuing]. The Minority to pre-clear our questions, our documents, and the videos we would like to use at this hearing. That is unprecedented. That is not regular order. Since when we do have to submit the questions and the process that we wish to follow to question this nominee—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator—

Senator HIRONO. I would like to have clarification. I would like your response on why you are requesting—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hirono, I would ask that you—

Senator HIRONO [continuing]. The Minority to submit our questions—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I ask that you stop so we can conduct this hearing the way we have planned it. Maybe it is not going exactly the way that the Minority would like to have it go, but we have said for a long period of time that we were going to proceed on this very day.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. And I think we ought to give the American people the opportunity to hear whether Judge Kavanaugh should be on the Supreme Court or not. And you have heard my side of the aisle call for regular order, and I think we ought to proceed in regular order. There will be plenty of opportunities to respond to the questions that the Minority is legitimately raising.

Senator HATCH. Have her thrown out of here.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. And we will—we will proceed accordingly.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, under regular order, may I ask a point of order, which is that we are now presented with a situation in which somebody has decided that there a hundred thousand documents protected by executive privilege, yet there has not been assertion of executive privilege before the Committee. How are we to determine whether executive privilege has been properly asserted if this hearing goes by without the Committee ever considering that question? Why is it not in regular order for us to determine—before the hearing at which the documents would be necessary—whether or not the assertion of privilege that prevents us from getting those documents is legitimate, or, indeed, is even an actual assertion of executive privilege? I do not understand why that is not a legitimate point of order at this point, because at the end of this hearing it is too late to consider it.

Senator LEAHY. Mr. Chairman, if I might add to this, on the integrity of the documents we have received, there really is no integrity. They have alterations. They have oddities. Attachments are missing. Emails are cut off halfway through a chain. Recipients' names are missing. They are of interest to this Committee, but it is cut off. The National Archives has not had a chance to get us all that we want even though you said on your website, the National Archives would act as a check against any political interference.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator LEAHY. But a check after the hearing is over is no check. I think we ought to at least have the National Archives finish it. And to have for the first time certainly in my 44 years here, to have somebody say there is a claim of executive privilege when the President has not made such a claim just puts everything under doubt. What are we trying to hide? Why are we rushing?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I can answer all the questions that have been raised, but I think if I answer those questions, it is going to fit into the effort of the Minority to continue to obstruct, and I do not think that that is fair to our Judge. It is not fair to our constitutional process. But let me—let me respond to those now, and then maybe we can proceed.

My colleagues on the other side are accusing the administration of using executive privilege to hide documents from the Committee. I want to say why they are wrong. Unlike President Obama's assertion of executive privilege during Fast and Furious, as one example, this assertion is not legitimate. Judge Kavanaugh was a senior lawyer in the White House. He advised the President on judicial nominations, provided legal advice on separation of powers issues, and handled litigation matters.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. As a—as the Supreme Court has put it, “Unless the President can give his advisors some assurance of confidentiality, a President could not expect to receive the full and frank submissions of facts and opinions upon which the effective discharge of his duties depends.” The issues Judge Kavanaugh worked on are exactly the sort of issues that require, according to the Supreme Court, some assurance of confidentiality.

We in the Senate and everyone else in America expects exactly the same sort of confidentiality. Most Senators would not agree to turn over their staffs' communication to anyone. For example, we did not ask for Judge Kagan's records for her service with then-Senator Biden to be turned over during her nomination. And because of attorney-client privilege, everybody has a right to keep communications from their lawyers out of Government's hands. We, therefore, did not ask for Justice Ginsburg's documents from her time with the ACLU. We did not ask for Judge Sotomayor's confidential documents from her time in private practice. It cannot be that the Senate and the ACLU are entitled to more protection than the President of the United States.

And then I will speak to the fact about the 42,000 pages. Last night, we received additional documents for the Committee's review. These were documents we requested before the hearing, and we received them before the hearing just as we requested. The Majority staff began reviewing the documents as soon as they arrived and has already completed its review. There is, thus, absolutely no reason—that is no reason to delay the hearing.

We have received and read every page of Judge Kavanaugh's extensive public record. This includes 12 years of his judicial service on the most important Federal circuit court in the country where he authored 307 opinions and joined hundreds more, amounting to more than 10,000 pages of judicial writing. We all—also received and read more than 17,000 pages of his speeches, articles, teaching materials, other documents that Judge Kavanaugh submitted with his questionnaire, the most robust questionnaire this Committee has ever issued. And, of course, we received and read more than 483,000 pages of documents from Judge Kavanaugh's extensive executive branch service. This is more pages than the last five Supreme Court nominees combined.

In short, this Committee has more materials for Judge Kavanaugh's nomination than we have had on any Supreme Court nominee in history. Senators have had more than enough time and materials to adequately assess Judge Kavanaugh's qualifications, and so, that is why I proceed.

I know that this is an exciting day for all of you in the family and all the people that are close to Judge Kavanaugh, and you are rightly proud of the Judge. The American people get to hear directly from Judge Kavanaugh later this afternoon. After this confirmation hearing and process is finished, I expect Judge Kavanaugh will become the next Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. Welcome again, Judge. Before I begin, I would want to give you, Judge, an opportunity to introduce your family.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Senator Feinstein and—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Push the red button if it is not on. Yes, we are going to—yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Senator Feinstein, and Members of the Committee. I am honored to be here today with my family: my wife, Ashley, proud West Texan, graduate of Abilene Cooper High School, now the town manager of our local community where we live, our daughters, Margaret and Liza. I thank the Committee for arranging a day off from school today.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. My mom and dad, Martha and Ed Kavanaugh; my aunt and uncle, Nancy and Mark Murphy; and my first cousins, Rosie and Elizabeth Murphy. I am very honored to be here, honored to have my family here. I am here because of them. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are delighted to have your family here. Before I make my opening remarks, I want to set out the ground rules for the hearing. I want everyone to be able to watch the hearing without obstruction. If people stand up and block the view of those behind them or speak out of turn, it is not fair or considerate to others. So, officers will immediately remove those individuals, and I thank the officers for doing the work that they have to do.

We will have 10-minute rounds of opening statements with each Member. The Ranking Member and I may go a little over 10 minutes, but I am going to ask everyone else to limit your remarks to those 10 minutes. I hope everyone will respect that. We plan on taking a 15-minute break after Senator Cruz's opening statement. After all the opening statements by Senators are complete, we will take another 15-minute round break to turn to our introducers, who will formally present the Judge. After that, I will administer the oath to the Judge, and we will close that portion of today's hearing with his testimony.

Tomorrow morning—

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman, when will we review Senator Blumenthal's motion to adjourn?

Chairman GRASSLEY. What is your motion?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I renew my motion to adjourn, Mr. Chairman. I think we are entitled to a vote on it. The responses that,

Mr. Chairman, you have given, with all due respect, really fly in the face of the norms of this Committee, our traditions, and our rules.

Senator COONS. Mr. Chairman, if I might add an additional point, I agree with my colleague. It is striking, given your long history of encouraging the executive branch to treat Minority requests equal with Majority requests, that you discouraged the National Archives from responding to Ranking Member Feinstein's request, which she tried to craft with you to be identical to the request for records for Justice Kagan. We should not proceed until we have the full documents that allow us to review the Judge's records.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And, Mr. Chairman, last Friday we learned that nearly 102,000 pages of documents from Judge Kavanaugh's work in the White House Counsel's Office are being withheld from the Committee and the public based on a claim of constitutional privilege. Executive privilege has never been invoked to block the release of Presidential records to the Senate during a Supreme Court nomination. This includes when Justice Kagan was nominated to the Supreme Court as well as Justice Roberts.

Yesterday my colleagues and I sent a letter to the White House Counsel asking that the President withdraw his claim of privilege over these documents so that they can be made available to this Committee and to the American people. We have not yet received a response to that letter, so we should not be proceeding until we have a response and these documents have been available. It is 102,000 documents.

Senator BOOKER. And, Mr. Chairman—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. My motion to adjourn, Mr. Chairman, would raise this issue of executive privilege and whether it has been properly asserted for reasons that have been outlined well by my colleague, Senator Whitehouse. There is no valid claim here of executive privilege. Even if there were one, it has not been properly asserted. The question is, what is the administration afraid of showing the American people? What is it trying to hide?

Senator BOOKER. And, Mr. Chairman, using your own words in the statement you just read, you said, I quote, "We have had more than enough time to review the documents." Sir, we just got a document dump last night of over 40,000 pages. I would venture to say not one Senator here has had time to read through those 40,000 pages, and so, we are continuing to rush through this process, a process that deserves to be scrutinized. I support Senator Blumenthal's motion to adjourn, and I hope that we can at least have a vote on that motion.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I think you would be hard pressed to find a court in the country that would not give a party litigant a continuance when the party on the other side did a 42,000-page document dump after close of business the night before trial.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, we waited for more than a year with a vacancy on the Supreme Court under the direction of your Leader in the United States Senate, and the republic survived. I think the treatment was shabby of Merrick Garland, President Obama's nominee. The fact that we cannot take a few days or weeks to have a complete review of Judge Kavanaugh's record is unfair to the American people. It is inconsistent with our responsibility under Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution to advise and consent on Supreme Court nominees.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cornyn, do you want to speak?

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, thank you. I will be very brief. I would just say that Senator Whitehouse has suggested that we handle this hearing like a court of law. But I would suggest that if this were a court of law, that virtually side—every Member on the dais on that side would held in contempt of court because this whole process is supposed to be a civil one where people get to ask questions and we get to get answers. And that is the basis upon which we are to exercise our constitutional responsibilities of advice and consent. So, I would just suggest we get on with the hearing.

Chairman GRASSLEY. If my colleagues—

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman, if I could just respond. Mr. Chairman, if I could just respond.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman.

Senator BOOKER. If we could just respond to that—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Sir, you can respond, but just a minute. If people wonder why the Chair is so patient during this whole process, I have found that it takes longer to argue why you should not do anything than let people argue why they want it. These things are going to be said throughout this hearing. We are going to be in session Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, until we get done this week, so however long people want to take. We are going to not necessarily accommodate all obstruction, but if people have got something to say, this Chairman is going to let them say it, but it gets pretty boring to hear the same thing all the time. Senator Booker, make it quick, please.

Senator BOOKER. I really appreciate the deference, Mr. Chairman. The question was why would we want to delay this, and this is not an attempt to delay. This is an attempt to be fully equipped to do our constitutional duty, which everybody, Republicans and Democrats, on this Committee take seriously. It is very hard to perform our role of advice and consent when we do not have a thorough vetting of the background of the candidate in areas which he—the candidate himself has referred to as the most formative part of his legal career, where he himself has talked about how important this period of his life is.

We are denied the full vetting. And, sir, this is not something that Democrats are asking for. I remind you that you yourself asked for a limited set of documents for when he was in the White House Counsel's Office. You yourself set that standard, and even on that limited standard, sir, we have not received the documents. And then even the documents—we've received 7 percent of them—almost half of those have been labeled "committee confidential." They cannot be put before the American people, which further undermine and inhibit our ability to ask questions to thoroughly vet this candidate and advise and consent the President of the United States.

So, sir, just on the basic ideals of fairness, the traditions of this body, we should have a thorough understanding of the nominee that is put before us so that we can vet them. To go into this hearing without those documents is an undermining of the constitutional role to which we have all sworn an oath to uphold.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for my colleague from Texas—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would like to respond to Senator Booker, and then Senator Feinstein has asked for the floor. I would like to—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask to respond to my colleague from Texas.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would like to respond to Senator Booker.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Booker, using a standard set by two Members of your political party in the caucus, and I am going to paraphrase because I do not have the exact quotes in front of me, but recently Senator Schumer said from the floor, the best judge of whether or not somebody should be on the Supreme Court is decisions that they have made at lower courts. Senator Leahy said something similar to that when Judge Sotomayor was before us, that we know—we know how many—we know what you have done in a lower court. That is the best basis for knowing whether or not you ought to be on the Supreme Court.

So, we have 307 cases that this nominee has written decisions on, as a basis for that, and we have got 488,000 other pages, and maybe the Senators have not read them, but their staff is fully informed because last night before 11 on the 42,000 pages that have come to our attention, the staff on the Republican side has gone through that.

Senator BOOKER. But, sir, then why did you ask for the White House Counsel documents?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator—

Senator BOOKER. If they were not germane to this hearing, why would you even ask for them?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Feinstein.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. For the record, that is a rate of 7,000 pages per hour. That is superhuman.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Yes.

Senator LEAHY. They are amazing. They are amazing.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, go ahead.

Senator FEINSTEIN. If I may, I have been through nine Supreme Court hearings, and—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Is this your opening statement?

Senator FEINSTEIN. It is part of it.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, why do you not make your opening statement?

Senator FEINSTEIN. Shall I?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, would you please?

[Laughter.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. There is a motion pending.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I asked for an opportunity to respond to my colleague from Texas because he has directly challenged us with—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I said you are out of order.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, Mr. Chairman—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Feinstein.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I ask in the process of regular order an opportunity to respond to what I believe was a personal attack—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Well, let me—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would like to have you give Senator Feinstein the courtesy of listening to her opening statement.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. DIANNE FEINSTEIN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Senator FEINSTEIN. Well, I was just going to say some things, and you heard that this is my ninth hearing, and I think we have got to look at this. These are very unique circumstances. Not only is the country deeply divided politically, we also find ourselves with a President who faces his own serious problems. Over a dozen Cabinet members and senior aides to President Trump have resigned, been fired, or failed their confirmations under clouds of corruption, scandal, and suspicion. The President's personal lawyer, campaign manager, deputy campaign manager, and several campaign advisors have been entangled by indictments, guilty pleas, and criminal convictions. So, it is this backdrop that this nominee comes into when what we are looking is, is he within the mainstream of American legal opinion and will he do the right thing by the Constitution.

We are also experiencing the vetting process that has cast aside tradition in favor of speed. When Justice Scalia died, Republicans refused to even meet—even a meeting in their office—with President Obama's nominee, and held the seat open for 1 year. Now with a Republican in the White House, they have changed their position. The Majority rushed into this hearing and is refusing to even look at the nominee's full record. In fact, 93 percent of the records from Kavanaugh's tenure in the White House as counsel and staff secretary have not been provided to the Senate, and 96 percent have not been given to the public.

We do know what the White House thinks of this nominee. Don McGahn, the White House Counsel, spoke to the Federalist Society and made clear Brett Kavanaugh is exactly the kind of nominee the President wanted. In his speech, Mr. McGahn discussed President Trump's two lists of potential Supreme Court nominees. One he said was filled with mainstream candidates. The other list included "candidates that are kind of too hot for primetime, the kind that really—would be really hot in the Senate, probably people who have written a lot, we really get a sense of their views, the kind of people that make people nervous." That is a quote.

Now, what I am saying, this is the backdrop into which we come into this situation, so, yes, there is frustration on this side. We know what happened with the prior nominee, the last one President Obama presented to us. He never even got a meeting. He never got a hearing. He never got a vote. And now the rush to judgment and the inability to really have a civil and positive process ends up being the result. I really regret this, but I think you have to understand the frustration on this side of the aisle.

Everyone on this side of the aisle wants to do a good job. They want time to be able to consider what the findings are, and there are tens of thousands of pages of emails and other items which could constitute findings on a whole host of major subjects that this nominee may be faced with, and they are serious. The torture issues, all of the Enron issues that he has been through, all of the kinds of things that we want to ask questions about.

So, I mean, understand where we are coming from. It is not to create a disruption. It is not to make this a very bad process. It is to say, Majority, give us the time to do our work so that we can have a positive and comprehensive hearing on the man who may well be the deciding vote for many of America's futures.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion to adjourn and Senator Harris' motion to postpone. I ask for a second.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Second the motion.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote. I ask that we—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I do not—

Senator BLUMENTHAL [continuing]. Reconvene in executive session.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I should not have to explain to you we are having a hearing. It is out of order. We are not in executive session. That would be the proper forum for entertaining motions, so—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I ask that we reconvene in executive session.

Chairman GRASSLEY. So, we will not—we will not vote on Senator Blumenthal's suggestion. We will not follow your suggestion to—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, it is a motion, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. To go into executive session. Motions will not be proper at this time.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mr. Chairman, it is a pending motion before the Committee.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, if there is no vote on this motion which has been properly seconded and which could be given a vote in executive session, this process will be tainted and stained forever. I am asking as a Member of this Committee—it is my right to do so—that we vote on my motion to adjourn and Senator Harris' motion to postpone, and that we do it in executive session which can be easily and quickly convened right now.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, the motion is out of order.

Senator BOOKER. Sir, then I make a very clear and simple motion to move into executive session so that Senator Blumenthal's motion may be considered.

Chairman GRASSLEY. The motion is out of order.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, they are not out of order, Mr. Chairman. They are properly before this Committee. Simply saying so, with all due respect, and I have great respect for the Chairman, does not make them so. It does not make them out of order just because the Chairman rules that they are out of order. We have a number of excellent lawyers in this room, and I ask that this body now do what its responsibility is to have an executive session so we can vote on a motion to adjourn, and then we can deliberately and thoughtfully consider the documents that have been presented, and also review the Committee documents that have been marked confidential without any reason or rationale.

Chairman GRASSLEY. The motion is denied.

Senator BOOKER. Sir, how long would that take, 10 minutes for us to have a motion and a vote on this process? I do not understand what the rush is that we cannot even let Senators vote on what is a very important motion germane to our constitutional duties before this—before this body before we proceed. I do not understand. It will not take that much time. What is the rush? What are we afraid of to hold a vote on the motions before us?

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a question about the process. I understand my colleagues' point, and I understand they feel strongly about this, but what are going to be the ground rules today? Are we going to be allowed to interrupt each other, interrupt the witness? Are we going to—should we seek recognition from the Chair? I just want to understand the ground rules.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Proper respect and decorum, plus how we normally have done business in a hearing like this. We would not be having all these motions. You are new to the Senate, so this is something I have never gone through before in 15 Supreme Court nominations that I have been since I have been on here. And every Member—I was interrupted before I got a chance to say what—the agenda for today, but every Member is going to get 10 minutes to make their remarks, and then we will go to the introducers of Judge Kavanaugh. There will be three of those. Then we will take the usual time of introducer, and then we will have the swearing in of Judge Kavanaugh, and then we will have his opening remarks, and then we will adjourn for today.

We will reconvene at 9:30 on Wednesday and Thursday. Each Member will have 30 minutes to ask questions or make all these points they are making right now for the first round, then there will be a second round of 20 minutes each. So, every Member is going to get 50 minutes to ask all the questions or make all the statements that they want to make in regard to anything about this candidate or anything about how this meeting is being conducted.

And then we will—we will go late into Wednesday night or Thursday night until we get done with the questioning of Judge Kavanaugh. And then on Thursday we are going to have three panels of six each, evenly divided for people that think Judge Kavanaugh should be on the Supreme Court and people that think he should not be on the Supreme Court. And we hopefully get that done Friday, but if we have to go Saturday and Sunday, we will go Saturday and Sunday until we get it all done.

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, how can we possibly talk about—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Does that answer your question, Senator Kennedy?

Senator KENNEDY. Well, if I want to—yes, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate it. If I want to say something, do I need to be recognized by the Chair?

Chairman GRASSLEY. That would be the way that it is handled. I have tried to explain to you I want to be patient because sometimes if you are not patient and you argue why something should not be done, it takes longer than it does just to listen to people. But I do not think we should have to listen to the same thing three or four times.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, patience is good, Mr. Chairman, but I just want to understand the rules. If I want to be recognized—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, you should be recognized—

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. I have—

Chairman GRASSLEY. You can understand that I have been patient and listened to people not be recognized and speak anyway, because I would like to have this be a peaceful session.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, before I try your patience, I am done.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, I have a question about ground rules.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Go ahead.

Senator HIRONO. The question is, before we can proceed, I would like to know whether the Majority is still requiring of all of the Democratic Members of this Committee to pre-clear the questions, documents, and videos that we would like to use at this hearing?

Chairman GRASSLEY. If the—I was hoping that on the subject that you just brought up that we would have some clarification of what you want, to approach that. And I am not prepared to answer that question because I do not know what the answer has been, and I do not want you to give me what you think the answer has been of discussion between our staff on that subject.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it has ever been the case in a hearing like this that the Members of this Committee have to pre-clear what we propose to query the nominee about. I think that is totally unprecedented.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And, Mr. Chairman, if we do not even know what the rules are, how can we proceed with this hearing?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would like to respond—I would like to respond to Senator Hirono. The reason why we are having that discussion is, at least in my time on this Committee and for 15 nominations, we have never had a request for a video. So, it seems to me to be courteous to all the Members of the Committee, it would be nice to know the purpose and what it might contain. You do not—any questions you want to ask, you can ask questions. It is not about what questions you were going to ask. It is about the presentation of something that has never been part of a Supreme Court hearing in the past.

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Who wanted—

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I think I will go back and forth.

Senator TILLIS.

Senator TILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am confused because I heard earlier that this was a reaction to the document releases last night. But I am reviewing a tweet from NBC that said “Democrats plotted coordinated protest strategy over the holiday weekend. All agreed to disrupt and protest the hearing, sources tell me, and subsequent Dem Leader, Chuck Schumer, led a phone call and Committee Members are executing now." So, I just want to be clear, none of the Members on this Committee participated in that phone call or that strategy before the documents were released yesterday? Is this a—are you suggesting that this allegation is false?

Senator HARRIS. This is outrageous.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, may I respond?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Durbin.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, there was a phone conference yesterday, and I can tell you at the time of the phone conference, many issues were raised. One of the issues was the fact that over a hundred thousand documents related to Judge Kavanaugh had been characterized by the Chairman of the Committee as "committee confidential." I have been a Member of this Committee for a number of years. Committee confidential documents have been really limited to extraordinarily circumstances, as an example, if someone is accused of taking drugs during the course of an investigation.

I'm not making any suggestion that that is even the case or close to it here. It was done in a confidential setting in fairness to the nominee, and the same thing on DUIs and the like. We used it in extremely rare circumstances where we would meet after this Committee hearing and sit down, and it usually related to a handful of pages or a handful of document references. Instead what we have found now is that we are seeing hundreds of thousands of documents characterized as "committee confidential" unilaterally. It is not done on a bipartisan basis. It is being done by the Chairman.

So, one of the discussions yesterday was this whole question of whether this Committee is going to hear a nominee for a lifetime appointment to the highest court in the land without access to basic information about his public record—his public record as secretary to the President of the United States, staff secretary. Thirty-five months of public service, we have been told, cannot even be considered. The documents of that service cannot even be considered.

So, I would say to the gentleman—the Senator from North Carolina, there was a conversation yesterday about these documents. I had no idea that at 11 o'clock last night 42,000 more documents would be put on top of us and we would be asked to take them up today. So, it added insult to injury.

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman—

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. We are in a hearing—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized under Rule IV. Rule IV states, "The Chairman shall entertain a non-debatable motion to bring a matter before the Committee to a vote. If there is objection to bring the matter to a vote without further debate, a roll call vote of the Committee shall be taken, and debate shall be terminated if the motion to bring the matter to a vote without further debate passes with eleven votes in the affirmative, one of which must be cast by the minority."

I ask for a vote on my motion to adjourn under Rule IV, Mr. Chairman. These are rules that we are obligated to follow. The Chairman has no right, with all due respect, to simply override them by fiat.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I ask for a second.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I second the motion.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are obligated by that rule in executive session. We are not in executive session.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would respond to the issues brought up by Senator Durbin about confidential documents. I was criticized for my decision to receive some documents on “committee confidential,” but I am doing exactly what I did during Judge Gorsuch’s confirmation and what Chairman Leahy did during Justice Kagan’s. This is another example of treating regular Committee practices as somehow out of the ordinary.

Presidential records that we receive often contain highly sensitive advice to the President as well as personal privacy information, like full names, date of birth, Social Security numbers and bank account numbers. Like my predecessor, I agreed to receive some Presidential records as “committee confidential” so that both Democrats and Republicans could begin reviewing Judge Kavanaugh’s materials much earlier. I do not know why my Democratic colleagues object to receiving documents faster, but not all of these Presidential documents remain confidential. In fact, nearly two-thirds already became public.

These records are posted on the Committee’s public website and are available to the American people. As a result, we have provided unprecedented public access to a record number of Presidential records, and do it—did it in record time. The most sensitive Presidential records remain committee confidential under Federal law, just as they were during the nominations of Kagan or Gorsuch.

But we have expanded access to these documents also. Instead of just providing access to Committee Members, we have provided access to all 100 Senators. Instead of just providing access to a very few Committee aides, we have provided access to all Committee aides. And instead of just providing access to physical binders of paper, we have provided 24/7 digital and searchable access. This is unprecedented access to committee confidential material.

I would also like to add that my staff set up workstations and have been available 24/7 to help Senators who are not on—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. Confidential materials, but not one—but not one Senator showed up. I guess Senators complaining about lack of access to confidential documents were not really interested in seeing them in the first place, but I want to emphasize more documents are widely available than in any prior Supreme Court nomination.

And then to the issue about hiding committee confidential documents, some colleagues, and you have heard it this morning, accused of hiding documents. They are suggesting that some of the committee confidential documents contain information that would be of great interest to the public. Well, just as I did last year during Justice Gorsuch's confirmation, I put a process in place that would allow my colleagues to obtain the public release of confidential documents for use during the hearing. All I asked was my colleagues to identify the documents they intended to use, and I would work to get the Department of Justice and former President Bush to agree to waive restrictions on the documents. Senator Feinstein secured the public release of 19 documents last year under this process, and Senator Klobuchar secured the release of four documents this year.

If my colleagues truly believed that other committee confidential documents should have been made public, they never told me about them and requested the ones that they wanted. Instead of scaring the American people by suggesting that we are hiding some incriminating documents, they should have made a request that I work to get the "committee confidential" designation removed. This year I received no such request except from Senator Klobuchar, which was honored and resulted in the disclosure of documents that she wanted to use during this hearing.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator LEAHY. Mr. Chairman, you stated what I did and you stated it inaccurately. I think I have the right—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I said I was paraphrasing. You can correct me any way you want to.

Senator LEAHY. It was one heck of a paraphrase when you—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Give me the exact quote.

Senator LEAHY [continuing]. When you speak about doing the same thing as with Elena Kagan. I was Chairman when Elena Kagan was here. We had 99 percent of her records from the White House that were made public 12 days—12 days—before the hearing. With Judge Kavanaugh, we have 7 percent, and only 4 percent are public. You can talk about the numbers of pages. The fact is 99 percent for Elena Kagan 12 days before the hearing. It was all available. For Judge Kavanaugh, it is 7 percent, and only 4 percent made public.

So, you know, if we are going to argue what was precedent, I would—I would point out that I have been in the Senate for 19 Supreme Court nominations. What is being done here is unprecedented, and I keep coming back to the same question I asked. What are we trying to hide? What are we hiding? What is being hidden? Why not have it open like all others? The only other time we heard a President invoke executive privilege was President Reagan during the Justice William Rehnquist hearing, and Republicans and Democrats together went to him and said do not do that. He said, okay, you are right, and he withdrew his request of executive privilege and released the documents.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman—

Senator LEAHY. I am just sorry to see the Senate Judiciary Committee descend this way. I have felt privileged to serve here under Republican and Democratic leadership for over 40 years. This is not the Senate Judiciary Committee I saw when I came to the U.S. Senate.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mr. Chairman, since my name was invoked by you, could I please respond?

Chairman GRASSLEY. After I get done. I want to give the exact quote that I was paraphrasing. Chairman Leahy said, “We have Judge Sotomayor’s record from the Federal bench. That is a public record that we had even before she was designated by the President. Judge Sotomayor’s mainstream record of judicial restraint and modesty is the best indication of her judicial philosophy. We do not have to imagine what kind of a judge she will be because we see what kind of a judge she has been.” And so, that is why my answer to “gold standard,” of whether Judge Kavanaugh ought to be on the Supreme Court, based upon what Democrats themselves have said, is the best judge of whether you should be on the Supreme Court.

Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you. Mr. Chairman—

Senator LEAHY. Wait a minute. You mentioned what I said. Let me just finish on that on Justice Sotomayor. I did say that we should look at her cases just as we should on Judge Kavanaugh’s. But you neglect to mention—carefully neglect to mention, and I think erroneously neglect to mention—that the Republicans asked for board minutes from her work at a civil rights group in the 1980s, long before she was ever even considered as a judge. You asked for that, and we got it for you. That’s the difference.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mr. Chairman.

[Voice off microphone.] Mr. Chairman.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mr. Chairman, you called on me.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before Senator Klobuchar speaks, so we have 488,000 pages of documents.

Go ahead, Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. A few points here. Number one, Justice Sotomayor never worked in the White House, so none of these issues of executive privilege or other things that we have been discussing are relevant. Number two, while I appreciate you granting my request, Mr. Chairman, on these campaign finance documents, this is all they were. This is it. This is how many pages.

Yet we have 148,000 documents that we cannot talk about publicly, and I will say they are illuminating. It shows that the nominee has a limited view of campaign finance reform. In his own words, he says that his views on the First Amendment are pure when it comes to this very important issue, and we can talk about that more in the future. But I do have a question, and that is, yes, I asked for these documents, but I have also joined several letters led by Senator Feinstein asking that all the documents that we have in the Committee be made public so that we can ask questions.

And then finally, my initial point that I am so focused on, the 102,000 pages of documents from Judge Kavanaugh’s work in the White House Counsel, I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, if you have another example of a time when executive privilege was invoked to block the release of Presidential records to the Senate during a Supreme Court nomination. As far as my research shows, this was not done for Justice Kagan or Justice Roberts, and I would like to know if you have another example of that during a Supreme Court nomination hearing.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, it was done for Justice Roberts and it was the Solicitor General position he had.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. When he was a Solicitor General, that is correct, but during the time that they worked in the White House, that is my question.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the Chair—

Senator CORNYN. I believe I have the floor.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cornyn.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for recognizing me. I have not been in as many confirmation hearings as some of my colleagues, but this is the first confirmation hearing for a Supreme Court Justice I have seen basically according to mob rule. We have rules in the Senate. We have norms for decorum. Everybody, as you pointed out, Mr. Chairman, is going to get a chance to their say.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator CORNYN. You have given everybody a chance to ask questions for up to 50 minutes. You have given them a chance to make an opening statement. Any one of our colleagues can step out here and talk to the press and make whatever comments they want to the press and tell the world how they feel about this. But the fact is it is hard to take it seriously when every single one of our colleagues in the Senate Judiciary Committee on the Democratic side have announced their opposition to this nominee even before today's hearing. So, it is hard to take seriously their claim that somehow they cannot do their job because they have been denied access to attorney-client or executive privilege documents when they have already made up their mind before the hearing. There is nothing fair about that.

And we were just asked for an opportunity for the American people to be able to listen to this nominee answer the questions that we have. And I think that is how we ought to proceed, and I hope we will.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, can I be recognized to respond specifically to that comment? There is precedent here. There are rules that can guide us. We are asking for those rules to be followed. In the past, our colleagues on the Republican side have asked for a postponement of these Committee proceedings on nominations when documents have been denied on two occasions from Senator Sessions—then-Senator Sessions, and Senator Kyl. Those requests were granted. We are asking simply that that precedent be followed, Mr. Chairman. Far from mob rule, far from contempt of the process, we are simply asking for respect here to the normal, regular order.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, go ahead.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address this “committee confidential” issue one more time because you have explained your point of view. Here is what we know. The Chairman, Chairman Grassley, who is my friend and I respect, said his reason for unilaterally designating 147,000 pages of Burck documents as “committee confidential” is because that was the condition that Bill Burck imposed on the provision of the documents. When Judge Kavanaugh was in my office meeting with us, I asked him, "Who is Bill Burck? By what authority can he restrict the information given to the Senate Judiciary Committee and to the American people? Is he a Government employee?" No one knew this mysterious Bill Burck who is filtering these documents.

So, I figured since the nominee carries the Constitution in his pocket, there must be some reference to Bill Burck in Article II, Section 2, but it just says "advice and consent of the Senate." It does not include Mr. Burck. By what authority is this man holding back hundreds of thousands of documents from the American people? Who is he? Who is paying him? So, "committee confidential" is being determined by a man, a private attorney, and we do not know who he works for, or to whom he is accountable.

Mr. Chairman, in the past when we went into committee confidential, it was in a discrete, specific area of concern involving a handful of words or accusations that have made in a document, and we were very careful to do it on a bipartisan basis. That has not been the case here where 147,000 pages have been designated by Bill Burck as outside the reach of the American people in the Senate Judiciary Committee. That is a further example of why this whole process has gone astray, and I think your explanation ignores that.

[Voice off microphone.] Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Who wants the floor?

Senator KENNEDY. The new Senator.

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Go ahead.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, can you tell me again how many documents have been produced?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Four hundred and eighty-eight thousand, minus—or, I mean, other than 28,000 pages that Justice Kavanaugh has submitted including his own judicial opinions.

Senator KENNEDY. Number two, are we in executive session or not?

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are having a hearing on the nomination of the—of a nominee for the Supreme Court.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes, sir, I got—

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are not in executive session.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. Number three, at some point are we going to get to hear from the nominee?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Hopefully it was going to be before 2:30. It will probably be later this afternoon now.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator COONS. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Can I ask my colleagues on the other side of the aisle how long you want to go on with this because I am not going to entertain any of the motions you are making. We are not in executive session, and I think we ought to level with the American people. Do you want this to go on all day because I have been patient. I have been accused of having a mob rule session. Now, if we have a mob rule session, it is because the Chairman is not running the Committee properly, but since every one of you on that side of the aisle, except Senator Booker and Senator Harris, new to the Committee, said during Justice Gorsuch's hearing, every one of you prefaced your comments on how fair I was in running that hearing. Now, this is the same Chuck Grassley that ran the Gorsuch hearing. I would like to run this hearing the same way if you will give me the courtesy of doing it.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. How long do you want to go on?

Senator COONS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one more point before we proceed, if I might.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. The accusation that this is a mob rule hearing was made by your colleague from the State of Texas. I think you have been conducting this in a respectful, appropriate, and deliberate way. My concerns that I want to renew given the exchange you just had with Senator Leahy, who has participated in or presided over more Supreme Court confirmations than any currently serving Member, I believe, was over how the document request was handled for now-Justice Kagan.

A request was sent to the National Archives. Ranking Member Feinstein tried to work with you to send an identical request to the National Archives. And before we proceed with the questioning, Mr. Chairman, I simply would like to have a settled heart about why you chose to communicate directly to the Archives, and not to respond to the Ranking Member's request.

Members of this Committee have raised issues about an unprecedented Committee process by which documents were blocked, by which they were considered classified, and by which we have been blocked from being able to share them with the American people or ask questions based on them. This is unprecedented. That is why, as you put it, this side seeks to raise issues to establish ground rules before we proceed.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You asked an appropriate question. I have an answer. I do not know whether it will satisfy you or not. Those documents are the least useful in understanding his legal views and the most sensitive to the executive branch, and let me emphasize—the most sensitive to the executive branch.

The staff secretary serves as an inbox and outbox to the Oval Office. And you are going to have opportunities to ask the nominee himself what he did then, but I am giving you my judgment about being a person that primarily was responsible for managing the paper that crosses the President's desk. His job—and if I am wrong, he can satisfy you otherwise in your questions you want to ask him. But his job was to make sure the President sees the advice of other advisers, not, as staff secretary, providing his own advice.

One of President Clinton's staff secretaries, Todd Stern, described the job this way. I quote, "The staff secretary's job is not to influence the President, but to ensure he gets a balanced diet of viewpoints from all relevant people on the staff. You are certainly not trying to put your thumb on the scale between options."

Reviewing Judge Kavanaugh's staff secretary documents would teach us nothing about his legal views. For that, we have the 307 opinions that he wrote and the hundreds more joined, totaling more than 10,000 pages of judicial writings. We also have more than 17,000 pages of speeches, articles, teaching materials, and other materials that Judge Kavanaugh attached to his 120-page written response, which I think was—Judiciary’s questionnaire was probably the most robust questionnaire ever submitted to a Supreme Court nominee.

We also have more than 480,000 pages of emails and other documents from Judge Kavanaugh’s service as an executive branch lawyer. This is a half million pages of paper, more than the last five confirmed Supreme Court nominees combined. In addition to not shedding light on Kavanaugh’s legal views, the staff secretary documents are very sensitive to the executive branch.

Let us emphasize that word “sensitive.” These documents contain highly confidential advice, including national security advice, that went directly to the President from his advisers. It would threaten the candor of future advice to Presidents if advisers knew their advice would be broadly disclosed.

Senators have more documents for Judge Kavanaugh than any nominee in Senate history. Democratic leaders insistent on getting staff documents I think was a way of not having this hearing take place at this particular time.

So can I proceed, Members of the Democratic Caucus?

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, if I may be recognized for one final point?

Chairman GRASSLEY. After you are done, can I proceed to my opening statement?

Senator HARRIS. I will defer to my colleagues. But I would just, as a point of information, we sent a letter to you, Mr. Chairman, 7 days ago regarding the “committee confidential” nature of the documents and asked if they would not be designated “committee confidential.” As another point of information, it is my understanding there are 6 million to 7 million pages of documents regarding this nominee, and it is my understanding, with all due respect, Mr. Chairman, that you have only requested 10 to 15 percent of the total.

I appreciate that there are a lot of pages of documents, but we have to have this conversation in the context of the total and the fact that we have only been given by your request 10 to 15 percent of those documents.

And my final point is this. This is a hearing about who will sit on the highest court of our land. This is a hearing that is about who will sit in a house that symbolizes our system of justice in this country.

And some of the most important principles behind the integrity of our system of justice is that we have due process and we have transparency. That is why we have public courtrooms. That is why we have requirements in courts of law in our country that there will be transparency, that both parties will be given all relevant information. We can argue then as to the weight of the documents and the significance, but not as to whether or not they are admissible.

So I object. I ask that we renew and revisit Senator Blumenthal's motion to suspend or my motion to postpone this hearing. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Thank you.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I appreciate the courtesy of the Democrats for me to proceed.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. May I just have one last opportunity regarding my motion?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Please go ahead. Please, please go ahead.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate your giving me the floor.

I have made a motion that is properly before this Committee. The Chairman said earlier that he has never been through a confirmation process like this one. The reason is that no administration in the past has engaged in this kind of concealment. That is the reason, very simply.

It is not the Chairman's doing necessarily. It is this administration that has concealed and hidden documents from us and from the American people. And so I renew my motion that we adjourn so that we can access the documents we need, review them in a deliberate and thoughtful way. Much has been done for colleagues in the past when they have requested it, and as is required under Rule IV of our rules, there is no requirement that we be in executive session to follow this rule, Mr. Chairman.

And I respectfully ask that we follow our rules, that we proceed in accordance with those norms, and I know the Chairman has great respect for open government, for whistleblowers, for sunlight as the best disinfectant. We need some sunlight in this process.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I again renew my motion to adjourn, which has been seconded by Senator Whitehouse.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Denied because we are not in executive session.

I will proceed with my—

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, before you proceed, I would just like to make one correction. There is a misconception as to what White House staff secretaries do. And, in fact, two past staff secretaries, Todd Stern and John Podesta, wrote an op-ed in the July 30, 2018, Washington Post titled, "Staff Secretaries Aren't Traffic Cops. Stop Treating Kavanaugh Like He Was One."

And, in fact, Judge Kavanaugh himself has acknowledged the importance of the time that he was White House staff secretary. So why, Mr. Chairman, you and the others on your side, keep saying that this is kind of a nothing kind of a job? Nothing could be further from the truth. And this is why we are so adamant about requesting these documents that the Judge himself, the nominee himself, has said were among the most formative times of his adult life.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Of course, that is why we have this hearing. Judge Kavanaugh—

Senator HIRONO. We do not have the documents.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Judge Kavanaugh will have an opportunity to answer every question about his role in almost anything he has done in his lifetime, I assume.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman? One—Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized, sir?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. Will you be the last one, or do you want to go on all afternoon?

Senator BOOKER. I cannot speak for my colleagues. But a lot of people I have a lot of respect for on this Committee, especially some of the new folks—I just want to answer in the most plain-spoken way I can possibly do—who are expected to evaluate a nominee who has a vast record, and if you look—and a lot of numbers have been cited—10,000 here, 40,000 here, 100,000 here. But an entire body of his record, sir, we only have 10 percent of his record that we have been able to evaluate.

Ninety percent of it has been withheld from Senators, 90 percent of his records. So we are asking to evaluate a candidate, to have intelligent questions and insights into his record, but we only have 10 percent of that record.

We can go on and on about the numbers of documents—100,000, 10,000—but the fact is we are about to proceed with a historic hearing. We are about to proceed toward having a hearing on someone having a lifetime appointment on the most important court in the land that will effectuate so many of the areas of American life, from civil rights to women's rights, to access to healthcare. All of this stuff is being decided, and we are going into this only having 10 percent, access to 10 percent of the body of work of this man's career.

That seems to me just common sense—90 percent is missing right now. Just common sense says we should have access to thoroughly evaluate this person. We are not asking for anything out of the ordinary.

Other candidates have come before. People can talk about tens of thousands here, hundreds of thousands here. But we have gotten far more for every Supreme Court Justice that has been mentioned here, far more than just 10 percent just to scan a bit.

My colleagues talk about what our duty to the American public is. Our duty to the American public is to evaluate a candidate on their body of work, but we are not even getting released that, and why? Because some political person, not a person who holds public office, not because—I mean, it is unprecedented to think that this Committee has ceded its role to a partisan outside lawyer.

And so here we are about to go forward with just 10 percent of this person's record to evaluate, to base our questions on, to investigate. Ninety percent is being withheld. Just common sense would say that that is not fair, that is not right. It undermines our ability to do our job. It is just plain wrong.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. One of the Senate's most solemn constitutional duties is to provide advice and consent to the President on the nomination of Supreme Court Justices. We are here this week to hear from Brett Kavanaugh, to hear about his exceptional qualifications, his record of dedication to the rule of law, and his demonstrated independence and his appreciation of the importance of the separation of powers.

Indeed, to protect individual liberty, the Framers designed a Government of three co-equal branches, strictly separating legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The Framers intended for the judiciary to be immune from the political pressures the other two face. That is so that judges would decide cases according to the law and not according to popular opinion.

Now, 230 years after ratification, our legal system is the envy of the world. It provides our people stability, predictability, protection of our rights, and equal access to justice. But this is only possible when judges are committed to the rule of law.

Our legal system's success is built on judges accepting that their role is limited to deciding cases and controversies. A good judge exercises humility and makes decisions according to the specific facts of the case and, of course, according to the law.

A good judge never—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. A good judge never bases decisions on his preferred policy preferences. A good judge also has courage, recognizing that we have an independent judiciary to restrain judges when that Government exceeds lawful authority.

President Andrew Jackson said, "All the rights secured to the citizens under the Constitution are worth nothing, and a mere bubble, except guaranteed to them by an independent and virtuous judiciary."

Confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominees are an independent—are a very important opportunity to discuss the appropriate role of judges. As I see it, and I expect many of my colleagues will agree, the role of the judge is to apply the law as written, even if the legal result is not one the judge personally likes.

Justice Scalia has often been quoted because he was fond of saying if a judge always likes the outcome of the cases he decides, he is probably doing something wrong. I do not want judges who always reach a liberal result or a conservative result. I want a judge who rules the way the law requires.

Judges must leave the lawmaking to Congress, the elected representatives of the people. Judges and Justices have lifetime appointments. They cannot be voted out of office if they legislate. Whereas if Congress legislates something that people do not like, then you can vote them out of office. That is why they are to interpret law and not make law.

Now some have a very different view of what a judge's role should be. According to this view, judges should decide cases based upon particular outcomes in order to advance their politics. But the American people do not want their judges to pick sides before they hear a case. They want a judge who rules based upon what the law commands.

This is the reason why all Supreme Court nominees since Ginsburg have declined to offer their personal opinions on the correctness of precedent. Seeking assurances from a nominee on how he will vote in certain cases or how he views certain precedent undermines judicial independence and essentially asks for a promise in exchange for a confirmation vote.

It is unfair and unethical. Indeed, what litigant could expect a fair shake if the judge has already pre-judged the case before the litigant even enters the courtroom?

I expect Judge Kavanaugh—in fact, it is my advice to him to follow the example set by Justice Ginsburg, and all the nominees that followed her, that a nominee should offer “no hints, no forecasts, no previews” on how they will vote.

Justice Kagan, when asked about Roe v. Wade, said the following, “I do not believe it would be appropriate for me to comment on the merits of Roe v. Wade other than to say that it is settled law entitled to precedential weight. The application of Roe to future cases, and even its continued validity, are issues likely to come before the Court in the future.”

Senators were satisfied with these answers on precedent. So Senators should be satisfied if Judge Kavanaugh answers similarly.

This is my fifteenth Supreme Court confirmation hearing since I joined the Committee in 1981. Thirty-one years ago, during my fourth Supreme Court confirmation hearing, liberal outside groups and their Senate allies engaged in an unprecedented smear campaign against Judge Robert Bork.

As Mark Pulliam said, in an op-ed over the weekend, “The borking of Robert Bork taught special interest groups that they could demonize judicial nominees based solely on their worldview. Worse, character assassination proved an effective tactic, nearly sinking Justice Clarence Thomas’ appointment 4 years later.”

But he also said, continuing to quote, “By confirming Judge Kavanaugh, the Senate can go some way toward atoning for its shameful treatment of Justice Robert Bork 31 years ago.”

Judge Kavanaugh is one of the most qualified nominees, if not the most qualified nominee that I have seen. A graduate of Yale Law School, clerking three Federal judges, including the man he is nominated to replace. He spent all but 3 years of his career in public service and has served as a judge for 12 years on the D.C. Circuit, the most influential Federal circuit court.

He has one of the most impressive records for a lower court judge in the Supreme Court. In at least a dozen separate cases, the Supreme Court adopted positions advanced by Judge Kavanaugh.

The American Bar Association, whose assessment Democratic leaders have called the “gold standard” of judicial evaluations, rated Judge Kavanaugh unanimously “well qualified.”

A review of Judge Kavanaugh’s extensive record demonstrates a deep commitment to the rule of law. He has written eloquently that both judges and Federal agencies are bound by the law Congress enacts. And he has criticized those who substitute their own judgment about what a statute should say for what the statute actually says.

After the President nominated Judge Kavanaugh, I said this would be the most thorough and transparent confirmation process in history. I say that statement even regarding all the discussion we have had this morning. It has proven to be, from Judge Kavanaugh’s authoring 307 opinions, joined hundreds more, amounting to more than 10,000 pages. He submitted 17,000 pages of speeches, articles, and other materials to the Committee, along with his 120-page written response to the questionnaire that the Committee set out.

These add up to 27,000 pages of Judge Kavanaugh's record already available to the American people. And we received just shy of half a million pages of emails and other documents from Judge Kavanaugh's service as an executive branch lawyer, which is more than we received for the last five Supreme Court nominees. Every one of these more than 483,000 pages of executive branch records are available to any Senator, 24/7.

I pushed for Federal officials to significantly expedite the public disclosure process under Federal law, so that all Americans have online access to more than 290,000 pages of these records right now on our Committee website. In short, the American people have unprecedented access and more materials to review Judge Kavanaugh than ever have had for a Supreme Court nominee. And to support the review of Judge Kavanaugh's historic volume of material, I have worked to ensure that more Senators have access to more material than ever.

Since so much of the rest of my statement has been discussed this morning by what the Democrats have said, and I have answered a lot of it, I am going to put the last seven pages of my statement in the record.

[The prepared statement of Chairman Grassley appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. And I am going to ask Senator Feinstein if she has more to say on her opening statement. And if she does not, I will go to Senator Hatch.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you. I do, Mr. Chairman. I will probably truncate it even so.

But I think it is really important that people, as well as the Judge, the nominee, understand how strongly we feel and why we feel that way. I want to talk a little bit about one of the big decisions that we have the belief that although you told Senator Collins that you believed it was settled law, the question is, really, do you believe that it is correct law? And that is Roe v. Wade.

I was, in the '50s and '60s, active, but first, as a student at Stanford. I saw what happened to young women who became pregnant. And then subsequently, I sat, as an appointee of Governor Brown's, on the term-setting and paroling authority for women in California who had committed felonies. And so I sentenced women who had committed abortions to State prison and granted them paroles.

And so, came to see both sides: the terrible side, and the human and vulnerable side. And when you look at the statistics during those days, those statistics that the Guttmacher Institute has put out, are really horrendous. For you, the President that nominated you, has said, "I will nominate someone who is anti-choice and pro-gun." And we believe what he said. We cannot find the documents that absolve from that conclusion.

So what women have won through Roe and a host of privacy cases—to be able to control their own reproductive system, to have basic privacy rights—really extraordinarily important to this side of the aisle and I hope the other side of the aisle as well.

Last year, you drafted a dissent in Garza v. Hargan, and that is a case where a young women in Texas, I believe, was seeking an abortion. In that dissent, you argued that even though the young woman had complied with the Texas parental notification law and secured an approval from a judge, she should nonetheless be barred.

In making your argument, you ignored and I believe mischaracterized a Supreme Court precedent. You reasoned that Jane Doe should not be unable to exercise her right to choose because she did not have family and friends to make her decision. The argument rewrites Supreme Court precedent and, if adopted, we believe would require courts to determine whether a young woman had a sufficient support network when making her decision, even in cases where she has gone to court.

This reason, we believe—I believe—demonstrates that you are willing to disregard precedent. And if that is the case because just saying something is settled law, it really is, is it correct law?

The impact of overturning Roe is much broader than a woman's right to choose. It is about protecting the most personal decisions we all make from Government intrusion. Roe is one in a series of cases that upheld an individual's right to decide who to marry. It is not the Government's right. Where to send your children to school. The Government cannot get involved. What kind of medical care you can receive at the end of life, as well as whether and when to have a family.

And I deeply believe that all these cases serve as a bulwark of privacy rights that protect all Americans from over-involvement of the Government in their lives. And to me, that is extraordinarily important.

Next, I would like to address the President's promise to appoint a nominee blessed by the NRA. In reviewing your judicial opinions and documents, it is pretty clear that your views go well beyond simply being pro-gun, and I would like to straighten that out.

It is my understanding that during a lecture at Notre Dame Law School, you said you would be the "first to acknowledge" that most other lower court judges have disagreed with your views on the Second Amendment. For example, in District of Columbia v. Heller, you wrote that unless guns were regulated either at the time of the Constitution was written or traditionally throughout history, they cannot be regulated now. In your own words, gun laws are unconstitutional unless they are "traditional or common in the United States."

You concluded that banning assault weapons is unconstitutional because they have not historically been banned. And this logic means that even as weapons become more advanced and more dangerous, they cannot be regulated. Judge Easterbrook, as you know, a conservative judge from the Seventh Circuit, concluded that that reasoning was absurd, and he pointed out that a law's existence cannot be the source of its own constitutional validity.

In fact, I am left with the fact that your reasoning is far outside the mainstream of legal thought and that it surpasses the views of Justice Scalia, who was clearly a pro-gun Justice. Even Scalia understood that weapons that are like M-16 rifles or weapons that are most useful in military service can, in fact, be regulated. And there is no question that assault weapons like the AR-15 were specifically designed to be like the M-16.

The United States makes up 4 percent of the worldwide population, but we own 42 percent of the world's guns. Since 2012, when 20 first graders and 6 school employees were killed at Sandy Hook Elementary, there have been 273 school shootings. This is an average of 5 shootings every month and a total of 462 children, teenagers, teachers, and staff shot, and 152 killed.

I care a lot about this. I authored assault weapons legislation that became law for 10 years, and I have seen the destruction. If the Supreme Court were to adopt your reasoning, I fear the number of victims would continue to grow, and citizens would be rendered powerless in enacting sensible gun laws. So this is a big part of my very honest concern.

You are being nominated for a pivotal seat. It would likely be the deciding vote on fundamental issues. So during your time in the White House when you were staff secretary, some people regard it as kind of a monitor, monitoring things going in and going out. But I think it is much more. And you yourself have said that that is the period of "my greatest growth."

And so we try to look at it, and the only way we can look at it is to understand the documents. And it is very, very difficult.

I do not want to take too much time, but we have heard a lot of noise. Behind the noise is really a very sincere belief that it is so important to keep in this country, which is multi-ethnic, multi-religious, multi-economic, a Court that really serves the people and serves this great democracy. And that is my worry. That is my worry.

So I look forward to your statement and answering the questions. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Senator Feinstein appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hatch for 10 minutes.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. ORRIN G. HATCH,
A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would first like to thank you for your tremendous work in organizing this hearing. This has been the most thorough Supreme Court confirmation process that I have ever participated in. We have received more than twice as many documents for Judge Kavanaugh as for any Supreme Court nominee in history.

This is a big deal. We have tens of thousands of pages of Judge Kavanaugh's opinions, speeches, and other writings. This has been an exhaustive process, and I want to thank you for your leadership on it.

Now to our witness, Judge Kavanaugh, it is good to see you. I have known you for a long time. This is my fifteenth and final Supreme Court confirmation hearing. I participated in the confirmation of every current Justice on the Court. I have participated in the confirmation of over half of all Federal judges now serving in the Federal system or who have ever served in the Federal system.

I know a good nominee when I see one, and you are a great nominee. I do not think there is any question about it. I have known you for a long time.

I remember when you first came before this Committee back in 2004 for your first confirmation hearing. I was the Chairman of this Committee at the time. I got to know you well. I was impressed by your intellect, your legal ability, and your integrity, all of which were very much notable. At only 39 years of age, you knew more about the law than most lawyers who have practiced for a lifetime.

And you have been an outstanding judge. You have earned the respect of your colleagues, and you have earned the respect of the Supreme Court as well. As you know, the Supreme Court has adopted the positions in your opinions no less than 13 times. That is something nobody can really argue against. You have authored landmark opinions on the separation of powers, administrative law, and national security.

You served as a mentor to dozens of clerks and hundreds of law students, male and female. And some of whom did not share your philosophy. Your student reviews are off the charts favorable, even by those who may not have completely agreed with your philosophical approaches on some matters.

You volunteer in your community.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Just go ahead.

Senator HATCH. You volunteer in the community. You coach youth basketball. You are the sort of person many of us would like to have as a friend and a colleague. You also apparently like to eat pasta with ketchup, but nobody is perfect.

Now this being politics and this being—this being a Supreme Court confirmation hearing, my Democratic colleagues actually—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HATCH. I have got to admit this is—

My Democratic colleagues can admit that you are actually a good judge and a good person as well. They have to turn the volume up to 11 and try to paint you as one of the four horsemen of the apocalypse. Anyone who actually knows you knows that is ridiculous, and the American people will see soon enough that you are a smart, decent, normal person that just so happens to have been nominated to the highest court in our land.

So here are the facts. Judge Kavanaugh is one of the most distinguished judges—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have this loudmouth removed. I mean, we should not have to put up with this kind of stuff. I hope she is not a law student.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I—now that we have quiet, I would like to explain that I advised 2 years ago that at my hearings I expected the police to do their job, and I expected the Committee to go on. But if you do not want to continue, we will—

Senator HATCH. I am going to continue.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Go ahead.

Senator HATCH. Okay. So here are the facts. Judge Kavanaugh is one of the distinguished judges in the entire country. He has served for over 12 years now on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. The D.C. Circuit is often referred to as the second—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HATCH [continuing]. Second-highest court in the land because it hears many critically important cases involving agency action and the separation of powers. During his time on the bench, Judge Kavanaugh has heard over 1,000 cases. He has written more than 300 opinions. His opinions span nearly 5,000 pages in length.

What is remarkable about Judge Kavanaugh's judicial record is not just its length, but its depth and its quality. Judge Kavanaugh has been a true thought leader. He has written powerful opinions on the separation of powers and administrative law. He has shown that he brings a fair-minded approach to questions of criminal law and employment law.

On almost every issue of consequence, Judge Kavanaugh has made a significant contribution to our Nation's jurisprudence, and he has won respect from both sides of the political spectrum. The Committee has received letters from former clerks, former colleagues, former students, and former classmates, all attesting to Judge Kavanaugh's sterling character and qualifications, some of whom are Democrats.

Eminent members of the Supreme Court bar and legal academia have all written in strong support of Judge Kavanaugh's nomination. The authors of these letters emphasize that they have different political views and that they do not agree on every subject. But to a person, they speak of Judge Kavanaugh's integrity and judgment, and they enthusiastically endorse his nomination.

I would like to highlight one letter in particular from 18 of Judge Kavanaugh's former women law clerks. That is all of his former women clerks, all of them, who were not precluded by their current or pending employment from signing the letter. They write that "Judge Kavanaugh has been one of the strongest advocates in the Federal judiciary for women lawyers." They detail the mentoring and encouragement Judge Kavanaugh has given them in their careers, and they say that is it "not an exaggeration to say that we would not be the professors, prosecutors, public officials, and appellate advocates we are today without his enthusiastic encouragement and unwavering support."

It bears emphasis that these former clerks span the political divide. A number went on to clerk for liberal Justices. That itself shows you the high regard Judge Kavanaugh has across the ideological spectrum. Republican- and Democratic-appointed judges alike have hired his former clerks.

Judge Kavanaugh is no ideologue. He is no extremist. He is a highly respected, thoughtful, fair-minded judge who is well within the judicial mainstream. Look no further than the letter the Committee received from over 40 members of the Supreme Court bar supporting Judge Kavanaugh's nomination. Among the signers are people like Lisa Blatt, Deanne Maynard, and Kathleen Sullivan. These are nationally renowned attorneys who practice frequently before the Supreme Court and the Federal courts of appeals, and they are not conservatives.

To the contrary, they are among the most prominent liberal attorneys at the bar today and in the country. But they know Judge Kavanaugh. They know his work. They know his character. And they know that he is an outstanding judge, and they know that he will make an outstanding Justice.

If we could just get the politics out of this, I think we could all agree that Judge Kavanaugh is an indisputably qualified nominee with strong backing in the legal community who is well within the judicial mainstream. Go ask anyone who practices regularly before the Supreme Court who does not have a partisan agenda, and they will tell you Judge Kavanaugh is exactly the kind of person we should have on the Court or we should want on the Court.

Indeed, no less than Bob Bennett, Bill Clinton's personal lawyer during Clinton's Presidency, wrote to the Committee urging support for Judge Kavanaugh's nomination. Here is what he intended to say: "As a Washington attorney, I can attest to the high esteem in which the bar holds Judge Kavanaugh. Lawyers love arguing before him for good reason because they know he will approach every case with an open mind." Bennett continues, "Brett is the most qualified person any Republican President could possibly have nominated."

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HATCH. "Were the Senate to fail to confirm Brett, it would not only mean passing up the opportunity to confirm a great jurist but would also undermine civility in politics twice over, just in playing politics with such an obviously qualified candidate and then again in losing the opportunity to put such a strong advocate for decency and civility on our Nation's highest court."

Again, this is President Clinton's personal lawyer during Clinton's Presidency who litigated against Judge Kavanaugh. Those who know Judge Kavanaugh hold him in highest regard. This is true of both Republicans and Democrats.

Unfortunately, we have all these interest groups streaming from the sidelines and putting pressure on my Democratic colleagues to make this hearing about politics, to make it about pretty much anything except Judge Kavanaugh and his qualifications. We have folks who want to run for President, who want their moment in the spotlight, who want that coveted TV clip. Frankly, I wish we could drop all of the nonsense.

Judge Kavanaugh is unquestionably qualified. He is one of the most widely respected judges in the country. He is well within the judicial mainstream. Anyone who wants to argue otherwise wants to banish half the country from the mainstream.

So, Judge, I am glad you are here today. I am sorry you are going to have to go through some of this nonsense that is about to come your way, but I hope you do it well. You are smart. You are smart, and you are a fundamentally decent, good person.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HATCH. Anyone who actually knows you knows that to be true. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that the Committee should have to put up with this type of insolence that is going on in this room today. And frankly, these people are so out of line they should not even be allowed in the doggone room.

Now, Judge Kavanaugh, I am proud of you. I know how good you are. I know you deserve this position. I am proud of the President for nominating you, and frankly, I wish you the best because we are going to confirm you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Out of courtesy to Ranking Member Feinstein, she wants to introduce people who are in the audience, and so she can take what time she wants right now.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you. I will be very fast.

I would like to recognize Marc Morial, the president of the National Urban League; Melanie Campbell, the president and CEO of the National Coalition on Black Civic Participation; Reverend Al Sharpton, the president of National Action Network; Vanita Gupta, president and CEO, Leadership Conference of Civil and Human Rights; Derrick Johnson, president and CEO, NAACP; Sherrilyn Ifill, president, NAACP Legal Defense Fund; Kristen Clarke, president and executive director, Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights; and Fatima Goss Graves, president and CEO, National Women's Law Center.

I would also like to recognize Fred Guttenberg, the father of Jaime, one of 17 killed in the Parkland shooting; Kelly Gregory, former Airman First Class, single mother, business owner, living with stage IV metastatic breast cancer; Sarah McBride, an advocate for LGBT rights and protections for patients; Tia Nelis, who works on behalf of people with disabilities; Angel Young, an enrolled member of the Standing Rock Lakota and a veteran; Kim Jorgensen Gane, who advocates for a woman's right to choose; Bobby Jenkins, a longtime resident of Randolph County, Georgia, and a voting rights advocate; Kerry Chen, who has been fighting for marriage benefits for same-sex couples; and Carlotta LaNier, a member of Little Rock Nine.

Thank you for this courtesy. I really appreciate it.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

Senator Leahy.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. PATRICK J. LEAHY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF VERMONT

Senator LEAHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I was perfectly happy to yield to Senator Feinstein for that.

Mr. Chairman, the last few minutes we have heard a lot of rhetoric. I think it might serve the Committee well to have some reality. I have served in the Senate for 44 years. During that span, I have been able to vote on 19 nominations to the Supreme Court.

I mention this because I have a sense of history. Now I have never seen in that 44 years so much at stake with a single seat, but I have also never seen such a dangerous rush to fill it. President Trump promised he would only nominate judges to the Supreme Court who would overturn Roe v. Wade, judges who would dismantle the Affordable Care Act, judges who would reshape our judiciary.

Now if that is not judicial activism, I do not know what is. And Judge Kavanaugh, with your nomination, the President has made it very clear that he is following through on his promises, and many of us feel he is.

It seems that you may have intrigued him for another reason, your expansive view of Executive power and Executive immunity. You have taken the unorthodox position that Presidents should not be burdened with a criminal or civil investigation while in office. This is for now we have a President who has declared in the last 24 hours that the Department of Justice should not prosecute Republicans.

It is “Alice in Wonderland,” and I find it difficult to imagine that your views on this subject escaped the attention of President Trump, who seems increasingly fixated on his own ballooning legal jeopardy. When questioning you about these concerns, we will certainly look to your record on the bench. All of us, Republicans and Democrats, agree that we should.

Indeed, your 12 years on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals will loom large during these hearings. But the unknown looms even larger. Before sitting on the bench, you were a political operative involved in the most political and partisan controversies of our time.

During this time, you shared your personal view on contentious issues without regard to restrictions imposed by precedent or stare decisis. And it is precisely those views that are being hidden from us today. The Judiciary Committee’s Supreme Court hearings are meant to be an unsparing examination of a nominee to a lifetime appointment to our highest court.

They are intended to give the American people—all, all, all the American people a genuine opportunity to scrutinize the nominee’s judicial philosophy, beliefs, and character because if confirmed with a stroke of a pen, a nominee may impact their lives for a generation or more. And how far we have fallen. Judge Kavanaugh, there are so many things wrong with this Committee’s vetting of your record that it is hard to know where to begin.

I have been on this Committee under both Republican and Democratic leadership. I never thought the Committee would sink to this. In fact, you should not be sitting in front of us today. You should be sitting in front of us only after we have completed a review of your record. Your vetting is less than 10 percent complete.

In critical ways, our Committee is abandoning its tradition of exhaustively vetting Supreme Court nominees. First, inexplicably, my Republican friends refused to request records from your 3 years as White House staff secretary, even though you describe those as the most formative for you as a judge, when you provided advice on any issue that may cross the President’s desk.

Now we know those issues include abortion, same-sex marriage, and torture. And torture. But 6 weeks ago, Senate Republicans huddled in a private meeting with the White House Counsel who is here today, and hours later, the American people were told those records would be off limits.

And second, in a stark departure from Committee precedent, certainly the Committee precedent I have seen for 44 years, Chairman Grassley sent a partisan records request to the National Archives. Not only did it omit all 1 million records from your 3 years as staff secretary, it did not even request a privileged log.

That means this Committee is in the dark as to what specific documents are being withheld and why. We do not even know what is being hidden. Such a move is simply incompatible with transparency.

And third, the Archives told us it could not even produce this partial records request until the end of October. That is the non-partisan Archives. Surely, I would—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator LEAHY. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend at any point to continue what I have to say with such interruptions. I do not care whose side they are on.

Now the Archives have said they could not produce this partial records request until the end of October. Surely I would think that the United States Senate could wait until then, even if it means a Supreme Court with eight Justices for a short time.

After all, Senate Republicans established a tradition of having just eight Justices. They did that with their treatment of Chief Judge Merrick Garland that showed they were willing to have patience with filling Supreme Court vacancies when the first time ever they refused to have a vote on a Supreme Court nominee either up or down during a Presidential election year. And I have been here when they have had in the past such votes.

But Republicans instead cast aside the Archives. They swapped the nonpartisan review process used for every nominee since Watergate for a partisan one. And I think you only have to look at Watergate to see why we have that nonpartisan process. It is followed by every nomination since Watergate until today, and my question still recurs. What is being hidden and why?

Every White House record that we have received was handpicked by your deputy in the Bush White House, a hyper-conflicted lawyer who also represents a half dozen Trump administration officials who are under investigation by prosecutors in the Russia investigation. And this partisan lawyer decided which of your records the Senate, but more importantly, the American people, the American people get to see.

Fourth, countless documents that have been provided to the Committee contain apparent alterations and omissions with zero explanation. No court in this country, certainly no court that I ever argued cases before would accept this as a legitimate document production, and the United States Senate should not either.

And fifth, more than 40 percent of the documents we have received, almost 190,000 pages, are considered "committee confidential" by Chairman Grassley. For the vast majority of them, there is not even a conceivable argument to restrict them.

Compare this to the mere 860 documents that were designated "committee confidential" for Justice Kagan. In that, the request was made by the nonpartisan Archives, not by this Committee, and we still had 99 percent of her records.

And six, on Friday, we learned that President Trump is claiming executive privilege over an additional 102,000 pages of your records. Such a blanket assertion of executive privilege is simply unheard of in the history of this country, and the reason it is unheard of is because it is so outrageous.

The last time a President attempted to hide a Supreme Court nominee's record by invoking executive privilege was when President Reagan did this for Justice William Rehnquist. But then Republicans and Democrats came together. We demanded the documents be released, and President Reagan said okay, and they were released. Boy, how times have changed.

And seven, to date, we have received less than half of Chairman Grassley's partial records request, meaning we are moving forward even though we have received a fraction of the records even Republicans claim they needed to vet your nomination just a few weeks ago. And then we received an additional 42,000 pages from your record a few hours ago. The notion that anyone here has properly reviewed them or even seen them at all is laughable. It is laughable. It does not pass the giggle test.

That alone would be reason to postpone during normal times, but nothing about this is normal. All told, only 4 percent, 4 percent of your White House record has been shared with the public. Only 7 percent has been made available to this Committee. The rest remains hidden from scrutiny.

Compare this to the 99 percent of Justice Kagan's White House record that was available to all Americans as a result of the bipartisan process I ran with then-Ranking Member Jeff Sessions. When Senator Sessions and I requested it, we got 99 percent. What is being hidden and why?

And if I have not been clear, I will be so now. Today, the Senate is not simply phoning in our vetting obligation, we are discarding it. It is not only shameful. It is a sham.

I felt, on the day when I took my oath of office the first time 44 years ago, I was told by both the Republican and Democratic leadership of the Senate, people I highly respected, that the Senate should be and can be the conscience of the Nation. I represented Vermont here for 44 years. I served with pride here, believing that the Senate can be and should be the conscience of the Nation.

Today, with this hearing, it is not being the conscience of the Nation. And from the bits and pieces of your record that we have received, it appears you have provided misleading testimony about your involvement in controversial issues at the Bush White House during your previous confirmation hearing, misleading testimony. I asked you about these concerns last month, and I want to alert you that I will return to those concerns when you are under oath and I am asking you questions.

What I fear is the American people will not know the full truth until your full record is public. And unfortunately, Republicans have done their best to ensure that will not happen. So we begin these hearings with gaping holes spanning multiple years of your career that deeply influenced, by your own words, your thinking as a judge.

And any claim that this has been a thorough and transparent process is downright Orwellian. This is the most incomplete, most partisan, least transparent vetting for any Supreme Court nominee I have ever seen, and I have seen more of those than any person serving in the Senate today.

So, Judge Kavanaugh, this hearing is premature. I hope you will use it, though, to answer our questions directly, clearly, and honestly because the American people have real concerns about how your confirmation would affect their lives.

Now I will conclude with this. The Supreme Court is a guarantor of our liberties and our republic. Few, I would argue, are worthy of taking a seat. Only those with unimpeachable integrity. Only those who believe that truth is more important than party. Only those who are committed to upholding the rights of all Americans, not just those in power.

As you know, inscribed in Vermont marble above the Court's entrance are the words, "Equal justice under law." For the millions of Americans fearful that they are on the verge of losing hard-fought rights, that aspiration has never been more important than it is today. Frankly, as a member of the Supreme Court bar and as a United States Senator, I feel it has never been more at risk.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Senator Leahy appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Chairman Grassley. Before I call on Senator Cornyn, how ridiculous it is to say that we do not have the records that it takes to determine this person qualified to be on the Supreme Court when all the documents we have add up to more than we have had for the last five Supreme Court nominees. How did we make those decisions for those other five?

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cornyn.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman, if I could just respond to that point, because you are not giving the whole picture, sir. Ninety percent of the documents we have not seen. It is not the number of documents.

Chairman GRASSLEY. And I will be glad to respond to that, but I—

Senator BOOKER. We would not hire an intern, sir, without 90 percent of their résumé.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator—

Senator BOOKER. We are putting somebody on the Supreme Court.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cornyn. Senator Cornyn.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN CORNYN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Kavanaugh, welcome to you and your family and friends. I am amazed at the poker faces I have seen on the front row during all of this pandemonium, unlike anything I have seen before in a confirmation hearing.

In my view, it is not because your opponents do not know enough about you. It is because they do know all they need to know, apparently, to oppose your nomination. And even before you have had a chance to answer our questions, including their questions, many of them have made up their minds. But the American people have not been introduced to you before. This is an opportunity for all of us to engage in a question-and-answer format that will hopefully illuminate why it is so important to have judges who actually are tethered to the text of the laws passed by Congress, signed by the President, as well as the Constitution of the United States.

The Senate Judiciary Committee undertakes few more important tasks than the one before us today. Last year, the Committee considered and advanced the nomination of Justice Neil Gorsuch, who was just one of many outstanding judicial nominees by President Trump. This Congress has proudly confirmed not just Judge Gorsuch but 26 judges to the appellate courts across the Nation.

This includes three outstanding Texans to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Historically, the confirmation of judges to our highest courts was somewhat routine. Routine. Justice Gorsuch was unanimously confirmed by a simple voice vote to the Court of Appeals. Not one Senator voted against Justice Kennedy who both you and Justice Gorsuch clerked for and who you will succeed on the Court. Not one Senator voted against Justice Scalia's confirmation, who you have called a "role model" and a "hero."

But that was before judges were viewed as policymakers rather than fair and neutral interpreters of the Constitution and the laws drafted by Congress. Today, as I suggested, is a wonderful opportunity to re-examine the proper role for judges under our Constitution and the difference between legislators and judges.

As Justice Gorsuch wrote before he joined the Supreme Court: "Upholding and enforcing this distinction between legislators and judges was the great project of the late Justice Scalia's career. Justice Scalia would always remind us that legislators may appeal to their own moral convictions and to claims about social utility. But judges instead should strive to apply the law as it is, looking to the text, structure, and history, not to decide cases based on their own moral convictions or the policy consequences."

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. So this hearing is an outstanding way to remind the American people the proper role of judges under our Constitution. Our Constitution provides for a Federal Government of limited and delegated powers with a Bill of Rights to further protect our individual liberties.

To that end, the Framers—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. Created three coequal branches, as you know: the legislature to enact laws, the executive to enforce them, and the judicial branch to settle disputes about the meaning of those laws and the Constitution.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. Of course, the legislature could change the laws, but only an amendment can change the Constitution. For this reason, Alexander Hamilton wrote in the Federalist Papers—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, could I pause there until the room is cleared?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you.

For this reason, Alexander Hamilton wrote in the Federalist Papers that the judiciary will always be the least dangerous branch because, as he famously wrote, "judges would have neither force nor will but merely judgment."

Today the Judiciary Committee is gathered to consider whether Judge Kavanaugh will honor that limited role for judges under our Constitution and whether he will properly exercise the modest and humble power of judgment entrusted to him under our Constitution.

I am confident that the Senate will find that Judge Kavanaugh will faithfully and fairly interpret the Constitution and the laws of this great Nation, and I look forward to him succeeding Justice Kennedy. One reason for that is because I have been acquainted with Judge Kavanaugh for about 18 years and I can personally attest to his skills as a lawyer.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. When I was Attorney General of Texas, as the Judge will recall, he helped me get ready for a Supreme Court argument.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. May I proceed, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator CORNYN. As I was saying—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. When I was Attorney General of Texas, I had a chance to argue a couple of cases in front of the United States Supreme Court. One case Judge Kavanaugh helped me prepare for was one involving the question of school prayer at a high school football game at the Santa Fe Independent School District High School.

After that, I was pleased to introduce Judge Kavanaugh to the Judiciary Committee when President Bush first nominated him to be a judge on the D.C. Circuit. What I said back then still stands the test of time today. Judge Kavanaugh has an unparalleled academic and professional record of service. Many will cite his education, his clerkships, his time arguing cases before the court, his experience working for the executive branch. But I think one of the most important factors to me is he has already exercised excellent judgment in marrying a Texan, Ashley, from Abilene. So I know he is a good judge. In fact, Judge Kavanaugh is one of the most respected and thoughtful judges in the country.

I am disappointed that, despite his exemplary qualifications and outstanding record, so many of our colleagues across the aisle have announced their opposition even before he was nominated.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. The level of disingenuousness and hyperbole even by today's standards is extraordinary. Members from the other side of the aisle, including some who serve on this Committee, have claimed that confirming Judge Kavanaugh would somehow be complicit in evil and result in the destruction of the Constitution. Some have even claimed that you testified falsely—we have already heard that alluded to—before the Committee when you were serving our country in the Bush White House.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. I hope you will have a chance to explain the apparent misunderstanding on the part of some Senators. And I sincerely hope this week we can all take a deep breath—we are not doing very well so far—

[Laughter.]

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. And get a grip and treat this process with the respect and gravity it demands.

As others have alluded, the American Bar Association, which some have called the “gold standard” for judicial evaluations, have unanimously rated you as “well qualified” for service on the Supreme Court. And as we have heard, a number of lawyers and judges across the spectrum have talked about your qualifications and sung your praises. And I am confident at the end of this hearing your stellar credentials and your body of work as a judge will demonstrate that you properly understand the role of a judge under the Constitution, and I am confident you will demonstrate that you will faithfully and fairly interpret the text of the law and the Constitution and dutifully apply them to the disputes that come before you.

Finally, Judge, I expect we will have a conversation or two about this book which you contributed to and the law of judicial precedent because I know that there is a number of questions by Members of the Senate about how you will regard previously decided cases in the Supreme Court. And I trust you will give us a scholarly and detailed explanation of that and demonstrate that many of the concerns that have been expressed about a new Justice coming on the Court somehow wiping away previous decisions single-handedly, not even with the help of other members of the Court, is just plain ridiculous. And we look forward to asking those questions and getting your answers.

Thank you very much.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Durbin.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. RICHARD J. DURBIN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Senator DURBIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Kavanaugh, it is good to see you again. I thank the members of your family who are weathering this hearing. Thank you very much for being here today.

This is a different hearing for the Supreme Court than I have ever been through. It is different in what has happened in this room just this morning. What we have heard is the noise of democracy. This is what happens in a free country when people can stand up and speak and not be jailed, imprisoned, tortured, or killed because of it. It is not mob rule.

There have been times when it is uncomfortable, and I am sure it was for your children. I hope you can explain this to them at some point. But it does represent what we are about in this democracy.

Why is this happening for the first time in the history of this Committee? I think we need to be honest about why it is happening. I think it is the same reason why when I go home to Illinois, after being in this public service job for over 30 years, I hear a question that I have never, ever heard before, repeatedly, as people pull me off to the side and say, "Senator, are we going to be all right? Is America going to be all right?" They are genuinely concerned about the future of this country.

You come to this moment of history in a rare situation. You are aspiring to be the most decisive vote on the Supreme Court on critical issues. Justice Kennedy did that for 12 years, and you are called to that responsibility, and we realize the gravity of that opportunity and that responsibility.

Second, of course, your record and the statements of others suggest there is real genuine concern about changing life-and-death values in this country because you see things differently. We have heard that over and over again, and I think you must understand the depth of feeling about that possibility.

And, third, try as they might, I am afraid the Majority just cannot get beyond the fact that there are parts of your public life that they want to conceal. They do not want America to see them. I think that is a serious mistake, and I am going to make a suggestion at the end of my remarks.

But over and above all of those things is this: You are the nominee of President Donald John Trump. This is a President who has shown us consistently that he is contemptuous of the rule of law. He has said and done things as President which we have never seen before in our history. He has dismissed the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation when he would not bend to his will. He harasses and threatens his own Attorney General on almost a daily basis in the exercise of his office. And I did not vote for Jeff Sessions, but I have to tell you, there should be some respect at least for the office that he serves in. And it is that President who has decided you are his man; you are the person he wants on the Supreme Court; you are his personal choice.

So, are people nervous about this? Are they concerned about it? Of course, they are. I am sure there will be a shower of Tweets sometime later in the day harassing people in the Cabinet, people in the White House, maybe even dismissing them. And maybe he will go after me again. Be my guest.

But the point I am getting to is if you wonder why this reaction is taking place, it is because what is happening in this country. There are many of us who are concerned about the future of this country and the future of democracy, and you are asking for a lifetime appointment to the highest court in the land where you will make decisions, the deciding vote on things that will decide the course of history and where we are headed.

The Senate has a constitutional responsibility to evaluate your nomination. We do know that before you became a judge, you were faithfully advancing the Republican Party agenda. I jokingly said in one of your previous appearances that you are like the Forrest Gump of Republican politics. You always show up in the picture. Whether it is the Ken Starr investigation, Bush v. Gore, the Bush White House, you have been there.

We also know that before naming you, President Trump made it clear that he would appoint Justices—only appoint Justices to the Supreme Court who would overturn Roe v. Wade and the Affordable Care Act. Those were his litmus tests.

Now, he did not ask you the question. What he did was to delegate this responsibility to two special interest groups: the Federalist Society and the Heritage Foundation. And the other groups that are spending millions of dollars in support of your candidacy, they are confident that you are going to favor the interests of corporations over workers and give the President wide berth when it comes to Executive authority.

And your own law clerks, men and women you chose, men and women who wrote the words that had your signature at the bottom of the page, have told us what they think of you. One wrote in an article entitled, "Brett Kavanaugh said Obamacare was unprecedented and unlawful." That is from one of your clerks.

Another wrote, when it comes to “enforcing restrictions on abortion, no court of appeals judge in the Nation has a stronger, more consistent record than Judge Brett Kavanaugh.”

Big corporate interests, solidly behind your nomination. Chamber of Commerce, full support. And President Trump, whose lawyers say they will fight any effort to subpoena or indict him all the way to the Supreme Court, that President seems personally eager to have you confirmed as quickly as possible.

Why are your supporters so confident you will rule on these issues as they wish? Why do they think you are such a sure bet to take their side when, in the words of one of your former clerks, “This is no time for a gamble.”

Unfortunately, I do not think you are going to tell us much this week. It is interesting to me that people in your position write all these law review articles, make all these speeches, and come to this room and clam up, do not want to talk about any issues. But that is what I expect.

Instead, we will be asked to trust that, if you are confirmed, you will have an open mind, that you will follow the law rather than move the law in the direction of your views. I would like to trust you, but I agree with President Ronald Reagan: Trust, but verify.

I wanted to trust you the last time you testified before this Committee in 2006, but after you were confirmed to the D.C. Circuit, reports surfaced that contradicted your sworn testimony before this Committee. You said to me unambiguously under oath the following: “I was not involved and am not involved in the questions about the rules governing detention of combatants.”

But later, just a week or so ago, you acknowledged in my office that you were involved. For 12 years, you could have apologized and corrected this record, but you never did. Instead, you and your supporters have argued we should ignore that simple declarative sentence which you spoke and somehow conclude your words mean something far different. You are a committed textualist, Judge Kavanaugh. If you are going to hold others accountable for their words, you should be held accountable for your own words.

So after my personal experience, I start these hearings with a question about your credibility as a witness. I know from my history with you that things you said need to be carefully verified.

That brings us to a major problem. I will not retread the ground about all the documents that are being withheld, but I will show you a little calendar here that is interesting. There is a 35-month black hole in your White House career where we have been denied access to any and all documents. Thirty-five months in the White House. And I asked you in my office, during that period of time, President Bush was considering same-sex marriage, an amendment to ban it; abortion; Executive power; detainees; torture; Supreme Court nominees; warrantless wiretapping.

One of these issues bears special mention as we mourn the passing of John McCain. In 2004 and 2005, I joined John McCain when he led the effort to pass an amendment affirming that torture and cruel and inhuman and degrading treatment would be illegal in America. As a survivor of unspeakable torture, John McCain spoke with powerful moral authority about American values during the time of war. You were in the Bush White House when that McCain Amendment passed.

The Bush administration did everything in its power to stop John McCain's Torture Amendment. Then after we passed it 90–9, a veto-proof margin, President Bush issued a signing statement asserting his right to ignore the law that John McCain had just passed in Congress. When we met in my office, you acknowledged that you worked on that signing statement. Yet we have been denied any documents disclosing your role or your advice to President Bush.

I asked you if you wrote, edited, or approved documents about these and other issues while you were staff secretary. Time and again you said, “I cannot rule it out.”

Judge Kavanaugh, America needs to see those documents. We cannot carefully review, advise, and decide whether to consent to your nomination without clarity on the record. The period of time when you worked in the Republican White House led to a change in position on an issue which we have to address directly. Your views on Executive power and accountability have changed dramatically. When you worked for Special Counsel Ken Starr in the late 1990s, you called him “an American hero” for investigating President Bill Clinton, and you personally urged Starr to be aggressive, confrontational, and even graphic in his questions. We have seen your memo on that one.

But a few years later, after working in a Republican White House, you totally reversed your position and argued the President should be above the law and granted a free pass from criminal investigation while in office. What did you see in that Bush White House that dramatically changed your view? What are your views about Presidential accountability today?

Judge Kavanaugh, at this moment in our Nation's history, with authoritarian forces threatening our democracy, with the campaign and administration of this President under Federal criminal investigation, we need a direct, credible answer from you. Is this President or any President above the law? Equally important, can this President ignore the Constitution in the exercise of his authority?

You dissented in the Seven-Sky case when the D.C. Circuit upheld the Affordable Care Act's constitutionality. You criticized a law, a law which this President has said many times he wants to ignore and abolish, and you said, “The President may decline to enforce a statute that regulates private individuals when the President deems”—“when the President deems”—“the statute unconstitutional, even if a court has held or would hold the statute constitutional.”

This statement by you flies in the face of Marbury v. Madison, our North Star on the separation of powers. It gives license to this President, Donald John Trump, or any President who chooses to ignore the Constitution to assert authority far beyond that envisioned by our Founding Fathers.

There are many people who are watching carefully. I am going to make a suggestion to you today, and it will not be popular on the other side of the aisle. If you believe that your public record is one that you can stand behind and defend, I hope that at the end of this you will ask this Committee to suspend until we are given all the documents, until we have the time to review them, and then we resume this hearing. What I am saying to you is basically this: If you will trust the American people, they will trust you. But if your effort today continues to conceal and hide documents, it raises a suspicion.

I will close Mr. Chairman. I know you are anxious. When I was a practicing lawyer a long time ago in trial and the other side either destroyed or concealed evidence, I knew that I was going to be able to have a convincing argument to close that case. What were they hiding? Why will they not let you see the speed tape on that train or the documents that they just cannot find? You know that presumption now is against you because of all the documents that have been held back.

For the sake of this Nation, for the sanctity of the Constitution that we both honor, step up. Ask this meeting, this gathering, to suspend until all the documents of your public career are there for the American people to see.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Senator Durbin appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Lee.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. MICHAEL S. LEE,
A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH

Senator LEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Judge Kavanaugh. And thank you also, Ashley and Margaret and Liza, for being here.

I want to start by saying that the fact that there is so much angst over a single nominee, a single judicial nominee, tells you everything you need to know about why it is that we need judges now more than ever who are willing to read the law and interpret it based on what the law says rather than on the basis of something else.

It also tells you more than anything else you could need to know about the need to restore a discussion of civics in this country, to restore a discussion about federalism and separation of powers, about where power is concentrated and where it should not be, and what the role of each branch of the Federal Government is and is not.

Many of the comments, many of the outbursts that we have had today suggest that we need to return to some of those fundamental principles, and I do not care whether you are a liberal Democrat or a conservative Republican or something in between. These principles apply. They are principles to which we have sworn an oath, and they are principles that I think we would do well to restore and focus on once again. If ever we are to return to an era of civility, we will return to that era on the basis of those foundational, structural principles within our Constitution.

Over the next few days, Judge Kavanaugh, a number of Members of this Committee are going to ask you questions, questions about cases that you have handled as a lawyer, cases that you have decided as a judge, about your record, about your qualifications.

Well, on that point about your record and your qualifications, the suggestion that you misled this Committee at any point in your previous hearings is absurd, and the absurdity of that suggestion will be borne out in the coming days. I am certain of it.

Some of the questions that will be asked of you will, in fact, be fair, and others will be unfair, and I think it is important for us to acknowledge that at the outset.

When you look back at history, answering these kinds of questions, this is sort of how the practice of holding these hearings began, so that Senators could ask nominees how they might vote, how they might rule in particular cases. But this did not always happen. In fact, it was not until 1916 that this even started. You see, there have been 113 Justices confirmed to the Supreme Court so far. The first 66 were confirmed without even holding a hearing. The idea of a hearing is relatively new. It is about 102 years old. We went for between 125 and 130 years under our constitutional republic without ever having a hearing. But, regardless, we started having hearings just over a century ago.

The very first Supreme Court confirmation hearing occurred in 1916 with Justice Louis Brandeis. After Louis Brandeis was nominated to the Court, some called for a hearing. Now, if we are honest with ourselves, if we are honest about history, I think a lot of this maybe had to do with some anti-Semitic fervor and the fact that Justice Brandeis was Jewish. But Senators also wanted to determine whether Brandeis would use his seat on the Supreme Court to advocate for some of the things that he had advocated for as a private citizen, as a public interest attorney. They wanted to know how he might vote in particular cases. They did not ask Justice Brandeis to testify, significantly, but they did, in fact, ask some outside witnesses what they thought about his nomination.

The next important moment, one could argue, occurred in 1939 when Felix Frankfurter became the first nominee to himself testify before the Committee. At the time Frankfurter was controversial in part because he was born overseas, but Senators also worried that Frankfurter was a radical based on his defense of anarchists in court. So, again, Senators wanted assurances about how Frankfurter might rule in particular cases, in particular what results he might reach in a particular type of case. Frankfurter, however, significantly, declined to engage with Senators on those topics and insisted that his public record spoke for itself.

Justice Stewart's nomination in 1959 was another turning point. Senators seeking to resist Brown v. Board of Education wanted to grill Stewart on his views on integration. Others still wanted to grill Stewart about his views on national security. So Senators turned up the heat a little bit more in that hearing. Like Frankfurter before him, Justice Stewart did not provide substantive answers to their questions. When they wanted to know how he might rule in particular cases, he appropriately declined, just as his predecessors had.

Twenty-eight years later, 28 years after Justice Stewart came through this Committee, the Senate considered Robert Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court. This was another significant turning point and, in my view, remains something of a rock-bottom moment for the Senate and for the Senate Judiciary Committee. Without getting into any of the gory details here, I think it suffices to say that Senator Ted Kennedy and Judge Bork did not agree on certain matters of constitutional law. And Kennedy's response was to savage—unfairly, in my opinion—the results that Judge Bork would reach if confirmed to the Supreme Court.

History shows that over the better part of a century the Judiciary Committee has gradually created something of a new norm, a norm in which Members demand that nominees speak about specific cases in return for favorable treatment from the Committee as the jurists are going through this process.

Now, nominees for the most part have gracefully resisted trading confirmation in exchange for promises about how they might vote in particular cases brought before them. To give two famous examples, Justice Scalia refused to say whether Marbury v. Madison was settled law on the ground that it could come before him. And, sure enough, last term, in Ortiz v. United States, the Supreme Court considered a case implicating the scope of Marbury. Likewise, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg created the so-called, “Ginsburg standard”: no previews, no forecasts, no hints. Every current member of the Supreme Court has adhered to a similar principle, what we might call the “Ginsburg standard.” Even though nominees have not caved to the pressure, I still believe that there are some aspects of the Senate's approach here that might do a disservice to the country and might be frowned upon by future historians.

If Senators repeatedly ask nominees about outcomes, then the public will be more entitled or at least more inclined to think that judges are supposed to be outcome-minded, that that is supposed to be their whole approach to judging, that that is supposed to be what judging is, in fact, about. But this, of course, undermines the very legitimacy of the courts themselves, the very legitimacy of the tribunal you have been nominated by the President to serve on. Over time, no free people would accept a judiciary that simply imposes its own policy preferences on the country absent fidelity to legal principle.

There is a better way for the Senate to approach its work. This process, in my opinion, should be about your qualifications, about your character, and perhaps most importantly, about your approach to judging, your own view about the role of the Federal judiciary. It should not be about results in a select number of cases.

Now, you are obviously exceptionally well qualified. Even your staunchest critics would not claim otherwise—your academic pedigree, your experience as a practicing lawyer, your experience in Government, and your 12 years' experience sitting on what many refer to as the “second highest court in the land,” the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

You are independent. You have written that, “Some of the greatest moments in American judicial history have been when judges stood up to the other branches, were not cowed, and enforced the law.” You have said that judges cannot be buffaloed, influenced, or pressured into worrying too much about transient popularity when we are trying to decide a case, and that one of the most important duties of a judge is to stand up for the unpopular party who has the correct position.

And you have lived up to your words during your time on the bench. Everyone knows that you served in the Bush administration, and yet when you became a judge, in only 2 years you ruled against the Bush administration a total of eight times. For you, it simply does not matter who the parties are. It simply does not matter that you may have worked for an administration before you became a judge. The only thing that matters is your commitment to correctly applying the law to the facts of any particular case.

As far as your approach to judging, you have appropriate respect for precedent. You have co-authored an 800-page book on precedent that, among other things, explains that a change in a court's membership alone should not throw former decisions open to reconsideration or justify their reversal.

You have explained that for precedent to be overruled, it must not be just wrong but a case with serious practical consequences. You voted to overturn Circuit precedent only four times during your time on the D.C. Circuit, and each of those cases involved a unanimous decision reached by your colleagues. And you follow binding precedent even if you believe that binding precedent was itself wrongly decided.

You decide cases based on legal merits, not based on the identity of the parties, and certainly not based on any political beliefs that you may harbor. We have already heard that your nomination will somehow be bad for women, for the environment, for labor unions, for civil rights, for a whole host of other things that Americans hold near and dear. I have a laundry list of cases in which you have ruled for people in each of those groups.

But there is a more fundamental point here that I think needs to be made. The judiciary's decisions are legitimate only to the extent that they are based on sound legal principle and reasoning, and ruling for a preferred party is not itself a sound legal principle. It is quite to the contrary. Jury-rigging decisions and backfilling legal reasoning to reach a particular result, a particularly politically acceptable result in a particular case, no matter how desirable that result might be in any instance, is not a legitimate mode of judicial decisionmaking. And no free people purporting to have an independent judiciary should ever be willing to settle for that.

So my plea to my colleagues today is that we ask Judge Kavanaugh hard questions. I believe we are required to do so. The Senate is not and never should be a rubber stamp, particularly when it comes to issuing lifetime appointments, even lifetime appointments on the highest court in the land.

But if you disagree with an opinion he has written, make a legal argument as to that issue. Explain why you think it is wrong. Do not complain about the results as if the result itself is proof that he is wrong, when you separate out the result from the legal analysis, from the facts and how they interact with the law in that particular case. And do not ask him to make promises about outcomes in particular cases. If it is unacceptable for the President to impose a litmus test, it is surely unacceptable for the United States Senate to do so.

Judge Kavanaugh, I look forward to your testimony, and I am grateful to you and your willingness to serve our country and to be considered for this important role.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Senator Lee appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Whitehouse.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. SHELDON WHITEHOUSE, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF RHODE ISLAND

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

When is pattern evidence of bias? In court, pattern is evidence of bias all the time, evidence on which juries and trial judges rely to show discriminatory intent, to show a common scheme, to show bias.

When does a pattern prove bias? I wish this were an idle question. It is relevant to the pattern of the Roberts' Court when its Republican Majority goes off on partisan excursions through the civil law. That is, when all five Republican appointees—the “Roberts Five,” we can call them—go riding off together and no Democratic appointee joins them.

Does this happen often? The Roberts Five has gone on almost 80 of these partisan excursions since Roberts became Chief. That is a lot of times. And there is a feature to these 80 cases. They almost all implicate interests important to the big funders and influencers of the Republican Party. When the Republican Justices go off on these five-Justice partisan excursions, there is a big Republican corporate or partisan interest involved 92 percent of the time.

The tiny handful of these cases that do not implicate an interest of the big Republican influencers is so flukishly few that we can set them aside. Let us look at the 73 cases that all implicate a major Republican Party interest. Again, 73 is a lot of cases at the Supreme Court.

Is there a pattern to these 73 cases? Oh, yes, there is. Every time a big Republican corporate or partisan interest is involved, the big Republican interest wins. Every time.

Let me repeat. In 73 partisan decisions where there is a big Republican interest at stake, the big Republican interest wins every damned time. Thus, the mad scramble of big Republican interest groups to protect a Roberts Five that will reliably give them wins, really big wins sometimes.

I note that when the Roberts Five saddles up, these so-called conservatives are anything but judicially conservative. They readily overturn precedent, toss out statutes passed by wide bipartisan margins, and decide on broad constitutional issues that they need not reach. Modesty, originalism, stare decisis—all these supposedly conservative judicial principles all have the hoofprints of the Roberts Five all across their backs wherever those principles got in the way of those wins for the big Republican interests.

The litany of Roberts Five decisions explains why big Republican interests want Judge Kavanaugh on the Court so badly—so badly that Republicans trampled so much Senate precedent to push him through.

So let us review the highlights reel. What do big Republican interests want?

Well, first, they want to win elections. What has the Roberts Five delivered? Help Republicans gerrymander elections. Vieth v. Jubelirer, 5-to-4, license to gerrymander.

Help Republicans keep minority voters away from the polls. Shelby County, 5-to-4, and Bartlett v. Strickland, 5-to-4, and Abbott

v. Perez, 5–to–4, despite the trial judge finding the Texas Legislature actually intended to target and suppress minority voters.

And the big one, help corporate front-group money flood elections. Big money interests love unlimited power to buy elections, lobby, and threaten and bully Congress. McCutcheon, 5–to–4, counting the concurrence; Bullock, 5–to–4; and the infamous, grotesque 5–to–4 Citizens United decision, which I believe stands beside Lochner on the Court’s “roll of shame.”

What else do big influencers want? To get out of courtrooms. Big influencers hate courtrooms because their lobbying and electioneering and threatening does not work, or at least it is not supposed to. In a courtroom, big influencers, used to getting their way, have to suffer the indignity of equal treatment. So the Roberts Five protects corporations from group class action lawsuits: Wal-Mart v. Dukes, 5–to–4; Comcast, 5–to–4; and this past term, Epic Systems, 5–to–4.

The Roberts Five helps corporations steer customers and workers away from courtrooms and into mandatory arbitration: Concepcion, Italian Colors, and Rent-A-Center, all Roberts Five. Epic Systems does double duty here because now workers cannot even arbitrate their claims as a group.

Hindering access to the courthouse for plaintiffs generally, Iqbal, 5–to–4. Protecting corporations from being taken to court by employees harmed through pay discrimination, Ledbetter, 5–to–4. Age discrimination, Gross, 5–to–4. Harassment, Vance, 5–to–4. And retaliation, Nassar, 5–to–4. Even insulating corporations from liability for international human rights violations, Jesner, 5–to–4.

Corporations are not in the Constitution. Juries are. Indeed, courtroom juries are the one element of American Government designed to protect people against encroachments by private wealth and power. So, of course, the Roberts Five rules for wealthy, powerful corporations over jury rights every time, with nary a mention of the Seventh Amendment.

What is another one? Oh, yes, a classic—helping big business bust unions: Harris v. Quinn, 5–to–4, and Janus v. AFSCME this year, 5–to–4, overturning a 40-year precedent.

Lots of big Republican influencers are polluters who like to pollute for free. So the Roberts Five delivers partisan decisions that let corporate polluters pollute. To pick a few, Rapanos, weakening wetland protections, 5–to–4; National Association of Home Builders, weakening protections for endangered species, 5–to–4; Michigan v. EPA, helping air polluters, 5–to–4; and in the face of emerging climate havoc, there is the procedurally aberrant 5–to–4 partisan decision to stop the EPA Clean Power Plan. Pattern.

Then come Roberts Five bonus decisions advancing a far-right social agenda: Gonzales v. Carhart, upholding restrictive abortion laws; Hobby Lobby, granting corporations religion rights over the healthcare rights of their employees; NIFLA, letting States deny women truthful information about their reproductive choices. All 5–to–4. All Republican.

Add Heller and McDonald, which reanimated for the gun industry a theory a former Chief Justice once called a “fraud,” both decisions, 5–to–4.

This year, Trump v. Hawaii, 5-to-4, rubberstamping the Muslim travel ban. And in case Wall Street was feeling left out, helping insulate investment bankers from fraud claims, Janus Capital, 5-to-4.

Pattern.

No wonder the American people feel the game is rigged. Here is how the game works. Big business and partisan groups fund the Federalist Society, which picked Gorsuch and now, you. As the White House Counsel admitted, they insourced the Federalist Society for this selection. Exactly how the nominees were picked and who was in the room where it happened and who had a vote or a veto and what was said or promised, that is all a deep, dark secret.

Then big business and partisan groups fund the Judicial Crisis Network, which runs dark money political campaigns to influence Senators in confirmation votes, as they have done for Gorsuch and now, for you. Who pays millions of dollars for that and what their expectations are is a deep, dark secret.

These groups also fund Republican election campaigns with dark money and keep the identity of big donors a deep, dark secret. And, of course, 90 percent of your documents are to us a deep, dark secret.

Then once the nominee is on the Court, the same business front groups with ties to the Koch brothers and other funders of the Republican political machine file friend-of-the-court or amicus briefs to signal their wishes to the Roberts Five. Who is really behind those friends is another deep, dark secret.

It has gotten so weird that Republican Justices now even send hints back to big business interests about how they would like to help them next, and then big business lawyers rush out to lose cases—to lose cases—just to rush up before the friendly court pronto. That is what happened in the Friedrichs-Janus episode.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is the biggest corporate lobby of them all, for big coal, big oil, big tobacco, big pharma, big guns, you name it. And this year, with Justice Gorsuch riding with the Roberts Five, the Chamber won nine out of 10 cases it weighed in on. The Roberts Five, since 2006, has given the Chamber more than three-quarters of their total votes. This year, in all civil cases they voted for the Chamber's position fully 90 percent of the time, and in these 5-to-4 cases I have highlighted, 100 percent.

People are noticing. Veteran court watchers like Jeffrey Toobin, Linda Greenhouse, and Norm Ornstein describe the Court's service to Republican interests. Toobin wrote that on the Supreme Court, Roberts has "served the interests of the contemporary Republican Party." Greenhouse has said the "Republican-appointed majority is committed to harnessing the Supreme Court to an ideological agenda." Ornstein described the new reality of today's Supreme Court: it is "polarized along partisan lines in a way that parallels other political institutions and the rest of society in a fashion we have never seen."

And the American public knows it, too. The American public thinks the Supreme Court treats corporations more favorably than individuals—compared to vice-versa—by a 7-to-1 margin; 49 percent of Americans think corporations get special treatment there.

Now let us look at where you fit in. A Republican political operative your whole career who has never tried a case. You made your political bones helping the salacious prosecution of President Clinton and leaking prosecution information to the press. As an operative in the Second Bush White House, you cultivated relationships with political insiders like nomination guru Leonard Leo, the Federalist Society architect of your Court nominations.

On the D.C. Circuit, you gave more than 50 speeches to the Federalist Society. That looks like auditioning.

On the D.C. Circuit, you showed your readiness to join the Roberts Five with big political wins for Republican and corporate interests, unleashing special interest money into elections, protecting corporations from liability, helping polluters pollute, striking down commonsense gun regulations, keeping injured plaintiffs out of court against corporations, and perhaps most important for the current occupant of the Oval Office, expounding a nearly limitless vision of Presidential immunity from the law.

Your alignment with right-wing groups who came before you as friends of the court, 91 percent. When big business trade associations weighed in, 76 percent. This, to me, is what corporate capture of the courts looks like.

There are big expectations for you. The shadowy dark money front group, the Judicial Crisis Network, is spending tens of millions in dark money to push for your confirmation. They clearly have big expectations about how you will rule on dark money.

The NRA has poured millions into your confirmation, promising their members that you will break the tie. They clearly have big expectations on how you will vote on guns.

White House Counsel Don McGahn admitted, "There is a coherent plan here where, actually, the judicial selection and the deregulatory effort are really the flip side of the same coin." Big polluters clearly have big expectations for you on their deregulatory effort.

Finally, you come before us nominated by a President named in open court as directing criminal activity and a subject of ongoing criminal investigation. You displayed expansive views on Executive immunity from the law. If you are in that seat, sir, because the White House has big expectations that you will protect the President from the due process of law, that should give every Senator pause.

Tomorrow we will hear a lot of confirmation etiquette. It is mostly a sham. You know the game. In the Bush White House, you coached judicial nominees to just tell Senators that they have "a commitment to follow Supreme Court precedent, that they will adhere to statutory text, that they have on ideological agenda." Fairy tales.

At his hearing, Justice Roberts famously said he would just call balls and strikes, but this pattern, 73-0, of the Roberts Five qualifies him to have NASCAR-style corporate badges on his robes.

Alito said in his hearing what a strong principle stare decisis was, an important limitation on the Court. Then he told the Federalist Society, "Stare decisis means to leave things decided when it suits our purposes."

Gorsuch delivered the key fifth vote in the precedent-busting and union-busting Janus decision. He, too, had pledged in his hearing to follow the law of judicial precedent, assured us he was not a philosopher king, and promised to give equal concern to every person, poor or rich, mighty or meek. How did that turn out? Great for the rich and mighty. Gorsuch is the single most corporate-friendly Justice on a Court already full of them, ruling for big business interests in over 70 percent of cases and in every single case where his vote was determinative.

The President early on assured evangelicals his Supreme Court picks would attack Roe v. Wade. Despite confirmation etiquette assurances about precedent, your own words make clear you do not really believe Roe v. Wade is settled law since the Court, as you said, “can always overrule its precedent.”

Mr. Chairman, we have seen this movie before. We know how it ends. The sad fact is that there is no consequence for telling the Committee fairy tales about stare decisis and then riding off with the Roberts Five, trampling across whatever precedent gets in the way of letting those big Republican interests keep winning 5–to–4 partisan decisions, 73–0, Mr. Kavanaugh, every damned time.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Senator Whitehouse appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cruz.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I have some documents to support this. May I ask unanimous consent they be entered into the record?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. TED CRUZ,
A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Judge Kavanaugh, welcome. Welcome to your family, to your friends. Demonstrating your good judgment, your wife was born and raised in West Texas, and you and she have been friends of Heidi and mine for 20 years. Thank you for your decades of public service, and I am sorry that your daughters had to endure the political circus of this morning. That is, alas, the world that is Washington in 2018.

I want to discuss what this hearing is about and what it is not about.

First, this hearing is not about the qualifications of the nominee. Judge Kavanaugh is by any objective measure unquestionably qualified for the Supreme Court. Everyone agrees he is one of the most respected Federal judges in the country. He has impeccable academic credentials, even if you did go to Yale. And you served over a decade on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, often referred to as the “second highest court in the land.” So our Democratic colleagues are not trying to make the argument that Judge Kavanaugh is not qualified. Indeed, I have not heard anyone even attempt to make that argument.

Second, this hearing is not about his judicial record. Judge Kavanaugh has over 300 published opinions which altogether amount to over 10,000 pages issued in his role as a Federal appellate judge. Everyone agrees a judge’s record is by far the most important indicium of what kind of Justice that nominee will be. And, tellingly, we have heard very little today from Democratic Senators about the actual substance of Judge Kavanaugh's judicial record.

Third, it is important to understand today is also not about documents. We have heard a lot of arguments this morning about documents. There is an old saying for trial lawyers: "If you have the facts, pound the facts. If you have the law, pound the law. If you have neither, pound the table." We are seeing a lot of table pounding this morning.

The Democrats are focused on procedural issues because they do not have substantive points strong enough to derail this nomination. They do not have substantive criticism with Judge Kavanaugh's actual judicial record, so they are trying to divert everyone with procedural issues. But let us talk about the documents for a moment.

The claims that the Democrats are putting forward on documents do not withstand any serious scrutiny. Judge Kavanaugh has produced 511,948 pages of documents. That includes more than 17,000 pages in direct response to this Committee's written questionnaire, which is the most comprehensive response ever submitted to this Committee. The more than a half million pages of documents turned into this Committee is more than the number of pages we have received for the last five Supreme Court nominees combined.

Listen to that fact again. The over a half million documents turned over to this Committee is more than the last five nominees submitted to this Committee combined.

So what is all the fuss over the documents that are not turned over? Most of those concern Judge Kavanaugh's 3 years as the staff secretary for President George W. Bush. Now, many people do not know what a staff secretary does, but that is the position in charge of all of the paper that comes into and out of the Oval Office. Critically, the staff secretary is not the author of the paper coming into and out of the Oval Office. That paper is typically written by the Attorney General, by the Secretary of State, by other Cabinet members, by other senior White House officials. The staff secretary is simply the funnel for collecting their views and then for transferring the paper back and forth.

In other words, those documents written by other people say nothing, zero, about Judge Kavanaugh's views, and they say nothing, zero, about what kind of Justice Judge Kavanaugh would make. But they are by necessity the most sensitive and confidential documents in a White House. They are the documents that are going to the President. This is the advice and deliberations of the President at the senior level, and the staff secretary is the conduit for those documents. So why is it that the Democrats are putting so much energy in saying hand over all of those documents? Because they know, they know beyond a shadow of doubt, that President George W. Bush's White House team is not going to allow every piece of paper that went to the President to be made public any more than any other White House would. Republican or Democrat, no White House would allow every piece of paper that went to and from the President to be made public. Indeed, there are rules and laws and procedures for when and how Presidential papers become public. And the reason the Democrats are fighting so loudly on this issue is they are making a demand they know is impossible to meet and, by the way, is utterly irrelevant to what actually Judge Kavanaugh thinks, believes, or has said.

It would open up all sorts of fishing expeditions to attack, relitigate George W. Bush's record as President and what various Cabinet members and senior advisers might or might not have said. But it is at the end of the day simply an attempt to distract and delay. And, indeed, the multiple motions we have seen from Democrats, "Delay this confirmation, delay this confirmation," that reveals the whole joke. Their objective is delay.

So what is this fight about? If it is not about documents, if it is not about Judge Kavanaugh's credentials, if it is not about a judicial record, what is this fight about?

I believe this fight is nothing more and nothing less than an attempt by our Democratic colleagues to relitigate the 2016 Presidential election. 2016 was a hard-fought election all around, and it was the first Presidential election in 60 years where Americans went to the polls with a vacant seat on the Supreme Court, one that the next President would fill. Americans knew who had been in that seat: the late Justice Antonin Scalia, one of the greatest jurists ever to sit on the U.S. Supreme Court. And it was the first time since President Dwight D. Eisenhower's reelection campaign that a Supreme Court seat was directly on the ballot.

Both candidates knew the importance of the vacant Supreme Court seat, and it was a major issue of contention in the Presidential election. Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton were both clear about what kind of Justices and judges they would appoint. During all three Presidential debates, both candidates were asked what qualities were most important to them when selecting a Supreme Court Justice.

Secretary Clinton's answer was clear. She wanted a Supreme Court Justice who would be a liberal progressive willing to rewrite the U.S. Constitution, willing to impose liberal policy agendas that she could not get through the democratic process, that the Congress of the United States would not adopt, but that she hoped five unelected lawyers would force on the American people. That is what Hillary Clinton promised for her judicial nominees.

Then-Candidate Donald Trump gave a very different answer. He said he was looking to appoint judges in the mold of Justice Scalia. He said he wanted to appoint judges who would interpret the Constitution based on its original public meaning, who would interpret the statutes according to the text, and who would uphold the rule of law and treat parties fairly regardless of who they are or where they come from.

Then-Candidate Donald Trump also did something that no Presidential candidate has done before. He published a list of nominees that he would choose from when filling Justice Scalia's seat, providing unprecedented transparency to the American people. All of this was laid before the American people as they went to the polls on November 8, 2016, and the American people made a choice that night.

Now, my Democratic colleagues are not happy with the choice the American people made, but as President Obama famously said, "Elections have consequences." Because the American people had the chance to vote, a national referendum on the direction of the Supreme Court, I have said a number of times that Justice Gorsuch's nomination and Judge Kavanaugh's nomination have almost a super legitimacy in that they were ratified, they were decided by the American people in a direct vote in 2016.

And so the Democratic obstruction today is all about trying to reverse that election. They are unhappy with the choice the American people want. And there is a reason that the American people want strong constitutionalists on the U.S. Supreme Court. Most Americans, and I know the overwhelming majority of Texans, want judges who will follow the law and will not impose their policy preferences on the rest of us and who will be faithful to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights; Justices who will uphold fundamental liberties like free speech, like religious liberty, like the Second Amendment. That is what this election was about, and if you look at each of these—let us take free speech. It is worth noting that in 2014 every Democratic Member of this Committee voted to amend the United States Constitution to repeal the free speech provisions of the First Amendment. And, sadly, every Democrat in the Senate agreed with that position, voting to give Congress unprecedented power to regulate political speech. It was a sad day for this institution.

Years earlier, Ted Kennedy, the great liberal lion, had opposed a very similar effort, and Ted Kennedy said, "We have not amended the Bill of Rights in over 200 years. Now is no time to start." Ted Kennedy was right then, and not a single Democrat in the U.S. Senate had the courage to agree with Ted Kennedy and support free speech. Indeed, they voted party line to repeal the free speech provisions of the First Amendment. That is radical, that is extreme, and it is part of the reason the American people voted for a President who would put Justices on the Court who will protect our free speech.

How about religious liberty? Religious liberty is another fundamental protection that the Democrats in the Senate have gotten extreme and radical on. Indeed, our Democratic colleagues want Justices who will rubber stamp efforts like the Obama administration's efforts litigating against the Little Sisters of the Poor, litigating against Catholic nuns, trying to force them to pay for abortion-inducing drugs, and others. That is a radical and extreme proposition. And to show just how dramatic Senate Democrats have gotten, every single Senate Democrat just a few years ago voted to gut the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, legislation that passed Congress with overwhelming bipartisan support in 1993, was signed into law by Bill Clinton, and yet, two decades later, the Democratic Party has determined that religious freedom is inconvenient for their policy and political objectives. They want Justices that will further that assault on religious liberty.

And, finally, let us take the Second Amendment. In the Presidential debate, Hillary Clinton explicitly promised to nominate Justices who would overturn Heller v. District of Columbia. Heller is the landmark decision issued by Justice Scalia, likely the most significant decision of his entire tenure on the Bench, and it upheld the individual right to keep and bear arms.

Now, Hillary Clinton was quite explicit. She wanted judges who would vote to overturn Heller, and, indeed, a number of our Democratic colleagues, that is what they want as well. Overturning Heller, I believe, would be a truly radical proposition. To understand why, you have to understand what the four dissenters said in Heller. The four dissenters in Heller said that the Second Amendment protects no individual right to keep and bear arms whatsoever, that it protects merely a collective right of the militia. The consequence of that radical proposition would mean that Congress could pass a law making it a felony, a criminal offense, for any American to own any firearm, and neither you nor I nor any American would have any individual right whatsoever under the Second Amendment. It would effectively erase the Second Amendment from the Bill of Rights. That is a breathtakingly extreme proposition. It is what Hillary Clinton promised her Justices would do. And at the end of the day, it is what this fight is about.

We know that every Democratic Member of this Committee is going to vote “no.” We do not have to speculate. Every single one of them has publicly announced they are voting “no.” It does not depend on what they read in documents. It does not depend on what Judge Kavanaugh says at this hearing. They have announced ahead of time they are voting “no,” and most of the Democrats in the Senate have announced that in the full Senate. But everyone should understand Judge Kavanaugh has handed over more documents than any nominee, more than the last five combined, Republican and Democratic nominees. This is not about documents. It is not about qualification. It is not about record. What it is about is politics. It is about Democratic Senators trying to relitigate the 2016 election and, just as importantly, working to begin litigating the 2020 Presidential election.

But we had an opportunity for the American people to speak. They did. They voted in 2016, and they wanted judges and Justices who will be faithful to the Constitution. That is why I am confident, at the end of what Shakespeare would describe as, “a lot of sound and fury, signifying nothing,” I am confident that Judge Kavanaugh will become Justice Kavanaugh and will be confirmed to the United States Supreme Court.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are going to take a break now, and—wait a minute. We are going to take a break now, and 30 minutes is what the Democrats would like to have, so we will return at 1:17. And Justice Gorsuch returned about 10 minutes later than that, so be on time, please.

[Laughter.]

[Whereupon the Committee was recessed and reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. First of all, thanks, Judge Kavanaugh, for getting back on the exact time.

Before I call on Senator Klobuchar, I think that some of my colleagues have raised some issues that I think demand an answer, and I want to speak to those points. But this issue has never come up from my colleagues, but I thought, as I sat here and listened to some people criticize the Supreme Court for, in a sense, being “bought”—and they always tend to criticize the President of the United States for somehow interfering in the judiciary, and I hear all about the criticism of Trump—it seems odd to me that we do not have criticism of people that are saying the same thing about the Supreme Court.

So, I want to read. Whenever the President criticizes the judiciary or judicial decisions, we hear wails of anguish from my Democratic colleagues. They attack the President for threatening the independence and the integrity of the judiciary, and they applaud the judiciary for standing up to the President.

I just listened to some of my colleagues here. One of them spent 18 minutes attacking the personal integrity of Justices of the Supreme Court. He said that five Justices have been bought and sold by private interests. He accused them of deciding cases to the benefit of favored parties. So I think it is pretty clear: a double standard. And we should not have to tolerate such double standard, and particularly from a press that is a policeman of our whole democratic process. That without a free press, our Government would be less than what it is. And it seems to me that that is something that I hope some of you will take into consideration, probably will not, but at least I said my piece.

Then also, several Senators have brought up about the 6 percent and the 99 percent and things like that that I thought I ought to clear up because I could say myself that when I first started finding out how much paper Judge Kavanaugh had on his record—I mean, for his background, I started talking about 100 million pages. And then when we finally get 488,000, then I could say, well, I got about 48 percent of what we ought to have. But there is a good explanation of why we do not have it, so I want to read.

Some of my colleagues keep saying that we have only 6 percent of Judge Kavanaugh's White House records but that 99 percent of Justice Kagan's White House records were made public before the hearing. This is "fuzzy math." My colleagues calibrate their phony 6 percent figure on two inaccurate numbers. First, their 6 percent figure counts the estimated page count by career archivists at the National Archives based upon their historical practice, before the unprocessed emails and attachments are actually reviewed.

Judge Kavanaugh's White House emails that we have received, the actual number of pages ended up being significantly less than the number the National Archives estimated before the actual review. One reason is because we were able to use technology to cull out the exact duplicate emails. Instead of having to read 13 times an email that Judge Kavanaugh sent to 12 White House colleagues, we only had to read the email once.

Second, the 6 percent figure counts millions and millions of pages of irrelevant staff secretary documents that we never, ever requested or needed. More importantly, we received 100 percent of the documents we requested from Judge Kavanaugh's time as an executive branch lawyer. And while we may have received 99 percent of Justice Kagan's White House records, we received zero records from her most relevant legal service as a Solicitor General, the Federal Government's top Supreme Court advocate. We received much less than 99 percent of her records as a lawyer. And we did not receive 60,000 emails from Justice Kagan, so 99 percent is an overestimate.

And even though we never received them, Justice Kagan's Solicitor General records were much more needed at the time because Kagan was a blank slate as a judge. Instead, unlike Judge Kavanaugh with his 12 years of judicial service and over 10,000 pages of judicial writings on the Nation's most important Federal circuit court, Justice Kagan had zero years of judicial service and zero pages of judicial writing before her appointment to the highest court.

Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And before I begin my opening statement, I just wanted to respond to just a few things. One, none of that takes away from the fact that 42,000 documents were dumped on us last night, and I do not think anyone would go to trial and allow a trial to go forward or allow a case to go forward if one side got 42,000 documents the night before and the other side—and you cannot simply review them. As pointed out by Senator Whitehouse, you would have to review 7,000 documents every hour. That happened last night.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let me respond without taking time away from you.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Democrats got exactly the same amount of money we did to do the massive amount of work we had to do, and we got it done at 11 o'clock last night.

Proceed.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. The point is, that no one could prepare and review 42,000 documents in one evening. We know that, no matter how much coffee you drink.

And the second point is, that it is true that executive privilege has never been invoked before to block the release of Presidential records to the Senate during a confirmation hearing, so I will begin my opening statement, but those are two points I do not believe are refuted so—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Well, I will refute it from this standpoint. There were 5,000 documents, 42,000 pages.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Proceed.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. AMY KLOBUCHAR, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you. Welcome, Judge Kavanaugh. We welcome your family as well. On its face, this may look like a normal confirmation hearing. It has all the trappings. All of us up here, all of the cameras out there, the statement, the questions, all of it looks normal, but this is not a normal confirmation hearing.

First, as we have debated this morning, we are being asked to give advice and consent when the administration has not consented to give us over 100,000 documents, all of which detail a critical part of the Judge's career, the time he spent in the White House. And, in addition, the Majority party has not consented to make 189,000 of the documents we do have, public.

As a former prosecutor, I know that no lawyer goes to court without reviewing the evidence and record. I know—and I know you know, Judge Kavanaugh—that a good judge would not decide a case with only 7 percent of the key documents. A good judge would not allow a case to move forward if one side dropped 42,000 pages of documents on the other side the night before a case started. And yet, that is where we are today. This is not normal. It is an abdication of the role of the Senate and a disservice to the American people, and it is our duty to speak out.

Second, this nomination comes before us at a time when we are witnessing seismic shifts in our democracy. Foundational elements of our Government, including the rule of law, have been challenged and undermined. Today, our democracy faces threats that we never would have believed occurring not that long ago.

Our intelligence agencies agree that a foreign adversary attempted to interfere in our most recent election, and it is happening again. In the words of the President's Director of National Intelligence, "The lights are blinking red."

There is an extensive ongoing investigation by a special counsel. The President's private lawyer and campaign chairman have been found guilty of multiple Federal crimes.

The man appointed as special counsel in this investigation, a man who has served with distinction under Presidents from both parties, has been under siege. The dedicated public servants who work in our Justice Department, including the Attorney General and the FBI, have been subjected to repeated threats and have had their work politicized and their motives questioned.

In fact, just this past weekend, Federal law enforcement was called out—was rebuked—by the President of the United States for simply doing their jobs: for prosecuting two white-collar defendants, one for insider trading, one for campaign theft. Why? Because the defendants were personal friends and campaign supporters of the President of the United States. As a former prosecutor, as someone who has seen Federal law enforcement do their jobs, this is abhorrent to me, so no, this is not normal.

And the last branch, the third branch of Government—our courts and individual judges—have been under assault, not just by a solitary disappointed litigant but by the President of the United States. Our democracy is on trial. And for the pillars of our democracy and our Constitution to weather this storm, our Nation's highest court must serve as a ballast in these turbulent times. Our very institutions, and those nominated to protect these institutions, must be fair, impartial, and unwavering in their commitment to truth and justice.

So, today, we will begin a hearing in which it is our duty to carry on the American constitutional tradition that John Adams stood up for many centuries ago, and that is to be, in his words, "a government of laws and not men." To me, that means figuring out what your views are, Judge, on whether a President is above the law. It is a simple concept we learned in grade school, that no one is above the law. So I think it is a good place to start.

There were many highly credentialed nominees like yourself that could have been sitting before us today, but, to my colleagues, what concerns me is, that during this critical juncture in history, the President has handpicked a nominee to the Court with the most expansive view of Presidential power possible, a nominee who has actually written that the President, on his own, can declare laws unconstitutional.

Of course, we are very pleased when a judge submits an article to the University of Minnesota Law Review and even more so when that article receives so much national attention. But the article you wrote that I am referring to, Judge, raises many troubling questions. Should a sitting President really never be subject to an investigation? Should a sitting President never be questioned by a special counsel? Should a President really be given total authority to remove a special counsel?

In addition to the article, there are other pieces of this puzzle which demonstrate that the nominee before us has an incredibly broad view of the President's Executive power. Judge Kavanaugh, you wrote, for example, in Seven-Sky v. Holder that a President can disregard a law passed by Congress if he deems it to be unconstitutional, even if a court has upheld it.

What would that mean when it comes to laws protecting the special counsel? What would that mean when it comes to women's healthcare? The days of the divine rights of kings ended with the Magna Carta in 1215, and centuries later, in the wake of the American Revolution, a check on the Executive was a major foundation of the U.S. Constitution. For it was James Madison, who may not have had a musical named after him but was a top scholar of his time, who wrote in Federalist 47: "The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny."

So what does that warning mean in real-life terms today? Here is one example: It means whether people like Kelly Gregory, an Air Force veteran, mother, and business owner who is here from Tennessee, and who is living with stage IV breast cancer, can afford medical treatment. At a time when the administration is arguing that protections to ensure people with pre-existing conditions cannot be kicked off their health insurance are unconstitutional, we cannot and should not confirm a Justice who believes the President's views alone carry the day.

One opinion I plan to ask about? When judges appointed by Presidents of both parties joined in upholding the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, you, Judge, dissented. Your dissent concluded that the Bureau, an agency which has served us well in bringing back over $12 billion to consumers for fraud from credit cards to loans to mortgages, was unconstitutional.

Or, in another case, you wrote a dissent against the rules that protect net neutrality, rules that help all citizens and small businesses have an even playing field when it comes to accessing the internet.

Another example that seems mired in legalese but is critical for Americans: Antitrust law. In recent years, a conservative majority on the Supreme Court has made it harder and harder to enforce the Nation's antitrust laws, ruling in favor of consolidation and market dominance. Yet two of Judge Kavanaugh's major antitrust opinions suggest that he would push the Court even further down this pro-merger path. We should have more competition and not less.

Now to go from my specific concerns and end on a higher plane. All of the attacks on the rule of law and our justice system over the past year have made me—and I would guess some of my other colleagues on this Committee—pause and think many times about why I decided to come to the Senate and get on this Committee and, much further back, why I even decided to go into law in the first place.

Now, I will tell you that not many girls in my high school class said they dreamed of being a lawyer. We had no lawyers in my family, and my parents were the first in their families to go to college. But somehow my dad convinced me to spend a morning sitting in a courtroom watching a State court district judge handle a routine calendar of criminal cases. The judge took pleas, listened to arguments, and handed out misdemeanor sentences. It was certainly nothing glamorous like the work for the job you have been nominated for, Judge, but it was important just the same.

I realized that morning that behind every single case there was a story and there was a person, no matter how small. Each and every decision the judge made that day affected that person's life. And I noticed how often he had to make gut decisions and had to take account of what his decisions would mean for that person and his or her family.

This week, I remembered that day, and I remembered I had written an essay about it at the ripe old age of 17. I went back and looked at what I had said. It is something that I still believe today and that is, that “to be part of an imperfect system, to have a chance to better that system” was and is a cause worth fighting for, a job worth doing.

Our Government is far from perfect, Judge, nor is our legal system, but we are at a crossroads in our Nation's history where we must make a choice. Are we going to dedicate ourselves to improving our democracy, improving our justice system, or not? The question we are being asked to address in this hearing, among others, is whether this judge, at this time in our history, will administer the law “with equal justice” as it applies to all citizens, regardless of if they live in a poor neighborhood or a rich neighborhood, or if they live in a small house or the White House.

Our country needs a Supreme Court Justice who will better our legal system, a Justice who will serve as a check and balance on the other branches, who will stand up for the rule of law without consideration of politics or partisanship, who will uphold our Constitution without fear or favor, and who will work for the betterment of the great American experiment in democracy. That is what this hearing is about.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Senator Klobuchar appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Sasse.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. BEN SASSE, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEBRASKA

Senator SASSE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We need to get to Judge Kavanaugh, but I really want to riff with Amy for a while. Senator Klobuchar, you did Madison, Lin-Manuel Miranda, the Magna Carta, and your dad——

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you. Thank you, I——

Senator SASSE [continuing]. Taking you to court.

Senator KLOBUCHAR [continuing]. Appreciate that.

Senator SASSE. Well done.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you.

Senator SASSE. I had all that on my bingo card.

[Laughter.]

Senator SASSE. I have little kids, and I have taken my two little girls to court a few times, too, mostly to juvie just to scare them straight, not to turn them into attorneys but that is not——

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Who said that that was not what my dad was doing, Senator Sasse?

[Laughter.]

Senator SASSE. That was wisdom in Minnesota.

Congratulations, Judge, on your nomination. Actually, congratulations and condolences. This process has to stink. I am glad your daughters could get out of the room, and I hope they still get the free day from school.

Let us do some good news/bad news, the bad news first. Judge, since your nomination in July, you have been accused of hating women, hating children, hating clean air, wanting dirty water. You have been declared a quote/unquote “existential threat” to our Nation. Alumni of Yale Law School, incensed that faculty members at your alma mater praised your selection, wrote a public letter to the school saying, quote, “People will die if Brett Kavanaugh is confirmed.”

This drivel is patently absurd, and I worry that we are going to hear more of it over the next few days. But the good news is it is absurd, and the American people do not believe any of it. This stuff is not about Brett Kavanaugh when screamers say this stuff for cable TV news. The people who know you better, not those who are trying to get on TV, they tell a completely different story about who Brett Kavanaugh is. You have earned high praise from the many lawyers, both right and left, who have appeared before you during your 12 years on the D.C. Circuit and those who have had you as a professor at Yale Law and at Harvard Law. People in legal circles invariably applaud your mind, your work, your temperament, your collegiality. That is who Brett Kavanaugh is. And to quote Lisa Blatt, a Supreme Court attorney from the left who has known you for a decade, quote, “Sometimes a superstar is just a superstar, and that is the case with this judge. The Senate should confirm him,” close quote.

It is pretty obvious to most people going about their work today that the deranged comments actually do not have anything to do with you, so we should figure out why do we talk like this about Supreme Court nominations now? There is a bunch that is atypical in the last 19, 20 months in America. Senator Klobuchar is right. The comments from the White House yesterday about trying to politicize the Department of Justice, they were wrong, and they should be condemned. And my guess is Brett Kavanaugh would condemn them.

But really the reason these hearings do not work is not because of Donald Trump. It is not because of anything in the last 20 months. These confirmation hearings have not worked for 31 years in America. People are going to pretend that Americans have no historical memory and supposedly there have not been screaming protestors saying women are going to die at every hearing for decades, but this has been happening since Robert Bork. This is a 31-year tradition. There is nothing really new the last 18 months.

So the fact that the hysteria has nothing to do with you means that we should ask what is the hysteria coming from? The hysteria around Supreme Court confirmation hearings is coming from the fact that we have a fundamental misunderstanding of the role of the Supreme Court in American life now. Our political commentary talks about the Supreme Court like they are people wearing red and blue jerseys. That is a really dangerous thing. And, by the way, if they have red and blue jerseys, I would welcome my colleagues to introduce the legislation that ends lifetime tenure for the judiciary because if they are just politicians, then the people should have power, and they should not have lifetime appointments. So until you introduce that legislation, I do not believe you really want the Supreme Court to be a politicized body, though that is the way we constantly talk about it now.

We can and we should do better than this. It is predictable that every confirmation hearing now is going to be an overblown politicized circus, and it is because we have accepted a new theory about how our three branches of Government should work and, in particular, how the judiciary should work.

What Supreme Court confirmation hearings should be about is, an opportunity to go back and do "Schoolhouse Rock!" civics for our kids. We should be talking about how a bill becomes a law and what the job of Article II is, and what the job of Article III is, so let us try just a little bit. How did we get here, and how can we fix it?

I want to make just four brief points. Number one: In our system, the legislative branch is supposed to be the center of our politics.

Number two: It is not. Why not? Because for the last century, and increasing by the decade right now, more and more legislative authority is delegated to the executive branch every year. Both parties do it. The legislature is impotent, the legislature is weak, and most people here want their jobs more than they really want to do legislative work, and so they punt most of the work to the next branch.

Third consequence is that this transfer of power means the people yearn for a place where politics can actually be done, and when we do not do a lot of big actual political debating here, we transfer it to the Supreme Court, and that is why the Supreme Court is increasingly a substitute political battleground in America. It is not healthy, but it is what happens, and it something that our Founders would not be able to make any sense of.

And fourth and finally, we badly need to restore the proper duties and the balance of power from our constitutional system.

So, point one: The legislative branch is supposed to be the locus of our politics properly understood. Since we are here in this room today because this is a Supreme Court confirmation hearing, we are tempted to start with Article III, but really, we need Article III as part of the Constitution that sets up the judiciary. We really should be starting with Article I, which is us. What is the legislature's job? The Constitution's drafters began with the legislature. These are equal branches, but Article I comes first for a reason, and that is because policymaking is supposed to be done in the body that makes laws.

That means that this is supposed to be the institution dedicated to political fights. If we see lots and lots of protests in front of the Supreme Court, that is a pretty good litmus-test barometer of the fact that our republic is not healthy because people should not be thinking they are protesting in front of the Supreme Court. They should be protesting in front of this body.

The legislature is designed to be controversial, noisy, sometimes even rowdy because making laws means we have to hash out the reality that we do not all agree. Government is about power. Government is not just another word for things we do together. The reason we have limited government in America is because we believe in freedom. We believe in souls. We believe in persuasion. We believe in love. And those things are not done by power. But the Government acts by power. And since the Government acts by power, we should be reticent to use power. And so it means when you differ about power, you have to have a debate. And this institution is supposed to be dedicated to debate and should be based on the premise that we know since we do not all agree, we should try to constrain that power just a little bit, but then we should fight about it and have a vote in front of the American people.

And then what happens? The people get to decide whether they want to hire us or fire us. They do not have to hire us again. This body is the political branch where policymaking fights should happen. And if we are the easiest people to fire, it means the only way the people can maintain power in our system is if almost all the politicized decisions happen here, not in Article II or Article III.

So that brings us to a second point. How do we get to a place where the legislature decided to give away its power? We have been doing it for a long time. Over the course of the last century but especially since the 1930s and then ramping up since the 1960s, a whole lot of the responsibility in this body has been kicked to a bunch of alphabet-soup bureaucracies. All the acronyms that people know about their Government or do not know about their Government are the places where most actual policymaking—kind of, in a way, lawmaking—is happening right now. This is not what “Schoolhouse Rock!” says. There is no verse of “Schoolhouse Rock!” that says give a whole bunch of power to the alphabet-soup agencies and let them decide what the governance decisions should be for the people because the people do not have any way to fire the bureaucrats.

And so what we mostly do around this body is not pass laws. What we mostly do is decide to give permission to the Secretary or the Administrator of bureaucracy X, Y, or Z to make lawlike regulations. That is mostly what we do here. We go home and we pretend we make laws. No, we do not. We write giant pieces of legislation, 1,200 pages, 1,500 pages long that people have not read filled with all these terms that are undefined and we say the Secretary of such-and-such shall promulgate rules that do the rest of our dang jobs. That is why there are so many fights about the executive branch and about the judiciary because this body rarely finishes its work.

And the House is even worse. I do not really believe that. It just seemed like you needed to try to unite us in some way.

So I admit that there are rational arguments that one could make for this new system. The Congress cannot manage all the nitty-gritty details of everything about modern government, and this system tries to give power and control to experts in their fields where most of us in Congress do not know much of anything about technical matters for sure, but you could also impugn our wisdom if you want. But when you are talking about technical complicated matters, it is true that the Congress would have a hard time sorting out every final dot and tittle about every detail.

But the real reason at the end of the day that this institution punts most of its power to executive branch agencies is because it is a convenient way for legislators to be able to avoid taking responsibility for controversial and often unpopular decisions. If people want to get reelected over and over again and that is your highest goal, if your biggest long-term thought around here is about your own incumbency, then actually giving away your power is a pretty good strategy. It is not a very good life, but it is a pretty good strategy for incumbency.

And so at the end of the day, a lot of the power delegation that happens from this branch is because the Congress has decided to self-neuter. Well, guess what? The important thing is not whether the Congress has lame jobs. The important thing is that when the Congress neuters itself and gives power to an unaccountable fourth branch of government, it means the people are cut out of the process. There is nobody in Nebraska, there is nobody in Minnesota or Delaware who elected the deputy assistant administrator of plant quarantine at the USDA.

And yet if the deputy assistant administrator of plant quarantine does something to make Nebraskans' lives really difficult, which happens to farmers and ranchers in Nebraska. Who do they protest to? Where do they go? How do they navigate the complexity and the thicket of all the lobbyists in this town to do executive-agency lobbying. They cannot. And so what happens is they do not have any ability to speak out and to fire people through an election.

And so, ultimately, when the Congress is neutered, when the administrative state grows, when there is this fourth branch of Government, it makes it harder and harder for the concerns of citizens to be represented and articulated by people that the people know that they have power over. All the power right now or almost all the power right now happens off-stage, and that leaves a lot of people wondering who is looking out for me?

And that brings us to the third point. The Supreme Court becomes our substitute political battleground. It is only nine people. You can know them. You can demonize them. You can try to make them messiahs, but ultimately, because people cannot navigate their way through the bureaucracy, they turn to the Supreme Court looking for politics. And knowing that our elected officials no longer care enough to do the hard work of reasoning through the places where we differ and deciding to shroud our power at times, it means that we look for nine Justices to be super-legislators. We look for nine Justices to try to right the wrongs from other places in the process. When people talk about wanting to have empathy from their Justices, this is what they are talking about. They are talking about trying to make the Justices do something that the Congress refuses to do, as it constantly abdicates its responsibility.

The hyperventilating that we see in this process and the way that today's hearing started with 90 minutes of theatrics that are preplanned with certain Members of the other side here, it shows us a system that is wildly out of whack.

And thus, a fourth and final point. The solution here is not to try to find judges who will be policymakers. The solution is not to try to turn the Supreme Court into an election battle for TV. The solution is to restore a proper constitutional order with a balance of powers. We need "Schoolhouse Rock!" back. We need a Congress that writes laws and then stands before the people and suffers the consequences and gets to go back to our own Mount Vernon if that is what the electors decide. We need an executive branch that has a humble view of its job as enforcing the law, not trying to write laws in the Congress' absence. And we need a judiciary that tries to apply written laws to facts and cases that are actually before it.

This is the elegant and the fair process that the Founders created. It is the process where the people who are elected, two and 6 years in this institution, 4 years in the executive branch, can be fired because the Justices and the judges, the men and women who serve America's people by wearing black robes. They are insulated from politics. This is why we talk about an independent judiciary. This is why they wear robes. This is why we should not talk about Republican and Democratic judges and Justices. This is why we say justice is blind. This is why we give judges lifetime tenure. And this is why this is the last job interview Brett Kavanaugh will ever have because he is going to a job where he is not supposed to be a super-legislator.

So the question before us today is not what does Brett Kavanaugh think 11 years ago on some policy matter. The question before us whether or not he has the temperament and the character to take his policy views and his political preferences and put them in a box marked irrelevant and set it aside every morning when he puts on the black robe. The question is does he have the character and temperament to do that. If you do not think he does, vote no, but if you think he does, stop the charades because, at the end of the day, I think all of us know that Brett Kavanaugh understands his job is not to rewrite laws as he wishes they were. He understands that he is not being interviewed to be a super-legislator. He understands that his job is not to seek popularity. His job is to be fair and dispassionate. It is not to exercise empathy. It is to follow written laws.

Contrary to The Onion-like smears that we hear outside, Judge Kavanaugh does not hate women and children. Judge Kavanaugh does not lust after dirty water and stinky air. No. Looking at his record, it seems to me that what he actually dislikes are legislators that are too lazy and too risk-averse to do our actual jobs. It seems to me that if you read his 300-plus opinions, what his opinions reveal to me is a dissatisfaction—I think he would argue a constitutionally compelled dissatisfaction—with power-hungry executive branch bureaucrats doing our job when we fail to do it.

And in this view, I think he is aligned with the Founders. For our Constitution places power not in the hands of this city's bureaucracy, which cannot be fired, but our Constitution places the policymaking power in the 535 of our hands because the voters can hire and fire us. And if the voters are going to retain their power, they need a legislature that is responsive to politics, not a judiciary that is responsive to politics.

It seems to me that Judge Kavanaugh is ready to do his job. The question for us is whether we are ready to do our job.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. The example I always use to back up what Senator Sasse says about the Congress not doing its job and delegating too much is the Obamacare legislation that was 2,700 pages and there was 1,693 delegations of authority to bureaucrats to write regulations because Congress did not know how to reorganize health care.

Senator Coons.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CHRISTOPHER A. COONS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF DELAWARE

Senator COONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Judge Kavanaugh. Welcome to you and to your family and to your friends who are here. As you know well, we went to the same law school. We clerked in the same courthouse in Wilmington, Delaware, so I have known you and your reputation for nearly 30 years, and I know well that you have a reputation as a good friend, a good classmate, a good roommate, as a good husband and family man, that you have contributed to your community. I think we will hear later today that you have even been a great youth basketball coach.

But frankly, we are not here to consider you as the president of our neighborhood civic association or even to review whether you have been a great youth basketball coach. We are here to consider you for a lifetime appointment to the United States Supreme Court where you will help shape the future of this country and have an impact on the lives of millions of Americans for literally decades to come.

And to make that decision to exercise our constitutional role, we have to look closely at your decisions, your statements, your writings to understand how you might interpret our Constitution. The next Justice will play a pivotal role in defining a wide range of critical issues, including the scope of the President's power in determining whether the President might be above the law. The next Justice will impact essential rights enshrined in our modern understanding of the Constitution, including the right to privacy, rights to contraception, intimacy, abortion, marriage, the freedom to worship as we choose, the ability to participate in our democracy as full citizens, and the promise of equal protection.

That is because the cases that come before the Court are not just academic or esoteric or theoretical. They involve real people and have real and lasting consequences.

With stakes this high, I deeply regret the process that has gotten us to this point, the excesses and partisan gamesmanship of the last few years, and that history bears briefly repeating.

When Justice Scalia passed in February 2016, I called the White House and urged then-President Obama to nominate a jurist who could gain support from both sides of the aisle and help build a strong center on the Court, and he did just that when he nominated Merrick Garland, chief judge of the D.C. Circuit, whom I know you also admire. But my Republicans refused to even meet with him, must less hold a hearing or vote on his confirmation.

During the 400 days that the Majority refused to fill the Supreme Court vacancy, then-Candidate Trump also released a list of potential nominees to the Court, a list compiled by two highly partisan organizations: the Federalist Society and the Heritage Foundation. And after our President was elected, he picked from that list and nominated Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court.

When Judge Gorsuch testified before this very Committee, he told us repeatedly how deeply he understood and respected precedent. He even cited a book on precedent he co-authored with you. But in his first 15 months of service, Justice Gorsuch has already voted to overrule at least five important Supreme Court precedents and to question many others. To name just one, given it was just Labor Day, Justice Gorsuch voted to gut public-sector unions, overturning a 41-year-old precedent on which there were great reliance interests in impacting millions of workers across the country.

My point is, that Justice Gorsuch was confirmed to the Court in one of the most concerningly partisan processes in Senate history, and only after the Majority deployed the nuclear option to end the filibuster for Supreme Court nominations. This brings us, Judge, to today and your nomination.

When Justice Kennedy announced his retirement, I once again called the White House and urged, through White House Counsel, that President Trump consider selecting someone for this seat who could win broad support from both sides of the aisle. And, Judge Kavanaugh, I am concerned you may not be that nominee. Your record prior to joining the bench places you in the midst of some of the most pitched and partisan battles in our lifetimes, from Ken Starr's investigation of President Clinton, to the 2000 election recount, to the controversies of the Bush administration, including surveillance, torture, access to justice, and the culture wars.

So, Judge, it is critical that this Committee and the American people fully examine your record to understand what kind of Justice you would be. And, unfortunately, as we have all discussed at length here today, that has been rendered impossible. The Majority has blocked access to millions of pages of documents from your service in a critical role in the White House. For the first time since Watergate, the nonpartisan National Archives has been cut out of the process for reviewing and producing your records.

Senate Republicans have worked to keep "committee confidential" nearly 200,000 pages of documents so that the public cannot view them, and we cannot question based on them, and your former deputy is in charge of designating which documents this Committee and the American people get to see. Not only that, but for the first time in our history, the President has invoked executive privilege to withhold more than 100,000 pages of documents on a Supreme Court nominee from the Judiciary Committee. This leads to a difficult but important question, which is, "What might President Trump or the Majority be trying to hide?"

Mr. Chairman, I want to make an appeal to work together to restore the integrity of this Committee. We are better than this process. We are better than proceeding with a nominee without engaging in a full and transparent process. This Committee is failing the American people by proceeding in this way, and I fully support the motions made by my colleagues earlier in this hearing and regret that we proceeded without observing the rules of this Committee.

That said, Judge Kavanaugh, I have reviewed the parts of your record that I have been able to access and what I have been able to see from available speeches, writings, and decisions, and I have to say it troubles me. While serving on the bench, you have dissented at a higher rate than any circuit judge elevated to the Supreme Court since 1980, and that includes Judge Bork. Your dissents reveal some views and positions that fall well outside the mainstream of legal thought. You have suggested, as has been referenced, that the President has the authority to refuse to enforce a law such as the Affordable Care Act were he to decide it was unconstitutional.

You have voted to strike down net neutrality rules, gun safety laws, the organization of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, and many of your dissents would undercut environmental protections or workers' rights or any antidiscrimination laws, and you have recently praised Justice Rehnquist's dissent in Roe. You have embraced an approach to substantive due process that would undermine the rights and protections of millions of Americans, from basic protections for LGBT Americans to access to contraception, to health care and the ability for Americans to love and marry whom they wish. I am concerned your writings demonstrate a hostility to affirmative action and civil rights. And, most importantly, I believe you have repeatedly and enthusiastically embraced an interpretation of Presidential power so expansive that it could result in a dangerously unaccountable President at the very time when we are most in need of checks and balances.

I want to pause for a moment on this last point, because the context of your nomination troubles me the most. In reviewing your records, Judge, you have questioned the lawfulness of United States v. Nixon, a historic decision in which a unanimous Court said the President had to comply with a grand jury subpoena. You have questioned the correctness of Morrison v. Olson, a 30-year-old precedent, holding that Congress can create an independent counsel with the authority to investigate the President, who the President cannot just fire on a whim. You have questioned whether a President and his aides should be subject to any civil or criminal investigations while in office.

And, given these positions about Presidential power, which I view as being at one extreme of the record of circuit judges, we have to confront an uncomfortable but important question about whether President Trump may have selected you, Judge Kavanaugh, with an eye toward protecting himself.

So, Judge Kavanaugh, I am going to ask you about these issues, as we did when we met in my office, and I expect you to address them. When we spoke, you agreed that we have a shared concern about the legitimacy of the Supreme Court, that it is critical to our system of rule of law. In my view, it is today in jeopardy. You are participating in a process that has featured unprecedented concealment and partisanship around your record. And a few moments ago, Senator Durbin proposed a bold step, which would be for you to support suspending this hearing until all your records are produced and available to this Committee and the American people, and I encourage you to do this.

There are also Members of both parties who have not stated how they will vote on your nomination, and I urge you to answer our questions about your prior work, about your writings, about precedent and the Constitution itself, to trust the American people, and to help build our trust in the Court on which you may well soon serve.

I have been to too many hearings in which judicial nominees have told us that they will evenhandedly apply the text of laws or the Constitution only to watch them ascend to the Bench and whittle away the individual rights of Americans or narrow and overturn long-settled precedent.

This Supreme Court vacancy comes at a critical time for our country, when our institutions of law and the very foundations of our democracy are being gravely tested. If we are going to safeguard the rule of law in this country, our courts—and in particular, our Supreme Court—must be a bulwark against unprecedented violations of law, deprivations of freedom, and abuses of power by anyone—including our President.

No one said it better than our former colleague, Senator McCain, who once asked about America, what makes us exceptional? Is it our wealth, our natural resources, our military power, our big and bountiful country? No, it is our founding ideals and our fidelity to them and our conduct in the world, they are the source of our wealth and power, that we live under the rule of law. That enables us to face threats with confidence that our values make us stronger than our enemies.

Judge Kavanaugh, we are here to determine whether you would uphold or undermine those founding ideals and the rule of law. We are here to determine whether you would continue in the traditions of the Court or transform it into a body more conservative than a majority of Americans. We are here to determine whether your confirmation would compromise or undermine the legitimacy of the Court itself. I urge you to answer our questions and to confront these significant challenges. These are weighty questions, and the American people deserve real answers.

Thank you, and I look forward to your testimony.

[The prepared statement of Senator Coons appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. You can easily get the impression, not just from Senator Coons but other Senators, that somehow you, Judge Kavanaugh, are out of the mainstream in some way. So I looked at your record in the D.C. Circuit and have found that judges have agreed with you and your rulings in an overwhelming majority of matters across the board. Ninety-four percent of the matters Judge Kavanaugh heard were decided unanimously. In 97 percent of the matters Judge Kavanaugh heard, he voted with the majority. Judge Kavanaugh issued dissenting opinions in only 2.7 percent of the matters that you heard.

I would also like to clarify what the Presidential Records Act requires. Our documents process has fully complied with the Presidential Records Act. Under the Federal statute, President Bush has the right to request his own administration records. He also has the authority to review his records before the Senate receives them. Indeed, the Archives may not produce them to the Committee without giving President Bush and his statutory representatives an opportunity to review first. This is what President Bush has done, and the National Archives does not have the authority to second-guess President Bush's decision to release records to us.

The National Archives was not cut out of the process. As President Bush's representative informed the Committee, quote, "Because we have sought, received, and followed NARA's"—that means the Archivist's—"views on any documents withheld as personal documents, the resulting productions of documents to the Committee is essentially the same as if the 'Archivist' had conducted its review first, and then sought our views and the current administration's views, as required by law," end of quote.

Senator Flake.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JEFF FLAKE, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF ARIZONA

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Congratulations, Judge Kavanaugh, and congratulations to your family as well.

Let me just say a few things about the issue that has been discussed here a lot today, the issue of documents and document production. The standard historically that we use to look at nominees is what is relevant and probative. I would suggest that we certainly get that from the 12 years you have served on the circuit court, on the D.C. Circuit Court, that considers, when you look at the docket, items that, you know, more than any other circuit court, that the Supreme Court would be perhaps called to rule on.

In the past, Senators on this panel have argued on both sides of the aisle that confirming a judge, the best we can look at is his or her judicial record. You have that record, and it is a long one, over 300 opinions, and I would suggest that that is where we need to start. A lot of the other records that have been discussed are mainly duplicative, administrative documents. Many do not meet the standard of relevant or probative. They may not demonstrate the type of Justice that you will be.

Senator Sasse talked about what we are called to do here is to look at your temperament and your judgment and your character, and I think you can see a lot of that by the type of life you have lived outside of the courtroom. When we met in my office, I was impressed obviously with your respect for the law and quick intellect but also struck by kindness and decency. I found out that we share a deep love of sports. We both played football back in the day. I am sure you are looking forward to this weekend not just when these hearings are concluded but when the Redskins and Cardinals play on Sunday.

I have learned that you have run the Boston Marathon twice. I wonder if the ABA took that into account when they gave you a favorable rating. I am not sure what that says about your soundness of mind myself. But, in all seriousness, training for a marathon, completing two marathons like this, is a huge accomplishment. It demonstrates not just your competitive spirit but a strong sense of purpose and commitment and says something about your temperament and character.

Of course, you have no greater commitment than to your family, your wife Ashley and your two daughters. I know that you beamed with pride when talking about them and talking about, as has been mentioned earlier, coaching your daughter's elementary-school basketball teams.

I have a letter for the record written by a group of parents whose girls play for basketball teams that Judge Kavanaugh coaches, and, Mr. Chairman, without objection, I would like to enter that letter into the record.

Chairman GRASSLEY. So ordered.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator FLAKE. The team's parents' note that Judge Kavanaugh has been a devoted coach and a mentor to their daughters. As these parents note, Coach K—and that is new, you, not the Duke, a famous one—stresses the importance of playing as a team and has provided the girls the opportunity to learn about teamwork, honesty, integrity, humility, respect, discipline, hard work, and competitiveness. Again, we are going back to temperament and character. Judge Kavanaugh's dedication and commitment as a volunteer basketball coach I think demonstrates and says a good deal about that character.

And congratulations to you and the Blessed Sacrament Bulldogs for winning the city championship this past year. I know you must be proud of your team.

Now, aside from running marathons, winning basketball championships, you have spent, as I mentioned, the last 12 years as a Federal Appeals Court Judge on the D.C. Circuit. You have earned a reputation among legal commentators and colleagues on both sides of the aisle of a solid, careful judge; a thorough and clear writer; and someone who promotes collegiality on the court, working with people across ideological lines.

I have also a New York Times article for the record written by Professor Akhil Amar, a self-professed liberal who describes Judge Kavanaugh as one who appreciates the craft of judging with seriousness and commands wide and deep respect among scholars, lawyers, and jurists across the political spectrum. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit that for the record as well.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator FLAKE. As I mentioned, Judge Kavanaugh has amassed an astonishingly distinguished and extensive record, writing more than 300 opinions, joining his colleagues in issuing thousands of additional cases, and that is where we need to look first when we are looking at how you will judge on the Supreme Court.

Now, I know—and it has been brought up today—that a lot of the concern on the other side of the aisle stems from the concern of an administration that does not seem to understand and appreciate separation of powers and the rule of law. I have that concern as well. If you just look at what was said just yesterday by the President, I think it is very concerning. He said in a tweet, “Two long-running Obama-era investigations of two very popular Republican Congressmen were brought to a well-publicized charge just ahead of the midterms by the Jeff Sessions Justice Department,” he calls it. “Two easy wins now in doubt because there is not enough time. Good job, Jeff.”

That is why a lot of people are concerned about this administration and why they want to ensure that our institutions hold. Thus far they have, gratefully. Jeff Sessions has resisted pressure from the President to punish his enemies and relieve pressure on his friends, and many of the questions that you will get on the other side of the aisle and from me will be how you view that relationship, where you believe the Article I powers end and Article II powers of the administration begin.

So I expect to have a number of questions on that subject. I again appreciate your willingness to put yourself through this process, and I look forward to the hearing moving ahead in the next week.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.
Senator Blumenthal.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. RICHARD BLUMENTHAL, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CONNECTICUT

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your conducting these hearings as fairly and patiently as you have, and I am going to be remarking further on what procedurally I think is appropriate here.

But I want to begin by thanking Judge Kavanaugh and your family for your commitment to public service. I want to thank the many, many Americans who are paying attention to this hearing, not only in this room but also across the country. I want to thank them for their interest and indeed their passion. That is what sustains democracy, that commitment to ordinary, everyday Americans participating and engaging in this process.

There is a T-shirt worn by a number of folks walking around this building that says, “I am what’s at stake.” This vote and this proceeding could not be more consequential in light of what is at stake: whether women can decide when they want to have children and become pregnant; whether the people of America can decide whom they would like to marry; whether we drink clean water and breathe clean air; whether consumers are protected against defective products and financial abuses; and whether we have a real system of checks and balances or, alternatively, an imperial Presidency.

I will not cast a vote more important than this one, and I suspect few of my colleagues will, as well. And what is at stake is, indeed, also the rule of law. My colleague, Senator Flake, quoted the President's tweet yesterday. I am going to repeat it: "Two long-running Obama-era investigations of two very popular Republican Congressmen were brought to a well-publicized charge just ahead of the midterms by the Jeff Sessions Justice Department. Two easy wins now in doubt because there is not enough time. Good job, Jeff."

I have had my disagreements with this Department of Justice. I want to note for the record that at least one high-ranking member of the Department of Justice was in this room. I want to urge the Department of Justice to stand strong and hold fast against this onslaught which threatens the basic principles of our democracy.

And I want to join my colleague, Senator Sasse, in his hope that you, Judge Kavanaugh, would condemn this attack on the rule of law and our judiciary. Because, at the end of this dark era, when the history of this time is written, I believe that the heroes will be our independent judiciary and our free press.

You are nominated by that very President who has launched this attack on our Department of Justice, on the rule of law, on law enforcement like the FBI, law enforcement at every level whose integrity he has questioned, and your responses to our questions will be highly enlightening about whether you join us in defending the judiciary and the rule of law.

That very President has nominated you in this unprecedented time, unprecedented because he is an unindicted co-conspirator who has nominated a potential Justice who will cast the swing vote on issues relating to his possible criminal culpability; in fact, whether he is required to obey a subpoena to appear before a grand jury, whether he is required to testify in a prosecution of his friends or associates or other officials in his administration, and whether, in fact, he is required to stand trial if he is indicted while he is President of the United States.

There is a basic principle of our Constitution, and it was articulated by the Founders: No one can select a judge in his own case. That is what the President is potentially doing here, selecting a Justice on the Supreme Court who potentially will cast a decisive vote in his own case. That is a reason why this proceeding is so consequential.

Senator Sasse urged us to do our job. I agree. Part of our job is to review the record of the nominee as thoroughly and deliberately as possible, looking to all the relevant and probative evidence. We cannot do that on this record.

Mr. Chairman, you have said multiple times that your staff has already reviewed the 42,000 pages of documents produced to this Committee at 5:41 p.m. yesterday. Both sides are using the same computer platform to review the documents from Mr. Burck. The documents had to be loaded into this platform overnight and could not be concluded until 6:45 a.m. this morning. How is it possible that your staff concluded its review last night before the documents were even uploaded? That is this platform that both sides are using here. It is simply not possible, Mr. Chairman, that any Senator has seen these new materials, much less all of the other relevant documents that have been screened by Bill Burck, who is not the National Archivist.

And this situation, when we say it is unprecedented, is truly without parallel in our history, and I am going to quote from the National Archivist: It is “something that has never happened before.” And the Archivist continued, “This effort by former President Bush does not represent the National Archives or the George W. Bush Presidential Library,” end quote.

So, Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion to adjourn so that we have time to conclude our review of these documents and so that also, my request under the Freedom of Information Act, which is now pending to the National Archivist, to the Department of Justice, to other relevant agencies, can be considered and judged. That Freedom of Information Act will require some time, I assume, to conclude.

I renew my motion, Mr. Chairman, and ask for a vote on the motion to adjourn. As I said earlier, Rule IV provides, quote, “The Committee Chairman shall”—shall, not may—“shall entertain a non-debatable motion to bring a matter before the Committee to a vote.” That seems pretty clear to me, Mr. Chairman. I have made a motion to bring before the Committee a motion to adjourn under the rules. With all due respect, you are required to entertain my motion.

And I would just add this final point. All of these documents will come out. They will come out eventually, as soon as 2019 and 2020. By law, these documents belong to the American people. They do not belong to President Bush or President Trump. They belong to the American people. It is only a matter of time, my Republican colleagues, before you will have to answer for what is in these documents. We do not know what is in them. But the question is, what are they concealing that you will have to answer to history for?

Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion to adjourn.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You quote the rules very accurately, but those rules apply to executive business sessions. We are not in an executive business session, so I deny your motion.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, I ask you to point out to me the language in Rule IV or anywhere else in our rules that limits its scope to executive business meetings. There is no such language, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would have you quote language to the contrary.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Could you quote me that language?

Chairman GRASSLEY. No. I am asking you, you quote me language to the contrary of what I ruled.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. There is no language to the contrary. I am asking for a vote in this session now. There is nothing that precludes a vote in our hearing at this exact time.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I have ruled. Do you want to proceed? Do you?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, if the Chair, with all due respect, is ruling against me, I move to appeal the ruling of the Chair. With all due respect, the Chairman is not above the Rules of the Committee. I ask for a roll call vote to overturn the ruling of the Chair and to allow for a vote on my motion to adjourn these proceedings.

Chairman GRASSLEY. That would be an appropriate motion if we were in executive business session, but we are not in executive business session, so it is denied.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I will proceed under protest. We have had a lot of rhetoric so far about rules and norms. I am very regretful that the Chair has adopted this stance, which in my view, contradicts our basic norms and rules. But I will proceed.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, I have fears about what this nominee will do with respect to our rule of law, but also about basic rights that have been established by past Supreme Court precedent. And the only way to test what his fidelity to the rule of law is, in fact, is to ask, as I have asked every single judicial nominee coming before me when I have served on this Committee in hearings, whether he believes past decisions of the Supreme Court were correctly decided.

So I am going to be asking you, Judge Kavanaugh, whether you believe Roe v. Wade was correctly decided.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I am going to be asking you—

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? I was under the impression each of us had 10 minutes for an opening statement. We will have 15 minutes for questions, but—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let me clarify.

Senator CORNYN. And then—plus, Mr. Chairman—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, I do not—

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. Various Members have been making speeches all day long and have not been confined to their 10-minute opening statement.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. Okay. Well, like I told you—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I think I have time left.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. You will have time. I am going to let you finish. Just a minute.

I was hoping that the 10-minute rule would stand, but we got off to a very bad start.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. And we got off to a bad start, and everybody started exceeding their time limit. So I guess as long as we have to stay here and get this all done today, if we have to stay into the night, we are going to stay, but I am not going to cut anybody off now that I did not do it right away. And like you said, mob rule. I have always said to myself when I am advising other people, either you run the Committee or the Committee runs you, and I let the—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. And I let the Committee run me this time. So let's just proceed as we have and let Senator Blumenthal take what time he wants. I hope you will not go too long.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I will be very judicious, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I do not know what that means.
[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. I am sorry, Senator Cornyn, I cannot agree with you. We will just proceed.

Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator CORNYN. Next time, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. So I will be asking, Judge Kavanaugh, whether you believe Roe v. Wade was correctly decided, whether you believe Brown v. Board of Education was correctly decided. Judicial nominees have figured out all kinds of ways to avoid answering the question. At first they said they thought it would violate the canons of ethics. There are no canons of ethics that preclude a response. Then they said that they felt a decision might come before them, an issue in a case that might arise, and more recently they have adopted the mantra that they think all Supreme Court decisions are correctly decided.

But you are in a different position. You have been nominated to the highest court in the land, and your decisions as a potential swing vote could overturn even well-settled precedent. There are indications in your writings, your opinions, as well as the articles you have written and some of the memos that have come to light, that you believe, for example, Roe v. Wade could be overturned. And that is why I want to know from you whether you think it was correctly decided in the first place, and other decisions that are regarded as well-settled or long-established.

In fact, I have these fears because, Judge Kavanaugh, the system and process has changed so radically. In fact, you have spent decades showing us in many ways what you believe. Or to put it more precisely, you have spent decades showing those groups like the Federalist Society and the Heritage Foundation and others what you believe. They are the ones who have really nominated you because the President outsourced this decision to them.

In those opinions and writings and statements and interviews, you have done everything in your power to show those far-right groups that you will be a loyal soldier on the Court. I am going to use some of those writings and some of the timing and other indications to show that you are more than a nominee, in fact a candidate in a campaign that you have conducted. That seems to be, unfortunately, the way the system has worked in your case.

The norms have been dumbed down, and the system has been degraded, but I think that we have an obligation to do our job and elicit from you where you will go as a Justice on the United States Supreme Court based on what you have written and said, and also what you will tell the American people in these hearings.

I join in the request that has been made of you that you show the initiative and ask for a postponement of these hearings. I think that this process has been a grave disservice to you, as well as this Committee and the American people. If you are confirmed after this truncated and concealed process, there will always be an asterisk after your name, "appointed by a President named as an unindicted co-conspirator after the vast majority of documents relating to the most instructive period of his life were concealed." The question will always be why was all that material concealed?

You have coached and you have mentored judges going through this process. You are as sophisticated and knowledgeable as anyone who will ever come before us as a judicial nominee. So you know that we have an obligation to inquire as to everything that can be relevant.

And it is not the numbers of documents. It is the percentage. There were no emails when Justice Ginsburg was the nominee. The documents that we have been provided contain duplicates. They are full of junk. We need everything that is relevant, including the 3-years that you served in the Bush White House as staff secretary, the most instructive period of your professional career.

So let me just conclude by saying what we share, I think, is a deep respect and reverence for the United States Supreme Court. I was a law clerk, as you were. I have argued cases before the Court. Most of my life has been spent in the courtroom as U.S. Attorney or as Attorney General. The power of the Supreme Court relies not on armies or police forces. It has none. But on its credibility, the trust and confidence of the American people. I ask you to help us uphold that trust by asking this Committee to suspend this hearing and come back when we have a full picture with the full sunlight that our Chairman is so fond of espousing, so that we can fully and fairly evaluate your nomination.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Senator Blumenthal appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Once again, I would remind everybody we have—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. We have a half-a-million documents on this gentleman's record. And also—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. I would like to respond to the fact that you cannot go 42,000 pages, which I guess is way over the number of documents that we actually received. The Majority and Minority received documents in two ways. One is a format that can be uploaded to reviewing platforms, and the second is in a standard document file format called PDFs.

Given the importance of reviewing documents in a timely manner, my staff reviewed the PDF versions. The production was relatively small, and therefore there was no need to upload them to a reviewing—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Kennedy, you are next.

Senator KENNEDY. Say again?

Chairman GRASSLEY. You are next, Senator Kennedy.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN KENNEDY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF LOUISIANA

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have listened with interest today. I agree so much with what Senator Sasse said. I listened today, and it is no wonder to me that so many Americans think that the United States Supreme Court is nothing more than a little Congress, a political body like the United States Senate.

Let me try to explain what I am looking for in a Supreme Court Justice. I want a judge. I do not want a politician. Now, I am not naive. It is true, Senator Booker and I are new to the Senate. We did not come here when Moses walked the earth. But we are not new to politics. And I understand that human relations are about politics. I get that. But I do not think our Founders ever intended for the United States Supreme Court to become a political body. I do not.

I am not looking for an ideologue. I am not looking for a hater. What I am looking for is somebody who is smart, who is intellectually curious, who writes cleanly and crisply, who knows what a semicolon is for, and who is willing to protect the United States Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and understands that the Bill of Rights is not an a la carte menu. Every one of them counts.

Let me try to explain further why I agree with so much of what Senator Sasse said. This is not a news flash. Our country is divided. We have been divided before. We will be divided again. We will survive this. But I confess, the division in our country today seems to me to be especially sharp. And what concerns me so much about that division is the basis for it. It is not honest disagreement. So much of it is anger.

There have been thousands, millions of pages written about the genesis of that anger. We all have opinions. You know what they say about opinions. Here is mine. I think a big part of the anger in America today is because we have too many Americans who are not sharing in the great wealth of this country, not economically, not socially, not culturally, and not spiritually. And those Americans believe that the American dream has become the American game, and that that game is fixed.

Let me give you one example why I say that. I do not hear it so much today. I am biased, but I happen to think the Tax Cuts and Jobs Act bill worked. But when I ran 2 years ago, I would hear it every single day. People would stop me and they would say, "Kennedy, do you know what is wrong with us economically?" They would tell me, "I look around, Kennedy, and I see too many undeserving people"—I emphasize undeserving. I do not want to paint with too broad a brush. They would tell me, "Kennedy, I look around and I see too many undeserving people at the top getting bailouts, and I see too many undeserving people at the bottom getting handouts. And I am here, just a working schmuck in the middle, stuck in the middle, and I cannot pay the freight anymore because my health insurance has gone up and my kid's tuition has gone up and my taxes have gone up, but I will tell you what has not gone up—my income."

Now, I happen to think we are doing better in that regard, but we still have a long way to go. But here is the point: Who is supposed to fix that for the American people? It is us. It is the United States Congress. It is not the United States Supreme Court that is supposed to fix this country culturally, economically, socially, spiritually.

And that is why I say I agree with so much of what Senator Sasse said. It has almost become a cliché, but the role of the judge is, or at least should be, to say what the law is, not what the law ought to be. Now, that has become cliché, but clichés become clichés because they are true. Judges are not put there to try to bypass the ballot. Courts should not try to fix problems that are within the province of the United States Congress, even if the United States Congress does not have the courage to address those problems. Our courts were not meant to decide these kinds of issues.

Again, I am not naive. I know that judges are not robots. We cannot replace you and should not try to replace you with a software program based on artificial intelligence. You have discretion. We are going to talk about that if we ever get to the questioning part of this exercise.

But I want to say it again. I understand why, listening today, so many Americans believe that the law, which I think all of us revere, has become politics just pursued in another way. It is not the way it is supposed to be, judge. That is not what I am looking for.

Now, I am going to end. I still have plenty of time left. I think I have 2 hours allotted, Mr. Chairman?

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Somebody talked about—said they had seen this movie before. I commented to my friend, Senator Tillis, this thing is as long as a movie.

These are the words of Justice Curtis in 1857, when he dissented in the Dred Scott case: “When a strict interpretation of the Constitution according to the fixed rules which govern the interpretation of laws is abandoned, and the theoretical opinions of individuals are allowed to control its meaning, we have no longer a Constitution. We are under the government of individual men who, for the time being, have power to declare what the Constitution is according to their own views of what it ought to mean.” That is not the rule of law.

Justice Scalia put it another way, and I truly will end with that. He said, “The American people love democracy, and the American people are not fools. The people know their value judgments are quite as good as those taught in any law school, maybe better. Value judgments, after all, should be voted on, not dictated.”

And that is what I am looking for, Judge.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hirono.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. MAZIE K. HIRONO, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF HAWAII

Senator HIRONO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Kavanaugh and your family, welcome.

Mr. Chairman, earlier on today, I pointed to an op-ed that had been written by two former White House staff secretaries, John Podesta and Todd Stern, entitled “Staff Secretaries Aren’t Traffic Cops: Stop Treating Kavanaugh Like He Was One.” And I note in their op-ed what they said. I will quote part of it.

They say that, “When we handled the job for Bill Clinton in much the same way that staff secretaries did for President George H.W. Bush, we wrote concise cover memos for every decision memo that went to the President. We summarized the underlying memo, identified the core decision points and options, and conveyed the views of key senior staff members from whom we had sought comments. We wrote hundreds of these memos.” It is no wonder that Judge Kavanaugh has deemed his time as White House staff secretary so important to his performance as a judge. But unfortunately, as we have said many times already, we do not have any of these documents during Judge Kavanaugh’s time as staff secretary.

Dana Sabraw. Michael Baylson. Ketanji Brown Jackson. Colleen Kollar Kotelly. Naomi Reice Buchwald. John Bates. Derek Kahala Watson.

These are the names of some of the Federal judges across this country who have vindicated my faith in the rule of law over the last year and a half. These are the women and men, appointed by Republican and Democratic Presidents, who ordered the Government to reunite parents with the children ripped from their arms at the border; who rejected attempts to deny Federal funds to cities refusing to be drawn into the war against immigrants; who stopped Executive orders aimed at kneecapping public-sector unions; who stopped the implementation of an ugly ban on transgender Americans serving in our military; who ruled that public officials cannot block citizens from their Twitter feeds; and who stopped the Government from banning Muslims from entering the United States.

These judges stood firm in defense of the Constitution, the American values it expresses, and the system of checks and balances it enshrines. At this moment of peril for our democracy, it is these judges, and others like them, who have pushed back against the efforts of a President eager to wield unlimited and unchecked power.

In normal times, we would be here today to determine the fitness of a nominee to the Supreme Court of the United States chosen for his or her legal talent and reputation for fairness.

But these are not normal times.

Instead, we are here to decide whether or not to rubber stamp Donald Trump’s choice of a pre-selected political ideologue, nominated precisely because he believes a sitting President should be shielded from civil lawsuits, criminal investigation, and prosecution, no matter the facts.

Let’s not forget. During his campaign, Donald Trump needed to shore up support from the Republican base who questioned whether he was sufficiently conservative. To help, he turned to the Federalist Society and the Heritage Foundation to build a pre-approved list of names, and promised to pick from among them when selecting nominees for the Supreme Court.

These groups are longstanding right-wing organizations that advocate for conservative causes and legal positions. The Heritage Foundation focuses on developing policy to, among other things, oppose climate change, repeal the Affordable Care Act, and reduce regulations for big business. The Federalist Society focuses on changing the American legal system to align with an ultra-conservative interpretation of the Constitution, including the overturning of Roe v. Wade.

When given the opportunity to nominate a new Supreme Court Justice, Donald Trump did exactly as he promised. He did not select someone who demonstrates independence and fidelity to the rule of law. Instead, Donald Trump selected a pre-approved name in order to guarantee a fifth vote for his dangerous anti-worker, anti-consumer, anti-women, pro-corporate, and anti-environment agenda.

And Donald Trump selected Brett Kavanaugh from this list for an even more specific reason. The President is trying as hard as he can to protect himself from the independent, impartial, and dogged investigation of his abuse of power, before the walls close in on him entirely.

Because if there is one thing we know about Donald Trump, it is that he is committed to self-preservation every minute, every hour, every day.

Judge Kavanaugh's appointment should be considered in a broader context. The President has been packing our courts with ideologically driven judges who come to the bench with firm positions and clear agendas, who then go on to rule in ways consistent with those agendas.

For example, Trump nominee James Ho, now a judge on the Fifth Circuit, has written in favor of unlimited campaign contributions and, in another case, publically aired his personal views in opposition to abortion.

Trump nominee Don Willet, now a judge on the Fifth Circuit, has already voted to curtail the independence of a Federal agency that helped rescue the economy after the mortgage crisis of 2008.

Trump nominee Stephanos Bibas, now a judge on the Third Circuit, wrote a dissent to explain that he does not believe Title IX requires school districts to provide transgender students appropriate changing facilities and bathrooms.

Trump nominee Amy Coney Barret, now a judge on the Seventh Circuit, ruled to keep out of court employees trying to challenge an arbitration proceeding, and cast the deciding vote to allow a business to continue to segregate its work force.

And Trump nominee John K. Bush, now a judge on the Sixth Circuit, ruled to keep out of court a woman accusing her employer of age discrimination, despite a dissenting judge's view that there was sufficient evidence to go forward.

When these Trump-nominated judges came before the Judiciary Committee as nominees, my Democratic colleagues and I tried to find out how they would go about deciding tough cases, what they would base their decisions on when the law did not give a clear enough direction, as is often the case.

Time and again, we were told: Do not worry about my personal background or my history as a partisan, political advocate. Do not worry about what I have done, written, or said until now. When I get on the bench, I will just follow the law. But clearly, they have not. Why should we expect this Supreme Court nominee, you, to be any different?

President Trump selected Brett Kavanaugh because of his fealty to the partisan political movement he has been a part of his entire professional life.

From his clerkship with Judge Alex Kozinski, to his apprenticeship with Ken Starr, to his work on George W. Bush's legal team during the Florida recount and in the White House, Judge Kavanaugh has been knee-deep in partisan politics.

The first reward for that service was his nomination to the D.C. Circuit. It was a tough fight, but Republican-aligned special interests fought for more than 3 years to get him confirmed.

And for the last 12 years as a judge, he has ruled, whether in dissent or majority, in ways in line with their political and ideological agenda.

Now, President Trump has selected Judge Kavanaugh to provide the decisive fifth vote in cases that will change some of the most basic assumptions Americans have about their lives and their Government.

There are more than 730 Federal judges working on thousands of cases across the country every day. Most of these cases end in trial courts. Some of them are appealed and heard in appellate courts. The closely divided Supreme Court hears very few cases, many times fewer than 100, every year.

Before Justice Kennedy retired, so many important Constitutional rights were hanging in the balance, decided on narrow grounds by 5-to-4 votes.

And now that Justice Kennedy has left the Court, the forces opposed to workers' rights, women's rights, LGBTQ rights, voting rights, civil rights of all kinds, and environmental protections are eager to secure a solid majority on the Court to support their right-wing views.

These ultra-right-wing forces have been working for decades to prepare for this moment because they know that a single vote from one Justice is all it would take to radically change the direction of this country.

It could take just one vote on the Supreme Court to overturn Roe v. Wade and deny women control over their reproductive rights.

