Mr. REID. Madam President, we have conferred with our colleagues on the other side of the aisle. Senator BOND is aware of this new amendment. He has not had time to study the amendment. He has been busy all day, as have all my Republican colleagues at their retreat. But he will have time to work on this tonight. His staff is working on it. We hope tomorrow to have a couple hours of debate, and then it is my understanding there could be and likely will be a motion to table this amendment.

I want to make sure Senators have adequate time to debate this amendment tomorrow. This is, if not the key amendment, one of the key amendments to this legislation, and we want to make sure everyone has adequate time. We are going to come in early in the morning and start this matter as quickly as we can. So I am not going to ask consent tonight as to how much time will be spent on it, but this will be the matter we take up tomorrow.

I have spoken to Senator WHITEHOUSE, who is a member not only of the Judiciary Committee but also the Intelligence Committee. He has a very important amendment he wishes to offer. It is a bipartisan amendment he has worked on for a significant period of time, and we look forward to this amendment.

Hopefully, we can work our way through some of these contentious amendments tomorrow. It is something we need to do, and we are going to work as hard as we can. There are strong feelings on each side. Everyone has worked in good faith. I especially appreciate the cooperation of Senator LEAHY and Senator ROCKEFELLER. They have not agreed on everything, but they have agreed on a lot, and they have worked in a very professional manner in working our way to the point where we now are.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Madam President, there will be no more votes tonight. We have a number of Senators who wish to speak. We understand Senator BOND will be here, Senator ROCKEFELLER will be here, Senator DODD will be here. That is good. They are going to be speaking about the legislation that is now before this body.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARDIN. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARDIN. Madam President, I take this time to speak in favor of the Leahy substitute amendment to the FISA legislation. I start by thanking Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND, Senator LEAHY and Senator SPECTER for their extraordinary work on this most difficult subject. This is not an easy subject. We are dealing with a technology that has changed and the need of our country to get information through our intelligence community, which is important for our national security, and protecting the constitutional and civil rights of the people of our Nation.

The Leahy substitute is a bill that was carefully worked and drafted within the Judiciary Committee. The Intelligence Committee came up with their legislation. We passed it rather quickly before the recess. The Judiciary Committee spent a lot of time looking at the substance of how we could make sure we got the language right, to make sure the intelligence community has the information they need, and that we do protect the rights of the people of our own country. The Leahy substitute does that, with the right balance.

I start by saying that I have been to NSA on many occasions. It is located in the State of Maryland. The dedicated men and women who work there work very hard to protect the interests of our Nation. They do it with a great deal of dedication and sensitivity to the type of information they obtain and how important it is to our country, but it must be done in the right way. The need for the FISA legislation is so we can continue to get information from non-Americans that is important for our national security. Much of this information is obtained from what we call foreign to foreign, where we have communications between an American and a non-American in a country outside of the United States, but because of technology it falls within the definition of the FISA statute. We need to clarify that in a way that will allow the intelligence community to get that information foreign to foreign, information that is important for the security of our country. The Leahy substitute recognizes the change in technology and the need for this information but does it in a way that protects the constitutional rights of the citizens of our own country and the civil rights of Americans.

Where an American is a target, that person should have certain rights. The Leahy substitute protects Americans who are targets of intelligence gathering when they are outside of the United States. When they are inside the United States, there has never been a question that you need to get certain warrants and certain information. Well, this legislation also makes it clear that where an American is a target outside of the United States, that individual will have proper protection. But the legislation goes further and says that in the course of obtaining information, you may get incidental information about an American who was not the target of the investigation, but the American comes up in the communication that has been gathered. We have certain minimization rules to protect the rights of Americans who are incidental to the information being gathered by the intelligence community. The Leahy substitute protects Americans through strengthening the minimization rules.

The Leahy substitute protects the process by involving the courts. The FISA courts are involved in making sure that the right procedures are used in gathering information so that Americans are protected.

The Leahy substitute contains a provision offered by Senator FEINSTEIN to make it clear that the gathering of information under the FISA statute is the exclusive way in which the intelligence community can get information of foreign-to-foreign communications or communications that involve telecommunications centers located in the United States, but that the FISA statute is the exclusive way to proceed so there will not be confusion in the future as to whether there are extraordinary authorities you can use warrantless types of intercepts without having congressional approval. It is the right balance, as I have indicated before, and I urge my colleagues to support the Judiciary Committee's substitute offered by Senator LEAHY.

It even goes further than that. The Leahy substitute does not contain the retroactive immunity. The Intelligence Committee bill contains retroactive immunity for telecommunications companies. Now, my major problem with that is it will take away the appropriate jurisdiction of our courts to act as a check and balance on potential abuses of our rights of privacy. I must tell my colleagues—and I said this in the Judiciary Committee and I have said it on the floor—that telecommunications companies operating in good faith are entitled to help, entitled to relief. They have serious problems in defending their rights because of the confidential nature of the information they are dealing with, but there are ways to deal with that without compromising the independence of the judicial branch of Government, without compromising in the future the ability of our courts to make sure we protect the rights of our citizens.

If we adopt the Leahy substitute, there are going to be other amendments that will be offered that will deal in a responsible way with the concerns of the telecommunications companies. Senator SPECTER has an amendment that says: Look, if the telecommunications companies are operating in good faith, if they are innocent in all this where they can't defend themselves, then let's let the Government be substituted for the telecommunications company. That protects their interests, without compromising the ability of our courts to make sure that all of our rights have been protected. I think that is a better course than what the Intelligence Committee did. There will be an amendment offered by Senator FEINSTEIN which I am a cosponsor of that says, look, we should at least have the courts—the courts—make a judgment as to whether the telecommunications companies operated in good faith under law. That decision shouldn't be made by the executive branch that asked them for the information. That makes common sense to me and offers us at least some protection to make sure we are moving with court supervision. So the Leahy substitute offers us the advantage of eliminating the retroactive immunity which is extremely controversial, and allows us to consider that in its own right, which I am certain we will have a chance to do by the amendments that have been noted.

In addition, the Leahy substitute contains an amendment I offered in the Judiciary Committee that changes the sunset provisions, the termination of these provisions, from a 6-year sunset to a 4-year sunset. Why is that important? First, it is interesting to point out that the members of the Intelligence Committee and the members of the Judiciary Committee, in fact all of the Members of this body, have said we have gotten a lot of cooperation from the intelligence community, from the administration in carrying out our responsibility as the legislative branch of Government to oversee what the executive branch is doing in this area. There has been tremendous cooperation. Why? Because they know we have to pass a statute to continue this authority. We have gotten access to information that at least initially the administration indicated we would not have access to. Well, we got access to it—some of us did. I am sorry more were not offered the opportunity to take a look at the confidential communications—the classified communications. That type of cooperation is helpful when you have the requirement that Congress has to act.

Four years is preferable to six because it will mean the next administration that will take office in January of next year will have to deal with this issue. If we continue a 6-year sunset, there will be no need for the next two Congresses and the administration ever to have to deal with this authority and to take a look at it to see whether it is operating properly, to see whether technology changes have caused it to need to change the way the law is drafted. But a 4-year sunset will mean we will have plenty of time for the agency with predictability to establish its practices for gathering intelligence information about foreign subjects, but we will also have an opportunity to review during the next administration whether these provisions need to be modified, whether there is a different way, a more effective way that we can get this information protecting the rights of the people of this Nation.

For all of those reasons, I urge this body to approve the substitute that is being offered by Senator LEAHY. It is the product of the Judiciary Committee. I believe it is a better way for us to collect the information. It gives us the chance to take a look at the immunity issue fresh and to make sure we don't compromise in the future the proper roles of our courts in protecting the privacy of the citizens of our own country. It provides for a much stronger oversight by the legislative branch of Government, and I urge my colleagues to support that amendment.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. BROWN. Madam President, I appreciate the comments of my colleague from Maryland and his insight. The economic house in our country is not in order. The United States may be entering its first recession since 2001—since the beginning of the Bush Presidency. It is pretty clear in my State of Ohio, from places I visited in January, from Kenton to Celina to Cincinnati to Lancaster, to places all over my State, that people are suffering. Food banks are at their most perilous time in at least 20 years.

In Logan, OH, a small community halfway between Columbus and the center of the State and the Ohio River and the town of Athens, halfway between Hocking County and Logan, OH, is the United Methodist Food Pantry. At 3:30 in the morning on a cold December day just about a month ago, people began to line up to go to this food bank, and by 8 o'clock, when the doors opened, cars were all the way up and down the road. This is a small county. By 1 o'clock in the afternoon, 2,000 people—7 percent of the people in this rural Appalachian county, Hocking County, Logan, OH—had come to this food bank; 2,000 people, 7 percent of the people who live in this county, many having driven 20 or 30 minutes to get there.

Middle-class families in Ohio and throughout our Nation face higher costs for energy and health care and education, amidst stagnant wages and falling home prices. In Lebanon, OH, in Warren County, the United Way director told me 90 percent of people going to food banks to pick up food are employed.

The mayor of Denver told a group of us today—Senator STABENOW and others—that 40 percent of homeless people in greater Denver are employed, they have jobs, but not making enough because of foreclosures or cost of food or transportation, simply not making—making low wages, not making enough to make a go of it.

Our Nation is bleeding jobs. The middle class is shrinking. People are hurting. When it comes to responding to these realities, we have several choices. We can try to buy time, as many of the Republican candidates for President are saying, and leave it at that. The economy is cyclical; it will get better; let's ride it out. No government involvement at all. That is one option.

The second option is we can enact a short-term economic stimulus package where we put money in the pockets of middle-class taxpayers, whether they are paying income tax or Social Security tax, put money in the pockets of middle-class taxpayers, extend unemployment compensation, offer aid for food stamps and food banks, and also offer aid to LIHEAP for seniors who are particularly victimized by this recession.

The third option is we can learn from our mistakes. We certainly need to do the short-term economic stimulus package. That is very important, but that is not enough. We can learn from our mistakes. We can confront the underlying causes of our Nation's economic stability. I want to focus on one of those causes. It is a refusal to acknowledge that U.S. trade policies must evolve as the global marketplace does.

When I first ran for Congress in 1992—the same year as the Presiding Officer was elected from her State of Washington—our trade deficit was $38 billion. Our trade deficit figures for 2007 are estimated at nearly $800 billion, and that is before we count the December numbers. So we know our trade deficit went from $38 billion to, a decade and a half later, nearly $800 billion.

President George Herbert Walker Bush has said that $1 billion in trade deficit or surplus translates into 13,000 jobs. So if you sell a billion dollars more out of the country than you import, that is a net increase of 13,000 jobs. If you export $1 billion less than you export, then that is costing 13,000 jobs. Do the math. We went from a $38 billion trade deficit to an $800 billion trade deficit.

The fact is, these job-killing trade agreements are hemorrhaging jobs out of our country and our manufacturing communities, from small towns such as Tippin, OH, to cities as large as Cleveland, OH, from places like Chillicothe, to places like Columbus. The U.S. trade deficit with China, which has continued to spiral upward, hit $238 billion through November of 2007. In 1992, the year I ran for Congress, our trade deficit with China was slightly over $10 billion. It hit over $238 billion, and that is just through November 2007. As President Bush the first said, $1 billion in trade deficit costs 13,000 jobs. Do the math.

Just with China alone, this is the highest annual imbalance ever recorded with a single country, with any bilateral relationship in world history. The trade deficit we have with China now accounts for 33 percent of the U.S. total trade deficit in goods.

Since 1982, our Nation has accumulated trade deficits of $4.3 trillion. That is money that must be eventually repaid. When you look at $4.3 trillion, think of the first President Bush's formula: a billion-dollar trade deficit costs 13,000 jobs.