It could take just one vote to declare the ACA's pre-existing condition protections unconstitutional.

It could take just one vote to dismantle environmental protections that keep our air safe to breathe and our water clean to drink.

It could take just one vote to dismantle commonsense gun safety laws that keep our communities safe.

And it could take just one vote to further erode protections for working people and unions.

Since this nomination was announced, I have been asked many times why the Democrats would even bother to go through the motions when we know that our Republican colleagues will do anything to support this administration's judicial nominees.

There are battles worth fighting regardless of the outcome. A lifetime appointment to the Supreme Court, of someone who will provide the fifth vote on issues impacting the lives of every working American, is a battle worth fighting.

So, I intend to use this hearing to demonstrate to the American people precisely why who sits on the Supreme Court matters, why a fifth ideologically driven conservative and political vote on the Court is dangerous for our country, why the Senate should reject this President's latest attempt to rig the system in his favor.

As Senators begin to ask their questions in the coming days, I ask the American people to listen carefully to what the nominee says and compare it with what we heard only a short time ago from Neil Gorsuch at his confirmation hearing.

Just 18 months ago, Judge Gorsuch told us that, “All precedent of the United States Supreme Court deserves the respect of precedent, which is quite a lot. It’s the anchor of the law.”

Judge Gorsuch said, “It’s not whether I agree or disagree with any particular precedent. That would be an act of hubris. Because a precedent, once it’s decided, it carries far more weight than what I personally think.”

Judge Gorsuch made these promises when he was asking for our votes. But earlier this year, he joined a majority of the Court to overturn precedent in a 41-year-old case that protected Government workers and their ability to form a union in a 5-to-4 decision.

I expect Judge Kavanaugh to make similar promises over the next few days, only to do, sadly, the exact opposite if confirmed.

Our job here is important, because every American should be concerned about what our Government and country would look like if Judge Kavanaugh is confirmed.

We owe it to the American people, and to all of the independent-minded judges I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, to preserve the integrity of our Constitution and the fairness and order of a system that has served us well for so long.

Judge Kavanaugh, what may be going through your mind right now is to simply and stoically endure this hearing. But do you not think you owe it to the American people to disclose all of the documents being requested? Because you have nothing to hide. Because you have nothing to hide.

I agree with my colleague, Senator Durbin, Judge Kavanaugh. If you stand behind your full record in public life, fundamental fairness will dictate that you join us in our call for this Committee to suspend until we receive all relevant documents and have a chance to review them. Your failure to do so would reflect a fundamental mistrust of the American people.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Senator Hirono appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HIRONO. And I would like to have entered into the record the op-ed piece that I referred to by John Podesta and Todd Stern.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, it will be entered.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let’s go to Senator Crapo next.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. MIKE CRAPO, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF IDAHO

Senator CRAPO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Kavanaugh, welcome. Thank you for your service to this country, and thank you for the willingness you have expressed to take this additional assignment. And thank you to your family. We welcome them as well.

The process upon which we are about to embark is one of, if maybe not the most, important duties entrusted to the Senate, advise and consent on judicial nominations. Ultimately, a fair and proper judge, Supreme Court or otherwise, must follow the law and not make laws from the bench.

Upon receiving his nomination to serve as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, Judge Kavanaugh stated, "My judicial philosophy is straightforward. A judge must interpret statutes as written, and a judge must interpret the Constitution as written, informed by history and tradition and precedent."

Isn't that the ideal of a judge steadfastly committed to the law?

No one seriously questions Judge Kavanaugh's qualifications to serve as an Associate Justice on our Nation's highest court. He is vastly experienced and widely respected for his intellect, his honesty, and his legal acumen. With over 300 offered opinions and 12 years of service on the bench, he is a judge with a clear record demonstrating that he applies the law as written and enforces the Constitution. He values precedent and has written, along with Justice Gorsuch and others, the law of judicial precedent, a scholarly piece on the importance of stare decisis.

Sadly, much of the discourse surrounding Judge Kavanaugh's nomination deals not with the content of his legal opinions, his judicial philosophy, or temperament, but rather, as today's discussion has shown, the spurious notion that our distinguished Chairman has not been rigorous or fair or transparent in navigating the requisite document production efforts required by this Committee.

Those claims are wholly without foundation. There have been 57 days since the announcement of Judge Kavanaugh's nomination on July 9 and today's confirmation hearing. This is a longer period of time than Senators had for Justices Sotomayor, Kagan, and Gorsuch. Justice Kavanaugh also submitted over 17,000 pages with his bipartisan Judiciary Committee questionnaire, the most extensive questionnaire ever returned by a nominee to the Supreme Court.

The Committee also received more than 440,000 pages of documents related to his service in the executive branch. This, too, is more than any Supreme Court nominee to date. As has been said earlier, in fact, it is more than the last five nominees combined.

I applaud Chairman Grassley and his dedicated staff for their tireless work in reviewing these documents and making the vast majority publicly available as quickly as possible. And frankly, Mr. Chairman, I believe the American people appreciate your efforts, your transparency, and your commitment to a fair process.

Now, I want to make one side note. It was said here today that the number of documents provided by now-Justice Kagan, who was also a nominee who had served in the White House and had many, many documents related to her service, that 99 percent of the documents requested for her were provided. One problem with that fact, and that is that when Justice Kagan was before us, she had been the solicitor General. There were probably more pages relevant to her service there than to your service. We do not know the number because the Republicans agreed after a strong disagreement with the Democrats that we would not request those documents because the White House claimed they were sensitive.

The Democrats have not made that agreement with the Republicans this time. But I think it is incredibly important to note that this argument that is going on today about the balance of document production is simply a trumped-up argument.

These facts aside, many of my colleagues continue to criticize this process. Their motives are clear: use any means available to attempt to delay the confirmation process of a well-qualified jurist fit for the job, indefinitely.

I strongly agree with the comments of many of my colleagues here today. Senator Cruz pointed out what was really at stake. Senator Sasse pointed out why it is that Congress needs to be the part of our Federal Government that makes the law, not the judiciary. Senator Kennedy has followed up on that thought, as have many of my colleagues here today.

I think that one point that Senator Cruz mentioned deserves repeating. Much of what we are hearing today and will hear for the remainder of this process is ultimately an effort to re-litigate the last Presidential election. In fact, we have just heard Judge Kavanaugh attacked and stated to be unqualified because he is a Trump nominee. Other Trump nominees have also been attacked here today.

The attack is on President Trump, not on their nominees, because of an unwillingness to accept the outcome of the last Presidential election. Judge Kavanaugh as the nominee has been widely recognized for his judicial temperament and his detailed legal writings in defense of the Constitution. His opinions are widely cited by his fellow appellate judges, and even the Supreme Court. And although his integrity was just challenged, stating that no matter what he says to this Committee he will vote the other way once put into office, put into the Supreme Court, the fact is that his record, as the Chairman has already outlined, disproves that.

He serves on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, a court on which more of the judges who serve have been appointed by Democratic Presidents than Republican Presidents. Yet he has voted 97 percent of the time with his colleagues in the majority on that court, showing that he will follow the law and that he does so with the majority support of broad and—I was going to say bipartisan, but nonpartisan judges who are appointed by Republican and Democratic Presidents and who consider some of the most important cases in America today.

That is the judge we have before us. He is a judge's judge.

Many critics argue that Justice Kavanaugh would play an instrumental role in reversing a number of Supreme Court precedents. However, I wonder how one can draw that conclusion given his record of exhaustive and weighty consideration of important legal questions on a court such as the D.C. Circuit.

I recognize that it is politics driving these attacks, and so do the American people. They know what is at stake.

Moreover, in his legal opinions, Judge Kavanaugh has consistently demonstrated a willingness to rein in both Congress and the executive branch when they overstep their respective constitutional grounds. Judge Kavanaugh understands and is focused on the principle that a judge is a servant of the law, not a maker of it. We should take him at his own words. The judge's job is to interpret the law, not to make the law or policy.

So, read the words of the statute as written. Read the text of the Constitution as written, mindful of history and tradition. Do not make up new constitutional rights that are not in the text of the Constitution. Do not shy away from enforcing constitutional rights that are in the text of the Constitution. Those are Judge Kavanaugh's words. That is the man who sits before us nominated to be a Justice on the highest court of our land.

Judge Kavanaugh has the backing of his former law clerks and law students, his colleagues on the bench appointed by both Republican and Democratic Presidents, and many members of his local community in which he remains so closely involved. He is a man of honor, integrity, and well-respected in the legal community. There is no dispute he is qualified to serve on our Nation's highest court.

Mr. Chairman, I look forward to the hearing to hear from the nominee himself when we all get done with our statements.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CRAPO. The next few days will prove insightful as we discuss with Judge Kavanaugh for the public to hear in his own words the proper role of the judge in our constitutional system. I look forward to this hearing, and again, Judge Kavanaugh, thank you for being willing to be here.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

Senator Booker.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CORY A. BOOKER, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY

Senator BOOKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Judge Kavanaugh. And I want to say welcome to your family sincerely as well. We are all Americans taking part in what is truly an historic moment.

Mr. Chairman, Chairman Grassley, I hope you do not think earlier this morning that in any way I was questioning your integrity or your decency. I was appealing to it earlier before, and you have been conducting this hearing giving myself and others the opportunity to at least speak and make our case, and even though you have not ruled in our favor, of which I am disappointed, I do hope you understand that I value your friendship, and frankly some of the most valuable moments I have had in the Senate. I still remember shaking your hand and coming to agreement with you on criminal justice reform. I have come to have a deep respect for you, sir. So I hope you do not think I was doing that earlier.

Chairman GRASSLEY. If you worry about our friendship being affected, it will not be. And that gives me an opportunity to say something to the public at large, and that is about this Committee.

You would think that Republicans and Democrats do not talk to each other, but I would like to remind the public that when they think that happens, they ought to think of the record of this Committee, not just this Chairman but this Committee in the 3½ years and maybe even before I got to be Chairman. But in the 3½ years I have been Chairman, every bill that got out of this Committee has been a bipartisan bill.

Proceed, Senator Booker.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you very much, sir. I appreciate that. It does not detract from the fact that I just fundamentally disagree with the way you have been concluding today.

When I first got to the Senate I was very fortunate that a lot of senior statesmen, yourself and Senator Hatch included, pulled me aside and gave me hard wisdom at times. You will remember, I came to the Senate in a special election at a time when we were changing some of the Senate rules. Senator Levin brought me aside and gave me a hard talking to. Senator McCain gave me a hard talking to. And all of them made similar points about this idea that sometimes you need to be as objective as possible and see how you would react if the pendulum had swung the other way. In other words, they warned me that what goes around in this place comes around, and to really think as if the shoe was on the other foot.

And I have been struggling with that, sir, in all honesty, of what the Republicans would be saying and what we would be saying if we had a Democratic President right now, a Democratic nominee right now, and this process was in the reverse. And I would like to believe how I would behave, and I am pretty confident, would be willing to bet that if the Republicans were being denied effectively about 90 percent of the documents about a person's public record, I actually do believe that some of the analogies that are made to Justice Kagan and her Solicitor General time is not a fair analogy.

This is a part of the nominee's history that he himself has said was one of his most formative times. I would not hire an intern in my office knowing only 10 percent of their résumé. There is not a person here who would buy a home only seeing 10 percent of the rooms.

I just believe what we are doing here, just on the objective view of fairness, is sincerely unfair and is insulting to the ideals that we try to achieve with some sense of comity and some sense of rules.

But I want to go deeper than that. I am trying to figure out what the jeopardy would be if we just waited for the documents. Last night we had a document dump of tens of thousands of pages, tens of thousands of pages. As has been said already, there is no judge that would allow a court proceeding to go on, no judge that would move forward if one of the parties had just gotten documents as of 5 o'clock last night, or potentially as of 11 o'clock.

What I do not understand is, what is the jeopardy of just waiting, not just to digest these documents but other documents? The reality is that, Senator Grassley, you have yourself asked for a specific, more finite set, a more limited set of documents that you have not even gotten.

So whether it is not seeing 90 percent of the résumé of the gentleman before us, or 50 percent, or 40 percent, that should come within time, and there is no jeopardy when we have a lifetime appointment. He will be there, should he be confirmed, for decades and decades and decades. Waiting another week or 5 days or 2 weeks for those documents that you yourself have requested, which is a more limited subset, for even those documents to come through, I do not understand what the rush is, especially given all that is at stake.

So those are the reasons why I say to you with sincere respect that this is an absurd process. It just seems unfair to me, and it could easily be solved by us putting a pause here in this process, waiting for the documents, evaluating the documents, and it will be a much more robust set of hearings on this nominee.

As I said, I would not hire an intern if I had not seen—if I had only seen 10 percent of their résumé. And here, to have a fuller body of the work of this gentleman before us, who one of my colleagues called popping up in some of the most interesting times in the last decade or two on some of the most important issues, already the limited amount, 7 percent of the documents that I have seen, unfortunately those are things that are being held Committee confidential, which I do not even know if I can use in my question here. I think the penalty is being ousted from the Senate.

But even the limited documents has made potentially my questioning far more rich, far more substantive, to get to the heart of the issues of the individual nominee. And again, sir, I try to summon the spirit of some of the elder statespeople I had the privilege of serving with, from Rockefeller to Levin to McCain, to summon that spirit to be as objective as possible. I do not think it is unreasonable for us to wait for a week or two to get the full body of those documents. It will cause no harm or damage except to have more of a full telling of what is at stake here.

The stakes are too high in what this nominee represents for us to rush through this process without a full sharing of the documents. And with that, I will continue, sir, with my opening statement.

I have said before already that—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Since you have not begun your opening statement—

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. I will take this opportunity to probably say that you said, I did not get all the documents I requested. You probably heard the first sentence of something I said after our break, and that was, that I first started talking about expecting a million documents, and we end up, I think, with 488,000. But then I went on to explain that the process with all the software and everything else that can speed things up, duplicates were eliminated, and, et cetera, et cetera. And so, we have gotten all the documents I requested, just to correct you.

Senator BOOKER. Sir, and to my understanding—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Go ahead with your opening statement.

Senator BOOKER. No, sir, but I just want to make a point to that, if you do not mind. You requested a limited set of documents of his time as a—in the White House Counsel's Office. We have not received all the documents from his time there. They are still being vetted slowly through our system of a—not a representative from the Committee, but the Bill Burck individual still—is still reading through those documents as we speak. I imagine some of them will be dumped on us as this process is going on, and I predict, with quite confidence, that some of those documents might still be trickling out in the days before the actual full Senate vote. Please, sir.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You are talking about “committee confidential,” and you have access to them right now. They just—there has not been a determination that, like, 80 percent of all the documents are on the website so the public can see them, but in regard to some, they were forwarded to us without a second review. That second review gives an opportunity to then get them out to the public if there is no reason that they are excluded under the law, and you can read those committee confidential documents right now.

Senator BOOKER. Well, sir, we sent a letter days ago asking for that. I will—I will re-send it with you in these next 24 hours before our hearing tomorrow.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We responded to your letter.

Senator BOOKER. Again, sir, you did not respond to our letter by allowing committee confidential documents to be—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Please go to your opening statement.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you very much, sir. And, look, I was—you know, former Senator—now former Vice President Biden talked about not questioning your colleagues' motives, and some of the colleagues across the aisle have called the efforts by some of us sincerely to get access to these documents a sham, a charade. I can go through a lot of the words that were used calling into question the motivations that I have or doing what I believe, sir, is perhaps the most grave and important duty that I have as a Senator, to advise and consent. And, yes, as Senator Cornyn pointed out, I have announced my decision already, but my duty to the people of the State of New Jersey, and others, is to fully vet an individual. That is why I think these documents are important, that his full record is made clear, and that we have a chance to ask questions about it.

I also have said that I oppose this nomination happening right now because of the moment we are in American history, which is very unprecedented. I remind you that we have had bipartisan statements by Senators working in tangent about the attack on the United States of America, which was an attack going to the core of what our democracy is about: the voting processes. A special counsel was put into place, and that has led to dozens of people being indicted, people all around the President of the United States. It has led to dozens and dozens of charges, and that investigation is ongoing. We have seen the President of the United States credibly accused by his own personal lawyer to—as being an unindicted co-conspirator.

In all of this, we have one judge being chosen who was not on the original list. He was not on the outsourced Federal Society's original list. He was not on the second version of that list. He got onto that list after this special investigation got going; in other words, after the President was in jeopardy. He was added to the list, and then the President pulled the one person from all of that list late—that was added late that would give him, in a sense, the ability to pick a judge that has already spoken vastly about a President's ability to be prosecuted, about a President's ability to dismiss or end an investigation. And so, that is the second reason why I have asked for us to put a pause on this process.

Fundamental to this Nation's very beliefs—Judge Learned Hand said this—as powerful and profound as the documents of this country, our founding documents, they are not worth much if the people themselves lose faith in them. And I believe the nomination of a judge through all of this, who so powerfully speaks to a President's de facto immunity from ongoing investigation prosecution, will shake the faith that millions and millions of Americans have in the fairness of the process and the system. And I have asked Judge Kavanaugh time and time again to recuse himself, to restore that faith, to alleviate the concerns of Americans, and he has thus far refused to do so.

Now, I am upset about the process, and this is not manufactured outrage. This is sincere concern for a process that seems wrong and just not objective and fair. I am concerned about, as many colleagues are on both sides of the aisle, a Russian attack on our Nation. But there is a lot more going on here that makes this nomination of great concern, and it is, frankly, some of the things I have heard from both sides of the aisle tonight, is when we travel this country and what we are hearing from individuals, and how that is related to a position on the Supreme Court.

Right now, millions of American families are watching this in sincere concern and fear. I have heard them. I have gotten the calls. I have traveled this country. I have talked to Republicans and Democrats. They are fearful about where the Supreme Court is going and what it will do when it has the power to shape law, shape the lives and liberties for individuals, for decades to come. I have talked to workers all over my State, all over this Nation, workers that now work in a country where wages are at a 60-year low as a portion of our GDP, whose labor protections—workers whose labor protections are being diluted and whose unions are under attack.

So many of those individuals are asking whether the Supreme Court of their lifetimes will be an institution that elevates the dignity of American workers, or one that allows powerful corporate interests to continue to weaken labor protections that did not just happen, labor protections that were fought for, that people struggled for, that some, you know, in the labor movement actually died for. Are these labor rights going to become aggravated, are they going to become limited, further increasing the vast disparities of wealth and power in our country?

We know this. We have talked to them on both sides of the aisle. We have talked to cancer survivors, Americans with disabilities, survivors of domestic abuse, parents with beautiful children that happen to have disabilities, who, because of the Affordable Care Act, can no longer be denied coverage because of, quote, "a pre-existing condition." There is a Texas case where that is being challenged right now. That is moving up. It could likely go before the Supreme Court.

Well, knowing your record, it is right that these Americans, so many of them with pre-existing conditions, are asking whether the Supreme Court will be an institution that affirms and protects the rights of people with access to healthcare, some—many people who rightfully believe when they read our founding documents that talk about life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that healthcare they believe is fundamental. We all know too many people who have set aside prescription drugs because they are too high because of what corporations are doing there, people who have put off going to see the doctor because a visit is too expensive. That is in the balance with this nomination.

I have gone across the State, and, Senator Durbin, I do not know if I have told you this. I was in your State talking to a Republican farmer about how the farm country is changing so dramatically the livelihoods of so many independent family farmers, are being threatened by the consolidation of large multinational corporations. These corporations have acquired so much power. This consolidation now—from the seeds that they buy, the prices going up, to who they have the ability to side to. This abuse of corporation consolidation is driving so many farmers out of business. You see, one farmer was telling me about the suicide rates.

Now, people are saying that this is histrionics, this is not life or death. Well, I know these things actually are often a matter of life or death. When insurance rates go up—when insurance rates go down rather, more people without healthcare often lose their lives. There are—there is not one Senator on the Republican side or the Democratic side who has not seen—I have only been here 5 years, and I have seen the culture of Washington change because of the obscene amount of dark money pouring into our political process, corrupting our political process, rigging the system. This nomination will have an effect on that.

I have seen Americans all over this country with the bipartisan work that I have done with Senators on either side who feel entrapped by a broken criminal justice system, one that is—we know and unassailably disproportionately targets Black and Brown Americans, where many Americans believe, and one famous American said, we have a system that now treats you better if you are rich and guilty, than poor and innocent. These issues are in the balance now.

And everyone who is concerned about these issues and more are wondering what the story of America is. We have this great leader, a man named King, who said, “The arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice.” There are so many Americans who fought for these fundamental rights, family members who they remember, union organizers, civil rights activists, women’s rights activists who fought for, struggled for, and died for many of these rights, the right for women to make their own medical decisions, including the right to an abortion and not a back alley butcher, the right of all Americans to marry who they love, the right to vote, and to work free of discrimination regardless of race and the rights of all Americans. These are our rights. These are American rights.

And so, we know the answer to these questions. I have looked through the record I have had access to to see the pattern of your decisions, and that is the pattern that really troubles me, Judge. And I know we are going to get a chance to go through this, and I know my colleagues will as well. But it seems so clear that in your courts, the same—the same folks seem to win over and over again—the powerful, the privileged, big corporations, special interests—over and over again. Folks that lose are the folks that why I came to Washington to fight, working folks, consumers, women, immigrants, minorities, the disadvantaged, the poor.

This is the challenge before us. This is why so much is at stake. I love that my colleagues keep going back to the Constitution, but understand this. I laud our Founders. I think they were geniuses, but you got to understand that there are millions of Americans who understand that they were also flawed people. We are the oldest constitutional democracy. We are the oldest one. We were founded in a break with human events. You know this, Judge. I have read your writings. We were not founded on some kind of tribalism as much as we think it is breaking out in our country. We were not founded because we all look alike, we all pray alike, because we are all of the same race. We are not a monarchy or theocracy. We broke with the course of human events and formed this Nation. God bless America. God bless our Founders.

But we know our Founders and their values and their ideals, we know that they—that they were flawed, and you can see that in the documents. Native Americans were referred to as “savages.” Women were not referred to at all. African Americans, Black slaves, were referred to as fractions of human beings. As one civil rights activist, I think it was Stokely Carmichael, used to always say, “constitute, constitute, I can only say three-fifths of the word.”

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Booker—

Senator BOOKER. I am almost done, sir.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay, go ahead.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. I have got about three more minutes.

Chairman GRASSLEY. The only reason—the only reason I stopped you at this point is I thought that I would let people go at least as far as Senator Blumenthal went, and you have reached that point.

Senator BOOKER. I appreciate that. I am a bit of a trailblazer, sir. I am going to push just two or three more minutes.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator BOOKER. My point—my point, sir, is that I am proud of this history.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Your clock, when it reaches 10, is your 2½ minutes—

Senator BOOKER. And I just want to point out right here from the activism in Stonewall, Selma, Seneca Falls. There is an activism that I worry, rights that were gained were rolled back. And the example I have here is, there is an amazing activist here right now, Ms. Carlotta Walls LaNier. And Ms. LaNier, I thank her for coming today. It was 61 years ago on this very day on September 4th, 1957, that Ms. LaNier at the age of 14, faced crowds that were shouting racial slurs. She was jeered. And on that day, Ms. LaNier joined eight other students, a group that would become known as the Little Rock Nine, to try to desegregate an all-White high school in Little Rock, Arkansas. We know what they did that day was much more—much bigger than a first day of school. It was the first major test of the Supreme Court’s landmark decision, the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision.

I have been shocked sitting here that there are now some judges that Trump has appointed that refuse to even say—and I am not saying this is you, sir—that that is settled law. There are people, like Ms. LaNier, who were part of gaining rights in this country, advancing the ideals of this Nation toward the purity of the ideals put forth by the Founders despite the imperfections. And now, the fear and the worry is, what the trend of the Court is doing, is rolling back those gains. It is undermining that progress. It is restricting individual rights as the rise of corporations, the rise of dark money, the rise of the interests of the powerful and the privileged and the elite.

And so, I just say in conclusion, sir, and I said this to you in a heart-to-heart moment in the last seconds that you were—you came to my office to meet with me one-on-one, which I appreciated. I pointed to the map behind my desk, which is the central ward of Newark, New Jersey, a place with mighty people. It is a low-income community, people still struggling for the fullness and the richness of the promises of America. That is the concern that I have right now. That is what is at stake. And so, I say in conclusion, sir, this to me is a profound and historical moment. I cannot support your nomination not just because of the body of your work, but also the perverse process by which this comes forward. We should not vote now. We should wait, and if we are not waiting, we should object to your nomination.

Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Tillis.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. THOM TILLIS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

Senator TILLIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have a 12-minute preamble and 18 minutes of comments.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. In all seriousness, I hope to beat Senator Flake in being brief.

First of all, to Ashley, I know that Margaret and Liza are gone, but you have gone through a very difficult day, and you have held up well. To your parents, Judge Kavanaugh, I have got to compliment you on your mother's composure. I am pretty sure my mother would have been out of the chair by now.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. So, I appreciate all that you have—all you have done. You have obviously raised your son right.

You know, I think we need to go back and recognize we were going to be here. This was not going to be a “Kumbaya” moment. We had every Member on this Committee either publicly state or participate in a press conference before the sun had set on the first 24 hours of your nomination that they were going to vote against you. Now, we are asking for all kinds of documents, and you are getting them. As a matter of fact, I think the Chair has done an extraordinary job. He started on this process by offering—acquiring as many as a million documents. We determined because of duplication and relevance it was only a half a million, and they have all been provided. And I am not an attorney, but I am a technologist, and I am also a process person, and I know damn well that if you get documentation electronically, you can get through in a matter of hours. And for the documents that got sent yesterday, you could get through it in a matter of hours. They have plenty of time to get documents. They only need to run up the score because they already know they are going to vote against you.

I also want to compliment you on your composure. You have taken a lot of notes, and I for one tomorrow am going to spend more of my time listening to your responses rather than talking over you and trying to simplify things into “yes”/“no” answers that you know you cannot respond to. So, I look forward to your testimony tomorrow.

You know, as the hearing was going on, there were two things that just caught me. I am not going to do my prepared statements. I will submit them for the record, Mr. Chair. But we’re talking about all this dark money and efforts going on on the other side. Well, I just got an email from Organizing for Action—you all would know that as the legacy campaign of President Obama—telling me to oppose you because you are going to deny reproductive rights, deny healthcare coverage, advance climate change in a bad way, and gun violence prevention. I do not know near as much about the institutions of Government as, let us say, Senator Sasse, but I am pretty sure once you get confirmed on the Bench, you are not going to be able to file a bill to do any of that. What you may end up doing is finding out that we got lazy, we did not work hard enough, we did not understand the Constitution, we did not reach across the aisle to create enduring value, which is largely the reasons why people get frustrated with you. They want you to do our job.

Justice Gorsuch said numerous times in his confirmation hearing that I had the privilege of participating in, “It is not my job to do your job, Mr. Senator.” If you are frustrated and worried about the prospects of somebody being denied coverage for pre-existing conditions, then let us fix it. That is why I filed a bill a couple of weeks ago. Let us fix it. Do not play politics and blame the Supreme Court for your inadequate architecture of a bill. Let us fix it. If you are worried about the balls and strikes that Judge Kavanaugh has called on the bench around regulatory issues, it seems to me you have called balls and strikes on both sides of the Administrative Procedures Act, and there seem to be flaws in there that need to be fixed.

For the attorneys in the room who are studied on the law, rather than trying to get Judge Kavanaugh to commit one way or another on these policy initiatives that President Obama and others around this table are interested in, get them to explain to you the legal theory behind his position that may have, in fact, produced an outcome that he did not particularly like, but because he did it based on his interpretation of the Constitution and the laws. Do not expect him to be a politician.

And as for motivations, you know, I have to say that it has been said by at least one person on this Committee that on the one hand we should not question other people’s motivations. On the other hand, I find it personally insulting to think that because I think we have before us an imminently qualified judge, someone who is going to call balls and strikes, to suggest that because I am inclined to support him, that I am complicit in evil really makes me wonder the sincerity about questioning other people’s motives.

So, Judge Kavanaugh, I am glad that you are before us. I believe that you have 300 opinions that people should look at and read and try and spar with you on the basis of your legal knowledge, your constitutional understanding and the statutory constructs. It would be great, and I hope that people are actually taking time to look at the single most important factor in your résumé. It is not maybe where you went to school. I guess that is good. It is not maybe where you practiced law, but it is the 307 different opinions you can read and the dissents you can read. Spar on the basis of your legal knowledge those of you who want to prove to be the smartest lawyer in the room, and see if you can actually prove a better theory that may actually give Judge Kavanaugh pause.

But that is not what this hearing has been about, and I am so glad that I am one of the last people to do an opening statement because what I hope I hear tomorrow—and by the way, just from a process standpoint, the—we are going to have 30-minute rounds, which in Senate time is about an hour and a half per Member—

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS [continuing]. Tomorrow, and then we are going to have 20-minute rounds the following day. Everybody take time to actually talk about legal theory. Stop the theater, and start talking about what is really meaningful here. And I think if we do that, I have every confidence, Judge Kavanaugh, you are going to be Justice Kavanaugh, and I am proud to actually see you compose yourself the way you have today.

I will be asking you several questions on some judgments that, frankly, I did not like, but I know you probably made the right decision. And I believe that when you get confirmed to the Bench, you are actually going to take some other opinions that I do not like because it is what it is, what I wished you could do for me because we failed to get it done here, but it will be done for the right reasons.

And I think if people objectively look at your record, they are going to be hard-pressed to take all this theater we have heard today and boil it down into something that makes you look like you are an activist judge just waiting to be one of the members of that nine-member legislative branch down the street. I think you are one of the single greatest opportunity—great opportunities that we have to make the Supreme Court make us do our job and to reign in the dangerously high amount of authority that our administration branch has, and that is all I want you to do. And I look forward to asking you questions tomorrow.

I yield back the rest of my time.

[The prepared statement of Senator Tillis appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Harris.

Senator HARRIS. I see Senator Graham has rejoined us. I think he was here before me. He is more senior.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We go back and forth.

Senator HARRIS. Okay, great.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. KAMALA D. HARRIS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Senator HARRIS. So, I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to restate my objection from earlier for the record, which is my motion to postpone this hearing.

A number of comments have been made by my honored and respected colleagues. I would like to address a few of them. One, there was some mention of a concern about Elena Kagan's hearing and that the White House at the time, there was an agreement that those—certain records and should, therefore, not be disclosed. It is my understanding that as a point of distinction between that time and today that those were active cases in the White House, and for that reason, there was an understanding and agreement that they were of a sensitive nature and should not be disclosed.

In terms of the point that has been made about playing politics and blaming the Supreme Court, I think that we have to give pause when those kinds of concerns are expressed to also think about the fact that there have been many a political campaign that has been run indicating an intention to use the United States Supreme Court as a political tool to end things like the Affordable Care Act, the Voting Rights Act, and campaign finance reform, which makes this conversation a legitimate one in terms of a reasoned concern about whether this nominee has been nominated to fulfill a political agenda as it relates to using that Court and the use of that Court.

As it relates to the 42,000 documents or 42,000 pages of documents, I find it interesting that we get those documents less than 24 hours before this hearing is scheduled to begin, but it took 57 days for those documents to be vetted before we would even be given those documents. So, there is some suggestion that we should be speed readers and read 42 pages—42,000 pages of documents in about 15 hours when it took the other side 57 days to review those same documents. So, the logic, at least on the math, is not applying.

Now, the Chairman has requested 10 percent of the nominee's documents. That is 10 percent of 100 percent of his full record. The nominee's personal lawyer has only given us 7 percent of his documents, 7 out of 100 percent of the full record. Republicans have only given 4 percent of these records or made them public. That is 4 percent of 100 percent of a full record. Ninety-six percent of his record is missing. Ninety-six percent of his record is missing. It is reasonable—it is reasonable—that we should want to review his entire record, and then we can debate among us the relevance of what is in his record to his nomination. But it should not be the ability of this—the leadership of this Committee to unilaterally make decisions about what we will and will not see in terms of its admissibility instead of arguing about the weight of whatever is made admissible.

The late Senator Kennedy of Massachusetts called these hearings of Supreme Court nominees, "a job interview with the American people," and by that standard, the nominee before us is coming into his job interview with more than 90 percent of his background hidden. I would think that anyone who wanted to sit on the Nation's highest court would be proud of their record and would want the American people to see it. I would think that anyone privileged to be nominated to the Supreme Court of the United States would want to be confirmed in a process that is not under a cloud, that respects due process. I would think that anyone nominated to the Supreme Court of the United States would want to have a hearing that is characterized by transparency, and fairness, and integrity, and not shrouded by uncertainty, and suspicion, and concealment, and doubt. We should not be moving forward with this hearing. The American people deserve better than this.

So, Judge Kavanaugh, as most of us know, and I will mention to you, and you have young children, and I know they are very proud of you, and I know you are a great parent, and I applaud all that you have done in the community. And so, as you know, as we all know, this is a week when most students in our country go back to school, and it occurs to me that many years ago, right around this time, I was starting kindergarten. And I was in a bus, a school bus, on my way to Thousand Oaks Elementary School as part of the second class of students as busing desegregated Berkeley, California, public schools. This was decades after the Supreme Court ruled Brown v. Board of Education that separate was inherently unequal.

And as I have said many times, had Chief Justice Earl Warren not been on the Supreme Court of the United States, he could not have led a unanimous decision, and the outcome then of that case may have been very different. Had that decision not come down the way it did, I may not have had the opportunities that allowed me to become a lawyer or a prosecutor. I likely would not have been elected District Attorney of San Francisco or the Attorney General of California. And I most certainly would not be sitting here as a Member of the United States Senate.

So, for me, a Supreme Court seat is not only about academic issues of legal precedent or judicial philosophy. It is personal. When we talk about our Nation's highest court and the men and women who sit on it, we are talking about the impact that one individual on that Court can have, impact on people you will never meet and whose names you will never know: whether a person can exercise their constitutional right to cast a ballot, that may be decided if Judge Kavanaugh sits on that Court; whether a woman with breast cancer can afford healthcare or is forced off lifesaving treatment; whether a gay or transgender worker is treated with dignity or maybe treated as a second class citizen; whether a young woman who got pregnant at 15 is forced to give birth or, in desperation, go to a back alley for an abortion; whether a President of the United States can be held accountable, or whether he will be above the law.

All of this may come down to Judge Kavanaugh's vote, and that is what is at stake in this nomination. And the stakes are even higher because of the moment we are in, and many of us have discussed this. These are unprecedented times. As others have already observed, less than 2 weeks ago, the President's personal lawyer and campaign chairman were each found guilty or pleaded guilty to eight felonies. The President's personal lawyer under oath declared that the President directed him to commit a Federal crime. Yet, that same President is racing to appoint to a lifetime position on the highest court in our land, a court that very well may decide his legal fate.

And, yes, that is essentially what confirming Judge Kavanaugh could mean, so it is important, more important, I would say, than ever that the American people have transparency and accountability with this nomination. And that is why it is extremely disturbing that Senate Republicans have prevented this body and, most importantly, the American people, from fully reviewing Judge Kavanaugh's record, and have disregarded just about every tradition and practice that I heard so much about before I arrived in this place.

Judge Kavanaugh, when you and I met in my office, you said with respect to judicial decisions that rushed decisions are often bad decisions. I agree with you. I agree with you. And when we are talking about who will sit on the Supreme Court of the United States, I believe your plank could not be more important.

Mr. Chairman, when Judge Kavanaugh was nominated in July, he expressed his belief that a judge must be independent, must interpret the law, and not make law. But in reviewing this nominee's background, I am deeply concerned that what guides him is not independence or impartiality. It is not even ideology. I would suggest it is not even ideology. What I believe guides him and what his record that we have been able to see shows is what guides this nominee is partisanship. This nominee has devoted his entire career to a conservative Republican agenda, helping to spearhead a partisan investigation into President Clinton, helping George W. Bush's legal team ensure that every vote was not counted in Bush v. Gore, helping to confirm partisan judges and enact partisan laws as part of the Bush White House. And in all of these efforts, he has shown that he seeks to win at all components, even if that means pushing the envelope.

And if we look at his record on the D.C. Circuit and in his recent writings and statements, it is clear that the nominee has brought his political bias to the bench. He has carried out deeply conservative partisan agenda as part—as a judge favoring big business over ordinary Americans, polluters over clean air and water, and the powerful over the vulnerable.

Just last year, Judge Kavanaugh praised the dissent in Roe v. Wade and ruled against a scared 17-year-old girl seeking to end her pregnancy. He has disregarded the Supreme Court precedent to argue that undocumented workers were not really employees under our labor laws. We have witnessed horrific mass shootings from Parkland to Las Vegas to Jacksonville, Florida, yet Judge Kavanaugh has gone further than the Supreme Court and has written that because assault weapons are “in common use,” assault weapons and high-capacity magazines cannot be banned under the Second Amendment. When he was part of an independent counsel investigation into the Democratic President, the nominee was dogged in demanding answers, and yet he has since changed his tune, arguing that Presidents should not be investigated or held accountable, a position that I am sure that is not lost on this President.

These positions are not impartial. They are partisan. Judge Neil Gorsuch, Judge Kavanaugh's classmate, insisted before this Committee that judges are not merely “politicians in robes.” I fear that Judge Kavanaugh's record indicates that is exactly what he may very well be.

Now, I know Members of this Committee and the nominee's friends and colleagues have assured us that he is devoted to his family, and supportive of his law clerks, and volunteers in his community, and I do not doubt that at all, but that is not why we are here. I would rather that we think about this hearing in the context of the Supreme Court of the United States and the impact that it will have on generations of Americans to come. And do we want that Court to continue a legacy of being above politics and unbiased, or are we prepared to participate in a process that is tainted and that leaves the American public questioning the integrity of this process?

And I will close by saying this. We have a system of justice that is symbolized by a statue of a woman holding scales, and she wears a blindfold. Justice wears a blindfold because we have said in the United States of America, under our judicial system, justice should be blind to a person's status. We have said that in our system of justice, justice should be blind to how much money someone has, to what you look like or who you love, to who your parents are, and the language they speak, and every Supreme Court Justice must understand and uphold that ideal.

And, sir, should those cases come before you, Judge Kavanaugh, I am concerned whether you would treat every American equally, or instead show allegiance to the political party and the conservative agenda that has shaped and built your career. I am concerned your loyalty would be to the President who appointed you and not to the Constitution of the United States. These concerns I hope you will answer during the course of this hearing.

I believe the American people have a right to have these concerns. I also believe the American public has a right to full and candid answers to the questions that are presented to you during the course of this hearing. I will be paying, of course, very close attention to your testimony, and I think you know the American public will be paying very close attention to your testimony.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Senator Harris appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Graham.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. LINDSEY O. GRAHAM, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Senator GRAHAM. Am I the last person?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. All right.

Chairman GRASSLEY. But do not forget, we are going to hear from the nominee and his introducers before you can go home and go to bed.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. Okay, thank you.

I was going to ask you to take me to dinner, but that is not going to happen.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You know the answer to that.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. You know that. That is right.

So, to my colleagues on the other side, I look forward to working with you, but we have a different view here. I think you got to be blind as to what is going on here. Have you heard of Justice Breyer? Do you know him? He cannot say anything, I guess. Where did he come from? He was Ted Kennedy's Senate Judiciary person. Where do you think Republicans are going to go find a judge?

The whole argument is, you can be a conservative Republican President, but you got to nominate a liberal to be fair to the country. That is absurd. Where do you think Ruth Bader Ginsburg came from? She was the general counsel of the ACLU. Wonderful person. What groups do you all use to pick from? This is shaping up to be the hypocrisy hearing, and that is hard to do in the Senate in today's time to be hypocritical, but let me just point to a few of these things.

Clinton. It did not bother anybody for Clinton to nominate Breyer while he was under investigation. We actually did it. It did not bother any of you all that a Ted Kennedy staff person was his pick. It did not bother me either because that is who I expected you to pick. This is ridiculous.

You are one of the best choices any Republican could make. As I said with Justice Gorsuch, I am glad you are here because there were days I was wondering who he would have picked.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. And this is a homerun from my point of view.

Let us talk about Roe v. Wade. Who would ever play politics on the campaign trail with Roe v. Wade? What a bastard Donald Trump is, until you hear about Hillary Clinton. February the 3rd, 2016, this is what Hillary Clinton said. When asked, does she have a litmus test for SCOTUS nominations—Supreme Court nominees, “I do have a litmus test. I have a bunch of litmus tests, because the next President could get as many as three appointments,” and I hope she is right. “We have got to make sure to preserve Roe v. Wade, not let it be nibbled away or repealed.” She sounds very open-minded. October 2016, “We need a Supreme Court that will stand up on behalf of women’s rights. It is important that we not reverse Roe v. Wade. I want a Supreme Court that will stick with Roe v. Wade and a woman’s right to choose.” I understand where she is coming from. Anybody running for President over there, I dare you to disagree with her. You will wind up like I did, getting 1 percent.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. If you even suggest that you will pick a nominee that is not going to uphold Roe v. Wade, that is the end of you. But you have figured that out. You do not need me to tell you. So, this is the way we do politics. This is a big decision called Roe v. Wade. There are two sides and a bunch of nuances.

Here is what I know about you. You are going to take it as precedent. You wrote a big book, which I will never read, and you are going to tell us what it takes to overturn longstanding precedent. Nobody on this side will care if you overturn Citizens United. As a matter of fact, they will cheer you on. Somebody will challenge Citizens United, and you will probably say, let me hear both sides of the story, then I will tell you whether or not I should uphold it. So, Hillary Clinton, we know where she is at, on Roe v. Wade, and that is just the way it is.

Now, what other things? Executive power, this idea that Trump picked you to save him. Amazing concept, since you said what you said back in 1998 and 2008. The bottom line is, when Clinton was being impeached, my good friend, and this is true, he is my good friend, on February the 12th, 1999, introduced into the record during the deliberations of the Clinton impeachment trial, an article by Brett Kavanaugh suggesting that you should wait, if there is an indictment, until after the President is out of office.

The same concept we are talking about here today, when the shoe was on the other foot, here is what Joe said about your thinking. “The President is not simply another individual. He is unique. He is the embodiment of the Federal Government and the head of a political party. If he is to be removed, the entire Government likely would suffer, and the military or economic consequences to the Nation could be severe. . . . Those repercussions, if they are to occur, should not result from the judgment of a single prosecutor—whether it be the Attorney General or special counsel—and a single jury. Prosecution or nonprosecution of a President is, in short, inevitably and unavoidably a political act. Thus, as the Constitution suggests, the decision about the President while he is in office should be made where all great national political judgments in our country should be made—in the Congress of the United States,” according to Joe Biden—the gift that keeps on giving for us. I think that is pretty hypocritical. During the Clinton days, you were right, but all of a sudden you are a danger to the republic.

Let us talk about—oh, there are so many—how many minutes do I have here? The bottom line is—Chairman GRASSLEY. Do not exceed what Whitehouse had.

Senator GRAHAM. I will not.

Senator CORNYN. That would be impossible.

Senator GRAHAM. Guns. Somehow you are going to make sure that Congress—the bottom line on guns—Dianne Feinstein is a wonderful lady and has passion on this issue about assault weapons. She was able to succeed politically. After 10 years, the gun assault weapons ban expired and it has been hard to get it re-established. She introduced legislation in 2013 that got 60 “no” votes, 16 Democrats. So, I do not believe they see you as a threat to the Nation if you come out on the idea that the Second Amendment has some meaning. In other words, the political process, when it comes to guns, is a work in progress, and I would rather us decide that than you.

When it comes to the pillar of virtue, Comey.

Harry Reid: That he has been a supporter of Comey and led the fight to get him confirmed as he believed Comey was a principled public servant. “With the deepest regret, I now see that I was wrong.”

Mr. Nadler from New York: “The President can fire him for cause and ought to. He violated all the guidelines and put his thumb on the scale of an election.”

Mr. Cohen from Tennessee, a Democrat, called on Comey to resign his position effective immediately. “I am sure upon reflection of this action, he will submit his letter of resignation for the Nation’s good.” To my Democratic friends, you were all for getting rid of this guy. Now all of a sudden, the country is turning upside down because Trump did.

There is a process to find out what happened in the 2016 election. It is called Mr. Mueller. And I will do everything I can to make sure he finishes his job without political interference. And I am here to tell anybody in the country who listens that this is so hypocritical of my friends on the other side. When it was their President, Kavanaugh was right. When you are talking about Roe v. Wade, it is okay to promise the Nation it will never be overturned. It is okay to pick a Democratic staff member of this Committee, but it is not okay to pick somebody who has been a lifelong Republican.

People see through this. You had a chance and you lost. If you want to pick judges from your way of thinking, then you better win an election. I voted for two of your choices, Sotomayor and Kagan. Got a lot of crap. I would suggest you think long and hard if you got a political ambition of voting for this guy because it will not play well on your side. And why did I do it? I thought they were qualified by any reasonable measure given the history of the Senate.

But we have turned the history of the Senate upside down. I found that they were different than I would have picked, Sotomayor and Kagan, but by any reasonable measure they are qualified. You have been on the court for 12 years. You have had 307 decisions. You have been approved before, so I hope people in the country understand this game. It is a game that I am sad to be part of. It has gotten really bad.

The antidote to our problems in this country when it comes to judges and politics is not to deny you a place on the Supreme Court. This is exactly where you need to be. This is exactly the time you need to be there, and I am telling President Trump you do some things that drive me crazy, you do some great things. You have never done anything better in my view than to pick Gorsuch and Kavanaugh because you had an opportunity to put well-qualified conservatives on the Court, men steeped in the rule of law, who will apply analysis, not politics, to their decisionmaking, and you knocked it out of the park. And to my friends on the other side, you cannot lose the election and pick judges. If you want to pick judges, you better win.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let me tell you what—let me tell everybody what the rest of the day holds for us. Judge Kavanaugh, you can take a break now that we had originally scheduled for 15 minutes, and it may take 15 minutes, but we got to put a different table in here for the people that are going to introduce you. So, if your staff will watch, and if we get done in less than 15 minutes, I would like to start just as soon as the table is set.

So, we will take a 15-minute break now, and then we have the introducers, and then we will give the oath to the nominee, and then we will hear the statement from the nominee, and then we will adjourn until 9:30 tomorrow morning. And tomorrow morning, my approach is going to be the same for the 30 minutes as it would be for the 5 minutes that we normally have in just an otherwise normal hearing, and that is that if you got 1 second left, you can ask a question, but do not take all day to ask a question. And I hope you can give a short answer if their time is up. Then we will—then we will—we will move on to the next person.

So, I want tomorrow not to happen—maybe I better speak to myself. I am not going to let happen tomorrow what I should not have let happen today because I have been instructing people that run Committees either you run the Committee or it runs you, and you guys have been very successful today in running the Committee. I do not want it to happen tomorrow.

Take your—take your time, sir, I mean, until we get the table set.

Recess.

[Whereupon the Committee was recessed and reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are fortunate to have Condoleezza Rice, Senator Rob Portman, and Lisa Blatt to introduce the nominee.

We will now start with Condoleezza Rice.

INTRODUCTION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH, NOMINEE TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, BY HON. CONDOLEEZZA RICE, Ph.D., FORMER U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE; SENIOR FELLOW, HOOVER INSTITUTION; AND PROFESSOR, STANFORD UNIVERSITY, STANFORD, CALIFORNIA

Dr. RICE. Thank you very much.

Chairman Grassley, Senator Feinstein, Members of the Committee, I am really honored to join Lisa Blatt and Rob Portman in introducing Brett Kavanaugh at these hearings to consider his confirmation as a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States of America.

My personal relationship with Judge Kavanaugh goes back 17 years to our time as White House colleagues in the administration of George W. Bush. Those were remarkable times, and I loved serving. They were, however, not easy times, and the guidance and counsel of those with whom I worked was both a joy and a blessing.

I am so grateful to have had Brett Kavanaugh as a colleague. He was always supportive and strong and caring and someone whose integrity and good judgment I valued enormously.

I knew Brett early in his years as a family member. As a matter of fact, I was there when he married Ashley. I remember well the birth of his children. He is a great father and husband and son. In short, he is just a very good human being.

Since the nomination of Brett Kavanaugh, I have been able to reflect back on those times and what my experience tells me about Brett in this crucial role. Many have given testimony to his extraordinary legal mind, the depth of his experience, his intellect, and his good common sense. You have heard and you will hear from his clerks and other jurists and great legal figures, as well as colleagues from throughout his career. I do not need to repeat their praise, only to say that I know firsthand that Brett is really, really smart.

Here is the Brett Kavanaugh that I know. He is hard-working. He has a sense of humor. He seeks truth in facts. There is no detail too small to gain his attention. He makes those around him better. Brett is wise. He is an old soul who is made to help steady us in these complicated times.

Brett listens, especially to those with whom he disagrees. And in our charged environment, when we have become almost tribal, living in echo chambers and often finding comfort in the company of only those with whom we agree, this is an indispensable quality for the responsibilities of the Supreme Court.

The only thing that would be better is if Brett had gone to the same college that his mentor and friend Anthony Kennedy went to. That would be Stanford University. But for that, I will forgive him, and I have to say Yale University seems to have done a pretty good job.

In recent weeks, we have also had the chance to reflect on our Constitution, the Supreme Court itself, and the trust that we place in the Justices of it. As a scholar and as a diplomat, I have watched the struggle of people across the world to achieve democracy and to keep it. Every day, I am more amazed by the brilliance of the institutional design that the Framers left to us.

They carefully balanced powers and responsibilities between the three branches of Government. Knowing that human beings are fallible, they constructed institutions that both enable and constrain those who would govern us.

Scholars often speak of the American spirit of constitutionalism. We Americans believe that the Constitution is our personal protection. We take our rights very seriously, and we will go all the way to the Supreme Court if we think those rights have been violated.

A democracy is only stable when there is that kind of trust in the institutions, a belief that those institutions will be fair and just and secure the rights of citizens. The strength of America's institutions is a cause for optimism, but they cannot be taken for granted.

The Supreme Court's special role in protecting the careful balances that the Constitution seeks to achieve is crucial to our democratic stability. This is true even as times and customs change, and it is more important with every passing year in our increasingly complicated Nation.

As a little girl born in segregated Birmingham, Alabama, who grew up to be Secretary of State, I know personally our country's long journey to guarantee equal rights. I know the power of the Constitution, and I know the gift of our democracy. The Supreme Court is a crucial guardian—both of our Constitution and of our democracy. That is why I am so honored to introduce Brett Kavanaugh for these hearings.

He will be an outstanding Supreme Court Justice. His intellect is unquestioned. His judgment is highly regarded, and I can personally attest to his character and integrity as a colleague. Brett Kavanaugh will thoroughly and faithfully uphold the trust that is our heritage, the Constitution of the United States of America, the most remarkable governing document in human history.

Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Secretary Rice.

Now, our colleague, Senator Portman.

INTRODUCTION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH, NOMINEE TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, BY HON. ROB PORTMAN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF OHIO

Senator PORTMAN. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, and colleagues on this Committee on the Republican and the Democratic side, it is a privilege to join Condi Rice and Lisa Blatt here this afternoon in introducing a friend, Judge Brett Kavanaugh.

I have known Brett and his wife, Ashley, since before they were married, and I had the opportunity to work with Brett during his service in the George W. Bush White House. As Secretary Rice has just said very well, those of us who worked with him universally praise his work ethic, his intelligence, and his integrity.

I visited with George W. Bush a few days ago, and we talked about Brett. He put it simply: Brett Kavanaugh is a class act.

In endorsing Brett, former lawyer to President Bill Clinton, Bob Bennett, called him “a strong advocate of decency and civility.”

By the way, of all the attributes you look for in a judge, what could be more important than good judgment? Brett definitely showed good judgment in marrying Ashley. So did she, and they are a great family. It is wonderful to have their daughters, Margaret and Liza, with us here today.

Brett’s parents, Edward and Martha, are also here. That is especially appropriate since Brett’s first introduction to the law came from listening to his mom practice closing arguments at the dinner table. She was a trailblazer. She went to law school at age 34 and eventually became a trial judge. Brett has said, to him, Martha Kavanaugh will always have been the true Judge Kavanaugh.

During the process of this hearing, there will be more spirited discussions about Brett’s legal philosophy and his experience and background as a lawyer and a judge. I heard quite a bit of it already today, and there should be this discussion. This is about a lifetime appointment to the highest court in the land. In my view, there is not a better qualified person to be on that Court.

Just last Friday, the American Bar Association gave Judge Kavanaugh a unanimous “well qualified” rating, which is the highest rating they offer, unanimous.

I saw how he conducted himself as Associate Counsel to the President in the White House Counsel’s office, the job I once had in the first Bush White House. And I have watched him for the past 12 years on the D.C. Circuit, where he has been praised as fair, smart, and independent.

He has authored more than 300 published opinions, an impressive number. And the Supreme Court has adopted his reasoning a remarkable 13 times, a testament to his thoughtful and well-reasoned decisions and a record that few, if any, other appellate judges can match. Again, no one more qualified.

For more than a decade, he has also taught classes at Harvard, Yale, and Georgetown Law Schools. He is a well-respected judge and a well-respected professor and a thought leader among his peers. That is why so many of his former students, his law clerks, his judicial colleagues, and legal scholars—by the way, from across the political spectrum—have come out in support of his nomination.

Judge Kavanaugh is guided by the Constitution and by the rule of law. He has said the judge’s job is to interpret the law, not to make the law or make policy. I agree, and by the way, as do most of the people we represent. Judges should not be legislating from the bench. Clearly, Brett Kavanaugh has the right qualifications, and he has a judicial philosophy that is very much in the mainstream.

Just as important to me is the kind of person you want on the Supreme Court. I have known Brett not so much as a legal scholar or a judge or a professor, but as a friend, a father, and a husband. He is thoughtful and compassionate and someone who has a big heart and the humility to listen. To me, that might be the single most important attribute for a member of the Supreme Court, the humility to listen.

Throughout this confirmation hearing, I hope the American people will get to know the Brett Kavanaugh I have had the privilege of knowing. A couple days after he was announced, Brett came to my office one evening to discuss his confirmation, just as he has been to your offices. He then went straight from our meeting to serve dinner to the homeless through his church, a regular occurrence that was long scheduled—scheduled long before his nomination.

I only found out about it because that night someone recognized him and took a photo that got tweeted, and it was a photo of him in a baseball cap in the soup kitchen. It is classic Brett that he did not tell me this was where he was going after meeting with me.

To my colleagues, I know the man. He does things because it is the right thing to do.

Brett is also involved, as some of you know, in his daughters' sports teams. Last season, Margaret's sixth grade girls basketball team he coached had an undefeated season and went on to win a citywide championship.

Way to go, Margaret.

[Laughter.]

Senator PORTMAN. To show you where his priorities are, Judge Kavanaugh, or "Coach K," as he is known by his players, has the team photograph and trophy prominently displayed in his judicial chambers.

Julie O'Brien, whose daughter goes to school with Margaret, has another telling story about Brett. A few years ago, Julie's husband passed away. With no one to accompany her daughter to the annual father-daughter dance, Brett stepped up. That year and every year since, Brett has taken her daughter alongside his own to the dance.

That is the kind of person he is. That is the Brett Kavanaugh I know. I am proud to introduce Brett Kavanaugh before this Committee, and I am proud to strongly support his nomination to be the next Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

I know these are partisan times here in Washington, but this is an extraordinary nominee in every respect. Based on his record, his qualifications, and his character, I believe he deserves broad support. My hope, Mr. Chairman, is that, as was the case with Justices Sotomayor and Kagan nominated by President Obama, this Committee will report his nomination favorably, and the full Senate will confirm him with a strong bipartisan vote that he deserves.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, my colleague.

Ms. Lisa Blatt.

INTRODUCTION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH, NOMINEE TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, BY LISA S. BLATT, PARTNER, ARNOLD
& PORTER, WASHINGTON, DC

Ms. BLATT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Committee Members.

It is a privilege to appear before you today. My name is Lisa Blatt, and I know Judge Kavanaugh in my capacity as an appellate lawyer here in Washington. I have argued 35 cases before the Supreme Court of the United States, more than any other woman in history. I am also a liberal Democrat and an unapologetic defender of a woman's right to choose.

My hero is Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, for whom I had the great fortune of serving as a law clerk. I proudly voted for Hillary Clinton. I voted for President Obama twice. And with my apologies, Mr. Chairman, for this one, I wish Senator Feinstein were chairing this Committee.

And yet, I am here today to introduce Judge Kavanaugh and urge the Senate to confirm him as the next Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. I have received many angry calls from friends and even strangers for supporting Judge Kavanaugh. But I was raised to call it like I see it, and I do not see the choice before you as difficult.

By any objective measure, Judge Kavanaugh is clearly qualified to serve on the Supreme Court. After law school, he clerked for Justice Anthony Kennedy, the Justice he would succeed. He spent 12 years on the Nation's most prestigious court of appeals, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. His opinions are invariably thoughtful and fair, and many are known as instant classics not just because they are important, but because they are written so clearly and well. The Supreme Court has adopted the reasoning in his opinions more than a dozen times.

Judge Kavanaugh's judicial temperament and integrity are also flawless. He is meticulously prepared, and he treats litigants with respect, asking probing questions of both sides. He approaches judging by determining what the law requires, no matter his personal preference.

Judge Kavanaugh has taught at the Nation's top law schools, published thoughtful Law Review articles, and co-authored a leading treatise on judicial precedent. And as just mentioned, the ABA strongly endorsed him because, "He meets the very highest standards of integrity, professional competence, and judicial temperament."

On a personal level, I just cannot say enough nice things about the Judge. I first met him almost 10 years ago when he emailed me completely out of the blue to say that he liked an article I had written about arguing before the Supreme Court. Since then, we have become friends, and he has become a mentor to me in my career.

Judge Kavanaugh has spent countless hours listening to me talk about the challenges I have faced as a working mother in a profession dominated by men. He has been a great source of advice on these and many other issues about work/life balance. He understands that life is not always perfect, and he responds to life's challenges with a self-deprecating sense of humor.

More generally, Judge Kavanaugh has been remarkably committed to promoting women in the legal profession. More than half of his law clerks have been women, something that is sadly by no means common. And almost all of his clerks, women and men, have gone on to clerk at the Supreme Court, including for Justices Kagan and Sotomayor.

As his former women law clerks told this Committee, the legal profession is “fairer and more equal because of Judge Kavanaugh.” He has mentored countless other women through the classes he teaches at Yale and Harvard Law Schools.

Obviously, I know that Judge Kavanaugh has a conservative judicial outlook, and if he is confirmed, he will have one of nine votes to definitively decide the meaning of the Constitution, including just how far to read it to protect the reproductive rights of women.

Now if it were up to me, Justice Ginsburg would have all nine votes. But that is not our system, and the reality is that the Presidency and the Senate are in Republican hands. Judge Kavanaugh is the best choice that liberals could reasonably hope for in these circumstances. I am sure that some Members of the Senate knew that they would disagree with Justice Ginsburg’s legal views when she was a nominee, but Justice Ginsburg was confirmed 96–3.

This body has obviously treated some nominees differently since then, to the detriment of our courts. I strongly disagree with the Senate’s treatment of Judge Garland. Judge Kavanaugh himself spoke glowingly of Judge Garland during his pending nomination, stating that, quote, “Chief Judge Garland is a brilliant jurist. He is thoughtful. He is considerate. He is collegial. He works well with others. He is a good man, great integrity, and he is supremely qualified by the objective characteristics of experience, temperament, writing ability, scholarly ability for the Supreme Court.”

All of this is equally true of Judge Kavanaugh. I do not think it is fair to hold Judge Kavanaugh responsible for the fact that Judge Garland is not a Justice today. Instead, I would urge this Committee to treat him as we expect him to treat litigants that appear before him: on his own merits and with an open mind toward someone whose views may differ from our own. Our judicial system is not well served by tit-for-tat politics.

At the end of the day, I enthusiastically support Judge Kavanaugh, and I am proud to introduce him because he is unquestionably qualified by his extraordinary intellect, experience, and temperament, and he does easily fit within the mainstream of legal thought.

I look forward to the Committee over the next few days getting to know the Judge Kavanaugh that I know. And at the end of that process, I hope you will agree that he should be confirmed to succeed his former boss on the Supreme Court.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Ms. Blatt.

Thanks each of the panel for their introduction, and you are dismissed now.

And then, Judge Kavanaugh, can you shake your head? I was told that you might want 5 minutes right now. Do you need that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Then just stay seated until we change the table a little bit, and then we will get to you.

[Pause.]

[Witness is sworn in.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

Proceed with your statement or anything else that you want to tell the Committee right now.

STATEMENT OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH, NOMINEE TO SERVE AS AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Feinstein, Members of the Committee.

I thank Secretary Rice, Senator Portman, and Lisa Blatt for their generous introductions. They are patriots who represent the best of America. I am humbled by their confidence. I am proud to call each of them a friend.

Over the past 8 weeks, I have witnessed firsthand the Senate's deep appreciation for the vital role of the American judiciary. I have met with 65 Senators, including almost every Member of this Committee. Those meetings are sometimes referred to as "courtesy calls," but that term understates how substantive and personal our discussions have been.

I have greatly enjoyed all 65 meetings. In listening to all of you, I have learned more about our country and the people you represent. Every Senator is devoted to public service and the public good, and I thank all the Senators for their time and their thoughts.

I thank President Trump for the honor of this nomination. As a judge and as a citizen, I was deeply impressed by the President's careful attention to the nomination process and by his thorough consideration of potential nominees.

I am also very grateful for his courtesy. At the White House on the night of the announcement, the President and Mrs. Trump were very gracious to my daughters, my wife, and my parents. My family will always cherish that night, or, as my daughter Liza calls it, her debut on national television.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. As a nominee to the Supreme Court, I understand the responsibility I bear. Some 30 years ago, Judge Anthony Kennedy sat in this seat. He became one of the most consequential Justices in American history. I served as his law clerk in 1993. To me, Justice Kennedy is a mentor, a friend, and a hero.

As a member of the Court, he was a model of civility and collegiality. He fiercely defended the independence of the judiciary, and he was a champion of liberty. If you had to sum up Justice Kennedy's entire career in one word, liberty. Justice Kennedy established a legacy of liberty for ourselves and our posterity.

I am here today with another of my judicial heroes, my mom. Fifty years ago this week, in September 1968, my mom was 26, and I was 3. At that time, my mom started as a public school teacher at McKinley Tech High School here in Washington, DC.

1968 was a difficult time for race relations in our city and our country. McKinley Tech had an almost entirely African-American student body. It was east of the park. I vividly remember days as a young boy sitting in the back of my mom's classroom as she taught American history to a class of African-American teenagers. Her students were born before Brown v. Board of Education or Bolling v. Sharpe.

By her example, my mom taught me the importance of equality for all Americans. Equal rights, equal dignity, and equal justice under law. My mom was a trailblazer. When I was 10, she went to law school at American University and became a prosecutor.

I am an only child. My introduction to law came at our dinner table when she practiced her closing arguments on my dad and me. Her trademark line was, "Use your common sense. What rings true? What rings false?"

One of the few women prosecutors at the time, she overcame barriers and was later appointed by Democratic Governors to serve as a Maryland State trial judge. Our Federal and State trial judges serve on the front lines of American justice.

My mom taught me that judges do not deal in abstract principles. They decide for real cases, for real people in the real world, and she taught me that good judges must always stand in the shoes of others. The Chairman referred to me today as Judge Kavanaugh, but to me, that title will always belong to my mom.

For 12 years, I have been a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. I have written more than 300 opinions and handled more than 2,000 cases. I have given it my all in every case. I am proud of that body of work, and I stand behind it. I tell people do not read about my judicial opinions, read the opinions.

I have served with 17 other judges, each of them a colleague and a friend on a court now led by our superb Chief Judge Merrick Garland. My judicial philosophy is straightforward. A judge must be independent and must interpret the law, not make the law. A judge must interpret statutes as written. A judge must interpret the Constitution as written, informed by history and tradition and precedent.

In deciding cases, a judge must always keep in mind what Alexander Hamilton said in Federalist 83, "The rules of legal interpretation are rules of common sense."

A good judge must be an umpire, a neutral and impartial arbiter who favors no litigant or policy. As Justice Kennedy explained in Texas v. Johnson, one of his greatest opinions, judges do not make decisions to reach a preferred result. Judges make decisions because the law and the Constitution as we see them compel the results.

Over the past 12 years, I have ruled sometimes for the prosecution and sometimes for criminal defendants, sometimes for workers and sometimes for businesses, sometimes for environmentalists and sometimes for coal miners. In each case, I have followed the law. I do not decide cases based on personal or policy preferences. I am not a pro-plaintiff or pro-defendant judge. I am not a pro-prosecution or pro-defense judge. I am a pro-law judge.

As Justice Kennedy showed us, a judge must be independent, not swayed by public pressure. Our independent judiciary is the crown jewel of our constitutional republic. In our independent judiciary, the Supreme Court is the last line of defense for the separation of powers and for the rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution.

The Supreme Court must never, never be viewed as a partisan institution. The Justices on the Supreme Court do not sit on opposite sides of an aisle. They do not caucus in separate rooms. If confirmed to the Supreme Court, I would be part of a Team of Nine, committed to deciding cases according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. I would always strive to be a team player on the Team of Nine.

Throughout my life, I have tried to serve the common good, in keeping with my Jesuit high school's motto, "Men for others." I have spent my career in public service. I have tutored at Washington Jesuit Academy, a rigorous, tuition-free school for boys from low-income families. At Catholic Charities at 10th and G, I serve meals to the homeless with my friend Father John Enzler.

In those works, I keep in mind the message of Matthew 25 and try to serve the least fortunate among us. I know I fall short at times, but I always want to do more and do better.

For the past 7 years, I have coached my daughters' basketball teams. I love coaching. All the girls I have coached are awesome, and special congratulations to the girls on this year's sixth grade CYO championship team—Anna, Quinn, Kelsey, Ceane, Chloe, Alex, Ava, Sophia, and Margaret.

I love helping the girls grow into confident players. I know that confidence on the basketball court translates into confidence in other aspects of life.

Title IX helped make girls' and women's sports equal. And I see that law's legacy every night when I walk into my house as my daughters are getting back from lacrosse or basketball or hockey practice. I know from my own life that those who teach and coach America's youth are among the most influential people in our country.

With a kind word here and a hint of encouragement there, a word of discipline delivered in the spirit of love, teachers and coaches change lives. I thank all of my teachers and coaches who have gotten me to this point, and I thank all of the teachers and coaches throughout America.

As a judge, I have sought to train the next generation of lawyers and leaders. For 12 years, I have taught constitutional law to hundreds of students, primarily at Harvard Law School. I teach that the Constitution's separation of powers protects individual liberty. I am grateful to all my students. I have learned so much from them, and I am especially grateful to the dean who first hired me, now Justice Elena Kagan.

One of the best parts of my job as a judge is each year hiring four recent law school graduates to serve as my law clerks for the year. I hire the best. My law clerks come from diverse backgrounds and points of view. A majority of my 48 law clerks have been women. More than a quarter of my law clerks have been minorities, and I have had far more African-American law clerks than the percentage of African-American students in U.S. law schools. I am proud of all my law clerks.

I am grateful for my friends. This past May, I delivered the commencement address at Catholic University Law School. I gave the graduates this advice: "Cherish your friends. Look out for your friends. Lift up your friends. Love your friends." Over the last 8 weeks, I have been strengthened by the love of my friends, and I thank all my friends.

I am grateful to have my family behind me. My mom rightly gets a lot of attention, but a few words about my dad. He has an unparalleled work ethic and the gift for making friends with people, regardless of who they are or where they come from.

My dad and I are both passionate sports fans. When I was 7, he took me to the 1972 NFC Championship Game at RFK stadium just 2 miles from here—upper deck, Section 503, Row 3, Seats 8 and 9. When I was 17, we sat in the same seats for the 1982 NFC Championship Game.

In 1995, when I was 30, we were at Camden Yards together when Cal Ripken played in his 2,131st consecutive game and broke Lou Gehrig's seemingly unbreakable record. And so many other games with my dad, a lifetime of friendship forged in stadium seats over hot dogs and beer.

My daughters, Margaret and Liza, will be in and out of this hearing room over the next few days. They are strong girls, dedicated students, outstanding athletes. In the time since you last saw them at the White House ceremony on July 9th, I am pleased to report that Margaret has gotten her braces off and has turned 13. Margaret is the sweetest girl you will ever know. As for Liza, I tell her every night that no one gives a better hug than Liza Kavanaugh.

Finally, I thank my wife, Ashley. She is a strong West Texan, a graduate of Abilene Cooper Public High School and the University of Texas at Austin. She is now the popular Town Manager of our local community.

This has not exactly been the summer she had planned for the family, but I am grateful for her love and inspiration. Ashley is a kind soul. She always sees the goodness in others. She has made me a better person and a better judge. I thank God every day for my family.

Mr. Chairman, Senator Feinstein, Members of the Committee, I look forward to the rest of the hearing and to answering your questions. I am an optimist. I live on the sunrise side of the mountain, not the sunset side of the mountain. I see the day that is coming, not the day that is gone.

I am optimistic about the future of America. I am optimistic about the future of our independent judiciary. I revere the Constitution. If confirmed to the Supreme Court, I will keep an open mind in every case. I will do equal right to the poor and to the rich. I will always strive to preserve the Constitution of the United States and the American rule of law.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Judge Kavanaugh.

I have something I want to say to the Committee, but before that, we have been here approximately 8 hours. You have had a lot to hear today and listen to. I think it is very noteworthy that no one has seriously questioned your qualifications to receive a promotion to the Nation's highest court, and they have learned a lot about you being an exceptional teacher, coach, volunteer, and dad, in addition to being an exceptional judge.

So I thank you very much for your statement.

Questions for the record are due Monday, September the 10th, at noon. We will notice Judge Kavanaugh's markup meeting for Thursday, September 13th. This timeline is consistent with how we have handled past Supreme Court nominations. I want everybody to know that right now, so that Members and their staff can be working on written questions throughout the week.

With that, we will recess until tomorrow morning at 9:30, when we will start the first round of questions. Again, each Senator will have 30 minutes for the first round of questions, and I intend to go like we have with Gorsuch, that people will have a chance to ask the questions they want to ask. But we start out with the 30 minutes, then the 20-minute second round. So everybody is going to have a chance for a 50-minute crack at this strong judge.

Meeting adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 4:55 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Additional material submitted for the record for Day 1 follows Day 5 of the hearing.]

CONTINUATION OF THE
CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE
NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 2018

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC.

The Committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:35 a.m., in Room SH-216, Hart Senate Office Building, Hon. Charles E. Grassley, Chairman of the Committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Grassley, Hatch, Graham, Cornyn, Lee, Cruz, Sasse, Flake, Crapo, Tillis, Kennedy, Feinstein, Leahy, Durbin, Whitehouse, Klobuchar, Coons, Blumenthal, Hirono, Booker, and Harris.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF IOWA

Chairman GRASSLEY. Good morning, everybody. And we welcome everybody back again and especially Judge Kavanaugh and his wife, Ashley.

Yesterday, each Senator made their opening remarks. We also heard from three people who had the honor of introducing Judge Kavanaugh—Secretary Rice, Senator Portman, and attorney Lisa Blatt. And we heard for the first time directly from Judge Kavanaugh. He made a powerful, compelling, and convincing statement demonstrating his exceptional background and qualifications to serve our Nation's highest court.

NBC News reported that Democratic Members of the Committee plotted with the Minority Leader to disrupt the hearing yesterday. Democratic Senators interrupted the hearing 63 times before lunch, and in the audience, 70 people were arrested yesterday who were following their lead.

All probably very constitutionally prepared to do that, doing what the Constitution says, the right of freedom of speech. But we also were able to finally conduct our hearing the way it should be conducted.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yesterday was just opening statements. It was only—it was only our time as Committee Members that we wasted on disruption and disorder over procedural matters. But today is different.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

[Pause.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. It was our time, as Committee Members, yesterday to make our case. Today is different. Today is the day that the American people are supposed to hear from the nominee. This morning, we will begin our questioning of Judge Kavanaugh. We will get through all Members' first rounds of questions today, no matter how long it takes.

Members are allotted 30 minutes for the first round. If your time expires, your remaining questions may be continued, of course, in the second round tomorrow.

We will take a lunch break as well as probably two other 15-minute breaks throughout the day. For now, let us plan our first break after five Senators or so have completed their questions. I assume that this will be around 12:15 p.m., which will hopefully coincide with the floor vote that is already scheduled. This would be a 3-minute—or 30-minute break for vote and lunch.

But, Judge, if you would like to take a break any other time, let us know. We are happy to accommodate that. And with that, I will start the questioning of my 30 minutes.

Judge, for the last 12 years, you have served as a Federal circuit judge on one of the most influential Circuits in America. You have authored 307 judicial opinions and joined hundreds more, totaling more than 10,000 pages of record. You have decided some of the most pressing legal issues facing our country. The Supreme Court of the United States, the one you are nominated to be on, has adopted a legal position—your legal position from at least 12 opinions.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has received dozens of strong letters of support from hundreds of people, many of whom you know best, from all across the political and ideological spectrum. And the American Bar Association has given you its highest rating, unanimously “well qualified.” My Democratic colleagues have said that this is the “gold standard” of judicial nomination.

There is no dispute that you are one of the most qualified Supreme Court nominees. Some people say the most qualified, and I do not disagree with their judgment, and that could be for anybody coming before the United States Senate. I am not the only one who says that because we have a letter from Robert Bennett, surprisingly, President Clinton's attorney and your opposing Counsel during the independent counsel investigation of President Clinton. He wrote a very strong letter in support of your confirmation: “Brett is the most qualified person any Republican President could possibly have nominated. Were the Senate to fail to confirm Brett, it would not only mean passing up the opportunity to confirm a great jurist, but it would also undermine civility in politics twice over, first in playing politics with such an obviously qualified nominee and then again in losing the opportunity to put such a strong advocate of decency and civility on our Nation's highest court.”

Mr. Bennett also speaks highly of your integrity and to your fairness and open-mindedness. And so, without objection, I would enter that letter in the record.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Now to a question. I imagine that your 12 years of judicial service on the second-highest court in the land has given you plenty of opportunity to think about my first question, which is what makes a judge a good one, and what influences in your life have shaped your vision of how a judge should go about doing his job?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think the first quality of a good judge in our constitutional system is independence. Independence comes directly from Article III of the Constitution. The independence of the Federal judges really is guaranteed by the Framers in our life tenure and our protection from pay reduction. So because we have life tenure, we are independent and immune from political or public pressure.

So I think the first thing that makes a good judge is independence, not being swayed by political or public pressure. That takes some backbone. That takes some judicial fortitude.

The great moments in American judicial history, the judges had backbone and independence. You think about Youngstown Steel. You think about, for example, Brown v. Board of Education, where the Court came together and knew they were going to face political pressure and still enforced the promise of the Constitution.

You think about United States v. Nixon, which I have identified as one of the greatest moments in American judicial history, where Chief Justice Burger, who had been appointed by President Nixon, brought the Court together in a unanimous decision to order President Nixon, in response to a criminal trial subpoena, to disclose information. Those great moments of independence and unanimity are important.

Respect for precedent is another one. We are a system of constitutional precedent. Precedent is not just a judicial policy. It is sometimes stated that it is just a policy. Precedent comes right from Article III of the Constitution.

Article III of the Constitution refers to the judicial power. What does that mean? What does "judicial power" mean? Judicial power, you look at Federalist 78, and what is described there is a system of precedent. So precedent is rooted right into the Constitution itself, and it is constitutionally dictated to pay attention and pay heed to rules of precedent.

Beyond that, being a good judge means paying attention to the words that are written, the words of the Constitution, the words of the statutes that are passed by Congress. Not doing what I want to do, not deferring when the Executive rewrites the laws passed by Congress, but respect for the laws passed by Congress, respect for the rule of law, the words put into the Constitution itself. That is part of being a good judge. That is part of being independent. That is part of precedent.

And then I would say being a good judge, there are human qualities in terms of the interaction. Although these confirmation processes focus on one person, as if you are making all of the decisions, as I said yesterday, I am joining a Team of Nine, if I were fortunate enough to be confirmed. And that means something. It means something in sports. It means something in judging.

I do not make decisions by myself. For the last 12 years, I have not been making decisions by myself. Every case has been in a panel of at least three judges, and you learn from each other when you are deciding cases. You work with each other when you are deciding cases.

And so having collegiality and civility, as Justice Kennedy showed us so powerfully repeatedly with how he conducted himself over the years. That is very important because those great moments that I was talking about at the beginning like United States v. Nixon, like Brown v. Board, the Court came together in unanimous decisions. And the unanimity of the decisions added force. That took personal interaction. That took collegiality.

So I think, you know, I have tried to be a very collegial judge. I have tried to be civil. I want, Mr. Chairman, the losing party, the losing party in every case to come out and say, "Kavanaugh gave me a fair shake. He was well prepared. He wrote a clear opinion. He explained everything. I disagree, but at least I get it."

So I want the losing party and I want both parties to walk out at oral argument and say, "He had an open mind. He gave me a fair shake." And I think I have done that for 12 years. I have tried to do that consistently. Everything you do as a judge matters in terms of being a good judge—oral argument, writing opinions, how you decide.

So those are the qualities. I guess the last thing I always remember about it is the thing I said my mom told me from the first instance. Judging is not just about theory. It is not theory. It is not just what a Law Review article is. Judging is real people in the real world, and every decision we make, no matter how high-minded it might sound, affects real people in the real world with real interests. And we have to remember that in how we explain the decisions.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Now following up on the wise words of Senator Sasse yesterday on separation of powers, your record before the Senate includes more than 10,000 pages of judicial writings over your dozen years. We have over 440,000 pages of emails and other records from your legal service at the White House and Judge Starr. And you have written extensively on the issue of our Constitution, separation of power among the three branches. And a key component of the separation of powers is the independent judiciary.

Obviously, everybody learns in eighth grade civics about judges interpreting law. The judiciary must continue to be the least political and least dangerous branch. A judge's sole job is to find and apply the law evenly and fairly without regard to the President who nominated him, the Senators who voted for him, the parties before him, and the political consequences of his judicial decisions.

So, Judge, let us discuss judicial independence from the executive branch. No one, not even the President, is above the law. Some of my colleagues have criticized your views of Presidential authority, suggesting—wrongly, in my opinion—that your views of Presidential authority would not allow any meaningful check on the President, particularly this one.

Please tell us what judicial independence means to you, including whether you have any trouble ruling against a President who appointed you and against the executive branch in any case before you. You have partly talked about independence, but apply it specifically to a ruling against a President or the executive branch generally.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

To begin with, you are correct. No one is above the law in our constitutional system. Federalist 69, Hamilton makes clear all the ways that the executive branch, as designed by the Framers of the Constitution, was different from the monarchy. Under our system of Government, the executive branch is subject to the law, subject to the court system, and that is an important part of Federalist 69. It is an important part of the constitutional structure.

In general, so, too, we, as judges, are separate from the Congress. We are not supposed to be influenced by political pressure from the Executive or from the Congress. We are independent. We make decisions based on law, not based on policy, not based on political pressure, not based on the identity of the parties. No matter who you are in our system, no matter where you come from, no matter how rich you are or how poor you are, no matter your race, your gender, no matter your station in life, no matter your position in Government, it is all equal justice under law.

And again, look at our examples in history. I always will go back to the great moments in our history where these principles, which sound abstract if you are just describing them, were actually implemented. And I go back to Youngstown Steel, and you think about it, it is a 6-to-3 decision where the Supreme Court rules that President Truman has violated the law by seizing the steel mills.

Now this is a time of war, a time of war where lots of Americans were killed, and the Supreme Court is under pressure to defer to the President's war effort in a 6-to-3 decision. But what is interesting to me, Justice Clark—we do not usually talk about Justice Clark in that decision. Why is he important?

He is important. He was appointed by President Truman to the Supreme Court. What a moment of judicial independence there to rule in that case.

You think about Justice Jackson, who had been working for President Roosevelt, and then he dissents in the Korematsu case. Stands up and says letting racism like this is like letting a loaded weapon lie around.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Dissents against President Roosevelt's decision. Justice Jackson's—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Ask him to suspend.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Justice Jackson's concurrence in Youngstown, which is, of course, what has become the law, that three-part test—Category 1, Category 2, Category 3. But again, he writes that concurrence in Youngstown. Why is that a moment of judicial independence? He had taken positions contrary to that when he had worked in the executive branch in the Roosevelt administration. Yet, when he is a judge, he sees it differently as an independent judge.

How about Chief Justice Burger? United States v. Nixon. Writes the opinion, unanimous. Moments of judicial independence. So it is resisting public pressure, political pressure. It is treating everyone equally, no matter where you are, what station.

When I was a—became a judge on the D.C. Circuit, I had a case called Hamdan v. United States. Who is Hamdan?

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. So in the Hamdan case, Hamdan is one of bin Laden's associates. You will never have a nominee—Mr. Chairman, should I proceed?

Chairman GRASSLEY. This is coming out of my time, but that is okay. Let these people have their free speech and interrupt the other 300 million people listening, that this is your opportunity to speak to the American people and for them to make a judge about it. If they want to affect what the other 300 million people hear from you, then that is just too bad. You proceed now.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Hamdan is one of bin Laden's associates involved before September 11th, worst attack ever on American soil. He was prosecuted before a military commission, signature prosecution of the Bush administration.

Comes to the D.C. Circuit. I am on the panel. I write the opinion saying that his military commission prosecution is unconstitutional, violates ex post facto principles.

You will never have a nominee who has ruled for a more unpopular defendant than ruling for Salim Hamdan. And why did I do that in that case? Why did I rule for someone who had been involved in the September 11th? It is because the law compelled it.

As Justice Kennedy showed us in the Texas v. Johnson case, we do not make decisions based on who people are or their policy preferences or the moment. We base decisions on the law. Justice Kennedy's example of independence is something I have tried to follow.

And it means, you know, you are not a pro—as I said yesterday, not a pro-plaintiff or pro-defense judge, not a pro-prosecution or pro-defense judge. I am a pro-law judge, and I have ruled for parties based on whether they have the law on their side.

That is part of being an independent judge is ruling for the party no matter who they are, so long as the party is right. If you walk into my courtroom and you have the better legal arguments, you will win.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I think you answered my next question based upon what you said about Hamdan. But there are probably other examples. You do not need to go into detail. But you have President—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. President Bush appointed you. Are there other cases that—there has been other cases presumably you have ruled against the administration of the person that appointed you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely, Mr. Chairman. There were a slew of cases on everything from Freedom of Information Act to some of the administrative law cases. The Hamdan one is certainly the one that comes to mind most because of the importance of that case. Yet I ruled that it was unlawful.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. Now did anyone ask you to make any promises or assurances at all about the way that you would rule in certain cases?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Were you asked about your views on Roe v. Wade?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.
[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. We were talking about separation of powers. Have you ever written any decisions where you use the Tenth Amendment? I am talking about division of powers between Federal and States.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, most of the cases that come to the D.C. Circuit are at the national level and, therefore, involving questions of separation of powers between the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. Of course, federalism is a critical part of our constitutional structure as well.

The genius of our system, Federalist 39, as described by Madison, is that we have both a national Government and a Federal Government simultaneously. And the House of Representatives really represents in some ways the national part, proportional representation. This body, with two Senators from each State, represents in many ways the Federal part, each State represented equally.

And the federalism system by which the States are allowed to regulate local matters, and some of the Commerce Clause cases, such as United States v. Lopez and United States v. Morrison, reinforce the idea that there is a core of authority that is exclusively in the province of the States and beyond the scope of the Federal Government.

The Tenth Amendment—
[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Tenth Amendment reinforces the structure of federalism that is in our constitutional system. It is important always to remember the role of the States in our constitutional systems, and it is important to recognize as individual citizens something we often forget, particularly in a process like this. Our rights and liberties are protected by the Federal Constitution and by the Federal courts, but they are also protected by State constitutions and State courts.

A great judge on the Sixth Circuit, Judge Jeff Sutton, has written a new book about using State constitutions to help protect your individual liberties and rights, too. This whole document, through the separation of powers and the federalism, tilts toward liberty—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]
Judge KAVANAUGH. Tilts toward liberty.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Now we have talked about your independence from a President. There is also the question of independence from the legislative branch, equally as important.

You are going to be asked about your personal views on a variety of topics and whether you believe various Supreme Court cases were correctly decided. Presumably, this is because Senators are going to try to predict how you will rule in cases before you. The idea is that if you agree with your personal views—if they agree with your personal views on particular issues of morality or on Supreme Court precedent, they maybe would vote to confirm you. If not, they might not.

Of course, that is improper. Judges should never promise their future votes on the bench in exchange for a Senator's vote for them.

If you answer these questions about your views on specific Supreme Court cases or public controversies of the day, you would be showing the opposite of independence from the legislative branch.

Politicians can make promises about how they will vote on issues. Judges, by the very nature of the job, should never promise any outcome. If a nominee answers these questions, it threatens to undermine judicial independence.

Of course, there may be times where it is appropriate to reconsider certain decisions, especially if more recent opinions have called into question the rationale of the original decisions. So with this in mind, I would like to explore the approach that you would take toward Supreme Court precedent.

Could you tell us your views on the value of precedent? I think you have already done that, but if you want to expand on it, go ahead. Have you ever followed precedent of the Supreme Court when doing so conflicted with your personal beliefs?

Judge KAVANAUGH. My personal beliefs are not relevant to how I decide cases. The role of precedent in our system, which I said is rooted in Article III of the Constitution, it is not just a judicial policy. The role of precedent is to ensure stability in the law, which is critically important.

It is also to ensure predictability of the law. People who order their affairs around judicial decisions need to know that the law is predictable. Whether you are an individual or business or worker, you need to have predictability.

People rely on the decisions of the courts, and so reliance interests are critically important to consider as a matter of precedent. They are one of the reasons we have the system of precedent, so that people can rely on the decisions.

Precedent also reinforces the impartiality and independence of the judiciary. The people need to know in this country that the judges are independent and that we are not making decisions based on policy views. Part of that is to understand we are following a system of precedent, of what has been done before.

The Court, every time someone gets on it, is not just bouncing around to, "What do I think is best?" It is, "What is the precedent of the Supreme Court?" is always part of the analysis, an important part.

And for 12 years, I have been applying precedent of the Supreme Court and of my court. Every day for 12 years, I have not been getting up saying how can I rewrite the law? I have been getting up for 12 years every day saying, okay, how can I apply this Fourth Amendment precedent to this fact pattern that comes before me? Or how can I apply this First Amendment precedent to this fact pattern that comes before me?

So precedent is the foundation of our system. It is part of the stability. It is ensuring predictability, and it is just foundational to the Constitution, as Article III and Federalist 78 make clear.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Now you will be asked by other Members which Supreme Court precedents you like and do not like. But as you know, it is inappropriate for a nominee to answer those questions. And this refers to Justice Ginsburg. She said, "A judge sworn to decide impartially can offer no forecasts, no hints, for that would show not only disregard for the specifics of a particular case, it would display disdain for the entire judicial process.”

The underlying reason for this, of course, is that making promises or giving hints undermines the very independence that we have discussed. Would you agree with that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do, Senator, Mr. Chairman. And one of the things that I have to remember sitting in this seat is that this moment is a moment of judicial independence with how I interact with this Committee.

And what I have done in each of the jobs I have had, and particularly as a judge over the last 12 years, but also in the executive branch, you always ask—I always ask myself and I tell people I am working with to ask how has it been done before? How has it been done before? So, as a judge, how has it been done before as precedent? That is, how has it been done before?

When I am sitting here, what did I do? I went and studied all the nominee precedent. I have studied. I have read Thurgood Marshall’s hearing and Justice Brennan’s hearing, and I have read the hearings of the eight Justices currently sitting on the Supreme Court. It is what I call nominee precedent.

And so all of the nominees currently sitting on the Supreme Court, all the Justices have made clear a couple things. First of all, they cannot discuss cases or issues that might come before them. As Justice Ginsburg said, no hints, no forecasts, no previews.

That also means with respect to at least the vast body of Supreme Court precedent going back, you cannot give a thumbs up or thumbs down on the case. That is Justice Kagan’s formulation. She said repeatedly no thumbs up or thumbs down when she was asked, “What do you do think about this case? What do you think about that case?” I liked her formulation there. No thumbs up or thumbs down.

That nominee precedent, as I call it, is now, in my view, part of the independence of the judiciary, and that nominee precedent is something I need to adhere to when I am here as a nominee now. Because that is—one of my jobs here is not to advance my own interests, but remember I am a representative of the judiciary as a whole, and I have a responsibility to do judicial independence right here, right now as a nominee. So following that nominee precedent is going to be critical.

Now there is an exception that the eight Justices have drawn currently sitting on the Court, if you read all the hearings, for some older cases. And I will be happy to give some older cases where nominee precedent does allow the Justices—has allowed them to talk about a few older cases.

And again, why do we do this? Why is this nominee precedence there? When eight Justices of widely ranging views do this, there must be a reason. The reason is judicial independence. What does that mean? It means two things in this context.

One, the litigants who come before us have to know we have an open mind, that we do not have a closed mind, that we have not committed something in this process that is going to affect how we decide a case because we feel bound by what we promised to this Committee. And believe me, judges do feel bound by what they said to this Committee.

So if I say something and a case comes before me 5 years from now, I am going to feel morally bound by what I said here. And if I have crossed the line of what I should say, then I am not going to have an open mind in that case. That is a violation of judicial independence.

Second, as Chief Justice Roberts described perhaps better than anyone, if I get into some kind of process that appears to be a bargaining process where I say, well, I will agree with this decision in exchange for your vote, it is never that explicit. But that is—as Chief Justice Roberts described it, that is kind of what seems to be going on sometimes. Well, that is a complete violation of judicial independence because then the judges are not making the decisions based on their reading of the law. It is really, as Chief Justice Roberts described it, it is the Senate or the Senate Judiciary Committee really sending a nominee as a delegate to the judiciary and really doing what the Senate Judiciary Committee thinks is the right thing to do.

Chief Justice Roberts explained very forcefully that doing that would be a violation of judicial independence. That nominee precedent weighs heavily on me as a nominee here because it is rooted in judicial independence. And I have said repeatedly already that I am going to be an independent judge. Well, I have to be an independent nominee as well, so I am going to have to adhere to the lines drawn by those prior nominees, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. There is only 25 seconds left. I am going to reserve that time and go to Senator Feinstein.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Good morning, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you.

Senator FEINSTEIN. I am sorry about the circumstances, but we will get through it.

I wanted to talk to you this morning about guns, and go back to Roe v. Wade, if I might. My office wrote the assault weapons legislation in 1993. It was law from 1994 to 2004, and it essentially prohibited the transfer, sale, and manufacture of assault weapons. It did not at the time affect possession.

I happen to believe that it did work and that it was important. And I have watched case after case, and I think I mentioned earlier, school shootings, which are just—I never thought this would happen in our country, that someone would bring a semi-automatic assault weapon into a school and just mow down children and staff.

And so I have been very interested in your thinking on assault weapons. You specifically argued that the DC assault weapons ban was unconstitutional, and I think because you said these weapons were in common use. What did you base your conclusion that assault weapons are in common use, and what evidence or study did you use to do that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator Feinstein, for the question.

I understand, of course, your role on that issue and your long leadership on that issue and appreciate that. I faced a decision where, as in every other decision just about on the D.C. Circuit, I had to follow precedent, precedent of the Supreme Court. I do not get to pick and choose which Supreme Court precedents I get to follow. I follow them all.

And so, in the Second Amendment context, the Supreme Court in the Heller decision, written by Justice Scalia, had held that there was an individual right to keep and bear arms. And then in explaining what that meant and what exceptions would be allowed to that right, Justice Scalia's opinion for the Court in Part 3 of the opinion went through this does not mean that there is no gun regulation permissible.

So that was an important part of the opinion, Part 3 of the Supreme Court's opinion, where it pre-identified a number of exceptions that would be allowed. Felon in possession laws, concealed carry laws, possession of mentally ill, possession of guns in schools, possession in certain kinds of buildings, he pre-identified that.

As to the weapons, the way I understood what he said there, and what was said in the McDonald case later, was that dangerous and unusual weapons could be prohibited. And what he referred to specifically is machine guns could be prohibited. So it is very important to recognize, under the Heller decision, machine guns can be prohibited. And machine—

Senator FEINSTEIN. They were in the Firearms Act a long time ago.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, and that is—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Machine guns have been prohibited.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, Senator. And Justice Scalia's opinion did not disturb that longstanding regulation. In fact, it specifically reaffirmed that machine guns could be prohibited. The Court in Heller, the Supreme Court upheld—or struck down a DC ban on handguns, most of which are semi-automatic—

Senator FEINSTEIN. I do not mean—let me interrupt you because I think we are on totally different wavelengths. I am talking about your statement on “common use”—“common use” being a justification. And assault weapons are not in common use.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And Justice Scalia's opinion used that phrase, and I think the next sentence of the opinion talked about dangerous and unusual weapons. And the Court in Heller itself, the Supreme Court, struck down a DC ban on handguns.

Now most handguns are semi-automatic. That is something that not everyone appreciates. Most handguns are semi-automatic. And the question came before us of semi-automatic rifles, and the question was, can you distinguish as a matter of precedent—again, this is all about precedent for me, trying to read exactly what the Supreme Court said if you read the McDonald case. And I concluded that it could not be distinguished as a matter of law semi-automatic rifles from semi-automatic handguns.

And semi-automatic rifles are widely possessed in the United States. There are millions and millions and millions of semi-automatic rifles that are possessed. So that seemed to fit common use and not being a dangerous and unusual weapon. That was the basis of my dissent.

But in a nutshell, the basis of my dissent was I was trying to follow strictly and carefully the Supreme Court precedent. And I know you have read the opinion—

Senator FEINSTEIN. You are saying the numbers determine common use? Common use is an activity. It is not common storage or possession. It is use. So what you said was that these weapons are commonly used. They are not.

Judge KAVANAUGH. They are widely possessed in the United States, Senator, and they are—they are used and possessed. But the question is, are they dangerous and unusual? They are certainly dangerous. All weapons are dangerous. Are they unusual? And given how prevalent they are in the United States, it seemed under Justice Scalia's test, and if you look at the majority opinion in McDonald, the same thing.

I want to reiterate the Supreme Court made clear that machine guns can be banned. Machine guns can be banned.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Let me speak to you. I am talking about the Heller case. Let me be specific. And you specifically argued that it was unconstitutional to defend assault weapons because they are—to ban assault weapons because they are in common use. And that, I believe, was your dissent in the case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, and I was referring to some semi-auto—some kinds of semi-automatic rifles that are banned by DC are widely owned in the United States. And that seemed to be the test that the Supreme Court had set forth in the Heller and McDonald cases. In other words, if a type of firearm is widely owned in the United States.

Now whether I agree with that test or not was not the issue before me. I have to follow the precedent of the Supreme Court as it is written, and that is what I tried to do in that case. It is a very long opinion.

I also made clear, Senator Feinstein, at the end of the opinion, I am a native of this area. I am a native of an urban/suburban area. I grew up in a city plagued by gun violence and gang violence and drug violence. So I fully understand, as I explained in the opinion, the importance of this issue.

I specifically referenced that Police Chief Cathy Lanier's goals of reducing gang and gun violence was something I certainly applauded, but that I had to follow the precedent of the Supreme Court in that case. And as I read it, that is what it said—I am sorry?

Senator FEINSTEIN. How do you reconcile what you have just said with the hundreds of school shootings using assault weapons that have taken place in recent history? How do you reconcile that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, of course, the violence in the schools is something we all detest and want to do something about, and there are lots of efforts, I know, underway to make schools safer. I know at my girls' school, they do a lot of things now that are different than they did just a few years ago in terms of trying to harden the school and make it safer for everyone.

Guns, handguns, and semi-automatic rifles are weapons used for hunting and self-defense. But as you say, Senator, you rightly say, they are used in a lot of violent crime and cause a lot of deaths. Handguns are used in lots of crimes that result in death, and so are semi-automatic rifles. That is one of the—that is what makes this issue difficult.

As I said in the last two pages of my dissent in Heller, I fully understand the gang violence, gun violence, drug violence that has plagued various cities, including Washington, DC. This was known as the murder capital of the world for a while, this city. And that was a lot of handgun violence at the time.

And so I understand the issue. But as a judge, my job, as I saw it, was to follow the Second Amendment opinion of the Supreme Court, whether I agreed with it or disagreed with it. At the end of the opinion, I cited Justice Kennedy's Texas v. Johnson quote, which I read yesterday, as the guiding light for the lower court judges and all judges.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Let me give you a couple of other quotes because I am going to change the subject. Do you agree with Justice O'Connor that a woman's right to control her reproductive life impacts her ability to, quote, "participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as a general proposition, I understand the importance of the precedent set forth in Roe v. Wade. So Roe v. Wade held, of course, and it reaffirmed in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, that a woman has a constitutional right to obtain an abortion before viability, subject to reasonable regulation by the State up to the point where that regulation constitutes an undue burden on the woman's right to obtain an abortion.

And one of the reasons for that holding, as explained by the Court in Roe, and also in Planned Parenthood v. Casey more fully, is along the lines of what you said, Senator Feinstein, about the quote from Justice O'Connor. So that is one of the rationales that undergirds Roe v. Wade. It is one of the rationales that undergirds Planned Parenthood v. Casey.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Well, let me give you another one—rationale. In the 1950s and 1960s, the two decades before Roe, deaths from illegal abortions in this country ran between 200,000 and 1.2 million. That is according to the Guttmacher Institute. So a lot of women died in that period.

So the question comes, and you have said today—not today, but it has been reported that you have said that Roe is now settled law. The first question I have of you is what do you mean by "settled law"? I tried to ask earlier do you believe it is correct law?

Have your views on whether Roe is settled precedent or could be overturned, and has your views changed since you were in the Bush White House?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I said that it is settled as a precedent of the Supreme Court, entitled the respect under principles of stare decisis. And one of the important things to keep in mind about Roe v. Wade is that it has been reaffirmed many times over the past 45 years, as you know, and most prominently, most importantly, reaffirmed in Planned Parenthood v. Casey in 1992.

And as you well recall, Senator, I know when that case came up, the Supreme Court did not just reaffirm it in passing. The Court specifically went through all the factors of stare decisis in considering whether to overrule it, and the joint opinion of Justice Kennedy, Justice O'Connor, and Justice Souter, at great length went through those factors. That was the question presented in the case.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Could I interrupt you to say, since you mentioned stare decisis, and I have sat on nine of these hearings. And when the subject comes up, the person says, “I will follow stare decisis,” and they get confirmed, and then, of course, they do not.

So I think knowing going into it how you make a judgment on these issues is really important to our vote as whether to support you or not. Because I do not want to go back to those death tolls in this country, and I truly believe that women should be able to control their own reproductive systems within obviously some concern for a viable fetus.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I understand your point of view on that, Senator, and I understand how passionate and how deeply people feel about this issue. I understand the importance of the issue. I understand the importance that people attach to the Roe v. Wade decision, to the Planned Parenthood v. Casey decision.

I do not live in a bubble. I understand. I live in the real world. I understand the importance of the issue. And—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Well, my staff just passed me a note. Let me read it to you because I think it is good. Have your views about whether Roe is settled precedent changed since you were in the Bush White House?

Judge KAVANAUGH. My—

Senator FEINSTEIN. “Yes” or “no”?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I will tell you what my views—I am not sure what it is referring to about “Bush White House,” but I will tell you what my view right now is. Which is, it is important precedent of the Supreme Court that has been reaffirmed many times. But then Planned—and this is the point that I want to make that I think is important. Planned Parenthood v. Casey reaffirmed Roe and did so by considering the stare decisis factors.

So Casey now becomes a precedent on precedent. It is not as if it is just a run of the mill case that was decided and never been reconsidered, but Casey specifically reconsidered it, applied the stare decisis factors, and decided to reaffirm it. That makes Casey a precedent on precedent.

Another example of that, because you might say, are there other cases like that, Miranda. So Miranda is reaffirmed a lot, but then in the Dickerson case in 2000, Chief Justice Rehnquist writes the opinion, considering the stare decisis factors and reaffirming Miranda. Even though Chief Justice Rehnquist, by the way, had been a fervent critic of Miranda throughout his career, he decided that it had been settled too long, had been precedent too long, and he reaffirmed it.

So precedent on—

Senator FEINSTEIN. What—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am sorry to interrupt.

Senator FEINSTEIN. I am sorry to interrupt, but I want to switch subjects, and one last question. What would you say your position today is on a woman’s right to choose?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as a judge—

Senator FEINSTEIN. As a judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. As a judge, it is an important precedent of the Supreme Court. By “it,” I mean Roe v. Wade, and Planned Parenthood v. Casey, they have been reaffirmed many times. Casey is precedent on precedent, which itself is an important factor to remember. And I understand the significance of the issue, the jurisprudential issue, and I understand the significance as best I can—I always try and I do hear—of the real world effects of that decision, as I try to do, of all the decisions of my court and of the Supreme Court.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Well, I thank you for that. Let us go to Presidential power for a moment. You were part of Ken Starr's independent counsel team, which conducted a sweeping investigation into possible wrongdoing by President Clinton and the first lady. At the time, you argued for aggressive questioning of the President. You did not take the position that President Clinton was immune from investigation.

Since then, you have taken the opposite position. In fact, you have said that, and I quote, "If the President were the sole subject of a criminal investigation, I would say no one should be investigating that at all." What did you mean by that, and what are the circumstances where a sitting President could be subject to criminal investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I appreciate the sign there. Senator, the last sign, I should have mentioned while it was up, the Second Amendment sign actually had brackets around part of my quote. And I am not sure if it was the exact quote.

But this one—I just wanted to point that out.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Is this accurate?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Here is what I was saying, Senator. Let me explain it, this one.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Oh.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The last one may or may not have been accurate. I just wanted to point that out for the record. It had brackets for my quote.

This one, so what happens after the Starr investigation? Then I work 5½ years in the White House. So let me just give you, if I can, some context here, and I am going to get specifically to your question.

So I work on the independent counsel investigation, and that is obviously difficult, controversial, a moment for our country that I wish had not happened. We all wish it had not happened. And I reflect on that. I wrote a Georgetown University Law Journal article in 1999 reflecting on some of my thoughts about that. This seems to be a tendency of mine to go through an experience, write an article reflecting on it.

And then I work in the Bush White House for 5½ years, and I write an article in the Minnesota Law Review, Senator Klobuchar, in 2009, when President Obama is in office, I should point out, and I reflected on a number of things I had learned working in the independent counsel office and then working in the White House. And I thought there were a number of things Congress could take a look at that I had experienced.

One of them was I proposed timelines for consideration of judicial nominees. I proposed a 180-day, up-or-down vote for every judicial nominee. That was something that from my experience I thought would avoid controversy and have rules of the road set in advance, and I proposed that specifically for Congress to consider.

Other aspects, I said—
 Senator FEINSTEIN. Well—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Another thing I proposed was, for Congress to consider whether it should look at Clinton v. Jones or the principle of Clinton v. Jones. So, you recall, Clinton v. Jones had said a President is subject to civil suit while in office, the Paula Jones suit. That was a controversial decision, but the Supreme Court made clear at the end of the decision, Congress could provide extra deferral of suits, not immunity, but deferral of suits for Presidents, if Congress so wanted.

And so in the Minnesota Law Review article, I put out some ideas about whether Congress may want to think about that. And why did I do that? I think Senator Durbin asked yesterday, what changed that made me think about that from the time? What changed was September 11th. That is what changed.

So after September 11th, I thought very deeply about the Presidency, and I thought very deeply about the independent counsel experience, and I thought very deeply about how those things interacted. And I thought very deeply about seeing President Bush, when he came into the Oval Office on September 12, 2001, in the morning, President Bush said this will not happen again. This will not happen again.

And he was of single-minded focus. Every morning for the next 7 years for President Bush was still September 12, 2001. Single-minded focus. And then thinking back to the independent counsel experience and August 1998. So I proposed some ideas for Congress to consider.

Here is the bottom-line point. They were ideas for Congress to consider. They were not my constitutional views. If a case came up where someone was trying to say this is a constitutional principle, I would have a completely open mind on that because I have never taken a position on the Constitution on that question. I have only put out proposals for you all to study to think about the balance of a President fighting a war, leading a war, and a President subject to, say, ordinary civil lawsuits as in the Clinton v. Jones case.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Let me ask you. You have become very good. You are learning to filibuster.

[Laughter.]

Senator FEINSTEIN. But let me ask this question precisely. The Supreme Court has unanimously ruled that a President can be required to turn over information. It upheld the subpoena for the tapes of Oval Office conversations that revealed President Nixon's efforts to cover up the Watergate break-in. This, as you know, was U.S. v. Nixon.

You have said that the Nixon case might have been wrongly decided. Was U.S. v. Nixon wrongly decided in your view?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So that quote is not in context and is a misunderstanding of my position that is up there. I have repeatedly called U.S. v. Nixon one of the four greatest moments in Supreme Court history. So I have called that—the four I have always identified are Marbury v. Madison, Youngstown Steel, Brown v. Board of Education, and United States v. Richard Nixon.

And why have I—Brown v. Board, by the way, the single greatest—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Was it rightly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So I have said that—I have said, yes, that the Court's holding that a criminal trial subpoena to a President in the context of the special counsel regulations in that case for information, a criminal trial subpoena for information under the specific regulations in that case, I have said that holding is one of the four greatest moments in Supreme Court history.

So, not only what I was—I can explain how that misunderstanding came up because that is—I know there was a news story about that, and that is just not correct impression of my views. My views have been consistently why was it one of the greatest moments? It was one of the greatest moments because of the political pressures of the time. The Court stood up for judicial independence in a moment of national crisis.

The Supreme Court, we need the Supreme Court to decide the things we can foresee. But one of the things that is really important for the Supreme Court, we are going to have crisis moments at the Supreme Court on things we cannot even predict, and we need people on the Supreme Court who are prepared for that. And U.S. v. Nixon—

Senator FEINSTEIN. My time is going to run out very quickly. Let me just ask you this. Can a sitting President be required to respond to a subpoena?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So that is a hypothetical question about what would be an elaboration or a difference from U.S. v. Nixon's precise holding. And I think going with the Justice Ginsburg principle, which is really not the Justice Ginsburg alone principle, it is everyone's principle on the current Supreme Court. And as a matter of the canons of judicial independence, I cannot give you an answer on that hypothetical question.

Senator FEINSTEIN. So you cannot give me an answer on whether a President has to respond to a subpoena from a court of law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. My understanding is that you are asking me to give my view on a potential hypothetical, and that is something that every—each of the eight Justices currently sitting on the Supreme Court when they were sitting in my seat declined to decide potential hypothetical cases.

I can tell you about the U.S. v. Nixon precedent, and I did about Chief Justice Burger's role in forging a unanimous opinion, and really all the Justices worked together on that. But Chief Justice Burger, who had been appointed by President Nixon—been appointed by President Nixon, writes the opinion in U.S. v. Nixon, 8–to–0. Rehnquist was recused—8–to–0, ordering President Nixon to disclose the tapes in response to a criminal trial subpoena.

A moment of crisis argument, I think July 8, 1974. They decided 2 weeks later. A really important opinion. A moment of judicial independence. Important precedent of the Supreme Court. But how that would apply to other hypotheticals, I best, as a sitting judge and as a nominee, follow the precedent of the nominees who have been here before and as a matter of judicial independence not give you a precise answer on a hypothetical that could come before me.

Senator FEINSTEIN. I understand. Thank you very much for being forthcoming. I appreciate it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I assume you want to reserve your 3 minutes?

Senator FEINSTEIN. Can I do that?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator FEINSTEIN. I will.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hatch.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. Before I begin, I would like to enter into the record three letters and an op-ed supporting Judge Kavanaugh's confirmation. The first letter, which I mentioned yesterday in my opening statement, is a letter from 41 attorneys who are members of the Supreme Court Bar. The signers include people like Lisa Blatt, Deanne Maynard, and Kathleen Sullivan. As the letter notes, the signers "hold a broad range of political, policy, and jurisprudential views," but they "speak as one in supporting Judge Kavanaugh's nomination." The letter's authors write, "Based on our experience with Judge Kavanaugh and his work over 12 years of distinguished judicial service, we are confident that he possesses the character, temperament, and intellect that will make him an asset to our Nation's highest court."

Now, the second letter is from Carolyn Williams, a partner at the venerable DC law firm, Williams & Connolly, who served on the ABA Standing Committee on the Federal judiciary. She writes that she has followed Judge Kavanaugh's legal career since 1990 when she was the hiring partner at the firm and he was a law student. Ms. Williams says, that Judge Kavanaugh "has all the qualities litigants and lawyers hope to find in a Supreme Court Justice: superb intellect and legal acumen, fundamental fairness and decency, abiding respect for precedent and the rule of law."

And I also want to enter into the record a letter—a letter and op-ed by Jay Lefkowitz. The op-ed appeared in National Review and is entitled, "Brett Kavanaugh is a Mensch." In it, Mr. Lefkowitz writes that Judge Kavanaugh "has a strong commitment to protecting Americans' freedom of religion, no matter what their faith." And Mr. Lefkowitz should know. He and Judge Kavanaugh worked together in private practice on a pro bono religious freedom case representing a Jewish synagogue in Maryland, and they won the case, vindicating the right of the congregation to build a place of worship in their neighborhood.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HATCH. Now, let me just begin with this. Before I begin, Judge, I would like to ask you to keep your answers to my questions as concise as you can so I can get through as many of them as time allows. Some of my colleagues have suggested that President Trump nominated you because he thought you would rule in his favor should certain issues come before the Court. Suppose you had a case involving President Trump or an issue near and dear to the President, what assurances can you provide that you will not allow the President's personal views on a case or personal interest to impact your decision?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am independent judge. For 12 years I have been deciding cases based on the law and the precedent in each case. If confirmed to the Supreme Court, that is how I will do it as well, be part of a Team of Nine. I will decide cases based on the Constitution, the law, the precedents of the Supreme Court working with that, the other eight Justices, without fear or favor, independently, without pressure from any quarter. And the person who has the best arguments on the law and the precedent is the person who will win in—with me.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you. If at the end of the process—of this process you are confirmed to the Supreme Court, which I expect you will be, what sort of loyalty will you owe to the—to the President? How will that loyalty differ from the loyalty you owe to, say, the American people?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, if confirmed to the Supreme Court and as a sitting judge, I owe my loyalty to the Constitution. That is what I owe loyalty to, and the Constitution establishes me as an independent judge, bound to follow the law as written, the precedents of the Supreme Court as articulated, subject to the rules of stare decisis. And I would do so.

Senator HATCH. Okay. You were appointed to the D.C. Circuit by George W. Bush. I think it is fair to say you were close to President Bush. You worked for him for a number of years. Can you give us some examples of cases in which you ruled against the Bush administration, notwithstanding that President Bush was the one who put you on the bench?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the prominent example is the Hamdan case.

Senator HATCH. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was the military commissions case. That was a signature prosecution of the Bush administration. They had established, with congressional authorization eventually after a unilateral effort did not succeed in the courts, established military commissions. The military commissions were to try al-Qaeda terrorists who had committed war crimes. And one case came to us, Salim Hamdan, and the question was, was the prosecution unlawful because the crime of which he convicted was not an identified crime as of 2001 when he was alleged to have committed it, ex post facto principles. And I wrote the opinion reversing his conviction, even though it was a signature prosecution of the United States, even though it was a national security case, because that was the right answer under the law. And it does not matter who you are, where you come from, if you are right under the law, you prevail.

Senator HATCH. I would like to turn now to your work in the Bush administration. As you know, my Democratic colleagues are demanding to see every piece of paper or every single scrap of paper you ever touched during your 6 years in the Bush administration, in part because they want to know what role, if any, you played in developing the Bush administration's interrogation policies. Well, 6 years ago, Ranking Member Feinstein, who was then the Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, and a good one at that, issued a lengthy report on the CIA's detention and interrogation program under President Bush. The report detailed the origins, development, and implementation of the program.

In 2014, a declassified version of that report was released to the public. The declassified version or report runs well over 500 pages, and your name appears nowhere in it. Now, I myself spent over 20 years on the Intelligence Committee. I know the quality of its staff and the work that they do, and I know the Ranking Member and how diligent she is. If you had played a role in the Bush administration's interrogation policies, I think the Ranking Member would have discovered it. Numerous administration lawyers appear in the report, but not you, and that should tell us something.

With that said, Judge Kavanaugh, I want you—I want to ask you for the record, what role, if any, did you play in developing or implementing the Bush administration's detention and interrogation policies?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the policies that are reflected and described in Senator Feinstein's extensive, thorough report were very controversial, as you know, Senator, the enhanced interrogation techniques.

Senator HATCH. Right. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And the legal memos that were involved in justifying some of those techniques also were very controversial when they were disclosed in 2004. And I was not involved—I was not read into that program, not involved in crafting that program nor crafting the legal justifications for that program. In addition to Senator Feinstein's report, the Justice Department did a lengthy Office of Professional Responsibility report about the legal memos that had been involved to justify some of those programs. My name is not in that report, Senator, because I was not read into that program and not involved.

There were a number of lawyers, and this came up at my last hearing, a number of lawyers who were involved, including a couple who were then judicial nominees. At my last hearing, I recall Senator Durbin asking about whether I also was likewise involved as these other judicial nominees had been, and the answer was no, and that answer was accurate, and that answer has been shown to be accurate by the Office of Professional Responsibility report, by Senator Feinstein's thorough report.

And I do want to say on Senator Feinstein's report, that is a—that is an important piece of work that collected facts about a program, that it is important for us to know those facts for the future. And I know it was an enormous effort and a lot of tough work to get all that information for Senator Feinstein and the Intelligence Committee. But I have looked through that report and looked through the Office of Professional Responsibility report. I was not read into that program, Senator. Thank you for—thank you for asking.

Senator HATCH. Okay. Judge, you have been accused of misleading this Committee during your 2006 confirmation hearing regarding your role in developing the Bush administration's detention policy. Now, you have a strong reputation in the legal community for honesty and integrity. Read any one of the dozens we received supporting your nomination, and you will see that right away. Now, some of my colleagues may not give you the opportunity to answer this question fully, so I would like to give you the opportunity now. Did you mislead this Committee in 2006? If not, what is the source of the confusion about your prior testimony?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I told the truth and the whole truth in my prior testimony. I was not read into that program. The subsequent reports of Senator Feinstein and the Office of Professional Responsibility show that. And that is what I did then, and that is the answer now. I was not read—I was not read into that program.

Senator HATCH. Okay. As I mentioned in my opening statement, 18 of your former women law clerks have written to the Committee in support of your nomination. That is all of your former women law clerks who were not precluded by their current or pending employment from signing the letter. Now, these women described the mentoring and encouragement that you have given them in their careers, and they say that you are “one of the strongest advocates in the Federal judiciary for women lawyers.” Quite a compliment. A majority of your clerks, in fact, have been women.

Now, I understand that you were the first judge in the history of the D.C. Circuit to have an all-female class of clerks. Why do you believe it important to encourage young women lawyers and to ensure that both men and women are well represented in the legal profession?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I believe in equality, equality for all Americans, men and women, also regardless of race, ethnicity. My mom was an example, as I described yesterday, of breaking barriers, showing me first on racial equality by her example of teaching at McKinley Tech. Then when she became a lawyer in the late ’70s, there were not many women prosecutors at the time, definitely male dominated, and how she overcame barriers, was a great prosecutor, became a State trial judge in Maryland appointed by Democratic Governors.

She showed me by her example the importance of women’s equality. During college—you have received a letter from 10 college friends of mine who are women, women athletes at Yale, talked about how I treated them and women’s sports with respect and as equal even when I was in college. You have a letter from 84 women I worked with in the Bush administration who talked about my efforts to work with them in the tense environment of the West Wing, especially after September 11th.

Senator HATCH. Did you say 84?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Eighty-four women signed a letter who had worked in the Bush White House—in the Bush White House and worked in that tense environment. But I came to be a judge in 2006. May 2006. And August 2006, Linda Greenhouse of The New York Times runs a story in The New York Times about the scarcity of women law clerks at the Supreme Court that year. There were seven, I believe, that year out of 37, and she wrote a story about that.

And that seemed to me very odd and unacceptable, and I started thinking about what I could do. First of all, why is that happening, and what can I do about it. What’s the problem, and what can I do. So, the problem seemed to me these networks that people—judges rely on for clerk hirings. Some professor networks were getting—were excluding women, or at least women weren’t fully represented in those. That is true with minorities as well, by the way.

And so, I made sure when I was talking to professors at law schools, I made sure—I wanted to see a broad pool of qualified—well-qualified applicants, including women. And in that year, for example, fall of 2006, which was my first year on the bench—we hire a year ahead, so I am hiring for 2007—I hired three women for that clerk class of 2007, three out of the four: Zina Bash, Brit Grant, and Porter Wilkinson. Zina is right here.

And that was the start of my efforts to make sure that women were not being excluded, and I really worked on why is this happening. So, Yale Law women did a study about 5 years ago about participation in class, the differences on who gets on in class, and there are slight differences there, men and women, who then get selected as research assistants, slight differences there. And it just keeps building until you get a disparity in the clerk network, and there is a pipeline problem.

And I said I am breaking through that problem. I am not—I am not listening to that. And so, I have been very aggressive about hiring the best and understanding the best include women. And as you say, Senator, a majority of my clerks have been women, 25. I believe 21 of them have gone on to clerk at the Supreme Court, and they are an awesome group. And if confirmed to the Supreme Court, I will continue to do this.

What it takes, and I think—my mom showed me this, President Bush showed me this a little. What it takes is just not accepting the same old answer, “Oh, there is a disparity.” Well, why? And then, do something about it. And I tried to figure out why, and we can talk about minority clerks, too. But on women, why were those disparities existed—existing as described by Linda Greenhouse, and I tried to figure out why, and then I did something about it.

I am very proud of that because I do believe that all people should be treated equally. And the law clerk position, which may sound ministerial, and, to some extent, the job is helping the judge, and shortly out of law school. But those positions are very important launching pads for the next generation of leaders, the people who will be sitting in these seats, the people who will be sitting in my seat. Lots of them are going to come from law clerks.

So, if we are not being inclusive now, that will show up later, and so, it has just been a critical part. It is something I am very focused on at all times is equality in the clerkship hiring process and making sure women are getting the same opportunities that men are. I appreciate the question, Senator.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, and I appreciate the answer, and I think everybody in this country should appreciate the answer, and I think it distinguishes you. Late last year, allegations against the former Ninth Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski surfaced when The Washington Post published an article detailing disturbing allegations of misconduct by the Judge. You clerked for Judge Kozinski for 1 year in 1991–1992. Some of your opponents have suggested that you must have known about these allegations. This seems to me to be an effort at guilty by association, which is not the way this Committee should operate in any way.

With that in mind, I want to give you a chance to answer a few questions about Judge Kozinski so that we are all operating on the same foundation of facts. First, how long have you known Judge Kozinski?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I clerked for him in 1991–1992, so I started the clerkship 27 years ago.

Senator HATCH. Second, I understand from media reports that Judge Kozinski operated an email list where he would send inappropriate material. Were you on this email list?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not remember anything like that, Senator.

Senator HATCH. How often did you talk with Judge Kozinski on the phone?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not often. Not often, Senator.

Senator HATCH. How often did you see him in person?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Again, not often. Maybe there was a legal convention or—

Senator HATCH. That is what a lot of people do not seem to understand, you know.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I was not working in the court—he was in the Pasadena courthouse in California with—a small courthouse with 10 other court of appeals judges in that courthouse. I, of course, was working in Washington, DC.

Senator HATCH. When you did see and talk with Judge Kozinski, what type of things did you talk about?

Judge KAVANAUGH. We were among the 12 co-authors of the Bryan Garner-led book on judicial precedent, so for several years that was a project all of us were—the 12 of us, I guess it was, in total were working on that: Diane Wood, Chief Judge of the Seventh Circuit.

Senator HATCH. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Justice Gorsuch was also a co-author, so we worked on that as a group. And then Justice Kennedy for the last 30 years had had Judge Kozinski his—run Justice Kennedy's law clerk hiring process, and in that—in the course of that process, I would have communications with the Judge.

Senator HATCH. Okay. Did you know anything about these allegations?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Nothing.

Senator HATCH. Okay. Before they became public last year?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. When they—when it became public, you know, the first thought I had was no woman should be subjected to sexual harassment in the workplace ever, including in the judiciary, especially in the judiciary. And when I heard, when it became public, I think it was in December, it was a gut punch. It was a gut punch for me.

Senator HATCH. It was for me, too.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It was a gut punch for the judiciary, and I was shocked and disappointed, angry, swirl of emotions. No woman should be subjected to sexual harassment in the workplace, and I applaud—Chief Justice Roberts appointed a committee of judges to establish better procedures. Chief Justice Garland did the same thing for our court, and those are first steps. I do not think they are a final steps by any stretch. And what—this is part of a much, much larger national problem of abuse and harassment, and one of the things we have learned is we need better reporting mechanisms.

Women, particularly in the workplace, need to know if they are the victim of harassment where to report it immediately, who to report it to. They need to know that they will be safe if they report it. They need to have a safe working environment and be safe if they report it. They will not be retaliated against, and they will be protected if they report it, and that is part of the steps, or one of the steps, that is, I think, being improved as a result of the working group—or, the committee that the Chief Justice has appointed.

And I am interested in doing everything I can to assist those efforts to make those workplaces safe. Again, it is part of a broader national problem whether it is priests, or teachers, or coaches, or doctors, or business people, or news people. There is a lot—there is a lot—it is a broad national problem that needs to be addressed, including in the judiciary. And I applaud Chief Justice Roberts for doing so.

Senator HATCH. Okay. I would like to talk to you now about the—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HATCH. I would like to talk to you now about the Chevron doctrine. Now, this is an important judicial doctrine that takes its name from the Supreme Court case that created it back in the 1980s. In that case, the Supreme Court instructed Federal courts to defer an agency's interpretation of the law if the law is "ambiguous." Some of your academic writings express skepticism about the Chevron doctrine, and concern that it allows an administration to impose its policy preference by avoiding the political process.

I can understand why this would be appealing to an administration, but I also think it is a threat to the separation of powers because it transfers power from Congress and the judiciary to the executive branch. That is why I have introduced the Separation of Powers Restoration Act to reverse the Chevron doctrine. Many Members of this Committee have cosponsored this legislation. And as someone who has written extensively about the separation of powers, can you tell us why the separation of powers is so important, and how it helps to protect individual freedom?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The separation of powers protects individual liberty because it responds to the concern the Framers had that—something Senator Klobuchar said yesterday from Federal 47, that the accumulation of all power in one body would be the very definition of tyranny. So, Federalist 47 talks about that, Federalist 69. So, the separation of powers, to begin with, protects individual liberty. It does so because Congress can pass the laws, but you cannot enforce the laws. A separate body has to decide to enforce the laws.

And then even if the law is enforced, a citizen may say, well, I want someone who did not pass the law or enforce it to decide whether I violated the law or whether the law is constitutional, and that is why we have an independent judiciary to guarantee, as an independent matter, our rights and liberties. And the three branches, therefore, do separate things because it all tilts toward liberty. It is hard to pass a law, as you know, in the Congress, and then even if it does get passed and affects your liberty, a separate body has to decide, usually a U.S. Attorney's office, to enforce the law, and that is a separate decision. That helps protect your liberty.

And then even if that happens, you go to a court and you say either I did not violate that law as I am accused of doing, or that law is ill—unconstitutional, or they are interpreting that law in a way that is not consistent with what the law said. The court independently decides that. It is not the Members of Congress or the Executive deciding that. That is how the Constitution's separation of powers tilts toward—toward liberty in all its respects.

Now, as to your specific question, Senator, one of the things I have seen in my experience in the executive branch and in the judicial branch is a natural tendency, but it is a natural tendency that judges need to be aware and then respond to. So, here is the natural tendency. Congress passes laws, but then does not have—cannot update the law. So, maybe it is an environmental law, or maybe it is some kind of law dealing with national security. Let us take those two examples to illustrate.

And then an executive branch agency wants to do some new policy and proposes a new policy to Congress, but Congress does not pass the new policy. What often happens, or too often I have seen, is that the executive branch then relies on the old law as a source of authority to do this new thing, and they try to say, well, the old law is ambiguous, so we can fit this new policy into the old law as justification for doing this new thing. And I have seen this in national security cases. I have seen it in environmental cases. You see it all over the place. It is a natural phenomenon because the executive branch wants to—wants to implement what it thinks is good policy.

Now, when those cases come to court, it is our job to figure out whether the executive branch has acted within the authority given to it by Congress. Have you given them the authority? And my administrative law jurisprudence is rooted in respect for Congress. Have you passed the law to give the authority? I have heard it said that I am a skeptic of regulation. I am not a skeptic of regulation at all. I am a skeptic of unauthorized regulation, of illegal regulation, of regulation that is outside the bounds of what the laws passed by Congress have said. And that is what is at the root of our administrative law jurisprudence.

Senator HATCH. Okay. One of the—one of the most important qualities I look for in a judicial nominee is the ability to impartially interpret the law and apply it to the case before the court. Now, this can often be the most difficult part of a judge's job because it may require the judge to rule against a litigant that may be sympathetic or against a policy that the judge may personally agree with. At Justice Sotomayor's confirmation hearings, Senator Schumer commended her for "hewing carefully to the text of statutes, even when doing so results in rulings that go against so-called sympathetic litigants."

Do you believe that it is important for a judge to interpret and apply the laws that Congress has actually passed rather than seeking to make up or change the law if the judge does not like what the Congress has done? And if so, why or why not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree completely, Senator. That is at the foundation of what I view as the proper judicial philosophy.

Senator HATCH. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The separation of powers system you described, we have to stick to the laws passed by Congress. You make the policy. We will follow the policy direction that you put into the laws that are enacted, passed by the House and Senate, signed by the President. We do not rewrite those laws. The executive branch also should not be rewriting those laws beyond the scope of the authority granted.

Senator HATCH. Okay. Some of my colleagues have criticized you for purportedly ruling too often against environmental interests. It seems to me that many of these circumstances boil down to the fact that some of my colleagues do not like the environmental laws Congress has actually passed, and are frustrated that they have not been able to get their own preferred environmental policies signed into law. Now, I have looked through your record, and I found that you have not hesitated at all to uphold environmental regulations when they were actually authorized by statute. Could you give us a few examples of cases where you have upheld environmental regulations because you concluded that Congress had authorized them?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Limit it to as many—few as you can. His time has run out.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, as I said yesterday, I am a pro-law judge, and in environmental cases, on some cases I have ruled against environmentalists' interests, and in many cases I have ruled for environmentalists' interest. And they are big cases, cases like the American Trucking Associations case where I upheld the California renegotiating for majority over a dissent; stricter air quality standards in the National Association of Manufacturers case; EPA rules for particulate matter in the UARG case; permanent process applicable to surface coal mining in the National Mining Association case; the Murray Energy case rejecting a premature challenge to a Clean Power Plant regulation; the National Resources Defense Council case versus EPA, ruling for environmentalist groups in a case—that was a big money case where the industry wanted an affirmative defense to be created for accidental emissions. The affirmative defense was not in the statutes passed by Congress. The industry came in with their lawyers and said, well just write the affirmative defense into the law, and I wrote the opinion saying, no, it is not in the law, and, yes, that might be a problem for industry, but we follow the law regardless.

And so, there are a large number of cases where I have ruled in favor of environmentalists' interests because that is what the law required in that case.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Judge. I appreciate it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Leahy.

Senator LEAHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good morning, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator LEAHY. You and your family. We have a lot of questions, and I know you have done a lot of preparation with some—a couple of our distinguished Republican colleagues about the questions you might be asked. But let me ask you something that normally is not an issue during Supreme Court hearings. You testified before this Committee in both 2004 and 2006 as part of your nomination to the D.C. Circuit Court. Then, you were nice enough to come by my office and chat with me last month. And I asked you if you would change anything in your prior testimony, and you said, no. Is that still your position?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is, Senator. I told the truth. I was not read into the programs—

Senator LEAHY. No, no, I am not asking about whether you did or not. I just asked if you would change anything in your—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I would like to explain if I can.

Senator LEAHY. I am going to give you a chance, but I am going to ask you a couple of questions. Go ahead.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I just wanted to explain that at the last hearing in 2006 in particular, you were concerned, understandably, because there had been two judicial nominees who had been involved in the legal memos and the legal discussions around crafting the enhanced interrogation techniques and detention policies. You were concerned whether I also was involved in those, and I made clear in response to those questions that I was not read into that program. That was a hundred percent accurate. It is still accurate today. I think Senator Feinstein's report and the Office of Professional Responsibility report established that I was not involved in those programs.

Now, there were two judicial nominees—

Senator LEAHY. Okay. I am going to go into that in a little bit. I do not want to go over my time as the preceding Senator did. I want to be—stay with—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I just want to—Senator, I just want to be clear—I want to reassure you—

Senator LEAHY. I am going to go—I am going to go into it. I am going to give you a chance to speak a lot more.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without taking—

Senator LEAHY. Well, let me—let me ask—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I am not going to take time away from you, but I want to explain something. I said yesterday that if a question is asked within the 30 minutes, that he can finish the question and it can be answered. So, I—he did not go over his time.

Senator LEAHY. Sorry, I did not mean to hit a sensitive area.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEAHY. Let me ask you this. Between 2001—I am new here.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEAHY. Between 2001 and 2003, two Republican staffers on this Committee regularly hacked into the private computer files of six Democratic Senators, including mine. These Republican staffers stole 4,670 files, and they used them to assist in getting President Bush's most controversial judicial nominees confirmed. Now, the theft by these Republican staffers became public in late 2003 when the Wall Street Journal happened to print some of the stolen materials. The ringleader behind this massive theft was a Republican staffer named Manny Miranda, who had worked for one of the Members of this Committee. In a way, it was considered by many, both Republicans and Democrats, as a digital Watergate, a theft not unlike what the Russians did in hacking the DNC.

Now, during all this, you worked hand-in-hand in the White House with Manny Miranda to advance these same nominees where he was stealing material. Not surprisingly, you were asked extensively about your knowledge of this theft during both your 2004, 2006 hearings, and I do not use the word “extensively” lightly. You were asked over 100 questions from six Senators, both Republicans and Democrats. And you testified, and you testified repeatedly, that you never received any stolen materials, you knew nothing about it until it was public. You testified that if you had suspected anything untoward, you would have reported it to the White House Counsel, who would have raised it with Senator Hatch, especially as Mr. Miranda had worked for him.

Now, at the time we left it there. We did not know any better. Today, with the very limited amount of your White House record that has been provided to this Committee, and it is limited, for the first time we have been able to learn about your relationship with Mr. Miranda and your knowledge of these events. So, my question is this: Did Mr. Miranda ever provide you with highly specific information regarding what I, or other Democratic Senators, were planning on asking certain judicial nominees?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, well, let me contextualize because I am looking at what you are putting up here first.

Senator LEAHY. The question—

Judge KAVANAUGH. That—what is up there is a hundred percent accurate. As my memory.

Senator LEAHY. Okay. So, let me ask you this. That is—

Judge KAVANAUGH. “Never knew or suspected,” true. “Never suspected anything untoward,” true. “Had I suspected something untoward, I would have talked to Judge Gonzales”——

Senator LEAHY. And I have already——

Judge KAVANAUGH. “I would have talked to Senator Hatch.” That is all a hundred percent true.

Senator LEAHY. And that is what I had already said. But, did Mr. Miranda ever provide you with highly specific information regarding what I, or other Democratic Senators, were planning in the future to ask certain judicial nominees?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, one of the things we would do as a White House is, on judicial nominations—and I am coming to your answer, but I want to explain—is to meet up here, and this happens on both sides all the time, with teams up here about, okay, their judicial nominations: our judicial nominees are coming up, how are we going to get them through, here’s a hearing coming up. And during those meetings, of course, it would be discussed, well, I think here is what Senator Leahy is going to be interested in. That is very common. I am sure in President Obama’s administration when they had similar meetings, they would probably have meetings and say, well, I think this is what Senator Graham will be interested in. That is what you do in meetings with—so, “highly specific” would, I think—I am not sure what you are getting at by “highly specific.”

Senator LEAHY. Judge, I have been here over 40 years. I know—I know what both Republicans and Democratic administrations do in preparing. I am not asking about that. I am asking you why, before this, did Mr. Miranda send you an email asking you, on July 19th, 2002, asking you and another Bush official why the Leahy people were looking into financial ties between two special interest groups and Priscilla Owen, a particular, controversial nominee to the Fifth Circuit. You had handled the Owen nomination. As you know, as a judge she had received a lot of contributions. Did Mr. Miranda send you an email asking you why the Leahy people were looking into her financial ties?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Is that what this email is?

Senator LEAHY. I am just asking you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Could I take a minute to read it?

Senator LEAHY. Of course.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator LEAHY. And this says it was 4 days before her hearing on July 23rd.

[Brief pause.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Did I send any of the emails on this chain? I do not think so. I think I am cc'd. In any event, if he said why are the Leahy people looking into this—from Manny Miranda—I do not really have a specific recollection of any this, Senator, but it would have been—it would not have been at all unusual for—and this happens all the time I think, which is, the Leahy people are looking into this, and the Hatch people are looking into that, I think.

Senator LEAHY. You say, “all the time.” Two days before the hearing, he told you that the Democrats were passing around a related “60 Minutes” story, and he said his “intel—intelligence suggests that Leahy will focus on all things money.” Well, that appears to come from a stolen email to me—stolen by the Republican staff member, sent to me the night before, and then given to you the next morning. Were you aware that you were getting, from Mr. Miranda, stolen emails?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not at all, Senator. It was part of what appeared to be standard discussion about—it is common, Senator, for—at the White House, it would be common to hear from our Leg Affairs team. This is, in fact, in this process, that is common to hear, “This is what Senator X is interested in.” “This is what Senator Y is going to focus”——

Senator LEAHY. Was it common to have copies of a private email sent to a particular Senator?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Copies of a private email sent to a particular Senator?

Senator LEAHY. Yes. Would that not jump out at you? For example——

Judge KAVANAUGH. What are you referring to?

Senator LEAHY. Well, Mr. Miranda is telling you about emails sent to me the night before. There would be no way that he would even have that unless he stole it. Did that raise any question in your mind?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Did he refer to that email in this?

Senator LEAHY. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Where is that, Senator?

Senator LEAHY. I will let you read it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I am not seeing where you are—I am not seeing what you are referring to.

Senator LEAHY. Okay. Well, let me take you to one that you do have because you have this information from Mr. Miranda. And the very limited amount of material that the Republicans are allowing us to see of your information about you, that at least did come through. But in January 2003, let me go to something very specific. Mr. Miranda forwarded you a letter from me and other Judiciary Democrats to then-Majority Leader Tom Daschle. The letter was clearly a draft. It had typos and it was not signed. Somebody eventually—we never put it out, but somebody eventually leaked the existence of it to Fox News. I am not sure who. I could guess. It was a private letter. At the time, I was shocked to learn of its existence had been leaked.

But here is the thing. You had the full text of my letter in your inbox before anything had been said about it publicly. Did you find it at all unusual to receive a draft letter from Democratic Senators to each other before any mention of it was made public?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the only thing I said on the email exchange, if I am looking at it correctly, Senator, was “Who signed this,” which would imply that I thought it was a signed letter.

Senator LEAHY. It was sent to you. Were you surprised to get it? I mean, it is obviously a draft. It has got typos and everything in it. Were you surprised the draft letter circulated among Democrats ended up in your inbox from Mr. Miranda?

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I think the premise of your question is not accurately describing my apparent recollection or understanding of it at the time because I would not have said, “Who signed this” if it was a—if I thought it was a draft, and my email says, “Who signed this.”

Senator LEAHY. So, you did not realize what you had was a stolen letter signed by—signed by me, that you had a letter that had not been sent to anybody, had not been made public?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, all I see that I said was, “Who signed this.” That is all I see.

Senator LEAHY. Well, let me ask you some more because so much of this came from Mr. Miranda, who was a Republican staffer who was, as we now know, stealing things. Did he ever ask to meet privately with you in an offsite location somewhere other than the White House or Capitol Hill?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think sometimes, Senator, that the meetings with Senate staffers and White House and Justice Department—

Senator LEAHY. I am just asking you about one particular one, Mr. Miranda.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, sometimes—usually it would be either at the White House or the Senate, but I think sometimes we would meet—or DOJ, but sometimes it could be somewhere else.

Senator LEAHY. Well, did he ask to meet with you privately so he could give you information about Senator Biden and Senator Feinstein?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not remembering anything specific, that is certainly possible. And, again, Senator, I just want to be clear here because it is very common when you are in the judicial selection process to determine what are all the Senators interested in for an upcoming nominee or an upcoming hearing. That is the coin of the realm. Senator X is interested in focusing on administrative law. Senator Y is going to ask about environmental law. Senator is concerned about your past work for this client. And that is a very common kind of discussion.

Senator LEAHY. Did he ever ask to have you meet him not at the White House, not in the—at the Capitol, but at his home?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not remember that.

Senator LEAHY. Okay. Did he ever ask you to meet you outside of the White House or the Capitol?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I cannot rule that out, but, again, that would not have been typical.

Senator LEAHY. Did he—did he ever hand you material separately from what would be emailed back and forth?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not remembering—if you are referring to something in particular, I can answer that.

Senator LEAHY. Well, let me ask you this. Did you ever receive information via Mr. Miranda of information marked, “Confidential” that informed you, or my staff was sharing with, other Democrats?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know the answer to that, Senator, but, again, people on the—it is not always the case, at least my understanding, that the—that the people—for example, your staff and Senator Hatch’s staff were necessarily working at odds. It seemed like a lot of times the staff was cooperating at times, not at other times, obviously, but at times about judicial nominations. And so, it would not have raised anything in particular in my mind if we learned, oh, Senator Leahy is concerned about this.

Senator LEAHY. Did my staff ever send you confidential material from Senator Hatch that was stolen from his emails?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not the last part, but the—I certainly did talk to your when we working on the airline bill—on the September 20th, 2001 airline bill. I do remember being here all night one night with your staff, and I am sure we did talk that night about what other Senators thought. And that was the airline bill where, as I think you recall, Speaker Hastert was involved, and we were up there with the OMB team. So, and that—I worked hard with your staff on that.

It just struck me as very—as not uncommon at all to be talking with our leg team about what Senators on both sides thing. I did not strike me that it was always armed camps.

Senator LEAHY. But, no, and oftentimes it was not. But here you are getting obviously very private Democratic emails. You were not concerned how Mr. Miranda got them?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I guess I am not sure about your premise.

Senator LEAHY. Were you at all concerned about—

Judge KAVANAUGH. The draft—

Senator LEAHY [continuing]. Where Mr. Miranda got some of the material he was showing you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not recall that, but on the premise of your last question, I want to—I want to step back to that. I am not sure I agree with the premise.

Senator LEAHY. I was just saying, if you are getting something that is marked “Confidential,” would you not assume that is not something being shared back and forth?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Unless it was shared. I mean, this is the thing, if a staffer said here is what we are sending to—you all should be aware of this because we are going to make a—we are going to be really opposed to this judicial nominee. It seemed—so, just to be clear, it seemed to me sometimes there were judicial nominees you were very opposed to, sometimes you were supportive of, sometimes in between, and there would be messages passed back and forth and sharing of information. Very cooperative, as I recall.

Senator LEAHY. Well, I—

Judge KAVANAUGH. You were transparent, in other words. When you are—when you had problems with a nominee's, I recall, transparency, and when you were supportive. You were at the May 9th, 2001 event at the White House, I recall, where the President announced his first 11 court of appeals nominees, and you were supportive of many of them.

Senator LEAHY. Well, as you know—you know, it is a fact I voted for a lot of Republican nominees.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator LEAHY. Both to the Supreme Court, the courts of appeals—and the district court.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator LEAHY. But when I have opposed one, like with Judge Owen, when I was raising some varied questions about funding that she was getting from people that were before her court, that might have raised a red flag that I had some concerns about her. Now, when you worked at the White House, did anyone ever tell you they had a mole that provided them with secret information related to nominations?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not recall the reference to a mole, which sounds highly specific, but certainly it is common—again, the people behind you can probably refer to this. But it is common, I think, for everyone to talk each other at times and share information. At least this was my experience—this is 20 years ago almost—where you would talk to people on the Committee.

Senator LEAHY. So, you never received an email from a Republican staff member with information claiming to come from spying, a Democratic mole?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not—I am not going to rule anything out, Senator, but if I did, I would not have thought that—I would not have thought the literal meaning of that.

Senator LEAHY. Would it have surprised you that—if you got an email saying you got that from somebody spying on the Democratic—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, is there such an email, Senator?

Senator LEAHY. Well, we would have to ask the Chairman what he has in his confidential material.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But here is the—if you are referring to something particular. Here is what I know.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Just stop a minute here. Reference twice in your 30 minutes, and do not take this off of his time, you made reference—you made reference. You are talking about the period of time that he was White House Counsel.

Senator LEAHY. Yes.

Chairman GRASSLEY. That material is available to everybody.

Senator LEAHY. So, that bit of material about him that is marked “committee confidential” is now public and available? Is that what you are saying? If that is what the Chairman is saying, we got a whole new series of questions.

Chairman GRASSLEY. No, not if it—

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Not if it is “committee confidential.” But you have access to it.

Senator LEAHY. Not, so I—

Chairman GRASSLEY. But do not forget, 80 percent of the material we have gotten from the library is on the website of the Judiciary Committee, so the public has access to it. Proceed.

Senator LEAHY. I want—I want Judge Kavanaugh to have access so that we can ask him these questions under oath and he can see them. So, I would ask the—and we will have another round, but I would ask the Chairman if he might look at some of these that are marked “committee confidential,” which limits the ability of us to ask you specifically and hand you the specific emails. But I would state on what has been public—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let me answer that for you. There is only one Democratic Senator asked for access to that. Senator Klobuchar got it. If you are interested in it, you could have been asking ever since August the 25th, I believe.

Senator LEAHY. We have been asking to have that—those made public. I do not—I am not interested—if I see this in a closed room where I cannot talk about it. I want Judge Kavanaugh to see the emails which came from Mr. Miranda and—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Give us a citation of the documents, and we will get them for you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That testimony up there is true, a hundred percent.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Can somebody read it? I cannot see it.

Senator LEAHY. Well, of course, it would be helpful if we allowed the National Archives time to complete their review.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I just want to reassure you, Senator, because you are asking important questions. I want to reassure that what you have got up on the board is a hundred percent accurate.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Can somebody move it so we can see it here?

Senator LEAHY. Well, I am concerned because there is evidence that Mr. Miranda provided you with materials that were stolen from me, and that would contradict your prior testimony. It is also clear from public emails, and I am restraining from not going into the non-public ones, that you have reason to believe materials were obtained inappropriately at the time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are at least six documents that you consider committee confidential that are directly related to this. Just like the three documents I shared that are already public, these other six contain no personal information, no Presidential records, restrictive material. There is simply no reason they cannot be made public. I hope they will be before this next round. You know, it is difficult when to ask a question, I have to ask Republicans, will you allow me to ask a question. I certainly never did that when I was Chairman.

Now, I asked you in 2006 whether you had seen any documents related to President Bush's NSA warrantless wiretapping program, or whether you had heard anything about it. You answered you learned about it with the rest of us in December 2005 when The New York Times reported it. Now, I know it has been 12 years, so here is the video of your sworn testimony. It should be on the TV screens.

[Video is shown.]

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, can I—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Can I—again, do not take this time away from him. Now, as far as I know in 15 hearings, so I am going to read something in just a minute, but preface it with this. As far as I know, in 15 hearings that I have been involved in of Supreme Court Justices, there has never been such a video shown. So, this is precedential, I want to read this: "The use of a video at a confirmation is highly irregular, but I see no reason my colleagues cannot use a video that was provided by the nominee himself in response to the Senate questionnaire." I have been assured that the video is from Judge Kavanaugh's submission to the Committee. Based on this assurance, we have allowed this video to be shown.

But I want to emphasize that I expect that video to be used fairly. The video clip should not be presented in a way that deprives it of relevant context. This is consistent with requirements in Federal court. That is why I will insist that Judge Kavanaugh have the opportunity before he answers this question to request if any additional video be played, if it provided appropriate context. So, Judge Kavanaugh, I would ask you, do you believe that more context is needed to be able to address the question?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I do not think I have heard the question yet, but I will let you know when I hear the question.

Senator LEAHY. Let me—let me ask you this. I will repeat the question asked before. You said that you heard about this with the rest of us in December 2005. You said, on there, that you had no knowledge of anything related to this until The New York Times article. Now we have a declassified Inspector General report that, on September 17th, which was before the—several months before The New York Times article, John Yoo issued a memo on surveillance of the White House that helped form the legal underpinnings of the NSA warrantless wiretapping program.

When you were in the White House in 2001, did you ever work with John Yoo on the constitutional implications of a warrantless surveillance program?

Judge KAVANAUGH. We are talking about a lot of different things, Senator, here.

Senator LEAHY. Warrantless surveillance program.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is talking about a lot of different things. So, what you were asking about right there was the specific—what President Bush called the terrorist surveillance program. That was his name for it.

Senator LEAHY. Which is a warrantless surveillance program.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Along with many others, and that is—you were asking me about the terrorist surveillance program, TSP, I think he called it. That story was broken. That testimony is a hundred percent accurate. That story was broken in The New York Times. I had not been read into that program, and when it came in The New York Times, I actually still remember my exact reaction when I read that story. And then the President, that Saturday, I believe, did a live radio address to explain to the country what that program was about. There was a huge controversy, and so, everyone was then working on getting the speech together. And you asked me if I learned about it before then. I said “no,” and that is accurate.

Senator LEAHY. Okay. When you were in the White House, did you ever work with John Yoo on the constitutional implications of any warrantless surveillance program?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I cannot rule that—right in the wake of September 11th, it was all hands on deck on all fronts, and then we were—we were farming out assignments, but we were all involved. On September 12th when we came in—let us just back up. On September 12th when we came into the White House, it was—you know, we have to work on everything. And so, then over time people figured out what issues they were going to work on. You know, the airline bill that I was up here on September 20th when President Bush spoke to Congress that night, as you recall. And then after that, we were in the meeting room together, you and I and others, working on the airline bill, but there were all sorts of other things going on. The Patriot Act was going on.

Senator LEAHY. I was involved with all of those—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, I know—

Senator LEAHY [continuing]. And I remember the discussions. But what I want to know, did you ever raise questions about warrantless surveillance?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I cannot rule anything out like that. There was so much going on in the wake of September 11th, Senator, as you recall, up here, too, but in the White House, in particular, and in the Counsel’s Office, in particular. We had eight lawyers in there. Eight or nine as I recall. And there were so many issues to consider for the President and for the legal team, and those issues—like I said, for President Bush, every day for the next 7 years was September 12th, 2001. You know, for the legal team there was a lot—

Senator LEAHY. For a lot of us it was.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator LEAHY. Mr. Chairman, I sent a letter, along with Senators Feinstein and Durbin, August 16th of this year, asking we make documents related to this issue public. Without them being public, it is not fair to me and it is not fair to Judge Kavanaugh that I cannot hand him the actual documents, which I think would refresh his memory. And I would ask again, you might look at that before my next turn, can we make those public?

Chairman GRASSLEY. You tell us what documents you want, and I will make them available to you, but I cannot say that they can be made public. Just as I said last year during Justice Gorsuch’s confirmation, I put a process in place that will allow my colleagues to obtain the public release of confidential documents for use during the hearing. All I ask was my colleagues to identify the documents they intended to use, and I would work to get the Department of Justice and former President Bush to agree to waive restrictions on the documents.

Senator Feinstein secured the public release of 19 documents last year under this process, and Senator Klobuchar secured the release of four documents this year. If my colleagues truly believe that other committee confidential documents should have been made public, they never told me about that.

Senator LEAHY. Well—

Chairman GRASSLEY. So, let us know what you want, and then you can—you can go ahead and we will get them for you.

Senator LEAHY. I want the same thing that I requested in August—on August 16th because it is directly relevant to Judge Kavanaugh's testimony, directly relevant to his—to the questions I have been asking here, and directly relevant to his own emails with John Yoo. So, I would—before my next turn, if we could take a look at that.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Well, we will get them for you for your next turn tomorrow.

Senator LEAHY. Now, may—you said everyone agrees the pardon prerogatives of a President, absolute, unfettered, unchecked power to pardon every violator of every Federal law. If the President issued a pardon in exchange for a bribe, "yes" or "no"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think that question has been litigated before, and I do not want to comment about—

Senator LEAHY. Well, let me ask you this.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Scope of the pardon, the scope about—there are a couple—there are a couple of things involved in that question. One is what is the scope—what is the effect of the pardon, and the other question is, can you be separately charged with the bribery crime, both the briber and the bribee, and those are two distinct questions. You would want to—you would want to keep those two questions separate in thinking about how the hypothetical—

Senator LEAHY. Well, then in that, the—

[Gavel is tapped.]

Senator LEAHY. Mr. Chairman, you know, I got interrupted an awful lot during my—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, okay.

Senator LEAHY. I just want to finish this question.

Chairman GRASSLEY. But I—but I made sure that if the timer did not treat—well, give him another minute.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEAHY. Thank you. God bless you. I will be forever thankful.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEAHY. President Trump claims he has an absolute right to pardon himself. Does he?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The question of self-pardons is something I have never analyzed. It is a question that I have not written about. It is a question, therefore, that is a hypothetical question that I cannot begin to answer in this context as a sitting judge and as a nominee to the Supreme Court.

Senator LEAHY. And the other half of that is the obvious one. Does the President have the ability to pardon somebody in exchange for a promise from that person they would not testify against him?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not going to answer hypothetical questions of that sort, and there is a good reason for it. When we get—judges do not—when we decide, we get briefs and arguments of the parties. We have a record. We have an appendix with all the information. We have amicus briefs and then—I never—I never decide anything alone. I am on a panel of three, and if I am confirmed to the Supreme Court I would be on a Team of Nine.

Senator LEAHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I hope for the sake of the country that remains a hypothetical question. Thank you very much.

Chairman GRASSLEY. And since I gave you an extra minute, I am not going to let you reserve the 25 seconds.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEAHY. I am done.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you very much.

July 21, 1993: “I certainly do not want you to have to lay out a test here in the abstract which might determine what your vote or your test would be in a case you have yet to see that may well come before the Supreme Court.”

That was wise counsel by Senator Leahy in the Ginsburg confirmation.

Very directly, did you ever knowingly participate in stealing anything from Senator Leahy or any other Senator?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator GRAHAM. Did you ever know that you were dealing with anything that was stolen property?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator GRAHAM. As to the terrorist surveillance program, did you help create this program?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator GRAHAM. Did you give legal advice about it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. We are referring to the same program I was talking about?

Senator GRAHAM. Yes, yes. The one that the article was about.

So a bit of a kind of run-through here. You are probably going to get 55 votes, I do not know, 54 to 56 or 57. I do not know what the number will be. There were 11 undecided Senators before the hearing, 3 of them Republicans—I like your chances—8 of them are Democrat. You are in play with about five or six of them. And I just want you and your family to know that in other times someone like you would probably get 90 votes. I want your daughters to know that what happened yesterday is unique to the times that we live in. And I want to give you a chance to say some things to the people who have attended this hearing.

I think there is a father of a Parkland student who was killed. I think there is a mother of a child who has got terrible health care problems. And there are many other people here with personal situations.

What would you like to say to them, if anything, about your job as a Supreme Court Justice?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I understand the real-world effects of our decisions. In my job as a judge for the last 12 years, I have gone out of my way in my opinions and in oral arguments, if you listen to oral arguments, to make clear to everyone before me that I understand the situation, the circumstances, the facts, for example, as I was saying to Senator Feinstein earlier, in the Heller II case about the facts in DC. And I want to reassure everyone that I base my decisions on the law, but I do so with an awareness of the facts and an awareness of the real-world consequences, and I have not lived in a bubble, and I understand how passionately people feel about particular issues, and I understand how personally people are affected by issues. And I understand the difficulties that people have in America.

I understand, for example—well, to start, I understand the situation of homeless people because I see them on a regular basis when I am serving meals and—

Senator GRAHAM. So tell me about that. What interaction do you have with homeless people?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I regularly serve meals at Catholic Charities at 10th and G with Father John Enzler, who is the head of Catholic Charities DC, and I have known since I was 9 years old when I was an altar boy. He was at Little Flower Parish. And what you learn when you are—I said, I am a Matthew 25, try to follow the lesson of serving the least fortunate among us. You know, when I was hungry, you gave me food; thirsty, you gave me drink; stranger and you welcomed me; naked and you clothed me; sick and you cared for me; imprisoned and you visited me. Six groups that—that is not exclusive, but that is a good place to start with your charitable works in your private time.

Senator GRAHAM. So describe the difference between Brett Kavanaugh, the man, and Brett Kavanaugh, the Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as a man, I am trying to do what I can in community service, as a dad, as a coach, as a volunteer, as a teacher, as a husband, and serving meals to the homeless. The one thing, Senator, you know, we are all God's children. We are all equal. People have gotten there because maybe they have a mental illness; maybe they had a terrible family situation; maybe they did not have anyone to care for them; maybe they lost a job and had no family. But every person you serve a meal to is just as good as me, or better, frankly, because they have—what they have had to go through on a daily basis just to get a meal. And you talk to them. That is the other thing. When you are walking by the street, you see people—and I understand—I am sure I have done this. I am not—I do not want to sound better than someone in describing this, but you do not necessarily look and you do not say, "How is it going?" But when you serve meals to them, you talk to people who are homeless, and they are just as human and just as good a people as all of us. You know, we are all part of one community, and so I think about that. You know, I do not want to sound like I am—I can always do more and more, and do better. I know I fall short. But Father John has been a big influence on that, and thinking about others.

So that is as a person. I try to do—Washington Jesuit Academy, so I tutor up there. I am now on the board of Washington Jesuit Academy. That is a little different situation. Those are low-income—boys from low-income families, a tuition-free school, one of these 7:30 a.m. to 7 schools. And I started tutoring up there because I wanted to do some more tutoring and just be involved more. Judging is important, but I wanted to be more directly involved in the community. They have tutoring. You do all your homework there because it was a situation, you do not want to go home and have anything else to do. You get three meals there, and you do your homework there. And I help them do their homework, and you see these great kids, and they are in a structured environment, and you make an effect on their lives.

And like I said yesterday, the teachers and coaches throughout America, they change lives. And for me to be able to participate—you know, you cannot change everything at once, but just changing one life, one meal 1 day at the shelter or one kid that remembers something you said in a tutoring program, you know, if we all did that more—and I fall short, too, I know, and I want to do more on that front. But you can make a big difference in people's lives.

I would just bring that into the judging. I think—I judge based on the law, but how does that affect me as a judge? I think, first of all, just standing in the shoes of others. We could all be that homeless person. We could all be that kid who needs a more structured educational environment. And one of the things I was taught by my mom, but also I remember Chris Abell, my sixth-grade English teacher and religion teacher and football coach and baseball coach, one of his—and he drove me to school. One of his—and he is now on the board of Washington Jesuit Academy with me. But one of his lessons in “To Kill a Mockingbird” was to stand in the shoes of others. And I still have the “To Kill a Mockingbird” that we used in sixth grade. It is in my chambers still, the same copy.

Senator GRAHAM. Is it fair to say that your job as a judge is to not so much stand in the shoes of somebody you are sympathetic to, but stand in the shoes of the law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. You are in the shoes of the law, but with awareness of the impacts of your decisions.

Senator GRAHAM. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And that is the critical distinction. You cannot be unaware. When you write an opinion, how is it going to affect people?

Senator GRAHAM. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And understand, try to explain. I think, you know, it is—explaining is such an important feature, and then when people come into the courtroom, and how you treat litigants. So we are all familiar—we have all been in courtrooms where the judge is acting a little too full of being a judge and too—well, we have all been there. I try not to do that. I cannot say I am perfect, but I try to make sure the litigants understand that I get it, whether it is a criminal defendant case—we had a pro se case, a pro se case where a litigant comes in and argues pro se in our court, which rarely happens in our court where the pro se actually argues. And it was a guy who said he had been called the “N” word by his supervisor. And he is arguing pro se, and the question is whether a single instance of the “N” word constitutes racial harassment under the civil rights laws. And I wrote a separate opinion explaining, yes, a single instance of the “N” word does constitute a racially hostile work environment. And I explained—in doing that, I explained the history of racism in this country and how that word—no other word in the English language so powerfully or instantly calls to mind our country’s long and brutal struggle against racism, I wrote in that opinion. And I cited “To Kill a Mockingbird” in that opinion, among other things.

But what I wanted to make clear by bringing this example up is I understood his situation. I tried to understand what that would be like, and I decided the case based on the law, but I understood with the pro se litigant, the point being I always try to be aware of the facts and circumstances.

Senator GRAHAM. Have you ever made a legal decision that personally was upsetting to you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I am sure I have, and that is what Justice Kennedy talked about in Texas v. Johnson. That case, in case people did not know what I was referring to in Texas v. Johnson, that is the flag-burning case. Justice Kennedy was in the majority with Justice Scalia and Justice Brennan and Justice Marshall and says that a law against flag burning is unconstitutional under the First Amendment. And that obviously tore Justice Kennedy—you know, it really bothered him because he is such a patriot. But he still ruled the way he did because he read the First Amendment to compel that result, and that is why he wrote that great concurrence in that case. And that concurrence is such a great model for judging, a great model of independence and a great model, to your point, Senator Graham, of we follow the law but we are aware—we are aware, and you are a better judge if you are aware.

Senator GRAHAM. Well, I just want to say this to my colleagues. Everything he said I think has been verified by the people who know him the best. I cannot say I have read 307 of your opinions. I can tell you without hesitation I have not. I did not read Sotomayor’s opinions or Kagan’s writings. But what I chose to do was look at the people who knew them the best, and I think Bob Bennett, who defended President Clinton during impeachment—I know him very well—said that Brett is “a judge’s judge, someone doing his absolute best to follow the law rather than his policy preferences. Brett is an all-star in both his professional and his personal life.”

I have yet to find anybody that I find credible, really anybody at all, that would suggest that you were unfair to litigants. I have yet to find a colleague that thought you were a politician in a robe. But you are a Republican. Is that true?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I registered—

Senator GRAHAM. Was. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. The only reason—I am glad to hear you say that. It makes a lot of sense given who you worked for.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have not—well, I will let you finish your question.

Senator GRAHAM. You worked for a lot of Republicans.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. Like the President, who was a Republican.

Judge KAVANAUGH. President Bush I worked for, yes.

Senator GRAHAM. So that—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator GRAHAM. So I remember—I remember—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator GRAHAM. I will tell you what I remember when she leaves.

So, I asked Elena Kagan about a statement that Greg Craig made. Do you know Greg Craig, by any chance?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have met him. I have not seen him in many years, but yes.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator GRAHAM. He was one of the defenders of President Clinton during the impeachment hearing, and somewhere in here I have got Greg Craig's statement about Kagan. I am looking for Greg Craig's statement.

Here we go. Here is what—"Kagan was a progressive in the mold of Obama himself." "Elena Kagan is clearly a legal progressive and comes from the progressive side of the spectrum," according to Ronald Klein. The first was Greg Craig.

And I had an exchange with Justice Kagan when she was the nominee: "I am not trying to trick you. I do not have anything on Greg. He said, on May 16th, that you are largely progressive in the mold of Obama himself. Do you agree with that?"

Ms. Kagan, "Senator Graham, you know, in terms of my political views, I have been a Democrat all my life. I worked for two Democrat Presidents, and that is what my political views are."

And I asked, "Would you consider your political views progressive?"

Ms. Kagan, "My political views are generally progressive."

Which is true. I really appreciate what she said, because I expect President Obama to go to someone like Elena Kagan who is progressive, shares his general view of judging, and who happened to be highly qualified.

Sotomayor. President Obama nominated Sotomayor because he wanted someone whose philosophy of judging was his—which, as applied to the law and constitutional principles was, be ready to adopt them to a modern context. So President Obama nominated Sotomayor because he wanted someone whose philosophy of judging was his.

I expect that to happen. If Donald Trump is President in 2020, he will be our next President. If it is somebody else, I expect that to happen.

To my colleagues on the other side, what do you really expect? You should celebrate, even though you do not vote for him—and I do not know why you would not—the quality of the man chosen by President Obama. Elena Kagan and Sotomayor came from the progressive wing of the judging world and of legal thought. They are absolutely highly qualified, good, decent people, and they got—let me see if I can find the vote totals. Ms. Kagan got 63 votes and Sonia Sotomayor got 68. It is going to bother me that you do not get those numbers. But what bothers me is, they should have gotten 90. They should have gotten 95. Anthony Kennedy got 97. Antonin Scalia got 98. Ruth Bader Ginsburg got 96. So what is happening? Between then and now, advise and consent has taken on a different meaning.

It used to be the understanding of this body that elections have consequences, and you would expect the President who won the election to pick somebody of their philosophy. I promise you that when Strom Thurmond voted for Ruth Bader Ginsburg, he did not agree with her legal philosophy. And I doubt if Senator Leahy agreed with Justice Scalia. Senator Leahy has voted for a lot of Republicans. I have voted for everyone presented since I have been here because I find them to be highly qualified, coming from backgrounds I would expect the President in question to choose from.

So, as to your qualifications, how long have you been a judge?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have been a judge for 12 years.

Senator GRAHAM. How many opinions have you written?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have written over 300 opinions.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Do you think there is a lot we can learn from those opinions if we spent time looking at them?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. I am very proud of my opinions, as I mentioned, and I tell people do not just read about the opinions. Read the opinions. I am very proud of them.

Senator GRAHAM. You were nominated by President Trump on July the 9th, my birthday, which I thought was a pretty good birthday present for somebody who thinks like I do—and I think that may have something to do with that—at 9 o'clock. By 9:23, Chuck Schumer says, "I will oppose Judge Kavanaugh." By 9:25, Senator Harris, "Trump Supreme Court Justice nominee Judge Kavanaugh represents a direct and fundamental threat to the rights and health care of hundreds of millions of Americans. I will oppose his nomination."

Elizabeth Warren at 9:55, "Brett Kavanaugh's record as a judge and a lawyer is clear, hostile to health care for millions, opposed the CFPB, corporate accountability, thinks President Trump is above the law," on and on and on.

Nancy Pelosi at 10:11, Bernie Sanders at 10:18, "If Brett Kavanaugh is confirmed to the Supreme Court, it will have a profoundly negative effect on workers' rights, women's rights, and voting rights for the decades to come."

All I can say, within an hour and 18 minutes of your nomination, you became the biggest threat to democracy in the eyes of some of the most partisan people in the country who would hold Kagan and Sotomayor up as highly qualified and would challenge any Republican dare vote against them. You live in unusual times, as I do. You should get more than 90 votes, but you will not. And I am sorry it has gotten to where it has. It is got nothing to do about you.

If you do not mind—and you do not have to—what did you tell your children yesterday about the hearing?

Judge KAVANAUGH. They did as they—I will tell what they told me. I do not think—they gave me a big hug and said, "Good job, Daddy." And Margaret, before she went to bed, made a special trip down and said, "Give me a special hug."

Senator GRAHAM. I just wish we could have a hearing where the nominee's kids could show up. Is that asking too much?

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator GRAHAM. So what kind of country have we become? None of this happened just a couple years ago. It is getting worse and worse and worse, and all of us have an obligation to try to correct it where we can.

Roe v. Wade, are you familiar with the case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am, Senator.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. Can you, in 30 seconds, give me the general holding of Roe v. Wade?

Judge KAVANAUGH. As elaborated upon in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, a woman has a constitutional right, as interpreted by the Supreme Court under the Constitution, to obtain an abortion up to the point of viability, subject to reasonable regulations by the State, so long as those reasonable regulations do not constitute an undue burden on the woman's right.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. As to how the system works, can you sit down with five—you and four other judges and overrule Roe v. Wade just because you want to?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, Roe v. Wade is an important precedent of the Supreme Court. It has been reaffirmed—

Senator GRAHAM. But do you not have to have a case as a—I mean, you just cannot—“What are you doing for lunch?” “Let us overrule Roe v. Wade.” It does not work that way, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I see what you are asking, Senator. Right. The way cases come up to us in that context or in other contexts would be a law is passed—

Senator GRAHAM. Can I give you an example? Because I can do this quicker.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. So some State somewhere or some town somewhere passes a law that runs into the face of Roe. Somebody will object. They will go to lower courts, and eventually it might come up to the Supreme Court challenging the foundations of Roe v. Wade. It would take some legislative enactment for that to happen. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator GRAHAM. If there was such an action by a State or a local government challenging Roe and it came before the Supreme Court, would you listen to both sides?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I listen to both sides in every case, Senator. I have for 12 years, yes.

Senator GRAHAM. When it comes to overruling a longstanding precedent of the Court, is there a formula that you use, an analysis?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, first of all, you start with the notion of precedent. And as I have said to Senator Feinstein, in this context this is a precedent that has been reaffirmed many times over 45 years, including in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, where they specifically considered whether to overrule, and reaffirmed and applied all the stare decisis factors. So that importantly became precedent on precedent in this context. But you look at—there are factors you look at whenever you are considering any precedent.

Senator GRAHAM. So there is a process in place that the Court has followed for a very long time. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Citizens United, if somebody said Citizens United has been harmful to the country and made a record that the effects of Citizens United has empowered about 20 or 30 people in the country to run all the elections, and some State or locality somewhere passed a ban on soft money, and it got to the Court, would you at least listen to the argument that Citizens United needs to be revisited?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of course. I listen to all arguments. You have an open mind. You get the briefs and arguments. And some arguments are better than others. Precedent is critically important. It is the foundation of our system. But you listen to all arguments.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Where were you on September 11, 2001?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Initially, I was in my then office in the EOB, and then after the first, as I recall, as the first building was hit, I was in the Counsel's office on the second floor of the West Wing for the next few minutes. Then we were all told to go down to the bottom of the West Wing. And then we were all evacuated, and I think the thought was Flight 93 might have been heading for the White House. It might have been heading here. And Secret Service—we were being hustled out, and then kind of panic, started screaming at us, "Sprint," "Run," and we sprinted out. My wife was a few steps ahead of me. She was President Bush's personal aide at the time, and we sprinted out. She was wearing a black and white checked shirt, I remember, and we sprinted out the front gate kind of into Lafayette Park, and no iPhones or anything like that, BlackBerrys, at that point in time, we did not have that, and our cell phones did not work, so we were all just kind of out there. And then I remember somehow ending up seeing on TV—down more on Connecticut Avenue there were TVs out, Mayflower Hotel. I remember I was with Sara Taylor who worked at the White House, and we watched—we were watching as the—I was standing with her when the two—when the two buildings—when the buildings fell.

Senator GRAHAM. So when somebody says post-9/11, that we have been at war and it is called the "War on Terrorism," do you generally agree with that concept?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do, Senator, because Congress passed the Authorization for Use of Military Force, which is still in effect, and that was passed, of course, on September 14, 2001, 3 days later.

Senator GRAHAM. Let us talk about the law and war. Is there a body of law called "the law of armed conflict"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There is such a body, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Is there a body of law that is called "basic criminal law"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Are there differences between those two bodies of law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. From an American citizen's point of view, do your constitutional rights follow you? If you are in Paris, does the Fourth Amendment protect you as an American from your own Government?

Judge KAVANAUGH. From your own Government, yes.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. So, if you are in Afghanistan, do your constitutional rights protect you against your own Government?

Judge KAVANAUGH. If you are an American in Afghanistan, you have constitutional rights as against the U.S. Government. That is long-settled law.

Senator GRAHAM. Is there not also a long-settled law that goes back to the Eisentrager case? I cannot remember the name of it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Johnson v. Eisentrager.

Senator GRAHAM. Right, that American citizens who collaborate with the enemy are considered enemy combatants?

Judge KAVANAUGH. They can be.

Senator GRAHAM. Can be.

Judge KAVANAUGH. They can be. They are often—they are sometimes criminally prosecuted, sometimes treated in the military—

Senator GRAHAM. Well, let us talk about “can be.” I think the—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Under Supreme Court precedent.

Senator GRAHAM. Right. There is a Supreme Court decision that said that American citizens who collaborated with Nazi saboteurs were tried by the military. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator GRAHAM. I think a couple of them were executed.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. So if anybody doubts there is a longstanding history in this country that your constitutional rights follow you wherever you go, but you do not have a constitutional right to turn on your own Government and collaborate with the enemy of the Nation. You will be treated differently.

What is the name of the case, if you can recall, that reaffirmed the concept that you could hold one of our own as an enemy combatant if they were engaged in terrorist activities in Afghanistan? Are you familiar with that case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. Hamdi.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. So the bottom line is, on every American citizen, know you have constitutional rights, but you do not have a constitutional right to collaborate with the enemy. There is a body of law well developed, long before 9/11, that understood the difference between basic criminal law and the law of armed conflict. Do you understand those differences?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do understand that they are different bodies of law, of course, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. If you are confirmed—and I believe you will be—what is your hope when all of this is said and done and your time is up, how would you like to be remembered?

[Brief pause.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. A good dad. A good judge.

Senator FEINSTEIN. A good husband.

Senator GRAHAM. I think he is getting there.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Good husband.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. Thanks, Dianne. You helped him a lot.

It is going to be better for you tonight.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I owe you—I owe you. Good son, I will quickly add. Good friend. I think about the pillars—the pillars of my life are being a judge, of course; being a teacher, I have done that, and either way this ends up I am going to continue teaching; coaching, as I mentioned, a huge part of my life, I will try to continue that. Senator Kennedy advised me when we met, "Make sure you keep coaching even if you get"—I am going to follow that. Volunteering and being a dad and a son and a husband, and being a friend. You know, I talked about my friends yesterday. I did not really expect—I got a little choked up talking about my friends.

Senator GRAHAM. That was well said. You have got to tighten it up because I just ran out of time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. Thank you, Senator. I can go on, as you know, but I will stop there.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are about ready to break for lunch and the vote that we have, and it will be 30 minutes. But before I do that, I have letters that Senator Feinstein asked me to put in the record from—70 letters from people in opposition to your nomination.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. And then we also have letters in support of Judge Kavanaugh from hundreds of men and women across the country holding diverse political views. They strongly support his confirmation. Without objection, those will also be entered in the record.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. And then I wanted to explain the exchange that I had with Senator Leahy, just so people do not think that that is something that I did on my own. We had previously sent out a letter and only Senator Klobuchar up to that point had taken advantage of the letter to be able to ask for documents that were committee confidential so that they could use them at the hearing. And the only thing I have done for Senator Leahy that was not already in that letter was to remind people that we did the same thing for the Gorsuch nomination to the Supreme Court, and it is a policy that Senator Leahy when he was Chairman of the Committee followed. So the only courtesy was extended to Senator Leahy, the fact that he did not make the request by the timeline that was in the letter, which I think was August 25th.

We are going to adjourn 30 minutes for a lunch break, and I think that we will be back here exactly in 30 minutes. If not, Judge Kavanaugh, we will let your staff know if it is going to be a little later, because you never know what happens in the United States Senate when you have a vote.

[Whereupon, at 12:16 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Whereupon, at 12:46 p.m., the Committee reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Welcome back, Judge Kavanaugh.

The next person to ask questions is Senator Durbin.

Senator DURBIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator.

Senator DURBIN. Judge Kavanaugh, Mrs. Kavanaugh, thank you for being back today to face this next round.

If I had to pick an area of clear expertise when it comes to Brett Kavanaugh, it would be the area of judicial nominations. You have been engaged in that at several different levels, including your own personal experience. And so I would like to ask you if you would comment on the strategy of your own nomination. Specifically, I would like to ask you whether those who were planning that strategy sat down and cleared with you their decision on the release of documents.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. I was not involved in the documents process or substance.

Senator DURBIN. No one told you that you would be the first Supreme Court nominee to assert executive privilege to limit the access to 100,000 documents relating to your service in the White House?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, there are a couple of things packed into your question. So, I did study the nominee precedent, read all the hearings. This came up in Justice Scalia's hearings, so I read that. There were all his memos from being the head of the Office of Legal Counsel, and he was asked about that. And I know with Chief Justice Roberts, there was 4 years of information when he was Principal Deputy Solicitor General that those were not disclosed either.

Senator DURBIN. But as for White House documents, you are breaking new ground here, or I should say covering up old ground here.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I guess—I was not involved in the documents discussions or process or substance in terms of the decisions that were made. But in terms of thinking about the issue, in terms of questions that could come to me, like Justice Scalia and Chief Justice Roberts received, or at least Justice Scalia did, I guess I do not distinguish. It is all—executive branch documents, Justice Department documents, and White House documents are not different.

Senator DURBIN. But you realize that when it comes to the role of the National Archives, we are being asked to give you special treatment.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I cannot comment because I do not know.

Senator DURBIN. Judge Kavanaugh, this is your field, judicial nominations. This is your nomination.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Let me ask you what the question is. Sorry.

Senator DURBIN. You are now embarking on this journey in this Committee, denying us access to documents which were routinely provided for other judicial nominees. You had to have known that was taking place.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think what Justice Scalia said in his hearing when he was asked about his Office of Legal Counsel memos is the right thing, which is that is a decision for the Senate and the executive branch to work out. As a nominee, I will—and there are long-term privileges and protections, as he mentioned, that were in effect for that discussion. It is not for the nominee to make that decision.

Senator DURBIN. Well, that is an interesting comment, because the way you are being presented to the American people, with only 10 percent of the public documentation that could be provided to this Committee, it is going to reflect on you and your nomination. And, of course, you know that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I guess I—again, looking at the nominee precedent, Senator, that was true in Justice Scalia’s case also. All his memos from 1974 to 1977, when he was head of the Office of Legal Counsel, a consequential time, at least as I understand it, those might not have been disclosed. He was asked about that at his hearing. Chief Justice Roberts, 4 years of Deputy Solicitor General memos, which would have been—

Senator DURBIN. So you are perfectly fine with this notion.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. I said I am—it is up to the Chairman and you and the Committee, the Senate and the executive branch—

Senator DURBIN. In fairness, Judge Kavanaugh, I think it is up to you. I think it is up to you. If you said at this moment to this Chairman and to this Committee, stop, pause, hit the pause button, I do not want any cloud or shadow over this nomination, I trust the American people, I want them to trust me, I am prepared to disclose those public documents—take Senator Leahy’s line of questioning. He was not the only victim of Manny Miranda. I was, as well. I did not realize that this Republican staffer had hacked into my computer, stolen my staff memos, and released them to the Wall Street Journal until they showed up in an editorial.

So now, your knowledge of this—your role in this, we are limited to even discuss because of the fact that we are classifying and withholding information about your nomination. First is Mr. Bill Burck, who has some magic power to decide what the American people will see about your role in the White House. Then the decision by those who put your nomination before us to take 35 months of your service as staff secretary to the President of the United States and to exclude the documents. Then the unilateral classification of documents coming to this Committee as Committee classified in a manner no one has ever seen in the history of this Committee.

Judge Kavanaugh, that reflects on your reputation and your credibility. If you said at this moment, I do not want to have a cloud over this nomination, I am prepared to suggest to the Committee and ask the Committee humbly, please withhold further hearings until you disclose everything, why will you not do that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I do not believe that is consistent with what prior nominees have done who have been in this circumstance. It is a decision for the Senate and the executive branch. Justice Scalia explained that very clearly, I thought, in his hearing.

Senator DURBIN. Are you happy with that decision?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not—it is not for me to say, Senator. This is a decision—the long-term interests of the Senate and the executive branch, particularly the executive branch, are at play. Justice Scalia, again, explained that well, I thought, in his hearing—

Senator DURBIN. I was not here for Justice Scalia, but I will tell you that—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let me interrupt without taking time away from you. So, do not charge him for this time. But here is something that—the nominee does not need any help for me to answer this, but we do not care what the nominee thinks. We have to follow the Presidential Records Act, and that is what we are following, is the law.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, following the Presidential Records Act involves the National Archives. The National Archives is not involved in this process. It is a Mr. Bill Burck, who was a former assistant to the nominee, who has decided what will be withheld, whether it is going to be Committee confidential. So it is not the Presidential Records Act, please.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, still, let me make clear here, we anticipated some of this, so let me read. Criticize the Committee process for obtaining Judge Kavanaugh's records. They have accused us of cutting the National Archives out of the process, so this is where I want to set the record straight.

President Bush acted consistently with Federal law when he expedited the process and gave us unprecedented access in record time to Judge Kavanaugh's record, but we have worked hand in glove with the Archives throughout this process, and the documents this Committee received are the same as if the Archives had done the initial review.

In fact, the Archives is not permitted by law to produce records to the Committee without giving both President Bush and a current President an opportunity to review. The National Archives was not cut out of the process. As President Bush's representative informed the Committee, quote from his letter, "Because we have sought, received, and followed NARA's"—that is the same as when I use the word, "Archivist"—"views on any documents withheld as personal documents, the resulting production of documents to the Committee is essentially the same as if NARA had conducted its review first and then sought our views and the current administration views, as required by law."

In other words, the documents this Committee received are the same as if the Archives had done the initial review. We are just able to get the documents faster by doing it this way, which gave the Senate and the American people unprecedented access in record time to a Supreme Court nominee record.

Continue.

Senator DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, the National Archives have stated publicly that the way we are handling the records for this nomination is unprecedented, and they have had nothing to do with it. They have asked until the end of October to produce records, and they have been told, "we do not need you, we are going to finish this hearing long before then."

I would like to ask that it be placed in the record the statement from the National Archives related to the records related to Judge Kavanaugh. Do I have consent to place this in the record?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I am sorry, what?

Senator DURBIN. The statement from the National Archives?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, without objection.

Senator DURBIN. Thank you.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator DURBIN. And now I am going to throw you a pitch which you have seen coming for 12 years. I want to talk to you about your 2006 testimony which you gave before this Committee. It was at a different time. We were very concerned about the issue of torture and detention and interrogation.

Yesterday I asked you to show the American people that you have nothing to hide by coming clean with us on this issue, and I would like to refer specifically to some of the questions that were raised because of that 2006 testimony. I believe, we have here a statement of my question, as well as your response. And I am sure you have seen this because it has been reported in the paper that you have been waiting for this question for a long time.

When I was, back in the day, a trial attorney preparing a witness for interrogation, testimony, deposition, giving testimony at trial, I said two things: tell the truth, and do not answer more than you are asked—do not volunteer information. Judge Kavanaugh, you failed on the second count.

The question I asked you: “What was your role in the original Haynes nomination and decision to renominate him? And at the time of the nomination, what did you know about Mr. Haynes’s role in crafting the administration’s detention and interrogation policies?”

Your response: “Senator, I did not—I was not involved and am not involved in the questions about the rules governing detention of combatants or—and so I do not have the involvement with that. And with respect to Mr. Haynes’s nomination, I’ve—I know Jim Haynes, but it was not one of the nominations that I handled.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. Could you raise it a little higher? I cannot see the bottom.

Got it, okay.

Senator DURBIN. I asked you about this when we had a meeting in my office.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator DURBIN. And I still do not understand your answer in terms of how you could state clearly and unequivocally, “I was not involved and am not involved in the questions about the rules governing detention of combatants.” You were involved in the discussions about access to counsel for detainees. You confirmed this during the meeting that we had in my office, and there are multiple media reports as well. You were involved in discussions regarding detained U.S. combatants Yaser Hamdi and José Padilla. You confirmed that in our meetings, and there are emails that support that fact.

You were involved—and this is one that I want to be specific about. You were involved with President Bush’s 2005 signing statement on Senator John McCain’s amendment banning cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of detainees, and you confirmed that in the meeting.

There were no exceptions in your answer given to me in 2006, not for litigation or detainee access to counsel or the McCain Torture Amendment. So if those three, based on the limited documents which we have been given, are obvious, what were you trying to tell me here? Did you really disclose accurately your role?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. I understood the question then and my answer then, and I understood—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I understood the question then and the answer then, and I understand the question now and the answer now to be 100 percent accurate. You were concerned about whether I was involved in the program that two other nominees had been involved in, and the report that Senator Feinstein produced, the Justice Department report, they showed that I was not. In other words, the program, crafting the program for the enhanced interrogation techniques for the detainees—

Senator DURBIN. Judge Kavanaugh, that is not the question. Do you see me asking you whether you crafted the program? I did not. I asked you about your involvement in the Haynes—and then you went further—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Crafting—

Senator DURBIN. Yes, and then you went further. You violated the second rule I give to every witness. You answered more than I asked.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I adhered to the first one. I told the truth.

Senator DURBIN. Well, you volunteered more information than I asked, and you went further than you should have, because in the three specific instances that I have given you, you clearly were involved in questions about rules governing detention of combatants.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I understood the question then, and I understand it now, and my answer about that program. I told the truth about that, and the reports that have come out subsequently have shown that I have told the truth about that. My name is not in those reports.

Now, for the 2005 signing statement, by that time I am in the staff secretary office, and everything that went to the President's desk—everything that went to the President's desk, with a few covert exceptions, would have somehow crossed my desk on the way. So you ask—I said on the signing statement it would have crossed my desk on the way. So would a speech draft on the Iraq war. Those things would have crossed my desk, prepared by others, not prepared by me, but they cross my desk on the way to the President.

Senator DURBIN. In the 2006 hearing you told Senator Arlen Specter you gave President Bush advice on signing statements, including, "identifying potential constitutional issues in legislation." Did you make any comments regarding the December 30, 2005 signing statement on the McCain Torture Amendment, including potential constitutional issues?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I cannot recall what I said. I do recall that there was a good deal of internal debate about that signing statement, as you can imagine there would be. I remember that it was controversial internally, and I remember that I thought—and I cannot remember all the ins and outs of who thought what, but I do remember that the Counsel to the President was in charge ultimately of signing statements in terms of the final recommendation to the President.

Senator DURBIN. And just a few months later you, under oath, told us you were not involved in any of the questions about the rules governing detention of combatants.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, again, at least I understood it then and I understand it now to be referring to the program that we were talking about that was very controversial that Senator Feinstein spent years trying to dig into, and I was not read into that program. I told the truth about that.

Senator DURBIN. Let me go to another area of questioning, if I can. Thank you very much.

In your dissent in Garza v. Hagan, you wrote that the Court had created “a new right for unlawful immigrant minors in U.S. Government detention to obtain immediate abortion on demand, thereby barring any Government efforts to expeditiously transfer the minors to their immigration sponsors before they make that momentous life decision.” You argued that permitting the Government additional time to find a sponsor for a young woman in the case did not impose an undue burden, even though the Government’s conduct in the case had already forced her to delay her decision on an abortion by several weeks.

We are talking about a young woman, characterized as Jane Doe, who discovered that she was pregnant after crossing the border into the United States. She made a personal decision that she was not ready to be a parent and did not want to continue her pregnancy. She went through every step necessary to comply with Texas State law, as well as steps forced on her by the Federal Government. She visited a religious anti-abortion crisis pregnancy center, she underwent an ultrasound for no medical purpose, and she went before a judge and obtained a judicial bypass of the State’s parental consent requirements.

In other words, this young woman complied with every legal requirement, including Texas State requirements, placed in front of her so she could move forward with her decision, a decision affecting her body and her life.

Do you believe that this was an abortion on demand?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the Garza case involved, first and foremost, a minor. It is important to emphasize it was a minor.

Senator DURBIN. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So she is in an immigration facility in the United States. She is from another country. She does not speak English, and she is by herself. If she had been an adult, she would have a right to obtain the abortion immediately. As a minor, the Government argued that it was proper or appropriate to transfer her quickly first to an immigration sponsor. Who is an immigration sponsor, you ask? It is a family member or friend who she would not be forced to talk to but she could consult with, if she wanted, about the decision facing her.

So we had to analyze this first as a minor, and then for me, the first question always is, what is the precedent? The precedent on point from the Supreme Court is there is no case on exact point, so you do what you do in all cases: you reason by analogy from the closest thing on point. What is the closest body of law on point? The parental consent decisions from the Supreme Court, where they have repeatedly upheld parental consent laws over the objection of dissenters who thought that is going to delay the procedure too long, up to several weeks.

I am getting to the point, I am getting to the point.

Senator DURBIN. Before you get to the point, you have just bypassed something. You have just bypassed the judicial bypass, which she received from the State of Texas when it came to parental consent. That has already happened here, and you are still stopping her.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not. The Government is arguing that placing her with an immigration sponsor would allow her, if she wished, to consult with someone about the decision. That is not the purpose of the State bypass procedure. So I just want to be very clear about that.

Senator DURBIN. But, Judge, the clock is ticking.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is.

Senator DURBIN. The clock is ticking, 20-week clock is ticking. She made the decision early in the pregnancy, and all that I described to you, the judicial decisions, the clock is ticking, and you are suggesting that she should have waited to have a sponsor appointed who she may or may not have consulted in making this decision.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Again, this is—I am a judge. I am not making the policy decision. My job is to decide whether that policy is consistent with law. What do I do? I look at precedent, and the most analogous precedent is the parental consent precedent. From Casey, has this phrase, page 895: “minors benefit from consultation about abortion.” It is a quote talking about consultation with a parent—

Senator DURBIN. So, you are adding a requirement here beyond the State of Texas requirements that there be some sponsor chosen who may or may not be consulted for this decision, and the clock is ticking on her pregnancy.

Judge KAVANAUGH. A couple of things there, Senator. You said, “you are adding.” I am not adding, I am a judge. The policy is being made by others. I am deciding whether the policy is then consistent with Supreme Court precedent.

There are two things to look at in this context, Senator. First, is the Government’s goal reasonable in some way? And they say we want the minor to have the opportunity to consult about the abortion. Well, the Supreme Court precedent specifically says, specifically says that that is an appropriate objective. Second—

Senator DURBIN. Was it a State requirement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The second question—

Senator DURBIN. Was that a State requirement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The second question is the delay, your point, and the parental consent cases of the Supreme Court recognized that there could be some delay because of the parental consent procedures. And, in fact, Justices Marshall, Brennan, and Blackmun repeatedly dissented in cases because they thought the delay was too long.

I quoted all that in my Garza opinion, and I made clear it had to happen very quickly, and I looked at the time of the pregnancy to make sure, on safety—I specifically talk about safety. I specifically say the Government cannot use this as a ruse to somehow prevent the abortion. I spent a paragraph talking about she was in an undeniably difficult situation.

So, as I was saying to Senator Graham earlier, I tried to recognize the real-world effects on her. I said consider the circumstances. She is a 17-year-old, by herself, in a foreign country, in a facility where she is detained, and she has no one to talk to, and she is pregnant. Now, that is a difficult situation, and I specifically recognized and tried to understand that. And then as a judge, not the policymaker, I tried to understand whether the Government's policy was consistent with the Supreme Court's precedents, and I did the best I could.

And I said—on those parental consent precedents—I said, some people disagree with those precedents and think those kinds of statutes should not be allowed. But precedent is not like a cafeteria where I can take this but not that. I had to take Casey completely. Casey reaffirmed Roe—

Senator DURBIN. I have some other questions, so I would ask if you would please—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it is an important question, though, and I want to—

Senator DURBIN. It is a critical question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I did my level best in an emergency posture. So I had basically 2 days to do this case.

Senator DURBIN. A 2-to-1 en banc decision which you dissented from. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I did the best to follow precedent, and as I always try to do, to be as careful as I can to follow the precedent of the Supreme Court.

Senator DURBIN. Let me ask you a personal question. What is the dirtiest, hardest job you have ever had in your life?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I worked construction in the summer after I was 16 for a summer, 7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. My dad dropped me off every morning at 7, 6:55. He wanted me to be early. And that is probably the one.

I also, I should say, Senator, I had what—a one-person lawn business, I guess, for many summers, business. I cut a lot of lawns, and that is how I made some cash when I was—I started that probably eighth grade, maybe seventh grade. I cut my parents' lawn, but then I cut a lot of lawns in the neighborhood and actually distributed flyers all over the place to say if you need your lawn cut, call me. So lawn cutting, and then the construction job, the one summer.

Senator DURBIN. My dirtiest job I ever had was four summers working in a slaughterhouse. I always wanted to go back to college. I could not wait to get out of there. It was unbearable. It was dirty, it was hot. The things I did were unimaginable, and I would not even start to repeat them.

Then came a case before you called Agri Processor Co. v. NLRB. At least a third of the workers, Judge Kavanaugh, in our Nation's slaughterhouses are immigrants. In visits to Iowa, Illinois, Delaware, you pick it, you are going to find a lot of immigrants doing these miserable, dirty, stinking, hot jobs. Many of them are undocumented. The work is low-paid and dangerous. And as the GAO has noted, immigrants are pressured not to even report injuries on the job.

The Agri Processors case was a notorious meat packing company owned by Sholom Rubashkin, who was convicted of 86 counts of fraud and money laundering in 2009. His 27-year sentence recently was commuted by President Trump.

Agri Processors had, at the core of its business model, the exploitation of undocumented workers. Half their workers, almost 400 of them, were not authorized. Workers alleged the company fostered a hostile workplace environment that included 12-hour shifts without overtime pay, exposure to dangerous chemicals, sexual harassment, and child labor. A truck driver at Agri Processor's Brooklyn warehouse told reporters, "We were treated like garbage, and if we said anything, we got fired immediately."

Judge Kavanaugh, you bent over backward to take the company's side against these workers. In a 2008 D.C. Circuit case, Agri Processor v. NLRB, your dissent argued that this company's workers should be prohibited from unionizing because they did not fit your definition of an "employee." To reach this conclusion, you imported a definition of "employee" from a totally different statute. You ignored the plain language of the controlling statute, the National Labor Relations Act, which has a broad definition of "employee," as well as binding Supreme Court precedent. The majority in this case—and you were a dissenter—the majority in this case noted that their opinion stuck to the text of the National Labor Relations Act and to the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act, which did not amend the National Labor Relations Act.

They said that your dissent, these other judges said about your dissent, would, quote, "abandon the text of the controlling statute and lead to an absurd result." The majority in this decision included one Republican- and one Democratic-appointed judge.

Judge Kavanaugh, you claim over and over again, to be a contextualist, to be carefully weighing every word of a statute. So why did you go out of your way to interpret the word "employee" in a way that benefited this horrible business and disadvantaged these exploited workers? Why did you not stick to the plain language of the controlling statute and the binding Supreme Court precedent?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Because the Supreme Court precedent compelled me to reach the result that I reached, and here is why, Senator. Let me explain.

The Supreme Court had a case in 1984 called the Sure-Tan decision. The Sure-Tan decision considered the interaction of the National Labor Relations Act and the immigration laws. What the Supreme Court did in Sure-Tan is, had this question and said it is at that time permissible to consider an immigrant unlawfully in the country as an employee under the National Labor Relations Act. In Part 2(b) of the opinion—you have to read Part 2(b) of the opinion, of the Supreme Court decision. If you read Part 2(b) of the opinion, the Court then goes on to say that because the immigration laws do not prohibit employment of people unlawfully in the country, it makes clear, the Supreme Court makes clear—this is when it is being considered in Congress in '84 and ends up in the '86 Act. The Court makes clear, as I read Part 2(b), and I think I am correct on this, that if the immigration laws did prohibit employment of someone here unlawfully in the country, then that would also mean that they cannot vote in the union election.

So what I was doing there, Senator, was all about precedent. I read that and, in my opinion, if you look at the dissenting opinion, I really parsed this very carefully, and I went deep into this case. So I went back and pulled from the Sure-Tan case. I asked for the Marshall papers, the Thurgood Marshall papers from the library to read all the memos that went back and forth among the Justices in the Sure-Tan case. I cited the oral argument to make sure that what I was reading in there actually reflected what had been going on in the Supreme Court, and it is quite clear from the oral argument they were aware that the immigration law was about to be changed, and they were aware of the interaction between the labor law and the immigration law.

So I think I stand by what I wrote then, and I think I correctly analyzed Part 2(b). Now, Senator—

Senator DURBIN. I have to—I am running out of time here.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I know, but if it ends—if the Supreme Court Sure-Tan opinion had ended at Part 2(a), 100 percent would agree with you and my decision would have been different. If you read Part 2(b), I think you see—

Senator DURBIN. You said earlier today you do not get to pick and choose which Supreme Court precedent you follow. The majority in the Agri Processor case was following Supreme Court precedent. In the Sure-Tan case, the Supreme Court, a 7-to-2 decision, said that undocumented immigrants are employees under the National Labor Relations Act. I quote: “Since undocumented aliens are not among the few groups of workers expressly exempted by Congress, they plainly come within the broad statutory definition of employee.” That is a quote from the case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is Part 2(a). You have to go to Part 2(b).

Senator DURBIN. Well, hang on. Let me tell you some people who went to both parts and could not disagree with you more. Everyone else who looked at this question—the administrative law judge, the National Labor Relations Board, including Republican appointees, two Appeals Court Judges, including one Republican appointee—followed the Supreme Court precedent and came to the opposite conclusion that you did.

I understand you may have preferred the Sure-Tan dissent, but you failed to follow Supreme Court precedent. This was a case where the National Labor Relations Act included those who were undocumented who could unionize to protect themselves in the workplace. You went out of your way to dissent all the way along and make sure they did not, in your view, have that right, that they did not have that right to unionize.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I very respectfully disagree, Senator. And the reason I disagree is that the Supreme Court did say that the immigrant was covered under the definition of NLRA. If it ends there, I am with you 100 percent. But then the Supreme Court goes on to say that we consider also in resolving this question that conflict between the National Labor Relations Act and the immigration laws and makes clear, as I read it, if the immigration laws had made employment of someone here in the country unlawfully illegal, then that would be prohibited in the case. And I went back, like I said. If you look at Justice—I mean, I quote the oral argument transcript from Sure-Tan in my dissenting opinion.

Look, I had no agenda in any direction on—I am a judge. So I am just trying to resolve the precedent—

Senator DURBIN. Let me just close. Let me close by saying this. “I am just a judge, I just follow precedent.” Gosh, we have heard that so often, and I hope it is the case, but we know that there is much more to your job than that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree.

Senator DURBIN. The fact that you were a dissenter and everyone else saw this the other way should give us pause when you say, "I am just following precedent."

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I respectfully, Senator—that opinion, I am proud of that opinion because I think it carefully details the law in that case following the Supreme Court precedent. And to your point that other judges disagree, there was a case I had about 10 years ago or 8 years ago called Papagno. It was a case where I ruled in favor of a criminal defendant on a restitution matter. Every other court before that disagreed. I wrote the majority opinion with Judge Edwards and Judge Griffith. Every other court after us disagreed. Finally we got to the Supreme Court this year in the Lagos case, and they agreed with our one opinion, the Papagno opinion. Just to point out that just because other courts might have disagreed does not necessarily mean we were necessarily wrong, because the Supreme Court ultimately decides that.

I understand your questions, and I appreciate them. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cornyn.

Senator Lee is going to chair while I have another appointment.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I was grateful that today's hearing, at least as far as the Committee is concerned, is a lot more dignified and civil. But unfortunately, some of the hijinks continue even on the Senate floor. I know that Senator McConnell asked consent for the Judiciary Committee to continue to meet during today's session of the Senate. Senator Schumer objected, so Senator McConnell was left with no option but to adjourn the Senate and allow the Committee to continue to meet. That is unfortunate.

So, Judge, I believe we met in the year 2000, and just to take a little walk down memory lane here, when I was Attorney General of Texas and had a chance to argue a case in front of the Supreme Court of the United States, you, Ted Olson, and Paul Clement, I believe—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. Helped me get ready. I regret you did not have better material to work with.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. It was an honor, Senator. It was an honor. Senator CORNYN. It was a great experience, an educational experience. I got to appreciate your skills as a lawyer from that time and have followed your career closely since, and I am proud to support your nomination based on my personal knowledge of your skills and your temperament and your character and your fidelity to the rule of law.

But I do want to pick one bone with you. This is not unique to you. Based on that experience, that case, as you may recall, involved a tradition in the Santa Fe Independent School District, unfortunately, which was the site of the shooting here in more recent days. But back then, the practice before football games was that the students would be able to volunteer to offer a prayer before the football game. They were not required to do so. The school did not pick them. They could offer an inspirational saying or read a poem or anything else. But that was the practice.

Well, until the ACLU filed suit, and unfortunately it was held to be unconstitutional and a violation of the Establishment Clause. I am not going to ask for your opinion because this issue will likely come back before the Court, but since I mentioned it to Judge Gorsuch—Justice Gorsuch, I am going to mention it to you.

The thing that has stuck in my craw for the last 18 years is the dissent written by Chief Justice Rehnquist which takes exception to the majority's decision saying they distorted existing precedent. But he goes on to say, even more disturbing than its holding is, the tone of the Court's opinion. It bristles with hostility to all things religious in public life. Neither the holding nor the tone nor the opinion is faithful to the meaning of the Establishment Clause when it is recalled that George Washington himself, at the request of the very Congress which passed the Bill of Rights, proclaimed "a day of public thanks-giving and prayer to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many signal favors of Almighty God."

Since I had you here, I thought I would mention that. I am not asking for your opinion since likely you will be called upon to decide cases involving the Establishment Clause in the future. But since we had that history together, I thought I would tell you that still sticks in my craw.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I understand, Senator. We remember, certainly, cases I lost—I remember, and they still stick in my craw too, Senator.

Senator CORNYN. Well, I just marvel that under the First Amendment, that a variety of voices can speak, and that is generally a good thing, but it can be about violence, sexism, it can be about almost anything, but you cannot speak about religion in a public forum.

Judge KAVANAUGH. There have been cases from the Supreme Court I think in more recent years, cases like the Good News Club case, cases like the Trinity Lutheran case, cases like the Town of Greece case where I think the Supreme Court has recognized the importance, of course, of religious liberty in the United States, and also has recognized, I think, that religious speakers, religious people, religious speech is entitled to a space in the public square and not to be discriminated against.

I think the Trinity Lutheran case is an important one on that. The Good News Club case, that is a case where there was an after-school program at a school gym, I think, or an auditorium, and that religious group was excluded, and the Supreme Court made clear, no, you cannot just exclude the religious group.

So I think there have been some developments since then in terms of religious equality and religious liberty that are important. Those cases are always difficult factually, but the principle you are espousing, I do think, is reflected in some more recent Supreme Court precedent.

Senator CORNYN. Well, I will just conclude with this. As I understand the Constitution, it requires the Government to be neutral. As Chief Justice Rehnquist said in this case, the Government demonstrated hostility to religious speech in the public square. That is just one person's opinion. And again, I am not asking you for any opinion with regard to—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. That may come before the Court.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that time will not be subtracted from my 30 minutes.

Senator LEE [presiding]. It will not be.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you.

So, Judge Kavanaugh, I am intrigued by your comment that you made earlier about the role of precedent. We have heard a lot about precedent. You alluded to this book that you and others, other judges wrote with Bryan Garner on the law of judicial precedent. I checked it out. It is 900 pages long, and I have not read every page of it either.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not think it is meant—it is not meant to be read word for word. It is a treatise where you go to a section that might be on point or something.

Senator CORNYN. But let me just ask you a more basic question, and then we can work our way into that.

When people go to court, should they expect a different outcome if the judge was nominated by a Republican from a court where the judge was nominated by a Democrat?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. That is an important principle of judicial independence and the judicial role where “the judge is umpire” vision that Chief Justice Roberts articulated, and I have talked about many times, as critical. When you go to a baseball game, the umpire is not wearing the uniform of one team or another, and that is a critical principle.

Senator CORNYN. Well, it strikes me as an important point given the suggestion that one of the reasons that people have objected to your nomination—I believe the quote was, you “have Republican blood flowing in your veins.” That strikes me as a strange and bizarre statement.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have been a judge for 12 years, Senator, with 307 opinions. I am very proud of that record and have been an independent judge for 12 years. As a judge, you are not a Republican or Democrat, as a Federal judge.

Senator CORNYN. And you talked a little bit about the constitutional basis for a judge’s obligation to apply existing precedent. Could you expand on that a little bit more? Because I think most people are under the impression this is sort of a discretionary matter and you can sort of cherry pick between what precedents you decide to follow and which ones you do not follow.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, there has been a debate sometimes about what are the origins of precedent, why do you follow precedent. And as I see it, there are a number of reasons you would cite: stability, predictability, impartiality, reliance interests. But all of those are not mere policies in my view.

As I see it, the system of precedent comes from Article III itself. When Article III refers to, the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, establish—to my mind the phrase, “judicial power.” You think about, what does that entail? And you look at the meaning, the meaning at the time of judicial power, and you look, one source of that is Federalist 78. In Federalist 78, it is well explained that judges make decisions based on precedent. And precedent, therefore, as I read “judicial power,” has constitutional origins and a constitutional basis in the text of the Constitution.

Senator CORNYN. And I think you have touched on this as well. Judges, unlike legislators, do not run for election. You do not have a platform, “Vote for me, this is what I will do if elected into office.”

One of the most important elements of limiting the important role of judges, I think, under the Constitution is that you are required to decide a case on a case-by-case basis rather than issuing some sort of oracle saying, “Henceforth the law will be thus,” assuming you could get eight other judges on the Team of Nine we talked about to agree with you.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. Could you talk about the importance of deciding cases on a case-by-case basis?

Senator LEE. We will add another 20 seconds.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely, Senator. It is important to understand, and I think Senator Graham alluded to this as well. As judges, you do not just issue policies or issue opinions out of the blue. You decide, as Article III says, cases and controversies, and that means there is a process. Litigants come into the Federal trial court, for example, and litigate against one another, and there is a process there, a trial or a summary judgment motion. The district judge renders a decision. Then that comes up to the court of appeals in my case, and there is briefing and oral argument. I like to say there is a process. I like to say process protects you. That is one of the things I always like to keep in mind.

You go through a process to help make the decisions, a deliberative process, and we have a process. Judges are very focused on process and having that oral argument, having the briefing, and then talking to your colleagues. You change your mind. Senator, you have been a judge, of course. You change your mind sometimes based on the comments of colleagues. So that process is important.

Then to your point about how you are deciding that case, you write an opinion. You are not trying to resolve every issue imaginable in the opinion. You are trying to resolve this case under the principles and precedents, the text of the law in question, the text of the statute in question, and decide that case or controversy. That is how judges build up a system of precedent over time, by deciding one case at a time and not trying to do more than they can or more than they should.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. Judge, do you not think that what you have described for us in deciding cases on a case-by-case basis has an important foundation in fairness to the litigants, the parties that come to your court? Because how would somebody feel if they know you have already announced, in all cases that have to do with subject X, I have made up my mind, I do not care what the facts are? Is that not unfair to the litigants?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It can be, Senator, at least where an overbroad ruling may resolve things that people who are affected by it may have thought that, well, I was not part of that case; why am I now affected in a particular way?

I think one of the things I can say about how I have tried to write my opinions, the 300 opinions, is that I am always concerned about—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am always concerned about unintended consequences. This is one of the reasons I always go through so many drafts of my opinions and really work through them, is even just a sloppy footnote or an ambiguous word in an opinion—it is true when you are drafting laws here too, but—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. You are concerned about unintended consequences, which is why it is so important to be clear in the opinions and to be exactly precise and not—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. To decide too much.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. Judge, let me ask you to tell us a little bit about September 11, 2001. Where were you when you heard that the planes hit the World Trade Center, and in Washington, DC, another plane hit the Pentagon here?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I remember I was in the West Wing when they hit the second tower. I remember that, up in the upstairs Counsel's office, with a couple of other people in the Counsel's office. And then we were ushered downstairs and then told to get out, run out, because there was fear, as we later learned, about Flight 93. I do not know whether it was headed to the Capitol or the White House or some other target, of course. And the heroes of Flight 93 saved so many Americans, a sacrifice that we still, of course, all celebrate in the sense of celebrating their lives and their heroism for saving all of us here in Washington. But I ended up out in Lafayette Park with the rest of the staff, bewildered.

It changed America, it changed the world, it changed the Presidency, it changed Congress, it changed the course, all the issues that came before us. It was a new kind of war, as President Bush described, with an enemy that did not wear uniforms and that would attack civilians. So new kinds of laws had to be considered in Congress, had to work through that. And President Bush had to focus so intently. As I have said before, my remembrance of September 12, his basic mentality of this will not happen again. Having traveled with him from 2003 to 2006 everywhere as staff secretary and seeing him up close, I still think every day I was with him during those years, every morning when he got up, it was still September 12, 2001, this will not happen again.

And to see that focus—of course, he had to do all the other things of the Presidency and all the other legislative and regulatory and ceremonial aspects. But he was so focused on that, and I am sure that has been true of the succeeding Presidents as well, because the threat still exists, of course.

Senator CORNYN. Well, as we came to learn, Osama bin Laden—and al-Qaeda—was responsible for that attack and has now morphed into other organizations like ISIS and the like.

But I want to ask you, you had to then sit in judgment later on in a case, the Hamdan case, which you alluded to earlier, where the defendant was Osama bin Laden's personal bodyguard and driver. He was captured by U.S. forces in Afghanistan after 9/11 and detained in Guantanamo Bay. He subsequently went through a military tribunal, and then that case was appealed to your court.

Just correct me if I am wrong, but notwithstanding the experience that you and everybody you cared about, having been through this terrible travesty of 9/11, you ruled in favor of Osama bin Laden's bodyguard and driver; correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct. I wrote the majority opinion.

Senator CORNYN. How could you do that? How could you possibly do that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The rule of law applies to all who come before the courts of the United States.

Senator CORNYN. Even an enemy combatant?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Equal justice under law. Everyone is entitled to—

Senator CORNYN. Even a non-citizen?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. Non-citizens who are tried in U.S. courts have constitutional rights. And really, my model on that, my judicial model for thinking about something like that, because I thought about what you are asking about, Justice Jackson, of course, Robert Jackson, who had been Franklin Roosevelt's Attorney General, in the Korematsu case, even though that was one of President Roosevelt's policies, the majority opinion now overruled, but Justice Jackson dissented and ruled against the Roosevelt policy. Justices Clark and Burton, two appointees of President Truman, are the two deciding votes in Youngstown Steel. That is a 6-to-3 decision. Those two are the deciding votes, therefore. They both were appointees of President Truman, and it is wartime against Korea. They get to the Supreme Court. They are the deciding votes in the Youngstown Steel case, which was an extraordinary national moment, one of the great moments.

So your conception of the role of the judge is that it is about the law. It is distinct from policy, and our judiciary depends on having people in it, and we are fortunate to have a wonderful Federal judiciary, people in it who understand the difference between law and policy and are willing to apply principles of equal justice under law to anyone who comes before the court. Even the most unpopular possible defendant is still entitled to due process and the rule of law, and I have tried to ensure that as a judge.

Senator CORNYN. Well, it is hard for me to imagine a more unpopular defendant than Osama bin Laden's driver and personal bodyguard. So I find the suggestion that somehow you are prejudiced against the small guy in favor of the big guy, or that you are picking and choosing who you are going to render judgment in favor of based on something other than the rule of law, I think this answers that question conclusively for me, the fact that you could separate yourself from the emotional involvement you had, along with so many people you worked closely with in the White House on September 11, and you could then as a judge, after you put on the black robe and take the oath of office, you could then render a judgment in favor of Osama bin Laden's bodyguard and driver because you applied the law equally to everybody that comes to your court.

Let me allude to something I think Senator Sasse was eloquently speaking about yesterday in terms of the separation of powers, a very important aspect of our constitutional system and one that I know you have dealt with often on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, and that has to do with what I have read some judges talk about, some constitutional scholars talk about, a conversation between the branches.

In other words, when the D.C. Circuit Court or the Supreme Court decides a case, they finally decide that case, but they do not finally decide what the policy is for the United States or the American people; correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator. I think one of the important things that judges can do is to adhere, of course, to the laws passed by Congress, but then in writing the opinion make clear—and I have done this before, and a lot of my colleagues do this—is that perhaps the statute needs updating. But if it does, that is the role of Congress to update the statute. Or sometimes there will be a hole in a statute or something that seems unintended in a statute, and to alert Congress to that.

Chief Judge Katzmann of the Second Circuit, who is a great judge I serve with on the Judicial Branch Committee, which is appointed by the Chief Justice, he has written a book about statutory interpretation, but he has also been the leader of a project to make sure that Congress is alerted to potential statutory issues that look like they might have been things that perhaps Congress would not have intended, or at least Congress would want brought to its attention so it could fix.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. So that project has been very successful. That is Chief Judge Katzmann's project, and it is one—even without that project, how you write your opinion, I think, is important. We do not update the statutes. You update the statutes. But it is good for us to write our opinions in a way that points out potential issues that Congress might want to be aware of.

Senator CORNYN. And that is part of the conversation between the two co-equal branches of Government.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely, and I think that is an important dialogue to have between Congress and the judiciary, and the back-and-forth is very important on that front, and I think that is one thing I am always thinking about in my opinions. You write the laws, but if the law looks like there is some issue with it, some flaw or something that might be an unintended consequence, in the opinion you can identify it, and that can be something that Congress can turn its attention to sometimes, because I am well aware that statutory drafting is a very difficult process.

It is something that I think judges actually need to be more aware of, how difficult the legislative drafting process is. Even if you are doing it as one person, it would be difficult. But then you are doing it as a collective body, and then you are doing it with the House and with the President involved. There are a lot of people in it, and it is hard to have, with all the compromises inherent in that, hard to have crystal clarity on every possible topic.

So as judges I think, number one, we have to recognize the process that you go through as legislators. That means adhere to the compromises that are made, the text as written. But also when we write our opinions, if there seems to be something that is not working out, it is appropriate I think for judges to point that out in their opinions.

Senator CORNYN. And, of course, even if it is the constitutional basis for your opinion, that can be changed by constitutional amendment. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is correct as well. The Framers did not think the Constitution was perfect by any stretch. They knew it had imperfections. For starters, the original Constitution did not have the Bill of Rights, the first 10 Amendments. So there was a lot of discussion at the ratifying conventions about having a Bill of Rights, and that was quickly done in the First Congress in New York in 1789, of course, by James Madison taking the lead on that.

But so, too, they did not think it was perfect. They have an amendment process that specified in Article V of the Constitution, and that amendment process was intended to be used, and we have seen it used to correct structural issues: the Twelfth Amendment on Presidential elections; the Seventeenth Amendment, of course, as you all know well, on Senate elections; the Twenty-second Amendment, which limited Presidents to only two terms; the Twenty-fifth Amendment, which corrected some issues with respect to the Vice Presidency. So too, of course, the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments, the most important amendments in the Constitution in many respects, because it brought the promise of racial equality that had been denied at the time of the original Constitution into the text of the Constitution.

So the job of the people, which is the Congress and the State legislatures, is to amend the Constitution. It is not the job of judges to do that on our own. Obviously, that is a basic divide of constitutional responsibility that is set forth right in the text of Article V of the Constitution.

Senator CORNYN. I cannot remember who said it, I think Justice Jackson perhaps, who said the Supreme Court is not final because it is always right; it is right because it is final, or words to that effect. But I always thought the more I got into that, the more I disagreed with that, because it is a conversation between the branches, and if the American people believe that it is a constitutional matter, the way the Constitution is being interpreted, it is within our power as the American people to change our own Constitution by amendment. There are provisions in the Constitution itself to do that.

It is hard, and it should be hard, but ultimately the authority that we delegate to the Government finds its origin in the consent of the governed. It is not something dictated to us from on high, from the marble palace or somewhere like that here in Washington. It is ultimately our Government, our responsibility, our authority that provides legitimacy to the Government itself. Do you agree with that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree, of course, with that, Senator. The people, we the people form the Constitution of the United States and the sovereignty. The people are the ultimate authority. And you are right about Justice Jackson's line. I think it is a clever line, but ultimately I agree with you. I have always had a little bit of a problem with that line, we are infallible because we are final. No, both parts of that are wrong in some sense, because I never want to think of the Court as infallible, and I also never want to think of it necessarily in the way you are describing either, because the people always have an ability to correct through the amendment process.

Now, the amendment process is hard and has not been used as much in recent decades. But, of course, at the beginning of the country the amendments were critical, and Dred Scott, of course, the awful example of just a horrific Supreme Court decision that is then corrected in part, at least on paper, in the Fourteenth Amendment—the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, and that is an important example, I think, probably the best example, frankly, of the point you are making about the people being able to respond to a horrific decision of the Supreme Court.

Senator CORNYN. Well, in fairness to Justice Jackson, maybe he was thinking, as I originally thought, about the expression as being binding on lower court judges, trial judges, appellate court judges, and the Supreme Court does have the final word in that food chain of the judiciary, but not in terms of the fundamental authority of the American people to decide what laws should govern them.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that is probably right, Senator. I do not want to be—Justice Jackson is one of our greatest Justices. So to question anything, whether it is the Korematsu dissent or Barnett or Youngstown or Morissette on mens rea, Justice Jackson wrote some of the greatest opinions, and the example of judicial independence as well.

But on that one line, I take your point.

Senator CORNYN. Let me just ask you one last question. We talked a lot about the role of precedent, and Senator Feinstein talked about stare decisis, that basically cases that have been decided provide the precedent for future cases.

But on occasion, the Supreme Court has decided that its decisions were just wrong and has chosen to overrule those previous decisions. I am thinking of Plessy v. Ferguson, for example, which was a scar on our body politic that said that separate but equal educational facilities met the constitutional requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment.

But can you talk about the extraordinary circumstances under which the Supreme Court would revisit a precedent?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, Brown v. Board of Education, of course, overturned Plessy. Plessy was wrong the day it was decided. It was inconsistent with the text and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, which guaranteed equal protection.

The Supreme Court in Strauder v. West Virginia in 1880, a jury selection case, had said, what is this amendment but that the law shall be the same for the Black and the White? And the Supreme Court, unfortunately, backtracked from that clear principle in the Plessy decision, and a horrific decision which allowed “separate but equal,” and then Brown v. Board corrected that in 1954, of course, corrected it on paper. It is still decades, and we are still seeking to achieve racial equality. The long march for racial equality is not over.

But Brown v. Board, as I have said publicly many times before, the single greatest moment in Supreme Court history, by, in so many ways, the unanimity which Chief Justice Warren achieved, which is a great moment; the fact that it lived up to the text of the Equal Protection Clause; the fact that it understood the real-world consequences of the segregation on the African-American students who were segregated into other schools and stamped with the badge of inferiority; that moment in Brown v. Board of Education is so critical to remember, and the opinion is so inspirational. I encourage everyone to—it is a relatively short opinion, but it is very powerful. It is very focused on the text of the Equal Protection Clause—and correcting that awful precedent of Plessy v. Ferguson—a great example of leadership.

And just the last point I will mention on process, they knew they were going to face popular backlash. They knew they were—but they still did it. So that shows independence and fortitude. But they also had re-argument, which I think is a good—they had argued originally and then decided there was a lot going on and maybe not everyone is seeing it the same way as the Justices, and they had a re-argument. I think it is a good lesson on process protecting us, and keep working at it and keep working at it and see—you know, the Team of Nine that I mentioned yesterday, and mentioned today, keep working at it as a Team of Nine, and they came out unanimous. Chief Justice Warren, thankfully, led the Court in that decision. That was a great moment, the greatest moment in Supreme Court history.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Judge.

Senator LEE. Thank you. I awarded two additional minutes to Senator Cornyn because he was interrupted, by my count, 5 times during his testimony.

Senator Whitehouse is next.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you. Good afternoon, Judge Kavanaugh.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Are you good for another half hour?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am good.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. All right, good. In my office, you told me that you could provide no assurance to me that you would uphold a statute requiring insurance companies to provide coverage for pre-existing medical conditions. Is that still true, here in public?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think, Senator, it is important to understand the principle at play here. The principle—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. We have talked a lot about that, but is the statement you made—have I recited it accurately, and is it still true today, that you can give no assurance that you would uphold—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, Senator, judges like to explain their decisions.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yep, but I get to ask the questions. Usually you get to ask the questions because you are the appellate judge, but today for half an hour I get to. So, is it still true that you can give no assurance that you would uphold a statute requiring insurance companies to cover pre-existing medical conditions?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, to prepare for this moment, I went back and read——

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I really would like you to be as careful with your time as you can, because I have a very limited amount of time with you. So, the quicker you can get to the answer—it could be as simple as “yes” or “no.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I can enhance your understanding of my answer if I explain it, I think.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I really just want your answer on the record. I think I am pretty capable of understanding it on my own.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But, well, then everyone to understand my answer. So, there is nominee precedent of how Justices and nominees in my position have answered in the past. I will be succinct, if I can. And all eight sitting Justices——

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I know. You have actually said this in the hearing, so people who are listening and interested have actually already heard you say this.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think it is really important, so I want to——

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Say it again, then.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I want to underscore it. All eight sitting Justices of the Supreme Court have made clear that it would be inconsistent with judicial independence, rooted in Article III, to provide answers on cases or issues that could come before us. Justice Ginsburg, “no hints, forecasts.” Justice Kagan, talking about precedent, “no thumbs are up or down.”

And I went back. Justice Thurgood Marshall was asked repeatedly in his hearing, “What do you think about Miranda?” “What do you think about Miranda?” “What do you think about Miranda?”

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Got it. Everybody else does it, and your answer is still “no.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, the reason everyone else does it, though, is rooted in judicial independence and my respect for precedent. So, it is a combination of my respect for precedent, nominee precedent, and my respect for judicial independence. So, I cannot give assurances on a specific hypothetical.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay, thank you. Let me go on to another subject, which is executive privilege. Executive privilege is a principle that is founded in the Constitution in the separation of powers, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court so ruled in the United States v. Richard Nixon case. So, that was the first—the key issue in United States——

Senator WHITEHOUSE. That is all right. I just needed the answer to the question, and you have answered it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But the source is important.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. As a privilege, it needs to be asserted, does it not? That is true of privileges generally?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know where you are—where this is going, but the——

Senator WHITEHOUSE. It is a pretty straightforward question. Do privileges not need to be asserted in order to apply?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, privileges are recognized.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Once they are asserted.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think as a general proposition.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Fair enough. I am only asking a general proposition.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, in attorney-client privilege, you would assert the attorney-client privilege.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes, assert it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And who asserts executive privilege?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Ordinarily—well, that is a complicated question, Senator, actually. That—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Who does it come back to? Ultimately, who asserts executive privilege?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, it depends what you are talking about. So, what kind of executive privilege document you are talking about, it depends. In my experience—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Ultimately, it is the President.

Judge KAVANAUGH. There is not—there is not as much precedent on that. There is some. The Supreme Court, this was—the Supreme Court in the United States v. Richard Nixon—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Is it not fair to say that executive privilege belongs to the President of the United States, the Chief Executive?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, it can also belong to the former President in the case of former Presidential records. That is one caveat I want to put on that.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay, fair caveat. Is the assertion of executive privilege by the President subject to judicial review?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, of course, because under the precedent, United States v. Richard Nixon—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Said two things. It said, one, that executive privilege is constitutionally rooted. The special prosecutor in that case argued that actually there was no such thing as executive privilege, and the Supreme Court rejected that argument and held that the executive privilege is rooted in the separation of powers and in Article II. But second—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. The reason I am asking does not have much to do with you. It goes back to a point that we were talking about earlier in the hearing, which is that we have received hundreds and hundreds of pages of documents of your record that looked like this. They both say “committee confidential” across them at an angle, and then across the front they say “constitutional privilege.” And as a Member of the Senate—this is not a question, I am speaking to my colleagues—I find myself in a quandary here about being denied those particular documents because I cannot find any assertion of the privilege.

These documents just suddenly appeared and somebody had put “constitutional privilege” on the page and wiped out all the text that was on the page. And my understanding is that there is ordinarily a process for getting to that determination that allows for ultimately a judicial review, and we have failed to get subpoenas out of the Committee for documents, so we cannot trigger it that way. And there is no apparent assertion of executive privilege that I can find in the record of how this particular paper got here.

So, I just wanted to establish some of the basic ground rules of executive privilege with you because I think we agree on that. I think that is basically commonly agreed and put that into the context of what we are looking at, and particularly with respect to Chairman Leahy's questioning earlier. If some of the documents he is looking for have now been protected by this non-assertion assertion of executive privilege, we have a problem. It is a continuing problem in the Committee. We have had other witnesses come and do non-assertion assertions of executive privilege, and so I am sorry to drag Committee business before you, but I do think it is important that we try to get this right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I make one addendum based on my experience from the time, which is I do not think formal assertions usually occur until after there has been a subpoena, at least from my time working in the Bush—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Which is why not being able to get a subpoena kind of bolixes up the process, yes indeed. The role of the Federalist Society in bringing you here today has been of interest to me. As you know, we spoke about it quite a lot when you and I met in my office. Mr. McGahn, who is sitting very patiently behind you—I can see him over your shoulder—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. Has said that the Federalist Society was insourced into the White House to make these recommendations, specifically to make the recommendation that you should be the nominee. You have said this regarding President Bush, that he thought it was, and I am quoting here, "improper to give one group, especially a group with interests in many issues, a preferred or favored position in the nomination process." That was—those were words speaking, I guess, to the Federalist Society National Lawyers Convention. On another occasion, you wrote a draft speech for Attorney General Gonzales or White House Counsel Gonzales—probably White House Counsel Gonzales—look at the date—to deliver to the Federalist Society. And you said in that speech, "As a matter of constitutional principle, it is simply inappropriate, we believe, to afford any outside group a quasi-official role in the President's nomination process." How do you square those comments about the role of the American Bar Association in the nomination process with the role of the Federalist Society in your nomination process, assuming that Mr. McGahn was speaking accurately when he said they had been insourced to the White House for this process?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. So, I can speak to the ABA part of that. President Bush in 2001 had to make a decision of how the ABA should play its usual rating role with respect to nominees, and the ABA takes files, amicus briefs, and takes policy positions on issues. And, therefore, after some deliberation, it was decided that there was nothing wrong with the ABA rating the nominees, but to give an organization that files amicus briefs and takes policy positions a preferred role in the constitutional nomination process was unfair in some ways and favoring—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Would it be a fair description of the Federalist Society's role in your selection as the nominee to say that it was preferred over other groups?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, my experience was when Justice Kennedy retired on the Wednesday, Mr. McGahn called me later that afternoon, said we need to talk on Friday. He came over to my office on Friday evening or late afternoon. We talked for three or 4 hours, interview and going through the usual kinds of questions you would go through when you are embarking on a process like this. And then I met with the—interviewed with the President on Monday morning, interviewed—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, is it your testimony that you do not what the role of the Federalist Society was in your selection?

Judge KAVANAUGH. My experience—my personal experience and what I know is that President Trump made the decision for starters. President Trump made the nomination, and I know he, as I explained yesterday, I know he spent a lot of time in those 12 days on this issue, and I was aware of that. I also know that Mr. McGahn was directly involved with me and spent a lot of time on it. And I also know that the Vice President—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But you have no knowledge to share with us today about the role of the Federalist Society and how they were insourced into the White House. That is a mystery to you as well as to us.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not sure what Mr. McGahn meant. I think by that comment—I think Federalist Society members are—the lawyers in the administration are Federalist Society members, and so it should not be a surprise that—because it is an organization—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Leonard Leo's role specifically from the Federalist Society?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know the specifics.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Well, let us go from specifics to generals, and let me put up a graphic that shows some of the folks who fund the Federalist Society.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. It is a pretty significant group of people who tend to share very conservative and pro-corporate points of view. It reflects that at least 14 of the donors are actually anonymous, which is a very unfortunate part of our current political world. Actually, probably more than that because Donors Trust here is an organization whose sole purpose is to launder the identity off of big donors so that a recipient of funds can report that they got the money from Donors Trust rather than the true party in interest. So, we do now know how much anonymous money flowed through them, but I would contend that this is a pretty strong group of right-wing, conservative, pro-corporate funders.

And presuming that to be true, should that give you or anyone in this process pause that groups like this may have had such a significant role in selecting you to be in this seat today?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, Mr. McGahn was the one who contacted me. I interviewed with the President, and I know the President was—I am the President's nominee. He was directly involved in making that decision. I am sure he consulted with Mr. McGahn and others. I know he consulted widely with a lot of people to get input on the—very widely to get input on the—at least the people who were the finalists. So, that part of it, my 12-day experience, was with the White House Counsel's Office and the President and Vice President, too.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. So—

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I also do not—I am not familiar with all the—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Whatever the role of the Federalist Society was in all of this, it was, and there is plenty of reporting. We do not need to litigate that. Between us, you do not know is what you have testified, and that is fine.

Judge KAVANAUGH. On my process, and, again, yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But you are fairly familiar with the process generally because you used to run it in the Bush White House or have a significant role in it, the process of judicial nomination selection. Judicial nominee selection, correct? You have been inside that machine.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I did not run it. Judge Gonzales, when I was in the Counsel's Office, was the Counsel. He—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But you have been inside the process.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have—I have been inside the process, yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, the next thing that happens going forward is that we see the Judicial Crisis Network showing up, and they spend millions and millions and millions and millions of dollars to run ads urging Senators to support you. Now, I do not know whether we can show that those were the same funders because they are engaged in what is called, as you know, dark money funding. They do not report their donors. But I would be prepared to make a very substantial guess that there is enormous overlap between the funders of the Judicial Crisis Network campaign for your confirmation and the Federalist Society donor group, to the extent that we are aware of it since so many of them are anonymous.

Hypothetically, should the American people have concern about the role of very, very big spenders and influencers doing things like being involved in the selection of a Supreme Court nominee and running dark money campaigns to support the confirmation of a nominee? Is there any cause for concern there as a general proposition?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, there are a lot of premises in your question that I am not sure about.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I am not asking you accept the premises as true. I am asking it as a hypothetical.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. If there were very, very significant big special interest funding behind the organization that was responsible for selecting you and recommending to the President that he nominate you, and again from a very similar group in supporting the dark money campaigns that are being run on your behalf for your confirmation, would that be a matter of concern, or is that all just fine and we should not even care about getting the answers?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, two things, Senator. One is, I have described the process I went through with Mr. McGahn, the President, and the Vice President—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And the selection. And that is what I know about my process. Two, on the ads, there were a lot of ads against me, as well, and I have seen those, and, you know, our family has seen those. And then there were ads for me, and we have seen those, too. And as Chief Justice Roberts said in his hearing, it is a free country, and there are ads for and against, and obviously we—as Senator Durbin said—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Should we as citizens know who they are, who is funding the ads, just as a matter of citizenship? Is that—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think that is, first and foremost, a policy question for the Congress to decide on what disclosure requirements it wants to put in. And then if those disclosure requirements were put in or State governments could try to make disclosure requirements. I think, some have tried, and then there would undoubtedly be challenges to that, and what is the First Amendment implications of that. And that would come to a court, and I would keep an open mind on that case under the precedent and First Amendment law, and we would think about that.

The policy question, I think, is really for Congress in the first place to determine, assess, study exactly what kind of disclosure requirements should be in place.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I understand—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. The potential hazard there is that the unleashed power of unlimited political dark money then becomes like a ratchet, the obstacle to solving that problem. And I hope you can understand that as a matter of political principle.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do understand the concerns about money in the political system. When I worked for—and the time it takes all of you and when I worked for President Bush in the 2004–2003–2004 timeframe, for example, and how many fundraisers he had to do, and going back to the September 11th point and the time and burdens on the Presidency, he had to do a lot of fundraisers. Running for President while being President—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. It has gotten a lot easier since now you can just get a huge special interest to set up a 501(c)(4) and drop tens of millions of dollars in, and it is [snapping of fingers] like that, and the public does not know who is behind it. Only the—a very few people are in on what the deal is. So, it has gotten easier since President Bush, but not better.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think for some Members, particularly in the House, if you have a—if you are running for re-election and a third party group comes in against you, and you do not have—you have to go out fundraising and spend even more time, I think—at least as I understand it, that is part of the concern I have heard over the years just generally, is the time that each of you has to spend and the Members of the House have to spend.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, let me just continue on forward through this problem of funders. On the Court, on the D.C. Circuit and potentially on the Supreme Court, you will often see cases brought by groups, like, for instance, the Pacific Legal Foundation. Are you familiar with that group?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have seen briefs by the Pacific Legal Foundation.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Do you know what they do?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will take your description.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. My description is that they get money from right-wing conservative and corporate interests, and they look for cases around the country that they believe they can use to bring arguments before the Court. I argued against them in the Supreme Court at one point. They came all the way across the country to the shores of Winnapaug Pond, Rhode Island, to hire a client whose case they could take to the Supreme Court with a purpose to make a point. And they are not alone in doing this. There are a number of similar groups who perform this service.

And it causes me to think that sometimes the true party in interest is actually not the named party before the Court, but rather the legal group that has hired the client and brought them to the Court more or less as a prop in order to make arguments trying to direct the Court in a particular direction. Is that an unreasonable concern for us to have about the process?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think there are public interest litigation groups spanning the ideological spectrum that look for cases to weigh in on as amicus briefs—in amicus briefs, and there are—also, of course, there have been historically—you look for—as I understand it, people try to identify suitable plaintiffs to challenge—and this, again, is across the entire ideological spectrum.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. What are the signals that that has gotten out of hand, that there is something rotten in Denmark?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is an interesting question, Senator, and I think it is an important one, but it is not one that I think I have a great answer to.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Well, let me propose one thought to you, which is that the Supreme Court at least should fix its rules on who the amici are who turn up, and require some disclosure of who is really behind them. The only thing the Supreme Court requires is to disclose who paid for the brief. The brief itself is not a very big expense. And so, very powerful interests can come in behind an amicus group that has a lovely name like Citizens for Peace and Prosperity and Puppies, and nobody knows who is really in interest. So, that would be one thing that I think would be a concern.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Another thing that would be a concern, I would think, would be when you see these special interest groups rushing out trying to lose cases in order to get before a friendly court. It really seems improbable that somebody who has actually tried cases, and who has been around courtrooms a lot, and who has seen a lot of litigation and a lot of great litigators, I have never seen anybody once try to lose a legitimate case. So, in the wake of Justice Alito's signaling about what then became Friedrichs and Janus, to see these groups rush out and ask the Court to rule against them so they can get—hot foot up to the Supreme Court where they expect a good outcome, to me that—there is just something that does not seem right about that. That seems to me a little bit like faux litigation; that there is something else going on other than real parties having real arguments, and the Supreme Court ultimately settling properly prepared real disputes.

Do you have any concern about the optics of people rushing to lose cases below to come before what they think is a friendly Supreme Court? Does that seem just a little bit odd?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Acknowledge, Senator, I am not entirely familiar with that phenomenon.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would be interested in more—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I might follow up with you with a, you know, question for the record to get your more deliberate thoughts about it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And on your amicus thought, I am interested in the specifics of your proposal, and certainly if confirmed, I would—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Because here is the concern. You know perfectly well that the Court depends on—as much as anything—on its reputation. You do not have a purse and you do not have an army, you stand on your reputation in the judiciary, and you must not only act justly, but be seen to act justly. And what I have laid out is a scenario in which very big special interests have a significant role in funding the group that I believe, and much reporting says, is responsible for getting you to the top of the greasy pole of—

[Applause.]

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. Of nominee selection. And that the same funders are behind the Judicial Crisis Network operation that is politically pushing for you.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator WHITEHOUSE. That the—

Senator LEE. Senator Whitehouse, we are going to add 1 minute to your time.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator WHITEHOUSE. That some portion of the Supreme Court's docket is made up of strategic cases rather than real litigation in which somebody has gone out to find an appropriate plaintiff, hire the client, bring them in. And by the way, when they are done with them, they fire the client rather unceremoniously, in my experience. And then when the proper case comes up, you see this flood of special interest amici with terrible transparency into who is behind them. In one case, we tracked one of these big funding groups behind 11 different amicus briefs in the same Supreme Court case. So, the whole amicus thing begins to have a really rank odor to it.

And then at the end of the day, where things really start to go haywire, in my view, is when you go back to those 5-to-4 decisions that I talked about yesterday, which I think is the most heart-breaking thing that I experienced in my political life. I used to argue in front of appellate courts. It was what I did, not at your level, but I have been in front of the First Circuit a lot. I have been in front of the Supreme Court once. I have been in front of the Rhode Island Supreme Court more than I can remember. I kind of thought that I was a reasonably good appellate lawyer, and the idea that our Supreme Court is deciding as many as 80 cases under Justice Roberts on a pure partisan divide, I think that has a real signaling problem. And I hope that you will at least consider that that is something that the Court needs to cure rather than make worse in order to continue having its credibility.

I think 80 cases in which all the Republicans go one way and cannot bring a single Democrat appointee with them, that is a tough data point. And then when you look at that tough data point and you see that more than 90 percent of those cases, if you look behind at the outcome, it had a big—one of the interests that I mentioned that are very, very important to big special interests that were implicated. And then when you look at the win/loss rate in those cases, and it is 100 percent—100 percent—for this crowd of big special interests. And then here is where you come in at the end. This is the Roberts' Five majority in those 5-to-4 cases where these conservative groups have come in to make their pitch. They have won 92 percent of the time in those 5-to-4 cases.

If you figure they have thrown a couple of long balls, you know, like Hail Marys, and maybe that is the 8 percent, that is a hell of a record. And then if you look at your record on the D.C. Circuit where these conservative groups come in, you line right up: 91 percent, 92 percent. And I think when you put the whole saga together, from the big special interests lurking behind the Federalist Society, to the big special interest funding, the Judicial Crisis Network, to the big special interests behind the Pacific Law Foundation and the Washington Law Foundation, and this little array of, I would say, strategic litigators who are funded by corporative interests and right-wing interests, and then these amici, we do not know who is behind them, and then you see this result, that is a tableaux that is an alarming one, I think, for the Court. And I would urge you to think hard about whether that is the direction you would want to continue to go as an Associate Justice of that Court, because at some point, those numbers catch up with you. At some point, as I said yesterday, pattern is evidence of bias.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, a couple of thoughts. First, on the amicus briefs, at least in my experience, I pay attention to the quality of the arguments in the briefs, not the identity of the parties on them. But I take your point on the disclosure. I would be interested in the specifics of anything you are talking about disclosure requirements for the Supreme Court.

Two, I do believe deeply in the idea that we are a Team of Nine and need to be working together. And I take—I take the point, too, that it is very important if I am confirmed that I work with, as best I can, and I will, to maintain the confidence of all the American people in the independence and impartiality of the Supreme Court at all times. I am aware that we ultimately—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am aware everything I do, if I were to be confirmed, would help affect that, how I decide, what I write in opinions, how I treat litigants in oral argument, where I speak, when I speak, where I teach, what I say on the outside, everything goes into how I behave, what I do in my volunteer time. Everything goes into the impressions of me as one part, if I am confirmed, of the Supreme Court. And I take very seriously your broader point about maintaining confidence of all the American people and the integrity and impartiality and independence of the Supreme Court. So, I appreciate that broader point.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator WHITEHOUSE. My time has expired, Chairman. There will be a second round, correct?

Senator LEE. There will be. I am happy to give you an additional minute in light of the fact that you had two additional interruptions, if you would like.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Well, I—just to make a final point, actually I think this is not an offshore storm. It has made landfall when you see polling that shows that 49 percent of Americans think a corporation will get a fairer shot in the United States Supreme Court than an individual, seven times as many that think it is the other way. Now, you still have a few to work with who are undecided on that question, but the fact that about half of the American people already believe that corporations will be treated more fairly in the United States Supreme Court than human beings will, and the alignment of that with the facts that I have shown you about the Supreme Court's record of 80 partisan decisions, 92 percent involving big corporate special interests and a hundred percent win rate for them in those cases. I think we are at a tough place right now, and I think we really need to get back away from that. So, thank you.

Senator LEE. Thank you, Senator Whitehouse.

Judge Kavanaugh, I want to get back to a couple of questions that colleague, Senator Whitehouse, was asking you a minute ago. Just to be clear, did anyone from the Federalist Society contact you about the vacancy after Justice Kennedy made his announcement that he would be stepping down from the Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator LEE. And during the campaign of President Trump, as I recall, he came out with two different lists, two different lists of possible Supreme Court nominees. The first list had 11 names on it. The second list, if I am not mistaken, had 21 names on it, which included the previous 11. There were reports at the time that some outside groups had had some involvement in that. Were you involved in the first list? Were you included in the first list?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I was not.

Senator LEE. Were you included in the second list?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I was not.

Senator LEE. Okay. So, you were—you became under consideration only after President Trump took office, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is my understanding. That is when I became identified.

Senator LEE. And after he was staffed up, after he had his own staff, his own staff within the White House. Within the Supreme Court, is it the case that there is an aisle, much as there in the United States Senate or the United States House of Representatives?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There is no aisle or separate caucus rooms in the Supreme Court, either literally or figuratively, in my view.

Senator LEE. And under most circumstances in most years, in recent—in the last decade or so, the number of cases that are decided on a 5-to-4 margin have been very low, less than 20 percent as far as I can count. Is that roughly consistent with your understanding?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is.

Senator LEE. Meaning that the configuration of 5-to-4 is much less common than basically all of the others. It is dwarfed in comparison to those cases that are decided either 9-to-0, which is often the biggest contingent, or 8-to-1, or 7-to-2, or 6-to-3. Now, even in those cases that are decided 5-to-4, does the fact that it was decided 5-to-4 make it any less of a legitimate decision? Does it make the judgment any less binding on the parties in that case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, it is still a decision of the Court no matter what the—what the ultimate majority opinion is composed of.

Senator LEE. And would it behoove a lawyer who is an officer of a court to call into question the subjective motivations of a court simply because of the fact that the Court decided a case on a 5-to-4 basis?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, if I were a lawyer arguing before the Supreme Court, I probably would refrain from questioning the motivations of the Justices. I think each of the Justices, I know them. They are all committed to the Constitution of the United States in impartially discharging their duties. Of course, they have different perspectives on certain issues, but they are all—I think we are fortunate to have eight hardworking Justices who have outstanding records and are committed to the Constitution and committed to the independence of the judiciary.

Senator LEE. What about in the—in the circuit court, in the D.C. Circuit where you have served? Would it be fair to suggest that a case is somehow less legitimately decided if that case were decided along the lines of the—which President appointed which member of the D.C. Circuit?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The precedent stands either way.

Senator LEE. Thank you. I want to get back to a separation of powers point that has come up along various lines of questions asked my colleagues today. Is the Constitution relegated to the judicial branch? Is it something that is to be upheld and interpreted only by those who wear black robes?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, Senator. Let me take you through the process, I think. So, Congress, of course, passes laws, and in considering laws, Congress will also often assess the possible constitutionality of the laws passed. So, in the first instance, when you are considering the passage of a law, you might assess the First Amendment implications, or if it is national security, the Fourth Amendment implications, and—or the due process Fifth Amendment implications.

Senator LEE. And we have all taken our own oath to uphold the Constitution.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right, so you do your best, and then the executive branch as well, the constitutional—whether to sign the bill, for example, for the President, if the President has a constitutional concern or a policy concern, but the President could veto the bill for that reason. That has certainly happened historically. And then when it comes to the Court, of course, we are—we assess in cases or controversies the constitutionality of a law that is challenged there in the context of a specific case or controversy. We do not—

President Washington, George Washington, asked the Supreme Court for an advisory opinion in his first term on a disputed legal issue. Actually, it might have been his second term. But President George Washington asked for an opinion, and the Supreme Court respectfully wrote back and said, we do not provide advisory opinions on—we only decide cases or controversies. Thereby, I think, underscoring the point you are making with your question, which is constitutionality of laws is assessed in the——

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Is assessed in the first instance by Congress and the Executive.

Senator LEE. So, it would be not—it would not be inappropriate for us as Members of the legislative branch to decide to protect something that we believe is constitutionally protected, regardless of where we might place our bets on what the courts would do it. If we see a particular right that might be jeopardized by an act of Congress we are considering, it would not be inappropriate for us to say, look, we are not sure exactly how far the Supreme Court will go here. Out of an abundance of caution, out of respect for the Constitution, we are going to draw the line more carefully so that we make sure that we do not step into unconstitutional territory.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That has happened historically, and I think happens today. And that underscores how the Constitution tilts toward liberty in so many different ways. It tilts toward liberty because it is hard to pass a law, as you know, with both Houses and the President, and then not only might there be policy objections, but Members of Congress might say, well, even if the Supreme Court would uphold this law based on my assessment of the Supreme Court, I have a First Amendment objection, a Fourth Amendment objection, Eighth Amendment, Cruel and Punishments Clause objection, Equal Protection objection, and based on my view of the Constitution, I am going to vote “no” on this law. That is another way in which the constitutional structure all fits together and tilts toward liberty.

Senator LEE. For that very reason, it would probably lead to some bad results if we were to not do that. In other words, if we were always inclined to say let us just pass this, if it is unconstitutional, the Court will do something about it. And, of course, you have instances in which they could create problems.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, Senator. I think Justice Kennedy has written eloquently about this. Each official—each officer in Congress, each Member of Congress, each Senator, the President takes an oath, of course, constitutional oath, to abide by the Constitution. And that is very important for each Member to understand and underscore, as I know all of you do, and that is an important part of the separation of powers process. I do not think that the Framers thought, well, let us pass something even though we ourselves, meaning the Members of Congress, think there is a constitutional problem here. That is not how it has worked historically, nor do I think that is how the Framers necessarily intended for Congress to work.

Senator LEE. And there are myriad of instances moreover in which we might enact something that for one reason or another might not be challenged for a long time, or might be difficult to challenge due to justiciability issues, somebody lacking standing, absence of a ripe controversy and so forth.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That particularly happens in the national security context, I think, Senator, because there is often not someone with standing, especially if it is something being done in a foreign country against foreign citizens that might be difficult to get into court in some way or another.

Senator LEE. One of the reasons I focus on this today is there was an exchange you had with one of my colleagues earlier today about the indefinite definition of American citizens apprehended on U.S. soil. There was some discussion surrounding this, suggesting that Ex Parte Quirin might somehow justify this. You do not need to respond to this, but I think it is a point that needs to be mentioned.

Justice Scalia mentioned in his dissent in Hamdan that Ex Parte Quirin was not this Court's finest hour. And, in fact, what happened was the case was argued. It was decided the next day. The saboteurs were taken out and executed the next week. Then the opinion itself was issued many months later. So, again, I'm not asking you to opine on the ongoing validity of Ex Parte Quirin, but the point is, you seem to agree that Congress certainly has the authority to protect liberty, notwithstanding the possibility that the Supreme Court might not step in, in a particular case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely. A couple of points in response to that, Senator, if I might. Justice Scalia, of course, dissented in that case joined by Justice Stephens, one of his more powerful dissents on individual liberty.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. One of his more powerful dissents protecting individual liberty there, ruling, Justice Scalia with Justice Stephens, that it was impermissible to hold an American citizen in long-term military detention, and I thought that was an important opinion of his. When I gave a talk once about Justice Scalia, I identified that as one of his most important opinions and a very powerful opinion.

On the Quirin opinion itself, it also dealt with some—many who were not American citizens. But you are right, there was an American—there were American citizens involved. The Court, you are right, of course—you have studied this as much as anyone, but the Court did resolve the case very quickly. And the opinion, I have spent many an hour trying to decipher certain paragraphs of that opinion for cases I have had. It is not easy.

I will—I will say the Court to its credit—give it a little credit—did have an 8-hour or something oral argument. The Attorney General of the United States argued Quirin personally, and I have read the transcript of that to try to figure out what was going on in the opinion that did not unlock the box completely for me on what was going on in the Quirin opinion. But your point, Justice Scalia did say it is not—was not the Court's finest hour. It was a rush. It was a rush. And rushes—sometimes the Court has to rush, but rushed decisions in a judicial context sometimes are not always the best.

Senator LEE. On that point, would you be open to the idea of bringing back the era of the 8-hour oral argument?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not—the 8—hour oral argument. We did have one in a—in an en banc case maybe 2 years ago that went all afternoon.

Senator LEE. That sounds like—

Judge KAVANAUGH. After we got back to the conference room, I do not think anyone was saying we should do that in every case.

Senator LEE. Understood. Understood. Let us talk about judicial philosophy for a minute. I would like to discuss Federalist 78. In Federalist 78, Hamilton discusses the dichotomy between will on the one hand and judgment on the other; “will” being something that is exercised by the political branches, primarily by the Congress, by the legislative branch, and “judgment” being something exercised by the judicial branch. What is the difference between those two?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The judicial branch is deciding cases or controversies according to law. The legislative branch is making the policy, exercising the will. The judicial branch can never exercise the policymaking role that is reserved to the Congress. Now, admittedly that is speaking to the level of generality and there are tough cases at the margins always in trying to figure out what the line is here.

But as a general proposition, it is important for every judge to go in with the mindset of I am not the policymaker. I am the law interpreter, the law applier in a particular case. And I think that is a very important part of the Federalist papers that is woven into the constitutional structure into Article III. And that judges—I certainly have tried for 12 years as a judge on the D.C. Circuit to incorporate that basic foundational principle into how I approach each case. And it is a very critical bedrock principle of what judges do in our constitutional system.

Senator LEE. Now, within that framework, when we enact a law, what determines what it is that you have interpret, that you have to interpret? Is it what we say or is what we subjectively intended?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is what is written in the text of the statute, Senator. Just Kagan said it well at a talk 2 years ago, maybe 3, at Harvard Law School. I was present in the audience. She said we are all textualists now. She was talking about Justice Scalia, who, of course, brought about significant change in the focus of all Federal judges. I have seen it across the supposed philosophical spectrum. All Federal judges pay very close attention to the text of the statute, and that is why I think Justice Kagan said we are all textualists now because she explained that every judge really cares about the words that are passed by Congress.

Now, why is that? I think about it both from a formal and a functionalist perspective. As a formal matter, the law passed by Congress is the binding law, is what is signed by the President. It is what has gone through Senate and the House, and that is the law. But also as a practical or functional matter, I think having seen the legislative process, I know how compromises come together in the House and the Senate, within the Senate, within the House. There are negotiations late at night over precise words and compromises inevitably. Legislation is compromise. The Constitution was a compromise Legislation is a compromise.

And when we depart from the words that are specified in the text of the statute, we are potentially upsetting the compromise that you all carefully negotiated in the legislative negotiations that you might have had with each other. And so, that is a danger that I try to point out when we are having oral argument in a case or we are deciding cases, that if we deviate from what Congress wrote, we are potentially upsetting this careful compromise. Even if we think we would have struck the compromise in a different place as judges, that is not really our role. So, I think both as a formal and functional matter, it is important to stick to the text.

There are canons of interpretation, which occasionally cause you a presumption of mens rea, presumption against extra territoriality and the like that cause you to superimpose a presumption on the text. But otherwise, sticking to what you passed is very important.

Senator LEE. But you certainly consider yourself a textualist, and if you follow Justice Kagan's statement, we are all textualists now. That is what judging is. Judging is—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Judging is paying attention to the text, in statutory cases paying attention to the text of the statute informed by those canons of construction such as presumption against extraterritoriality, presumption of mens rea, presumption against implied repeals, things like that, that are settled canons, although some of the canons are not so settled, which is a whole separate half hour of discussions.

Senator LEE. How does textualism relate to or differ from originalism?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, originalism, as I see it, has—to my mind means, in essence, consequential textualism, meaning the original public meaning of the constitutional text. Now, originalism, it is very careful when you talk about originalism to understand that people are hearing different things sometimes. So, Justice Kagan, again, at her—at her confirmation hearing said we are all originalists now, which was her comment. By that, she meant the precise text of the Constitution matters, and by that, the original public meaning, of course, informed by history, and tradition, and precedent. Those matter as well.

There is a different conception that some people used to have of originalism, which was is there original intent. In other words, what did the people—some people—

Senator LEE. Subjectively.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Subjectively intend the text to mean, and that has fallen out of the analysis because, for example, let us just take the Fourteenth Amendment, Equal Protection Clause. Well, it says right in the text, “equal protection.” “Equal” means “equal.” As the Supreme Court said in Strauder, what is that but the law shall be the same for the Black and the White, and Brown v. Board focuses on the text. But there were some racist Members of Congress involved in that who did not think it should apply in that way to certain aspects of public life, but we do not—if you are doing—paying attention to the text, you do not take account of those subjective intentions, nor is it proper as a general proposition to take account of the subjective intentions.

They can be evident in certain cases, the First Amendment, for example, of the meaning of the words—

Senator LEE. Of the original public meaning.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of the original public meaning. They can be evidence of that, but you are not—you do not follow the subjective intention. So, original public meaning, originalism, what I refer to as constitutional textualism, what Senator Cruz yesterday, I think, referred to as constitutionalism or constitutionalist. I think those are all referring to the same things, which is the words of the Constitution matter.

Of course, as I have said repeatedly, you also look at historical—the history. You look at the tradition. Federalist 37 tells us to look at the liquidation of the meeting by historical practice over time. And then you look at precedent, which is woven into Article III, as I said in Federalist 78. But the—you know, start with the words as Justice Kagan said, we are all originalists now in that respect of paying at least some attention to. More than some. Paying attention to the words of the Constitution.

Senator LEE. So, if we stipulate, for our purposes today, as we are having this conversation, that originalism refers to basically textualism applied in the constitutional sphere with an eye toward identifying the original public meaning of the constitutional text at issue, you are an originalist.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, and as Justice Kagan said, I think that is what she meant, we are all originalists now. And I do not—I think she said what she meant and meant what she said when said that.

Senator LEE. Sure. What, by the way, would be the argument against that? To me, that sounds like judging. Why would one argue against being that type of judge, against being a textualist originalist?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, there are different philosophies of what a judge does, but I think that judges, you know, what the role of a judge is. But I think the law—Article VI of the Constitution says this Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, and the word “law” is very important there. It is not a set of aspirational principles. It is law that can be applied in court, and what is the law? The law are the words that were ratified by the people, and, therefore, can be applied in the—in the courts of the United States. And it says the “supreme law.” What does it mean by that? It means when you pass a statute that is inconsistent with the Constitution, the supreme law controls, namely the Constitution controls over a contrary statute, and that is, of course, also discussed in Federalist 78 as well of what is the supreme law of the land, and the Constitution is the supreme law.

Again, precedent, historical practice subsequent to the passing of the text. We see that, for example, in the Establishment Clause cases. The Court will often look at the text. What is the historical practice and precedent, which I have said is rooted in Article III. Those things all go into it, but the words, the original public meaning are an important part of constitutional interpretation, and has been, I think, throughout.

Senator LEE. Let us suppose Congress in its infinite wisdom—with its approval rating that ranges between 9 and 11 percent, making us slightly less popular than Raul Castro in America, and slightly more popular than the influenza virus, which is rapidly gaining on us—what if we decided that, you know, we are all busy. There are parades to attend. There are political rallies to organize. We get tired of the busy, drudgerous work of actually making laws, and we also do not want to make ourselves accountable for the laws we pass. It is much easier to just pass a broader statement. So, we say we hereby pass a law that says we in the United States of America shall have good law, and we hereby delegate to the herewith created United States commission on the creation of good laws the power to promulgate, and interpret, and enforce good laws in the United States. What constitutional issues do you see there?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the Congress is, of course, assigned the legislative power in Article I of the Constitution, so if it delegates wholesale the constitutional power to another body, then that naturally poses a question of whether the body exercising that power ultimately has improperly exercised the legislative power, and whether that rule or what have you that is enacted by that body is lawful because it was not enacted by Congress. So, the Framers intended that Congress would enact the laws, and that the Executive would enforce the laws, and that the judiciary would, of course, resolve cases and controversies arising under those laws.

Senator LEE. And yet in some respects, it is not that far removed from some of what we do today. We may not pass something as extreme as what I have described in my hypothetical, but in some cases we will essentially say we shall have good law in area X, and we hereby give commission Y the power to make and enforce good laws in that area. So, is there some point at which we cross a threshold of unconstitutional delegation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Supreme Court, as you know, Senator, has a non-delegation principle, and at least under current precedent, it is allowed the delegation—and I do not want to get too specific here, but it is allowed some delegation. Some Justices or judges would say actually when the Executive enacts rules pursuant to those delegations, that is the exercise of Executive power, but I think there has been some pushback on that. And in any event, the Supreme Court has doctrine on the non-delegation principle, and the line is debated on where that should be drawn. But there is precedent that does suggest that at some point, Congress can go too far in how much power it delegates to an executive or independent agency.

Senator LEE. And when we do that at some point, we are shirking our own responsibility because we are making lawmakers rather than laws, and we are also consolidating into one body the power to make and enforce laws, which is not only something that can lead to tyranny, it is the very definition of “tyranny” itself.

I want to get to the campaign finance discussion that you were having a few minutes ago with Senator Whitehouse. With regard to Citizens United, did the Supreme Court uphold the disclosure requirements at issue in Citizens United?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It did. I believe that was an 8-to-1 margin.

Senator LEE. And, in fact, you have written on this, that there is a distinction for First Amendment purposes, for constitutional purposes, between laws mandating disclosure and laws banning the doing or the saying of something. Is that not right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what the Supreme Court has said in certain context, and that is the law as set forth by the Supreme Court. Citizens United is a good example of that, Senator.

Senator LEE. And in a case called EMILY's List v. FEC, you wrote that disclosure requirements trigger rights that receive “less First Amendment protection” than speech prohibitions—other types of speech prohibitions.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I think that followed from Supreme Court law and is consistent, I believe, with subsequent Supreme Court law. Of course, the subsequent Supreme Court law controls.

Senator LEE. Do you have a favorite among the Federalist Papers?

[Laughter.]

Senator LEE. I am not asking you to choose here between Liza and—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, no, that is right. Yes. So, I like a lot of Federalist Papers. Federalist 78, of course, the independent judiciary, the role of the judiciary. Federalist 69, which says the Presidency is not a monarchy is a very important one. Hamilton explains all the ways in which the Presidency is not a monarchy in our constitutional system. I think that is very important. Federalist 10, which talks about factions in America, and explains that having the separation of powers in the federalism system, dividing power in so many different ways would help prevent a faction from gaining control of the entire—all the power for the people of the United States. And that makes it frustrating at times because it is hard to pass new legislation, but that also—that division of power helps protect individual liberty, and I think that comes a bit from Federalist 10.

Federalist 37 and 39 talk about, on the one hand, how we were just talking, laws or the Constitution over time can be the term liquidated by historical practice. What does that mean? That means that as the branches fill out the meaning of the Constitution over time with practices, those can be relevant in how the Court subsequently interprets certain provisions. We see that in Dames & Moore v. Regan, for example. We talk also about the national and Federal Government, so the combination in 39, the combination that we have this odd—that is the genius, right—of having a national government plus State governments, and then within the national government, the House is proportional representation, the Senate is State representation. That interesting compromise which Madison, by the way, was opposed to, but that compromise at the Convention.

Federalist 47, which Senator Klobuchar mentioned yesterday, the accumulation of all power in one body is the very definition of tyranny. I start—so, I start my separation of powers class every year with that exact quote that you read yesterday, Senator Klobuchar, because that is very important. 51, if men were angels, we do not—we would not need government. So, sorry, I have got eight kids.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEE. No, it is brilliant, and I think that is a greatest hits list. If these were on Spotify, I would say you put together a list of those. Let us close in the minute and a half I have got left, and I gave myself an additional 30 seconds because of the two interruptions there. Tell me how you were informed by Federalist 51, and how that relates to your role as a jurist, your role as a jurist now on the D.C. Circuit, the role that you would play if you were confirmed to the United States Supreme Court. This understanding that government is an exercise in understanding human nature. If we were angels, we would not need government, and if we had access to angels to govern over us, we would not need all these rules, these cumbersome rules that make government so inefficient and so frustrating. Why is that important, and how does that affect you as a judge when trying to interpret the Constitution and trying to interpret acts taken pursuant thereto?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is an—that is an interesting question, Senator. I think we recognize that we are all imperfect, first of all. All of us as humans are imperfect, and that that includes judges, and that includes legislators, and it includes all of us are imperfect. And so, we recognize that in how we go about setting up our Government. If there were some perfect group of people, we would put all the power in that one body, but because we are imperfect, putting all the power in that one body would be, as Senator Klobuchar was saying, the definition of tyranny.

So, I think the way we deal with the imperfection while also having a government, because we are imperfect, is dividing the power, separating the power. And, again, to my mind, that all reinforces why the Framers, the genius—despite the flaws in the Constitution, and there were flaws—the genius of separating the legislative, executive, and judicial powers, tilting toward liberty in all those respects, and then having a federalism system where we would still have State governments that can further protect liberty and be laboratories of democracy as well. I think all that, because we are imperfect and because we recognize the imperfections.

It is also why we have things like a jury system and even within the judiciary we did not trust a judge to do trials on his or her own, criminal trials or civil trials. We have a jury system to recognize, and we have usually 12, and that is designed to recognize that we are imperfect, and sometimes that is why we group decision-making. That is why we have 535 legislators. That is why we have nine Justices. We do not usually have one person, and so, too, in juries.

So, I think that all maybe stems from the same philosophical understanding that we are imperfect beings, and that we divide power, and that we make sure that no one person in a jury situation or other situations where our liberty can be affected is exercising total control.

Senator LEE. Great. Thank you very much, Judge. My time has expired. I am not the Chairman of this Committee, even though I am playing him on TV. I understand that under the previous order entered before he left, we are supposed to take a 10-minute break. We will stand in recess for 10 minutes.

[Whereupon the Committee was recessed and reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Welcome back, Judge Kavanaugh.

Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I was just visited by your wife, who is here, and she just told me you celebrated your 64th wedding anniversary. Is that correct?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, nobody's going to believe that.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Yes, well, that is what she told me. I thought this was very romantic that you are gathered here.

[Laughter.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I want to start, Judge Kavanaugh, going back to where we started yesterday, and that is about the documents, the production of documents from the time that you worked in the White House. Do you personally have any objections to the release of the documents from your time as staff secretary?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not going to take a position. That is, in my view, a decision for the Committee in consultation or discussion with the executive branch and the—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. So you are not going to say whether or not you have a problem with it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not think it is my role to say one way or another, at least, as I analyze the current situation. That is a decision for the Committee and the executive branch and the Presidential library. They are President Bush's documents ultimately.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Since right now we are not able to review those documents in addition to the 102,000 that the White House has deemed "theirs," that we are not able to see and asserted a privilege that has never happened before in a Supreme Court nomination hearing, is there anything in those documents or in the staff secretary documents that you think we would like to know that is relevant to some of the topics we have discussed today? I mean, you must know what is in them.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before you answer, without taking time off of her time, it is incorrect that "committee confidential," no Senators can see those records. Any—all 100 Senators can see those records. In fact, we set up separate terminals so people can go there. We have not had very many people take us up on the offer.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. But, Mr. Chairman, not to go into my time either, to respond to you, I was not talking about those 189,000 documents. I was talking about the ones that we are not allowed to see at all from the staff secretary time, as well as the 102,000 that the White House has asserted privilege on that we are not able to see. So I am not even talking about the 189,000. Okay. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I stand corrected.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. All right.

So, again, I asked if there is anything in those documents you think would be relevant to our discussion here?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, those documents are President Bush's documents and for the Committee and the Bush Library and the executive branch to negotiate about. And as discussed, I have 12 years of judicial record, and this is not a new issue. This is an issue that came up in Justice Scalia's hearing and Chief Justice Roberts' experience with the SG documents with Justice Kagan.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Those are Solicitor General. I am talking about the ones in the White House time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I guess I am not seeing a distinction. They are both executive branch documents, so there is one executive branch.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I think one is involving the ongoing Solicitor General, but I have just one more question on this line. You just said that rush decisions are not always the best in answer to the discussion with Senator Lee. Do you think a good judge would grant a continuance to someone who just received 42,000 documents on the day before the start of a trial?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not—that is a decision for the Committee, and I am not familiar with the circumstances of the document.

On the Solicitor General documents, I just want to say one thing. With Chief Justice Roberts, it was not active cases. Those 4 years of his documents from the time he was Solicitor General from 1989 to 1993—he was nominated in 2005. It is my understanding that those documents—so my only point is it is not a new issue, but it is also not for the nominee to decide because they are the President's, former President's documents.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. Why don't we move on to the Executive power issues. Yesterday I mentioned your submission to the University of Minnesota Law Review. We thank you for making our law review so famous over the last month or so. In that article, you said that a President should not be subject to investigations while in office. You said in our meeting that Congress would likely act quickly if the President does something, in your words, "dastardly," a word you also used in the article. And I am struggling with the practical implications of that. What about a President who commits murder or if she jeopardizes national security or he obstructs an investigation or a white-collar crime? How do you differentiate between these crimes when you characterized them as "dastardly"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So I think there are several issues going on in that question, Senator. The first thing I want to underscore is that what I wrote in the Minnesota Law Review was in 2009 when President Obama was President or becoming President, was thoughts on a variety of topics reflecting on my experience—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I just want to pick up the tempo a little with my questions because I have so many of them. Could we get to that point about the "dastardly," if there is a way to differentiate?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, but just to underscore it is real important. That was a proposal to be considered. It was not a constitutional position. I did not take any constitutional position on the issues you are raising. I want to underscore that. And if a constitutional question came to me, I would have an open mind and decide that.

On your point—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But there is not any clear text in the Constitution that speaks to the question, so instead these are your own recommendations based on your own views and experience. Would that be a fair characterization?

Judge KAVANAUGH. But there are two different things going on. The one is about special counsel investigations, for example, or criminal investigations or civil lawsuits, and that is a question for Congress to consider whether they want to supplement the protection provided by Clinton v. Jones because there was a lot of criticism of Clinton v. Jones.

The second question, getting right to your point, is what is an impeachable offense, and that is actually a decision for you, not for me, because the House and the Senate—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But I am just figuring out how whether we know something is dastardly or not if we cannot even investigate it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think I am going to repeat that is a question for the—you are asking for—is it a high crime or misdemeanor?

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I am asking about your position that you stated in this law review article that a President is not subject to investigations while in office.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The “dastardly” comment—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. You are only saying that they should be subject to investigation as part of an impeachment and that there is no other investigation that could occur? Is that—

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. I was—first of all, on constitutional position on criminal investigation and prosecution, I did not take a position on the constitutionality, period. The idea that I talked about was something for Congress to look at if it wanted, so that is point one. Point two is the idea that if the—what is an impeachable offense, and that really is a question for the House and the Senate.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Let me move on. This is about actual opinions and really along the same lines, and I know Senator Coons is going to talk to you about the special counsel statute, and we are very concerned about that. But in the Seven-Sky v. Holder case, I quote, this is you: “Under the Constitution, the President may decline to enforce a statute that regulates private individuals when the President deems the statute unconstitutional, even if a court has held or would hold the statute constitutional.”

And so then you told me when we had the talk in my office that you attempted to clarify your views two years later in the Aiken County case, but it seems inconsistent to me. So is it the case, your views, as expressed in actual opinions, not law review articles, that a President can just ignore a law until a court upholds it, like you said in Aiken County, or that a President can continue to ignore a law even after a court upholds it, like you said in Seven-Sky?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So ignore is not—the concept there, as I think we discussed when we met, and we had a good back-and-forth on that—the concept is prosecutorial discretion, and that is the concept I referred to in the Aiken County opinion to explain the footnote you are referencing. And prosecutorial discretion is, of course, firmly rooted—United States v. Richard Nixon case says the executive branch has the absolute—“exclusive authority and absolute discretion whether to prosecute a case.” That is an exact quote from United States v. Richard Nixon. And then Heckler v. Chaney says that that applies also in the civil context. And the limits—so prosecutorial discretion is well recognized. In other words, the U.S. Attorney’s Office might prosecute gang violence, but let low-level marijuana offenses go, in terms of an exercise of prosecutorial discretion.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. So if a court has held a statute constitutional, do you believe that a President should have to enforce it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, for example, let us talk about, for example, the marijuana laws. Those are constitutional. But a U.S. Attorney or the Attorney General could say, “We are not going to devote our resources to low-level marijuana offenses.” Those are perfectly constitutional.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Let me just try one other example, the Texas case on pre-existing conditions. The administration has taken the position that that is unconstitutional, that part of the Affordable Care Act down in the Texas case, taking the position that you could actually throw people off of their insurance if they have a pre-existing condition. So let us say that that law is found to be constitutional. Could the President choose not to implement the part of the law providing protections for pre-existing conditions?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that is a pending case, so I cannot talk about it.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. This is just my concern because of this expansive view of Executive power where it brings us and where we end up.

I want to move on to some consumer issues. In 2016, you wrote an opinion, which was later overturned by the full D.C. Circuit, in which you found the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau unconstitutional. The majority recognized that millions of people were devastated by the financial crisis, and they upheld this Bureau, and we know now, in real time, the Bureau has helped about 30 million consumers obtain more than $12 billion in relief. But you dissented in the case, and I want to talk about the consequences of this legally. I know you focused on the Bureau’s structure. We talked about that. You looked at the relevant history, and you said that agencies like the CFPB, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, amount to a headless fourth branch of our Government, and that they “pose a significant threat to individual liberty.”

So does it follow that you think that other independent agencies are also constitutionally suspect?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has, of course, upheld since 1935, the Humphrey’s Executor decision, the concept and practice of independent agencies. On the CFPB decision, the structure of that agency deviated from the traditional historical practice of independent agencies—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. So you think the Humphrey’s case that was 80 years ago was correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is a precedent of the Supreme Court, and it has been reaffirmed many times. But on that CFPB case, I need to get this out, which is, I did not say that the agency had to stop operating. It could continue operating, and it still operates. What my constitutional concern was, was the structure with the single-member head, which had never been done before for an independent agency of that kind, and my remedy would not have been to invalidate the agency at all but would have been to make that person removable at will, and then you could have, if you wanted, amended the statute to have a multi-member agency.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. It also concerns me because other agencies like, say, the Social Security Administration, which you note in the dissent, in the opinion, they are also just headed up by one person, right? So then, does it follow that that agency, as well, would be unconstitutional?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Again, Senator, my—let us go from the back door, which is the remedy, if there is a problem, is not that the agency has to stop operating. The remedy is that the person, a single person, would be removable at will instead of for cause. But the agency would continue to operate and perform its—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But it would not have anyone heading it up.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. It would have a single person heading it up, but removable at will in the case of the CFPB, so the agency—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I want to turn to what the majority felt about your dissent, and I think they recognized that the dissent would threaten many, if not all, independent agencies. I think they specifically mentioned the FTC, and I would add other ones like the Federal Reserve, Securities and Exchange Commission. Does it follow that you think these agencies are unconstitutional?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, I did not say anything remotely like that, respectfully, Senator, in the case. All I was talking about was a single-headed independent agency.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But that is like Social Security.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But the SEC, the FTC, those are the traditional—the FERC, the NLRB, are all—the Fed, are all multi-member independent agencies. And so those agencies are all the traditional Humphrey's Executor agencies. And the concern I explained with the single-director independent agency goes back to your point about Federalist No. 47, which is if you have an independent agency that is completely unaccountable to Congress or the President and it is one person in charge, that becomes an extremely powerful position.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. But Social Security has been like that for a long time, and so my issue is, when we were talking about Executive power, you talked about how Congress has to step in, right? That is a lot of the argument you have made to some of my colleagues—Senator Sasse; Congress has to step in. But in this case, Congress stepped in. Congress said we had this major financial crisis. That is why we started this agency. We have done this. And then you come in and in a minority opinion here, and you say that it is unconstitutional. And I would throw another Federalist Society back at you, Federalist quote. You quoted Hamilton yesterday from Federalist 83 when he said, “the rules of legal interpretation are rules of common sense.” Right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. I agree with that.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. All right. So it just does not make common sense to me that we would throw an agency out like that or—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I did not.

Senator KLOBUCHAR [continuing]. Even the head of it. You are basically putting your judgment in the place of Congress.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I did not throw the agency out. I said the agency could continue operating as it was. The only change would be instead of being for-cause removal, it would be at-will removal. That was the only—there was a judge, not me, on our court who said because of that constitutional flaw, the whole agency had to stop operating. I specifically and explicitly rejected that as a remedy and said, no, the agency can continue operating, doing its important consumer functions.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. But let us go to one where you actually did throw out the rules, and that is net neutrality. Right? And that is in my mind a bedrock of a free and open Internet, allowing consumers and small businesses to have an equal playing field. But in U.S. Telecom Association v. FCC, in your own opinion you went out of your way to dissent against the protections. This was the full D.C. Court against you, and the rules were upheld by a panel of judges appointed by Presidents from both parties. And here you relied on something else that you came up with called the “major rules doctrine,” and I know it has been mentioned in dicta, in a 2015 case, but in claiming that the FCC lacked authority to issue net neutrality rules because they were, in your words, “major.”

So, again, it feels to me like Congress set up the FCC, and the FCC is doing their job in a really complex policy matter. They put forward these rules on net neutrality. And then you insert your judgment to say that they are unconstitutional. So tell me why I am wrong.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The major rules doctrine, or major questions doctrine, is rooted in Supreme Court precedent, and, therefore, as a lower-court judge, I was bound to apply it. It was applied by the majority opinion in the Brown & Williamson decision. The godfather of the major rules, or major questions doctrine is Justice Breyer who wrote about it in the 1980s as a way to apply Chevron. The Supreme Court adopted that in the Brown & Williamson case, applied it in the UARG case, the one you referenced Justice Scalia’s opinion. And what that opinion says is, it is okay for Congress to delegate various matters to the executive agencies to do rules, but on major questions of major economic or social significance, we expect Congress to speak clearly before such a delegation, and that had not happened, in my view, with respect to net neutrality, and I felt bound by precedent, therefore, to apply the major questions or major rules doctrine.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. So minor rules would be okay, but not major? And I know in the decision you said, well, you will know the difference when you see it, and I think that is why the other judges on the court, appointed by both parties, went with the traditional and precedential view of how to look at this, and you used the 1986 law review article by Justice Breyer, and then in dicta, from the King v. Burwell case in 2015. And it just—what I am trying to show here is this pattern where to say, oh, Congress should step in and do everything, you are stepping in in these cases.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So I would say it is a pattern of adhering to precedent.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. Well, it just seems that the precedent to me when you look at, for instance, Chevron, and I know the White House touted the fact that you have overruled the Federal agency action 75 times, and they said that you led the effort to rein in executive agencies in the press release when you were announced. How do you explain—what does that mean, how you led the effort?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know. I do not know what that is referring to. I know my record. I am sure I have upheld agency decisions dozens and dozens and dozens and dozens of times. We get agency cases. That is what we do on the D.C. Circuit, and I have upheld them, I am sure, in the same range, if not many more times. And so I think my record will show that I have ruled both ways on those kinds of cases. I do not think I have a pro this or pro that record.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. One last question in this area on consumers. The major rules doctrine actually raises questions to me about your view of Chevron, and as you know, it is that 1984 case—I would think it is settled law, but I will ask you that—where courts generally defer to reasonable interpretations of agencies. And what would you replace it with if you are not going to uphold it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The precedent says that courts should defer to reasonable agency interpretations of ambiguous statutes, and the whole question of ambiguity has become a difficult inquiry. At least it has been in my 12 years of experience in the D.C. Circuit. How much ambiguity is enough? And I wrote a law review article in the Harvard Law Review about that problem of judges disagreeing about ambiguity and how much is enough. But I also said in that article that Chevron serves good purposes in cases where it is somewhat of an overlap with the State Farm doctrine, so statutory terms like “feasible” or “reasonable” are terms of discretion that are granted to agencies and that courts should be careful not to unduly second-guess agencies. And I have written an opinion, American Radio Relay League, where I made clear that courts should not be unduly second-guessing agencies.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. I want to move to campaign finance since those were the documents that I received and we are able to make public. Of course, I think they all should be made public, the ones that—and I do not like this Committee classification, what happened, but the Chairman did allow me to make those public. And in those documents, in one email from March 2002, you discuss limits on contributions to candidates saying, “And I have heard very few people say that the limits on contributions to candidates are unconstitutional, although I for one tend to think those limits have some constitutional problems.”

I just want to know with the Buckley v. Valeo case from 1976 being settled law, it seems like you have some issues with those rulings. How do you view the precedent created by Buckley? And would you respect it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Buckley divide, as you know, Senator, is that expenditures on the one side, Congress does not have substantial authority to regulate contribution limits; on the other side, Congress does have authority to regulate and has done so.

With respect to contribution limits, however, there are cases where the contribution limits are too low, so subsequent to the email you are talking about, the Supreme Court has twice struck down contribution limits, one in a case Randall v. Sorrell—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I am aware of these cases.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Justice Breyer wrote. So I do not think there is—Buckley v. Valeo is an important precedent. There is a lot of case law subsequent to those emails: McConnell, Wisconsin Right to Life, Citizens United, which fleshes out some of those—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I mean, my issue is that we have had past nominees who said they would honor precedent, and then they joined the Citizens United opinion. And when I was hearing your discussion with Senator Whitehouse in which you talked about how Congress should step in again, and they did with the McCain-Feingold bill, and we tried, and then it was struck down basically with Citizens United. And so, that is the problem. We are left with nothing now but a constitutional amendment. And I personally view this as lawmaking from the Court, the Citizens United case. So I am trying to figure out where you are on this. Do you think contribution limits have constitutional problems? And what can Congress actually do to rein in the flood of money?

Judge KAVANAUGH. As a D.C. Circuit judge, I have upheld contribution limits in two important cases—one ruling against the RNC in RNC v. FEC, where it was challenging limits on contributions to political parties, and I rejected that challenge; in another, Bluman v. FEC, contributions by foreign citizens to U.S. election campaigns, and I upheld that law.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Let us just talk about that case because your opinion left open the possibility of unlimited spending by foreign nationals in the United States on issue advocacy, the same kind of activity that we saw by the Russians in 2016. And, in fact, a Russian company facing charges brought by Special Counsel Mueller actually cited your opinion in arguing to have these charges thrown out. Does that concern you at all?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Our case dealt with contribution limits, so that is what I was opining on in that case. So I am not sure that there are—the state of the law and the expenditure limits was not before us in that case, and so I do not want to opine on expenditure limits.

What I did do—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Well, you should know that it was—that opinion was cited by—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I do not know if it was cited—well, I do not want to talk about a pending case.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. All right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But my case, I upheld—importantly, I upheld limits on contributions in the RNC case and in the Bluman case, and the Supreme Court has upheld contribution limits generally, but struck them down when they are too low in cases like Randall v. Sorrell and McCutcheon.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. In light of the recent indictments, do you stand by your interpretation of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act in that case, the Bluman case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not sure the question—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. We can go back to it on the second round. I look forward to it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay, antitrust. Senator Lee and I run the Antitrust Subcommittee, and, as you know, in recent years—we talked about this in my office—the Supreme Court has made it harder to enforce our antitrust laws in cases like Trinko, Twombly, Leegin, and, most recently, Ohio v. American Express. This could not be happening, in my view, at a more troubling time. We are experiencing a wave of industry consolidation. Annual merger filings increased by more than 50 percent between 2010 and 2016. I am concerned that the Court, the Roberts Court, is going down the wrong path, and your major antitrust opinions would have rejected challenges to mergers that the majority has found to be anti-competitive. So I am afraid you are going to move it even further down that path, starting with the 2008 Whole Foods case where Whole Foods attempted to buy Wild Oats Markets. It is very complicated, so I am just going to go to the guts of it from my opinion.

The majority of courts and the—what happened: There was a Republican majority; FTC challenges a deal; and then you dissent, and you apply your own pricing test to the merger. My simple question is: Where did you get this pricing test?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I affirmed—I would have affirmed the decision by the district judge in that case which allowed the merger, and the district judge, Judge Friedman, an appointee of President Clinton's to the district court, and I was following his analysis of the merger. That case is, as I think we discussed, very fact-specific, really turns on whether the larger supermarkets sell organic foods or not. And so that was a fact—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But where did you get the pricing test, is what I want to know, because you used a different test? And I am trying to figure that out, what legal authority actually requires a Government to satisfy your standard to block a merger? I think what I remember in our discussion, you cited these nonbinding horizontal merger guidelines that you used to come up with this test.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, you are looking at the effect on competition and what the Supreme Court has told us, at least from the late 1970s, is to look at the effect on consumers and what is the effect on the prices for consumers. And the theory of the district court and Judge Friedman in this case was that the merger would not cause an increase in prices because they were competing in a broader market that included larger supermarkets that also sold organic food. The question was really: Is there an organic food market solely, or is there a broader supermarket market? And that is what the case—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I was just trying to get to where that new test came from. So in the second case, you also dissented in the Anthem case last year, and your opinion would have allowed a merger between two of the four nationwide health insurance providers, which was eventually blocked because it would lead to higher prices for health care in the long term and what was viewed as poorer quality insurance. And here you actually went a step farther than Whole Foods. Instead of just trying to raise the bar on what the Government would have to prove to block a merger, you also tried to lower the bar for merging companies trying to justify their deals. And your opinion suggests you would lower the bar for merging companies that are trying to prove their deals will not harm competition.

Does that represent your views when it comes to mergers?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is a very fact-specific case, and the market in question there where two health insurers that were not selling health insurance in the downstream market but were acting as purchasing agents for employers in the upstream market where they negotiated prices with hospitals and doctors, and so the theory, at least as I understood it, which I agreed with, was that by having a stronger purchasing agent, they would be able to negotiate lower prices from hospitals and doctors for the employers. And I pointed out in the end of my dissent, Senator, that there might be a problem in the upstream hospital-doctor market, but I did not think there was a problem in the market that was at issue in the case. And I specifically said I would have sent it back to the district court for analysis of whether the merger was a problem in that other—it is a three—it is—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But you did suggest that the Court should disregard two cases that have been widely relied on for more than 50 years in antitrust, Brown Shoe and Philadelphia National Bank. Do you think courts now applying these cases are wrong to do so?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think the Supreme Court in the 1970s moved away from the analysis in those cases because those cases focused on the effect on competition—I mean on competitors, not competition. And in the 1970s, the Supreme Court moved to focus on the effect on competition, which in turn is really consumer—what would be the effect on consumers.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cruz.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And could I, just one—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Proceed.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. It is just that this antitrust issue is, as you know, very dense.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But, again, I am very concerned about what is going on with these cases nationally. And then when I looked at these two cases, it appears to me that you would go even further. And I think we need less mergers, not more.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I add one thing?

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And more competition. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. When I referred to the overlap of Chevron and State Farm, that is when I was talking about words like “feasible” and “reasonable.” I was not sure I was clear on that.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cruz.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome back, Judge Kavanaugh.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, again, for your service.

Before I get into questions, I just want to take a minute to recognize and thank the outstanding work at this hearing by the Capitol Police in terms of in a calm and professional manner dealing with the unfortunate disruptions we have seen and maintaining an environment where this hearing can focus on the record and substance of this nominee. And so thank you for the tremendous work that the men and women here are doing.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I think we would like to second—and Senator Cruz—second that sentiment on our side as well.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thanks both of you very much. I have expressed it to many of the policemen individually as I see them. Proceed. Start his 30 minutes over.

Senator CRUZ. Judge Kavanaugh, let us start with just a general question. What makes a good judge?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, a good judge is independent, first of all, under our constitutional system, someone who is impartial, who is an umpire, who is not wearing the uniform of one litigant or another, of one policy or another, someone who reads the law as written, informed by history and tradition and precedent in constitutional cases, the law as written, informed by canons of construction that are settled in statutory cases, that treats litigants with respect, that writes opinions that are understandable and that resolve the issues. I think civility and collegiality help make a good judge. A good judge understands that real people are affected in the real world, the litigants in front of them, but also the other people affected by the decisions the judge decides or the court decides in a particular case. A good judge pays attention to precedent, which is in constitutional cases, of course, rooted in Article III and critically important to the stability and predictability and reliance interests that are protected by the law.

So there are a number of things that go into making a good judge: a work ethic. It is hard work to dig in and find the right answer in a particular case, and I think that is critically important as well. Judicial temperament. There are a lot of factors that go into it, and those are some of them. I am sure there are more.

Senator CRUZ. One of the things I was looking at, it is striking both the overheated rhetoric we have heard from some of our Democratic colleagues and also from some of the protesters over the last 2 days. I took a look at your record compared to that of Judge Merrick Garland. Judge Garland, of course, was appointed to the D.C. Circuit by Bill Clinton, and he was President Obama's nominee to the U.S. Supreme Court. What I found that was striking is that in the 12 years you have been on the D.C. Circuit, of all the matters that you and Chief Judge Garland have voted on together, you voted together 93 percent of the time. Not only that, of the 28 published opinions that you have authored, where Chief Judge Garland was on the panel, Chief Judge Garland joined 27 out of the 28 opinions you issued when you were on a panel together. In other words, he joined 96 percent of the panel opinions that you have written when he was on a panel with you. And the same is true in the reverse. Of the 30 published opinions that Chief Judge Garland has written on a panel, you have joined 28 out of 30 of them, over 93 percent of those opinions.

What is your reaction to those data and the level of agreement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think we are trying hard to find common ground and to—as I have said before, he is a great judge, a great Chief Judge. And he is very careful and very hardworking, and we work well together and try to read the statute as written, read the precedent as written. And he is a judge who does not, like I try to be as well, a judge who is not trying to impose any personal preferences onto the decision, but take the law as written, and that is what I have tried to do in those cases, and that probably explains some of that. I think it also goes back to—I do not think—

I think judges are distinct from policymakers, and I think that shows up when you dig into the actual details of how courts operate and go about their business. You, of course, know well, Senator, from all your arguments and seeing judges decide cases in real time. And I think those statistics reflect the reality of how judges go about their business.

I have said several times I think of the Supreme Court as a Team of Nine, and when you try to be a team player on a Team of Nine, of course, there are going to be disagreements at times, so I do not want to overstate, but if you have that mind-set of where a court, without sitting on different sides of an aisle, without being in separate caucus rooms, trying to find what the right answer is, and I think there is a right answer in many cases, and maybe, you know, a range of reasonable answers in some others, and I think that is what those statistics reflect to me.

Senator CRUZ. So you talked about the difference between your own policy preferences and what the law describes or mandates. How would you describe a judicial activist?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would describe a judicial activist as someone who lets his or her personal or policy preferences override the best interpretation of the law, and that can go in either direction. So a judge who strikes down a law as unconstitutional when the text and precedent do not support that result or a judge in the other direction who upholds a law as constitutional when the text and precedent would suggest that the law is, in fact, unconstitutional. So, too, in statutory cases, it is the same principle. When a judge does not stick with the compromises that you have reached and written into the text of the statute passed by Congress and signed by the President, but thinks the judge can improve on it in some way or maybe picks a snippet out of a Committee report and says, "Well, I agree with that view in the Committee report, and I am going to superimpose that onto the text of the statute passed by Congress," that is to me the textbook definition of a judicial activist, adding to or subtracting from the text as informed by the precedent.

Senator CRUZ. In your time on the D.C. Circuit, you have written a number of opinions addressing separation of powers. Why does separation of powers matter? Why should an American at home watching this on C-SPAN care about the separation of powers?

Judge KAVANAUGH. People should care about separation of powers because it protects individual liberty, and it is really the foundational protection of individual liberty. We think of the First Amendment, freedom of religion and freedom of speech, as foundational protections of individual liberty. But as Justice Scalia used to say, the old Soviet constitution had a bill of rights, but it was meaningless in operation because they did not have an independent judiciary, they did not have a separation of powers system to help protect those individual liberties. So it works in two ways, I think, or more than two ways: first, the independent judiciary that helps enforce those rights; second, the whole structure, as I have explained, tilts toward liberty in the sense that you start with a system, it is hard to pass a law to effect what you do or cannot do, hard to get a law through Congress. And that is by design. The bicameralism principle, a House and a Senate, as well as adding the President, was designed to prevent the passions of the moment from overwhelming and enacting a law based on the passions as opposed to a more difficult process. That all helps protect individual liberty.

Then even after you pass a law, the President has, as I was discussing with Senator Klobuchar, some—or the executive branch has prosecutorial discretion, when and how to enforce particular laws. Who is protected by prosecutorial discretion? Ultimately, it protects individual liberty. And then, even when the Congress has passed a law and the Executive has enforced a law, that does not mean you go straight to prison. If you are charged with a crime, you go before an independent judiciary.

And just to add further protections for liberty, you have the jury protections that are in the original text of the Constitution and also reflected in the Bill of Rights. So in check after check after check, the Constitution tilts toward individual liberty.

The separation of powers also ensures that there are checks on the branches. So what do we do—for example, Members of Congress do not serve for life. You have to run for reelection, and that is a check, again, to help protect individual liberty, to help ensure accountability as well. So, too, with Presidents.

So the document is just chock full with protections of individual liberty, and that is ultimately why the separation of powers matters as much as the individual protections that are in the Bill of Rights and also in Article I, Section 9, and Article I, Section 10, of the original Constitution.

Senator CRUZ. How about the doctrine of federalism? That has been an issue you have not encountered as much serving on the D.C. Circuit, but can you share with this Committee why federalism matters and, again, why Americans watching this hearing at home should care about the principles of federalism?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Federalism matters for several reasons, Senator. Again, it helps further individual liberty in the sense of additional protection, so let me give you an example. If the U.S. Constitution only protects—the Fourth Amendment only protects you against unreasonable searches and seizures up to a certain line, it is possible that your State Constitution will protect you even further under that, or your State legislature might protect you further, so further protections of individual liberty. federalism also operates in a different way, a laboratory of democracy in the sense of experimentation around the country. It is not always the same views in Texas that there might be in California, for example, on particular issues, and so you have different laws—

Senator CRUZ. Thankfully.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. And different laws in those States. And also I think that federalism serves the more general idea of the Government that is closest to you for most of your day-to-day activities. My wife is, of course, in local government now as the town manager, but federalism—for the things that affect you on a daily basis, the paving of the roads, the leaf collection, the trash collection, the local schools, which is probably the most direct impact that many people have with the government, the local court system—my mom, of course, was a State trial judge. The whole system of State government is most people's interaction with government, and federalism in that sense makes—ensures accountability because you know better usually your local and State elected officials than you do—and you can, therefore, make your views known on whatever governmental issue is of concern to you. For example, the schools is a classic one.

Senator CRUZ. So what is the importance and the relevance of the Tenth Amendment?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Tenth Amendment protects federalism in the sense of ensuring that the States have independent sovereign—they make clear, which is also clear from the structure, but reinforces the idea that the States are sovereign entities that have independent authority under the Constitution, and that they have the status as separate sovereigns under the Constitution. And so you were Solicitor General of Texas, of course, and I know you represented the State of Texas in many cases where the sovereignty of the State of Texas to pass its laws and to enforce its laws was critical. And the sovereignty of the individual States is important for the people, again, both for the accountability, the local government, and also for the protection of individual liberty. And I think the Tenth Amendment underscores that. It also makes—it helps underscore something else, which is that States cannot be commandeered by the Federal Government. Commandeered is commandeering doctrine of the Supreme Court which recognizes that—and this is from the structure as a whole and underscored, but the Federal Government cannot order States to do certain things that the States themselves have not chosen to do, and so that is an important part of the federalism principles recognized by the Supreme Court and that comes out of the Constitution as well.

Senator CRUZ. What do you make of the Ninth Amendment? Robert Bork famously described it as an “ink blot.” Do you share that assessment?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I think the Ninth Amendment, and the Privileges and Immunities Clause, and the Supreme Court’s doctrine of substantive due process, are three roads that someone might take that all really lead to the same destination under the precedent of the Supreme Court now, which is, that the Supreme Court precedent protects certain unenumerated rights so long as the rights are, as the Supreme Court said in the Glucksberg case, rooted in history and tradition. And Justice Kagan explained this well in her confirmation hearing, that the Glucksberg test is quite important for allowing that protection of unenumerated rights that are rooted in history and tradition, which the precedent definitely establishes, but at the same time making clear that when doing that, judges are not just enacting their own policy preferences into the Constitution.

An example of that is the old Pierce case where Oregon passed a law that said everyone in the State of—this is in the 1920s—everyone in the State of Oregon had to attend—every student had to attend a public school. And a challenge was brought to that by parents who wanted to send their children to a parochial school, a religious school. And the Supreme Court ultimately upheld the rights of the parents to send their children to a religious parochial school and struck down that Oregon law, and that is one of the foundations of the unenumerated rights doctrine that is folded into the Glucksberg test and rooted in history and tradition.

So how you get there, as you know well, Senator, there are stacks of law reviews written to the ceiling on all of that, whether it is privileges and immunities, substantive due process, or Ninth Amendment. But I think all roads lead to the Glucksberg test, as the test that the Supreme Court has settled on as the proper test.

Senator CRUZ. Let us talk a little bit about the First Amendment. Free speech, why is that an important protection for the American people?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is one of the bedrocks of American liberty, the ability to say what you think, to speak politically, first of all, about policy issues, and to speak about, for example, who you want to support for elected office is a critical part of the free speech principle. But it is broader than that. It is the idea that there is no one truth necessarily, that one person can dictate from on high in terms of policy issues or social issues or economic issues, and that the truth or at least the best answer emerges after debate and over time, and that freedom of speech is important to help advance that cause of the debate. And it is important just as an individual matter, I think, to have that protection written into the Constitution because you may have an unpopular view at a particular point in time, and if that view were suppressed, that view would never take hold even though that view would be the better view. And so it is particularly important in Supreme Court precedent, I think, to protect unpopular views or views that seem out of fashion or out of fashion at a particular moment in time because of both the inherent dignity that that provides to individual people, but also for the broader purpose of that advances societal progress or economic progress or social progress. Most good ideas were unpopular at one point or another and take time to take hold, and I think the Framers understood that. Look at where they came from and how they had to fight against suppression of speech and suppression also of religious liberty, of course, in how they came about.

So free speech is critically important. I think, again, Justice Kennedy and Justice Scalia in Texas v. Johnson, what could be more unpopular than burning the American flag? And yet they upheld the right to do that, not because they liked it, and that is the whole point of Justice Kennedy's concurrence, but because they thought the First Amendment had to protect the most unpopular of ideas in order to accord with the precedent and principle of free speech.

Senator CRUZ. So you mentioned religious liberty. Religious liberty is one of our fundamental liberties, cherished by Americans across the Nation, the right to live according to our faith, according to our conscience. Can you share your views on the importance of religious liberty and how the Constitution protects it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, Senator. To begin with, it is important in the original Constitution, even before the Bill of Rights, that the Framers made clear in Article VI no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States. So that was very important in the original Constitution, that the Framers thought it very important that there not be a test to become a legislator, to become an executive branch official, to become a judge under religion, recognizing the religious freedom at least to serve in public office.

And then, of course, in the First Amendment to the Constitution, ratified in 1791, the principle of religious liberty is written right into the First Amendment to the Constitution. And the Framers understood the importance of protecting conscience. It is akin to the free speech protection in many ways. And no matter what God you worship or if you worship no God at all, you are protected as equally American, as I wrote in my Newdow opinion, and if you have religious beliefs, religious people, religious speech, you have just as much right to be in the public square and to participate in the public programs as others do. You cannot be denied just because you have a religious status, and the Supreme Court has articulated that principle in a variety of different ways in particular cases.

If you look at, for example—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. In other countries around the world, you know, in China, for example, you—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. So if you look at other countries around the world, you are not as—you are not free to take your religion into the public square. You know, crosses are being knocked off churches, for example, or you can only practice in your own home, you cannot bring your religious belief into the public square.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. And being able to participate in the public square is a part of the American tradition, I think, as a religious person, religious speech, religious ideas, religious thoughts. That is important.

So, too, in the Establishment Clause, some of those—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Some of those case are, as you know, particularly complicated in the Supreme Court precedent, but the Supreme Court precedent, for example, in the Town of Greece case and others has recognized that some religious traditions in governmental practices are rooted sufficiently in history and tradition to be upheld, and so in that case, the Town of Greece case, the Supreme Court upheld the practice of a prayer before a local legislative meeting, as Marsh v. Chambers, of course, also—a local town meeting, I should say, Marsh v. Chambers, it upheld that in a legislative meeting as well.

So the religious tradition reflected in the First Amendment is a foundational part of American liberty, and it is important for us as judges to recognize that and not—and recognize, too, that as with speech, unpopular religions are protected. Our job—we can, under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, question the sincerity of a religious belief, meaning is someone lying or not about it, but we cannot question the reasonableness of it, and so the Supreme Court has cases with all sorts of religious beliefs protected, Justice Brennan really the architect of that.

So religious liberty is critical to the First Amendment and the American Constitution.

Senator CRUZ. How would you describe the interaction between the Free Exercise Clause and the Establishment Clause? And are they at cross purposes and in tension? Or are they complementary of each other?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think in general it is good to think of them as both supporting the concept of freedom of religion and—in the Newdow case I wrote, tried to explain some of those principles, but I think it is important to think that, to begin with, you are equally American no matter what religion you are, if you are no religion at all; that it is also important, the Supreme Court has said, that religious people be allowed to speak and to participate in the public square without having to sacrifice their religion in speaking in the public square, for example, or practicing their religion in the public square.

At the same time, I think both clauses protect the idea or protect against coercing people into practicing a religion when they might be of a different religion or might be of no religion at all. So the coercion idea I think comes really out of both clauses as well.

The cases that are Establishment Clause cases that do not involve coercion but are some of the—the religious symbols cases, as you well know, Senator, that is a complicated body of law, but probably each area of that has to be analyzed in its own silo. But as a general matter, I think it is good to think of the two clauses working together for the concept of freedom of religion in the United States, which I think is foundational to the Constitution.

Senator CRUZ. When you were in private practice, you represented the Adat Shalom synagogue pro bono. You did that for free. Can you describe for this Committee that representation and why you undertook it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I undertook that representation to help a group of people who wanted to build a synagogue, but were being denied the ability to do that based on a zoning ordinance that seemed to be—the application, at least, of a zoning ordinance in a way that seemed to be discriminating against them because of their religion, and that may have allowed other buildings to be built there, but they were being blocked or at least challenged from building a synagogue there. So it seemed to me potentially a case of religious discrimination that was being used to try to prevent them from building. So I wanted to—I agreed to represent them because I wanted to do pro bono work and I always like to help the community. In that case in particular, I thought these people who want to build their synagogue had the right to do so, as I saw it under the law. And I thought I could help them do so, and we did prevail in the district court in Maryland, and that synagogue now stands, and they were very grateful.

And so that was the kind of litigation—that was the couple years I was actually at a law firm but did some pro bono work, and that was very rewarding pro bono work to have a real effect on real people in their practice of their religion in the State of Maryland. So that is something that means a lot to me. They gave me something to hang on the wall: “Justice, justice shalt thou pursue,” which has hung on my wall in my chambers the whole 12 years I have been there as just a reminder of a representation I had in the past and the importance of equal treatment in religious liberty and a successful pro bono representation that meant a lot to me.

Senator CRUZ. Well, and I will note, some of the Democratic Senators on this Committee—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CRUZ. Some of the Democratic Senators on this Committee have suggested that you would somehow side with rich and powerful entities at the expense of the little guy, but at least in that instance, representing the synagogue against the power of government that was trying to prevent it being built is very much an instance that you chose to give your time and your energy and your labor for free to a litigant that I think most would view as the little guy in that battle.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator, and I have tried as a judge always to rule for the party who has the best argument on the merits, and that has included workers in some cases, businesses in others, coal miners in some cases, environmentalists in others, unions in some cases, the employer in others, criminal defendants in some cases, the prosecution in others. And I have a long line of cases in each of those categories, and little guy/big guy is not the relevant determination. If you are the little guy, so to speak, and you have the right answer under the law, then you will win in front of me.

Senator CRUZ. Earlier in the questions from Senator Graham, he asked you a question, “Are you a Republican?” And he asked it in the present tense. And your answer, you acknowledged that you had been a registered Republican. Indeed, you had served in a Republican administration previously. But, of course, you have been a Federal judge for 12 years. Do you consider yourself a Republican judge?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not sure what the current registration is, but shortly after I became a judge, I assume the registration—I have not changed it, but I do not know if it is still listed. But shortly after I became a judge and had voted I think in one election, I decided—I had read about the second Justice Harlan having decided that he did not want to continue voting while being a Federal judge, and I thought about that practice, and I would be the first to say I am not the second Justice Harlan, not trying to compare myself in any way to him, but I thought that was a good model for a Federal judge, just to underscore the independence, because we are not supposed to participate in political activities, go to rallies, give money and that kind of thing. And it seemed to me that voting is a very personal expression of your policy beliefs in many ways and your personal beliefs. And I am not trying to—

Senator CRUZ. Let me ask one final question. My time is expiring, and I want to end on a lighter note.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CRUZ. You and I have both had the joys of coaching our daughters in basketball. Could you tell this Committee what have you learned coaching your daughters playing basketball?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it has been a tremendous experience to be able to coach them for the last 7 years, and all the girls on the team, and I have learned about something I saw in my own life about the importance of coaches to the development of America’s youth, teachers too, but coaches can have such an impact, I think, on building confidence, and when you see—I have coached girls. When you see a girl develop confidence over time or you see their competitive spirit, team work, the toughness that is developed over time, the drive, you know, win with class, lose with dignity, winning and—the ability to lose but still put forth your best effort, and so I have learned just how important—I think I understood that from my own experience, as I said, but learned how important it is for people, for coaches, and the effect that you can have on people's lives. And I have heard from a lot of the parents over the last 8 weeks while I have been in this process about, you know, the effect I had on some of the girls' lives, which was very nice to hear in terms of my coaching.

So like I said yesterday, coaches have such an impact on people, and I have learned that. That is why Senator Kennedy said in our individual meeting, "I hope you keep coaching," and I am going to—either way this comes out, I am going to try to keep coaching.

Thank you, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Chairman Grassley. Thank you, Judge Kavanaugh.

As we discussed in my office, and in a letter I have sent to you to follow up, I hope to question you today about your views on rule of law, separation of powers, Presidential power.

And Chairman, I would like to start by entering into the record a series of articles that I think lay some of the foundation for my concerns. First—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered. Well, go ahead, if you want.

Senator COONS. Thank you.

First, "Who Is Brett Kavanaugh?" by Chicago Professor Eric Posner and Emily Bazelon.

Second, "The Kavanaugh Nomination Must Be Paused, and He Must Recuse Himself" by former Third Circuit Judge Timothy Lewis, former White House Ethics Counsel Norm Eisen, and Harvard Law Professor Tribe.

Third, "Brett Kavanaugh's Radical View of Executive Power" by Professor Brettschneider.

"Brett Kavanaugh Is Devoted to the Presidency" by Law Professor Garrett Epps.

And "Brett Kavanaugh's Legal Opinions Show He Would Give Donald Trump Unprecedented New Powers" by Fordham Professor Shugerman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. As I previously said, without order—

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Would you repeat who the third one was? Sorry, I want to make sure I know the names.

Senator COONS. I think it was, "Brett Kavanaugh's Radical View of Executive Power" by Brown University Professor Corey Brettschneider, if I am not mistaken.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. That is not a law professor, though, right?

Senator COONS. Correct.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator COONS. It is a range of opinions from a range of folks from a range of backgrounds.

Judge, the rule of law requires that those who are governed and those who govern both be bound by the law. And a key way to ensure, as you said in your opening, that no one is or should be above the law is to ensure that the President is not above the law by preventing him from firing someone appointed to investigate him.

Sitting on a panel at Georgetown in 1998, you took a different view. You said at that time, and I quote, “The prosecutor should be removable at will by the President.” Given what is in your record, a long record of writing and speaking on this topic, I think there is legitimate cause for concern about your views on Presidential power and whether it is possible President Trump chose you so you would protect him.

Please answer directly. Do you still believe a President can fire at will a prosecutor who is criminally investigating him?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is a question of precedent, and it is a question of that could come before me either as a sitting judge on the D.C. Circuit or, if I am confirmed, as a Supreme Court Justice. So I think that question is governed by precedent that you would have to consider.

United States v. Nixon, of course, the special prosecutor regulation in that case was at issue in the United States v. Richard Nixon in the subpoena—

Senator COONS. Judge, if I could, I am just asking whether you stand by your record, something that you chose to write in 1998. You expressed a view at the time that a President can fire at will a prosecutor criminally investigating him. Is that still your view?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that would depend—

Senator COONS. I am not asking for a recitation of precedent. We will get into some precedent later.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator COONS. I am just trying to make sure I understand if you stand by that publicly expressed view back in 1998.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think all I can say, Senator, is that was my view in 1998.

Senator COONS. Okay. Well, then let us move to a more recent statement that I think is equally important. In the wake of the Watergate Presidential scandal, a scandal precipitated by a President who had committed some crimes and then was investigated, Congress passed the independent counsel statute, a statute which restricted in part when the President can fire an independent counsel.

And during a recent speech, a 2016 speech, you described this law as, and I quote, “a goo-goo post-Watergate reform,” and “a constitutional travesty.” Do you stand by your criticism of the independent counsel statute as a constitutional travesty?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that was understated compared to what Members of this Committee and others said in 1999, when the decision was made—

Senator COONS. But, Judge, I am interested in your views—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator COONS [continuing]. Not the views of Members of this Committee. And when you chose in a public speech as a sitting judge to say that that statute was a constitutional travesty, you had something in mind. What are your views on this statute, and why do you view it as a constitutional travesty?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So let me make a few things clear. This is the old independent counsel statute.

Senator COONS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is distinct from the special counsel system that I have specifically said is consistent with our traditions. I said that in the Georgetown article, as you know. I said that, actually, in the PHH case most recently.

The statute you are talking about, the independent counsel statute was a distinct regime that Congress itself decided not to reauthorize in 1999. I think Senator Durbin said it was unrestrained, unaccountable, unconstitutional statute. That statute—

Senator COONS. But I am interested, if I might, Judge, in your views. You chose to describe the independent counsel as a constitutional travesty. What did you mean?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I meant I think what Justice Kagan said, when she said at Stanford a few years ago, that Justice Scalia's dissent in Morrison v. Olson—and this is a quote—"was one of the greatest dissents ever written, has gotten better every year." By identifying Justice Scalia's dissent as one of the greatest dissents ever written, Justice Kagan seemed to be saying, at least I think this is the only reading of it, that the Morrison v. Olson decision was—was wrong.

Senator COONS. I will actually strongly disagree. You offered that quote, that cite of Justice Kagan when we met. I was struck—perhaps I should call Justice Kagan and tell her she is one of your judicial heroes. I think that citation is actually literally true, but misleading in context.

Justice Kagan wrote in a famous Harvard Law Review article in 2001 strongly rejecting the unitary executive theory, which is at the root of the Scalia dissent in Morrison v. Olson. I believe Justice Kagan was complimenting the forcefulness and the clarity of Scalia's writing in the dissent, not agreeing with the legal theory.

I am trying to get to the point of—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I disagree with that, Senator.

Senator COONS. Well, I look forward to exchanging some papers on this, and perhaps in our next round tomorrow, we can have more fun on it. But it is an important point.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is. But I think in that article, and I have read that article. It is a great article, "Presidential Administration" by Justice Kagan, then-Professor Kagan. I think she was referring to the concept of independent agencies generally, so the Humphrey's Executor line of cases.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

So I think she is referring there, at least I read her as referring there, to independent agencies are traditional and permissible. The independent counsel statute was something quite different from the traditional independent agencies that existed with the Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission. So I did not read her old article to, in any way—

Senator COONS. Let us put it this way. Justice Kagan may have complimented Scalia's dissent in its writing or its holding. You have criticized the independent counsel statute as a constitutional travesty, and I am simply trying to get to the bottom of why you held that view and why you chose to say that in a speech just 2 years ago.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it was Morrison v. Olson was a one-off case about a one-off statute that has not existed for 20 years. The statute is gone. The case, as Justice Kagan—I think I took my lead from her comment. I know I read that. I have cited it many times in speeches I have given. But that statute, it is just real important to be clear here, and I know you know this, Senator, but so everyone understands. That statute has not existed since 1999. Special counsel systems—

Senator COONS. But Morrison v. Olson is still good law, is it not? But the holding by the Supreme Court in Morrison v. Olson, even though the independent counsel statute has passed into history, Morrison v. Olson, as a decision of the Supreme Court, is still good law. In fact, your own Circuit said so forcefully this year.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think Humphrey's Executor is good law.

Senator COONS. I think that is a “yes” or “no” question. The D.C. Circuit held this year in PHH, where you wrote a dissent, that Morrison v. Olson is still good law. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think they were applying Humphrey's Executor. They might have cited Morrison. But the principle being—

Senator COONS. They literally said, and I quote, “Morrison remains valid and binding precedent,” and—

Judge KAVANAUGH. In how it applied Humphrey's.

Senator COONS [continuing]. Criticized your minority as, “flying in the face of Morrison”.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And again, we are talking about independent agencies. So the traditional independent agencies on the one hand, and the old independent counsel regime that is long gone, on the other. And the independent counsel regime, this Committee and the Congress as a whole decided was a serious mistake. Just Senator Durbin’s words—unrestrained, unaccountable, unconstitutional. And I think the case—

Senator COONS. So what I am concerned about, Judge—what I am concerned about, Judge, is not so much whether there are Members of this Committee or other Justices who view the independent counsel statute as a serious mistake, but whether you view Morrison v. Olson and the majority holding there as a serious mistake. So let us move to that point, if I could.

In Morrison v. Olson, as you well know, the Court upheld a restriction on the President’s power to fire the independent counsel, in fact, by a vote of 7–to–1. It is an opinion written by your first judicial hero, Chief Justice Rehnquist. It was only Justice Scalia who dissented in arguably a well-crafted dissent.

But for those seven Justices, they wrote an important decision, which I believe you have challenged and criticized because it restrained the President’s power to fire the independent counsel. Just 2 years ago, you were asked at a public event to name a case that deserved to be overturned—any case. And after a pregnant pause, you said, “Well, I can think of one.” There was some chuckling. And then you said, “Well, sure, Morrison v. Olson.”

And I am struck by that, having watched that speech. Not Korematsu, not Buck v. Bell, cases that, you know, are taught to all first-year law students as terrible examples of shameful decisions. No, you chose Morrison v. Olson to say, “it has already been effectively overturned”—which I disagree with—and, “I would put the final nail in the coffin.”

So, here is a recent public statement by a sitting D.C. Circuit judge who is now before me as a nominee to serve on the Supreme Court. So, I have got a question: Would you vote to overturn Morrison?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, first of all, I—Korematsu has been now overturned, and Buck v. Bell is a disgrace. So I am—

Senator COONS. Right. So it is striking you did not choose either of them. You reach out and say, oh, this old, 30-year-old decision about a statute long gone, that is the one I am going to hold up to get rid of.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I really did have Justice Kagan’s comment foremost in mind. I thought she had already talked about Morrison v. Olson and—

Senator COONS. Nothing to do with a view of Presidential power?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I have written about the special counsel system, and I have said in the 1999 Georgetown article that the special counsel system is the traditional approach that is used. When there is a conflict of interest in the executive branch, there is a need for an outside counsel. And I have said that is traditional, and it was when I said that again in the PHH case that you just cited.

Senator COONS. And is that special counsel fireable at will or only for cause in your conception of what is the most appropriate structure?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So that is the hypothetical that you are asking me, and I think what that depends on is, is there some kind of restriction on for-cause protection either regulatorily or statutorily that is permissible that is different from the old independent counsel, for example? And that is the kind of open question, gray area question that you would want to hear the briefs, get the oral arguments, keep an open mind on. What is the specific statute you have at issue?

Remember, the old independent counsel had a lot of moving parts to it that were—all of which were novel and together produced Justice Scalia’s dissent. I do not think any one aspect—

Senator COONS. So given your enthusiasm for Justice Scalia’s dissent, given your choice to say, forgive me, I would put the final nail in, let me go back to that question. Would you vote to overturn Morrison?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not going to say more than what I said before.

Senator COONS. Well, I think what you said before is clear. I think your enthusiasm for overturning Morrison is unmistakable. [Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I want to repeat two things, Senator, because they are important. One is, Humphrey’s Executor is the precedent that stands—and I have called it an entrenched precedent in an opinion—on independent agencies generally. And two is, the special counsel system, both in the PHH decision recently and in the old Georgetown Law Journal article, I have specifically said that that is the traditional way that criminal investigations proceed when there is a conflict of interest and the usual Justice Department process is not appropriate.

Senator COONS. Humphrey's Executor has been settled law now for 83 years, right? And early on, you said that you would be willing to offer views on long-settled cases. Can you just tell me if Humphrey's Executor was correctly decided?

It is long-settled precedent, yes. You have said that about a number of cases. But a key difference here is whether you will say that something was rightly decided. I am struck about this—frankly, a little concerned about it—because in your own opinion, in your dissent in PHH, you went into a long criticism of Humphrey's Executor that at least that is how I read it.

You laid out a very strong articulation of this unitary executive theory, this theory that the President is imbued with all the power of the executive branch, which is the core of Scalia's dissent in Morrison, which is a radical theory that has been rejected by the Supreme Court, I would argue.

And you go on to then say that Humphrey's Executor, yes, it is long-settled. But you know, if we were to overturn it, it would not mean the elimination of independent agencies. Why did you need to go there? Why have that conversation if this long-settled case is actually well reasoned?

Judge KAVANAUGH. What I said in the PHH case is that Humphrey's Executor is the precedent that governs independent agencies. I have applied it dozens of times, Humphrey's Executor, and referred to it that way.

What concerns me constitutionally as a judge in the PHH case was that the CFPB did not follow the traditional model of independent agencies and, therefore, departed from this traditional exception, one might say, to the idea that a single President controls the executive branch. And I explained all that, that the—having one head of an independent agency both diminished Presidential authority more than Humphrey's Executor and posed a serious threat to individual liberty and was a departure from historical practice, which under the Supreme Court's precedent made—makes a big difference, as you know, of course.

And so I referred—so that is why I concluded in the CFPB case that the statute was—the bureau was unconstitutionally structured. But the remedy was not to get rid of the whole agency. The remedy was simply to make the person removable at will.

Senator COONS. So Humphrey's Executor was essentially about whether or not the head of the FTC could be removable at will or have a good cause removal protection?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. President Roosevelt wanted to fire Humphrey, who was a Republican holdover.

Senator COONS. Will you simply just state that it is well-reasoned, well-decided, long-settled law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will say it is an important precedent of the Supreme Court that I have applied many times. It has been reaffirmed—

Senator COONS. It is troubling to me that you cannot say that Humphrey's Executor was well-decided.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But again, I will follow what the eight nominees—

Senator COONS. Was Marbury v. Madison well-decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of course. Of course. The—of course it is. The concept of judicial review was not even invented in Marbury v. Madison. It is right here in the Constitution, as I read it, and also referred to in Federalist 78. We mistakenly say Marbury created the concept of judicial review. It actually exists right there. So it is a correct application.

But the reason I am hesitating—

Senator COONS. So let me bring this back to the current context and why all of this is of concern to me and relevant—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I did not finish my answer.

Senator COONS. We have a series of public statements by you that are recent about your enthusiasm for overturning Morrison. And you are not going to comment on that here. You will not answer that question here. You have got a recent decision as a D.C. Circuit judge where you forcefully articulate this unitary executive theory that would give the President significantly more power. And if Humphrey's Executor is at any risk, we might then see a whole series of agencies moved or a whole series of long-established protections from at-will removal at some risk.

Let me just make sure I get this right. In your view, can Congress restrict the removal of any official within the executive branch?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Under the Supreme Court precedent, which I have applied many times, Humphrey's—and referred to it as an entrenched precedent—Congress historically has restricted the removal of independent agency heads. And that is—that is law that has been in place for a long time.

Senator COONS. For decades.

Judge KAVANAUGH. On Morrison, you may disagree with what I am about to say. But the reason I think Justice Kagan probably felt free to talk about Morrison, and I did as well, is, it seemed a one-off case about a statute that does not exist anymore and that Humphrey's is the precedent on independent agencies.

Now you may disagree with me on that, but I think that is the premise on which she spoke. I do not want to put words in her mouth, but that is certainly the premise on which I spoke. But I was not intending to do either of two things. I was not intending to say anything about Humphrey's, and I was not intending to say anything about traditional special counsels, which I have explicitly distinguished multiple times over the years.

Senator COONS. So I am just—I am concerned that I am having difficulty getting what I think is a clear and decisive answer from you on a number of things. Would you overturn Morrison? What is your view of executive theory? Is it appropriate for a President to fire a special counsel investigating him?

I am just going to come back to a decision that you rendered this year, this PHH decision, and I urge folks who are having any interest in this or trouble following it to just read your decision in this case. Because you lay out—you embrace this theory of the Executive, that the Executive has all the power of the executive branch, which I think is directly relevant to the question whether a special prosecutor should be fireable at will by the President or could be protected from being fired by the whims of the President.

This is a theory that was rejected not just by the Supreme Court in Morrison v. Olson, not just by the D.C. Circuit, but by a number of Members of this Committee in a recent vote, a bipartisan vote advancing a bill that is predicated on the idea that Congress can impose some restrictions on the Executive power to fire at will executive branch senior officers.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But just with respect, Senator, I think you are significantly overreading what I wrote in that case. I did not in any way say that the traditional independent agencies are in any way constitutionally problematic. In fact, I took that as the baseline on which I said that this new agency departed from that traditional model and was problematic.

So I did not—I did not cast doubt on Humphrey's in that case as I—at least as I read it. I guess you do not agree with the opinion, but I explained in great detail why I thought this deviation from Humphrey's mattered as a matter of historical practice.

Senator COONS. Let us get then, if we could, Judge, in the few minutes I have got left, to the question of investigations because this is also something you have written about, you have spoken about. And it is related, I think, to this issue.

Now back in Georgetown on a panel in 1998, you said, and I quote, “It makes no sense at all to have an independent counsel investigate the conduct of the President. If the President were the sole subject of a criminal investigation, I would say no one should be investigating that.”

Is that still your view that if there is credible evidence that a President committed crimes, no one should investigate it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is not what I said, Senator. So two things on that. One, the independent counsel you are referring to there, it is just important because people forget this, is distinct from the special counsel system. So it is very important. I specifically in that Georgetown Law Journal approved of the traditional special counsel system.

That is—

Senator COONS. And the traditional special counsel system has a special counsel that can be fired at will by the President. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, in the Watergate situation, there was a regulation that protected the special counsel from—from that.

Senator COONS. And what happened to the special counsel in Watergate?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, there was a new regulation then put in place, as you know, and then in the United States v. Richard Nixon, that new regulation was parsed pretty carefully. And then, more generally—

Senator COONS. This is exactly why your quote that the independent counsel statute was “a goo-goo post-Watergate reform” gave me some agita.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But that was not the—but that was a statute put in well after Watergate, of course, 1978. In Watergate itself, what the system that was in place was the traditional special counsel system with a new regulation put in after the episode you are referring to. And then when the independent counsel system came up in 1999 for reauthorization, there was everyone here, everyone—

Senator COONS. Well—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Agreed it was—I mean, I think I am not—

Senator COONS [continuing]. You are not alone. You are not alone.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not exaggerating to say that the quote you put up before that one was understating what everyone here said about the independent counsel system.

Senator COONS. Well, in a 1999 article in that exact period, I think this is the American Spectator article, you called it, “constitutionally dubious” for a criminal prosecutor to have the responsibility to investigate the President.

Help me understand that. Is that still your view, Judge? Is it still your view that it is constitutionally dubious for a criminal prosecutor to investigate the President?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have never taken a position on the constitutionality. All I have done is point out that, as I did in the Minnesota Law Review article, that Congress might want to consider the balance of—and that is when President Obama was in office—

Senator COONS. So this is just a policy argument, not a constitutional argument?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Correct. If I have a constitutional case come before me as a judge on the D.C. Circuit or, if confirmed, on that Court, I will have an open mind. I will listen to the arguments. I will dig into the history.

I have seen all sides of this. I will—I will have a completely open mind on the constitutional issue. And again, briefs and arguments, I think I have also shown a capacity to, if I am presented with a better argument than something I have had before, to adopt the better argument.

I have certainly done that. A good example of that in the national security context in the first Bahlul case, I pointed out how I had reconsidered something I had written before in a national security context. I am not a—but the larger point is that I have not taken a position on constitutionality before.

Senator COONS. Well, and I will just come back to a point we have now talked about several times. In several different contexts, in several different ways, you have chosen to make a constitutional point, either expressing enthusiasm for overturning a 30-year-old long-settled precedent in Morrison v. Olson, or arguing for the unitary executive theory that Scalia advanced in his dissent there.

Or I will give you another quote. In a different 2016 speech, you said there Justice Scalia never wrote a better opinion than his dissent in Morrison v. Olson, and you may have been commenting on the quality of his writing. But you go on to say you believe his views will 1 day be the law of the land.

I assume here you are talking about the constitutional analysis in Scalia’s dissent, and you are expressing a hope, an expectation that it will some day be the law of the land. You sit before me as the nominee to be in a seat where that will be eminently within your reach.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But again, Senator, I just want to avoid melding a lot of different things into one because they are very important to keep distinct here, very important. The first is the independent counsel statute, and I view Morrison as only about the independent counsel statute. And I realize you may have a different view on that.

But if it is only about the independent counsel statute, as I see it, and the independent counsel statute does not exist anymore, that is why Justice Kagan probably felt free to comment about Morrison as well.

Senator COONS. Well—

Judge KAVANAUGH. And then on special counsels, I have said what I have repeated many times here. On investigation and indictment of a sitting President, number one, I have never taken a position on it, and number two, it is important to underscore the Justice Department for 45 years—now this is the Justice Department, not me. The Justice Department for 45 years has taken the position and written opinions that a sitting President may not be indicted while in office, but it has to be deferred. Not immunity, but a deferral.

And Randy Moss, who was head of President Clinton's Office of Legal Counsel, wrote a very long opinion on that. He is now a President Obama-appointed district judge in DC and an excellent district judge. I am not saying I agree with that or disagree with that. I am saying that is the consistent Justice Department view for 45 years.

So before a case like this would come before the courts, whether I am on the D.C. Circuit or otherwise, the Justice Department presumably would have to change its position. That is one. Two, a prosecutor at some point in the future would have to decide to seek an indictment of a sitting President at some point, and three, it would have to be challenged in court. Then all the briefs and arguments, and then it would come up on appeal to me in the D.C. Circuit.

So there is a lot of things that would have to happen before this hypothetical that you are presenting even comes to pass. And if it does come to pass, you can be assured that I have not taken a position on the constitutional issue that you are raising on that specific question, at least as I understand the question. And that is totally distinct from the Morrison issue as I understand it.

Senator COONS. Well, and I will tell you again the reason this has been gravely concerning to me, why I raised it in our meeting and sent you a letter about it and why I have dedicated so much time to this question is I really do not view the issue in the independent counsel statute and the Morrison v. Olson decision as dealing with some now long-past statute and some really sort of obscure and now not particularly relevant issue.

I think the reason you reached out and volunteered that you would love to overturn Morrison v. Olson is not because Scalia wrote a powerful and moving dissent. It is because of a view of the executive branch having all the power of the executive branch in the President's hands that you have articulated across speeches, interviews, writings, and an opinion, an opinion this year.

I think that is really your view of the executive branch. And it rings as real concern for me.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I have not said—I have never said that. I have never said that, number one. So there are two issues here, and I want to be very, very clear on them so people understand that, too.

One is—

Senator COONS. This is how I read your dissent in PHH this year, is arguing—advancing a unitary executive theory.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I refer to a single President, but same concept. But—

Senator COONS. Single President means the President is the chief law enforcement officer of the United States and should have all the power of the executive branch, including the ability to fire at will, which is really what is at issue in all of these articles and cases, the ability to fire at will a special prosecutor. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So the—I have taken as a given in all these cases—

Senator COONS. That is a “yes” or “no,” is that what you mean?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I just want to be real clear, and I am going to be repeating myself for about the tenth time. But I have repeatedly said that Humphrey's Executor is the precedent that allows independent agencies and that I have applied time after time. That is point one.

Point two is, I have specifically said what I have said about special counsel systems being the traditional mechanism. Point three is, I have never taken a position on the constitutionality of indicting or investigating a sitting President. And point four is, that the question of who controls the executive—

Senator COONS. I have got just a minute or two left, if I might? On that point that you have never taken a position on the constitutionality of investigating a President, it was this American Spectator article where you said, and I am quoting, “If there is an allegation of Presidential wrongdoing, a congressional inquiry should take precedence over the criminal investigation, including an investigation of any Presidential associates.”

This American Spectator article was striking to me, this one in which you said it was constitutionally dubious for a criminal prosecutor to investigate a President. Because you suggested not just that the President should not be criminally investigated as during his term, but that even his associates should not be held accountable through the criminal justice system.

You mentioned you might make an exception for violent crime, and I—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Now that is—

Senator COONS [continuing]. Have a last question for you, if I might. Whether—what if a Presidential aide commits an assault, an act of domestic violence?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I never said anything like that, Senator, in terms of—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I will—I will let you—I will let you answer that, and then we will go on to the next Senator.

Senator COONS. And I would like to conclude, if I might?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, I have not said anything approaching what your broad description was. There has always been a question based on the Justice Department's own position for the last 45 years. The Justice Department's own position assumes that the proper thing to do is to wait for indictment, is that that occurs after a President leaves office, whether that is because the term ends or because of the impeachment process.

And that is how the Justice Department—again, for 45 years, that has been the law. But it is not my—that is not my law. That is the Justice Department's law, again, with Randy Moss writing the most important thinking on that.

Senator COONS. I recognize I am out of time. I would like to conclude, if I might, Mr. Chairman, briefly?

I look forward to continuing this line of discussion with you in our next round, Judge. I do think that there is good reason for Members of this Committee, myself, principally, to be concerned about a whole range of things that you have said, that you have written, and that you have decided as a judge about whether or not a President can be held accountable.

I think the ability of a special counsel to conduct an independent investigation of the President is foundational to the rule of law.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have said the same thing. I have said that.

Senator COONS. And I look forward to the next round where we can investigate that more thoroughly.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have said the exact same thing.

Senator COONS. But frankly, Judge, your views about Executive power, as I think you have detailed, your statements about what you would like to overturn and what limits you think there should be, really leave me concerned. And it is because of our current context. It is because of the environment we are operating in.

And I look forward to another round and to more questions.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I look forward, too. But just to reiterate what you said about special counsels, is exactly what my article said in 1999 and exactly what PHH said.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before I call on Senator Sasse, a couple things. One, in regard to independent counsel statute at issue in Morrison, that statute was never renewed and does not have any effect today. And we in Congress chose not to renew it because it was nearly universally condemned.

I often quote Senator Durbin about independent counsels' "unchecked, unbridled, unrestrained, and unaccountable authority." According to him, unchecked power is tyranny. We had Eric Holder, President Obama's Attorney General, said the law was too flawed to be renewed.

Also I want to insert in the record 30 op-eds from all across the country that support the confirmation of Judge Brett Kavanaugh. The editorial boards of the Los Angeles Times, the Chicago Tribune, the Wall Street Journal, among those 30 supporting confirmation.

Without objection, I will enter in the record all 30 of these op-eds.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator COONS. Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Sasse.

Senator COONS. While we are on that exact point, there are four committee confidential documents that I would—I wanted to be able to question our witness about today, the nominee, the Judge. I would like to submit those for the record. They reveal his thinking on a unitary executive theory.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Give that, and I can advocate that you get them. And we will put into it, just like we said to Senator Leahy, give us the citations, and we will try to get them. So far, we have been very fortunate.

Senator Sasse.

Senator SASSE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, by my count, you are about half done. Congratulations.

[Laughter.]

Senator SASSE. You are going to be here past midnight, I think.

I also want to talk about limited government in general and about limits on Executive power in particular. I think today has been—Senator Cruz did a nice job complimenting the Capitol Police. I think today has been a tough environment to manage, and I think we all are glad that people get a right to express their First Amendment views and have the right to protest.

I do not want to draw too much more attention to it, though, because I think it disrupts the events. But four things that have been said that I think are relevant to this question, protesters that have been carried out or led out in the last couple of hours.

Just a few minutes ago, a woman shouting, “Please vote ‘no’ on Kavanaugh. Presidents should not have the power to do whatever they want.” “Vote ‘no’ on Kavanaugh” is one of the loudest shouts of today. “He will be a Trump puppet.”

A separate one, “He will support Presidential criminality,” and “Executive immunity has no place in a democracy.”

I think that I want to empathize with concerns that people have about those kinds of statements. And frankly, if I thought that you would be a puppet for this or any President, if you would support Presidential criminality, if you believe that Executive immunity is something that is fitting for our system, or if you believe that Presidents should have the power to do whatever they wanted, I could not vote for you either.

So I am headed toward voting for you because I do not believe any of those things are true. But I think the American people need to understand why not. So already today you cited the Federalist Papers and said the President is not a monarchy. I think it would be useful—the Presidency is not a monarchy.

I think it would be useful to just have you back us up and let us go again. I think Senator Coons asked lots of fair questions, but as a non-lawyer, many times we got lost in weeds. Not critical of his questioning, but I would like to have it at a high school sophomore level for a little while.

If you were going to explain to the American people what the limits on Executive power are, what are they? Where do you start?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would start with the fact that the President is elected by the people through the electoral process specified in the Constitution. So not a hereditary monarchy was something that was specified in Federalist 69. Second, the President serves a term in office, not an unlimited term in office. Again, specified in Federalist 69.

The President is subject to the law. No one is above the law in the United States, including the President of the United States. And that is something that is made clear in Federalist 69. The President does not—a President does not have absolute power to make the laws because Congress has the power to make the laws. The President does not have the power to adjudicate disputes because an independent judiciary has the power to adjudicate disputes and cases and controversies, along with a jury.

As Justice Jackson's framework in Youngstown famously made clear, it is important to understand that, though, even in the national security context where the Constitution gives the Commander-in-Chief power to the President, the President remains subject to the law, both the Constitution and the laws passed by Congress.

So, for example, as I have said in writings and my review of Judge David Barron's book on war, for example, and some of my cases, Congress has substantial power—and this is often forgotten—a substantial power in the war powers arena. Of course, to declare war, authorize war, but also to regulate the war effort. And Congress has done so historically and currently, including post September 11th on issues such as interrogation, detention, military commissions, surveillance. Congress has been actively involved in those areas historically and through post September 11th.

And I have made clear in my writings that the President has very limited power in Youngstown Category 3 to disregard such a law and/or practice. The historical example that is accepted by the Supreme Court is command of troops in battle, for example, that Congress could not get in the middle of that. But outside examples like that and narrow examples like that, Congress regulates the—can regulate the war effort.

Now Congress often chooses to give the executive branch broad discretion on national security policy, but sometimes not because the Congress does not like what the Executive has done. Usually we are very reactive, and that is understandable. Something happens that seems bad. Congress will come in and say we do not want that to happen again in wartime or otherwise in the national security context.

And Justice Jackson set forth that framework, which has stood the test of time and been applied by the Supreme Court. And that is a very critical part because where else would we expect the Executive to really exercise unilateral power but in the national security context, but also at the same time, what else is a greater time of threat to liberties than the national security context? Youngstown Steel again being the classic example, where the President said, well, we are trying to win the war, so I can seize steel mills.

And that did not work by a 6-to-3 vote of the Supreme Court, given the statutes Congress has passed. So, too, no President is above the law in the sense that a President remains subject to, the Supreme Court said in the Clinton v. Jones case, civil process. So that is a precedent of the Supreme Court on civil suits while in office.

So, too, the criminal process, Hamilton specifies this in Federalist 69, a President is not above the law with respect to the criminal process. The only question that the Justice Department, as I was saying to Senator Coons, has opined on for 45 years is the timing of the indictability question. And the Justice Department, through Democratic and Republican administrations for 45 years, has said that should occur when the President leaves office, either because the term has expired or because of the impeachment process.

Senator SASSE. Can I interrupt to unpack there? And then I will come back.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator SASSE. I want to have you finish because I think you are building a list that has duration in time of the office of the Presidency, authorities that the legislature may or may not have given to the executive branch, powers of the purse to fund things that may have authorities but may not have current dollars available to them.

I think a lot of your debate with Senator Coons—again, I think it is an important debate—is about personnel matters. But for just a second, let us play out this question of criminality versus civil charges against a President. And I admit that I am sort of, as a non-lawyer, I follow in the Midwestern tradition of the Chairman, of being a non-lawyer on the Committee. I know a whole bunch of big legal brains told me if I ask any hypothetical, you will run circles around me telling me why you cannot answer.

But I kind of want to try the start of a hypothetical. Imagine 10 years in the future: There is a President from the Purple Party. So it is none of the current participants in public life, and it is none of these parties even. And this President ran for office with an instinct to demonstrate self-reliance, and he/she decides that they will not be a part of any motorcades. They are going to drive themselves. And they are drunk one night, and there is a motor vehicle homicide committed by the President.

That is both a criminal and a civil matter. Is the President immune from either being sued or being charged with a crime because they are President?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. No one has ever said, I do not think, that the President is immune from civil or criminal process. So immunity is the wrong term to even think about in this process. The only question that has ever been debated is whether the actual process should occur while still in office. That is the Jones v. Clinton case where strong arguments were presented by both sides, and the Supreme Court ultimately decided that the civil process could go forward against President Clinton.

President Clinton was arguing that the civil process should be deferred until after he left office. The Supreme Court rejected that. So, too, the only question with the criminal process is not immunity. That is the wrong term. It is timing, and the—as I have said, the Justice Department for 45 years has taken the position that the timing of the criminal process, a criminal process should be after the President leaves office.

Now that does not prevent investigations, gathering of evidence, questioning of witnesses, I would not think necessarily. I do not want to opine too much. But that is certainly how it has proceeded under the special counsel system that we have had traditionally that has coexisted with the Justice Department position on the ultimate timing question.

So those are just timing questions from Jones v. Clinton and from the Justice Department position. But immunity is not—not the correct word, and I do not think anyone thinks of immunity. And why not? No one is above the law. And that is just such a foundational principle of the Constitution and equal justice under law, and that is what Hamilton was concerned about in Federalist 69, and that is what the Framers were concerned about.

Even with having—if you read the Constitutional Convention debates, even with having a single President, they were concerned, well, that may seem like a monarchy. And that is why Hamilton felt the need to convince the people, “no, this is not a monarchy.”

And how did Hamilton go about convincing the people of that? He wrote all the ways it was distinct in Federalist 69, some of which I have outlined to you. Appropriations is another important one to—I mean, as Senator Byrd reminded me when I met with him in my 2006 process, Senator Byrd pulled out his pocket Constitution. And Senator Byrd, as everyone who remembers Senator Byrd knows, was very focused on the Appropriations Clause of the Constitution, the fact that the—

Senator SASSE. As any drive through West Virginia will show you.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, exactly.

Senator SASSE. I want you to finish that list, and then I want to ask some personnel-specific questions. But, so, I think you have duration of the President’s term in office. Specific authorities that the President may or may not have been given. Appropriations. Personnel questions.

Are there any other—I guess vertical and horizontal federalism. So there is not just executive-legislative distinction here. In my hypothetical, the drunk driving accident could have happened in Virginia or Maryland, instead of DC, and so then we would have to have debates about which level of government would be involved.

Are there any other categories of limitation on Executive power?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think a huge one, really the hugest question, as I have said many times in my writings in the entirety of constitutional law, is the President’s ability unilaterally to take the country into war. That really dwarfs all other questions in many ways, and Hamilton made clear in Federalist 69 the answer to that question was no.

Now it is sometimes thought and opined by commentators or even scholars that, oh, actually, that has changed over time and actually Presidents have—that really has not changed in practice, at least, over time. Obviously, there is no definitive Supreme Court case.

But you look at all the significant wars, and I wrote this in the book review of the Barron book, which I, you know, recommend to you. I think you would enjoy that. All—

Senator SASSE. Thanks for calling me a nerd on national TV.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, I know you would enjoy it, really. Is the—all the significant wars in U.S. history have been congressionally authorized, with one major exception, the Korean War. And the Korean War is an anomaly in many respects, and I think some of the fact that it was undeclared and unauthorized really did lead to the Youngstown decision.

But you know, Vietnam, the Persian Gulf War, the AUMF against al-Qaeda, the 2003 Iraq War, and then going back, World War II, World War I, the War of 1812, they are all congressionally authorized. You can go back throughout, and I specify that.

And so the war power, the power to take the Nation into war, at least a significant one, and there are some questions about short-term air strikes and things like that. But a significant war, that is the biggest of all, and that is something that Hamilton talked about in 69 and that our historical practice, I think, has actually lived up to.

I do not mean to footnote Korea. That is an enormous exception. But since then, they have all been congressionally authorized. People debate the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, but the words of it are quite broad.

Senator SASSE. This is not the place for this full detour, but I just want to underscore one thing you said about Hamilton and just in the Federalist Papers more broadly, how many times we see our Founders writing about the norms of our civics. And one of the things that goes wrong in these kind of proceedings is we so regularly conflate policy and politics with civics, and I think that our jurisprudence should fit inside our civics, not inside our politics because it is the overarching thing.

Ken Burns often says “E pluribus unum” is a core motto for America, and we have a whole bunch of pluribus and very little unum right now. We should have a lot more unum, a lot more unity about what we think the role of the judge is. And I think Senator Cruz did a really nice job of unpacking how often you and Judge Garland have been on the same side of issues, 93 and 96 percent of the time.

Your comments yesterday about being on the Team of Nine, about there being no center aisle that needs to be crossed over at the Court, about there being no caucus rooms in the Supreme Court, that is another way of saying if we are doing civics right in America, we should be seeing fewer and fewer political disputes trying to be settled at the Court.

And it means that we need to attend more to the norms. When things are going wrong in America, and we should all admit that things are a mess in this country. We have had—in the governance of our country. There is a lot that is great in America right now.

But in the idea that in our public square we agree on very much, I think we know that that is not true. And if you look at survey data of what high school students turn up if they try to take the immigration and naturalization test and huge shares of high school juniors do not know that we have three branches of Government, shame on us. Not shame on them that they do not understand that because we are not doing that basic civics.

Well, Washington thought it was essential that when he was explaining what his job is as President and that it not be confused with the monarchy, he wanted to be called Mr. Washington, not honorifics. He rebuked people for bowing before him because we might confuse our kids and grandkids that the Presidency is a monarchy.

So one of the fundamental problems about not understanding the limits on Executive power is that we are not doing a very good job of talking together in common about all the ways that all three branches of Government should be limited.

But let us go back to Senator Coons' point about personnel. I sit on the Armed Services Committee as well, and one of the things that we do there, I do not know, every second week maybe, is that we have confirmation votes of dozens, scores, sometimes hundreds of promotions and flag officers. And why do we do that?

It is because there are all sorts of constraints on Executive power at the level of personnel. And when somebody is getting promoted in the Navy or when somebody is getting promoted at the Air Force, the Congress actually has oversight of that. And because that process works so well, because there is so much collegiality between the legislature and the executive branch, it tends to not turn up on TV. It is often a pretty pro forma moment at the start of our hearings, even though any Senator, Republican or Democrat, that wants to delay the promotion of those officers, we can do that because almost all that stuff is moving by consent.

So there are things where there is unity in hiring or in promotion. It is just a lot of that is noncontroversial. So it does not end up salacious. It does not end up on TV.

Jump in, please. I know you are trying to say something.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that is an important addition is that the President, and this goes to Senator Coons as well, does not have the unilateral power to—under the Constitution to appoint even members of the Cabinet, which if you are thinking of a monarchy, of course, you would be able to dispense offices and dispense—you cannot create offices, first of all. You cannot unilaterally fill even Secretary of Defense or Secretary of State because the Framers were so concerned about overbroad Executive power that they required Senate confirmation for even those positions who, if confirmed, then become executive officers.

That is another really hugely important check on the executive branch, which is a reality. And of course, the confirmation process for executive officers, as you say, becomes a part and parcel of the oversight in many ways. And I think that is very important. And I think we have spent—I spent a little too little time. I mentioned it on appropriations. But that is the lifeblood of the Government, of course, is the money that causes the Government to—allows the Government to be able to operate in terms of without money, you cannot do things.

And the President does not—a President does not have the unilateral power to appropriate money. And so Congress ultimately, through that appropriations power, and you all know this better than anyone, can restrict activities of the executive branch in multiple ways, and I think that is an important thing that Hamilton also talked about.

So Congress has substantial power, but that is not to say—the President has large powers, of course, under the Constitution. But we sometimes forget, and I think your civics lesson is a reminder that all these checks and balances work together, including on judges, in a way that has served the test of time but could always be improved in some respects, I suppose.

Senator SASSE. And one of the reasons that the executive branch seems so powerful right now is, again, because of how weak the legislature is. I mean, it is a fundamental part of why we have the term “President.” In the 1780s, this was not a very common term in the English language. “President” was a nounified form of the name “presiding officer,” and we made it up, our Founders made it up so that we would not have a term that sounded a lot like a king.

And so we wanted to be sure that the term “presiding officer” sounded pretty boring and administrative because the legislative, the policymaking powers were supposed to sit in this body, and the Article II branch is supposed to preside over and execute the laws that have been passed.

It is not supposed to be the locus of all policymaking in America. But one of the reasons we have some of these problems with so many of these executive agencies is because Congress regularly does not finish its work, punts those powers to Article II, and then it is not clear who exactly can execute all those authorities. And so we end up with this debate about the unitary executive, and you had a different term for it.

But unpack for us a little bit why you have a different view about both the prudence and the constitutionality of one person-headed independent executive agencies or pseudo-independent agencies versus commission structure-headed independent agencies.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The traditional independent agencies that were upheld by the Supreme Court in Humphrey's Executor in 1935 are multi-member independent agencies. And so usually sometimes three, five, occasionally more, but they are multi-member independent agencies. And that has been all the way through. And then—for the significant independent agencies.

The CFPB, and I have no—it is not my role to question the policy or to question the creation of the new agency. In fact, I think it was designed to—for efficiency and centralization of certain overlapping authorities. It is not my role to question that policy. Someone challenged the fact that it was headed for the first time on something like this by a single person.

And a couple things then I wrote about in my dissent in that case. I will just repeat what I wrote in the dissent. I said, first of all, that is a departure from historical practice of independent agencies, and that matters, according to the Supreme Court.

They had a previous case involving the PCAOB, where they had a different innovation there the Supreme Court had struck down in part because of the novelty of it. So departure from historical practice matters because precedent always matters, including Executive precedent.

Then a diminution of Presidential authority beyond the traditional independent agencies in this sense. With a traditional independent agency, when a new President comes in office, almost immediately the President has been given the authority to designate a new chair of the independent agency. So when a new—when President Obama came in, was able to designate new chairs of the various independent agencies, and the chairs, of course, set the policy direction and control the agency. That has historically been the way. That does not happen with the CFPB.

And finally, having a single person, just going back to liberty, who is in charge, who is not removable at will by anyone, not accountable to Congress, in charge of a huge agency, is something that is different and has an effect on individual liberty.

So a single person can make these enormous decisions—rulemakings, adjudications, and enforcement decisions, all of them. And from my perspective—I am just repeating what I wrote here, I am not intending to go beyond what I wrote in that opinion—that was an issue of concern.

And I did put in a hypothetical because it seems abstract that I think we will realize this issue with that agency or any other when a President comes into office and has to live for 3, 4 years with a CFPB director appointed by the prior President. And then I think everyone is going to realize—of a different party in particular.

Senator SASSE. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And then I think everyone is going to realize, wow, that is an odd structure. Now maybe not, but that is what I wrote in my opinion that that will seem very weird because that is not what happens with all the traditional independent agencies, and so when President—whenever any President leaves and is appointed in the last 2 years, the CFPB director—the new President might campaign on consumer protection.

Let us imagine, okay, Presidential campaign, candidate campaigns on consumer protection and consumer issues and then comes into office and cannot actually appoint a new CFPB director for the whole term of his or her office. That is going to seem, I think, quite odd structurally. At least that is what I said in my opinion, again not intending to go beyond what I said in my opinion.

Senator SASSE. So is it fair to say that if you have a single person-headed agency and the President does not have the authority to hire or fire this person, that that person having policymaking functions, executive functions, and judicial functions, functionally becomes a fourth branch of Government because who are they accountable to? Is that a fair summary of the concern?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely, that is a fair summary. A branch unto itself.

Senator SASSE. I want to ask unanimous consent to enter into the record, Mr. Chairman, I have got a letter from several dozen legal scholars. They are professors that teach at Harvard, Stanford, Yale, Duke, Northwestern, and other schools, a diverse group of folks, very varied politics and legal scholarship.

But a few of their quotes I want to include here are, that they “all agree that Judge Brett M. Kavanaugh displays outstanding scholarly and academic virtues and that he would bring to the Court an exceptional record of distinction in his judicial service.” As well, “Judge Kavanaugh’s long record of teaching and mentoring students of diverse backgrounds is to be applauded,” and “Judge Kavanaugh would continue to help build productive bridges between the bench, legal practitioners, and the academy.”

Mr. Chairman, can I ask unanimous consent? Chairman, can I ask unanimous consent to include it?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator SASSE. Thank you.

I have a series of questions I would like to ask you about both precedent and the First Amendment, but I am going to be out of time too soon. So I am going to do some smaller ball stuff first and save for the next round.

I would like to go back to the Kagan quote on Scalia and the “We are all textualists now” point. What is a fair way to characterize the position that folks would have held before Justice Kagan said we have all become textualists now?

When people were—when there were nontextualists, who were they, and how does it make any sense? What is the fairest construction you can put on it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think one way to describe it is that judges would try to figure out what the general policy was reflected in the statute and then feel free to shape the particular textual provision in a way that the text itself would bear to serve that broad policy end.

And so I think that is probably one way to think about it. Another way is that judges would sometimes use a snippet of a Committee report or a floor statement and say that is really what Congress was getting at in terms of the statute. And therefore, we are going to follow that Committee report or floor statement rather than following the text of the statute.

So that is another way I think in which judges would depart from the text of the statute. And that mode of statutory interpretation I do think Justice Scalia had a very profound effect on the Supreme Court itself and the lower courts in particular. And one of the things Justice Kagan said in that speech was he probably did not get 100 percent of what he wanted in terms of moving the statutory interpretation, but he got pretty darned close in terms of moving the ball in his direction and that everyone really does pay attention to the text.

And if you sat in my court for a week and listened to argument after argument, which I do not recommend, Senator. But if you did that, you would hear judge after judge saying, well, what about the text of the statute? What about Clause 2 of the statute?

Every judge is focused on the text of the statute, again because that is what you passed and that is what matters under the Constitution, and because we know the compromises that are inherent in any legislative product and we have to respect that compromise.

Senator SASSE. So I think one of the things that concerns me about the way we have talked about your nomination and a lot of media reports about it is that it has been said that you have been nominated to the so-called “swing seat” on the Court.

I think two ways that we can go wrong. One of them are thinking about judges as Republican versus Democrat, and you are supposedly because you have been—you have worked in a Republican White House. You have worked in the George W. Bush White House and because you are being nominated by a Republican President today, there are a whole bunch of people who say, heck, yes. We won the election. We get our guy on the Court. Wear your jersey. You are supposed to be a Republican when you are on the Bench.

And then there are other people—I think that is a terrible view. There are other people who say, well, hopefully, he can grow in office. And because he is going to be nominated and confirmed to the swing seat, the Kennedy vote, the Powell vote on the Court, he will be big enough to rise above the all the muck of politics. And when there are really big issues facing the country that get to the Court, at least in a 4-to-4 Court, this could be the guy who rises to the level of giving us Solomonic wisdom and functioning not just as a judge, but maybe as a quasi-kingly figure.

What do you say to people who have a conception of a swing seat on the Court? What does that mean?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not entirely sure what it means to individual people who use that term.

Senator SASSE. Are you being considered for the swing seat?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am being nominated to replace Justice Kennedy, who was his own man, as am I my own judge. And I have talked about his jurisprudence and his devotion to liberty, which he found as the unifying theme of all the constitutional provisions and, as I said, established a legacy of liberty for ourselves and our posterity, as the Framers established this Constitution to secure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity.

But I have read that he publicly in public statements did not like that term, and I am not sure I always know what people mean by that term. As I said repeatedly, but I really believe it, I think that the Court, at least if I am on it—well, I think of the Court, period, as a Team of Nine. And if I am on it, I am fortunate enough to be confirmed, I think of myself as trying to be a team player.

I do think of things through a sports line sometimes, as I know you do, too, Senator. And I think that is important. I am not naive. I am not naive. There would be cases where people divide. But I do think that mindset and that attitude matters in any collegial body, and the Court is a collegial body.

And so different—different cases—

Senator SASSE. I am only interrupting you because I watched the Chairman pull his little gavel.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, yes.

Senator SASSE. And if I do not get my question in before the bell, I am done. So I can get one more off, if I fire fast.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Make sure it is a short question.

Senator SASSE. Yes, sir. When I was writing my dissertation, I struggled to find my voice at one point, and I had an adviser who was great. He said, put an 8-by-10 picture up, next to your keyboard, and make it be somebody that you are writing to every day and make it be somebody who is smarter than you but knows nothing about your topic.

This was great advice. I took a picture of my aunt, from one of the farms I used to work on when I was a kid, and she is far smarter than I am. She did not know anything about the topic I was writing about, and it was an incredibly helpful device for me to every day figure out who I was writing to that day.

When you write your opinions, who are you writing for?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Multiple audiences, Senator. I am thinking first and foremost about the litigants before us, and I want the losing party in particular to respect the opinion. They are not going to agree with it by definition, but I want them to respect the opinion. The clarity of the opinion, the thoroughness of the opinion, the fact that I understood the real world consequences, that I have grappled with the law, that I grappled with the best argument.

So I want the losing party to come away saying he got it. As a litigant, I knew how important that was when I lost, at least I felt like I got a fair shake. Why does that matter? Both due process and the individual case, but it builds overall confidence I think in the judiciary to know you are getting a fair shake even when you lose.

I am also writing for the parties affected by the decision. So we decide cases and controversies, but we write opinions that have precedential effect, as we have discussed often. So the opinions need to be clear. They need to be organized.

They can, if there is a screwed up footnote or something, that is going to—I have seen it in my executive branch and private practice experience. That is going to cause all sorts of complications. So to get it just exactly right is so important, which takes draft after draft after draft.

But I am thinking about the affected parties, whether it is agencies or regulated parties or the criminal defense bar or the prosecution, the U.S. Attorney's Office. I am always thinking about that.

I am thinking about someone like you said, I think similar to your model, someone who just picks up the decision and is a lawyer, and I want them to be able to read it and understand it and get it and to be able to follow it. So I always try to have an introductory paragraph or few pages, as you have seen in a few of them. Like the PHH case has a long introduction where they could just read the introduction, say "I got it." And then they could read the whole thing if they want. I think that is very important as well.

I am writing, I think about students. So students, where do they learn law? They learn law oftentimes by reading opinions. I have taught for 12 years, and I certainly understand the value of teaching. But teaching through your opinions, that is not the first thing I am thinking about. But I am, that is, okay, could a student learn from this about the criminal—the Fourth Amendment or learn about the First Amendment if they read my opinion?

If I give the—to Senator Coons' conversation, if I give the historical backdrop of the independent agencies, maybe a student will pick that up and think that is good.