Today, Americans are losing jobs for reasons, frankly, that have nothing to do with this recession. They have much to do with our country's narrow, myopic, tunnel-vision trade policies. When we craft trade deals that favor gains for multinational corporations over evenhanded competition for both trading partners, why should we be surprised when U.S. companies are crippled or they move out of the country? In Tippin, OH, where I visited a week and a half ago, workers are losing their pensions, health care, or the company has come in and raided these communities and put people out of work, so there are less dollars for schools, less dollars for police protection, for fire protection, and fewer dollars for the local hardware store, fewer dollars for the local restaurants, all of that.

That is why we need to enforce trade rules meant to prevent anticompetitive practices by countries such as China. We should not be surprised when our manufacturing sector—which is not only crucial to our economy but to national security—falters because of these anticompetitive practices. It is not in our Nation's best interest to rely on other nations for our defense infrastructure, our transportation infrastructure, our industrial infrastructure.

The tragedy is, we in this country do the best research and development in the world. We do the research and development and so often companies take that research and development and make the products in other countries. Then we continue to do research and development, and they continue to take the production of these items and goods and this research and these high-tech products out of our country. The research and development certainly creates jobs, good, high-paying jobs, many in the State of the Presiding Officer and many in mine.

The fact is, we cannot continue to run an economy when we do the research and development in this country and then we farm out the production of those goods that are developed to other countries, to exploit low-wage labor, to exploit weak environmental laws, to exploit worker safety laws, to exploit the consumer products safety net. Look at the toxic toys coming from China and the contaminated toothpaste and dog food, and the unsafe tires coming from countries that don't have a consumer products safety net and the food safety net we have.

We clearly need a stronger manufacturing sector such as we have had in our history. That sector cannot effectively compete against companies subsidized by the Chinese Government, companies that pay slave wages, that too often churn out dangerous toys that end up in our children's bedrooms, and toxic, contaminated food that ends up too often in our families breakfast rooms.

On a level, competitive playing field, U.S. companies thrive. When the cards are stacked against them, they struggle, of course.

In 2007, prior to the onset of the 2008 recession, 217,000 manufacturing jobs across the country were lost. That was last year before this recession seems to have deepened. Madam President, 217,000 jobs were lost in the manufacturing sector last year in places such as Youngstown, Warren, Ravenna, and Lima, all over my State.

The United States now has fewer manufacturing jobs—get this—the United States, now with 300 million people, has fewer manufacturing jobs today than it did in 1950 when we had about 150 million people in our country. Manufacturing jobs bring wealth to our communities. A job that pays $15 an hour in Marion, OH, and pays $14 an hour in Springfield, OH, brings wealth into the community that spends out into other jobs and prosperity for other people in the community.

We have lost more than 3 million manufacturing jobs since President Bush took office in 2001. Many of these jobs have been eliminated because of imports from China or direct offshoring to countries such as China.

Last week, NewPage, a paper manufacturing company based in Miamisburg, OH, near Dayton, announced it was shutting down plants in Wisconsin, Maine, and Chillicothe, OH. Heavily government-subsidized Chinese paper producers account for nearly 50 percent of the world market.

One country, because of subsidies and low wages, unenforced environmental rules, and pretty much nonexistent protection for workers, accounts for 50 percent of the world market. That is not free trade, that is a racket.

China has done little to address the fundamental misalignment of its currency, a practice that continues to take jobs and wealth from our country, and they don't share it with their workers. If they didn't have an oppressive, authoritarian government, it would be a different story. They are taking wealth out of our country, and it means higher profits for outsourcing companies, more money for the Chinese Communist Party, for the People's Liberation Army, but not much for Chinese workers.

When we allow China to manipulate currency, trade isn't free, it is fixed. When we allow China to import dangerous products into our country, we should not be surprised when Americans balk.

It took generations for our Nation to build a solid product safety system. If we don't demand safe imports from China and our other trading partner nations, our investment in U.S. product safety becomes an exercise in futility. Think how it happens. U.S. companies shut down an American toy manufacturer, for instance, and those U.S. companies, after shutting down the manufacturing in the United States, move to China. China is a country with low wages, unenforced environmental and worker safety standards. The U.S. company goes to China because of weak environmental and worker safety standards and low wages. Because they don't enforce those rules, you know what is going to happen. Products made in those countries will be made in bad conditions, and there is likely to be toxic or dangerous toys, and more likely to be contaminated food.

The U.S. companies in China then push their Chinese subcontractors to cut costs because they want more profit. So they are pushing the Chinese subcontractors to cut costs, and then those products that are imported into the United States are even more dangerous. Then the Consumer Products Safety Commission in this country—because of President Bush's decisions, we have weakened the regulatory system, so those products come in and there are not enough inspectors. The laws are weakened, so the dangerous toys and contaminated food too often ends up in our family rooms, bedrooms, and our kitchens.

Some free-trade proponents say workers and consumers should get over it, get used to it; it is globalization and there is nothing you can do about it. That is wrong.

Continuing this course will not only cost the middle class more jobs, it will cost our economy its global leadership. It will foist so much debt on our children and their children that basic economic security, basic retirement security may be reserved for the fortunate few. Certainly not the middle class. And as for the poor, just let them eat cake.

The people in Ohio, in all corners, are swimming upstream against deteriorating economic forces. One important reason for that is that Federal policymakers continue to cling to the fantasy that markets run themselves and police themselves, and as long as the rich are getting richer, wealth will trickle down, jobs will be created, and everybody is better off.

It is time to take the blinders off. To secure our economy for the future, we need to write trade rules that crack down on anticompetitive gaming. In our country, still the most powerful in the world, with the most vigorous economy, we need to write trade rules that crack down on anticompetitive gaming of the system. That is what they have done. We need trade rules that prevent dangerous products from entering our country. We need trade rules that acknowledge that destroying the environment in any country, whether it is China or the United States, is a threat to every country.

We need to take responsibility for the consequences of our inaction when it comes to trade policy. We need to take responsibility for the consequences of mistakes we have made in writing trade policy. We need to change course, and we need to do it now.

I yield the floor.

(Mr. CASEY assumed the Chair.)

RECOGNIZING ROBERT ''SARGENT'' SHRIVER

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize Robert ''Sargent'' Shriver, a role model, hero, and icon. An activist, attorney, and politician, Sargent Shriver has always led by example, driven by the desire to serve those less fortunate.

Sargent Shriver's political career began in 1960, when he worked for his brother-in-law, Democratic Presidential candidate John F. Kennedy. Passionate about civil rights, Shriver was instrumental in connecting then-Senator Kennedy with Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr. And when the newly elected President established the Peace Corps in 1961, Shriver became the new agency's first director. This organization, which promotes peace and international friendship, embodies Shriver's belief in public service by young people to help the poor and the uneducated abroad and at home. In less than 6 years, Shriver developed volunteer activities in more than 55 countries with more than 14,500 volunteers.

In 1962, Sargent Shriver's wife Eunice Kennedy Shriver began ''Camp Shriver,'' a day camp for young people with physical and intellectual disabilities. ''Camp Shriver'' grew into the Special Olympics, of which Sargent Shriver later became president and chairman of the board. Special Olympics was built on Eunice and Sargent Shriver's shared dedication to expanding opportunities for disabled persons, and today brings athletic competition to 2.5 people in 165 countries.

Shriver was presented with the Franklin D. Roosevelt Freedom from Want Award in 1993, a prestigious award that acknowledges a lifetime commitment to securing the basic needs of others. On August 8, 1994, President Bill Clinton recognized Sargent Shriver's lifetime in public service with the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the United States' highest civilian honor.

Additionally, Sargent Shriver served as U.S. Ambassador to France and has directed several organizations including, Head Start, Job Corps, Community Action, Upward Bound, Foster Grandparents, and the National Center on Poverty. Today, Shriver lives in Maryland with his wife.

To tell Shriver's life story to the next generation, Emmy award-winning writer, producer and director Bruce Orenstein created a film entitled ''American Idealist: The Story of Sargent Shriver.'' The program, which aired on the Public Broadcasting Service this past Monday, January 21, 2008, focuses on Shriver's visionary devotion to activism. By highlighting his role in the civil rights movement and the war on poverty, this powerful film will help spread Sargent Shriver's message of patriotic service.

In closing, I extend my most sincere gratitude to Robert Sargent Shriver. As a result of this film, his legacy will continue to inspire future generations of Americans.

RECOGNIZING CONGRESSMAN TOM LANTOS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize one of America's most respected and distinguished lawmakers: chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, TOM LANTOS of California.

The story of Congressman LANTOS is unique in American history, and one that serves as an inspiration to each of us. Born in Budapest, Hungary, on February 1, 1928, this young man displayed the type of intellectual precociousness characteristic of our great statesmen of the past. It was during his youth in Central Europe that Congressman LANTOS experienced great joys but also endured a most terrible tragedy.

By the time he was 16 years old, the Nazis had occupied his native Hungary, and as a result of being born into a Jewish family, Congressman LANTOS was soon taken to a forced labor camp. Through unimaginable perseverance and resolve, he survived long enough to escape and then complete the 22-mile trek to a safe house run by Swedish humanitarian Raoul Wallenberg. Sadly, like so many other Jewish families torn apart by the Holocaust, Congressman LANTOS lost his family in the ordeal.

A bright moment during these darkest of times in human history was the reunification of two childhood sweethearts. TOM and his lovely wife Annette first met as children growing up in Budapest, and they have now entered their 58th year of devoted marriage to one another.

Two years after the last shots of World War II were fired, Congressman LANTOS won a scholarship to study in the United States. Arriving in America with nothing more than a piece Hungarian salami, he began his studies at the University of Washington in Seattle, where he received a B.A. and M.A. in economics. This young academic then moved to San Francisco in 1950, where he began graduate studies at the University of California, Berkeley, eventually receiving his Ph.D. in economics.

Following three decades as a college professor in economics, TOM was elected to Congress in 1980 from the State of California. Ever since, Congressman LANTOS has enjoyed as fine a career in public service as any lawmaker of his generation. Perhaps his greatest single contribution to our cherished branch of government was his founding, along with Congressman John Edward Porter of Illinois, of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus in 1983. In the intervening quarter-century, the caucus has brought much-needed attention to the most pressing human rights crises around the world. In 1987, the caucus became the first official U.S. entity to welcome recent Congressional Gold Medal recipient, his Holiness the Dalai Lama, to the United States.

Considering Congressman LANTOS' wealth of intellect and wisdom in the field of foreign policy, the United States has been privileged to have him serve as chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs for the past 12 months, where he previously served as ranking member. From demanding tougher sanctions on the Iranian government to standing up for democracy and human rights in Burma, his chairmanship has been nothing short of masterful in these most difficult of times. I can stand up here today, with the full confidence of my colleagues in the Senate, and say that American foreign policy has been greatly enriched by the contributions of Congressman LANTOS throughout his tenure in the House of Representatives.

I met TOM before I came to Washington in 1982. He is terrific in so many ways and he is devoted to his wife, children, and grandchildren. His No. 1 priority is his two beautiful daughters, 17 fantastic grandchildren, and two wonderful great-grandchildren. He loves them and loves to talk about them.

I served with Chairman LANTOS during my years as a Member of the House of Representatives and consider him a friend, as well as a leader. I shared the sadness of my fellow Senators and House Members, when Chairman LANTOS announced that he will leave the House at the end of this year. On behalf of all my friends in the Senate, I wish you and your family all the best as you continue your public service in other ways following this congressional session.

RETIREMENT OF BILL GAINER

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate Bill Gainer for his many professional contributions to my home State and to wish him well as he begins a new chapter in his life. I have known Bill and his wife Gerry for over 20 years. Bill is a proud son of the southside of Chicago. He was born in Roseland to Dorothy Quinn and William Gainer, a second generation Chicago police officer. He and his six brothers and sisters went to St. Wilabroad grammar school and Bill graduated from St. Ignatius in 1958—at 16 years of age. Bill found his calling and started with Illinois Bell in 1960. The next year he joined the Army where he ran phone lines through southern Texas in the 261st Signal Construction Corps.

Starting at the top—of a telephone pole as a lineman—Bill has worked his way through every operation of Illinois Bell—construction/operations, installation/repair, marketing, network coordination–planning, and business relations. He ended up at the crossroads in a job that combined his depth of knowledge and love for the phone company with his devotion to Chicago and the labor and civic organizations that make it the greatest city in the world.

Leveraging his place in the business community with his Irish heritage, Bill became an active member in the city of Chicago and Cook County Irish Trade Missions. Mayor Richard M. Daley appointed Bill as the chairman of the Chicago Sister Cities International Program—Galway Committee in October of 2001. He has hosted mayors, Members of the Irish Parliament and business leaders to promote trade and business development between Chicago and Ireland. Bill is also the chairman of the Business Development Committee for the Cook County Irish Trade Mission to County Down and County Cork. The ever-expanding success of the South Side Irish Parade owes much to Bill. He is the Parade's emeritus chair.

Bill also has been active in many civic and nonprofit organizations. Closest to his heart are his involvement on the advisory board for Misericordia Heart of Mercy and the executive board of the Mercy Home for Boys and Girls. Bill was awarded the Misericordia Heart of Mercy Award in 2001 for his dedication and devotion to the Misericordia Home where his sister Rosemary lived many happy years. He is also the past president of the Illinois Veterans Leadership Program, an executive board member of the Irish Fellowship Club, the Chicagoland Chamber of Commerce, the Convention and Tourism Bureau, as well as the Irish American Alliance. As a result of his deep respect for law enforcement and the fact that there has been a Gainer serving continuously on the Chicago Police Department for over 100 years, Bill is an active member and strong supporter of the Hundred Club of Cook County.

Bill is the first to admit that behind all these wonderful accomplishments is his great wife Gerry, a registered nurse and his six children, Bill, Bridget, Nora, Maureen, Mary, and Shelia and four grandchildren. Since they met at Duffy's Tavern in 1964, Bill and Gerry have not only been a great team, but also a lot of fun and a wonderful example of marriage and family. I congratulate him and his family and wish them the very best.

REMEMBERING MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, on January 21, the Nation recognized the birthday of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. It is important that we honor this day and that we do not let the significance of Dr. King fade from our memories, as individuals and as a nation.

I am pleased that citizens in my State of Arizona have found ways to honor Dr. King and ensure that the lessons of his legacy continue to resound among future generations. This past weekend the Senate Chaplain, Dr. Black, joined me in Phoenix for a number of events relating the King commemoration. Dr. Black preached two sermons and later delivered the keynote address at the Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Youth Scholarship service, a candlelight ceremony at Pilgrim Rest Baptist Church.

It is very fitting that these events took place in churches. Dr. King, after all, was a minister, and his speeches and writings invoked biblical themes and were delivered with the zeal of a fiery evangelist. Moreover, by recognizing Dr. King in a place of worship, we are reminded of the important role that religion plays in the public square.

Indeed, the events like those I attended in Phoenix highlight the importance that religious institutions play in civic life, and I believe they embody an important past of Dr. King's legacy.

Alexis de Tocqueville observed long ago that ''Freedom sees religion as the companion of its struggles and triumphs, the cradle of its infancy, and the divine source of its rights. Religion is considered as the guardian of mores, and mores are regarded as the guarantee of the laws and pledge for the maintenance of freedom itself.''

Religion is an essential underpinning to a well-ordered society and a functioning democratic republic. The Founders of our country understood that, and Dr. King did too.

In his famous ''I have a dream'' speech, Dr. King invoked the words of the Declaration of Independence. On August 28, 1963, he told the throngs who had gathered on The Mall, ''I have a dream that one day this Nation will rise up and live out the true meaning of its creed: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal.'''

King believed, as the Founders wrote in the Declaration, that we are created equal and endowed with the right to life and liberty by our Creator. King's speech could have very well been delivered to a congregation at a church instead of before thousands at the Lincoln Memorial.

In his message at the King celebration in Phoenix, Dr. Black urged the congregation to remember some will seek to destroy the dream and dreamer, but God will frustrate their plans.

These words echo what King said at the Lincoln Memorial almost 40 years ago, ''With this faith, we will be able to work together, to pray together, to struggle together, to go to jail together, to stand up for freedom together, knowing that we will be free one day.''

Mr. President, it is imperative that we as Americans understand the bond between religion and freedom, and I was pleased to attend the King celebration services this past weekend that testified to this bond.

HONORING OUR ARMED FORCES

MAJOR ANDREW OLMSTED

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on January 3, 2008, MAJ Andrew Olmsted of Northborough, MA, was killed in Iraq. He was the first American servicemember to die in Iraq this year. During his service there, he wrote a number of essays about his service that he posted on the Internet. His final essay, written in anticipation of his possible death, is an eloquent farewell that I believe will be of interest to all of us in Congress, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FINAL POST

(January 4, 2008)

''I am leaving this message for you because it appears I must leave sooner than I intended. I would have preferred to say this in person, but since I cannot, let me say it here.''

—G'Kar, Babylon 5.

''Only the dead have seen the end of war.''

This is an entry I would have preferred not to have published, but there are limits to what we can control in life, and apparently I have passed one of those limits. And so, like G'Kar, I must say here what I would much prefer to say in person. I want to thank Hilzoy for putting it up for me. It's not easy asking anyone to do something for you in the event of your death, and it is a testament to her quality that she didn't hesitate to accept the charge. As with many bloggers, I have a disgustingly large ego, and so I just couldn't bear the thought of not being able to have the last word if the need arose. Perhaps I take that further than most, I don't know. I hope so. It's frightening to think there are many people as neurotic as I am in the world. In any case, since I won't get another chance to say what I think, I wanted to take advantage of this opportunity. Such as it is.

''When some people die, it's time to be sad. But when other people die, like really evil people, or the Irish, it's time to celebrate.''

—Jimmy Bender, ''Greg the Bunny.''

''And maybe now it's your turn to die kicking some ass.''

What I don't want this to be is a chance for me, or anyone else, to be maudlin. I'm dead. That sucks, at least for me and my family and friends. But all the tears in the world aren't going to bring me back, so I would prefer that people remember the good things about me rather than mourning my loss. (If it turns out a specific number of tears will, in fact, bring me back to life, then by all means, break out the onions.) I had a pretty good life, as I noted above. Sure, all things being equal I would have preferred to have more time, but I have no business complaining with all the good fortune I've enjoyed in my life. So if you're up for that, put on a little 80s music (preferably vintage 1980–1984), grab a Coke and have a drink with me. If you have it, throw 'Freedom Isn't Free' from the Team America soundtrack in; if you can't laugh at that song, I think you need to lighten up a little. I'm dead, but if you're reading this, you're not, so take a moment to enjoy that happy fact.

''Our thoughts form the universe. They always matter.''

—Citizen G'Kar, Babylon 5.

Believe it or not, one of the things I will miss most is not being able to blog any longer. The ability to put my thoughts on (virtual) paper and put them where people can read and respond to them has been marvelous, even if most people who have read my writings haven't agreed with them. If there is any hope for the long term success of democracy, it will be if people agree to listen to and try to understand their political opponents rather than simply seeking to crush them. While the blogosphere has its share of partisans, there are some awfully smart people making excellent arguments out there as well, and I know I have learned quite a bit since I began blogging. I flatter myself I may have made a good argument or two as well; if I didn't, please don't tell me. It has been a great five-plus years. I got to meet a lot of people who are way smarter than me, including such luminaries as Virginia Postrel and her husband Stephen (speaking strictly from an 'improving the species' perspective, it's tragic those two don't have kids, because they're both scary smart.), the estimable Hilzoy and Sebastian of Obsidian Wings, Jeff Goldstein and Stephen Green, the men who consistently frustrated me with their mix of wit and wisdom I could never match, and I've no doubt left out a number of people to whom I apologize. Bottom line: if I got the chance to meet you through blogging, I enjoyed it. I'm only sorry I couldn't meet more of you. In particular I'd like to thank Jim Henley, who while we've never met has been a true comrade, whose words have taught me and whose support has been of great personal value to me. I would very much have enjoyed meeting Jim.

Blogging put me in touch with an inordinate number of smart people, an exhilarating if humbling experience. When I was young, I was smart, but the older I got, the more I realized just how dumb I was in comparison to truly smart people. But, to my credit, I think, I was at least smart enough to pay attention to the people with real brains and even occasionally learn something from them. It has been joy and a pleasure having the opportunity to do this.

''It's not fair.''

''No. It's not. Death never is.''

—Captain John Sheridan and Dr. Stephen Franklin, Babylon 5.

''They didn't even dig him a decent grave.''

''Well, it's not how you're buried. It's how you're remembered.''

—Cimarron and Wil Andersen, The Cowboys.

I suppose I should speak to the circumstances of my death. It would be nice to believe that I died leading men in battle, preferably saving their lives at the cost of my own. More likely I was caught by a marksman or an IED. But if there is an afterlife, I'm telling anyone who asks that I went down surrounded by hundreds of insurgents defending a village composed solely of innocent women and children. It'll be our little secret, ok?

I do ask (not that I'm in a position to enforce this) that no one try to use my death to further their political purposes. I went to Iraq and did what I did for my reasons, not yours. My life isn't a chit to be used to bludgeon people to silence on either side. If you think the U.S. should stay in Iraq, don't drag me into it by claiming that somehow my death demands us staying in Iraq. If you think the U.S. ought to get out tomorrow, don't cite my name as an example of someone's life who was wasted by our mission in Iraq. I have my own opinions about what we should do about Iraq, but since I'm not around to expound on them I'd prefer others not try and use me as some kind of moral capital to support a position I probably didn't support. Further, this is tough enough on my family without their having to see my picture being used in some rally or my name being cited for some political purpose. You can fight political battles without hurting my family, and I'd prefer that you did so.

On a similar note, while you're free to think whatever you like about my life and death, if you think I wasted my life, I'll tell you you're wrong. We're all going to die of something. I died doing a job I loved. When your time comes, I hope you are as fortunate as I was.

''What an idiot! What a loser!''

—Chaz Reingold, Wedding Crashers.

---

''Oh and I don't want to die for you, but if dying's asked of me;

I'll bear that cross with honor, 'cause freedom don't come free.''

Those who know me through my writings on the Internet over the past five-plus years probably have wondered at times about my chosen profession. While I am not a Libertarian, I certainly hold strongly individualistic beliefs. Yet I have spent my life in a profession that is not generally known for rugged individualism. Worse, I volunteered to return to active duty knowing that the choice would almost certainly lead me to Iraq. The simple explanation might be that I was simply stupid, and certainly I make no bones about having done some dumb things in my life, but I don't think this can be chalked up to stupidity. Maybe I was inconsistent in my beliefs; there are few people who adhere religiously to the doctrines of their chosen philosophy, whatever that may be. But I don't think that was the case in this instance either.

As passionate as I am about personal freedom, I don't buy the claims of anarchists that humanity would be just fine without any government at all. There are too many people in the world who believe that they know best how people should live their lives, and many of them are more than willing to use force to impose those beliefs on others. A world without government simply wouldn't last very long; as soon as it was established, strongmen would immediately spring up to establish their fiefdoms. So there is a need for government to protect the people's rights. And one of the fundamental tools to do that is an army that can prevent outside agencies from imposing their rules on a society. A lot of people will protest that argument by noting that the people we are fighting in Iraq are unlikely to threaten the rights of the average American. That's certainly true; while our enemies would certainly like to wreak great levels of havoc on our society, the fact is they're not likely to succeed. But that doesn't mean there isn't still a need for an army (setting aside debates regarding whether ours is the right size at the moment). Americans are fortunate that we don't have to worry too much about people coming to try and overthrow us, but part of the reason we don't have to worry about that is because we have an army that is stopping anyone who would try.