And then I am thinking, I think also about professors as well. Not in a sense of trying to convince necessarily if it is not something convincible, but the sense of professors are thinking for years about things I might by definition have a week or two or four to spend. And they are writing treatises and Law Review articles, and I want them to at least be able to understand and help look at my opinions to build the body of law.

Senator SASSE. Thank you. Oh, and thank you, Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. How come you did not ask that question first?

Senator SASSE. You told me to ask last.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We are going to take a 10-minute break, but if you can be back in 5 minutes, it would benefit Senator Blumenthal.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, okay. I will do it.

[Whereupon, at 5:24 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Whereupon, at 5:35 p.m., the Committee reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thanks, Mr. Chairman. Good afternoon, Judge.

I want to begin by talking about the elephant in the room, non-theoretical. The President of the United States who has nominated you is an unindicted co-conspirator implicated in some of the most serious wrongdoing that involves the legitimacy of his Presidency. There is a distinct possibility, even a likelihood, that issues concerning his personal criminal or civil liability may come before this Supreme Court as early as the next term. The issues may involve his refusal to comply with a grand jury subpoena or to testify in a criminal trial involving one of the officials in his administration or his friends or even his own actual indictment.

We are in uncharted territory here. It is unprecedented for a Supreme Court nominee to be named by a President who is an unindicted co-conspirator. In the U.S. v. Nixon case, two of the Justices had been appointed by Richard Nixon, but not while he was an unindicted co-conspirator. I would like your commitment that you will recuse yourself if there is an issue involving his criminal or civil liability coming before the United States Supreme Court. In other words, will you take yourself out of ruling on any of the issues involving his personal criminal or civil liability?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, one of the core principles I have articulated here is the independence of the judiciary, which I know you care about deeply, too, and I think undergirds some of your comments yesterday. And the independence of the judiciary is critical to the confidence of the American people in the judiciary and to the rule of law in the United States. But one key facet of the independence of the judiciary, as I have studied the history of nominees, is not to make commitments on particular cases—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I am not asking for a particular commitment, and I am going to take your answer as a “no.” It is really a “yes” or “no” question. You will not commit to recuse yourself. You will not commit to take yourself out of that decision despite the unique circumstances of your nomination.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think to be consistent with the principle of independence of the judiciary, I should not and may not make a commitment about how I would handle a particular case, and the decision to participate in a case is itself a decision in a particular case. And, therefore, following the precedent set by all the nominees before me, I need to be careful. And, again, you may disagree with this, but this is part of what I see as the independence of the judiciary.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, I do disagree, and I am troubled and disturbed by your refusal to say that you will take yourself out of that kind of case.

I want to move on to some examples of real-world impacts on real people and taking that as a factor, as you have articulated it, in the decisions that you have made. I want to talk about Jane Doe in Garza v. Hargan. As you know, she was a 17-year-old unaccompanied minor who came across this border having escaped serious threatening, horrific physical violence in her family in her homeland. She braved horrific threats of rape and sexual exploitation as she crossed the border. She was 8 weeks pregnant. Under Texas law she received an order that entitled her to an abortion, and she also went through mandatory counseling as required by Texas law. She was eligible for an abortion under that law. The Trump administration blocked her. The Office of Refugee Resettlement forced her to go to a crisis pregnancy center where she was subjected to medically unnecessary procedures. She was punished by her continued requests to terminate her pregnancy by being isolated from the rest of the residents. She was also forced to notify her parents, which Texas law did not require. And the pregnancy, which was 8 weeks, was 4 weeks further when you participate on a panel that upheld the Trump administration in blocking her efforts to terminate her pregnancy.

The decision of that panel was overruled by a full court of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. It reversed that panel, and the decision and opinion in that case commented, "The flat barrier that the Government has interposed to her knowing and informed decision to end the pregnancy defies controlling Supreme Court precedent." And it said further, "The Government's insistence that it must not even stand back and permit abortion to go forward for someone in some form of custody is freakishly erratic."

In addition to being erratic, it also threatened her health because she was unable to terminate her pregnancy for weeks that further increased the risk of the procedure—one study said 38 percent every week. Her health was threatened. She was going through emotional turmoil. And yet in your dissent, you would have further blocked and delayed that termination of the pregnancy.

All of what I have said is correct as to the facts here, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, Senator. I respectfully disagree in various parts. My ruling, my position in the case would not have blocked—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. It would have delayed it, and it would have put her perilously close to the 20-week limit under Texas law. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. We were still several weeks away. I said several things that are important, I think. First—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, I want to go on because I can read your dissent, but I want to go to—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, but you read several things—respectfully, first of all, I think the opinion was by one judge that you were reading from. That was not the opinion for the majority.

Second, I was trying to follow precedent of the Supreme Court on parental consent which allows some delays in the abortion procedure so as to fulfill the parental consent requirements. I was reasoning by analogy from those. People can disagree, I understand, on whether we were following precedent, you know, how to read that precedent. But I was trying to do so as faithfully as I could and explained that. I also did not join the separate opinion, the separate dissent that said she had no right to attain an abortion at all. I did not say that. And I also made clear that the Government could not use this immigration sponsor provision as a ruse to try to delay her abortion past, to your point, the time when it was safe.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Let us talk about your dissent in just a moment, but, first, I want to talk about a list. It is the list that Donald Trump circulated in May 2016 of his potential Supreme Court nominees. May 2016. Was your name on that list?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It was not.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And then he circulated another list in November 2017, another list of Supreme Court nominees. November 2017. Was your name on that list?

Judge KAVANAUGH. 2017, yes. There was another list in the interim between those two, but—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And his litmus test for that list was that a Justice that he would nominate would have to automatically overturn Roe v. Wade, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not going to comment on what he had said. Whatever he had said publicly—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, he said it. That is not in dispute. And in between, in—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not sure the exact words you just used are consistent with what he said, but whatever he said publicly will stand in the record.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Exactly.

October 2017, your decision and dissent in Garza occurred. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It did, but that case came to us in an emergency posture. I did not seek that case. That was not a speech. I was driving home on a Wednesday night, as I recall, and the clerk's office called and said, "We have an emergency abortion case," which is very unusual in our court. First time I had had one.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Okay. What occurred then between May 2016 and November 2017 besides your Garza dissent that put you on that list?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, Mr. McGahn was White House Counsel, and the President has taken office by then, if I am—sorry, I am looking at the dates. I think I got it—May.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. We can hold it up higher.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No; that is okay. I got it now. The interim list—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. So let me ask you—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But so President Trump had taken office. Mr. McGahn was White House Counsel. Those are just facts. And then what else happened, I—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. It is a mystery.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, it is not a mystery. I am just debating whether I want to say, but a lot of judges and lawyers who I know—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Let us talk about your dissent for a moment.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I answer the question? Can I answer the question?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I want to talk about your dissent.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I had an answer to your question. You said, "What else happened?" And I have an answer.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Go ahead.

Judge KAVANAUGH. A lot of judges and lawyers I know made clear to, I think, various people that they thought I should at least be considered based on my record for the last 12 years. And colleagues of mine thought I should be considered, and I think that—I appreciate that.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And maybe more than a few of them cited your dissent in Garza.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think it had happened long before that, actually. They—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, let us talk about the dissent, though. In that dissent, three times you used the term "abortion on demand." "Abortion on demand," as you know, is a code word in the anti-choice community. In fact, it is used by Justices Scalia and Thomas in their dissents from Supreme Court opinions that affirm Roe v. Wade. They have used it numerous times in those dissents, and it is a word used in the anti-choice community. And, in addition, in that dissent, you refer to Roe v. Wade as "existing Supreme Court precedent." You do not refer to it as Roe v. Wade protecting Jane Doe's right to privacy or her right to an abortion. You refer to it as "existing Supreme Court precedent"—not "Supreme Court precedent"—"existing Supreme Court precedent."

Now, I do not recall seeing a judge refer to "existing Supreme Court precedent" in other decisions, certainly not commonly, unless they are opening the possibility of overturning that precedent. It is a little bit like somebody introducing his wife to you as, "my current wife." You might not expect that wife to be around for all that long. "My current wife"—"existing Supreme Court precedent."

And throughout your opinion, you are careful to never say that the Constitution protects the right to choose. You concede that the parties have "assumed for purposes of this case" that the plaintiff has a right to end her pregnancy, but not that she actually has that right. You write, "As a lower court, our job is to follow the law as it is, not as we might wish it to be."

Judge KAVANAUGH. There I have to interrupt, Senator, because I was referring to the parental consent cases as well, which I talked about at some length there. And my disagreement with the other judge was that I thought I was, as best I could, faithfully following the precedent on the parental consent statutes, which allowed reasonable regulation. As Casey said, "minors benefit from consultation about abortion." That is an exact quote from Casey, and the Supreme Court had upheld those statutes even though they allowed—I mean they occasioned some delay in the abortion procedure. Justices Marshall, Brennan, and Blackmun dissented in those.

And so an "existing Supreme Court precedent," I put it all together, Roe v. Wade plus the parental consent statutes, and I said different people disagree about this from different directions, but we have to follow it as faithfully as possible, and the parental consent were the—was the model—not the model, the precedent.

And can I say, on “abortion on demand,” I do not—I am not familiar with the code word. What I am familiar with is Chief Justice Burger in his concurrence in Roe v. Wade itself, so he joined the majority in Roe v. Wade, and he wrote a concurrence that specifically said that the Court today does not uphold abortion on demand. That is his phrase. And he joined the majority in Roe v. Wade. And what that meant in practice over the years, over the last 45 years, is that reasonable regulations are permissible so long as they do not constitute an undue burden. And that has been the parental consent, the informed consent, the 24-hour waiting period, parental notice laws, and that is what I understood Chief Justice Burger to be contemplating and what I was recognizing when I used that term. I am not familiar—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, it also was a signal. Let us be very blunt here. It was a signal to the Federalist Society and the Heritage Foundation and to the preparers of those lists—the President outsourced that task to those groups—that you were prepared, and you are, to overturn Roe v. Wade. “Abortion on demand” has a very specific meaning in the dissents after Roe, and the concurrences. “Existing Supreme Court precedent,” and reference to that precedent not as you wished it to be, but as the law, Supreme Court precedent existing now, required.

Is it a fact, Judge, also that while you were in the Bush White House, you took the position that not all legal scholars actually believe that Roe v. Wade is the settled law of the land and that the Supreme Court could always overturn it as precedent and, in fact, there were a number of Justices who would do so?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that is what legal scholars have—some legal scholars have undoubtedly said things like that over time, but that is different from what I as a judge—my position as a judge is that there are 45 years of precedent and there is Planned Parenthood v. Casey, which reaffirmed Roe, so that is precedent on precedent, as I have explained, and that is important. And that is an important precedent of the Supreme Court. It is not the only—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I think—

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is not the only precedent, though, and Casey, it is very important to understand, I think, and it goes to your point about existing. Planned Parenthood v. Casey reaffirmed Roe, but at the same time upheld Pennsylvania’s waiting period, its informed consent provision, and the parental consent provision of the Pennsylvania law, and Justices Blackmun and Stevens dissented from that part of the decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey. That was Justices Kennedy, O’Connor, and Souter who upheld that. So, in many ways, Casey reached—in applying the undue burden standard, reached a position that allowed some reasonable regulation, as the Court put it, so long as it does not constitute an undue burden. And so existing Supreme Court precedent is the body of precedent on the regulations, too. It is Roe, but then what regulations, and that is the body of existing Supreme Court precedent.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And that is exactly the point here. You were telling the Trump administration that if they wanted someone who would overturn Roe v. Wade, you would make the list. These were your bumper stickers in that campaign: “Abortion on demand,” “Existing precedent,” “Law not as it necessarily was as you wished it now.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I would just say two other things, Senator. One, I did not join the separate opinion of another dissenter who said that there was no constitutional right at all for the minor in that case. I did not join that opinion. And, second, I—I will say three things. Second, I said in a footnote, joined by Judge Henderson and Judge Griffith, that—my whole dissent was joined by both of them—that the Government could not use this transfer to the sponsor procedure as a ruse to delay the abortion past unsafe time.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. You did not join that dissent, but let me ask you—

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I said, third, that if the 9 days or 7 days expired, that the minor at that point, unless the Government had some other argument that had not unfolded yet that was persuasive, and since they had not unfolded it yet—I am not sure what that would have been—that the minor would have to be allowed to obtain the abortion at that time. So the whole point was simply—and it was not my policy, but my question was to review the policy set forth by the Government, and the question was: Was that policy consistent with precedent? And it was a delay, undoubtedly, but a delay consistent, as I saw it, with the Supreme Court precedent on parental consent provisions.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, let me just ask you then: Can you commit, sitting here today, that you would never overturn Roe v. Wade?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, Senator, each of the eight Justices currently on the Supreme Court, when they were in this seat, declined to answer that question.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I understand—I understand your answer. You have given it on other issues before. But you can understand also given what we have seen in Garza and the pattern here of sending a signal about your willingness to overturn Roe v. Wade, that your response leaves in serious question your commitment to this precedent. And, in fact, given the real-world consequences here, a young woman’s health was put in serious jeopardy. She came close to being unable at 20 weeks to even have the opportunity to terminate her pregnancy. She was deprived of options because of that wait, and you would have delayed it further, and perhaps completely. And I think that you needed to send a message to the Trump administration that you should be on that list.

Let me move on to other health care issues. You have taken the position in Seven-Sky—and I am going to put up a poster—that the President’s authority—“Under the Constitution, the President may decline to enforce a statute that regulates private individuals when he [the President] deems”—when he deems—“the statute unconstitutional, even if a court has held or would hold the statute constitutional.”

Under the Affordable Care Act, as you know, there are protections for millions of Americans who suffer from pre-existing conditions. That protection has real-world consequences. Pre-existing conditions include Alzheimer's, arthritis, congestive heart failure, Crohn's disease, hepatitis, lupus, mental disorders. That is just a very partial list, including being pregnant. You have answered my colleague, Senator Coons, that you would not say whether or not the President would have the power to strike down that statute unilaterally or decide that he would not enforce it because there is a case pending.

Do you believe that the President can refuse to enforce that statute even if the United States Supreme Court upholds it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, a couple things. First of all, just to close out the prior discussion, you said delayed completely. That is not what I said. In fact, I said it could not be delayed past the point of a safe time. I just wanted to close the loop on that and make clear the record on that.

On this, I was referring to the concept of prosecutorial discretion, and this is in a broader—which is established by the United States v. Richard Nixon case, which says the executive branch has the “exclusive authority and absolute discretion whether to prosecute a case.” That is an exact quote from U.S. v. Nixon, if I am remembering correctly, and then in Heckler v. Chaney, the Supreme Court says that that principle applies to civil enforcement as well. So that is the precedent of the Supreme Court that I was referring to and explained later in Aiken.

But why did I have that in there at all? I was—in the Affordable Care Act case, I wrote a decision saying that the Court should not consider it, at that time, because it was not ripe under the Anti-Injunction Act, and that we should wait to consider it when—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But here is my question to you—the enforcement of the Affordable Care Act is a matter of prosecutorial discretion, and my question is, even if the United States Supreme Court in that Texas case should hold it to be constitutional, could President Trump decline to enforce it and put at risk the health of literally tens of millions of Americans, including 500,000 people in Connecticut who suffer from those diseases, including those homeless people who come to the shelter where you distribute meals?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So a couple things on that, Senator. The concept of prosecutorial discretion, as you know, of course, as a former U.S. Attorney, is well rooted in American law. So if a U.S. Attorney decides we are going to go after bank fraud and not after low-level marijuana, that is classic prosecutorial discretion.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But we are not talking about that discretion. We are talking about the President saying that law, the Affordable Care Act, or, for that matter, civil rights statutes, which this President unfortunately could decide he is not going to enforce, or consumer protection statutes or even anticorruption statutes, we are talking about statutes that, as you said here, regulate individuals and they protect them, simply because he deems them unconstitutional, refused to enforce them, not in selected cases, across the board.

Judge KAVANAUGH. A couple things, Senator. First of all, for a few of your examples, of course, there are private causes of action as well, so—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. There are private causes of action, but the Government is the chief enforcer.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree with that. I am not disputing that. On prosecutorial discretion, what I said in the subsequent Aiken County case, I elaborated on that, but then in a subsequent Marquette speech that is published in the Marquette Lawyer that you have, I indicated that the limits of prosecutorial discretion are uncertain and it would be important for academics and others to study that history and figure out what the limits are.

So, for example, in the deferred—in the immigration context—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, my point is there are no limits here.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But the Supreme Court, if you look at the quote in United States v. Richard Nixon, which I know you have read, it says the executive branch has the “exclusive authority and absolute discretion whether to prosecute a case.” Now, Heckler v. Chaney refers back to that, cites that, and that is in the civil context. There are some limits presumably on prosecutorial discretion, but this came up in the immigration context in President Obama’s administration. That is still something I will not comment on directly, but there are always questions about prosecutorial discretion of—Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, let me just point out—and I apologize for interrupting you, but my time is limited.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I understand.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. In Seven-Sky v. Holder, in your dissent you said, “Under the Constitution”—this is in your dissent in that case. You cited Justice Scalia in Freytag v. Commissioner as your authority.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. “The President may decline to enforce a statute that regulates private individuals when the President deems the statute unconstitutional, even if a court has held or would hold the statute constitutional.” I am going to leave this topic. I hope we will have an opportunity to return to it tomorrow.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Sure.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And I want to talk about the Second Amendment and your position on gun violence prevention. As you know, my State has a tragic history—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL [continuing]. And experience, recently with this issue. But literally every community in the whole country has some experience with gun violence prevention because 90 people every day die from it. And I am deeply troubled by your position on this issue that history and tradition govern here, that any weapon in common use is protected. The reason that some weapons are not in common use is that they are banned, like machine guns. If our standard is going to be whether assault weapons are in common use, we are going to have more and more of them, and they are in common use, they are commonly used to kill people. That is what they were designed to do.

So I want your explanation as to how possibly you can justify requiring that gun violence protection statutes have to be long-standing or traditional and that they cannot in any way protect people from weapons, assault weapons, that are, as you put it, “in common use,” because they are in common use only because they are not in any way regulated for public safety.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Judge, you answer as thoroughly as you need to answer that question. And then when you are done answering that question, I am going to call on Senator Flake.

Judge KAVANAUGH. A few things, Senator. First, at the end of my Heller opinion, I pointed out that I grew up in this area, and this area has been plagued by—in the 1970s and 1980s plagued by gang and gun/drug violence, and was known for a while as the “murder capital of the world.” So I understand and appreciate your initial comment on that.

Second, where did I get the test? I got it right out of the Supreme Court’s opinion in Heller, which uses those exact phrases and then elaborates on those in the subsequent McDonald case. And I know people passionately disagree with the Supreme Court’s decision in Heller and with the Supreme Court’s decision in McDonald. But as a lower-court judge, I am following all the precedent. It is not a cafeteria where I can pick which precedents I want to apply. I have to apply all the precedents. I did that. I explained it in painstaking detail why I thought the test I was applying was appropriate in that case and went through the test.

I made clear that the Supreme Court Part 3 of Justice Scalia’s majority opinion in Heller allowed—still allowed a lot of gun regulation. Machine guns can be banned. Laws, traditional laws, felon in possession, concealed carry were identified there, laws prohibiting guns—possession by people with mental illness, government buildings, schools, those were all pre-identified. And then it is important to point out, also, the footnote in Heller says, “This list is not meant to be exhaustive,” and so I think that is guidance to the lower court when applying that test.

As Chief Justice Roberts said at the oral argument in Heller, “You reason by analogy from those historical exceptions in regulations,” and that is something that I think is appropriate, and I said it in my opinion. But, ultimately, I had to apply the test to the Supreme Court, and I understand people may disagree, (a) with the Supreme Court opinion or (b) with how I applied it, but I tried to do it as faithfully as I could.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Flake.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Judge. Thank you for your—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Hey, wait a minute, would you, please? Start his time over.

Judge, you have been attacked for this short footnote that you wrote in the Affordable Care Act case about when a President may decline to enforce the laws passed by Congress. But in a different opinion, you actually ordered the executive branch to comply with the law. You wrote, “It is no overstatement to say that our constitutional system of separation of powers would be significantly altered if we were to allow executive and independent agencies to disregard Federal law.”

Obviously, you do not think the President has a blank check to ignore the law.

Senator Flake.

Senator FLAKE. Thanks. Always happy to defer to the Chair.

I appreciate your endurance here today, Judge, and let me just ask, you mentioned your mother as one of your judicial heroes. Who else would you put on that list? What people do you admire and why?

Judge KAVANAUGH. My mom, as you mentioned, of course, trial judge, real-world consequences, real people in the real world, and saw her operate her courtroom with firmness and civility and was well respected as a prosecutor first, then as a judge, and her civility and work ethic are something—and remembering that cases have real-world consequences.

Justice Kennedy, I have mentioned, a model of independence, fiercely defended judicial independence throughout his career, a model of civility and collegiality. You can look at 30 years of his opinions, and what is the harshest thing ever written? It is not—you cannot find it. Just a model of civility in his judicial opinions. Oral argument, always so courteous to Counsel, in his public speeches, someone who always celebrated the Constitution and its protection of individual liberty, and showed by his example, I think, how to conduct oneself as a judge off the Bench.

When I became a judge, I was sworn in May 30, 2006, in his chambers, and he said, “You are going to go back and you are going to”—“Soon you are going to feel lonely. You have been doing this job at the White House. It is all energetic. And you are going to feel quiet.” And he said, “Get out and teach,” and he has taught since 1975, I believe, when he became a Ninth Circuit judge. And I followed that example, and teaching has been an important part of my life. So he taught—he instructed that. You know, the legacy of liberty he left for the United States is written all through the U.S. reports.

Justice Scalia, someone I knew, and also a fierce adherent to the Constitution and someone who changed statutory interpretation, as we have discussed, in terms of his focus on the text. But it was rooted in his appreciation for the Constitution and the rule of law. And as he often said, but it is true, if you look through his jurisprudence, the decisions where he ruled in ways that people did not expect, protection of the Fourth Amendment, for example, the thermal imaging case, Kyllo; the Jones case on GPS tracking; First Amendment, Texas v. Johnson. He had in Hamdi, the dissent. So he was a fierce, also, protector of individual liberty, even in the national security context.

I look back to Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Jackson for whom Chief Justice Rehnquist clerked as two people who had experience in the executive branch and then came to the Supreme Court and I think became models of independence. Justice Jackson, of course, with his beautiful prose also in cases like Morissette, Korematsu, and Youngstown, Barnett as well.

Rehnquist, I think such a firm but also affable manner. I wrote about Rehnquist—I gave a speech about him and wrote—I referred to the fact that “Brethren” was this book that came out in the late 1970s very critical of—well, the sources were very critical of the Supreme Court, not saying the authors were, of some of the Justices individually, but Rehnquist is referred to by all these terms throughout that emphasized his collegiality, and I think that is why he was such a hero.

And then I will end it with, you know, anytime you look at the Constitution and you think about people who have had an effect on it and what it means today, you have to identify and you should identify Thurgood Marshall because of what he did as a Justice, but perhaps even more, he had a huge record as a Justice that is very important. And he was a real-world consequences person. I pulled up an old oral argument one time in a First Amendment case that he argued in the early 1970s, and it was about ads on a bus, on the interior of a bus, and I guess it was political ads on the interior of a bus, and the question was whether they were permissible, and the First Amendment right to run these ads on the interior of the bus. And the wording was that they would be identified, it would look like the city was putting its imprimatur on a political candidate. And Thurgood Marshall started the oral argument, "Why? Why?" You know, "Why are you banning them?" And then they said, "Well, people might think that the city is endorsing the political candidate." And he said, "Do you really think people are that stupid?" And it just showed his—he got the real-world consequences in a way that no one else—but, of course, his legacy is towering in terms of what he did as a litigator and helped—not singlehandedly, but he certainly—he had colleagues, but he helped bring the end of Plessy v. Ferguson and achieve the greatest moment in Supreme Court history in Brown v. Board. So I always think about Thurgood Marshall's legacy as well.

So that is a much more long-winded answer than you expected, Senator, but I appreciate you giving me the time.

Senator FLAKE. That is important insight. I appreciate it. I had the opportunity to sit next to Anthony Kennedy last Saturday for John McCain's funeral, and I think all of us have the same opinion of his collegiality, friendliness, and that certainly is important. We will talk about that a little later.

I noted yesterday some concerns, back to the real world here, about an administration that does not seem to understand or appreciate the separation of powers or the rule of law. I worry that the President, the head of our executive branch, may be using Executive power to advance personal political interests. Now more than ever I think that we have to ensure that our institutions are independence and are firm against encroaching partisan politicking. There is nowhere more important obviously than the judiciary. Alexander Hamilton famously wrote in Federalist No. 78 that you have cited many times that the judiciary is the least dangerous branch of Government based on the understanding that the judicial branch lacks what he said was the power of the executive branch and the political passions of the legislature.

I believe that if you are confirmed to the Supreme Court—I do not believe that you would erode judicial independence or otherwise disrupt the separation of powers between the three branches. You have been discussing your reverence for the separation of powers with us today, particularly the importance of keeping the judiciary the least dangerous branch by making sure that it stays apolitical. And I will discuss that more in a moment, but specifically, I am a little concerned about the executive branch and the powers therein, and I reiterate some of the concerns that Senator Sasse just identified. And in response to Senator Sasse, you walked us through some of the founding documents, the Constitution Federalist Papers, that endow the President with positive powers. You have also discussed today cases; you mentioned Youngstown, U.S. v. Nixon, those that you admire because they involve the judiciary standing up to the President and putting limits on Executive power. These precedents certainly restrain Presidential power.

But I am curious. What limits are there, if any, that would prevent a President from centralizing the Executive power and using it for his own political or personal purposes? What protections are there, statutory, constitutional, judicial, that are built into the system? Can you talk a little about that? You have talked about the positive things that give a President or endow the Executive with power. What constraints are there?

Judge KAVANAUGH. First, Senator, there are the constraints built into the Constitution which—the appropriations power, the Senate confirmation power, which is often used, as you know, of course, as a way to restrain Executive action or at least to prevent the—not only to prevent the appointment of people for principal executive officers who might be—the Senate might not approve, but also sometimes as ways of restraint.

There are also built into the constitutional—there is the ultimate remedies in the Constitution for—there are remedies for how judges can be removed, how Members of Congress can be removed through the expulsion power, and how Presidents can be removed. Those are built in. Those are the ultimate checks that are built into the constitutional system for all of us. There is no one who is guaranteed a permanent time because of the ultimate checks that are in the constitutional system as well.

There are statutes then beyond the Constitution, and I did not mean that to be an exhaustive list, but there are innumerable branch statutes that, of course, regulate Presidential and executive branch conduct in all sorts of ways, whether it be statutes that regulate war powers, surveillance, detention, interrogation, the War Powers Act, statutes that regulate in the domestic arena, statutes that regulate the operations of Government, Freedom of Information Act, Federal Advisory Committee Act, Inspector Generals Act, that all are efforts by Congress, as has historically been understood, to make sure the executive branch does not operate in a way that Congress disapproves of. And there are norms. Norms are important. I think norms, historical practices—Madison talks about that in Federalist No. 37. I think historical practice is relevant to judicial decisionmaking, as we have seen in a lot of judicial decisions. But when I worked in the executive branch, one of the questions I always asked and I ask as a judge is: How has this been done before? And I think that is always—two things I always tell students, two things to always ask yourself, what does the text of the relevant law say, regulation, code, statutes, Constitution? And how has it been done before? Which is really a question of precedent or norm within the executive branch or norms within Congress. Those are important as well.

So I think there is constitutional and statutory structures as well as custom or norm that all constrain Congress and constrain the executive branch and constrain the judiciary as well.

Senator FLAKE. You discussed with Senator Sasse the danger of independence agencies that amass too much power in any individual. Would that not be true with the Executive as well?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was the debate at the Constitutional Convention, Senator, whether to have a plural Executive—in other words, multi-member Executive—or to have a single President. And, ultimately, the Framers at the Convention decided to go with—and Wilson and Gouverneur Morris, James Wilson and Gouverneur Morris were really the architects of the Presidency at the Constitutional Convention. And they ultimately convinced the others to go with a single President. But at the same time, the fear that you just discussed—or the concern, is a better word to put, you just discussed was certainly raised by people at the time, and that is why Hamilton wrote Federalist No. 69—well, that is why they put all the checks into the Constitution and why Hamilton wrote Federalist No. 69 to point out for the people who were voting on ratification all those differences between the king and a monarchy. And so that fear has existed throughout American history. I think of an Executive that is unchecked, and it is why, for example, the Supreme Court has been willing—Marbury is another case. President Jefferson, of course, is trying—is the one who loses in Marbury v. Madison. President Truman loses in Youngstown. President Nixon loses in United States v. Richard Nixon. Hamdi, national security is not a blank check for the President. That was President Bush.

Senator FLAKE. Let me bring it up to today. You have mentioned a couple of times that you live in the real world.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I try, yes. That is important for a judge.

Senator FLAKE. And let me bring it to the real world. This week, there was a Tweet by the President that said—and I mentioned this yesterday—“Two long-running, Obama era, investigations of two very popular Republican Congressmen were brought to a well publicized charge, just ahead of the Mid-Terms, by the Jeff Sessions Justice Department. Two easy wins now in doubt because there is not enough time. Good job, Jeff.”

Should a President be able to use his authority to pressure executive or independence agencies to carry out directives for purely political purposes?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I understand the question, but I think one of the principles of judicial independence that judges, sitting judges—and I am a sitting judge—and nominees sitting here need to be careful about is commenting on current events or political controversies. I do not think we want judges commenting on the latest political controversy because that would ultimately lead the people to doubt whether we are independent or whether we are politicians in robes. And so maintaining that strict independence of the judiciary requires me, I think, to avoid commenting on any current events.

Senator FLAKE. All right. Forget I just said that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I said I understand, but I—

Senator FLAKE. Just answer this question: Should a President use his or her authority to pressure executive or independent agency officials into carrying out directives for purely political purposes?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think that hypothetical that you are asking is directly analogous to the current events, and, therefore, I hesitate to get in. It is also me commenting on something that is not a case or an issue or something I have written about. I just—I have thought about this principle as well and looking at all of the nominee precedent of the Supreme Court nominees in the past, and I think about Chief Justice Roberts and I think an underappreciated aspect of his Chief Justiceship is how he has fervently stood up for the independence of the judiciary and tried to keep the judiciary out of politics through what he does off the Bench as well as on the Bench. And I think that is—he sets the tone for the entire American judiciary, and I think that tone of not getting us involved in politics means I need to stay not just away from the line but three zip codes away from the line of current events or politics. And so I respectfully—I understand, but I respectfully decline.

Senator FLAKE. Well, let me rephrase it a different way. If you have an Executive who is abusing his or her authority by instructing independent agencies of Government to use—or to pursue political ends, are there any remedies other than the one that you mentioned, a political remedy involving Congress, or is there something short of that? And I understand your aversion, as many in this body had—I was not here yet—to the independent counsel statute that we did away with. You expressed—you are a little more sanguine about a special counsel. But what other remedies are there and what other constraints are there on a President?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the constraints on the Executive generally are important ones. The appropriations power is a huge check. That is an enormous check if employed as fully as it might be. The confirmation power of executive branch officials, the ultimate check, of course, that you referred to is always part of the system. And then just to be clear on the special counsel system that I spoke approvingly of in the 1999 law journal article and I have referred to in my PHH opinion just last year, the traditional system, that exists. And then I have said what I said about the old independent counsel statute, but that was a statute that had a lot of parts to it, and if a case came before me that had a different statute that you had enacted or that statute, I would have an open mind about considering the arguments in favor of that, and against it, of course. And so those are—you know, that possibility is present to the Congress, of course, in general.

Senator FLAKE. But if the President could fire an independent counsel or a special counsel, is that any restraint at all?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that hypothetical was tested, I suppose, in September 1973, if I have my month right, and—I might not have my month right, but it might have been a different month, but in 1973. And the system held.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you. We will move on and maybe get back to this tomorrow.

A conversation you and I had about separation of powers leads to a host of other related legal issues, including Chevron deference and agency overregulation. In your written opinions, you have suggested that you have concerns with Chevron deference. I share those concerns, as we spoke about. You have explained that Chevron deference can allow executive agencies to stretch the meaning of the law beyond what Congress intended. I think we have certainly seen that. You have also encouraged Congress—it can also encourage Congress to abdicate its legislative power by punting its lawmaking responsibilities to the other two branches. We spoke at length about that in a conversation with Senator Sasse and others about our inability here in Congress to actually legislate on important issues. You were discussing with another Senator our failure here to authorize war. I have had that frustration for years now, myself and Senator Tim Kaine, and others trying, unsuccessfully, express Congress' opinion and to provide some kind of template at least, if nothing else, for the executive branch to follow in terms of these long unauthorized wars.

But that aside, your opinion suggests that a Chevron analysis has a two-part test: one, determining if there is statutory ambiguity and, if so, determining whether an agency's interpretation of the statute is reasonable. So the real question, when it comes to Chevron, is not just whether to defer to an agency but, rather, how a judge approaches statutory ambiguities.

How do you know when a statute is ambiguous?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is a huge problem, Senator, and I think that is at the heart of the concern I have about how certain canons of statutory interpretation have been applied, including Chevron, legislative history, constitutional avoidance, as well. They depend on a threshold finding of ambiguity. And after several years as a judge, I thought about why is it that I disagree with a colleague after a particular case? What is at the root of that disagreement? Because we are both independent judges, and why are we disagreeing?

It occurred to me in some cases that the disagreement is not about what the best meaning of the statute is or what the precedent says. The disagreement is about whether something is ambiguous. And then I would think about going to the judge as umpire vision that I believe in. How can we get neutral principles for determining ambiguity? And this is—and it turns out it is really hard to get neutral principles for how much ambiguity is enough. And there are two problems at the heart of that.

First of all, just to try to reason through this: is 60 percent ambiguity enough, or 80 percent ambiguity, or 95 percent ambiguity? Where is your ambiguity trigger, so to speak? And then, second of all, when applying whatever trigger you come up with, how the heck do you figure out whether a particular word or phrase or statutory provision crosses that ambiguity threshold? And this is something that Justice Kagan and Justice Scalia both have talked about. In the past, Justice Kagan actually said at that same speech where she said we are all textualists now, she also said, you know, some people just find ambiguity more quickly than others do, which I think is a true statement, an observation of human nature, but also leaves the judge as umpire vision in real trouble in those cases because if there is no neutral principles to determine ambiguity, then we are going—and this is not a minor deal.

So if you are in a case about deference to an agency, the fate of huge regulations can—so to give you the example, three judges could be sitting around after oral argument and all three could agree actually the agency's reading of the statute is not the best reading of the statute given the words, but two judges will say, “I think it is ambiguous,” and the third one says, “I do not think it is ambiguous.” So the two will defer to the agency, no, it is not the best reading of the statute, that can be a $1 billion decision right there, fate of huge regulations rise or fall just on that. And one judge will say, “Well, I think it is not ambiguous.” “Well, I think it is.” And there is not a great—in my experience sitting in those conference rooms, a great neutral principle, and to my mind that is a concern if you have, as I do, the idea that judges should be umpires and we should have neutral rules of the road. So that is something I focused on. I explained that at some length in that Harvard article. I know you and I talked about that as well.

Senator FLAKE. Let us talk about stare decisis, precedent. You talked a little about I think what Senator Lee—about 5-to-4 decisions, they have the same weight, same precedent as those decided unanimously. Kelo, in 2005, was a 5-to-4 decision, obviously concerning the Government’s ability to seize property for economic purposes. Those of us in the West are very concerned about issues like this. Arizona, for example, is 85 percent publicly owned when you take State, Federal, and Tribal property. Only about 15 percent of the State is in private hands. So decisions that the Federal Government makes, whether it is the legislative branch, executive agencies, or the judiciary, has an outsized impact on a State like Arizona. Judge Gorsuch, coming from the West, was familiar with many of these issues. You serving on the D.C. Circuit have addressed these issues more than perhaps others.

Do you want to talk a little about that, about some of the Western issues or these issues, and Kelo in particular? That is a big concern out West.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So I think Kelo was something that was controversial in the East, too, and the Midwest, and the West—in terms of that decision.

Senator FLAKE. Duly noted.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. But I know it is of special concern in the West as well, but it is a precedent of the Supreme Court. But to your point, I have had cases involving regulations. A couple of examples. One where a critical habitat designation based on a fairy shrimp that was found on a property, Otay Mesa case, and I wrote in that case that the statutory term was occupied, and the fact that you could not see it to the naked eye, that the fairy shrimp had been present in a tire rut 3 years earlier was not enough to designate a huge swath—

Senator FLAKE. I think you said it was the size of an ant or something.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I did, yes, Senator. So I had that case, and I think there I was just applying the statute as I saw it, but I was trying to do it in a way that understood the concern of landowners.

I had another case, Carpenters case, it is called. It was another designation of land in the West, and the issue involved standing of someone who was deprived of their business because of the designation. And I found standing because I think it is important to understand that when something like that happens, there are lots of affected parties. I have talked about this in other cases, like my Mingo Logan case. When the Government regulation—the policy is not my concern, but in assessing standing, for example, or retroactivity, which was another case I had, you need to think about the affected parties, so businesses, workers, the coal miners in the Mingo Logan case or the people in the lumber, the timber industry in the Carpenters case. But I am also sympathetic to the fact that Westerners do not think people in the East always understand what is going on with those designations. I put right in—

Senator FLAKE. Not even remotely.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, not even remotely. I grant you that. I tried to put out in my opinion something. I said, “For Easterners reading this opinion”—this is the second paragraph of the opinion. “For Easterners reading this opinion, the size of this designation is twice the size of the State of New Jersey.” And I said, “So if you are an Easterner, imagine driving up the New Jersey Turnpike and then all the way back down it, and you will have some sense of what it would take to drive across this designation of land,” which was just my way of saying—

Senator FLAKE. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Trying to appreciate the effect of some of these things in the West.

Senator FLAKE. Getting back to precedent, you know, when you are not on the Supreme Court, if you are in one of the lower courts, then you always look to the Supreme Court, and those precedents are of equal weight, I guess, any decision that is made. But when you are on the Supreme Court, precedent is only precedent until it is not precedent anymore, until there is a decision made.

My question, I guess, is: A decision like Kelo, decided in 2005, a 5–4 decision, does it have the same weight as a Texas v. Johnson decided in 1989 on the flag-burning issue? How do you—what weight do you give it, once you are on the high court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think you start with principles that the Supreme Court itself has articulated about precedent, and those principles that look at, of course, whether the decision is wrong, grievously wrong, whether the decision is inconsistent, deeply inconsistent with other legal principles that have developed around it.

You look at the real-world consequences, to your point, the workability and real-world consequences. You look also at the reliance interests. Those are very important, the Supreme Court has said, in looking at precedent.

But one of the things I will say about Kelo—this is kind of an offshoot of your question—is that a lot of States in the wake of Kelo have enacted—or their State Supreme Courts have interpreted their own Constitutions in a way that prevents takings of private property for what appears to be not the traditional public uses but going to economic development for private parties. And so, again, I think I have cited this before, but Judge Sutton on the Sixth Circuit, his book, “51 Imperfect Solutions,” is a great book about how State Constitutions and State constitutional law and State statutes can enhance protection of individual liberty even beyond what the Supreme Court has interpreted the Federal Constitution to be.

That is not a direct answer to your question, but it is another way that the people who are affected can—who are upset about that kind of land use designation can find protection.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY [presiding]. Senator HIRONO.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I have some letters of opposition to Judge Kavanaugh's nomination. These are letters from Lambda Legal and 63 national, State, and local LGBT groups, from Earth Justice, from Muslim advocates, from 63 women lawyers and supporters of Whole Woman's Health, from Secular Coalition for America, and from Asian-Pacific American advocates. I ask unanimous consent to enter these letters into the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator HIRONO. Thank you. Judge Kavanaugh, Chief Justice John Roberts has recognized that "the judicial branch is not immune" from the widespread problem of sexual harassment and assault, and has taken steps to address this issue. As part of my responsibility as a Member of this Committee to ensure the fitness of nominees for a lifetime appointment to the Federal bench, I ask each nominee two questions. The first question for you. Since you became a legal adult, have you ever made unwanted requests for sexual favors or committed any verbal or physical harassment or assault of a sexual nature?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator HIRONO. Have you ever faced discipline or entered into a settlement related to this kind of conduct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator HIRONO. I started asking these questions about sexual harassment because it is so hard to hold lifetime appointees to the Federal bench accountable, and because I did not want the #MeToo movement to be swept under the rug. While Senator Hatch asked you some questions about this, I have some additional questions for you.

Last December, 15 brave women came forward and shared their stories of sexual harassment and assault by former Judge Alex Kozinski. Some of them are detailed on the chart behind me: very explicit allegations of sexual harassment and assault. We know from the reporting that Judge Kozinski's behavior was egregious and pervasive. It went on for more than 30 years. It affected law clerks, professors, law students, lawyers, and in, at least, one case, even another Federal judge. And those are just the women who came forward. Judge Kozinski's behavior became so notorious that professors began to warn female students not to apply for clerkships with him. Judge Kozinski's behavior, in this regard, was an open secret.

A short time after Judge Kozinski's accusers went public, the Judge abruptly resigned, which effectively shut down the Federal investigation into his misconduct. I do not think this was a coincidence. In 2008, in connection with another investigation into Judge Kozinski, the L.A. Times wrote a story about something called, "the Easy Rider Gag List," an email group that the Judge used to send, what the Times reported was, quote, "a steady diet of tasteless humor" end quote. The report describes a list is made up of friends and associates, including his law clerks, colleagues on the Federal bench, prominent attorneys, and journalists.

Senator Hatch asked you if you were on this “Easy Rider Gag List” where Judge Kozinski would send inappropriate materials. Your response was that you do not remember anything like that. Are you telling us that you may have received a steady diet of what people on the list have described as, quote, “a lot of vulgar jokes, very dirty jokes,” but you do not remember it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, I do not remember anything like that, and I am not—

Senator HIRONO. So, the answer is “no.” Have you ever—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, if I could elaborate.

Senator HIRONO. I think that is a complete answer. Let me go on. Have you otherwise ever received sexually suggestive or explicit emails from Judge Kozinski, even if you do not remember whether you were on this “Gag List” or not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, Senator, you start with, “no woman should be subjected to sexual harassment in the workplace,” and—

Senator HIRONO. Judge Kavanaugh, you already went through all of that, and I will get to your perspective about making sure that women in the judiciary do not get sexually harassed. I just want to ask you, during and after your clerkship with Judge Kozinski, did you ever witness or hear of allegations of any inappropriate behavior or conduct that could be described as sexual harassment by Judge Kozinski?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, Senator. And, you know, there were 10 judges—I worked in Washington, DC. There were 10 judges in the courthouse with him in Pasadena, prominent—prominent Federal judges in the courthouse with him—

Senator HIRONO. So—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Who worked side by side with him day after day while he was Chief Judge in the Ninth Circuit.

Senator HIRONO. To be clear, while this kind of behavior on the part of Judge Kozinski was going on for 30 years, it was an open secret, you saw nothing, you heard nothing, and you obviously said nothing. Judge Kavanaugh, do you believe the women who recently came forward to accuse Judge Kozinski of this kind of behavior?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have no reason not to believe them, Senator.

Senator HIRONO. So, you know, let me just put this into a context, because you have testified that you basically saw no evidence of this kind of behavior at all, you never heard of it, but you worked closely with him on a number of projects. It was not just during the time you were clerking for him. You kept in touch with him while you were in the White House. He introduced you to the Senate at your 2006 nomination hearing, and he called you his good friend. Yesterday, you called each of the people who introduced you a friend, and I presume you felt that way about Judge Kozinski when he introduced you in 2006. You joined him for panels at the Federalist Society where you patted him on the shoulder and said, “I learned from the master about hiring clerks,” and I believe I have a photo of that—there is Judge Kozinski.

You told us that you have hired many women clerks, how you are a mentor to women, how important you think it is for women to have a safe working environment where they feel that they can report sexual harassment. I conclude that you consider yourself an advocate for women. If a judge was aware that another judge was engaging in sexual harassment or sexual assault, would the judge have a duty to report it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. If I heard those allegations, Senator, I would have done three things immediately. I would have called Judge Tom Griffith, who is on our court, who is on the Codes of Conduct Committee for the Federal judiciary appointed by Chief Justice Roberts. I would have called Chief Judge Garland, who is chair of the Executive Committee. I would have called Jim Duff, who is head of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. If, for any reason, I was not satisfied with that, I would have called Chief Justice Roberts directly.

Senator HIRONO. So, you believe that all judges who, including yourself, if you ever heard of any allegations about these kinds of behaviors, you would report it. You would go through whatever processes were set up by the courts.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would do that and—

Senator HIRONO [continuing]. To prevent this kind of behavior and to hold people accountable. And yet, you know, someone that you have been close to that you clerked, and I did go through the various encounters, more than encounters that you had with Judge Kozinski, and yet you heard nothing, saw nothing, and obviously you did not see anything. So, let me just mention that this is why the #MeToo movement is so important because often in these kinds of situations where there are power issues involved, and certainly there are between judges and clerks, that often, you know, it is an environment where people see nothing, hear nothing, say nothing. And that is what we have to change.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree with you, Senator.

Senator HIRONO. That is great.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree completely. There need to be better reporting mechanisms. Women who are the victims of sexual harassment need to know who they can call, when they can call. They need know first that the way—

Senator HIRONO. Judge Kavanaugh, perhaps if all those situations or those processes had been in place over the 30 years that Judge Kozinski was engaging in this kind of behavior, maybe he would have stopped, but he did not.

I have one more question, Judge Kavanaugh. Were you aware of the serious allegations of domestic violence against Rob Porter before you recommended him for staff secretary to Donald Trump?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There is a premise in there that I am not sure is accurate—

Senator HIRONO. The premise being that he engaged in domestic abuse.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, no, no, the recommendation premise, but I will—but put that aside. No, I was not aware of those allegations until they became public, when there was the news reports about them.

Senator HIRONO. Let me turn to another set of questions that I have for you. In 1999, you joined Robert Bork in writing an amicus brief in support of Harold “Freddy” Rice, who challenged the voting structure for Hawaii’s Office of Hawaiian Affairs, a State office charged with working for the betterment of Native Hawaiians. You argued that Hawaii could not limit those who voted for the Office's Trustees, so only made of Hawaiians. You not only made this argument in a legal brief, but you also published an opinion piece in the Wall Street Journal under your own name entitled, "Are Hawaiians Indians?" In the piece you wrote, "The Native Hawaiian community was not indigenous because," as you said, "after all they came from Polynesia." It might interest you to know that Hawaii is part of Polynesia, so it is not that they came from Polynesia. They were part of Polynesia. Hawaii is part of Polynesia. Native Hawaiians did not come from Polynesia. Let me repeat that. They were a part of Polynesia.

You also implied that Native Hawaiians could not qualify as an Indian Tribe, and, therefore, were not entitled to constitutional protections given to indigenous Americans because, and I quote you, "They do not have their own government. They do not have their own elected leaders. They do not live on reservations or in territorial enclaves. They do not even live together in Hawaii." Let me tell you why each of these assertions are wrong, but it is the basis on which you determined that the OHA elections were unconstitutional.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Supreme Court—the Supreme Court agreed, though. The Supreme Court agreed, 7-to-2.

Senator HIRONO. No, they did not agree based on necessarily your arguments. Let me go on. To say that there is no system of law is an insult to the society that evolved in the Hawaiian Islands over centuries, even before the creation of the United States. To say they do not have their own elected leaders in a historical sense just betrays, in my view, your ignorance of Native Hawaiians. They were a self-sustaining, self-governing society for a thousand years prior to the so-called discovery by Captain Cook. You said, "They do not live on reservations or in territorial enclaves. They do not even live together in Hawaii."

You know, it is hard to know what to say to this assertion. It sounds like you are saying that Native groups in the United States derive their rights from having been herded into reservations and cheated out of their land, or that they surrender their rights when they move outside of these artificial boundaries. It is not only factually wrong, but also very offensive. Judge Kavanaugh, it is hard to believe that you spent any time researching the history of Native Hawaiians. Now, I am going to refer to an email that you sent out.

Judge KAVANAUGH. May I respond to that?

Senator HIRONO. I am going to get to my question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator HIRONO. You sent out an email on June 4th, 2002, and I am going to read in part. "Any programs targeting Native Hawaiians as a group is subject to strict scrutiny and of questionable validity under the Constitution." Now, you sent out this email after the Rice decision had already been made by the Supreme Court. When you wrote this email saying that all Native Hawaiian programs should be—undergo strict scrutiny because they are a constitutional—questionable validity under the Constitution, were you looking to Rice v. Cayetano as a basis for this view which you expressed in your email?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, Senator, first of all, I appreciate your perspective. The amicus brief I wrote was—the Supreme Court agreed with by a 7-to-2 decision written by Justice Kennedy in that case, Rice v. Cayetano. And that decision—in the case, just so I am clear, it was a State office that denied African Americans the ability to vote in that—for that State office. Latinos and other people were denied the ability to vote for a State office, and the question was whether that was permissible under the Constitution. And the Supreme Court, by 7-to-2—

Senator HIRONO. No, I attended the Supreme Court hearing.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I did, too.

Senator HIRONO. And I believe that one of the reasons they kept asking about—trying to figure out whether Native Hawaiians constitute Tribes is probably because of the amicus that you put in there that raised this issue, so let me go on. You know, you did not answer my question as to whether or not when you said that “any program targeting Native Hawaiians as a group is subject to strict scrutiny and of questionable validity under the Constitution.” My question to you was, were you thinking about the Rice decision, which you continue to say, yes, the Supreme Court agreed with you. Were you thinking about the Rice decision when you made this view known?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is an email 16 years ago. I do not recall what I was thinking about when I wrote—

Senator HIRONO. It was right after the Rice decision. This is a 2002 email. The Rice decision was 2000. Well, let me ask you this, then. Do you think Rice v. Cayetano raises constitutional questions when Congress—not the State, because Rice was a State action case. It had to do with the Fifteenth Amendment—not the Fourteenth Amendment—the Fifteenth Amendment having to do with voting rights. So, my question to you is, do you think Rice v. Cayetano raises constitutional questions when Congress passes laws to benefit Native Hawaiians?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think Congress’ power with respect to an issue like that is substantial. I do not want to pre-commit to any particular program, but I understand that Congress has substantial power with respect to declaring—recognizing Tribes.

Senator HIRONO. But you believe that any of these kinds of programs and laws passed by Congress should undergo strict scrutiny and raises constitutional questions?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as I—as I sit here today as a judge, I would listen to arguments under—16 years ago, and I am working in the administration, in the executive branch, and putting forth the position there. But if I were a judge, I would listen to the arguments. To your question, Congress has substantial power with respect to programs like this. I appreciate what you have said about Native Hawaiians. The specific case was about an election to a State office.

Senator HIRONO. Yes, that is why it is a State action case. I am well aware of the basis on which the Supreme Court made that decision. So, Judge Kavanaugh, Rice is often cited for the proposition that laws that benefit Native Hawaiians are unconstitutional because they are race-based. Do you think Rice can be cited for that view, knowing, as you have acknowledged, that it is a State action, Fifteenth Amendment voting rights case? Rice—I know this—Rice is often cited for the proposition that all Native Hawaiian programs enacted by Congress are—can be challenged as unconstitutional as race-based. I am asking you if that is an appropriate citation of the Rice decision.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think Congress has substantial power, of course, in this area that you are discussing, and I would want to hear more about how Rice applies. I would want to hear the arguments on both sides. I would keep an open mind and appreciate your perspective on this question.

Senator HIRONO. You know, when the Supreme Court keeps an open mind and listens to the litigants and the advocates, one would hope that the advocates will actually proffer facts to the Court, and that is not what you did when you filed your amicus to the Court. And I think you have a problem here. Your view is that Native Hawaiians do not deserve protections as indigenous people under the Constitution, and your argument raises a serious question about how you would rule on the constitutionality of programs benefiting Alaska Natives. And I think that my colleagues from Alaska should be deeply troubled by your views. And I know that in your amicus brief and in your Wall Street article you did not mention one word about Alaska Natives. And it could be because there is no Commerce Clause reference to Alaska Natives, as there is for American Indian Tribes.

I want to go on to another set of questions because I am running out of time. I want to follow up on your discussion with Senator Feinstein about Roe and Casey, and your conversation with Senator Durbin about Garza, and also raised by my colleague, Senator Blumenthal. You talked about the importance of precedence. You said you understand the strong feelings about abortion. You said you recognized the real-world effect of cases, and you do not live in a bubble. But I think when you talk about respect for precedent it is misleading because there are ways to say you are relying on precedent, i.e., Roe v. Wade and its progeny, but still severely limit a woman's right to make her own reproductive choices. And that is exactly what you did in Garza, because we all recognize that even if Roe v. Wade is not overturned, there are going to be many cases that will continue to come before all of the courts, including the Supreme Court, that will probably be laws enacted by States that will limit a woman's right to choose, so including things like parental consent, spousal consent, or notification, limits on where abortions can be performed, i.e., Whole Woman's.

So, both Senators Durbin and Blumenthal explained the facts in Garza, so I will not go over that. But when the case reached you, you took any opportunity you could to prevent that girl from getting an abortion. You said you were relying on precedent, but you were not. You turned this case into a parental consent case, which it was not. Then you looked at the facts and ruled against, in my view, all common sense that keeping a young woman behind lock and key against her will by ORR—Office of Refugee Relocation—insisting that ORR be allowed to delay beyond the time an abortion would be—would no longer be feasible by finding her sponsors that she did not need. And, that you deemed these factual circumstances not an undue burden on her constitutional right for an abortion.

Let me read you a portion of your dissent in this case. You say, “The majority points out in States, such as Texas, the minor will have received a judicial bypass. That is true, but it is irrelevant to the current situation.” Why? The current situation was all about parental consent and the need to get—to get a judicial bypass, which this young woman did. So, if there is anything that is irrelevant, it is your argument that this was a parental consent case. Then you went on to analyze this case on the basis of whether or not keeping her under lock and key—you sustained that there would be sponsors found for her which could have ended up being an unfeasible timeframe for her to get an abortion, and you deemed those not to be undue burdens.

The young woman had already received a State judicial bypass, as referenced before. The fact that she did not have, you thought, that parental consent, that was not even an issue—it was irrelevant. So, this is very disturbing. Is it any wonder there are so many people who, even if you are not sitting there, in spite of the fact that President Trump said his nominees to the Supreme Court will overturn Roe v. Wade. Even if Roe is not overturned, there will be, as I mentioned, all of these cases that will put barriers—that would put barriers before a woman’s right to choose.

So, I find it really a rather unbelievable—and by the way, you also mentioned—you know, you said several times in Garza you did not join the dissent, which basically says an alien minor does not have a constitutional right to an abortion. So, does the fact that you did not join this dissent mean that undocumented persons do have a constitutional right to an abortion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I decided that case based on the precedent of the Supreme Court and the arguments that were present in the case. I made clear that I was following as carefully as I could the precedent. You mentioned parental consent and spousal consent. The Supreme Court has upheld parental consent laws, but has rejected spousal consent.

Senator HIRONO. Usually it requires a judicial waiver, which was the case in the Texas case. So you cannot just require parental consent, as in this case, where her parents were beating her up. How can you expect parental consent in a situation like that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That would be a situation for the bypass.

Senator HIRONO. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. This was an analogy for a woman who is a minor, that is critical, who was in an immigration facility by herself in the United States and had—

Senator HIRONO. She had already gotten a judicial bypass. There was no issue of parental consent, and in this case you would have substituted a foster family for parental consent. That is not even an issue, but I do have a question. Since you mentioned several times that you did not join the dissent, and the crux of the dissent was that there was no constitutional right for an alien minor to have an abortion, I want to ask you, did you join or did you not join that dissent because you disagreed with that, that, in fact, alien minors do have a right to an abortion in our country?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as a general proposition—first of all, the Government did not argue in that case that aliens lack a constitutional right generally to obtain an abortion.

Senator HIRONO. Yes, even they did not argue because probably they figured that is a decided issue, but maybe you do not think so. Do you think that that is an open question as to whether or not alien minors, or, in fact, aliens in our country have a right to—a constitutional right to an abortion? Do you think that is an open case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has recognized that persons in the United States have constitutional rights.

Senator HIRONO. Okay. So, I hope that is why you did not join the dissent. Moving on to another set of questions relating to your dissents. I think you can learn a lot about a judge by looking at his or her dissents, and that is why judges go out of their way to voice their disagreement with the majority and show what their views are. And you have the dissent rate among active D.C. Circuit judges, 5.1 dissents per year.

I am going to talk about several studies that analyze your decision. The first study by Professor Elliott Ash and Professor Daniel Chen shows that compared to other circuit court judges elevated to the Supreme Court since the 1980s, you not only have the highest rate of dissents, you also have the highest rate of partisan dissents. So, I think I have a chart on that. Well, maybe not. Suffice to say there is such a study, and I ask unanimous consent to have the study by Professors Ash and Chen be entered into the record.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HIRONO. The second study by people—thank you, I am on a roll here, Mr. Chairman.

[Laughter.]

Senator HIRONO. The second study by People for the American Way shows that you consistently sided against workers or immigrants and only once favored consumers in your dissents. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the People for the American Way study entered into the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HIRONO. A third study by Public Citizen shows that in cases where there was disagreement among the judges, you consistently sided against helping people who wanted to protect our clean air and water. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the Public Citizen study entered into the record as well.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HIRONO. A fourth study, a detailed study by Professors Cope and Fischman, found that you are, and I quote their study, “no judicial moderate,” and that, “It is hard to find a Federal judge more conservative than Brett Kavanaugh.” Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the study of Professors Cope and Fischman entered into the record as well.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HIRONO. Judge Kavanaugh, why do you rarely dissent on behalf of consumers, workers, or the powerless? And please, do not talk to me about all the times that you were with the majority or where you joined other majorities?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, Senator, I have ruled for workers many times. I have ruled for environmental interests many times in big cases that involve clean air regulation, particulate matter regulation, affirmative defense for accidental emissions, the California Clean Air law over a dissent by a fellow judge.

Senator HIRONO. So, Judge Kavanaugh, I cited—how many studies did I enter into the record? At least four studies that indicate that there is a pattern to your dissents, and your pattern is that you do not favor basically regular people.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I wrote a—one of my most important dissents, Senator, was in United States v. Burwell. That was a criminal case, an en banc case for a convicted drug distributor. The question was whether he had been sentenced to a 30-year mandatory minimum permissibly, and I joined by Judge Tatel, who is an appointee of President Clinton, ruled that the jury instructions were flawed. I was in dissent for him because mens rea requirement had been omitted from the jury instructions, and I wrote a very opinion lengthy about that. That is someone—that is one of my most important dissents, and that was on behalf of a criminal defendant.

Senator HIRONO. Judge Kavanaugh, the thing about patterns that are exceptions to the pattern. So, all of these studies that I cite to, we are not talking about the exceptions to the pattern. We are talking about the existence of a pattern. You know, it kind of—it bothers me—you know, I would expect a judge to follow the law. I fact, I think you started off saying that you are a—how did you describe yourself in terms of following the law? You said several times—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Independent and pro-law.

Senator HIRONO. Pro-law.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Another important decision is a case, I think I wrote the leading opinion or one of the leading opinions, on battered women's syndrome, called United States v. Nwoye over a dissent of another judge where I reversed a conviction of a woman on the ground that she had not been able—

Senator HIRONO. Judge Kavanaugh, I hate to continue to interrupt you, but, you know, 30 minutes goes by awfully fast, and there are always exceptions to the pattern. So, yes, you call yourself—you describe yourself as a pro-law judge. And, you say, you consider yourself to be someone who follows precedent and the law, but over and over again your colleagues and the majority criticize you for not following the law or Supreme Court precedent. Where Congress is clear, you miss the plain language. Where the Supreme Court clearly states rules, you ignore them.

Let me cite you to some examples where your colleagues actually took the time to criticize your dissents. So, in a 2008 case, Agri Processor v. NLRB, the majority said the dissent—your dissent—“creates his own rule instead of following Supreme Court rules.” They said that your dissent “abandons the text of the applicable laws all together.” Or, in 2011, the majority in a case called, Heller II, held that Washington, DC, could ban semi-automatic weapons, and the majority wrote an entire appendix—an entire appendix—to explain why your dissent was wrong and how you misread the Supreme Court.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the 10-page appendix in Heller II entered into the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HIRONO. In 2017, in U.S. v. Anthem, the majority sharply criticized your dissent. They said, “Rather than engage with the record, much less adhere to our standard, the dissent offers a series of bald conclusions and mischaracterizes the Court’s opinion.” They said that you, the dissenting colleague, “applies the law as he wishes it were, not as it currently is.” This does not sound like such a pro-law judge to me. Now, why do your colleagues go out of their way so often—

Senator KENNEDY. Senator, if you could begin to wrap up, please, ma’am.

Senator HIRONO. Why do your colleagues go out of their way so often to point out that you are not following the law or relevant Supreme Court cases?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, my—I stand by my record. I have been in the majority the vast majority of the time, 95—90 to 95 percent of the time. I have written opinions joined by colleagues of all stripes. I think there have been studies that have shown the affiliation of the judges who join me in majority opinions when there has been a dissent. I stand by my record. I am proud of my record. I have explained thoroughly my decisions in each case. I appreciate your perspective, and I understand the cases you have raised, but my opinions speaks for themselves, and I am very proud of them.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Crapo.

Senator HIRONO. And I think all these studies speak for themselves also. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Crapo.

Senator CRAPO. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And, Judge Kavanaugh, you can relax for just a short moment because I am going to take a few minutes at the beginning and introduce some documents for the record.

First, Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce—or, ask unanimous consent to enter an op-ed from the San Bernardino Sun editorial board stating that Brett Kavanaugh’s nomination might be the calm before the storm. The editorial board says that “Judge Kavanaugh is impeccably credentialed, conventionally conservative, and less likely than other short-listed judges to overturn landmark culture war case law. In addition to his qualifications and nationwide respect, Judge Kavanaugh brings a reassuring image of normality and judicial cohesion.” I ask unanimous consent to introduce this document into the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator CRAPO. Second, Mr. Chairman, the San Diego Union Tribune, “Why Supreme Court Nominee, Brett Kavanaugh, May Be More Independent Than You Expect.” This op-ed goes forward to say that—the editorial board is strongly inclined to support Judge Kavanaugh’s confirmation, has endorsed nominees from both Republican and Democrats in the past. The board advocates for the deference to the President in picking Justices “so long as the nominee has the requisite credentials,” and it applauds “Judge Kavanaugh as straight out of Supreme Court central casting.” I ask unanimous consent to put this document in the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator CRAPO. Third, a document from the Harvard Black Law Students Association. This is a letter that exhibits Judge Kavanaugh’s commitment to fostering diversity in the legal profession. “Last year, Judge Kavanaugh reached out to the Harvard Law School chapter of the Black Law Students Association to express his interest in organizing a clerkship event for their members. Also on the panel with him was Judge Paul Watford, African-American Judge on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.”

The Black Law Student Association described that event. “Judge Kavanaugh explained that one of his priorities is to encourage more students of color to apply for judicial clerkships. Several recent reports have indicated that minority law students are significantly underrepresented in Federal clerkships. During the event, Judge Kavanaugh provided his insight and advice on how students should navigate the entire process.” They continued, “The judge not only graciously offered his time for that panel, but also has continued to mentor numerous Harvard students whom he has taught or worked in a number of capacities.” Again, I submit this document for the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator CRAPO. Fourth, a Georgetown Prep letter. Judge Kavanaugh’s former Georgetown Prep classmates. These men grew up with Judge Kavanaugh. They have known him for 35 years. They know him as man of high character and intellect before he became a judge, and in high school he was the team captain and a multi-sport athlete. Years later, despite his great achievements, he remains the same grounded and approachable person they knew from class sports and student body activities. Their letter goes on with shining accolades. I would like to put this letter into the record, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator CRAPO. And then finally for documents for the record, Governor Matthew Mead of Wyoming has sent a letter which states that “Judge Kavanaugh embodies the qualities we need in an independent, thoughtful judiciary. He will be an effective and fair member of the United States Supreme Court.” I ask to submit this letter to the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and, Judge Kavanaugh, I would like to now turn to some questions. Before I get into the questions I had intended to ask, though, I wanted to get into the discussion—go back and try to bring some clarity to the discussion that was held earlier in some of the questioning with regard to the independent counsel versus the special counsel circumstances and laws and statutes that we have had in the United States.

My colleagues have asked you a lot about the old independent counsel statute. I think it is important that we walk through some of the differences between that statute, which is now no longer law, and the new special counsel regulation. And I am going to mention three important differences, and then I am going to just ask you, Judge Kavanaugh, if you would like to give any clarity to this situation and the issues that were raised with you earlier.

First, the process for appointing a special counsel, which is the current situation. The decision to appoint a special counsel and the choice of whom to appoint is solely within the discretion of the Attorney General. The old independent counsel had to be appointed and selected by a panel of three D.C. Circuit judges. Second, the scope of the investigation. The scope of the current special counsel inquiry is determined solely by the Attorney General. The scope of the independent counsel's jurisdiction, when it was the law, was essentially boundless, no limits. Third, is the process for removing a special counsel. The Attorney General can remove the special counsel for good cause. The independent counsel could only have been removed by a three-judge panel. I think those are important differences related to the conversations you had earlier.

And, Judge Kavanaugh, I would just, with that clarification, like to ask you if you would like to give any more comment or clarification to the discussions that were raised with you earlier.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator. I appreciate the distinctions, which I think are accurate, and it is important to understand, as you underscored, the old independent counsel statute had many parts to it that combined to make it such a departure from the traditional special counsel system, all of which were part of the analysis that, I think, Justice Scalia engaged in in his dissent, and that the Congress looked at when it decided that that statute had been a mistake, and you overwhelmingly decided not to reauthorize it in 1999.

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you. I just—I felt like you did not get an opportunity to make that clarification and that the record needed to be clear for the American people.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator CRAPO. Before we move on from that topic, I just want to state that Eric Holder has noted that the fundamental—noted the fundamental structural flaws with the old statute. Senator Durbin, as has been said, called that law “unchecked, unbridled, unrestrained, and unaccountable.” And, as we have heard, Justice Kagan has praised Justice Scalia's dissent calling that law into question. So, I just did want the record to be clarified somewhat in that context.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator CRAPO. Now, what I want to do during the rest of my questioning, in a number of different ways, is to get into your judicial record. I will start with this, however, by going back to what this set of hearings began with yesterday, which was an attack on the documentation that has been produced by you and others for your record. I will state again there is no nominee for the Supreme Court who has ever been asked a more robust questionnaire by this Committee than you, and you provided, I believe, around 17,000 pages of documents in response to that questionnaire, which was more than any other nominee has been asked.

Second, you provided over 440,000 other documents that—or pages, I believe it is, of documents that in and of itself is more than the entire number of documents or pages of documents that were provided by the last previous five nominees to the Supreme Court. You have also got a record—a judicial record, which is acknowledged by Senators constantly as the most important part of the documentation for a nominee to the Supreme Court of over 10,000 pages of your decisions. And unfortunately, we have not seen a lot of focus on that yet in the questioning that you have received in this hearing, so I want to try to get into that.

Before I do, however, I want to note, everyone has heard this many times, but I am not sure that the—that the normal American really understands. You are a judge of the D.C. Circuit. It has been said in this room a number of times that that is often called the second most powerful court in the Nation. It is a circuit court. There are a number of circuit courts. What is different about the D.C. Circuit Court from, say, the Ninth Circuit Court in which I sit in Idaho for the Ninth Circuit? What is different between all of the other circuit courts and the D.C. Circuit Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator. All the courts of appeals are important and have important dockets and important case-loads, and the judges on all those courts do important work. The D.C. Circuit does get more regulatory cases because we are—the D.C. Circuit is in the Nation's capital, the seat of Government, and, therefore, more of the administrative law regulatory cases come. So, EPA cases, for example, or NLRB cases—EPA, Environmental Protection Agency, NLRB, National Labor Relations Board, Securities and Exchange Commission. We will get more of those cases involving agencies of the Government here in DC as a percentage of our docket than you would get in other courts, and that includes some of the separation of powers controversies that traditionally arise of—relating to national security cases. We have all the Guantanamo-related cases in our court.

So, there are cases related to Government operations, Government—separation of powers, administrative law, the agencies that are a bigger percentage of our docket. But I do want to underscore all the courts of appeals of this country do important work, and all the judges have important dockets, and they are different, distinctive characteristics or characters of each of those courts in terms of—for example, the Ninth Circuit has a good deal of immigration law. The Fifth Circuit has a good deal of that. The Eleventh Circuit, of course, has a very—all the Circuits have important dockets. So, I just wanted to not—I want to underscore that D.C. has a lot more separation of powers, but I do not want to—I have a lot of friends on the other courts of appeals, Senator.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not want to—I do not want to diminish the work that they do because it is very important work, and what they do as well.

Senator CRAPO. Well, I appreciate your answer, and believe me, those of us who live in the Ninth Circuit understand the power of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. And sometimes we chafe under its rulings, but we are very aware of the incredible power. The point being, though, that the D.C. Circuit is distinctly different, as you indicated, in that it gets a much higher level of caseload dealing with the operation of executive agencies and with operations of Government, the kinds of things that we have been talking about extensively here, these types of issues. And I just think it is important for that to be brought out.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you.

Senator CRAPO. With regard to the—to the D.C. Circuit on which you sit, you have spent how many years as a judge on that Circuit?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Twelve years and 3 months.

Senator CRAPO. And how many decisions? Do you know the number of decisions you have participated in?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I have handled well over 2,000 cases, including all the cases counted up together.

Senator CRAPO. And how many of those were you the author of the opinion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have written majority opinions, published majority opinions in, I believe, 307 cases is the current number.

Senator CRAPO. And there has been some discussion even with the last questioning that you received about what the norm is, what the pattern with your decisionmaking. I will note before I ask you this question that the current active judges on the D.C. Circuit are made up of seven nominees from Democrat Presidents and four nominees from Republican Presidents.

So, the current makeup of the active judges on the D.C. Circuit is more Democrat than Republican in terms of who nominated them. But in—I guess I am going to lead you a little bit with this question, but in this several thousand cases that you have been involved in deciding with this group of judges, what percentage did you agree with? In other words, in what percentage were you in the majority?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It has to be in the nineties, I would believe.

Senator CRAPO. I heard yesterday from the Chairman it was 97.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, I believe that sounds correct.

Senator CRAPO. So, if there is a pattern here, it is that you are right there with the majority of your colleagues on the court on most cases, and I do not mean just 51 percent. It is, like, 90-plus percent, probably 97 percent if I remember from yesterday correctly.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, that sounds about right, Senator, appreciate it. We are judges. We do not wear a partisan label as judges, and I worked—tried to work well under the law with my—all my colleagues.

Senator CRAPO. So, those who want to try to create the impression that you are an outlier have to use that last 3 percent—in fact, I think it is 2.7 percent in which you are actually in the dissent or not—maybe you are a member of a partial majority. But they have to go to that very small number of cases and then try to figure out a way in there to make it look like you have disagreement with norms in the judiciary. I just think it is important for us to note when people start talking about let us look for patterns, the pattern is that you are working with your colleagues on that court in a united way, and that there seems to be a pretty high level—a pattern of—a high level of consensus in the rulings in which you participate.

In terms of the decisions that you have written, the 307 decisions that you have written, how many of those do you recall—have you analyzed it—how many of those were majority—decisions for a majority?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The vast majority of those are majority opinions.

Senator CRAPO. So, it was a small number that would have been dissenting opinions.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Dissents and also some concurrences.

Senator CRAPO. And some concurrences.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CRAPO. Again, I do not know that you would have these statistics, but I assume some number of those cases were appealed to the Supreme Court. Did the Supreme Court—when your cases were brought to the Supreme Court, the ones that you wrote, were they overturned regularly or were they sustained mostly? Do you know the numbers on that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I believe there are 13 cases where the Supreme Court has agreed with the analysis that I had—or the decision I had made either in a dissent or in a majority opinion for the D.C. Circuit.

Senator CRAPO. And how about reversals where one case where there was a reversal? Excuse me. So, 13-to-1. Again, if you are looking at a pattern, it appears to me that you are, again, in the mainstream of the American judiciary. With regard to the—to the question of how the Supreme Court has treated your cases, I seem to recall that they actually adopted your line of reasoning in a number of cases. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator. I do not know if you have a—I will let you—

Senator CRAPO. I do not have the number on that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. No, of the 13, that is correct where they either cited or quoted or otherwise agreed with the reasoning or decision I made in a concurrence or dissent. And I am happy to talk about those, but—

Senator CRAPO. Well, let me—let me get—ask you this question, and you can use it there—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of course, I am happy to talk about them.

Senator CRAPO. What I was going to ask you next is before I go into some of the cases that I am aware of that you participated in that I think are notable, are there any—of the cases that you have participated in as a judge, particularly those where you have written the opinion, but any cases you would like to note. Like I said, we have not really gotten into your judicial record much here. I would like you to have an opportunity to talk about your judicial record. Are there some that you would like to discuss with us before I go on to some that I have on my papers?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I will let you ask a few, and if there are any others I want to go to—

Senator CRAPO. Well, I will probably run out of time before I am done with mine, but—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will try to be succinct.

Senator CRAPO. Well, the first one is, back to an issue that you have been criticized for is, equal treatment of women. One of the cases I am aware you participated in is the United States v. Nwoye—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CRAPO [continuing]. Where you defended the rights of vulnerable women and reversed the district court on grounds that a female criminal defendant was prejudiced by her lawyer's failure to introduce evidence of her suffering from battered women's syndrome. Would you discuss that case a little bit?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. There had been a criminal conviction of a woman for extortion, and she claimed duress defense. She claimed that she was a battered woman, that she had been repeatedly beaten by her boyfriend. The district court had ruled against the woman on the claim that she—her Counsel was ineffective by not presenting the battered woman's defense. It came up to our court, and I wrote a lengthy opinion explaining why it was ineffective assistance of Counsel not to present the battered woman's defense over a dissent from another judge, I should add.

And I explained the point there that the jurors needed to hear the evidence from the expert about the battered woman's defense because otherwise the jury might not believe the claim she was making because they might think, well, why did she not walk away, or why did she not do something else. And the expert testimony would explain the—what happens when you are beaten repeatedly, and would explain that the jurors would not—would benefit from having that expert understanding, that sometimes you cannot walk away. That is the whole point when you are in a relationship where you are beaten repeatedly.

Senator CRAPO. Well, I appreciate that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And, I therefore, reversed the conviction in that case that Nwoye had received.

Senator CRAPO. And the ACLU said your opinion in Nwoye "demonstrated a sympathetic and nuanced understanding of intimate partner violence and its effects." I am going to skip over to another case, Adams v. Rice, because we are running low on time. What about Artis v. Bernanke, in which you voted to reverse the dismissal of a Title VII complaint by an African-American female group of secretaries alleging race discrimination by the Federal Reserve Board? Can you tell me about that case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is a—that is a discrimination case where the, as we analyzed it, the evidence presented was sufficient to raise a claim of race discrimination based on the treatment that the African-American secretaries had received in that case. And that was our ruling in that case.

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you, and I have got pages more of cases on this issue, but only 10 minutes left in our time. So, I am going to shift to another issue, again, looking at cases that you have decided. Race and diversity. Let us talk about Ayissi-Etoh v. Fannie Mae. In that case, an African-American employee was fired from his job at Fannie Mae. He brought an employment discrimination claim alleging his supervisor had used a despicable racial slur and created a hostile work environment. Not only did you join Judge Merrick Garland and Judge Thomas Griffith in the court's per curiam opinion, but you also wrote a separate concurrence. And in your concurrence, you wrote that the severity of this racial slur—"Even a single use of the 'N' word by a supervisor is sufficient by itself to create a hostile work environment." And I could go on, but I would rather give you a chance to just describe that case a little bit.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that case was a powerful case. The plaintiff argued it pro se in front of our court, which is unusual. The situation was that he had been called the "N" word by a supervisor. The question was whether the single utterance of the "N" word was—constituted a racially hostile work environment under the Supreme Court's precedent, which says "severe or pervasive." So, the question really was, is a single utterance of that word severe under the—under the precedent. I wrote a separate opinion to make clear that it was, that that word—that no other word in the English language so instantly or powerfully calls to mind this country's long and brutal struggle against racism, which I have emphasized in many cases as a—and the long march for racial equality in the United States is not over.

When you look back to the—I cited some of the history of the country, and the original sin of the Constitution was its tolerance of slavery, Fugitive Slave Clause, the Importation Clause, which allowed the slave trade from 1788 to 1888—I mean, to 1808, which during that 20-year period, 200,000 additional slaves were imported into the United States. The history that corrected in part on paper in the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments, but then, of course, a century of backtracking from the promise of the Fourteenth Amendment, Jim Crow and racial discrimination, leading up to Brown v. Board of Education. Of course, again, in the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, among the most important pieces of legislation ever enacted by Congress in terms of changing America.

But still, there is still work to be done after centuries of discrimination, racial—slavery, racial oppression, racial discrimination. And this case, to my mind, was one case with one person arguing one claim of one incident, but to me the whole history of the country was presented on race relations, and racial discrimination was represented in that one case. And I tried to capture that as best I could in the opinion I wrote in that case.

Senator CRAPO. Thank you, Judge. Let us move on to Ortiz-Diaz v. the Department of Housing and Urban Development. In that case you joined an opinion holding that "denying a lateral job transfer with the same pay and benefits may be an adverse employment action when the employee alleges he sought to transfer away from a biased supervisor." And in that case, you wrote a concurrence in which you said that "The court sitting en banc should establish a clear principle that all discriminatory transfers and discriminatory denials of requested transfers are actionable under Title VII." And you went on to make it clear that "denying an employee's requested transfer because of the employee's race plainly constitutes discrimination." And I will let you go further on that if you would.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the question was if you are transferred laterally and you get the same pay and benefits, is that really a change. In oral argument in that case—if anyone is interested, I encourage them to listen to the oral argument in that case where I said something I explained later in the opinion. Look, in the real world, a transfer, even if you get the same pay and benefits, may hugely affect your later job opportunities, your career track, and to think that discriminatory transfers were somehow exempt from the civil rights law merely because you have the same pay and benefits was blinking reality. And so, that is what I said in the opinion.

Our case law at that point basically said some transfers can be actionable, others not, and what I wrote was I do not see all discriminatory transfers are not unlawful under the Civil Rights Act.

Senator CRAPO. Well, I think it is important for America to know that your attitude is that strong on this. And we already went over the Artis v. Bernanke case when we were talking about women's rights issues. But this, again, is a group of African-American secretaries who were alleging discrimination, and you ruled in their favor.

Again, I have a number of more cases on this, but I got a different question, again, still on race and diversity. I recall the Black Law Students Association letter from Harvard that we talked—that I introduced the letter on previously. But I also note here that your commitment to promoting civil rights extends back to your personal law school days when you wrote one of your first pieces of legal scholarship, your Law School Note, which was titled “Defense Presence and Participation of Procedural Minimum for Batson v. Kentucky Hearings.” Now, what that means you can explain.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CRAPO. But essentially, it was an article about this topic that you chose when you were in law school. And I guess my question is, explain the topic, but why did you choose this topic in law school?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, because I was interested in trial procedure at that time, but I was also a product of a city where, as I described yesterday and described what my mom did in terms of teaching at McKinley Tech where race relations and race discrimination were an issue that was of concern to me. And so, I wrote after the 1986 Batson opinion, which prohibited race discrimination and preemptory challenge in jury selection. I worried or wrote, well, what is to prevent backtracking from that decision by prosecutors who will be able to assert seemingly race neutral reasons, but still have the effect of excluding African Americans from juries.

And so, I wrote a Law Review article, published, explaining that we needed good procedures to detect even subtle discrimination in the jury selection process to ensure that the Batson v. Kentucky decision was not evaded, and so that, you know, the legacy of all-White juries convicting African-American defendants is, of course, a painful part of our criminal justice legacy. And one of the things I wanted to make sure when the Batson decision came out was that that was not circumvented procedurally.

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you, Judge Kavanaugh. I just want to commend on this. And as I said at the outset, it seems to me that an awful lot of the time in this hearing has been sent—been spent trying to create criticisms of you in areas like women's rights or race relations and what have you, when in reality your record is strong and deep in terms of protecting women's rights and protecting those who are in unfavored positions, and protecting against racial discrimination. And I hope that we can get a strong focus on your true record, because whether it is these issues, whether it is the independent counsel versus special counsel issues, or whether it is just the balance of your decisionmaking and whether you are somehow out of the judicial norms in terms of your approach to decisions that you have entered into as a circuit judge. The record, your record, reveals the truth, and the attacks that have been made on you today are absolutely unfounded. And I just hope that we can get a much deeper look at your true, honest record as we move forward.

Now, I have only got a minute and 12 seconds left. The most important issue to me in your nomination is whether you will be an activist Justice or whether you will follow the law as it is written. I know what your answer is, but I would like to hear you, in the last minute that I have, tell me again what kind of a judge—what kind of a Justice will you be on the Supreme Court if you are confirmed?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I appreciate that and I appreciate your comments. Be an independent judge who follows the law, Constitution as written informed by history and tradition and precedent, follow the statutes that you pass, that Congress passes as written informed by the Canons of Construction. I will remember Hamilton's admonition in Federalist 78 that the judiciary exercises not will, but judgment, and Hamilton's admonition in Federalist 83 that the rules of legal interpretation are rules of common sense. And I will give it my all, as I have tried to do for the last 12 years as a judge on the D.C. Circuit.

Senator CRAPO. Thank you very much. I commend you for that answer and your approach to it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Senator. Judge, we are scheduled to take a 30-minute break. If you need all of it, just say so. If you do, I am not suggesting you should not take it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Twenty-five?

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Twenty-five. We will be back at—I have got 20 of 8. We will be back at five after. If you need a few additional minutes take them. When we come back, Senator Booker will begin.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

[Whereupon, at 7:40 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Whereupon, at 8:07 p.m., the Committee reconvened.]

Senator KENNEDY. Judge, are you ready?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am ready.

Senator KENNEDY. Good. Got a little rest?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not much.

Senator KENNEDY. Not much, huh?

Senator Booker.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, in a 1999 interview with the Christian Science Monitor about the Rice case, you discussed with Senator Hirono a little bit, but you said, and I quote, “This case is one more step along the way in which I see as an inevitable conclusion within the next 10 to 20 years when the Court says we are all one race in the eyes of Government.”

It has been about 20 years now. We are about 6 months away. Do you think that you were wrong at that point, that racial discrimination in America would be over by 2019?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that was, Senator, an aspirational comment and one that, to your point, of course, I have said in my decisions, as you and I have discussed, that the march for racial equality is not finished, and we still have a lot of work to do as a country and as a people on that. So—

Senator BOOKER. I appreciate that. I really do. But I want to know what you were thinking in 1999 that would make you make such a bold aspirational comment that, hey, in 10 years, the Court could view this—us all as one race. What was going on in the 1990s that led you to have that belief?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Hope.

Senator BOOKER. Okay. Because you and I know—you and I are both aware of where the trends were going in the 1990s. This was a period where the drug war was in full blare, where the prison population exploded. Since 1980, we have been up 800 percent in the Federal prison population.

The massive increases in racial disparities of incarcerations. Blacks constitute roughly 13 percent of drug users but were 46 percent of those that were being jailed for drug offenses. Even our schools in the 1990s were becoming more segregated.

And so your brief in the Rice case invoked Justice Scalia’s argument that we should be “one race”. And this, let me go on with the Scalia quote because he said that Government can never have—never have a compelling interest in implementing race-conscious programs that seek to address this Nation’s wretched history of racial discrimination. He said, “never.”

He said that race-conscious programs, I am going to quote him now, are “racial entitlement.” Now do you think that someone who wants to remedy the fact that they could not get a loan from the Fair Housing Administration because of the color of their skin is racial entitlement, or are they seeking racial justice? Do you think someone, a person who tried—tries to remedy the fact that they were denied the chance to go to college under the GI bill because of the color of their skin is seeking racial entitlement, or are they seeking racial justice?

So to be specific with Scalia, do you agree with Justice Scalia, who you reference in your brief, that it is never permissible for the Government to use race to try to remediate past discrimination to try to achieve justice?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that was a brief for a client, first of all. So I am not—I was not saying something in my own voice particularly there. So I am writing a brief for a client.

Senator BOOKER. But if I can correct you, sir? You said this is a brief for a client, but you seem to invoke Scalia’s one race theory quite often. You invoked Justice Scalia’s one race theory to a reporter. You again mentioned it in the Wall Street Journal op-ed you wrote around the same time, and you cited his opinion, yes, in this brief.

Are you saying that you do not share Justice Scalia's beliefs about this idea that people who are seeking to address past—past discrimination, past harms, that they are seeking racial entitlement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think, first of all, the Supreme Court precedent allows race-conscious programs in certain circumstance. So the precedent on the Supreme Court, as you know, Senator, is different. I was writing a brief, trying to cite all the principles from the different cases that would support the brief.

But to your point, when you are trying to remedy past discrimination, as a general proposition, you are seeking racial equality and seeking to remedy both past discrimination and the lingering effects.

Senator BOOKER. So you disagree with Scalia that it is—that he says it is never permissible for the Government to use race to try to remediate past discrimination to try to achieve justice? You disagree with Scalia?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court law—

Senator BOOKER. I know what the precedent is. I know what the law is. I am asking what you believe. Do you agree with Scalia that, again, that it is never permissible for Government to use race to try to remediate past discrimination to try to achieve justice, that that is racial entitlement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That position has never been adopted by the Supreme Court.

Senator BOOKER. I am asking what you believe, sir, not the Supreme Court.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. The term I used was that what you are seeking is equality. Equal, and what—

Senator BOOKER. And right. So if you are seeking equality, I appreciate it, grant that. Is it never permissible for Government to use race to try to remediate past discrimination?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There are a couple of things that the Supreme Court has pointed out in its case law.

Senator BOOKER. And again, I know the Supreme Court case law. Maybe I can approach this in a different way.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator BOOKER. The aftermath of Katrina. In a case brought by plaintiffs in New Orleans who challenged the way Government provided grants to homeowners as having a discriminatory impact on African Americans, you joined the minority in denying them relief.

If the findings had shown that the grant program systematically disfavored African Americans, would a Government effort that uses race to remedy that disparity be unconstitutional? In other words, do you believe that all such efforts that use—the Government using those efforts amount to what Scalia called, “a racial entitlement”? I am trying to figure out if you agree with that point that Scalia is making.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, first of all, I approach questions like you are asking with a recognition of two things. One, the history of our country and, two, the real world today.

Senator BOOKER. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I try, as best I can, to understand both the history of our country on that issue and the real world today. So I am coming at it from that perspective.

You are asking a question, I think, about specific remedies for discrimination, and there is a lot—I am a judge, as you know, and so I have to follow precedent. And the precedent allows remedies in certain circumstances—

Senator BOOKER. And again, sir, I have heard you use that with a lot of colleagues, and I know what precedents are, especially dealing with a lot of very important Supreme Court issues. I am asking about your opinions because your opinions matter, what you have stated matters.

Let me give you an example. In April in 2003, you wrote regarding a program designed to benefit Native-American small businesses by saying the desire to remedy societal discrimination is not a compelling interest.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what the Supreme Court has said and—

Senator BOOKER. Hold on—the Supreme Court said that the desire to remedy societal discrimination is not a compelling interest?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has in—let us go to Bakke, for example.

Senator BOOKER. I am going to get to Bakke.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator BOOKER. Just answer this question. Do you still believe, this is what you said, that race can never be used to remediate clearly proven discrimination? If it is clearly proven discrimination, I am just using an absolute, do you still believe that it can never be used?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Supreme Court has said it can be to remedy—

Senator BOOKER. I know what the Supreme Court, but what do you believe, sir?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I—

Senator BOOKER. I know the history. You have recited it numerous times.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would say, look, I have trouble departing from the Supreme Court precedent and saying—

Senator BOOKER. But you do not. You opined about it in emails. You have opined about it in Wall Street Journal articles. I have heard you opine about these things in “race.” You just cannot say right now what you believe?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, a couple of things, Senator, just to back up. Lawyer for client in the email you are reading. As well, lawyer for—

Senator BOOKER. Christian Science Monitor article, Wall Street Journal, your comments to a reporter. Let me approach it this way, because you are not answering the question, but let me see if I can approach it in a different way now, getting to some of the things you were talking about.

The Supreme Court has said for decades—this gets us to Bakke. The Supreme Court said for decades that institutions of higher education have a compelling interest in student body diversity and that race can be used as a factor—not the only factor, but a factor—in admissions if it is done so in a way that is narrowly tailored to serve that interest.

You said the Court said this in Bakke, and I know these cases. Said it in Grutter in 2003. Fisher, most recently in 2006. The simple question here is do you believe these cases were rightly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, they are important precedents of the Supreme Court, and as Justice—

Senator BOOKER. I did not ask you if they were precedents. I have heard you go through this before. Do you, sir—if you cannot answer it, just say, “Cory, I cannot answer this.” Do you believe that those cases—you say Marbury v. Madison was rightly decided. You said that. You said Brown v. Board of Education rightly decided.

And by the way, desegregation cases could come before the Supreme Court. Do you believe that these cases, “yes” or “no,” do you personally believe they were rightly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am following the precedent of the—set by the eight Justices currently sitting on the Supreme Court. To put it in the terms of Justice Kagan, who was asked a lot of these same questions, it would be inappropriate to give a thumbs up or thumbs down on—

Senator BOOKER. Yes, but, sir, there is a distinction between you and Kagan, you and Ginsburg on these issues because—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Or Roberts, Alito, Gorsuch, Kagan, Breyer—

Senator BOOKER. And I am going to tell you the distinction between that excuse you are using with many of my colleagues and the distinction here is, none of those nominees had voiced personal opinions that Government should refuse to defend these kinds of programs.

And let me give you an example. Let me give you an example. You wrote in an email about Adarand v. Mineta, a case that involved benefits to minority-owned businesses. You wrote that the Government should file a brief saying that the program is unconstitutional.

And let there be no confusion, sir. You went on to say, you went on to write that, “In fact, this is my personal opinion.” And so you said that then. My question is, do you still think a diverse student body is a compelling interest?

You opined on it then. You wrote it then. What do you believe now?

Judge KAVANAUGH. A couple of things there, Senator. First of all, the Adarand case is in the context of contracting. The Bakke case is—

Senator BOOKER. So you think that those cases, using race to remedy past discrimination, is unconstitutional? That is what you wrote then.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In light of the precedent of the Supreme Court representing a client in that case, and I go through—I think the email you are referring to, I go through—actually, we should not—the SG should make a recommendation first that this should not be a White House-dictated answer. And the Solicitor General is ordinarily—I think if you are referring to the email that I am thinking of.

But in any event, I think, as you know, and I just want to reiterate, there is precedent in the higher education context, in the contracting context, that are somewhat distinct. And those precedents have been applied by judges. And in my record on race discrimination cases, I am happy to talk about my cases, the Ayissi-Etoh, the—

Senator BOOKER. But you are not happy to talk to me about the opinions you have expressed in the past. Do you still hold those opinions now?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is what I wrote then as a lawyer for a client.

Senator BOOKER. But you said that, again, “That is, in fact, my personal opinion.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is before the case is decided. In subsequent—

Senator BOOKER. So you expressed a personal opinion on this issue then. Do you still hold that same opinion now that it is unconstitutional?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think you are—you are taking, I believe, respectfully, “personal opinion,” out of context there. Personal opinion about what the Government position, so personal recommendation. Because I said, the distinction there is, I said the Solicitor General should first make a recommendation, and then the White House should respond, or the President.

As to “personal opinion,” it was not my personal opinion, “Kavanaugh,” it was what the Government’s position—recommendation would be, based on President Bush’s stated policy—

Senator BOOKER. Okay, sir. It seems that you were pretty clear there what your personal opinion was.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I—

Senator BOOKER. Let me approach it again—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not want to—I do not want to—

Senator BOOKER. Sir, we do not have to go back and forth. I want to ask you a simple, direct question. Do you think having a diverse student body is a compelling Government interest? Do you believe that? Do you think having a diverse—it is not a complicated question.

Do you believe having a diverse student body is a compelling Government interest?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has said so, and my efforts to promote diversity, I am very proud of.

Senator BOOKER. But I know what the law is now—

Judge KAVANAUGH. No—

Senator BOOKER [continuing]. I am worried about what the law is going to be, sir, when you get on the Court and have the ability to change those precedents. But let me—I will go back to your words. I just want to ask you about your words and maybe give you a chance to explain something else because you have not answered my question, and I understand that you are going to stick to that.

You have also written that, “an effort designed to benefit minority-owned businesses, an effort to try to give them a fair shake because they had been historically excluded,” and these are your words now, “use a lot of legalisms and disguises to mask what is, in reality, a naked racial set-aside.” That is what you said. That is how you referred to it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. What are you reading from, Senator?

Senator BOOKER. Sir, I am reading from an email dated August 8th. These are your words. But I do not need to know—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I get a copy of it?

Senator BOOKER. You certainly can, but let us ask you what you believe now. I will leave aside then. Okay? You said it—you wrote it, but my question is, what are your views right now?

Do you believe that Government efforts to promote racial diversity are “a naked racial set-aside”? Those are loaded words. Do you believe that now, sir?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Government efforts to promote diversity in the higher education context are constitutional, and I have made clear my own personal efforts to promote—

Senator BOOKER. But you refer to it in the past, sir, you refer to minority-owned businesses trying to get a fair shake after historically being excluded, you call that—which is very powerful.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I cannot—I do not have the email, Senator. So I am a little—

Senator BOOKER. Have you ever used the term, “naked racial set-asides”? You remember ever using that term?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That would—if you are saying there is an email, but I would like to see an email if I am getting questioned about an email.

Senator BOOKER. Okay. I am going to ask my staff to provide you the email while I move on.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have promoted diversity in law clerk hiring and made a big difference in that.

Senator BOOKER. Sir, you told me about the diversity in promoting law clerk hiring, and I am so grateful for it. You told me a lot of things about the diversity that you personally have practiced—practice in your own life. I really, really appreciate that.

I am not asking you about the five Black clerks that you have. That is good. I am seeking—you are seeking a position on the highest court in the land that is going to affect millions of people. You have expressed opinions about these subjects to the media, to the press, in speeches, in past emails. But you are not willing to say if you still hold those positions that you held before.

And I want to just move on to specifically something that you have expressed opinions in some of your cases as well, sir, and that is the issue of racial profiling. You once discussed the use of racial profiling after 9/11 with your colleagues in the Bush White House.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I see the email?

Senator BOOKER. What is that, sir?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I see the email?

Senator BOOKER. Yes. I will get you the email, but there was—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I cannot answer if I do not—

Senator BOOKER. I am going to ask you about your views now, sir, and I will provide the email. But I am more interested in your views right now before you may be confirmed as a Supreme Court Justice.

There was a debate going back and forth, and one of your colleagues said that there was a school of thought in the administration that if the use of race renders security measures effective, if using race renders security measures effective, then perhaps we should be using it in the interest of safety, now and in the long term. And that such actions, your colleague said, may be legal under such cases as Korematsu.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It sounds like you are quoting someone else, not me.

Senator BOOKER. I am quoting somebody else.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it sounds like—

Senator BOOKER. Sir, sir. I am not going to stick you with that. I know you have already said Korematsu—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But do not attribute—

Senator BOOKER. I am not attributing it to you. Sir, please do not accuse me of that. I am not. I said that was your colleague. I clearly said that was your colleague.

You did not respond. You did not respond in the email by denouncing racial profiling or expressing outrage at the idea of relying on a case as odious as Korematsu.

Senator TILLIS. Mr. Chair, point of order.

Senator BOOKER. Can I ask for my time to be paused, Mr. Chair, while you hear this point?

Senator KENNEDY. Please do. Pause Senator Booker's—

Senator TILLIS. Mr. Chair, just as a courtesy to the witness, we just saw an example there where I even believed that the words that were being repeated were words in an email authored by Judge Kavanaugh. I think it would be helpful if we could suspend for long enough to have the documents available to the Judge so that it can be answered in proper context.

Is that an appropriate request?

Senator KENNEDY. Do you have any objections?

Senator BOOKER. I do have an objection. If my colleague has an issue with that agenda, I think he should bring it up after my time. I would like to get back to my questioning.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. Let us proceed. Do not take time away from Senator Booker.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you very much.

Sir, your response to that colleague's email was that you generally favored race neutral security measures, but you thought that there was, and I am quoting you now, "interim question of whether the Government should use racial profiling before a supposedly race neutral system could be developed sometime in the future."

So it seems that you are okay with using race to single out some Americans for extra security measures because they look different, but you are not okay with using race to help promote diversity and equal opportunity and correct for past racial, documented racial inequality?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Sounds like I rejected the racial profiling idea. What is the date of the email, Senator?

Senator BOOKER. The date of the email is January 17, 2002. And so, have you ever suggested or expressed an openness to, even in a temporary circumstance, like this email seems to indicate, in an interim question of using racial profiling? Have you ever suggested that, sir?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would like to see the email.

Senator BOOKER. I will provide the email, sir, to you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But that sounds, from what you read, like I rejected the concept, but I will look at the email.

Senator BOOKER. It seemed to me that you were open to the concept, sir, clearly. This is critically important because right now in our Nation, there are law enforcement practices, and I think you are aware, that overwhelmingly target African Americans and other people of color. Yet I have read opinions, such as yours in the United States v. Washington, upheld a search, and I quote, “in the neighborhoods in Southeast Washington, DC,” that you called crime plagued. In Wesby v. District of Columbia, where you would have protected police from liability when they made warrantless arrests at a house that was “in east of the Anacostia River.” You and I both know that those are predominantly Black areas.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. Predominantly African-American communities.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. I understand there is case law that says police can justify some actions by saying that they were in areas that were high crime. But you know how some of these opinions using this type of racially coded language can further the disparate treatment of people of color with the police.

And so the way I see it, and I will give you a chance to respond, is that you are willing to consider using racial profiling to accept police practices, like heavy policing of African-American neighborhoods, but you are hostile to the use of race when it is used to promote diversity or remediate past proven discrimination.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I get 60 seconds?

Senator BOOKER. Sir, go ahead.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. On the Wesby case, there was a house—there was a call to the police. It was not the police patrolling the neighborhood. On the Wesby case, the Supreme Court reversed the majority decision that had been written by other people that I dissented from. They reversed it 9–to–0 this past term. So what I wrote in Wesby, I was cited, and the Supreme Court agreed with the approach that I had suggested, 9–to–0.

On the general concept, you and I have discussed this in our meeting. I am very aware of the reality and perception of targeted policing or police activity in minority neighborhoods and—or I try, as best I can, to be aware and understand that. And you and I talked about that. And the Wesby case, in my view, had nothing to do with that issue.

Senator BOOKER. So, sir? Sir, I tried to give you some time there, but this is what I am hearing right now, sir. And you know, and I appreciate your rhetoric on these matters. But again, you are going to be a judge on the Supreme Court, if you are confirmed, and have a power to make massive differences in our country. And these are real issues.

And so I asked you, was the Fisher case, I just asked if it was rightly decided. You refused to answer. I asked you again whether you believe diversity is a compelling interest. You did not answer that, sir.

That is not good enough for a nominee to the highest court, particularly one who has expressed, and I will provide you with the emails as well as other quotes for the record as well, opposition to affirmative action and efforts to address systemic provable discrimination, such as—and yet you also have an openness to racial profiling. And again, I will provide that email.

The cases I raise are about addressing documented systemic structural inequality in our country. This is about the fact that children in this country still encounter a different experience of America based upon the color of their skin and not the content of their character.

They are more likely to drink dirty water and breathe dirty air and less likely to have access to equal educational opportunities. They are more likely to be stopped by the police. They are more likely to be shot by the police and become unfairly entrapped in our broken criminal justice system.

I, like you, you said you are an optimist. I am a prisoner of hope. But I think even I have a troubling understanding in your eyes how America could be just months away or a few years away from becoming one race in the eyes of the law, as Scalia you have quoted numerous times.

We are a good country with great people. And we are great people because people of all races in America have worked together. Black folks, White folks, all folks have worked together to make progress. But you said it yourself. We have so much work still to do.

The Supreme Court, see, plays a vital role in that work, just as it did generations past with cases like Brown. And so, Judge, our communities—you have answered my question. I want to move really quick in the remaining time I have to voting rights, which is the crown jewel of the civil rights movement.

It is designed to prevent States from putting up barriers for the rights of African Americans to vote. It is in the 21st century voter ID laws, which we are seeing more and more, many people consider them the modern-day equivalent of poll taxes. These laws are being enacted despite the fact that in-person voter fraud is incredibly rare. You are more likely to be struck by lightning in America than to find a person committing in-person voter fraud.

You wrote an opinion in the South Carolina voter ID law that you said you were proud of that decision in my office, and I heard you say it here. I am taking you at your word that you are proud of this decision.

But you were aware at trial that the author of the South Carolina voter ID law admitted that he received an email from a supporter of the bill that said African Americans—he said—that said if African Americans were offered $100 reward for obtaining a photo ID to vote, it would be, and I quote, “like a swarm of bees going after watermelon.”

In response to that racist email, the author of the voter ID wrote, and I quote him directly, “Amen, Ed. Thank you for your support.”

You were also aware that, based on the evidence in that case, that minority voters in South Carolina were 20 percent more likely than White registered voters to have a valid photo ID. So how could you have concluded that the voter ID law would not have a disparate impact on minority voters and poor voters in general?

If a registered voter did not have a voter ID, is it not true that their only option was to write out a sworn statement that could expose them to criminal penalties? And is it not true that even then, they could only vote on a provisional ballot? Is that true?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So the decision was unanimous, joined by Judge Kollar-Kotelly, who is an appointee of President Clinton's, and Judge Bates, a President Bush appointee. But it was a unanimous decision where we blocked—we blocked implementation of the South Carolina voter ID law for the 2012—

Senator BOOKER. But you are telling me things I know. Can you just get to your feelings on this? Could you not see—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BOOKER [continuing]. That this was going to provide an impediment and disparate impact on African Americans? Could you not see the problems that this would create?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is why we said that the reasonable impediment provision could not just be the form that they had prepared, but there had—we essentially said what would have to occur.

Senator BOOKER. And you said you were proud of the reasonable impediment provision. That is where we got—that is the point we had to stop, when we talked in my office. Could I just ask you, because this is how I see the reasonable impediment provision.

South Carolina tried to enact this law that would not disenfranchise minority voters. When the people who enacted this law realized that they had to make changes to it, remember this?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. They enacted, sort of created a second class of voters, those without an ID. They had to go to a separate line, fill out a form under the threat of criminal prosecution. Wait for an attorney or a poll worker to witness that. And then, after all that, they had to cast a provisional ballot that may not have counted at all.

Now this is a lot of a process. And you said to me, and I appreciate you saying this. You said what looks good on paper may fall apart in practice. And you told me, hey, Cory, I was keeping an eye on this to see what was going on.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I said “Senator,” but yes, otherwise—

Senator BOOKER. I am sorry, Judge. I am sorry. I feel comfortable with you.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. Can I just show you what was up, in South Carolina polling places?

[Showing sign.]

Senator BOOKER. You can see this sign. Here is a picture. This is the sign that was in the polling places in South Carolina after the passage of their voter ID law. I mean, look at this sign, sir. This is what people without a photo ID would have seen.

This is confusing and intimidating. It does not show the—what you call the reasonable impediment option that they had. It just shows this very thing. Do you see how this poster board, you know, might not be really much—I do not even know if you can see any reasonable provision aspect on this.

Does it not matter that the average voter seeing this poster could be intimidated by this process?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is why I said in the last paragraph of the opinion what looks good on paper may fall apart in practice. And what we did in the decision was we said—to your concern, I was concerned about the same thing you are asking about here when I was questioning the lawyers at oral argument. And we said the proposed reasonable impediment form was not good enough and that there had to be a catch-all box where you could put in any reason.

And then we have listed all the reasons—

Senator BOOKER. Well, sir, I appreciate you saying all that, but this is the result. And let me—but let me go with something different from a person—you and I are nearly the same generation. I want to talk to you about somebody from a different generation that we all think is the greatest generation.

They did try to get a photo ID under the law that you were part of establishing. That was hell. And this was a 92-year-old South Carolinian named Larry Butler, a military veteran and a pastor of the Lord. He voted in the 2010 election, but in his attempt to get a photo ID, he had to chase down paperwork from his high school records, then go to get his birth certificate, then go to get court records.

He went to the DMV, to the Official Vital Records Office, and the court. And after all that, actually, he still was having trouble. He still could not get a valid photo ID.

According to a study by the Harvard Law School, the cost of his filing efforts were 36 bucks. That is how much all this process cost him. Now I am not accounting for his time. If he was working, it would have been a lot more.

And so I just want to ask you, because many people call this the modern-day poll tax, that we are going back. Do you know what the infamous poll tax was in South Carolina in 1895? Do you know how much it was?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The exact amount?

Senator BOOKER. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not.

Senator BOOKER. I did not think so. I will tell you, sir. It was one dollar. That was the poll tax that you and I think is despicable and disgusting. It was one dollar then, which is roughly $30 today. Less than what it cost the veteran, Pastor Larry Butler, that is less than what he incurred trying to get to vote after the 2011 law. And if it was not for him holding a press conference with the Governor intervening and others giving him a special dispensation.

And so here is this great generation, where Black folks and White folks in this country joined together, they fought and they bled, they died. Goodman, Chaney, and Schwerner, dying for voting rights. They grew up at a time when the States like South Carolina routinely placed these burdens on the right to vote and made it impossible and even dangerous to try to cast these votes.

I do not know if you see that this is not that much different in terms of the cost to this person of trying to ultimately pay what is in effect a poll tax.

Now my time is about to run out, and I want to say you can answer up to this because I have only got a minute and 30 seconds. So let me just conclude, and then I know they will ask you this. But this, this is not complicated to me, sir.

Costs like this create structural barriers that systematically disenfranchise African Americans, people of color, and actually poor people of all colors. I am concerned that a person who believes that we are all one race, like Scalia says, in the eyes of Government, that could happen months from now, a couple of years from now. A person who believes that efforts to promote racial justice are, your words, naked racial set-asides, they will be blind to the reality of someone like Mr. Butler and the experiences of poor folks all around this country.

You refused to answer a lot of my questions about your views of the race and the law, talking about what Supreme Court precedent is. We are at a time when States are enacting these laws all over our country, designed to disenfranchise voters. As one Federal court said about a North Carolina law, targeting them with almost surgical precision to disenfranchise them.

And now we do not even have the benefit of the Voting Rights Act provision designed to curtail discriminatory laws before they go into effect. Your answers do not provide me comfort—as a Justice of our Nation’s highest court—that you will fairly take into account the barriers that continue to disenfranchise minority voters like Mr. Butler today.

Sir, I am optimist. I am prisoner of hope like you. But we have a long way to go. We have work to do, Black folks and White folks honoring the history of a united America, fighting to make us more just. The Supreme Court has a vital role in that, and nothing you have said here today gives me comfort—gives me comfort that should you get on the Supreme Court that you will drive forward and see that we have that work to do and make the kind of decisions that will make a difference for people like Mr. Butler, people living east of the Anacostia River, north of the river, south of the river, all over this Nation.

Thank you, sir.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I take a minute to respond?

Senator KENNEDY. Sure. And then I am going to recognize Senator Lee.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, a couple of things, on that. I pointed out in the South Carolina opinion, I wrote the majority opinion on it, that we see, on an all too common basis, that racism still exists in the United States of America. The long march for racial equality is not over.

I cited, I think you have seen, after an African-American hockey player scored the winning goal, a burst of racial commentary about him. I think that was just one of many examples I could have cited in that case.

Senator BOOKER. Racial commentary? Can you be more specific?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Racist. Racist.

Senator BOOKER. Racist commentary.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I actually said racist. So racist comments is what I should have said online. And that was just one example I pointed to say the reality, just one example.

I made clear that the reasonable impediment provision had to be rewritten. I was all over the real world effects during the trial that you are raising here, I was all over that—so were the other judges—of how is this really going to work in practice? We drilled down and drilled down and drilled down and caused the rewriting of the reasonable impediment provision to make sure.

I talked about the fact, for example, that African Americans in South Carolina at that time did not have as many cars on the same percentage. And so to get—to your point about getting the photo IDs, I made clear that I understood that.

We blocked implementation for 2012 because we were worried, to your point about the form, that it would not be enough time to get all this in place and to educate people.

It was a unanimous decision. Again, neither side, the Obama Justice Department did not appeal our decision to the Supreme Court. I believe, I assume that is because they thought our decision appropriately accommodated the interests of the parties in that case to ensure that African Americans in South Carolina were able to vote on the same basis as before.

In talking about my life and record, you were talking about that, going back to growing up, but the law journal note that I wrote on race discrimination talked about something that I know you have been talking about a lot, which was bias in the criminal justice system. And I said at the end of that law journal note that both racial equality and the appearance of racial equality were critical to the fairness of the racial justice system.

I provided specific mechanisms for rooting out race discrimination in the jury selection process and talked about what you have talked about, implicit bias or subconscious racism. I specifically talked about that in that decision.

I have been a, I think, a leader. So there is 2010 testimony before the Congress about the lack of minority law clerk hiring at the Supreme Court, and Justice Thomas and Justice Breyer were testifying before the Appropriations Committee, and they were asked about minority law clerks and the lack of them at the Supreme Court. And they said, in essence, well, we are hiring from the lower courts. And I remember reading that and thinking, well, I need to do something about that. I am the lower court. I am one of them.

And so after that, I thought what can I do? And I did not just sit there. I went and thought what can I do? And I started on my own going to the Yale Black Law Students Association every year, starting in 2012. I think I am the only judge who has done something like that, or certainly one of the few. And I just cold-called them, cold-emailed them and said I would like to come speak about minority law clerk hiring because I am told there is a problem there.

And I showed up the first time wondering how it would go, and I explained and I got a good crowd from the Black Law Students Association. I said we need more law clerks. There is a problem. And let me tell you how to do it, and here is why you should clerk, and here is how you clerk, and here is how you—here are the classes you should take, and here are the things you need.

And at the end of that meeting, I gave them my phone number and email and said call me anytime, email me anytime if you want help. And then it was a big success. I got a lot of emails after that. I helped students get clerkships with other judges. One of them recently finished the Supreme Court, emailed me, thanking me for starting him on that road.

And then it was a success, and I have gone back almost every year there. And as you know, we are graduates of the same law school—that is, a lot of people clerk from there, so it is a good place to go. And I have continued to encourage African-American law clerks. But it is not just encouragement. I have given them help and advice and been a source of counsel, I have tried to be.

And why is that? Because I saw a problem to the extent of the kind you are talking about. And it is one small thing, I suppose. But those are the future people who are going to be sitting around here and sitting here, I think. Those are the pool.

And I have tried to be very proactive on that, including my own clerk hiring where the old networks that prevented women and African Americans and minorities from getting law clerkships. I have been very aggressive about trying to break down those barriers and be very proactive on that, recognizing that part of this is professors who have research assistants.

And so I have done, you know, my cases like the Ayissi-Etoh case and the Ortiz-Diaz case, and I think the South Carolina case I understand your concern about, but I am proud of what we did in that case. So I think if you look at my—your broader question about my life and my record, I understand what you are asking about a few comments in those Hawaii—the Hawaii case. But if you look at the sweep of it, I hope it gives you confidence that I have at least done my best to try to understand the real world and tried through my actual decisions to understand the real world and apply the law fairly.

And through my other role as a judge and hiring law clerks to be very proactive in trying to advance equality for African Americans.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Lee.

Senator BOOKER. Sir?

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. Mr. Chairman, thank you.

I think it is important. The rules of fairness and the Rules of the Committee require us to treat our witnesses with respect, with certain minimum standards of respect such that you cannot cross-examine somebody about a document that they cannot see.

Now in this circumstance, the document that was referred to by my distinguished friend and colleague from New Jersey, Senator Booker, was designated as “committee confidential.” Now there are ways we can deal with this. We can deal with this either in a closed session so that he can see the document to which you are referring, or we can also go about different procedures to make it public.

We have already done this in this very set of hearings with Senator Leahy and with Senator Klobuchar, who identified some documents that were identified as “committee confidential.”

The one thing we cannot do is refer to a document, cross-examine him about that document, but not even let him see it because he cannot see it. We would not do that in a courtroom, and we cannot do that in our Committee. Our rules do not allow it. So I would just suggest that we go through the proper procedure to either deal with this in a closed session or ideally go through the process that Senator Leahy and Senator Klobuchar went through in order to allow us to address this in open Committee.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman, may I respond?

Senator KENNEDY. The objection is duly noted.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman?

Senator KENNEDY. Thirty seconds, Senator.

Senator BOOKER. I really respect my colleague from Utah, and I appreciate that. I am not the first colleague that has referenced committee confidential emails, not the ones you said is the exception, they were referenced before. And that is why this system is rigged is because we have been asking, I have letters here, sir, that we have asked for.

Now the one email specifically entitled, “Racial profiling” that somehow—I mean, literally, the email was entitled, “Racial profiling”—that somehow was designated as something that the public could not see. This was not personal information. This was not personal information.

There is no national security issue whatsoever. The fact that we are not allowing these emails out, as we have asked, as I have asked, joined the letter with my colleagues asking. And that is why I am saying the system is rigged.

More than that, Senator, you have this system where there are whole areas—whole areas that was cleared where—

Senator KENNEDY. Senator, if you could begin to wrap up?

Senator BOOKER. I will wrap up. Thank you, sir, for the generosity. Where there is whole areas where we are not allowed to let these out. And so I see you are outlining a process, but I am saying that process is unfair. It is unnecessary. It is unjust, and it is unprecedented on this Committee.

Senator KENNEDY. Gentlemen, I am trying to be fair to everybody. I know Senator Lee wants to respond. With respect, if he would do that briefly, I would like to continue on.

Senator LEE. Senator Booker, I will go with you hand in hand literally to work with Committee leadership staff to get that going. I agree with you. There is no reason why it should not be something that we can discuss in public.

I do not know why it was marked “committee confidential.” I was not in charge of that. Regardless, we do have to follow procedure so that he can have access to it so that he knows how to respond. I will work with you on that.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, gentlemen.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Now that the hearing is half over.

Senator KENNEDY. I am next. So, and I do not have any emails. [Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. I want to start, I have watched you for the last couple of days, Judge, and I want to compliment you on your demeanor. And I mean that. I know you are on your best behavior, but—but I appreciate your humility.

We both know some Federal judges who can pretty much strut sitting down, and I appreciate your attitude and your demeanor, and I mean that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. I just want to ask you a few questions about—about the law. I am not going to ask you to violate the canon of judicial ethics. I am not asking you to go thumbs up or thumbs down. I am truly not.

I may have to interrupt you a few times just to move us along. I am not trying to be rude. I want you to understand that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. You know, you have been nominated for the most powerful unelected position in the most powerful country in all of human history. Congratulations, but you understand also where we are coming from. There is no margin for error.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. We have got to get this right. Yesterday—gentlemen, take it outside, would you?

Yesterday, I talked a little bit about the fact that judges have limits on their power, and I do not know if I said it this way, but I said I think it is inappropriate for a Federal judge to try to rewrite the Constitution every other Thursday to advance an agenda that either he or his/her supporters cannot get by the voters.

Do you agree with that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, of course, Senator. The judges interpret the law. They do not make the law, and that is obviously something that is repeated a lot. I know it is cliché, but it actually matters. If you keep that in mind, it matters.

Senator KENNEDY. Judges also have another duty, though. I did not get to talk about it yesterday. Federal judges and State court judges have an obligation to protect inalienable rights, even if the majority wants to take them away. That is why they call them “inalienable.”

And I said this when Judge Gorsuch was here, if you think about in many cases, the Bill of Rights is really not there for the high school quarterback or the prom queen. The Bill of Rights is there for the person who kind of sees the world differently but has the right to do that.

And I think that is important for a judge. Can we agree on that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely, Senator. I think the Bill of Rights is—protects all of us, but that includes and it is most relevant for free speech of the unpopular—

Senator KENNEDY. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Or the unpopular criminal defendant.

Senator KENNEDY. Even if the majority says—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. We are the majority. Because we both know that sometimes the majority just means that most of the fools are on the same side.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. I mean, just because you are in the majority does not mean you are right. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Just because you are in the majority does not mean you are right is absolutely a correct proposition.

Senator KENNEDY. Right. That is why we have a Bill of Rights.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. I want to talk about—now that is the easy part. I want to talk about how we go about making these decisions, and there is a tension there, and that has to do with the language. If I talked about—and you have talked about it a little bit. But if I talked about the Holy Trinity doctrine, you would know what I am talking about, I am sure?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes. Now the Supreme Court has rejected the Holy Trinity doctrine. Okay?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. You talked about we are now textualists and are originalists, and you called originalism constitutional textualism, I think.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, original public meaning, originalism, constitutional textualism. I think those describe the same thing.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. You start with the language, let us take a statute, with the language in the statute.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. And the first question you ask as a textualist, is it ambiguous or unambiguous? Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. If there is a canon of construction that is there that depends on a finding of ambiguity, that would be the question. Otherwise, other than that, you would just say what is the best meaning?

Senator KENNEDY. Yes, you read the statute.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, read the statute.

Senator KENNEDY. You say does it make sense? It either makes sense or it does not. How do you determine that? How ambiguous—you alluded to this. But how ambiguous does it have to be? Does it have to be 100 percent ambiguous? Does it have to be 51 percent ambiguous?

Is there really any principled way to compare clarity to ambiguity, or do some judges use it as an excuse to get to those canons of interpretation about which they have already read in the brief to do what they want to do, did you know?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. I have said many times in my cases and talks to students that judges should not be snatching ambiguity from clarity. So that is one thing. I think that goes right to your question. But to your broader question is that is one of my concerns about a few canons of construction that depend on an initial finding of ambiguity, which sounds great in theory, which is, oh, if it is ambiguous, go to that canon or this canon or this canon.

But in practice over 12 years, what I have found—and I have written about this—is that there is not a good way to find neutral principles on which two or, in my case, three judges can agree on how ambiguous is ambiguity. And that is hard to even talk about. I find it ambiguous. I do not think it is ambiguous.

That has, in my view, frustrated the goal that I have of a judge as umpire, the even-handed application of neutral principles in the rule of law, and ultimately that has concerned me because some of these cases where that has come up are big deal cases. Yet it is dependent on this initial determination that when you unpack it and you actually sit in the judicial conference room like I do, it turns out to be very hard to apply in an even-handed way.

So that has been the concern I have identified.

Senator KENNEDY. Original of the article. You advocate the best reading of the statute.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. Let us talk about that, and I want to talk about it, not in terms of the statute, but the Second Amendment and talk about the Heller case. You defined originalism as constitutional textualism, and you—the way to interpret the Constitution is to ask yourself—tell me if I get this wrong now. What would—how would a reasonable person at that time have understood the Constitution? The public knowledge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The original public meaning. I always want to add—

Senator KENNEDY. Public meaning.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of course, precedent is a huge part of what we do in constitutional law.

Senator KENNEDY. Sure.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But if you are looking at the words, the original public meaning, you look at what the words mean, sometimes the meanings change. Oftentimes, it has not. But to your point, I agree.

Senator KENNEDY. And there is almost an objective test.

Judge KAVANAUGH. You are trying to make it as objective as possible, absolutely. It is—it is an objective test. I mean, sometimes there is different evidence about what the meaning of the word was, I think.

Senator KENNEDY. Sure. But you are not looking at intent.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Correct. You are not looking at the subjective intent other than to the extent that helps show the—

Senator KENNEDY. Right. We have thrown that out?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. If you look at the Heller case—and I am talking about the DC v. Heller by the U.S. Supreme Court—it was not a balancing case. You made that point clear at the court of appeals level. It was a text history and tradition case. And Justice Scalia wrote the majority opinion. Justice Stevens dissented, and they both took an originalist approach.

And I went back and looked. Scalia, this is what he relied on. He relied on founding era dictionaries, founding era treatises. He looked at English laws, American colonial laws, British and American historical documents, colonial era State constitutions. He looked at post-enactment commentary on the Second Amendment.

And Justice Stevens, also using an originalist approach, looked at the same documents, and then he added he relied on linguistic professors, an 18th century treatise on synonymous words, and a different edition of the colonial era dictionary that Justice Scalia used. Pretty impressive.

Here is my question. Does the originalist approach not just require a judge to be an historian, and an untrained historian at that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not think—

Senator KENNEDY. I mean, would we not be better off hiring a trained historian to go back and look at all of this, this commentary?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Heller case was one of the rare cases where the Supreme Court was deciding the meaning of a constitutional provision without the benefit of much, if any, relevant precedent. On most of the constitutional provisions, there has been a body of cases over time interpreting the provision, and you do not have to do the kind of excavation that Justice Scalia and Justice Stevens did in that case because it has been done before.

The reason I think why the Second Amendment posed a challenge in that case in terms of figuring it out is, the prefatory clause in the Second Amendment, which the question was did that define the scope of the right indicated afterwards, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed. Or did the prefatory clause merely state a purpose via for which the right was ratified, and therefore, you read the right as written. The right to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

And to figure out what the prefatory clause meant, you had to figure out as a general proposition how legal documents at the time used prefatory clauses and what the purposes of those were, and that required a lot of historical excavation by the two Justices who had the competing positions.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. Fair enough. Somebody commented yesterday, maybe it was you, Judge, they talked about how our judiciary was one of the crowning jewels of our Government and the fact that it separates us from other countries.

I think one of the reasons so many of our neighbors in the world want to come here is because of our independent judiciary. They know their person and their property will be protected. I think that singles us out. You know, you never read about somebody trying to sneak into China. They want to come to America.

But there have also been studies, I think Senator Booker talked about this. Maybe it was Senator Whitehouse. People have—in America, many of them think the United States Supreme Court is a little Congress that is political, and that is unfortunate because that means we lose confidence in an independent judiciary. I am not saying it is true, but perception is important in government.

Do you think having cameras in the courtroom would help?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that is an issue that I have thought about, and let me just give you a little perspective on our court. We have gone to same-time audio in our court. We started with release of tapes much later, then release of tapes later in the week, then release of tapes later in the day, and now we are same-time audio in our court. And I think that has been a—that has worked at the court of appeals level for us.

I know nominees who sat in this chair in the past have expressed the desire for cameras in the courtroom only to get to the Supreme Court and really change their positions fairly rapidly. So that gives me some humility about making confident assertions about that, and, of course, joining a Team of Nine means thinking about that, if I were fortunate enough to do so, and hearing the perspectives of why did they change their position? What is their view?

Senator KENNEDY. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will say one thing about that that I do think is important. Oral arguments are a time for the judges to ask testing questions of both sides, and there is a perception sometimes, and you see it in the media that the oral argument, Judge X is leaning this way at oral argument.

I really cannot stand that kind of commentary about oral argument because I, at least, have always approached oral argument as the time to ask tough questions of both sides. And I do sometimes wonder whether people would get the wrong impression of oral argument.

Now I have always thought, too, though, the announcement of the Supreme Court decisions, when they issue the opinions, that is a different point in time. When if there—

Senator KENNEDY. What did you say Justice Marshall said? People are not fools. You have to trust in people sometimes, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And as to the decisions, right, that is when the Court is announcing its decision, and that is the decision of the Court. Oral argument, lawyers—people are asking tough questions of both sides, and sometimes you would think, oh, Judge X thinks this because of the oral argument question.

Senator KENNEDY. I understand.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But the decisions, I think that is—let us put it this way. If I were starting—I think I will stop there.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I get your point, and there are good arguments on both sides. But I do think that the American people have lost confidence in the institution of the Supreme Court and Congress and the Presidency, and it is ironic, given my generation, that the only institution that the American people I think have a lot of confidence in right now is the military, which was not true in my era.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. Well, that shows—

Senator KENNEDY. But you know, you have got to trust the people, and too many up here on the beltway do not.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree with your general point.

Senator KENNEDY. You know, they do not—the people do not read Aristotle every day, but they get it. They will figure it out.

All right. Let me ask you a couple more. You are an originalist?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. I pay attention to the text, the original public meaning. But informed, I always want to make sure I say precedent. If you are in a constitutional case, precedent is critically important, and that is part of the text of the Constitution, too.

Senator KENNEDY. Right. But you may—and the focus of primarily of an originalist is an understanding of the Constitution by the people, an objective test, at the time it was written and ratified?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The meaning, as opposed to the intent, and then informed—

Senator KENNEDY. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I always have to add precedent.

Senator KENNEDY. I get it. I am not trying to trick you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, I understand. I just—

Senator KENNEDY. I could not trick you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I just want to be clear in case someone takes something out of context.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. Are you willing to overturn precedent that you think conflicts with the original public understanding of the document?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court's rules on precedent, the precedent on precedent, sets forth a series of conditions that you look for before you consider what you would overrule—

Senator KENNEDY. I know that, but I am just asking if you come upon a case and you say, you know, I am on the Supreme Court now, and I have looked at this. And that is not—under originalism, that is not what the public understanding was.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So the first inquiry is, is the prior decision wrong, actually grievously wrong? And if you thought it was grievously wrong, that would be you would go on to the—because of that or for some other reason, you would go on to the next steps of the stare decisis inquiry. But that is how that would work, if I understand the question correctly.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. All right. Can we agree that there were State constitutions that preceded the Federal Constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. They did, and the Framers at Philadelphia drew on a lot of the experience of State constitutions.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes, they drew from State constitutions.

Judge KAVANAUGH. They sure did.

Senator KENNEDY. And can we agree that every State now has a State constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, yes. And they protect a lot—a lot of rights.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes. In fact, they before the Federal Constitution was extended to the States in the Fourteenth Amendment, the only protection you had from the State government was the State constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, other than the rights articulated in Article I, Section 10 of the original Constitution.

Senator KENNEDY. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. Ex post facto and—

Senator KENNEDY. Can we agree that your right under the U.S. Constitution, let us take the Bill of Rights, but you know what I mean. I mean the whole document.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Let us take the First Amendment. Can we agree that the First Amendment in the United States Constitution sets the floor that the State counterpart, the State First Amendment counterpart can actually give you a greater First Amendment right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Correct. And I think that is—I have mentioned a couple of times Judge Sutton's book, and Justice Brennan wrote an article in the 1970s about State constitutional law doing exactly what you said and encouraging State litigants and State courts and State court judges to think about exactly what you are saying.

Senator KENNEDY. And in fact, some States have.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Like California, for example. Their first amendment, they do not have a State action requirement. Am I correct in that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will admit I have not looked at the California constitution recently, but I will take your understanding of it, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, they do not. In a private shopping center, so long as it is a common area, somebody can go in there and protest, and you have a First Amendment right under the State constitution.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And the only question in that case would be if it conflicts with another provision of the Federal Constitution.

Senator KENNEDY. And that is my question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator KENNEDY. That is my question. What happens when a State interprets its own first amendment, which it can insulate from review by you guys or by you soon-to-be guys on the Supreme Court under the adequate and independent State ground document, but it conflicts with your Fifth Amendment property right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, Article VI of the Constitution makes clear that the Federal Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and that trumps not only State legislation, but also State constitutional decisions. So in that instance, the property right protected, if it were determined that what you are talking about violated the property right in the U.S. Constitution, that would control.

Senator KENNEDY. Except that is not what the United States Supreme Court said in the Pruneyard case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, there was a—

Senator KENNEDY. Is it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It was a balance—I think because they interpreted the property right not to be protected.

Senator KENNEDY. Protected.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But it—

Senator KENNEDY. But California won.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, but the point being—and I think I have the premise, I hope I did in what I said to you. If you concluded that it violated the property protection in the U.S. Constitution, then the U.S. Constitution would control. In that case, the Supreme Court concluded that it did not violate the property protection of the U.S. Constitution.

Senator KENNEDY. Right. That is—I am not going to outsmart you. You are right.

All right. You have got this—you have got this First Amendment speech right, free speech right on steroids in California, and there is no State action requirement. In Golden Gateway, Pruneyard, you know—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. They all said it applies to a private entity like a shopping center. I know that Justice Kennedy—I do not have the language here—but he has talked about how the internet is the new public arena. Okay?

If you have—and other States have adopted this approach, same as California, this enhanced First Amendment right with no State action requirement. I think New Jersey has, and there are some other cases. How then can Twitter in California censor any messages if you are living in California, and you have a First Amendment right, and it is not limited by the State action doctrine?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that sounds like a hypothetical I am not prepared to give you a full answer on, other than I will give you a broader conception of—

Senator KENNEDY. Well, it is coming.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. So I think one of the things with these proceedings for judges and Supreme Court Justice nominee hearings are backward looking in terms of our cases, the cases I have done and the cases the Supreme Court has decided. But one of the interesting things that I think about is, what is the future? What are the big issues coming down the pike?

Senator KENNEDY. Well, that is one of them.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And so speech, how technology affects our conception of speech, how technology affects Fourth Amendment rights and our conception of search and seizure and privacy. I think on the war powers front, which I was discussing with Senator Sasse and Senator Flake earlier, cyber war, and how does the war powers framework fit in with cyberattacks?

And I think those are three things, all technology rooted, that someone sitting in this seat 10 years from now are going to be, I think, critical issues, and I think we also think, again backward looking, but what are the future crisis moments? Because there will be crisis moments for the Supreme Court, and usually those are unpredictable.

When Justices Ginsburg and Breyer went through, you would not have predicted September 11th, for example, or even thought to ask them questions about—

Senator KENNEDY. I am going to stop you, Judge. I am going to run out of time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to talk about Chevron deference just for a second. Here is my understanding of Chevron, the deference. First of all, the statute has got to be ambiguous. And if it is ambiguous, according to our Supreme Court, we have got to adopt the agency interpretation, even if it is not the most reasonable interpretation.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is right.

Senator KENNEDY. It has just got to be half-way reasonable.

Judge KAVANAUGH. They say reasonable, but even your point was it is not the most reasonable.

Senator KENNEDY. It is not the most reasonable, okay? Here is what I do not understand. You look at the APA. This is what the APA says, I am going to quote, “The reviewing court”—not the agency—“The reviewing court shall decide all relevant questions of the law, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action.”

There it is, big as Dallas. Now that is just the Court. How come we have to defer to a Federal agency under 5 U.S.C. Section 706?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, in my article that I wrote in the Harvard Law Review on this, I pointed out that statutory provision and did say that Chevron was intentioned—I think I used something stronger—with that statutory provision. But Chevron concluded what it concluded, and it has been applied over time.

Now I have pointed out some problems with it in terms of its practical application, the ambiguity trigger. And you are pointing out a problem at the core, which is where did it come from to begin with, given what the APA—

Senator KENNEDY. Well, not only that, Judge, but I mean, I know you know this. But it encourages misbehavior. And let us suppose Senator Whitehouse or Senator Lee, they run for President. You know, they are not going to go out and run on their good looks, though they are good-looking guys and all that. But they are going to run on policy.

And then they get elected, and they need us in Congress. And a lot of times they cannot get their bills passed.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is right.

Senator KENNEDY. So you know what they do.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. They go to one of their agencies, and they say I am going to take my policy, square peg, and put it in a round hole of a statute. And all we have got to do is find a judge to say that the statute is ambiguous, and then we can do anything we want to do. And that is not right, is it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that is a problem I have identified in the real world application of certain broad conceptions of deference and that it is a judicially orchestrated shift of power from the legislative branch to the executive branch. And the phenomenon that you have described I think is exactly right.

Presidents run for office. I have seen this with the President I work for, President—

Senator KENNEDY. They all do it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And you get—and if you cannot get legislation through, then you try to see existing statutory authorities where you can achieve to the extent possible your policy ends, and then you push the envelope on the theory of, well, there is ambiguity in the old statute. And then sometimes courts will uphold it, and that is—

Senator KENNEDY. Yes, but your hands are tied when it comes in front of you if a President does that. And all Presidents have done it. I am not blaming them. I mean, they all do it.

But your hands are tied if the statute is ambiguous, and even if the agency interpretation is not the most reasonable, it can be the tenth most reasonable, and you have got to go with it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So two things on that. One is, if the statute is ambiguous, as we have discussed, turns out to be a much more difficult inquiry. And Footnote 9 of Chevron does say use all the tools of statutory interpretation before you get to that.

Senator KENNEDY. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And that is something I have cited that, you know, dozens and dozens of times, that footnote, to make sure that you are not jumping too quick to deferring to the agency's interpretation.

The other thing is the major questions, major rules—

Senator KENNEDY. Could you tell me quickly? I have got 2 minutes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. That means if it is of major economic or social significance, you should not defer to the agency because that is a big deal for Congress and—

Senator KENNEDY. I want to ask your opinion about universal injunctions. I do not know how many Federal judges, district judges we have. Seven hundred? Anybody know? Seven hundred.

As I understand a nationwide injunction, sometimes they call it universal, it means that a Federal—a single Federal district judge can enjoin or freeze a law or a regulation. Let us suppose we have 700 Federal district court judges. One of them can enjoin a law or a regulation—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, ma'am. I just got an extra 20 seconds under the rules.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Anybody else want to go? I will get up to 40. I am giving myself an extra 20 seconds. Where was I? Oh, yes, the nationwide injunctions.

One Federal judge can enjoin a law or a regulation for the entire country, even if every other judge in the country says I do not agree. Now what is the legal basis for that? It has got to either be a statute or the Constitution.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that is an issue that is being contested currently in courts around the country, I think, and is an issue of debate. And therefore, I think I better say nothing about it. I apologize for that, but it is an issue of current debate.

Senator KENNEDY. All right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I apologize.

Senator KENNEDY. That is okay. I have got 9 seconds. No, I have got 29 seconds.

All right. This is not meant to be a trick question. This question is not about Title IX, and it is not about sexual assault, because I know you cannot answer that. But it is really a—well, I am not going to ask that. I am going to strike it.

State action. Is a private security guard a State actor?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as stated, your question stated that way, the answer would be “no.” But I think sometimes the cases, when you are—if you are—

Senator KENNEDY. Okay, I am going to take the “no.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. There are questions of contracting, and if you are a State contractor and this and that. There are lots of factors.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, here is my question because I do not want to abuse this. I have always wondered this. If a city privatizes its entire police force, they are private police officers. Do they have to comply with the Constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is why I pointed out the contracting issue that I mentioned. Some of the Supreme Court case law would say you look at the contracting issue, and I think that is an interesting question that is hard to answer in the abstract without looking at the particular arrangement of a particular city or locality and figuring out how much the State is involved.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. Thanks, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Harris.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Judge, have you ever discussed Special Counsel Mueller or his investigation with anyone?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it is in the news every day. I—

Senator HARRIS. Have you discussed it with anyone?

Judge KAVANAUGH. With other judges I know.

Senator HARRIS. Have you discussed Mueller or his investigation with anyone at Kasowitz Benson & Torres, the law firm founded by Marc Kasowitz, President Trump's personal lawyer? Be sure about your answer, sir.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I am not remembering, but if you have something you want to—

Senator HARRIS. Are you certain you have not had a conversation—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I said—

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. With anyone at that law firm?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Kasowitz Benson—

Senator HARRIS. Kasowitz Benson—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. And Torres, which is the law firm founded by Marc Kasowitz—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. Who is President Trump's personal lawyer. Have you had any conversation about Robert Mueller or his investigation with anyone at that firm? "Yes" or "no"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, is there a person you are talking about?

Senator HARRIS. I am asking you a very direct question, a yes or a no.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. I need to know the—I am not sure I know everyone who works at that law firm.

Senator HARRIS. I do not think you need to. I think you need to know who you talked with. Who did you talk to?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not think I—I am not remembering, but I am happy to be refreshed or if you want to tell me who you are thinking of that works—

Senator HARRIS. Sir, are you saying that with all that you remember—you have an impeccable memory. You have been speaking for almost 8 hours, I think more, with this Committee about all sorts of things you remember.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator HARRIS. How can you not remember whether or not you had a conversation about Robert Mueller or his investigation with anyone at that law firm?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not—

Senator HARRIS. This investigation has only been going on for so long, sir, so—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. I am not sure I—

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. Please answer the question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am just trying to think, do I know anyone who works at that firm. I might know—

Senator HARRIS. Have you had—that is not my question. My question is have you had a conversation with anyone at that firm about that investigation? It is a really specific question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would like to know the person you are thinking of because what if there is—

Senator HARRIS. I think you are thinking of someone and you do not want to tell us. Who did you have a conversation with—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not going to—

Senator LEE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to raise an objection here. This town is full of law firms. Law firms are full of people.

Senator HARRIS. First of all, I would like you to—

Senator LEE. Hold on.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. Pause the clock.

Senator LEE. He—

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Senator TILLIS [presiding]. The clock is paused.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Senator LEE. Pause the clock. Let me raise my objection.

Senator TILLIS. The Senator is recognized.

Senator LEE. This town is full of law firms. Law firms are full of people. Law firms have a lot of names. There are a lot of people who work at a lot of law firms.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator TILLIS. Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. On that point, law firms abound in this town, and there are a lot of them. They are constantly metastasizing. They break off. They form new firms. They are like rabbits. They spawn new firms. There is no possible way we can expect this witness to know who populates an entire firm—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator LEE [continuing]. That he is not even—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator LEE. My point of order, Mr. Chairman, is simply this. If there are names, if there is a list of names he can be given of the lawyers to whom she is referring, I think that is fine, but I think it is unfair to suggest that an entire law firm should be imputed into the witness' memory when he does not know who works at the law firm.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman?

Senator TILLIS. Senator Whitehouse—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. We have a—

Senator TILLIS [continuing]. Are you making a point of order?

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Well—

Senator TILLIS. Senator Whitehouse, the—

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. I am trying to figure out what the rules are here because we had a very, very long discussion about whether or not points of order were in order because this is a hearing. And we were told that all of our points of order—

Senator TILLIS. Senator Whitehouse, there—

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. About all the documents—

Senator TILLIS [continuing]. Has never been a time in the 2 days where someone has made an inquiry of the Chair where the Chair has not recognized the Member for a point of inquiry or point of order—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And I have been recognized——

Senator TILLIS [continuing]. And that was one of them.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. Now, and I appreciate that. But my point is that if the rule is that nobody on our side can make a point of order, then it ought not to be appropriate for Senator Lee to start making points of order——

Senator TILLIS. Well, the——

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. After all of ours were summarily——

Senator TILLIS. Senator——

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. Silenced on the basis that we were in a hearing and not in an executive session. If we have moved out of hearing and into executive session, then I am more than happy to make motions——

Senator TILLIS. Senator Whitehouse——

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. To adjourn.

Senator TILLIS [continuing]. The mere fact that you are speaking right now means that you have been allowed to make a point of order. The matter that you were talking about yesterday was a motion that the Chair said was out of order because it was an adjournment motion that would have required us to be in executive session. Anyone who wants to make an inquiry of the Chair may do so, but we will limit it to that before we go back to Senator Harris.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Very good. That is the right result.

Senator HARRIS. Sir, please answer the question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know everyone who works at that law firm, Senator.

Senator HARRIS. And have you had any discussion with anyone ever about Bob Mueller and/or his investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So you said Bob Mueller—or, so have I——

Senator HARRIS. Or——

Judge KAVANAUGH. Ever had a discussion about Bob Mueller? I used to work in the administration with Bob Mueller.

Senator HARRIS. What about his investigation? Have you had a conversation with anyone about his investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am sure I have talked to fellow judges.

Senator HARRIS. Anyone aside from fellow judges?

Judge KAVANAUGH. About Bob Mueller?

Senator HARRIS. About his investigation, sir. I will ask again.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But——

Senator HARRIS. I asked the question just a minute ago. I am surprised you forgot. Have you had this conversation with anyone about the investigation that Bob Mueller is conducting regarding Russia interference with our election or any other matter?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The fact that it is ongoing, it is a topic in the news every day, I talk to fellow judges about it. It is, you know, in the courthouse in the District of Columbia so I——

Senator HARRIS. And——

Judge KAVANAUGH. Guess——

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. And I will ask it one last time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The answer to that is, “yes.” So the answer is “yes.”

Senator HARRIS. Okay. And did you talk with anyone at Kasowitz Benson & Torres?

Judge KAVANAUGH. You asked me that. I need to know who works there.

Senator HARRIS. I think you can answer the question without me giving you a list of all employees of that law firm.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, actually, I cannot. I——

Senator HARRIS. Why not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Because I do not know who works there.

Senator HARRIS. So that is the only way you would know who you spoke with? I want to understand your response to my question because it is a very direct one. Did you speak with anyone at that law firm about the Mueller investigation? It is a very direct question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. I would be surprised but I do not know everyone who works at that law firm, so I just want to be careful because your question was and/or, so I want to be very literal.

Senator HARRIS. That is fine. I will ask a more direct question if that is helpful to you. Did you speak with anyone at that law firm about Bob Mueller's investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not remembering anything like that, but I want to know a roster of people and I want to know more.

Senator HARRIS. So you are not denying that you have spoken——

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I said I do not remember anything like that.

Senator HARRIS. Okay. I will move on.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator HARRIS. Clearly, you are not going to answer the question. When you and I met, we talked about race relations in this country, and there has been a lot of talk among my colleagues with you about the subject. And when you and I met, I brought up the incident in Charlottesville where, as you know, there was a rally by White supremacists that left a young woman dead. You will recall that the President who nominated you described the incident by saying, quote, "I think there is blame on both sides." So I think this will be a simple question for you. Do you, sir, believe there was blame on both sides?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, we did talk, and I enjoyed our meeting and to talk about the history of this country. And we talked about that at some length and talked about discrimination. I appreciated your opening statement yesterday where you talked about your experience. One of the principles I have articulated throughout this hearing is the independence of the judiciary.

Senator HARRIS. And, sir, I would appreciate it if you would answer the question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am, Senator. So one of the principles I have talked about throughout this hearing is the independence of the judiciary. And one of the things judges do, following the lead of the Chief Justice, and what all the judges do is stay out of current events, stay out of commenting on current events because it risks confusion about what our role is. We are judges who decides cases in controversy. We are not pundits, so we do not comment on current events. We stay out of political controversy.

Senator HARRIS. Judge, with all due respect, I only have limited time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But it is—

Senator HARRIS. Are you saying that it is too difficult a question or it is a question you cannot answer, which is whether you agree with the statement that there was blame on both sides? We can move on, but are you saying you cannot answer that pretty simple question?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am saying that the principle of the independence of the judiciary means that I cannot insert myself into politics in either of two ways: commenting on political events or, in my view, commenting on things said by politicians, a Governor, a Senator, or a Congressperson, a President. I am not here to assess comments made in the political arena because the risk is, I will be drawn into the political arena, and the Justices and judges of the United—

Senator HARRIS. Sir—and I appreciate your point, but there was such a robust conversation that happened, especially with my colleagues on the other side and you about race. So on the subject of race, I raise this question. But we can move on.

Have you ever heard the term, quote, “racial spoils system”?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, and that is a term that sometimes is used to—yes, I have heard that term.

Senator HARRIS. You twice wrote the term in The Wall Street Journal opinion piece describing the Cayetano case that you discussed previously with Senator Hirono. And I will tell you, the racial spoils system, that term stood out to me, so I actually decided to look it up in the dictionary, the term spoils, and in the dictionary, spoils is defined as, quote, “goods stolen or taken forcibly from a person or a place.” Can you tell me what the term racial spoils system means to you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, first of all, the Supreme Court affirmed the position that I had articulated in the amicus brief 7-to-2 in Rice v. Cayetano, an opinion written by Justice Kennedy.

Second of all, the State voting restriction at issue in Hawaii was a State office, State office for the Native Hawaiian, and it—

Senator HARRIS. Judge, that is not what I asked you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But it—

Senator HARRIS. If you can define the term as you used it, what does it mean to you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. But you raised the case, and the State voting restriction in that case denied Hawaiians, residents of Hawaii the ability to vote on the basis of their race. So if you were Latino or African-American, you could not vote in the election.

Senator HARRIS. And I heard your response to that earlier, and I appreciate the point that you made then. My question is, you used this term—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. Twice, and I am asking what does the term mean to you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not sure what I was referring to then, to be entirely frank, so I would have to see the context of it. But what I do know is that the Supreme Court, by a 7-to-2 margin, agreed with the position articulated in the amicus brief and that the voting restriction there was for a State office and denied people the ability to vote on account of their race. So it was——

Senator HARRIS. Sir, I appreciate that, but you have been very forthcoming about the amount of work and preparation that you put into everything you do. You have certainly led me to believe that you are very thoughtful about the use of your words and your knowledge that words matter, especially words coming from someone like you or anyone of us. So I would like to know what you meant when you used that term, but we can move on. But I will say this: Are you aware that the term is commonly used by White supremacists?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, when I wrote that, that was 20 years ago in the context of a voting restriction that denied African Americans and Latinos the ability to vote in Hawaii. I was representing a client when I articulated that. And the answer to your question is no.

Senator HARRIS. Okay. Well, unfortunately, it has been, and it is something that you should know. You should know that the same year you wrote your op-ed, a magazine published a cover story, a magazine that is described as being a White supremacist magazine, published a cover story about what it called, quote, “the racial spoils system,” of, quote, “affirmative action, the double standard in crime, sensitivity toward Black deficiencies, and everything else.”

The same year a self-proclaimed Eurocentrist wrote, quote, “While Blacks are generally regarded as the recognized expert in the game of racial shakedown, it is American Indians who may actually be the real geniuses at obtaining ‘racial spoils’.” So we can move on, but my concern is that this is a loaded term, and it would be important to know that someone who may very well and very possibly serve on the United States Supreme Court would be aware that the use of certain terms will have a profound meaning because they are loaded and associated with a certain perspective and sometimes a certain political agenda.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I take your point. I would point out that Hawaii was denying Latinos and African Americans the ability to vote in a State election at the time, but I take your point and I appreciate it.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you. In Griswold and Eisenstadt, the Supreme Court said that States could not prohibit either married or unmarried people from using contraceptives. Do you believe Griswold and Eisenstadt were correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So those cases followed from the Supreme Court’s recognition of unenumerated rights in the Pierce and Meyer cases earlier. And so what those cases held is that there is a right of privacy——

Senator HARRIS. And do you agree, do you personally agree, these cases, those two cases were correctly decided? So I am asking not what the Court held but what you believe.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. So to just go back to Pierce and Meyer, those cases recognized a right of privacy, the ability, one might say family autonomy or privacy is the term under the Liberty Clause of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Senator HARRIS. And with due respect, then, Judge, I am asking do you agree that those cases were rightly decided——

Judge KAVANAUGH. So I think——

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. And correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So in Griswold, I think that Justice White's concurrence is a persuasive application because that specifically rooted the Griswold result in the Pierce and Meyer decisions. I thought that was a persuasive opinion and no——

Senator HARRIS. Do you believe that it is correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Quarrel with that. That is a——

Senator HARRIS. Do you believe it was correctly decided? Words matter. Again, words matter.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator HARRIS. Do you believe it was correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think, given the Pierce and Meyer opinions, like I said, Justice White's concurrence in Griswold was a persuasive application of Pierce and Meyer. I have no quarrel with it. I——

Senator HARRIS. So there is a term that actually both Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito used, I believe, and affirmed in their confirmation hearings that these cases were correct. And so I am asking you the same question. Are you willing in this confirmation hearing to agree that those cases were correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, given the precedent of Pierce and Meyer, I agree with Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts, what they said.

Senator HARRIS. That it was correctly decided.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what they said so——

Senator HARRIS. Do you believe the right to privacy protects a woman's choice to terminate a pregnancy?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is a question that, of course, implicates Roe v. Wade, and, following the lead of the nominees for the Supreme Court, all eight sitting Justices of the Supreme Court have recognized two principles that are important: One, we should not talk about, in this position, cases or issues that are likely to come before the Supreme Court or could come before the Supreme Court; and second, I think Justice Kagan provided the best articulating of commenting on precedent. She said we should not give a thumbs up or thumbs down.

Senator HARRIS. No, I appreciate that. And I——

Judge KAVANAUGH. And then——

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. Did hear you make reference to that perspective earlier. But you also, I am sure, know that Justice Ginsberg, at her confirmation hearing, said on this topic of Roe, quote, "This is something central to a woman's life, to her dignity. It is a decision she must make for herself, and when Government controls that decision for her, she is being treated as less than a fully adult human responsible for her own choices." Do you agree with the statement that Justice Ginsberg made?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So Justice Ginsberg, I think there, was talking about something she had previously written about Roe v. Wade. The other seven Justices currently on the Supreme Court have been asked about that and have respectfully declined to answer about that or many other precedents, whether it was Justice Marshall about Miranda or about Heller—

Senator HARRIS. And we discussed that earlier.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Or Citizens United. And it is rooted—I just want to underscore. It is rooted in judicial independence—

Senator HARRIS. No, I appreciate that, but—I am glad you mentioned that Justice Ginsberg had written about it before, because you also have written about Roe when you praised Justice Rehnquist's Roe dissent. So in that way you and Justice Ginsberg are actually quite similar, that you both have previously written about Roe. So my question is, do you agree with her statement or, in the alternative, can you respond to the question of whether you believe a right to privacy protects a woman's choice to terminate her pregnancy?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So I have not articulated a position on that. And consistent with the principle articulated, the nominee precedent that I feel duty-bound to follow as a matter of judicial independence, none of the seven other Justices when they were nominees have talked about that, nor about Heller, nor about Citizens United, nor about Lopez v. United States, Thurgood Marshall about Miranda. Justice Brennan asked about his—

Senator HARRIS. And, respectfully, Judge, as it relates to this hearing, you are not answering that question, and we can move on.

Can you think of any laws that give Government the power to make decisions about the male body?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am happy to answer a more specific question but—

Senator HARRIS. Male versus female.

Judge KAVANAUGH. There are medical procedures—

Senator HARRIS. That the Government has the power to make a decision about a man's body?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I thought you were asking about medical procedures—

Senator HARRIS. No.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That are unique to men.

Senator HARRIS. I will repeat the question. Can you think of any laws that give the Government the power to make decisions about the male body?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not thinking of any right now, Senator.

Senator HARRIS. When referring to cases as settled law, you have described them as precedent and, quote, "precedent on precedent." You have mentioned that a number of times—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. Today, and through the course of the hearing. As a factual matter, can five Supreme Court Justices overturn any precedent at any time if a case comes before them on that issue.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Start with the system of precedent that is rooted in the Constitution.

Senator HARRIS. I know, but just as a factual matter, five Justices, if in agreement, can overturn any precedent. Would you not agree?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, there is a reason why the Supreme Court does not do that.

Senator HARRIS. But do you agree that it can do that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it has overruled precedent at various times in our history, the most prominent example being Brown v. Board of Education, the Erie case, which overruled Swift v. Tyson. There are tons—

Senator HARRIS. So we both agree the Court has done it and can do it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. There are times, but there is a series of conditions, important conditions that, if faithfully applied, make it rare. And the system of precedence rooted in the Constitution, it is not a matter of policy to be discarded at whim.

Senator HARRIS. But there is nothing, you and I agree, that prevents the Court from doing it, meaning that it is not prohibited.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The—

Senator HARRIS. The Court is—if I may finish.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator HARRIS. The Court is not prohibited from overruling or overturning precedent. No matter what the steps are that the Court must take, the Court may overrule precedent.

And so my question also is, then do you believe that this can happen no matter how long the precedent has been on the books? For example, there is no statute of limitations during which, after that statute of limitations has passed, the Court may not touch precedent. Would you agree?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, for example, the Supreme Court this past year said that Korematsu had been overturned in the court of history. That, of course, was the case that allowed the internment during World War II—

Senator HARRIS. Yes. Yes, I am familiar with—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of Japanese Americans. And the Supreme Court this past term—that was a 1942 or 3 decision and the Supreme—

Senator HARRIS. But you would agree there is no statute of limitations? The Court can go back as far as it wanted if it believed it was warranted? There is nothing that prevents the Court from reaching back many years?

Judge KAVANAUGH. What I would say is, there are a series of conditions that the Supreme Court must meet—

Senator HARRIS. I agree.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And the age of a precedent, as, I think, the Supreme Court itself has articulated many times, does ordinarily add to the force of the precedent and make it an even rarer circumstance where the Court would disturb an old—

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Precedent.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you. I have a couple of questions for you about voter suppression. Our history, as you know, is littered with shameful attempts to deny voting rights, especially for communities of color and particularly the African-American community in this country. For 50 years, the Voting Rights Act has protected against racial discrimination in voting. I know you had this conversation prior to this with my colleague, Senator Booker. Under the Act, it states that a record of discriminatory voting practices had to obtain Federal permission in order to change their voting laws. I know you are familiar with that. But then came the Court's decision in Shelby and by a 5-to-4 vote, the Court gutted the Act, effectively ending Federal approval requirement.

The majority believed that the requirement had outlived its usefulness. As you know, that was part of the ruling, essentially saying that the threat of race-related voter suppression had diminished.

So my question is, are you aware that within weeks of the Supreme Court's ruling, Republican legislators in North Carolina rushed through a laundry list of new voting restrictions, restrictions that disproportionately disenfranchised racial minorities? And it is just a "yes" or "no" question—are you aware of that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I recall reading about efforts in the aftermath, but one thing I would point out is I believe the Supreme Court's concern in that case was with the formula that was used for which States were covered by the preclearance requirement. I do not believe the Court said that Congress was proscribed from going back and redoing the formula. So on the "outlived its usefulness," I believe what the Court said—I am just describing it, not saying whether I agree or disagree—was saying the formula had not been updated to reflect current conditions but was not saying that preclearance was precluded if Congress went back and adjusted the formula and studied current conditions.

Senator HARRIS. Are you aware, as it relates again to that North Carolina action, that the Federal court of appeals later held that these restrictions intentionally discriminated against African-American voters, targeting them, quote—and these are the words of the Court—"with almost surgical precision." Are you aware of that ruling?

Judge KAVANAUGH. When was that decision, Senator?

Senator HARRIS. That was—I believe that was in—it was shortly after—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. A few years ago, 2016.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am aware that there has been a lot of voter ID litigation in other voting-related, election-related litigation in North Carolina—

Senator HARRIS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In particular, over the last several years, and so, I am generally aware of all the litigation in North Carolina.

Senator HARRIS. And are you aware that Republicans in Texas, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, and Florida have also implemented new voting restrictions since Shelby, again, disproportionately disenfranchising minority voters?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I know there is—I am not aware of the specifics of all that, but I do follow election law blogs and election law updates to keep generally aware of developments in the election law area. It is an area—

Senator HARRIS. Would you not agree, then, reading about this on the blogs, that it is troubling? In fact, compounding those with the recent proposal to close more than two-thirds of polling places in Randolph County, Georgia, where more than 60 percent of the residents are Black. Would you not agree that that is troubling?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not aware of that specific, but as I had the South Carolina voter ID case, what I tried to make clear through the trial in that case and the opinion, which was unanimous, that the reality of racial discrimination in America exists.

Senator HARRIS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The long march for racial equality is not over and that courts must scrutinize efforts to look for discriminatory intent, or discriminatory effects can always be evidence of an intent, and uncertain laws, the effects themselves can be problematic.

Senator HARRIS. And do you believe that the Court in Shelby underestimated, then, the danger that was presented in terms of States' willingness to restrict the right to vote?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I do not want to comment on the—I think that is getting to the correctness or incorrectness of Shelby, in particular. I just want to underscore, at least as I recall the opinion, it did say Congress itself could adjust the formula for preclearance, and I do not think Congress has done so, but that is—

Senator HARRIS. And clearly unwilling to do it, so there will have to be some recourse, do you not agree, for those voters in these various States if Congress is unwilling to act, to give them due process in terms of equal access to the polls so that they can vote? Otherwise, we are looking at widespread disenfranchisement. Would you not agree, if Congress does not act?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So Shelby dealt with the preclearance requirement. There is still, of course, Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act—

Senator HARRIS. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Which allows litigation brought by plaintiffs to challenge voting restrictions that are enacted with discriminatory intent or discriminatory effects—

Senator HARRIS. All right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. As well.

Senator HARRIS. Do you believe that Section 2 is constitutional?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that is asking me a hypothetical about any statute—

Senator HARRIS. Well, because you referred to it, I would like to know—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well—

Senator HARRIS. I would assume that you think it is constitutional if you think it is a tool.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think as a general matter—I do not want to pre-commit on any statute that you would identify. If there is some challenge raised, I will, of course, listen to the arguments. But Section 2 is an important tool for the voting rights enforcement. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 is one of the most consequential and effective statutes ever passed by Congress, and, you know, I have said that. And the history is, of course, well-known, but the voting rates before the 1965 act were abysmal because of the discriminatory restrictions that were in place. And the immediate effects of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 were enormous and are very important for people to understand.

Senator HARRIS. I agree. And in fact, to that point, in his confirmation hearing in 2005, Chief Justice Roberts, when asked about Section 2 and whether it was constitutional said, quote, “I have no basis for viewing it as constitutionally suspect, and I do not.” Do you agree with Chief Justice Roberts that the law is not constitutionally suspect, or do you have a different view?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not have any basis for viewing it that way either. I was just—if you ask me about any statute, I want to be careful because I do not know what arguments could come up, and I always want to make sure I have preserved the judicial independence and have not pre-committed. But I agree I have no basis for doing that.

Senator HARRIS. And then after the President nominated you to the Supreme Court, you had a chance before now—it was the only chance actually before now—to introduce yourself to the American people. You stood in the East Room of the White House and you thanked the President for your nomination. And then immediately you said, quote, “No President has ever consulted more widely or talked with more people from more backgrounds to seek input about a Supreme Court nomination.” Now, by my count, there have been 163 nominations to the Supreme Court, so unless you have personal knowledge about every one of these nominations before yours, including who those Presidents consulted with and who they talked to, and I cannot imagine that you have that personal knowledge. My question is did someone tell you to say that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No one told me to say that. Those were my own words. They were based on my—I did look into it a little bit in terms of thinking about what was possible before cell phones and before phones and then thinking about the history. And I know some of the history of Supreme Court nominations, and I also know in that 12-day period, I do know that President Trump talked to an enormous number of people. I think President Clinton, when I look back on it—that is why I said no one—President Clinton, as I recall, had a consultation process that was very wide as well, but that was my analysis of the situation. Those were my words, entirely my words, and I thought it was important to point out the—because I was—as I said yesterday, I was deeply impressed by the thoroughness of the process during the 12 days, and I said as much yesterday and I said as much in the East Room. The 12-day process was—at least it seemed to me—quite a thorough process.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you. And then I am going to follow up with some questions for the record for you on the first question I asked.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HARRIS. Thank you. Thank you.

Senator TILLIS. Judge Kavanaugh, we started this about 12½ hours ago. I am amazed that you are able to continue to respond and compose yourself in the way that you have. I want to cover a couple of things, and I am going to try and keep my comments limited so that we can get you, hopefully, with a decent night’s sleep.

A few minutes ago, you were asked some questions about emails or an email chain that you were involved in, and you did not get an opportunity to see them. You have not seen them before. I had not either. As a matter of fact, when I heard them read, I thought at least in one case they were being presented as your words, and then come to find out, because you astutely asked a question, you found out they were actually somebody else's words. So I did look into reading them. There is a reason why you do not have them, and that is because they are clearly marked "committee confidential."

Senator Lee brought up the point when the gentleman from New Jersey was speaking that we would work hard to try and look and see if we could get those documents cleared, but I also point out that those documents were made available to everybody on this Committee, any staff who supports the Senator on this Committee, on August the 22nd. And the last confirmation process with Neil Gorsuch, Senator Feinstein availed herself of that courtesy to be able to look at documents and have them cleared. In this confirmation hearing, Senator Klobuchar did the same thing.

The reason why it is very important for Members of this Committee to honor the confidentiality requirements is because we become stewards of documents that were provided under the Presidential Records Act. Now, we are going to go back and try and clear these documents. I would encourage all my colleagues that if you have not taken the time in the weeks that these documents were available to go through a process that Chairman Grassley has honored, please do so before you disclose such information before this hearing. So we will see whether or not that information is made available. And I will assume that Senator Lee will work alongside Senator Booker to see if that is possible.

I also want to go back to Kozinski for a minute, and you can actually take a break and drink some water because I do not really expect you to respond to any of this. I am going to get to a couple of questions. You were asked about Judge Kozinski. I think you were a clerk for him about 27 years ago. But you were not allowed to answer those questions. And I am not going to ask you about any of them right now, but I really want to kind of lay the groundwork for maybe where we can go with questions tomorrow. It has given me some food for thought on maybe where I will go down that line if others do.

You know, it is one thing for the people in the back to speak over you and make it difficult to hear, but I find it particularly insulting when Members here ask you questions of what I consider an incendiary nature and really never give you a chance to respond.

So here is a question I want—well, maybe I will ask you this. Are you Judge Kozinski?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator TILLIS. Okay. Because all of this was about somebody's else behavior for whom you clerked 27 years ago. You do not even have to answer that. So some of my colleagues are arguing, because you clerked with him and you knew him, that you knew everybody about him. Now, this is what is interesting to me. It turns out you are not the only judge that we have considered who clerked for Judge Kozinski. President Obama nominated and the Democrats voted to confirm Paul Watford on the Ninth Circuit. He clerked for Judge Kozinski. And actually, when the Ranking Member introduced him, she highlighted that fact. And, as a matter of fact, Judge Watford, I believe, worked with Judge Kozinski on the Ninth Circuit Court for about 5 years. I think that is right, about five and a half years.

So I do not want you to respond to this either, but if we are going to ask somebody who clerked for a judge 27 years ago why did you not know everything about that judge, then I think perhaps I would like to get copies of letters from Members of the Senate here who should be sending letters to Judge Watford and asking him the same question.

And now let us go a little bit further because I think we have got a double standard going on here. We had a Member in the U.S. Senate faced with a number of allegations for sexual harassment by women. When those allegations surfaced, it even included photographs in terms of the behavior in question. And when reporters asked Members about their thoughts on that and whether or not the Member should resign, they said that is not a distraction that we should be dealing with here in the Senate.

So I feel like tomorrow, if we go down this path, then we should be prepared to make sure that we fully explore the double standard and perhaps the questions that we should have for other people who worked with Judge Kozinski.

Now, I want to get to Rice v. Cayetano, and I want you to go back very quickly, and the thing that you have said multiple times I think is very important because we have had a number of discussions here about Voting Rights Act and denying various people the right to vote. And this particular case, this case was about potentially denying people in the State of Hawaii the right to vote based on their ethnicity, Latinos, African Americans, Asian Americans. Can you tell me a little bit more about that? And be brief. I am going to try and be brief just so I can yield back some of my time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. It was the Office of Hawaiian Affairs, and it was a State office, however, and they restricted voting for that office and denied voting to people who were residents and citizens of Hawaii but who were not of the correct race, and therefore, African Americans and Latinos and, as you say, Asian Americans, Whites in Hawaii were barred from voting for that office. And the Supreme Court held that that was a straightforward violation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

Senator TILLIS. And I believe you said by a 7-to-2—

Judge KAVANAUGH. By a 7-to-2 majority in an opinion written by Justice Kennedy.

Senator TILLIS. Okay.

Now, I actually have to get to one fun thing that you may have to do some damage repair on. Yesterday, when you introduced Margaret and Liza, you told me that Liza, you end every night—she gives you a hug. You said she gives the best hugs in the world. Today, you mentioned to Senator Graham that Margaret came down and gave you a second hug.

Judge KAVANAUGH. She did.

Senator TILLIS. So I was wondering if those competitive instincts are at play where she is trying to make up with quantity over quality.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is possible. As I think I said—

Senator TILLIS. I am sure it was an act of love, but it could have been competitive, too.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Margaret is 13 now, and when you are 13, the hugs are fewer and far between, but—

Senator TILLIS. That is right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. She came down last night and it was very nice. She gave me a special extra hug.

Senator TILLIS. In the next couple of minutes I want to talk about—you know, we had people here talk about you being an advocate for big business, an advocate for the rich, that you would be somebody who would be beholding to your boss or at least the person who nominated you.

So I want to go back through in just a couple of minutes and talk about a few things that have been discussed but I think they bear repeating, and I think that they—and the first one we need to add a little bit of context. I was in the White House when the President announced your nomination, and I believe in your comments you mentioned that the first date that you had with your wife Ashley was on September the 10th. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct—

Senator TILLIS. September the 10th—

Judge KAVANAUGH. September the 10th, 2001.

Senator TILLIS [continuing]. 2001.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, and I—

Senator TILLIS. And we know what happened the next day.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator TILLIS. And all the terrible events that you had to deal with, including your President that you have said every day came in the office and said this can never happen again. And that was the culture for the whole time you were in the office.

So then you moved forward a few years later and you are on the Circuit and you do Hamdan v. United States. Now, you had personally experienced an evacuation of the building that you thought could potentially be at risk. You worked with the President, who was personally very much invested in trying to protect the American people. And then you had this case. And in this particular case, tell me what you did.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The case involved Salim Hamdan, who had been an associate of Osama bin Laden's, and the case came to us through a military commission conviction. And the question was whether it violated ex post facto principles, and what that means was were you being convicted of something that was not a law in place at the time you committed the act.

Senator TILLIS. I read your opinion, and basically you said that—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I said it was a violation.

Senator TILLIS. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. So we reversed the conviction of Hamdan. In that case, I wrote the majority opinion in that case.

Senator TILLIS. Incidentally, I mentioned yesterday there was probably a couple of cases that I did not like the way you ruled—that is one of them—but you did it for the right reasons. There is another one, EMILY's List v. FEC. Tell me a little bit about that one. We all know who EMILY's List is. They proudly support promoting abortion rights and pro-choice Democratic women candidates. I went on their website today to confirm that that is still out there. Tell me what you did on that case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. They were challenging FEC—Federal Election Commission—registrations that prohibited how much money they could raise and how they could raise it, and I wrote the majority opinion invalidating those restrictions. And I wrote the opinion ruling for EMILY's List in that case.

Senator TILLIS. Another one, it is another one that I find interesting, did not like it but understand why you did it, Republican National Committee v. FEC.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In that case, the Republican National Committee was challenging some restrictions on fundraising, donations to, contributions to the Republican Party and Republican Party committees in the wake of—well, in the wake of Citizens United, they were arguing that certain other aspects of McConnell v. FEC were no longer good law. I wrote the opinion rejecting that challenge and ruling for the Federal Election Commission against the Republican National Committee in that case.

Senator TILLIS. I want to go back to another one. It involved another boss, actually a boss, a prior boss who was sitting right down there as the introducers yesterday, and that was Adams v. Rice. Tell me about that case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was a discrimination case involving someone who had had breast cancer in the past and was discriminated against in her job on that basis and joined an opinion ruling that that was unlawful discrimination and ruled against the Government in that case. In that case, the Secretary of State, in her official capacity, but the Government in that case, ruled against them.

Senator TILLIS. And some have said that you are not for the employees, you are also big for the big corporations. Tell me a little bit about Stephens v. U.S. Airways.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was a case where I wrote in favor of a group of retired airline pilots who were in a dispute about their retirement compensation with U.S. Airways, and I wrote an opinion favoring the pilots in the litigation against U.S. Airways.

Senator TILLIS. And, you know, if we go a little bit further, I think you already covered U.S. v. Nixon, so I will not cover it there, but I think maybe one or two that I will ask you about. Tell me a little bit about your environmental cases, the American Trucking case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was a case involving a California air quality regulation, and the argument by industry was that that regulation was impermissible under the Federal environmental statutes and Federal environmental law and, in essence—I am simplifying for effect here—but in essence preempted or impermissible. And I wrote the majority opinion rejecting the industry's challenge in that case, which allowed the California law to stay in effect. There was a dissenting opinion in that case that would have cast doubt on or validated the California regulation. I wrote the majority opinion sustaining it.

Senator TILLIS. There were other people—and, you know, I know that there were some in the crowd that expressed a concern about this, but there were some people here who have suggested that somehow you are unfriendly to the LGBTQ community. If my information is correct, back as early as 2003, you participated in a meeting with some 200 members of the Log Cabin Republicans to solicit their input and feedback. And I was just kind of curious if you have any recollection of that meeting and really what prompted you to go there.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So as a member of the administration working in the White House Counsel's Office on judicial nominations in particular but other issues as well, we would have outreach to groups, and one of the groups was the Log Cabin Republicans. And I went and spoke to them as a representative of the Bush White House to talk, as I recall, about judicial nominations. And I cannot remember all the specifics. I might have talked about some of the other Bush administration initiatives and received feedback on that. And I do recall that.

Senator TILLIS. Well, I am glad you did that. I also think it is interesting again because some people have not necessarily given you a chance to answer the question but have suggested you would be unfriendly to the LGBTQ community. The Human Rights Campaign ultimately put a statement out that said that in fact you have never been involved in any substantive legislation involving LGBTQ issues. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not believe I have had any cases involving—

Senator TILLIS. Lawrence v. Texas, Romer v. Evans, United States v. Windsor, Obergefell v. Hodges, Bowers v. Hardwick, and they made it very clear that you have not been involved in any of that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Those cases were not through our court, and I am not remembering any specific cases as a judge that I have had involving those issues.

Senator TILLIS. Well, I would hope that if it comes up tomorrow, that perhaps they have found some evidence that you have, because we have not.

So I am going to try and do what I did yesterday and be the Member who spoke the least, but I am going to do something a little bit different because I found out that I can. I am not going to yield back my time. I am going to potentially reserve it for use tomorrow. But since I am at the end of the dais, I will probably be going last, and I probably will not.

So I just want to again thank you for being here. I want to particularly thank the people that have been sitting in the chairs. You have got the most uncomfortable position in the Chamber, but you have got a far more comfortable chair than all the people sitting behind you, and I am sure they are ready to get up, but we appreciate you being here.

And I do also—I have got some wrap-up comments. I actually want to thank the Members on both sides of the aisle because, consistent with my old Speaker self, I have been keeping a running total on exactly just how many people went over and how much time, and they did an extraordinary job, given the complexity of the issue.

And, Senator Whitehouse, I will add that, technically speaking, you yielded back time, about 3 seconds. You may want to bring that in tomorrow.

[Laughter.]

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I will use it wisely.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. But I think it was a sea-change difference in terms of what we saw here at the dais, and I think it is the right way to run these Committees.

So, Judge Kavanaugh, I want to thank you. I want to thank you for your patience; I want to thank you for your stamina. And the good news is you are more than halfway done. These were 30-minute rounds. Tomorrow will be 20-minute rounds, and I suspect that the Chair will also ask Members to try and stay within their time limits.

So we will be back here tomorrow morning at 9:30.

For the information of all the Members, we will stand in recess and reconvene tomorrow at 9:30 for the 20-minute rounds. Thank you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

[Whereupon, at 10:07 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Additional material submitted for the record for Day 2 follows Day 5 of the hearing.]

CONTINUATION OF THE
CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE
NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 2018

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC.

The Committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:33 a.m., in Room SH-216, Hart Senate Office Building, Hon. Charles E. Grassley, Chairman of the Committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Grassley, Hatch, Graham, Cornyn, Lee, Cruz, Sasse, Flake, Crapo, Tillis, Kennedy, Feinstein, Leahy, Durbin, Whitehouse, Klobuchar, Coons, Blumenthal, Hirono, Booker, and Harris.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF IOWA

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, Judge, I see you got here without my walking you in.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Good morning.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Good morning, and welcome back, of course, and that is to all the people that are here for 3 days as well as the people that might be here just for a few minutes. Everybody is welcome. Your testimony yesterday over a nearly 30-hour day made very clear that you have a strong command of the law, and even Ranking Member Feinstein said that you were forthcoming in your answers to questions. Your 12 years of exceptional judicial service, and that obviously includes your 307 opinions that you wrote and hundreds more that you joined in, make you very well qualified to receive a promotion from the second highest court in the land to the highest court in the land, and we will have the American Bar Association in tomorrow that will say particularly the same thing.

I am particularly impressed with your lifetime of public service that tells something about you, but also more so than your 12 years, what you have done as an outstanding professor. You have talked a great deal about being a coach for your daughters. You have talked a great deal about volunteering for meal service. I have only done that once in my life, so—and I should do it more, but you do it regularly, so you are to be complimented, and, most importantly, being a father.

And, of course, I have enjoyed conversation with your wife and two daughters, and my wife was here yesterday, and she was talking about that all night, talking to your wife I mean.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. And I heard some of my colleagues on the—I have had some of my colleagues, as I get into some of the business of this Committee, complain again yesterday about publicly releasing committee confidential documents. But anyone who did not get documents released to use during the hearing, I have to say, as I have tried to cooperate and make everything available to everybody that they wanted, they only have themselves to blame if they did not get the documents they wanted.

This is what I did a long time ago, sent a letter to each Member of this Committee on August 22nd, and a short quote from that is, “I invite all Members of the Committee to submit to me by noon, August the 28th, a list of document control numbers specifically identifying committee confidential documents, or documents publicly released with redactions, that a Member wishes to use in the hearing.” And I said I would work with the former and current President to secure their public release, and that meant working with lawyers in the Department of Justice on redaction and all that stuff.

Senator Klobuchar was the only Senator who requested the release of specific documents, and we secured their release. And as she told me yesterday, she gets an A for cooperation. She does get an A for her cooperation. Every Senator who complained about this process needs then to only look to Senator Klobuchar as an example to see that my process was fair and would have resulted in public release of documents before the hearing if they had only asked me.