Soldiers cannot have the option of opting out of missions because they don't agree with them: that violates the social contract. The duly-elected American government decided to go to war in Iraq. (Even if you maintain President Bush was not properly elected, Congress voted for war as well.) As a soldier, I have a duty to obey the orders of the President of the United States as long as they are Constitutional. I can no more opt out of missions I disagree with than I can ignore laws I think are improper. I do not consider it a violation of my individual rights to have gone to Iraq on orders because I raised my right hand and volunteered to join the army. Whether or not this mission was a good one, my participation in it was an affirmation of something I consider quite necessary to society. So if nothing else, I gave my life for a pretty important principle; I can (if you'll pardon the pun) live with that.

''It's all so brief, isn't it? A typical human lifespan is almost a hundred years. But it's barely a second compared to what's out there. It wouldn't be so bad if life didn't take so long to figure out. Seems you just start to get it right, and then . . . it's over.''

I wish I could say I'd at least started to get it right. Although, in my defense, I think I batted a solid .250 or so. Not a superstar, but at least able to play in the big leagues. I'm afraid I can't really offer any deep secrets or wisdom. I lived my life better than some, worse than others, and I like to think that the world was a little better off for my having been here. Not very much, but then, few of us are destined to make more than a tiny dent in history's Green Monster. I would be lying if I didn't admit I would have liked to have done more, but it's a bit too late for that now, eh? The bottom line, for me, is that I think I can look back at my life and at least see a few areas where I may have made a tiny difference, and massive ego aside, that's probably not too bad.

''The flame also reminds us that life is precious. As each flame is unique; when it goes out, it's gone forever. There will never be another quite like it.''

I write this in part, admittedly, because I would like to think that there's at least a little something out there to remember me by. Granted, this site will eventually vanish, being ephemeral in a very real sense of the word, but at least for a time it can serve as a tiny record of my contributions to the world. But on a larger scale, for those who knew me well enough to be saddened by my death, especially for those who haven't known anyone else lost to this war, perhaps my death can serve as a small reminder of the costs of war. Regardless of the merits of this war, or of any war, I think that many of us in America have forgotten that war means death and suffering in wholesale lots. A decision that for most of us in America was academic, whether or not to go to war in Iraq, had very real consequences for hundreds of thousands of people. Yet I was as guilty as anyone of minimizing those very real consequences in lieu of a cold discussion of theoretical merits of war and peace. Now I'm facing some very real consequences of that decision; who says life doesn't have a sense of humor?

But for those who knew me and feel this pain, I think it's a good thing to realize that this pain has been felt by thousands and thousands (probably millions, actually) of other people all over the world. That is part of the cost of war, any war, no matter how justified. If everyone who feels this pain keeps that in mind the next time we have to decide whether or not war is a good idea, perhaps it will help us to make a more informed decision. Because it is pretty clear that the average American would not have supported the Iraq War had they known the costs going in. I am far too cynical to believe that any future debate over war will be any less vitriolic or emotional, but perhaps a few more people will realize just what those costs can be the next time.

This may be a contradiction of my above call to keep politics out of my death, but I hope not. Sometimes going to war is the right idea. I think we've drawn that line too far in the direction of war rather than peace, but I'm a soldier and I know that sometimes you have to fight if you're to hold onto what you hold dear. But in making that decision, I believe we understate the costs of war; when we make the decision to fight, we make the decision to kill, and that means lives and families destroyed. Mine now falls into that category; the next time the question of war or peace comes up, if you knew me at least you can understand a bit more just what it is you're deciding to do, and whether or not those costs are worth it.

''This is true love. You think this happens every day?''

—Westley, The Princess Bride.

''Good night, my love, the brightest star in my sky.''

—John Sheridan, Babylon 5.

This is the hardest part. While I certainly have no desire to die, at this point I no longer have any worries. That is not true of the woman who made my life something to enjoy rather than something merely to survive. She put up with all of my faults, and they are myriad, she endured separations again and again . . . I cannot imagine being more fortunate in love than I have been with Amanda. Now she has to go on without me, and while a cynic might observe she's better off, I know that this is a terrible burden I have placed on her, and I would give almost anything if she would not have to bear it. It seems that is not an option. I cannot imagine anything more painful than that, and if there is an afterlife, this is a pain I'll bear forever.

I wasn't the greatest husband. I could have done so much more, a realization that, as it so often does, comes too late to matter. But I cherished every day I was married to Amanda. When everything else in my life seemed dark, she was always there to light the darkness. It is difficult to imagine my life being worth living without her having been in it. I hope and pray that she goes on without me and enjoys her life as much as she deserves. I can think of no one more deserving of happiness than her.

''I will see you again, in the place where no shadows fall.''

—Ambassador Delenn, Babylon 5.

I don't know if there is an afterlife; I tend to doubt it, to be perfectly honest. But if there is any way possible, Amanda, then I will live up to Delenn's words, somehow, some way. I love you.

FURTHER CHANGES TO S. CON. RES. 21

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, pursuant to section 301 of S. Con. Res. 21, I previously filed revisions to S. Con. Res. 21, the 2008 budget resolution. Those revisions were made for legislation reauthorizing the State Children's Health Insurance Program, SCHIP.

Congress cleared H.R. 3963, the Children's Health Insurance Program Reauthorization Act of 2007, on November 1, 2007. The President vetoed that legislation on December 12, 2007. Unfortunately, the House of Representatives was unsuccessful in its attempt today to override that veto. Consequently, I am further revising the 2008 budget resolution and reversing the adjustments previously made pursuant to section 301 to the aggregates and the allocation provided to the Senate Finance Committee.

I ask unanimous consent that the following revisions to S. Con. Res. 21 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE SECRETS PROTECTION ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, yesterday, Senator SPECTER and I introduced the State Secrets Protection Act. I have been working on this bill with Senator SPECTER for several months, and I thank him for his commitment and leadership on this very important issue. I hope that our collaboration on this legislation will demonstrate that even the most sensitive problems can be addressed through bipartisan cooperation if we keep the interests of the Nation front-and-center and roll up our sleeves to do the work of seeking a realistic and workable solution. The State Secrets Protection Act is an essential response to a pressing need.

For years, there has been growing concern about the state secrets privilege. It is a common law privilege that lets the Government protect sensitive national security information from being disclosed as evidence in litigation. The problem is that sometimes plaintiffs may need that information to show that their rights were violated. If the privilege is not applied carefully, the Government can use it as a tool for cover up by withholding evidence that is not actually sensitive. The state secrets privilege is important, but there is a risk it will be overused and abused.

The privilege was first recognized by the Supreme Court in 1953, and it has been asserted since then by every administration, Republican and Democratic. Under the Bush administration, however, use of the state secrets privilege has dramatically increased and the harmful consequences of its irregular application by courts have become painfully clear.

Injured plaintiffs have been denied justice, courts have failed to address fundamental questions of constitutional rights and separation of powers, and confusion pervades this area of law. The Senate debate on reforming the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act has become far more difficult than it ought to be because many believe that if courts hear lawsuits against telecommunications companies, the courts will be unable to deal fairly and effectively with the Government's invocation of the privilege.

Studies show that the Bush administration has raised the privilege in over 25 percent more cases per year than previous administrations and has sought dismissal in over 90 percent more cases. As one scholar recently noted, this administration has used the privilege to ''seek blanket dismissal of every case challenging the constitutionality of specific, ongoing government programs'' related to its war on terrorism, and as a result, the privilege is impairing the ability of Congress and the judiciary to perform their constitutional duty to check executive power.

Another leading scholar recently found that ''in practical terms, the state secrets privilege never fails.'' Like other commentators, he concluded that ''the state secrets privilege is the most powerful secrecy privilege available to the president,'' and ''the people of the United States have suffered needlessly because the law is now a servant to executive claims of national security.''

In 1980, Congress enacted the Classified Information Procedures Act—known as CIPA—to provide Federal courts with clear statutory guidance on handling secret evidence in criminal cases. For almost 30 years, courts have effectively applied that law to make criminal trials fairer and safer. During that period, Congress has also regulated judicial review of national security materials under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and the Freedom of Information Act. Because of these laws, Federal judges regularly review and handle highly classified evidence in many types of cases.

Yet, in civil cases, litigants have been left behind. Congress has failed to provide clear rules or standards for determining whether evidence is protected by the state secrets privilege. We have failed to develop procedures that will protect injured parties and also prevent the disclosure of sensitive information. Because use of the state secrets privilege has escalated in recent years, there is an increasing need for the judiciary and the executive to have clear, fair, and safe rules.

Many have recognized the need for congressional guidance on this issue. The American Bar Association recently issued a report ''urg[ing] Congress to enact legislation governing Federal civil cases implicating the state secrets privilege.'' The bipartisan Constitution Project found that ''legislative action [on the privilege] is essential to restore and strengthen the basic rights and liberties provided by our constitutional system of government.'' Leading constitutional scholars sent a letter to Congress emphasizing that there ''is a need for new rules designed to protect the system of checks and balances, individual rights, national security, fairness in the courtroom, and the adversary process.''

The State Secrets Protection Act we are introducing responds to this need by creating a civil version of CIPA. The act provides guidance to the Federal courts in handling assertions of the privilege in civil cases, and it restores checks and balances to this crucial area of law by placing constraints on the application of state secrets doctrine. The act will strengthen our national security by requiring judges to protect all state secrets from disclosure, and it will strengthen the rule of law by preventing misuse of the privilege and enabling more litigants to achieve justice in court.

Recognizing that state secrets must be protected, the Act enables the executive branch to avoid publicly revealing evidence if doing so might disclose a state secret. If a court finds that an item of evidence contains a state secret, or cannot be effectively separated from other evidence that contains a state secret, then the evidence is privileged and may not be released for any reason. Secure judicial proceedings and other safeguards that have proven effective under CIPA and the Freedom of Information Act will ensure that the litigation does not reveal sensitive information.

At the same time, the State Secrets Protection Act will prevent the executive branch from using the privilege to deny parties their day in court or shield illegal activity that is not actually sensitive. A recently declassified report shows that the executive branch abused the state secrets privilege in the very Supreme Court case, United States v. Reynolds (1953), that serves as the basis for the privilege today. In Reynolds, an accident report was kept out of court due to the government's claim that it would disclose state secrets. The court never even looked at the report. Now that the report has been made public, we've learned that in fact it contained no state secrets whatever but it did contain embarrassing information revealing government negligence.

In recent years, Federal courts have applied the Reynolds precedent to dismiss numerous cases—on issues ranging from torture, to extraordinary rendition, to warrantless wiretapping—without ever reviewing the evidence. Some courts have even upheld the executive's claims of state secrets when the purported secrets were publicly available, as in the case of El-Masri v. Tenet. In that case, there was extensive evidence in the public record that the plaintiff was kidnapped and tortured by the CIA on the basis of mistaken identity, but the court simply accepted at face value the Government's claim that litigation would require disclosure of state secrets. The court dismissed Mr. El-Masri's case without even evaluating the evidence or considering whether the case could be litigated on other evidence.

When Federal courts accept the executive branch's state secrets claims as absolute, our system of checks and balances breaks down. By refusing to consider key pieces of evidence, or by dismissing lawsuits outright without considering any evidence at all, courts give the executive branch the ability to violate American laws and constitutional rights without any accountability or oversight, and innocent victims are left unable to obtain justice. The kind of abuse that occurred in Reynolds will no longer be possible under the State Secrets Protection Act.

The act requires courts to examine the evidence for which the privilege is claimed, in order to determine whether the executive branch has validly invoked the privilege. The court must look at the actual evidence, not just Government affidavits about the evidence, and make its own assessment of whether information is covered by the privilege. Only after a court has considered the evidence and found that it provides a valid legal defense can it dismiss a claim on state secrets grounds.

The act also gives parties an opportunity to make a preliminary case with their own evidence, and it allows courts to develop solutions to let lawsuits proceed, such as by directing the Government to produce unclassified substitutes for secret evidence. Many of these powers are already available to courts, but they often go unused. In addition, the act draws on CIPA to include provisions for congressional reporting that will ensure an additional layer of oversight.

I am pleased that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania and I have been able to work together to produce this bill. We expect to have a hearing soon on the state secrets privilege in the Judiciary Committee under the leadership of Chairman LEAHY, who is a cosponsor of the bill and a strong supporter of state secrets reform. I look forward to a full airing of the issues and the important feedback that will come from the committee's thoughtful consideration of the legislation.

In particular, as the bill moves forward, we intend to continue to explore the possibilities for providing relief to plaintiffs who have a winning case but cannot get a trial because every piece of evidence they need is privileged. This is an extremely difficult subject, which Congress should address if we can find a fair way to do so that will also protect legitimate secrets. We will also explore other measures to make the bill stronger, such as providing expedited security clearance reviews for attorneys.

Under the State Secrets Protection Act, the Nation will be able to preserve its commitment to individual rights and the rule of law, without compromising its national defense or foreign policy. Congress has clear constitutional authority to regulate the rules of procedure and evidence for the Federal courts, and it is long past time for us to exercise this authority on such an important issue. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to pass this needed legislation as soon as possible.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the State Secrets Protection Act of 2008. Senator KENNEDY and I are introducing this bipartisan bill in order to harmonize the law applicable in cases involving the executive branch's invocation of the privilege. This bill is timely for several reasons. First, the use of the privilege appears to be on the rise in the post-September 11, 2001, era, which has generated new public attention and concern about its legitimacy. Second, there is some disparity among the district and appellate court opinions analyzing the privilege, particularly as to the question of whether courts must independently review the allegedly privileged evidence. Finally, a codified test for evaluating state secrets that requires courts to review the evidence in camera—a Latin phrase meaning ''in the judge's private chambers''—will help to reassure the public that the claims are neither spurious nor intended to cover up alleged Government misconduct. With greater checks and balances and greater accountability, there is a commensurate increase in public confidence in our institutions of Government.

In view of its increasing use, inconsistent application, and public criticism, we think the time is ripe to pass legislation codifying standards on the state secrets privilege. Our bill builds upon proposals by the American Bar Association and legal scholars who have called upon Congress to legislate in this area.

Mr. President, I begin my remarks by discussing some of the historical and more recent applications of the state secrets doctrine—which have run the gamut from cases involving military aviation technology to CIA sources and methods, to extraordinary rendition and the terrorist surveillance program, or TSP.

In the 1876 case Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105, 1876, the Supreme Court acknowledged a privilege that barred claims between the Government and its covert agents ''in all secret employments of the government in time of war, or upon matters affecting our foreign relations, where a disclosure of the service might compromise or embarrass our government in its public duties, or endanger the person or injure the character of the agent.'' The Totten case involved a purported Civil War spy who sought to sue President Lincoln to enforce an alleged espionage agreement. In 2005, the Court reaffirmed the holding in Totten that ''lawsuits premised on alleged espionage agreements are altogether forbidden.'' Tenet v. Doe, 544 U.S. 1, 2005.

Notwithstanding Totten, the modern state secrets privilege was first recognized by the Supreme Court in the 1953 case of United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 1953. Reynolds involved the Government's assertion of the military secrets privilege for an accident report discussing the crash of a B–29 bomber, which killed three civilian engineers along with six military personnel. In Reynolds, the Supreme Court set out several rules pertinent to the assertion and consideration of the state secrets privilege. For example, the Court said the privilege belongs to the Government. It can be neither claimed nor waived by a third party. The Court also held that the privilege must be asserted ''in a formal claim of privilege lodged by the head of the department which has control over the matter, after actual consideration by that officer.'' Further, ''the showing of necessity which is made will determine how far the court should probe in satisfying itself that the occasion for invoking the privilege is appropriate.'' Significantly, however, the Supreme Court held that the material in question need not necessarily be disclosed to the reviewing judge. On this point, the Reynolds Court said:

> Judicial control over the evidence in a case cannot be abdicated to the caprice of executive officers. Yet we will not go so far as to say that the court may automatically require a complete disclosure to the judge before the claim of privilege will be accepted in any case. It may be possible to satisfy the court, from all the circumstances of the case, that there is a reasonable danger that compulsion of the evidence will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged. When this is the case, the occasion for the privilege is appropriate, and the court should not jeopardize the security which the privilege is meant to protect by insisting upon an examination of the evidence, even by the judge alone, in chambers.

Unfortunately, this limitation on judicial review ultimately led to further litigation and public skepticism when the accident report from the Reynolds case was later declassified—a result the State Secrets Protection Act seeks to avoid in future cases.

In 2003, after the documents at issue in Reynolds were declassified, one of the original plaintiffs and heirs of the others brought suit alleging that the Government had committed a ''fraud upon the court.'' I cite Herring v. United States, 424 F.3d 384 (3d Cir. 2005), cert. denied by Herring v. United States, 547 U.S. 1123, May 1, 2006. They claimed the Government had asserted the military secrets privilege for documents that did not reveal anything sensitive simply to conceal the Government's own negligence. Nevertheless, both the district court and the Third Circuit declined to reopen the case after finding that the plaintiffs could not meet the high burden for proving a claim of fraud on the court. The Third Circuit wrote:

> We further conclude that a determination of fraud on the court may be justified only by ''the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself,'' and that it ''must be supported by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence.'' The claim of privilege by the United States Air Force in this case can reasonably be interpreted to include within its scope information about the workings of the B–29, and therefore does not meet the demanding standard for fraud upon the court.

I cite Herring, 386–387. This ruling, however, did not end public debate on the matter. As recently as last October, the New York Times editorialized: ''[T]he Reynolds case itself is an object lesson in why courts need to apply a healthy degree of skepticism to state secrets claims. . . . When the documents finally became public just a few years ago, it became clear that the government had lied. The papers contained information embarrassing to the government but nothing to warrant top secret treatment or denying American citizens honest adjudication of their lawsuit.''

Upon learning of the Herring case, which was filed in Philadelphia, it became clear to me that codifying provisions for a court to use in ruling on state secrets cases was desirable for a number of reasons—including the added legitimacy of having a judge evaluate the validity of the claim. I think that by requiring in camera court review, we will ultimately provide parties with greater trust in the integrity of the claim and, importantly, appropriate closure.

The benefits of court review are illustrated by recent events in the Ninth Circuit. On November 16, 2007, the Ninth Circuit decided Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, Inc. v. Bush, 507 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. (Ca.) 2007), a case in which the plaintiffs challenged alleged surveillance of their organization under the terrorist surveillance program, TSP. The case stands out in TSP jurisprudence because the plaintiff alleged the Government had unwittingly provided proof that it was surveilling the plaintiff by inadvertently disclosing a partial transcript of phone conversations. The district court denied the Government's motion to dismiss on grounds of the state secrets privilege, but the Ninth Circuit reversed. Citing Totten and Reynolds, the Al-Haramain court acknowledged that when the very subject matter of the lawsuit is a state secret, dismissal without evaluating the claim might be appropriate. However, given all of the public disclosures concerning the TSP, the Al-Haramain court held that the subject matter of the lawsuit was not itself a state secret. Instead, the court concluded that it ''must make an independent determination whether the information is privileged.'' This is 507 F.3d at 1202. It did so by undertaking a full review of the privileged documents in camera. The Al-Haramain court described its review of the sealed document at issue and the balancing test it imposed:

> Having reviewed it in camera, we conclude that the Sealed Document is protected by the state secrets privilege, along with the information as to whether the government surveilled Al-Haramain. We take very seriously our obligation to review the documents with a very careful, indeed a skeptical, eye, and not to accept at face value the government's claim or justification of privilege. Simply saying ''military secret,'' ''national security'' or ''terrorist threat'' or invoking an ethereal fear that disclosure will threaten our nation is insufficient to support the privilege. Sufficient detail must be—and has been—provided for us to make a meaningful examination. The process of in camera review ineluctably places the court in a role that runs contrary to our fundamental principle of a transparent judicial system. It also places on the court a special burden to assure itself that an appropriate balance is struck between protecting national security matters and preserving an open court system. That said, we acknowledge the need to defer to the Executive on matters of foreign policy and national security and surely cannot legitimately find ourselves second guessing the Executive in this arena.

I cite 507 F.3d at 1203

The State Secrets Protection Act essentially codifies the Al-Haramain test by requiring courts to evaluate the assertion of a state secrets privilege in light of an in camera review of the allegedly privileged documents. I think it is highly advisable to codify both the means of asserting the privilege and the method for reviewing courts to go about resolving claims of privilege because the state secrets privilege is being asserted more frequently and the resulting decisions will benefit from more consistent procedures. Indeed, one recent study indicates that, of the approximately 89 state secrets cases adjudicated since the Supreme Court's decision in Reynolds, courts have declined to review any evidence in at least 16 cases. It is unclear whether the courts reviewed any evidence in another 16 cases, so the number could be as high as 32, or more than a third of the total. The current bill would end this practice.

Reliable statistics on the use of the state secrets privilege are somewhat difficult to come by because not all cases are reported. The Reporters' Committee for Freedom of the Press claims that, ''while the government asserted the privilege approximately 55 times in total between 1954 . . . and 2001, [the government] asserted it 23 times in the four years after Sept. 11.'' With the use of the privilege apparently on the rise, the risk of abuse also grows. As I have noted, critics argue that the Government has abused the privilege to cover up cases of malfeasance and illegal activity. They point to the aftermath of Reynolds and more recently to the case of Khaled El-Masri, whose claim that the was subject to extraordinary rendition was dismissed following the Government's successful assertion of the state secrets privilege at the district and appellate court levels. This is El-Masri v. United States, 479 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. (Va.) March 2, 2007), cert. denied, 128 S.Ct. 373 (October 9, 2007). Although the Supreme Court declined to revisit the state secrets doctrine in the El-Masri case, there is ample cause for congressional action—both to protect legitimate secrets and ensure public confidence in the process for adjudicating such privilege claims.

The State Secrets Protection Act establishes a clear standard for application of the state secrets privilege and creates procedures for reviewing courts to follow in evaluating privilege claims. Specifically, the Kennedy-Specter State Secrets Protection Act:

Defines state secrets and codifies the standard for evaluating privilege claims: The bill defines ''state secret'' as ''any information that, if disclosed publicly, would be reasonably likely to cause significant harm to the national defense or foreign relations of the United States.'' It requires Federal courts to decide cases after ''consideration of the interests of justice and national security.''

Requires court examination of evidence subject to privilege claims: The legislation requires courts to evaluate the privilege by reviewing pertinent evidence in camera. By statutorily empowering courts to review the evidence, the bill will substantially mitigate the risk of future allegations that the Government committed ''fraud upon the court,'' as asserted by the Reynolds plaintiffs 50 years after the landmark decision.

Closes hearings on the privilege—except those involving mere legal questions: Under the legislation, hearings are presumptively held in camera but only ex parte if the court so orders.

Requires attorney security clearances: Under the bill, courts must limit participation in hearings to evaluate state secrets to attorneys with appropriate clearances. Moreover, it allows for appointment of guardians ad litem with clearances to represent parties who are absent from proceedings.

Permits the Government to produce a nonprivileged substitute: Consistent with the Classified Information Procedures Act, the bill allows for the use of nonprivileged substitutes, where possible. If the court orders the Government to provide a nonprivileged substitute and the Government declines to provide it, the court resolves fact questions involving the evidence at issue against the Government.

Protects evidence: The proposed bill incorporates the security procedures established in the Classified Information Procedures Act and permits the Chief Justice to create additional rules to safeguard state secrets evidence.

I commend the bill to all of my Senate colleagues.

HONORING MARTIN P. PAONE

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, today I wish to honor our distinguished Secretary of the Majority, Martin Paone, who announced recently his plans to leave the Senate after almost 30 years of exemplary service. During his career in the Senate, Marty has helped to guide this body as it has addressed some of the most pressing issues, and faced some of the most difficult challenges, in our Nation's history.