But then yesterday, and I think we have accommodated these Senators, but Senator Leahy, Coons, Blumenthal, and Booker asked that I obtain the public release of certain confidential documents, and I have attempted to do so despite the untimely request. These Senators could have made the same request last week, but maybe that would have deprived them of more talk that they have been able to express about my hiding of documents.

With respect to Senator Booker’s question to Judge Kavanaugh, my friend my New Jersey asked the nominee to answer some questions regarding an email exchange from over 15 years ago without showing the nominee the email in question. And then you know what happened? The Senator from New Jersey blamed it on the fact that the email was labeled “committee confidential.” Well, there was nothing preventing any Senator from asking me before the hearing to get this document publicly released. In fact, the request was made to release these documents for the first time last night after the Senator asked the question of the nominee. We did not get some requests until after midnight.

And we have—we, quite frankly, had to have quite an argument with people in the Department of Justice to get these released and all the redactions that have to be done. What Senator would want to release their emails with all the emails and everything without redaction of phone numbers, Social Security numbers, addresses, and Social Security numbers? That all has to be done under law to reduce this. But I think that we have the Department of Justice cooperating with that, so before this day is over, Members will have the documents that they need to ask the questions that they want to ask.

Now, before I ask my questions, and one Senator wants to make a 30-second comment. I am willing to turn to that, but let me say, each of our 21 Senators on the Committee get to ask questions for the 20-minute round. Every couple of hours we will take a break, and that would include a lunch break. And, Judge, if you need a break at any time, have your staff inform my staff. And, as is the standard practice for every judicial nominee, the FBI conducts a background investigation and provides to the Senate a background report. Moreover, like with prior nominees, including Justices Kagan and Gorsuch, there are a number of Presidential records that are restricted by Federal law from public release because they contain sensitive information, including highly confidential advice delivered to the President, and personal identifying information such as full names, date of birth, and Social Security numbers.

So, at the end of the questions today, we will move, as we have before, into a closed session with the nominee where we will review the FBI report and any committee confidential records that any Member would like to discuss. This is standard practice that we do for all Supreme Court nominees, and every Member is invited to participate.

Now I would like to call on Senator Hirono.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to set the record straight on a matter that was brought up late last night with regard to me and my questioning of Judge Kavanaugh and his relationship to Judge Kozinski, and whether I would ask Judge Watford the same questions. I would like to quote from my response to the Washington Times on September 4th, 2018. And that quote is, and this is from me, "If President Trump would be so enlightened as to withdraw Judge Kavanaugh's nomination and nominate Judge Watford to the Supreme Court, I would certainly ask Judge Watford about his relationship with Judge Kozinski." Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Booker, before you speak, I hope that you are not going to say that we have not gotten the document you want and all that sort of thing because we worked—my staff was here until 3 trying to accommodate everybody that asked for documents. Would you proceed, please?

Senator BOOKER. I appreciate that, sir. And, sir, the very section of the process that you read points out the absurdity of the process, and that is what is deeply frustrating to me and deeply disappointing. The process you read, you invite Committee Members "to submit to me by noon, on August 28th, a list of document control numbers specifically identifying the committee confidential documents or documents publicly released with redactions that the Members wish to use in the hearing, so long as it is a reasonable request," so no guarantee that we will be able to use them, but to submit the ones we want to ask questions about. And then you will go back to President Trump, go back to President Bush for review.

Now, I see that plainly—sir, if I could just finish my point. We were—we had a number of those documents released to us the night before, and to think that we could somehow ask you about the documents, reveal to you what questions we wanted to ask, and then it is not even your determination. It goes back to Bill Burck, who is then making a determination about documents. Now, the specific document that I brought up is a great illustration of the absurdity of the process.

I brought up a document entitled, “Racial Profiling.” And by the way, I asked the candidate about his views today about that issue. It is a controversial issue, and that document actually does reveal his thinking about that issue at the time. And the fact that there is nothing in that document that is personal information, there is nothing national security related, the fact that it was labeled as “committee confidential” exposes that this process, sir, is a bit of a sham; that we are now—this has never been before. We are holding back not only—not only holding back documents labeled “committed confidential,” but not even giving us the time to review those documents.

In addition to that, this is just the tip of the iceberg of all the documents that will continue to be released, I assume, up until the time that we have a vote on the Senate floor and beyond that. I am sure you can understand, sir, how it puts all of us in a very difficult situation when it is not you. It is somebody—you have to then go back to a person named Bill Burck to decide if some document, who is an associate—who is an associate and colleague of the nominee to figure out which documents are going to be released.

And by the way, if all these documents were things, as you characterized them, they were personal information, if these were things that were delicate information. But as I read these, the documents we got the night before the hearing, including the ones we got before the hearing, I find it—I am actually flabbergasted that so many of these things are not controversial whatsoever, but bring up pertinent issues that we should have a time to digest and to ask the candidate about.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I think—can I—I will call on you, but I think I ought to respond to the Senator. I would like to respond at least on two points, one, the word “sham.” Senator Leahy, Chairman of the Committee, accepted documents, committee confidential. During Gorsuch’s nomination, we accepted committee documents—committee confidential. At that particular time, Senator Feinstein asked for 19 documents as we are getting documents for you now in the same way.

So, you read from my letter and you called it a sham. Was it a sham when we did it for Gorsuch? Was it a sham when Senator Leahy did it? And the reason we did it is so that we could get documents so you could review them almost from, I think, August the 5th or some time—maybe it was August the 10th—so you could start on it very early. And then do not forget that documents become committee confidential, and then do not forget on a regular rolling basis, they are not committee confidential and then put on our website so that 300 million people can view them if they want to.

And then the second point about the lawyer for President Bush, all of our conversations last night were with the Department of Justice. Now, I hope you understand that these people in the Department of Justice are people that are there for years under both Republican and Democrat administrations. They are supposed to be non-political. I hope they are non-political. They are civil servants. We ought to respect their judgment as they try to take care of the privacy of people by redacting late into the night Social Security numbers, phone numbers, cell numbers, and all those sorts of things.

Senator—and then we also have Senator Whitehouse, but I want to go and let him comment.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Senator Grassley, may I be recognized after Senator Whitehouse?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, thank you. I was disappointed to see last night that some of our colleagues are unwilling or unable to conduct themselves in this hearing with regular order and in accordance with the Rules of the Committee and the Rules of the Senate. I know last night some of our colleagues even tried to cross-examine the nominee about documents, but refused to let him even read them.

Members of the Senate and Members of Congress generally are privy to sensitive information, including classified information on occasion, and we are expected to protect that information for all of the obvious reasons. And it is inappropriate to raise these in an open session before the Committee. And I think our colleagues understand that, but nevertheless decided to go ahead anyway. So, I just think it is important that we remind one another that there are clear rules about the discussion of confidential material, and that there can be consequences to the violations of those rules. And this idea that somehow President Bush, when his lawyer and the President decide that information represents legal advice or other protected information that was given to the President during the time he was President of the United States, and that somehow he is unable to make a claim of privilege, or that once the claim is made in consultation with his private lawyer that that would be not respected by the Senate is outrageous.

And so, I just—I thought we were doing pretty well yesterday, but things went off the rails, it looks like, last night. And I hope we will return to a hearing process that respects the Rules of the Senate and that treats each other and particularly the nominee with the civility that he and this process is entitled to. And I would encourage our colleagues to avoid the temptation to either violate the Senate Rules or to treat the witness unfairly by cross examining him about a document and refusing to show it to him, and violating the confidentiality of some of these documents as requested by President Bush in consultation with his private lawyer.

Senator BOOKER. Sir, maybe I respond because it was a direct—it was directly invoking—may I respond, sir? No Senate rule accounts for Bill Burck's partisan review of the documents. No Senate rule and no history of the Senate accounts for what is going on right now. There was a—that was following this archive's—this partisan operative following his involvement in this process that I think, in my opinion, undermine the process. And the idea that we could somehow go through your lengthy process and these documents are—many of these documents were dumped on us at the last minute.

But Senator Cornyn actually made a very good point. I knowingly violated the rules that were put forth, and I am told that the committee confidential rules have knowing consequences. And so, sir, I come from a long line, as all of us do as Americans, to understand what that kind of civil disobedience is, and I understand the consequences. So, I am right now before you—before your process is finished, I am going to release the email about racial profiling, and I understand that that—the penalty comes with potential ousting from the Senate. And if Senator Cornyn believes that I have violated Senate Rules, I openly invite and accept the consequences of my team releasing that email right now.

And I am releasing it to expose, number one, that the emails that are being withheld from the public have nothing to do with national security, nothing to jeopardize the sanctity of those ideals that I hold dear. Instead, what I am releasing this document right now to show, sir, is that we have a process here for a person—the highest office in the land for a lifetime appointment. We are rushing through this before me and my colleagues can even read and digest the information. And I want—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Can I ask you—can I ask you—can I ask you how long you are going to say the same thing three or four times?

Senator BOOKER. No, sir, I am saying—I am saying—

Chairman GRASSLEY. How long do you want to take?

Senator BOOKER. I am saying I am knowingly violating the rules.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator BOOKER. Senator Cornyn called me out for it.

Chairman GRASSLEY. How many times—how many times are you going to tell us?

Senator BOOKER. Sir, I am saying right now that I am releasing—I am releasing committee confidential documents.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman—

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman.

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. Since the Senator invoked my name, can I insist on an opportunity to respond?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator CORNYN. I did not mention his name—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. But he mentioned my name, and he is right. Running for President is no excuse for violating the Rules of the Senate or of confidentiality of the documents that we—that we are privy to. This is no different from the Senator to release classified information that is deemed classified by the executive branch because you happen to disagree with the classification decision. That is irresponsible and outrageous, and I hope that the Senator will reconsider his decision because no Senator deserves to sit on this Committee or serve in the Senate, in my view, if they decide to be a law unto themselves and willingly flout the Rules of the Senate and the determination of confidentiality and classification. That is irresponsible and conduct unbecoming a Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Since——

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman——

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, just a minute——

[Voice off microphone.] Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I have got something I want to say. I think we ought to be thinking about this is the last—I got three Senators are asking for—Senator Kennedy, Senator Whitehouse, and the Senator from Connecticut.

Senator HIRONO. And, Mr. Chairman, I would like to also be recognized.

Chairman GRASSLEY. So, here is—this is the last day, so here is something you got to think. We will be here until midnight if you want to be here, but I have been told that the Senate Minority Leader or somebody in the Democrat Party invoked the 2-hour rule. So, if the 2-hour rule is invoked, that is—nobody on this Committee, Republican or Democrat, is going to have an opportunity to do what they want to do today because this is the last day he is going to be here. And so, I hope you do not invoke the 2-hour rule. So, if you want to talk now before I start to ask my questions, I will do it.

Senator Whitehouse was the next one, and then Senator Kennedy.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, I would also like to be recognized because I am in a similar situation as my colleague here.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Whitehouse. I think—I think he asked before you did.

Senator DURBIN. He did.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, you recognized for 30 seconds, and I will take 30 seconds. Lest silence imply consent, speaking for myself, I want to make it absolutely clear that I do not accept the process of this committee confidential routine that we went through. I do not accept its legitimacy. I do not accept its validity. Because I do not accept its legitimacy or validity, I do not accept that I am under any obligation.

I have not made a big fight about this. I have just gone ahead with my questioning. But, again, lest silence imply consent, I think that that rule is as ineffectual as if the Chair had unilaterally repealed the law of gravity. It simply is not so. I have not agreed to this rule. I have not voted on this rule. This rule does not exist in our Committee or Senate rules, and I will leave it at that.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Did you——

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Just me speaking. I am not willing to concede that there is any legitimacy to this entire committee confidential process in this hearing.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Was it just——

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And nothing sensitive, nothing personal, nothing classified, and nothing confidential has been released.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Did you object to it when it was previously used under other Supreme Court nominees?

Senator WHITEHOUSE. It was developed then through a bipartisan process in which—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator FEINSTEIN. That is correct. That is correct.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. We had reached an agreement by unanimous consent effectively, not by decree.

Senator FEINSTEIN. No, there was agreement between—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator FEINSTEIN [continuing]. The Chairman and me.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Precisely, and that did not exist this time. And now you have documents that are not personal, not classified, not confidential, not sensitive that are nevertheless covered under this—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, I was in the Chair last night when this issue came up. I made the call when I—I want to explain why I made it. Senator Tillis my colleague, raised the point. I allowed Senator Booker to continue. Sometimes patience ceases to be a virtue, but I did not think in these hearings following the Chairman's example that that was appropriate.

Senator Booker examined Judge Kavanaugh about the racial disparities in this country. I gave Judge Kavanaugh, I think I—it was 6 minutes and 39 seconds to respond uninterrupted. So, I was trying to be, and we will continue that, was trying to be fair to both sides following the example of our Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. There has been a lot of commentary over the last couple of days about how we are in uncharted and unprecedented territory here, that the process has broken down, reflecting what is happening in our Nation generally, and particularly in the last couple of days with the publication of a new book and an op-ed that indicate very serious chaos and breakdown in other parts of Government. And I am hoping that we can come together as a Committee, and if there are any rules, do what we have done in the past, which is adopt them on a bipartisan basis. That has been the way that "committee confidential" designation—

It is not classification. There are no classified documents here. It is a designation. It is an arbitrary and seemingly capricious designation designed to spare people embarrassment possibly, but all these documents belong to the people of the United States. They are covered by the Presidential Records Act, and eventually they will come out. So, shame on my colleagues if they conceal them now and deny us the benefit of questioning this nominee who comes before us for the last time today. He comes before us for the last time today. This is our last opportunity, up or down, whether he is confirmed or not, to question him.

And like any trial lawyer, documents have to be assessed as the trial goes on, as this witness responds to our questions. We cannot give the Chairman a list of what documents are relevant before we hear his answers and our colleagues' questions. So, not only from the standpoint of there being no basis for the rules, but also to deny the fairness and effectiveness of the process, that is the reason that we are making this protest and we are here under protest.

That is the reason why I asked to adjourn so that we could consider fairly all of these documents. I appreciate that Senator Grassley has decided to release the documents that I would have used yesterday. He has released the documents that Senator Booker, commendably, would have released even if not reclassified or redesignated. But I want to reserve the right—I hereby reserve the right to release documents before any confirmation vote so that my colleagues can see what the truth is.

We are literally trying to get at the truth here, and between now and any vote on confirmation, there is the right, in my view, on the part of every Member of this Committee to release documents that she or he believes are appropriate. And to delegate this decision to an unappointed, and unconfirmed, and largely unknown figure, Bill Burck, who used to used to work for the nominee, is the height of irresponsibility. Thank you.

Senator LEE. I want to start by pointing out that when this part of the discussion started last night, I was concerned that as with any witness in any courtroom or any proceeding before this Committee, I want to make sure that when a witness is questioned about a particular document, the witness has access to that document. It is not fair to the witness. The witness who has over the course of his career been involved in the creation, the authorship, the review of not just hundreds of thousands, but many millions of documents in his lifetime. It is not fair to this witness or any other witness in any other proceeding anywhere to not give the witness a copy and allow him to respond to it while he is being questioned about it.

So, that is why I offered to Senator Booker—and Senator Booker and I had a helpful conversation with the very helpful Committee staff last night, and they have agreed in the meantime to release this same document that was now the subject of it. So, the process worked. It works. We do have the ability to make these things available, to make them public so that we can be fair to Senator Booker, we can be fair to the witness, to the nominee.

I do want to point out since the charge has been made that this process is somehow rigged, that it is charged, that it is unfair, that it is arbitrary and that it is capricious, I completely disagree. We are not dealing in a lawless environment here. We are dealing here with the Presidential Records Act. We have got documents that are the subject of privileges, privileges that have to be asserted.

Now, Bill Burck is the designee for that Presidential administration, and has the prerogative of asserting privileges. But through an accommodation with the Senate, with the Senate Judiciary Committee to allow us to gain access to other documents to which we would never otherwise be able to have access, they have agreed to hand those over with the understanding that we have this committee confidential process, and that there are means by which we can clear documents like this one that we would otherwise not be able to clear. It worked here. It has been cleared, and I think we should move forward. Thank you.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Durbin or Senator Feinstein, whichever one wants to go first.

Senator DURBIN. No, I would defer to Senator Feinstein.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Well, I will accept it. Thank you. It is my understanding that by agreement with private lawyer, Bill Burck, the Chairman has designated 190,000 pages of Kavanaugh's records "committee confidential." And by doing this, Republicans argue Members cannot use these documents at the hearing or release them to the public. Unlike the Intelligence Committee, and I have been a Member for about 2 decades, the Judiciary Committee does not have any standing rules on how and when documents are designated "committee confidential." Previously, the Judiciary Committee has made material confidential only through bipartisan agreement. That has not been done in this case, so this is without precedent.

Republicans claim that Chairman Leahy accepted documents on a committee confidential basis during the Kagan administration. It is my understanding that those documents were processed through the National Archives, not private partisan lawyers, and Republicans agreed. Ninety-nine percent of Elena Kagan's White House records were publicly available and could be used freely by any Member. By contrast, the Committee has only 7 percent of Brett Kavanaugh's White House records, and only 4 percent of those are available to the public. No Senate or Committee rule grants the Chairman unilateral authority to designate documents "committee confidential." So, I have no idea how that stamp, "committee confidential," got on these documents.

I sent a letter on August 10th, 2018 objecting to the blanket designation of documents as "committee confidential." I offered to work with the Chair. He refused. Judiciary Democrats sent the Chairman a letter on August 28th restating the objection to the Chair's designation of the documents as "committee confidential" and requesting public release. As I have looked at the documents that are committee confidential, they do not affect any of the usual standards that would deny Committee confidentiality, and, Mr. Chairman, I think that is a problem.

I think we are entitled to all records, and I think the public is entitled to all records that are appropriate and do not put forward personal information or information that otherwise should not be disclosed. So, I do think we have a problem, and I think for the future we ought to settle that problem with some kind of a written agreement between the two sides, whether that is an agreement between the two sides of the entire Committee or between the Chairman and the Ranking Member, I think does not matter much. But I think the fact is that we should agree on who determines something is "committee confidential," what the criteria are for it, and the release to the public, and particularly in the event of a Supreme Court hearing.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Durbin.

Senator DURBIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And like my colleague, Senator Whitehouse, I do not want my silence to be interpreted as consent to the process that we have faced before this Senate Judiciary Committee. It is unlike any process I have ever seen. This designation of "committee confidential" should be put in historic context. There will be an opportunity for us later this afternoon to meet in confidential and secret, private session to discuss this nominee. That is not unusual. It is done for virtually every nominee. Some of the meetings literally last a matter of a minute or two and we say there is nothing to talking and we are leaving.

But it has happened in the past, but whenever we dealt with "committee confidential," it was something that was very specific and usually personal to a nominee, and it was done by bipartisan agreement that we would protect the nominee from assertions or comments that may not have any truth to them whatsoever, but the Committee should take into consideration. That is a far cry from what we have faced with this nominee.

I cannot understand, and I said this in my opening statement here, the authority that we have given to a man named Bill Burck, a former assistant to the nominee; that we have said to Mr. Burck, you will decide what America gets to see about Brett Kavanaugh. You will make the decision as to which documents we will be allowed to discuss openly and publicly and which documents we cannot. Who is this man? By what authority could he possibly be denying to the American people information about a man who is seeking a lifetime appointment to the highest court in the land?

The National Archives is usually the starting point of this process. I put in the record yesterday a statement from the National Archives disavowing this whole process, saying this is not the way we have done in the past. We usually initiate this, please give us a few weeks to do it in an orderly way. But the decision was made by the White House and the administration not to go down that path, not to take the same course we have on previous nominees, but instead to allow this gentleman, Bill Burck, a private attorney, the authority to decide what the American people can see about the background of Brett Kavanaugh in other capacities.

Who is Bill Burck? All that I know of him is that he was once an assistant to the nominee. I am told that he is not only the attorney for George W. Bush, but also for the White House Counsel, Mr. McGahn, Mr. Preibus, the former chief of staff to the President of the United States, and Steve Bannon, a man whom I could not characterize in a few words, but he is his personal attorney.

And in this situation, he is now the litmus test. He is the filter to decide what the American people will see about this nominee, and that is why we bring this issue before you. Lest you think we are carping on a trifle here, we are talking about whether the American people have the right to know, and we now know that less than 10 percent of the documents reflecting the public career of Mr. Kavanaugh have been made available to this Committee.

And I just want to say to my colleagues, particularly my colleague from New Jersey, I completely agree with you. I concur with what you are doing, and let us jump into this pit together. I hope my other colleagues will join me. So, if there is going to be some retribution against the Senator from New Jersey, count me in. I want to be part of this process. I want to understand how Bill Burck, this private attorney, has the right to say, as one of my colleagues mentioned, this should be considered a classified document, a top secret document, a document that relates to the national security of the United States.

By what right, by what authority can Mr. Burck possibly designate a document as "committee confidential"? He has no authority to do that. He only has authority because he has the consent and the cooperation of the Republican Majority on this Committee. That is the only thing that brings us to this moment.

And let me just say in closing one last thing. I am sorry that one of my colleagues has characterized all of us on the Democratic side on the first day of this hearing as contemptuous. I have never heard that said before in a full Committee meeting, but it has been said. And I am particularly sorry that he singled out one of our colleagues on this side and accused him of conduct unbecoming a United States Senator. I think statements like that are personal. They are disparaging. They question the motive of a colleague, something that we should do our very best to avoid in the United States Senate if we are ever going to restore the reputation of this body.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman?

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman?

Senator CORNYN. May I make just a brief point? Mr. Chairman, I am looking at a Wall Street Journal article back during the Elena Kagan nomination. It says, "Document production from Elena Kagan's years in the Clinton White House Counsel's Office was supervised by Bruce Lindsay, whose White House tenure overlapped with Ms. Kagan." Bill Clinton designated Mr. Lindsay to supervise records from his Presidency in cooperation with the National Archives Records Administration under the Presidential Records Act. So, President Bush, by choosing Mr. Burck, is doing exactly what President Clinton did in choosing Bruce Lindsay for that same purpose.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Senator Hirono was first.

Senator HIRONO. I thank my colleague. Count me in, too. Mr. Chairman, I, too, referred to a so-called "committee confidential" document, deemed such by one Bill Burck, and we all know who he is at this point. And had the nominee asked me for a copy of that so-called "committee confidential" document, I would have been happy to release to him or give it to him. I am releasing that document to the press, and I would defy anyone reading this document to be able to conclude that this should be deemed confidential in any way, shape, or form. Thank you.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mr. Chairman, I know you have mentioned a number of times that I went through the process. I do want to point out, however, that I also was on numerous letters asking for all these documents to be released, and that my colleagues have repeatedly asked for documents to be released. And I go back to what happened on the first morning of this hearing, and that is that we pointed out that when there are 42,000 documents that are dumped on us in one night, there is absolutely no way people are going to be able to adequately review them. And as they review them, they are going to find documents that they want to be made public, that they want to ask the nominee about.

So, the whole point of this is because this hearing was ramrodded through and we were not given, say, maybe the month it would take to look at these documents, we are where we are. So, my remedy for this, in addition to making it clear that I join my colleagues that we support what Senator Booker is doing here, is that you must somehow expedite the review of every single document, and we must have some kind of rules in place to get them out. I understand you would want to take out Social Security numbers and things like that. That is normal. But we simply cannot hide these documents from the American public. It is the highest court of the land.

And I was looking back. Everyone was citing people—the Founders of this country, and I found a quote that really works here by Madison: “A popular government without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce or a tragedy.” That is what we are talking about here. By ramrodding this through for political reasons, by denying us the access to the documents, we are denying the public the right to see what is out there, and it is just now how we do things in my State, and it is not how we have done things in this Committee.

Senator COONS. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I am going to call on Senator Lee, and then you, but before that, a couple things she just reminded me of in her comments. Number one was to take care of all the people that did not act promptly, like you did, Senator Klobuchar. That is why we extended it and gave the courtesy of doing whatever anybody else wants from now, and those are—can either be brought. Now those that you have got can be brought up right now to him, and the things that you—that are not cleared that you want to bring up with the Judge, you can bring up in the closed session today.

And the other thing is when you talk about getting all the documents, I do not know who might work for Members of this Committee, sometimes want to be on the Supreme Court. For instance, would you—we did not ask for all the documents that Kagan had and emails or whatever communications she would have had when she worked with Senator Kennedy. Would you—would you want to be exposed to that sort of thing? If you want everything to be made public or all the emails that you have, whether—I think they are protected for 50 years for a United States Senator. So, you are talking about the public right to know, do you want to give up your emails right now, make them public? I do not think you do.

Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I want to say I am deeply sympathetic to the frustration people feel when they do not have access to documents they want. As a United States Senator, I have faced this on a number of occasions. There have been times when we have been called upon to vote on legislation literally at the midnight hour, sometimes much later than that, that we have not seen until moments before it was voted on. There have been other times, and I kid you not, when I have been asked to vote on a piece of legislation that has an annex to it, and I have been told that I cannot see the annex to the legislation because it is classified and it is classified in a way that I do not have access to because of a Committee assignment that I do not have.

It is incredibly frustrating. In those circumstances, we look for a demon. There are demons in those circumstances. They are too numerous to name here. In this circumstance, there is a demon, but that demon is a law of our own creation, and it is called the Presidential Records Act. That is the demon that you are after here. That is the only reason we have got this issue.

Now, the custodian of those documents holds and exercises a privilege on behalf of the Bush administration. These are documents we would otherwise not have access to because they are privileged. Pursuant to an agreement with the Senate as an accommodation to the Senate, the custodian of those records has agreed, notwithstanding the privileged nature of those documents, to hand them over to us with an understanding that when there is a need that arises with respect to one or more of those documents to make them public, we can as a Committee go through a process to do that. That is exactly what has happened. It is what has worked, and it is what has worked here today.

So, if you are frustrated with the process, then let us review the Presidential Records Act, but we are just doing what the law allows us here to do. These documents are not ours. They belong to someone else. It is not written into the Constitution. It is not written on stone tablets anywhere that we are entitled to documents that do not belong to us. It is significant that William Howard Taft did not release his Presidential papers. It is significant that Robert Jackson, having served as Attorney General, did not release all the papers he had as Attorney General. Why? Well, I assume it had a lot to do with the fact that they did not belong to us as a Senate.

If we want to be able to have a process not just with this administration, but in every Presidential administration, Democratic, Republican, or of other stripe in the future, we need to respect the process and respect the privilege that is accorded to documents that do not belong to us. That is all we are asking, and the process is working. Let us move forward.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator FEINSTEIN. On behalf of this side, I would like to just say a couple of things. There is no process for the “committee confidential.” It used to be that both sides had to concur, the Chair and the Ranking Member, but now this is—this is just simply not the case. To some extent with this kind of thing, “committee confidential” becomes a kind of a crock, and it should not.

I think we need to sit down. I think we need to have a rule on how “committee confidential” is determined, on what it means, and who makes that decision. For all I know, some Republican staffer could have made the decision, and I just do not know. Documents appear. Our side had nothing whatsoever to do with the designation of “committee confidential.” So, it becomes a way, if there is no rule, for the Majority to essentially put all information through a strainer. Should we let this go out, be public, or should we not? And I do not think that is what this Committee is about.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, you know—you know, in the absence of a majority of a Committee opposed, the Chairman acts on behalf of the Committee, and Chairman Leahy accepted documents on a committee confidential basis during Justice Kagan’s nomination. And there is no indication that the Ranking Member agreed to that at that particular time.

Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Just two quick points if I could. First, the question has been raised whose documents are these. These are the American people's documents. The Presidential Records Act gives us a right to obtain them for a Supreme Court nomination after the review of the professionals at the National Archives, and Bill Burck is not a professional at the National Archives. The Archives has said that this is not their process.

Equally importantly, because some will now make dire predictions about the appropriateness of the release of any these documents, Bill Burck himself in his letter to us of August 31st said, and I quote, "The Presidential Records Act exemption, one which protects against the disclosure of classified information, did not apply to any documents our team reviewed."

I agree with Senator Booker. This confirmation is too important for us to conceal documents that may reveal the nominee's views, and I think we should not be proceeding under these grounds.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized, sir?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I hope you do not say the same thing again.

Senator BOOKER. Sir, I will not. And first of all, I will say something that I have not said, which is I appreciate the patience of Job that you are showing here. And I just also want to say, too, the representations from Senator Kennedy and Senator Lee were right on point, right on correctly. They stood strong last night, challenged me, but they not only were collegial, but they looked to find a fair way to deal with this process, and I want to express my appreciation.

I want to clarify something that I said before. There is no Senate rule that accounts for this process, period. This is not a Senate rule. I did not violate a Senate rule.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator BOOKER. I will pause. I will pause. There is no Senate rule that I violated because there is no Senate rule that accounts for this process. And I say to a Chairman that I respect, that I believe has been fair and good to me, I will say that I did willingly violate the Chair's rule on the committee confidential process. I take full responsibility for violating that, sir, and I violate it because I sincerely believe that the public deserves to know this nominee's record, in this particular case, his record on issues of race and the law. And I could not understand, and I violated this rule knowingly, why these issues should be withheld from the public.

Now, I appreciate the comments of my colleagues. This is about the closest I will probably ever have in my life to an "I Am Spartacus" moment.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. My colleagues, numerous of them, said that they, too, accept the responsibility. There are very serious charges that were made against me by my colleague from Texas. I do not know if they were political bluster or sincere feelings. If what he said was sincere, there actually are Senate rules governing the behavior of Senators. If he feels that I, and now my fellow colleagues who are with me, have violated those rules, if he is not a tempest in a teapot, but sincerely believes that, then bring the charges. Go through the Senate process to take on somebody that you said is unbecoming to be a Senator.

Let us go through that process because I think the public should understand that at a moment that somebody is up for a lifetime appointment, that this issue—does the public have a right to know. This is not about the Presidential Records Act. This is not a violation of the Presidential Records Act, not a violation of Senate rules, sir.

But if somebody is going to land those charges, I hope that they will follow through with me and Senator Durbin, Senator Coons, Senator Whitehouse, Senator Hirono, Senator Blumenthal, now Senator Feinstein. I hope that they will bring charges against us, and I am ready to accept the full responsibility for what I have done, the consequences for what I have done, and I stand by the public's right to have access to this document and know this nominee's views on issues that are so profoundly important, like race and the law, torture and other issues. Thank you.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, may I read the Senate Rule 29.5, the Standing Rules of the Senate, for the benefit of all Senators. "Any Senator, officer, or employee of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate, including the business and proceedings of the Committees, Subcommittees, and Offices of the Senate, shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body, and if an officer or employee, to dismissal from the service of the Senate and the punishment or contempt."

Senator BOOKER. Bring it. Bring it.

Senator COONS. Bring it on.

Senator CORNYN. So, I would correct the Senator's statement, there is no rule. There is clearly a rule that applies—

Senator BOOKER. If it applies, Chairman, bring the charges.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, all of us are ready to face that rule on the bogus designation of "committee confidential." Just because there is a Senate rule does not mean it can be misapplied, or misconstrued, or misused. And I think even the threat raised by one of my colleagues here is unfortunate, and that is a kind way of putting it, with all due respect.

And I would just make one other point. We are dealing here with a lifetime appointment. Nothing we do here is more serious than confirming a Justice on the United States Supreme Court. Let the American people appreciate that we are here in the most solemn responsibility we have under the Constitution. We need the full truth. Just as this nominee has sworn to give it us, we are entitled to it from our colleagues.

And the question is, what are they concealing by this procedure? What are they afraid the American people will see? What are they afraid we would be asking of this nominee if we had all of those documents that have been denied us in this sham and charade.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Lee, then Senator Tillis.

Senator LEE. To Senator Booker's point, the document you are talking about has now been approved through the Committee processes. It has been made available to the public. The process worked, and I pledge to work with each and every one of you. If you have got a document as to which a privilege has been asserted such that it is not public yet, I will work with you to try to make it public. Let us do it. I think we can do this. It is not that difficult, and we have done it several times, at least three times now. We can do it more.

The privilege thing is real, though, and this is not our privilege we are dealing with. This is the privilege that belongs to somebody else. The privileged nature of documents has been around for a long time, since the early days of the republic. The records, the notes of the Constitutional Convention were ordered sealed for 30 years after the Constitutional Convention occurred in 1787. I am not sure all the reasons why, but those who participated in it decided that that was going to be the rule, sealed 30 years. Those documents did not belong to anyone else. They belonged to those who attended that Convention and participated in it.

Now, there were at least two from that list, Oliver Ellsworth and James Wilson, I believe, who were subsequently nominated to serve on the United States Supreme Court. No one demanded, to my knowledge, and no one could have gotten, notwithstanding the 30-year seal agreement, the notes to the Constitutional Convention, even though those certainly would have been probative as to how those people might have served on the Supreme Court.

Yet no one was accusing the U.S. Senate back then of being a rubber stamp for the Washington administration or anyone else. In fact, in 1795, the United States Senate disapproved of at least one of President Washington's Supreme Court nominees. This was no rubber stamp, and yet they respected the fact that they did not own every document, that other people might own them. We do not own these, and so we have to go through the process, a process ordained by a law that we passed and that only we have the power to change. Let us follow that law. We can follow the law and respect the process, and respect the rights of each of our colleagues and the rights of the American people to review documents that might be relevant here. But let us go through the appropriate process to do it.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Mr. Chairman—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I think I ought to be fair to the Republicans.

Senator FEINSTEIN. I think you should, too.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Go ahead, Senator Tillis.

Senator TILLIS. Thank you, Mr. Chair. You know, Mr. Chairman, it took nearly 17 years to get my college degree. I went to five different institutions. I am pretty sure none of them have been elevated to the Ivy League.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You finally found one that was right.

Senator TILLIS. That is right. I do not ever plan on running for President in 2020 or any point in the future. I want to make—I want to make one comment and then one request. The comment is, I hope everybody will record a transcript of what is going on right now. Senator Lee explains things, I think, in eloquent legal terms, but let us talk about the consequences of making this an untrusted body to receive documents under the Presidential Records Act. You may rue the day that you do that because you will probably get fewer documents in the future.

Now, what I would like to do is ask all of our Members, is perhaps we can actually demonstrate to the American people that we are prepared to expose our own records. I would like to suggest for the purpose of the SCOTUS nomination that all of us waive any right to the Speech and Debate Clause, and that we allow all of our email records related to this SCOTUS nomination to be made public on an immediate basis. I for one am ready to sign up for it now. I hope all my other Members would do the same thing, because in the interest of transparency, certainly it would make sense for every one of us, regardless of what we want to do in the future, to expose that information to the American people.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Are you done? I will start with my questioning. By the way, we are going to have to protect—so everybody gets an opportunity to look at the FBI and anything else you want to ask, at 1 we are going to have to go into executive session and get that done before—if the Senate does close down at 2. I mean, if they do not give us permission to meet after 2, we have got to get that out of the way. So, we will do that at 1.

Senator FEINSTEIN. May I just put a document in the record?

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, would you yield to a question?

Mr. Chairman, would you yield to a question about procedure?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I used the wrong word—“closed.” We are talking about “closed” instead of “executive” session. So—

Senator KENNEDY. Would you yield to a question about procedure, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Go ahead.

Senator KENNEDY. Could you explain to me why we are having to truncate the hearing today?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, I am not sure we do have to truncate it, but just in case—well, it would be because the Minority may object to the unanimous consent request the Leader would make for this Committee to continue to work while the Senate is in session.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, let me be sure I understand. Senator Schumer is saying that we have to shut down while the Senate is in session. Do we not generally waive that rule?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, generally it is waived, but if it is objected to, we cannot meet. So, that means that we want to make sure that we get the executive—or the closed session out of the way.

Senator KENNEDY. May I ask why Senator Schumer is doing that?

Senator DURBIN. Has he done it?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I do not know.

Senator KENNEDY. We have a nominee to the Supreme Court of the United States. We have all talked about transparency. What is his basis for doing that?

Chairman GRASSLEY. You will have to ask him. I do not know.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Mr.—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, you go—

Senator FEINSTEIN [continuing]. If I may, I would just like to put a document in the record. The Committee was told that President Trump has decided to withhold 102 pages of Kavanaugh’s White House Counsel records.

[Voices off microphone.] A hundred and two thousand pages.

Senator FEINSTEIN. A hundred and two thousand? What did I say?

Senator DURBIN. You were close.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you, 102,000 pages of Kavanaugh's White House Counsel records, and asserted a new claim of constitutional privilege. And, of course, that has not been done before. I am told there is no such privilege. There is an executive privilege, which is outlined in the Presidential Records Act and requires the President to notify Congress and the Archivist, which was not done here. There is a little bit more to it, but I would just like to put this in the record.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. That will be put in the record, yes.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Judge Kavanaugh, we heard a lot yesterday about your record of independence and impartiality, and you have done more than talk about your independence and you have done more than talk about your independence and impartiality. You have demonstrated the judicial values of the bench. By my account, you ruled against executive branch agencies 23 times between May 2006—January 2009.

Of course, President Bush was nominated—who nominated you to the bench, was the head of the executive branch. You had no problems ruling against the President who appointed you, if that is what the law required, and I have no doubt that you would do the same on the Supreme Court, if that is what the law requires. You have demonstrated your impartiality.

Some of my colleagues tried to depict you as hostile to the little guy and always willing to rule for the powerful, but your record shows that you rule for the party that has the law on their side. So that makes you out to be not a pro-plaintiff judge or pro-defendant judge, but to be a pro-law judge.

So let me ask you about a few of your cases that I think demonstrate that you will vindicate the rights of those who are less powerful in our society. After all, our aspirations as Americans is equal justice under law.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. So I will ask you on each one of them, but just so you know the three cases I am thinking about is Rossello, Essex Insurance, and United Food and Commercial Workers. So in the first one, a case in which you ruled for the woman wrongfully denied Social Security benefits, tell us your approach to that case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. This case, Mr. Chairman, was a case in which the Social Security Administration had denied benefits—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Was a case where the Social Security Administration had denied benefits to a woman who had a history of mental illness, and they had done so because at one point in time, she had been employed for a brief period of time with a family member, but it had been subsidized. And this was, in my view, the height of arbitrary agency decisionmaking.

The case had gone on for 15 years, was kind of a hall of mirrors for the woman, and we wrote an opinion, I wrote an opinion reversing the denial of benefits for the woman and also making clear to the Social Security Administration that any further delay would not be tolerated and that these kinds of delays in denying benefits to people with mental illness were unacceptable.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let us go to the Essex Insurance Company case.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Essex Insurance?

Judge KAVANAUGH. In the Essex case, it was a case of a child's family and an insurance company, and the child had been the victim of sexual abuse, and the—on three occasions, and the insurance company was trying to give—pay out simply $100,000 for the total number of—for the abuse. And the insurance policy said $100,000 for each occurrence, in essence.

And we ruled that the insurance company had to pay $100,000 for each occurrence, each incident of the abuse, and, therefore, a total of $300,000. So in that case, we ruled and I wrote for a victim of abuse against an insurance company that was seeking to squeeze the benefits that were paid under a policy that was owed to the plaintiff in the case.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Then the last one would be United Food and Commercial Workers.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And that is a case, a union case against Walmart, and the case came from the NLRB, and the question was whether Walmart had engaged in unfair labor practices against a union in that case. And in that case, we ruled for the union against Walmart in that case on the ground that the factual record supported the conclusion that the company had engaged in unfair labor practices and, therefore, violated the rights of the union members.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Now to something that I believe I have discussed with every nominee to the Supreme Court probably for the last 15 years. It is not about a case or your approach to the law, and it is something that Senator Kennedy talked to you about yesterday. It is not a very popular subject with some of the current and former Justices. I think I make Chief Justice Roberts uncomfortable when I raise the issue with him when I speak for a short period of time at the Judicial Conference.

And then there was a former—when Justice Souter was on the Supreme Court, he made a famous quip about television cameras, that they would have to roll over his dead body. I can respect that view. I just think it is plain wrong.

I, and many of my colleagues on this Committee, believe that allowing cameras in the Federal courthouse would open the courts to the public and bring about a better understanding of the Court and its work. You may be aware of that for a number of years, I have sponsored a bill, the Sunshine in the Courtroom Act, which gives judges the discretion to allow media coverage of Federal court proceedings.

Would you keep an open mind on cameras in the courtroom? Or if you have strongly held views on it, do not be afraid to tell me.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your longstanding interest in the issue and transparency for the courts, of course. I will tell you what we have done on my court briefly and then tell you some general thoughts going forward, if I were to be confirmed.

On our court, we have gone from audio release at some date much later. Then we went to audio release same week. Then we went to audio release same day. And now we are allowing audio to go out live with the oral arguments, and that process has been one in which the judges have learned, experienced, and become comfortable with the additional transparency that has become in the same-time audio over time, and that process has worked well in our court.

On the Supreme Court, I think the best approach for me is to listen to the views of people like yourself, Mr. Chairman, and others I know who are interested in that to learn, if I were to be confirmed, from the experience there and to see what the experience there is like, to listen to the Justices currently on the Supreme Court. As I have said, be part of a Team of Nine, well, I would want to learn from the other Justices what they think about this. Because several of them, as you know well, Mr. Chairman, when they were in my seat, expressed support for the idea of cameras for oral arguments, and then, when they were there for a few years, switched their position after experiencing it. So I would want to talk to them, why that position.

And as I said to Senator Kennedy last night, too, I would want to think about the difference between oral argument and the actual announcements of the decisions. I think those are two distinct things. There has not been much focus on the possibility of live audio, for example, of the decision announcements or video of the decision announcements.

And I think that is a distinct issue from oral arguments, and I would be interested in thinking about that and talking to my colleagues, if I were to be confirmed. I will have an open mind on it, and I do think when you attend oral argument at the Supreme Court, as I have many times, or you attend the announcement of decisions, it is extraordinarily impressive to walk into that building and the majesty of that building.

The building itself conveys the stability and majesty of the law, and to go into the courtroom and to see the Justices working together, as they do, to try to resolve cases is extraordinarily impressive. It makes you confident, I believe, in the impartial rule of law and in each member of the Supreme Court to see them in action.

And so I do understand your point of view on this, and I would certainly keep an open mind on it and listen to you and listen to the other Justices on the Court, of course.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Feinstein.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am going to go back to Roe because most of us look at you as the deciding vote, and I asked yesterday if your views on Roe have changed since you were in the White House. You said something to the effect that you did not know what I meant, and we have an email that was previously marked "confidential" but is now public, and shows that you asked about making edits to an op-ed that read the following, and I quote:

"First of all, it is widely understood, accepted by legal scholars across the board, that Roe v. Wade and its progeny are the settled law of the land," end quote. You responded by saying, and I quote, "I am not sure that all legal scholars refer to Roe as the settled law of the land at the Supreme Court level since Court can always overrule its precedent, and three current Justices on the Court would do so.”

This has been viewed as you saying that you do not think Roe is settled. I recognize the word said is what legal scholars refer to. So, please, once again tell us why you believe Roe is settled law, and if you could, do you believe it is correctly settled?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So thank you, Senator Feinstein.

In that draft letter, it was referring to the views of legal scholars, and I think my comment in the email is that might be overstating the position of legal scholars, and so it was not a technically accurate description in the letter of what legal scholars thought. At that time, I believe Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia were still on the Court at that time.

But the broader point was simply that I think it was overstating something about legal scholars. And I am always concerned with accuracy, and I thought that was not quite accurate description of legal, all legal scholars because it referred to “all.”

To your point, your broader point, Roe v. Wade is an important precedent of the Supreme Court. It has been reaffirmed many times. It was reaffirmed in Planned Parenthood v. Casey in 1992 when the Court specifically considered whether to reaffirm it or whether to overturn it. In that case, in great detail, the three Justice opinion of Justice Kennedy, Justice Souter, and Justice O’Connor went through all the factors, the stare decisis factors, analyzed those, and decided to reaffirm Roe.

That makes Casey precedent on precedent. It has been relied on. Casey itself has been cited as authority in subsequent cases such as Glucksberg and other cases. So that precedent on precedent is quite important as you think about stare decisis in this context.

A similar analogy, the United States v. Dickerson case in 2000, where the Court considered whether to overturn Miranda v. Arizona or to reaffirm it. And in that case, the Court, through Chief Justice Rehnquist, specifically reaffirmed Miranda despite the fact that Chief Justice Rehnquist had been a critic of Miranda in his early days and had written some opinions quite critical of it.

It became that—so that Dickerson case is similarly precedent on precedent, which is important going forward as you think about the stare decisis calculation for a case like Miranda.

So that is why both of those cases, Planned Parenthood v. Casey and Dickerson, are cases where I would refer to them as precedent on precedent.

Senator FEINSTEIN. So you believe it is correctly settled, but is it correct law in your view?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, there is on that case or on Dickerson, or on cases like Citizens United or Heller or United States v. Lopez or Kelo, just the whole body of modern Supreme Court case law, I have to follow what the nominees who have been in this seat before have done.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Judge, a “yes” or a “no” will do.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, just if I can briefly explain, Senator?

Senator FEINSTEIN. Yes, you can.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Briefly. I will try to be brief. But this—when you are in this seat, I am not just sitting here for myself. I am sitting here as a representative of the judiciary and the obligation to preserve the independence of the judiciary, which I know you care deeply about. And so one of the things I have done is studied very carefully what nominees have done in the past, what I have referred to as “nominee precedent.”

And Justice Ginsburg, but really all the Justices have not given hints or forecasts or previews. And Justice Kagan, I think, captured it well, as she often does, with in talking about questions like the one you are asking, you cannot give a thumbs up or thumbs down and maintain the independence of the judiciary. So I need to follow that nominee precedent here.

Senator LEE. Mr. Chairman, could I ask that the email at issue be made part of the record?

Senator FEINSTEIN. Pardon me?

Senator LEE. I would like to ask that the email at issue be made part of the record.

Senator FEINSTEIN. We will be happy to do that. Thank you.

During your time in the Bush White House, the administration actively took steps to limit women’s reproductive choices. This included re-imposing the global gag rule to prevent foreign organizations from spending their own money on reproductive health and trying to prevent the FDA from making Plan B contraception available over the counter.

During your service at the White House, 2001 to 2006, did you work on any issues related to women’s reproductive health or choice?

Judge KAVANAUGH. President Bush was a pro-life President, and so his policy was pro-life. And those who worked for him, therefore, had to assist him, of course, in pursuing those policies, whether they were regulatory. There was partial birth legislation that was passed as well, and some of those things might have crossed my desk. I cannot remember specifics.

But he—I think this came up in Justice Kagan’s when she worked for President Clinton. He had a different view than President Bush on that issue, and she had some work for President Clinton. I consider myself working for President Bush, was there to assist him.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Let me go to torture. During the time you worked in the White House, the Office of Legal Counsel concluded that harsh interrogation techniques were legal, even though Congress had passed a law in 1994 banning torture.

The Office of Legal Counsel took a sweeping view of Presidential power and concluded that the President could override the statute. In response, in 2005, the Congress adopted an amendment championed by our colleague Senator McCain—I was the cosponsor—that stated that only interrogation techniques that can be used are those authorized in the Army Field Manual.

Was the Office of Legal Counsel correct when it concluded that the President could ignore the torture ban?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So the Office of Legal Counsel, Senator, subsequently withdrew those memos, as you know. And as I have made clear in some of my writings—the review of Judge David Barron’s book, some of my opinions as well—the President does not have the authority to disregard statutes passed by Congress regulating the war effort, except in certain very narrowly described circumstances that are historically rooted. The common example being command of troops in battle.

So as a general proposition, the President has to comply with the law. The President is subject to the law, including in the national security context.

That is the lesson, I think, of the Youngstown Steel case, of Justice Jackson's categories. Category 3, as I have said repeatedly in my writings, which is where Congress has prohibited the President from doing something, is critically important. That is essential to the rule of law. As Justice Jackson said, that is the equilibrium of the country is at stake in Category 3, and I have written about that quite frequently.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Got it. Thank you.

Today, we have a President who said he could authorize worse than waterboarding. How would you feel about that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not going to comment on and do not think I can sitting here on current events.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Well, but you know what the law is. You have made that clear.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I know what the law is, Senator, and I know your—

Senator FEINSTEIN. So I ask specifically how do you feel about that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I feel that I should follow the law as a judge. I know what the law is, and I know your leadership on this issue, both with the report you did, which was the thorough documentation of things that happened, as well as recommendations for the future. And I know your leadership with Senator McCain on the 2005 Act as well. And I know what the law is, and I have written about the—how the separation of powers works when Congress passes laws of the kind that you have.

Senator FEINSTEIN. One last question on this. In December of 2005, President Bush issued a signing statement regarding the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, reserving the President's right to disregard that the law's ban on torture—disregard the law's ban on torture if it interfered with his constitutional authorities as President.

What was your involvement, if any, with this signing statement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. While I was staff secretary, any issue that reached the President's desk, with the exception of a few covert matters, would have crossed my desk on the way to the President's desk. I would not have in the ordinary course provided the policy advice or the legal advice, but it would have crossed my desk. So in that case, the signing statement—the drafts of it, that process—would have crossed my desk at some point.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Okay. In a 2013 panel discussion, as—well, you did nothing about it, though. It crossed your desk, and that was that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, there was debate, as I think I have mentioned, about that. The Counsel to the President, Ms. Miers at the time, was the ultimate adviser on that matter for the President and, thus, would have been the one who primarily dealt with that with the President.

It was important as in the job I had there not to supplant the policy or legal advisers. That was not my job. My job was to make sure the President had the benefit of the views of his policy and legal advisers.

Senator FEINSTEIN. One more Bush era question on this. In a 2000 panel discussion at NYU Law School regarding Bush administration anti-terrorism policies, you said the Bush administration went “right up to that legal line to defend the security of the United States,” implying that Bush policies did not cross the legal line. Do you mean to suggest that Bush administration’s post 9/11 programs, including the CIA torture program, were legal?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, Senator, that is not what I was suggesting there, and let me try to provide you an explanation. President Bush’s view, as I think he had said publicly, was in trying to keep America safe, he was going to do everything he could within the law. He relied on his lawyers to provide him the boundaries of what the law is, and then he would go up to that line as he thought effective as a matter of policy.

It was up to the lawyers, therefore, to make sure that they were giving sound advice and not—and having the backbone. And this is something that your legislation reinforces. Lawyers need to have backbone, even in pressurized moments, to say no, and I have talked about that many times.

One of the most important responsibilities of an executive branch lawyer in the passions of the moment, where the pressure is on, where the President wants to do something perhaps, is to go into the Oval Office and say, “No, you should not do this.” And that is something that I have written about, talked about, and experienced in my time with President Bush, and I have encouraged young lawyers to have that backbone and fortitude to say no. That is about the most important thing.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you.

A quick change of subject. You sat on a case where a trainer, Dawn Brancheau, was killed while interacting with a killer whale during a live performance. Following her death, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration found that SeaWorld had violated work force safety laws. The majority agreed with the agency that SeaWorld had violated the law.

According to what I know, you disagreed. In your dissent, you argued that the agency lacked the authority to regulate employers to protect participants in sporting events or entertainment shows.

However, the statute as enacted applies to each employer, and it defined “employer” as anyone engaged in business affecting commerce who has employees. Where in text of the law did Congress exempt employers of animal trainers?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you for the question, Senator.

The first point I want to make is that was not a case that involved potential compensation to the family. That was handled through the State tort system or through insurance or through a settlement with the—SeaWorld and the family. So the case before us had nothing to do with compensation to the family. It had to do with a separate regulation of SeaWorld.

The issue, Senator, was precedent. I follow—as a judge, I follow precedent. The precedent of the Labor Department, as I read it, was that the Labor Department under the statute would not regulate what it called the intrinsic qualities of a sports or entertainment show.

So lots of sports and entertainment shows have serious dangers, whether it is football or the balance beam in gymnastics or the high wire act at the circus or the lion tamer show. And the SeaWorld show was of—as I saw it, of a piece under those with that precedent that said the Labor Department would not regulate, for example, whether baseball helmets had to have ear flaps or whether to prohibit the punt return or to make the balance beam have nets.

And this seemed to be covered by that precedent, as I saw it. The Labor Department in the oral arguments tried to distinguish, for example, the dangers of football from the dangers of the SeaWorld show, and I did not, as I explained in the opinion, find that distinction persuasive.

But I did make clear two things, Senator. One is Congress could, of course, regulate the intrinsic—Congress could make the decision to regulate the intrinsic qualities of sports and entertainment shows, or the Labor Department could change its precedent. And I made clear that, of course, State tort law—as the NFL has experienced with the concussion issue, State tort law always exists as a way to ensure or help ensure safety in things like the SeaWorld show.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you.

A question, if I may, about independent agencies. Congress has established several independent agencies. We believe they are essential to enforcing our laws and safeguarding consumers. Congress requires the President to have good cause to remove the heads of these agencies to insulate them from political interference.

You have objected to this limit on the President's power and struck down the for-cause requirement in a case involving the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. The D.C. Circuit disagreed and overturned your decision.

If the President can fire the heads of independent agencies for any reason, what is to prevent political interference in these independent agencies?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I have followed the Humphrey's Executor precedent. I have referred to it as entrenched. That is the precedent that allows independent agencies and protects them from at-will firing, the for-cause restriction. So as a general matter, I have affirmed the—or I have followed the precedent of Humphrey's Executor.

The example you are talking about, the Congress established a new independent agency that did not follow the traditional model of independent agencies—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of having multiple members. That is all I thought was problematic there, and I did not invalidate or did not say the agency should stop operating. I said the agency can continue performing its important functions on behalf of consumers. But either it had to be restructured as a multi-member agency, or the President had to be able to remove the single head at will.

Senator FEINSTEIN. The limited set of documents we have received indicates that you were heavily involved in the Bush White House's response to congressional investigations after the Enron scandal. Is that accurate?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is accurate. We had a document request from Senator Lieberman's Committee, and I was one of the lawyers that had to help gather the documents from people within the White House and then had to negotiate documents—I had to negotiate documents with Senator Lieberman's staff.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Right. So you know that Enron was one of the greatest corporate scandals in American history. And I can tell you as a Senator from California, not only did many of my constituents lose everything financially when Enron collapsed under the weight of its accounting fraud, but the fraud and market manipulation contributed to an energy crisis in California.

White House emails show that you were asked to review a set of draft talking points for Press Secretary Ari Fleischer that addressed the role of Enron's market manipulation in the California energy crisis. Essentially, the talking points said if there was any misconduct by Enron, it was up to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to investigate and punish the company.

I am not going to ask you if you remember the specific document, but was that your view that FERC was the regulatory body that was supposed to stop this sort of misconduct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not recalling the specifics of that, Senator. My role, as a general matter, was to help gather documents in response to Senator Lieberman's Committee's request, as I recall. And I know FERC would have a role necessarily in something like that, but I do not know if I thought primary or I do not think that was my area of expertise. So I am just not recalling it specifically, Senator.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Yes.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hatch.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the way you have conducted these hearings in spite of these type of irresponsible outbursts and so forth that it is hard to believe.

Now, Judge Kavanaugh, I would first like to commend you for how you have conducted yourself these last 2 days. You have displayed the level-headedness and decency that so many of your friends tell us actually exist and I would say your friends and former colleagues have described in their letters to this Committee. I wish you could say the same about everyone who has attended this hearing or conveyed it—or covered it on social media, but I cannot.

I am deeply concerned about the theatrics we have seen these last 2 days. I have been on this Committee for 42 years, longer than any other person except Senator Leahy. I am the former Chairman. Never have I seen the constant interruptions we have witnessed at this hearing.

Confirmation hearings are supposed to be an opportunity for the American people to hear from the nominee. Unfortunately, it seems that some on the political left have decided to try to turn this hearing into a circus. Now I worry about the precedent this is setting for future confirmations, but that is not the worst.

The worst of it are the attacks against people who are not even up for confirmation who just happen to be here in the room to support the nominee. It is bad enough that Supreme Court nominations have turned into all-out war against the nominee. Have we really reached the point where anyone who supports or even sits behind a nominee must also be destroyed? Has our tribalism really reached that low?

To those who have been unfairly caught up in the mob mentality of the last 2 days, I just want to say you are right to be here supporting someone you believe in. Do not let the fact that there are a lot of, frankly, sick people out there cause you to lose faith in our political process. We need good, decent people to step forward to contribute even when it is ugly, particularly when it is ugly.

Just now to my questions. Let me ask you this. As I did yesterday, I would like to ask you to keep your answers to my questions concise so we can get through as many of them as we can.

Late last night, one of my colleagues asked you a series of open-ended questions about any conversations you have had with anyone at a 350-person law firm about Special Counsel Bob Mueller or his investigation. You said you do not remember having had any such conversations.

My colleague did not clarify why my colleague was asking the questions and did not allow you to complete your answers. I want to give you a chance to respond if you would like to.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Sure, Senator. I do not recall any conversations of that kind with anyone at that law firm. I did not know everyone who might work at that law firm, but I do not recall any conversations of that kind.

I have not had any inappropriate conversations about that investigation with anyone. I have never given anyone any hints, forecasts, previews, winks, nothing about my view as a judge or how I would rule as a judge on that or anything related to that. So I thank you for the opportunity to clarify and reassure you on that.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you.

With all of the accusations and insinuations and innuendo being hurled around yesterday, there is something I have to come clean about. I am on the Board of Visitors of the Federalist Society. It is true. For those who are not familiar with the Federalist Society, it generally holds debates and puts together panels on legal issues, covering all sides of these issues—the liberal, the conservative, et cetera. It is a very responsible organization.

The American Constitution Society, the Democrat organization, does much the same thing, and I respect them, except it focuses on liberal or progressive lawyers. So this is familiar to my Democratic colleagues on this Committee.

They have been involved with ACS'—with the ACS from keynoting the annual conference to being an honorary host committee chair, to speaking on panels, to writing blog entries for the organization. I even heard the nasty rumor that one of them spoke at a Federalist Society event. Can you believe that?

You have already said that when it came to your nomination, you spoke with the President, the Vice President, and the White House Counsel Don McGahn, not the Federalist Society. So I do not need to ask you about that. My question for you is this. What has your experience with the Federalist Society been?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, thank you.

The Federalist Society, as you noted, holds debates at law schools—

Senator HATCH. On both sides.

Judge KAVANAUGH. On both sides. The typical program of a Federalist Society event at a law school will have two speakers and a moderator—that is typical—with the two speakers presenting different views on an issue. It could be, for example, Fourth Amendment privacy, where you have someone who has got different view on national security-related Fourth Amendment issues or on free speech issues or all sorts of legal issues. They try to have debates where both sides are presented at the law school events that I have been to.

At the conventions, they will always have panels of four or five with a moderator, where they will have a spectrum of views represented on a different topic. They are very enriching in terms of your knowledge of the law, and they are also enriching, I believe, in terms of providing different perspectives on the law. And they have—they welcome people and actually insist on having people from all different perspectives at the event.

So it is very beneficial to the law. I think the programs they have at the law schools, they are very educational. They provide some of the best debates that are held with the law schools, I believe.

And so I think the organization itself, which itself does not lobby and does not file amicus briefs or anything like that, does a very valuable service at law schools and the legal community as a whole for bringing together different views on important legal issues. And I applaud them for their efforts to bring speakers to campus and provide legal debates on campus and in lawyers' conventions.

Senator HATCH. You have described it quite well.

Earlier this year, I attended oral argument in Microsoft v. United States, also known as the Microsoft Ireland case. Naturally, I was very interested in that. At issue in the case was the meaning of the Stored Communications Act and whether a warrant for data stored overseas, but accessible in the United States, falls within the Act's confines.

I had introduced legislation known as the CLOUD Act to resolve this issue. Following oral argument, Congress passed the CLOUD Act, thus mooting the case before the Court.

Now the specific question at issue in the Microsoft Ireland case has been resolved by my legislation, but the case also raised a broader question that I would like to ask you. When the Stored Communications Act was passed in 1986, no one imagined a world where data could be stored overseas but accessible instantaneously in the United States. It was clear that the act covered data stored in the United States, but it was less clear that it extended to data stored abroad using new technologies that were not available in 1986.

How do we interpret our laws in light of changing technology? How do we determine whether the authors and enactors of legislation would have intended the legislation to cover new technologies and unforeseen situations?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think there, as elsewhere, the job of a judge is to focus on the words written in the statute passed by Congress. Sometimes Congress will write a statute where the words are very precise, and it is quite clear it covers only something that might be in existence at the time. Sometimes Congress will write broader, more capacious words, as does the Constitution at times, that can apply to new technologies.

For example, the Fourth Amendment, of course, in the Constitution applies to things that were not known at the founding, including cars and communication devices that were not known at the founding. So, too, with statutes. It depends on how broadly or narrowly you have written it.

And your question raises a broader point, which is the issue of privacy and liberty on the one hand versus security, law enforcement on the other is an enormous issue going forward for the Congress, in the first instance, I believe, and also for the Federal courts, including the Supreme Court, going forward. The Carpenter case this past term is a good example of that, written by Chief Justice Roberts.

As I look ahead over the next 10 to 20 years, that balance of Fourth Amendment liberty and privacy versus security and law enforcement is an enormous issue.

Senator HATCH. Well, I appreciate your elucidation on that. On the domestic front, there has been debate for some time now in Congress about whether our laws should be updated to require a warrant for the content of electronic communications, regardless of how old those communications are.

As you may know, the Electronic Communications Privacy Act currently distinguishes between communications that are less than 180 days old and those that are more than 180 days old, requiring a warrant for the former, but not the latter. Can you speak generally to the importance of warrant requirements and why they are an important bulwark against the Government overreach?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The warrant requirement helps ensure, as a general matter, that the executive branch is not unilaterally able to invade someone's privacy, someone's liberty without judicial oversight. That ensures that there is probable cause or whatever the standard might be in a statutory situation to get someone's records or information or otherwise invade their liberty or privacy.

So that judicial oversight is part of the checks and balances of the Constitution, and Congress has written that also into several statutes, as you know, Senator.

Senator HATCH. Well, I want to return to the email Senator Feinstein was asking you about. You were asked for your comments on an op-ed that was going to be published by a group of pro-choice women in support of a circuit court nominee. You said, "I am not sure that all legal scholars refer to Roe as the settled law of the land at the Supreme Court level since Court can always overrule its precedent."

You then added, "The point there is in the inferior court point." Were you giving your opinion on Roe there, or were you talking about what law scholars might say?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I was talking about what legal scholars might say, and I thought the op-ed should be accurate about what, in describing legal scholars.

Senator HATCH. Okay. So we have got that cleared up.

You have been critical of the practice of judges sentencing defendants based on uncharged or acquitted conduct. With regard to acquitted conduct in particular, I agree that the notion that a judge can sentence a defendant to a long prison term for a crime that a jury acquitted the defendant of flies in the face of the right to a jury trial.

You have written that you believe, “It likely will take some combination of Congress and the Sentencing Commission to systematically change Federal sentencing to preclude use of an acquitted or uncharged conduct.”

Why do you take issue with the use of acquitted conduct at sentencing, and why do you believe this is an issue that will likely require intervention by Congress to resolve?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The opinions I have written on this, and I have written several, say, in essence, the following, Senator. When a criminal defendant, for example, let us say is charged with 10 counts, let us suppose, and is acquitted on 9 and convicted on 1, and then the criminal defendant is sentenced as if he or she had been convicted of all 10 because the judge just says, well, I think, you know you did X or that Y, and under my discretion—which you now have under the Supreme Court’s case law for sentencing—I am just going to sentence you the same anyway.

Defendants and the public, the families of the defendants understandably say that seems unfair. I thought the point of the jury trial was to determine whether I was guilty or not guilty on all those charges. And if I am getting sentenced exactly as if I were guilty on all the charges, that seems a violation of due process.

So I have written about the fairness and perceived fairness of the use of acquitted conduct at sentencing. Judge Millett on my court and I have both written about it several times and made clear our concern about the use of acquitted conduct and how it affects the sentencing system.

Why I have said Congress might need to look at it, although I have also pointed out individual district judges can look at it, is because under the current system, sentencing judges have wide discretion in picking sentences. So it is hard for an Appeals Court to say that you have infringed your discretion, given some of the case law of the Supreme Court which grants that discretion.

But I do not like the practice, and I have made the clear in my opinions. So I am just repeating my opinions here because of the unfairness and perceived unfairness of it.

Senator HATCH. Okay. This Committee has been chasing an elusive deal on criminal justice reform for quite some time now. One particular focus of mine in this area has been mens rea reform. Without adequate mens rea protections, that is, without the requirement that a person knows his conduct was wrong or unlawful, everyday citizens can be held criminally liable for a conduct that no reasonable person would know was wrong.

Critics of my legislative efforts to bring clarity to mens rea requirements claim the effort is a ploy to get corporations and white-collar defendants off the hook. But stronger mens rea requirements protect the liberty of all defendants in the criminal justice system, the vast majority of whom are not corporations or white-collar defendants.

You have written about the importance of mens rea requirements, including in cases involving unsympathetic defendants like an armed robber or a convicted murderer. Why, in your view, are mens rea requirements so important?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Mens rea requirements are important because, Senator, under the Due Process Clause and the precedents of the Supreme Court, it is not right to convict someone based on a fact they did not know. It is just an elemental point of due process.

Justice Jackson described this principle in his famous Morissette decision that he wrote. It is elementary as the—he said, as the school child’s “I did not mean to. I did not know.” And if someone truly did not know a fact that they—that is relevant to their conviction, to nonetheless convict them is contrary to due process.

I have seen cases where a mandatory minimum sentence was elevated from 10 years to 30 years, a 30-year mandatory minimum based on a fact that the defendant did not know. I dissented in that case, in an en banc case joined by Judge Tatel, who was an appointee of President Clinton to our court, saying that—and I wrote a very lengthy dissent about the history of mens rea and just how much of a violation of due process I thought had occurred in that case. That was not a sympathetic defendant, given what he had been convicted of, but I thought it was a complete violation of due process and principles of mens rea that were longstanding from Morissette to give him a 30-year mandatory minimum for a fact he did not know.

I have also wrote—or joined an opinion and wrote a separate opinion reversing a murder conviction of someone where the jury instructions were unclear about the mental state of the murderer. It was a question of manslaughter versus second-degree murder. That would have had a huge difference in the defendant’s sentence, and I wrote an opinion saying this was not an especially sympathetic case, given the facts, but the jury instructions were flawed on the issue of the mental state. And my exact line was, “I am unwilling to sweep that under the rug.” And that is how I felt about that case. There was a dissent in that case, but I was in the majority reversing the murder conviction in that case.

No matter who you are, in my court, if you have the right argument on the law, I am going to rule in your favor. And mens rea is foundational to due process. I have written that repeatedly, and I share your concern about mens rea reform, Senator Hatch.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you.

I have one last question. Some people seem to think that religious people should not work in Government because they swear allegiance to their church, not their country necessarily. I have faithfully served this country for over 40 years, and I am a—I believe I am a religious person.

Now religion is also a big part of your life. You went to Catholic school. Your children go to Catholic school. And you regularly attend church and serve at a church-supported soup kitchen. I know that religious faith is a personal subject, but I would like to hear from you how you—how your private beliefs affect your public decisions. Can you be devout in your faith and still uphold the law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, my religious beliefs have no relevance to my judging. I judge based on the Constitution and laws of the United States. I take an oath to do that. For 12 years, I have lived up to that oath.

At the same time, of course, as you point out, I am religious, and I am a Catholic. And I grew up attending Catholic schools. And the Constitution of the United States foresaw that religious people or people who are not religious are all equally American.

As I have said in one of my opinions, the Newdow opinion, no matter what religion you are or no religion at all, we are all equally American, and the Constitution of the United States also says in Article VI, no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

That was an important provision to have in the founding Constitution to ensure that there was not discrimination against people who had a religion or who people who did not have a religion. It is a foundation of our country. We are all equally American.

Senator HATCH. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Leahy.

Senator LEAHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And as I mentioned to you earlier, I have a number of letters that I ask consent to be placed in the record, as well as emails that were declassified, I think some at 3 this morning, that they be placed in the record.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator LEAHY. Thank you.

And I know there was a claim this morning, the Committee was following my precedent, Judge Kavanaugh. Not so. For Justice Kagan, we had 99 percent of her documents for her time at the White House, and, of course, we do not have—we have less than 10 percent of yours. And there were 860 documents designated as “committee confidential” by the nonpartisan National Archives that was discussed with both the Democrats and Republicans on the Committee. Nobody objected to that.

But let us go to follow up on our questions yesterday. Now we discussed the fact that while you worked on nominations in the Bush White House, you received stolen material from a Republican Senate staffer named Manny Miranda. I thought it was a digital Watergate. He stole 4,670 computer files from six Democratic Senators.

And he was doing this in an effort to confirm some of President George W. Bush’s most controversial judicial nominees. They were some of the most contentious fights of the day, and this Republican stole 4,670 computer files.

Now in 2004 and 2006, you testified, and a number of Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, asked you, and you said you had never received any stolen materials. That does not appear to be accurate.

You also testified that you knew nothing about the scandal until it was public, and if you had suspected anything untoward, you would have reported it. You also testified to Senator Hatch that you never received any document that even appeared to you to have been drafted or prepared by Democratic staff.

Now I also asked you yesterday whether Mr. Miranda asked to meet privately offsite to hand you documents related to Senators Biden and Feinstein. I also asked about him sending you “intel” with extraordinarily detailed specifics about what I was going to ask a highly controversial nominee just days later, something I never said publicly. I also asked about your receiving a draft, a nonpublic letter of mine, before any mention of it was made public.

You testified you did not recall anything specific, but you thought that sharing information between staffs was common. So let me ask you this. Has anyone told you what any Democratic Senators have been advised to do by our staff at this hearing?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think there has been a lot of—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. There has been a lot of discussion about what individual Senators might be interested in, and when I met—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator LEAHY. I really want to hear what you have to say, Judge, not what protestors have to say. Please, go ahead.

Have you ever been advised—have you been told what any Democratic Senator has been advised to do by our staff at this hearing?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. So when I met individually with the 65 Senators, including almost every Member of the Committee, a lot of the Senators, a lot of you in the meetings told me issues you were interested in. I think your staff was probably talking to—

Senator LEAHY. But has anybody said to you, for example, Senator Leahy’s staff is asking him to do this at the hearing tomorrow?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think you yourself told me what you were going to ask. So I—

Senator LEAHY. No, I tried to give you a good heads-up, and I appreciate the meeting. But has anybody else told you this is what Leahy’s staff is asking him to ask at the hearing tomorrow?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Again, I think this might be a different kind of process because you all were very transparent when I met with you. I am looking around and saying here is what I am focused on and here is what I am going to ask you at the hearing, and it has turned out you were telling—you were accurately telling me your concerns for that—

Senator LEAHY. And you are saying that is normal, but did anybody hand you anything marked “Highly confidential” about any one of these Senators?

Judge KAVANAUGH. For this? No. I am not remembering anything like that, but you all did talk about the issues. In other words, there are no surprises. Well, there are not no surprises. But you know, you gave me basic concerns and issues you wanted to raise.

Senator LEAHY. I want to make sure we are clear on this. Nobody handed you something marked, “Highly confidential,” but that is the material you received from Manny Miranda. For example, on July 18, 2002, days before an extremely controversial hearing for Fifth Circuit nominee Priscilla Owen, Mr. Miranda sent you an email with the subject line, “Highly confidential,” and informed you that Senator Biden’s staff was asking him not to attend the meeting that day.

On March 18, 2003, Mr. Miranda sent you several pages of talking points that were stolen verbatim, stolen verbatim from Democratic files. The talking points revealed arguments Democrats were making on another controversial nominee, Miguel Estrada. The subject line of the email stated it was not for distribution, meaning Mr. Miranda was asking you not to share the information.

This has now been, as of 3 this morning, made public. So yesterday, when I asked you about these specific events, you said you did not have any recollection. So I am not going to ask if you remember receiving this email, I am going to ask you this.

Why would you ever be asked to keep secret Democratic talking points if they were legitimately obtained?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am looking at these, Senator, and it says, for example, it looks like—it looks like that Biden’s staff is asking him not to attend the hearing. I do not know why that—

Senator LEAHY. But look how you received it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I know. Highly—I do not know why that is even confidential because it—

Senator LEAHY. Whether it is or not, would you consider that somewhat unusual to be receiving from a Republican staff member something marked, “Highly confidential,” telling him what he has found out that a Democrat is going to do?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as I explained yesterday, Senator, my understanding of this process is that the staffs do talk with one another, that they are not camps with no communication, and that was my experience when I worked in the White House. And so this, it looks like Biden’s staff is asking him not to attend the hearing would have been pretty standard kind of information that would be—

Senator LEAHY. Well, not really. You read this. I would be amazed if somebody handed me a memo saying this is a confidential memo that Senator Grassley’s staff has prepared for him. I know I would not read it. I would be on the phone immediately to Senator Grassley to say I am bringing something over that just arrived to me for you to take a look at it.

But you received on July 28, 2002, an email from Manny Miranda that said my staff distributed a confidential letter to Democratic counsels, not to Republicans. Now Mr. Miranda said I received that letter in the strictest confidence. You were asked explicitly by Mr. Miranda to take no action on the email without his, his further instructions. You never asked him how he obtained the letter sent in strict confidence to me.

And then July 30, 2002, you received an email from Miranda saying that he had 100 percent info that I was convening a meeting about a controversial nominee, and then further, on August 13, 2002, email he obviously had taken from my internal emails what I was going to do.

Did any of this raise a red flag in your mind?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It did not, Senator, because it all seemed consistent with the usual kinds of discussions that happen. And sometimes, people do say things of here is what my boss is thinking, but do not share it around. I mean, I must have had, you know, so many conversations in the course of my life like that where someone is saying like that about something, in other words, trying to give you a heads up on something. And that just seems standard Senate staff—so nothing—the direct answer to your question is, for example, it looks like Biden’s staff is asking him not to attend the hearing. That would not have raised anything at all for me other than someone was——

Senator LEAHY. Not even where he came from? On June 5, 2003, you received an email from a Republican Senate staffer with subject line “spying.” That is not overly subtle. This staffer appears in over 1,000 documents we received together with both you and Mr. Miranda. She says, she “has a mole for us,” and so forth. None of this raised a red flag with you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It did not, Senator. Again, people have friends across the aisle who they talk to. At least this was my experience back then. Maybe it has changed. And there was a lot of bipartisanship on the Committee. There was a lot of bipartisanship among the staffs. There were a lot of friendships and relationships where people would talk to, oh, I have got a friend on Senator Kennedy’s—Ted Kennedy’s staff or I have a friend on Senator Hatch’s staff or I have a friend on Senator Spector’s staff. That kind of conversation and information-sharing was common, so it did not raise the——

Senator LEAHY. Well——

Judge KAVANAUGH. Flags.

Senator LEAHY [continuing]. Judge, I was born at night but not last night, and if I had something that somebody said we have stolen this or do not tell anybody we have this, I think that would raise some red flags. Now, we only have a fraction of your record, and I do thank the Chairman for opening these up at 3 this morning. But as you know, the President asserted executive privilege, the first time we have had to face this up here on a nominee from either Republicans or Democrats, of 102,000 pages of material, 102,000 from just your time in the White House. That includes all judicial nominations.

Can you confirm for me today that that 102,000 pages, there are no emails from Mr. Miranda marked, “Highly confidential,” or “Do not share,” or “Take no action on this,” describing what he has found out the Democrats are thinking?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not involved in the documents process, so I do not know what is in them.

Senator LEAHY. Well, that is convenient. But we do not know what is in them either because we have never had so much withheld before. We do not know what is in all the documents. They are still being gone through by the archives because this is being rushed through, and we do not get a chance to see them. That is not fair to us, and, frankly, Judge, it is not fair to you. You have probably been told you have the votes to be confirmed so you do not have to care, but I care. I care about the integrity of the Supreme Court. I care about who is on there. I think you should care what is in that, just as we should care what is in it.

There are even more documents than I had time to discuss today. I find it impossible to reconcile what you are regularly being told, your testimony that you received nothing stolen and no reason to suspect anything was stolen when, frankly, as we now know, Republican staffer Manny Miranda stole things. And some of the things he stole went directly to you.

Let me ask you another one. You testified in 2004 that, aside from participating in a mock court argument, you did not work on the nomination of Judge William Pryor. Now, he was a controversial nominee, called Roe v. Wade, the “worst abomination” in the history of constitutional law. He argued that constitutional right to same-sex intimacy would logically extend to activities like necrophilia, bestiality, pedophilia. You said you did not work on his nomination personally, but you did participate in the Pryor working group, did you not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. We all were met—just so you know the process, there was something called the White House—I think, Judicial Selection Committee, and Judge Gonzales, the Counsel to the President, chaired that committee. And that started immediately after President Bush came into office in 2001. And so we would meet with memos, and individual members of the staff would be assigned to different regions—

Senator LEAHY. Did you interview William Pryor?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not believe so. It is possible, but I do not believe so. But if I did, it would have been part of the general process where people came in.

Senator LEAHY. I put in the record Exhibit C, which said you did interview him. Did you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is possible. We interviewed hundreds of nominees—

Senator LEAHY. I understand.

Judge KAVANAUGH. As I said, Senator, and we met every week for several years to go over nominees. And we worked closely with the home-State Senators. And I had various States for district court. I had Illinois. I had California I worked on with Senator Feinstein and Senator Boxer’s staff; Maryland, Senator Sarbanes and Senator Mikulski. But then we would sit in sometimes on interviews of other people who came in, and then we would meet and go over the memos. Then, we would meet with the President. We met every week with the President before September 11. After September 11, those meetings became less frequent because—

Senator LEAHY. You had recommended him internally for the Eleventh Circuit seat, had you not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I have no reason that I would not have recommended him because he was a highly qualified Attorney General of Alabama, and Senator Sessions, of course, knew him well and he was well-respected and—

Senator LEAHY. The only reason I ask was that one of the emails that we have up here says, “Brett, at your request”—at your request—“I asked Matt to speak with Pryor about his interest.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well—

Senator LEAHY. I am not asking these questions to get you in a bind, Judge. I am asking them because it is so easy on these hearings to say I do not remember, and oftentimes, that is the case, but you mentioned Mr. Gonzales. He had difficult remembering when he came here. He had one hearing where—so that he would not have that problem, I gave him I think 35, 45 of the questions ahead of time. On every one of them, he said I do not remember, I do not recall, and then every question asked—almost every question asked by both Republicans and Democrats he said I do not remember, I do not remember. Shortly after that, he went to private practice.

I think it is so difficult that you do not remember the things done by somebody who I think on both sides of the aisle we would agree is one of the most egregious breaches of Committee confidentiality when Manny Miranda stole material from here, stole it to send it to you and others at the White House. And you have no recollection of that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I obviously recall the emails—or have seen the emails, but your question, your larger question was did that raise a red flag, and I have answered that, “no.”

Senator LEAHY. Well, when you were in the White House, was part of your job to coach President Bush’s judicial nominees how to answer Democrats’ questions about Roe v. Wade?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Part of our job would have been to prepare nominees more generally, and it was common for Senators to ask that question then, as it is now, and so I assume that we would have been involved in going through mock sessions. I know we were involved in going through mock sessions, which is very standard for Democratic—

Senator LEAHY. Well, you have been going through some mock sessions with at least one Republican Senator from this Committee, and other Republican Senators, and I am not saying that as a “gotcha” thing. You have every right to do that. You did advise her exactly how she should respond to that, according to one of the emails.

And my last question: Do you agree that a plastic firearm created with a 3-D printer so that—it would not have been in the minds of our Founding Fathers in the 18th century, would you agree that that could be regulated or banned without raising any Second Amendment questions?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think there might be litigation coming on that, Senator, so consistent with judicial independence principles, I should not comment on a potential case like that so—thank you.

Senator LEAHY. I had actually written out here your answer ahead of time, and I just wrote it so that you did not see what I wrote.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Graham.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to introduce into the record an op-ed from the L.A. Times editorial board entitled “Can the Supreme Court Confirmation Process Ever Be Repaired?”; a bipartisan letter from 23 of Judge Kavanaugh’s classmates at Yale; a letter signed by hundreds of Yale students, alumni, and faculty; a letter from Georgia’s Secretary of State Brian Kemp; an op-ed in The Clarion-Ledger by Mississippi Governor Phil Bryant. So I would ask that that be allowed. Just say—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection——

Senator GRAHAM [continuing]. Without objection.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. So ordered.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator GRAHAM. That is good. Okay. All right. Thank you, Judge. There are several things I want to go over with you. One, I want to compliment Senator Leahy in this regard, that he worked with Senator Grassley to get what had been previously committee confidential released to the public, and sort of, that is the way it works around here. You do not always get what you want, but you try to work with your colleagues, and many times, you can succeed.

From the public's point of view, it has got to work this way. You just cannot do everything you want in a legislative body. There are rules, and it is frustrating to be told no on something you are passionate about. But I am often asked—people wonder, are these hearings turning into a circus? And I want to defend circuses.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. Circuses are entertaining and you can take your children to them.

[Laughter.]

Senator GRAHAM. This hearing is neither entertaining, nor appropriate for young people.

Now, some of my colleagues, who I respect greatly, are trying to make a point. I do not know what that point is. But I do know this, if you want to be President, which I can understand that, it is hard. And what you do will be the example others will follow.

Back to the subject matter, the Morrison case, was that about separation of powers?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was a separation of powers case.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. It was about a congressional statute and the authority of the executive branch and how they interacted, is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, and a very specific statutory scheme that was unprecedented, had the judiciary involved in appointing the counsel.

Senator GRAHAM. And apparently, Kagan and Scalia agreed——

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. Kagan agreed with Scalia's dissent.

Judge KAVANAUGH. She has called it one of the greatest ever written, and she has added it gets better every year.

Senator GRAHAM. Well, I do not want to get in the habit of saying listen to Elena Kagan, but I will here because she is a fine person.

The situation we have before us about Mr. Mueller, that is not a separation of powers issue, is it? Are these not different facts, that Mr. Mueller was appointed through Department of Justice regulations.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I do not want to talk specifically about current events, but I will just refer back to what I have written previously about Special Counsel——

Senator GRAHAM. I am not asking you——

Judge KAVANAUGH. Generally are——

Senator GRAHAM [continuing]. How to decide a case. I am just asking you, do you read the paper, do you watch television? The special counsel statute in question does not exist anymore, does it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The independent counsel statute—

Senator GRAHAM. Yes, independent counsel statute—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Does not exist anymore—

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Since 1999.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The traditional special counsel system I have written about is the ordinary way that outside investigations—

Senator GRAHAM. But is that an executive branch function?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is ordinarily appointed by the Attorney General and is—

Senator GRAHAM. Who is a member of what?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The executive branch.

Senator GRAHAM. So last time I checked, that is not a separation of powers issue.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That, traditionally, as I have written, has been an executive branch—

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Now, the question is if someone is appointed as special counsel by Department of Justice regulations, who has authority over implementing those regulations and overseeing those regulations, all I can say is that that is different legally and factually than the Morrison situation where you had a statute.

Let us talk a little bit about the law regarding the President. Clinton v. Jones tells us—see if I am correct—that you can be President of the United States, you can still be sued for conduct before you were a President, and when you invoke executive privilege, the Court has said no, wait a minute, you have to show up at a deposition because it happened before you were President. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, in a civil suit was the Clinton v. Jones case—

Senator GRAHAM. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Involving allegations that—or a suit that involved activity before President Clinton became President.

Senator GRAHAM. So it is pretty well understood through Supreme Court precedent that if you are the President of the United States and you engaged in conduct that allowed you to be sued before you got to be President, you cannot avoid your day in court on the civil side.

The Nixon holding said what?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Nixon holding said that in the context of the specific regulations there, that a criminal trial subpoena to the President for information—in that case the tapes—could be enforced, notwithstanding the executive privilege that was recognized in that case as rooted in Article II of the Constitution.

Senator GRAHAM. So that is the law of the land as of this moment?

Judge KAVANAUGH. United States v. Nixon is the law of the land.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Now, whether or not a President can be indicted while in office has been a discussion that has gone on for a very long time. Is that true in the legal world?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct. The Department of Justice for the last 45 years has taken the consistent position through Republican and Democratic administrations that a sitting President may not be indicted while in office. The most thorough opinion on that is written by Randy Moss, who was head of President Clinton's Office of Legal Counsel in 2000. He is now a district judge, appointed by President Obama on the district court in DC.

Senator GRAHAM. And I think you have written on this topic as well, have you not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have not written on the constitutionality.

Senator GRAHAM. You are talking about whether or not it would be wise to do this.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have made my thoughts known for Congress to examine—

Senator GRAHAM. Right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Because in the wake of September 11, I thought one of the things Congress could look at is how to make—

Senator GRAHAM. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Presidency more effective.

Senator GRAHAM. I just want my Democratic colleagues—to remind you that when President Clinton was being investigated, you took the position that he is not above the law, but in terms of indicting a sitting President, it would be better for the country to wait. And the person who echoed that the most or at least effectively I thought, from his point of view, was Joe Biden. So there is nothing new here, folks. When it is a Democratic President, they adopt the positions that they are arguing against now, but that is nothing new in politics. I am sure we do the same thing.

So this man, Judge Kavanaugh, is not doing anything wrong by talking about this issue the way he talks about it. What we are doing wrong is blending concepts to justify a vote that is going to be inevitable. You do not have to play these games to vote “no.” Just say you do not agree with his philosophy. You do not think he is qualified. But the thing that I hate the most is to take concepts and turn them around upside down to make people believe there is something wrong with you. There is nothing wrong with you. The fault lies on our side. Most Americans after this hearing will have a dimmer view of the Senate. Rightly so.

I do not want anybody to believe that you stole anything. Did you steal anything from anybody while you were working at the White House Counsel's.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator GRAHAM. Did you know that anybody stole anything, or did you encourage them to steal anything?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator GRAHAM. Did you use anything knowingly that was stolen?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator GRAHAM. So you can talk about Mr. Miranda, and he deserves all the scorn you can heap on him, but I do not want the public to believe that you did anything wrong because I do not believe you did. So it is okay to vote “no,” but it is not okay to take legal concepts and flip them upside down and act like we are doing something wrong on the Republican side when you had the exact same position when it was your turn.

Roe v. Wade, you have heard of that case, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Now, there are a lot of people like it, lot of people do not. It is an emotional debate in the country. Is there anything in the Constitution about a right to abortion? Is anything written in the document?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the Supreme Court has recognized the right to abortion since the 1973 Roe v. Wade case. It has reaffirmed it many times.

Senator GRAHAM. But my question is did they find a phrase in the Constitution that said, that the State cannot interfere with a woman’s right to choose until medical viability occurs? Is that in the Constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court applying the Liberty—

Senator GRAHAM. It is a pretty simple, “No, it is not, Senator Graham.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I want to just be—

Senator GRAHAM. Those words.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I want to be very careful because this is—

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. A topic on which—

Senator GRAHAM. No, if you will just follow me, I will let you talk but the point is, will you tell me, “yes” or “no,” is there anything in the document itself talking about limiting the State’s ability to protect the unborn before viability? Is there any phrase in the Constitution about abortion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has found that under the Liberty Clause—but you are right that specific words—

Senator GRAHAM. Well, is there anything in the Liberty Clause talking about abortion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Liberty Clause refers to liberty but—

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Well, the last time I checked—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Does not have specific—

Senator GRAHAM [continuing]. Liberty—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM [continuing]. Did not equate to abortion. The Supreme Court said it did. But here is the point: What are the limits on this concept? You have five, six, seven, eight, or nine judges. What are the limits on the ability of the Court to find a penumbra of rights that apply to a particular situation? What are the checks and balances of people in your business, if you can find five people who agree with you, to confer a right, whether the public likes it or not, based on this concept of a penumbra of rights? What are the outer limits to this?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court, in the Glucksberg case, which is in the late 1990s—and Justice Kagan talked about this at her hearing—is the test that the Supreme Court uses to find unenumerated rights under the Liberty Clause of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that refers to rights rooted in the history and tradition of the country so as to prevent—

Senator GRAHAM. So let me ask you this. Is there any right rooted in the history and traditions of the country where legislative bodies could not intercede on behalf of the unborn before medical viability? Is that part of our history?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court precedent has recognized the right to abortion. I am—

Senator GRAHAM. But I am just saying what part of the history of—I do not think our Founding Fathers—people mentioned our Founding Fathers. I do not remember that being part of American history, so how did the Court determine that it was?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Court applied the precedent that existed and found in 1973 that under the Liberty Clause—

Senator GRAHAM. Yes, but before 1973—I mean, when you talk about the history of the United States, the Court has found that part of our history is for the legislative bodies not to have a say about protecting the unborn until medical viability. I do not—I have not—whether you agree with that or not, I do not think that is part of our history. So, fill in the blank. What are the limits of people in your business applying that concept to almost anything that you think to be liberty?

Judge KAVANAUGH. And that is the concern that some have expressed about the concept of unenumerated rights.

Senator GRAHAM. Well, here is the concern I have. You got one word that has opened up the ability for five people to tell everybody elected in the country you cannot go there, that this is an “off limits” in the democratic process. Whether you agree with Roe v. Wade or not, just think what could happen, down the road, if five people determine the word liberty means “X.” The only real check and balance is a constitutional amendment to change the ruling. Do you agree with that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not going to comment on potential constitutional amendments or what—

Senator GRAHAM. But—okay. If we pass a statute tomorrow in Congress saying that the Congress can regulate abortions before medical viability, would that not fly in the face of Roe v. Wade?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So the Supreme Court has said that a woman has a constitutional right to—

Senator GRAHAM. Does that not trump a statute?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court precedent—

Senator GRAHAM. So all of us could vote because five people have said liberty means right to—the State has no interest here, compelling interest before medical viability, that we could pass all the laws we want, it does not matter because they fall. The only way we can change that is a constitutional amendment process that requires two-thirds of the House, two-thirds of the Senate, and three-fourths of the State. Is that a pretty correct legal analysis?

Judge KAVANAUGH. When the Supreme Court has issued a constitutional ruling—

Senator GRAHAM. Then you can always change it by constitutional amendment?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is the—Senator GRAHAM. So here is the point: Whether you agree with Roe v. Wade or not, the reason some legal scholars object to this concept is it is breathtakingly unlimited. Whatever five people believe at any given time in history in terms of the word liberty, they can rewrite our history and come up with a new history. And I think the best way for democracies to make history, is to have the Court interpret the Constitution, be a check and balance on us, but not take one word and create a concept that is breathtaking in terms of its application to restrict the legislative process.

Now, whether you agree with me or not, I think there is a genuine debate. And you would agree with me if it was something you liked or you were supporting that got shut out, or you opposed you could not do. So I hope that one day the Court will sit down and think long and hard about the path they have charted, and not just about abortion, whether or not it is right for people in your business on any given day based on any given case of controversy to say that the word liberty, looking at the history of the country and the penumbra of rights, means "X," and it shuts out all of us who have gone to the ballot box and gone through the test of being elected. All I ask is that you think about it.

Also, I want to ask you about something else to think about. You said you were in the White House on 9/11. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Did you believe America was under attack?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. It was under attack.

Senator GRAHAM. Right. Do you believe that if the terrorists could strike any city in the world and they had—like you get one shot at the world, based on your time in the White House, do you believe they would pick an American city probably over any other city?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it certainly seemed that New York and Washington, DC, were the two targets.

Senator GRAHAM. The only reason I mention that, to my good friends—and they are—who believe that America is not part of the battlefield, it sure was on 9/11. The law. If an American citizen goes to Afghanistan and takes up the fight against our forces and they are captured in Afghanistan, the current law is you can be held as an enemy combatant in spite of your citizenship. Is that correct? Is that the Hamdi decision?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what the Supreme Court said in the Hamdi decision with—

Senator GRAHAM. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Appropriate due process findings.

Senator GRAHAM. Absolutely, appropriate due process findings. Here is what I want people in your business to think about. Are you aware of the fact that the radical Islamic groups are trying to recruit Americans to their cause, that they are over the internet trying to get Americans to take up jihad?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. The likelihood of an American citizen joining their cause is real because it has happened in the past. The likelihood of it happening in the future I think is highly likely. If an American citizen attacking the embassy in Kabul can be held as an American citizen, here is the question: Can an American citizen, collaborating with other terrorists who are not American citizens, be held as an enemy combatant for attacking the capital? And if they cannot, you are incentivizing the enemy to find an American citizen because they have a privilege that no other terrorist would have.

So you said something that was very compelling to me, that you apply the law and you have to understand how it affects people, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. I hope you will understand that this war is not over, that the war is coming back to our shores. It is just a matter of time before they hit us again because we have to be right all the time and they have to be right one time. I hope we do not create a process where if you can come to America, you get a special deal. It makes us harder for us to deal with you and find out what you know. We treat you as a common criminal versus the warrior you have become. That is just my parting thought to you. And you will decide the way you think is best for the country.

Is there anything you want to say about this process that would help us make it better? Because you are going to get confirmed. I worry about the people coming after you. Every time we have one of these hearings, it gets worse and worse and worse. You have sat there patiently for a couple of days. My colleagues have asked you tough questions, sometimes unfair questions. Your time is about over. You are going to make it. And you would probably be smart not to answer at all, but I am going to give you a chance to tell us what could we do better, if anything?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am just going to thank all the Senators on the Committee and all the Senators I met with who are not on the Committee for their time and their care. And, as I said, each Senator is committed to the public service and the public good in my opinion, and I appreciate all the time of the Senators. And I am on the sunrise side of the mountain and an optimist about the future, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before we break, I want to bring up some information because I was wondering how long it would take the National Archives to get the material that we needed because you have heard several times that the Archives, that is their responsibility. The National Archives has 13 archivists who handle George W. Bush's Presidential records. They can only review about 1,000 pages per week. We could not have gotten these documents for 37 weeks if we did not get President Bush's team to expedite the review process for the benefit of all Members of the Committee. We received all the documents we would have received from the archivists, just at a faster time.

We will now take 15 minutes and resume at 12:22.

[Whereupon the Committee was recessed and reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Tell me when you are ready, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am ready.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Durbin.

Senator DURBIN. Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Let me say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, thank you for the way you have presided over this Committee. It has been a challenge for the last several days, but you and I have been through battles in the past, both as allies and as enemies, and you have always shown fairness, and I appreciate the fairness you have shown during the course of this hearing.

I also want to say a word about the protesters who have interrupted the hearing from time to time. As I said at the outset, this is one of the costs of democracy, and it is one which the Senate Judiciary Committee, which has been constructed for the purpose of guarding our Constitution, should value even when it is inconvenient. I could go into a long riff here but I will not, in the interests of time. I do not know who organized these protests or why they did it, but thank goodness in the United States of America, where we venerate free speech, these things can happen.

I want to thank the men and women of the Capitol Police and those who have been in charge of our security during this period of time, as well.

I would like to also ask for two things to be entered into the record. First is, statements in opposition to the Kavanaugh nomination from several groups.

Senator CORNYN [presiding]. Without objection.

Senator DURBIN. Thank you very much.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator DURBIN. And second, Senator Grassley closed the earlier, last session with some comment. I will have to read it in its entirety to understand, but I think he said, or someone said it would take 37 weeks for the National Archives to go through Judge Kavanaugh's record.

I would like to enter into the record a letter from August 2nd, 2018, from Gary Stern, General Counsel to the National Archives, which concludes with the following statement: "By the end of October 2018, we would have completed the remaining 600,000 pages that we should be considering and unfortunately cannot."

So I would ask consent to enter that letter into the official record.

Senator CORNYN. Without objection.

Senator DURBIN. Thank you very much.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator DURBIN. Judge Kavanaugh, I remember when I got the results from my bar exam I thought to myself, well, that will be the last time I will ever have to sit down and take an exam. So at the end of this day, this may be your last formal exam in terms of your legal career, and I am sure there is a sense of expectation, hopefulness, and relief in that.

I want to thank your wife for being here and for bringing those beautiful daughters. I hope someday they will understand what happened to their father in a few days here, but thank you so much for being part of this hearing.

Judge, when I started this, I said this is not just about filling a key vacancy on the Supreme Court, a deciding vote on the Court, a vote which may decide life and death issues on important cases. It is more than the question of release of documents. It really goes to the heart of where we are in America at this moment. You have been nominated to be a Justice on the United States Supreme Court by President Donald Trump. We have to take your nomination in the context of this moment in history.

We are at a moment where the President has shown contempt for the Federal judiciary unlike any President we can recall. He has shown disrespect for the rule of law over and over again. He has repeatedly ridiculed the Attorney General of the United States, whom he chose. He has called for blatant partisanship in the prosecution of our laws. He is a President who is the subject of an active criminal investigation, an investigation which he has apparently sought to obstruct repeatedly. He is a President who has been characterized in this hearing publicly, on the record, as an unindicted co-conspirator. And in the last 2 days, during the course of this hearing, there have been two incredible events, the release of a book and an article in The New York Times which remind us again what a serious moment we face in the history of the United States.

And that is why your nomination is different than any other. I cannot recall any that have ever been brought before us in this context. I cannot recall so many people across the United States following this as carefully—perhaps Clarence Thomas. At that time, everybody in America was tuned in.

But it is in the context of the Trump Presidency that we ask you these questions, in anticipation that you may face issues involving this President which no other Supreme Court has been asked to face.

And that is why I want to address your view of the power of this President, the authority of this President, because it is an important contemporary question which, of course, has application for beyond his Presidency.

You have quoted me several times—thank you—yesterday regarding the independent counsel statute. As our Republican colleagues are fond of reminding us, judges are not legislators. So, to state the obvious, my opposition or any legislator's opposition to re-authorizing a statute is very different from a judge's opinion on whether a statute is unconstitutional.

To get to the heart of the matter, the reason why we continue to return to the Morrison v. Olson decision is because of its significance in light of the Trump Presidency. The reason we are so interested in your view that that case was wrongly decided has little to do with the statute that was in question. It has everything to do with your views on the power of the Executive and what that would mean for this President and future Presidents if you join the Supreme Court.

Justice Scalia's Morrison v. Olson sole dissent embraces the so-called unitary executive theory which grants sweeping powers to the President of the United States. Scalia said, and I quote, "We should say here that the President's constitutionally assigned duties include complete control over investigation and prosecution of violation of law, and that the inexorable command of Article II is clear and definite. The executive power must be vested in the President of the United States."

In this age of President Donald Trump, this expansive view of Presidential power takes on added significance. Earlier this year the Senate Judiciary Committee reported a bipartisan bill to protect the independence of the special counsel, Bob Mueller. Several Republican Senators who are here today cited Scalia's dissent to justify their opposition to a bill protecting the special counsel, with one even saying, and I quote, “Many of us think we are bound by Scalia’s dissent.” At the time, I joked and said, instead of dealing with stare decisis, we are dealing with Scalia decisis.

Given your views on Morrison v. Olson, we are obviously worried that you will feel bound by this dissent by Antonin Scalia if President Trump decides to attempt to fire the special counsel, Bob Mueller.

It does not stop there. You cited Scalia’s dissent in the case involving the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, where you gutted that agency; and in the 2011 Seven-Sky case, you dissented from a decision upholding the Affordable Care Act and made a breathtaking claim of Presidential power which has been repeated over and over again, and you said, “Under the Constitution, the President may decline to enforce a statute that regulates private individuals when the President deems the statute unconstitutional, even if a court has held or would hold the statute constitutional.” Your words.

Of course, the unitary executive theory was the basis for President Bush’s December 30th, 2005, signing statement claiming the authority to override the McCain Torture Amendment. Yesterday, I asked you what comments you made on the signing statement as President Bush’s staff secretary. Senator Feinstein asked a similar question this morning. What you told me was, “I can’t recall what I said. I do recall there was a good deal of internal debate about that signing statement, as you can imagine. I do remember it would be controversial internally.” It is hard to imagine you cannot remember that controversial issue.

Given our concerns about your views on Executive power, it is important for you at this moment, please, to clarify for us the power of the Presidency in this age of Donald Trump.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, thank you. First, thank you for your comments about my wife and daughters. My daughters will return this afternoon for a return engagement so they will experience democracy once again in action, and I appreciate that.

On Morrison v. Olson, a couple of things at the outset. First, that case did not involve the special counsel system. I have written repeatedly that the traditional special counsel system, which we have now and have had historically, is a distinct system appointed by the Attorney General. Morrison has nothing to do with that. That dealt with the old independent counsel statute, as you said, which expired in 1999 under overwhelming consensus that that statute was inappropriate, unrestrained, unaccountable, as you said.

Second, Morrison, Justice Scalia’s dissent, that does not affect the precedent of Humphrey’s Executor. Humphrey’s Executor is the Supreme Court precedent that allows independent agencies to exist. Those independent regulatory agencies continue to exist, of course. So both on the independent agency side, those are unaffected; on the special counsel side, that is unaffected.

You mentioned the CFPB case. My decision in that case would have allowed that agency to continue operating and performing its important functions for American consumers. The only correction would have been in the structure, because it was a novel structure that was unlike every other independent agency that had been created previously.

As to the concept of prosecutorial discretion that is referred to in the 2011 case, that is a traditional concept of prosecutorial discretion that is recognized in the executive branch. The limits of it are uncertain. That has arisen in the immigration context with President Obama. There are debates about what the limits are. Those are not finally determined. But the basic concept of prosecutorial discretion is all I was referring to there.

I have made clear in my writings that a court order that requires a President to do something, or prohibits a President from doing something under the Constitution or laws of the United States is the final word in our system, our separation of powers system. That is Cooper v. Aaron. That is Marbury v. Madison. That is United States v. Richard Nixon. That is an important principle.

And finally, I would say that the question of who controls the Executive power within the executive branch, the vertical question—you have the President at the top, you have independent agencies which exist consistent with precedent—is distinct from the question of what is the scope of the Executive power vis-a-vis Congress.

On that latter question, the scope of Executive power vis-a-vis Congress, I have made clear in the context of national security, the Youngstown framework; in the context of administrative law, my cases questioning unilateral executive rewriting of the law; in the criminal law where I have reversed convictions; that I am one not afraid at all, through my record of 12 years, to invalidate Executive power when it violates the law.

Senator DURBIN. Judge, let me ask you this, because you have referred to the Youngstown case in the context of a war and a decision by a President that was immensely unpopular.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator DURBIN. Or it might have been popular, I should say, and the decision of the Supreme Court, which could have been very unpopular at that moment in history.

What I am trying to ask you is, in historic context, do you understand where we are as a Nation now, when books are being written about how democracy dies, when fear of authoritarian rule and the expansion of the executive branch is rampant in this country, with illustrations that are found around the world, why we are asking you over and over again to give us some reassurance about your commitment to the democratic institutions of this country in the face of a President who seems prepared to cast them aside, whether it is voter suppression, the role of the media? Case after case, we hear this President willing to walk away from the rule of law in this country. That is the historic context which this is in, not a particular case but a particular moment in history.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Sir, my 12-year record shows, and my statements to the Committee show, and all my teaching and articles show—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Show my commitment to the independence of the judiciary as the crown jewel of our constitutional republic. My citing of Justice Kennedy, for whom I worked, who left us a legacy of liberty but also a legacy of adherence to the rule of law in the United States of America, no one is above the law in the United States. That is a foundational principle that I have talked about, coming from Federalist 69, coming from the structure of the Constitution. We are all equal before the law in the United States of America.

And I have made clear my deep faith in the judiciary. The judiciary has been the final guarantor of the rule of law. As I said in my opening, the Supreme Court is the last line of defense for the separation of powers and for the rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Senator DURBIN. You see, that is why the unitary theory of the executive is so worrisome. What you have said is what I want to hear from a co-equal and very important branch of our Government. But what you have said in relation to Morrison suggests the President has the last word.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have not said that, Senator, and I will reiterate something I said a minute ago, coming from Cooper v. Aaron, coming from Marbury. When a court order requires a President to do something or prohibits a President from doing something under the Constitution or laws of the United States, under our constitutional system, that is the final word.

Senator DURBIN. Let me ask you one last time a question you knew I would ask about your testimony in 2006. I am just struggling with the fact that when I ask you about this issue of detention, interrogation, and torture, you gave such a simple declarative answer to me and said that I was not involved and am not involved in the questions about the rules governing detention of combatants.

We have found at least three specific examples where you were, three: your discussions about the access to counsel for detainees; your involvement in the Hamdi and Padilla cases, and your involvement with President Bush's signing statement on the McCain Torture Amendment.

Judge Kavanaugh, you say that words matter. You claim to be a textualist when you interpret other people's words, but you do not want to be held accountable for the plain meaning of your own words. Why is it so difficult for you to acknowledge your response to the question and acknowledge that at least your answer was misleading, if not wrong?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, you had a concern at the time of the 2006 hearing, which was understandable, whether I had been involved in crafting the detention policies, the interrogation policies that were so controversial, that the legal memos had been written in the Department of Justice that were very controversial. As you know, and as the Committee knew then, two judicial nominees to the courts of appeals had been involved in working on some of the memos related to that program. Senator Feinstein led the Intelligence Committee investigation of that matter, produced a massive report, a large, unclassified report, and apparently an even larger classified report. The Justice Department Office of Professional Responsibility produced a long report about all the lawyers who were involved. I was not involved in crafting those policies.

Senator DURBIN. Do you deny being involved in the three specific areas involving detention and interrogation which I have just read to you? Do you say that you had nothing to do with the Hamdi and Padilla cases, that you were not involved in the conversation about access to counsel for detainees, that you were not involved in President Bush's decision on the signing statement on the McCain Torture Amendment? Are you saying that none of those things occurred?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, what I have made clear is I understood your question then, and I still understand it now, and I understood my answer then, and I still understand it now to be about those legal memos. I was not read into that program. I was not involved. My name does not appear in Senator Feinstein's report, which is—

Senator DURBIN. That is not the question I asked. Do you deny the three specific instances where you were involved in questions involving detention and interrogation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was the question that I saw that you asked at the time of that hearing, and my answer was then and is now, as Senator Feinstein's report shows, and as the Professional Responsibility report shows, I was not read into that program.

Senator DURBIN. That was not—I did not ask you about that program. I asked you about the three specific instances.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The current question—

Senator DURBIN. You keep answering, oh, I was not—Feinstein is my defense, she came to my rescue. She was talking about something else. I have asked you about three specific instances where we have written proof and sworn testimony from you now that you were involved in these three things, and all of them relate to detention and interrogation, which you gave me your assurance you were not involved in.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am going to distinguish two things. One is what you were asking me in 2006, and my testimony then was accurate and was the truth. What you are asking me now is, for example, on the signing statement, as we discussed in your office, I made clear that, of course, as staff secretary, everything that went to the President for a 3-year period, with a few covert exceptions, would have crossed my desk on the way from the counsel's office or the policy advisor or wherever it was going, and would have made its way to the President's desk, and that includes that signing statement. So—

Senator DURBIN. Well, let me just close. I do not think the staff secretary to the United States President is a file clerk. What you have explained to us over and over again, this was a formative moment in your public career. You were giving constitutional issue advice, as well as making substantive changes in drafts that were headed for the President's desk, and one of them involved John McCain's Torture Amendment. And that, to me, is involved directly on detention and interrogation. And I think, unfortunately, your answer does not reflect that.

Chairman GRASSLEY [presiding]. If you want to speak to that, then we will go to Senator Lee.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I just wanted to close, Mr. Chairman, by thanking Senator Durbin. And in response to his questions about the judiciary, the role of the judiciary, he gave me a book when we met, a biography of Frank Johnson. And that Friday night, after a lot of Senate meetings and a lot of practice sessions, I went home, read the whole thing, and I appreciate it. It is a good model of judicial independence. It is a great story about someone who was a judge in the south in the civil rights era who stood firm for the rule of law, and so a good model, and I thank Senator Durbin for giving me the book.

Senator DURBIN. Well, I thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator.

Senator DURBIN. If I could just say one word, thank you, Judge Kavanaugh. That night, obviously, the Nationals were not playing.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you again, Judge Kavanaugh, for your willingness to answer our questions.

I want to follow up a little bit on this last line of questioning from Senator Durbin. Senator Durbin and I actually, notwithstanding the fact that we come from different parts of the country, have different political ideologies, come from different political parties, we share many views in common, and this is one area, indefinite detention, where he and I are concerned about the Government not overreaching. Only, as I look at this, I think this cuts in your favor, not against you. Tell me if I am missing something.

In the first place, what you were asked about was whether or not you were involved in crafting the policies that would govern detention of enemy combatants. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. And that was a classified program, classified at a very high level, presumably compartmentalized such that you would have had to have been read into that program in order to participate in that process. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I believe that is correct. Read in, I was not necessarily using the formal sense of that, but what I meant is I was not part of that program.

Senator LEE. Okay, but that is a binary issue. You were either involved in the development of that policy or you were not.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. And you were not.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. And Tim Flannigan, who was I believe at the time the White House Counsel—

Judge KAVANAUGH. He was the Deputy Counsel.

Senator LEE [continuing]. The Deputy Counsel, has confirmed that you were not involved in that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. We have your word and the word of the then-Deputy White House Counsel.

Then there is a separate issue, I guess one could argue a related issue, but a separate—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator LEE. I assume that will not be counted against me there.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, it will. It will be counted.

Senator LEE. Oh, okay. Well, then I will have to speak more quickly.

When we talk about being read into, that is a colloquial term that we sometimes refer to. It is government-speak that talks about being cleared to discuss certain classified matters. In any event, you were not brought into the development of this policy.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. Second, there was a separate, arguably related but a distinct issue involving a meeting where you were asked for your opinion about how Justice Kennedy might react to certain legal arguments that people in the administration were pushing. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. And you answered that question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I said that indefinite detention of an American citizen without access to a lawyer, which at the time was what was happening in that particular case, would never fly with Justice Kennedy.

Senator LEE. And I happen to agree with you on that, and it seems like a fairly unremarkable proposition to me.

I do not think anyone disputes that that argument had problems with it, that that argument would not fly with Justice Kennedy, and I therefore have difficulty seeing how this cuts against you. As someone who believes in civil liberties and who shares many of the same concerns that have been discussed by many of my Democratic colleagues, I think the advice you offered here was accurate. I think it was good advice. It certainly is not inconsistent with the statement you provided, which was that you were not involved in the development of the policy governing the program.

Sometimes as lawyers we are called upon to offer litigation strategy. Sometimes we are called upon to handle litigation. Other times as lawyers, particularly in the Government, we might be called upon to develop a policy. Here, you were involved in neither handling the litigation directly nor in developing the policy. You went to a meeting, somebody asked that question, you gave them your answer.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, and it was about something entirely separate from that policy or the legal memos.

Senator LEE. Separate and distinct from that policy. It was about a litigating position that dealt sort of in the same universe but not with that policy.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. I therefore have great difficulty in seeing that you did anything but the right thing and that you answered this question in any way other than with the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Let me turn next, while we are talking about colleagues with whom I often agree and with whom I often work across the aisle, Senator Booker is a good friend of mine. He is a colleague. He and I work together on a lot of issues. He raised an issue last night that I wanted to touch on with you.

He raised an issue related to some emails. I was concerned at the time that you did not have the emails in front of you, and I think that is very important for any witness in any proceeding to be given access to the documents, documents that in this case were prepared some 18 years ago. You as a lawyer have no doubt been involved in the creation of many hundreds of thousands, possibly millions of documents. So to ask you to recall from memory something you wrote 18 years ago is going to be difficult.

In any event, these emails deal with an issue involving some questions surrounding a Supreme Court case called Adarand Constructors v. Mineta. So let us refer to a document, Document 00289596. As I understand it, you were being asked in this instance to provide some advice on what might happen if a particular argument were presented to the Supreme Court on the merits. You looked at some Department of Transportation contracting regulations, and as I understand it—correct me if I am wrong—if I have understood it correctly, the Government was considering making a series of arguments before the Supreme Court, and you did what a lawyer should do when advancing an argument to the Court, you counted to five. You identified five Supreme Court Justices who you believed would not accept the Government's argument in defense of those DOT regulations. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, under the precedent that existed at the time. The Croson precedent I think was the most relevant precedent.

Senator LEE. And yet at the time, the Supreme Court of the United States had already granted review of the case, granted certiorari, meaning that the Supreme Court, unlike most appellate courts, is in charge, with very, very few exceptions remaining today, of its own docket. It decides which of the 10,000 or so cases that want to go to the Supreme Court each year will in fact be reviewed by the Court. The Court had already granted certiorari, granted a review in that case. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, I believe.

Senator LEE. So, as I read these emails, I read your argument as saying, okay, number one, you cannot count to five here because I am identifying—I am Brett Kavanaugh and have identified that there are grave doubts as to whether Chief Justice Rehnquist, Justice Scalia, Justice Thomas, Justice Kennedy, or Justice O'Connor can embrace these arguments in defense of these Department of Transportation regulations. But the Court has already granted certiorari, so what to do?

As I understand the emails—and correct me if I am wrong—you recommended a course of action that would allow the Government to make its case, but to make its case in a way that would allow the Court to decide that perhaps it should not have granted review in the case. Am I correct so far?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator.

Senator LEE. And what is that called when the Court decides that it should not have granted a case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Dismissing as improvidently granted, or colloquially known as digged.

Senator LEE. As a dig.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator LEE. So you came up with a strategy for the purpose of encouraging the Court to dig a case that it had previously granted because you believed the Government was going to lose and the regulations at issue were going to be invalidated, and you did not want the Government to have to endure that. Did they accept your arguments?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court did, yes.

Senator LEE. So the Government, the Bush administration, the Solicitor General's Office followed your advice and wrote the arguments as you had prescribed, thus prompting a dig. And as a result, the regulations stood. Is that not right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I believe that is so, Senator.

Senator LEE. They stood where they otherwise would have fallen.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is right.

Senator LEE. Okay. So, here again, I have a hard time seeing this as anything other than something that helps you, that helps you not just with Republicans but that helps you with Democrats. You saw a problem with an argument the Government was making, you identified that problem, you offered a remedy, that remedy was embraced by the Solicitor General's Office and the Department of Justice, and the Court did exactly as you wanted it to do, and as a result the regulation stood. The regulation that Senator Booker is concerned about, was wanting to make sure was not under attack unfairly was, in fact, preserved. I have a hard time seeing why that should not want to make him vote more for you. In fact, I think Senator Booker really should vote for you. I will have that conversation with him later.

Okay. One additional response to last night's round of questions. Last night, at the end of a grueling day, my friend and colleague, Senator Harris from California, asked you whether you had ever spoken to anyone at the law firm of Kasowitz, Benson and Torres about the Mueller investigation. She even implored you to be sure about your answer, which I suppose is good advice in any context, but it can perhaps sound somewhat ominous.

The issue with this question is that Kasowitz, if I understand it correctly, is a law firm that includes 350 lawyers in nine U.S. cities. I am guessing that not even Mr. Kasowitz himself, who started the firm, can even name every single attorney. Could you name every attorney that works at that firm?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator LEE. As you sit here, can you rule out the possibility that you may have close friends, former law clerks, former law school classmates who might work or who might have worked at that firm at some point?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know who works at that firm other than a few people I am aware of just from the public. I gather Senator Lieberman works at the firm. I did not know that last night.

Senator LEE. That is correct. I did not, either, but I found that out last night. Can you name the nine cities where this firm has offices?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator LEE. So my colleague's question may be a very direct question, but it is something that I think in this circumstance is unfair, if you cannot identify the people that she has in mind, or you do not even know who works there.

So let me ask you something that may get at her underlying concern but in a way that I think is fair, because I think each of my colleagues, when they have concerns, when they have questions, they deserve to be able to have their concerns addressed. So let me ask you in a way that I think is fair.

Have you made any promises or any guarantees to anyone about how you would vote on any case that might come before you if you are confirmed to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator LEE. Have you had any improper conversation with anyone about the Mueller investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator LEE. Let's talk a little bit about Executive power. Is the President of the United States absolutely immune from any and all legal action, whether civil or criminal?

Senator LEE. Senator, the foundation of our Constitution was that, as Hamilton explained in Federalist 69, the Presidency would not be a monarchy, and it specified all the ways that under the Constitution the President is not above the law, no one is above the law in the United States of America. The President is subject to the law. The Supreme Court precedent in cases such as Clinton v. Jones, United States v. Richard Nixon establishes those principles. Cases like Youngstown established it in the official capacity, and Marbury v. Madison in official capacity.

So the President has authority under the Constitution, the Executive power under the Constitution. The President, as established by the Framers of the Constitution, is not above the law. No one is above the law in the United States of America.

Senator LEE. As a practical matter, who investigates the President?

Judge KAVANAUGH. As a practical matter, traditionally, as I have written about in the Georgetown Law Journal article and written about elsewhere, when there is an allegation of wrongdoing by someone in the executive branch as to whom there might be a conflict of interest if an ordinary Justice Department process took place, there has been traditionally the appointment by the Attorney General of a special counsel. That has gone back for 100 years or so of that kind of outside counsel appointed. Of course, we saw that in Watergate, but we have seen it lots of other times where special counsels have been appointed for particular matters where there is otherwise a conflict of interest or perceived conflict of interest of some kind.

Senator LEE. Now, I have had colleagues who have worried about your view that Morrison was wrongly decided. Your view, just to be clear, is that Morrison applies only in a special context no longer relevant here. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator LEE. What context is that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is the context of the old independent counsel statute, which is distinct from the special counsel system. The old independent counsel statute had a lot of features to it, and that statute was viewed by the Congress when it reconsidered it in 1999 as being unrestrained, unaccountable, impermissible, and the statute was not renewed, and the Morrison case was thus a one-off case, as I see it, about a one-off statute that no longer exists.

Senator LEE. And that is why you can talk about it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is why Justice Kagan can talk about it, and that is why I also have talked about it.

Senator LEE. These are the vestigial remains of a once-existing but no longer—it is a dinosaur in legal terms.

What about your opinion in PHH? Now, PHH is really limited to independent agencies, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is right. The governing precedent on independent agencies—so think the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission or the Federal Communications Commission or the Securities and Exchange Commission, a whole range of independent agencies governed by Humphrey's Executor, the 1935 precedent of the Supreme Court which established that those are permissible. They have ordinarily, traditionally been multi-member bodies, and that was a problem I thought in the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau case, that it was only a single-director independent agency, but the remedy would still have allowed that agency to continue operating and performing its consumer functions and protecting consumers from improper behavior.

Senator LEE. What is the biggest single difference between the independent counsel statute, which is now a dinosaur, and the special counsel regulations, which are still in effect?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, there are a whole host of differences. The appointment mechanism was different, the removal mechanism was different, the jurisdictional mechanism was different, how Justice Department policies applied was different. There were so many different features of that old independent counsel statute that combined to convince Congress that that statute was a mistake, worse than a mistake really, and also showed why the statute was inconsistent with our constitutional traditions.

Senator LEE. And the reason for that is because when you create an entity within the Federal Government, within the executive branch, it is not accountable to anyone. It sounds appetizing. It sounds appealing to some at the outset to say, well, we are insulating it from political forces, but what that really means is it is not accountable to anyone. It is not accountable to anyone who is, in turn, elected. Was that not really the problem Justice Scalia was pointing out in Morrison?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what he pointed out. It is what Senator Durbin and many others on this Committee and elsewhere pointed out after experience with the statute for some years, and then seeing how it operated in practice. I think there was overwhelming bipartisan agreement that the statute did not operate in a good way and that the flaws in the statute's operation stemmed from some of these features of its design that you just discussed, which distinguished it from the traditional special counsel system that we had had, and then starting in 1999 have had since 1999 to the present.

Senator LEE. What were we dealing with in Watergate, a special counsel or an independent counsel?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It was the traditional special counsel at the time. We have had historically the kind that we now have and have had since 1999, the traditional special counsel system.

Senator LEE. So he was appointed by regulation, not by statute. Nixon fired him, and Nixon fired Archibald Cox, and we all know how that turned out. I am not going to ask you to respond to this but it seems to me that this remains an effective tool. It is not as though the absence of the independent counsel statute renders the President completely immune, because that simply is not the case.

You have never taken a position on the immunity question, on the question of whether the President is immune from prosecution.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, just to be technically accurate, the question is deferral, not immunity. So the constitutionality of indicting a sitting President, I have never taken any position on that. The Justice Department for 45 years has taken the position that a sitting President may not be indicted while in office, and that is the Justice Department's longstanding position under Presidents of both parties. But I have not taken a position on the constitutionality of that.

Senator LEE. And among academics and practitioners of every ideological stripe that I know of, that is where the dispute is, not whether there is absolute immunity so much as the timing of it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is all about the timing. It is not an immunity question. Correct, Senator.

Senator LEE. There are people on both ends of the ideological spectrum who take different positions on that.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let me—we are going to—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before I give the schedule, because we are soon going to break for lunch, I have had another request for documents. So I would like to give you an update on that.

After two deadlines that only Senator Klobuchar honored, my staff stayed up all night pushing the Department of Justice and the former President to make public every committee confidential document the Minority has requested, including a request after midnight. Senator Leahy made a request today, and we have pushed the Department of Justice and the former President—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. To honor this request. They have agreed—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. And will be producing the documents imminently. And so, like with Justice Gorsuch's confirmation, the process that I set up works when it is followed.

We will now take a 30-minute lunch break.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a brief question about that?

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I have a question about that, too.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CORNYN. I could not hear everything you said, so I just want to clarify. It is my understanding that every document requested by any Senator that had previously been designated as "committee confidential" has now been vetted and made available to that Senator, or will be shortly.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, including what Senator Leahy asked for today.

Before I read the schedule—oh, I am sorry. I did not mean to interrupt.

Senator CORNYN. No, I was just going to make the point that there is nothing that a Senator has requested that has not been made available to them and then been properly vetted with the Department of Justice and now is available to the public.

Chairman GRASSLEY. And before I make the announcement—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. On the schedule, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, you will be—go ahead.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I think I am the lead-off batter when we return?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I am told that we have a vote that is scheduled to begin at 1:45. They often do not begin exactly at 1:45. Could you please build in time so we can vote and come back here?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, do not go yet. We are going to accommodate you from this respect. We are going to take a 30-minute lunch break. It might be longer than that, so be alert, Judge.

There are two votes, but I am hoping you will vote first, come back, do your questioning, and then go back and vote on the second one, and I should probably come back with you unless I get some other Republican to come back, and I will do the same thing. Then we will proceed that way through the two votes.

Adjourned.

[Whereupon the Committee was recessed and reconvened.]

Senator TILLIS [presiding]. The Committee will come to order.

Senator Whitehouse.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Welcome back, Judge Kavanaugh. Let me know when you are good.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am ready. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you. Judge Kavanaugh, journalists go to jail to protect sources, unless and until the source releases the journalist from their obligation of confidentiality. Will you now release from that obligation any journalist that you spoke with during and about the Starr investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not sure I am understanding the question.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. There were journalists you spoke with during and about the Starr investigation. They are not disclosing what you spoke with them about because you are an undisclosed source. If you say do not worry, that is over, say whatever happened, then they are freed of that obligation, and we can find out about what you said to the journalists during and about the Starr investigation. Will you do that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I spoke to reporters at that time at the direction and authorization—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I know, but that is not what—that is the basis of my question. If you had not done that, I would not be asking this. You do not tell me that. The question is, will you release those reporters from whatever source confidentiality protection they feel you are owed? It is up to you to do that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I spoke to reporters at the direction and authorization of Judge—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. You have just recited the exact same words that you answered me with beforehand. Will you release them—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Because that is relevant to the answer to the question if I could continue?

Senator WHITEHOUSE. What I would really get is an answer to the actual question I asked rather than a disquisition on the general topic area that I asked. This is a very simple thing. You either will or will not, or if you wish, this is—you are welcome to say, look, I would like to take that under advisement and I will get back to you after some reflection and consultation.

But our situation right now is that reporters may very well have information about what you told them during the Starr Clinton investigation that they are unwilling to divulge now because you were a confidential source. Can you release them from that by simply saying here publicly, look, anybody I talked to, say what I said. It is not a problem. I do not need confidentiality any longer.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. Senator, and if I could just 30 seconds on this, if that is okay.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. If it is 30 responsive seconds, I am all for that. Go for it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. I spoke to the reporters at the direction and authorization of Judge Starr, and, therefore, Judge Starr would be the one who would be part of that process. I was not acting on my own, so.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. No. No. Nope, that is not the way that reporters look at it. They look at it as you were the source. You were the one to whom they owe the obligation of confidentiality. Starr's name has not come up.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I was in turn acting as part of that office, and, therefore, I guess the answer—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But it is yours to divulge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The answer to your question is because I cannot do that or do not think I should do that as a matter of appropriateness given that I was working for someone else who was running the office. I talked, of course, on the record and publicly—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay, that answers it. You are unwilling to do it. I will move on. You have said today you have never taken a position on the constitutionality of indicting the President. Let me ask you, has there ever been any statutory law on Presidential immunity from an indictment or from due process of law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There has been Justice Department law.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Statutory law is the question. Has there ever been a statute that limited the—or protected the President against indictment or due process of law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. This has been Justice Department law, but not—I do not believe there has been statutory law.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. The Justice Department is not a law-making body, is it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Oh, I think it does—I guess, the term all encompasses regulations, so, yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Directive to the Department's own employees, correct? The OLC opinion is what you are talking about.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is encompassed, as I think about it, within the concept of law.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Well, if you are going to the general concept of law perhaps, but there is no law that Congress has ever passed that protects a President from either indictment or due process of law, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Congress has never passed something. The Justice Department—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Has an opinion about it. I understand that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Which is binding on everyone—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. On the Justice Department.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Mm-hmm.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, if, as a matter of law, a sitting President cannot be indicted, that must be constitutional law since there is no statutory law as a proposition of logic. Is that not correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is not correct as I see it because if the Justice Department has law that binds that Justice Department, that is another source of law as well.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. So, let us go back to Georgetown Law Journal, 1998, and a conference you attended. And you spoke at it, and the panel that you were on was asked the question who on the panel believes as a matter of law that a sitting President cannot be indicted during the term of his office, and your hand shot up, and I think you have probably seen the film clip of that because it has been posted already. Did you mean as a matter of law the OLC guidance when you said that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I know that right before the passage you read, I said there is a lurking constitutional question.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Bingo.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The fact that I said that suggests that I did not have a position on the constitutional issue.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Although you shot your hand up when you said—when the question as a matter of law a sitting President cannot be indicted came up. And it seems to me there are really only two kinds of law, unless you are really stretching the envelope here. One is laws that Congress passes, and the other is laws that are founded in the Constitution. An internal policy directive within the Department of Justice, I think it is a real stretch to call that law.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I appreciate that, Senator, but it has been a longstanding Justice Department position.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Policy, yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And right before—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And is that what you meant when you put your hand up, do you know?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was 20 years ago, I do not know. I do know right before I said that that I said—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Here is why it is important, is because you have been telling us, “I have never taken a position to say this was a constitutional principle. I have never taken a position on the Constitution on that question. I did not take a position on constitutionality period. I have never taken a position on constitutionality of indictment.” Those were all things you have said during the course of this hearing, and it looks to me like that is a bit of a conversion.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, right before that, though, Senator, to be fair to me, I did say there is a lurking constitutional question, which implies—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes, and—

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And then you were asked to answer that question by putting your hand up, and you put your hand up saying, “I.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. The question was—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, it seems to me you answered your question by putting that hand up the way you did.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But the question was not the Constitution. The question was law, and there was Justice Department position had been—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, that is what I am saying you are saying is you are saying that what you meant was the OLC policy position when you answered a question about law.

Judge KAVANAUGH. What I said is—I do not know what I was thinking in a panel 20 years ago, but I do know having looked at it that the question was about law, that the Justice Department position has been consistent for 45 years.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. As a matter of constitutional law, right? The Justice Department position reflects a view of constitutional law.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But it is an interpretation binding on everyone in the Justice Department, as I understand it, and—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Because they are employees of the Department of Justice in the same way that you cannot steal the computer or you cannot, you know, bring a pet into your office, whatever other rules there might be.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think internal regulations are still law.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. As long as it is your position that that was what you meant by a matter of law.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, just to be clear, I said I do not know what I meant—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. You answered the question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But when I look at it now, that is what I—that is what I think.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, let us go on to recusal, and let me—there is a case that is somewhat on point on all of this. It is the Caperton case out of West Virginia. And as you will recall, it was a civil case, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And it came to the Supreme Court because there was an objection that a judge should not sit—basically, the nemo iudex problem, should not sit in his own cause, so to speak, and the problem was that the—one of the litigants had received three—the judge had received $3 million in political support from one of the litigants. Is that—the fact pattern correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I believe that is correct, Senator.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yep. And the standard that the Court came up with was whether that judge had—whether that donor, that party, had a significant and disproportionate influence—ooh, we did not spell “influence” right—in placing the judge on the case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I believe so. That is my memory.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, and the—Justice Kennedy—

Judge KAVANAUGH. A Justice Kennedy opinion.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. Decided that the Constitution requires—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. Recusal. If the Constitution requires recusal of a judge who was the beneficiary of a $3 million piece of political support to help him get into office, was it not follow perforce that the person who actually appointed the judge would be in a similar or stronger position of significant and disproportionate influence?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the question in the Caperton case, as I understand, was because of the amount of money, the financial interest, which is a whole separate brand.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Correct, which would have a significant and disproportionate influence on the judge becoming a judge, right? That is what the connection was. The spending of money by the party helped make the judge the judge. In this case, if a criminal matter involving President Trump came before you, he would not have just spent $3 million to make you a judge. He would have flat out made you the judge, 100 percent—finito, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the question of recusal is something that is governed by precedent, governed by rules. One of the underappreciated aspects of recusal is whenever I have had a significant question of recusal as a judge on the D.C. Circuit, I have consulted with colleagues, and so, too, they have consulted with me when they have had their own questions. So, that is part of the process. In other words—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Is not actually the 100 percent responsibility for direct appointment more significant in terms of influence than simply making a big political contribution to a judge? That is the 100 percent responsibility, appointed, period, done.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, just on the—I do not mean to quibble, but on the premise of your question, the Senate obviously, it is a shared responsibility. The President and the Senate participate in a Supreme Court confirmation process—appointment process.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Well, you were very clear yesterday in our discussion that it was the President of the United States who appointed you, and this is about that. This is about how you get to the seat, and you got appointed by the President. Would that not pertain as a significant influence—I mean, what possible greater influence could there be on who is in the seat that you are nominated to than the nomination of the President to that seat?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, two points, if I could, Senator. First, I have said already, I do not believe it appropriate in this context to make decisions, and recusal is a decision, on a case, and so, I do not think it is appropriate.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. Well, if it is not appropriate, then let me move on with something else because—let me ask you about the question of Presidential, shall we say, “conflicts with prosecutors.” When you were in the Starr prosecution effort, you were exposed to this contest with the Clinton White House, and you described the Clinton White House as running a, and I am quoting you here, “Presidentially approved smear campaign,” was one phrase you used; “a disgraceful effort to undermine the rule of law,” was another phrase you used; and, “an episode that will forever stand as a dark chapter in American Presidential history.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was about something different.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And you—“Presidentially approved smear campaign against Starr” was what the topic was. You then said in a later memo that “the President has tried to disgrace Starr and his office with a sustained propaganda campaign that would make Nixon blush, and he should be forced to account for that.” Have your views of Presidential interference or smearing of independent or special counsel changed since you made those statements?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Those comments were in a memo written, as I recall—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Two actually. Two memos, but close enough, yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the one that I am remembering written late at night after an emotional meeting in the office, dashed off, and some of the language in that, as I think I told you or some of the Senators in individual meetings, was heated, and I understand that. But that was what my memo at the time.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And now?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not think—I think I have been clear I do not want to talk about current events because I do not think a sitting—I am a sitting judge as well as a nominee. I do not think I should talk about current events.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. How about just the guy, the guy who was outraged at being on the receiving end of a smear campaign? Does that guy still exist, or is he long gone?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is—that is what I wrote at the time, how I felt one night after a meeting we had had in August 1998, I believe, at least the memo I am remembering.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. Last topic because my time is getting short here. The hypothetical problem that I have has to do with an appellate court which makes a finding of fact, asserts a proposition of fact to be true, and upon that proposition hangs the decision that it reaches. And the question is, what happens when that proposition of fact actually in reality—you have referenced the real world so often—actually in reality turns out not to be true. What is the obligation of an appellate court if it has hung a decision on a proposition of fact, and then the proposition of fact turns out not to be true? Does it have any obligation to go back and try to clean up that discrepancy, to clean up that mess?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think, Senator, it is probably hard to answer that question in the abstract because—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But if I give you specifics, then you will say you cannot answer that because that would be talking about a case. So, I am kind of in a quandary here with you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I was going to give you a couple thoughts, which are I think that would be wrapped up in the question of precedent and stare decisis. And one of the things you could look at, one of the factors you could look at, how wrong was the decision and if it is based on an erroneous factual premise, that is clearly one of the factors you would—you would—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. You would look at it and whether it could be—

Judge KAVANAUGH. A mistake of history. Sometimes there have been cases where there were mistakes of history in decisions, mistakes of facts, and so forth.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, just quickly, the two examples that comes readily to mind, one is Shelby County in which the Court said in looking whether there was still any kind of institutional racism in the preclearance States that they needed to worry, nope: The “country has changed and current conditions”—to use their phrase—“are different.” First, where do you suppose the five Justices who made that decision got expertise in vestigial State racism to make that determination at all?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I cannot comment on the decision other than to say it is a precedent. I understand the point you are making about the—Senator WHITEHOUSE. Because you do know that since then, both North Carolina was found to have targeted minority voters with “surgical precision,” which is a pretty rough phrase, and Texas got after it so frequently that a Federal court finally said, look, we think there is a penchant for discrimination here. So, if you—if you have got the five judges saying that it is over in these States and then it turns out it really is not over, that there is actually still surgical precision targeting of minority voters, and that there is a penchant for discrimination in the Texas State government, that ought to be something that might cause some reconsideration of the Shelby holding, ought it not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, three things on that, I think, Senator. One, I think the case did not strike down preclearance as opposed to saying the formula needed to be—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. De facto it did. Preclearance ended in all those States with that decision.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree. I understand that.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But the—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, I have got 1 minute left. Let me jump to the other example because I think it is an important one, and my time is running out. And that is Citizens United. Citizens United took on the proposition that the unlimited spending that it authorized by people capable of unlimited spending would be both transparent and independent, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Court upheld the disclosure requirements in that case, if that is the question. I am not sure—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. It actually said more than that. It said that it is the transparency and the independence of the spending that it authorized—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. That were the guardians against corruption.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right, so it was not contributions to parties or candidates, correct.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. So, the First Amendment ends where efforts to corrupt begin, correct? You do not have a First Amendment right to corrupt your Government.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has relied on corruption and the appearance of corruption as part of the test, and it is—you know the story.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Correct, and in order to fend off the argument that big money corrupts and absolute money corrupts absolutely, they said, no, because there is going to be independence and transparency. In fact, if I remember correctly, they said—well, I do not have it front of me and I am out of—oh, here we go: “The separation between candidates and independent expenditures negates the possibility of corruption.” So, if they are wrong factually about this spending being transparent, and we know that they do from what we have seen since then, and if they are wrong factually about the independence of this spending, and we know that they are from actual events that have happened since then, then that strikes a pretty hard blow against the logic of Citizens United, does it not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, Citizens United, as you know, is a precedent of the Supreme Court, so entitled to respect as a matter of stare decisis. But as you know, and I would just reiterate, if someone wants to challenge that decision, they—one of the things that anyone can raise about case is that it is based on a mistake in premise or a mistake in factual premises, and that is always the kind of thing that courts are open to hearing.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. My time has expired. I thank the Chairman for the indulgence of the extra minute.

Senator TILLIS. A couple of things. First, I would just note that I believe Justices Breyer and Ginsburg sat on the Supreme Court during Clinton v. Jones and three out of four of President Nixon’s appointees were on the Supreme Court that heard U.S. v. Nixon. And, Judge Kavanaugh, I have a—my colleague and friend, Senator Whitehouse, attempted to imply you would resolve the constitutional question of whether a sitting President can be indicted. Is it not that, in a contemporaneous law review article you authored, you explicitly stated—these are your words—“whether the Constitution allows indictment of a sitting President is debatable”?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what I said in the contemporaneous Georgetown Law Journal article. I have said that subsequently as well.

Senator TILLIS. And without objection, I would like to have that article submitted for the record.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator TILLIS. And before I transition, if Senator Cruz will indulge, I reserved 13 minutes of my time last night, and I was wondering, there were two instances where you were not allowed to answer the question. I did not know if you wanted to make any clarifying comments on disclosing sources relative to the discussion around Judge Starr. And at one point you were saying that Senator

Whitehouse said something you said, “that is about something different.” I do not know if you remember what that was, but if you want to clarify it before we transition to Senator Cruz, I will give you a minute to do so.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I will just leave the record as it stands.

Senator TILLIS. All right.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That third comment that he referenced was about something—a different aspect of that investigation.

Senator TILLIS. Okay.

Senator CRUZ.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I want to note at the outset that the Senator from Rhode Island took his questioning as an opportunity to impugn the residents of North Carolina and the residents of Texas as having a penchant for bigotry, and I appreciate the compassion from the Senator from Rhode Island. I will point out—I will let you rise to the defense of your own State, but I will point out in the State of Texas, that we had just a few years back, three Statewide-elected African-American officials, all Republican, I might note, which I believe at the time was the most of any State in the Union. And I think it is the case that Rhode Island has none.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CRUZ. And I would note as well—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. For the record, I apologize to my colleague if he takes any umbrage about my reference to the general residents of Texas. This was a specific quote from a Federal court decision in Texas referring to the decisionmakers in that case. So, I apologize—

Senator TILLIS. Senator Cruz, you have 30 additional seconds.

Senator CRUZ. Judge Kavanaugh, yesterday you had some discussion with Senator Lee about what it means to be a textualist. And I want to go back and revisit that conversation and ask for someone at home who is watching this, why should it matter to them if a judge is a textualist. What difference does that make to somebody not involved with the Supreme Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, it goes to the foundation of the Constitution and the system that the Framers designed with a legislative branch, an executive branch, and a judicial branch that were all separate. As was said in Federalist 78, the judiciary does not exercise will, but it exercises judgment. The policy decisions are made by the legislative branch with the President, of course, in terms of signing legislation, so the House, the Senate, and the President. The President enforces Federal law, comes to the judiciary.

When we interpret a statute, if we as judges must adhere to the text of the statute, why is that? Two reasons I think are paramount. The first is the statute as written is what was passed as a formal matter by the Congress, by both Houses of the Congress, signed by the President into law. So, as a formal matter, that is the law. So, if we are going to exercise judgment and not will, we need to adhere to the law as passed, and the law as passed is reflected in the written words that were—went through both Houses and signed by the President.

Second, in supporting that, as a practical matter, legislation is a compromise, and within the Senate, within the House, with the President as well, lots of compromises are inherent in any legislative product. Now, that is what my experience shows. That is what, I know, your experience shows as well, Senator. So, when a case comes to court, a statute comes to court, we upset the compromise that you so carefully reached and where people might have given up this for that in terms of the legislative final language. And we then insert ourselves after the fact into the process and upset the compromise if we do not stick to the actual words of the text of the statute as passed by Congress.

So, as both a formal matter of what the law is and as a practical matter of not inserting ourselves into the legislative process and upsetting the legislative process, it is critical that judges stick to the law as written, the text of the statute as passed by Congress and signed by the President.

Senator CRUZ. What in your view is the proper role, if any, for legislative history in statutory adjudication? As you know, different Justices have different views on this.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think all judges are much more skeptical of legislative history than they once were. That is the influence, as you know, Senator, largely of Justice Scalia, but really very mainstream now to be very skeptical of legislative history. And, again, two reasons support that skepticism, if not outright refusal to use it. The first is that the legislative history, and by that I mean the Committee reports or the floor statements made by individual Members on the floor of the House or Senate, are not part of the law as passed. And that is important because it would be very easy, and I have said in my articles, for Congress, if there are a paragraph or a paragraph or more in the legislative history and a Committee report that was really important, we will put it into the law. Put it into the introduction of the law, have it be part of the law that is passed. When it is a Committee report, it might have just been seen by one Committee in one House. It might not have even been seen by the other House. The President, of course, who is part of the process, might never have seen it. So, to rely on that is to upset the formal process by which law is enacted in the United States.

So, too, again, the legislative history, the Committee report, is not part of the compromise that is reached between the House and the Senate and the President, at least not ordinarily. And so, you are allowing one Committee, for example, or one Member to go down to the floor of the House or Senate, and to say something that will shape subsequent judicial interpretation and upset the careful compromise that is reflected in the text that is passed by the Senate, passed by the House, and signed by the President.

So, again, both formal and practical reasons why skepticism of legislative history is warranted, and why Justice Scalia, I think, was able to persuade Justices across the spectrum, judges across the spectrum, that legislative history is useful for understanding why something came to be, but not as a tool for upsetting or changing your interpretation of the words of the statute.

Senator CRUZ. Also, yesterday when you were talking with Senator Lee, I believe you described yourself as an originalist.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CRUZ. Can you explain what that means to you, what you mean by that, and why, again, people at home should care, why that should matter if a judge or justice is an originalist.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, by “originalist,” it is important to be clear because there are different things people hear when they hear the term “originalist.” There was an old school of original intent, the subjective intentions of the drafters or ratifiers, and that is not really the proper approach, in my view, for similar reasons to the discussion of legislative history of the statutes.

By “originalist,” what I have meant is original public meaning or the “constitutional contextualism” is a term I have used that refers to the same concept, which is, pay attention to the words of the Constitution. The Constitution, as Article VI of the Constitution makes clear, is law. It is not aspirational principles. It is law. It is the supreme law of the land, and in that sense it is superior to statutes, but it is law-like—just like statutes are, superior law.

The Constitution itself, including the amendments, but the original Constitution, was itself a compromise, so it is law and it is a compromise reached at Philadelphia in the summer of 1787. And, of course, Madison’s notes and the history of that shows all the compromises that were reached. Probably the most famous compromise is the compromise that allows for representation according to population in the House, representation according to State in the Senate, the Connecticut compromise, as it is often referred to.

It is important for judges, again, not to upset the formal law that is written in the Constitution or to upset the compromises reached either in the original Constitution or in the amendments. Now, one key thing to add to that is precedent is part of the constitutional interpretation as well as Federalist 78 makes clear and the Judicial Power Clause of Article III also makes clear. So, a system of precedent is built into how judges interpret the Constitution and constitutional cases on an ongoing basis. So, that is part of the proper mode of constitutional interpretation and important system of precedent.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you. Let us shift back to the topic you and I discussed yesterday, which is religious liberty, which is a topic of considerable interest and importance to a great many Americans. In private practice, you wrote an amicus brief in the Santa Fe case for Congressmen Steve Largent and J.C. Watts. Could you describe to this Committee what that case was about and your representation there?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will. Of course, Senator Cornyn argued the case as Attorney General for the State of Texas and did an outstanding job. I remember participating in the moot court, as the Senator recalled.

Senator CORNYN. It did not turn out too well, Judge.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. You did an excellent job, Senator, as I remember being there. So, the case involved prayer before a football game, and the Supreme Court, of course, has had a number of cases on religious expression in schools, and these are always challenging cases and very fact-specific. There are two principles that the precedents have set forth. One is that school-sponsored prayer at school events is often impermissible, either at the school day, Engel v. Vitale, or graduations, Lee v. Weisman.

At the same, when students want to express themselves in some way—tee shirt, clothing, or saying their own prayer, say, before a football game or other event, if students want to say a prayer for themselves, or there is an open forum where students are allowed to say whatever they want and one student chooses to talk about religion or say a prayer—that is generally on the free speech side of the house, freedom of religion side of the house of the Supreme Court precedent, which would protect the religious liberty of the individual in that circumstance.

The Santa Fe case came—I think Senator Cornyn would say—well, Senator Cornyn would say it came on the free speech, freedom of religion side of the house. The Supreme Court thought that the school was too involved, I would say, in the prayer opportunity in that case, and, thus, attributed the prayer in that case to the school. And the Supreme Court, therefore, said that the prayer in that case was impermissible.

It was a very fact-specific decision, I think, based on how some of the actual prayers had gone down in the school district there. And so, it was really in the gray area on the facts between these two principles—freedom of speech and freedom of religion for individuals on the one hand, no school-sponsored prayer on the other—and those two principles are part of the Supreme Court precedent that I think the Courts have applied for a long time now.

Senator CRUZ. So, what led you to want to take on that representation in the amicus brief?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think at that time I worked on several—I was asked to work on several cases involving religious liberty and religious speech. I also did a case in the—amicus brief in the Good News Club case, and that was a case where a school district allowed use of a—the gymnasium auditorium area after school for whatever group from the community wanted to use the facility. And they would allow everyone to come in, you know, Boy Scouts, the community—any community group to come in, but they did allow religious groups to come in. And that seemed to be discrimination against religion, discrimination against religious people, religious speech.

And I was asked to do an amicus brief, which made the point—I wrote that made the point that religious people, religious speakers, religious speech is entitled to its place on an equal basis in the public square, including, in this case, in the school auditorium or gymnasium. The Supreme Court agreed with that principle in that case, stating that discrimination against religion in public facilities in the nature of what was going on in that case was impermissible and a violation of freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and, therefore, unconstitutional.

Those cases are important, I think, because it is important that the—to recognize that the Constitution, the First Amendment of the Constitution as well as many statutes, of course, protect religious liberty in the United States, religious freedom in the United States. And as I have said in some of my opinions, we are all equally American, no matter what religion we are or no religion at all, and that means religious speakers and religious speakers have a right to their place in the public square.

Senator CRUZ. Another case you were involved in as a judge is, you wrote a dissent from denial of re-hearing en banc in the Priests for Life case. Can you tell this Committee about that case and your opinion there?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was a group that was being forced to provide certain kind of health coverage over their religious objection to their employees. And under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, the question was, first, was this a substantial burden on their religious exercise, and it seemed to me quite clearly it was. It was a technical matter of filling out a form—in that case they said filling out the form would make them complicit in the provision of the abortion-inducing drugs that they were, as a religious matter, objected to.

The second question was, did the Government have a compelling interest nonetheless in providing the coverage to the employees. And applying the governing Supreme Court precedent from Hobby Lobby, I said that the answer to that was, yes, the Government did have a compelling interest, following Justice Kennedy's opinion in Hobby Lobby, said the Government did have a compelling interest in ensuring access.

And then it came down to the least restrictive means prong of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. And that prong of the act, to my mind, is an opportunity to see is there—is there a win-win in some respects. In other words, the Government interest in ensuring healthcare coverage, can that be provided without doing it on the backs of the religious objector. So, that is what the Court is looking for.

In that case, Professor Voll has written about that, and in that case it seemed to me that the Government had avenues to ensure that the coverage was provided without doing so on the backs of the religious objectors, and I so ruled, following the Supreme Court precedent in Hobby Lobby and in a subsequent case, Wheaton College, where they had an order that I followed, and it seemed to me to dictate the result that I identified in the Priests for Life dissent.

Another case, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, just to reiterate, was overwhelmingly passed by Congress in the early 1990s and signed by President Clinton, and was an important addition to the protection of religious freedom in the United States to supplement the constitutional protection that exists in the Free Exercise Clause.

Senator CRUZ. Well, and I would note, much like yesterday when we discussed your pro bono representation of the synagogue, that Priests for Life, using the paradigm that some on the Democratic aisle have suggested of little guy versus big guy, by any measure Priests for Life, where the little guy against the almost all-powerful Federal Government. And in that opinion, presumably because you felt the law dictated it, you sided with the Priests for Life in that decision.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator, and I think in a lot of the religious freedom cases that the Supreme Court has had, that has been the case. There was a prisoner, in an opinion written by Justice Alito, I believe unanimous opinion where the prisoner is being—a Muslim prisoner was being forced to shave his beard in violation of his religious beliefs. Justice Alito, as I recall, wrote the opinion for the Supreme Court saying that was a substantial burden on his religion and was not necessary. And that is just another example of how religious liberty protects all of us no matter what our religious beliefs are, and that is an important principle—foundational principle both of the Constitution and of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act.

Senator CRUZ. Another case that you were involved in, in your career, that stood out to me personally just by being a Cuban American is that, as I understand it, in November 1999 when Elian Gonzalez came to this country as a young child. And sadly, the Federal Government ended up coming into the home he was staying, with machine guns, taking him into custody and removing him to Cuba. You worked on Elian Gonzalez's case pro bono against the INS returning him to Cuba, and if you could talk about that case a little bit to the Committee.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, thank you, Senator. I was asked by another person in my firm who had gotten a call from someone in Florida whether we could on an emergency basis do, as I recall, a re-hearing en banc petition in the Eleventh Circuit, and then a cert petition in the Supreme Court on a really very short notice because he was going to be returned.

The question was really due process, what kind of hearing needed to be held before the INS returned him to Cuba. It was a question under the Refugee Act as what that required, and also a question under the Due Process Clause. And interestingly, it seemed that the INS had not—was interpreting the Refugee Act in a way that seemed a stretch of the statutory language, and it was not some kind of formal regulation. So, the question of Chevron deference to an informal agency position was a question in the case, and I wrote the cert petition and the en banc petition before that saying that the agency was stretching the language of the statute beyond recognition, and was doing so in a way that was entitled to no deference because it was not in any kind of formal regulation, which years later turns out to be a position the Supreme Court has agreed with in terms of administrative law.

But in that case, I got involved because I was asked to get involved on a moment's notice in a case of importance for people who needed help.

Senator CRUZ. Let me just ask one final question. You have been nominated to the highest court in the land. As you know, there is another highest court in the land. That is the basketball court atop the U.S. Supreme Court courtroom.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CRUZ. And I believe that no sitting Justice has played regularly there since Justice Thomas many years ago when he was a much younger Justice. If you are confirmed, do you intend to break that tradition and return to having a Justice play on the highest court in the land?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I do, if fortunate enough to be confirmed. I will—Justice Thomas did at some point get injured, so I hope that precedent is not one that I would follow. But if I am fortunate enough to be confirmed, yes, indeed, Senator. Thank you.

Senator CRUZ. Excellent. I am very glad to hear it.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before I call on Senator Klobuchar, there are a couple of things. One, I became aware of the fact that a lot of the committee confidential material that has been requested, some of the requests we got were already public. So, somebody is not doing very good homework if they are asking us for committee confidential stuff to be disclosed that is already available to the public.

Then I want to ask you, Judge Kavanaugh, you testified in 2004 that you were not involved in handling Judge Pryor's nomination while you were in the White House Counsel's Office. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I believe that is—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I am talking about the handling of it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, the handling. We had one person who would be assigned to each judge. I was not the—as I recall, at least, I was not the primary person on that.

Chairman GRASSLEY. So, is it not the case that somebody else handled the nomination, and if you know who that is, I would like to give you a chance to say so, and if you do not, I want to suggest a name.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not remember who it was.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Could it have been Benjamin Powell?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It sure could have been, yes. He was another associate counsel.

Chairman GRASSLEY. What, if any, involvement did you have?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not recall specifics. We would have met at meetings. I could have attended a moot court where we did a mock hearing. I do not remember specifics, but I—it sounds—that sounds right to me that Benjamin would have been the person primarily in charge of that, handling it.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, I had colleagues attempting to insinuate that you were interviewed—that you interviewed Judge Pryor, the documents that we have, that he was referring, is one of your colleagues asking how the Pryor interview went. It certainly seems to me that this email is more likely to indicate that you know the people who interviewed Judge Pryor, but may have even been kept in the loop because it was something that you were interested in.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That sounds correct. I knew him, and, therefore, was interested in his process.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I am going to do some follow-ups from our discussions yesterday, Judge. I thought I would start with campaign finance. The document that the Chairman has pointed out several times was originally designated "committee confidential," that I put the request in and got made public. And on that document, you said that contributions to—limits on contributions to candidates have some constitutional problems. And I asked you about Buckley v. Valeo, which is notable because it did not apply strict scrutiny to campaign finance laws. You really did not answer yesterday about whether you would follow that precedent of Buckley, and so, I want to be more specific. Do you think that strict scrutiny is the right standard to apply to all campaign finance laws?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Supreme Court, as you say, Senator, has, since 1976 in the landmark Buckley case, applied a different level of scrutiny, is one way to put it, to expenditures on the one hand and contributions on the other. And that divide has persisted since then to the current day so that now contributions to parties as well as candidates are on the one side of the line, and independent expenditures or expenditures and donations to outside groups are on the other side of the line.

So, that law is precedent of the Supreme Court. That has been around for a long time and has set the basics for the campaign finance framework that we are all familiar with.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. So, do you see—but will you say it is settled law or precedent? I am trying to—

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is precedent of the Supreme Court that has been applied since 1976, and, therefore, entitled the respect under principles of stare decisis. And anyone seeking to upset that—there are people who do not like the expenditure—the freedom to—the Court’s blessing of freedom to make unlimited expenditures, of course. There are people from the other direction that do not like some of the contribution limits who do not like Buckley v. Valeo from that side either. So, there are people who kind of hit it from both sides.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I understand.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But it is a precedent that has been applied repeatedly.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And so, do you think Brown v. Board of Education is settled law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think Brown v. Board of Education, as I have said many times before, is the single greatest moment in Supreme Court history.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I know, I know, I know, you said it, and I appreciate that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And it is correct. It is correct.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. So, it is—

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is correct because it corrected a historic mistake in Plessy v. Ferguson.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I understand, but is it settled law? I am trying to get at this difference between when you say some things are precedent, which is what, you know, we had an issue here because the last hearing we had, Justice Gorsuch said a bunch of things were precedent, and now he is on the Court and he has already dissented actually from Justice Roberts, and did not even want to uphold the reasonable expectation of privacy.

So, I am trying to get at the difference between when people that come before us say it is precedent versus settled law. Do you think there is a difference in those two words?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, here is what I know, Senator, which is for cases or issues that might come back before the Court, it is important as a matter of independence as reflected in the nominee precedent not to give a forecast or hint about that. And part of that is giving a thumbs up or thumbs down on those precedents that could be involved in that.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Got it. But so, if Brown v. Board of Education is settled law and say, like, Roe v. Wade you just say it is precedent. Precedent, non-precedent with Casey, is that a difference, because I—Brown v. Board of Education was—how many years ago? So, that was 64 years ago, but Roe v. Wade was 45 years ago. And I am trying to figure out if you are using these words in different ways when something is precedent and something is settled law.

Judge KAVANAUGH. All right. So, what I am trying to do is adhere to the line that has been drawn by the eight Justices currently sitting on the Supreme Court. And the line they have drawn is for the vast body of Supreme Court precedent, they have refused, in Justice Kagan's words, to give a thumbs up or thumbs down on that precedent. There are some historical cases where there is no prospect of that case coming back where they felt free to indicate their agreement with them.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And so, that is Brown v. Board of Education.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Correct. In Brown v. Board of Education, I said, single greatest moment in Supreme Court history.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But it is just that Roe is now 45 years old. I mean, that is the issue. Why is that not a thumbs up settled law?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, no—none of the currently sitting Justices of the Supreme Court have opined on that.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. I want to go back to Presidential power, and this is not a hypothetical. I am just going back to 2009, which is not that long ago, in the University of Minnesota Law Review. And that is where you said, “We should not burden a sitting President with civil suits, criminal investigations, or criminal prosecutions.” And when you and I talked about this yesterday, you said that Congress could still pursue an impeachment proceeding, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, the impeachment mechanism.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Your view back then because you would not comment on it, but your view when you wrote this was that—well, your view now is that Congress should still be able to pursue an impeachment.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Constitution specifies impeachment always as a tool for—in the Constitution itself.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. So, when we go back to when you wrote this, it is not a hypothetical, but when you wrote this in 2009 and you were thinking about it, did you think then, and this is what you meant, that a President should not have to be investigated. I mean, you said it, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The context there, I believe, Senator, was talking about civil suits, or criminal investigations, or criminal lawsuits, and it was not my position on the constitutionality. It was something for Congress to consider, and the idea was reflecting on my experience after September 11th and what we could do to make the Presidency the most effective for the American people.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I am trying to understand in practicality when you look at the last impeachment proceedings how you would, in effect, do this if you did not have an investigation, because these other ones have used independent counsel. They have used special counsel. And if you do not have that, do you not effectively eviscerate the impeachment part of the Constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not at all, Senator. Historically, Congress has often had investigative bodies that have done the work for—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But why would we want to foreclose our ability to use a special counsel or an independent counsel?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, that was—that is your decision ultimately in Congress to decide. That is one view that you just articulated. And, of course, Congress has not enacted any special deferral for civil suits, so Congress is stuck with the Jones v. Clinton result from that case, and is stuck with, of course, the existing system of special counsels.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But when you—to get back into where you were in 2009 when you wrote this as opposed to just using a hypothetical, so we have said several times here no one is above the law, and I said that in my opening statement. But when you said then, you mean no one is temporarily above the law. So, if a sitting President, if she was in office and there was some crime committed—murder, white-collar crime, everything—then you are saying in this article at the time that she should not be subject to criminal prosecution.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is a—that would be an issue for Congress to consider if it wanted to pursue providing a temporary deferral. There is—there are statutes that do that for members of the military, so servicemembers serving overseas. In fact, I think President Clinton's brief in the Clinton v. Jones case cited that example as something where there is statutory deferral, not immunity. It is important to distinguish immunity from deferral. And not above the law, but the timing of when a particular litigation will occur. So, I would not call that above the law. I would call that a timing question.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay, but there would be a long time. If a President was serving for 4 years or 8 years given—and, again, I am reading the words, “We should not burden a sitting President with civil suits, criminal investigations, or criminal prosecutions.” So, it feels to me that that was your view when you wrote that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, it was an idea for Congress to consider along with many other ideas I had in there about judicial confirmations and war powers, and it was all reflecting—again, that one was reflecting on an idea Congress could consider. The whole point was to make the—you know, help the country do better based on my observations from 3—5 and a half years working in a White House where—during war. During wartime.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. I want to turn to another topic. This is a follow-up from Senator Harris' questions from last night. She asked you questions about voting rights. I am the Ranking Member of the Rules Committee, and as she noted, many States have restricted access to voting since the Supreme Court's decision in Shelby County, which struck down a key provision of the Voting Rights Act. And according to the Brennan Center, 23 States now have more restrictive voting laws than they did in 2010. Many of these laws have been challenged in court. Some have been overturned.

So, here is one more question on this. Should courts consider these widespread efforts to restrict voting, what has been going on since 2010, when ruling on challenges to statutes that affect the right to vote?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think in any particular case, Senator, you would want to see what the record established in the case was, and the record could include what is going on in that particular State, and I can imagine a factual record where that would include also potentially what is going on in other States as well.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you. Thanks. Studies by the Brennan Center and other nonpartisan organizations have found no evidence of widespread voter fraud, and a study by The Washington Post found only 31 credible instances of fraud from 2000 to 2014 out of more than 1 billion ballots cast. Do you believe there is evidence of voter fraud? Do you believe—I know you told Senator Harris that you read some election law blogs that were sitting here last night. And so, have you read one of these articles on widespread voter fraud on one of these blogs you mentioned? I am just concerned because that is out there, and I would think that would be something that could be looked at.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I would certainly look at Professor Hassan's election law blog, and that is one of the ones that I have looked at. I have looked at other blogs as well, and there is discussion of this issue, and I would want—as a sitting judge, I would want to see a record before me of what is going on in a particular case. I hesitate to opine on something based on something I have read in a law review article or blog. I think you have a better sense of what is going on there. But I would want a record in a particular case to determine what the evidence in that particular case was.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. And I want to turn now to affirmative action, and Senator Booker raised these questions as well late last night. And in a 2017 speech at Notre Dame, you discussed how affirmative action represents a “longstanding exception” to the “basic equal protection right not to be treated by the Government on account of your race.” And you summarized the Court's debates on this issue and remarked, “On what basis is the Court making those decisions? Is there something in the text of the Constitution that tells us one is good enough and the other is not good enough? Not really. Again, this is common law judging to define the contours of the exception to the constitutional right.” So, what did you mean by that statement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, what I meant by that is we, in many areas of constitutional law, have, say, free speech rights, but we have exceptions analyzed, usually we are just talking about under strict scrutiny, and we have talked a lot about the Second Amendment, how the regulations that co-exist with the individual Second Amendment right. And so, too, in the Fourteenth Amendment context, the equal protection context, what kinds of programs are permissible, consistent with the equal protection right. And the precedent is critical on this. The precedent has built up things over time, the Bakke case, of course, the most prominent in the higher education context where the Court rejected remedying past societal discrimination as a basis for an affirmative action program, but the Court accepted diversity as a compelling interest for an affirmative action program. And that rationale has remained as part of the Supreme Court's precedent in the higher education context.

So, the Court applies these principles. They build up case law over time, and that is part of the system of precedent that develops, and that is what I was referring to there, I believe.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. While at the White House, you suggested that a Federal program meant to encourage the participation of minority- and women-owned businesses in transportation contracting was unconstitutional. This was a document that was just made public by the Chair today. Although you say that your—it was your personal opinion in the document, you told Senator Booker that this was just your view as a lawyer for a client. The client was the President at the time.

The program remains in place today, and it is intended to level the playing field and increase the participation of minority- and women-owned businesses in local and State transportation projects. So, I am just trying to understand your views here. Do you believe that the use of race as a factor in Federal contracting programs violates the Fourteenth Amendment?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, my note in that case, as I understand it and have seen it briefly, was rooted in Supreme Court precedent, the Croson case. And I think it even says, “See Croson,” in the email, and Croson is the Supreme Court precedent where the Court had invalidated a Richmond contracting program, as I recall. And so, that precedent made clear what conditions need to be satisfied before a racial—a contracting program of that kind could be sustained consistent with the Constitution.

And the analysis that we went through suggested that, at least as it was being applied, as I recall, the Federal program went afoul of the Supreme Court precedent specified in the Croson case. So, in that sense, I was providing advice about how the program would fit within the Supreme Court’s existing precedent in the Croson case. At least that is my best understanding. I have not gone back to re-study it, but that is my best understanding was, that it was rooted in the precedent of the Supreme Court.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. Well, maybe we can get that in writing at some point if you want to look back at it.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. We have witnessed unprecedented attacks on journalists and journalism over the past several months. This should be concerning to everyone because the role of journalists is critical to our democracy. This is personal for me. My dad was a journalist his entire life, and even wrote a blog—he is now 90—for a while. You probably did not read that one, though.

[Laughter.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. In New York Times v. Sullivan, the Court issued a landmark ruling in support of First Amendment protections for the press by affirming that when newspapers report on public officials, they can say what they want unless they say something untrue with “actual malice.” Under New York Times v. Sullivan, do you believe the First Amendment would permit public officials to sue the media under any standard less demanding than actual malice, and can you explain what that standard means to you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Supreme Court has elaborated on and applied that standard repeatedly over time. I have, too, as a lower court judge, so that precedent has now been applied over and over and over again. I am not aware of much effort to deviate from that standard. Interestingly, in New York Times v. Sullivan, the Court in the course of that opinion said that the Sedition Act of 1798 had been overturned in the court of history, which I thought was an interesting turn of phrase in New York Times v. Sullivan. Of course, the Sedition Act was the act that said that criticism of public officials was illegal in the United States in 1798. Never actually struck down by the Court, but New York Times v. Sullivan made clear that that act had been overturned in the court of history.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. I also want to talk about First Amendment protections for journalists and how journalists have been deterred from doing their jobs at times under threat of jail time. And I have raised this issue in the hearings for many of the Justice Department nominees this Congress. But it is also critical for the Court.

In Branzburg v. Hayes, a 5-to-4 Court did not recognize the reporter's privilege, at least in the context of criminal grand jury testimony. Since then, various circuit courts have debated the contours of the decision with most courts—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. With most courts now recognizing some type of privilege, particularly in civil cases. Can you talk about the scope of that decision and whether there are instances where the Court should recognize a reporter's privilege?

Judge KAVANAUGH. In civil cases. So I did sit on a case once where we had exactly that question presented.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. I knew that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And we had a great oral argument, and it was fascinating, and I put a lot of time into something, and then it settled before our opinion ever came out. So I never actually released my opinion on that issue and—but I know the issue well from the time I spent on that case at the time, and I know the arguments.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. You want to share them with us—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think it is—

Senator KLOBUCHAR [continuing]. In the remaining minute with me here?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is a matter that obviously is the subject of current litigation and could come before me again. So I—as a matter of judicial independence, I cannot do so. But I will say it is a very interesting issue, a question of precedent, and the oral argument in the case, which is available publicly, was fascinating because of the issue presented as you described it.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. How would you apply the First Amendment to a reporter's decision to protect a confidential source?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So there is also important precedent on that matter that makes clear the importance of the relationships of reporters and their sources. Again, the criminal-civil divide there is something that I think has been a part of the case law in the—in the past where the criminal context has been deemed in some cases sufficiently compelling.

But that is set forth as important part of the reporter's privilege, and the relationship with confidential sources is very important, I understand, to the role of journalists in bringing sunlight to American democracy.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before we go to Senator Sasse, I would like to note that we have had some good luck in confirming this week eight Federal judges to lifetime appointments.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Eight Federal judges to lifetime appointments this week. Last week, we did seven judges. Twelve were confirmed without any objection from Democrats. And so we have had a pretty good record finally of being able to show that you do not have anything to fear from lifetime appointments for Federal judges like we have heard a big issue it is today.

Go ahead.

Senator SASSE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, welcome back. Congratulations on your last day of interviewing in your life.

I would like to talk about precedent. You have been a law professor—how long have you been a professor?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I started in 2007 was the first year. I have taught 12 separate calendar years.

Senator SASSE. Okay. Let us pretend you are a sixth grade civics teacher for our 20 minutes together instead of a law professor. I think precedent is critically important, but I do not think the American people—it is not something that we debate in front of them much, so it is something that maybe we could benefit from having more shared understanding about.

Has the Supreme Court ever made a mistake?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has made some major mistakes at times—Dred Scott, Plessy v. Ferguson, good examples.

Senator SASSE. How do you know when you have a mistake?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Sometimes you know right away, and I think in those cases, with the dissents written in those cases, those dissenters knew right away, and I think they were mistakes right away. Plessy v. Ferguson was wrong the day it was decided.

Senator SASSE. It was 1896, and we knew it was wrong when it happened. What was the ruling count? Do you remember the vote?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There was only one dissenter, Justice Harlan, the first Justice Harlan was the only dissenter in that case.

Senator SASSE. Okay. It is so close to McCain's event that I do not—I know we should not be joking right now, but I just want to talk about lunch. Republican Senators have lunch together three times a week, and whenever we do, if somebody's phone goes off, it was always John McCain's.

[Laughter.]

Senator SASSE. When he would get bored at lunch, he would be watching CNN, and he would not know that it came on at full volume 10. So it just felt like a ghost of lunches past.

You wrote a really important article in Catholic Law Review last year, "The 10 Principles of Good Umpiring," and it was not about you as basketball coach. It was about the job of a judge.

I am going to speed through them. So I am oversimplifying, but I think your top 10 list was if you are a judge—or if you are an umpire, you cannot be a partisan. You have got no rooting interest. You have got no fan favorites.

Number two, the rules have to exist before the game.

Number three, you have to apply the rules consistently.

Four, you cannot remake the rules based on your preferences. If your view of the game changes—Dez Bryant a couple of years ago, that catch at the goal line,

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator SASSE. It may be the case that the NFL decides in the course of a year that the targeting penalty does not work. A judge does not get to remake that rule on the fly.

Number five, you have got to have backbone or courage.

Number six, you have to be able to tune out the crowd.

Number seven, you have to have an open mind. You think you know what case is coming before you, and people may present arguments that are different than you thought.

Number eight, you need the right demeanor and temperament.

Number nine, you have to work collegially with your colleagues.

And number 10, you have to be good at explaining.

Rule number two, the rules have to exist before the game. You then go from having a kind of paragraph-by-paragraph structure, you pause and have a long 2(b), and you explain a little bit about precedent. Can you give us a 60- or 90-second view about how precedent relates to having rules of the game before the game?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. Precedent is important for stability and predictability. And so to know what the rules are ahead of time is important for good judging and for good umpiring, and to do it consistently with how it has been done before I think is part of the system of precedent.

The point is when the rules are set ahead of time by the precedent or by the law, then you are not making up the rules as you go along in the heat of the moment, which will seem unfair, which will seem like you are a partisan because you are going to seem like you are favoring one side or another because of allegiance to that team or favoritism to that team rather than applying the rules ahead of time.

Which is why in sports, as you know well, Senator—because I know of your devotion to sports—there are a lot of detailed rules that are set forth about how the game is played and how referees and umpires are supposed to call the game. And that is to ensure that there is predictability, there is stability, that the players can rely on that and that it is overall fairness.

Due process is not a word used often in the refereeing context, but it really is an element of due process. Notice about what the rules are ahead of time so that everyone has confidence in the fairness of the game and that the umpiring, which is critical to the outcome of many games, is done in a fair and impartial way.

So it facilitates impartiality, integrity of the game, fairness of the game. And it is true for games, sports, and it is true—I think the analogy is very strong, frankly, and this is—why I wrote that article is because the Chief Justice of the Court had talked famously about the judge as umpire, and because I coach and play a lot of sports and I really thought about the analogy, and I thought there are actually a lot of parallels between being a good judge and a good umpire. I am a connoisseur of umpiring.

Senator SASSE. I want to jump in here because I agree with you that the analogy is strong and tight, but I think it is imperfect, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator SASSE. Because in a football—mind you, I was a football coach. In a football game, everything that is going to happen inside the four corners of that 120 yards with end zones is predictable in that Woody Hayes comes off the sideline in 1971 and punches a player in the face. That was new, and yet it was still nonparticipation.

There is a rule you can only have 11 players. Coach cannot play. Another 12th player cannot play. And so there was a rule that spoke to that.

But in what you are doing, it is not as defined because the cases that may originate are not as perfectly cabinable, if that is a word, as in football, what might happen. So help me understand the distinction between judging as umpiring and the fact that the Supreme Court has made decisions in the past. It is not the case that every decision the Supreme Court has ever made is right and is now a part of the permanent rulebook. You sometimes have to throw them out.

So sixth-grade level, help us understand how, from 1896 to 1954—you have repeatedly called Brown the greatest moment in Supreme Court history. I think it is one of the greatest moments in American history as well.

In those 58 years, the Court was wrong for that whole time, and yet the way we think about precedent, we might have our sixth-graders thinking we should always take every received decision as right. So how do you reconcile the two?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, with the factors the Supreme Court looks at or whether the decision is not just wrong, but grievously wrong, whether it is inconsistent with the law that has grown up around it, what the real world consequences are, including workability, and then reliance.

And one of the genius moves of Thurgood Marshall, among many genius moves he made as a lawyer, was to start litigating case by case. He knew Plessy was wrong the day it was decided, but he also knew as a matter of litigation strategy the way to bring about this change was to try to create a body of law that undermined the foundations of Plessy.

And he started litigating cases and showing case by case that separate was not really equal. And he did it in cases like Sweatt v. Painter and many other cases. And he built up a record over time that by the time he went to the Supreme Court to argue Brown v. Board of Education, he had shown its inconsistency with the law that had built up around it for those who were not otherwise as quickly onboard with the idea that Plessy was wrong the day it was decided. He was taking no chances.

Senator SASSE. I want to interrupt you because I want you to keep coming forward these 58 years. But just as a civics commercial, what you are describing right here, in the new documentary “Marshall,” every mom and dad and teacher ought to show it to their kids.

I actually got to see it before it was out because Senator Harris gave me a copy, and my kids and I watched it before it was public. But everybody should watch the Marshall documentary that is going through the history of what he was doing as a long-term litigation strategy.

But continue, please.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think that by the time it got to Brown v. Board of Education that the foundations for overturning Plessy had been strengthened by showing what the real world consequences were and by building up a body of law that was inconsistent with the principle, the erroneous principles set forth in Plessy.

And so he had a strategic vision of how to do this, which was brilliant, and he effectuated along with a team of lawyers over time litigating case after case after case and building up factual records that would show the harm, the badge—the Supreme Court ultimately said the badge of inferiority from separate educational facilities and separate—separate facilities more generally. And that is—that is how he was able to show that the precedent, even with principles of stare decisis in place, should be overturned.

Senator SASSE. But so if you were on the Court during that period, that 58-year period—I want to get at some point to this distinction between precedent, super precedent, precedent on precedent, super-duper precedent. But one of the reasons you think this is because of the Harlan dissent.

So back up. And again, sixth-grade level, what is the purpose of a dissent? Why do we write them?

Judge KAVANAUGH. We write dissents because we, in a multi-member court, disagree with the decision that is being made by the majority and because we think that the issue is sufficiently important if you are on the Supreme Court that perhaps a future court will pay attention to your decision, or in a statutory case, sometimes maybe Congress will think that your interpretation of the statute was better, and maybe Congress will update the statute to reflect your review.

But the purpose of dissents in constitutional cases, I think Justice Ginsburg has said this, Justice Scalia used to say this, dissents often speak to the next generation, and it is important, therefore, in constitutional cases of importance to have those dissents. And Harlan’s dissent was a classic. It had some lines that are very memorable about the separation of the races in the Louisiana railcars, and that law had just recently been enacted. So this was an example after the Fourteenth Amendment.

After the Civil War and the Fourteenth Amendment, there was a period of positive movement, at least some positive movement, not complete by any stretch. And Strauder v. West Virginia reflects that in 1880, where the Supreme Court says what is this, but the law should be the same for the Black and the White.

That was a case where African Americans were being excluded from juries—all-White juries—and the Supreme Court said no to that. And, but then progress, any progress went backward, as reflected in the Plessy v. Ferguson decision, which upheld the separation of the races in that case.

And so the Harlan dissent was very important for setting forth a clear principle rooted in the text of the Constitution and rooted in the principles of the Fourteenth Amendment and subsequently vindicated, at least on paper, of course, in Brown v. Board of Education.

Senator SASSE. Why do you write a concurring dissent?

Judge KAVANAUGH. You can write a separate dissent or concurring opinion in the majority opinion. Sometimes you will write a concurring opinion to the majority opinion because you have a different rationale for reaching the same result. So you might have a—

Senator SASSE. So who is your audience?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Your audience, that is a good question. Sometimes it is also future courts. But oftentimes, when you are at the Supreme Court level, I think—I obviously do not know, but I think they are writing concurring opinions sometimes to influence or suggest things to lower courts about how this case, either another issue or related issue or tangential issue, should be resolved or thought about in the lower courts.

Sometimes the concurring opinion is written to the future Supreme Court that might be 5 years down the road about an issue that is related to the issue being decided by the majority opinion. There are lots of different purposes that one might have for a concurring opinion when you are on the Supreme Court, at least as I have read them over the years.

Senator SASSE. So let me give you a hypothetical. You are on the Court, and there is a 6-to-3 decision. And you are on the losing side, and so you write your dissent. And the next year there is a case that looks to you to be almost exactly the same. So you do not grant cert. You do not vote for it, but other people do. And so a case is coming back before you.

And I know you are going to tell me that you need to be open-minded, and maybe the case is really different and you were wrong when you did not grant cert. But just bracket that problem for a minute. Let us pretend, a 6-to-3 case, you lost.

Then there is a new case that comes before you. Are you supposed to have the view of the majority the next year, even though you disagreed last year, or do you write the same dissent again?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So as a matter of precedent, the ordinary course is that you follow the precedent of the Supreme Court, even if you were on the losing side, maybe especially if you were on the losing side. There are times when Justices have persisted in their dissents repeatedly over the years, particularly in certain critical constitutional issues, or sometimes they have not persisted in the dissent but joined the majority, but said I still agree with myself back in the prior precedent where I had dissented originally.

You see different approaches to this by different Justices on different issues. I do not think it is a one-size-fits-all answer to your question, at least in terms of what the Justices have done over time on that particular question. Most famously, Justices Marshall and Brennan dissented in every death penalty case because they did not accept the precedent of the Supreme Court that allowed the death penalty under the Eighth Amendment.

Senator SASSE. So how do you imagine you would act in that circumstance if there is a difference—there is a diversity of views across Justices in our history. But if you have got the same case coming back the next year, do you dissent again, or do you accept a majority opinion? Could you write the majority opinion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is what I think a good judge does, which is once the decision has been made, you accept the precedent, subject to the rules of stare decisis. And yes, there are lots of historical examples where that has happened, and that has been done.

Justice White had been a dissenter in Miranda v. Arizona famously and then wrote many decisions applying Miranda subsequent to that, accepting the decision. Chief Justice Rehnquist, of course, ultimately wrote the decision where the question was whether to overrule Miranda and wrote the decision reaffirming Miranda because he decided that, at that point, it had—did not meet the conditions for overruling a precedent in that case.

So I think ordinarily, ordinarily you get onboard the precedent, but you might still write separately to say I think this was a huge mistake, and we should go back to a different approach. You see that sometimes. I think there are lots—there are lots of permutations to the question you are asking, Senator, but the ordinary course—

Senator SASSE. I want to ask them, but the Chairman will only let me have 3½ more minutes. He is miserly about this.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator SASSE. What is the difference between an appellate court judge's job and a Supreme Court Justice's job?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There are many.

Senator SASSE. Specifically with regard to questions where there has been a precedent.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So at the D.C. Circuit level or the court of appeals level, we follow vertical stare decisis, absolutely, and that means that we are not permitted to deviate from a Supreme Court precedent. With respect to Supreme Court, or let us put it this way, when I am on the D.C. Circuit and we are reconsidering en banc a prior precedent of our own, we can do that at times if the conditions for overruling a precedent are met. We cannot do that with respect to Supreme Court precedent. We have to follow that.

And why is that? Because that is there is one Supreme Court in our hierarchical system, and lower courts have to follow that, or there would be chaos in the Federal system if lower courts were not strictly bound to follow the precedents of the Supreme Court.

Senator SASSE. Is there a single Supreme Court Justice today who agrees with the every extant opinion of the Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that has got to be zero.

Senator SASSE. Right. So how does that get netted out in the next controversial case? When you use these terms—precedent, super precedent, precedent on precedent—how does that get netted out?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Ordinarily, it gets netted out by the Court following the precedent until—until unless or until the conditions for overturning something are met. Brown v. Board being the most prominent example of when that happened. Erie Railroad case overruling Swift v. Tyson. There are examples throughout our history where that has happened.

But it is rare, and ordinarily, what happens is once a decision has been decided, that is what stare decisis means. You follow the decision that has been set forth by the Supreme Court, subject to the rules of stare decisis.

And you see that time and again. That is part of stability. That is part of predictability. That is part of impartiality. That is part of public confidence in the rule of law that it is not just going to move pillar to post, that the law is stable and foundational.

Again, it is not—Brown v. Board shows it is not absolute. And that is a good thing, but it is critically important to the impartiality and stability and predictability of the law.

Senator SASSE. And the fact that Harlan should have been the guiding opinion for those 58 years is not true just for the Supreme Court. It was also true for appellate courts? Could an appellate judge have gone with Harlan in 1940?

Judge KAVANAUGH. An appellate judge was bound by the precedent of the Supreme Court, and that would have been, sadly, Plessy v. Ferguson at that time.

Senator SASSE. So the core difference here for the Supreme Court is there is greater latitude to reconsider the previous errors of the Court.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of the Supreme Court, that is correct, Senator.

Senator SASSE. I am at 30 seconds left. So I have got to get my last one out to get in under the bell. I will shift gears just a tiny little bit.

What is the Declaration of Independence? In what way—the Constitution is fundamental law for us. What is the Declaration of Independence?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, the Declaration of Independence, first of all, is a legal document, legally declaring independence, of course, from Great Britain. But it also sets forth a series of grievances against the monarchy, the system, many of which are reflected in the Constitution in terms of protections that are in the Constitution.

If you trace to the Declaration of Independence, you see the grievances they had reflected and protections we have in the Constitution, starting with the separation of powers, but also including the individual protections, whether it is ex post facto law or freedom of speech or quartering. The Third Amendment not much mitigated, as we know, Senator, but you can trace it.

But this Declaration of Independence is a set of principles that I think guide our beliefs of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. All men are created equal. All people are created equal in our society. And those principles have guided us, inspired us, been the source of our liberty, the source of much of what we have done as a country since the Declaration of Independence.

But it is not law in the same way the Constitution is law that is applied in courts.

Senator SASSE. Thanks.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Chairman Grassley.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator COONS. Thank you, Chairman Grassley.

Thank you, Judge Kavanaugh. To you, to Ashley, to your family and friends, thank you for being here and for the opportunity to engage with you. Again, you have certainly shown great persistence and engagement.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator COONS. In the last round, we talked about the bedrock constitutional principle that no one should be above the law, including the President, which is a principle foundational to our democracy. It is about more than any one person and any one President. And I just want to continue asking you about the President's obligation to cooperate with a Federal investigation and how your view of the President's power might implicate an investigation.

As we all know, in 1974, senior officials in the Nixon administration in the campaign were on trial for crimes related to Watergate. And with so many former White House and Justice Department officials implicated in crimes, then-President Nixon felt threatened by the investigation.

So special prosecutor Archibald Cox, when he issued a grand jury subpoena for the Watergate tapes, audio recordings of White House conversations, reasonably believing they contained evidence of criminal activity, the President acted. Instead of complying with the subpoena for tapes and providing the evidence, President Nixon had the special prosecutor fired, and he fought the subpoena for the tapes all the way to the Supreme Court.

I want to focus on the question of the President's action in firing the special prosecutor because that is what I think is a key issue here. Judge, when President Nixon fired special prosecutor Archibald Cox, did he violate the law or the Constitution?

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I know that the regulation in place for Leon Jaworski after the firing had special protection for against firing, and I think that has become the model for the regulations. I am not recalling the specifics of the Cox regulation in place at the time.

Senator COONS. I will tell you that there were for-cause restrictions in place in regulation at the time. Given that, do you think firing the special prosecutor violated the law or the Constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, if it violated the regulation, it violated the regulation.

Senator COONS. Would it have violated the Constitution? What I am getting at, Judge, is your view of Presidential power and whether or not it would be a violation of the Constitution for there to be these for-cause restrictions on the President's ability to fire the special prosecutor?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think the Supreme Court in United States v. Richard Nixon analyzed the specific regulation at issue in that case and actually relied on the specific regulation in finding that the case was justiciable under the precise terms of the regulation in place at the time. In fact, the Court analyzed that in really specific detail, pointed out that so long as the—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator COONS. Let me be clear about the point I am trying to get to.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator COONS. It is your views about whether or not, when President Nixon fired Archibald Cox, he obstructed justice in violation of the Constitution or the firing itself violated the Constitution. It is important to know your views on U.S. v. Nixon as well, and we will turn to that. But I am interested in your understanding of the Constitution and whether or not it prohibits restrictions on the President's ability to fire a special prosecutor at will.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So the Supreme Court said, and so you are asking my views. My views are what the precedent says. In other words, I follow the precedent. The precedent of the Supreme Court in the U.S. v. Nixon case did apply that regulation, analyzed—

Senator COONS. And Judge, U.S. v. Nixon was unanimous. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It was unanimous, 8-to-0.

Senator COONS. Are you aware of any Justice having questioned the decision in U.S. v. Nixon since then?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. I have called it one of the four greatest moments in Supreme Court history, U.S. v. Richard Nixon.

Senator COONS. You have, and that is exactly what I want to get to because you have also, in another context, as we talked about yesterday, in a roundtable in 1999, volunteered unprompted that maybe Nixon was wrongly decided. Do you think U.S. v. Nixon was wrongly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have said it was one of the four greatest decisions and correct decisions in terms of the specific regulation at issue in the case and the Court's holding in the context of a criminal trial subpoena, that the subpoena for the information, the tapes was enforceable in that context. And that is what I have said before publicly about the Nixon case.

And that 1999—

Senator COONS. So, Judge, you would agree that it was correctly decided? Did I just hear you right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I—yes, of course. When I say it is one of the great—I mean, when I say something is the greatest, that means I agree with it. And the point was under the specific regulation at issue in that case, a criminal trial subpoena for the information, and it was a moment of judicial independence, a moment where the Court, I think, came together as unanimous opinion written by Chief Justice Burger. So that is an important moment in the Court's history.

Senator COONS. So you would agree then, just following the U.S. v. Nixon precedent, that a Court can order a President to produce records in response to a grand jury subpoena or can be compelled to testify in front of the grand jury?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not going to answer hypotheticals about to apply U.S. v. Nixon.

Senator COONS. But that is the holding?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The holding of U.S. v. Nixon was that the subpoena for the information in the context of the criminal trial had to—could be enforced and that, therefore, given the regulation at issue in the case, the case was justiciable, and the subpoena could be enforced. I am not going to answer hypotheticals about how it applies in other contexts.

By the way, I should add that the context of what you have up there is incorrect. So, but I have said Nixon was one of the four greatest moments in Supreme Court history. I have written it several times before—

Senator COONS. You have.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Including 1999. The context of that, if you want to know, was a roundtable with me and some lawyers who had represented the Clinton administration. We were just talking, reflecting on the independent counsel investigation. And my point to them, they were concerned that the subpoenas that were enforced by the courts during the Starr independent counsel investigation had weakened the Presidency. That was the position of the Clinton lawyers.

And I said, well, we were just following U.S. v. Nixon. That was my position. So my position was either you are wrong or Nixon is wrong, to the Clinton lawyers. And that is the context of that comment. The tone of voice there makes the printed words look much different from how they were intended, and I think that been seriously mischaracterized.

Senator COONS. And the striking thing about the context, which we discussed before and I made clear in a letter I was going to question you about, is that Phil Lacovara, who was facilitating this roundtable, who was the Watergate prosecutor who argued U.S. v. Nixon, in a later interview said he did not think you were just being provocative, this was just some academic give-and-take with some Clinton lawyers. Lacovara has been quoted saying that statement that perhaps Nixon was wrongly decided was Brett staking out his jurisprudential approach since law school.

It seems Lacovara thought you were serious about raising a question about whether U.S. v. Nixon was wrongly decided because—and this is what you said at the roundtable—Nixon took away the power of the President to control information in the executive branch.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. And that is why the Clinton lawyers, I thought, were wrong.

Senator COONS. So—

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was my point.

Senator COONS. Why should the person being investigated—

Judge KAVANAUGH. The point, the point—the point that I was making was that Clinton lawyers, who were—were saying that the independent counsel office had weakened the Presidency, I was saying to the Clinton lawyers it was not the Starr office who had done that. It was United States v. Nixon that had done that. And then I pointed out to the Clinton lawyers—and I think we have discussed this in the office, had a good discussion in your office about this—was I said, but you were unwilling. I said this to the Clinton lawyers. You were unwilling to challenge United States v. Nixon.

Well, that was the governing precedent, and that is the precedent we were litigating, and that is where your concern should be. And that is the context in which that line was said. With all respect to Mr. Lacovara, I think he is misunderstanding what I was saying there.

And here is how I know he was misunderstanding. Because in a contemporaneous Law Review article at that same time, I specifically talked about U.S. v. Nixon and the importance of that precedent. So that is how I know he was misunderstanding the point of what—I respectfully think he was misunderstanding the point of what I was saying there.

Senator COONS. So if U.S. v. Nixon was rightly decided, was Morrison v. Olson rightly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I have talked about Morrison v. Olson.

Senator COONS. Yes. That was the whole point of our exchange yesterday, and that is the root of my core concern. And what I am getting at in this whole line—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have associated myself with Justice Kagan's position on Morrison v. Olson.

Senator COONS. And given our exchange yesterday, I went back and looked at "Presidential Administration," her article where she expressly rejects unitarianism, as she calls it, the unitary executive theory. The theory that you do not just mention in passing but expound in your PHH dissent.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not—

Senator COONS. It is exactly this reason that I have concerns, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I specifically recognize, Senator—and I understand the point. But I specifically call Humphrey's Executor the precedent that we must follow in the independent agency context. Humphrey's Executor, of course, accepts independent agencies, as did I in that case, as precedent of the Supreme Court that I have referred to as entrenched.

The only thing I was—the only question in PHH was can we go further than that kind of independent agency, consistent with Article II, or does Humphrey's Executor draw the line that sets forth the permissible boundaries under which Congress can establish independent agencies?

Senator COONS. In an exchange you had with Senator Feinstein earlier today, this was exactly the question where I do not think you ever really answered it.

As I understand your dissent in the CFPB case, PHH v. CFPB, your exact problem with the structure Congress created for this independent agency was that the Director was not removable at will by the President. The Director is removable, but only for cause.

That is the line that I am drawing here between your concerns or criticisms in one context a long time ago about U.S. v. Nixon, your comments about being able to fire the prosecutor at will in a number of Law Review articles, your comments in some roundtables and discussions in 2016, and the dissent in PHH and the structure of the CFPB. What offended your constitutional sensibilities, as I understand your dissent, Judge, this year in PHH, was that the President could not fire at will the Director.

And that is the whole reason of my asking you about did the President violate the Constitution, in your understanding, in firing the special prosecutor in Watergate? It is a coherent theory. You can have a coherent theory that the Congress cannot restrain the President's ability to fire at will lesser executive branch officials. I just want to have a clear understanding of it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I want to understand the question. So the first part of the question was, part of your premise—

Senator COONS. So earlier today, let us return to an earlier exchange you had with Senator Feinstein. She was asking you about your dissent in PHH. What was it that caused you to write an opinion, what was the constitutional view, the underpinnings of your decision that having a single Director removable for cause by the President was constitutionally unsound?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay, I can explain. Can I get a minute?

Senator COONS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. So I was following a precedent of the Supreme Court from about 10 years ago, Free Enterprise Fund case. I had written the dissent at the D.C. Circuit in that case, a novel independent agency structure for the PCAOB, the accounting oversight board.

Senator COONS. Right. I am familiar.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I wrote a dissent saying that the—that structure departed from the traditional independent agency structure. I dissented. The Supreme Court took the case, agreed with my dissent in a majority opinion by Chief Justice Roberts saying that the outer lines, at least as I interpret what Chief Justice Roberts said for the Court, the outer lines of independent agencies are the traditional independent agency structures set forth in Humphrey's Executor. At least that is how I interpreted the opinion.

And then—

Senator COONS. But was Humphrey's Executor not also, Judge, critically about removable at will versus for-cause?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. And that is so long as it—

Senator COONS. And is this not exactly why the majority in your Circuit said that your dissent flew in the face of Morrison?

Judge KAVANAUGH. They thought Humphrey's Executor allowed structures beyond the multi-member agency that was upheld—

Senator COONS. Yes, exactly.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In Humphrey's Executor. I disagreed, based on the Free Enter—the same thing had been said about my dissent in Free Enterprise Fund. The Supreme Court took it and agreed with my dissent in Free Enterprise Fund. I thought this case is very similar to what I had written in Free Enterprise Fund. In fact, I block quote my old dissent.

Senator COONS. But what you did not say in response to Senator Feinstein's question that I am still trying to get an answer to, was not your core concern in your PHH dissent that the President could not fire at will the Director of the CFPB?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was the concern because that departed from history to have a single Director independent agency structure, not the multi-member independent agency structure that existed in Humphrey's Executor, and that had—

Senator COONS. And you can see how that then raises questions and concerns about your distinction between fireable at will or fireable for cause.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But—

Senator COONS. And as this body has taken up and debated whether or not it is permissible for us to legislate a protection for special prosecutors that they can only be fired for cause, not at will, your repeated citation of the Scalia dissent in Morrison v. Olson rises again to the fore. Thus, my question to you. Will you also agree that Morrison was correctly decided?

It is good law. It is a settled case. You may have in a response to a previous question said, oh, it is a one-off case about a now extinguished statute.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator COONS. But as I said yesterday, why then pick it out of the whole constellation of constitutional opinions as the one you most want to put a nail in its coffin? Why the animus against this if you do not think it was wrongly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have said what I have said about Morrison, but Justice Kagan said that it is one of the greatest dissents ever written by Justice Scalia, which—

Senator COONS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Unless I am misreading something—

Senator COONS. You are misreading something, Judge, with all due respect. I went back to look at “Presidential Administration” by Justice Kagan after you cited it to me yesterday. That is clearly not what she is saying. She is not endorsing the unitary executive.

Judge KAVANAUGH. You are conflating—

Senator COONS. She is saying Scalia wrote a beautiful dissent, in my view.

Judge KAVANAUGH. You do not think she agrees with it?

Senator COONS. I do not think she agrees with it at all.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think when she calls something the greatest, she probably agrees with it.

Senator COONS. But let us get to what you believe. What I am encouraged by is, that you have said when you call U.S. v. Nixon the greatest, you think it is rightly decided. What I am not getting an answer from you on is whether you think Morrison v. Olson was rightly decided.

But I would be interested in hearing whether you think Griswold v. Connecticut or Eisenstadt v. Baird were correctly decided. An opinion that Justices Kennedy, Ginsburg, Roberts, and Alito proffered when they were before this Committee in their confirmation hearing—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I—

Senator COONS [continuing]. Were those correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I said last night in response to Senator Harris, who asked me about whether I agree with Senator— with Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts on that, I said yes.

Senator COONS. That they were correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I answered that I agreed with Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts.

Senator COONS. Can I just take a minute and explore your view of the independent counsel, the idea that the independent counsel statute is unconstitutional? Because you have written and spoken about that repeatedly. 1998, 1999, in law journal articles and public speeches. As I perhaps pointedly raised yesterday, in 2016, you called the independent counsel statute a “constitutional travesty.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what Senator Durbin had also, in essence, called it.

Senator COONS. Well, what I am concerned about is what you said about it because you are the nominee for the Supreme Court, not Senator Durbin.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is what the entire—that is what the entire Congress, the entire Congress had basically taken that view in 1999 that it was unrestrained, unaccountable, a disaster.

Senator COONS. Let us say it was widely panned.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But it is very different—

Senator COONS. But you chose to call it out as a constitutional travesty, and you are the nominee for the Supreme Court in front of me. So just give me a moment. While you worked for Ken Starr as independent counsel under the independent counsel statute, you took an oath of office to defend the Constitution. Correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. As interpreted by the—you know, you follow precedent of the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court has upheld something, you still work in your public service.

Senator COONS. So you took an oath. You were engaged in public service. You believed then, as we all do, that it was your job to act in compliance with the Constitution. But you also fully utilized the tools available to the independent counsel, right? You were part of a team that sought a subpoena against President Clinton for evidence, for DNA evidence. Yes?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I get 30 seconds?

Senator COONS. I think this is a “yes” or “no” question. I am down to 2 minutes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I get 30 seconds?

Senator COONS. If it is your last 30 seconds.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. I want to emphasize that the special counsel system that is in place now is something that I have specifically repeatedly and expressly said is consistent with our traditions in my 1999 Georgetown Law Journal article and in the CFPB decision. The special counsel system, I have said, is part of our tradition.

That is the system in place. You are talking about something that has not been in place for 20 years.

Senator COONS. That is right. The independent counsel statute, that structure, has not been in place for 20 years. My core concern, first, was that you were perfectly happy to use all the tools available to the independent counsel when you worked there. After working there, discovered an enthusiasm for its invalidation as a constitutional matter.

In trying to understand that, I have dug into your writings, your opinions, your speeches and concluded that you hold a view of the executive branch, which I believe you made clear this year in your PHH dissent, which I believe is in line with Justice Scalia’s view as expounded in his dissent in Morrison v. Olson, which is that there has to be in the President, as the chief law enforcement officer of the United States—this is the unitary executive theory, not mine—the ability to fire at will any special prosecutor.

And the ability—and I have got quotes from you in different contexts saying that what is appropriate in this traditional special counsel setting like the Watergate period is if the President disagrees with the conduct of the prosecutor, he should simply fire him and bear the consequences.

My point essentially is this. I am convinced that you—you have said repeatedly you support the traditional practice of appointing special counsels, but you have not acknowledged you have supported this practice because the President has retained the power to fire the special counsel at will. And those of us who have tried to enact statutes that might restrain the President in some way, by putting in place for-cause removal restrictions, have had thrown back at us the dissent from Morrison v. Olson, a dissent which you embrace and cite and a dissent which I think reveals a deep commitment to a view of the President that in our current context is profoundly dangerous.

And I simply wish, Judge—and we will have a third round to explore this. I simply wish you would be clear with us and the American people about your view of the scope of Presidential power and what its consequences might be. I do not think you are being direct with me about that because I think to be direct with me about that in this context would put your nomination at risk.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I would respectfully disagree, Senator. You are talking about a statute that has been—not existed for 20 years.

Senator COONS. That is no longer what I am talking about, Your Honor, as you know. What I am talking about is your view of Presidential power as made clear in speeches and in writings and in a decision this year. We are not talking about the independent counsel statute now. We are talking about the scope of Presidential authority, and I think it has consequences for our Nation.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You can answer.

Senator COONS. You are clearly a capable and good man.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You can answer.

Senator COONS. And a good neighbor and a good coach, and we have heard a lot about that. What I want to hear more about is an honest answer about your view of Presidential power.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You can answer.

Judge KAVANAUGH. You are talking—if I can answer uninterrupted for 25 seconds?

Chairman GRASSLEY. You can answer—you can answer on the 10 minutes I did not use.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. Respectfully, Senator, first of all, I appreciate your care—and we have known each other since law school, we have been friendly with each other since law school—and your devotion to this. Respectfully, I believe you are talking about a statute that has not been in place since 1999.

Second, the special counsel system I have specifically written about multiple times and approved. Third, if there were some kind of protection, for-cause protection or some other kind of protection that were different from the old independent counsel statute, I have said that I would keep an open mind about that. So I have not said anything to rule that out.

And finally, I have reaffirmed repeatedly or I have applied repeatedly the precedent of Humphrey's Executor for traditional independent agencies and have never suggested otherwise. I have referred to that as an entrenched precedent.

So those are—and I have referred to U.S. v. Nixon as one of the greatest decisions in Supreme Court history.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We will soon take a break, and then Senator Flake is up next. But before, there is a couple of things.

One, it will be a 15-minute break, but if you can make it 7½ minutes, I would appreciate it.

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, I am not ordering you to do that. I just said I would appreciate it.

But before you go, I want to get back to this Justice Kagan's comment on Morrison, and this is something that you and the Senator from Delaware have discussed a long time. Somehow that the only commentary on Morrison v. Olson is from Kagan's Law Review article, "Presidential Administration."

But she also said this in a magazine, Stanford Lawyer, 3 years ago. And it says, "Justice Kagan has called Justice Scalia's dissent in Morrison one of the greatest dissents ever written and said that every year it gets better."

We are in recess.

[Whereupon, at 3:48 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Whereupon, at 4:03 p.m., the Committee reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Tell me when you are ready, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, sir.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Flake.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you. Judge Kavanaugh, if it is fourth quarter and you are down by 1 point, what play do you call and which one of the young ladies in the front row do you get the ball to?

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I cannot choose. They are all great players, as you know, Senator. It is awesome to have them all here.

Senator FLAKE. Do you want to let us know who they are and what your team is here?

Judge KAVANAUGH. These are a variety of teams that I have coached. So, I started coaching many years ago, and some of these girls are as old as 10th grade now, so they are older than my daughters. I started coaching the Fifth-16 then, I guess, 4 years ago. So, the oldest girls, Caroline and Abigail, 10th grade; Sara and Fiona, 10th graders; Madison, ninth grader. Girls over here. Well, these are my two, of course, and Keegan, and Coco, and Anna, and Shawnee, Quinn, Sophie are all here. And so, let us see. We have got: Liza is going into the fifth grade, Margaret is in seventh, Keegan is in fifth, Coco is in fifth, Anna is in seventh, Shawnee is in seventh, Quinn is in sixth, and Sophie is in seventh. So, I think I got it all right, yes.

[Applause.]

Senator FLAKE. Well, thank you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And they are all awesome players. They really are. I mean, they are tough as nails, right, Caroline? Caroline Conahan, no one tougher.

Senator FLAKE. Well, there goes my whole line of questioning.

[Laughter.]

Senator FLAKE. Well, thank you all for coming. Welcome here. Let me ask a variation on the question that Senator Sasse asked a few minutes ago. He asked you what Supreme Court decisions over the years were decided wrongly. You answered. You have decided over the past 12 years about 307 cases, I believe, on the circuit court. Are there any that you look back on and say I just did not get it right, or this one has not held up well over time? And I know that is a difficult question. I mean, as politicians, that is a tough thing for us to answer, but I would be glad to, you know, tell you the number of cases where Senator Sasse got it wrong.

Senator SASSE. And I will reserve my time for rebuttal.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, Senator, I will point out where I reconsidered something in one case. So, the Bahlul national security case that I had, one of the questions in that case was what did the “law of war” mean in Section 821, and I referenced it in a prior case as being limited solely to the international law of war. And then after reflection and actually after the Deputy Solicitor General for President Obama argued in our court, at oral argument he planted a seed in me that I interpreted it too narrowly, and that it included not just the international law of war, but the U.S. historical practice.

And I went back and really thought about that. He made a compelling case at oral argument, and I went back and dug deeper and studied it, and ultimately concluded he was right in what he had said at oral argument, and I referenced that in my subsequent Bahlul opinion that based on the arguments of the Deputy Solicitor General, I had gone back. It is like—it is like a replay official. You know, I made the call on the original case, but gone back and looked at it again carefully, studied it over and over again, and went back to the history, and concluded he was right. So, that is one example where I myself in one of my opinions pointed out that in a previous decision, I had, you know, under-interpreted the scope of one statute.

Senator FLAKE. Going a little further there, which ones have you struggled with? Which ones were the most difficult, and how did you deal with those?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think what Justice Kennedy used to say in response to that question is something that always comes into my mind. When he was always asked what is the hardest case, what is the most difficult case, he would always say, “The one I am working on right now.” And I think that is—I think that—there is something to that, which is every case you want to give it your all and you are focused on the case you are working on at that moment.

There, of course—more responsive to your question, I think what Justice Kennedy said is correct, but perhaps more directly responsive to your question, I, of course, think national security cases are quite difficult and quite important because you know the significance of them. But, so, too, every case has an effect on real people in the real world. So, I want to give every single case, give it my all. I do not treat any case as a second-tier case. I treat every case as the most important case. And that is why I think Justice Kennedy’s comment really does resonate with me and does point out something, which is to the litigant before you in that particular case, that is the most important case they will ever have. It is probably the only case they will ever have, and it is important that I treat it as the most important case for me at that moment in time and while I am deciding it.

Senator FLAKE. Can you talk briefly a little bit about the process that you have undergone in the appellant court. It will be a little different at the Supreme Court level. But when a case comes before you, you sit down with your clerks I am sure, and assign research to them. Do they frequently work with other clerks, compare notes? Do you do that with the other judges? How does it usually work, and how might that be different with the job you are applying for?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think there are a lot of similarities to the Supreme Court in terms of the process from my time clerking for Justice Kennedy at least, my experience there and seeing how it works now. So, in basic terms, what I do is I read the briefs very carefully. I have my clerks prepare binders, many, many binders of all the cases I need to read, of all—I like to know the law review article and treatises on point. I like to go back and see if there are any historical materials that might be, and they are all in the binders. Then I will talk about it with the clerks. I will have one clerk who is handling it, but sometimes talk about it with all the clerks, about my tentative views.

The judges, interestingly, do not talk about the case ahead of time with each other, and the reason for that is we each want to come into the oral argument having formed our own tentative approaches and questions, and not having been influenced by maybe, well, this is what the other judge thinks, and so, that will suddenly influence you. But if we come into the oral argument with three independent perspectives, the practice has been that will help us reach a more informed decision. Each of us will be prepared.

Then at the oral argument itself—it is so important—we learn from the lawyers, but we also learn from each other at the oral, the questions, similarly the way this process works. You hear the questions of other Senators, and that sparks thoughts for you to ask questions and other Senators to ask questions. So, too, for the judges. Then we conference right after oral argument, and we give our tentative views and go around and debate and discuss. And it is very collegial, and there is a lot of fluidity in that discussion. It is not as—it is not here is my position and that is it. It is never—for 12 years, I have never been in a single conference where any judge has said anything like that. Rather, it is a here is what I am thinking, what are you thinking, and we go around and go in turns, and then discuss it, and reach a tentative resolution.

Then we write it up. One judge is assigned to draft up the opinion and writes—that is an intense process for me and I think for all judges of draft after draft after draft, and I talked about that, to get it exactly right. I want it to be clear, and I want it to be consistent with precedent, and I do not want to—I want the losing party to think they have gotten a fair shake. I want the affected parties to be able to understand it, to be as clear as possible.

And that discipline of writing sometimes convinces you you might have gotten it wrong when you first were thinking about it, and sometimes you change 180 sometimes, but often will just shift your views. But the writing is such a discipline. That is an important—the whole thing is a process with three judges, or nine on the Supreme Court, that is designed to make sure you get it right. And so, the collective decisionmaking process combined with the discipline of preparing and the discipline of oral argument, the discipline of writing it out.

That is why judges when they come here are very reluctant when they get a hypothetical to just give a one-off answer without going through that process. Process protects us as judges. It protects the people who are affected by our decisions. So, we are—we love process because we are used to process, and process, in our view, helps us make better and more informed decisions.

Senator FLAKE. Thanks. Let me talk a little about what I touched on yesterday, obviously the independence of the judiciary or separation of powers are what's at issue here, and the most important questions I think you have been asked are about that. Senator Coons and I, along with a few others, traveled to Southern Africa a few months ago, and we met there with the constitutional court of South Africa at a time when just a few weeks before, or a month before, they had ruled against the sitting president, expenditure of funds issue and a few other things. But rendered a decision against the president of the country, the executive, that allowed the parliament then to go in and remove him.

And we talked about that, and they marveled at how this country—this country of South Africa had had such a court that understood their role and how important it was to be completely independent of the executive. One of the justices put it, well, he said, we cannot allow the executive to climb over the lectern, and I thought that that was an image that is apropos here as well. There have to be some limits to Executive power where he, head of the executive branch—the President in our case—cannot climb over the lectern. And in many cases, just north to Zimbabwe where for the past 37 years, Robert Mugabe had over a period of time climbed over the lectern enough where—to put judges in place that would rule whatever he wanted.

And the genius of our system, or separation of powers, and the independent judiciary is that we can never allow that to happen, and there have to be constraints. And you mentioned some of them yesterday with regard to what constrains the President. But still, the President has immense powers largely because we have conceded too much from the Article I branch to the Article II branch.

But when we talk about Presidential power now, I was struck by a conversation you had yesterday with Senator Feinstein, and I want to explore it a bit. You mentioned as a point of pride, and I think it is a point of pride, that you had ruled in the Hamdan case after 9/11. This is one of the bodyguards or drivers for Osama bin Laden. It was an extremely unpopular decision, but one to protect his constitutional rights, and to ensure that we just did not look and say, here, here is something unpopular, we cannot protect his rights.

Yet when you were asked why you feel how you do now on the independent counsel statute, you feel differently than you did in the 1990s. And you mentioned to Senator Feingold that you feel differently because of 9/11. And that ostensibly, the President needs to be given more reign, I guess, because he needed to focus on national security issues. But I am trying to square that. I think that your explanation of how you ruled in the Hamdan case is admirable. I am not sure about your explanation with regard to giving the President more leash or more authority because of 9/11 squares with that. Can you shed some light?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was simply a proposal in 2009 when President Obama was coming into office that for Congress to consider, but there would be pros and cons if Congress did consider something like that, about—and it was not immunity. It was simply the timing of litigation, the Clinton v. Jones scenario, for example. And it was something—an idea based on my experience, but Congress would, of course, consider the pros and cons.

The principle I emphasized there was no one is above the law in the United States Constitution under the—in the United States Government. There is a question, and that is Federalist 69, of course, but it is also woven right into the text of the Constitution. But there is a question about timing for members of the military, for example. That is why we defer—have deferral for them. But it was not a constitutional position, so I really want to emphasize that, Senator, that that was not a position of what I thought was required by the Constitution; rather, something to be studied as Congress studies things all the time to ensure the effective operation of the Government.

On your point about Hamdan, I do think some of the—and your point about your trip, some of the great moments in Supreme Court history have been those moments of judicial independence and moments of political crisis, the Youngstown Steel case. We were at war with Korea, and the President seizes steel mills, well intentioned because it is well intentioned to serve the war effort, but the Court says it is not consistent with law, and, therefore, unlawful, and the Court rules against President Truman.

We talked a lot about the United States v. Richard Nixon case, a unanimous decision in 1974 by Chief Justice Burger who had been appointed. The Clinton v. Jones case itself was a moment where the President of the United States was ruled against by the Supreme Court, including two of his appointees. The Boumediene and Hamdan cases in the Supreme Court, before Hamdan came back to me, were cases; Boumediene by Justice Kennedy in 2008 ruling against President Bush, Boumediene v. Bush, in a wartime case.

And so, to my Hamdan case, I do look at that as a case where the rule of law protects all who come into court regardless of who you are. And no one is above the law, and the President is subject to many legal restraints in terms of the official capacity, the war effort. And I think my decisions have shown that independence in a variety of areas.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you. Let me shift gears in my final couple of minutes to technology. We struggle here in Congress with striking a balance obviously between security, freedom, between innovation, privacy. We just had the Facebook hearing in this room along with the Commerce Committee, and questioned Mark Zuckerberg on these issues. A late night comic that night commented that with all of us questioning out here, at least five of us, our password for our email is, “password.” And so, we were not as nimble in dealing with a lot of these issues, but the same applies to the Court.

How does the Court, how will the Court, how would you as a Supreme Court Justice deal with these issues? Would you describe yourself as technologically literate? I know you have dealt with these issues on the D.C. Circuit, but balancing privacy, and innovation, and security, and freedom. This is going to make up a big chunk of what the Supreme Court does over the coming months and years.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I do think that technological developments are going to be a huge issue for the Supreme Court over the next generation. And Chief Justice Roberts has been a—writing some of the key opinions, the Carpenter case most recently, which was a very important decision, the Riley case before that. And you see how he is—and this would not necessarily have been predicted at the time of his 2005 hearing, how he has focused and led the Court in making sure the Fourth Amendment keeps abreast of technological developments, and his opinions are very clear.

Senator FLAKE. Specifically, what impact does technology have on the Fourth and the First Amendments?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I think the Carpenter case explains that once upon a time if a piece of information of yours ended up in the hands of a third party and the Government got a third party, that really was not any effect on your privacy. But now when all of our data is in the hands of a business, a third party, and the Government obtains all your data, all your emails, all your texts, all your information, your financial transactions, your whole life is in the hands of a data company and the Government gets that, your privacy is very well affected. And that is the importance, I think, of the Carpenter decision is that it recognizes that change and understanding of our understandings of privacy. And I think going forward that is going to be a critical issue.

One of the cases I did write an opinion in, GPS surveillance, and putting a GPS tracker on your car. And I wrote an opinion in the D.C. Circuit where I recognized that putting a GPS tracker on your car was an invasion. A new technology was an invasion of your property. And, therefore, was something that violated the Fourth Amendment.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, and was something that the Supreme Court then in an opinion by Justice Scalia adopted that approach to recognizing the GPS surveillance. But I think going forward, as I have said, these are backward-looking hearings sometimes, but the forward-looking question you asked is, I think, a very important one about the change in Fourth Amendment, not doctrine, but the change in technology that in turn requires us to understand it as we apply Fourth Amendment doctrine going forward, and First Amendment free speech principles as well. Our conception of speech will have to take account of the technological developments as well.

Senator FLAKE. Just one last question. What does an independent judiciary mean in terms of judges and their personal political or religious beliefs? Have you known good judges who are Democrats, Republicans? Do you see a difference? Are they viewed that way? What about Catholic, or Mormon, or Muslim, or an atheist? What should be our approach to judiciary in that sense?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think, Senator, all judges are independent. We do not sit in separate caucus rooms. We do not sit on sides of an aisle. We are not Republican judges or Democratic judges. We are independent United States judges, and so, too, with respect to religious beliefs. As I have written, we are equally American no matter what religion we are or if we have no religion at all. And so, too, as judges. We are all equally United States judges no matter what religion we are, and we see that right in the text of the Constitution that no religious test shall be imposed as a qualification for any office in the United States.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thanks, Mr. Chairman. Good afternoon, Your Honor.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And welcome to your team.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I want to, first of all, tie up a couple of loose ends from yesterday. I asked you yesterday whether during your service in the Bush administration you took the position that not all legal scholars believe Roe v. Wade is settled law, and whether the Supreme Court could overrule it. You said, in fact, that the Supreme Court could, and you declined to say whether you would commit to saying that you would not vote to overturn Roe v. Wade. I believe, thanks to that exchange, that an email has now been made public in which you took exactly that position, and you argued in that email that Roe can be overturned.

My question to you is whether during that break, did anyone suggest to you that I would ask about this email? I think we took a break before I asked you my question. Did anyone ask you whether—did anyone suggest to you that I might ask about this email during the break before the questioning?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Just now?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. No, yesterday.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Boy, I am not remembering. I am not remembering one way or another. What did I—I am not remembering.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Did anyone show you this email during the session yesterday at any point?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would have to check actually. I do not remember. During each break yesterday, I have had—I have had these emails, I think.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And you reviewed this one before you came to testify.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not—I am not going to remember, Senator, but I do know that that email does refer to what—my impression of what legal scholars think. It is not—I think the premise of your questions was, respectfully—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, if you do not—if you do not remember somebody—whether someone showed it to you or not, I want to move on to another area. You were asked yesterday by Senator Harris as to whether you had certain conversations about the special counsel investigation with anyone outside of the group of judges on the D.C. Circuit. At that point, your answer was vague, and it was again this morning when Senator Hatch asked you about it. So, I want to ask you very specifically, have you discussed the special counsel investigation with anyone outside of the group of judges on the D.C. Circuit?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have had no inappropriate discussions with anyone. Of course, it is on—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Have you had any discussions with anyone, appropriate or inappropriate?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, when—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Have you ever talked about the special counsel investigation with anyone outside the—

Judge KAVANAUGH. If you are walking around in America, it is coming up, Senator, so people discuss it. But in terms of—I have never made any—let me just finish if I could. I have never suggested anything about my views about anything, commitments, foreshadowing. I have had no inappropriate discussions. Of course, first of all, let me tell you a few contexts in which it can come up. Our courthouse has a lot of activity going on in it because of that. There are a lot of people there, so those are discussions that will come up.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Let me be more specific so that we sort of hone in on what my concern is. Have you ever talked to anybody in the White House about the special counsel investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have no discussions with people in the White House about—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. No one, including—

Judge KAVANAUGH. What do you mean by—I guess I just want to make sure I am understanding what your question is going for. I have had no issues where I have discussed my views on any matters, issues, cases, no hints, previews, forecasts, no—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But have you ever talked about the special counsel investigation with Don McGahn, who is behind you, or anyone else in the White House? That is a simple “yes” or “no.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not remembering any discussions like that. Of course, in preparing for this hearing I prepared for questions like the one you are asking.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And they have—

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, those are—those are moot court sessions where we have—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, what discussions have you had about the special counsel with people in the White House?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have not had discussions—if I am understanding your question correctly, I have not had such discussions, but I want to make sure I am understanding your question correctly.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. It is pretty simple English. Have you talked about the special counsel with anyone in the White House, anybody who works for the President of the United States?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, you just rephrased the question, though. That was about Mr. Mueller this time, and previously it was about the investigation. But I have had no—if I am understanding the question correctly, no discussions of the kind you are asking.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. So, you are saying, no, you have had no discussions. You have not talked to anyone in the White House about Robert Muller or the special counsel investigation.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, you changed the question again, Senator. Of course, I know Mr. Mueller personally from my prior experience in the—I mean, I have not seen him in a long time, but I knew him when we worked in the Bush administration. So, but I have no discussions of the kind that I think you are asking about.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, I am asking about the kind you are thinking about, not myself.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I have not had any discussions of the kind I am thinking about either.

[Laughter.]

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, I am going to take that as a “no,” which you are giving under oath, and we can put aside the humor for the moment.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right, I am not trying to be humorous, I am trying to be accurate. For example, if someone says your courthouse—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. No, I am talking about discussions with anybody who works for the President of the United States in the White House about the special counsel. And so far, frankly, your answer has been ambiguous.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not think it has been ambiguous.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. You have dodged the question. You have ducked it. It is the same question again and again and again, and I am going to move on because I have other ground to cover.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Have you had conversations about the special counsel investigation with anyone at the Kasowitz, Benson, and Torres firm?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, I do not remember anything like that.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Are you acquainted with anyone at that firm?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I know Ed McNally used to work at the White House Counsel’s Office, and I now—I understand that he works at that law firm.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Have you ever talked to him about the special counsel investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Are you acquainted with Marc Kasowitz?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am not.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Are you acquainted with anyone else at the Kasowitz law firm?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not believe so, but as I discussed with Senator Harris last night, I did not know, for example, Senator Lieberman worked at that firm, and he spoke to the judges a couple of years ago before this. But that is the kind of thing I was worried about when I was talking with Senator Harris last night is that I do not have the full roster. But I am pretty confident the answer is no.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Okay. We have talked about the independence of the judiciary, and you have spoken compellingly about the importance of an independent judiciary, and I could not agree more. I think the heroes of this era will be the independent judiciary and our free press. I want to talk to you about President Trump's attacks on the judiciary. They have been blatant, craven, and repeated, and I want to quote to you a couple of those attacks.

I have achieved a partial quotation of them, 41 tweets attacking the judiciary. But the one I want to cite to you is from July 13, 2013 when he said, of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, "Justice Ginsburg of the United States Supreme Court has embarrassed all by making very dumb political statements about me. Her mind is shot. Resign!" November 10th, 2013, again, speaking about Justice Ginsburg, "Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg was going to apologize to me for her misconduct. Big mistake by an incompetent judge." Do you believe that Justice Ginsburg "embarrassed us all"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I have, of course, spoken about all the Justices individually during the course of this hearing, and my—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. If I may interrupt, and I say this with all due respect, this is a question where less is more in the answer. Do you think Justice Ginsburg has embarrassed us all?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not going to get drawn into a political controversy, a line I have maintained. I am not going to get three zip codes of a political controversy here.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. This is not political. This is about Justice Ginsburg. Do you believe that her "mind is shot"?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, respectfully, you are asking me to, after having read those comments, you are asking me to comment on something another person said, and I am not going to do that. I have spoken about my—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Do you believe that—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have spoken about—

Senator BLUMENTHAL [continuing]. She's an incompetent judge?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have spoken about my respect and appreciation for the eight Justices on the Supreme Court, my—the honor it would be if I were to be confirmed to be part of that Team of Nine with those eight people, all of whom I know and respect, and I know they are all dedicated public servants who have given a great deal to this country. And so, I have made that clear throughout this hearing.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Do you believe that a judge should be attacked based on his heritage? The President of the United States attacked Judge Gonzalo Curiel saying that the Judge—"the judge who happens to be, we believe, Mexican" in attacking him? Do you believe that judges should be attacked based on their heritage?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, again, I am not going to comment on—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, these are issues that concern the independence of the judiciary, Your Honor. With all due respect, you talked about your heroes who have the grip and backbone to stand up and speak out. We are talking here about an independent judiciary, and my colleagues have raised this point. And I might just say to you as I said to Judge Gorsuch, then-Judge Gorsuch, now Justice Gorsuch, that the judiciary and nominees like yourself have an obligation to stand up for the judiciary. And he said that these attacks are "disheartening and demoralizing." Do you agree?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am not sure of the circumstances, but the way we stand up is by deciding cases and controversies independently without fear or favor. Beyond that, we follow the canons in the leadership of Chief Justice Roberts, who is a superb leader of the American judiciary in terms of maintaining the independence of the judiciary and staying well clear of political controversy.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Let me ask you something else then about the intersection of President Trump and yourself. On the night of the announcement of your nomination, you were at the White House.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And you chose to begin your speech introducing yourself to the American people by saying, and I quote, “No President has ever consulted more widely or talked with more people from more backgrounds to seek input about a Supreme Court nomination.” What was the factual basis for that statement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I did think about that. Those were my words. Senator Harris asked me about that last night, and the President and Mrs. Trump when we were there, my family was there that night at the White House. He and Mrs. Trump were very gracious. I was very impressed with during the 12-day period between Justice Kennedy’s announcement of his retirement and the announcement of my nomination, I was impressed as a citizen and as a judge with the thoroughness of the process. And I did look into, to your point directly, and thought about and looked into comparing what I knew about past processes and made that comment—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. You looked into past appointments? Did you talk to President Clinton about how many people he talked to before he nominated Justice Ginsburg?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, last night I said to Senator Harris that President Clinton, I do recall, talked to a lot of people as well. And I indicated that is why I used the phrase—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. He talked to just about everybody in Washington, did he not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. And President Trump talked to a lot of people as well, and so I said to Senator Harris last night, I mentioned President Clinton specifically as an indication of someone who likewise consulted very widely, as I recalled.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But you did not have any factual basis, any record, any research at the time of that statement, did you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I did actually look into it as best I could, you know, thinking about the technological developments, and I did think about it very carefully. He talked to an enormous number of people based on my understanding in those 12 days.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I want to talk to you now about real-world consequences; that is, impacts in the real world on real people of the decisions that courts make. We were talking yesterday about the statement that you made in Seven-Sky v. Holder, and I think we have it here. Under the Constitution essentially, that statement says to me a President can deem a statute to be unconstitutional, even if a court has held or would hold the statute constitutional. Now, you stated yesterday to me when we talked at some length that your view was compelled by Heckler v. Chaney and other cases on prosecutorial discretion. I disagree. Nothing in Heckler suggests that the President can essentially nullify, simply deem a law unilaterally unconstitutional based on his personal view of the law's constitutionality.

So, Heckler stands for the principle that courts will generally not second guess executive branch's decision on how to use scare enforcement resources, like I did as a U.S. Attorney or as Attorney General of my State of Connecticut. Nowhere it says that Chief Executives are free effectively to nullify duly passed statutes that have been upheld by the Court. But I want to go to the real-world impact.

Clearly, Heckler does not say that there are no limits, but for the sake of real-world impacts, I think there must be impacts. And one of them affects the Affordable Care Act and the protections it provides to millions of Americans, about 13 million Americans, including 500,000 in Connecticut who suffer from diabetes or high blood pressure or mental health issues. There are 15 to 20 or more pre-existing conditions.

And one of them affects a young boy. His name is Connor Curran. He is 8 years old. He suffers from Duchenne muscular dystrophy, and I want you to think about Connor. This is a chronic and terminal condition. It will slowly erode his motor function. Unless we find a cure, eventually it will take his life. His parents have told me, and I have gotten to know his family pretty well, although he appears healthy and happy today, he will slowly lose his ability to run, to walk, even to hug them goodnight. As Connor gets older, he will need more and more help. He will need the Affordable Care Act more and more. He will need protection from abuses that involve pre-existing condition.

My reading of your view of the constitutional authority of Donald Trump is that he could simply deem the Affordable Care Act unconstitutional even if it is upheld by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals and then by the United States Supreme Court, and even though it has been signed by a President who deems it to be constitutional and passed by a Congress who deem it to be constitutional. Do you think the President of the United States has that unilateral authority to nullify protection for Connor, and should the Connor family be afraid?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, thank you for bringing up this example. In my opinions on the Affordable Care Act in the Sissel case where I upheld the Affordable Care Act against an Origination Clause challenge and in the Seven-Sky case where I made clear that I thought the timing of the case was premature, in both those decisions I expressed my respect for the congressional goal in that legislation of ensuring health insurance for uninsured Americans and providing more affordable healthcare for all Americans to take care of people who did not have health insurance, people who had conditions like the one you are bringing out here.

I understand the real-world impacts of the Affordable Care Act. I have made that clear in my decisions. I have also——

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, in my decisions on the Affordable Care Act, I have shown respect for the act and respect for Congress, respect for the law, and understanding of the real-world impacts. In terms of prosecutorial discretion, the United States v. Nixon case did say that the executive branch has the exclusive authority and absolute discretion whether to prosecute a case——

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I am just going to interrupt you because I am out of time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And if the Chairman wants to give you more time, I am more than happy to hear the rest of your answer.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But I just want to express to you my fear and my deep concern that you will not apply the law to the facts, but use the law to advance an ideological position that may affect the people of America like Connor. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before I go to Senator Crapo, did you say all you wanted to the Senator?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I did.

Chairman GRASSLEY. You do not have to respond to what I am going to say, but I think that we need some clarification if you want to give it, but only if you want to give it. We have heard it suggested that you did not give clear testimony about the—any relationship you might have with various people in regard to the Mueller investigation. So, have you made any pre-commitments or offered any hints, previews, forecasts, winks, nods, or secret handshakes to the President, the Vice President, the White House lawyers, anyone else in the administration or anyone at all about if and how you would rule on any matter related in any way to Special Counsel Robert Mueller's current investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, I have not.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Crapo.

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. And before I begin asking questions, I would like to follow up on that exact line. I have in my hands a printout of the story that was published 2 hours ago on CNBC. The headline says, "Trump lawyer Marc Kasowitz denies Kavanaugh ever spoke to anyone at the firm about Mueller probe." It goes on to discuss this in a little more detail, but I would like to ask unanimous consent that this report be put into the record.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator CRAPO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Judge Kavanaugh, before I go to some of my questions, and which I am going to ask you just to describe mostly some of the legal parameters in which we work together with regard to the separation of powers, I wanted to go back to the independent counsel versus special counsel issue just one more time. You will recall yesterday in my questioning I went through the differences between the independent counsel and special counsel.

The reason I am coming back to it is I have been a little puzzled by my colleagues' attacks on your writings about the Morrison case back in—which was talking then about the 1988 case in which the Supreme Court upheld that then old independent counsel system. And I have concluded—maybe I am wrong, but I have concluded that the reason they keep bringing it up and bringing it up and bringing it up is that they may be trying to create some confusion between the old case—the old system, which you were criticizing, which Justice Scalia criticized, if I understand correctly, which Senator Durbin criticized, and others did, and the current system.

And I think—I wonder if maybe they are trying to create an impression in the public that you were criticizing the current system, so I just want to give you one more chance to make it clear. In your writings about the Morrison case, were you criticizing the current special counsel system?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator. No, I was not, and I have tried to make clear to Senator Coons and you and otherwise that I have repeatedly discussed the special counsel system, the tradition of that kind of system with approval in the Georgetown Law Journal article that I wrote in the late 1990s, as well most recently in the PHH decision where I specifically distinguished that from the independent counsel system. The old independent counsel system in Morrison, which dealt with it has not existed since 1999. The current special counsel system I have always spoken approvingly of the general system and the tradition of special counsel.

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you, and I hope that that puts it to rest. Like I said, for several days now, I have been perplexed as to why it is that your criticism of a system that ended in 1999 was of such concern. And I hope that any confusion that has been created by those consistent attacks does not create and will not create an impression that you were making any comment about our current situation. So, thank you for that.

What I would like to do with the rest of the time I have is to go through some issues related to the separation of powers, and I realize that you have been through this it may seem like endlessly in the last few days. But I want to go back and first start with the notion of deference with regard to rulemaking in the Chevron doctrine. Could you just describe to us what the Chevron doctrine is?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, Senator. What that says, that doctrine, when Congress passes a statute in an administrative agency, executive or independent agency is implementing that statute, the agency's interpretation of that statute will be upheld by a court so long as it is a reasonable interpretation of any ambiguity or gap that may exist in the statute. If the agency is interpreting it in a way contrary to its language as interpreted by the text structure, history as reflected in Chevron Footnote 9, then it is an impermissible interpretation. But otherwise, if it is—there is an ambiguity or a gap and the interpretation is reasonable, the courts under the Chevron doctrine uphold it.

Senator CRAPO. And when you talk about interpreting the statute, you are talking about agency rulemaking.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Ordinarily, it will be a—typically it will be an agency rulemaking or at least often it will be an agency rulemaking.

Senator CRAPO. And there is an exception, correct, for major cases? What is the exception?

Judge KAVANAUGH. For rules of major economic or social significance, the Supreme Court has long made clear that the deference to the agencies will not apply in those cases. In those cases we expect Congress, in the words of the Supreme Court most recently in the UARG case, we expect Congress to speak clearly if it wants to assign rulemaking on an issue of major economic or social significance to an agency. And that is a doctrine that Justice Breyer in the 1980s first talked about, I believe, Justice Rehnquist in a 1980s decision as well talked about. And those—that doctrine has been applied by the Supreme Court since the 1990s most recently in the King v. Burwell and UARG decisions.

Senator CRAPO. It seems to me that that is a pretty broad or maybe narrow exception, and what I mean is ill defined. How does a judge—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator CRAPO. How does a judge determine when you have a major circumstance that would be impacted by the exception? Is there a standard or are there some rules of how a judge makes that determination?

Judge KAVANAUGH. There is no clear rule on that. I have talked about that in the U.S. Telecom decision that the Supreme Court has not as yet provided specific guidance. And you look at the number of people affected, the amount of money involved, the kind of attention it has received in Congress, the kind of attention it has received in the public, and you make a judgment based on that whether this is the kind of rule, as Justice Breyer first explained, that is really filling a smaller intricacies of a statute or as a big social or economic decision. And there are lots of factors you can look into to determine that.

Senator CRAPO. Well, also it seems to me, and this is relevant to a number of other comments that you have received in questions, that if the congressional statute that is passed is vague or broad, that the room for agency discretion is greater. Does that play an impact—play a role in the determination as to whether it is a major exception that would require a deeper review by the Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the question of ambiguity is something that applies in all of these Chevron cases, but I do think, as well, in the major rules situation, what Justice Scalia said for the Supreme Court in the UARG case is, if it is a rule of major economic or social significance, we expect Congress to speak clearly. And that “speak clearly” phrase in Justice Scalia’s opinion for the Court is quite important. In other words, we want to see an express assignment of authority to decide a major social or economic issue if that is going to be upheld as a rule by the courts.

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you. I appreciate that. This issue is very important to me and to a number of my colleagues because there is a concern among many Members of Congress that Congress has delegated too much of its responsibility to the executive branch by giving them this deference in rulemaking. And the broader and more vague the congressional delegations are, the greater the opportunity for the Executive to simply write law through rulemakings. And so, it is a very significant issue.

A further question I have is, and I know you have also been asked this earlier, is there a point at which congressional delegation can be so broad as to be unconstitutional? For example, one of the cases or examples you were given earlier was if Congress just decided to create another group and say we are going to have them be Congress now.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, the Supreme Court has long applied the non-delegation doctrine that allows broad delegations, at least under the precedent, but there is a limit to how broad those delegations can be. And there are—there is litigation in the Federal courts now and in the Supreme Court now about certain applications of the non-delegation doctrine. But the general law is that Congress can delegate broadly, but there are limits. It has to be “an intelligible principle” is the phrase that the Supreme Court has used.

Now, what that means in practice has been decided under a series of cases applying that principle over time, and those precedents build on one another, and that is what the Court applies to figure out whether a delegation has gone too far.

Senator CRAPO. And this brings in the issue of independent agencies as well, and I know you have talked about that a lot as well. Humphrey’s Executor is the case that sets the standard, correct, as to what is an appropriate—appropriately constitutionally created independent agency?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct. The 1935 decision in Humphrey’s Executor upheld the concept of independent agencies where the heads of the agencies are removable only for cause, not at will, and the—so we see agencies such as the FERC, the Federal Communications Commission, the SEC, and the like.

Senator CRAPO. And you have ruled in the PCAOB case that the creation of that independent agency was unconstitutional?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That particular independent agency was differently structured than the typical and traditional independent agencies. I dissented in the D.C. Circuit on the—in a challenge to the constitutionality of that structure because it was two levels of for cause removal, in essence. The Supreme Court granted review. In an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, they agree with the approach I had set forth, in essence, in the dissent in the Free Enterprise Fund v. PCAOB case in Chief Justice Roberts’ opinion for the Court in that case.

Senator CRAPO. And what about the CFPB case? I understand that you did not rule that the CFPB could be—was so unconstitutional that it had to be eliminated, but that its structure needed to be changed with regard to the President’s authority to replace the director. Could you first of all just describe your reasoning in that case a little bit, and then I have one follow-up question on that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That decision, in my view, followed from the PCAOB case Chief Justice Roberts had written for the Supreme Court. The CFPB was also structured differently from the traditional independent agency, and the Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Roberts, had made clear that independent agencies that were novel, not historically rooted, the structure, were problematic constitutionally, and the single director head of an independent agency was something novel, not something that had traditionally occurred in independent agencies.

So, I felt under the precedent set forth by the Supreme Court in the Free Enterprise Fund case that that was a problem, but I did not say that the agency was invalid or could not continue to pursue its important functions, regulatory functions for consumer protection. Rather, I said simply that the single director head of it had to be removable at will, not for cause. And I also made clear, though, if Congress wanted to have a traditional multi-member independent agency, Congress could, of course, change that structure if it wanted.

The important point for your question is that the agency would continue to operate. There was another judge who did say that due to that flaw, the whole agency should stop, cease operation. I did not agree with that remedy because I did not think that was the proper remedy under the Supreme Court's precedents remedying constitutional problems.

Senator CRAPO. Well, that is really my follow-up question. I am one of those who has been working since almost before the creation of the CFPB to establish a board, a balanced board to run the CFPB, which I think would have addressed the constitutional issue that you found. But the question I have is why did you choose the route that kept the agency operative rather than joining with the other judge to say that it had to cease operating until it was fixed?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that is a question of a doctrine known as severability, and that—what that doctrine means is suppose you have a law, a big law, and one provision of the law is unconstitutional, what do you do as a court? Do you strike down the entire law or do you hold simply the one provision invalid and excise that provision from the law. And the traditional approach is reflected perhaps best in Marbury v. Madison, which found a section of the Judiciary Act of 1799 on jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, of the courts, to be unconstitutional. And what did the Court do in Marbury v. Madison? Did it strike down the entire Judiciary Act? No, it excised the one provision that was—or did not enforce the one provision that was unconstitutional, and simply excised that.

The traditional approach to severability is ultimately one of congressional intent to try to figure out what Congress would have wanted in the statute, but I have written about this both in cases and in articles that as a general proposition, the proper approach for a court is to try not to disturb more than is necessary of the work Congress has done in setting forth the statute to a scheme. And, therefore, severability, as I referred to it, narrow severability is the norm unless Congress has specified a contrary intent, or unless the whole law just—unless it just would not work otherwise.

Senator CRAPO. All right. I appreciate that explanation. And to go back to agency deference for just a minute, I would like to talk about the Administrative Procedures Act just to create the full picture. When we were talking about the Chevron doctrine, that is a Court-made doctrine with regard to deference on agency rule-making and other interpretation of statutes.

The Administrative Procedures Act contains a statutory requirement, does it not, that requires the findings of fact that the agency makes in quasi-judicial proceedings to be honored. Have I got that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is with some deference, that is correct.

Senator CRAPO. And the reason I bring that up is not so much because it is a judicially created issue, but because it just shows the broad parameter of deference that either through Congress or through judicial precedent has been given to the executive branch in terms of what many of us believe is the equivalent of making law. And just as we do not want you making law, I personally do not want to see the executive branch making law without involvement of Congress to the maximum extent possible.

And so, these are issues that I just hope that you will pay attention to in terms of the appropriate establishment and precedent necessary for the kind of separation of powers in our constitutional system that we need to have as we move forward. I am not even asking you to comment on that. I am just making an observation.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I will add one comment, which I do think it is important when we do review adjudications, which is another part of the bread and butter of the D.C. Circuit, so agency adjudications where, for example, it could be a benefits case of some kind or a—an adjudication of an NLRB case. That when we review those adjudications, I do think it is important that courts be aware of the importance of those cases for the individuals affected by those cases, and to make sure that the adjudications are complying with the principles of American justice and due process that we expect in the adjudication when someone's life, liberty, or property is on the line. And administrative adjudication is something I have written about in many of my cases to make sure that the proper kind of fact finding is occurring even in the administrative adjudications.

Senator CRAPO. Well, thank you. I appreciate you making that note, and I actually have pages of summaries of your adjudications on those kinds of issues. And I will just make a conclusory statement there for the argument that you are not watching out for the little guy or that you are not making sure that the litigants in their engagement with executive agencies are protected, people just have to read the cases. I commend you for being very, very carefully attentive to making sure that the rights of individuals in agency adjudications are protected and honored.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator CRAPO. Last thing I will do with my 2 minutes is, I want to talk to you about western States issues. Senator Flake got into this a little bit yesterday, and I actually was surprised to hear him say—I think he said—83 or 85 percent of Arizona was owned by the Federal Government. I am impressed. I am sorry for him, but in Idaho it is 63 percent of the State is Federal land. We believe that—you know, we have got the bragging rights to gorgeous country, whether it is mountains, rivers, deserts, fishing, hunting, recreation of all different kinds. The environment that we have in Idaho is a wonderful place. That is one of the reasons people go there to live.

We are also very concerned about the management of that Federal land. We want to make sure that at the same time we protect and preserve this heritage, we also allow the people who live there to be able to have an ability to make a life and to make a living. And there is a conflict there. I do not believe it is an irreparable conflict. In fact, I believe it is something where both a strong economy and a strong environment can be achieved. I am not asking you to make any commitments about anything, except I would like you to just acknowledge to me as you did to Senator Flake that you understand we have got some incredibly different types of issues in the West that relate to the differences in land ownership.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely, Senator. I understand that, and I have tried through my decisions—cases like the Otay Mesa case, cases like the Carpenters case—to understand the situation with the West, the land, the designations of land. It is not my job, of course, as a judge to make the policy decisions for those land or environmental regulations, but it is my job to police the boundaries of what you have set forth in the statute, and to make sure that the Executive is not unilaterally rewriting the law or going beyond what has been authorized by Congress.

It is also my job when constitutional boundaries are crossed in terms of action taken by the Government with respect to land or landowners, to make sure that I am enforcing the Constitution. I understand, and I hope my opinions demonstrate my understanding and appreciation for the importance of land and land owners in the western States and throughout the entire United States for that matter. But I know how important it is to you and Senator Flake as well.

Senator CRAPO. Thank you very much.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hirono.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman asked and you responded that you had not engaged in any secret handshakes, winks, and no discussions relating to the Mueller investigation. On the other hand, your Minnesota Law Review article, wherein you said Congress should protect a sitting President from criminal or civil proceedings, is a pretty big signal or notice to this President, and as far as I can see, it is a very big blinking red light.

I was also listening to the series of questions asked of you by Senator Blumenthal regarding the comments made by the President referencing judges. Is disagreeing with the President a concern to you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am an independent judge. I have ruled in cases such as the Hamdan case where that was a signature prosecution of the Bush—

Senator HIRONO. So you are saying that disagreeing with the President is not a concern to you. Is that what your response is?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am saying that, as a judge deciding cases or controversies, I decide cases based on who has the better position. I have done that for 12 years, and I have a record to show that in 307 opinions and—

Senator HIRONO. Is—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Over 2,000 cases.

Senator HIRONO [continuing]. Is disagreeing with the President a concern to you when it is not a case in front of you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Following the lead of the judicial canons, following the lead of Chief Justice Roberts who leads the Federal judiciary, we stay out of politics. We do not comment on politics, we do not comment on comments made by politicians. We stay out—way away from politics.

Senator HIRONO. So to the extent that a comment is made by the President, then disagreeing with him, any statement that the President makes is political to you and you will not respond. Thank you.

Let me follow up with some questions that some of us had of you yesterday and last night. Yesterday evening, Senator Tillis asked you about Rice v. Cayetano, and that is the case that I discussed where the issue was whether the State of Hawaii could restrict those voting for offices of the officers of the Office of Hawaiian Affairs, which administers certain lands held in trust for Native Hawaiians to only Native Hawaiians.

In fact, Hawaii felt so strongly about the importance of its trust obligations to the Native Hawaiian community, the people of Hawaii—the people of Hawaii voted to create the Office of Hawaiian Affairs, also known as OHA, in our Constitution. It is not just a law; it is in our Constitution that we created the Office of Hawaiian Affairs in 1978.

In answering Senator Tillis, you describe the case, Rice v. Cayetano, giving it a different and a grossly misleading spin. What you said totally ignored and disparaged the trust obligation that the State had to Native Hawaiians, and this trust obligation led the State to create the Office of Hawaiian Affairs and to decide who should be able to vote for the leaders of that office, Native Hawaiians.

You said the State, quote, “denied voting to people who were residents and citizens of Hawaii but were not of the correct, correct race, and therefore, African Americans and Latinos and Asian Americans and Whites were barred from voting for that office.” You then misstated the holding of Rice v. Cayetano. You said, quote, “The Supreme Court held that that was a straightforward violation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution.”

I will get to your misstatement later, but my first question to you is, Do you think that Rice can be used to justify the argument that programs to benefit Native Hawaiians are subject to strict scrutiny and of questionable validity under the Constitution, as you noted in the email that I referred to last night?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I appreciate the question, Senator, and thank you for raising it. In Rice v. Cayetano Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion, for 7-to-2 Supreme Court, saying that the voting restriction in that case violated the Constitution.

To your question about—I am getting to your question—about the other question, that was something I wrote in an email then, and if that issue came before me, I would—there has been subsequent precedent that would be relevant, and I would have an open mind about how to apply the precedents of the Supreme Court, the strict scrutiny or intermediate scrutiny that would apply in a case like that and would consider the facts and circumstances and arguments.

Senator HIRONO. Rice is a Fifteenth Amendment case. It was a State-action case, so should another State-action-voting case come to you, you would apply Rice.

My question was, whether you would turn to Rice with a proposition that programs that benefit Native Hawaiians should be subject to strict scrutiny because they are of questionable validity under the Constitution—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right, but—

Senator HIRONO [continuing]. Then to my question—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, so I appreciate that, Senator, and I think that would be analyzed in the light of Rice but in the light of all the other precedents of the Supreme Court on programs that—so contracting programs and higher education programs, which has set for the body of precedent under which programs like that would be analyzed. And I would look at the specific program under the facts and arguments of that case—

Senator HIRONO. So considering that Rice was a Fifteenth Amendment case and you are citing to other examples where other constitutional provisions may come into play, Rice should be limited to a Fifteenth Amendment case because that is what the Court decided. But, in fact, you answered last night that the case was decided under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth—you said it was a straightforward violation of Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution. So that is not what the Court did, as I have iterated, and I think you agree because, I mean, that is what you wanted the decision to be based on. You wanted the Rice decision to be based on the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, so that is not what they did.

So this reminds me of the criticism that was lodged against you in the U.S. v. Anthem case where the majority said that you applied the law as you wanted it to be, not what it is.

A question to you is where in the Rice Court's opinion did the Court decide the case on Fourteenth Amendment grounds?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the principal of the Fifteenth Amendment is that there cannot be voting restrictions on the basis—

Senator HIRONO. I am asking you where in the decision does the Court rely on the Fourteenth Amendment. You are citing to the Fifteenth Amendment. This is the Fourteenth Amendment.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I think the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, I think both prohibit restrictions on voting on the basis of race. The Fifteenth Amendment explicitly—this refers to voting, but the Fourteenth Amendment, of course, applies, as I read the precedent, to all State restrictions on the basis of race.

Senator HIRONO. Well, the Fourteenth Amendment mainly relies on one man, one vote. That is a whole other line of cases, but that is not what the Court chose to decide to base its decision on Rice, so I would expect someone who is going to be on the Supreme Court to be very, very careful in citing precedent and to be very accurate in saying what the Court based its decision on.

And it is totally clear to me because you have not been able to cite to the opinion in Rice that says we are deciding this case based on the Fourteenth Amendment. They did not. So that is very disturbing to me that you would cite that case for the proposition that it was based on the Fourteenth Amendment when clearly it was not. And you have been, as I noted, been criticized for citing law as you wished it to be and not as it is.

Let me go on to Priests for Life case. And the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment ensures that each person has the freedom of conscience to pursue their own religious values. These rights end where they would interfere with another's ability to do the same. However, in recent years, a wide range of individuals and institutions have received special dispensation to impose their beliefs on others. And, of course, most notably this is the Hobby Lobby v. Burwell case.

So a case that raised those kinds of issues came before you in the Priests for Life, and in that case one of the things you had to determine was whether there was a substantial burden on the employers. And the employers, their claim, the act of filling out a form to let their insurance company and Health and Human Services know that they had a religious objection were not going to cover the contraception, was overly burdensome.

And it was not the priests who were providing the contraception coverage. A third party was. And the priests were not forcing that third party to cover birth control. Congress was through the ACA. In your dissent you thought that was too much. You said the employer's religious exercise was substantially burdensome and that they could deny contraceptive coverage to their employees.

So my question to you is do you believe that the Freedom of Religion Clause supersedes other rights?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, Senator. I made clear in that decision that the Religious Freedom Restoration Act has a three-part test: first, substantial burden. I found that satisfied their based on the Hobby Lobby precedent, which I was bound to follow and the Wheaton College; second, compelling interest. I did find a compelling interest there for the Government in ensuring access. And then the third prong is least restrictive means, and I made clear there—I cited Reva Siegel's law review article, which makes clear the—Senator HIRONO. Let me get to the first prong, which is whether this was an unduly burdensome. So you determined that filling out a two-page form was unduly burdensome. Did you now?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I concluded that penalizing someone thousands and thousands of dollars for failing to fill out a form when they did not fill it out because of their religious beliefs was a substantial—

Senator HIRONO. No, if they filled out a two-page form, they could have been totally insulated from thousands and thousands of fines. So the question became not the fines. That was irrelevant. The question was whether a two-page form was overly burdensome, and you determined it was overly burdensome. So, you know, it kind of defies logic to me.

Let me go on to what I would consider to be a related case, which is Garza v. Hargan. And I would consider these two cases as being related because, first of all, they are both cases about women's reproductive freedom. And second, while you balance the interest of the parties involved in very different ways, you come to different conclusions, what is similar is in both cases you ruled against the women.

In Garza v. Hargan, been brought up before, you argue that the Government's basically charade of trying to keep the young women in custody until it was too late to get an abortion was not an undue burden on her rights. So forcing her to remain in HHS's custody and in fact considering this to be a parental consent case, which was not the case, that was irrelevant. And in Priests for Life you insisted that a Government requirement that religious employers fill out a pretty short form declaring their objection to providing health care was too much of a burden.

And in each case you reached your desired outcome, which is against women's reproductive rights and you ignore the common-sense meaning of burden. By the way, filling out the two-page form, the majority opinion did not consider that overly burdensome. And, you know, I really think that your conclusions that filling out this form was overly burdensome defied logic, but it is logical in the sense that in both cases you were against women's reproductive rights.

So how is it possible for me to draw any other conclusions that basically you really want to limit a woman's reproductive rights? So even though you engaged in a balancing test in the case of Priests for Life, filling out a two-page form was too much, but in the case of Garza, it was not too much to have this young woman remain in custody and to be forced, as far as you are concerned, to wait around for foster parents to be found.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In each case, Senator, I was doing my best to apply the precedent on point. The Hobby Lobby and Wheaton College case—the Wheaton College case had dealt with a form, and so I followed as best I could the Wheaton College case. The Supreme Court had, I think, a 6-to-3 vote, found—or granted emergency injunction in that case. I tried my best to follow that precedent.

Senator HIRONO. See, that is the thing about following precedent because, you know, oftentimes, your own perspective—a judge's ideological viewpoints, et cetera, come into play as to which precedent to apply, how to apply the precedent, and what parts of the precedent you want to apply.

Let me get to something that should be really simple. I think you said yesterday that Korematsu had been overruled. And in Trump v. Hawaii, the Chief Justice wrote, "Korematsu was gravely wrong the day it was decided. It has been overruled in the court of history and to be clear has no place in the law under the Constitution." I am just really curious. Is being overruled by the court of history a valid way to overrule a case?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think what the Chief Justice was recognizing in that case was the same thing the Supreme Court Justice Brennan had recognized in New York Times v. Sullivan where he said the Sedition Act of 1798 had been overruled in the court of history. In other words, there was not a specific case that arose, but it was important for the Supreme Court to nonetheless recognize that this law in the case of the Sedition Act and this precedent in the case of Korematsu was no longer good law and to note that. And so the Chief Justice noted that in the Trump v. Hawaii case.

Senator HIRONO. This was, by the way, long after a coram nobis case was brought many, many years later when it was made very clear that Korematsu had been wrongly decided. It would be nice if the court of history can overrule cases, but let me go on to Trump v. Hawaii.

The Chief Justice declared that Korematsu has nothing to do with this case, but Justice Sotomayor called the—I am quoting her holding—"all the more troubling given the stark parallels between the reasoning of this case and that of Korematsu v. United States."

And she continued, quote, “In Korematsu the Court gave a pass to an odious, gravely injurious racial classification authored by an Executive order and basically the Court invoked an ill-defined national security threat to justify an exclusionary policy in sweeping proportion.”

Now, are not the parallels between the cases very strong? Because in Trump v. Hawaii, as it was in Korematsu, the President discriminated against a minority group on national security grounds, and in both cases the Court did not question an obviously bogus justification. They did not, in both cases, go behind the bald-faced assertion by the President that this was based on national security.

So where does this reasoning take us? Because if the President can claim national security as a shield against any challenge to his actions, under what circumstances do you think a Court—based on the most recent case, Trump v. Hawaii, should a Court look behind the President’s stated justification of national security?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Supreme Court has made clear, Senator, in a variety of cases that it will hold the executive branch to account in national security cases, the Boumediene case in 2008, the Youngstown case in 1952, the Hamdan case. National security is not a blank check for the President. The Supreme Court has said, Justice O’Connor writing in the Hamdi case. And that is an important principle under our Constitution, is that even in the context of wartime, the courts are not silent. Civil liberties are not silent.

In the particular case you are raising, Chief Justice Roberts concluded that there was no violation in that case, but the general principle that, I think, is important to reiterate is, that we are a nation of laws, including in the national security context, and that precedent of the Supreme Court over the course of our history has recognized that the law applies even in wartime and national security.

Senator HIRONO. Well, the thing is, though, the most recent iteration of an articulation of national security to justify an Executive order is Trump v. Hawaii. The record was replete with references and statements that the President had made as to what his true intentions were, that this was a Muslim ban. He talked about it during the campaign. He talked about it after the campaign. He told the Justice Department—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator HIRONO. He told the Justice Department, as President, get me an iteration of this ban that would withstand constitutional challenge, and so the most recent iteration is very concerning because it says to me that the President can say this is based on national security, and the Supreme Court made very plain that it would not look behind that articulation. Let me move on. I am running out of time.

So the Warren Court, in 2017 you gave a tribute to the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist. You explained that you chose the topic because “it pains me”—you—“that many young lawyers and law students, even Federalist Society types, have little or no sense of the jurisprudence and importance of William Rehnquist to modern constitutional law.” And then you went on, “they do not know about his role in turning the Supreme Court away from its 1960s Warren Court approach where the Court, in some cases, seemed to be simply enshrining its policy views into the Constitution, or so the critics charged.”

And then you praised Chief Justice Rehnquist because he “righted the ship of constitutional jurisdiction.” What decisions of the Warren Court were you referring to as, “simply enshrining its policy views into the Constitution”? Were you thinking about Brown? Were you thinking about Loving? Were you thinking about any of the Warren Court decisions that created rights for individuals? Privacy rights? There is a whole array. So which were the Warren Court decisions that you thought needed to be righted by the Rehnquist Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I said, “or so the critics charged.” I identified the areas where Chief Justice Rehnquist had helped the Court, I think, reach consensus or maybe a middle ground on areas such as criminal procedure that is Religion Clause cases, and I identified all those in the speeches. When he passed away—and even before he passed away, many of the Justices who worked with him were very much praiseworthy of Chief Justice Rehnquist for fiercely defending the independence of the judiciary—

Senator HIRONO. I would really be interested to know the particular cases that you are referring to, not general kinds of cases, particular cases.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I referred to them in the speech, but thank you, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. After Senator Kennedy asks his questions, we will take a 30-minute dinner break. I expect we will be back around 6:15 then, and four Senators will be able to ask questions, Booker, Tillis, Harris, Cornyn, and then several Members have requested a third round. After all questions are finished, we will then move to Dirksen 226 for the closed session. Senator—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I just wanted to say one thing—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I am sorry. I—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman. When I introduced the players earlier, I did not see the three in the second row, Mary Grace, Shay, and Keke are in the second row. They are all three eighth-graders.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. And Megan.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. They are getting an introduction to democracy, Mr. Chairman—

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. So it is noisy and I will explain that to them later.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, ladies. You will get used to the yelling. Senator Tillis is keeping count. It has happened over 200 times in the last 3 days. It is not really how democracy is supposed to work.

Judge, I will repeat what I said yesterday. I am not going to ask you to give me a hint about how you might vote on the Court if you are confirmed. I certainly do not want you to violate the judicial canons of ethics, and I may have to gently interrupt you a few times to kind of move you along or move me along.

Yesterday, you started to talk about Justice Harlan and his feeling about whether he should vote in a political election, and somehow we ran out of time, and I thought I would give you an opportunity to finish that thought.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator. And one of the things that we have to do as judges, as I have emphasized many times in this hearing, is maintain the independence of the Federal judiciary, independence from politics, independence from political influence or public pressure or public influence. And part of that, part of the canons for Federal judges, Federal judiciary is that we do not attend political rallies, we are not allowed to donate to political campaigns, support political candidates, put bumper stickers on our cars, signs in our yard.

And one of the things I decided—we are allowed technically to vote, but one of the things I decided after I voted in the first election and I read something about how the second Justice Harlan had decided not to vote in elections because he thought that reinforced the independence that he felt as a judge. And I thought about that and I decided to follow that lead.

I am not saying my approach is right and other judges take a different approach on that, and I fully respect that, but for me it just felt more consistent for me with the independence of the judiciary not to vote because I have always consider voting a sacred responsibility and one in which I think very deeply about the policies I am supporting and the people I am supporting. And that seemed almost as if I were taking policy views at least to myself into the voting booth, and I did not want to do that as a judge. So I decided to follow the lead of the second Justice Harlan.

I will be the first to say I am not the second Justice Harlan. He was a great Justice on the Supreme Court and someone, of course, who I would be very—if I were to be confirmed, honored to be on that Court and follow in his lead.

Senator KENNEDY. You do not vote in political elections?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not vote in political elections.

Senator KENNEDY. Interesting. Last night, you talked a little bit about your outreach efforts to attract more women and minority law clerks. Would you quickly go through that for me again? I think I was getting coffee when you were talking about that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, one of the issues in American society generally, of course, but also in the judiciary in particular, has been to advance—to overcome the discriminatory history of the country and to help advance the cause of women and minorities in the legal profession. And one of the areas where that has revealed itself is law clerk hiring. And one of the—and that is important because the—

Senator KENNEDY. Law clerks for judges, you mean?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, law clerks for judges. We get four law clerks each year, and they are there for just 1 year and then they turn over after a year. They are like a team. They turn over after the year and you get a new team of four the next year. Those law clerks are among the best and brightest out of American law schools, and they often will go on to leadership positions in the Congress or in the State legislatures or in the judiciary or in the bar or in public service, and so those are important training positions for the future leaders of America.

And there were disparities when I came on the bench in the number of women and minorities, so I decided to be very proactive about that. There was a problem identified. I decided to be proactive. So on the women law clerk front I am very proud that of my 48 law clerks, a majority of them have been women, and they are the best and brightest. And one of them was just confirmed as a Federal judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, Britt Grant, and she was in my second class of clerks.

That is important because, as I talked about, my mom was a trailblazer in the law and overcame barriers to help women achieve equality in the law, and I want to do my part as well and not just because of her but she was an example to help achieve equality for all women to give them an equal place at the table and future opportunities. And I think I have helped one small—I am just one small piece and I do not want to overdo it, but I have tried to be proactive about it and to make a difference. So, too——

Senator KENNEDY. What about minority outreach?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. So in 2009 or 2010, so after I was on the court for about 3 years, there was a hearing I think in the House Appropriations Committee with—the two Justices usually go up every year and talk about the Supreme Court budget and testify before the Appropriations Committee to get money or to explain the need for money for the Supreme Court for the following year. And Justice Thomas and Justice Breyer were there that year, and they were asked about the seeming disparity with minority law clerks in general, African-American law clerks in particular, and one of the things they said—and they were talking about Supreme Court law clerks. Those are the law clerks for the Supreme Court Justices. And one of the things they said was they hired from the lower courts, from the courts of appeals. And they pointed out that the pool in the courts of appeals had the disparities, and so they were really dependent on what the court of appeals did and does. I took that as a bit of a call to action to do something about it myself.

Senator KENNEDY. And what did you do, Judge?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I reached out initially to the Black Law Students Association at Yale Law School, emailed them and asked them if I could come talk to them. Yale Law School is a school that produces a lot of law clerks, so I thought—and it is my alma mater——

Senator KENNEDY. I have heard of it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I start there, and I went and spoke to them. What I did is I went and spoke to the group and I explained to them the importance of clerking. I encouraged them to clerk. I explained the history of the disparities. Then I gave them in essence what I thought were tips about how to make yourself a better clerk, kind of like a coach, tips to how to be a better clerk candidate, classes to take, professors, how to deal with professors——

Senator KENNEDY. Do you think that helped?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do think it helped. I was uncertain frankly when I walked into the room how that would work, and it worked great in terms of the reaction I got and also in terms of I think the real-world results. And the way I thought about it is if I make even a difference for one clerk or one student, it is worth it.

Senator KENNEDY. Sure.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I think I did for more, and I have kept it up year after year. I have done it also where I teach at Harvard Law School, and I am proud of the results. I think it has made, you know, again, a small difference, but it is one person at a time, one clerk at a time, one student at a time, and I think hopefully by talking about it in this forum, I can encourage more efforts of that nature, which are really just recruiting efforts and explanation for—many of the students at law schools are first-generation professionals and do not have the networks necessarily that others do and so—

Senator KENNEDY. I know we could—I can tell you enjoy talking about it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I could go for about 2 hours on that, but yes, Senator, thank you for cutting me off.

Senator KENNEDY. And I will be glad to go if the Chairman will give me 2 hours, but I do not think he will.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. I know you have read an opinion before where you agree with the conclusion but you do not agree with the reasoning. Have you had that experience?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes, I think we all have.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Here is why I ask that. Can you tell me what in God's name a penumbra is?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the Supreme Court, as I think you are referring to, once used that term, but it does not use that term anymore for figuring out what otherwise unenumerated rights are protected by the Constitution of the United States. What it refers to now is a test in the Glucksberg case—and Justice Kagan talked about this in her confirmation hearing when she was sitting in this seat. The Glucksberg case sets forth a test where unenumerated rights will be recognized if they are rooted in history and tradition. And why that matters I think to your point—

Senator KENNEDY. Can I stop you? It is deeply rooted—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. And are those roots that are just deep or are those roots that are deep that have been growing there a long time? Do you understand what I am asking? Is it—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I fear I do not.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Well, that is my fault, not yours. Is it something that Americans have cherished for a long time or can it be something that is a moray of contemporary society?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So when the Court is referred to deeply rooted in history and tradition, it has looked to history. Now, how deep the history must be, I do not think there is a one-size-fits-all answer to that and how much contemporary practice matters. I also do not think there is a one-size-fits-all. But the important thing is the Court—and again, Justice Kagan emphasized this in her hearing—that the Glucksberg test means that the Court is not simply doing what your role is, which is to figure out the best policy and to enshrine it into the law, in the Constitution in the case of the Court, but rather is looking for as best it can objective indicia of rights that are not explicitly enumerated in the Constitution but that are nonetheless protected.

The best example I think is the Pierce case. Oregon passed a law saying that everyone—and this is in the 1920s—saying that everyone in the State of Oregon, every student had to attend a public school and could not attend a parochial or private school. And parents who wanted to send their children or child to a Catholic school sued and argued that that violated the United States Constitution. It made it to the Supreme Court. The right in essence, the claimed right was, the right of parents to direct the upbringing of their children by sending them to a private or parochial school. And the Supreme Court affirmed and recognized that right under the United States Constitution even though that is—

Senator KENNEDY. And that is a good example, Judge, and again, I apologize for interrupting, but we are dealing here with values, are we not, that we all cherish together as Americans like the rule of law or privacy or equal opportunity or personal responsibility? How are you to determine what values all Americans cherish? How do nine people determine what values all Americans cherish enough to read into or to discover as a result of the superior intellect of those nine individuals is a part of the Constitution and has been there for a long time? But most of us could not see it except the nine Justices.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I do not think that is the conception of the judicial role that the Supreme Court has articulated.

Senator KENNEDY. I agree, but that is the perception some people have, and perception is important in appreciation of government.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I agree with you. The values question is one that, of course, is first and foremost for Congress to figure out the policy or the State legislatures. Judges, Federal judges, the Supreme Court, we are not supposed to be, I think consistent with your question, simply importing our own values into the Constitution. It is not just supposed to be five people. We are five people like every other American. We do not have a charter to create new rights just because we think they are best. Rather, we find them—

Senator KENNEDY. Excuse me again for interrupting, but I think Justice Scalia would say and has said that, no disrespect, but that five people, whoever they may be in the United States Supreme Court, can establish this value and that their sense of morality or their value system is no better or worse than picking the first five names in the Washington, DC, phone book.

Judge KAVANAUGH. He did say that, and I think that is a comment that I think is shared by the Justices on the Supreme Court, and it is reflected now in the Glucksberg test. But I recognize that it is important to explain that to people so that people do not get confused about our role. Our role is rooted in law, it is rooted in precedent, it is rooted in not our values per se but the values reflected either in the Constitution or reflected in the legislation passed by Congress. And I realize there are gray areas in what I am just saying, but it is very important to explain that to people.

Senator KENNEDY. And here is my point. Excuse me again for interrupting. I will bet most Americans could agree today and would agree that we have a privacy right. Search and seizure privacy is important, but we also believe now that disclosure privacy is important, autonomy privacy is important, and it is part of our Constitution. And frankly, I am glad that it is. But how it got there matters. How it got there matters. It is not just the end result. Let me leave that for a second—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I agree with that.

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. And just kind of shift gears. I have just got a few minutes left. I can tell from your testimony the last 3 days or 2 days that high school, those were formative years for you. You went to Georgetown Preparatory School?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I did Georgetown Prep, a Jesuit high school here. It was very formative.

Senator KENNEDY. What was it like for you? What were you like? Did you ever get in trouble?

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Were you more of a John-Boy Walton type or—

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. A Ferris Bueller type?

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. These ladies are old enough to understand.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I loved sports first and foremost. I think that—I worked hard at school. I had a lot of friends. I have talked a lot about my friends.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And they have been here. So it was very formative. And when I think back on it—

Senator KENNEDY. You left out of the trouble part. I was waiting for that but—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right, so that is encompassed under the friends I think. Yes.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Yes. You were an athlete?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, I played football and basketball. My football coach was named Jim Fegan, and he is a legendary football coach. And so over the last 8 weeks where I have been in a slightly different situation than I have been for the previous 53 years in terms of where I can go freely, I have been working out on weekends at my old high school and running on the track and ran into him out there. It was awesome to run into him. He still helps out with the football team, and he sent me a text three nights ago, so it is awesome.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. That is all I am going to get out of you, is it not? I understand. All right. Let me yield back.

Strike that, Mr. Chairman. Just in case we have to have the time, I am going to reserve my 2 hours and 10 minutes. I am sorry, my 2 minutes and 7 seconds.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Now, see, I was going to ask the Judge if—not him but any of his underage running buddies had ever tried to sneak a few beers past Jesus or something like that in high school, but I am not going to go there.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator CORNYN [presiding]. I want you to.

[Laughter.]

Senator CORNYN. Well, I for one am grateful for the Senator's self-restraint.

[Laughter.]

Senator CORNYN. Judge, your endurance has been remarkable. Those of us on the dais have been able to come and go and tend to other business along the way. You have had to sit there for two full days and you are not through yet—

Judge KAVANAUGH. No—

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. But you are getting close. I think you said you have run a couple marathons. Consider this about the 20-mile mark—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. Where you hit the wall.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CORNYN. But we are getting closer.

I just want to say briefly that your conversation with Senator Kennedy about your recruiting female law clerks and the importance of being proactive there reminds me of a conversation I had briefly before you and I met when I served on a State Appeals Court, the Texas Supreme Court, where I would also hire law clerks, and most often they would be female law clerks. And I would ask them occasionally, I said, "Well, why do you think it is that I end up hiring predominantly female law clerks?" She said, "It is easy, Your Honor. We are smarter and we work harder."

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CORNYN. So with that, we are going to take a 30-minute break. We will be back about 6:15, and then Senator Booker, Senator Tillis, Senator Harris, and I will ask questions before we go to the third round.

[Whereupon, at 5:48 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Whereupon, at 6:16 p.m., the Committee reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Are you ready, Judge?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Booker.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, we, at 1:20 p.m. today, received another 1,000 documents, and I am just wanting to know, are you familiar with the 1,000 documents we just received at 1:20 p.m. today? Are you familiar with those documents or what is in those documents?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have not been involved in the documents. So I do not know what you have and what—I do not know.

Senator BOOKER. So even if I were to ask you questions from one of those 1,000 documents, you would not—you would need to see them?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Even if I have seen them before, I would like to see them.

Senator BOOKER. I understand. So 1,000 documents, the idea that any Senator up here could go through 1,000 documents since 1:20 p.m. and ask you questions, have you have a chance to see what we would like to ask you questions, seems a little absurd. If Bill Burck was the one to give those documents, I cannot help but wonder what else, again, he might be holding back, what else they might be trying to hide.

And so I understand you stand by your record, but it is our job to try to examine that record, the fullness of that record. And so I just want to ask you some questions perhaps that can illuminate Bill Burck's role. And so, Judge, have you communicated in any way with Bill Burck or his team since Justice Kennedy's retirement announcement on June 27, 2018?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I saw him on the Saturday after my—the Saturday after my nomination, I saw him at an event, a social event with a number of people.

Senator BOOKER. Was that—did you communicate with him beyond that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, I have not communicated with him beyond that, nor do I—have I had—I said before on the documents, I have not been involved in the substance, the process. I have stayed away from that. That is an issue for the Senate and the Bush library.

Senator BOOKER. Okay. So if you have not communicated directly with him about this process, have any of your intermediaries that have been working with you or preparing you for this been in discussions with Bill Burck or his team since Justice Kennedy's retirement announcement on June 27, 2018?

Judge KAVANAUGH. All I can say is what I know.

Senator BOOKER. So to your knowledge, you do not know if your people who have been preparing you for this have been in consultation or coordination with Bill Burck?

Judge KAVANAUGH. When you say people?

Senator BOOKER. Who you have been helped to prepare for these hearings, I imagine?

Judge KAVANAUGH. You mean White House and Justice Department people?

Senator BOOKER. Whoever might be helping you prepare for these hearings.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know what the White House—the White House and Justice Department people could speak for themselves about that.

Senator BOOKER. I guess what, you see, I am asking you is if the folks who are preparing you have been communicating with Bill Burck about these documents, what is being released, or anything like that. Do you have no knowledge of that, or do you know if people who have been preparing you have been in contact and communication with Bill Burck about these documents?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know what the process has been, other than what I—

Senator BOOKER. But I am not asking about the process. I am asking do you know if the people who have been preparing you have been in touch with Bill Burke about the documents, content of the documents, or anything related to the documents?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know the answer to that question.

Senator BOOKER. You do not know if the people who have been preparing you have in any way been communicating with Bill Burck about the documents?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can you—do you want to identify some specific—

Senator BOOKER. No, sir. I am just asking you that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Is who prepare—I just want to make sure we are on the same page.

Senator BOOKER. Yes, sir.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So that there is no confusion. I do not know who is—I have been staying out of it for obvious reasons. I mean, I let other—it is not my privilege to assert.

Senator BOOKER. So you have never taken—you have never taken a stand regarding the release of the documents with anybody in the White House, the DOJ, or anyone else? You have never taken a stand on this?

Judge KAVANAUGH. This was an issue for the Bush library.

Senator BOOKER. I understand there is an issue. You have stated this on the record. I am just asking have you ever taken a stand with anyone from the White House or the DOJ about document release?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. I do not have a—I do not have a position, stand on—

Senator BOOKER. I know you do not have a position. I am asking what has transpired.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. And I am in the position that I think Justice Scalia was in when he was being asked about his memos from the Office of Legal Counsel, and he said that is a decision—

Senator BOOKER. Again, I have a lot—a short amount of time. I appreciate your knowledge of Justice Scalia's record and statements. I just want to know what you think, sir, and what you know.

Judge KAVANAUGH. What I think is that—I am just going to repeat myself. But what I think, it is an issue for the Senate and the Bush library.

Senator BOOKER. So why do we not move on? You told Ranking Member Feinstein and Senator Coons that you had never taken a position on the constitutionality of criminally investigating or indicting a sitting President. You stand by what you told the Ranking Member?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am happy to have my recollection refreshed.

Senator BOOKER. Sir—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But that is my recollection.

Senator BOOKER. Okay. You told Senator Klobuchar that you “did not take a position on the constitutionality, period.” You stand by that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Again, I am happy to have my recollection refreshed, but that is my recollection as I sit here.

Senator BOOKER. And that is your position now? Because you have said this to me in private as well, that you had never taken a stand on the constitutionality of this issue about—about investigating or indicting a sitting President.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think in the various Georgetown events, I referred to it as an open question. In my Minnesota Law Review, I referred to it as an open question. I think here I have referred to it as an open question.

And I have said if it comes to me, you know, a lot of things would have to happen. I just—

Senator BOOKER. But you indicated—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Just 20 seconds.

Senator BOOKER. I just want to try to get the question, so you understand what I am asking.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. Yes, sir.

Senator BOOKER. That the constitutionality itself, have you taken an issue on the constitutionality of these issues about criminally indicting or investigating a sitting President?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. I have said repeatedly, and here is—

Senator BOOKER. No. That was it. “Yes” or “no.” You said “no.” Can I refresh your recollection with things you have said, sir?

So this is a Georgetown article, and again, I have the quote—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have—seems that—

Senator BOOKER. Okay. I just want to walk through it, okay? So you agree you did say this. You said, “The constitutionality itself seems to dictate.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. So you are expressing a view on the constitutionality. Look at what you wrote in The Washington Post. The Constitution—again, you use the conditional word—appears to preclude, but you talked about the constitutionality. Appears to preclude.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And that was—

Senator BOOKER. Please.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In the Georgetown Law Journal in 1998 and, as has been reported, I advised—my advice to Independent Counsel Starr was not to seek—

Senator BOOKER. In the Minnesota Law Review article, you said that the Constitution establishes a clear mechanism, talking about what the Constitution establishes, yes?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, let us be very clear. Can I get 30 seconds?

Senator BOOKER. Yes, of course.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay. So the Constitution obviously sets out a mechanism for removal.

Senator BOOKER. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. The question of criminal indictment is simply a question of timing, and the question is does it have to be after or may it also be before? The Justice Department—10 more seconds. The Justice Department for 45 years has said it must be after.

Senator BOOKER. And I guess you see what I am getting at here is that you have talked about this issue quite a bit. Even what Senator Whitehouse brought up when you were asked, people were asked to raise their hand, give a hand how many people believe a sitting—as a matter of law that a sitting President cannot be indicted during a term of office.

We saw the videotape. You raised your hand. You have commented on it multiple times. I guess this is sort of what I am saying. I am going to get this—

Judge KAVANAUGH. It said law, right, in the Justice—it did not say Constitution.

Senator BOOKER. As a matter of law, yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. And I do think it is important—again, I do not want to take too much of your time, but it is important to know that the Justice Department, since 1973 and to this day, through Republican and Democratic administrations, has had that position.

So before it could come to a court, if I am on the D.C. Circuit, before it could come to a court, that position presumably would have to change after 45 years. So it would have to change. And then a prosecutor with a President would have to decide I want to go forward as a matter of prudence. And then, third, would have to decide you have the evidence.

Senator BOOKER. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And fourth, a—it would have to be challenged.

Senator BOOKER. Sir? Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. After all that, it would get to court. And then I would consider—

Senator BOOKER. Sir? Okay. I want to move on, but you—you have made clear that you have never, you know spoken about these issues in a constitutional manner. And I just want to say that in a lot of your statements it seems like that you are not just talking about this as a matter of policy, you are making some speculations about the constitutionality of it, which I think sends a clear signal about where you stand on those issues.

I really want to move on because—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I promise you I have an open mind.

Senator BOOKER. Okay. You speak a lot in your speeches and articles about the matter of character. And just looking at President Trump's comments, there is a number of sources that keep track of how many lies he tells. There is about—it is sort of stunning that according to one source, he has made 4,200 misleading claims during his Presidency. That is an average of about 7.6 false or misleading statements per day.

Now I have listened to you speak a lot about character and the character of the Presidency. At Duke University in 2000, for example, you said that character matters and that the President of the United States should not—should be a role model for America. Do you still think character matters for the President of the United States?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, given the lead-in to your question that you have heard me talk about, I need to stay so far away from any political conversation.

Senator BOOKER. Three zip codes away. I have heard you say that a number of times.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Three zip codes.

Senator BOOKER. And, but that was not what you did when you were a Bush appointee. You talked a lot about Bush's character, even in your confirmation hearing, you said at your swearing-in ceremony. You were willing to comment about President Bush, who—and his character. In fact, you said he was—you had the greatest respect for President Bush.

Now we have a President now that has said a lot of comments, and this is not in any way a partisan or political issue because people on both sides of the aisle have denounced the kind of statements that this President has made, matters of character. Trump—President Trump during the campaign referred to immigrants as rapists. He said a Federal judge was not able to do his job because of his heritage.

He bragged about sexually assaulting women. He has mocked a disabled reporter. I could go on and on and on. The list they provided me is long, but my time is brief.

Do you want to say right now, do you have the greatest respect? You said this about the last President, you thought it was okay. Do you have the greatest respect for Donald Trump?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, to reiterate, you do not hear—

Senator BOOKER. You cannot even say if you have great respect for Donald Trump?

Judge KAVANAUGH. You do not hear sitting judges commenting on political—

Senator BOOKER. I am just asking what you said about President Bush in the last time you were before the United States Senate. Do you have the greatest respect for Donald Trump?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I appreciate the question. And what I have said during this process is I need to stay away—

Senator BOOKER. And you do not need to—three zip codes. You do not need to repeat again. You are not answering my question. And I want to tell you why I am building toward this. Because there is an issue of this President who is asking for loyalty tests from the people he is putting forward for offices.

Now you heard how he is continuing to bash the Attorney General of the United States of America and saying that if you knew he was going to recuse himself that he would not have put him forward. You have seen this President demanding loyalty, expecting loyalty. President Trump not only said that about Jeff Sessions, but you know he has said that about other folks.

And so you are not willing to say about—to comment on the character of this President. You are not willing to say if you have great respect for this President. Just last night, you would not comment on the fact that the President, to one of my other colleagues when he was talking about both sides being to blame, really excusing, it seemed, the behavior of neo-Nazis. And I am just wondering what kind of loyalty is being required of you for this job? That is what I am building to by asking you and trying to keep apples to apples.

What you said about President Bush, why are you not saying it about President Trump? And so I want to just—just build to this in the remaining time I have left. In May 2016, then-candidate Trump put out his first list of potential Supreme Court nominees. You were not on that list.

In September 2016, he put out another longer list. You were not on that one. Then in May 2017, something incredible happened. Robert Mueller was appointed by the special counsel to investigate any links and coordination between the Russian government and the Trump campaign. The President was now in jeopardy, or at least his campaign was in jeopardy. He was a subject of a criminal investigation.

And then President Trump puts out a third list of nominees, and your name is on that list. Now you have heard so many of my colleagues asking about your views, the constitutionality of a President being investigated. You are failing to at least hold President Trump in your eyes to the same level of the Presidential character, which you have talked about in speech after speech. And suddenly, you are going mum as to the character of this President, given all his lies, all his remarks that have been renounced, actually criticized on both sides of the aisle.

And now there is a suspicion, and I do not think it is a big leap to think that the public has this suspicion that somehow you want a position, and I wonder, do you credibly believe that if you agreed right now to recuse yourself, do you credibly believe that somehow, like he said with Jeff Sessions, that he would not hold your nomination up. If you recused yourself. Do you credibly believe that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, in this process, I need to uphold the independence of the judiciary. And one of those—

Senator BOOKER. But that is what is at question right now. I mean, right now, there is a shadow over the independence of the judiciary because a President who has been credibly accused by his former lawyer of being an unindicted co-conspirator has the opportunity to put a judge on the Bench.

The only judge from that list that was added after the Mueller investigation, of all those judges, you are the only one that has spoken extensively, from raising your hand at a Georgetown Law School event to speaking about it. I do not think it is a big leap to have the common person begin to suspect that you are being put up right now, a person that cannot even speak to the character of this President, will not even say what you said about George Bush, that you have the greatest respect for a President.

And granted, it is hard to say about someone who brags about sexually assaulting women. It is understandable for people to suspect that there is something going on, that somehow this is rigged that you are going to get on that bench. And I hear your admonitions that you are going to be independent, but the suspicion is clearly there.

And so you have written extensively about this. You have spoken to the issue. You have written about the issue in law journals. Can you tell me why the common person, millions of Americans, would not sit back and say, well, this is Donald Trump, who has demanded loyalty from an FBI Director, demanded loyalty from the Attorney General, all the people he seems to be putting in positions of law enforcement.

In fact, he criticizes in the most—as a tweet we saw right before these hearings began, criticizes very dramatically the Justice Department for doing investigations on folks, it seems, because they are Republicans in the most partisan way. And to me, that cast a shadow over these whole processes.

It is a shadow. Of course, it is extended by not having your documents. It is extended by not having access to your full record. But can you speak to that for me, sir? Can you speak to that credible suspicion that people might have that the system is somehow rigged and the President is putting somebody up just to protect him from a criminal investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, three quick points. One, my only loyalty is to the Constitution. I have made that clear, and I am an independent judge. Two, the Justice Department for 45 years has taken the position, and still does, that a sitting President may not be indicted while still in office. Three, I have not a position on the constitutionality and promised you I have an open mind on that question.

And four, I did talk about a congressional proposal which was not enacted, and as you have heard me say for 2 days, I draw a distinction between what Congress does and what the Constitution requires. So just because I talked about something for Congress to consider in the wake of the experience with President Bush does not mean that I think that is in the Constitution. I have made clear that I have not taken a position on the constitutionality and have an open mind.

So if you put those four points together, I think you should conclude that I—and read my 12 years of opinions and read the letters and read the teaching evaluations and look at my whole life, I think you should conclude, respectfully, that I have the independence required to be a good judge.

Senator BOOKER. And I appreciate it and respect—and I afford you, sir, respect as well. You have spent your whole life in public service. And you and I both know, and I am not sure if you will say it right now, but this is unusual times in the United States of America. If you had told me what has been going on the last 3, 4 months was going to happen 4 years ago, I would think you are describing a fiction novel and not something that actually could be happening in our country right now.

You have seen in these last few days everything from a high-level White House official writing about the chaos and the President, invoking the Twenty-fifth Amendment, which you know very well, and much more. We have a President under investigation. People surrounding him being indicted, criminally charged.

All of us, I really believe this, every single Senator up here is going to be tested. The test for all of us is coming, and the test for the Supreme Court is coming as well. And this is going to be a time, if we have a constitutional crisis, where the faith in this country will be tested, shaken again. And it is really important that the Supreme Court be above suspicion.

And so Senator Blumenthal asked you this. I sent you a letter. Why not right now, right now, even at the jeopardy of President Trump pulling back your nomination, why not now alleviate all of that suspicion that the reasonable person can have? Why not just announce right now that you will recuse yourself from any matters coming before the Supreme Court involving the Mueller investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Because if I committed to how I would decide or resolve a particular case and that it would be——

Senator BOOKER. But would not a recusal take you out of the position that you had to decide or resolve? To say that this is a time in this Nation where I should do the right thing, and just take that suspicion off to restore the faith in the Supreme Court and in this country.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I have 10 minutes on my time. I will give you whatever time you want to respond to it, and I will make sure you are not interrupted.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Just a few seconds.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Look at me, will you, please? I am the guy that gave you the time.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Oh, yes, sir. I will try to keep you both.

If I committed to deciding a particular case, which includes committing to whether I would participate in a particular case, all I would be doing is demonstrating that I do not have the independence of the judiciary that is of the judging that is necessary to be a good judge. Because all of the nominees who have gone before have declined to commit because that would be inconsistent with judicial independence.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Tillis.

Senator TILLIS. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

And Judge Kavanaugh, if you want to continue to look at the Chair, you can, because he gave me the time.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. Mr. Chair, I would like unanimous consent to introduce some documents for the record. First is, from 13 States' Attorneys Generals who, among other things, said that Judge Kavanaugh has an unshakable respect for the proper role of the courts within the constitutional structure.

I have an op-ed from the New Hampshire Union Leader. Among other things, they said that Kavanaugh is an experienced, well qualified pick.

Another document is from 80 former law students at Harvard Law. They say Judge Kavanaugh consistently encouraged his students to voice different viewpoints, even if others or the Judge himself might disagree.

Another document written—or I should say an article written by Jonathan Turley of The Hill, who says that no one can use the Mueller probe to hold up the Supreme Court nominee.

Another document from Salvador Rizzo from The Washington Post, and basically, the question is, does Brett Kavanaugh think that the President is immune from criminal charges? And his assumption—or his assertion is that Kavanaugh does not think so.

Ed Whelan, National Review, "Dems' Latest Documents Hullabaloo." Catholic Charities CEO, someone that I know Judge Kavanaugh has worked closely with. He says, "I know Brett to be a man committed to his community and to those less fortunate."

Catholic Youth Organization basketball parents—and I might add, I coached my kids, and I actually think that parents are the toughest constituency to get support from. And you apparently have done that, and they have submitted letters to that effect.

Also, a letter from the Charleston Post and Courier editorial board, "Kavanaugh, the Right Choice." From the Boston Herald staff, "Nix the Toxic, Give Brett Kavanaugh a Shot."

From William Whitaker, the president of the Washington Jesuit Academy, lauding Judge Kavanaugh for the work that he has done for tutoring over the past several years. From my former colleagues in the House; a letter from the Majorities of the House and Senate supporting Brett Kavanaugh's nomination; from my Lieutenant Governor supporting same.

And finally, a letter from the DOJ dated August 5, 2005, in response to Senator Joe Biden's, at the time, request for Justice Roberts' information. I think it is a very interesting read.

Now before I make some comments and hope to keep the record alive for yielding back the most—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Wait a minute. You asked permission to put them in the record.

Senator TILLIS. I did.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Proceed.

Senator TILLIS. Thank you.

First, before I get started, I think it is really important. I ran over to a convenience store when I was taking a break and thinking, I am taking a break. The other Members are taking a break. Hopefully, Judge Kavanaugh did. The ones who were not taking a break were the staff.

So I would like to thank the staff on both sides of the aisle. I know you work hard.

And to the police, who are working mandatory 16-hour shifts. You know, it is one thing—

[Applause.]

Senator TILLIS. It is hard—it is very—it is very difficult for those of you facing forward to see what they are doing. But I do not think you understand the complex operation and the work they are doing to keep us all safe. And those who are exercising their First Amendment right safe.

And finally, to the Chair, thank you. You have done a great job, as you always do. And I appreciate your fairness. I love your sense of humor, and I look forward to us continuing this for probably about another 5 hours. Now—

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. Now I have got to get on to a few things, and you know, Judge, I was Speaker of the House in North Carolina for 4 years. And when we would get into extended debates and our conference would meet, at a break I would say, "Guys, if it has already been said, do not say it again." So, there is not a whole lot more I am going to say.

Clearly, we have got an impasse here, but that impasse did not start based on the discussions we had over the last 3 days. The impasse started in some cases before you were ever nominated. There are people on the other side of the aisle, including people on this Committee, who opposed your nomination on a fill-in-the-blank basis before you were ever nominated. And all they did is fill in the blank on July 10th.

These are the assertions people made. They already concluded before they saw the first document, and they were not going to change their minds. Now they do deserve getting as many documents as possible, and they will have more time to get documents.

I want to make a point on the 1,000 documents that the Senator from New Jersey mentioned. It is actually 1,000 pages, not 1,000 documents. So let us just be sure to be clear on volume. And let us also be clear that those documents are publicly available.

And let us also be clear that the record will be held open until early next week so additional questions for the record, I assume, and other information can be submitted.

Next week, you will go into the hearing—or you will go into the Committee, you will be held over. That is another week. The following week, you will go to Committee. We will have debates again. Another opportunity for comments to be made by the same Members who have already made up their minds.

And then, hopefully, the following week, you will be on the floor, and every Member will have an opportunity to have their say on the floor. So for anybody to say that this discussion is over and the discovery is over, over the next couple hours is simply creating theater.

Now I want to talk a little bit about theater. I want to talk about what happened last night. I did something I seldom do. I seldom interrupt another Member, regardless of how much I want to talk. Last night was the first time of probably only three times in the 3½ years I have been in the U.S. Senate.

But the reason I did it is, I felt like we were going down a path that subsequently proved to be true, and at the time, Senator Kennedy was chairing. He rightfully allowed the discussion to go. But I want to talk about the timeline that occurred and then what happened this morning.

So at about 9:30 last night, we had an exchange where you were being asked to respond to something that you had not seen. We subsequently found out, it was because it was “committee confidential.” And again, I am not an Ivy League school attorney, but I really feel like when you have got in 30-point type running diagonally across the page something that says “committee confidential,” you probably ought not read verbatim from it. But that is what happened last night.

But about 9:30 last night, a request was made to release those documents. That is one of the reasons why I thanked the staff, because those staff stayed up until about 4 a.m. this morning, talking first with President Bush’s people, then talking with the White House and getting it cleared. And they were cleared and in an email box at about 3:15 this morning, 3:30.

Now I do not expect somebody to check their email at 3:15 or 3:30. Maybe some of you do. But certainly in the 6 hours between the time that email hit your email box and the theatrics that happened in this Chamber today, you could have actually found out that you did not have to be Spartacus. You did not have to go interact with civil disobedience. You got what you wanted.

You could have come in here and started out, had a discussion about it if you wanted to, incorporated it into the discussion today.

But that would have given you an opportunity to put that in the proper context. So perhaps it was not as helpful.

The fact of the matter is what happened today and what has happened subsequent to this afternoon reminds me of something I am more likely to see at the Kennedy Center. Maybe, maybe a version of “Much Ado About Nothing,” but not really appropriate for what we are doing here.

Now I have noticed—I love watching people and body language, and I have noticed you—I have had hash marks for the number of times we have been interrupted. I just did not think I could keep track of the number of times that you touched that pocket Constitution.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. And I have to know—and I know it is tattered. It is almost a metaphor for the very document itself, challenged, kind of torn through, but kept together, largely intact, hopefully will continue to be intact. But do you have a story behind that pocket Constitution?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I got it about 25 years ago. I know that because the Twenty-seventh Amendment, which was ratified in 1992, is not in my version. So I have written in the Twenty-seventh Amendment in my handwriting.

And then I have used it each year teaching my classes at Harvard Law School on separation of powers in the Constitution, and I have written a lot of notes, and there is a lot of ink in there. And the assignment on the first—for the first day of class, the students have to read the entire Constitution word for word. And for the last day of class, they have to read the entire Constitution word for word.

And on the first day of class for about the first hour or hour and a half, I give them a tour of the Constitution. So I start with the beginning and kind of roll through the whole thing, Article I, and I go through the different clauses. Article II, Article III, Article IV, go through the whole thing. Article V, Article VI.

Then we go through the amendments, and but I really focus on the original text of the Constitution because people have heard a lot about a lot of the individual amendments, although I point out some of the less—the ones that are not always discussed as much. But I go through the structure because I try to explain how the structure fits together to protect individual liberty. And some of the clauses about how the House of Representatives and the power of Congress, the power of the Senate, how that all fit together, the different—

Senator TILLIS. I just find it remarkable—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Sorry.

Senator TILLIS [continuing]. That in spite of your encyclopedic knowledge that you keep it with you, and you always refer back to it. And the fact that you have had it for 25 years is a testament to those cheap pocket Constitutions.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will say that when I met with Senator Feinstein, I wish she were here, but she saw this, and she—and because she talked about how much she appreciated the words of the Constitution, and I pulled it out. And she said, “Well, that looks tattered.” And she gave me a new one.

So if this thing ever totally falls apart and hers has the Twenty-seventh Amendment in it—so if this falls apart, I told her I would use her copy for the future.

Senator TILLIS. Thank you. Well, I am going to ask you a few other personal questions, but also, you know, I started out by saying we know where everybody was beforehand because a couple people made public statements. We know people want more documents. You have more time.

If you have more questions, ask them and submit them for the record. If you want more documents, request them because they have been in each and every case granted. Do not wait until the day before the floor to say I have not gotten the document, when now you have had a running clock since August the 22nd to request some documents that were actually cleared overnight.

I also want to point to this. I do not understand how somebody with that kind of track record, with either judges appointed by a Democratic President and judges appointed by a Republican President on the district court or the D.C. Circuit could actually be viewed in such a divisive way. I do not see how somebody who has clearly judged on both sides of the issues here, sometimes you have judged in a way that made some of my folks mad, and sometimes you have judged in a way that made some of their folks mad.

But I think if we go back and really examine this, this has been a political exercise more than anything else. I, for one, think you should be very proud of that record, and I, for one, will not be surprised if you do not have—meet or exceed that when you get on the Bench.

And that is the last thing I want to talk about. You know, last night I went through some of the cases, and I kept on going through more. But folks, I mean, let us get real. Read his opinions. And the amazing thing about these opinions, I had never read an opinion. I read a few when I was speaker, but not many.

I first started reading opinions when Justice Gorsuch was in front of us. And the first thing that I was amazed with is how approachable they are. You do not have to read all the footnotes. If you are like me, you can read the summary. You get the point. You can go to some of the footnotes, but read them. Because if you do, you will be amazed by them.

Do not judge it based on a tweet or some sort of get out and protest. Read them.

John Locke, I think, said, “To prejudge other men’s notions before we have looked into them is not to show their darkness, but to put out our own eyes.” Do not put your eyes. You may disagree, but you may want to take a look at how thoughtful all of Judge Gorsuch’s 307 opinions are. I said Gorsuch—and Judge Kavanaugh.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. So just look at it. I mean, go away. I walked over to this convenience store to get me some kombucha and come back here and—and I was just thinking. I talked with some people there. Apparently, they were in the audience. I think they were clearly on the other side, and they said, “What are you doing here?” I said, “I am getting a drink.”

And I said, look, you know, what really bothers me is how we go into this process and we take these incredible people, and you wonder why they do it. So that is the last thing. And I told them the same thing. I said read some of his opinions. Do not believe what you have been told. Do not judge someone based on someone else's judgment.

Judge them based on the body of work. And your body of work extends long before the 12 years that you have actually been in the role of public service, and that is what I am going to end with. I actually started public service about the same time you did, Judge Kavanaugh. Actually, we have, I think, some similarities.

I was a partner at a big four accounting firm. I traveled all over the place. I have two kids. I coach their tee-ball, their soccer. I was sometimes flying in for practice on Monday night and trying to get home on Friday night to be on the ballfields.

I then went into the legislature in 2011. That is really the first time I did, or 2007, I should say, public service. And then became Speaker of the House, and came up here.

And sometimes when I am in settings like this, I ask myself the question I am about to ask you. Why on earth do you do this, and why on earth do you want to do it? You are brilliant. You have augmented your God-given talents with an extraordinary education, and you have served so extraordinarily well. You know well that in the private sector—I mean, your potential is endless.

So in the remaining time, and whatever you do not use I will yield back, why on earth are you doing this?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I appreciate that. I am doing—been a judge and doing this and going through this process because from an early age, I tried to commit myself to public service. I have talked about the motto of our Jesuit high school, which was, “Men for Others”—and that motto of public service is something I have always tried to pursue.

And following the example set by my mom of law, and I found that an important way to contribute to public service. And then became, of course, a lawyer and within public service as a lawyer, I think one of the highest forms—not the only, but one of the highest forms of public service as a lawyer is to be a judge. Because our rule of law in this country, our rights and liberties depend on independent, neutral, impartial judges, and I thought I could contribute in that way to the public service and the rule of law.

And so I, when that opportunity arose, I was honored to be considered and honored to become a judge. And I have enjoyed and been honored to do it for the last 12 years because I know that it is not abstract. It is not academic. It has real effects for real people in the real world.

And being part of the process of our Government by which the rights and liberties of people are protected in the real world was the highest form of public service. At the same time, I have recognized that that is not the only way to contribute. So I have, as I have mentioned before, sought to teach, sought in hiring law clerks to train the next generation, teaching the Constitution, sought to volunteer with Father John in Washington Jesuit Academy.

Coaching has been just an enormous part of the last 7 years, and then, you know, my family.

So, but the public service as a judge is—it is a great honor, and it is a great—it is a great responsibility. To the discussion I just had with Senator Booker, I understand the responsibility I bear as a nominee to this Court. I appreciate that. I hope my experience gives me the ability to, if I were to be confirmed, to live up to that responsibility. I will give it my all, if I am confirmed, as I have tried to do for the last 12 years.

So thank you for the question.

Senator TILLIS. Judge Kavanaugh, thank you. Thank you for what you are going through. Thank you for your past service and what I believe is going to be a distinguished career on the Bench. And God bless you and your family.

I yield the rest of my time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you for the 2 minutes you did not use.

Senator Harris.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Judge, as you know, these hearings are placed to hopefully get answers, and as I am sure you have noticed, your lack of a clear answer to a question I asked you last night has generated a lot of interest.

I received reliable information that you had a conversation about the special counsel or his investigation with the law firm that has represented President Trump. As you will recall last night, I asked you whether you had had such a conversation, and under oath, you gave no clear answer.

Then today my Republican colleagues raised the issue with you, and again, you said you do not recall and that you had no “inappropriate conversations” with anyone at that law firm, which has led a lot of people to believe that that was equivocal in terms of a response.

So whether a conversation was appropriate in your opinion is not a clear answer to my question. My colleague, Senator Blumenthal, again, asked you, and you said you were pretty confident the answer was “no.” So, frankly, if last night you had just said “no” or an “absolute no” even today, I think this could be put to rest.

But I will ask you again and for the last time. “Yes” or “no,” have you ever been part of a conversation with lawyers at the firm of Kasowitz Benson Torres about Special Counsel Mueller or his investigation, and I ask were you ever part of a conversation? I am not asking you what did you say. I am asking you were you a party to a conversation that occurred regarding Special Counsel Mueller’s investigation? And a simple “yes” or “no” would suffice.

Judge KAVANAUGH. About his investigation. And are you referring to a specific person?

Senator HARRIS. I am referring to a specific subject, and the specific person I am referring to is you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, who was the conversation with? You said you had information.

Senator HARRIS. That is not the subject of the question, sir.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator HARRIS. The subject of the question is you and whether you were part of a conversation regarding Special Counsel Mueller's investigation.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The answer is no.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you. And it would have been great if you could have said that last night.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I—

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In my—never mind.

Senator HARRIS. Let us move on.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator HARRIS. Yesterday, Senator Blumenthal asked if you could recuse yourself in cases involving the personal civil or criminal liability of the President. You declined to say that you would. So my question is could a reasonable person question your independence in cases involving the President's civil or criminal liability?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am sorry. Can you repeat it for me?

Senator HARRIS. Would it be reasonable for someone to question your independence in cases involving the President's civil or criminal liability, should that occur?

Judge KAVANAUGH. My independence I believe has been demonstrated through my 12-year record and what you have heard from the people who have worked with me, and I believe deeply in the independence of the judiciary. I rule based on the law, and you can look at cases that I have ruled against when I became a judge against the Bush administration. And I have talked about the history of our country and the history of the Supreme Court.

Senator HARRIS. And on that point, sir, and particularly history of the Supreme Court in confirmation hearings. Justice Kagan, during her confirmation hearing, committed to recusing in cases she handled as Solicitor General. Justice Breyer committed to recusing in cases implicating his financial interests in Lloyd's of London.

Justice Ginsburg refused to commit to recusing in cases that were on her D.C. Circuit recusal list. Justice Scalia committed at the hearing to recuse in a case implicating an issue that was the same as an issue he had decided as a D.C. Circuit judge. So my question to you is will you commit to recusing in any case involving the civil or criminal liability of the President who appointed you—or nominated you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The independence of the judiciary requires that I not commit to how I would decide a particular case and to issue a commitment on a discretionary recusal issue in either direction. So if I answered that question in either direction—

Senator HARRIS. But do you think it is inappropriate—

Judge KAVANAUGH. That would be a—I would be violating my judicial independence, in my view, by committing in this context. I have explained—

Senator HARRIS. But with all due respect, sir, I shared with you that other nominees sitting at that desk, or some desk like that, have committed to recusing. There have been circumstances where they have committed. So is it your opinion then that they violated some ethical code or rule?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know all of the circumstances, but I believe those were situations that were required recusals where they had previously had to recuse and were simply indicating their required recusals. But I do not know all of the circumstances.

A discretionary recusal as a commitment to get a job or a discretionary nonrecusal as a commitment to get a job, either direction would be violating my independence as a judge, as a sitting judge and as a nominee to the Court.

Senator HARRIS. Okay. It is clear you are unwilling at this point to commit to recusal. So we can move on.

One of your mentors, Justice Kennedy, wrote landmark opinions in the area of LGBTQ rights that have had a major impact on the lives of many Americans. Let us assess one of those cases, and that is the Obergefell case.

In Obergefell, as you know, the Court held that same-sex couples have a right to marry. My question is whether the Obergefell case was correctly decided, in your opinion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, Justice Kennedy wrote the majority opinion in a series of five cases, Romer v. Evans—

Senator HARRIS. If we can just talk about Obergefell, that would be great.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I want to explain it.

Senator HARRIS. I actually know the history leading up to Obergefell, so can you just please address your comments to Obergefell?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would like to explain it, if I can? He wrote the majority opinion in Romer v. Evans, Lawrence v. Texas, United States v. Windsor, Obergefell, and Masterpiece Cakeshop. Concluding in Masterpiece Cakeshop importantly with a statement, if I could just read this?

Senator HARRIS. But, no, please do not. Because I actually have read it, and I am sure most have. My question is very specific. Can you comment on your personal opinion on whether Obergefell was correctly decided? It is a “yes” or “no,” please.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In Masterpiece Cakeshop, and this is, I think, relevant to your question, Justice Kennedy wrote in the majority opinion joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito and Justice Gorsuch and Justice Breyer and Justice Kagan, the days of discriminating against gay and lesbian Americans or treating gay and lesbian Americans as inferior in dignity and worth are over, paraphrasing.

Senator HARRIS. Are over. Right. Do you agree with that statement?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is the precedent of the Supreme Court agreed with by a—

Senator HARRIS. Sir, I am asking your opinion.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I—

Senator HARRIS. You are the nominee right now, and so it is probative of your ability to serve on the highest court in our land. So I am asking you a very specific question. Either you are willing to answer or not. And if you are not willing to answer it, we can move on.

But do you believe Obergefell was correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So each of the Justices have declined, as a matter of judicial independence, each of them, to answer questions in that line of cases.

Senator HARRIS. So you will not answer that question?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Following the precedent set by those eight Justices, they have all declined—

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Judge KAVANAUGH. When asked to answer that question.

Senator HARRIS. I have limited time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But it is important that—

Senator HARRIS. I would really like to move on. You have said that Brown v. Board of Education was one of the greatest moments in the Court's history. Do you believe that Obergefell was also one of those moments?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have said, Senator, consistent with what the nominees have done, that the vast swathe of modern case law, as Justice Kagan put it, you cannot, as a nominee in this seat, give a thumbs up or thumbs down. That was—that is her words.

Senator HARRIS. Do you think that Obergefell was one of the great moments in the history of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Judge KAVANAUGH. And for that reason, those nominees have declined to comment on recent cases, all of them.

Senator HARRIS. Is it a great moment, is what I am asking you, not to comment on the legal analysis. Do you believe that was a great moment in the history of the Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So Justice Kennedy wrote the majority opinion saying the days of treating gay and lesbian Americans or gay and lesbian couples as second-class citizens or inferior in dignity and worth are over on the Supreme Court. That is a very important statement, Senator.

Senator HARRIS. I agree. That is why I think you repeated it. Thank you.

Let us move on. Over the last several months, we have all witnessed the inhumane and heartbreaking separation of immigrant children from their families by this administration. Despite a court order requiring the administration to reunite them over a month ago, nearly 500 immigrant children are still separated from their parents.

Do you believe that constitutional rights of parents, specifically fundamental due process rights, are implicated in such family separations?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that is a matter of pending litigation, I believe. And as a sitting judge on the D.C. Circuit or as the nominee, I, of course, cannot comment.

Senator HARRIS. Have you watched the coverage of any of these cases on television, or have you read about the experiences those parents and those children have had?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have seen some television.

Senator HARRIS. In the 1889 Chinese Exclusion Case, the Supreme Court permitted a ban on Chinese people entering the United States. The Court said Chinese people are “impossible to assimilate with our people” and said they were immigrating in numbers “approaching an invasion.”

This case has never been explicitly overruled. You have said you would be willing to talk about older cases. So can you tell me, was the United States Supreme Court correct in holding that Chinese people could be banned from entering our country?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the cases in the 1890s, as you know—

Senator HARRIS. 1889, to be specific.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay, in that era reflect discriminatory attitudes by the Supreme Court. Of course, that is the era also of Plessy v. Ferguson.

Senator HARRIS. But would you be willing to say that that was incorrectly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I do not want to opine on a case, a particular case without looking at it and studying with the discrimination—

Senator HARRIS. Are you aware that that case has not been overturned?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I know that with a number of the cases, like Korematsu. Let me use that as an example.

Senator HARRIS. Which we have discussed earlier.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is—

Senator HARRIS. But this case in particular, were you aware that it had not been overturned?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I realize that there are still cases in the immigration context—

Senator HARRIS. Have you ever written about any of those cases and your thoughts about whether they should be re-examined or potentially overturned, and sometimes obviously they should be overturned?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, there is a swathe of cases—

Senator HARRIS. Have you talked about this case ever?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not believe. I am happy to be refreshed if you have something that suggests I have.

Senator HARRIS. No, it is actually a question.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Okay.

Senator HARRIS. And under the Constitution, Judge, do you believe that Congress or the President can ban entry into the United States on the basis of race?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was, of course, one of the issues that was just in litigation, and there is still litigation about the immigration laws and how exclusions—

Senator HARRIS. So you are not going to answer that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is pending litigation, so I think I, as a matter of independence and precedent.

Senator HARRIS. Will not answer that. That is fine. Let us move on.

In 2013, Texas passed a law that imposed new restrictions on healthcare facilities that provide abortions. The effect was that after the law was passed, half those facilities closed, which severely limited access to healthcare for the women of Texas.

In 2016, Whole Woman's Health was decided, wherein the Supreme Court invalidated the Texas restrictions. Was Whole Wom- an's Health correctly decided? “Yes” or “no”? And we can keep it short and move on.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, consistent with the approach of nominees—

Senator HARRIS. You will not be answering that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Following that nominee precedent.

Senator HARRIS. Okay. I would like to ask you another question, which I believe you can answer. You have said repeatedly that Roe v. Wade is an important precedent. I would like to understand what that really means for the lives of women. We have had a lot of conversations about how the discussion we are having in this room will impact real people out there.

And so my question is what, in your opinion, is still unresolved? For example, can a State prevent a woman from using the most common or widely accepted medical procedure to terminate her pregnancy? Do you believe that that is still an unresolved issue? I am not asking how you would decide it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I do not want to comment on hypothetical cases. Roe v. Wade is an important precedent. It has been reaffirmed many times.

Senator HARRIS. So are you willing to say that it would be unconstitutional for a State to place such a restriction on women for Roe v. Wade?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, you can—the process on the Supreme Court was—in Roe was reaffirmed in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, of course, and that is precedent on precedent. And then there are a lot of cases applying the undue burden standard. And those themselves are important precedents, and I had to apply them—

Senator HARRIS. And we have discussed that many times. I actually had the benefit of sitting through most of the hours of your testimony over the last 2 days.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you.

Senator HARRIS. I know you have talked a lot about that. Can Congress ban abortions nationwide after 20 weeks of pregnancy?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that would require me to comment on potential legislation that I understand, and therefore, I should not, as a matter of judicial independence following the precedent of other nominees, do that.

Senator HARRIS. Okay. Then we can move on. I am going to ask you about unenumerated rights. So you gave a speech praising former Justice Rehnquist’s dissent in Roe. There has been much discussion about that, and you wrote celebrating his success that “successful in stemming the general tide of freewheeling judicial creation of unenumerated rights.” That is what you said in celebration of Justice Rehnquist.

So, “unenumerated rights” is a phrase that lawyers use, but I want to make clear what we are talking about. It means rights that are protected by the Constitution even if they are not specifically mentioned in the Constitution.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator HARRIS. So they are not in that book that you carry. So what we are talking about is the right to vote. That is an unenumerated right. The right to have children, the right to control the upbringing of your children, the right to refuse medical care, the right to love the partner of your choice, the right to marry, and the right to have an abortion.

Now putting those unenumerated rights in the context of the statement you made, which was to praise the stemming of the general tide of freewheeling creation of unenumerated rights, which means you were—the interpretation there is you were praising the quest to end those unenumerated rights. My question to you is which of the rights that I just mentioned do you want to put an end to or roll back?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Three points, I believe, Senator. First, the Constitution, it is in the book that I carry. The Constitution protects unenumerated rights. That is what the Supreme Court has said.

Senator HARRIS. But it does not explicitly protect the rights that I just listed, and we both know that that is the case.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. So that is point one. Point two is Glucksberg, the case you are referring to, specifically cited Planned Parenthood v. Casey as authority in that case. So Casey reaffirmed Roe. Casey is cited as authority in Glucksberg. That is point two.

And point three, Justice Kagan, when she sat in this chair, pointed repeatedly to Glucksberg as the test for recognizing unenumerated rights going forward. In describing the precedent, I agree with her description of that in her hearing.

Senator HARRIS. So thank you for that. So then let us put the rights that I mentioned, which are unenumerated, in the context of your praise of Justice Rehnquist as having “stemmed the general tide of freewheeling judicial creation of unenumerated rights.” Arguably, every right that I mentioned on that list was a judicially created unenumerated right.

And my question then is when you praised a jurist who attempted to end those rights, which rights in particular do you believe are praiseworthy of ending?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So that was the test that was set forth by the Supreme Court going forward for recognition of additional unenumerated rights. That was cited as authority in that case, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, which reaffirmed Roe. The point—

Senator HARRIS. So let us talk about the right to vote. Do you believe that that falls in the category of having been caught up in the general tide of freewheeling judicial creation of unenumerated rights?

Judge KAVANAUGH. What I was describing with Chief Justice Rehnquist, and it was a description of his career was in a variety of areas and his role—

Senator HARRIS. But specifically your reference was to unenumerated rights, sir.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. And in a number of areas I have described five different areas of his jurisprudence, where he had helped the Supreme Court achieve what I think has been a common sense middle ground that has stood the test of time in terms of precedent in a variety of areas. At least that is how others have described it.

The Glucksberg case, as Justice Kagan explained when she was in this chair, is the case that the Supreme Court has relied on for forward-looking future recognition of unenumerated rights. It did not—

Senator HARRIS. Thank you, sir. I am familiar with that. I think you are not going to address the specific unenumerated rights, or are you? Because if not, we can move on.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I have addressed it. Thank you, Senator.

Senator HARRIS. Okay. In 2011, you were a judge on one of the challenges to the Affordable Care Act. The court you sat upon held there that you dissented on procedural grounds on the court, which upheld the Act.

One of your former law clerks described your opinion in that case, and that is the Seven-Sky case, as “a thorough take-down of the individual mandate.” He would go on to clerk for Supreme Court Justice Kennedy that year or the next year, and the Supreme Court then held or heard the challenge to the Affordable Care Act. And according to him, your opinion was “a road map” for the dissenting Justices, the ones who would have struck down the Affordable Care Act.

Given you wrote the “road map,” according to your law clerk, could one reasonably conclude that you would have voted to strike down the Affordable Care Act, had you been on the Supreme Court?

Judge KAVANAUGH. A couple points, Senator. First, I concluded—in one case I upheld the Affordable Care Act against an Origination Clause challenge. In the case you are referring to, I did not reach the merits. But I discussed the merits pro that were being argued in both directions.

My opinion has been described as the road map for both sides because I described both positions, and actually, it was not a road map at all because I did not reach—

Senator HARRIS. He also described it as a take-down.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I speak for myself, and my own opinions speak for themselves. And what my—

Senator HARRIS. So he was out of bounds—of line then? And I am sure the Chairman wants to close this questioning, so we can leave it with that.

I thank you, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. All right. Thank you for your time, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before I call on Senator Cornyn, the Minority has requested a third round of questions, and that is perfectly legitimate. It may make your day longer, Judge, but we did the same thing in the Gorsuch hearing.

We have agreed to 8-minute rounds. Senator Leahy has given his additional 8 minutes to Senator Hirono. So she will have 16 minutes. And then we will go to our traditional closed session down in the regular Committee room, 226, that we have already discussed.

So two things I need to know. Would you like to have a few minutes from me if you would like to respond to some of the issues my colleague has raised, including recusal from any cases involving the Mueller investigation, your opinion or response to whether Obergefell was correctly decided, and about Whole Woman's Health issues, that due process rights of family separation? Any of those things that you did not get a chance to explain you want to explain?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No. That is okay, Mr. Chairman. I think we had a good dialogue.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Then one other thing, would you like—when we get done with Senator Cornyn, before we start the third round, because that adds up to about 80 minutes, assuming none of you guys want to talk—and I hope you do not want to.

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Would you like to have a 2½-minute break or a quick 10-minute break or 7—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I can go with 5, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. When Senator Cornyn is done, we will take a 5-minute break.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, this side may have a few pearls of wisdom, too.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay, but here—

Senator CORNYN. No, I take your point.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Well, let me explain.

Senator CORNYN. I think most everything has been asked and answered.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I would not want to cut anybody off if they get really warmed up about something.

Senator CORNYN. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a description of a series of letters and editorials. I would like to ask that those letters and editorials described in this document be made part of the record.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator CORNYN. So, Judge, a lot of things going on here today and yesterday, I think you will agree. One of the things that bothers me a little bit is the suggestion that some Americans can participate in the political debates and others should be demonized and be condemned, sort of a guilt by association.

And we have heard in particular you being criticized, and the Federalist Society in particular being criticized for participating in the judicial selection process, debating legal issues, social issues, and the like. But, and I recall my friend from Minnesota talked about the Brennan Center. She referred to it as a nonpartisan group. I would not call it that. I would call it a left-leaning, progressive group, just like I would call NARAL, the Alliance for Justice, Sierra Club, Emily's List, and others.

I mention all of those because each of those organizations and their members have weighed in on the important topic of your confirmation. And I just think it is—well, it reminds me a little bit of Joseph McCarthy, talk about one of the dark periods of the Senate's history. In the red scare of the 1950s, he was known for asking, "Were you now or have you ever been a member of the Communist Party?"

And he was appropriately admonished and ultimately left the Senate because he made irresponsible allegations in public against innocent people. But the idea that we would somehow disparage Americans or their associations and somehow disparage their right to express themselves on a matter of public interest like the confirmation of a Supreme Court Justice strikes me as a bad road to go down.

That is not a question. That is a statement. I want to—I have found this hearing, I hope you have, to be edifying in a number of ways. It is not always pretty. It is like democracy itself. Sometimes it gets pretty messy. But that is what we do here in the Senate. We make sausage and—or we give those who make sausage a bad name sometimes by what we do here.

But this is democracy. This is the people—people’s representatives in action, advocating on their behalf different points of view. And the ultimate decisionmaker in all this, of course, is the American people, and that is as it should be.

But one of the things that Senator Crapo and Senator Sasse and others have raised during the course of this hearing is, the role of administrative agencies in our Government. First of all, were there any administrative agencies at the founding of America?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, in the First Congress, they created a Secretary—Department of War and Foreign Affairs, Treasury. So there were a few departments created at the beginning of the republic. But obviously, those were ones of core executive functions, and as more—so those were the ones at the beginning.

But to your point, not anything approaching the number of agencies now.

Senator CORNYN. Well, that is very helpful. I had not really thought about those as being administrative agencies, but they certainly are departments of Government, and they would issue regulations and rules that essentially what we see today when administrative agencies issue rules and regulations, they have the force of law, do they not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. They do, Senator.

Senator CORNYN. And we do not get to vote on the bureaucrats who occupy those agencies, do we?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, for the independent agencies, of course, they operate with for-cause protection, and the executive agencies are appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principal executive officers. They are not elected. As to your point, they are not elected.

Senator CORNYN. Well, one of the things that I think is part of the genius of our representative Government is the fact that those of us who do make policy are—run for election, and we can either be voted into office or voted out of office. But when it comes to administrative agencies, the American people do not have that choice, do they?

Judge KAVANAUGH. They are not elected. That is correct, Senator.

Senator CORNYN. And so what I want to talk to you about briefly here is just the growth of the administrative—of administrative agencies in our Government and the fact that over time an enormous body of decisionmaking has been delegated from the collected representatives of the people, the Congress, to these administrative agencies that issue voluminous rules and regulations, which have the force of law.

And to the comments made by some of my colleagues more eloquently than I am making them, Congress has delegated more and more responsibility to them and accepted less and less responsibility to make the hard judgments that ultimately we will be held accountable for at the ballot box. And I want to just talk to you a little bit about—we talked about the Chevron case, and you have explained that. I will come back to that in a minute.

But if a community bank or credit union in Austin, Texas, the regulatory agencies that govern them and audit them and the like, they have—they issue regulations and rules and can basically penalize or otherwise punish those community banks and credit unions in Austin, Texas, can they not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct in terms of establishing rules and then being able to bring enforcement actions sometimes that are brought before administrative law judges subject to sometimes deferential judicial review.

Senator CORNYN. And because of the Administrative Procedures Act that Senator Crapo talked about and because we presume that these administrative agencies have expertise that courts do not, there is deference afforded to the fact-finding and the legal conclusions in the application of those rules to contested cases, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct. That is a concern that I have identified in some of my cases about fact-finding and the fact that sometimes it appears not always to live up to the due process requirements. It is something I have identified in a few cases. It is a part of our administrative system, so I am talking about specific cases where I have ruled that in that specific case there was a problem with how the adjudication was conducted.

Senator CORNYN. And if the courts will defer under Administrative Procedures Act and under that body of law to the fact-finding by an administrative agency and the courts say, well, unless it is arbitrary and capricious or some similar standard, they are going to let it stand. There is really no recourse for an individual even in a court of law if in fact what that agency has done has made an erroneous decision in all circumstances, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That can be correct.

Senator CORNYN. I know we are getting into a little bit of complexity here and there are some nuances associated with—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But—

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. But I think you get my drift.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Your general description is right. I have been very in the weeds sometimes in cases involving individuals in administrative adjudications where we have had judicial review because I know those of the cases where individual lives and liberty and property—the Rossello case was a good example where the woman was denied Social Security benefits for her disability because of a claim that she had had employment at some point even though she really had not. It had gone on for 15 years, and I was very stern, I would say, in the opinion I wrote in that case about how that was inconsistent with basic due process and the law.

And so I have been—every case matters, of course, but the cases with individuals who seem to have gotten the runaround from the Government are cases where I think judicial review is especially important. And that can be criminal defendants, that can be in administrative adjudications. Whoever it is, you want to make sure they are getting treated fairly under the law.

Senator CORNYN. And I do not know if it happened in the case of the woman you described, but in some instances even after the agency makes a decision, if you want to appeal the decision of that agency, they tell you to go next door and talk to another employee of the same agency and state your grounds for appeal, hardly due process in my regard. Is that generally a concern about whether there is an independent review process even within an administrative agency?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is an issue many have raised as a concern in the Supreme Court since Crowell v. Benson has upheld the general concept of administrative adjudication. But whether it is Article III adjudication or administrative adjudication and we are reviewing it, we need to make sure that people's due process rights are being respected.

Senator CORNYN. Well, it just strikes me that, given the explosion of administrative agencies and the people that work for them, the explosion of regulations that Congress never passes on and that the courts are, by doctrine, by precedent, deferential to both the finding of fact and the conclusions of law under the Chevron doctrine, then there is a lot of room for a lot of abuse, and a lot of individuals strike me as—the frustration they feel that their Government is no longer responsive to them is very real and a serious issue.

But now let us get into the Chevron case, it strikes me—and I may not get this right. You will correct me if I am wrong. That basically where Congress is ambiguous on the grant of authority to an administrative agency, the Court will defer to the agency in the interpretation of its own legal authority if it is a reasonable conclusion. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is a correct description of the Chevron doctrine.

Senator CORNYN. Well, I got lucky, I guess.

[Laughter.]

Senator CORNYN. But my point is why in the world would an agency be able to determine their own legal authority? I mean, given the other concerns we have about a lack of accountability, a lack of due process, would the courts then say, well, we are going to let them define the scope of their own legal authority where they can act, and we are going to defer to that. Why in the world would the courts do that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is one of the critiques that has been leveled at Chevron, one of the things that is important, I believe, is to recognize Chevron itself—I hate to get in the weeds, but Footnote 9 of Chevron is very important in terms of using all the tools of statutory construction before you make a finding of ambiguity in the statutory term at issue or otherwise. And I think that is important for courts to take seriously.

As I have pointed out, the ambiguity finding is sufficiently uncertain that, that is, in my view, as I have written, in tension with the notion of the judge as neutral umpire and something that has been of concern to me. There is also the major questions exception, major rules exception to the Chevron doctrine that I have written about.

Senator CORNYN. Well, I am certainly not going to ask you on how you might rule in a future case, but this has been identified by legal scholars and by judges of all description and orientation as a serious issue that may need to be revisited in the future.

And like I did with our Santa Fe School District case, I will just express my own frustration with that, but especially when you compound it with the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau where Congress insulated the Bureau from any sort of oversight by Congress and where they appointed a head of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau with vast powers to get into the personal financial information of every American and give them really more authority than we would ever give any of our intelligence agencies, it just strikes me as a tremendous abuse of power. Again, it is not a question, but I will use the opportunity to express a frustration I know Senator Crapo, as the Chairman of the Banking Committee, shares with me.

In the 5-minutes I have left, let me ask you a softball question, cameras in the courtroom. One of the reasons why I think these confirmation hearings, as painful as they are to the nominee and their family and friends, are so important is I think more people in America have learned about how their Government should operate and does operate by watching the last 2 days and you and the doc then they have through all their time in elementary school, junior high school and high school and college.

Most Americans do not really study American history anymore, much less civics, and so I think this is a wonderful opportunity, and I am glad your students, your team are here on the front row may be listening to a few things because I think this is really important. If Americans are going to accept responsibility for their Government and if they are going to hold public officials accountable for performing their responsibilities according to the Constitution, they need to be able to understand the sorts of issues we have been talking about here today, and they need to get involved and express themselves.

So, to me, cameras in the courtroom I know are controversial on the Supreme Court. I will tell you—and you know this already—many State courts, for example—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. The Texas Supreme Court has a fixed camera in the corner that never moves, and everybody forgets it is there and nobody grandstands and they have oral arguments and the judges do their thing and ask questions. The lawyers give answers. And I think it is another great opportunity for people to see their government in action.

And I know the Supreme Court, no cameras in the courtroom, you maybe pay to have a very nice artist rendition of your oral argument. I was given a copy of mine from my staff when I argued the case we talked about, and my staff said, “Well, we paid $50 to take 5 years and 10 pounds off.” And I said, “Thank you. Money well spent.”

But the point is, I think the American people would learn an awful lot by seeing the Supreme Court in action, and I applaud the action that your court and others have taken to make that more accessible with recordings and the like. But I would hope that the Court would continue to look at the possibility that more and more of its activities would be available to the American people because not everybody can go across the street and get a nice seat in that wonderful marble palace over there and see the Court in action. I think they would be awed, I think they would be impressed, and I think they would learn a lot about how the courts do operate and should operate in our system of government.

So, I know the O.J. Simpson trial—and I am showing my age here—gave cameras in the courtroom a bad name and certainly some of the activities we see at hearings like this where people know they are going to be on TV camera encourages them to misbehave and disrupt. That may be the cost of doing business sometimes. I am confident that the Court could control that much better than we in Congress can.

But I would just like for you to take a couple minutes to comment on that. And how should the judiciary look at this great opportunity to inform and educate the American people about how their Government works and certainly the judiciary and what the risks you see to the litigants into the fair administration of justice?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, thank you. First, you mentioned that this—you used the word painful. For me, this has been a great honor to be here, the greatest honor, and for my family to be here. I have enjoyed the discussions with all the Senators on the Committee. I have enjoyed—and it is continuing, I know. And I have enjoyed it, the 65 meetings. I know this is not my last comment, but I have enjoyed the 65 meetings, I have enjoyed the hearing. It is a great honor.

As I have said repeatedly, I am a sunrise side of the mountain. I am an optimist. I am positive about the future of the judiciary. I am positive and optimistic about the future of the country. We are always forming a more perfect union, seeking to fulfill the promises of the Constitution, and to be here is a great honor.

You mentioned people watching. If there is one thing they take away, I hope they understand that an independent judiciary is the crown jewel of our constitutional republic in my view and that the judiciary has been, must be, and must continue to be independent of politics, that we do not make the policy decisions. We do the best we can to decide the law under the precedent of the Supreme Court, the laws passed by Congress.

To your point about cameras, I view it as of vital importance going forward, vital importance to maintain the confidence of all Americans, all Americans in the independence and impartiality of the judiciary. And I know how concerned and focused Chief Justice Roberts is on maintaining confidence—and all the Justices on the Supreme Court—maintaining the confidence of all the American people in the independence of the judiciary and the rule of law in the United States of America. And I understand that. I understand the responsibility I bear as a nominee and, if confirmed as a Justice, to do everything I can and everything I do to maintain confidence in the independence of the judiciary going forward.

I do agree with you; when you watch an oral argument of the Supreme Court and you see the Justices in action grappling with cases, it is inspiring to see them in action grappling, as I have said, not sitting on different sides of an aisle, not caucusing in different rooms, as one group seeking as best they can to get the right answer under the precedent and laws of the United States. It is inspiring, and it is something, if I am fortunate enough to be there, that I will give it my all to live up to that responsibility. As I said to Senator Booker, I understand the responsibility I would bear if I were on that Court, and I would do everything I can to live up to it and maintain it.

As to cameras, consistent with what I have said, I have an open mind on that. I have seen the benefits of live audio, but I would want to listen first, listen to the eight Justices who are there and have thought about it, have experienced it. But I have an open mind.

And I will close with this: I want to do everything I can, as I said to the Chairman, to maintain confidence of the American people, all the American people in the independence and impartiality of the judiciary.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. We will take a 5-minute break.

[Whereupon the Committee was recessed and reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Judge, I want to apologize to you. I am the one that did not get back here on time.

Okay. I think we will start with Senator Durbin with your 8 minutes right now. Well, if she wants to go first, she can, but—

Senator DURBIN. Yes.

Chairman GRASSLEY [continuing]. I would like to have somebody start. Why do you not take a couple minutes right now just to use up two of your minutes? I do not think she will care. Go ahead.

Senator DURBIN. You are going to have to represent me in this. Is she here? All right.

Judge, thank you very much. I have a granddaughter who is going into the second grade, and she came home from school in first grade last year to tell her mom that there had been an instruction from the teacher about what to do in her first-grade classroom if a shooter came into their school. She was told to get on the floor and stay away from the windows. Her mom called me in tears and said I cannot believe it has come to this, that in the first grade we have got to warn our kids about shooters coming in to schools. But we know we do. And I talked to Senator Blumenthal and Senator Murphy about the tragedy at Sandy Hook and so many other tragedies.

That is why I want to spend a moment talking about the Second Amendment here because you have taken a position on the Second Amendment which you yourself have described as a lonely voice. You have taken a position which I do not believe is responsible from a public safety viewpoint. You laid out your text history and tradition test for reviewing Second Amendment challenges to gun laws and your dissent in the D.C. Circuit Court Heller case. Your test would have courts ignore the public safety impact of laws and instead search to see if the laws had historic analogs.

In a March 31, 2016, speech at the American Enterprise Institute, you said, quote, “I thought Justice Scalia said pretty clearly what the test is, that history and tradition-based approach. I have been a lonely voice in reading Heller that way,” end of quote. Indeed, Judge, I am not aware of any Circuit that follows your test, the history and tradition test. They all apply intermediate or strict scrutiny and ask basic questions about public safety.

In the 2011 Heller case, the two judges in the majority of the D.C. Circuit, both Republicans I might add, said this about your lone dissent: “Unlike our dissenting colleague, we read Heller straightforwardly.”

Now, one lonely voice can connote that you are inspiring, insightful, or brave. It might also connote that you are just plain wrong. And in this situation it is a life or death test, whether it is an assault weapon or the person who can buy it or use it. I need to know from you how you can reconcile your position with your opening statement to this Committee. Do you remember what you told us, the rule of common sense? The rule of common sense suggests to me that you would not be a lone voice on an issue of life and death involving innocent Americans. Common sense would suggest that you would join with Justice Scalia and other Federal courts who believe that scrutiny, which involves public safety, should be the test.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, thank you. It is not my test. It is my interpretation of the Supreme Court’s test. In my opening statement I emphasized precedent. It is all about precedent so—

Senator DURBIN. You are alone. You are alone. You have admitted you are alone.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not anymore.

Senator DURBIN. How can you read the same case others have read and come up with a completely different solution and say, “I am just following the precedent”?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Many other judges since I gave that talk have agreed with the approach I set forth in that case, but the important thing is the opinion speaks for itself. It goes through in painstaking detail the Heller case for the Supreme Court authored by Justice Scalia and then the McDonald case authored by Justice Alito and explains that the exceptions to the individual right protected by the Second Amendment are laid out in part three of the Supreme Court’s Heller opinion.

You mentioned intermediate or strict scrutiny. I said specifically in my opinion that the history and tradition test may allow some additional regulations than strict scrutiny test, so in terms of comparing how much, to your point, gun regulation is permissible, I made that explicit point in my—

Senator DURBIN. But would not the commonsense rule that you stressed in your opening statement, at a time when so many innocent people are being killed with guns, suggests that we ought to be mindful that the Second Amendment is not a suicide pact? We ought to make America safe and to find a construction of this which sets you apart from those who are looking to public safety as the standard is a troubling thing. I am sure that some groups—I am not going to name names; you know what I am talking about—applaud your position, but I would just say from the viewpoint of parents and families and people worried about gun safety, why do you set yourself aside from the mainstream of thinking on this?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Because that is how I read the precedent of the Supreme Court as best I could. I specifically talked about at the end of that opinion, too, as well, the real-world consequences. I was very aware of the real-world consequences. I am very aware of the drills that are done in the schools these days. I am very aware that I lived in the DC area, which was known as the murder capital of the world, for a time in the 1980s with mostly handgun violence. I am very attentive to that issue.

At the same time, I am a judge. My duty, as I have explained repeatedly, is to follow the Constitution, as interpreted by the Supreme Court. I explained in as much detail as I possibly could how I analyzed Justice Scalia's majority opinion and Justice Alito's plurality opinion in McDonald. They, as I read them, seem to reject the balancing test that had been articulated in Justice Breyer's dissenting opinions in both cases. I explained that in detail. It is important to underscore the Supreme Court said and I have said, following it, machine guns can be banned—

Senator DURBIN. That has been the case since the 1930s.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I just want to reiterate, machine guns can be banned under the Supreme Court precedent.

Senator DURBIN. Thank goodness.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And so, too, the Supreme Court said traditional laws such as felony possession laws, concealed carry laws are permissible, bans on possession by mentally ill, bans on possession of guns in schools and government buildings, all of those were articulated by the Supreme Court as permissible regulations, and those are some of the regulations that has traditionally existed.

But I understand and I am aware of what you are talking about in terms of schools, and I understand the drills. And, of course, the test—

Senator DURBIN. Common sense.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Gun violence—

Senator DURBIN. Rules of common sense.

Last question I have for you is this: When the President introduced you as his nominee, you said, "Throughout this process, I have witnessed firsthand"—you said this to the President—"I have witnessed firsthand your appreciation for the vital role of the American judiciary." What did you witness about this President's appreciation for the vital role of the judiciary?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I witnessed his discussion with me in my interview, his discussion with me the night he announced me at the White House, his discussion on that Sunday night when I went to the White House—he and Mrs. Trump met with me—and his discussion of the judiciary with me. What I based that judgment on was my interactions with him on the Monday, on the Sunday, and on the Monday.

Senator DURBIN. We usually instruct juries not to put their life experience and common sense aside when they make a verdict, and I think the verdict on this President and his vital role in the judiciary would include more than those meetings. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. In between any Democrat, if a Republican wants recognition, ask for it. Otherwise, Senator Hatch.

Senator HATCH. Well, let me just ask one question. Hang on. Let me just ask one question to you. You told Senator Durbin earlier that, quote, "We are all equal before the law in the United States of America," unquote. And yesterday, you said that, quote, "No matter where you come from, no matter how rich you are, no matter your race, your gender, no matter your station in life, no matter your position in government, it is all equal justice under the law,” unquote.

So in your opinion, what does equal justice under the law mean to you?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Equal justice under the law means that every American, every citizen, everyone who ends up in an American court is entitled to equal treatment, due process, equal protection, your argument will prevail on the facts and the law in a particular case, not—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not based on the identity of the parties or the litigants, not based on policy views, and that is a critical foundation of the rule of law in the United States and of the independence and impartial judiciary that we hold dear in the United States.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Judge. That is all I care to ask.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Feinstein.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman.

If I do not use all my time, I would like to cede what remains to Senator Coons.

Chairman GRASSLEY. That will be done, yes.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thanks.

Judge, you have very expansive views on Presidential power, and they are not limited in whether the President can be checked by Congress or the courts. I think you believe that a sitting President cannot be indicted, cannot be prosecuted, cannot be investigated, and should have the authority to fire a special counsel at will.

It is my understanding in 2016 you told the American Enterprise Institute that you will put the final nail into the, I guess, coffin of the independent counsel. Would you comment on that, please?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, thank you. The nail in the independent counsel statute was put in by Congress in 1999 when Congress overwhelmingly decided not to reauthorize the law as a general matter.

In terms of Executive power, I would just urge—we have not discussed a few issues here today, but by opinion on the political question doctrine in El-Shifa, my article on national security and my book review of Judge David Barron’s book, my mens rea opinion dissent in Burwell joined by Judge Tatel, my administrative law—the Harvard Law Review piece, if you just read those four pieces, just read those four pieces, I think you will understand that I am not someone who has an unduly expansive view, that I am one who has held the executive branch to account in a number of different areas, consistent with our constitutional structure. And those are important, so if you are just going to read a few things, just read those four things—

Senator FEINSTEIN. I will.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I think you will understand my understanding—

Senator FEINSTEIN. I will.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of how Executive power and legislative power interact.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Okay. In 2003 while you were in the White House Counsel's Office, the Supreme Court decided to hear two cases involving University of Michigan's efforts to increase racial diversity. The Bush administration filed briefs in the Michigan case arguing that the University of Michigan's programs were unconstitutional. Senator Booker asked you about this. So please tell me, what was your view on whether the Bush administration should oppose the University of Michigan's efforts to increase racial diversity on the campus? And do you support using race as one factor in admission to college or universities to achieve racial diversity on campuses?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator. This was an issue on which the existing precedent of the Supreme Court and President Bush's views, in my view, dovetailed. I was working for President Bush. He was interested in promoting racial diversity. He had said as much as Governor of Texas. That was his position as President of the United States. He believed also, and this is consistent with Supreme Court precedent as well I believe, in using race-neutral means first to see if that—in Texas, the top 10 percent plan in the wake of the Hopwood decision of 1996, then-Governor Bush had been part of that. He always talked about the importance of diversity. And in the Michigan case, he insisted that the brief filed by the administration reflect his position that promoting racial diversity was an important goal for his administration.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Okay. Let me ask you a question on employment discrimination involving the LGBT community, and this is a while back. On July 11, 2001, you received an email from your White House colleague, Brad Berenson, who wrote that you were a walking point on faith-based issues. You replied to him that you had, and I quote, "mapped out a preliminary strategy to respond to concerns raised about the Bush administration's policies allowing Federal funding to go to religious organizations that discriminate against LGBT individuals." Could you describe your involvement in Bush administration's efforts to exempt charities from State and local laws prohibiting employment discrimination against LGBT individuals?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, thank you. I do not recall the specifics, but I do know that one of President Bush's initiatives when he came into office in 2001 was an Office of Faith-Based Initiatives. He was very focused on making sure that religious organizations could participate as equals, not as preferred, but as equals in American society, and that was something that the Faith-Based Initiatives Office worked on and something he was very focused on. I do not remember the details of—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not remember the details of particular—of that particular, but I do know that President Bush—at the same time, I also did speak to—on occasion to the Log Cabin Republicans, which was a group that we—that I talked to about judicial nominations, as I recall. And President Bush is someone who, you know, believed deeply, as he said repeatedly, in quality for all Americans.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Were you involved in the discussion of any other action to permit employment discrimination against LGBT persons?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Employment discrimination? I do not recall anything specific on that, Senator.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Okay. That is all I have.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Senator Coons will have another 1 minute and 22 seconds before I call on you. Any Republican want the floor? Senator Kennedy, then I will—I am going to—

Senator KENNEDY. Now, Mr. Chairman? Okay. Nothing. Thank you.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. My office is now going to be moved to Arlington.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Judge, real quickly, yesterday you—we talked about originalism, and you defined that as constitutional textualism. And what counts according to the Supreme Court in interpreting the United States Constitution and the Bill of Rights is the public understanding of the document—what the words meant at the time they were drafted and approved. And you pointed—if I get this wrong, stop me. And you pointed out that intent—the intent of the delegates was not something that should be focused on.

There were 55 delegates, I think about 55 delegates to the Convention.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Originally.

Senator KENNEDY. Originally. They obviously did not move in lock step. Delegates, Senators, Congressmen, Congresswomen have a multitude of reasons for voting as they do. That is why we focus on the public understanding, which is sort of an objective, reasonable person standard, right? Am I in the ballpark?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. So, here is my question. Why then—I am not suggesting we should not. I am just curious. Why then do we put so much emphasis on the Federalist Papers, or for that matter, the Anti-Federalist Papers when you are only getting the point of view of one person?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is a great question, and we should be careful when we look at the Federalist Papers. It is a great document. Those papers describe the structure of government in magnificent ways, but they were an advocacy piece to try to convince people in the ratifying Convention and a ratifying convention to vote “yes” on the draft Constitution. So, sometimes the—as with everything else that is an advocacy piece, we have to be careful to make sure that the words control and not necessarily an advocacy piece about the—about the document. And there were lots of statements in ratifying conventions as well.

This was a compromise, and not everyone, in fact, probably no one was a hundred percent with the final product, yet they came together. Ben Franklin performed a critical role at the Convention in bringing about the spirit of compromise that ultimately allowed them to get over the finish line, with George Washington as the presider at the Convention. And that compromise is contained in the words of the document.

Of course, precedent is part of the system we have now, and I always like to add that, that precedent is critical to how we today decide cases. But the original meaning, the words control over any intent of any one person or group of people.

Senator KENNEDY. Briefly, do you put much stock in Theron's treatise, compilation, discussion of the Convention record?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I find them fascinating, the notes of the Convention, and to see the day-by-day debate on the Convention and how things changed, how close we were to so many different things, things such as proportional representation in the Senate. That was close. A one-term President, that was close. The various compromises that were reached, the debate over the Necessary and Proper Clause. Some of those things that caused Gary, and Randolph, and Mason not to sign the final Constitution because they had such profound disagreements with the structure and were concerned in some respects with having a Bill of Rights which was not part of the original Constitution.

So, I enjoy the notes. I put—you learn from them. But, again, those don't necessarily control—those help you understand, but they do not control over the actual words of the document. So, to the Federalist Papers, they help you understand what is going on and how to read it all together as a whole, and they help you understand the Government. But you have to be focused on the words.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Judge. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Since Senator Leahy gave his 8 minutes to Senator Hirono, I am going to give Senator Leahy what time he needs off of my time.

Senator LEAHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will be very brief. Judge, how are you doing?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am doing great. It is an honor to be here, Senator.

Senator LEAHY. I will leave that one alone.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEAHY. In your concurrence in Klayman v. Obama, you went out of your way to say that not only is the dragnet collection of America's telephone records by the National Security Agency okay because it is not a search, you also said, and I did not see any support in this, that even if it is a search, it is justified in order to prevent terrorism. I believe Senator Lee is still here. This was months after Senator Lee and I worked to pass the USA Freedom Act, which prohibited such collection.

Now, the year before you issued your opinion, the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board had stated it could not identify a single instance involving a threat to the United States in which the program made a concrete difference in the outcome of a counter-terrorist investigation. Now, it also found the NSA phone records program was not essential to thwarting terrorist attacks. Why did you—I am just curious why you went out of your way to write an opinion stating that the program met a critical national security need when it already had been found by the national security people, it made no concrete difference in fighting terrorism.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I appreciate that question. The important point, I would say, as I was trying to articulate what I thought based on the precedent at the time. At the time, when your information went to a third party and the Government obtained the information from the third party, the existing Supreme Court precedent was that your privacy interest was essentially zero.

The opinion for the Supreme Court by Chief Justice Roberts this past spring in the Carpenter case is a game changer, and that is important. I talked repeatedly in this hearing about how technology will be one of the huge issues with the Fourth Amendment going forward, and you see Chief Justice Roberts' majority opinion in Carpenter. That alters and really is a game changer from the precedent on which I was writing at that time, so I would—

Senator LEAHY. Do you think if Carpenter had been decided, you would have written the concurrence you did in Klayman?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think—I do not see how I could have.

Senator LEAHY. Thank you. I agree with that. And you joined the dissent in U.S. v. Jones. You claimed that there was zero expectation of privacy in a person's movement outside their home. You said, "Infinite number, zero value part is also zero." Given the ever-greater data available to all of us and the ever-greater computing power to analyze everything, there is more computing power here than there was in our first moonshot. This sounds more like an analysis we get from the Chinese government than we would from James Madison had he known about what we can do. So, because of Carpenter, do you believe that there comes a point in which collection of data about a person becomes so pervasive that a warrant would be required even if the collection of one bit of the same data would not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Two points on that, Senator. I also went on in that opinion to say the attachment of the GPS device on the car was an invasion of the property right, and that independently would be a Fourth Amendment problem. When the case went to the Supreme Court, the majority opinion for the Supreme Court followed that approach that I had articulated in saying that it was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. So, the approach I had articulated there formed the basis of saying it was actually unconstitutional in that case to install the device. I relied on that in the Silverman decision from 1961 and Justice Brennan's concurring opinion in the Knotts case in the 1970s.

On your other point on technology and the phone that you held up, I do think the Supreme Court case law in the Riley case written by Chief Justice Roberts and the Carpenter case written by Chief Justice Roberts, both majority opinions, show his and the Court's recognition of the issue that you are describing in that technology, it has made things different, and we need to understand those differences for purposes of applying Fourth Amendment law now.

And I do think those two decisions are quite important as we move forward. And I think this will be one of—someone sitting in this chair 10 years from now, I think the question of technology on Fourth Amendment, First Amendment, war powers, is going to be of central importance. So, I appreciate the question, but I think the Supreme Court case law is developing in a way consistent with your concern.

Senator LEAHY. Do you think it is consistent with the fact that there will be areas so pervasive that you will need warrants?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that—the Supreme Court case law is certainly suggesting as much in the Riley and Carpenter cases, and the Jones GPS case, which I had written an opinion on.

Senator LEAHY. Yes. I mentioned this, and I thank you, Mr. Chairman, because Senator Lee and I spent a great deal of time talking to our colleagues, both Republicans and Democrats, because of our concern that privacy is disappearing, and, frankly, privacy is important. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator SASSE. Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman, could I make a 30-second comment?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator SASSE. I am not aligned with the Leahy-Lee bill on USA Freedom, but I just want to say I thought that was a great line of questioning. And so much of the American people's, you know, absorption of events like this through cable news is right versus left, and I think that was past versus future. And I just think there is a lot there, Senator Leahy, that is really useful for us to think about. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Whitehouse.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you very much, Judge. When we met in my office, I was trying to get a sense of the intimacy of your relationship with Mr. Leo of the Federalist Society. And I asked you if he was in your phone. Do you remember that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And you answered as to whether he was in the contacts or saved calls or whatever. Just could you let me know for the record what you said then? I do not want to put words in your mouth.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I said, "yes."

Senator WHITEHOUSE. With respect to our earlier—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have known him for 25 years.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes. With respect to our earlier question about waiving source confidentiality with respect to reporters who you spoke to during the Starr investigation, I just want to make sure that I understand what you said because you kind of referred it to Judge Starr, and I do not want to be in a situation where I am getting the two of you going opposite ways. Do I correctly understand that you personally have no objection to reporters disclosing their conversations with you, you just do not want to speak for Judge Starr who you feel has equities here to the extent that you were working at his direction, or do you have a personal objection to the reporters disclosing those conversations?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would want to think about that some more, Senator.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Could you get back to me on that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I can.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Under advisement was one of the options I offered you, and you have taken it. Fair enough.

You have had a lot of conversation with all of us about the concern that you are basically a human torpedo being launched at the Mueller investigation, so that when it gets to the Supreme Court, you will knock it out. And the Law Review article has been talked a lot about that in the context of the President cannot be investigated, and your comment about Nixon being wrongly decided has been talked about a lot. And how you have pushed back on that has been to assert that United States v. Nixon is one of the four best decisions in the Court's history.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have said that before.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yep. So, here is my concern, because virtually every time, if not every time, that you have mentioned United States v. Nixon, you have dropped in to your description of the holding that it was a trial court subpoena.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And I do not know if you drop that in just as a factual observation because that was, in fact, a 17(c) trial subpoena, or whether that was a loophole, an escape hatch so that when that comes, you are in a position to say, well, I told the Senate that because that was a trial court subpoena, but Mueller is going to be coming with grand jury subpoenas, and they are different, and so nothing that I said in that hearing should interfere with my ability to stop Mueller's subpoenas. What in that context is your view of the trial court subpoena part of U.S. v. Nixon? Was that essential to the holding, or were you just using that to describe one of the facts in the holding?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I appreciate that. I have been careful to describe the holding of the case, and—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Does it apply to a grand jury?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is—so, I figured I would get lots of hypothetical questions about this, that, or the other thing, and as a sitting judge I need to be careful about—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I know, but you are the one who has been dropping this trial court phrase in, and I think it is fair to ask you are you simply using that as a factual observation or is that the escape hatch to be able to discard U.S. v. Nixon in this context and say, oh, yes, it is still a great decision, but it has no relevance to the ongoing investigation of the President—investigations of the President.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I understand the question—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And appreciate the question, but what I have done is describe the holding as I have described it in this hearing because I think it is important not to be answering hypotheticals—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes, but you are the one who chose to use it as a counterpoint or as evidence against concerns that you are going to basically, like I said, be the human torpedo to take out anything that Mueller brings to the Supreme Court.

Judge KAVANAUGH. What I was trying to do was merely reiterate what I had said in a variety of forums over 20 years as against one 1999 excerpt that I thought was a serious and severe misunderstanding of my longstanding position about the case.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But since you have been the one who put your regard for United States v. Nixon into play as a data point in the conversation about whether you are going to tank the Mueller investigation at your first chance, I think it is fair for us because you have opened the door by using it that way, to ask whether you believe that the central holding of Nixon, which is that "a President has to answer a subpoena applies equally to a trial court and a grand jury subpoena alike,” because if it does not, I am going to feel very misled by the way you have used this.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right. So, I have tried to describe in summary fashion exactly what the Supreme Court said in the Nixon case, and it is a very important opinion and it is very—but I have tried to describe just what they said and not go beyond what they said in themselves in that opinion.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yep. And so, why did you use it in the context of a grand jury investigation if you did not mean it that way?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I was—you mean when I was in the Independent Counsel Office?

Senator WHITEHOUSE. No, no, no, when we were in this conversation right here. We have had a lot of questions where we have been talking about is the President amenable to investigation, is the President amenable to indictment, is the President amenable to subpoena. And you have constantly referred back to U.S. v. Nixon, and if that is not a real assurance because in the back of your mind, which you did not tell us, is that that is only limited to trial subpoenas and I am still cool with taking out grand jury subpoenas, I think that would be a very unfortunate way to have dealt with the Senate on that question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I understand. I understand your point on that, Senator. What I have tried to do is describe the holding of the case, what I have said before about it, and I have been getting a lot of questions, a real lot of questions about a 1999 excerpt that I think that was a severe distortion of what I have said for many years.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes, but this is very different. This is whether you in this hearing have been essentially playing a trick on the Committee by using United States v. Nixon in this way without telling us that while you are using it in this way, all you intend is that its application is to a trial subpoena, and that a subpoena from the Mueller investigation or from anybody else to the President—“Olly, olly, in come free”—you can knock those out to your heart’s content.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I appreciate the question, but if you read the opinion, all I am doing is describing what the opinion said.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I will let it go at this point because I am obviously not going to get an answer, but I assert that you did more than that by putting this decision in play as a statement or as a signal to us that we should take a little bit—have a little bit of a pause, if you will, about the—U.S. v. Nixon should be looked at again, and the President cannot be investigated points that we addressed.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, Senator, I think other people have been putting it in play repeatedly based on one excerpt that was a distortion—I am not saying it is intentional.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay, never mind. One last question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. In the Bluman decision, your decision, it would be legal for Vladimir Putin to come to the United States and buy issue ads.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can you repeat that?

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Under your reading of the Bluman decision, which says that foreign nationals can buy issue ads under election law, Vladimir Putin would be able to buy issue ads in American elections. Does the recent activity of Russia hacking our last election, interfering with our last election, and helping to elect Donald Trump give you any pause about the wisdom of a judicial construction that would allow foreign nationals to buy issue ads in American elections?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Three quick points, Senator. First, my decision for a unanimous panel in that case, which in turn was unanimously affirmed by the Supreme Court—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Not unanimous on that point, though, I do not believe, but go ahead.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It was unanimous affirmed summarily by the Supreme Court. The upheld limits on contributions by foreign nationals, summarizing briefly there. Justice Stevens, the dissenter in Citizens United, has subsequently repeatedly and explicitly praised my decision in Bluman in various speeches he has given. Third point is, that the case did not involve expenditures, and Congress, of course, is free to put in laws that ban expenditures by foreign citizens and those—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But you did specify issue ads.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I was talking about what the statute said. Congress is free, subject to, of course, challenge, to put some—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. My time is up.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Law in place.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Cornyn.

Senator CORNYN. So, just to reiterate, Congress writes campaign finance laws, not the Federal courts, correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That is correct, Senator.