Marty began his career in the Congress, working in the House Post Office and the Senate Parking Office. From there, he quickly rose through the ranks to become an assistant in the Democratic cloakroom in 1979. After demonstrating his keen understanding of floor procedures, he became a member of the floor staff for the Democratic Policy Committee and later assistant secretary of the majority. In 1995, he was elected as secretary of the minority, and continued to serve in that role, and later as the secretary of the majority, for the Democratic caucus.

As we all know, the procedures of the Senate are complicated, and at times perplexing. Indeed, Americans watching us from home may wonder how we are able get our important legislative work done. Well, one of the principal reasons is that Republican and Democratic Senators alike have been able to rely on Marty's counsel when it comes to questions about the rules of the Senate. Marty possesses a vast and detailed knowledge of the history and procedures of the Senate that is possibly second only to that of our distinguished President Pro Tempore, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD. And he has a well-deserved reputation as a straight shooter. Whenever I have approached Marty with a question during my time as a Senator, I have always been able to count on him for a straight answer—even when my position may have run counter to that of my leadership.

Throughout his tenure in the Senate, Marty has also served as a steady hand, helping this Chamber through changes in our country's leadership and critical events in our Nation's history. Marty's career has been marked by five different Presidents, five Republican Senate leaders and four Democratic Senate leaders. Marty has also served during several key historic moments, from the end of the Cold War to the tragic events of September 11, 2001. It was after September 11 that Marty's extensive experience and understanding became especially important as he helped guide this body during an extremely difficult and uncertain time. That service to the Senate, and to the country, was invaluable, and I will always remember it.

I wish Marty, his wife Ruby, and their three children, Alexander, Stephanie, and T.J., all the best as Marty begins this new chapter in his life. He will be greatly missed, but he leaves behind a lasting impact that will help guide this body for years to come.

OPEN GOVERNMENT ACT

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, as we start a new year—and the Senate starts a new session—the American people have a new law that honors and protects their right to know. I am pleased that during the waning hours of 2007, the President signed the Leahy-Cornyn Openness Promotes Effectiveness in our National Government Act, the ''OPEN Government Act,'' S. 2488, into law—enacting the first major reforms to the Freedom of Information Act, ''FOIA'' in more than a decade.

Today, our Government is more open and accountable to the American people than it was just a year ago. With the enactment of FOIA reform legislation, the Congress has demanded and won more openness and accountability regarding the activities of the executive branch. I call on the President to vigorously and faithfully execute the OPEN Government Act, and I hope that he will fully enforce this legislation.

Sadly, the early signs from the administration are troubling. Just this week, the administration signaled that it will move the much-needed funding for the Office of Government Information Services created under the OPEN Government Act from the National Archives and Records Administration to the Department of Justice. Such a move is not only contrary to the express intent of the Congress, but it is also contrary to the very purpose of this legislation—to ensure the timely and fair resolution of American's FOIA requests. Given its abysmal record on FOIA compliance during the last 7 years, I hope that the administration will reconsider this unsound decision and enforce this law as the Congress intended.

In addition, for the first time ever under the new law implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission, Federal agencies will be required to fully disclose to Congress their use of data mining technology to monitor the activities of ordinary American citizens. I am pleased that this law contains the reforms that I cosponsored last year to require data mining reporting and to strengthen the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board.

Surely all of these OPEN Government reforms are cause to celebrate. But there is much more work to be done.

During the second session of the 110th Congress, I intend to work hard to build upon these OPEN Government successes, so that we have a government that is more open and accountable to all Americans. As chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I have made oversight of the FOIA reforms contained in the OPEN Government Act one of my top priorities. I will also continue to work closely with Members on both sides of the aisle and in both Chambers to address the growing and troubling use of FOIA (b)(3) exemptions to withhold information from the American people.

As the son of a Vermont printer, I understand the great value of documenting and preserving our Nation's rich history for future generations, so that our democracy remains open and free. Next month, I will convene an important hearing of the Judiciary Committee on the Founding Fathers Project and the effort to make the historical writings of our Nation's Founders more accessible and open to the public.

I will also work to ensure Senate passage of the Presidential Records Act Amendments of 2007, S. 886 to reverse a troubling Bush administration policy to curtail the disclosure of Presidential records. And I will continue my fight to ensure the public's right to know by urging the prompt consideration and passage of meaningful press shield legislation in the Senate.

More that two centuries ago, Patrick Henry proclaimed that ''[t]he liberties of a people never were, nor ever will be, secure, when the transactions of their rulers may be concealed from them.'' I could not agree more. Open government is not a Democratic value, nor a Republican value. It is an American value and an American virtue. In this new year, at this new and historic time for our Nation, I urge all Members to join me in supporting an agenda of an open and transparent Government on behalf of all Americans.

VOTE EXPLANATION

Mr. THUNE. Mr. President, last night, due to airline flight delays in South Dakota and Minneapolis, I missed the rollcall vote on H.R. 4986, the amended version of the Department of Defense authorization bill. Had I been present for this vote, I would have voted ''yes''—similar to my vote in December when the Senate initially passed H.R. 1585, the conference report to the Department of Defense authorization bill.

EXTENDING UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I rise in support of legislation introduced this week to extend unemployment benefits temporarily as a means of stimulus. Like many of my colleagues I certainly have a list of ideas for best stimulating our struggling economy. But unemployment insurance certainly needs to be a part of the picture. I would like to thank Senator KENNEDY for so quickly introducing this bill to extend current unemployment benefits by at least 20 weeks, and by an additional 13 weeks in States experiencing especially high unemployment rates.

There are two key principles this legislation addresses. First, we need to make sure that we are prudently spending money in a way that encourages an increase in actual economic activity. Second, we need to help the people who are most hurt during difficult times. We need a combination of prudent fiscal policy and human compassion.

So first, it is just plain good sense to target people who are unemployed. They are going to spend this money immediately on food and clothing, and this money will very quickly churn in the local economy. But equally importantly, the goal of stimulating the economy should be one of improving the quality of life for Americans. The people who are in the greatest need of help, directly hurt by economic decline, are those who have lost their jobs. It only makes sense that we make their needs a priority.

I think that this period of economic difficulty also highlights the need to pass the broader unemployment reform efforts that Senator KENNEDY is spearheading. While this stimulus measure will help many people who are unemployed, we need to cover part-time workers who have lost their jobs, and make sure we are counting all recent periods of work toward unemployment eligibility and levels.

Extending unemployment benefits is regularly employed to stimulate a flagging economy, and these payments have been proven to quickly add demand to the economy. I hope that we are all in agreement that this is an essential component of any stimulus package.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

RECOGNIZING GANNESTON CONSTRUCTION CORPORATION

• Ms. SNOWE. Mr. President, I wish to recognize a small business from Maine's capital city that will be honored this coming Friday for earning the Kennebec Valley Chamber of Commerce's President's Award for its outstanding contributions to the quality of life in the greater Augusta area. Ganneston Construction Corporation, a woman-owned construction business that works in both the public and private spheres, is known for its sparkling and dependable structures.

Founded early in the 1960s as a builder of solely residential units, Ganneston Construction subsequently moved into commercial construction and has continued to expand into other markets since. Presently a full-service general contractor, construction manager, and design builder, Ganneston has taken on projects of varying sizes throughout Maine, and each job is performed in a timely manner with painstaking sensitivity to that particular building's unique requirements. The firm has restored landmarks like the Lewiston Library, made renovations to the well-known Senator Inn in Augusta, and provided the Maine Veteran's Home and Down East Community Hospital in Machias with a new facility. Ganneston has completed roughly 100 projects so far this decade, with examples of its work on display in cities and towns across Maine. Because the company's 45 employees consistently produce buildings of remarkable quality, annual sales have grown from $6 million in 2001 to $15 million in 2007.

While Ganneston is to be commended for its dedication to building safe and secure structures, the community service its employees perform is what makes Ganneston so deserving of acknowledgment. Setting an inspirational example is Stacey Morrison, chief executive officer and owner of Ganneston Construction. In addition to managing the company's day-to-day operations, Mrs. Morrison makes time to serve the local area in multiple ways. She is a member of the board of Women Unlimited, a praiseworthy Maine organization that supplies women, minority, and displaced workers with the tools, training, and consistent support needed to be successful in the technical, trade, and transportation industries. Similarly, Mrs. Morrison volunteers for the Kennebec Valley United Way and was recently elected chairwoman of the chapter for 2008. Ganneston's employees have emulated Mrs. Morrison's compassion and leadership and have donated countless hours and dollars to service organizations throughout central Maine.

Ganneston Construction's record of success and service is stellar. On the one hand, Ganneston has never failed to complete a contract and continues to see its workload rise as a result of its first-rate performance. Whether constructing for the Air National Guard or the University of Maine, for shopping centers or apartment complexes, Ganneston maintains a commitment to solid craftsmanship that has helped the company earn its prestigious reputation. On the other hand, the company's officers and employees donate significant time and resources to help those in need, making good on Ganneston's value statement ''to give back to the community in which we live.'' I thank Stacey Morrison and everyone at Ganneston Construction for their hard work and determined generosity, and congratulate them on their recognition.●

TRIBUTE TO ROBERT O. ANDERSON

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, Robert O. Anderson was not a citizen just of New Mexico, but I think it can be fairly said that he was one of those people for whom the term ''citizen of the world'' was intended.

He died in December at age 90, and his memory was honored at this past weekend services in Roswell, NM. Our State has been his home for decades. Those of us who knew him were reminded each time we talked with him how wide-ranging his interests were, and how progressive and determined a man he was. It was his leadership and willingness to take a risk that led to the discovery of oil on the North Slope of Alaska, and the pipeline that followed 7 years later.

He was a giant in the oil industry, in ranching, in business, in publishing, in politics and in environmental circles. A thoughtful and perceptive man—he warned of global warming years ago—he was a patron of the arts and of institutions devoted to study and research, including the Aspen Institute, the Worldwatch Institute and the John Muir Institute of the Environment.

As far as I know, he never sought public office, but he certainly held positions of public trust. He was quoted as saying of his industry:

Never look back in this business. If you do, you'll lose your nerve.''

He certainly had that in common with many elected officials, including Members of this body, and Presidents of the United States, all of whom regarded him highly as did countless international leaders. He could ''walk with kings, nor lose the common touch.'' It was that ability which was a hallmark of his leadership, and was one of his most endearing and enduring qualities.

Married to Barbara Phelps Anderson for 68 years, he is survived by her, and by 7 children, 20 grandchildren and 5 great-grandchildren. Their loss is a great and one we all share in some measure.●

30TH ANNIVERSARY OF WOMEN ESCAPING A VIOLENT ENVIRONMENT

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, I am pleased to recognize the 30th anniversary of one of the Capital region's most vital nonprofit agencies, Women Escaping a Violent Environment Inc., WEAVE, in Sacramento, CA. In its three decades of service, WEAVE has provided invaluable public service to victims of domestic abuse, as well as their families, and has helped to save countless lives as a result of the education, counseling, and intervention they have provided to victims of domestic abuse and sexual assault.

WEAVE was established in 1978 in Sacramento as a grassroots organization to serve survivors of domestic violence and their families by providing crisis lines and counseling services. Within the first 10 years of its establishment, WEAVE broadened its role in the community to include legal advocacy, opened a safehouse that provides emergency services to female victims of domestic violence and their children, and became a dual agency that expanded its mission to include sexual assault services. Victims are accompanied to appointments and are given emotional support, information, counseling, food and clothing.

In the next decade WEAVE recognized that employers and schools could also be part of a solution in preventing domestic abuse and sexual assault. They provided prevention education to elementary and high schools, and began their Break the Silence Campaign that increases awareness of domestic violence by educating employers and their employees to recognize signs of abuse and how to best respond. During the 1990s, WEAVE also opened a Children's Center and WEAVE Works retail clothing store that provide revenues to support their mission in the community.