Senator CORNYN. You were asked whether you were a human torpedo. Do you even know what that means?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not, but I understood the gist of the question.

Senator CORNYN. Well, with all due respect to my friend, Senator Whitehouse, he has got a very fertile imagination, it strikes me. And what does it prove that you have somebody's name in your phone directory? Somebody you have known for 25 years?

Judge KAVANAUGH. For 25 years.

Senator CORNYN. What does that prove?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It proves I have known someone for 25 years. You know, it might be more than 25 years, but in any event, for a long time.

Senator CORNYN. That sounds about right. That is nothing more, it strikes me. That great legal sage unfortunately is not here, so I—

Senator KENNEDY. I deny everything.

[Laughter.]

Senator CORNYN. That great legal sage, and I am not talking about Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. Senator Kennedy said something that really struck me is right on. He said the Bill of Rights is not an a la carte menu, and I would like to know whether you agree with that. Can you pick and choose which of the Bill of Rights is more important than another, or whether you can ignore some and recognize others? How do you, as a Federal judge, address that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. As a sitting judge, I try to apply all the provisions of the Constitution and all the precedents of the Supreme Court without picking or choosing which precedents or which pieces of precedents that I might favor, which pieces of the Constitution or the laws passed by Congress, apply them all.

Senator CORNYN. So, are any one of the Bill of Rights more important than another?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think they are all important, all the provisions of the Constitution, and the structural provisions, of course, are essential, or the Bill of the Rights would not be nearly as meaningful because we would not have the structural protections to ensure an independent judiciary to protect them.

Senator CORNYN. Our friend, Senator Durbin, asked you to apply common sense when interpreting the Second Amendment. I am tempted to say common sense is not all that common, but is that a basis upon which to construe the provisions of the Second Amendment, just to apply your common sense?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The rules—you apply the precedent of the Supreme Court interpreting the Second Amendment, which in turn interpreted the words, history, structure, historical practice of the Second Amendment, and as a lower court judge, it was incumbent on me to apply that precedent as faithfully as I could. And I explained in very painstaking detail, and I really encourage anyone who is interested and has some time because it is long, to read that dissent. I am—the analysis in there is carefully laid out, and then at the end I describe that I understand the real-world consequences of this and the real-world issues, and where I have grown up and what I have experienced. But I explained it in great detail.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you. Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Coons, you have about 9½ minutes.

Senator COONS. Great. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent that letters from eight different groups, organizations, individuals be entered into the record.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator COONS. Thank you. Judge Kavanaugh, we are at the end of a long day, and I would like to take a few minutes and just explore with you a speech you gave last year, a speech at the American Enterprise Institute entitled, “The Constitutional Statesmanship of Chief Justice Rehnquist.” There you called Rehnquist your first judicial hero, and you went on to discuss at length the 1997 case, Washington v. Glucksberg, in which the Supreme Court rejected a fundamental right to physician-assisted suicide.

In Glucksberg, as you know, Rehnquist explained his belief that the only liberties protected by the Due Process Clause are those that are “deeply rooted in the Nation’s history, legal tradition, and practice.” You praised Rehnquist’s opinion. You said, and I am quoting your speech here now, “The Glucksberg case stands to this day as an important precedent limiting the Court’s role in the realm of social policy and helping ensure the Court operates more as a court of law and less as an institution of social policy.” Further, “Rehnquist is a Justice who”—I think I am quoting here—“was successful in stemming the general tide of freewheeling judicial creation, enumerated rights that were not rooted in the Nation’s history and tradition.”

The only conclusion I can draw from your praise in this speech last year of Rehnquist substantive due process jurisprudence in his Glucksberg opinion is that you endorse this so-called Glucksberg test, which asserts the only due process rights protected by the Due Process Clause—excuse me—are those objectively rooted in American legal history and tradition. You even said yesterday in a similar exchange here that “all roads”—all roads—“lead to the Glucksberg test.”

So, let me in the few I have left, ask a few quick questions about the implications of applying the Glucksberg test in a principled fashion—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I say one thing first?

Senator COONS. I want to get a couple of questions quick, and then depending on the grace of the Chairman, we may have an exchange—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I said the same thing that Justice Kagan said when she was in this chair, about Glucksberg.

Senator COONS. And here is the most important thing about Justice Kagan’s jurisprudence. She did not apply the Glucksberg test in U.S. v. Windsor, in Obergefell, or Whole Women’s Health. So, the question I want to get to is what would it mean to go and apply this test in a range of settings? So, first, is judicial protection of the fundamental right to access and use contraception consistent with the Glucksberg test? It is a simple “yes” or “no” question, Judge.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I disagree that it is a simple “yes” or “no” question. What I have said here is, that the precedent of the Supreme Court on that question, what Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts said about those precedents, Justice White’s concurrence in Griswold, is persuasive application of precedent. What is important to know about Glucksberg is it is cited in Planned Parenthood v. Casey as authority—

Senator COONS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. As authority—

Senator COONS. But on the specific issue of—and I appreciate your having said those were correctly decided. I am just trying to get clarity about if it were the Glucksberg test, well rooted in our history, legal tradition, and practices, would the Court have ever reached those results on a fundamental right to access and use contraception, given the long history of States having statutes that prohibited access to contraception? I think it is a simple “yes” or “no.”

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as Justice White explained in his concurrence in Griswold actually, those laws had not been enforced for decades. But put that aside, the test in Glucksberg, as Justice Kagan explained when she was sitting in this chair, is a test that is guiding the Supreme Court going forward and has been cited in the precedent. It did not disturb any preexisting precedent, indeed cited Casey as authority.

Senator COONS. It did. So, let us move on then to abortion, which was really centrally at issue in Casey. Is judicial protection of abortion rights consistent with the Glucksberg test, something deeply rooted in our history, legal tradition, and practices?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Again, I think it is important to underscore that the Glucksberg decision written by Chief Justice Rehnquist cited Planned Parenthood v. Casey as authority, which in turn reaffirmed Casey, reaffirmed Roe v. Wade.

Senator COONS. But had it been the test at the time, the Court would not have reached that result. In fact, you said at the AEI lecture “Even a first-year law student could tell you the Glucksberg Court’s approach to unenumerated rights was not consistent with the approach of the cases, Roe v. Wade, Planned Parenthood v. Casey.” So, we know the Glucksberg test, had it been applied, would not have reached that same result.

Let us move, if we could, from contraception, abortion, to intimacy. Is the Glucksberg test consistent with the Court’s historic decision—Justice Kennedy’s decision in 2003, Lawrence v. Texas, which the Court held the Constitution protects intimacy, including same-sex intimacy, between consenting adults?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, as the Supreme Court said last year in a broad majority, under the precedents that now exist, the days of treating gay and lesbian Americans as second-class citizens—gay and lesbian couples—or as inferior in dignity and worth, are over. That was Justice Kennedy joined by Chief Justice Roberts, Justice Alito, Justice Gorsuch, Justice Breyer, and Justice Kagan. Statement for the Supreme Court summarizing, in essence, Romer, Lawrence, Windsor, and Obergefell.

Senator COONS. But had the Glucksberg test been—the sole test being applied during Lawrence, Justice Kennedy would not have reached the result he did.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well—

Senator COONS. Let us move to the right to marry, if we could, for a moment.

Judge KAVANAUGH. One sentence—

Senator COONS. It is the last case we are going get through.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Windsor—

Senator COONS. The right to marry is clearly rooted in our history of legal tradition and practices, yes, Judge? And we both know the landmark case, Loving v. Virginia, distinguishes marriage is clearly deeply rooted in our history, legal tradition, and practices, but interracial marriage was not. In fact, it was barred in many States, probably longest in Virginia. And the Supreme Court struck an important blow in 1967 in striking down anti-misogynation statutes.

Last, what about same-sex marriage? If the Glucksberg test were the test applied, is a right to marriage regardless of gender deeply rooted in our history, legal tradition, and practices?

Judge KAVANAUGH. A couple things, Senator. I think Windsor and Obergefell talk about equality as well, so there is an equality principle. And as the Court said in Masterpiece Cakeshop, summarizing all those decisions, a line of five decisions all written by Justice Kennedy—Romer, Lawrence, Windsor, Obergefell, and Masterpiece Cakeshop.

Senator COONS. Were they all correctly decided?

Judge KAVANAUGH. They are all—none of the eight currently sitting Justices have answered questions about any of those cases. As Justice Kagan said, no thumbs up or thumbs down on those recent cases. But they—but what the Court said in Masterpiece Cakeshop is the most recent statement of the Supreme Court for a broad cross-section, a broad—large number of Justices on the Supreme Court. And I think I will leave it by referring you to that statement from the Supreme Court.

Senator COONS. Here is my core concern. This quote—this quote—what you chose to do in a speech last year in front of AEI was to lift up this Glucksberg test. What you chose to say yesterday, “All roads lead to the Glucksberg test,” gives me pause and concern. If you feel I have somehow misquoted you in the American Spectator article, if you feel I have somehow misquoted you here, I expect we will have a chance through some written exchanges to give you an opportunity to further clarify that, given the limitation on my time.

But in what I have read about how the Glucksberg test has or has not been applied, the ways most critically in which Justice Kennedy himself rejected the Glucksberg test in his opinions in Casey, in Lawrence, in Obergefell, I think the Glucksberg test is better at rejecting claims of constitutional rights than it is at accepting them, and I think it is a blunt instrument. And I am concerned that it may reveal an enthusiasm for a test that would permit the continued exercise of government power in ways that, frankly, would blow up all modern substantive due process. If applied rigidly, it would blow up precedent in contraception, abortion, protection from sterilization, marriage, a whole range of areas.

These are settled precedent, but those of who sit trying to decide whether you should be the next Justice and take Justice Kennedy’s seat have to ask ourselves what your views would be. And in this recent speech where you cite your first judicial hero, Rehnquist, in articulating the Glucksberg test, I worry that you reveal you do not share the view of our Framers, in particular, the Fourteenth Amendment Framers, who understood constitutional rights to exist in significant part to right historical wrongs, not to ignore them or entrench them.

Our Constitution’s protection for people who are vulnerable or marginalized or just different from the majority is what makes us a beacon to the rest of the world where there are so many countries, where minorities or those who dare to live their lives differently are marginalized or oppressed. And it is exactly this Glucksberg test that worries me most because it excludes all such people from the circle of constitutional concern and protection.

I am troubled, Judge Kavanaugh, if you do not understand that is the driving, animating force of our constitutional culture. And this is a test that, in my view, is just not up to the task of vindicating our country’s greatest ideals. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. If you feel you want to comment, go ahead, and then I will call on Senator Lee.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Two points. Justice Kennedy joined Glucksberg. Justice Kagan cited Glucksberg repeatedly when she was in this chair.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. So, Glucksberg is precedent, right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is, and it is precedent that Justice Kennedy joined.

Senator LEE. And so, it is settled law. I mean, it is established. It is entitled to the same respect as other precedent, including other precedent mentioned by Senator Coons.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is an important precedent of the Supreme Court. It has been discussed by other Justices over time.

Senator LEE. And nothing in Glucksberg or in those other cases suggest that Glucksberg is incompatible, suggests that it cannot—suggests that it is somehow incompatible with those other precedents.

Judge KAVANAUGH. It cited Casey as authority.

Senator LEE. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I have a letter that I would like to offer into the record. This is signed by David Levi. He is one of our Nation's foremost legal scholars.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, so ordered.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator LEE. He served until about a month ago as the dean of Duke Law School. Prior to that he served as a U.S. District Judge in the Eastern District of California. He shares some great personal information in here about his interaction with Judge Kavanaugh and about the fact that Judge Kavanaugh came to Duke Law School. And, as it is becoming a theme in this hearing, he describes how Judge Kavanaugh was a mentor to these students who participated in moot court competitions, answered their questions, gave advice to the participants and all the other students there. And I offer that into the record. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Second one?

Senator LEE. Just this one. You have already admitted it. I am just thanking you now for doing it.

Your phone, the contents of your phone, the question you received from Senator Whitehouse, the contents of your phone in light of Carpenter, he cannot really ask you that, right?

[Laughter.]

Senator LEE. I want to echo something that Senator Crapo mentioned a few minutes ago with regard to western lands. I am not going to make you answer any questions regarding this, but there are significant issues that frequently do not get addressed as a result of the fact that there are just few States where the Federal Government owns most of the land. In every State east of the Mississippi, the Federal Government owns less than 15 percent of the land. In many of those States, it is in the low single digits. In every State west of Colorado, the Federal Government owns more than 15 percent of the land. In many States like my own, it is most of the land. The Federal Government owns two-thirds of the land in the State of Utah, even more in Nevada.

As a result of this, our local communities are severely impaired in terms of their ability to manage their own affairs, to authorize the most basic of economic activities going on on their land. Our local communities cannot tax the land, and property taxes are where in most States, including my own, a lot of the money comes from to fund schools, to fund basic services like search and rescue, police, fire suppression, and so forth. As a result of the fact that the Federal Government owns all that land and controls what activity can occur on it, these States are locked out. They are thwarted in development. Cannot do anything on that land without a mother may I. And in States like mine, you almost cannot even access a lot of property without crossing Federal land, and you have to get a permit for it.

In many respects, this puts the States on equal footing, one as compared to another. But in many respects, I think this runs into conflict, at least potentially, with some language put into the Enclave Clause into Section—in Clause 17 of Article I, Section 8, that talks about how if the Federal Government is going to be the sole sovereign lawmaking authority on Federal land within a State, it is supposed to be acquired by and with the consent of the host State's legislature.

That was—that language was put in to the Enclave Clause as a result of a concern expressed by Elbridge Gerry, who expressed in early September of 1787 as the Convention was drawing to a close that unless this clause was put in there, the Federal Government might acquire a whole land in a lot of these States and use its exclusive lawmaking power under the Enclave Clause to compel the States to a humble undue obedience to the general Government. And yet this has been overlooked for a long time, since the late 1970s.

Many have improperly conflated the Enclave Clause authority—that is, the Federal Government's sole sovereign lawmaking capacity relative to Federal lands—its property clause authority under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2, which is really a proprietary interest, authorizing Congress to sell and otherwise dispose of territory and other property owned by the Federal Government.

There are two different things. In order to exercise the Article IV power, Congress just acts because it can dispose of land. In order to exercise the Article I, Section 8, Clause 17 power, to be the exclusive sole sovereign lawmaking authority within a State as to that Federal land, that land has to have been acquired by and with the consent of the host State's legislature.

The Court has not been careful to distinguish between those two, in part because of some, what I believe, was over generalization in the case called Kleppe v. New Mexico. This is of concern to my State, and I felt the need to make that point to you today. You do not have to respond to it.

I do, however, have a very important question for you. Why do you—I notice that you take a lot of notes, and I respect that because I can tell you are paying close attention. You use a Sharpie, and it is not a fine-tipped Sharpie.

[Laughter.]

Senator LEE. It is a regular Sharpie that might smudge and make—why do you prefer that pen? I am just dying of curiosity.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I can see it.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. It is nothing scientific.

Senator LEE. That is the perfect mic-drop moment, and with that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. That is going to be really hard to follow, but I will try my best. So, Judge, we talked a lot about some big issues, Times v. Sullivan, Executive Power, and I want to get back to where I started. You have talked over the last few days about what matters is real things, real people, and I want to bring it back to that and some of the issues that are dense in terms of legal issues, but in the end mean things to people.

And one of the things we have talked about is the net neutrality rules, and we know that those were the protections that were put in place by the FCC a few years back to prevent internet service providers from blocking and slowing traffic so that people would have equal access to the internet. And the case came before the D.C. Circuit, and they were against you. The rules were upheld by a panel of judges appointed by Presidents of both parties. We talked about this yesterday. I do not want to go over your theory again on major rules, which I disagreed with.

But there was something we did not talk about yesterday, and that was that you went actually beyond the bounds of what the parties had argued to reach a constitutional issue in that case. You found that the First Amendment protects internet service providers' right to exercise editorial discretion, even though neither of the principal parties had raised a First Amendment argument at all. Why did you go out of your way to address that constitutional issue?

Judge KAVANAUGH. That issue was raised in some of the briefs in the case, point one. Point two, I followed the Turner Broadcasting approach that was the majority opinion of the Supreme Court in 1994 of Justice Kennedy in the Cable Operator context, which, as I explained in the opinion, seemed to apply very closely in this situation. It is something I have written prior opinions on as well about how Justice Kennedy's opinion in Turner Broadcasting applies in other contexts. And it seemed—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But were you the only judge that went that far to take on the constitutional issues?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I may have been, but I was applying Turner Broadcasting. It is a precedent of the Supreme Court that seemed on point, and it was raised in the case by a party, and I thought important to explain.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But you have said that the canon of constitutional avoidance, which says courts should avoid reaching constitutional questions, that are not necessary to decide a case, is something you would "consider jettisoning all together." I think you said that in a 2016 book review. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I would talk about—I talked about the problem of ambiguity as a trigger for certain canons of statutory interpretation because, at least in my practice over the last 12 years, that has been one of the sources of disagreement among judges that is hard to grapple with and figure out what is the—how to bridge that divide when one judge says I think this is ambiguous and another one says, no, it is not. Justice Scalia—Justices Scalia and Kagan have both talked about that as being an issue, and that is one of the reasons I talked about it in that Harvard Law Review article. That was a Law Review article, however, and not a case or decision of mine where I was just identifying my experience and talking about ideas.

One thing about the First Amendment issue I want to make clear, I pointed out there if a company has market power under Turner Broadcasting, then the Government does have the authority to regulate. If a company does not have market power, Turner Broadcasting says no, but it does not bar all regulation by any stretch, not even close.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. It just would seem that there is First Amendment rights of individuals to use the internet and express their own views, and if it gets too expensive for them to use it, you basically said that the companies have these First Amendment rights, not looking at the issue that I think a lot of us as policy-makers see, is that unless you have some rules of the road in place, it is going to make it very hard for individuals and small businesses to access.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that is a fair point. An argument like that was raised in the Turner Broadcasting case in 1994 when it was argued to the Supreme Court. That was the term I clerked. And that is not the argument that the Supreme Court accepted at that time.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. You mentioned Justice Scalia, and I wanted to end with when we talk about the effects of things. And he actually was a champion of the Chevron case, which, of course, was the Supreme Court ruling that allowed agencies' decisions on health and safety protections to stay in the book. It has been referenced in more than 15,000 decisions.

But you said it was a precedent to me yesterday, but your writings—in your writings you have called it “an atextual invention of courts and a judicially orchestrated shift of power.” You have said that “Instead of applying Chevron, courts should simply determine the best reading of the statute and no longer defer to agency interpretations.” Does this not mean you really would prefer de novo review for those that are still watching this at home? That would mean that the courts would act as if they are considering questions of law for the first time so that they would not defer to the agency.

And you have—the way we have set this up here is, Congress passes laws, agencies often do the fine work with experts of figuring out what those rules are. So, this is what I am so concerned about for people's drinking water, for safety reasons. If you would then go and go to de novo review or change this, and I think it is a very big deal when you look at 15,000 decisions and the fact that Justice Scalia supported this and you appear to be itching toward the other side.

Judge KAVANAUGH. What I have done is identify some of the issues that arise when you are applying the doctrine, but I also pointed out in that same article that it is—it has overlapped with—not to get too into the weeds here—but with the State Farm doctrine. And so, when there is a statutory term such as “reasonable,” “feasible,” those—“appropriate,” those kinds of statutory terms that judicial deference is appropriate.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Mm-hmm. Do you think a judge that does not have a technology background is better deciding this than, say, experts at the FCC when you have rules—or, someone with no scientific background better to decide some of these things than people who are scientists.

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I have a number of cases where the statute gives discretion to the agency to exercise those expert scientific judgments where I have said courts should not second guess those in the clean air context where I have upheld emissions limited. The NACS, I have written—the air quality standards. I have written opinions saying courts should not second guess what EPA—where EPA sets the limit within the NACS. So, too, in a case called American Radio Relay League, I made clear that courts should not unduly second guess agencies.

It is all about the statute that you write. If it has discretion built into it, I am one who does not think courts should add requirements that you have not put in. If you have written a really tightly confined statute, at the same time of an agency pushes beyond those boundaries, the courts are there to draw the line, and that is how I have tried to be even handed in how I have applied—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And, again, and we went over this yesterday, but just the finding of unconstitutionality with the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. And then the internet rules where, again, you are the only one saying this, and now you would be on the highest court of the land if you are to be confirmed. And just for me, these rules, it is not just some law on the books, it is personal. We are proud of our clean water, and clean lakes and rivers in Minnesota. Those are safety rules.

My grandpa worked 1,500 feet underground in the mines his whole life. Went down there in a cage, and the sirens would sound and people would run because they did not know who was killed in the mine that day. And my dad still remembers those coffins in the Catholic church up in Ely, Minnesota, and it was those safety rules that came in place, many of them implemented by agencies that got us to where we are. And it really concerns me if we overturn all of that and just leave it in the hands of Congress to have to mete through all these minute details when we cannot even get through 42,000 documents, so.

Senator CORNYN [presiding]. Senator Blumenthal.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Can I say two quick points?

Senator CORNYN. Oh, sure. I did not know there was a question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. One, I have a large number of cases, particularly in the EPA context, where I have upheld EPA rules that have done things and in other administrative agency context. It is all about—and I understand what you are saying about the people affected by the rules, and in each of the cases I have written, I have tried to make that clear. Ultimately, my approach to statutory interpretation is rooted in respect for Congress.

Senator CORNYN. Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thanks, Mr. Chairman. Good evening. Judge Kavanaugh, I would like you to tell me that I am wrong, and I would like you to tell me that you would put aside your Heller II dissent, and as a member of the United States Supreme Court, if confirmed, you would uphold a ban on assault weapons.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, as a sitting judge, I cannot make a commitment about a future case.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, let me put it this way. In your view, a ban on assault weapons in your dissent you voted to strike down because it was not longstanding, and it applied to weapons in common use. Is that correct?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I applied the precedent of the Supreme Court, which made clear that machine guns can be banned. Machine guns can be banned. The Supreme Court said that explicitly, and I said it as well.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But assault weapons are equally destructive, and the evidence for them is equally compelling, that is, the evidence for a ban on assault weapons, which is what the majority in Heller II in your court found, did it not? In fact, the court said that it was upholding the ban on assault weapons because, "Our role is narrower, to determine whether the district has presented evidence sufficient to establish the reasonable fit we require between the law at issue and an important or substantial governmental interest." Governmental interest, public safety never figured into your test on Heller II, did it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the precedent of the Supreme Court, which I applied, says that the Government can ban machine guns. I encourage—I explained in detail how I interpreted Heller. In the Staples case from 1994, which I cited, referred to these kinds of guns as in common use, so I would encourage you to—at least if you are thinking of me, I have to apply precedent. Take a look at that Staples case and—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I have taken a look at the Staples case, but more compellingly, I have taken a look at what assault weapons can do.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I understand that, but I also—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And I thought about bringing some posters here today showing what happened at Sandy Hook when 20 beautiful children and six wonderful educators were gunned down, just as has happened in countless places across the country, including Sutherland Springs in Texas, Parkland in Florida, Las Vegas in Nevada, Orlando in Florida, Virginia Tech, San Bernardino, most recently in Florida, of course. Assault weapons were designed to kill people, were they not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the end of my Heller II, opinion, I understand and, of course, detest all school violence or gun violence, and I said that at the end of my Heller II—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I am sure all of us detest school violence.

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I am asking you to look at the real world—

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I did that—

Senator BLUMENTHAL [continuing]. With real impacts, and I am asking you to reconsider your dissent in Heller II, and look at the impacts on children, young children who have their whole lives ahead of them as did those 20 first-graders in Sandy Hook, and a ban on assault weapons might well have saved them. There is no knowing for sure, but they might be alive today if there had been a ban on assault weapons, and high-capacity magazines, and better background checks.

And now we face the specter of a new kind of weapon, 3-D blueprint design guns that are untraceable and undetectable by and large. They are not in common use yet, but they will be if they are not banned. There is no traditional ban on them. They were unimaginable in 1789. The test that you are imposing here is out of touch with the real world and the impact on real lives, and I would just suggest that, with all due respect, you give us the benefit of saying here that you will reconsider a test that is out of touch with reality.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I appreciate what you are saying. If someone came to me and argued that the test was wrong, I will, of course—of course, I always would listen and try to understand. What I did there at the end of my opinion, I am from this area, and this—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And I know you have lived in the gun or gun violence capital of the world. I have heard you say it a number of times, and I—

Judge KAVANAUGH. But I grew up in it. I mean, I—you know, I do not want to overstate that, but, I mean, I grew up in an urban/suburban environment where it was—there was a lot of gang and gun violence in the 1980s in the District of Columbia, and I talked about Police Chief Kathy Lanier's goals, at the time Police Chief Kathy Lanier.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But all of that experience is not reflected in the test that you are imposing here, despite your claim that you look to the real world and impacts on real people, nor is it reflected in the test on Presidential power that you are going to impose, which says, in effect, a President can strike down the Affordable Care Act. Donald Trump can strike it down if he deems it, and he alone unilaterally believes it to be unconstitutional, even after your court, the D.C. Circuit, even after the United States Supreme Court, even after President Obama, and the Congress of the United States all deem it constitutional. That gives the President virtually unchecked power. And in this real world, that is a dangerous prospect for us, is it not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, two things. One, on the Second Amendment issue, I did explain as best I could why I felt the President controlled and set forth that test. I did point out that the test that I understood the Court to be setting forth would allow potentially more gun regulation depending on how it was applied than, say, strict scrutiny would depend. But I pointed that out. And I pointed out what the Supreme Court said about banning machine guns. On the Presidential power, I referred you before on prosecutorial discretion, what the limits are of that being tested in court, and I have said that in my Marquette speech in 2015. The concept, of course, is, as you know, well established in Supreme Court precedent of prosecutorial discretion in the Heckler v. Chaney case.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Judge Kavanaugh, I was at Sandy Hook the afternoon of that massacre. I do not know whether you have been at these kinds of scenes. I do not whether you have seen the pictures of what assault weapons can do. They were designed for the sole purpose to kill and maim human beings. They are very good at it. They were one of the most effective and efficient weapons known to man. And I would urge you to reconsider. I think the test that you are imposing is out of touch with the reality of what assault weapons do, and I think it reflects a broader shortcoming in the way you are applying law to facts in trying to meet an ideological standard rather than a test for the real world.

Senator CORNYN. Judge, if you care to respond, you can respond.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I just wanted to thank Senator Blumenthal for sharing that perspective, and I thank you for sharing it, appreciate it, and will take it into account and consider it and remember what you said here. Thank you.

Senator CORNYN. Your Honor, would you care to take a 5-minute break?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, please.

Senator CORNYN. We will be in recess for 5 minutes.

[Whereupon the Committee was recessed and reconvened.]

Senator CORNYN. I understand Senator Blumenthal will have a unanimous consent request with regards to some documents. If he has that when he comes back in, we will recognize him. Senator Hirono, I believe you are next.

Senator SASSE. I think I am next.

Senator CORNYN. I am sorry. Senator Sasse—

Senator SASSE. Go ahead. Go ahead, that is fine.

Senator CORNYN. Senator Hirono and then Senator Sasse. Thank you.

Senator HIRONO. Oh, I am sorry. I thought we were going to—

Senator CORNYN. I beg your pardon. Senator Hirono, you are recognized. Thank you.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and Senator Leahy. And any time that I do not use, of my 16 minutes, I would like to have that time go to Senator Booker.

Judge Kavanaugh, as you know, this June, the Court delivered a blow to millions of public sector workers with its decision in Janus v. AFSCME. In a 5-to-4 decision, five of the Justices overturned decades-old precedent, a case called Abood that workers around the country depended on for fair salaries and basic rights. The Janus decision is important here because it shows your nomination fits in a larger campaign that groups like the Federalist Society and the Heritage Foundation have been waging for decades. Decades. Their goal is to undermine well-established Supreme Court precedent that protects workers, women, and everyday Americans.

In Janus, five Justices overturned Abood “because they wanted to.” Those were Justice Kagan’s words, not mine. Although the five Justices went through the factors that—for overturning precedent, it identified another, what they referred to as a very strong reason for not following precedent, and that reason was “fundamental free speech rights are at stake.” In fact, the five Justices said the rule for following precedent, also known as stare decisis, applies with perhaps least force—least force—to decisions that wrongly deny First Amendment rights. So, it sounds as though the Court is saying that First Amendment takes precedence.

So, why is this important is because of the larger political campaign by groups like the Federalist Society and the Heritage Foundation that I mentioned earlier. So, with the help of these groups, the Supreme Court, as Justice Kagan put it, has been “weaponizing the First Amendment in a way that unleashes judges now and in the future to intervene in economic and regulatory policy.” And, in fact, just this past year, the First Amendment was used to advance the political agenda against workers’ and women’s health and reproductive rights. Judge Kavanaugh, do you agree with the five Justices in Janus?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, that is a precedent of the Court that, of course, because it is one of the recent cases, I cannot comment on whether I agree or disagree with it. But it is a precedent that is now part of the body of the Supreme Court case law.

Senator HIRONO. And, of course, should you get on the Supreme Court, you can either follow that precedent or overturn it. But basically, the Court in Janus said that—they come up with a very strong reason for overturning even decades-old precedent if First Amendment rights are at stake. So, based on the answer you just gave me, then that kind of rationale would also be the precedent of the Court now.

So, the Supreme Court sets precedent, of course, and all it takes is five votes to overturn precedent, as happened in Janus. Five votes. And I am particularly troubled that the five Justices in Janus claimed, “It did not matter that public sector unions have relied on the Abood case for decades.” And yesterday when you talked about the role of precedent, you talked about—you used words such as how people rely on the precedent, whether it creates stability, there is predictability, but the five Justices in Janus—the fact that public sector unions have been relying on the Abood decision for 41 years did not matter.

So, five Justices also claimed that “they could overturn Abood as a well-established precedent because public sector unions were on notice”—this is quoting the Court—“notice for years regarding this Court’s misgivings about the Abood case.” But as Justice Kagan explained, this so-called notice was actually Justice Alito’s 6-year campaign to reverse Abood. So, I will not go over his 6-year campaign, but suffice it to say that Justice Alito made it very plain to potential litigants out there who wanted to undo the Abood decision, basically he said, come on over because I want to be in a position to be able to reverse Abood.

And the only reason in an earlier case, called Friedrichs, said that Abood was not overturned was because of the death of Justice Alito, and then after that, Justice Gorsuch was confirmed, and Justice Gorsuch was going to provide the fifth vote, whereas in the previous vote because of the death of Justice Scalia, the earlier case of Friedrichs ended in a 4-to-4 tie. But then along comes Justice Gorsuch, and the fifth vote was there, and Abood is overturned, and Janus is now the precedent case.

So, to the extent the Court in Janus said, well, you know, by the way, all you litigants who are—all you people out there who are relying on this precedent, you had notice that we were thinking of overturning this case.

So, do you believe that a Justice should be able to make it easier to overturn or even—overturn even well-established Supreme Court precedent by simply giving notice that he or she has concerns about that precedent, because that is exactly what Justice Alito did?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think the factors that the Court considers is whether the prior decision was grievously wrong, whether it is deeply inconsistent with subsequent precedent that is developed around it, the real-world consequences, the workability of the decision, as well as reliance interests—

Senator HIRONO. Well, on the other hand, Judge Kavanaugh, can you call a 5-to-4 decision as reflective of the prior decision having been grievously wrong, not to mention that in the case that came before Janus, ended in a 4-to-4 tie because of the death of Justice Scalia? So, by one vote. The Court looked to the notice provided by a Justice as one of the justifications for overturning this 41-year-old precedent.

So, my next question is, do you think the prior writings of someone before becoming a Supreme Court Justice can count as notice, that Americans cannot rely on the protections entrenched in well-established precedent? For example, if someone like you did some writing that questioned a precedent, would that suffice as notice for the Supreme Court to overturn precedent?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think the factors that the Supreme Court considers in applying stare decisis are established. If you look at the prior decision, whether it was grievously wrong, deeply inconsistent with subsequent precedent, the real-world consequences, and the reliance interests. And, I understand that you disagree with how those factors were applied, and Justice Kagan, of course, in dissent disagreed with how they were applied. But, and I understand—

Senator HIRONO. It was a very strong dissent, and it was a split decision, and suddenly we are talking about strong reasons being the First Amendment rights, which Justice Kagan said is now being weaponized. And you can see the trend of the 5-to-4 decisions that weaponizes First Amendment. We are already seeing that. The Court said that where the First Amendment rights are concerned, that stare decisis, meaning precedent, applies with the least force. Going on. So, basically, the concern I have about the reasoning in the Janus Court is, that we will see many more 5-to-4 decisions where precedent can be overturned if a Justice has given notice as Justice Alito did, or if First Amendment rights are concerned.

Let me turn to the issue of guns. You were asked some questions about this, about your position on basically Heller II. The Brennan Center for Justice reported that as of August 20th, 2018, outside groups had spent almost $3.5 million to campaign for your confirmation, and I think we have all seen those ads. By contrast, groups opposing your nomination had spent a less than a quarter of that amount. And one of those groups spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to get you confirmed to the Supreme Court is the National Rifle Association.

And the NRA makes clear in their commercials what is at stake with your nomination. In fact, they highlight that there are currently four Justices who favor gun control and four Justices who oppose gun control. They then explain, and I am quoting their ad, "President Trump chose Brett Kavanaugh to break the tie." They urge your confirmation pointing out that the viewers' access to guns depends on your vote, Justice Kavanaugh.

So, you had mentioned earlier that the Supreme Court had in the past said concealed weapons, guns in schools, machine guns could be banned, but, you know, you can provide that fifth vote to undo these earlier Supreme Court precedents. So, why do you think—this is part of their ad: “Your right to self-defense depends on this vote.” This is based on—it is part of the NRA’s million-dollar campaign to get you onto the Court. Why do you think the NRA is spending so much money to ensure that you get confirmed as a Supreme Court Justice?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, there are a lot of ads for and against me, and I have seen—

Senator HIRONO. Well, I am asking specifically about the NRA ad. Why do they think you are going to provide the crucial fifth vote to—they obviously think that you are on their page.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, there are a lot of ads by groups against and for. That is the right of people to express their views. I understand that, again stand for. And I am independent judge, and I for 12 years have a record of being an independent judge.

Senator HIRONO. Well, obviously the NRA does not think you are so independent when it comes to gun legislation because they are spending a lot of money to tell everybody that you are going to provide that crucial vote to their liking. So, you know, I think it is—these ads speak for themselves of why they think you are the critical person to be on that Court.

And I want to follow up one more thing, something you told Senator Feinstein yesterday regarding your views on guns. You seem to indicate that your view on Supreme Court precedent is that a type of gun could not be banned, and I will quote you to her, what you said yesterday, “if a type of firearm is widely owned in the United States.” So, did you mean to say “widely owned” as opposed to “widely used” in your response to Senator Feinstein?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think I referred to the dangerous and unusual test that the Supreme Court has articulated, and referred to how I had applied that test in the Heller—my Heller opinion.

Senator HIRONO. Well, you did say that if a type of firearm is widely owned in the United States, you would deem any limitation on widely owned guns to be unconstitutional. So, is it your view that a large enough number of people downloaded designs for 3-D guns and printed them, and, therefore they own them, that the States and the Federal Government could not ban them because now they are widely owned.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I cannot talk about a hypothetical case.

Senator HIRONO. I think that is another reason that the NRA is so adamant that you get on the Court. I would like to cede the rest of my time to Senator Booker.

Senator CORNYN. I understand, Senator Blumenthal, you have a unanimous consent request to offer some documents?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I do. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I would like to enter several letters from outside organizations into the record. These organizations have voiced some of the real-world consequences of Judge Kavanaugh’s appointment, and they come from the National Council of Jewish Women, the National Abortion Federation, various faith organizations and communities, the National Center for Transgender Equality, the American Public Health Association, and the Center for Public Representation. I ask that they be made a part of the record.

Senator CORNYN. Without objection.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator CORNYN. The Chair recognizes Senator Sasse.

Senator SASSE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, you are in the home stretch. Some of us are way beyond bed time. I just snuck out and did a goodnight call with my kids, and my 7-year-old was so groggy, he asked what I was up to, and I told him, and he said—he was curious if you were scared of poisonous spiders.

[Laughter.]

Senator SASSE. I will protect you from having to answer his question. Mike Lee already asked you about Sharpies, so we will not ask you about your phobias related to the outdoors.

I would like to talk a little bit about the First Amendment. I am worried about the Liberal Project in the grand sense. I think what is happening on campuses right now is really dangerous, and I think what happens on campus will probably not stay on campus. We have got lots of data that shows high school kids do not know our history, do not know basic civics. One of the most frightening numbers is that Americans under 35, 41 percent of them tell pollsters they think the First Amendment is dangerous because you might be able to use your free speech to say something that would hurt someone else's feelings. So, I would love to explore a little bit where we are in the First Amendment.

So, can we go to history first? What is the core purpose of the First Amendment? Why do we have it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. We have protected so individuals can express their views in speech and in writing. The idea is that there is no such thing as a true idea that is dictated from above or by the Government, and that individuals can say what they think in speech and writing and help—it is both an individual idea that they can express their own opinions and their own beliefs, and it is also—I think there is also an idea that truth develops through debate, and more informed judgment, the more perfect union develops through debate when we have different perspectives that are shared.

And a lot of—a lot of ideas began as unpopular ideas, and then people, they take hold over time, and it is important to protect the ability of people to speak both for their individual rights and for the idea of the betterment of society over time through debate and improvement and more perfect union.

Senator SASSE. Thanks. I am encouraged. I was hoping that we would hear both sides of that. We need a First Amendment because it is required for individual liberty, and we need it structurally because society, and particularly a republic, needs that discourse. You never really have a great idea of what you think if it is just bouncing around inside your head. It needs to be dialogued with others, and a free republic, a free people need that debate to advance a structure of liberty.

Why are there five freedoms in the First Amendment? Why do we have speech, press, religion, assembly, protest, redress of grievances? Why would we not have a different amendment for each one? Why is there not just free speech and maybe the two clauses of religion, but why are they all together in an amendment? And this is not supposed to be some grand “gotcha” question.

[Laughter.]

Senator SASSE. I am abusing you for private tutorial.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think the rights—when they go to New York in 1789, James Madison, after going through the ratifying conventions and hearing—getting a lot of heat, frankly, for why is there not protection in a Bill of Rights, something that George Mason and others who were concerned about, what the original Constitution. So, when they got to New York, you know, he was busy working on this, writing out a draft of the rights that he thought should be protected in a Bill of Rights, and drew on a lot of the State constitutions. I know I have talked with Senator Kennedy about some of that. And I do not have a clear answer for why the grouping ended up in that fashion.

Senator SASSE. Well, is it fair to say that if we did not have a First Amendment, would people not have these right? I mean, was the Constitution not completed without a Bill of Rights because we do not think Government gives us rights? We have rights by—because people are created by God with dignity, and so the rights are—they belong to people because of the nature of humans, and humans are created in the image of God and they have dignity. And so, the Constitution stops before the Bill of Rights, and then Bill of Rights sort of clarifies a whole bunch of things that we believe about people.

And when you run through them, it is kind of amazing that we end at the Ninth and Tenth Amendment, which in a way—well, the Ninth Amendment—I want you to tell me what they mean. But if I am teaching it to my kids, what I say the Ninth and Tenth Amendment mean is, oh, you do not actually need a list that might end because if you think that you only have the rights that Government decrees for you, then you might think when the Government stops talking, you do not have any more rights.

And it seems to me what the Ninth and Tenth Amendments say, oh, by the way, if you do not—if we do not have a list of rights that continues, you still have all the ones we did not name. And State and local governments, if the Federal Government has not said this is a power uniquely enumerated for the Federal Government, States and locals, you are the only governments that still have these remaining powers. Is that fair? Or correct me.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think one of the ideas at the Convention, and they did talk a bit about Bill of Rights there or individual rights, and they do have some in Article I, Section 9, Article I, Section 10. We forget those rights. I hate to take an aside here, but I want to underscore the ex post facto bill of attainder provisions are critical to individual liberty. Ex post facto is the very definition of a tyrannical government when what you did yesterday is made illegal tomorrow and you are promised for what you did yesterday when it was not illegal then. And so, those were some of the foundational individual liberties.

But the idea I think they had, and it was maybe a bit of a political miscalculation at the Convention, was because the Federal Government was only given certain specified powers, we did not need to put in a Bill of Rights because the Federal Government would not have the power to do these kinds of things in the first place. Well, that did not go over so great in some of the ratifying conventions, and some of the promises that were made were instead of amending the existing structure, let us get to work as soon as we get to New York in 1789 on a Bill of Rights. And there were a variety of discussions, and so that is what Madison did when they got to—got there in 1789.

So, I think your point is correct with respect to thinking about where rights come from, but I think in the practical politics of the day, the initial idea was the Federal Government will not have the power to do that, and then people said what are talking about, there are lots of powers in this Constitution. Even if you think that—

Senator SASSE. Clarify.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Let us belt and suspenders and make sure that the Federal Government cannot infringe these core liberties, which are part of what we think are fundamental to being—being an American.

Senator SASSE. Why is there not an exception written into the First Amendment against hate speech? What is hate speech, and who gets to decide what it is?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think the principle of free speech that the Framers put into the Constitution encompassed the idea that there would be, as the Supreme Court has subsequently said in a variety of cases, unpopular ideas that would be expressed. And that, as we said earlier, it is important for individual liberty to have the ability to express your thoughts and your words, and it is important for societal development, the development of America for the people to be able to express their ideas so that we can improve over time.

And a lot of the ideas we hold dear were unpopular, some of them not so long ago. And we developed those ideas over time, and part of free speech helps us build a better America.

Senator SASSE. Yes.

If we had to unpack American political philosophy in one word, I think it is anti-majoritarianism. You never would want the Majority to get to define what the Minority cannot hold in an unpopular position.

The Chairman is going to take my gavel, take my microphone, but I would love to ask you if speech can ever be called violent.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I would just add one sentence to the anti-majoritarianism point. We think of the individual liberty specified in the Constitution as supporting that, but the structure, as I made clear, the structure, the separation of powers and federalism, is part of that same overall idea, which is protection of individual liberty against majoritarian rule, and the whole document tilts toward liberty.

Senator SASSE. Thanks.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Booker.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, you do not need to answer this because we all know your answer anyway, but will you allow me to ask you a series of questions leading to a question that I do not know your answer to?

A simple question. Again, we all know your heart, but just a question so I can lead someplace. You would not fire somebody because of the color of their skin. Obviously, no. Right? You would not fire somebody—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right, right.

Senator BOOKER. I know that is a snappy answer. I just want you to say “no” to that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator BOOKER. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have made clear—

Senator BOOKER. You have made clear because you have hired interns, you have talked to me about friends. I know that is the case. And, forgive me, I am not even questioning that. You would not fire somebody because of their gender, obviously. Right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I have made clear my efforts to achieve, as best I can, in the ways I can as a judge—

Senator BOOKER. Sir, just because of my time, I heard about numerous of my colleagues, even on the other side of the aisle, asked you to go through your hiring, and I just know that is your heart. I am not challenging that. I am not asking that. I am just trying to lead someplace, if you will allow me.

So you know it would be wrong for someone else to fire somebody just because of the color of their skin. Right? It would be morally wrong.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Of course.

Senator BOOKER. It would be morally wrong. It would be morally wrong. Right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. In the civil rights laws—

Senator BOOKER. If I could just ask you person to person, human being to human being, the dignity of a human being, it would be wrong to fire somebody because of the color of their skin.

Judge KAVANAUGH. And I understand that. I think my record—

Senator BOOKER. It clearly states that, it echoes that—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BOOKER [continuing]. As it has been stated numerous times. I am not challenging that at all.

Would it be wrong to fire somebody if the person found out, hey, I just found out this person is gay? Would it be wrong to fire that person?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, in my workplace, I hire people because of their talents and abilities. All Americans, all Americans—

Senator BOOKER. So maybe I can shift, then. Morally, you think it is right to hire people, it does not matter their background. For someone to fire someone just because they are gay, let us shift to the law now. Do they have a legal right to fire somebody just because they are gay, in your opinion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, the question, as I am sure you are aware, of the scope of employment discrimination laws being litigated right now, and therefore while I would like to talk to you about this more, because that issue is in a variety of cases right now, it would be inconsistent, as I am sure you are going to understand—

Senator BOOKER. Right. And I guess Senator Harris, Senator Coons, have all brought up these issues. Loving v. Virginia has been mentioned, the Obergefell case has been mentioned. I think there are a lot of folks who have real concerns if you get on the Court, folks who are married right now really have a fear that they will not be able to continue those marital bonds, and we still have a country where, if you post your Facebook pictures of your marriage to someone of the same sex, we still have a majority of States where if that employer of yours finds out that you had a gay marriage and that you are gay, in the majority of American States you can fire somebody because they are gay.

I guess you are not willing to tell me whether you personally morally now think that that is right or wrong.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I am a judge, and therefore with the cases that you are well aware of pending in the courts about the scope of the civil rights laws, the employment discrimination laws—of course, Congress could always make those clear—

Senator BOOKER. That is what I want to get to, the point that you will not give me a moral answer because of the pending cases, and I have heard that before.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right, and I do not want to in any way—

Senator BOOKER. So, maybe I can ask you about your concern when you were in the Bush White House. Did you have any involvement in Bush's effort to support a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, Senator, when I was in the White House, that was part of something that he talked about. Of course, at that point in time—

Senator BOOKER. Did you express an opinion then about it yourself?

Judge KAVANAUGH. As staff secretary, things related to that, speeches he gave went across my desk, as I have discussed before.

Senator BOOKER. I am not privy to your documents at that time.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator BOOKER. Did you ever express your opinions about same-sex marriage in those documents that I am not privy to, that will one day come out?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not recall. Of course, at that time, as you are well aware of, Senator, there has been a sea change in attitudes in the United States of America, even since 2004, as you are well aware.

Senator BOOKER. But you are not willing to tell me your attitudes then? I mean, we can change. We had President Obama evolve on that issue.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Right.

Senator BOOKER. So will you tell me your attitudes then about it?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will tell you that there was debate in the White House. Vice President Cheney came out, one of the few times he came out and publicly disagreed—

Senator BOOKER. I do not need to know Cheney's opinions. I want to know your opinions on the issue.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am sorry, Senator. I did not mean to interrupt. But there was debate in the White House about what President Bush was doing. Of course, as you said, President Obama—

Senator BOOKER. That was his word, "evolved" on the issue. But in your opinion—I do not need Obama, Cheney. Just, will you express to me your opinion on same-sex marriage?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not recall—

Senator BOOKER. I am not asking your opinion then. I am asking your opinion now. Do you recall your opinion now on same-sex marriage?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the Supreme Court in Obergefell—

Senator BOOKER. Your opinion. I do not know, maybe I did not get the record. I do not know if you have conducted gay marriages. I do not know if you have been to gay marriages. What is your opinion?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am a judge. I apply the law. I apply the precedent.

Senator BOOKER. Have you conducted a gay marriage?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Have I conducted one?

Senator BOOKER. Have you presided over one, officiated a gay marriage?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I have not.

Senator BOOKER. Okay. But you do not want to tell me your opinion on that issue.

Judge KAVANAUGH. I apply the law. The law of the Supreme Court—

Senator BOOKER. I want to move on as quickly as I can.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The law of the land protects that right, as dictated by the Supreme Court.

Senator BOOKER. Right. I just want to turn really quickly to your views on the criminal justice system. A lot of my colleagues heard this speech last summer at a conservative think tank. You called Chief Justice Rehnquist, and I quote, your "first judicial hero." Rehnquist was one of the most conservative Justices. You said about him, quote, "Rehnquist fervently believed that the Supreme Court had taken a wrong turn in the sixties and seventies when the Court made a lot of really landmark decisions." Gideon v. Wainwright, about access to an attorney. You had the assurance that police officers cannot violate your constitutional rights and then turn around and use that improperly to gain information. The exclusionary rule. The requirement that police officers taking you into custody read you your Miranda rights.

You praised Rehnquist's efforts to "limit and halt"—that is your quote—halt these critical protections. You said that it "righted the ship of constitutional jurisprudence."

So, do you think we had taken a wrong turn by establishing those rights?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No, that is not what I said, Senator, and the fact that we have not discussed exclusionary rule and Miranda over the last 24 hours is a sign of success of Chief Justice Rehnquist in helping the Supreme Court achieve a middle ground that has endured, that has endured and that is not really controversial.

Senator BOOKER. Well, I think we have not discussed it, at least I have not had a chance to ask you about it yet, and my time is running out. So just tell me if any of these were wrong turns. The exclusionary rule. A wrong turn or not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Supreme Court—

Senator BOOKER. Your opinion. The exclusionary rule. A wrong turn or not? Is that settled?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I apply the precedent—

Senator BOOKER. You cannot tell me it is settled.

What about the Miranda warning? Settled or not?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The Court—can I get two—

Senator BOOKER. No, not unless you tell me your opinion. I know what the precedent is. I know this law very well.

Senator CORNYN. Senator, I think the witness is entitled to answer the question.

Judge KAVANAUGH. In Dickerson, the Court reaffirmed that is precedent on precedent.

Senator BOOKER. Sir, he has been allowed 6 minutes at the end of my time. I know he is going to get a chance to answer my questions. I am just trying to get them all out so when he has his 6 or 7 minutes at the end.

You said Rehnquist made our criminal laws more workable. But the question really is—this is a quote from you, sir.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Criminal law, singular, I think.

Senator BOOKER. Criminal laws, but maybe criminal law in general. I have a real question about workable for who, and you understand the disparities in our criminal justice system.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. You understand that we have—all the data show that people, based upon their financial status, based upon the color of their skin, often have different experiences in the law. Do you understand that?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Absolutely, Senator.

Senator BOOKER. Yes, you know that. I know you know that.

Judge KAVANAUGH. We have talked about that.

Senator BOOKER. Yes. Bryan Stevenson says, “We have a system of justice that treats you better if you’re rich and guilty than if you’re poor and innocent” We have a real issue with that. You and I have discussed this.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes. That was a good conversation.

Senator BOOKER. I appreciated that. And I have 2 minutes left for this conversation, so let me just really quickly get this out, because I am going to then let you respond.

And that is the challenge for a lot of Americans right now, which is that they really believe that the scales are different. We have a system now where we do not even really have jury trials in criminal cases anymore, and that was something that was really fundamental to our criminal justice system, is the jury trial. But the scales have shifted so much that you see now—in fact, there is a great book. I did not know Senators were going to give me books; I would have given you a number for them.

[Laughter.]

Judge KAVANAUGH. I am happy to get them.

Senator BOOKER. I will. I will give you “The New Jim Crow” by Michelle Alexander.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes, I clerked with Michelle Alexander.

Senator BOOKER. I am grateful to give you these books. But let’s keep going on because you were doing a good job of allowing me not to get to my question, and I have a very, very diligent Chairman who is going to cut me off in 1 minute and 10 seconds.

So, you know right now that we have a system that seems to be shifting away. “Why Innocent People Plead Guilty” is another book that is worthy of reading, because of criminal defendants and the power shifting. So that is what raises that question to me about the rights of criminal defendants. And it seems to me that you were indicating that you were in favor of what Rehnquist said, that those rights of criminal defendants somehow got out of control, that they are making them more workable. And the question I have is workable for who?

It seems that when I look at a lot of these issues, as a guy—you and I both have talked—you talked a lot about your city of violence. I was the mayor of a big city, every single day working to try to keep my city safer. So I know about public safety, as you do, and I believe that these systems, these laws are making us less safe. They are destroying communities, because at Yale, they were not stopping and frisking kids on the way home from parties at The Toad looking for drugs. They were not getting the same treatment, those kids, and there was a lot of drug use at Yale.

So I hear you saying you are praising Rehnquist, who is making these laws more workable, and I would just ask you, workable for who?

Senator CORNYN. Judge, do you want to answer any of those questions?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I will try to give about a 1-minute on this.

I understand we had a great conversation about racial disparities in the criminal justice system, and we talked about ensuring confidence of all Americans in the fairness of the criminal justice system and the American legal system and the court system and the Supreme Court, and I appreciated that conversation.

I would just note four things. The note I wrote in law school about detecting race discrimination in Batson hearings, my opinions on acquitted conduct that have been used to enhance sentences, my opinions of that, that it is often unfair when acquitted conduct is used to jack up sentences far beyond what the offense of conviction would be. Third, my opinion on mens rea in the Burwell case. I strongly would encourage you to take a look at that, because that is part of the fairness and due process case.

I understand your perspective, and I enjoyed our conversation, and thank you for that.

Senator BOOKER. And if I could get the same treatment that Senator Blumenthal got, can I just read some things?

Senator CORNYN. Absolutely.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. Chairman, I am holding a number of letters in opposition to the nomination of Judge Brett Kavanaugh to be Associate Judge. They are letters from the NAACP, multiple health care groups around the country, Voto Latino, the Women Lawyers On Guard. There are a number of very esteemed religious organizations, the AME Churches representations here, the Congressional Black Caucus, and others. I would like to submit those to the record.

And just in honor of Mr. Sasse, because I have a tremendous respect for him, and I actually agree with a lot of what he was saying about free thought and what is happening in this country, I just want to ask the person a friendly question, that I would love to read any book that he has to recommend, if the Judge would read any book I recommend. I make that offer just as an extension of good faith.

Senator CORNYN. Without objection, they will be made part of the record.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator CORNYN. For the record, Senator Durbin is one of the most prolific book recommenders I know in the Senate.

[Laughter.]

Senator CORNYN. I have benefited greatly from his recommendations of fiction and non-fiction alike. So I would suggest—

Senator BOOKER. Is that—

Senator CORNYN [continuing]. Recommend we go back to Senator Durbin—

Senator BOOKER. Senator Cornyn, I would love to do a book exchange with you, sir, as well.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. Maybe that could help us this morning.

Senator CORNYN. Okay.

Senator BOOKER. Oh, God, please do not do that.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. In that case, just for the record, I retract my comments. That is pretty thick.

[Laughter.]

Senator CORNYN. We will go to Senator Flake.

Senator FLAKE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Judge. Appreciate your endurance.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Yes.

Senator FLAKE. It was noted before, you have done the Boston Marathon twice. How does this compare?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I feel good, Senator.

Senator FLAKE. Senator Booker represented Heartbreak Hill, I think. But you are beyond that and on the way down now.

I just wanted to make a couple of comments, and I will yield additional time to Senator Lee.

The cameras in the courtroom, I know you addressed it a little before. I raised it during the Gorsuch hearings. I am very much opposed to it. Not here. I am glad there are cameras here. They belong here. This is the Congress. This is the Senate. They belong here, and the protests here are people's right to free speech, and the country needs to see that. But I fear that it would politicize and be detrimental to the independence of the judiciary. I am glad that the cameras have been resisted in oral arguments. I know you cannot comment or will not comment on this, and if you want to, you can. But I certainly do not think it is in our interest to bring the element of politics any closer to the judiciary. So I will make the same comments as I did with Judge Gorsuch's hearing.

I did Chair a Subcommittee hearing on the use of technology in the courtroom last summer. I have had a long interest in the topic, and I remain convinced, after the testimony that we received there and what I have observed, that we are better off having oral arguments the way they have been, and the Court has remained and I hope will continue to remain a bastion of independence. That is more difficult if there are cameras in the courtroom.

So with that, I will yield my remaining time to Senator Lee, as he might use it.

Senator CORNYN. Thank you, Senator Flake. We will go to Senator Harris and then come back to Senator Lee.

Can I ask? Senator Booker raised some issue about the reduction in the number of jury trials in criminal cases?

Senator FLAKE. Probably for plea bargaining.

Senator CORNYN. Oh, is that because of plea bargains?

Senator BOOKER. Yes, sir. The percentage of jury trials in this country has gone down dramatically.

Senator CORNYN. It is because of plea bargains, not because people are being denied their constitutional—

Senator BOOKER. I would say plea bargains are the result of mandatory minimum sentences, which have changed pretty dramatically.

Senator CORNYN. Okay. Thank you for that explanation.

Senator Harris.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Judge, you have spoken about the President's unlimited prosecutorial discretion. Does that discretion allow him to target his political enemies for prosecution and spare his friends?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, in the Marquette speech I gave in 2015, I pointed out that the question of the limits of prosecutorial discretion is a question that is unsettled and needs further study. The Supreme Court, of course, has referred to the concept and well-settled tradition of prosecutorial discretion in Heckler v. Turner and Nixon.

Senator HARRIS. And I actually recall you talking about that during the course of this hearing. And also I am reflecting on a conversation you had with Senator Flake yesterday where he raised concerns with you about a recent tweet by the President. In that tweet, the President attacked the Justice Department for indicting two Republican Members of Congress because it would hurt the Republican Party at the polls.

You said you did not want to assess comments in the political arena, so I will not ask you to condemn the tweet, even though I believe you should. But would you recognize and agree with the principle that a sitting President should not politicize the Justice Department?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think that is asking me to wade into the political arena.

Senator HARRIS. So it is not a self-evident—

Judge KAVANAUGH. Three zip codes away from the political arena, Senator.

Senator HARRIS. Okay. Following up on Senator Booker's question from yesterday on an interview you gave in 1999 in connection with a case you worked on, you said that it was an inevitable conclusion within the next 10 to 20 years that the Court would say, quote, "We are all one race in the eyes of the Government." Would you agree that your statement suggests that the Government would no longer recognize racial differences? That is my reading of your words. Was that in the zone of what you intended?

Judge KAVANAUGH. So, I think I talked to Senator Booker about that yesterday.

Senator HARRIS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That was certainly an aspirational suggestion, but I have said as recently as a couple of years ago that the long march for racial equality is not finished and racial discrimination is still a reality we see on an all-too-frequent basis. I said that in my opinions.

Senator HARRIS. So the conclusion I draw from that is that you would agree, and I certainly believe we have not arrived at that place yet.

Judge KAVANAUGH. There is still racial disparity, racial discrimination, of course, in American society. I have said that in my opinions.

Senator HARRIS. So my question is this: Why should it be up to the Court to decide when we arrive, whenever that moment comes? Why should it be up to the Court to decide?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think that is a question of how to interpret the precedent of the Supreme Court, and it is not—it is different areas, as we have discussed. There is precedent in the higher education context. There is precedent in the contracting context in terms—

Senator HARRIS. And does that precedent dictate that it should be the Court that would make the decision that we have arrived at that place where we are basically all one race in the eyes of the Government?

Judge KAVANAUGH. The precedent does not necessarily lead to that conclusion. I think that is an open question going forward. You are familiar with Justice O'Connor's statement in the Michigan case about 25 years ago.

Senator HARRIS. Yes.

Judge KAVANAUGH. That clock is moving fast, but we still have, as I have said in my opinions, work to do.

Senator HARRIS. So I have just a few minutes left, but just to continue this conversation, if it were up to the Court to decide, just talking again to the natural conclusion, what you wrote, will it be the five Justices, then, of the Court, who will decide, or are you suggesting that it should be like Brown v. Board of Education, where there would be a unanimous decision that we have arrived at that point? Or could it simply be five Justices, a majority of the Court, deciding that we have arrived at that point?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think a one-size-fits-all answer to the question is hard to give in this context.

Senator HARRIS. What do you imagine as being the ideal?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, the ideal for every case is that every case is unanimous. I realize that is naive, but that is the goal.

When I talk about joining a Team of Nine, that is the goal, and I think that is the goal of every Justice, and the Court has shown a remarkable ability on the most important cases in its history, like Brown v. Board of Education, like United States v. Richard Nixon, to achieve unanimity, and that is part of the reason those cases stand as such landmarks.

Senator HARRIS. Sure.

Judge KAVANAUGH. The decision, the independence, and the unanimity.

Senator HARRIS. And you and I have discussed that before, and you have mentioned that here. I agree with that.

But tell me, when the Court does make that decision, if that moment arrives, that we are one race, does that mean the Government should not provide Federal funding to Historically Black Colleges and Universities?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Senator, I think the Historically Black Colleges and Universities have, of course, been a critical part of the educational system in the United States.

Senator HARRIS. Pardon me. Because we recognize past restrictions on African-American students being able to have access to higher education. But do you imagine, though, that if we reach this point that you, I think, hope that we will achieve—I think that we all do, that we will all be equal—

Judge KAVANAUGH. I think we all do.

Senator HARRIS [continuing]. In every way, do you believe that that would mean, then, that we would end Federal funding for HBCUs?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Again, Senator, when we reach that point, it is hard to foresee what that would mean. But what I know about the Historically Black Colleges and Universities, of course, is the origins of them, that African Americans were denied access to higher educational institutions. What they have accomplished and produced, and what they continue to do, and the importance of those colleges and universities in the United States can continue to perform that educational function.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you. And how would the courts and agencies enforce laws like the Civil Rights Act of 1964 if the Government does not recognize racial categories? I am not clear about what you are imagining would occur.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, that is a question of what Congress has as the law. So long as Congress and, of course, a landmark civil rights law, the Voting Rights Act, those two from 1964 and 1965, two of the most consequential laws ever passed by Congress, ban discrimination on the basis of race, and so long as those laws are on the books, and one imagines that those laws will always be on the books, discrimination on the basis of race will be illegal under the civil rights laws and the voting rights laws in what they cover.

Senator HARRIS. So what would come of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 in that place that you imagined, at least in 1999, where we would arrive in 10 to 20 years from then, where we are all one race in the eyes of the Government? What would that mean for the Civil Rights Act of 1964? Because I am assuming that if you are actually confirmed, you will live a long life, as all of us do.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you.

Senator HARRIS. So it is conceivable that during the course of your lifetime—conceivable; I do not know if it is probable, but conceivable that we will arrive at that place. So imagining that, and imagining that you will be still a member of the United States Supreme Court, what do you imagine would be your analysis as it relates to the applicability and relevance of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, if we arrive at that place that you describe?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Well, I am not—I think those might be two distinct issues, which one imagines it will always be on the books, the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act prohibit discrimination on the basis of race in employment, housing, and voting—so long as those are on the books, those will continue to be enforced by the Federal courts and discrimination on the basis of race would be something that will be unlawful and illegal.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you. My time is up. I appreciate it.

Judge KAVANAUGH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator HARRIS. And then, Mr. Chairman, I would like to also introduce letters into the record. I have first a letter from several of our Nation's leading civil rights organizations signed by the leaders of the National Coalition of Black Civic Participation, the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, the NAACP, the Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the NAACP, the National Urban League, and the National Action Network, all critical of this nomination and expressing concerns.

Second, I have a letter from 31 reproductive rights, health, and justice organizations, including Planned Parenthood Federation of America, NARAL, and the National Women's Law Center.

And finally I have letters from the Feminist Majority Foundation, the Disability Rights Education and Defense Fund, the American Network of Community Options and Resources, and the National Center for Special Education, if they could be admitted.

Senator CORNYN. They will be made part of the record, without objection.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator CORNYN. Senator Tillis.

Senator TILLIS. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

I am going to be real brief.

One, I thought Senator Booker did a very artful job of going down the path of questions that you could answer "yes" or "no" to in terms of who you would hire and who you would fire. So let me just make sure that I am also clear on something you cannot respond to.

But quite honestly, if firing someone because of their gender identification is immoral, it is also something that if anybody even suggested it that has ever worked in my organization, they would get fired before the sun set. I have been very passionate about this issue since 1997 when I set up a gay and lesbian recruiting practice at Price Waterhouse. That is becoming the norm. It is on us to fix it. It is not on the Judge to determine how we are going to get it done.

And as for HBCUs, I am also proud to have led the first HBCU recruiting practice at Price Waterhouse. It is critically important.

Again, if it comes under threat under the law, then let's do our job and fix it.

The last thing for you. Now you get to answer questions.

Judge Kavanaugh, there are about 350 lawyers at the Kasowitz firm. Is that right?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I do not know the number.

Senator TILLIS. I think that is right based on what we found in looking up the firm. Do you know all of them?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator TILLIS. Are there any that you do know?

Judge KAVANAUGH. I know Ed McNally. He used to work in the White House Counsel's Office when I was in the White House.

Senator TILLIS. Have you ever talked with him about the Mueller investigation?

Judge KAVANAUGH. No.

Senator TILLIS. Do you know anyone else that works at the firm?

Judge KAVANAUGH. Not that I am aware of.

Senator TILLIS. Thank you. I again appreciate it, and it gives me one more chance to thank your family and all your friends and all these folks here who are probably going to have to go get back massages.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. So, thank you all. God bless you. I look forward to supporting your nomination.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let me close and give the Committee the agenda for tomorrow, and then we will go to our closed session.

Judge, I am very pleased that the American people have finally had an opportunity to listen to you and to hear directly from you, because that is what these last 2 days have been all about, and I hope a lot of people in this country have formed very positive views of you, as I have.

It seemed to me that you made a powerful and convincing case for Senate confirmation, hours and hours of questioning, and your answers have been compelling and credible. Your 12 years of judicial experience on the most important Federal circuit court in America, 10,000 pages of judicial writings I think proves that unquestionably you are qualified to serve on the Supreme Court of the United States.

We also ought to be very impressed with you as a person, a lifetime of public service. In addition to serving as an outstanding judge, you have been a professor, coach, volunteer and, probably most importantly, I think you would see your position as a husband and dad as the most important thing in your life.

Tomorrow is the fourth and final day of this hearing. We will have four panels. On the first panel we will hear from two witnesses from the American Bar Association. Of course, everybody knows that Democratic leaders have called their judgment of somebody a "gold standard" of judicial evaluations, and they have rated you unanimously "well qualified" to serve on the Supreme Court.

We will then have three more panels after the ABA panel where we will hear from 26 additional witnesses, 13 from the Majority, 13 from the Minority, and many of these witnesses include Judge Kavanaugh's former law clerk students, friends and associates. I look forward to hearing about their personal bonds with you, Judge.

Now, without objection, the Committee Members and Judge Kavanaugh will move into closed session in Dirksen Room 226.

This session is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 10:12 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Additional material submitted for the record for Day 3 follows Day 5 of the hearing.]

CONTINUATION OF THE
CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE
NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 2018

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC.

The Committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:30 a.m., in Room SH-216, Hart Senate Office Building, Hon. Charles E. Grassley, Chairman of the Committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Grassley, Hatch, Graham, Cornyn, Lee, Cruz, Sasse, Flake, Crapo, Tillis, Kennedy, Feinstein, Leahy, Durbin, Whitehouse, Klobuchar, Coons, Blumenthal, Hirono, Booker, and Harris.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF IOWA

Chairman GRASSLEY. Good morning, everybody. I welcome you to our fourth and final day of the Kavanaugh confirmation hearing.

Over the last 3 days, the American people heard directly from the Judge. He sat through hours and hours, and I think my staff calculated 32½ hours of our colleagues' statements and, of course, our colleagues' questioning. I think he made a very compelling case that he is one of the most qualified nominees, if not the most qualified, that we have seen for the Supreme Court of the United States. And I have seen, I think, 15 of them.

He demonstrated that his 12 years of exemplary judicial service on the Nation's second-highest court uniquely qualifies him for promotion to the Nation's highest court. In fact, on today's first panel, we will hear from two witnesses from the American Bar Association. The ABA, whose assessment, particularly by Democrat leaders—I like to quote that they refer to it as the “gold standard” of judicial evaluation—has rated Judge Kavanaugh unanimously “well qualified” to serve on the Supreme Court.

I am going to tell you a little bit now how today is going to evolve. Each ABA witness will have 5 minutes to make an opening statement. We will then have 5-minute rounds of Senators' questioning of the panel. We will have 3 more panels after the ABA panel, where we will hear from 26 additional witnesses.

Many of these witnesses include the Judge's former law clerks, students, friends, and associates. They will help make the case that not only is Judge Kavanaugh one of the most qualified nominees that we have, Judge Kavanaugh is also an exceptional judge, teacher, coach, volunteer, and dad. And I am sure we will hear that.

Now I want to point out one person that is going to come on a later panel because he has deep Iowa roots. I am pleased and proud to hear from Professor Adam White—grew up in Dubuque, Iowa, graduated from Dubuque Wahlert High School, the University of Iowa, and Harvard Law School. And Adam's parents live in Bettendorf, Iowa. So he is probably not here yet, but I welcome Adam. And I hope to meet his parents as well.

We will divide the time equally between the Majority's 13 and the Minority's 13 witnesses. Each witness has 5 minutes to make an opening statement, then 5 rounds for Senators' questioning of each of the 3 panels.

Our first panel today will feature two representatives from the ABA Standing Committee of the Federal Judiciary: Paul Moxley and John Tarpley. I would like to have you folks stand now so that I can swear you.

[Witnesses are sworn in.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Now before you give your testimony, I know a fine lawyer in Des Moines by the name of Mr. Brown who does a lot of what you are doing, and I know he spends a lot of time doing it and takes it very seriously. So let us—did you two folks—

Senator FEINSTEIN. Do I get to make a statement?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I am sorry. You do get to make a statement.

I apologize. Go ahead. You should make a statement, yes.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. DIANNE FEINSTEIN,
A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you. Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I do not have any questions for the two panelists, but I want to thank them both for all the hard work the ABA does, not just on the evaluation of Judge Kavanaugh, but on your evaluation of all of the district and circuit court nominees that come before the Committee.

I, in particular, pay special attention to the recommendation, and for me, speaking personally, it is very important. And I want you to know that, and I believe I speak for Members on my side as well.

For decades, the American Bar has provided an analysis of judicial nominations to provide the Senate and the American public with an important assessment of a nominee's qualifications. So thank you.

The kind of rating it is, is to some extent what colleagues know of colleagues, and I think it is important because we see one side of a person, but the ABA sees their professional side and hears about their professional side. And I think that is very important.

The rating is not determinative, and by no means is it the only consideration necessary to evaluate a nominee. It does provide the useful insight into whether the nominee has the legal competence, temperament, and integrity to be elevated to the Federal bench, and I think it is critically important for the ABA to be allowed to follow its process and finish its work before a nominee has a hearing.

And I know I am, Mr. Chairman, speaking for our side on that point. Because this enables the Committee to ask questions of the nominee, especially if the ABA's evaluation suggests areas of concern in the nominee's record. So I hope we can return to such a process.

Once again, thank you for your hard work, and welcome today.

Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

Mr. Moxley, do you want to start for your group?

Mr. MOXLEY. Happy to.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF PAUL T. MOXLEY, CHAIR, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDING COMMITTEE ON THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY, SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH

Mr. MOXLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chair and Ranking Member Feinstein. We are honored to be here today representing our committee and to explain our evaluation of Judge Kavanaugh.

We gave him the highest rating possible, which is unanimously "well qualified." For over 60 years, we have conducted thorough, nonpartisan, nonideological peer review of nominees to the Federal courts. We assess the nominee's integrity, professional competence, and judicial temperament.

The Standing Committee does not propose, endorse, or recommend nominees. We only evaluate the professional qualifications of a nominee to the courts.

I am from Salt Lake City. John Tarpley, to my left, is from Nashville, Tennessee, and in the gallery is Bob Trout. And we were also assisted by Pam Bresnahan, who was the chair of this committee in July when the nomination came in.

To be a nominee to the Supreme Court, one must possess exceptional professional qualifications. As such, our investigation of a nominee to the Supreme Court is much more extensive than the other Federal courts. First, all of the Circuit members of the committee, of which there are 14, participate in the evaluation. Every Federal Circuit in the country is covered by these 14 people rather than just the Circuit in which the nominee resides.

Second, while the Standing Committee independently reviews the writings of the nominee, we also commission three reading groups. In this instance, we had the University of Maryland, University of Utah, and a professional group. And in this group of people were approximately 48 law professors and distinguished practitioners.

Members of the reading groups independently evaluated factors such as the Judge's analytical abilities, the clarity of writing, knowledge of the law, application of the law to the facts, expertise in harmonizing a body of law, and the ability to communicate effectively. We contacted and solicited input from almost 500 people who are likely to have knowledge of his qualifications, including Federal and State judges, lawyers, and bar representatives. Some of these people were identified in his Senate questionnaire, which you are also familiar with.

Also, our committee had a confidential evaluation performed on Judge Kavanaugh in the years 2003, 2005, and 2006 when he was nominated to the D.C. Circuit Court. We also, Mr. Tarpley and myself and Mr. Trout, met with the Judge for about 3½ hours in early August and, since then, have talked to him regularly on the telephone, had email exchanges, and the like.

We concluded that his integrity, judicial temperament, and professional competence met the highest standards for appointment to the Court. Our rating of unanimously “well qualified” reflects the consensus of his peers who have knowledge of his professional qualifications, and we reached out to a broad range of legal professionals, including almost 500 people, and we conducted about 120 personal interviews.

And with that, I conclude my opening statement.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Moxley appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Mr. Moxley.

Mr. Tarpley.

STATEMENT OF JOHN R. TARPLEY, PRINCIPAL EVALUATOR, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDING COMMITTEE ON THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY, NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE

Mr. TARPLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Feinstein, and Members of the Committee.

Good morning. I am John Tarpley. As my colleague Paul Moxley reported, I am the lead evaluator of the American Bar Association’s investigation of Judge Kavanaugh’s nomination to the United States Supreme Court. It is my privilege to be here, and it is my privilege to present this testimony on behalf of the committee’s evaluation of Judge Kavanaugh’s professional qualifications.

Let me point out at the start the Standing Committee did not consider Judge Kavanaugh’s ideology, his political views, or his political affiliation. It did not solicit information with regard to how Judge Kavanaugh might rule on specific issues or cases that could come before the United States Supreme Court.

Rather, the ABA Standing Committee’s evaluation of Judge Kavanaugh was based on a comprehensive, nonpartisan, nonideological peer review of integrity, professional competence, and judicial temperament. In evaluating integrity, the Standing Committee considers the nominee’s character and general reputation in the legal community, his industry, and his diligence.

The Standing Committee found that Judge Kavanaugh enjoys an excellent reputation for integrity and is a person of outstanding character. It was clear from all of our interviews and other lengthy conversations that he learned the importance of integrity from a very early age and throughout his life.

Importantly, many of the lawyers, judges, and others interviewed praised his integrity. They said his integrity is absolutely unquestioned. He is a person of the highest morality and the highest ethics. He is what he seems, very decent, humble, and honest.

Another said, he always seeks to be fair. He is not result-oriented. He wants to do the right thing.

On the basis of our comprehensive evaluation process, the Standing Committee concluded that Judge Kavanaugh possesses the integrity for our highest rating, a unanimous “well qualified.”

Professional competence, this encompasses qualities such as intellectual capacity, judgment, writing, analytical abilities, knowledge of the law, and breadth of professional experience. A Supreme Court—must possess all of these exceptional qualities. Judge Kavanaugh’s professional competence easily exceeds these very high criteria.

One of the reading group members noted in reviewing his scholarly work, their view was that Judge Kavanaugh writes and analyzes the law and the application of the facts to law and that—with exceptional clarity and that his opinions are well organized, resulting in clear precedent. Another said Judge Kavanaugh is an excellent writer with a flair for making complicated facts very understandable.

Given the breadth, diversity, and strength of the positive feedback we received from judges and lawyers from all parts of the profession, the committee would have been hard-pressed to come to any conclusion other than that Judge Kavanaugh has demonstrated exceptional professional competence. Those with whom he has worked and those who have been involved in cases over which he has presided have applauded his intellectual acumen, his thoughtful discernment, and his written clarity. As a result, the ABA Standing Committee has determined that Judge Kavanaugh possesses sufficiently outstanding professional competence to be rated unanimously “well qualified.”

In evaluating judicial temperament, the ABA Standing Committee considers a nominee’s compassion, decisiveness, open-mindedness, courteousness, patience, and freedom from bias. Lawyers and judges overwhelmingly praised Judge Kavanaugh’s judicial temperament. They said, among other things, he is very straightforward. He maintains an open mind about all things.

He is an affable, nice person. He is easy to get along with and even has a good sense of humor. Can you imagine that? A judge with a good sense of humor? He is really a decent person. His temperament is terrific. He is thoughtful, fair-minded, always fair-minded in his questions to counsel. Thus, our highest rating in this category.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I note that the ABA Standing Committee shares the goal of your Committee, to assure a qualified and independent judiciary for the American people. On behalf of the ABA’s more than 400,000 members from one end of the country to the other, I want to thank you for the opportunity to present this statement explaining our evaluation.

We are a very diverse group of lawyers and we agreed unanimously that Judge Kavanaugh meets our highest standards and rated him as unanimously “well qualified” to serve as an Associate Justice on the United States Supreme Court.

Thank you again for this opportunity, and thank you for your service.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I will not have any questions of you. I am going to start with Senator Graham. But before I do that, I just want to thank you not only for your testimony, but you and your colleagues that did this review, we thank you very much for that part of your public service and your dedication to the rule of law.

Senator GRAHAM, and then Senator Feinstein.

Senator GRAHAM. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

That was an incredible explanation and overview of a well-lived life. Do you agree with that?

Mr. TARPLEY. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. He sounds like a great judge, but a lousy politician. He has no chance in my business.

What I would like to do is thank you because very seldom do we have moments like this in modern politics where you pick people outside the rim of politics to give us some insight about a person like you have done. Often—not often, but sometimes, we disagree with the ABA’s rating from a Republican point of view.

I am glad you do what you do. I want it to continue. When you reach a conclusion that I disagree with, it will not be because I do not respect your opinion. From this Committee’s point of view, I think this is a valuable input.

Some of us think you may be more left than right at times as an association, but that does not matter to me. What matters to me is the quality of your work, and I think you do the country a great service.

So just to sum up. Intellect, A-plus?

Mr. TARPLEY. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with that, Mr. Moxley?

Mr. MOXLEY. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. Integrity, A-plus?

Mr. MOXLEY. A-plus-plus.

Senator GRAHAM. Again, we have nothing in common, I do not, with Judge Kavanaugh, so far as an A-plus-plus. I think I have got integrity, but I am not going to—I am not going to put myself in the category of this man in terms of his ability to impress his peers.

Would you say he is mainstream in terms of being a judge?

Mr. TARPLEY. Absolutely. He is at the top of the stream.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. Have you ever heard the word “radical” used when it came to Judge Kavanaugh?

Mr. MOXLEY. No.

Mr. TARPLEY. Not in—not in all of the evaluations that we have done, and we have communicated with more than 100 lawyers and judges who work with him on a regular basis.

Senator GRAHAM. If he is confirmed, do you think the Court will be in good hands if he is a member of it?

Mr. TARPLEY. We gave him our unanimously “well qualified” rating. It is our highest rating. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with that, Mr. Moxley?

Mr. MOXLEY. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. Are either one of you running for President?

Mr. TARPLEY. Oh, no.

[Laughter.]

Mr. TARPLEY. I will save that job for you, Senator.

Senator GRAHAM. Did not work out.

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Feinstein.

Senator FEINSTEIN. I have no questions, except to say that I think the report in writing is very helpful. I think the individuals' names that are down here who have participated in different aspects of it is very helpful. I think we have something that becomes part of the standing record.

Mr. MOXLEY. Yes.

Senator FEINSTEIN. And there has been some controversy about the ABA, as you probably know. And I think the way to really solve it are reports like this, which are thorough and contemplative and helpful.

So, thank you.

Mr. TARPLEY. Thank you.

Mr. MOXLEY. We understood we needed to make a motion for the admission of the statement as well?

Chairman GRASSLEY. I just think it is automatically accepted because we always say you have 5 minutes and a longer written statement would be included.

Senator Cruz or—go ahead, Senator Cruz.

Senator CRUZ. I do not have any questions, but I want to briefly enter into the record—

Chairman GRASSLEY. I should say that we do all this without objection. I do not hear any objection so that the report is received. [The report appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Go ahead.

Senator CRUZ. I want to briefly enter into the record a letter from the Solicitors General of 12 States, including the State of Texas. These SGs have written in their personal capacities “to express our strong support for the confirmation of Judge Brett Kavanaugh.”

They write, “The Solicitor General serves as the State’s chief appellate litigator. Thus, we represent our States in the U.S. Supreme Court, carefully study the work of the Court, and have a keen appreciation for the role that the Court plays in safeguarding the rule of law, including vital federalism and separation of powers principles. In our view, Judge Kavanaugh would make an outstanding addition to the Nation’s highest court. Throughout his distinguished career, Judge Kavanaugh has demonstrated an unwavering commitment to preserving the rule of law and advancing the legal profession.”

And so I would like to enter this into the record.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Without objection, it will be received.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Let me just ask both of you one question, if I might? Would it concern you if we proceeded to consider a nominee for a judicial post without taking into account the ABA’s advice? Paul.

Mr. MOXLEY. Yes.

Mr. TARPLEY. I will just add to that—Paul knows that I am the wordy one of this duo. But I will add to that, yes, I think it is an integral part of the process. It is an important part.

I am a lawyer. I am really interested in the kinds of judges that we have. All of our 410,000 members bring a unique perspective to this process. Our individual committee members bring a unique serious perspective to the process. It is valuable work we believe that we do, and we think it is important to the process.

Mr. MOXLEY. What I would add to that is, that the thing that is hard to get your mind around is, that if you have practitioners from a particular district or circuit and they are well known to the courts, and you call the judges in your district or the lawyers in your district, they are going to be—because they know you, they are going to be more honest and candid with you, and since it is confidential. And part of our rule is, that if someone brings up negative information about a nominee, unless we take that information back to the nominee for them to rebut it, we do not use it. But it gives—it gives the work that we do more authenticity, at least in our minds it does. And obviously, we are doing this on a pro bono basis, and we think it is important or we would not be doing it. Because we are interested—

Senator COONS. Well, thank you.

Mr. MOXLEY. We are interested in having good courts, and we represent everyday people who are dependent on the courts.

Senator COONS. I consult and rely on the ABA ratings when I am considering district court, circuit court, and obviously Supreme Court nominations. I appreciate your input both on Justice Kavanaugh, but this is input that I look for every time we are doing a confirmation hearing and I think is valuable, and I think it ought to be part of our regular process.

I appreciate your appearing before us today.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Senator.

Senator CRAPO.

Senator CRAPO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I did not have a question, but now I do.

I, too, appreciate deeply the work that the ABA does and the ratings and reviews that it gives on all of our candidates. To me, that is not the question that this Committee has been struggling with.

The question is whether the ABA, or anybody for that matter, should be giving a blackball and be able to prohibit or ban a candidate from being considered by this Committee if it does not give it its approval. What are your thoughts on that?

Mr. MOXLEY. Incidentally, one of your fellows from Idaho was chair of this committee, Tim Hopkins.

Senator CRAPO. A great attorney. Good friend.

Mr. MOXLEY. Great, great lawyer and great man. I do not think that—we only see our part of the ball, and what we are familiar with is the competence of nominees, their integrity, and their judicial temperament. You may have other considerations that are not on our minds, and I do not think we blackball them. We just give our recommendation.

Senator CRAPO. Mr. Tarpley?

Mr. TARPLEY. I agree with that.

Senator CRAPO. Thank you. All right, thank you very much. And thank you for your testimony here today. I appreciate it.

Mr. MOXLEY. Thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

I want to join in thanking you for your excellent work and the values that you uphold in this work, the highest traditions of our profession, which is advocacy for people regardless of their station in life, their status, their background, their race or religion. And for that kind of advocacy to work, we need judicial independence, and I want to thank you for making that a specific criterion in your report, and you remarked that you believe that Judge Kavanaugh would uphold judicial independence.

I hope that you join me in the very, very strong feeling that attacks by public officials, and I am not going to mince words—by the President of the United States—on our independent judiciary are a disservice to judicial independence and the integrity of our judicial system.

Mr. TARPLEY. I can respond quickly on that one, Paul. The ABA feels very strongly that a fair and independent judiciary is a linchpin of our society. The Founding Fathers set it up like that. It survived all these hundreds of years, and we feel very strongly about the fair and independent judiciary.

Mr. MOXLEY. What I would add to that is, that a Federal district court can declare an act, an Executive order as unconstitutional, enter injunctions, and that is also true for legislative bills. And that is an integral part of our legal system, the federalism and the fact that each branch of Government is coequal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But attacks on the courts that undermine the faith and confidence of the public in the credibility of our courts are a real blow to judicial independence, are they not?

Mr. MOXLEY. I do not disagree with that.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I want to just note for the record that both of our guests seem to be in agreement with that proposition, and I thank you very much.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, thank you for being here. Do you have colleagues in the audience who worked with you on this effort?

Mr. TARPLEY. Certainly. We mentioned Bob Trout, a distinguished lawyer here in the District of Columbia, just immediately behind us, who was our local person on the ground, who did a tremendous amount of work.

And Denise Cardman, our staff representative from the American Bar Association. We are proud of both of them.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, with your permission, may I ask them to stand?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, would you, please?

Senator KENNEDY. I want to thank all of you for your hard work and your input.

Mr. MOXLEY. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you for being here.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Whitehouse, do you have a question?

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Sure. Gentlemen, your evaluation of the nominee related to his qualifications and produced a conclusion that he was “well qualified”?

Mr. TARPLEY. Unanimously “well qualified.”

Senator WHITEHOUSE. In the evaluation of the nominee's qualifications, did you have a chance to look at any patterns in his decisions on the court?

Mr. TARPLEY. We looked at a number of decisions. Our reading group examined every decision that he rendered. They read many of his writings. To be candid, I did not see a pattern in his decisions.

If there were a—if there is a pattern to the decision, it is what we saw was an allegiance to the law, a dedication to looking at the facts of each particular case and applying the law to the facts of that case, and a faithfulness to precedent.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Did you make any effort to cross-reference who the parties, or amici, were in these cases in that review?

Mr. MOXLEY. Yes, I will answer that, Senator, and I am not sure if you were here during the beginning parts of our remarks.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I was not.

Mr. MOXLEY. Yes. But we had—we had three different reading groups who participated in this evaluation, and there were two different law schools that participated—University of Utah and University of Maryland. And then we had a practitioners group. And this consisted of 48 people who broke the law into different areas and gave us a report on their—the opinions.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And in that evaluation, did it take into account what amici, for instance, were appearing before the court?

Mr. TARPLEY. The amicus curiae that appeared before the court?

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes.

Mr. TARPLEY. I mean, that was a part of the record in every case.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Obviously. But was that part of your analysis?

Mr. TARPLEY. We did not look at who the parties were to the case.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Or who the amici were?

Mr. TARPLEY. We looked—when the cases were read, it was considered as to who the parties were.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes.

Mr. TARPLEY. As well as who all the amicus curiae were.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But in terms of looking for any pattern, there was no cross-referencing between decisions and who amici and parties were?

Mr. MOXLEY. Do not think so.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. Just wanted to check. Well, the reason I asked that question, to be totally up front about it, is that as we showed earlier, when certain amici come before the D.C. Circuit, amici who tend to be associated with and funded by very powerful, very wealthy right-wing interests, they seem to have a better than 90 percent win rate in front of this particular judge.

And I know that he says that he makes decisions based only on the quality of the legal work and the argument before him, in which case it seems that these particular amici seem to have some very superhuman lawyering going their way because a win rate above 90 percent, to me, is a bit of a signal that there may be something else going on to pursue. Since you never looked at that underlying statistic, presumably you drew no conclusions about it?

Mr. MOXLEY. That is correct.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay. Thank you.

Mr. MOXLEY. But if it would be helpful to the Senator, we could have the reading groups look at that particular question.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I do not know that we have time, but I will consider that. I will get back to you.

Mr. MOXLEY. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Let us see, I guess all of my colleagues have asked the questions they want to ask.

So we thank you, and we will call the second panel. Thank you very much.

Mr. TARPLEY. Absolutely. Thank you so much.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We will wait just a minute while people get the right names up here, and then we will have the second panel come.

[Pause.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. I have indicated to the audience that we have three more panels, where we will hear 26 additional witnesses. Many of these witnesses include Judge Kavanaugh's former law clerks, students, friends, and associates.

Our next panel includes the following 10 witnesses, 5 for the Majority and 5 for the Minority. We have Congressman Richmond, Mr. McCloud, Ms. Garza, Ms. Garry, Ms. Weintraub, Mr. Olson, Ms. Baker, Ms. Sinzduk, Professor Murray, and Professor Amar.

I would ask if you would stand. And I should have said this before you sat down, I am sorry.

[Witnesses are sworn in.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you for your affirmation.

Now, when the Congressman comes, this will be his introduction. Cedric Richmond is a U.S. Representative, Second District, Louisiana. Currently serves as Chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Luke McCloud served as law clerk for Judge Kavanaugh in 2013, 2014. He also served as law clerk for Paul V. Niemeyer, U.S. Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit; Justice Sotomayor, Supreme Court; and he is an associate at Williams & Connolly.

Rochelle Garza serves as managing attorney of Garza & Garza Law, located in Brownsville, Texas.

Louisa Garry is a teacher at Friends Academy, Locust Valley, New York. She has known Judge Kavanaugh for 35 years.

Liz Weintraub is an advocate specialist at the Association of University Centers on Disabilities, Silver Spring, Maryland. She previously served as a fellow in Senator Bob Casey's office.

Ted Olson is a partner of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. He served as Solicitor General of the United States, 2001–2004, and as Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel, 1981–1984. He has argued more than 60 cases before the Supreme Court.

Alicia Baker is a pastor of the Free Methodist Church in Indiana.

Colleen Roh Sinzduk is a senior associate, Hogan Lovells. She previously served as a law clerk for Chief Justice Roberts and Judge Garland on the D.C. Circuit. Ms. Sinzduk was a student of Judge Kavanaugh's at Harvard Law School.

Professor Melissa Murray, professor of law at New York University School of Law. She previously served as a law professor at University of California-Berkeley.

Professor Akhil Amar is the Sterling Professor of Law and Political Science at Yale University, where he teaches constitutional law in both Yale College and Yale Law School. After graduating from Yale Law School, the professor served as a law clerk to then-Judge Breyer on the U.S. Court of Appeals, First Circuit. The professor taught Judge Kavanaugh when he was a student at Yale Law School.

We will start with you, Mr. McCloud.

STATEMENT OF LUKE McCLOUD, FORMER LAW CLERK, AND ASSOCIATE, WILLIAMS & CONNOLLY LLP, WASHINGTON, DC

Mr. McCLOUD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Feinstein, Members of the Committee.

I am honored to speak with you today about my former boss and my current friend and mentor, Judge Kavanaugh.

I had the privilege of serving as one of Judge Kavanaugh's law clerks from 2013 to 2014. During that time, I worked closely with the Judge—day in, day out—helping him to prepare for arguments and draft opinions. I witnessed firsthand the Judge's approach to deciding cases large and small, and what I saw leaves no doubt that Judge Kavanaugh would make an outstanding Supreme Court Justice.

Judge Kavanaugh is a fair-minded and independent jurist. Regardless of the parties to the case or the issues being litigated, Judge Kavanaugh worked hard to understand every argument and perspective. There was always another opinion to read, another piece of the record to review, another angle to explore.

That was true even when a case turned on legal issues the Judge knew well. He never looked for an easy answer or assumed that he had considered all of the relevant points. Judge Kavanaugh pushed himself to master every aspect of the cases he worked on, and he expected his clerks to do the same.

To be sure, Judge Kavanaugh and I did not always see eye to eye on what the law required, but the Judge did not want clerks who reflexively agreed with him or who never offered a contrary opinion. Just the opposite, Judge Kavanaugh has made a point of surrounding himself with a diverse group of law clerks—diverse ideologically, diverse racially, and from diverse backgrounds—so that he can better understand all sides of a given issue.

I can vividly recall spending hours with my fellow clerks gathered around the Judge's desk, debating the meaning of some statutory phrase or the best way to understand a precedent. Invariably, the opinions that Judge Kavanaugh produced reflected his careful consideration of and respect for views other than his own.

Moreover, when we disagreed, I always knew that Judge Kavanaugh had come to his position honestly, based on a rigorous analysis of the strengths and weaknesses of the arguments before him. There was no hidden agenda or partisan axe to grind. Just the law, always the law.

These qualities have earned Judge Kavanaugh a sterling reputation for his work on the bench. But Judge Kavanaugh has also shown himself to be a leader when it comes to his work outside of chambers. I especially admire Judge Kavanaugh's efforts as an advocate for those who are underrepresented in the legal profession. He regularly speaks to diverse law student associations to encourage their members to apply for clerkships. The Judge also actively mentors the minority students he teaches, helping them become future leaders within the law.

Judge Kavanaugh's commitment to promoting the careers of minority attorneys is also apparent from his own clerk hiring. Of his 48 law clerks, 13 are racial minorities, including 5 African Americans. These percentages are nearly unheard of amongst his peers.

Many of the Judge's minority law clerks have gone on to clerk for the Supreme Court, something that is still all too uncommon in these days. I am fortunate to count myself among them, but I would not have even applied for that position had it not been for the support and encouragement of Judge Kavanaugh.

Again and again during the year I worked for him, Judge Kavanaugh showed himself to be a model of judicial excellence. But even more than his intelligence and his diligence, it is Judge Kavanaugh's character, his fundamental decency and kindness, that inspired me then and continues to inspire me now.

Despite being one of the most prominent judges of his generation, Judge Kavanaugh remains humble and gracious. He is unfailingly polite to everyone he interacts with at the courthouse, from his colleagues on the bench, to litigants, to the court's professional staff. Judge Kavanaugh also volunteers regularly in his community and encourages all he knows to do the same. He is, in short, a dedicated public servant, in the truest sense of those words.

I will always be proud, incredibly proud, of the time I spent as Judge Kavanaugh's law clerk, and I am prouder still today to support his confirmation to the Supreme Court.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Mr. McCloud appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Mr. McCloud.

Now, Ms. Garza.

STATEMENT OF ROCHELLE M. GARZA, MANAGING ATTORNEY, GARZA & GARZA LAW, BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS

Ms. GARZA. Good morning. Thank you for the opportunity to testify in this hearing on the nomination of Judge Brett Kavanaugh to the Supreme Court of the United States.

My name is Rochelle Garza. I am an attorney and managing member of Garza & Garza Law, PLLC, in Brownsville, Texas, along with my brother, and law partner, Myles R. Garza.

My practice is focused on working with children, immigrants, and victims of violence, including unaccompanied minor children, through the areas of immigration, family, and criminal law.

I am proud to have been the guardian ad litem for the young woman known as Jane Doe, an unaccompanied immigrant minor who the Trump administration attempted to block from accessing abortion, and I am here today to talk about what this experience was like for Jane and the impact that Judge Kavanaugh's ruling had on her life.

Jane was 17 when she left her home in Central America, where she was physically abused by her parents, and traveled thousands of miles to seek safety. In September 2017, she arrived in the United States after a long and dangerous journey. As she later said, “My journey was not easy, but I came here with hope in my heart to build a life I can be proud of.”

She was put into the custody of the Office of Refugee Resettlement and placed at a facility for immigrant children in the Rio Grande Valley. There, Jane learned she was pregnant. She immediately knew she did not wish to proceed with the pregnancy and expressed this to the facility staff, but as we were about to learn, Jane would face unprecedented obstruction by the Trump administration.

I will never forget meeting Jane for the first time. She was a petite, 17-year-old. But as I quickly learned, no one should underestimate her. Her resolve was strong, and she was very certain about her decision to terminate her pregnancy.

In Texas, minors seeking to terminate their pregnancies must obtain parental consent or a judicial bypass, which is an order from the court allowing the minor to consent to the procedure on her own. It was in that context that I was appointed Jane’s guardian ad litem.

A State court granted her bypass, and we scheduled her appointment and confirmed the medical costs would be covered by a private source. It was then that the Government stepped in and ordered the facility from going to her medical appointments.

The way that Jane was treated was unbearable. Even after she made her decision, she was forced to undergo biased counseling, including a medically unnecessary sonogram at an anti-abortion crisis pregnancy center. As Jane later said, “People I do not even know are trying to make me change my mind. I made my decision, and that is between me and God.”

Against Jane’s objections, they told her mother she was pregnant and wanted an abortion. And even though Jane disclosed that when her older sister became pregnant, her parents had beaten her until she miscarried. Jane was placed under constant surveillance and no longer allowed to leave on outings or exercise.

Despite all of this, Jane was strong. She was determined not to be forced to carry the pregnancy to term against her will. So we fought back on her behalf. We filed a lawsuit in Texas State court to require the facility to allow Jane to be transported. At the same time, the ACLU pursued a constitutional lawsuit in Federal court in DC on my behalf as Jane’s guardian ad litem.

Although the ACLU represents me, to be clear, I am testifying on my own behalf.

The ACLU obtained an emergency order from the district court to stop the Government from blocking Jane’s abortion, but the Government appealed. Judge Kavanaugh issued an order giving the Government 11 more days to find a sponsor for Jane, something they had already failed to do for the previous 6 weeks.

Furthermore, at the end of those 11 days, Judge Kavanaugh’s order would not have granted Jane—that Jane could finally get the care she needed. Rather, she would have to start her case all over again, and the Government could appeal. This could have taken weeks and might have forced her to carry the pregnancy to term against her will, particularly because Texas bans abortion at 20 weeks, and Jane was already 15 weeks pregnant.

The pain that this caused her is impossible to describe. Throughout her ordeal, I saw her suffer. No politician or judge saw firsthand what she went through. As she later said, "It has been incredibly difficult to wait in the shelter for news that the judges in Washington, DC, have given me permission to proceed with my decision."

Thankfully, the full Appeals Court overturned Judge Kavanaugh's decision, and I was with her when she had her abortion. I saw the relief that she experienced when she was able to realize the decision that she knew was right for her. But at that point, Jane had been forced to remain pregnant against her will for an entire month and by the time—from the time she obtained her judicial bypass.

I am and will always be in awe of Jane. She possessed a profound strength of character. She believed that no other girl should have to go through what she went through. And, as she said, "No one should be shamed for making the right decision for themselves."

I can think of nothing more human or more American than what I saw in Jane. Knowing that she is now pursuing the life she hoped for gives me great pride. She may have been petite, but she ignited change. And just like she said, "This is my life, my decision."

It was an honor to represent her and to be by her side and to witness true perseverance and to share her story with this Committee today.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Garza appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Ms. Garry.

STATEMENT OF LOUISA GARRY, TEACHER, FRIENDS ACADEMY, LOCUST VALLEY, NEW YORK

Ms. GARRY. Chairman Grassley and Ranking Member Feinstein, my name is Louisa Garry. I am a high school teacher and coach. So it is unusual for me to not be in the classroom with my students on the first Friday after Labor Day, but I am honored to be here to voice my support of my college classmate and longtime friend.

I met Brett Kavanaugh in 1983, almost exactly 35 years ago today. We were both incoming freshmen at Yale. Brett was standing under a tent with his parents, waiting to depart for the freshman outdoor orientation. I grew up in a small town in Ohio and was accustomed to saying hello to everyone. So I walked up and introduced myself. Brett warmly received my greeting and thus began a friendship that continues to this day.

Our enduring friendship might surprise some because in certain ways, we are quite different. I have been teaching and coaching high school students for the last 30 years while Brett pursued a high-profile career in law. Brett comes from a Catholic upbringing in a city and tends to have a conservative outlook while I would describe myself as a moderate Quaker who seeks out running trails and ocean beaches.

Our differences have allowed us to learn from each other and see things from a different perspective. We have maintained a close friendship based on our mutual respect, support, and trust.

One of the things Brett and I do have in common is an appreciation for competitive sports. We both have daughters, and we often talk about the benefits of youth sports in raising strong, independent girls and women with confident voices. Brett and I not only watch a lot of sports, we also run together.

We first started running together while Brett was in his first year of Yale Law School and I was working at Yale and training to compete in the 1988 U.S. Olympic trials for track. Brett was not much of a runner, but he could keep up with me on an easy warm-up.

After he ran his first three-mile race, Brett announced that he wanted to run the Boston Marathon in his third year of law school. He asked me to promise to train and to run it with him, and I agreed. Even though I was a competitive runner, I had never run anything close to a marathon in distance, but Brett's faith in my ability as a runner and coach gave me confidence to take on this challenge.

During the marathon, Brett waited for me through water stops and bathroom breaks, just as I waited for him through leg cramps and blisters. We ran together, step for step, for 26.2 miles and crossed the finish line at exactly the same time. We ran the Boston Marathon together again, step for step, two more times, in 2010 and most recently in 2015 in celebration of our 50th birthdays.

Four hours is a long time to spend with someone as you physically and mentally struggle through the miles, but I was lucky to go through it with Brett, whose humor, fortitude, and idealism elevates those around him.

Brett and I share an interest in the growth and development of young people. Many people have heard about Brett's basketball coaching expertise, but I believe even more students have benefited from taking a class with Brett at Harvard, Yale, or Georgetown. Brett is a bright, articulate, and engaging educator, and he is generous with the time and attention he devotes to mentoring others.

In November 2016, Brett welcomed juniors from my school to the Federal court for a field trip to learn about the judicial system. As we prepared for the visit, my students wanted to know, is Judge Kavanaugh conservative or liberal? I responded they should wait and determine the answer on their own.

Brett spent over an hour with my class, explaining his role as a judge, discussing current issues facing the Federal court of appeals, answering the students' questions, and listening to their voices. He spoke passionately about his belief in the judicial system and the importance of the separation of powers in Government. As we left the Federal court, a couple of students immediately remarked, "We could not tell. Is he conservative or liberal? Can you tell us?"

I responded, that is how it is supposed to be. The judiciary is supposed to be independent.

Brett has a wide circle of friends of diverse political viewpoints and often shows a willingness to step into potentially uncomfortable forums with a spirit of collegiality. At our 30th Yale College reunion, Brett joined a panel on free speech. The panel broadly represented the diverse perspectives of our classmates, and each of the panel members spoke respectfully about the challenges faced by universities in addressing issues of free speech.

When discussing how to balance a wide range of opinions, Brett quotes the character, Atticus Finch, from the book, “To Kill A Mockingbird,” and emphasizes how important it is to “stand in a person’s shoes.” Brett does not just speak words of empathy and tolerance, he listens and acts upon these words. His friends and colleagues describe him as a kind, thoughtful person and a good listener.

I leave it to others to speak to Brett’s judicial record. I am here to speak to his outstanding qualities, personal qualities as a life-long friend. Brett Kavanaugh will be a voice of fairness and integrity as a Justice of the Supreme Court.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Garry appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Ms. Garry.

Now, Ms. Weintraub.

STATEMENT OF ELIZABETH “LIZ” WEINTRAUB, ADVOCACY SPECIALIST, ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITY CENTERS ON DISABILITIES, SILVER SPRING, MARYLAND

Ms. WEINTRAUB. Thank you, Chairman Grassley and Ranking Member Feinstein and the Members of the Committee for believing that I have something important to say about Judge Kavanaugh.

Fifty-one years ago, I was born with cerebral palsy and an intellectual disability. I entered a world that had low expectations for me and people like me. Judge Kavanaugh has shown that he has the same low expectations, and I am here to tell you that he is wrong.

I have achieved more than many thought possible for someone like me. I work full time as a professional where I host “Tuesdays with Liz,” a weekly YouTube series where I talk to people about policy in a way that people with intellectual disabilities can understand. You are all invited to be my guest on “Tuesdays with Liz.”

Today, I live with my husband, who also happens to have a disability, and together, we make our own decisions. It has not always been this way. In my twenties, some professionals and my parents decided to put me into a private institution. My parents love me, but instead of treating me like an adult with opinions and preferences and asking what I wanted, they made the decision for me like I was a child.

This was wrong. In the self-advocacy movement, there is a saying that we hold very dear to our hearts, and that is, “Nothing about us without us.” This means that any decision that affects us should include us. We expect to be part of the conversation, even to lead the conversation. Self-determination is a basic human right for all people with disabilities. People with intellectual disabilities have opinions and preferences, and they should be recognized.

Judge Kavanaugh’s nomination matters to me. Reading the Doe v. DC case made me very upset that Judge Kavanaugh’s decision did not respect people’s rights and their freedom of choice. This is wrong. The lower court in Doe told the D.C. government that it needed to ask people with intellectual disabilities if they wanted certain medical treatments. That requirement respects the civil rights of people with disabilities.

Judge Kavanaugh had a chance to stand up for the rights of the woman in the case, but he failed. He said that the D.C. government did not even need to ask them what they wanted but could decide for them what was going to happen to their bodies. Would this have been too hard to ask? Ask them what they wanted. Every adult deserves to be treated like a grown-up and have the right to be asked what they wanted, especially when it is about their own body. If they need support to understand and make an informed choice, then give it to them.

Our country is founded on liberty and justice for all. And all means all. I worry about a Supreme Court Justice who does not believe that we, as people with intellectual disability, can make decisions for ourselves.

If Judge Kavanaugh is confirmed, I am afraid that my right to make decisions for myself will be taken away. I ask you, for myself and my community, when you vote on Judge Kavanaugh, please do not vote to turn the clock back and take the rights that I and others have fought for.

Thank you very much.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Weintraub appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Ms. Weintraub.

I assume that if you are like everybody in the House of Representatives, you are always busy, and you would like to go—that is why you were probably on first. So I think I will go to Congressman Richmond. Welcome.

I previously had introduced you as a Congressman and Chair of the Congressional Black Caucus.

STATEMENT OF HON. CEDRIC L. RICHMOND, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF LOUISIANA, AND CHAIRMAN OF THE CONGRESSIONAL BLACK CAUCUS, WASHINGTON, DC

Representative RICHMOND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and we did have pending votes. So I want to thank you for the courtesy and apologize for being late. And I want to thank the Ranking Member, Senator Feinstein, for being here.

Earlier this week, my Senator argued that—or stated that, “It’s not the U.S. Supreme Court that is supposed to fix this country culturally, economically, socially, spiritually. Courts should not try to fix problems that are within the province of the U.S. Congress, even if the U.S. Congress does not have the courage to address those problems. Our courts were not meant to decide these kinds of issues.”

That logic would mean that African Americans would not be able to attend integrated schools, buy a home previously owned by a White person, or lodge at certain hotels. In many cases, the high court has acted when Congress had neither the courage, nor the will to act.

For nearly eight decades, African Americans have fought to secure historic legal victories that have significantly bent the moral arc of the universe toward justice, even at times when progress felt incremental. Nonetheless, we know that reversing meaningful progress for decades to come would be profoundly devastating and an affront to all who courageously fought on the front lines, some of whom I currently represent as Chair of the Congressional Black Caucus.

President Trump has seized on this opportunity to pack the courts by selecting judicial nominees who lack pragmatism and are often strikingly unqualified and proven intolerant bigots. We are in the midst of a fundamental shift toward nominees that embrace ideology at the fringes of mainstream legal thought.

The current administration has nominated and, with help of Senate Republicans, has confirmed a range of nominees whose confirmation hearings portend a precarious legal fate for communities of color moving forward. Mr. Kavanaugh's confirmation would fortify a generation of destructive conservative ideology at a time when several historically significant legal challenges will come before the high court.

As Members of the CBC, we cannot overstate what is at stake for African Americans and communities of color across the Nation. Judge Kavanaugh, who relies heavily on the same textualist reading of the Constitution employed by former Justice Scalia, possesses a conservative judicial record that leads us to believe that voting rights, education, criminal law outcomes will be greatly endangered in the coming years. A careful, in-depth evaluation of his record, which has largely been shrouded in secrecy and withheld from public examination, uncovers writings that illustrate sparse commitment to equal protection under the law.

Additionally, Judge Kavanaugh's lack of deference to precedent is staggering and inconsistent with other conservative judges who currently preside on the D.C. Circuit Court with him. A judge who frequently questions key legal precedents represents a grave danger to many legal frameworks that have advanced the African-American community.

Voting rights. From Ohio to Wisconsin to Georgia, the vestiges of Jim Crow have resurfaced under a new cloak unchecked and unabated. While these States are no longer conducting literacy tests, the effects of their new policies have been implemented with staggering precision and efficiency.

By a 5-to-4 vote more than 5 years ago, the Court struck down Section 4 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, making Section 5 of the law essentially unworkable. The decision has precipitated a myriad of voter suppression efforts across the country.

Most recently, the Randolph County Board of Elections and Registration in Georgia inexplicably considered a proposal calling for the closure of more than three quarters of the polling locations in the 60 percent Black county, including one location that is 97 percent African-American.

Despite the eventual rejection of this ill-fated proposal, the Federal Government never bothered to intervene and fulfill its statutorily obligated responsibilities. Simply put, there is no longer any active Federal mechanism dedicated to oversight and safeguarding an individual's constitutionally protected right to vote.

As I told you in January 2017, Jeff Sessions' record on civil rights is questionable and one that shows that he does not care about enforcing civil rights. It is within this context that we have grave concerns about Judge Kavanaugh's opinion in the 2012 case of State of South Carolina v. Holder.

In 2011, under the fully viable Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Obama administration blocked enforcement of South Carolina's State-issued photo ID law because it affected up to 8 percent of Black South Carolinians. In his ruling to uphold the law, Mr. Kavanaugh claimed it "does not have the effects that some expected and some feared."

Not only is this statement inexplicably tone deaf, it is also inconsistent with reality. These same real-life consequences reverberate to other elements of everyday life for Black families. On criminal justice, Judge Kavanaugh's record on criminal justice is entirely unsatisfactory for a country persistently struggling to hold law enforcement accountable for mass incarceration and police brutality. He has expressed a desire to overturn precedent that protects civilians from officers engaging in activities inconsistent with the Fourth Amendment. He suggested the probable cause standard should be more flexible, which would expose more African Americans to failed policies, police tactics like stop-and-frisk.

Additionally, Judge Kavanaugh's support for narrowing individuals' Miranda rights would hurt people of color, who are disproportionately subject to excessive law enforcement engagement in their respective communities.

And last, affirmative action. Mr. Kavanaugh's record on affirmative action is particularly disturbing and ripe for intense scrutiny. Almost 20 years ago, while in private practice he wrote that in the future, the Supreme Court would agree that "in the eyes of Government, we are just one race."

Given the Department of Justice's recent investigation into Harvard University's admissions practices, we are deeply troubled by the increased likelihood this will come before the Supreme Court in short order.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I will submit the rest of my testimony for the record, but I would just conclude by saying that with the cloud of criminality and lack of transparency, the Congressional Black Caucus—which is 48 Members—we represent 78 million Americans. And I just wanted to say for the record, of those 78 million, only 17 million are African-American.

We represent a vast variety of people. And we represent a collective conscience of this country—Black, White—in the spirit of Goodman, Chaney, and Schwerner, who gave their life to make this country a more perfect union, and to fight for civil rights, and to fight for justice. And it is within that spirit that we have grave concerns and oppose the nomination of Justice Kavanaugh.

And thank you for your time, and I know I went over.

[The prepared statement of Representative Richmond appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you very much, Congressman.

Now, we go to Mr. Olson.

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

STATEMENT OF HON. THEODORE B. OLSON, PARTNER, GIBSON, DUNN & CRUTCHER, AND FORMER SOLICITOR
GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, WASHINGTON, DC

Mr. OLSON. Thank you, Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, and Members of the Committee.

I have had the privilege of practicing law throughout the United States for over 50 years in State and Federal appellate courts and 63 times before the United States Supreme Court. I have argued to 20 different Supreme Court Justices appointed by 11 Presidents, from President Eisenhower to President Trump, one-fifth of our Nation's Justices appointed by one-fourth of our Presidents.

My experience has given me firsthand exposure to the Justices numerous Presidents have selected for the Supreme Court, the qualities that these Justices have exemplified, and the standards they have established for themselves and for their successors. Each of these Justices has manifested the highest professional and jurisprudential standards, the qualities we expect in Justices appointed by Presidents of any political party.

I have won and lost my share of decisions from Justices appointed by Presidents of every political background. I can say that in every case, my clients and arguments were received with respect, understanding, and great care. Americans are rightly proud of the Supreme Court and its Justices, the envy of the world.

I will elaborate on five of the characteristics that I have seen in Supreme Court Justices. First, intelligence and learning. A Justice on the Supreme Court must understand the Constitution, the separation of powers, the Bill of Rights, the role of each of the three branches of Government, and Federal laws ranging from antitrust and patents to criminal procedure and the environmental. And I could go on and on.

The Court decides 75 cases each year involving an awesome range of complex subjects, demanding from each Justice an extraordinary breadth of understanding, experience, erudition, judgment, and insight.

Second, respect for precedent and judicial tradition. The Justices before whom I have appeared have uniformly manifested abiding respect for the role of the judiciary and past decisions of the Court. Not every precedent is inviolate, of course. As Justice Breyer has explained in his book, "Making Democracy Work," the Court has occasionally been mistaken or wrong, but its errors have generally been corrected over time.

The Justices are mindful of the importance of stare decisis and the public's reliance on past decisions, but within the context of an overarching fealty to the meaning and intent of the Constitution and the rule of law.

Third, open-mindedness and independence. Justices, of course, have their individual histories, predilections, and past writings. But each Justice must examine every case on the merits, carefully review precedents, briefs and oral argument, and the views of their colleagues, and only then come to a decision. Any other approach—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Mr. OLSON. Any other approach would, as Justice Ginsburg has explained, “display disdain for the entire judicial process.”

Fourth, integrity. The Justices of our Supreme Court, like our judiciary in general, reflect rock-solid integrity. We may strongly disagree with the Court’s decisions from time to time, but no credible critic would suggest that the Court’s decisions are corrupt or dishonest. Our citizens respect and obey even very unpopular decisions because they believe in the integrity of the judicial process and the honesty of our Justices.

Fifth, temperament. An open mind and respectful temperament and collegiality are vital to the Supreme Court. And the Justices before whom I have appeared uniformly listened to and probed, often intensely, the arguments presented to them. But however strongly they have disagreed in a particular case, they have remained respectful, warm, and gracious to their colleagues and to the advocates who appeared before them.

I have known Judge Kavanaugh for two decades. I know from personal observations and experience that he possesses and has consistently exemplified the qualities that I have described. He received an outstanding education in one of the Nation’s finest law schools, clerked for extraordinary jurists, including the Justice he is being nominated to replace, taught constitutional law at Harvard Law School, served in the executive branch and in private practice, and for 12 years at the highest level of the Federal appellate judiciary. He is thoughtful, gracious, open-minded, respected by his peers, and widely praised by the lawyers who appear before him.

Our system contemplates that Justices will be appointed by Presidents of either party. As lawyers who appear before the Court and as Americans who must live with the Court’s decisions, we cannot expect that our cases will be decided by jurists who always agree with our positions.

But we can aspire to a judiciary that will be prepared, perceptive, competent, open-minded, honest, and respectful. That is the jurist that is Brett Kavanaugh. He is the kind of person and judge that we expect and deserve on the Supreme Court. I hope you will confirm his appointment to this Court.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Olson appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Mr. Olson.
Now, Ms. Baker.

STATEMENT OF ALICIA WILSON BAKER, INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA

Ms. BAKER. Good morning, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee.

My name is Alicia Wilson Baker. I am a pro-life Christian and ordained minister from Indiana. I am someone who was denied the birth control I needed because of my insurance company’s religious beliefs, and I am honored to be here today, truly honored to speak on behalf of everyday women.

If Judge Kavanaugh is confirmed to the Supreme Court, I fear that many woman, especially those who can least afford it, will not get access to affordable birth control because of their employer’s religious beliefs. Birth control allows women and people to control their lives, and without it, women's health and their futures are at risk.

I would like to tell you about my background. I grew up in a devout Christian family in California. My parents were leaders in our church congregation. My childhood is filled with happy memories of attending church, learning how to put faith into action through mission trips and serving our community.

I decided to go to seminary and become an ordained minister so that I can serve others. I currently work at a local neighborhood center in urban Indianapolis, where I collaborate with local agencies and neighbors to improve the quality of life in our neighborhood.

In 2015, I met and fell in love with my best friend, Josh, who is here with me today. Like me, Josh is also a Christian who believes that faith a verb. It is about how we live our lives. And like me, Josh had decided to wait until marriage to have sex.

Once we got engaged, we knew we would not be ready to have children right away. So we started researching birth control options. Josh and I were on a tight budget as we struggled to pay off our students loans and save for a home. We were relieved that the Affordable Care Act requires health plans to cover birth control at no additional cost to us.

On my doctor's advice, I decided to get an IUD, but what I got was a nightmare and a $1,200 bill. It turned out my insurance company had a religious objection to covering my birth control. Nothing in our faith disapproves of birth control. We were making prudent and responsible decisions for our family, but our beliefs and our decisions were overridden by the religious beliefs of an insurance company.

In the days leading up to our wedding and for several months after, I was fighting with my insurance company, sending appeal after appeal. In the end, Josh and I scrounged together the money. But we had to use the money we had set aside to pay off our student loans and buy our first home together. I still feel a pit in my stomach when I remember the stress and anxiety that we went through just as we were starting our new life together.

But I know I am fortunate. I was ultimately able to pay that bill. But what happens to those who cannot pay for their birth control? What happens to those who face an impossible choice between getting the healthcare they need and putting food on the table or paying for childcare or staying in school?

If Judge Kavanaugh is confirmed to the Supreme Court, access to affordable birth control will be in jeopardy. Just 3 years ago, Judge Kavanaugh heard a case which was about something to what Josh and I had experienced. In that case, Judge Kavanaugh would have allowed employers and universities to use religion to deny birth control coverage to individuals.

If Judge Kavanaugh had his way, courts would give free rein to those who claim their religious beliefs override the law. As a Christian, I am against such broad interpretations of religious freedom. It is not right that employers may be allowed to use religion to avoid following the laws of the land.

I fear that some will use this reasoning not to protect religion, but as a way to discriminate. I shudder to imagine what this means for real people, for the communities I work with every day.

At this critical moment, when so much is on the line for women and their families, my faith guides me. Proverbs 31:8–9 says, “Speak out for those who cannot speak, for the rights of all the destitute. Speak out, judge righteously, defend the rights of the poor and needy.”

As a person of deep faith, I would never impose my religious beliefs on anyone, and no one else should either. My religious beliefs are separate from the law, and that is how it should be. But Judge Kavanaugh’s record shows he does not respect this critical separation.

This Committee and the Senate must weigh the harmful impact that Judge Kavanaugh would have on the health and well-being of so many people. I urge this Committee to block his nomination to the Supreme Court.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Baker appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Ms. Baker.

Now, Ms. Sinzduk.

STATEMENT OF COLLEEN E. ROH SINZDUK, FORMER HARVARD LAW SCHOOL STUDENT, AND SENIOR ASSOCIATE, HOGAN LOVELLS LLP, WASHINGTON, DC

Ms. SINZDUK. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Feinstein, and Members of the Committee, thank you for the opportunity to address the Committee about my former Harvard Law School professor, Judge Kavanaugh.

I took Judge Kavanaugh’s Separation of Powers class in the winter term of 2009. In the years since, he has served as a trusted mentor to me. My experience as Judge Kavanaugh’s student and mentee has led me to offer my firm support of his nomination to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In some ways, my support for Judge Kavanaugh is unsurprising. A recent New York Times article catalogued the exceptionally strong reviews that Judge Kavanaugh’s students have given to his teaching. Over the years, students’ anonymous feedback forms have consistently lauded the Judge as an outstanding professor, one who strives to present a balanced view of the material in class and who makes himself uniquely accessible to students outside of the classroom. I wholeheartedly agree with that praise.

Multiple articles have also detailed Judge Kavanaugh’s role as a mentor and sponsor for young lawyers, many of them females and minorities. You have heard about Judge Kavanaugh’s impressive record of hiring women and diverse law clerks, but Judge Kavanaugh’s efforts as a mentor are not limited to his clerks. He also works to maintain connections with countless law students and young lawyers across the country.

Judge Kavanaugh is an invaluable resource and advocate for those starting out in the profession and a champion of diversity in the legal world. Ever since I took his class, he has been a mentor and a sponsor, offering friendly advice, helpful support, and a listening ear as I have navigated the stages of my legal career.

When I was considering applying for a Supreme Court clerkship, Judge Kavanaugh generously offered his advice and support, helping me to obtain a clerkship with Chief Justice Roberts. And when I went back to work after having my first child, a lunch with Judge Kavanaugh helped bolster my enthusiasm for my legal career.

In other ways, however, my support for Judge Kavanaugh may strike some as surprising. I am a registered Democrat, and from 2010 to 2011, I had the great honor of serving as a law clerk for then-Judge, now Chief Judge Merrick Garland on the D.C. Circuit. In that role, I experienced firsthand what a brilliant, fair, and kind jurist he is. I believe the judiciary, and the country as a whole, has suffered greatly from the failure to confirm Chief Judge Garland to the Supreme Court.

I nonetheless support Judge Kavanaugh's confirmation. In my view, preserving and protecting the integrity of the judiciary means supporting and confirming highly qualified judicial nominees, regardless of whether one agrees with the politics of the party that nominated them.

In my experience, Judge Kavanaugh has the traits that make him eminently qualified to serve as a Justice on the United States Supreme Court. His impressive intellect is obvious. But the Judge is also open-minded, he is principled, and he is evenhanded. I would like to speak a little more about each of those qualities.

First, in my interactions with Judge Kavanaugh, he has always demonstrated open-mindedness and intellectual integrity. When I think back on the Judge's Separation of Powers class, it is not his lectures I remember. It is his insightful questions and the classroom debates they sparked.

The course touched on some of the most important issues in our constitutional democracy, but rather than telling us what to think about them, the Judge asked questions that enabled us to develop our own views and share them with the class. More than that, he seemed genuinely interested in hearing our varying perspectives.

One of my favorite law school memories is engaging in a fierce debate with a Separation of Powers classmate over whether INS v. Chadha was correctly decided. Judge Kavanaugh seemed delighted to hear both sides, and he encouraged us to develop our conflicting views. With Judge Kavanaugh, I was confident that if I could make the right argument, he would accept my position.

My belief in Judge Kavanaugh's open-mindedness has deepened over the years through my one-on-one conversations with him. I often cannot resist sharing my views on separation of powers issues, and he is invariably an engaged listener and an insightful questioner, despite the fact that we come from different sides of the political aisle.

Second, in my experience, Judge Kavanaugh is highly principled. By that, I mean something very specific. He carefully delineates the difference between policy preferences and what the law demands.

In the Separation of Powers class, we often discussed current events and the way they implicated various constitutional concerns. Policy considerations inevitably came up, and we certainly discussed those, but the Judge would repeatedly remind us that those policy concerns are beside the point if the Constitution dictates a different outcome. More generally, the Judge taught us that the way to discern the legal principles that undergird our democratic system is to look to the text, history, and precedents regarding the Constitution, not our policy preferences.

Third, Judge Kavanaugh is evenhanded and treats people fairly and with respect. In class, he gave the same consideration to the views of all students. I consistently felt he was judging our answers based on our ability to reason clearly and support our points, not based on any political or ideological standard.

Judge Kavanaugh's evenhandedness goes beyond respect for varying ideologies. In my experience, he treats everyone equitably regardless of their gender, race, or background. One would think, or at least hope that, in 2018, that should not be remarkable. But as a woman, I know that explicit and implicit bias continue to plague the legal profession, just as they plague the rest of society.

Far too often in my career, I have felt that I was being treated as a female lawyer, rather than just as a lawyer. But with Judge Kavanaugh, I have never felt that way. In my interactions with him, I know that I am being judged on the merits of what I say, nothing less and nothing more.

I believe that a person with such sterling credentials and experience as a judge who so clearly values integrity, principle, and fairness is eminently qualified to serve on the Supreme Court. I, therefore, enthusiastically support Judge Kavanaugh's nomination.

Thank you for your time.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Sinzdak appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you very much.
Now, Professor Murray.

STATEMENT OF MELISSA MURRAY, PROFESSOR OF LAW, NEW YORK UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW, NEW YORK, NEW YORK

Professor MURRAY. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, thank you so much for the opportunity to appear at these hearings on the confirmation of Judge Brett Kavanaugh to the United States Supreme Court.

My name is Melissa Murray, and I am a professor of law at New York University School of Law, where I teach constitutional law, family law, and reproductive rights and justice, and serve as a faculty co-director of the Birnbaum Women's Leadership Network.

Prior to my appointment at New York University, I was the Alexander F. and May T. Morrison Professor of Law at the University of California, Berkeley, where I taught for 12 years, served as faculty director of the Berkeley Center on Reproductive Rights and Justice, and served as interim dean of the law school. Like Judge Kavanaugh, I, too, am a graduate of Yale Law School.

Over the course of these hearings, much has been made of Judge Kavanaugh's warmth and kindness toward his clerks and those in his community. These accounts resonate with me, as Judge Kavanaugh and I have traveled in similar professional circles over the years. In fact, I, too, have had lunch with him, and I can attest to his friendliness and charming demeanor.

But this nomination is not about whom I would befriend or with whom I would have lunch. It is not about how Brett Kavanaugh treats a handful of women from elite institutions. It is about real people on the ground, people like the women to my right and the people they represent who will not have lunch with Judge Kavanaugh, who will not meet with Judge Kavanaugh, but who will nonetheless depend on Judge Kavanaugh to protect their constitutional rights to make decisions about their lives.

As you have heard from women like Alicia Baker and Liz Weintraub, confirming Judge Kavanaugh to the Supreme Court would threaten people's ability to make fundamental personal decisions, including deciding whether to have an abortion.

Reproductive rights are under serious threat in this country. What we have seen over the last two decades is a concerted strategy that would dismantle Roe v. Wade piecemeal, not in one fell swoop, but rather through a death by 1,000 cuts. This nomination is the culmination of that decades-long effort to destroy Roe v. Wade incrementally without necessarily formally overruling it.

The Supreme Court stands as a bulwark against this assault on reproductive freedom. Just 2 years ago in Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt, Justice Kennedy joined a majority to reaffirm the undue burden standard first articulated in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, thereby reaffirming the Court's commitment to protecting reproductive rights.

But Judge Kavanaugh's nomination to replace Justice Kennedy imperils the Court's ability to continue to hold the line on reproductive freedom. In Garza v. Hargan, the only abortion case to come before him, Judge Kavanaugh voted to block a young immigrant woman from receiving abortion care and insisted that she remain pregnant against her wishes weeks after she had made her decision and after she had completed all of the State-imposed requirements.

Although he claimed to follow Supreme Court precedent in Garza, Judge Kavanaugh's opinion evinced a crabbed and skeptical view of these precedents, a view that is completely out of the step with the high court's own view of those cases.

Despite his claims during these confirmation hearings that he was respecting Supreme Court precedent on minors and abortion, in fact his dissent shows the opposite. He ignored the Supreme Court's holding in 1979's Bellotti v. Baird that allows minors to complete a confidential judicial bypass in lieu of parental or guardian consent.

Jane Doe had already met the Texas requirement of a judicial bypass by the time her case before Judge Kavanaugh. So further delay to seek a sponsor was wholly unwarranted.

Further, Judge Kavanaugh did not explain how the Government's flat prohibition wholly preventing Jane Doe from accessing abortion failed to constitute an undue burden under Casey or a previability ban under Roe. Nor did he weigh the potential harms to Jane Doe stemming from a further delay against the purported benefits of that delay, as is required by Whole Woman's Health.

Judge Kavanaugh's record in Garza suggests that rather than respecting precedent, he will undermine or ignore it. And in so doing, he will provide the necessary fifth vote that would utterly eviscerate the right to abortion.

During these hearings, when asked by you, Senator Feinstein, whether he agreed with the statement that a woman's right to control her reproductive life impacts her ability to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation, Judge Kavanaugh's reply was not, "I agree." Instead, he said, "I understand the importance of the precedent set forth in Roe v. Wade."

We have seen this before. In 2005, then-Judge Roberts came before this Committee and stated that Roe is the settled law of the land during his own confirmation process. Despite this earnest declaration, as a Justice, he voted to uphold a statutory scheme that would have shuttered 75 percent of the clinics in Texas.

If this is what it looks like to respect precedent and treat Roe as settled law, then these are empty promises. Since 2011, politicians have passed over 400 new laws in 33 States across the Nation that shame, pressure, and punish women who decide to have an abortion. Some of these laws would ban abortion as early as 6 weeks, before a woman may even know that she is pregnant. Others would require doctors to convey a falsehood to patients, telling them that abortion leads to breast cancer.

The point of these restrictions is to make it difficult, costly, and in some cases impossible for women to obtain an abortion. And as such, these restrictions impede women's ability to participate equally in the social and economic life of the Nation. And these restrictions are especially detrimental to young women, women struggling to make ends meet, women of color, immigrant women, rural women, and women who have already had children.

In practice, these restrictions mean that Roe is merely a hollow promise and not a reality for many women. To be clear, Roe v. Wade is not a decision invented by activist judges. It is part of a century's worth of jurisprudence that protects an entire constellation of rights, rights relating to family, marriage, parenthood, contraception, and personal autonomy in intimate life.

A vote against Roe, whether to overrule as a formal matter or gut it through incremental cuts, puts all of those rights in jeopardy. And make no mistake about it, a vote for Judge Kavanaugh is a vote against Roe.

Thank you for having me.

[The prepared statement of Professor Murray appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Professor Murray.

Now, Professor Amar.

STATEMENT OF AKHIL REED AMAR, STERLING PROFESSOR OF LAW AND POLITICAL SCIENCE, YALE LAW SCHOOL, NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT

Professor AMAR. Thank you, Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, distinguished Senators.

My name is Akhil Amar. I am the Sterling Professor of Law and Political Science at Yale University, where I specialize in constitutional law. I have previously testified before this Committee on seven occasions, and it is always a solemn responsibility to appear here.

Here are my top ten points.

Point 1. Brett Kavanaugh is the best candidate on the horizon.

The Supreme Court's biggest job is to interpret and apply the Constitution. Kavanaugh has studied the Constitution with more care, consistency, range, scholarliness, and thoughtfulness than any other sitting Republican Federal judge under age 60.

He is the best choice from the long list of 25 potential nominees publicly circulated by President Trump. I say this as a constitutional scholar who voted for Hillary Clinton and strongly supported every Supreme Court nomination by Democratic Presidents in my adult lifetime.

Point 2. Originalism is wise and nonpartisan.

Studying the Constitution requires diligence and intelligence, especially for those, like Kavanaugh, who are "originalists," paying special heed to what the Constitution's words originally meant when adopted. I, too, am an originalist. In prioritizing the Constitution's text, history, and structure to discern its principles and distill its wisdom, we originalists are following in the footsteps of George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, John Marshall, Joseph Story, and Abraham Lincoln, among others.

Originalism is neither partisan nor outlandish. The most important originalist of the last century was a towering liberal Democratic Senator-turned-Justice, Hugo Black, the driving intellectual force of the Warren Court, who insisted on taking seriously the Constitution's words and spirit guaranteeing free speech, racial equality, religious equality, the right to vote, the right to counsel, and much more.

Among today's scholars, the originalist cited most often by the Supreme Court is also a self-described liberal and a registered Democrat, yours truly. The best originalists heed not just the Founders' vision, but also the vision underlying its amendments, especially the transformative reconstruction amendments and women's suffrage amendment.

I believe that Justice Kavanaugh will be in this tradition. On various vital issues—voting rights, governmental immunities, congressional power to enforce the reconstruction amendments—Justice Kavanaugh's constitutional views may well be better for liberals than were Justice Kennedy's.

Point 3. Kavanaugh's writings reflect proper respect for tradition and precedent.

Originalists start with the Constitution's text and structure, but almost always need to consult other constitutional sources, such as tradition and precedent. Harmonizing these different constitutional sources requires great legal acumen. Kavanaugh's record shows that he is adept at harmonization.

Point 4. Kavanaugh's views on Executive power have strong constitutional foundations.

Many of Kavanaugh's views about the executive branch are quite standard. On several other executive branch topics, Kavanaugh's views are not yet conventional wisdom but are nevertheless sound and, indeed, align well with the testimony I offered this Committee in 1998 and 2017.

Point 5. The best basis for assessing would-be Justice Kavanaugh is the track record of Judge Kavanaugh.

The judicial track record is more proximate and relevant than Kavanaugh's pre-judicial life.

Point 6. Kavanaugh would work well with his new colleagues.

I predict that Kavanaugh, a studious and open-minded conservative who likes listening to and engaging with moderates and liberals, will be a pro-intellectual and anti-polarizing force on the Court.

Point 7. Judicial nominees should not make substantive promises about how they would rule on specific legal issues, nor should they make recusal promises that closely approximate substantive promises.

Point 8. Senators may properly oppose a judicial nominee simply because they disagree with a nominee's general constitutional philosophy or likely constitutional votes on the bench.

Point 9. The current Senate confirmation process is badly flawed and should be changed for future vacancies.

Point 10. Back to Point 1. Responsible naysayers must become yeasayers of a sort. They must specifically name better nominees realistically on the horizon. If not Brett, who?

Distinguished Republicans, Kavanaugh is your team's brightest judicial star. Rejoice.

Distinguished Democrats, do not be mad. Be smart. Be careful what you wish for. Our party controls neither the White House nor the Senate. If you torpedo Kavanaugh, you will likely end up with someone worse, someone less brilliant, less constitutionally knowledgeable, less studious, less open-minded, less good for America.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Professor Amar appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you all very much.

Before I ask my questions and take 5 minutes to do that, Senator Tillis is going to Chair this Committee after I get done asking questions for this panel, I should say. I will be back, but because I will be gone when you separate, I want to thank all of you for your participation in this process.

And then I think after this panel, it is scheduled that we would have a lunch break.

I am going to start with Mr. McCloud because it seems to me you clerked for different people of different views on interpreting the law and the Constitution—Judge Sotomayor, I believe, and then also Judge Kavanaugh. So I will let you define yourself what the most important characteristics of a Supreme Court Justice is and if you see Judge Kavanaugh meeting these.

Mr. McCLOUD. Well, I think the most important characteristics are, first of all, intelligence and faithfulness to the law. I think Judge Kavanaugh, as his reputation shows from his years on the D.C. Circuit, has those characteristics in spades.

I think something that is maybe underappreciated in terms of the work the Supreme Court does is, how closely the Justices work together, and I share Professor Amar's view that Judge Kavanaugh would work well as a colleague on the Supreme Court. He has talked during these hearings about the idea of a Team of Nine, working together with his colleagues on the Court, to achieve a goal of justice and interpreting the law fairly, and I think that he would live that model if he were appointed to the Supreme Court.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes, thank you.

I am going to ask Ms. Garry this, but it is based upon a very strong point that Professor Murray made that we hear a lot about what Professor—or I mean Kavanaugh has done for people that have worked close with him. She fears that he may not take the average American's point of view into mind in his work as a judge.

So what would you want the average American to know about Judge Kavanaugh as a person and how he might see their problems, not the people he has associated with all of his life?

Push the button, will you?

Ms. GARRY. In my experience, Judge Kavanaugh listens and hears everyone he speaks with. I do think he considers people from a variety of backgrounds. I do not think he has lived only in one sphere. I think he has exposed himself to a wide range of people, and I think that he would listen empathetically and hear their voices.

Chairman GRASSLEY. And probably a point he has made and how he serves at—for low-income people at congregate meal programs as an example would be one way I would see from what he has said.

Ted Olson, you are famous in the legal community in this town and around the country as well. So you ought to interact with a lot of people that, in turn, have interacted with Judge Kavanaugh. What do other members of the legal profession say about the experiences that they have had with Judge Kavanaugh?

Mr. OLSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. That is a very good question.

The fact is that throughout his legal career, I have heard nothing but the highest praise for Judge Kavanaugh as a human being, as a lawyer, and as a judge. As far as I can tell and as far as I have heard, he is uniformly respected by his peers on the D.C. Circuit with whom he has worked in many cases for 12 years or more, including also the most recent appointees to the Court.

Every lawyer that I have spoken to who has appeared before Judge Kavanaugh has respected the experience and has related to me the fact that he has listened, he pays attention. It is impossible to tell exactly how he is going to decide until you read the decisions that he makes.

So, in summary, the answer to your question is I do not know of a lawyer or a judge who is more uniformly respected in terms of his personality, his character, his integrity, his fairness, and his competence.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Ms. Sinzdek, you obviously remember him as a good teacher. What are those qualities, if you can transfer them to being a good judge and eventually a Supreme Court Justice, what would you say about what you learned of him in class versus his being a judge?

Ms. SINZDAK. I think the qualities are directly transferrable. I think he was a great professor because he not only listened and engaged more than he talked, but he knew how to get people explaining their arguments in the best possible way.

And I think that as a judge, too, he needs to listen to everyone before him. He needs to be able to engage with different viewpoints. And then also he needs to be able to treat those viewpoints equally.

And in our class, I think that he was open-minded and wanted to listen to all, to people of all ideologies equally, wanted to hear the different sides of a discussion. And similarly, I think that as a Justice, he will listen to both sides of an argument. He will consider those.

And then, third, he knows what is important in the law. He was not just a teacher. He was a law professor. And what he told us was that what matters in the law is what the law says, not what your policy preferences dictate. And I think that in many ways, that is the most important quality for a Justice, and I think that he exhibited that.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Feinstein.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you very much.

I want to just pick up on the last sentence that you said. The issue of qualities really should not matter. It should be the fairness, the likeability, the qualifications only. And that might be fine if some of the critical things that many of us—and I am going to speak for myself as a woman who has been a mayor. I represent 41 million people.

And Ms. Baker, America is like you out there today in the young woman. I see it over and over and over again.

And Ms. Weintraub, I am so proud of you. Stand tall. Be strong. You are quite wonderful to be here today.

Professor Murray, I think you were very cogent. I thank you for your remarks. I have never, in all my years here, been with a panel the majority of whom are women, and each one of you brought a different point of view, and it is very, very welcome.

For me, Ms. Garza, I wanted to ask you a couple of questions, if I could, because the Jane Doe case is really a problem for me because what it showed was, there were so many things in her treatment I did not like. The way she was treated by the Office of Refugee Resettlement. She was subjected to unnecessary sonograms, you know, forced to go to a crisis center, subjected to harassment, as I understand it, had been physically abused by her parents, and went to a Texas Judge and received an order of approval.

I do not have that order of approval. What did that order of approval say?

Ms. GARZA. Well, in Texas, you have to get a judicial bypass to bypass the consent from your parents and to consent to your own abortion care. And that order is typically based on a best interest assessment, whether or not it is in Jane's best interest to go ahead and proceed with making that decision on her own or whether or not she is sufficiently mature enough.

So in this case, she was—it was in her best interest to go ahead and proceed with that. A Texas Court decided that, and that is how the case moved forward.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Now the panel that the nominee in question was on, were questions asked? Were you there?

Ms. GARZA. No—no, I was—

Senator FEINSTEIN. It was in appellate court. I understand that.

Ms. GARZA. No, I was not there. However, I did listen to it. The question was not in—the order was not in question. A Texas court made that decision. Jane went through every single hoop she needed to go through in Texas, including complying with the Texas law of the 2 days, and she was just being blocked. She was not being allowed to be—to go to her medical appointment, and she was not allowed to be released to her ad litem, to myself as her guardian ad litem or her attorney ad litem, that were appointed by State courts.

Senator FEINSTEIN. And why was that?

Ms. GARZA. Just to obstruct her ability to enact her decision. It was a policy enacted under ORR, and they directed the facility not to allow her to be released.

Senator FEINSTEIN. So, Professor Murray, I think the arguments have been made here, and my great query is, women have never historically been treated equal, and finally, you know, we got the vote. It began to change. We were able to go to higher education. The United States began to accept women, and now the world seems to be changing in favor of women.

What I am most worried about this is, that Roe goes down, and for what this meant in my generations, which were the 1950s and 1960s, when the death toll was estimated to be between 200,000 and 1.2 million of women that went to illegal abortionists and died. I do not want to see us go back to that day. And so that is inherent in this vote.

Weapons in this country are inherent in this vote, and if you look at where America is going, also the quality of the individual who is going to sit in that deciding seat I think overwhelms most else. Your analysis, and you spoke very cogently, how would you analyze this judge affecting those issues?

Professor MURRAY. Thank you, Senator.

It is clear to me reading Judge Kavanaugh's opinions on these reproductive rights cases, that he says he is following Supreme Court precedent, but that is not the case. In the Garza case, which is the only abortion case to come before him, Judge Kavanaugh said he was following the Federal precedent. Yet he did not even engage the question in Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt, which would have required him to weigh the benefits of a delay against the burdens it would have imposed against Jane Doe.

That is required by the Supreme Court under its most recent decision in Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt. He did not engage that at all.

In requiring that Jane Doe take an additional 11 days for the Government to seek a sponsor, his decision defied Bellotti v. Baird, a 1979 case where the Supreme Court held that a State cannot require a minor to obtain parental consent or even to notify a parent unless it provides an alternative judicial bypass option for determining whether an abortion is in the best interest of that minor.

And as Ms. Garza has said, Jane Doe went through that State-required procedure to have a judicial bypass. She obtained that bypass. A Texas State judge determined that an abortion was in her best interest. The Government then still prevented her from obtaining the abortion care she needed, and Judge Kavanaugh's decision, which would have required the Government to continue looking unsuccessfully for a sponsor for an additional 11 days, would have further delayed her care, making it almost 6 weeks from the time she decided to have an abortion until when she could actually receive it.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator TILLIS [presiding]. Senator Cruz.

Senator CRUZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you to each of the witnesses who are here.

Professor Amar, let us start with you. You are widely acknowledged to be one of the most respected constitutional law professors in the country. In your opinion, is Judge Kavanaugh qualified to serve as a Supreme Court Justice?

Professor AMAR. Unquestionably.

Senator CRUZ. How would you compare his level of qualifications to other Supreme Court nominees, without specifically disparaging any other nominee?

Professor AMAR. I have great respect for all the Justices, but I would actually say, without naming names, that, you know, I might rank him—I might predict that end of—well, were he to be confirmed by this body, at the end of his service, he would rank well above the average. In the—I would say in the top tier of modern Justices, and the modern Justices are quite impressive.

Senator CRUZ. Ms. Sinzdek, you were a student of Judge Kavanaugh's?

Ms. SINZDAK. That is correct.

Senator CRUZ. What was he like as a professor?

Ms. SINZDAK. Well, again, he was open-minded, principled. He was very fair. I mean, he was also a really nice guy. I take the point of my colleagues that likeability is not necessarily a criteria. So I did not gear my comments in that direction, but he was wonderfully warm. He took students out to dinner and was very friendly.

Senator CRUZ. So am I right that you were part of the legal team that brought a challenge to President Trump's so-called travel ban? Is that right?

Ms. SINZDAK. That is correct.

Senator CRUZ. And in your experience at Harvard with Judge Kavanaugh as a professor, you found him fair, open-minded, willing to listen to views from multiple perspectives?

Ms. SINZDAK. I did. I like to hope that I used a lot of the things I learned in Judge Kavanaugh's class to bring that challenge against what I still consider an unconstitutional order.

Senator CRUZ. Mr. Olson, you served with Judge Kavanaugh in the George W. Bush administration. You were Solicitor General while he was in the White House. What was your experience in terms of any professional interactions you had with him at that time?

Mr. OLSON. We did not have a great deal of professional interactions because his position in the White House did not directly relate to what the Solicitor General was doing. We worked often with the Counsel to the President, the White House Counsel. But from time to time, there were opportunities to see the kind of input that he was providing to the people in the White House, the senior officials in the White House, including the President.

He was scrupulous, far as I could tell, scrupulously balanced in making sure that the President and other senior officials in the Department were receiving even-handed presentations. So that he would assure that if one side was being advanced to the President, that the other side was also being demonstrated.

His thoughtfulness impressed, I think, everyone around him that was dealing with him, both from the standpoint of the White House and the Justice Department.

Senator CRUZ. Now you have argued in courts of appeals all over the country. Have you had the opportunity to present oral argument before Judge Kavanaugh in the D.C. Circuit?

Mr. OLSON. I have. I have presented argument in one of the cases involving separation of powers, the constitutionality of the Consumer Finance Protection Board, and the court heard that case en banc in the D.C. Circuit. All of the judges were engaged in that case. It was the kind of case that the D.C. Circuit is very good at because it involves separation of powers and involves the structure of government.

All of the judges on that case were engaged. The argument must have gone on for a couple of hours. Judge Kavanaugh was as engaged, if not more so than the other judges. He—at the end of the day, he did not agree completely with the arguments that we were making, but he wrote a very thoughtful, reasoned concurring dissenting opinion with respect to the constitutionality of the Consumer Finance Protection Board.

He very carefully parsed what the Supreme Court had said in the Free Enterprise Fund case and came to a conclusion that was, I thought, very persuasive, although I did not completely agree with it. Very persuasive and reasonable.

Senator CRUZ. But let me thank each of the witnesses for being here on this panel, and I want to echo what Senator Feinstein said in particular, Ms. Weintraub. Thank you for your powerful and inspirational testimony. Thank you for being here and being part of this panel.

Ms. WEINTRAUB. Thank you.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Klobuchar.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you.

Congressman Richmond, thank you so much for being here and for your leadership.

I asked some questions yesterday of the Judge about voting rights, and I referenced data from the Brennan Center for Justice showing that 23 States, as you know, have now have more restrictive voting laws than they did in 2010. Can you elaborate on the consequences of Shelby County?

And as you know, yesterday Judge Kavanaugh noted that Section 2 of the law remains in effect, and is, in your view, Section 2 sufficient to protect voting rights?

Representative RICHMOND. Thank you for the question.

Section 2 is absolutely not sufficient. And for States like the State I come from and some of the other Southern States that were Section 5 States which had to preclear their actions that affect voting rights, they were not chosen by random, they were chosen because of their past history of affirmatively trying to disenfranchise minority voters.

And so, because of Shelby, you do not have that anymore, and you saw the race to the legislature. As soon as Shelby was decided, where the courts held, that the disenfranchisement and the discrimination basically was done with laser-like precision.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Word from the circuit court.

Representative RICHMOND. Yes. So you see the voter ID laws. You just saw in Georgia where they—there was an attempt to close polling locations right before a gubernatorial race with the opportunity to elect the first African-American Governor in this country. So it is a big concern for us.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Right. And gerrymandering, as you know, this past term in Abbott v. Perez, 5-to-4, Supreme Court upheld a number of Texas electoral maps that the dissent said burdens the rights of minority voters. Again, 5-to-4 decision.

Based on Judge Kavanaugh's record, his testimony before the Committee, what do you think the future holds there when it comes to gerrymandering with him on the Court?

Representative RICHMOND. We are very concerned. And if you look at the effect that it has in terms of representation, especially for minorities, and I am not just saying that. What is important is the ability to elect a minority candidate of your choice. In many instances, minorities choose to elect non-minorities like Steve Cohen who represents Memphis, Tennessee, and does an amazing job.

But the ability to elect a minority is important. And so if the Court shifts toward—makes a drastic shift in terms of gerrymandering, then we face the ability of rolling back the clock in terms of African-American and minority representation in this country.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you very much.

Ms. Baker, thank you so much. I do not think we focused enough on that case, and you really brought it to light here. Can you tell us quickly why it is important that women are able to access affordable contraception, as well as the impact that you think Judge Kavanaugh's confirmation could have on the laws in this area?

Ms. BAKER. Absolutely. For me, as a Christian, I definitely believe that—well, one of my favorite Bible verses is John 10:10, in which Jesus says, "I have come that you might have life and have it to the fullest." And I definitely believe that birth control helps us to live our best lives as women. It helps us to go after, you know, education or our careers, helps us to better plan our families and when we are ready to have children. And so—if and when.

And so I really think that is critical to helping empower women and continue the advance forward for women in society.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you very much.

And I think the idea here is that you were someone that is pro-life. Is that correct?

Ms. BAKER. That is correct.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And you are someone that just simply wanted to be able to afford contraception after you got married. Is that right?

Ms. BAKER. That is correct. Yes.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And so the Affordable Care Act, there you were hoping to use those provisions and to be able to—there is other things in there that is helpful as well, not getting kicked off of insurance because of pre-existing conditions, an issue that came up here a number of times in our questions and concerns.

But one of them was that you were hopeful about getting contraception that you could afford, is that right, when you got married?

Ms. BAKER. That is correct. Yes.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And so then what happened here is you go and you get an IUD, and then you find out that the employer is somehow able to exercise their religious rights. Could you explain that just a little more for people?

Ms. BAKER. Yes, absolutely. So I had even gone and done my due diligence and checked with my personal insurance company about the benefits and everything and made sure that it was all clear, not just my knowledge of the ACA, and it said it would be covered. And so when I went to get my IUD, they give a pregnancy test as well, you know, it is being used as contraception.

And so I went and got it put in, and then a few weeks later, we got the EOB for $1,200. And that was about a month before our wedding and—

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Right.

Ms. BAKER. As you can imagine, the stress that already comes with planning a wedding and then putting that on top of it. We are trying to start our new life together, and so it was just a very difficult thing.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you.

And Professor Amar, I would ask you questions, but I am out of time. And also, you would have to recuse yourself since you are my daughter's college adviser.

[Laughter.]

Senator KLOBUCHAR. But I would like to note that your comments about the Judge having standard conventional opinions, maybe we can talk about it after, but it just is not my opinion based on looking at his rulings on net neutrality, or some of the things he has said about Chevron, or what he said about the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. And so I am looking forward to debating that with you at a break.

Thank you.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to thank all of you for coming today. I know a lot of work went into your statements. I find this kind of testimony very helpful.

Number two, I want to especially thank my colleague Congressman Richmond. I have known him a long time. Before he became a distinguished Congressman, he was a distinguished member of the Louisiana House of Representatives, and he is a smart guy and a fine American. And a good guy, too.

Number three, Ms. Baker, you are a Methodist?

Ms. BAKER. Free Methodist, that is correct.

Senator KENNEDY. Right. I am a Methodist, too. When Becky and I got married, I was raised in the Presbyterian Church. My parents founded two Presbyterian churches. So I was a Presbyterian, and my wife, Becky, was a Methodist. So we compromised, and I became a Methodist.

[Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Ms. "Sinzdak," did I say that right?

Ms. SINZDAK. "Sinzdak."

Senator KENNEDY. Ms. Sinzduk, I appreciated your testimony, too, as I did the testimony of all of you, and I apologize again for hitting you in the head when I was going down to shake Congressman Richmond's hand.

Ms. SINZDUK. That is okay. No harm.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. McCloud, what year did you clerk for Judge Kavanaugh?

Mr. MCCLOUD. I clerked for him from 2013 to 2014.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. And then you went on to clerk for the Supreme Court after that?

Mr. MCCLOUD. I did, Senator. For Justice Sotomayor.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. And now you are with Williams & Connolly?

Mr. MCCLOUD. Yes, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. You are an associate there?

Mr. MCCLOUD. Yes, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. Have a lot of free time, do you?

Mr. MCCLOUD. Not much, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. I agree with my colleague Senator Feinstein that our world is getting better for women. I am biased, of course, but I think our world is getting better for many Americans. I am proud of that.

In the last 20 months, the U.S. Congress and President Trump have cut taxes, increased wages, helped create 4 million jobs, delivered 4.1 percent growth in our domestic product, deregulated the economy, improved healthcare, I believe, for our veterans, strengthened our military, stood up to China and Iran and North Korea and Russia. And last, but not least, we have confirmed some, I think, very accomplished men and women to join the Federal judiciary, including, but not limited to, one Supreme Court Justice and I think soon to be a second Supreme Court Justice.

And I am proud of that record, and I thank you all again for sharing your thoughts with us today.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Whitehouse.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thanks very much.

Professor Amar, you mentioned recusal. So, let me follow up with you a little bit on the recusal question.

When you have a judicial nominee whose name has been put forward by the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation and by someone who has been named in open court as directing other criminal activity, in the event that those criminal investigations should ultimately come before the Court and the nominee of that subject and that named co-conspirator is then on the Court, it is fair to say, is it not, that the question of recusal is a very live and legitimate issue?

Professor AMAR. Senator, it is. And I think back to the Nixon tapes case where one Justice who had been appointed by Richard Nixon and who had worked in the Justice Department, and Watergate involved questions about the head of the Justice Department, John Mitchell, one Justice, then-Justice Rehnquist did recuse himself from the Nixon tapes case, and three did not.

My thought is that that has to be decided when the case arises, and there should never be a promise of any sort to any nominator or to this body in the confirmation process about how you will vote or even how you will recuse. You decide that when the case comes before you. And Rehnquist decided one way, and three other Justices appointed by President Nixon decided it the other way.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Now since that episode, there has—the Nixon episode, there has been some case law at the Supreme Court developed in the area of judicial recusal, has there not?

Professor AMAR. There has. One thinks, for example, of Justice Scalia's decision not to recuse himself in a case involving then-Vice President Cheney in his official capacity.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. I mean actually legal precedent, as opposed to behavioral precedent at the Court. And I am specifically referring to the Caperton decision.

Professor AMAR. Oh, sure. Sure.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. What is your summary of the Caperton decision?

Professor AMAR. Thank you, Senator.

So one important thing to understand about that case, which arose out of West Virginia, is it involved a State judiciary, a State-elected judiciary, and one problem with State-elected judiciaries—I know a lot of States have them, I am not a fan of them, nor is Justice O'Connor, retired Justice O'Connor, who has actually made a crusade of this issue—is, you have to raise money to run, and then you do not have life tenure, and you have to raise money to run again.

And that makes it very different, it seems to me, than a Federal judge. One of the great glories of the Federal system is once you are confirmed to the Supreme Court, it is a life tenured position, and you should not make any promises getting it. But even if you did, they are not really, as a practical matter, easily enforceable because you never have to run again.

So I see that case as quite distinguishable in important ways. It also involved a financial—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Although look at the standard. What is the standard that the Court used to apply to the judge in question to determine that he was constitutionally required to recuse himself? Was it not that the funder, by virtue of the amount of funding that he put into the race, had a significant and disproportionate influence on that judge occupying that seat?

Professor AMAR. That was part of the standard, if memory serves. It is an opinion of Justice Kennedy, for whom Brett Kavanaugh clerked. And there were about 40 different factors, actually, that in the dissent by Chief Justice Roberts were sort of identified as possible limiting considerations in that case.

But you are absolutely right, Senator—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. The standard was significant and disproportionate influence in putting the judge into that seat. Correct?

Professor AMAR. It did involve a huge financial contribution by a private person—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Correct.

Professor AMAR. In a case that was already pending when—when the person was running for the State Supreme Court, a pending case.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Correct.

Professor AMAR. A huge financial contribution by a private individual.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And in this case, you have a pending criminal investigation, and you have somebody who has done a good deal more than put $3 million toward getting that judge in the seat. He has actually 100 percent put that judge in the seat. Do you not see that there is any potential relevance between the Caperton decision and the decision that Judge Kavanaugh would face, if confirmed?

Professor AMAR. May I answer? Thank you, Mr. Chair.

So it is not 100 percent. That is what this body actually is about. Presidents do not put people on the Supreme Court. And if you have any concern whatsoever that any promise of any sort was made to the President or anyone in the White House about this litigation, I would say you should vote no because promises are improper.

There is another relevant precedent on judicial recusal, and to repeat, when that case comes before the Supreme Court, were Justice Kavanaugh to be on it, he is going to have to make that decision, as is everyone else. I just do not want him to promise anything, one way or another as part of the process of becoming Justice Kavanaugh.

That I start Con Law every year teaching Marbury v. Madison, which, as you know, actually has a really interesting recusal question, arguably, in it, because John Adams, at the very end of his administration, is putting his Secretary of State, John Marshall, on the Court. And then the case comes before the now-Chief Justice John Marshall, and there is a real question whether he should have recused himself.

I believe he should have, but that is because he had firsthand knowledge of adjudicative facts of the case, but not merely because he happened to have been picked by one President. Because all Justices are picked by one President or another one and confirmed by a Senate.

So it is actually the first question we do, in Marbury v. Madison, is the judicial ethics recusal question, and I do not think it is a sufficient basis for recusal just that you happen to have been nominated by a President who happens to be implicated in a litigation. That might not be enough.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Feinstein will be recognized for a correction of the record.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you. I appreciate this, Mr. Chairman, because I apparently misspoke.

It is the estimates of the number of illegal abortions in the 1950s and 1960s that range from 200,000 to 1.2 million per year. I said deaths. That is not correct.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Hatch.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Olson, you have been at the center of the DC legal community for decades. What is Judge Kavanaugh's reputation among the lawyers you know? How is he—how is he thought of and regarded?

Mr. OLSON. I do not know of anyone in the judiciary or in the legal profession in Washington, DC, or anywhere around that who is respected more than Judge Kavanaugh. Now there are other judges, of course, who have a reputation which is very, very high. The D.C. Circuit on which Judge Kavanaugh sits is populated by very, very talented, very fair judges, many of whom could be perfectly well qualified to be on the Supreme Court.

But my experience with respect to Judge Kavanaugh, it would be hard to describe someone with a greater reputation.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you. You have appeared before Judge Kavanaugh in court many times. What kind of a judge is he? What type of a judge is he during oral argument?

Mr. OLSON. He is very attentive, like other colleagues on that court. As I said, this is a very, very fine court. But my experience has been that he has not only read the briefs, but he understands the history that brings the case to the court.

He is very, very thoughtful. He asks very hard questions of the litigants, no matter which side you are on, very perceptive. The sort of thing that you experience in the United States Supreme Court, where the Justices are probing the strengths and weaknesses of your case and an advocate has to be ready to answer those hard questions.

Judge Kavanaugh asks those hard questions, and you cannot tell from his questions where he is going to come out in a case. He is looking for information and analysis and input from the advocate. That is what a good advocate hopes for in a good judge.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you.

Professor Amar, what are the most important qualities you think Senators should look for in a potential Supreme Court Justice, and why should people from both sides of the political aisle, Republicans and Democrats, support Judge Kavanaugh's nomination?

Professor AMAR. Senator, I did—I do believe that the most important job of the Supreme Court is constitutional interpretation and implementation. It does other things, but that is the most important. And Constitution does not define itself. It requires a lot of careful study, and I just thought that Judge Kavanaugh, more than any other sitting Federal judge, Republican Federal judge under age 60, has studied it with more care and scholarliness and consistency and range.

He is read very widely. I refer you to the very interesting exchanges he had with Senator Lee, for example, about the Federalist Papers. How many people would know Federalist 37 and 39? Maybe 10, maybe 78.

So, but in answer to—Senator Cruz asked me a question, and I should have said one other thing. It is not just that I think he will be good on his own on the Court. It is that I think he will actually help bring out the best in others. I think it is a small group, and when I think about the one-on-one interactions and the collegial interactions, I see him as exceptional.

And the final thing that I really do want my fellow liberals and Democrats to hear is I believe he actually is likely to be better than many are saying, even on this panel, on things like voting rights, on congressional power to implement the reconstruction amendments. Many originalists do not pay enough attention to the amendments, to the women's suffrage amendment, to the reconstruction amendments.

And when I read what Judge Kavanaugh has written, both on the bench, including a voting rights case that I actually think was an impressive opinion, and I contrast that to Shelby County, for example, which I think was the worst decision of the last 20 years, in fact, 15 years, I actually am optimistic about Judge Kavanaugh as someone who will very seriously take the vision of the reconstruction generation and the women's suffrage generation alongside the founding generation.

Senator HATCH. Well, I want to compliment this whole panel. It has been an excellent panel. You folks are really helping us here on the Committee with your testimony from every one of you on the panel. So I am proud of you, appreciate you, and it is one reason why this system does work better.

Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Chairman Tillis.

Congressman Richmond, welcome. I just wanted to follow up on the line of conversation with Professor Amar. Do you think Judge Kavanaugh is the right nominee to replace Justice Kennedy, particularly given Kennedy's critical voice and vote in Fisher v. University of Texas, where the Supreme Court upheld UT's race conscious admission policies and given Judge Kavanaugh's decisional record?

Representative RICHMOND. No, and that is a very real concern. Look, the question has been asked now very consistently about affirmative action, whether it is in the Bakke case or other cases about whether it is still necessary, and I will just say this. And we will take it out of legalese for a minute and just take it to plain, old physics.

If a ball is rolling down the hill, the only way to stop it is to apply equal and opposite force. And the ball of racism and discrimination in this country rolled down hills for centuries, and the only way to stop it is an opposite, but equal force. And that is what affirmative action and that is what those cases mean.

And if you look at some of the decisions and if you look at Scalia's comments in the last case, he actually questioned the intellect of African Americans and their ability to succeed at a prestigious university. So, when you couple the other Justices and their opinions with Kavanaugh's record, that is what leads to the real concern about where we are going to go with affirmative action, race-based factors in admissions, and others.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Congressman.

Ms. Baker, thank you for both your testimony and your witness today. And thank you for bringing forward what is a challenging and very personal fact pattern.

I just want to make sure I heard right. In some ways, I think for you the most shocking thing and the most upsetting thing was a decision that chooses the religious liberty interest of your employer, a company really—nonprofit, but a company—their views on what contraception you should be able to access versus your views about what you ought to be able to do in preparing for marriage and preparing for parenthood.

Is that what sort of stuck most? As I understood your testimony today, that really in particular struck you as just baffling, that the religious liberty interest of a company ended up trumping yours?

Ms. BAKER. Yes, absolutely. That is something that has stuck with me throughout the whole process.

Senator COONS. Thank you.

Professor Murray, I thought you did a particularly powerful job of explicating the range of ways in which Judge Kavanaugh's writing and opinions caused some hesitation or concern. It is in Priests for Life, in his dissent, that he was particularly clear about his view that the complicity of a corporation in being forced to check a box should outweigh the liberty interest of a real, live, breathing person.

Can you just comment on why that tension might strike you as novel or why, given Hobby Lobby, you might see this as a very difficult, long-term trend line in this Court, should Judge Kavanaugh be confirmed?

Professor MURRAY. Thank you, Senator.

There are a number of troubling messages that Judge Kavanaugh evinces in that dissent in Priests for Life. The first that strikes me is exactly the concern that Ms. Baker related. The Supreme Court has said in Eisenstadt v. Baird, decided in 1972, the year before Roe v. Wade, that the right of privacy, if it means anything, it is the right of the individual, whether married or unmarried, to make a decision so fundamentally affecting the person as whether to bear or beget a child. The decision about what kind of contraception a person uses is certainly wrapped up in that, and the Supreme Court has acknowledged it.

In the Hobby Lobby case, five Justices of the Court said that ensuring access to contraception was a compelling governmental interest. What we saw in Priests for Life is that Judge Kavanaugh would defer substantially to the wishes of an employer to—based on the employer's religious beliefs and the employer's faulty understanding of the accommodations process, to deny an individual like Ms. Baker, who has made a reasonable contemplative choice about what is best for her and her family, and instead defer to the wishes of the employer. And that is deeply concerning.

Senator COONS. Chairman, one last question, if I might?

Professor, just to continue, I do not know if you got to see my line of questioning of Judge Kavanaugh I think fairly late last night about the Glucksberg test. He said all roads lead through Glucksberg, and I went through a line of examination with him about whether or not if that test, deeply rooted in this Nation's legal history and tradition, if that had been applied, whether the outcome would have been the same in a whole range of cases relating to marriage, to intimacy, to access to contraception.

And as Justice Kennedy wrote, I think importantly, in Obergefell, if rights were defined by who exercised them in the past, then received practices could serve as their own continued justification and new groups could not invoke rights once denied. Are you concerned that Judge Kavanaugh might depart from Justice Kennedy's vital jurisprudence in substantive due process and that that might have a real impact on how justice is dispensed in these areas going forward?

Professor MURRAY. I think it is clear from Judge Kavanaugh's judicial record, Senators, that he is not a jurist in the mold of Justice Kennedy, who frequently upheld these precedents like Whole Woman's Health, like Planned Parenthood v. Casey, in his writings. Judge Kavanaugh, in these decisions, has evinced a crabbed and narrow understanding of the right to liberty.

The right to liberty that is enumerated in the Constitution is not fossilized in amber. It has changed over time to admit individuals who would not have been contemplated within the body of the people at the time of the founding or even just as the reconstruction amendments were being ratified.

So decisions like the right to marry have evolved. We did not have a situation where individuals who wished to marry a person of the same sex could do so until just 2015. These decisions are all imperiled by a Justice who would follow history and tradition unfailingly toward his outcome.

Senator COONS. Thank you. I have many more questions, but I am out of time.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thanks to all of you for being with us today.

Mr. Olson, I would like to start with you. Your name has been used a lot this week in our proceedings, not necessarily with your whole name, but your last name has made many appearances with a lot of references to Morrison v. Olson. I was wondering if you could just tell us briefly a little bit about your experience with that case?

Mr. OLSON. Well, the Morrison v. Olson case, as everybody on this Committee knows, involved the constitutionality of the independent counsel statute under a statute that required the appointment of an independent counsel by members of the judiciary, prevented the removal of the independent counsel except under very narrow circumstances.

The constitutionality was challenged in the United States Supreme Court in a case that I think of as the Morrison case, but other people refer to as Morrison v. Olson. And the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of that case on a 7-to-1 vote, with, in my judgment, a very, very persuasive dissenting opinion by Justice Scalia.

Over time, I have heard from a number of people in the academic world, the legal academic world, that Justice Scalia's opinion dissenting in that case, which was—he has described as—he did describe as one of his most important contributions to jurisprudence, has received much more favorable attention over the years.

The importance of it is separation of powers and the extent to which power vested by Article II of the Constitution in the President shall be reserved to execution by the President or whether it shall be taken from the President and given to other individuals who are not accountable to the electorate through the electoral process. And, of course, I could go on and on, but I do not think you want me to do that. It is an important case, and it may be revisited someday.

Senator LEE. And you raise a great point. In that respect, judicial independence, somebody's willingness to stand out, stand alone, at times dissenting or perhaps concurring in the absence of additional support, can end up having a big influence, as Justice Scalia's dissent in Morrison v. Olson made clear. Or in the case of, for example, Justice Jackson's concurring opinion in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer. Over time, they acquired more meaning.

Ms. Sinzduk, I wanted to talk to you a little about your class with Judge Kavanaugh. What was that like, and I noticed that you mentioned INS v. Chadha as something that he got you excited about. How did he get the class excited about Chadha?

Ms. SINZDAK. Well, I think it is naturally an exciting case.

Senator LEE. I tend to agree, but I have met exactly five people on planet Earth who agree with me there.

Ms. SINZDAK. Well, I mean, I think part of it was that he would, as I mentioned briefly in my remarks, open class talking about current events. So he was very much about contextualizing separation of powers issues as they were affecting the real world, which kind of took what is a lengthy, but scintillating opinion and kind of put it in—so it was about putting it in a practical context of thinking about the legislative versus the Executive power.

Senator LEE. Great. Thank you.

Professor Amar, I cannot resist the opportunity to talk to you about Hugo Black. You mentioned Hugo Black as someone you admire, someone you would look to. And yet he is someone who has offered a number of opinions I assume you would disagree with, author of Korematsu, for example.

Tell me about your affinity for Justice Black.

Professor AMAR. Justice Black always carried a copy of the Constitution around with him, and I was charmed when Brett Kavanaugh pulled his out, and it looked pretty well worn to me as if he had maybe looked at it a time or two. Justice Black reminds us that you do not have to have gone to a fancy law school to be one of the greats. I know it has been a concern for some.

They think, oh, it is just Professor Amar just likes the fellow because it is an Ivy League club or something. You come to my office and you see in my office Abe Lincoln, two pictures of Abe Lincoln, and he is a guy who had less than a year's formal education in his whole life. And Hugo Black did not go to a fancy law school. He came from the South land. He was actually underestimated, I think, in part because of that.

There is a very interesting piece about country lawyering in The New York Times by just an op-ed yesterday about how folks who sometimes come from the South, and/or speak a slightly different way, are underestimated by fancy-pants, Yankee Ivy League types.

So, Hugo Black actually—and he is a Southerner who really—a Southern White person who really understood the reconstruction amendments. He was there in Brown v. Board of Education, and the people from his hometown did not like what he did in Brown v. Board of Education. He championed incorporation of the Bill of Rights against the States. He championed the right of even indigents in Gideon v. Wainwright.

But long before that, in a case called Johnson v. Zerbst, indigents to have counsel, he was the driving intellectual force of the Warren Court, saying all sorts of things before Warren and Brennan got on the Court. And this body might be interested just from the fact that he was a former Senator turned Justice, and we do not have so many of those right now, but maybe in the future we will. And it is a reminder that you do want all sorts of diversity on your Court. And it really is an issue maybe if they are all coming as Federal court of appeals judges from a few schools. That is a genuine concern to think about.

Senator LEE. Thank you very much, Professor.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you all for being here. This panel really is extraordinary, some really powerful advocates.

Thank you, Congressman Richmond, for your standing so strong in a dark and dangerous time for our democracy. When the history of this era is written, my view is that the heroes will be our independent judiciary and our free press, and I would like to ask you, Mr. Olson—by the way, in the interest of full disclosure, you and I argued before the Supreme Court together. You may not remember it because it was 1 of 63 for you, but it was 1 of 4 for me.

Mr. OLSON. I remember it very well, Senator.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you. And we won 9–to–0 in upholding the sex offender registry case.

Mr. OLSON. Correct.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I am deeply troubled by the attacks on our judiciary and most especially from the President of the United States. You are absolutely right when you say, and I am quoting you, “Our courts are the envy of the world. They depend on the faith and confidence of the public.” Courts do not command armies or police forces, and the President’s attacks on the courts undermine that credibility.

And so I asked yesterday, Judge Kavanaugh, about some of those attacks, and I was disappointed in his responses. He would not even go as far as Neil Gorsuch did, now Justice Gorsuch, in saying that attacks on the judiciary are disheartening and demoralizing. I also cited to him some remarks made by President Trump about Justice Ginsburg, saying “Her mind is shot, resign. We are all embarrassed by her.”

Do you not think that Judge Kavanaugh and members of our judiciary and all of us have an obligation to stand strong against these kinds of attacks?

Mr. OLSON. I can only speak for myself. I have the greatest respect for our judiciary in this country. I meant what I said. It is the envy of the world.

It is the envy of the world in part because very, very fine people are put on our courts, and our judges and Justices exercise independence from the appointing authority and from everything in their backgrounds. They make independent decisions based upon individual cases. I deplore statements criticizing the integrity or intelligence of members of our judiciary across the board.

As far as Justice Ginsburg is concerned, I have to say that she is someone that I have the hugest respect for. She is a hero in this country, a warrior. She has stood for many, many great things. She argued cases in the Supreme Court that broke ground on behalf of women and on behalf of all of us, and I respect her.

I have argued before her. I lost a very significant case involving the Virginia Military Institute, which she decided. I was representing the State, the Commonwealth of Virginia. She is an extraordinarily talented, able person. She remains so to this day.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Ms. Garza, when Judge Kavanaugh came before our Committee and I asked him about the real world consequences of the delay, he characterized it as simply a delay in your client being able to terminate her pregnancy. I wonder if you could describe for us what the consequences were and whether those consequences were apparent in the record so that they would have been known to a member of the Court.

And I want to thank you, by the way, for the great work that you are doing in Brownsville. I visited Brownsville. I know what you are doing to try to prevent separation of children from families and passports being taken away from American citizens and some of the other cruel and inhumane practices going on there.

But if you could talk to us about some of those consequences, I would appreciate it.

Ms. GARZA. Thank you for your question.

Well, I had to see Jane go through all of it. Delaying her further, she had already been delayed at that point for many weeks. You know, the coercion tactics, the pressure, and she never once wavered, never once. And this could have affected her. She could have been forced to have a child against her will. So that was—

Senator BLUMENTHAL. She had to have a surgical procedure, did she not, instead of having other options?

Ms. GARZA. The medical abortion. Yes. She had the option to do a medical abortion early on, but because she was delayed and constantly week after week, she had to have a surgical abortion.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And were health risks—

Ms. GARZA. And the health—yes, and the health risks increased as she was being pushed further into her pregnancy.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. My time is expired. Thank you.

I have a lot more questions. This is a great panel, and I want to thank all of you for being here today.

Thank you.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Booker.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you very much.

So, first, I just want to ask a couple things because I was confused by some of the very—I guess very pointed language. So, Professor Murray, I would like to start with you, if I can?

You were mentioning the standards that were not applied in the Garza case. And I pulled the two cases you mentioned, Bellotti, which discusses striking down a parental consent statute as unconstitutionally burdensome. So why would not a judge that sticks to precedent stick to this case? I do not understand that.

Professor MURRAY. It is also something I do not understand, Senator. The Bellotti case is directly on point with the facts of the Garza case. Jane Doe had completed the required judicial bypass, which under Bellotti is an alternative to securing parental consent. And yet, despite her having done that, Judge Kavanaugh, in his decision before the three-judge panel and again in his dissent, reiterated the need for a sponsor, right, someone, a support network to aid her in making this decision, adding additional delay, something—

Senator BOOKER. But I heard—can you try to put yourself in the shoes of the Judge? What excuse could he possibly have? There is a lot of bragging going on here that when it came to abortion cases or anything, that he would follow precedent. I just—I really sincerely do not understand how this was the binding precedent of the Court about undue burden. The story we heard was gut-wrenching about what this individual had to go through, gut-wrenching.

And there was a clear burden, right? The more you waited, the more of a burden was being put on this person. I just—can you really help me understand this?

Professor MURRAY. Well, during his testimony before this body, Judge Kavanaugh said that his insistence on Jane Doe having a sponsor was because she was a minor. She was alone in this country, and he viewed it as sort of a proxy for parental consent.

But again, I go back to the precedent. The Supreme Court—

Senator BOOKER. Well, a proxy for parental consent. But again, I heard in the testimony from Ms. Garza here that she was—is it true that you were the appointed guardian?

Ms. GARZA. Yes, I was her guardian ad litem.

Senator BOOKER. Right. And so that, to me, just does not hold water.

Professor MURRAY. In addition to precedent upon precedent, there were guardians upon guardians. She had a guardian ad litem. She had gone through the judicial bypass process. A judge in Texas had made the determination that an abortion was in her best interest, that she wanted the procedure. And nonetheless, ORR refused to let her leave Federal custody.

And then Judge Kavanaugh compounded that injury by refusing to allow her to have the abortion, instead insisting that she have a sponsor, adding an additional 11 days to the delay.

Senator BOOKER. And so just real quick, the other case you mentioned, this Whole Woman's Health case, is again about weighing certain standards. Correct?

Professor MURRAY. It is about weighing burdens and benefits, and again, Judge Kavanaugh made no mention of that. He made no mention of the burdens of an additional delay. And Ms. Garza has spoken movingly about the difference between seeking a medication abortion versus a surgical abortion, which admits additional risk to the woman.

Senator BOOKER. Right. So this fiction that somehow—and what did you think of it when he used—and maybe, Ms. Garza, I can ask you, what did you think of it when he used this language like “abortion on demand.” All the things, Ms. Garza, that you just outlined to us does not sound like abortion on demand. It sounds like you are signaling something to a whole bunch of folks so you can get yourself on a list so that you can be considered for the Supreme Court. Would you agree with that?

Ms. GARZA. Yes. Simply yes.

Senator BOOKER. Why use that term? Why use that term?

Ms. GARZA. I do not understand what “abortion on demand” means because that was not the situation for Jane. I mean, she was one of the most vulnerable people in our community, one of the most vulnerable human beings. She was an immigrant. She did not speak English. She was in detention, and she was being put under extreme pressure.

And I felt it was unfortunate that Judge Kavanaugh did not take that into consideration.

Senator BOOKER. So I just want to say this is like a fiction that is being presented to us, that somehow there was not an agenda here by this judge to try out for the Supreme Court to a President that promised his supporters I am going to put somebody on there that is going to overturn Roe.

Cedric, real quick, you said that equal and opposite force rolling down when it comes to racism, you were not saying that we should have racism against another group or bigotry toward other people. You are talking about equal and opposite force, a positive force for justice, force of life, right?

Representative RICHMOND. Yes, exactly. And it was mentioned today all of the economic improvements in the last 2 years. But what we have not talked about is the increased intolerance, racial intolerance over the last couple of years.

When we grew up, Senator Booker, it was well known about racial profiling and driving while Black and that you could be stopped. But it has gone to another level now. Now it is just living while Black. So whether you are studying at Yale, whether you are sitting in Starbucks, whether you are leaving an Airbnb that you purchased, all of a sudden, just being African-American makes you a criminal suspect. And that has happened since this President was sworn into office. So—

Senator BOOKER. And I just want to get you on the record because we are going to use your words. But you believe you deal with that issue by pursuing justice, not by pushing anybody down.

Representative RICHMOND. No.

Senator BOOKER. It is just by trying to elevate folks up as a matter of justice.

Representative RICHMOND. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. I just want to say to the Chair, I have one more question. It is going to be mean. It is going to be a mean question. So please do not interrupt me, though. Let me get it out. And say “potato, potato” to you, but this is going to be mean. Let me get it out.

Akhil Amar, sir, Mr. Professor, I have one question for you. My final question: In your Con Law class, do you regret passing me? [Laughter.]

Professor AMAR. You have a right to remain silent.

Senator BOOKER. You are under oath.

Professor AMAR. I think the only thing that I ever did to my Wikipedia page was add your name as one of my former notable students because I am so proud to be associated with you, even if we disagree on this issue, as we may very well.

Senator BOOKER. Thank you, sir. Thank you very much.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Harris.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

A conversation has come up—Congressman Richmond, I want to ask you a question. But a conversation has come up during this process that leads me to believe that there have been certain dog whistles that have been offered by this nominee, especially in recent years. “Abortion on demand” being one of them.

Another being a term that he used, Congressman Richmond, in a Wall Street Journal op-ed that I asked him about, and the term is “racial spoils system.” And he referred to a racial spoils system, it was in reference to a Hawaiian case and the Office of Hawaiian Affairs. But I asked him about the meaning of that term and what did he mean when he used that term twice.

And he told me, “I am not sure what I was referring to, to be entirely frank,” when I asked him what did he mean by using that term. And I explained to him that it is a loaded term, and I would like for you to share with the Committee what you understand that term to mean and how it has been used, based on your experience.

Representative RICHMOND. Well, I will tell you that it is a very common dog whistle, especially in the South, where you are pitting—and I will just be as frank as I can.

Senator HARRIS. Please do.

Representative RICHMOND. You are pitting poor White people against poor Black people, and your justification to poor White people is that the reason why you are poor is because minorities are scooping up all of the benefits that should be going to you.

And this country is better than that. First of all, it is not true. But second, those programs and those things that I think that he refers to are righting that very wrong history in this country. But just the use of the term is what we see far too often today, which is the dog whistle. It is not even a dog whistle anymore, it is just blatant pandering to a base of people. And I believe that it is a lot more significant than even you would address.

But think of that in the case of race-based factors in admissions, which will come back before the Court because this Justice Department is investigating Harvard right now. So what does that mean for minorities that are applying to prestigious universities or universities all around the country? And that is why it is such a concern.

Senator HARRIS. And to emphasize your point, Congressman, and I actually mentioned this earlier in this process, the Judge has been lauded for the amount of thought that he puts into his writings and the words that he speaks. And the fact that he would use such a loaded term and said he did not understand what it meant was troubling to me as well.

Professor Murray, even if a Justice Kavanaugh does not vote outright to overrule Roe, how else could he undermine a woman’s right to make decisions about her healthcare? What other types of scenarios might come before the Court short of overruling Roe that could impede a woman’s access to reproductive healthcare or to an abortion?

Professor MURRAY. As I said in my opening statement, it is not just the threat of overruling Roe, but incrementally gutting its protections through a death by 1,000 cuts. And there are at least over 10 cases currently pending at the lower Federal courts that all concern restrictions on the methods of abortion that may be used.

Senator HARRIS. So if you will, can you break down for the American public that is watching this hearing so that you can speak to those people who are watching the hearing about the things that they are familiar with that could be impacted short of a Justice Kavanaugh overruling Roe.

Professor MURRAY. Certainly. The restrictions that are pending throughout the States, and as I said, there have been over 400 laws passed since 2011. These laws would increase wait times to obtain reproductive care like an abortion. They would eliminate certain methods of abortion, like the dilation and evacuation procedure, which is the safest procedure according to doctors for safely evacuating a fetus from the womb.

They would also do things like require doctors to tell their patients falsehoods about the abortion procedure, that it leads to suicidal ideation or that it leads to breast cancer. These have all been disproven by science. A number of these laws have been passed. Many of these laws have been challenged and those cases are pending, and certainly, there will be a case that may percolate and make its way to the Supreme Court. And if Justice Kavanaugh is on the Bench, he will be in a position to decide.

Senator HARRIS. And to emphasize your point, all of these things could happen short of him overruling Roe if he were the deciding Justice on that case?

Professor MURRAY. Again, we can make the protections of Roe utterly meaningless for millions of ordinary women in America by simply making this procedure inaccessible, by putting it out of reach, by making it impossible, by making women drive hundreds of miles to obtain abortion care, by making them wait hours, making them leave their jobs, leave their families in order to access care that is their constitutional right.

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I have a document that I would ask be added to the record and ask for consent for that. It is from Dēmos regarding this nomination. Dēmos is a public policy organization working for both political and economic equality for all Americans. And the report is in opposition to Judge Kavanaugh's confirmation based on concerns that his confirmation would threaten equal justice for people of color and the future of racial equity.

Senator TILLIS. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator HARRIS. Thank you.

Senator TILLIS. Senator Coons.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry. I just—I forgot to put into—or I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the National Latina Institute for Reproductive Health in opposition to Judge Kavanaugh's nomination also be entered into the record.

Senator TILLIS. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator TILLIS. Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Chairman Tillis.

I, too, would like—would ask unanimous consent that a letter be entered into the record from the Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights. This letter expresses strong opposition to Judge Kavanaugh's nomination on behalf of 180 different organizations involved in civil rights and human rights.

Senator TILLIS. Without objection.

[The information appears as a submission for the record.]

Senator TILLIS. Senator Hirono.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. Weintraub, can you talk about the dangers you see for Americans with disabilities and their civil rights if Judge Kavanaugh is confirmed to the Supreme Court?

Ms. WEINTRAUB. Yes, thank you, Senator.

Senator HIRONO. Hirono.

Ms. WEINTRAUB. Yes.

Senator HIRONO. Even the Chairman has problems pronouncing my name.

[Laughter.]

Ms. WEINTRAUB. Well, anyway, I see as the issue about the Doe case, these are three women with intellectual disability, first in regard to myself and my friends, and we—they were not asked what they wanted to do nor personal decisions around their body, and we all deserve the right to make decisions.

And yes, these women, they may not understand about these issues, but that is why we bring our friends. I would never go into a doctor's office myself. I would take my husband. I would take my supporters. I can tell you that, and it was in my written testimony.

I just was diagnosed with diabetes, and I brought in my husband. And we did not understand. As I told you, my husband also has a disability, and both of us did not understand. So we asked my sister to help us to understand these issues.

So what I am saying is that, "Nothing about us without us." We need to be told. We need to be involved in these decisions. And Judge Kavanaugh took that away from us.

Thank you.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you.

There have been a lot of questions raised about Garza, and Judge Kavanaugh testified that—this is for Professor Murray and Ms. Garza. He testified that he viewed Garza as a parental consent case, but that was not a parental consent case. Would you agree, both of you?

Professor MURRAY. It was not a parental consent case. The judicial bypass procedure had been followed and was in lieu of parental consent.

Senator HIRONO. So why would—I would characterize that as a very obvious misstatement of the question before the court. And when you get the issue wrong, you are likely to come up with the wrong answer. So I think it was so fundamental that he mischaracterized or misstated the issue. Would you agree with that, both of you, Professor Murray and Ms. Garza?

Ms. GARZA. I would agree with that for sure.

Senator HIRONO. So we could sit here—would you agree with that?

Professor MURRAY. Yes, I agree.

Senator HIRONO. So we could sit here and talk about whether there should have been time for the sponsor to be found and all of that, but that only—that is totally irrelevant—

Professor MURRAY. That is correct. It is irrelevant.

Senator HIRONO [continuing]. To what should have been the real issue in this case, whether or not she should have the right to abortion. So I think that is very troubling when somebody who is about to be seated on the Supreme Court mischaracterizes the question before the court.

Now I did want to ask you, Professor Murray, if you can talk about the contradiction in Judge Kavanaugh's dissents in Garza and Priests for Life because I believe that he really wanted to reach a result in each case. They are different cases, but nonetheless, though, they both have to do with a woman's reproductive rights. And in the end, he denied the women involved their reproductive rights, and I believe he misapplied the facts to the law to get there.

So can you talk a bit about the contradiction in the outcomes, the dissents in Garza and Priests for Life?

Professor MURRAY. Sure. I have spoken at length about Garza and the way in which Judge Kavanaugh ignored existing precedent, such as Bellotti v. Baird, such as Casey and its undue burden standard, and Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt, which requires judges to weigh both the burdens and benefits of a particular restriction.

In Priests for Life—again, I have also spoken about that case—what we saw is such incredible deference to the employer and the employer's religious beliefs and the employer's view that doing something as simple as filling out a form to notify the Government of its objections to providing the necessary contraception is an impermissible burden on religious exercise. That is just a broad deference that would be meaningful, as Ms. Baker had testified, to many women.

Senator HIRONO. So you found undue burden in the Garza case and—

Professor MURRAY. Substantial—

Senator HIRONO. So very—but what do you see is the common—

Professor MURRAY. The common, the common element in all of that is there is no burden that is too great for the woman. There is a burden in Garza on Jane Doe, and in finding a substantial burden on the religious exercise of the employers, there is a burden in the absence of contraceptive coverage to women like Ms. Baker.

Senator HIRONO. I think that is why there are so many people who are very concerned about Judge Kavanaugh being on the Court because, as you said, there are hundreds and hundreds of cases that States have passed that limit the woman's right to choose. So for him to say that Roe v. Wade, even were he to say that Roe v. Wade is settled law is of little comfort to those of us who support women's reproductive choice.

Thank you.

Senator TILLIS. Professor Amar—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Senator TILLIS. Professor Amar, welcome back to the Committee. My colleague here, Senator Coons, and I were talking about how much we enjoy your insights in spite of the fact that you hate our Special Counsel bill, and we also agreed that we are not going to allow you to talk about it because we would have to extend the hearing for 2 hours, mainly because of Senator Coons' commentary.

I wanted to ask you a question about Judge Kavanaugh and his body of work, some 307 opinions. And could you—if you have studied them, and I assume you have, can you give me any insights into ones that you think best reflect his thought process in arriving at an opinion?

Professor AMAR. In the appendix to my testimony, I offer a snippet from The Washington Post that I wrote about the PHH case. I think it is the same one that Ted Olson discussed involving the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and its structure. And what—Senator Klobuchar, I think, passingly mentioned it also before she—in her remarks.

And what is impressive particularly about that case, it is the only case by a court of appeals that I actually assigned my students last year. I usually just give them Supreme Court cases. And what is so impressive about—and this is long before the nomination, of course—is it is trying to take seriously the founding and founding principles and the role of the President and the bureaucracy. The First Congress agreed that Presidents could fire Cabinet officers at will. It is called the Decision of 1789. It was very basic.

The Supreme Court has unanimously reaffirmed that. The Supreme Court agreed with that in a very famous case called Myers that was written by—beginning of the 20th century by former President, Chief Justice Taft, and today's Supreme Court takes it very seriously. And so, Judge Kavanaugh was confronted with the Decision of 1789 that says Cabinet officers are basically fireable at will, and yet we have all these independent agencies—the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission—whose members are not removable at will, but only for good cause.

And I note you are saying, ooh, this is perilously close to—but I am not going to talk about it, and I will not talk about it. But, so, how are we going to take seriously the founding, but also take seriously the 20th century with the rise of independent agencies that have been affirmed again and again and again by the Supreme Court? And I thought Judge Kavanaugh came up with a beautiful synthesis of founding first principles and respect for modern understandings and institutions.

And I do predict that the Supreme Court, when the case finally goes up, will perhaps embrace something very similar to that approach, and he will fit in very well with John Roberts on one side, maybe Elena Kagan will be part of that. She understands Executive power also, with someone like Clarence Thomas or—and some of the others on the other side.

So I think he will work for a Team of Nine, but he will respect the founding a lot, but he also takes seriously modern precedents and modern realities.

Senator TILLIS. Thank you very much.

And thank you, everybody on the Committee.

Mr. Olson, the only comment I will make. Senator Blumenthal, talking about 9–to–0 decision, I am not a Supreme Court expert, but that is a pretty definitive opinion. Is that right?

Mr. OLSON. Absolutely.

Senator TILLIS. I want to thank all those on the panel—

Senator COONS. I take—I take complete credit for it.

[Laughter.]

Senator TILLIS. I want to thank you all on the panel. I thought your opening testimony was outstanding, and with panels this size, it is very difficult to direct questions to everyone, but we do appreciate you all being here.

Congressman, thank you for your time and for your attention throughout the entire hearing.

We are going to take a 30-minute recess for lunch. That will give us time to transition to the next panel. So we will return at 1:03 p.m.

We are in recess.

[Whereupon, at 12:32 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Whereupon, at 1:06 p.m., the Committee reconvened.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before I introduce the panel, if nobody told you, that you push the red button before you speak. Otherwise, we will not be able to hear you. So, the next panel is followed by eight witnesses. Four are for the Majority and four are selected by the Minority. We have a Mr. Kramer, Ms. Eastmond, Ms. Taibleson, Mr. Corbin, Mr. Lachance, Ms. Mahoney, Ms. Smith, and Mr. Christmas.

I would ask you at this point if you would stand, and I would like to have you take an oath.

[Witnesses are sworn in.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you all very much for responding.

Now I would like to say a little bit about each of you so the public watching on television or anybody in the audience knows. Aalayah Eastmond is a—let us see—I am going—yes, okay, is a student. Oh, you know why I am—I should be starting with Mr. Kramer.

A.J. Kramer is Federal Public Defender for the District of Columbia, very important position. He has held the position since the creation of the Office of Federal Public Defender for the District of Columbia in 1991. Now, I do not know, but I would bet you would be one of the longest-serving people in that position any place in the country.

We have Aalayah Eastmond, a student from Parkland, Florida and survivor of the very bad school shooting at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School. Quite a tragedy you went through, and we will hear about it, I am sure.

Rebecca Taibleson served as law clerk for Judge Kavanaugh from 2010 to 2011. Later clerked for Justice Scalia on the Supreme Court and was an associate at Kirkland & Ellis. She currently serves as Federal prosecutor in Iowa's neighboring State of Wisconsin.

Jackson Corbin is a student from Hanover, Pennsylvania, and that is all the information I have about you, but if you want to tell us any more about you, we will not take it off of your time that you have to speak to us.

Then we have Hunter Lachance, a student from Kennebunkport, Maine.

And then we have Maureen Mahoney serving as Deputy Solicitor General of the United States from 1991 to 1993. She is a retired partner of Latham & Watkins.

Melissa Smith is a teacher at U.S. Grant High School, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

Kenneth Christmas is executive vice president for business and legal affairs, Marvista Entertainment. He is a 1991 graduate of Yale Law School, and you were a classmate of Judge Kavanaugh.

So, I welcome all of you, and I think we will proceed with Mr. Kramer, and then we will have our questioning.

STATEMENT OF A.J. KRAMER, FEDERAL PUBLIC DEFENDER, OFFICE OF THE FEDERAL PUBLIC DEFENDER FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, WASHINGTON, DC

Mr. KRAMER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Ranking Senator Whitehouse. Thank you for the opportunity to speak today on behalf of Judge Brett Kavanaugh's nomination to be a Justice of the Supreme Court. I have been, as Chairman Grassley said, the Federal Public Defender in Washington, DC, since 1990. Prior to that, and I think all you meant was that I am old when you said I am one of the longest. And there, I have worked in the Federal Public Defender's Offices in Sacramento and San Francisco before I came to Washington, DC, so I have spent my entire legal career as a Federal Public Defender.

I do want to echo two things that were said by the prior panel that I, too, was dismayed that Chief Judge Garland was not confirmed for the Supreme Court because I think he would have been a great Supreme Court Justice, and also Congressman Richmond's remarks about race in the criminal justice system, which I think still pervades the criminal justice. And I—so I suppose you ask what I am doing here speaking on behalf of Judge Kavanaugh, and I will tell you why.

I have two disclaimers I have to make. I speak only on my behalf, not on behalf of our office here in Washington, DC, or any other Federal Public Defender Office or the Federal Public Defender system. And also, I have read essentially none of Judge Kavanaugh's civil opinions, but I have read almost all of his criminal opinions, and I have argued in front of him numerous times, probably more than 20 times, in criminal cases. And that is what I am here to talk about, his decisions in criminal cases. And I have to just say that he is extremely well prepared in oral argument. He asks the pertinent questions. He asks them in an extremely nice manner. Not all judges are like that, but he asks the most important questions and zeroes in on the most important issues in the case.

I think I was asked to talk about a couple of cases that I argued. One of them was a woman who was convicted of extortion, testified extensively at her trial about how she had been severely beaten by her boyfriend and forced into committing the offense. And I took over the case after the trial proceedings and argued that her lawyer had been ineffective for failing to present expert testimony on battered women's syndrome. It went up and down to the court of appeals and back, and Judge Kavanaugh wrote the opinion for the court of appeals saying that her lawyer had been ineffective for failing to retain an expert on battered women's syndrome. And he wrote a primer essentially on the defense of battered women's syndrome for lawyers, and over a dissent of one of his colleagues.

In another case that I argued and tried, actually, it was a terrible tragedy of a person in the military who had died after a hazing incident involving a gang, and there were major issues about jury instructions in closing argument. And the case was reversed again in a 2-to-1 panel opinion, and Judge Kavanaugh wrote a concurring opinion in that case talking about how important it was that the jury be properly instructed on the mens rea for the crime, and that while—while my client had committed some heinous acts, he deserved to have a fair trial, and the trial in this case had not been fair, and he wrote a concurring opinion to emphasize that.

I should add that there are a number of other cases I have argued and our office has argued where Judge Kavanaugh has been protective of making sure that mens rea has been proved in various cases, including a case called Burwell, where I was appointed amicus by the court of appeals for an en banc argument. Judge Kavanaugh was one of three judges that dissented from the en banc that adopted the views that I put forward.

He has also been a major advocate on the court of appeals of writing about the bizarre situation where defendants who go to trial and are acquitted of a number of counts in a case, including a case where everybody was acquitted of all but one count, but then they are sentenced for the conduct of which they were acquitted. The Judge takes that all into account and gives them a heavier sentence, which I should add that Congress could end very quickly in a bill with a couple of sentences telling judges they should not take account of acquitted conduct. He has been a very—he has been very critical of that.

I should also add that I have served on two committees with him, so I think the bottom line is, he has been extremely fair in criminal cases where it might be assumed that he would just reflexively affirm criminal cases. He has been extremely fair and thoughtful in my experience. And I have also served on a committee—two committees with him, one of whom provides for CJA lawyers, Criminal Justice Act lawyers. His concern has always been to provide the most effective lawyers for defendants and the highest quality.

And I just want to end with one thing. He sends me emails occasionally talking about how he likes the good job that our office does in defending criminal defendants and our clients. And he sent me an email totally unsolicited, quoting the Chief Justice's dissent in a forfeiture case, and he said, "Federal prosecutors when they rise in court represent the people of the United States, but so do defense lawyers one at a time." And Judge Kavanaugh sent that to me, that quote, and said, "That is a nice line that summarizes what you and your office do so well."

So, all of that is why I am here to support the nomination of Judge Kavanaugh for the Supreme Court.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Kramer appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF AALAYAH EASTMOND, PARKLAND, FLORIDA

Ms. EASTMOND. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, and other Members of the Committee, thank you for the opportunity to be here today to share my experience and perspectives on gun violence in America. It needs to be a critical part of your consideration for any judge, particularly for the highest court in the land. My view is significantly impacted by my experience as a survivor of gun violence at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Florida just 6 months ago, and also losing my uncle, Patrick Edwards, 15 years ago in Brooklyn, New York.

My name is Aalayah Eastmond, a senior at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Florida. I work across the country to help amplify the voices of young people, and particularly young people in communities of color whose day-to-day experience with gun violence is always ignored, mischaracterized, marginalized, and minimized by the press, the public, and the corporate gun lobby.

1:02: February 14th, fourth period, Holocaust history. My last period of the day. The classroom door was locked today because of the new procedures. In the beginning of the period, we began presenting our hate group projects that we have been working on. Nicholas Dworet was in my group. Little did I know, 79 minutes from then he would be saving my life.

2:21: We heard a round of extremely loud pops. We had no idea what it was or where it was coming from. The class was in complete silence, and we all stared at each other in immediate fear. Within seconds we heard it again. We all immediately ran. The class split in half. Half of my class ran to the safe spot, which was out of view from the window that was in the classroom door. The other half was diagonally across from the window in complete view. I was not in the safe spot. As I sat down, I remember telling myself if I were to get shot anywhere, I wouldn't make it. I needed to get behind something. The only thing in front of me was Nicholas Dworet. Helena Ramsay began passing books down so we can shield ourselves from the bullets, but yet everyone thought it was a drill.

2:22: I clenched the book from Helena and then looked down at my phone to call my mother. As I raised my finger to hit the green call button, the loud pops were now in my class. I thought to myself, what kind of senior prank is this? As I began to see red on the floor, I assumed it was a paintball gun. I looked up and saw Helena Ramsay slumped over with her back against the wall. I began smelling and inhaling the smoke and gun powder. Then Nicholas Dworet rapidly fell over in front of me. I followed every movement of his body. When he fell over, I fell over with him. I then placed myself underneath his lifeless body, placing his arm across my body and my head underneath his back.

Bullets continued flying. I kept my eyes on the ground so I knew when to hold my breath and close my eyes when the shooter got near. I began talking to God. I told God that I knew I was going to die. I asked Him please make it fast. I did not want to feel anything. I asked for the bullet to go through my head so I would not endure any pain. I laid there for about 30 seconds still protected by his lifeless body, waiting for the shooter to move onto the next class.

After the shooting stopped in my class, his body began to be very heavy. I couldn't breathe anymore. I rolled him off of me and placed his head on his arm so he would not be touching the cold ground. I sat up and looked over. Helena was still in the same exact position I last saw her. I froze, still in absolute view of the window—of the window the shooter shot into. Two of my classmates then pulled me behind a filing cabinet. We were all crammed, some on the phone with 9-1-1, some on the phone with their parents.

I immediately called my mom. I told her my last goodbyes. I told her how much I loved her. I apologized for all the things I might have done in my lifetime to upset her, and then the phone hung up. I then called my father, I told him how much I loved him. I told him to tell my brothers I love them, and I said my last goodbyes. I could not hear anything they were saying to me, but I made sure they could hear me. Not knowing whether it was one shooter or multiple, and not knowing whether they were coming back or not was an unimaginable amount of fear, sitting behind the filing cabinet waiting to die. I began hyperventilating. My classmates began breathing with me and trying to keep me calm and quiet. It did not work. They then covered my face. I felt like I was suffocating but it was to keep me quiet.

2:30: Broward County Police Department was heard from outside the shattered glass. I thought it was the shooter playing a trick. Then a SWAT team member came to check the pulse of Helena and Nicholas. He then looked at me with compassion and said, "I know." We all ran out passing bodies in the hallway on the way out. When I got outside, I was completely disoriented. The police then said, "He is still on the loose guys, we need you to work with us." I was petrified.

4:00: I finally found my friend and her mother. They noticed the unimaginable. They called the police over, and they began picking body matter from my hair. I completely broke down. The police took me back on campus to gather photos of me and collect my bloodied dress. They placed me in a chemical suit meant for chemical and biological exposure, then recorded my statement.

9:30: At the Marriott Hotel, I was finally allowed to physically touch my mother. It was absolutely horrific, surreal, and mind-numbing. I will never forget what I saw, what I did, and what I experienced that day. I will never forget Nicholas Dworet who, even in death, helped protect and save my life. Days later we received news that my mother would be having a miscarriage because of what the shock of the shooting did to her body. The shooting did not only impact me on February 14th, it impacts me every day of my life.

I have also lost a family member to gun violence. I lost my uncle, Patrick Edwards, in the streets of Brooklyn New York. He was shot in the back. The bullet then pierced his heart. He was only 18 with his whole life ahead of him, and unfortunately that is the same story of thousands of Black and Brown families across the country. Gun violence disproportionately impacts Black and Brown youth, whether that being police brutality, homicides, or domestic violence.

As for people of color, law enforcement is the shooter in some cases, history of bias, brutality and racism in so many communities. Like many of brothers and sisters of color, I am not comforted by deputies with handguns, let alone assault rifles. I am very concerned since learning Brett Kavanaugh's views on guns and how he would strike down any assault weapons ban. Too many dangerous and prohibited people continue to be able to readily access and use dangerous weapons to terrorize Americans at home, work, church, school, concerts, and on our streets, and anywhere we go on our day to day life.

As you consider what to do and who to appoint to make us safer from gun violence, remember my story. Remember my classmates who died. Remember the victims of colors who—that face mass shootings every day. Remember all victims of gun violence from Parkland, Brooklyn, Miami, Milwaukee, Oakland, and all over America. As you make your final decision, think about it as if you had to justify and defend your choice to those who we lost to gun violence. If Kavanaugh does not even have the decency to shake hands with a father of a victim, he definitely will not have the decency to make life-changing decisions that affect real people.

The youth is urging our society to recognize the depth and seriousness of the gun violence epidemic in America. We are all here with an urgent message for you: if the youth across the country can fight to eradicate gun violence, why cannot judges, lawmakers, and Donald Trump understand that young people are dying from this senseless gun violence?

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Eastmond appears as a submission for the record.]

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Ms. Taibleson.

STATEMENT OF REBECCA TAIBLESON, FORMER LAW CLERK, EASTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN, FOXPOINT, WISCONSIN

Ms. TAIBLESON. Thank you. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Senator Whitehouse, and Members of the Committee. I am honored to be testifying before you today. My name is Rebecca Taibleson. I am here today from Milwaukee, Wisconsin. I clerked for Brett Kavanaugh in 2010 and 2011, and I enthusiastically support his nomination to be an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. I would like to talk about two things today: first, what Brett Kavanaugh is like as a judge, and second, what Brett Kavanaugh is like as a person.

At work in his chambers, Judge Kavanaugh has a motto of sorts. It is, "process protects us." I will admit, it is not very catchy, but it is true to the Judge and to his core judicial philosophy. What it means is that Judge Kavanaugh goes through an intense, step-by-step process in order to decide each and every case. That process starts with an open mind and a foundational commitment to the belief that either side might be right. Judge Kavanaugh then reads and analyzes every brief and re-reads every relevant precedent in the case, and he insists that his clerks find the very best version of every argument in the case, even when the lawyers themselves have not.

In addition to the parties' arguments, Judge Kavanaugh also takes very seriously the views of his colleagues, the other judges on the case, especially when they differ from his own. I can remember all——

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

[Audio malfunction in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. There is something wrong with the system. Okay.

Ms. TAIBLESON. Is this okay? Okay.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. Start over again, Rebecca.

Ms. TAIBLESON. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Senator Whitehouse, and Members of the Committee. I am honored to be testifying before you today. My name is Rebecca Taibleson. I am here today from Milwaukee, Wisconsin. I clerked for Brett Kavanaugh in 2010 and 2011, and I enthusiastically support his nomination to be an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. I would like to talk about two things today: first, what Brett Kavanaugh is like as a judge, and second, what Brett Kavanaugh is like as a person.

At work in his chambers, Judge Kavanaugh has a motto of sorts, "process protects us." I will admit it is not very catchy, but it is true to the Judge and to his core judicial philosophy. What it means is that Judge Kavanaugh goes through an intense, step-by-step process in order to decide each and every case. That process starts with an open mind and a foundational commitment to the belief that either side might be right. Judge Kavanaugh then reads and analyzes every brief and re-reads every relevant precedent, and he insists that his clerks find the very best version of every argument in the case, even when the lawyers themselves have not.

In addition to the parties' arguments, Judge Kavanaugh also takes very seriously the views of his colleagues, the other judges, especially when they differ from his own. I can remember all too clearly, being corrected by Judge Kavanaugh once when I, fresh out of law school, spoke too dismissively about a different judge's opinion on a case. I learned from that. Understanding Judge Kavanaugh's humility and respect for his colleagues is essential to understanding his identity as a judge.

Judge Kavanaugh completes his entire process from scratch for every issue in every case. It is no coincidence he is often the last person at work in the courthouse each night, but it is worth it. This process, as he says, protects us. It protects against snap decisions, shortcuts, and pre-judgments. By never skipping a step, never giving short shrift to an argument or ignoring a precedent, Judge Kavanaugh ensures that his decisions are based on the law and the facts of each case and only those things. That process also protects us, American citizens, from having unelected judges ruling based on their own predispositions or preferences.

Only after completing that process does the Judge decide once and for all what he thinks, and once he is decided, he is difficult to budge. He is independent and stubbornly so. He cannot be pressured by his law clerks or his colleagues, and he cannot be intimidated by other actors in Government. It is simply not part of his process.

Politics also have no place in Judge Kavanaugh's process. Having known the Judge for almost 10 years, and having worked with him very closely, I myself do not know what his views are on the political issues of the day. And as a law clerk, it would have been unthinkable to even mention the political implications of a case. In fact, had we known in advance how to decide a case based on the parties, or the amici, or some policy goal, we might have skipped a few steps in the process and gone home a bit earlier at night, but he never did, and so we never did. For those reasons, if you want to know what Judge Kavanaugh is like as a person, his cases are not the best place to look because he keeps his preferences out of them. His process reflects his fairness, work ethic, and judicial temperament, but the outcomes are based on the law, not his personal views.

But I can tell you that as a person, Brett Kavanaugh stands out. He has testified extensively this week, so I do not need to tell you how smart, thoughtful, and unflappable he is. When his guard is down, when he is not before this Committee or on television, he is the same way. But in my view, those are not his most remarkable qualities. Instead, it is his everyday, universal, disarming kindness. I sometimes find myself saying that Judge Kavanaugh is normal or approachable, but those cliches are not quite right. Instead, those are compliments designed for Federal judges, who no one expects to be normal or approachable. In truth, Judge Kavanaugh is far, far nicer than is normal, and far more approachable than almost anyone you will ever approach. He has an easy laugh and a great sense of humor. I myself am rarely funny, as Senator Booker has pointed out, but he laughs at all of my jokes, including, especially the jokes at his expense. Although his credentials are elite, you would never know it to talk to him. The Judge is a regular at his neighborhood bar, for example, where he is partial to a Budweiser and a hamburger, and where the long-time bartender did not even know Brett Kavanaugh was a lawyer until he saw his nomination to the United States Supreme Court. If he is confirmed, Judge Kavanaugh's humility, collegiality, and kindness will stand out on the Supreme Court.

Judge Kavanaugh is going to stand out on the Supreme Court for another reason as well, which is his support for women in the legal profession. Elite legal circles are predominantly male. The year I clerked on the Supreme Court, for example, 26 of the 39 law clerks were men, and that is typical. Just this morning, The New York Times ran an article about the barriers faced by women and people of color throughout the legal profession. According to that article, an ABA report found that in 2016—2016—only 35 percent of active American lawyers are women. Judge Kavanaugh, by contrast, has hired more women than men as law clerks. One year, all four of his clerks were women, which was a first for the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. That is something no Supreme Court Justice has ever done.

After hiring us, Judge Kavanaugh goes to bat for us. As the Members of this Committee know, hard work and smarts are not always enough to reach the top of your profession. Instead, it takes guidance from people who have been there and advocates willing to fight for you. Studies have shown that women often are at a disadvantage on those fronts, but Judge Kavanaugh is a force of nature. Thanks to his sponsorship, about 85 percent of Judge Kavanaugh's female clerks have gone on to clerk on the Supreme Court. We have clerked for Justices across the Court, including Justices Kagan, Breyer, and Sotomayor. We have served in all three branches of State and Federal governments. We are professors, prosecutors, and nonprofit attorneys. One of us is now even a judge herself. I know of no Federal judge who has more effectively supported women in this profession than Brett Kavanaugh.

Ten years after I first met Judge Kavanaugh, I am now figuring out how to be lawyer and a mom to three children aged 3 and under. In fact, if you heard a baby crying outside this chamber earlier this morning, that is my fault. She is 3 months old, and she absolutely insisted on coming. I know firsthand how important it is to have an advocate like Brett Kavanaugh, and I attribute my still-vibrant legal career in large part to him.

I am only one of many. A significant number of Judge Kavanaugh's former clerks have been here for these hearings, and we have uniformly recommended him for his character, his work ethic, and his kindness. The United States and the American people would be well served with Judge Kavanaugh on the Supreme Court.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Taibleson appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Mr. Corbin.

STATEMENT OF JACKSON CORBIN, HANOVER, PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. CORBIN. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, and distinguished Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, I am privileged to represent 130 million people with pre-existing conditions today, and I am grateful for the invitation to testify before you. My name is Jackson Corbin, and I am 13 years old. I am a lot like other teenagers. I love comic books, Marvel movies, and I love to play Minecraft and Fortnite with my friends.

Ten years ago, my brother, mother, and I were all diagnosed with Noonan Syndrome, a genetic condition that affects various systems of the body. As a result of my Noonan Syndrome, I have a lot of pre-existing conditions. Noonan Syndrome affects my growth, so I will never be as tall or as strong as other people my age. I have stomach issues, reflux, and I get really bad headaches. My most severe condition is my Von Willebrand Disease, a form of hemophilia. This means that I cannot play contact sports or do things like roughhouse, roller skate, or jump on trampolines. I take medication to control my reflux and to clot my blood if I get hurt. Having my clotting medicine at home means that I do not have to go to the emergency room every time I lose a tooth or get a bad bruise or a cut.

My brother, Henry, is my best friend. He is 10-and-a-half years old, and he has Noonan Syndrome, too. We do everything together, including going to our specialist visits. My mom always says the greatest thing she ever did was to give the two of us to each other.

Noonan Syndrome affects everyone differently, so in addition to having all the same conditions as me, including Von Willebrand Disease, Henry has even more special healthcare needs than I do. When Henry was a baby, he had to have lifesaving stomach surgery and a blood transfusion. Now he has what is called gastroparesis, which means he vomits almost every day, sometimes even in his sleep. The medicine he takes helps, but not all the time. We share a room, and at first it was scary to see him vomit in his sleep, but now I am used to it. When I hear him gagging, I roll him over so he does not choke and run to get my parents. Henry also has heart problems and asthma. I worry about Henry, a lot.

I have heard my mom and dad say that they are grateful for our insurance because the cost of our care is more than my family makes in a year. That means if the Affordable Care Act is repealed and Henry and I lose our insurance, my parents will not be able to afford to pay for our care.

I have been fighting for healthcare for nearly 2 years. Last year, in the first speech I ever gave on the lawn of the Capitol, I compared myself to Dr. Seuss' "The Lorax." The Lorax says, "I am the Lorax and I speak for the trees," and so I said, "I am Jackson, and I speak for the children." I said that because I have met so many children with special healthcare needs who are unable to speak for themselves. I wanted to be their voice. But as my journey continued and I met even more children and adults who have pre-existing conditions, and who, like me and Henry, are scared for their future, I realized that I don't only speak for the children anymore. Today, especially, I speak for everyone.

I speak for myself, Henry, and all the other children across the country with special healthcare needs. I speak for the parents who struggle with their own health issues while caring—while caring for their children, including my own mom, who has Noonan Syndrome, too. I speak for every person with a disability who high fives me in the Senate hallways as they fight for our care. I speak for every person with a disability who will never be able to live independently. I even speak for the man who has Lupus who altered the suit that I am wearing today. Most importantly, I speak for every American whose life could change tomorrow with a new diagnosis.

My Noonan Syndrome is a part of who I am. It has been a part of me since the day I was born, and will be a part of me for the rest of my life. If you destroy protections for pre-existing conditions, you will leave me and all the kids and adults like me without care or without the ability to afford our care, all because of who we are. We deserve better than that.

I might be a kid, but I am still an American. The decisions you are making today will affect my generation's ability to have access to affordable healthcare. We must have Justices on the Supreme Court who will save the Affordable Care Act—save the Affordable Care Act, safeguard pre-existing conditions, and protect our care. Please give us the chance to be healthy, to grow up, and to lead this country one day. I know I want that chance.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Corbin appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Jackson.

[Applause.]

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Mr. Lachance, go ahead.

STATEMENT OF HUNTER LACHANCE, KENNEBUNKPORT, MAINE

Mr. LACHANCE. Senator Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, and Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, my name is Hunter Lachance. I live in Kennebunkport, Maine, and I am a sophomore at Kennebunk High School. I am 15 years old, and I suffer from asthma.

I live in a State that has some of the highest rates of asthma in the country. According to the Maine Center for Disease Control, nearly 12 percent of the adults in our State have asthma compared with 9 percent nationally. Maine children also suffer from a higher rate of asthma than the national average. I am one of those statistics. Despite Maine's many beauties, it has worse air quality than most people realize. Because Maine sits at the end of America's tailpipe, air pollution from upwind States is carried into Maine by prevailing winds.

Air pollution makes life extremely difficult for those of us with asthma, and it makes it harder for me to breathe. For me to live a healthy life, air pollution needs to decrease, not increase. I am concerned that the Supreme Court could make major decisions in the next few years that will cause air pollution in Maine to increase if Brett Kavanaugh is confirmed.

Many people in this room may have asthma, or know someone who does, so what I am about to describe may be familiar. Here is a coffee stirrer. If you have one, I encourage you to put it to your mouth and try breathing through it. Now, imagine only being able to breathe through this sized-hole this size for an hour, or a day, or even a week. That is what it has been like during an asthmatic attack. Unfortunately, I am not alone in having asthma impact my life. Asthma affects nearly 25 million Americans, including over 6 million children. Two million people go to an emergency room each year because of asthma. I am here today because my future, and my health, may depend on it.

I am just your everyday kid from Maine. I play sports, like to swim, and love playing in the snow. But my active life changed when I was diagnosed with asthma at the age of 10. Suddenly, everything became more difficult. I was sidelined from sports, began missing school, and my parents constantly worried about my health. The year after I was diagnosed, I missed close to a quarter of the school year. I can vividly remember times when my asthma attacks were so strong and scary that I was removed from class by my teachers and sent to the nurse's office. Most of the time, the nurse sent me home or asked my parents to get medical attention. I remember one really bad attack when I was home sick for 3 straight weeks. Asthma is a leading reason why kids miss school, and it has directly impacted my ability to learn from my teachers and spend time with my friends.

Although air pollution does not cause asthma, it triggers attacks. On ozone alert days, people across the country have trouble breathing, and this should worry everyone. It worries me. In Maine, we need strong Federal regulations on air pollution because pollution does not stop at State borders. If States upwind from Maine are allowed to pollute more because Federal regulations are weakened, then that is bad for me, it is bad for Mainers, and it is bad for anyone in America with a respiratory disease or asthma.

That is why I am here. I am deeply concerned that if Judge Kavanaugh is on the Supreme Court, he would vote to weaken laws that protect my health because he already has. In a 2012 ruling, he rejected the Cross-State Air Pollution Rule based on the Clean Air Act's Good Neighbor provision, which regulates air that crosses State lines. According to the EPA, this rule reduces sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide pollutants and will prevent 34,000 premature deaths. During his time on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, Mr. Kavanaugh has repeatedly struck down other Clean Air Act protections. This worries me a lot because clean air is a life or death issue for so many people like me.

We need a Supreme Court that will protect clean air because lives depend on it. We also need a Supreme Court that will uphold protections to address climate change because my generation's future depends on it. For me, climate change means that life will be even more difficult with more ozone alert days, more dust and soot in the air from forest fires, and more mold due to extreme weather and flooding.

Here is my coffee stirrer again. Next time you have the chance, pick one up and try breathing through it and see how long you can last. This is what it is like to suffer through asthma—through asthma. If the Supreme Court fails to protect clean air, then it is failing to protect me and millions of other Americans. Please do not confirm someone for the Supreme Court with a record like Judge Kavanaugh's, a record that could mean more air pollution, more asthma attacks, and more premature deaths for the millions of Americans unfortunate enough to be afflicted with asthma like me.

Thank you for letting me testify today.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Lachance appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Mr. Lachance.

Now, Ms. Mahoney.

STATEMENT OF MAUREEN E. MAHONEY, FORMER DEPUTY SOLICITOR GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, WASHINGTON, DC

Ms. MAHONEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Whitehouse, and Members of the Committee. I am honored to add my voice in support of Judge Kavanaugh today. I worked with him at the Solicitor General's Office, and I appeared before him on the D.C. Circuit, and it is hard for me to think of anyone who is more qualified.

I would like to make two points: First, I want to share my view that Judge Kavanaugh has much in common with my former colleague, Chief Justice Roberts, whom the Senate voted to confirm by a wide margin. Second, I want to explain why Judge Kavanaugh's extraordinary record of mentoring female lawyers is so important to my profession.

In 2005, I testified before this Committee in support of Chief Justice Roberts' confirmation, and I am struck by the many similarities between him and Judge Kavanaugh. Some are obvious. Both are extraordinary lawyers, both worked in the White House Counsel's Office and the Solicitor General's Office, and both served as judges on the D.C. Circuit. But they also share a civility and evenhandedness on the bench that reflects their genuine effort to consider all sides of an argument thoroughly before reaching any conclusions.

I have had the pleasure of arguing before both men. Like the Chief Justice, Judge Kavanaugh asks difficult and incisive questions of both parties, but he is polite, and he conveys his thoughts with an open mind. As the ABA confirmed this morning, my view is widely shared by the Bar. Don Verrilli, Solicitor General during the Obama administration, has called Judge Kavanaugh a "brilliant jurist who is a gracious person, both on the bench and off." And a bipartisan group of appellate practitioners praise his unfailing courtesy to counsel and to the other judges and his colleagues. In an era when some appellate judges have behaved like brusque advocates for one side during oral argument, Judge Kavanaugh has been a model of the proper judicial disposition.

The Chief Justice and Judge Kavanaugh also understand the proper role of a Federal judge: to be an independent, neutral arbiter. During his confirmation hearing, the Chief Justice famously described judges as umpires who apply the rules without fear or favor. I think it is fair to say that the Chief Justice has done so. At various times, both sides of the aisle have denounced his rulings just like the same thing that happens to umpires. And Judge Kavanaugh has similarly demonstrated impartiality and fairness in his 12 years on the D.C. Circuit. He repeatedly ruled against the Bush administration, where he worked prior to becoming a judge, in his first 3 years on the bench. He has ruled in favor of an al-Qaeda terrorist, in favor of a pro-choice Democratic interest group, and against the Republican Party. And to the surprise of some, even the ACLU has recognized that Judge Kavanaugh has been "sympathetic" to Title VII claims. As Judge Kavanaugh has explained in multiple speeches over the years, a judge must check any prior political allegiances at the door, and I am confident he will stay true to that ideal.

Second, Judge Kavanaugh also stands out as a mentor to women lawyers. I know you have heard the statistics a lot, but they are worth repeating. Over half of Judge Kavanaugh's law clerks have been women. Twenty-one of those 25 have been hired to clerk on the Supreme Court, and this is simply astounding. These women have gone on to serve in all three branches of Government, in the White House in the Solicitor General's Office, four Federal prosecutors. One is a Deputy Solicitor General of the District of Columbia. Another, as you just heard, serves as a judge on the Eleventh Circuit.

It is difficult to overstate how important opportunities like these can be for a lawyer's career, especially in appellate practice. Credentials like a Supreme Court clerkship or a job at the Solicitor General's Office are keys that unlock doors at the highest levels of the legal profession. Very few women have historically held these elite positions. When I clerked for Chief Justice Rehnquist in 1979, almost 80 percent of the law clerks at the Court were male, and a large gender imbalance endures today. Almost twice as many men as women have been hired as Supreme Court clerks since 2005.

In the most recent Supreme Court term, women delivered just 12 percent of the oral arguments, and women make up only 19 percent of law firm equity partners. I was one of the lucky few. I argued 21 cases before the Supreme Court, and this never would have happened without the mentorship of a Federal judge, just like Judge Kavanaugh does for his clerks. Chief Justice Rehnquist helped launch my appellate career by hiring me as his clerk, and in 1988 he then arranged for me to argue my first Supreme Court case. I was the first woman to receive the honor of being appointed by the Supreme Court to argue a case by invitation. With that argument under my belt, Chief Justice Roberts recruited me in 1991 to join him in the Solicitor General's Office as one of four deputies, a position that has rarely been held by women.

These were the opportunities that made it possible for me to compete with the men who dominate the Supreme Court Bar. For more than a decade, Judge Kavanaugh has been instrumental in opening these doors for a new generation of women lawyers. He has been a teacher, adviser, and advocate for women in ways that unquestionably demonstrate his commitment to equality, and that will ultimately reduce persistent gender disparities in the legal profession. In short, Judge Kavanaugh's independence, his civility and open-mindedness, and his generous mentorship are just a few of the many characteristics that make him superbly qualified to serve on the Supreme Court.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Mahoney appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Ms. Mahoney.

Now, Ms. Smith.

STATEMENT OF MELISSA SMITH, SOCIAL STUDIES TEACHER, U.S. GRANT PUBLIC HIGH SCHOOL, OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA

Ms. SMITH. Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Judiciary Committee. Thank you for this opportunity. My name is Melissa Smith, and I am a union member and public school teacher at U.S. Grant High School on the southwest side of Oklahoma City. I am also the very proud daughter of a police officer, who served his community 41 years, and who taught me how to use my voice. He made sure that I not only knew my rights, but that I knew how to exercise them.

Because of my father, I went into juvenile justice where I quickly realized that most teenagers have no idea that they have rights. So, I became a high school social studies teacher where I can open my students' eyes to the concepts of equality, justice, and fairness. I teach them that under the U.S. Constitution, they do have rights. I teach them the impact of the law and their roles and responsibilities within the Government so that they can be engaged and active in our democracy. Today, I am honored to be able to show my students exactly what it means to use your voice and participate in our Government at the highest level. As you consider your vote to confirm Judge Kavanaugh to a lifetime appointment, please consider our experiences.

Oklahoma City Public Schools is the State's largest district where almost 90 percent of our families are considered to be economically disadvantaged. I am a proud General at U.S. Grant High School General. We have the most dedicated teachers and incredible students. Our district has had to cut almost $40 million from its budget in the last 2 years. Our fine arts budget was slashed by 50 percent, and our library media budget was completely eliminated. Our school building was built for 1,200 people just 11 years ago, yet we currently have 2,200 staff members and students.

Classrooms that have almost 40 students rarely have enough desks for all of them. It is often first come, first served to those classrooms. Some teachers do not even have classrooms at all. They have all of their belongings, textbooks, and supplies on carts, and they push them from classroom to classroom, hour to hour. I am telling you about our funding crisis in Oklahoma for two reasons: first, because Judge Kavanaugh's stated position on private school vouchers would exacerbate the situation in Oklahoma City. Vouchers do nothing to help student achievement, but do everything to undermine the public schools that 90 percent of children in this Nation attend. Siphoning more funding away from public education will destroy public schools.

The second reason I am telling you about our funding crisis is that I have seen firsthand how the collective power of unions allows individuals to band together to bargain for resources for students and teachers. Judge Kavanaugh has a strong history of siding with big business over the needs, rights, and safety of individual employees. His record shows that he sides with employers who do not adhere to their collective bargaining agreement, and he does not see the need for union representation in employee meetings. I can tell you that through my union, I have learned the power of collective voice. I can advocate for my own working conditions, which are the same learning conditions for my students. Unions give voice and agency to people who cannot find it otherwise. They make it possible for us to accomplish together what we could not do on our own.

Five months ago, Oklahoma City Public Schools teachers walked out of our classrooms. Our legislature passed a $6,000 pay raise in an attempt to stop that walkout, but we were fighting for more than just a pay raise. We were fighting for our students and their needs that often go well beyond what you would expect a teacher to have to take care of. I have physically picked up a teenager off the floor and carried her to the counselor's office. She was sobbing saying that she did not want to live anymore. Thank goodness our counselor was able to be at school that day. I have seen the terror on a transgender student's face when he shared that he identifies as male, and then that terror turn to joy when I, as a trusted adult, accepted him for who he is. Just last week a fellow teacher wrote a reference letter for a student and his family for their hearing to determine whether or not they can remain in this country. She stressed about it for days because she needed it to be perfect.

Her student has never known anything but his life in Oklahoma, and he is terrified of being sent to a place that is not his home.

The morning after the 2016 Presidential election was a tough one at U.S. Grant. Many of our students are undocumented or have undocumented family members. The U.S. Grant family rallied around all of our students more than usual on that day. We do not ask if they or their parents are undocumented. That is not our purpose. And so far, the U.S. Supreme Court agrees.

Now why am I sharing these experiences with you? Because I worry about my students and who will look out for them. I worry that our Government is too far removed from the people it serves, and that the consequences of that gap are far more dangerous than we realize. If confirmed, Judge Kavanaugh's decisions will impact not just teachers and students in schools now, but the futures of my students and for generations to come. The experiences of my students and fellow staff members show that there is a real impact of Judge Kavanaugh's jurisprudence on America's future.

Thank you for allowing me to be here today. I would like to end my statement the same way I end every single Friday in class with my students: "Be the example, have a good weekend, and please make good choices."

[Applause.]

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

[The prepared statement of Ms. Smith appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Ms. Smith.

Now, Mr. Christmas.

STATEMENT OF KENNETH C. CHRISTMAS, JR., EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT, BUSINESS AND LEGAL AFFAIRS, MARVISTA ENTERTAINMENT, LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

Mr. CHRISTMAS. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, and other distinguished Members of this Committee, I am honored, grateful, and humbled to appear before you endorse—to endorse the nomination of Judge Brett Kavanaugh to sit as an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. I have known this nominee for 3 decades. He is a close personal friend. I hope my testimony today will illuminate a side of Judge Kavanaugh that is not often seen in media accounts.

I met Judge Kavanaugh in 1988 during my first year at Yale Law School when he was a second-year law student. In addition to both of us pursuing our love of the law, we watched SportsCenter, played pick-up basketball, and loved going to Yale football games. We became fast friends. The following year, we roomed together with six other law school students in a house behind the Yale gym.

I have always admired Judge Kavanaugh's ability to create deep relationships with people from all walks of life, conservative, liberal, athlete, academic, male, female, White, Black. I think the one reason for this is he never assumes he is the smartest person in the room. Judge Kavanaugh deeply believes he can learn something from everyone. A wonderful confidant, Judge Kavanaugh has always made me feel comfortable speaking to him about basically anything because he genuinely cares how others feel and authentically tries to understand how they think.

During law school, I often sought out Judge Kavanaugh's advice. He would implore me to first understand the issues from the points of view. Put yourself in their shoes, I recall him advising me. How would that make you feel? Then, he would challenge me to demand of myself that which you ask from others. Should he be fortunate enough to be confirmed, I believe Judge Kavanaugh will bring that same humility and compassion to the Supreme Court. It is who Judge Kavanaugh is.

Since graduation, the same eight law school roommates have spent a long weekend together every year with an astonishingly minimal absentee rate, and Judge Kavanaugh has been no exception. These 26 reunions have kept all of us close, even as our families and careers demanded more time from each of us. I will never forget a long drive I took to Bucks County, Pennsylvania for one of our early annual reunions. Judge Kavanaugh listened and asked questions for the whole ride as I explained my bewilderment over those who deny the continuing effects of slavery and Jim Crow laws. While I was raised in California, I have deep family roots in Mississippi. I believed then, as I do now, that the laws of our country must remain responsive to historical prejudice, discrimination, oppression and mistreatment of African Americans. There was no doubt left in my mind following that ride that Judge Kavanaugh deeply cared, and still cares, about truly understanding my Black experience and point of view.

Over the years, Judge Kavanaugh and I have traveled together many times in and outside the country. I drove with Judge Kavanaugh to Boston to watch him run his first Boston Marathon. Judge Kavanaugh made the trip to California for my wedding, and I flew back to DC for his. While our age is no longer conducive to pick-up basketball games, we have been able to commiserate over coaching our children and learning that the first rule of being a good youth basketball coach is understanding you are no longer a player. Our support for one another has been a steady and reliable force as we move through life's ups and downs.

Earlier this year, Judge Kavanaugh and I, along with our other law school roommates and friends, gathered over a weekend for the funeral of the son of another roommate. I witnessed Judge Kavanaugh's love, care, and support of our friend during the most difficult of times. He attended dinners, participated in fellowship well into the night, and spent the day at the funeral service in support of the family. In a time of personal crisis, I will not need to look far for my friend because Judge Kavanaugh will already be there.

So, you may ask what does coaching basketball, showing up at each other's wedding, listening to my experiences as a Black man living in America, or attending a funeral have to do with determining whether Judge Kavanaugh should become a Supreme Court Justice? The answer is it speaks directly to his humanity. Judge Kavanaugh cares. He is far from being an ideologue. He does naturally what a good judge should do, seek to understand before offering an opinion. Judge Kavanaugh is a tremendous son, friend, husband, and father. He is honest, empathetic and intellectually curious. That is the person I know.

Over the course of my life, I have found that a true test of a friendship is when support for a friend is inconvenient. For me, from the perspective of a lifelong Democrat, it is inconvenient to support Judge Kavanaugh, especially during this time of an unprecedented partisan divide and polarization among Americans, but I know it is the right thing to do. As an American, I am quite concerned about the attacks on our esteemed institutions, like the judiciary. My expectation of any judicial nominee I support, especially when it is for the Supreme Court, is that he or she possess a powerful sense of fairness and impartiality. As an African American, I expect a nominee I support to have a deep sense of obligation to protect the interests of those disempowered, particularly those whose voices are too often drowned out of our political discourse and cannot be heard. Again, all this requires a judge who is compassionate, humble, and principled. Judge Kavanaugh is such a nominee.

Everyone here today is well aware of Judge Kavanaugh's extraordinary qualifications, both educationally and professionally. However, it is Judge Kavanaugh's humanity that compelled me to come here today to testify on his behalf. For this reason, without equivocation or reservation, I respectfully urge this Committee and the Senate to confirm Judge Brett Kavanaugh as an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Christmas appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you. As Chairman of the Committee, I should thank all of you for your testimony. I know you have to work hard to do it. Some of you have traveled a long way, so just generally thank you. And then I am going to ask my questions, and then I will call on Senator Whitehouse, and I would ask for maybe 10 or 15 minutes if one of my Republican colleagues would moderate while I step out, and I will be close by.

Senator HATCH. I would be happy to.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. I am going to start with you, Mr. Christmas, and I am going to—I am going to say that for 4 days now we have had a lot of people exercise their public constitutional rights to speak, as you have heard it this day, afraid of Judge Kavanaugh being a Justice on the Supreme Court. We have three or four panel people right here that you have heard their own testimony. And so, there is this fear that he does not—might not take into consideration the needs of people less fortunate than he is with various problems that we have heard expressed here. So, I think you probably spoke a little bit to this in your testimony, but emphasize for us—speak not to me, but to the people that have these concerns.

Mr. CHRISTMAS. Well, Senator, I understand those concerns. I do not share that fear. Brett is one of the most thoughtful, empathetic people I know. I have spent much time with him talking about issues that are very dear to me. He has been generous with his insight. He cares, and I think that empathy that he naturally exhibits will serve him well, and I would encourage people to understand this man is thoughtful, is humble, and thinks to understand before he makes himself understood.

Chairman GRASSLEY. From your point—I will follow up. From your point as a lawyer and as—you expect a judge to look at the facts of the case and the—what the law is, and leave their own personal views out of it. So, can you explain, to the people that have these concerns about him, those things that have to be taken into consideration that maybe do not deal exactly with a person that has special medical problems like you have heard here today?

Mr. CHRISTMAS. Yes, and I recall Brett, when he came to my wedding—I should say, Judge Kavanaugh—and he spent time with my family. I recall him speaking at length with members of my family who had no real knowledge of what it is like to be a judge and be involved in DC and the way that Judge Kavanaugh is. And I was just struck by how easily and comfortably he was able to speak to everybody who he had just met during that wedding. There was a period where my niece graduated from Howard University and I had mentioned to Judge Kavanaugh that I may come out, and he arranged for 20 of the members of my family to tour the West Wing, and he showed up on a Saturday with a couple of his aides. That is the sort of the person he is.

So, I understand the concerns, but the man I know is generous with his time and thought, and I love the discussion about process. He seeks to not be influenced by people outside, and he is one of the most prepared, thoughtful people I know.

Chairman GRASSLEY. I will end with Mr. Kramer. Not being a lawyer, but I can assume what public defenders do, you are dealing mostly, defending people that do not have resources of their own, and, in fact, that may be a hundred percent of your clientele. You have heard, several days, that my colleague from New Jersey has expressed concern about people that cannot defend themselves in court, the jury system not working the way it traditionally works, and mandatory minimums, all that.

Can you give people of low-income that you represent, maybe other problems, that—the assurance that they are going to get their concerns addressed the way they ought to be through somebody that is on the Supreme Court?

Mr. KRAMER. Thank you, Chairman Grassley. Yes, absolutely, and I tried to get that out. The fact—the reason that I am here is because of the fairness that Judge Kavanaugh has shown. Our clients are without resources, and tend not to be a very popular group. And Judge Kavanaugh has shown through my experience, my numerous arguments in front of him, and the opinions he has written a belief in the fundamental—and I completely share Senator Booker's views on the criminal justice system. But Judge Kavanaugh has shown through his opinions in the criminal cases that I have argued as well as his service on the CJ committee that I have been involved with a concern for the fundamental fairness of the system and a—that people should be—even though they are without resources and represented by a public defender, that they should have the best representation possible. And that is why I wholeheartedly support his nomination.

And I note one more thing that is, in a sense, to me remarkable. Usually a judge who wants to be confirmed for a position or another court would never have a public defender in the hearings talking in support of them. And I think that, again, shows Judge Kavanaugh's concern for the fundamental fairness of the system, and that is why I support him.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay.

Senator Whitehouse.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you, Chairman.

Aalayah, may I use your first name? I could call you "Ms. Eastmond," if you wanted.

Ms. EASTMOND. No, it is fine.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Aalayah, I just wanted to tell you that you have had to live through an experience that no child should have to live through, and what you have brought into this hearing room from that experience has been stunning.

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Your testimony was incredibly well delivered—

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. And incredibly well prepared, and I hope that not only you, but your friends and family who are with here today are very, very proud of what you have been able to draw out of that horrible experience you went through.

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Take care of yourself because these things do not go away.

Ms. EASTMOND. Yes.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. But keep doing what you are doing—

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE [continuing]. And do it with pride and confidence because you really shone today.

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And, Jackson, may I use your first name as well? I just want to thank you, as well. It may seem a little weird coming from an old guy across the podium, but when I was 13 I was about your size, and I know what it is like to be the small kid. And I just want you to know that when you spoke today, you were the biggest person in this room.

Mr. CORBIN. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And you did a wonderful, wonderful job, and you brought a really important message to us. So, to you and to your family and friends who are here, congratulations. Well done. Please be proud and keep your voice.

Mr. CORBIN. Thank you.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Hunter, you and I have a—may I use your first name also? At some point, you know, you can say, "no, I would prefer you call me 'Mr. Lachance.'"

Mr. LACHANCE. No, "Hunter" is fine.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Okay, "Hunter" is fine. You and I share a similar predicament. We are the inhabitants of downwind States. Rhode Island, like Maine, is a tailpipe State, and if it were not for the EPA, there is nothing that our State environmental officials could do to protect us from out-of-State pollution, very often from coal-burning plants and so forth. And we have the same situation you do. We have a lot of kids, and when the air gets bad, you often see them in the emergency room. You have situations in Rhode Island where we are—you know, you are driving into work in the morning and it is a beautiful day, the sun is shining. You should be out playing. You know these days. But on the radio you hear today is a bad air day, and we want little kids, we want old people, and we want people with breathing difficulties to stay inside on what would otherwise be a great day for you to be out swimming and playing sports and doing all those things. So, the voice that you brought here was very, very important.

To each of you I would say, part of the problem that I have in this whole nominations process is, that you are up against enormously powerful forces on the other side. The National Rifle Association essentially has dominion over Congress with respect to everything that has to do with guns and the ammunition that tore through your friends. The—I do not know what you would call it, a “mania,” a “fetish,” an “ideological crusade”—against providing your family with reliable healthcare simply makes no sense to me, and yet it is enormously powerful. And we came very, very close to a vote here where it would have been taken away from you.

And so, and, of course, the polluters have almost as much dominion around here in Congress as the NRA does. They bring in phony scientists who quarrel with the real science because they are paid to quarrel even if their science is not real. And they do economic studies that only show the harm to the polluting companies and totally omit what it is like to be you on a day that you cannot breathe except, like, through that little coffee straw.

So, this is a one-sided place, and the forces that have the most money and that make the most money are able to use it here in ways that keep very, very unbalanced. And my concern is that the current Republican Majority on the Supreme Court and the decisions of Judge Kavanaugh reflect a desire to enhance that power to defer decisions that the Court could make into this very unbalanced forum, to diminish the regulatory agencies where there is the actual expertise to understand and say how chlorophora carbons work, or what a loose guy filing should look like for a new stock offering, or complicated things like that.

And so, that is my biggest concern, and I am not going to take any more time because I have burned it all already. But I really, really was so impressed with each of the three of you, and I just wanted to say thank you. Well done. Do not ever give up. Those other forces may be big, but this is still our country.

Thank you.

Senator HATCH [presiding]. Mr. Kramer, as a public defender, you have spent your career representing defendants who do not have the money for a fancy law firm—

Mr. KRAMER. Yes.

Senator HATCH [continuing]. Or any kind of a law firm, who may have been accused of some very serious misconduct. Now, when appearing before Judge Kavanaugh, have you ever felt that your client’s economic status or situation or charged conducted affected the Judge’s treatment of your client?

Mr. KRAMER. No, I would say just the opposite, that they have always been treated without regard to any of those factors.

Senator HATCH. How have you ever had a case where you felt your client’s economic situation or charged conducted affect Judge Kavanaugh’s decision in the case?

Mr. KRAMER. I do not think it has ever affected his decision in a case. He examines the facts and the law and decides based on that without regard to those circumstances.

Senator HATCH. Well, he is a judge who is most well known for his jurisprudence on broad structural issues, like the separation of statutory interpretation or the—well, sometimes his jurisprudence on individual rights gets less attention. For example, his discussions of the importance of mens rea requirements, which I am very concerned about, and the problems, among many things, and the problems inherent in sentencing based on acquitted conduct. How has the—how has Judge Kavanaugh contributed to criminal law and the rights of defendants?

Mr. KRAMER. Well, in the acquitted conduct, he is bound by Supreme Court precedent, but he has encouraged judges as a matter of discretion, which they have to not use acquitted conduct for sentence. He has in a number of cases, some of which I have argued, on mens rea, he has reversed convictions or noted in concurrences that—or dissents that he believes that people should not be convicted of certain crimes without the proper mens rea. And he has written a number of those cases. So, I think in both of those areas, those are important individual rights for my clients.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you.

Ms. Mahoney, you have known Judge Kavanaugh for over 2 decades since both of you were in the Solicitor General's Office together at the Justice Department. You have also appeared before him in Court. Now, what kind of a jurist is he on the bench?

Ms. MAHONEY. Phenomenal. I—

Senator HATCH. Do you have an advantage because you had served with him before?

Ms. MAHONEY. No, no, I am sure it was not an advantage.

Senator HATCH. What is the matter of him?

Ms. MAHONEY. Yes, right, I am sure it was not an advantage. He is extremely careful about his work, and one of the harder—hardest-working judges out there, and that is the way he was in the Solicitor General's Office, too. He is kind of renowned for his work ethic, for trying to find an answer in the case. And I think he believes that if you look long enough and hard enough, in most cases the answer is going to come, and it is just a product of doing the work.

Senator HATCH. Well, that is great. How many other lawyers have worked with Judge Kavanaugh or argued cases before him? You know many of them—

Ms. MAHONEY. I do not—I know most of the Appellate Bar in Washington, DC. Many of them have argued before him. Many of them know him from working with him either in the White House—

Senator HATCH. What are their opinions?

Ms. MAHONEY. I do not know anyone who does not put Judge Kavanaugh in just the highest category they can come up with. He is—he is remarkable, and people really adore him. I will tell you that, you know, around Washington, at least in my world, when people who were debating who would be appointed to the Supreme Court when Justice Kennedy retired, the answer from almost everybody that I talked to was, well, it ought to be Brett Kavanaugh.

So, I mean, this was—you know, this is the Supreme Court Bar and the Appellate Bar in the Washington, DC, area, but there is just really deep uniform respect for him as a jurist and as a man.

Senator HATCH. Everybody I know who knows him speaks very glowingly of him—

Ms. MAHONEY. Glowingly.

Senator HATCH [continuing]. Just like you.

Ms. MAHONEY. Uniformly glowingly.

Senator HATCH. Well, it seems to me he is precisely the type of person we want on the Bench.

Ms. MAHONEY. It would be a travesty if he does not get a hundred votes.

[Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. Well, you have put a lot of pressure—

Ms. MAHONEY. There you go. Just do that.

[Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. Keep it up. I appreciate that.

Ms. MAHONEY. Right.

Senator HATCH. We are happy to have all of you here. This is very important, and your testimonies all will be paid—given serious attention. Let us—who is next on this—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Senator Blumenthal.

Senator HATCH. Senator Blumenthal, you are next.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Senator Hatch. I want to join in thanking all of you for being here. This is another great panel. I want to join my colleague, Senator Whitehouse, who very eloquently and powerfully thanked Aalayah Eastmond, and Jackson Corbin, and Hunter Lachance. You have really shown us how an individual voice can make such a difference. But I also want to thank Melissa Smith for your comments on how a collective voice can be impactful, and a lot of young people would not have their individual voices but for your service as a teacher.

I have always thought that being a teacher, along with being police, firefighter, emergency responders, you are the unsung heroes, our public service employees. I want to thank you for your personal testimony about the importance of the issues that matter in real lives to real people and have real impact.

Ms. SMITH. Thank you.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And I want to ask Aalayah Eastmond, since we are talking about real people and real lives, you know, in Connecticut we had—we had a tragedy similar to the one you experienced. And I lived through an afternoon and then a week similar to what you did in Parkland, not the same firsthand experience that you did, but I saw the impact on loved ones, and children, and parents, and teachers as you did. And I saw the impact on moms and dads like Fred Guttenberg, who was here earlier in the week, as you know, and you commented in your testimony about him.

If I were Judge Kavanaugh, who, as you know, said that assault weapons should not be banned, cannot be banned, under the Second Amendment of the Constitution, what would you say to him?

Ms. EASTMOND. That my life, along with all the other youth, is more important than that gun.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And if he said to you, you know, there is this legal principle that says unless it was a ban or one analogous to it at the time of our Constitution or traditionally in our law, what would you say about the real impact of that kind of assault weapon on your life?

Ms. EASTMOND. Yes, it is unimaginable. The shooter at my school shot 34 kids in under 6 minutes, and that gun ended 17 lives on February 14th. That gun ended lives at Sandy Hook. That gun ended lives all over the country, and there are mass shootings that happen almost every month. And I believe that that gun needs to be banned, any assault rifle, and he needs to listen to us because our lives are just as important as any American's freedom to own a gun.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Well, I hope that Judge Kavanaugh is listening to you. Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Senator Lee.

Senator LEE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thanks so much to all of you for being here. My friend and colleague, Senator Kennedy from Louisiana, had to step out for a few minutes and was not sure whether he will back in time, but he asked me to convey to you his gratitude to each of you for your testimony and your willingness to provide insights.

Ms. Mahoney, I would like to start with you. I heard mention a minute ago speculation about unfair advantage in court. And, Senator Hatch, I can tell you, she always has an unfair advantage in court because she is so good. You have always been one of my favorite litigators to watch argue cases in the Supreme Court. It is an odd little hobby of mine watching Supreme Court litigants, and I always enjoyed you arguing.

One of the things I have appreciated about your arguments is that you focus on the law. You focus on what—why your client's case is right, and you focus—you seem to have an approach that echoes something that you said a minute ago, which is that if you are willing to go to the hard work of finding the right answer in a case, you can find the right answer. The law will normally supply a correct answer, and you seem to believe that Judge Kavanaugh shares this view.

Tell me how that can instill a sense of civility among members of the Bar and among jurists, the belief that there is a right answer in the law.

Ms. MAHONEY. I think—I think there is a right answer in the law. I think he believes that, and it—and it should instill a sense of confidence in the Judiciary because there is sort of this pervasive view that the Justices are—or it is becoming more pervasive that the Justices are just partisans, you know, deciding for their team. And I certainly do not believe that is the case. I do not think that is what is going on. There are different ideologies, but I do not think it is partisanship. And I think that Justice—Judge Kavanaugh—Justice Kavanaugh hopefully—will perform will his role in a way that people will understand that he is just working to get the answer, the way he asks questions, the way he probes evenly, the way he shows respect for everyone, and the way he explains his decisions, and the way he surprises people sometimes with the way that he rules.

You will not be happy—Republicans will not be happy every time. Democrats will not be happy every time. But it will be a product of his reasoning and his effort and his work in the case. And I think Americans should be grateful for that kind of judicial approach, whether they are Republicans or Democrats, and I would hope that we could get beyond some of this polarization.

Senator LEE. As someone who has devoted her career to arguing in front of the Supreme Court, you can confirm that there is no aisle, there is no political aisle in the Supreme Court.

Ms. MAHONEY. There is no political aisle. No, there is not.

Senator LEE. And, in fact, 5-to-4 decisions are very rare.

Ms. MAHONEY. They are very rare, yes, they are.

Senator LEE. Ms. Taibleson, I appreciated your comments. Having served as a law clerk myself, I know that there is a special bond and relationship that develops between a law clerk and the judge or Justice for whom the law clerk is working. One of the reasons for that is, you are able to interact with the jurist on a day-to-day basis, not only in seeing, in your case, how Judge Kavanaugh interacted with his law clerks, but also how he interacted with his colleagues. What can you tell us about what you saw and what—how that would portend for how he would interact with colleagues regardless of their backgrounds and regardless of what some people might identify as their political ideologies?

Ms. TAIBLESON. Certainly, Senator. The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals is composed of many judges who have diverse views on the law and on judicial philosophy, more generally. But at least when I was there, their views of Judge Kavanaugh are not diverse. Instead, they uniformly respect him. They appreciate his collegiality, his ability, his hard work, and ultimately the fact that he is a straight shooter. There are certainly always going to be disagreements, but those are disagreements that he has in good faith. There is no hidden agenda, nothing like that. He says what he means, and he means what he says.

I think on the Supreme Court, he is going to bring those same characteristics, and I think he is going to be sort of a uniter for that reason. I think he is going to bring out the best in his fellow Justices should he be fortunate enough to be confirmed, and is going to have great relationships with Justices across the ideological spectrum.

Senator LEE. Thank you.

Ms. Smith, I have great respect for teachers. Both my parents worked as educators in different capacities at different points in their careers, and they always taught me to have great respect for my teachers, especially social studies teachers because of the importance of the subject matter you teach. Can you help me understand, I understand that resources are scarce and resources—more resources often need to be devoted to public education to make sure that you as a teacher and your colleagues, those with whom you work, have the capacity to do your job, to educate people. Help me understand the connection between your concern for those resources and the jurisprudential philosophy of this Federal judge.

Ms. SMITH. One of my biggest concerns is his positions on public school vouchers. Taking money from public education to give a few select people some choice takes money from us to fund someone else's education. We will be left in my district with the majority of our—of our same students with less funding than we have now, so—

Senator LEE. Well, when you say “his position,” you do not mean his policy position because he is acting not as a policymaker, but as a jurist deciding on whether or not something is lawful, deciding whether or not the policymakers are empowered to make that decision.

Ms. SMITH. Right, I understand—

Senator LEE. Is there not a difference between those two things?

Ms. SMITH. Yes and no. We often believe that our—whether they be elected officials or judges are not supposed to bring their personal views into it and only base decisions on the laws, but it does not always seem like that is the case. Maybe not with Judge Kavanaugh, but there is always a concern that personal views will influence judgment. That is a concern that teachers have, that students have. And when he has publicly spoken in support of public school vouchers, that is a concern that we have.

Senator LEE. I see my time has expired.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

Senator Booker.

Senator BOOKER. I did not mind if he kept going. I did not want—I know I am the last person, I think, sir.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Well, we have got another panel waiting.

Senator BOOKER. Oh, you do have another panel. I apologize.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. Okay. First of all, I just want to thank all the panelists for coming. I really do appreciate you participating in this process, and it is extraordinarily helpful.

Aalayah, your testimony was really heartbreaking and painful to listen, but the poise with which you spoke of something that I know is horrific and unimaginable was extraordinary.

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator BOOKER. Extraordinary.

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator BOOKER. And there are specific policy things that you all are advocating for. I know—I have met with lots of the students from Parkland, and I am just wondering if you—just give you another opportunity, not just because I also think you are extraordinarily eloquent speaker.

Ms. EASTMOND. Thanks.

Senator BOOKER. But are there any particular policy issues that you all are advocating for, that you can maybe speak to in a little more detail about what you would like to see and how that relates to a Supreme Court Justice?

Ms. EASTMOND. Yes. Right now we are focusing on an assault weapons ban because they are just unnecessary. Next year I will be 18, and I could get an assault rifle. Like, why I would need that? And also, high-capacity magazines, we want those gone, too. And also, my focus, I really want people from the Congress to focus on the youth from Black and Brown communities because that is often the elephant in the room that nobody wants to talk about, and their lives are being taken away every single day. So, I think focusing on the entire spectrum of gun violence and not only mass shooting, but the shootings that happen every day in urban communities, are just as important.

Senator BOOKER. And I guess that is what spoke to me a lot because I live in a community with a lot of—even though my incredible mayor has done a lot to lower the shootings in my city, we still have a lot of—I had one on my block just this year where someone was murdered with an assault weapon at the top of the hill where I live. And I appreciate your concerns about that, and your advocacy is extraordinary. And I think that for you and the other young people on this panel, you should know in many ways your voices can be more powerful than any adult. And I just really want to thank everybody, all three of you, for being there.

Ms. EASTMOND. Thank you.

Senator BOOKER. Mr. Kramer, you said that generally you agree with me on criminal justice issues?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes.

Senator BOOKER. That is all I wanted to hear.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. No, sir.

Mr. KRAMER. That is good enough for me.

Senator BOOKER. Good enough for me as well. No, sir, the—can you just give me—I tried to make a point yesterday about the balance of power shifting in American law. I mean, we seem to have a right to a jury, but that seems to me, and I am not saying you should agree with me on this. I just want to hear your real opinion on it. It is really shifting dramatically because in a plea bargain, which is not really a fair bargain, but now prosecutors have a lot more of a—of a threat of jeopardy to offer—to offer that makes often people take a plea bargain because they are too afraid of going to trial. When they do go to trial, the chances for success are pretty low, and I know that public defenders often will let people know what the reality is. Is that shift in our American criminal justice system happening?

Mr. KRAMER. Senator Booker, that is a great question, and absolutely. I think you know the statistics. Over 97 percent of the cases in Federal court pleaded guilty last year, and similar statistics in State court, and I would not call it a “plea bargain.” I would call it a “plea imposition.” The terms are given. You take it. And you are absolutely right about mandatory minimum sentences skewing the power in the system. It is all in the prosecutor’s hands.

I have been around for a long time and seen a huge power shift as a result of sentencing guidelines, mandatory minimums, and just draconian sentences, especially of people of color. It has affected disproportionately. And so, yes, you are absolutely right, there has been a huge shift.

Senator BOOKER. And that is the painful thing for me is, I see young kids getting caught up for drug crimes that kids in privileged communities. You know, I, too, went to Yale, I went to Stanford. Lots of drugs. Lots of drugs. I will not make any personal confessions right now, but lots of drugs.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. And so, here are kids getting charges for doing things that two of the last Presidents admitted to doing, and then they are presented with a plea. I have had young kids sit in my office and say, hey, look, I was terrified, facing 10 years, stacked mandatory minimums. This guy told me I can get out right now, and then I end up with a—then I end up with a criminal conviction, but they do not realize that is a lifetime sentence.

And so, I guess, just can you make this point for me, that this idea of a right to a jury trial, that is kind of being eroded in the United States of America. Would you agree with me?

Mr. KRAMER. I would call it a disappearing right, Senator Booker. And also, I think you are absolutely right, and since you did not make any confessions, I do not feel I have to make any either.

[Laughter.]

Senator BOOKER. You are good.

Mr. KRAMER. But you are right, there is—you are talking about the neighborhoods. There are tactics in various neighborhoods that if they were engaged in other neighborhoods in the cities or suburbs that would just be—they would not be tolerated by the population there, but because of a powerless population in the neighborhoods where it does occur. And so, you are right on both points about the tactics that occur in various neighborhoods, and you are absolutely right about the disappearance of the—of the jury trial.

Senator BOOKER. Okay, thank you. My time has expired. I just want to say something to Mr. Christmas because I have met—Mr. Christmas and I know—have previous—we have met each other before. And I just want to testify to your character because it is a tough—you said something—he said something that was really—I think really important about the partisanship and the tribalism often, and how friendships are tested, that you were speaking to what you know of him as a friend, not as a judge, but as a friend, and I want to appreciate that.

And I want to make an open offer for you because you stopped playing basketball because of your age. The Senate has a basketball game, and I promise you there are age-appropriate of us that can play, and you probably would be like Michael Jordan if you came and played amongst us.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CHRISTMAS. I will do my best.

Senator BOOKER. All right. Thank you, sir.

Chairman GRASSLEY. We have two things left for this panel. Senator Kennedy, you want some time. And then Senator—well, now, we are going to have Senator Hirono, too. Go ahead, Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. I had to step out for a few minutes, but I heard your testimony, each of you, and I just want to thank you for it. And I know you each spent a lot of time putting the testimony together. This stuff does not just write itself. I was—mentioned to the earlier panel, I enjoy this immensely. I learn a lot from listening to your different perspectives, and I just want to thank you.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Hirono does not want to be recognized.

Senator HIRONO. Mr. Chairman, I have questions for the next panel—

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Senator HIRONO [continuing]. But I certainly thank this panel for being here.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. Yes. I am—for courtesy to the Ranking Member, he wants to speak for a minute to some people on the panel.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes, thank you very much, Chairman. I just wanted to make one point because there is so much discussion about mens rea, and I just wanted to provide what I see as some context for this. I have read Judge Kavanaugh's decisions on mens rea, which have focused so far on individual defendants, and very often individual defendants who faced very significant terms of incarceration. And I see no objection whatsoever in any of the decisions that I have read of his.

I have also been at the center of the effort to try to negotiate a sentencing and reentry reform package, along with Senator Cornyn, Senator Grassley, and Senator Booker, and Senator Lee, and others. And as we did that, what began to pop up and what popped up through big industry-funded groups, was a late-arriving desire to reform mens rea. And the obvious motive for that is a group of offenses, a category of offenses, that are called "public welfare offenses."

And those are offenses in which we say, particularly about a dangerous instrumentality, like a pollutant, or benzi, or dynamite, or something like that, that at some point if you are a big corporation and something really goes wrong—you spill your 10,000th barrel—that is a crime, and we do not care what your mens rea, what your degree of intent is. Your job as a big corporation that pollutes or has dangerous things is, to make sure that does not happen. That is why we put that marker out there. And it is a very well-established type of criminal conduct, is it not, Mr. Kramer?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes, absolutely. Public regulatory offenses like that, they are—there are a number of them, right, that have no mens rea requirement.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And my worry, and I will just put this out, there is a marker, and this will be telling if it happens, is, if this body of precedent that Judge Kavanaugh is building up with respect to individual defendants who face significant terms of incarceration all of a sudden has a very big morph and suddenly becomes the basis for an attack on these public welfare offenses. I have seen that maneuver begin to happen in Congress, and if it starts to happen in the courts, to me, at least, that would be another telling sign of the big influencers and interests that operate so much of what happens in our court systems coming in to seize a prize. And I hope that we do not go there.

Mr. KRAMER. Did you want me to respond? If you want me to respond briefly, I do not want to—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Go ahead and respond briefly.

Mr. KRAMER. The only thing I can say, and I know exactly what you are talking about, is that, Judge Kavanaugh, the opinions he has written are in cases that have a mens rea requirement, knowing, willfully. And I have never seen him write that it should be extended to public with—he is—in other words, he is going with the will of Congress and what Congress enacted. And I have never seen him take that step in an opinion—

Senator WHITEHOUSE. And I hope he never does.

Mr. KRAMER. Of a case—of a crime without a mens rea requirement.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Once again, even though I thanked you once, we know you go to a lot of work to do this for the people of this country and the Senate in the consideration of this nomination. Thank you very much, and you are dismissed.

Before I introduce the next panel and swear the next panel, I want to take the opportunity to give appreciation from the Chairman of the Committee for all the staff work that goes into this. And I have been fortunate as a Senator to have an outstanding staff over many years, and I hope they know how much I appreciate them, both Committee staff and Personal Office.

Before closing this hearing today, I would like to name staffers specifically assigned to work on this nomination hearing. Some are my permanent staff, led by Chief Counsel for Nominations Mike Davis, and including Lauren Mehler, Steve Kenney, Jessica Vu, and Katharine Willey.

And then others are here only temporarily because we get additional resources when we have a Supreme Court nominee, so I want to name them and say thank you for their extraordinary work and commitment to public service. The special counsels added specifically for this Supreme Court nomination were led by Andrew Ferguson and included Tyler Badgley, Lucas Croslow, Colleen Ernst, Megan McGlynn, and Collin White. The law clerks were Camille Peeples, Abby Hollenstein, Tim Rodriguez, Dario Camacho, Elizabeth Donald, Bob Minchin, Nathan Williams, Sam Adkisson, Nick Gallagher, Michael Talent, Asher Perez, Garrett Ventry, as did Jacob Ramer as an intern.

So I thank the legal team for their important part in the Senate's consideration of Judge Kavanaugh.

I think before I introduce you, I would ask that you stand so I can swear you, please.

[Witnesses are sworn in.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you all very much. I know a lot of you here, names I recognize, you are famous around town and famous in history, so I probably will not do justice to your introduction.

Monica Mastal is a real estate agent in Washington, DC. She has known Judge Kavanaugh for 25 years.

John Dean, who I have known not as a person but I have known since before I even got to Congress by his reputation, served as Richard Nixon's White House Counsel from 1970 to 1973.

And then, of course, famous lawyer Paul Clement is a partner of Kirkland & Ellis, served as Solicitor General of the United States 2005 to 2008 and has argued over 90 cases before the Supreme Court. Judge Kavanaugh and Mr. Clement clerked at the same time on the Supreme Court. Judge Kavanaugh clerked for Justice Kennedy—and the Justice's whose big shoes Judge Kavanaugh is nominated to fill—when Mr. Clement clerked for the late Justice Scalia.

Professor Rebecca Ingber—I hope that is right—is an assistant professor of law, Boston University School of Law.

Professor Adam White has had me on panels with an organization he is with, and he is also from Iowa, not right now from Iowa but was born in Dubuque, Iowa. By the way, I talked about you in my opening statement this morning. Professor Adam White is assistant professor at George Mason University Antonin Scalia Law School and is executive director of C. Boyden Gray Center for the Study of Administrative State. He is also a research fellow at the Hoover Institution and a member of the Administrative Conference of the United States. And I also had a chance to meet your parents about an hour ago, and they came out just especially for you.

Professor Lisa Heinzerling, is that right? Is a Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., Professor of Law at Georgetown University Law Center.

Professor Jennifer Mascott served as a law clerk for Judge Kavanaugh from 2006 to 2007 and went on to clerk for Justice Clarence Thomas, Supreme Court. She is an assistant professor of law at George Mason University Antonin Scalia Law School and is counsel to the law firm Consovoy McCarthy Park.

Professor Peter Shane is the Jacob E. Davis and Jacob E. Davis II Chair in Law at the Ohio State University Moritz College of Law.

So will you proceed, Ms. Mastal?

STATEMENT OF MONICA MASTAL, REAL ESTATE AGENT,
WASHINGTON, DC

Ms. MASTAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Whitehouse, and Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, I am honored to be here today to address you in support of my friend and my daughter's favorite coach, the Honorable Brett Kavanaugh. My testimony today will not be from a legal perspective but from a personal and parental perspective. Consider it more about the person than the nominee.

I have known Judge Kavanaugh for many years, but in recent years have seen him on a regular basis thanks to his position as the coach of the CYO girls fifth and sixth grade basketball team at Blessed Sacrament School. In our house, he is not known as Judge Kavanaugh but as Coach K. He was my daughter's coach for 2 years. Our first year, his daughter was in fourth grade and therefore ineligible for the team. He still coached. In my book, that alone qualifies him for sainthood.

As a high school and college player, Coach K had the job prerequisite of basketball knowledge. More importantly, however, he had the other necessary attributes of patience, fairness, and diplomacy, and he had them in spades. Fairness with young players and opposing teams, patience with boisterous parents, and diplomacy with referees who are on their fifth game of the day and making some questionable calls.

In the few hours a week of practices and games, Judge Kavanaugh teaches much more than the fundamentals of basketball. All of the other important concepts were there, too: teamwork, hard work, commitment, setting and achieving goals, and striving to be your best. It is an enormous task to communicate all of that to young girls in so little time, but his calm demeanor got the message across. No yelling or gavel was necessary.

Of course, the Kavanaugh's contribution to our community extends beyond basketball. School auctions, food drives, and service projects are abundant at Blessed Sacrament, and Brett and Ashley are always there to participate.

This leads me to another personal perspective: Brett is relatable to everyday Americans. In the public eye, Supreme Court Justices are strictly cerebral, ethical, humble, and courageous. He is all of those things, but I am one of the everyday Americans who sees him getting his children to practice, managing four games a weekend, serving as a lector at church, running on the high school track, and socializing with friends.

As my final note today, I would like to read Coach Kavanaugh's "final note" to my daughter, from his end-of-the-season player evaluation. I share this with the utmost confidence that every player on the team received the same honest, appreciative, supportive, heartfelt, and confidence-building message. It stated: "Thanks, Mary Grace. You are an excellent athlete and were a great contributor to the team. We loved your spirit and attitude. We really enjoyed coaching you and wish you all the best. We look forward to having you on the team next year. Keep up your great spirit, attitude, and work ethic and you will be a big success in all you do." It kind of makes me want to go back to fifth-grade basketball.

Thank you for the opportunity to share this personal perspective. As the great UCLA basketball coach John Wooden said, "Young people need models, not critics." I think this final note says it all as to the model Coach Kavanaugh has been to our children. I know the parents of his players feel as fortunate as I do that our girls had such a wonderful mentor. Through basketball, he taught them the skills they will need not only for a season, but for a lifetime.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Mastal appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Mr. Dean.

STATEMENT OF JOHN W. DEAN, FORMER COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT, PRESIDENT RICHARD M. NIXON, BEVERLY HILLS, CALIFORNIA

Mr. DEAN. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member, Members of the Committee, thank you for the invitation. In my allotted time, I would like to take a few points from the statement I have submitted for the record.

I have made two overriding points in that submitted statement. First, if Judge Kavanaugh joins the Court, it will be the most Presidential-power-friendly court in the modern era. Republicans and conservatives only a few years ago, I know well, fought the expansion of Presidential power and Executive powers. That is no longer true.

Judge Kavanaugh has a very broad view of Presidential powers. For example, he would have the Congress immunize sitting Presidents from both civil and criminal liability. Under Judge Kavanaugh's recommendation, if a President shot somebody in cold blood on Fifth Avenue, that President could not be prosecuted while in office. Also, it is not clear to me listening to the testimony that he really believes U.S. v. Nixon was correctly decided.

A second general point from my submission, a very vital, I think, process point, Ranking Member Dianne Feinstein stated on the morning of September 4 just before the hearings opened that after participating in nine Supreme Court confirmations, it had never been so difficult to get access to background documents relating to a nominee as in the current proceedings. Unsuccessfully, the Minority sought to postpone these hearings until all the requested documents were provided. The Chair, however, declined to consider the motion that would make review possible.

This Committee is deeply involved in the final phase of vetting Supreme Court nominees. Based on personal experiences with the confirmation, for example, of William Rehnquist and studying the confirmation of Clarence Thomas, it is clear there was an across-the-board failure to fully vet the nominees, and it has haunted their careers on the Court, it has hurt the Court and the American people. Because of the withholding of documents, Judge Kavanaugh may be traveling the same path as Rehnquist and Thomas.

When writing a book that I did several years ago, "The Rehnquist Choice," I explained how Rehnquist was selected by Nixon as one of the two—for two openings that occurred in 1971. I also reported my sad discovery that Rehnquist had dissembled during his confirmation proceedings. He did, however, notwithstanding false statements, become an Associate Justice.

When Ronald Reagan nominated him to be Chief Justice in 1986, again, he was not vetted, and in those hearings he was confronted not only with his early false statements but new material that resulted in new false statements. All the Court historians that I have examined as well as Court scholars find clear and convincing evidence that Mr. Rehnquist lied in his two confirmation proceedings. This hurt him and it hurt the Court.

Because Justice Thomas was not fully vetted, his career on the Court has been under a cloud as well. Justice Thomas' truthfulness vis-a-vis Professor Anita Hill's claims of sexual harassment have never been fully resolved, nor has the controversy ever ended. A definitive study of this controversy was undertaken in 1994 by journalists Jane Mayer and Jill Abramson, "Strange Justice: The Selling of Clarence Thomas." They found a preponderance of evidence that supported Anita Hill's claims. This controversy has received renewed attention with the #MeToo movement, which is growing stronger and it is not going to disappear. In fact, Justice Thomas' truthfulness is an issue in this year's midterm elections. A Democratic candidate in Massachusetts has made impeachment of Thomas for his false claims during his confirmation one of the planks of her campaign.

In closing, Judge Kavanaugh's nomination has raised issues about the truthfulness of his confirmation to become a judge on the D.C. Circuit. His answers to this Committee have not resolved the issue. Frankly, I am surprised that Judge Kavanaugh is not demanding that every document that he has ever handled be reviewed by this Committee unless, of course, there is something to hide.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Dean appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Mr. Dean.

Now, Mr. Clement.

STATEMENT OF HON. PAUL D. CLEMENT, PARTNER, KIRKLAND & ELLIS LLP, AND FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, WASHINGTON, DC

Mr. CLEMENT. Thank you, Chairman Grassley, Senator Whitehouse, and Members of the Committee. It is a great pleasure and honor to return to the Senate Judiciary Committee where I served as a staffer some two decades ago. It is an even greater pleasure and honor to be here today to testify in support of the confirmation of Judge Kavanaugh's nomination to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Judge Kavanaugh and I first met some 25 years ago when we clerked at the Supreme Court together during the same term for different Justices. Although the law clerks were an impressive bunch, Brett immediately stood out. Unlike most of the rest of us whose legal experience consisted of a single appellate clerkship, Brett came to his Supreme Court clerkship with two clerkships under his belt already on the Ninth and Third Circuits, and he had also served as a Bristow Fellow in the Office of the Solicitor General, where he spent a year following the Court closely and working on briefs in opposition and other Supreme Court filings.

As a result, while the rest of us were feeling our way rather blindly through the process of preparing our first pool memos and sorting through our first sets of briefs, Brett was already fully versed in the Court's certiorari criteria, rules, and even stood ready to handicap the likely quality of upcoming oral arguments by members of the Supreme Court bar. Brett quickly came to be seen by his fellow law clerks as a resource on everything from the minutia of Supreme Court practice to matters of high constitutional doctrine.

But what really stood out about Brett was not just his knowledge of the Court and the law, but the undeniable fact that he was a well-rounded, likable, and unpretentious person. You expect a Supreme Court law clerk to have a first-rate legal mind. You do not necessarily expect a Supreme Court law clerk to have a sweet jump shot. I can tell you from firsthand experience that Brett had both. He was as comfortable talking about how to break a full-court press as he was discussing the Rooker-Feldman doctrine.

For all these reasons, Brett was admired by fellow clerks from all chambers and across ideological lines. None of us was the least surprised to see him become the first of our ranks to argue a Supreme Court case and the first to become a Federal appellate court judge, beating out Justice Gorsuch by a nose.

Judge Kavanaugh and I became friends during our clerkship year and have remained friends ever since. But I am not here today testifying out of friendship. Rather, I am testifying today because of what I have seen in observing Judge Kavanaugh in his over 12 years of service on the Federal appellate bench.

By happenstance, I was in the courtroom to witness one of Judge Kavanaugh's first oral arguments as an appellate judge. He was incredibly well-prepared. He demonstrated a mastery of the record and asked penetrating questions of both sides. He carefully listened to the arguing attorneys' answers, as well as the questions emanating from his more seasoned colleagues. None of this surprised me, but I was struck by the fact that he was expressing this mastery of the record and a profound interest in the legal arguments in the context of a petition for review from a decision of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, or "FERC."

Now, at least in my days as a law clerk on the D.C. Circuit, FERC cases were not among the most coveted by the law clerks or the judges. FERC cases were notoriously complex, with long administrative records filled with strange acronyms and doctrines unknown in other areas of the law. I feared for my friend Judge Kavanaugh that he would be saddled with the assignment of the FERC case while his more senior colleagues authored opinions in higher-profile cases addressing more readily accessible doctrines.

While my fears were realized, I am quite sure that Judge Kavanaugh did not mind. As I have seen in the ensuing 12 years, he approaches every case with the same thorough approach, regardless to the amount in controversy, the degree of notoriety, or the agency involved. He recognizes that each case is the most important case for the clients and lawyers involved and treats each case accordingly.

Let me close with just a few words about judicial temperament. The concept has been much discussed in the course of other judicial confirmation hearings, but the topic has received less attention in the course of these particular hearings because Judge Kavanaugh has so plainly demonstrated the requisite judicial temperament over his years on the D.C. Circuit.

That said, I believe it is a mistake to think of judicial temperament as if it is a binary characteristic, something a judicial candidate either has or lacks. Instead, there are degrees of judicial temperament. And I am here to tell you, based on my own experience arguing in front of Judge Kavanaugh that Judge Kavanaugh has judicial temperament in spades. He is respectful of counsel in both his demeanor and in his level of preparation and engagement.

Nothing is more discouraging to litigants or their clients than a cold or underprepared bench. There is no fear of that with Judge Kavanaugh. He understands that appellate cases are serious business for the parties involved and prepares accordingly. So I think based on my experience knowing him not just as a friend but also as a judicial officer, by any conventional measure, I believe he is enormously qualified to serve on the Nation's highest court. I am confident he will serve with distinction, and I urge you to vote for his confirmation.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Clement appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Mr. Clement.
Now, Professor Ingber.

STATEMENT OF REBECCA INGBER, ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF LAW, BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

Professor INGBER. Thank you, Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Whitehouse, and distinguished Committee Members. It is an honor to testify before you today.

My name is Rebecca Ingber. I am an associate professor at the Boston University School of Law, and previously, I served in the State Department Office of the Legal Advisor, where I worked with colleagues at the Departments of Justice and Defense, in the intelligence community, and at the White House on matters involving international law and war and Executive power, so my testimony today will focus on Judge Kavanaugh's jurisprudence in these areas.

Judge Kavanaugh has clearly had an exceptional career and has many obvious strengths, but I believe there are concerns his jurisprudence raises that should be addressed before final consideration of his nomination.

In particular, and as I explore in more detail in my written remarks, Judge Kavanaugh's opinions reveal that he is exceedingly reluctant to impose checks on the President's powers in the national security sphere.

Now, this is not an area where Judge Kavanaugh has merely followed precedent with his hands tied.

To take one prominent example, in a case involving the President's authority over detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Judge Kavanaugh wrote an 87-page separate opinion to argue that the Court should not look to international law to inform the President's war powers, a position that is contrary to over two centuries of settled precedent. In fact, all three branches of Government have long looked to international law to define war powers over the entire course of this Nation's history. When Congress authorizes the President to use all necessary and appropriate force, it does so against the backdrop of that history.

The Supreme Court has ratified this understanding repeatedly, including in opinions that look to international law both to read the President's powers expansively and to interpret the outer limits on those powers. They did just that in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, which Justice Kennedy joined, which looked to international law to find that the 2001 statute authorizing the President to use military force also authorizes detention, as well as limits on that detention.

Perhaps because these rules have always guided our understanding, international law is one of the only tools the courts and the political branches have for interpreting war powers. Thus, it is often the only limiting principle for interpreting the outer bounds of the President's wartime authorities.

Now, I want to clarify a misconception about international law. These are not rules imposed on us by some outside source. The international laws of war, for example, are rules that we have affirmatively chosen to be bound by, specifically in wartime, and which the United States, including the U.S. military, has always played a principal role in shaping. These are rules that benefit our military, as well as all of us.

These rules are so built into the national ethos that we may forget they derive from international law. For example, we know that it is unlawful for the President to kill families of terrorism suspects. Why? Because the international laws of war prohibit the targeting of civilians. And we have always interpreted the President's authority to wage war in light of those rules.

If the Supreme Court were to adopt Judge Kavanaugh's position on this or other areas where he has invoked national security to dismiss the Court's role in checking the President, the result would be that the President could wield nearly unreviewable discretion when he invokes war or national security.

For my time in Government, I know there is a great deal of thoughtful decisionmaking and robust process that happens inside the national security apparatus, but I also saw firsthand the importance of the Court's role in checking Presidential power, even when the President invokes war or national security. Mistakes happen. Bad decisions may come about through incompetence, through insufficiency of facts, exigency, and even, yes, through the intentional abuse of power. Even a robust process can lead to Presidential overreach. After all, the premise of the separation of powers is that each branch will seek to enhance its own authority and the other branches, including the courts, are there to impose limits.

Moreover, while Judge Kavanaugh would have the courts defer broadly to the President in this area, the reality is that the executive branch looks to the courts to understand the parameters of its authority. When a judge defers broadly to the position that the Government takes in court, a position taken not under the best view of the law standard but rather that of a defensive litigant trying to win its case, the court's deference often has the result of a merits decision, and that becomes the law for the executive branch going forward. If the courts never—

[Disturbance in the hearing room.]

Professor INGBER. If the courts never push back on the Government's litigation positions, the result is a one-way ratchet of expanding Executive power.

And because so much of executive branch decisionmaking in this realm happens in secret, accountability through public scrutiny alone is often insufficient. Judicial review is at times the only means of holding the President accountable.

For these reasons, and those in my written testimony, I urge you to consider the dangers in a judicial approach that cedes to the President unreviewable discretion in this realm.

Thank you for inviting me to testify today. I would be pleased to answer any questions the Committee has.

[The prepared statement of Professor Ingber appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Professor.

Now, Professor White.

STATEMENT OF ADAM J. WHITE, PROFESSOR AND EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, THE C. BOYDEN GRAY CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE STATE, GEORGE MASON UNIVERSITY ANTONIN SCALIA LAW SCHOOL, ARLINGTON, VIRGINIA

Professor WHITE. Thank you. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Whitehouse, Members of the Committee, thank you for inviting me to testify in support of Judge Kavanaugh's nomination.

Chairman Grassley, as you very kindly mentioned, my first education in civics and history came from the teachers in Dubuque, Iowa, and the University of Iowa, so it is a real pleasure to be here today, a great honor to discuss Judge Kavanaugh's own deep appreciation for our Constitution and the rule of law, as exemplified by his 12 years of service on the D.C. Circuit, 300-plus judicial opinions, and a deep record of legal scholarship.

His record is particularly impressive on questions of administrative law; that is, the body of law that governs administrative agencies and defines the agencies' relationships with Congress, with the courts, with the President, and with the people. In my longer written testimony, I focus on four important aspects of Judge Kavanaugh's approach to administrative law. Today, I would like to highlight two issues in particular.

The first involves doctrines of judicial deference to administrative agencies' legal interpretations. Not long ago, skeptics of judicial deference were found primarily on the left. Now, increasingly, judicial deference also finds critics on the right. I would like to echo a lot of Professor Ingber's comments toward the end of her testimony on the inherent challenges and problems of excessive judicial deference to the executive branch, not just in matters of foreign policy and national security but also with respect to executive regulatory agencies.

Throughout his time on the D.C. Circuit, Judge Kavanaugh has faithfully applied the Supreme Court's increasingly complex approach to judicial deference, including Chevron deference, especially in recent cases involving agencies claiming immense new regulatory powers under the guise of decades-old statutes.

My second point today goes to the design of administrative agencies. From time to time, Congress has passed laws giving a certain degree of independence to the leadership of Federal regulatory commissions or to other officers by limiting the President's ability to fire those officers at will. Making officers independent from the President raises profound constitutional questions because, as Professor Amar explained this morning, the Constitution vests the President with Executive power. The Constitution obligates the President to take care that the laws are faithfully executed, and when you break that link of accountability between officers and the President, you undermine both of those constitutional commitments.

So on the limited occasions where the Supreme Court has affirmed statutes giving regulatory commissions or other officers a measure of independence, it has done so carefully and subject to crucial limits. Judge Kavanaugh has followed those judicial precedents very carefully in cases where Congress improperly attempted to vest even greater independence in newly created regulatory agencies beyond the limits previously allowed by the Supreme Court. And this includes the PHH case, as Professor Amar noted this morning.

In applying those Supreme Court precedents, Judge Kavanaugh has attracted criticism from those who would like to see administrative agencies be made even less accountable to the courts, the President, and the Congress. Now, in an era when agencies are often eager to enact policies that Congress has not legislated, some of Judge Kavanaugh's critics favor those energetic agencies over Congress. And in a system where an elected President might disagree with the policy preferences of an administrative agency, some of Judge Kavanaugh's critics favor making the agencies independent from the President rather than accountable to the President. And in an era when administrative agencies have been increasingly eager to impose unprecedented and immense regulatory programs despite the lack of clear legislative authorization, some of Judge Kavanaugh's critics favor judges becoming more deferential to agencies, not less.

I think Judge Kavanaugh, in applying the Supreme Court's precedents under the Constitution, has the better of these arguments. His approach in my opinion is administrative law at its best, empowering agencies to administer the laws efficiently and effectively but always subject to the deeper fundamental commitments of our Constitution's structure and rights. For that reason, I hope that you will give your advice and consent to the appointment of Judge Kavanaugh to the Supreme Court.

Thank you for this opportunity to testify.

[The prepared statement of Professor White appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Professor White.

Now, Professor Heinzerling.

STATEMENT OF LISA HEINZERLING, JUSTICE WILLIAM J. BRENNAN, JR., PROFESSOR OF LAW, GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY LAW CENTER, WASHINGTON, DC

Professor HEINZERLING. Thank you, Chairman Grassley.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Push the red button or whatever color the button is.

Professor HEINZERLING. Thank you, Chairman Grassley and Ranking Member Whitehouse, for inviting me to testify here today. My name is Lisa Heinzerling, and I am the Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., Professor of Law at Georgetown University. I will testify about Judge Kavanaugh's views on administrative law. They are somewhat different from the views we have just heard.

Administrative agencies are at the heart of administrative law. These agencies are the institutions you know by their initials: the EPA, the FDA, the FTC, the FCC, and so on. They are the institutions that do the day-to-day work of Government, staffed by experts, created and set in motion by Congress, and subject to requirements of public input and reason-giving.

Administrative agencies combine expertise, politics, and deliberation in a way other institutions do not. They are responsible for everything from addressing air pollution to enforcing rules against financial fraud. They are essential to the daily business of Government.

Judge Kavanaugh would limit the ability of Congress to structure and empower administrative agencies to do this important work. He would eliminate Congress' power to provide agencies with some measure of independence from the President by protecting their top officials from being fired for political reasons. He would also erase Congress' power to give agencies legal authority to deal with the most important problems we face unless Congress speaks with precise and crystalline clarity. His opinions stating these views read as if they are addressed to the administrative agencies themselves, but make no mistake, Judge Kavanaugh's sights are trained on Congress and its power to structure and empower administrative agencies.

Judge Kavanaugh believes that the basic problem with the structure of government today is that the President has too little power and that Congress has too much. Judge Kavanaugh believes that one of the constitutionally guaranteed powers of the President is the power to fire agency officials for any reason he deems sufficient, even where Congress has made a different choice. Yet longstanding Supreme Court precedent confirms Congress' constitutional power to create agencies that are relatively independent from the President. Judge Kavanaugh's approach to this precedent has been to treat it grudgingly and read it narrowly. Once on the Supreme Court, Judge Kavanaugh would be able to cast this precedent aside, and in doing so, restructure modern government.

The result would be a super-powerful President, a diminished Congress, and a corrosion of the checking and balancing that the Constitution contemplates. Under Judge Kavanaugh's constitutional theory, the President would be able to exercise undiluted control over all of the administrative agencies. Ironically, Judge Kavanaugh has thus taken an instrument that is aimed at checking concentrated power—that is, the separation of powers—and turned it into an instrument calibrated to increase the power of the already most powerful person in the Government.

Judge Kavanaugh also has a cramped view of Congress' power to delegate crucial jobs to administrative agencies. He has indicated that his preference would be to discard or drastically pare back longstanding precedent giving agencies deference when they interpret statutes that Congress has charged them with implementing. The result would be uncertainty and disruption as agencies, citizens, and courts adjusted to a wholly new approach to statutory interpretation.

Even more damaging, however, is Judge Kavanaugh's view that Congress may not empower an agency to issue a major rule—that is, a rule that has great political and economic significance—without giving the agency a precise and crystal-clear instruction to that effect. This interpretive approach would perversely disable agencies in the very circumstances in which we need them the most. It would skew statutory interpretation against agencies' power to undertake protective regulatory programs that run counter to Judge Kavanaugh's own political preferences. And it demands a legislative clarity that Judge Kavanaugh himself has said is difficult to achieve.

Worst of all, it is quite clear that Judge Kavanaugh would apply his strict new principle of interpretation only to affirmative regulatory initiatives and not to deregulation or failure to regulate. This is not a neutral principle.

Judge Kavanaugh often says that his motivating force is the protection of individual liberty, but the liberty Judge Kavanaugh embraces is badly skewed and terribly small. It is the liberty of powerful groups to do their business unhindered by Government rather than the liberty that comes from meaningful Government protections against harmful human behavior. In the name of liberty, Judge Kavanaugh has rejected rules addressing toxic air pollution, climate change, workplace safety, and financial fraud without acknowledging that in such cases liberty sits on both side of the legal question. There is on one side the liberty of regulated groups to go about their business unimpeded by Federal law. There is on the other the liberty of the rest of us to go about our lives at home, at work, at school, and in our communities with the reasonable assurance that the Government has our back in protecting us against coming to harm at other people's hands.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Professor Heinzerling appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you, Professor.

Now, Professor Mascott.

STATEMENT OF JENNIFER MASCOTT, FORMER LAW CLERK, AND ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF LAW, GEORGE MASON UNIVERSITY ANTONIN SCALIA LAW SCHOOL, ARLINGTON, VIRGINIA

Professor MASCOTT. Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Whitehouse, and Members of the Committee, thank you for the opportunity to testify today. I am honored to speak in support of my mentor and former boss, Judge Kavanaugh, and to share with you why I believe he would be an outstanding Supreme Court Justice. So my testimony will highlight three aspects of Judge Kavanaugh's character and judicial service: first, his commitment to mentorship and consideration of diverse perspectives; next, his fair-minded and careful consideration of legal questions; and then finally, his commitment to following the law, independent of personal policy preferences. These are qualities that I have witnessed firsthand as Judge Kavanaugh's law clerk and then as a student of his opinions over the years.

I served as a law clerk to Judge Kavanaugh during his first year on the bench, and already at that time Judge Kavanaugh demonstrated a commitment to seeking out diverse perspectives. Our group of four clerks came from different parts of the country, had diverse racial backgrounds, grew up among distinct religious traditions, and graduated from ivy-league, as well as non-ivy-league law schools.

Judge Kavanaugh's decision to hire our group of clerks showed his value for perspectives of people from different walks of life, and the Judge values hard work, achievement, and determination, not any specific pedigree.

We routinely had lively discussions in the Judge's chambers as he prepared each month for oral arguments. The Judge encouraged us to ask tough questions of him as he prepared and to debate legal issues with him and with each other. The Judge wanted to hear and consider all sides of an issue, apply the law fairly, and help train us to bring more rigor and precision to our legal analysis, skills that have stayed with me throughout my career so far. And now, as a law professor, I view it as part of my job to pass along those skills to another generation of students.

In addition to training us professionally, the Judge also mentored us on a more personal level. We had regular lunches with the Judge where we would discuss our families, our professional aspirations, sports. Judge and Mrs. Kavanaugh had us in their home for dinner during the holiday season, a tradition that continued for many years. And Judge Kavanaugh's devotion to training and mentoring female and male leaders in the legal professional does not conclude at the end of a clerkship in his chambers. He has remained a close mentor to me, providing advice at every major point in my career since the end of my clerkship more than 11 years ago.

And Judge Kavanaugh also branches out to assist young lawyers far beyond the four corners of his clerk community. He presides over student moot court proceedings. He speaks to students associations and regularly teaches courses to students in law school campuses.

Judge Kavanaugh's record of mentoring young lawyers and his practice of hiring law clerks with diverse life experiences demonstrate his commitment to giving back to the legal profession and show that he has an open mind. Judge Kavanaugh knows the impact that members of the judiciary can have on the legal profession, the state of the law, and individuals in the real world.

Judges take an oath to decide cases according to the law and the Constitution, but care for people and the legal system in its entirety can make a jurist a more careful, modest, and thoughtful judge.

Judge Kavanaugh's determination to consider all relevant issues and hear discussions from all sides also shows his humility and his commitment to equal justice under the law. During my clerkship, he approached each case with the same level of care, regardless of the identity of the litigants or the legal issues presented. He considered all relevant statutes, precedent, and history, and he was conscientious when writing his opinions. He would work through scores of drafts, wanting his opinions to be precise, clearly written, and accessible to litigants and the public.

In the years since clerking for the Judge, I have become a professor who teaches and writes in the areas of administrative law and the constitutional separation of powers, and serving as a clerk for Judge Kavanaugh prepared me to analyze issues rigorously, write carefully, consider all sides of an issue.

Judge Kavanaugh's fair application of the law, his mentorship of young lawyers, and his commitment to constitutional principles and an independent judiciary demonstrate I believe that he would be an excellent Supreme Court Justice, and I strongly support his confirmation.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Professor Mascott appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Professor Shane.

Thank you, Professor Mascott.

STATEMENT OF PETER M. SHANE, JACOB E. DAVIS AND JACOB E. DAVIS II CHAIR IN LAW, OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY MORITZ COLLEGE OF LAW, COLUMBUS, OHIO

Professor SHANE. Thank you. Chairman Grassley, Senator Whitehouse, and distinguished Committee Members, thank you for the opportunity to address you today.

This Committee's consideration of any potential Supreme Court Justice inevitably immerses you in profound constitutional issues. No issue before you now is more important than Judge Brett Kavanaugh's approach to questions of Presidential power and accountability. One straightforward constitutional principle frames any sound analysis of these questions. That principle is that no one, including the President, is above the law.

My concern is that Judge Kavanaugh, both on and off the bench, has crusaded for an extreme interpretation of the President's constitutional powers that could effectively undermine a President's accountability to law and to this Congress. It is by no means the view historically associated with conservative constitutionalism.

In the coming years, the Supreme Court may face a host of issues, testing the Justices' commitment to a Presidency subject to effective checks and balances. Some issues may arise because our President and some of his closest associates stand at the center of an ongoing investigation of an election campaign tainted by covert foreign involvement and multiple potential crimes. Some issues have already emerged because this President has refused to distance the performance of his public duties from those commercial activities that enrich his private fortunes. Let me list some of these questions for you.

One is, whether a President is potentially liable for obstruction of justice if he, and I am quoting the statute, "corruptly endeavors to influence, obstruct, or impede the due and proper administration of the law," unquote, to an official act. The President's lawyers say no, which is almost certainly both wrong and dangerous.

Another is, whether a President may relieve himself of criminal liability through self-pardon, a power that President Trump has said he "absolutely" has.

A third is, whether an incumbent President may be indicted while in office.

A fourth issue is, whether Congress or a court may subpoena Presidential records and even Presidential testimony in connection with investigations into the 2016 campaign.

A fifth is, whether a President is constitutionally entitled to personally direct the activities of all Federal criminal prosecutors, including Special Counsel Robert Mueller.

With regard to the President's business dealings, a case is already underway concerning the President's attempt to exempt himself from the reach of the Constitution's Emoluments Clauses. The President takes the position that unless a payment is made to him personally for services rendered, the profits he pockets from foreign and State governments patronizing his properties are not the business of this Congress.

I am fearful of Judge Kavanaugh refereeing these questions for three reasons: First, he explicitly adheres to the tenets of a theory of the Constitution called unitary executive theory. This extreme theory could give the President total control over the actions and decisions of any executive branch official. If it became law, Congress would be unable, for example, to enact statutory limits on a scope of Presidential supervisory power over an independent prosecutor. It is a theory subversive of effective checks and balances, which misreads our constitutional history and which the Supreme Court has so far wisely rejected.

Second, Judge Kavanaugh's service in the George W. Bush White House coincided with that administration's advocacy of a host of dangerous and unprecedented claims for the reach of Presidential power. During his first 6 years in office, President Bush raised nearly 1,400 constitutional reservations regarding roughly 1,000 provisions of over 100 statutes, more than three times the total number of objections raised by his 42 predecessors combined.

After Judge Kavanaugh left his role as staff secretary, the pace of Bush signing statements slacked off. This fact raises the question to what degree Judge Kavanaugh was responsible for urging unfounded claims of Presidential power.

Finally, while on the bench, Judge Kavanaugh has approached issues of Executive power with an advocate's agenda. His most important opinions on the D.C. Circuit rooted in unitary Executive theory appear in cases where the court had no need to reach constitutional issues at all. He has shown himself willing to craft constitutional doctrine from whole cloth in order to advance his precommitment to extreme Presidentialism.

Our current President daily expresses his contempt for the democratic institutions and the rule of law. He believes that all three branches of Government, not to mention the press and the private sector, should heel to his personal command. He chafes at the Constitution's constraints on his power. Now is a dangerous moment to elevate to the Supreme Court any Justice who would weaken the President's accountability to law. I have elaborated on these points in my written testimony and would be happy to discuss them further in response to your questions.

Thank you so much.

[The prepared statement of Professor Shane appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Before I take my 5 minutes, I would like to, since this is—I am going to turn this over to Senator Kennedy to finish the meeting. He will moderate. But I thought I ought to, first of all, thank the whole panel for participating, and then I want to thank all my colleagues on the Committee, both Republican and Democrat, for their cooperation throughout these 4 days of hearings. And except for the first hour and 15 minutes on Tuesday, they all went very well.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Even that went well.

Chairman GRASSLEY. In the end.

Senator KENNEDY. He is looking at you, Senator Whitehouse.

[Laughter.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. So anyway, I do appreciate the cooperation that we have had for the last 31-and-a-half hours.

My first question is to Professor Heinzerling and Professor Shane. This is not a question that I had my staff prepare, but both of you spoke very highly of the fear of Presidential power and what he thinks about that. So I am asking you more of a process question than a substance question.

Is it because you fear having a voice like that on the Supreme Court under any conditions, or is it because you think that his being on the Supreme Court may make a majority, understanding the present eight members of the committee, that that would make a majority and make it more dangerous than just having one voice?

Professor HEINZERLING. I have been worried about Presidential power for decades and across administrations. And so it is not just the present moment, although the present moment does make me more fearful of Presidential power. It is striking, I will say—even having said that, I will say that there will be a clear five-Justice majority for what I consider to be quite extreme views about Presidential power.

Chairman GRASSLEY. And would you have anything to add, Professor Shane, to what she said?

Professor SHANE. My views would be very similar, and I would echo what Mr. Dean said, that I am worried about having the most Executive-power-indulgent Supreme Court since the end of World War II.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Professor White, I think you heard a question I asked the last panel. We have had people express their constitutional rights in demonstrating at this hearing. You have had my colleagues ask views about whether or not Judge Kavanaugh has any concern about people of less means, and you heard it specifically from people on the previous panel. So how do you feel his experience shows or does not show that he would take those concerns into mind?

Professor WHITE. Sure. Well, the challenge for any judge is to see the case at hand through the eyes of all parties to the case and those who are affected by the case. In administrative law, a real challenge—I teach it, and before that I practiced it, and a real challenge is to see administrative law through the eyes of those who are regulated as much as through the eyes of the regulator.

It is easy to be a professor or to be a high-powered lawyer and see yourself as someday wielding the power of an agency, and, of course, you want to be independent, of course, you want the courts to defer to you. But knowing that regulatory power has significant impacts on not just big corporations but on landowners, homeowners, farmers, that is important as well.

So when the Supreme Court in recent cases became more critical of the EPA's impositions on landowners, claiming authority to regulate wetlands, when Judge Kavanaugh took pause at the impacts the EPA's unprecedented program for greenhouse gas regulations could have on small businesses and churches that fell within the regulatory ambit the EPA was claiming, those too I think deserve to be part of this conversation about the impact of Government power on people without the means to fight back against it.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you.

And, Mr. Clement, since you appear so much before courts, and I guess I said 90 cases you have argued before the Supreme Court, tell me what type of a judge you see Judge Kavanaugh being during the times of oral arguments.

Mr. CLEMENT. Senator Grassley, I think he has been an exemplary judge on the bench. I think I would describe him as an active judge, but he actively questions both sides. I think as an active questioner he is going to fit right in, were he confirmed, to the Supreme Court. I think the Supreme Court right now is about the hottest bench that the Supreme Court has ever been. I think each of the last Justices that have been confirmed by this Committee have tended to ask more questions than the Justice they replaced.

So I think he will fit right in to what he referred to as the Team of Nine, and I think from an advocate's perspective, that is what you want. You want somebody who is going to push you but is going to push your adversary in the argument and ask the hard questions of both sides, and I think that is what you would get—that is what you are already getting with Judge Kavanaugh on the D.C. Circuit, and I think that is what you would see on the Supreme Court of the United States.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Senator Whitehouse.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Thank you, Chairman.

Mr. Dean, I do not know if you have been watching the hearings, but my take on what we have seen is that, for a number of very good reasons, including that Minnesota Law Review article in which Judge Kavanaugh expressed a policy desire that the President be immunized from law enforcement investigation, and the Kavanaugh comment that U.S. v. Nixon was wrongly decided, and the Georgetown Law Journal episode in which he was asked as a matter of law can a President be indicted and put up his hand “no,” with those who agreed that a President was beyond indictment, it was a very live issue through these hearings about whether the President could properly be the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation. Of course, we know that this President is the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation, and we further know a separate criminal investigation in which this President has been identified as a named director of the criminal activity.

So in that circumstance, what I heard over and over was Judge Kavanaugh citing his assertion that U.S. v. Nixon was one of his top four cases. And all other facts being equal you would say, okay, these other things do not matter very much. But since he said U.S. v. Nixon was one of his top four cases, then obviously that will overwhelm all these other things and we can count on him to do the right thing.

But a little bell kept ringing in my mind, because whenever he said that, he seemed to just drop in very quietly that it was a trial court subpoena in U.S. v. Nixon. He never raised that point. He never said this would be very different and separated the two arguments. But it strikes me that if his famous top-four U.S. v. Nixon decision is limited to a trial court subpoena and does not protect the ability of law enforcement to proceed through, for instance, a grand jury subpoena, he played a little game with us to try to have the best of both worlds, to reserve a little escape hatch for himself to be able to shut down, for instance, the Mueller investigation or the Southern District of New York investigation subpoenas while still purporting to uphold U.S. v. Nixon as a big favorite decision of his. Would you respond to that?

Mr. DEAN. I would agree with your analysis. And as I said in my opening statement, I was not clear at all that he had reversed his position on U.S. v. Nixon when he said that he was not sure it was properly decided.

He also used it in the 2016 Law Journal article, along with Marbury v. Madison, Youngstown, and Brown v. Board of Education, in the context of a judge needing a backbone. He did not say it was rightly decided, and he repeated that several times during the hearings.

So, I do not think he has informed this Committee of his real position on that very important case.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Yes, and actually through a rather clever subterfuge, which I think is a shame, if that is the case. We will pursue the question further.

Ms. Heinzerling, you have made some powerful statements today, perhaps the best of which was that there is liberty on both sides of the regulatory equation. As you know, we usually see in politics the polluter big-money side heavily engaged, and then good luck to the individual victim, like Hunter Lachance here earlier with his asthma, and we very often see phony-baloney studies that are put together that look at the cost/benefit of regulation, but only look at the cost to the polluter, to the regulated industry, and totally omit what happens on the other side.

Could you speak a little bit more about the liberty side of the beneficiary of the regulation and how they stand up on the political side in terms of the balance of political power on this question?

Senator KENNEDY [presiding]. If you could give us about 30 seconds, Professor.

Professor HEINZERLING. Yes, I would be happy to.

The laws that engage the administrative agencies in protecting against the kind of harm I mentioned range across a very broad area, and the people who are protected by those rules are the ones who are left unprotected when Judge Kavanaugh says that Congress has no authority to grant that broad a power or to give the power, for example, to an independent agency. And we do not hear about that in his opinions at all. We only hear about the liberty of the regulated group.

So I wonder to what extent he thinks about the people on the other side. And if you think about it and you think about the witnesses who were on the panel before this one, it is basic things like going outside, being able to go to school on certain days and so forth. Those are basic elements of liberty that I think weigh just as heavily in the legal equation.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. Or ought to.

Professor HEINZERLING. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you. Thank you, Professor.

Senator Coons.

My order says Coons and then Klobuchar.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. We have Klobuchar, Coons, Hirono, and Blumenthal as our order.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I would never argue with you, Senator. [Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Klobuchar.

Senator WHITEHOUSE. In that case, let's talk about some things. [Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Okay.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. All right. Thank you very much.

Thank you to all of you. I think I will sort of start where we were ending over there.

I spoke, of course, in my questions with Judge Kavanaugh at length about the 2009 article in the Minnesota Law Review, given it is from my State, in which he argued that a President should not be subject to investigations while in office. Judge Kavanaugh actually, Mr. Dean, suggested that Congress can always impeach the President if there is evidence of wrongdoing, because I asked similar questions that you raised in your testimony: Well, what if she committed a murder, the President? What if she did this? And he has a differentiating word of a "dastardly" crime, which I did not get to the bottom of, really. But then also said that, well, you can always impeach the President.

And one of the questions that I asked was, well, in the modern day, these investigations have been done not by Congress but with the special counsel, the independent counsel. And could you talk about the difficulty, if we do not actually have an ability to have an investigation, in terms of an impeachment proceeding?

Mr. DEAN. I was one who believed very strongly in the independent counsel law. I think that was when Congress did express itself that indeed a sitting President could be investigated, and that withstood several tests on its constitutionality.

We are currently, with the expiration of the sunset clause of the independent counsel law, putting an end to that. We now do it through the regulations of the Department of Justice, and there are certainly no restrictions other than a policy right now at the Department of Justice that prohibits investigation of a President.

The history of that policy, people seem to forget why it was written. It happened in 1973 when a Vice President was under investigation by a Maryland grand jury and defending himself by saying you cannot indict me, you can only impeach me. An opinion was requested of Office of Legal Counsel, and they concluded, and I think it was a predetermined solution to a problem, that indeed the Vice President could be indicted but the President could not be indicted, and that policy has stood since then.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. And you have previously drawn parallels between Watergate and where we are today. How important was the independence of the Federal judiciary in helping our country to weather the Watergate scandal? Just really quickly because I have one other question.

Mr. DEAN. It was vital. Let me put it that way.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Okay. I would assume that it was.

Professor Heinzerling, thank you for being here. I had asked Judge Kavanaugh about how the White House noted that he has overturned agency action 75 times. When they announced his nomination, they said he was a leader in overturning these agency decisions. And when I asked him about it, he responded to me by stating that he has also ruled in favor of agencies at times.

What did you think of his response, and how do you view his record in this area of law overall?

Professor HEINZERLING. It would be astonishing if he ruled against the agency in every case. That would be a sign of something seriously amiss. So if there is a handful of cases—I think he may have mentioned about six cases, something like that, in which he ruled in favor of environmentalists. I think most of them were not brought by environmentalists. But if there were a handful of cases, there would be nothing surprising about that, and also nothing about it that would indicate that he was evenhanded, quite frankly, about the environment.

He has issued a number of major decisions narrowing the environmental laws, requiring a cost/benefit balancing in the face of either clear or arguably ambiguous language, and he has forwarded this message from case after case in the big cases. In the little easy cases, it is no surprise if an agency might win some of them, or if the environmentalists might win some of them if it is an easy case on a procedural matter. But in the big cases, the big environmental cases, he has been all on the other side. And I will just say, the Supreme Court only takes big cases.

Senator KLOBUCHAR. Thank you very much.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Crapo, you are not interested in asking questions? Okay.

Senator Coons.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Senator Kennedy.

I would like to ask unanimous consent to enter into the record a report on the nomination of Judge Kavanaugh by the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, and by the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

Senator KENNEDY. Without objection.

[The information appears as submissions for the record.]

Senator COONS. Mr. Dean, thank you for your written testimony and for appearing before us today. You alone in this panel have the unique historical experience that I think is directly relevant to the question of what happens when Presidential power is unchecked and the President is not accountable.

Based on your experience, what are the dangers of a Presidency that does not face strong checks in the Supreme Court and Congress? And what would have happened in Watergate if President Nixon had been able to avoid compliance with a subpoena or if he had been able to fire the special prosecutor without some consequential response by Congress?

Mr. DEAN. Well, of course, when he fired the special prosecutor, he reacted to the negative publicity it had generated and the interest of Congress suddenly in impeachment. So he thought he could possibly stem that tide by bringing a new, he thought initially, favorable and maybe not as aggressive investigation with the appointment of Leon Jaworski. The second special prosecutor, however, was equally as effective as the original one, Archibald Cox, which I do not think the White House had anticipated.

As far as the courts and the rulings, we would have had a very different history had the Supreme Court not dealt with the tapes case as they did. It would have resulted in Nixon surviving. Without the tapes, it was my word against his, and in the polling, while

I was out-polling him at times, it was not enough to resolve the problem.

Senator COONS. So without the smoking gun, which was made possible by the Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Nixon, Presidential accountability might not have occurred. We might not really know what role the President had played, and we might not have avoided the constitutional crisis of confidence, and we might not have removed a criminal President.

Professor Shane, I questioned Judge Kavanaugh fairly aggressively on his view of the scope of Presidential authority. Based on his writings, his speeches, his opinions as a judge, I am concerned he has a view of Presidential power that is dangerously unbounded.

You have had a chance to review his work. Do you share my concerns? And what do you make of his enthusiastic and repeated embrace of Scalia's dissent in Morrison?

Professor SHANE. There is a lot to that question, Senator, so I will try to keep it brief.

What most concerns me about Judge Kavanaugh's position is not just that he has embraced the tenets of the unitary executive theory but that he has gone to such lengths to try to create a kind of legal foundation for it in the D.C. Circuit in cases that had nothing to do with unitary executive theory.

There was much discussion during Mr. Olson's panel about the case of Morrison v. Olson, and Judge Kavanaugh, of course, has famously said that he would like to put the final nail in that case. But in the PHH case that was being discussed—this was a case that the D.C. Circuit unanimously resolved on purely statutory grounds—Judge Kavanaugh saw fit to write an extensive opinion for the panel on the constitutional issue that later got overturned en banc. The opinion he issued for the panel pulled out of thin air this completely unmoored theory about why a single-headed independent agency was unconstitutional. It was full of arguments that would be perfectly fine for Congress to entertain as a matter of policy, but they had nothing to do with the Constitution.

With regard to Morrison v. Olson, it is still good law in the Supreme Court that independent agencies are constitutional. Whether they are a good or a bad idea is up to Congress, which has the power to make all laws necessary and proper not only for carrying into execution the powers of Congress but the powers of all officers and offices of the United States Government.

Senator COONS. Thank you, Professor.

If I might, a last question to Professor Heinzerling. Since we went around and around about this several times, Judge Kavanaugh and myself, in trying to explain his reliance on or his interest in, or I would say his fixation with Scalia's dissent in Morrison, Judge Kavanaugh tried to describe it as a sort of one-off case about a now-expired independent counsel statute, and I kept coming back to this dissent in PHH which Professor Shane was just referencing.

Do you think that dissent lays out the unitary executive theory and displays some significant enthusiasm for it that is a well-founded justification for my having concerns about Judge Kavanaugh's views on Presidential power?

Professor HEINZERLING. Absolutely.

Senator KENNEDY. Professor, just to be fair to everybody, if you could give us about 30 seconds?

Professor HEINZERLING. Yes. Absolutely, yes. He would have struck down a major Federal statute that was very new that set up the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau in which Congress had made a judgment about the degree of independence and the structure of the agency that was necessary in order to counterbalance the power of the financial industry, and he wrote a dissent from an en banc denial in that case. So, yes, absolutely, you are right to be concerned.

Senator COONS. I would like to thank the whole panel and just conclude by pointing out that the reason I raised these concerns in pressing Judge Kavanaugh was that it is exactly his quotes about U.S. v. Nixon, his enthusiasm for the dissent in Morrison, his dissent in PHH, that leads me to still have concerns that he would not hold the President accountable to an investigation tied to a subpoena or to testimony in a way that we need in our current environment.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator Hirono.

Thank you, Senator.

Senator HIRONO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome to the panelists.

Mr. Dean, in your written statement you explain that if Judge Kavanaugh is confirmed, we will have the most pro-Presidential-powers Supreme Court in the modern era. Most recently in Trump v. Hawaii, the Court upheld the President's basically bald assertion of national security as a way to sustain his Muslim ban. At least one Justice, Justice Sotomayor, said that she saw parallels to Korematsu. So that is already pretty far down the road as far as Presidential power.

So what current controversies do you think might come before this Court that you have serious concerns as to how Judge Kavanaugh, if he gets on the Court, will support the President?

Mr. DEAN. In answer to your question, I must say that one of the things I did before I came to Washington was talk to some academic friends that I think know an awful lot about Presidential powers, the people I turn to with whom I have discussed these things at great length. They cited that case as one of the examples of how things quickly are slipping out of bounds and where we are headed.

The fact that we have a President who is unchecked right now by other branches makes it particularly timely to be worried afresh given the Kavanaugh positions on so many cases that would enhance Presidential power. I could see him as the leader of the 5-4 that would enhance Presidential powers.

Senator HIRONO. And he did not respond affirmatively to any questions as to whether he would recuse himself should these kind of questions come before this Supreme Court.

Mr. DEAN. Exactly.

Senator HIRONO. Professor Heinzerling, I found your testimony really interesting because in my review of Judge Kavanaugh's decisions there are various patterns, and I do think he creates some new, novel ways to decide agency action cases, for example. When Judge Gorsuch came before us, there were a lot of questions regarding what we would call, “the frozen trucker case,” in which Judge Gorsuch, in my view, his decision or dissent was just outrageous and defied common sense. I would look at the SeaWorld of Florida case as Judge Kavanaugh’s frozen trucker case.

Are you familiar with—

Professor HEINZERLING. Yes, yes.

Senator HIRONO. So do you think that this is an example of how far Judge Kavanaugh would go to protect the corporate interest over an individual?

Professor HEINZERLING. Yes, I do. Thank you for that question. In SeaWorld, he took a clear statute, a statute that really fit the situation like a glove, and held that it did not fit that situation because he could imagine that the single enforcement action based on a single day at a single amusement park might be deployed, that theory might be deployed to rule out tackles in football, and that cannot be what Congress meant.

And so he took clear language about assuring a reasonable workplace against recognized harms that were avoidable and that the agency had held in an evidentiary hearing all of those circumstances were met in that case, and he said no. In dissent, he said no, I do not believe this is covered by the statute because I cannot believe Congress meant to rule out tackles in football.

That was not what the case was about, and it was absolutely, in my opinion, a departure from both the language of the statute and the interpretation by the agency, and common sense.

Senator HIRONO. I think there is a pattern of that kind of decisionmaking by Judge Kavanaugh. Let me cite a couple of other examples.

Standing is one of the threshold issues. If you do not have standing, you are out of court. So, for example, in Public Citizen v. National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, there was a public interest group challenging the adequacy of tire safety standards because they thought that this may increase the risk of harm, and he found that that was way too speculative an interest to articulate, so this public interest group was out.

On the other hand, in Grocery Manufacturers Association v. EPA, where the grocery manufacturers’ food processing people challenged EPA action saying what you are making us do might increase prices for them and that would just be too much, he said that was not just speculative. So when a business interest comes forward and says this is going to cost us money maybe, but when a public interest group comes out and says this is going to harm people, he finds that too speculative.

Have you seen this kind of pattern in his decisionmaking?

Professor HEINZERLING. Yes, and I will say this is a pattern I think across standing cases, where the courts have, in my opinion, wrongly made it very difficult for public interest groups and particular groups like environmental groups to come to court to complain about violations of Federal law, and they make it very easy for business groups to do that. So that is a very, in some ways, subtle way of loading the dice against the public interest groups that we have been talking about.

Senator HIRONO. The Roberts Court is already heading toward—they are much more oriented toward protecting corporate interests over individual rights. We do not need another Justice going in that direction.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Senator Kennedy.

Welcome to you all, and thank you for being here. I know some of you have come from a far distance, but you recognize, as we do, the importance of this decision for us.

I want to begin by perhaps asking Mr. Dean a couple of questions.

Sir, when you came forward, which was before the United States v. Nixon case, you did not write an anonymous op-ed, did you?

Mr. DEAN. No, I did not.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. You came forward—

Mr. DEAN. Actually, I did send—my only discussion with the media was having my secretary read a quickly dictated line to get to my superiors that they were making a mistake if they were going to make me the scapegoat of their activities.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. In effect, you announced to the world what you were going to do.

Mr. DEAN. I did.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And to your superiors.

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And the result was a bombshell.

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And the United States v. Nixon case produced evidence that corroborated the evidence that you had provided. Correct?

Mr. DEAN. Well, I had testified that I believed I had been recorded. That prompted the Senate staff to ask Mr. Butterfield if that was possible. He said it is very possible and very likely. The Special Counsel filed immediately for those tapes. The tape cases and the fight in the Court started. The whole dynamics of Watergate changed and it became all about obtaining the tapes and whether they would corroborate or not my testimony.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And I can remember vividly the picture of Alexander Butterfield revealing those tapes, and it was also a bombshell. Correct?

Mr. DEAN. July 16th, 1973. It was.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And we could go through the history here, but where I am going with my point is that it was not just, or maybe even primarily, the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Nixon. It was a number of individuals who had the backbone and guts to come forward, whatever motives at the time, and speak that truth to power. Correct?

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. So we tend here to talk about the law, about U.S. v. Nixon, about a unitary President, about all kinds of concepts that mean little to the American people, but we are talking about basic courage to stop a constitutional crisis.

Mr. DEAN. The system is important to those who do want to rely on it.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. There is now arguably a cancer on the Presidency as malignant and metastasizing as there was then. Correct?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, I would agree with that.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. And the only way to really stop it is not by relying on laws alone but on people respecting the laws, taking acts of personal courage, and coming forward to speak that truth to power. Would you agree?

Mr. DEAN. Even with anonymous op-eds.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Even with anonymous op-eds, which could lead others to come forward—

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL [continuing]. Non-anonymously.

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. But cases are not built on anonymous sources. Eventually, there have to be witnesses willing to testify—

Mr. DEAN. True.

Senator BLUMENTHAL [continuing]. And speak that truth to power. You have said that your belief is that President Trump would never resign because he—I am going to paraphrase—is shameless. I think you said something like that.

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Would you give us, in your view, your analysis, knowing Richard Nixon as you did, the reasons why he resigned? I suspect it had something to do with the fact that he saw impeachment coming and he was told by Hugh Scott and Everett Dirksen that he lacked the votes in the Senate to avoid conviction. But let me ask you your—

Mr. DEAN. It was very much the fact that he was going to lose in an impeachment battle, that the House would impeach and the Senate would find him guilty and remove. That appeared to be the case. But I think also Richard Nixon had done something that made it very awkward for him. He had pulled people aside and told them a falsehood that he had had nothing to do with the cover-up until I had told him about it, which was a flat-out lie, and he had been caught in that by the release of the so-called smoking-gun tape. But even more basically, I think he left because the man at his core had a respect for the rule of law. That is one of the differences I find today in Mr. Trump and the reason I do not think he would resign. He could care less about the rule of law.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you. If you could begin to wrap up. Yes sir, Senator, one more.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Ultimately, also it was those Republicans in the United States Senate who delivered the message, “We won’t stand for it.”

Mr. DEAN. That is correct.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. Thank you.

I am going to ask a few questions. I would love to be able to ask all of you questions. I just do not know if I have time.

Let me start with Ms. Mastal. Did I say your name—

Ms. MASTAL. Yes, that is correct.

Senator KENNEDY. I am going to be sure I understand. Judge Kavanaugh coached your daughter?

Ms. MASTAL. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. And his daughter was not on the team at that time?

Ms. MASTAL. Correct.

Senator KENNEDY. And when he finished coaching the kids, at the end of the season he wrote them all personal notes?

Ms. MASTAL. Yes, a detailed evaluation of things to work on, things you did well, and then the final note, which is what I read.

Senator KENNEDY. Does he generally do that for his teams, or do you know?

Ms. MASTAL. I think he does it for everybody on the team for every team he has coached.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. I want to switch gears. I think I heard Professor White and—is it Professor “Henserling”?

Professor HEINZERLING. “Heinzerling.”

Senator KENNEDY. “Heinzerling.” My apologies. Talk a little bit about a transfer of power from Congress to the President, and thinking of it in terms of the Chevron doctrine. I would like you to each quickly help me out on this.

Here is my problem with the Chevron deference: I just do not understand how it is constitutional, and here is why. I look at the APA, which, of course, Congress passed, and Congress says this is the law. The reviewing court, not the agency, the reviewing court shall decide all relevant questions of the law, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action. That is a statute, 5 USC Section 706, as I am sure both of you know better than I do.

So how can the courts construe that congressional directive as giving the power to an agency? I mean, that was clearly not Congress’ intent.

Could you each give me about 30 seconds on that?

Professor HEINZERLING. This is a great question, and it is a puzzle in administrative law a little bit. The text of the Administrative Procedure Act says what you say it says, and it has been sort of hidden from view, in a way, for a number of years.

But I think the answer would be that even where a court defers to an administrative agency on the interpretation it is offering, it is still making the legal judgments, the relevant legal judgments. It is deciding, in the first instance, is the statute so clear that it should not defer at all? And in the second instance, even if the statute is not clear, it is making the judgment about whether that interpretation is permissible.

Senator KENNEDY. Not to interrupt you, but I have to keep us on schedule.

Professor HEINZERLING. That is fine.

Senator KENNEDY. So you think that Chevron deference is unconstitutional here?

Professor HEINZERLING. No, I think it is consistent with the language of the Administrative Procedure Act. I do not think it is unconstitutional, no.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay.

Professor White.

Professor WHITE. One of the interesting things about Chevron and its relatively short history is that you had critics and proponents on both sides of the aisle. The most eloquent case for Chevron's constitutionality and propriety came from Justice Scalia in a 1989 Duke Law Journal article.

That said, there has been an increasing awareness, I think, on both sides that in the biggest cases, Chevron deference illustrates either a delegation of judicial power to an agency, or it respects a delegation of legislative power to an agency. That is why you see, I think most recently in the King v. Burwell case, where Chief Justice Roberts, with Justices—

Senator KENNEDY. I have to stop you—

Professor WHITE. I was going to say with Ginsburg, Breyer, and others, set aside Chevron.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay. I got it. You have helped me a lot there.

Professor "Mascott"—did I say it correctly?

Professor MASCOTT. Yes, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. Did you ever see Judge Kavanaugh take politics into consideration in deciding a case?

Professor MASCOTT. No. Judge Kavanaugh spent his time learning the record inside out, looking at the law, statutes, and principles.

Senator KENNEDY. But you were with him a year?

Professor MASCOTT. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. You never saw him take politics—

Professor MASCOTT. No.

Senator KENNEDY. Ever.

Professor MASCOTT. No.

Senator KENNEDY. Not once.

Professor MASCOTT. No.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay, fair enough.

Mr. Clement, should the Supreme Court televise oral arguments?

Mr. CLEMENT. Well, that is an excellent question.

Senator KENNEDY. We have 42 seconds.

Mr. CLEMENT. Sure. I think that that is an excellent question. It is a question that the Justices are ultimately going to have to answer at some point, unless Congress forces their hands by passing a statute, and then there will be a very interesting question whether that statute is constitutional.

My own view, for what it is worth, is that televising Supreme Court arguments makes an awful lot of sense. It is one of the odd realities that everybody seems to think that, until they become a Supreme Court Justice, and then they tend to have a different view.

But as I sit here as a Supreme Court advocate, I honestly do not see a particularly compelling argument why the public should not get to see the proceedings televised. And I think if they did, they would have a very high opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I appreciate that. You are a hell of a lawyer.

All right. I let Senator Hirono go over, so I am going to go over 20 seconds.

Mr. Dean, I do not care about your politics, I really do not. I have friends on both sides of the aisle. Like Senator Blumenthal, I remember vividly the early 1970s as well, when you worked in the White House. I think you and your co-conspirators hurt my country. I believe in second chances, and you did the right thing ultimately, but you only did it when you were cornered like a rat.

It is hard for me to take your testimony seriously, and I am going to give you a chance to respond. But I could not sleep tonight if I did not tell you that. I am going to give you a chance to respond.

Mr. DEAN. The President has also called me a rat, and I do not think you understand—

Senator KENNEDY. I am not calling you a rat, though, in the sense—

Mr. DEAN. No.

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. Of what you did with the prosecutor. That is not what I mean. But I honestly feel that way as an American. I think you hurt our country.

Mr. DEAN. I wrote a book based on all the Watergate conversations that were secretly recorded, learned a lot that I had not known. Out of the thousand conversations that Nixon had on Watergate, I was involved in 39 of them. I think every conversation I had with him I am trying to warn him, alert him, find out how much he does know or does not know.

I tried internally to end the cover-up. I did not succeed. That is the day I think I met Richard Nixon. I did not know the man and had not had dealings with him. There is a great misconception about what an early 30s White House Counsel could do around a White House.

So maybe you want to—I will send you a copy of that book, and it might give you some insights into what really did happen in there.

Senator KENNEDY. Okay.

All right. Well, we are done. I want to thank this panel very much. I am going to say what I said to the earlier panels. I know this testimony does not just write itself, and you all spent a lot of time on it, and I really want to thank you. I think all of us get a lot out of this part of the confirmation process.

The record will remain open until noon on Monday, and that is consistent with other Supreme Court nominee practices.

With that, thanks to everyone.

These hearings are adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 4:15 p.m., the Committee was recessed.]

[Additional material submitted for the record for Day 4 follows Day 5 of the hearing.]

CONTINUATION OF THE
CONFIRMATION HEARING ON THE
NOMINATION OF HON. BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
TO BE AN ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 2018

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC.

The Committee met, pursuant to notice, at 10:05 a.m., in Room SD-226, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Charles E. Grassley, Chairman of the Committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Grassley, Hatch, Graham, Cornyn, Lee, Cruz, Sasse, Flake, Crapo, Tillis, Kennedy, Feinstein, Leahy, Durbin, Whitehouse, Klobuchar, Coons, Blumenthal, Hirono, Booker, and Harris.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF IOWA

Chairman GRASSLEY. This morning, we continue our hearing on the nomination of Judge Brett Kavanaugh to serve as Associate Justice on our Supreme Court.

We will hear from two witnesses, Dr. Christine Blasey Ford and Judge Kavanaugh. Thanks, of course, to Dr. Ford and Judge Kavanaugh for accepting our Committee's invitation to testify and also thank them for their volunteering to testify before we even invited.

Both Dr. Ford and Judge Kavanaugh have been through a terrible couple weeks. They and their families have received vile threats. What they have endured ought to be considered by all of us as unacceptable and a poor reflection on the state of civility in our democracy. So I want to apologize to you both for the way you have been treated, and I intend, hopefully, for today's hearing to be safe, comfortable, and dignified for both of our witnesses. I hope my colleagues will join me in this effort of a show of civility.

With that said, I lament that this hearing—how this hearing has come about. On July 9, 2018, the President announced Judge Kavanaugh's nomination to serve on the Supreme Court. Judge Kavanaugh has served on the most important Federal appellate court for 12 years. Before that, he held some of the most sensitive positions in the Federal Government. The President added Judge Kavanaugh to his short list of Supreme Court more than 9 months ago in November 2017.

As part of Judge Kavanaugh's nomination to the Supreme Court, the FBI conducted its sixth full-field background investigation of Judge Kavanaugh since 1993, 25 years ago. Nowhere in any of these six FBI reports, which Committee investigators have reviewed on a bipartisan basis, was there a whiff of any issue, any issue at all, related in any way to inappropriate sexual behavior.

Dr. Ford first raised her allegations in a secret letter to the Ranking Member nearly 2 months ago in July. This letter was secret from July 30th, September 13th to—no, July 30th until September 13th when I first heard about it. The Ranking Member took no action. The letter was not shared with me, our colleagues, or my staff. These allegations could have been investigated in a way that maintained the confidentiality that Dr. Ford requested.

Before his hearing, Judge Kavanaugh met privately with 65 Senators, including the Ranking Member. But the Ranking Member did not ask Judge Kavanaugh about the allegations when she met with him privately in August.

The Senate Judiciary Committee held its 4-day public hearing from September 4th to September 7th. Judge Kavanaugh testified for more than 32 hours in public. We held a closed session for Members to ask sensitive questions on the last evening, which the Ranking Member did not attend.

Judge Kavanaugh answered nearly 1,300 written questions submitted by Senators after the hearing, more than all prior Supreme Court nominees. Throughout this period, we did not know about the Ranking Member's secret evidence.

Then, only at an eleventh hour, on the eve of Judge Kavanaugh's confirmation vote, did the Ranking Member refer the allegations to the FBI. And then, sadly, the allegations were leaked to the press, and that is where Dr. Ford was mistreated. This is a shameful way to treat our witness, who insisted on confidentiality, and, of course, Judge Kavanaugh, who has had to address these allegations in the midst of a media circus.

When I received Dr. Ford's letter on September the 13th, my staff and I recognized the seriousness of these allegations and immediately began our Committee's investigation, consistent with the way the Committee has handled such allegations in the past. Every step of the way, the Democratic side refused to participate in what should have been a bipartisan investigation. As far as I know on all of our judgeships throughout at least the last 4 years—or 3 years, that has been the way it has been handled.

After Dr. Ford's identity became public, my staff contacted all the individuals she said attended the 1982 party described in The Washington Post article. Judge Kavanaugh immediately submitted to an interview under penalty of felony for any knowingly false statements. He denied the allegations categorically. Democratic staff was invited to participate and could have asked any questions they wanted to, but they declined, which leads me then to wonder. If they are really concerned with going to the truth, why would you not want to talk to the accused?

The process and procedure is what the Committee always does when we receive allegations of wrongdoing. My staff reached out to other individuals allegedly at the party—Mark Judge, Patrick Smyth, Leland Keyser. All three submitted statements to the Senate under penalty of felony denying any knowledge of the events described by Dr. Ford. Dr. Ford's lifelong friend, Ms. Keyser, stated she does not know Judge Kavanaugh and does not recall ever attending a party with him.

My staff made repeated requests to interview Dr. Ford during the past 11 days, even volunteering to fly to California to take her testimony. But her attorneys refused to present her allegations to Congress. I, nevertheless, honored her request for a public hearing, so Dr. Ford today has the opportunity to present her allegations under oath.

As you can see, the Judiciary Committee was able to conduct thorough investigations into allegations—or thorough investigations into allegations. Some of my colleagues, consistent with their stated desires to obstruct Kavanaugh's nomination by any means precisely—by any means necessary, pushed for FBI investigations into the allegations. But I have no authority to force the executive branch agency to conduct an investigation into a matter it considers to be closed. Moreover, once the allegations became public, it was easy to identify all the alleged witnesses and conduct our own investigations.

Contrary to what the public has been led to believe, the FBI does not perform any credibility assessments or verify the truth of any events in these background investigations. I will quote then-Chairman Joe Biden during Justice Thomas' confirmation hearing. This is what Senator Biden said: "The next person who refers to an FBI report as being worth anything obviously does not understand anything. The FBI explicitly does not, in this or any other case, reach a conclusion, period. They say 'he said, she said, they said,' period. So when people wave an FBI report before you, understand they do not, they do not, they do not reach conclusions. They do not make recommendations," end of Senator Biden's quote.

The FBI provided us with the allegations. Now it is up to the Senate to assess their credibility, which brings us to this very time. I look forward to a fair and respectful hearing. That is what we promised Dr. Ford.

Some of my colleagues have complained about the fact that an expert on this side investigating sex crimes will be questioning the witness. I see no basis for complaint other than just plain politics.

The testimony we will hear today concerns allegations of sexual assault, very serious allegations. This is an incredibly complex and sensitive subject to discuss, and it is not an easy one to discuss. That is why the Senators on this side of the dais believe an expert who has deep experience and training in interviewing victims of sexual assault and investigating sexual assault-led allegations should be asking questions. This will be a stark contrast to the grandstanding and chaos that we saw from the other side during the previous 4 days in this hearing process.

I can think of no one better equipped to question the witnesses than Rachel Mitchell. Ms. Mitchell is a career prosecutor, civil servant with decades of experience investigating and prosecuting sex crimes. She has dedicated her career to seeking justice for survivors of sex-related felonies.

Most recently, Rachel was a Division Chief of the Special Victims Division, Maricopa County Attorney's Office, which prosecutes sex crimes and family violence. Then-Democratic Governor Janet Napolitano previously recognized her as the Outstanding Arizona Sexual Assault Prosecutor of the Year, and she has spent years instructing prosecutors, detectives, and child protection workers on how to properly interview victims of sexual assault and abuse. With her aid, I look forward to a fair and productive hearing.

I understand that there are two other public allegations. Today's hearing was scheduled in close consultation with Dr. Ford's attorneys, and her testimony will be the subject of this hearing.

We have been trying to investigate other allegations. At this time, we have not had cooperation from attorneys representing other clients, and they have made no attempt to substantiate their claims. My staff has tried to secure testimony and evidence from attorneys for both Deborah Ramirez and Julie Swetnick.

My staff made eight requests—yes, eight requests—for evidence from attorneys for Ms. Ramirez and six requests for evidence for attorneys for Ms. Swetnick. Neither attorney has made their clients available for interview. The Committee cannot do an investigation if attorneys are stonewalling. I hope you all understand that we have attempted to seek additional information, as we do a lot of times when there are holes in what we call the “BI reports.”

Additionally, all the witnesses should know—by when I say “all the witnesses,” I mean Dr. Ford and I mean Judge Kavanaugh. All the witnesses should know that they have the right under Senate Rule 26.5 to ask that the Committee to go into closed session if a question requires an answer that is a clear invasion of their right to privacy. If either Dr. Ford or Judge Kavanaugh feel that Senate Rule 26.5 ought to be involved, they should simply say so.

Senator Feinstein.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. DIANNE FEINSTEIN,
A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I will make just a brief comment on your references to me. Yes, I did receive a letter from Dr. Ford. It was conveyed to me by a Member of Congress, Anna Eshoo. The next day, I called Dr. Ford. We spoke on the phone. She reiterated that she wanted this held confidential, and I held it confidential up to a point where the witness was willing to come forward.

And I think as I make my remarks, perhaps you will see why. Because how women are treated in the United States with this kind of concern is really wanting a lot of reform, and I will get to that for a minute.

But in the meantime, good morning, Dr. Ford. Thank you for coming forward and being willing to share your story with us. I know this was not easy for you.

But before you get to your testimony, and the Chairman chose not to do this, I think it is important to make sure you are properly introduced. And I have to—

Chairman GRASSLEY. By the way, I was going to introduce her. But if you want to introduce her, I will be glad to have you do that. But I want you to know I did not forget to do it, because I would do that just as she was about to speak.

Senator FEINSTEIN. Thank you.

I have to say when I saw your CV, I was extremely impressed. You have a bachelor's degree from the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill; two master's degrees, one from Stanford and one Pepperdine; and a Ph.D. from the University of Southern California, better known to Senator Harris and I as USC. You are a professor affiliated with both Stanford University and Palo Alto University. You have published over 65 peer-reviewed articles and have received numerous awards for your work and research.

And as if that were not enough, you are a wife, a mother of two sons, and a constituent from California. So I am very grateful to you for your strength and your bravery in coming forward. I know it is hard.

But before I turn it over, I want to say something about what is to be discussed today and where we are as a country. Sexual violence is a serious problem and one that largely goes unseen. In the United States, it is estimated by the Centers for Disease Control, one in three women and one in six men will experience some form of sexual violence in their lifetime.

According to the Rape, Abuse, and Incest National Network, 60 percent of sexual assaults go unreported. In addition, when survivors do report their assaults, it is often years later due to the trauma they suffered and fearing their stories will not be believed.

Last week, I received a letter from a 60-year-old California constituent who told me that she survived an attempted rape at age 17. She described as being terrified and embarrassed. She never told a soul until much later in life. The assault stayed with her for 43 years.

I think it is important to remember these realities as we hear from Dr. Ford about her experience. There has been a great deal of public discussion about the #MeToo movement today versus the Year of the Woman almost 27 years ago. But while young women are standing up and saying "no more," our institutions have not progressed in how they treat women who come forward. Too often, women's memories and credibility come under assault. In essence, they are put on trial and forced to defend themselves and often re-victimized in the process.

Twenty-seven years ago, I was walking through an airport when I saw a large group of people gathered around the TV to listen Anita Hill tell her story. What I saw was an attractive woman in a blue suit before an all-male Judiciary Committee speaking of her experience of sexual harassment. She was treated badly, accused of lying, attacked, and her credibility put to the test throughout the process.

Today, Dr. Christine Blasey Ford has come forward to tell her story of being assaulted and fearing for her life when she was a teenager. Initially, as I said, Dr. Ford did not want to make her story public.

Then, within 36 hours of coming forward, Republicans scheduled a hearing without talking to her or even inviting her to testify. She was told she had to show up or the Committee would move forward with a vote. It took a public outcry for the Majority to back down and give her even a few days to come before the Committee.

Republicans also scheduled this hearing with Dr. Ford without having her allegations investigated by the FBI. In 1991, Anita Hill's allegations were reviewed by the FBI, as is the normal process and squarely within its jurisdiction.

However, despite repeated requests, President Trump and the Republicans have refused to take this routine step and direct the FBI to conduct an impartial investigation. This would clearly be the best way to ensure a fair process to both Judge Kavanaugh and to Dr. Ford.

In 1991, the Senate heard from 22 witnesses over 3 days. Today, while rejecting an FBI investigation, Republicans are refusing to hear testimony from any other witness, including Mark Judge, who Dr. Ford identified as being in the room when the attack took place. And we believe Judge should be subpoenaed so the Committee can hear from him directly.

Republicans have also refused to call anyone who could speak to the evidence that would support or refute Dr. Ford's claim, and not one witness who could address credibility and character of either Ford or Kavanaugh has been called. What I find most inexcusable is this rush to judgment, the unwillingness to take these kinds of allegations at face value and look at them for what they are, a real question of character for someone who is asking for a lifetime appointment on the Supreme Court.

In 1991, Republicans belittled Professor Hill's experience, saying, and I quote, "It will not make a bit of difference in the outcome." And the burden of proof was on Professor Hill. Today, our Republican colleagues are saying this is a hiccup. Dr. Ford is mixed up and declaring, "I will listen to the lady, but we are going to bring this to a close."

What is worse, many of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle have also made it clear that no matter what happens today, the Senate will plow right through and ensure Judge Kavanaugh would be elevated within a week. In fact, on Tuesday, the Majority went ahead and scheduled a vote on the nomination before we heard one word of testimony regarding allegations of sexual assault and misconduct by Brett Kavanaugh.

Republican leadership even told Senators they should plan to be in over this weekend so the nomination can be pushed through without delay. This is despite the fact that in the last few days, two more women have come forward with their own serious allegations of sexual assault involving Brett Kavanaugh.

This past Sunday, we learned about Debbie Ramirez, who was a student at Yale with Brett Kavanaugh. She, too, did not want to come forward. But after being approached by reporters, she told her story.

She was at a college party, where Kavanaugh exposed himself to her. She recalls pushing him away and then seeing him laughing and pulling his pants up.

Then yesterday, Julie Swetnick came forward to say that she had experiences of being at house parties with Brett Kavanaugh and Mark Judge. She recounted seeing Kavanaugh engage, and I quote, "in abusive and physically aggressive behavior toward girls," including attempts to "remove or shift girls' clothing," not taking "no for an answer," grabbing girls "without their consent," and targeting "particular girls so that they could be taken advantage of."

Each of these stories are troubling on their own, and each of these allegations should be investigated by the FBI. All three women have said they would like the FBI to investigate. Please do so. All three have said they have other witnesses and evidence to corroborate their accounts, and yet Republicans continue to blindly push forward.

So today, we are moving forward with a hearing and being asked to assess the credibility of Brett Kavanaugh. He has made several statements about how his focus was on school, basketball, service projects, and going to church. He declared that he “never” drank so much he could not remember what happened and he has “always treated women with dignity and respect.”

And while he has made these declarations, more and more people have come forward challenging his characterization of events and behaviors. James Roche, his freshman roommate at Yale, stated Kavanaugh was, and I quote again, “frequently incoherently drunk,” and that was “when he became aggressive and belligerent,” when he was drunk.

Liz Swisher, a friend of his from Yale, said, and I quote, “There is no medical way I can say that he was blacked out, but it is not credible for him to say that he has no memory lapses in the nights that he drank to excess.”

Lynne Brookes, a college classmate, said the picture Kavanaugh is trying to paint does not match her memories of him. And I quote, “He is trying to paint himself as some kind of choir boy. You cannot lie your way onto the Supreme Court. And with that statement out, he has gone too far. It is about the integrity of the institution.”

Ultimately, Members and ladies and gentlemen, I really think that is the point. We are here to decide whether to evaluate this nominee to the most prestigious Court in our country. It is about the integrity of that institution and the integrity of this institution.

The entire country is watching how we handle these allegations. I hope the Majority changes their tactics, opens their mind, and seriously reflects on why we are here. We are here for one reason, to determine whether Judge Kavanaugh should be elevated to one of the most powerful positions in our country.

This is not a trial of Dr. Ford. It is a job interview for Judge Kavanaugh. Is Brett Kavanaugh who we want on the most prestigious Court in our country? Is he the best we can do?

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes. I am sorry you brought up about the unsubstantiated allegations of other people because we are here for the sole purpose of listening to Dr. Ford and will consider other issues at other times.

I would like to have you rise so I can swear you.

Now, do you swear that the testimony you are about to give before this Committee will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Dr. FORD. I do.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you very much. Please be seated.

And before you give your statement, I want to say to everybody that she has asked for—any time you ask for a break, you get a break. Anytime there is something that you need you do not have, just ask us, and you can have as much time for your opening statement as you want. And just generally let us know if there is any issues.

Proceed, please.

STATEMENT OF CHRISTINE BLASEY FORD, Ph.D., PROFESSOR OF PSYCHOLOGY, PALO ALTO UNIVERSITY, PALO ALTO, CALIFORNIA, AND RESEARCH PSYCHOLOGIST, STANFORD UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF MEDICINE, STANFORD, CALIFORNIA

Dr. FORD. Thank you, Senator Grassley. I think, after I read my opening statement, I anticipate needing some caffeine, if that is available.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Can you pull the microphone just a little bit closer to you, please? Can the whole box go a little bit closer?

Mr. BROMWICH. That is what I am trying, Senator. No.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Okay. Well, then—

Dr. FORD. I'll lean forward.

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you. Thank you.

Dr. FORD. Is this good?

Chairman GRASSLEY. Yes.

Dr. FORD. Okay. Thank you, Chairman Grassley and Ranking Member Feinstein, Members of the Committee.

My name is Christine Blasey Ford. I am a professor of psychology at Palo Alto University and a research psychologist at the Stanford University School of Medicine. I won't detail my educational background since it has already been summarized.

I have been married to Russell Ford since 2002, and we have two children.

I am here today not because I want to be. I am terrified. I am here because I believe it is my civic duty to tell you what happened to me while Brett Kavanaugh and I were in high school. I have described the events publicly before. I summarized them in my letter to Ranking Member Feinstein and again in a letter to Chairman Grassley. I understand and appreciate the importance of your hearing from me directly about what happened to me and the impact that it has had on my life and on my family.

I grew up in the suburbs of Washington, DC. I attended the Holton-Arms School in Bethesda, Maryland, from 1978 to 1984. Holton-Arms is an all-girls school that opened in 1901.

During my time at the school, girls at Holton-Arms frequently met and became friendly with boys from all-boys schools in the area, including the Landon School, Georgetown Prep, Gonzaga High School, as well as our country clubs and other places where kids and families socialized. This is how I met Brett Kavanaugh, the boy who sexually assaulted me.

During my freshman and sophomore school years, when I was 14 and 15 years old, my group of friends intersected with Brett and his friends for a short period of time. I had been friendly with a classmate of Brett's for a short time during my freshman and sophomore year, and it was through that connection that I attended a number of parties that Brett also attended. We did not know each other well, but I knew him, and he knew me.

In the summer of 1982, like most summers, I spent most every day at the Columbia Country Club in Chevy Chase, Maryland, swimming and practicing diving. One evening that summer, after a day of diving at the club, I attended a small gathering at a house in the Bethesda area. There were four boys I remember specifically being at the house—Brett Kavanaugh, Mark Judge, a boy named P.J., and one other boy whose name I cannot recall. I also remember my friend Leland attending.

I do not remember all of the details of how that gathering came together, but like many that summer, it was almost surely a spur of the moment gathering. I truly wish I could be more helpful with more detailed answers to all of the questions that have and will be asked about how I got to the party and where it took place and so forth. I don't have all the answers, and I don't remember as much as I would like to. But the details that—about that night that bring me here today are the ones I will never forget. They have been seared into my memory and have haunted me episodically as an adult.

When I got to the small gathering, people were drinking beer in a small living room/family room-type area on the first floor of the house. I drank one beer. Brett and Mark were visibly drunk.

Early in the evening, I went up a very narrow set of stairs leading from the living room to a second floor to use the restroom. When I got to the top of the stairs, I was pushed from behind into a bedroom across from the bathroom. I couldn't see who pushed me.

Brett and Mark came into the bedroom and locked the door behind them. There was music playing in the bedroom. It was turned up louder by either Brett or Mark once we were in the room. I was pushed onto the bed, then Brett got on top of me.

He began running his hands over my body and grinding into me. I yelled, hoping that someone downstairs might hear me, and I tried to get away from him, but his weight was heavy. Brett groped me and tried to take off my clothes. He had a hard time because he was very inebriated and because I was wearing a one-piece bathing suit underneath my clothing.

I believed he was going to rape me. I tried to yell for help. When I did, Brett put his hand over my mouth to stop me from yelling. This is what terrified me the most, and this had the most lasting impact on my life. It was hard for me to breathe, and I thought that Brett was accidentally going to kill me.

Both Brett and Mark were drunkenly laughing during the attack. They seemed to be having a very good time. Mark seemed ambivalent, at times urging Brett on and at times telling him to stop. A couple of times, I made eye contact with Mark and thought he might try to help me, but he did not.

During this assault, Mark came over and jumped on the bed twice while Brett was on top of me. Then the last time that he did this, we toppled over, and Brett was no longer on top of me. I was able to get up and run out of the room. Directly across from the bedroom was a small bathroom. I ran inside the bathroom and locked the door.

I waited until I heard Brett and Mark leave the bedroom laughing and loudly walk down the narrow stairway, pinballing off the walls on the way down. I waited, and when I did not hear them come back up the stairs, I left the bathroom, went down the same stairwell, through the living, and left the house. I remember being on the street and feeling an enormous sense of relief that I had escaped that house and that Brett and Mark were not coming outside after me.

Brett's assault on me drastically altered my life. For a very long time, I was too afraid and ashamed to tell anyone these details. I did not want to tell my parents that I, at age 15, was in a house without any parents present, drinking beer with boys. I convinced myself that because Brett did not rape me, I should just move on and just pretend that it didn't happen.

Over the years, I told very, very few friends that I had this traumatic experience. I told my husband before we were married that I had experienced a sexual assault. I had never told the details to anyone, the specific details, until May 2012 during a couples counseling session.

The reason this came up in counseling is that my husband and I had completed a very extensive, very long remodel of our home, and I insisted on a second front door, an idea that he and others disagreed with and could not understand. In explaining why I wanted a second front door, I began to describe the assault in detail.

I recall saying that the boy who assaulted me could someday be on the U.S. Supreme Court and spoke a bit about his background at an elitist all-boys school in Bethesda, Maryland. My husband recalls that I named my attacker as Brett Kavanaugh.

After that May 2012 therapy session, I did my best to ignore the memories of the assault because recounting them caused me to relive the experience and cause panic and anxiety. Occasionally, I would discuss the assault in an individual therapy session, but talking about it caused more reliving of the trauma. So I tried not to think about it or discuss it.

But over the years, I went through periods where I thought about the attack. I had confided in some close friends that I had had an experience with sexual assault. Occasionally, I stated that my assailant was a prominent lawyer or judge, but I did not use his name. I do not recall each person I spoke to about Brett's assault, and some friends have reminded me of these conversations since the publication of The Washington Post story on September 16, 2018, but until July 2018, I had never named Mr. Kavanaugh as my attacker outside of therapy.

This changed in early July 2018. I saw press reports stating that Brett Kavanaugh was on the short list of a list of very well-qualified Supreme Court nominees. I thought it was my civic duty to relay the information I had about Mr. Kavanaugh's conduct so that those considering his nomination would know about this assault.

On July 6th, I had a sense of urgency to relay the information to the Senate and the President as soon as possible before a nominee was selected. I did not know how specifically to do this. I called my congressional Representative and let her receptionist know that someone on the President's short list had attacked me.

I also sent a message to the encrypted Washington Post confidential tip line. I did not use my name, but I provided the names of Brett Kavanaugh and Mark Judge. I stated that Mr. Kavanaugh had assaulted me in the 1980s in Maryland. This was an extremely hard thing for me to do, but I felt that I couldn't not do it.

Over the next 2 days, I told a couple of close friends on the beach in Aptos, California, that Mr. Kavanaugh had sexually assaulted me. I was very conflicted as to whether to speak out.

On July 9th, I received a return phone call from the office of Congresswoman Anna Eshoo after Mr. Kavanaugh had become the nominee. I met with her staff on July 18th and with her on July 20th, describing the assault and discussing my fears about coming forward.

Later, we discussed the possibility of sending a letter to Ranking Member Feinstein, who is one of my State Senators, describing what occurred. My understanding is that Representative Eshoo's office delivered a copy of my letter to Senator Feinstein's office on July 30th. The letter included my name, but also a request that it be kept confidential.

My hope was that providing the information confidentially would be sufficient to allow the Senate to consider Mr. Kavanaugh's serious misconduct without having to make myself, my family, or anyone's family vulnerable to the personal attacks and invasions of privacy that we have faced since my name became public.

In a letter dated August 31st, Senator Feinstein wrote that she would not share the letter without my explicit consent, and I appreciated this commitment. Sexual assault victims should be able to decide for themselves when and whether their private experience is made public.

As the hearing date got closer, I struggled with a terrible choice. Do I share the facts with the Senate and put myself and my family in the public spotlight? Or do I preserve our privacy and allow the Senate to make its decision without knowing the full truth of his past behaviors?

I agonized daily with this decision throughout August and September 2018. The sense of duty that originally motivated me to reach out confidentially to The Washington Post and to Anna Eshoo's office when there was still a list of extremely qualified candidates and to Senator Feinstein was always there, but my fears of the consequences of speaking out started to exponentially increase.

During August 2018, the press reported that Mr. Kavanaugh's confirmation was virtually certain. Persons painted him as a champion of women's rights and empowerment, and I believed that if I came forward, my single voice would be drowned out by a chorus of powerful supporters. By the time of the confirmation hearings, I had resigned myself to remaining quiet and letting the Committee and the Senate make their decision without knowing what Mr. Kavanaugh had done to me.

Once the press started reporting on the existence of the letter I had sent to Senator Feinstein, I faced mounting pressure. Reporters appeared at my home and at my workplace, demanding information about the letter in the presence of my graduate students. They called my bosses and coworkers and left me many messages, making it clear that my name would inevitably be released to the media.

I decided to speak out publicly to a journalist who had originally responded to the tip I had sent to The Washington Post and who had gained my trust. It was important for me to describe the details of the assault in my own words.

Since September 16th, the date of The Washington Post story, I have experienced an outpouring of support from people in every State of this country. Thousands and thousands of people who have had their lives dramatically altered by sexual violence have reached out to share their experience and have thanked me for coming forward.

We have received tremendous support from our friends and our community. At the same time, my greatest fears have been realized, and the reality has been far worse than what I expected. My family and I have been the target of constant harassment and death threats, and I have been called the most vile and hateful names imaginable.

These messages, while far fewer than the expressions of support, have been terrifying and have rocked me to my core. People have posted my personal information and that of my parents online on the Internet. This has resulted in additional emails, calls, and threats. My family and I were forced to move out of our home.

Since September 16th, my family and I have been visiting in various secure locales, at times separated and at times together, with the help of security guards. This past Tuesday evening, my work email was hacked, and messages were sent out trying to recant my description of the sexual assault.

Apart from the assault itself, these past couple of weeks have been the hardest of my life. I've had to relive this trauma in front of the world, and I've seen my life picked apart by people on television, on Twitter, other social media, other media, and in this body who have never met me or spoken with me.

I have been accused of acting out of partisan political motives. Those who say that do not know me. I am an independent person, and I am no one's pawn. My motivation in coming forward was to be helpful and to provide facts about how Mr. Kavanaugh's actions have damaged my life so that you could take into a serious consideration as you make your decision about how to proceed.

It is not my responsibility to determine whether Mr. Kavanaugh deserves to sit on the Supreme Court. My responsibility is to tell you the truth.

I understand that a professional prosecutor has been hired to ask me questions, and I'm committed to doing my very best to answer them. I have never been questioned by a prosecutor, and I will do my best.

At the same time, because the Committee Members will be judging my credibility, I do hope to be able to engage directly with each of you, and at this point, I will do my best to answer your questions—and would request some caffeine.

Mr. BROMWICH. A Coke or something?

Dr. FORD. That sounds good. That would be great.

Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Dr. Christine Blasey Ford appears as a submission for the record.]

Chairman GRASSLEY. Thank you very much.

Before I use my 5 minutes of questioning, I thought that I would try to remind my colleagues and, in this case, Ms. Mitchell as well, that 5 minutes, the way I traditionally have done, if you ask a question before your time runs out and even though you go over your time, as long as you are not filibustering, I will let you ask your question.

And I am going to make sure that both Dr. Ford and Judge Kavanaugh—as Chairman of the Committee, I know that they are going to get a chance to answer the questions fully beyond that 5 minutes. But when that—when either Dr. Ford or Judge Kavanaugh gets done, then we immediately go to the next person. So I hope that that will be done in a—and Dr. Ford, I am told that you want a break right now, and if you do, that is fine.