Today WEAVE has 80 staff members and over 200 active volunteers in two locations, who serve over 20,000 survivors of domestic violence and sexual assault annually with intervention and counseling services, along with educating an additional 10,000 members of the community on issues of domestic violence and sexual assault. WEAVE has achieved this success through partnerships with local law enforcement, government and business leaders.

As the community and staff gather to celebrate WEAVE's 30th anniversary, I congratulate and thank the staff, volunteers and community partners of this important organization and wish them many more years of success.●

REMEMBERING KENT HAWS

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring the memory of a dedicated public servant, Detective Kent Haws of the Tulare County Sheriff's Department. On the afternoon of December 17, 2007, while on motor patrol in rural Tulare County, Detective Haws was killed in the line of duty while investigating a suspicious vehicle.

Detective Haws was born in Phoenix, AZ and raised in Visalia, CA. A graduate of Mt. Whitney High School and College of the Sequoias, Detective Haws served in the United States Army 10th Mountain Division before achieving his long-time goal of joining the Tulare County Sheriff's Department. For the past decade, Detective Haws dutifully served the citizens and communities of Tulare County with great commitment, integrity, and valor. Detective Haws' devotion to help others, coupled with his passion for law enforcement, enabled him to become a model member of the Tulare County Sheriff's Department.

Detective Haws is survived by his wife Frances and children Dominik, Nicholas, and Evan. Those who knew Detective Haws will always remember him as a caring, kind, and devoted family man, colleague, and friend. Detective Kent Haws served Tulare County with honor and bravery, and fulfilled his oath as an officer of the law. His contributions to public safety and dedication to law enforcement are greatly appreciated and will serve as an example of his commitment to protecting and serving the public.

We shall always be grateful for Detective Haws' heroic service and the sacrifices he made while serving the community and the people he loved.●

IN CELEBRATION OF LOUIS BURGELIN

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, I am pleased and honored to pay tribute to Louis—Lou—Brosnahan Burgelin for his 65-plus years of dedicated service to the greater Vallejo community.

Born on January 20, 1916 in Vallejo, CA, to Otto and Frances Burgelin, Lou graduated from Vallejo High School in 1932 and went on to graduate from the Mare Island Naval Shipyard Apprentice School as a marine machinist.

Always eager to exceed expectations, Lou held numerous management positions throughout his career with the United States Navy, including production control manager at Norfolk Naval Shipyard, chief progressman at Mare Island, and head progressman at Hunter's Point. In addition, Lou worked his way up from charter member to national president of the Naval Civilian Manager's Association and also served as president of the Council of Naval Employee Groups, which represents all of the employees of West Coast naval shipyards.

After retiring from Federal service in 1972, Lou became the executive secretary of the Armed Services Committee of the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce, a position he held for 19 years. This was just one of many leadership positions he held in his beloved hometown, with other civic engagements including first chairman of the Vallejo Senior Citizens Center, Exalted Ruler of the Vallejo Elks Lodge, and president of the Vallejo-Napa United Way.

Lou was also actively involved with the city of Vallejo's naval landmark, Mare Island. His lobbying efforts for military construction projects on Mare Island and his efforts to maintain dredging operations necessary for shipyard operations culminated in his receipt of the Public Service Medal by the Navy's Chief of Operations.

Proving that age will not slow him down, Lou is still active in the greater Vallejo community, currently serving as president of the Vallejo Council of the Navy League of the United States, treasurer for the Salvation Army, and national legislative chair for the Vallejo NARFE Chapter 16. In addition to his ongoing civic involvement, Lou remains happily married to the former Betty Greenwell. Approaching 69 years of marriage, Lou and Betty have three children, three grandchildren, and five great-grandchildren.

When I first met Lou in the eighties, I knew he was a powerful voice for his community and he became one of my top advisors when I represented Vallejo in Congress.

After more than 65 years of continuing service to the city of Vallejo and U.S. Navy, I remain in admiration of Lou's strong sense of civic duty. Along with hundreds of his friends and admirers throughout the city of Vallejo, I wish him many more years of continued community involvement and leadership.●

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. REID (for Mrs. CLINTON):

S. 2549. A bill to require the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to establish an Interagency Working Group on Environmental Justice to provide guidance to Federal agencies on the development of criteria for identifying disproportionately high and adverse human health or environmental effects on minority populations and low-income populations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Mrs. CLINTON, Mr. President, today I rise to introduce the Environmental Justice Renewal Act, legislation to address the issue of environmental racism that is faced by far too many Americans today.

In our country, we have communities predominantly racial and ethnic minority and low-income communities in which the air is unsafe to breathe, the water unfit to drink, the schools unsafe places to learn.

A 2005 Associated Press analysis of Environmental Protection Agency, EPA, air data found that African Americans were 79 percent more likely than their white counterparts to live in an area where the levels of air pollution posed health risks. About half of lower-income homes in our Nation are located within a mile of factories that report toxic emissions to the EPA. Hispanic and African-American children have lead poisoning rates that are roughly double that of their white counterparts. The evidence clearly documents the disproportionate impact of pollution faced by minority and low-income populations.

For more than a quarter-century, activists have been working to address this disparity in exposure. The work of residents in Warren County, NC, in protesting the placement of a toxic waste site in a predominantly African-American community sparked the modern-day environmental justice movement. Since that time, individuals in all parts of the United States have spoken out about the conditions in their own neighborhoods, and have joined together with schools, with churches, and with local organizations to create positive change in their communities. But they cannot act alone. The Federal Government has a clear role in reducing and eliminating the disparate pollution burden placed upon racial and ethnic minorities and low-income populations.

This role has been acknowledged by the Federal Government by individuals on both sides of the aisle. Under the first Bush administration, the EPA released several reports on what was then known as environmental equity, now called environmental justice. President Clinton promulgated Executive Order 12898, titled ''Federal Actions to Address Environmental Justice in Minority Populations and Low-Income Populations,'' which directed federal agencies to account for the ways in which their activities would impact low-income and minority communities. The Federal Government took action to ensure that environmental justice was part of the mission of its agencies.

But under the current Bush administration, the EPA has not lived up to its motto ''to protect human health and the environment.'' Because of their inaction on environmental justice, too many minority and low-income Americans lack equal access to protections that safeguard health, well being, and potential of children and families.

A 2004 report from the EPA's Office of the Inspector General found the following: ''EPA has not fully implemented Executive Order 12898 nor consistently integrated environmental justice into its day-to-day operations.''

In 2005, the Government Accountability Office released a report concluding that the agency has failed to consider environmental justice in making rules that protect families from environmental degradation and pollution.

In 2006, the Office of the Inspector General released another report on the EPA's environmental justice record, concluding that EPA senior management had not ''sufficiently directed program and regional offices to conduct environmental justice reviews.''

Earlier this year, the United Church of Christ released a report, Toxic Wastes and Race at Twenty, which stated: ''Environmental Justice faltered and became invisible at the EPA under the George W. Bush Administration.''

The Environmental Justice Renewal Act will address the rollbacks that have taken place during this Administration, and once again focus federal attention and resources on environmental justice.

It will revitalize the Interagency Working Group, IWG, on Environmental Justice, codifying the IWG and requiring biennial assessments of their efforts by the Government Accountability Office, to ensure that all agencies are completing goals and following timelines identified in each agency's environmental justice strategy.

It will establish new and expand current grant programs. With this additional funding, community groups can address the complicated health, environmental, and economic components of the pollution problems in their neighborhoods. The legislation will help states, tribes and territories develop and implement environmental justice strategies and policies. It will strengthen the technical assistance available to communities, by developing web-based Environmental Justice Clearinghouse.

This bill will increase the number of federal employees who have received environmental justice training, and who are able to incorporate environmental justice into their daily activities, such as permit review. In addition, it would establish a training program for community members modeled after the existing Superfund training programs to help affected individuals gain the skills needed to identify and monitor environmental concerns in their local areas.

Finally, the bill will increase public awareness of and participation in environmental justice activities, requiring the EPA to routinely hold community-based outreach meetings and ensuring increased interaction with the National Environmental Justice Advisory Committee, which represents stakeholders and impacted communities. It will also establish the position of Environmental Justice Ombudsman at the EPA, in order to receive, review, and process comments about the environmental justice work of the agency.

Groups supporting the legislation include the Sierra Club, ReGenesis, the Center on Race, Poverty and the Environment, Earthjustice, the Indigenous Environmental Network, and the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

We have neglected this issue for far too long, and it is time to once again ensure that the federal government works to reduce and eliminate these disparities that exist in our minority and low-income communities. I look forward to joining my colleagues in the Senate to get this enacted into law.

FISA

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, let me begin my remarks, I know tomorrow we are going to begin more formal debate on the FISA legislation. This is to be a continuation of the effort, for those who wonder what this is, this is the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. This was the debate which was the last item of debate before the holiday break back in mid-December.

The legislation was withdrawn and was not completed. Senator ROCKEFELLER, Senator BOND, the chairman and the ranking Republican, and members of the Intelligence Committee, Senator LEAHY, Senator SPECTER, and members of the Judiciary Committee, Republicans and Democrats have worked on this legislation.

I wish to begin my comments by thanking them for their efforts on trying to develop a piece of legislation that would reflect the realities of today.

There has been some history of this bill. My intention this evening is to spend some time talking about a section of this bill dealing with retroactive immunity, which my colleagues and others who followed this debate know I spent some 10 hours on the floor of this body back in December expressing strong opposition to that provision of this bill; not over the general thrust of the bill.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is critically important to our country. It provides a means by which you can have a proper warrant extended or given out by governmental authorities to collect data, information, critical to our security.

For those who know the history of this, it dates back to the 1970s as a result of the Church Committee's efforts revealing some of the egregious activities of the Nixon administration in listening in, eavesdropping, wiretapping, without any kind of court order, warrant or legal authorities.

So the Congress, working in a bipartisan fashion, I think almost unanimously adopted the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in the late 1970s. Since that time, this bill has been amended I think some 30 or 40 times, maybe more, I know it has been a number of times over the years. In nearly every instance, almost unanimously amended to reflect the changes over the years and the sophistication of those who would do us harm or damage, as well as our ability to more carefully apprehend or listen in or gather information that could help us protect our Nation from those who would do us great harm.

That is a very brief history of this. We are once again at a situation to try and modernize and reflect the needs of our Nation. There is a tension that that exists between making sure we are secure and safe and simultaneously doing it in a manner in which we protect the basic rights of the American citizens.

There has been this tension throughout our history. But we are a nation grounded in rights and liberties. It is the history of our country. It is what made us unique as a people going back more than two centuries.

Over the years, we have faced very significant challenges, both at home and abroad. So we have had a need to provide for the means by which we collect data and information that would protect us, to make us aware of those who would do us harm, and yet simultaneously make sure that in the process of doing that, we do not abandon the rights and liberties we all share as Americans. The Constitution does not belong to any political party. I have said that over and over again. Certainly today, as we debate these issues involving the FISA legislation, I hope everyone understands very clearly my objections to the provisions of this bill have nothing to do whatsoever with the important efforts to make it possible for us to collect data that would keep us safe, but I feel passionately that we not allow this vehicle, this piece of legislation, to be used as a means by which we reward behavior that violated the basic liberties of American citizens by granting retroactive immunity to telecom companies that decided, for whatever reason, to agree, at the Bush administration's request, to provide literally millions of telephone conversations, e-mails, and faxes, not for a month or 6 months or a year but for 5 years, in a concerted effort contrary to the law of our land.

So that is what brings me to the floor this evening. It is what brought me to the floor of this body before the holiday recess, talking and expressing my strong opposition to those provisions of this legislation. There are other concerns I would point out about this bill that other Members will raise. Senator FEINGOLD has strong objections to certain provisions of this legislation, others have other ideas I am confident have merit.

But I commend Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND. They have done the best job, in many ways, of dealing with these sets of questions. But why in the world we decided we are going to grant retroactive immunity to these telephone companies is what mystifies me, concerns me deeply, because of the precedent-setting nature of it.

There are those who would argue that in order for us to be more secure, we must give up some rights, that you have to make that choice. You cannot be secure, as we would like to be, if we are unwilling to give up these rights and liberties.

I think this false dichotomy is dangerous. In fact, I think the opposite is true. In fact, if you protect these rights and liberties, that is what makes us more secure. Once you begin traveling down that slippery slope of deciding on this particular occasion we are going to walk away from these rights and these liberties, once you begin that process, it gets easier and easier to do.

In this case, we are talking about telecom companies. We are talking about communications between private citizens, e-mails, faxes, phone conversations. Why not medical information? Why not financial information? When is the next example going to come up where companies that knew better, not should have known better, knew better, in my view.

One of the companies that may have complied with the Bush administration's request, in fact, was deeply involved in the drafting of this legislation in the 1970s, in putting the FISA bill together. This was not some first year law school student who did not know the law of the land in terms of FISA, they knew the law, they understood it.

In fact, there are phone companies that refused to comply with the request of the Bush administration absent a court order. Those companies said: Give us a court order, we will comply. Absent a court order, we will not comply.

So there were companies that understood the differences when these requests were made more than 5 years ago.

So this was not a question of ''everybody did it,'' the same argument that children bring to their parents from time to time, or ''we were ordered on high,'' in what is known as the Nuremberg defense which asserts that there were those in higher positions who said we ought to do this. That was the defense given in 1945 at the Nuremberg trials by the 21 defendants who claimed they were only obeying orders given by Hitler. Though this situation before us is obviously enormously different, a similar argument, that the companies were ordered to do this, defies logic and the facts of this case.

With that background and the history of the FISA legislation—and there are others who will provide more detail—let me share some concerns about this particular area of the law. I will be utilizing whatever vehicles are available to me, including language I will offer to strike these provisions, to see to it that this bill does not go forward with retroactive immunity as drafted in the legislation included in the bill. I rise, in fact, in strong opposition to the retroactive immunity provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act as passed by the Intelligence Committee. I strongly support the Leahy substitute to the current legislation. It is my hope the Senate adopts this important measure. If it does, it will solve this particular problem. However, I am concerned that, once again, we will return to a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that will grant retroactive immunity to telecom companies.

As my colleagues know, I have strongly opposed retroactive immunity for the telecommunications companies that may have violated the privacy of millions of our fellow citizens. Last month, I opposed retroactive immunity on the Senate floor for more than 10 hours. The bill was withdrawn that day, but I am concerned that tomorrow retroactive immunity will return, and I am prepared to fight it again.

Since last month, little has changed. Retroactive immunity is as dangerous to American civil liberties as it was last month, and my opposition to it is just as passionate. The last 6 years have seen the President—the Bush administration's pattern of continual abuses against civil liberties.

Again, if this were the first instance and it went on for a few months, a year, these companies acquiescing to an administration's request, an administration that had made it its business to protect the basic liberties of Americans throughout its terms in office, I would not be standing here. I am not so rigid, so doctrinaire that I am unwilling to accept that at times of emergency such as in the wake of 9/11, you might have such a request being made by an administration—not that I think it is right, but it could happen. I would say if it did and a handful of companies for a few months or a year, even, complied with it and went forward, I wouldn't be happy about it, but I would understand it. But that is not what happened here. That is not what this administration has been involved in. From Guantanamo, from Abu Ghraib, from rendition, secret prisons, habeas corpus, torture, a scandal involving the Attorney General's Office, the U.S. attorneys offices around the country—how many examples do you need to have? How many do we have to learn about to finally understand that we have an administration regrettably that just doesn't seem to understand the importance of the rule of law, the basic rights and liberties of the American public?

My concern is that we had a pattern of behavior, almost nonstop, going on some 6 years and still apparently ongoing today. Then add that to the fact that this collection of data, this collection of information went on not for 6 months or a year but for 5 long years and would have continued, had there not been a story in the media which uncovered, through a whistleblower, that this was going on. It would still be going on today, despite the absence of any court order, or a warrant being granted by the FISA courts. There is a pattern of behavior that is going unchecked, and behavior went on for more than 5 years. That is why I stand here, because I am not going to tolerate—at least this Member is not—accepting these abuses and granting retroactive immunity. It is, once again, a walking away from this problem, inviting even more of the same in the coming days.

It is alleged, of course, that the administration worked outside the law with giant telecom corporations to compile Americans' private domestic communications—in other words, a database of enormous scale and scope. Those corporations are alleged to have spied secretly and without warrant on their own American customers.

Here is only one of the most egregious examples. According to the Electronic Frontier Foundation:

> Clear, first-hand whistleblower documentary evidence [states] . . . that for year on end every e-mail, every text message, every phone call carried over the massive fiber-optic links of sixteen separate companies routed through AT&T's Internet hub in San Francisco—hundreds of millions of private, domestic communications—have been . . . copied in their entirety by AT&T and knowingly diverted wholesale by means of multiple ''splitters'' into a secret room controlled exclusively by the NSA.

Those are not my words; those are the words of the Electronic Frontier Foundation. To me, those facts speak clearly. If true, they represent an outrage against privacy, a massive betrayal of trust.

I know many see this differently. No doubt they do so in good faith. They find the telecoms' actions defensible and legally justified. To them, immunity is a fitting defense for companies that were only doing their patriotic duty. Perhaps they are right. I think otherwise, but I am willing to concede they may be right.

But the President and his supporters need to prove far more than that. I think they need to show that they are so right and that our case is so far beyond the pale that no court ever need settle the argument, that we can shut down the argument here and now. That is what this will do. It will shut down this argument, and we will never, ever know what data was collected, why, who ordered this, who was responsible, if we grant retroactive immunity.

Retroactive immunity shuts the courthouse door for good. It settles the issue with politicians, not with judges and jurist, and it puts Americans permanently in the dark on this issue. Did the telecoms break the law? I have my own strong views on this but, candidly, I don't know. That is what courts exist for. Pass immunity, and we will never know the answer to that question. The President's favorite corporations will be unchallenged. Their arguments will never be heard in a court of law. The truth behind this unprecedented domestic spying will never see the light of day. The book on our Government's actions will be closed for good and sealed and locked and handed over to safekeeping of those few whom George Bush trusts to keep a secret.

Over the next couple of days, I will do my best to explain why retroactive immunity is so dangerous and, conversely, why it is so important to President Bush. But first it would be useful to consider the history of the bill before us, as I did at the outset of my remarks, and how it fits into the history of the President's warrantless spying on Americans.

For years, President Bush allowed Americans to be spied on with no warrant, no court order, and no oversight. The origins of this bill, the FISA Amendments Act, lie in the exposure of that spying in 2005.

That year, the New York Times revealed President Bush's ongoing abuse of power. To quote from that investigation:

> Under a presidential order signed in 2002, the National Security Agency has monitored the international telephone calls and international e-mail messages of hundreds, perhaps thousands of people inside the United States without warrants over the past 3 years.

In fact, we later learned that the President's warrantless spying was authorized as early as 2001. Disgraced former Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in a 2006 white paper, attempted to justify that spying. His argument rested on the specious claim that in authorizing the President to go to war in Afghanistan, Congress had also somehow authorized the President to listen in on the phone calls of Americans. But many of those who voted on the original authorization of force found this claim to new Executive powers to be laughable.

Here is what former majority leader Tom Daschle wrote at the time or shortly thereafter:

> As Senate majority leader . . . I helped negotiate that law with the White House counsel's office over two harried days. I can state categorically that the subject of warrantless wiretaps of American citizens never came up. . . . I am also confident that the 98 senators who voted in favor of authorization of force against al Qaeda did not believe that they were also voting for warrantless domestic surveillance.

Such claims to expand Executive power based on the authorization for military force have since been struck down by the courts.

Recently, the administration has changed its argument, now grounding its warrantless surveillance power in the extremely nebulous authority of the President to defend the country that they find in the Constitution. Of course, that begs the question, exactly what doesn't fit in under defending the country? If we take the President at his word, we would concede to him nearly unlimited power, power that belongs in this case in the hands of our courts. Congress has worked to bring the President's surveillance program back where it belongs—under the rule of law. At the same time, we have worked to modernize FISA and ease restrictions on terrorist surveillance.

The Protect America Act, a bill attempting to respond to the two-pronged challenge—poorly, in my view—passed in August. But it is set to expire this coming February. The bill now before us would create a legal regime for surveillance under reworked and more reasonable rules.

But crucially, President Bush has demanded that this bill include full retroactive immunity for corporations complicit in domestic spying. In a speech on September 19, he stated that ''it's particularly important for Congress to provide meaningful liability protection to those companies.'' In October, he stiffened his demand, vowing to veto any bill that did not shield the telecom corporations. And last month, he resorted to shameful, misleading scare tactics, accusing Congress of failing ''to keep the American people safe.'' That is absolutely outrageous. An American President, at a time when there are serious threats and reliable information that the threat still persists, an American President is saying: Despite your efforts to modernize FISA by providing the additional tools we need for proper surveillance on terrorist activities, I will veto this bill, I will deny you this legislation, if you don't provide protection for a handful of corporations that violated the law. That is an incredible admission, the fact that he is willing to lose all of the efforts we are making to modernize FISA in order to grant retroactive immunity so you are not in a court of law. Who is putting the country at greater risk? That is what the debate is about. That is what the President has said. He will veto the bill if we don't provide protection for a handful of corporations that, for 5 long years, when their legal departments knew exactly what the law was—AT&T was involved in the drafting of the FISA legislation in 1978. How can that company possibly claim they didn't know what the law of the land was when it came to FISA, going before the secret FISA courts, getting those warrants to allow for the Government to go in and do the proper surveillance and grant the immunity that these companies would receive under that kind of a situation. To avoid that court altogether was wrong. For 5 long years, they did that.

Now the President says: I don't care what Jay Rockefeller or what Kit Bond or what the Intelligence Committee has done to modernize FISA. If you don't give me those protections I want for those handful of corporations, then you are not going to get this bill that modernizes the surveillance on terrorist activity.

The very same month, the FISA Amendments Act came before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. Per the President's demand, it included full retroactive immunity for the telecom corporations. Don't give me it, I will veto the bill. And the committee went along. Senator NELSON of Florida offered an amendment to strip that immunity and instead allow the matter to be settled in the courts. It failed on a 3-to-12 vote in committee. As it passed out of the Intelligence Committee by a vote of 13 to 2, the bill still put corporations literally above the law and assured that the President's invasion of privacy would remain a secret.

At that time, I made public my strong objections on immunity, but the bill also had to pass through the Judiciary Committee. Through an open and transparent process, the Judiciary Committee amended several provisions relating to title I and reported out a bill lacking the egregious immunity provisions. However, I am still concerned that when Senator FEINGOLD proposed an amendment to strip immunity for good, it failed by a vote of 7 to 12 in the committee.

So here we are, facing a final decision on whether the telecommunications companies will get off the hook for good without us ever knowing anything more about it, because if you grant immunity, that is it. We will never learn anything else. The President is as intent as ever he was on making that happen. He wants immunity back in this bill at all costs, including a willingness to veto very important legislation, without the meaningful provisions of this bill that would provide this country with the kind of protection and security we ought to have. He is willing to lose all of that. He is willing to trade off all of that to give a handful of corporations immunity.

What he is truly offering is secrecy in place of openness. Fiat in place of law. And in place of the forthright argument of judicial deliberation that ought to be this country's pride, there are two simple words he offers: Trust me.

I would never take that offer, not even from a perfect President. Because in a republic, power was made to be shared; because power must be bound by firm laws, not the whims of whomever happens to sit in the Executive chair; because only two things make the difference between a President and a king—the oversight of the legislative body, and the rulings of the courts.

It is why our Founders formed this Government the way they did, with three branches of government coequally sharing the powers to govern. Each is a check on the other. That is what the Founders had been through: the absence of that.

''Trust me.'' Those two small words bridge the entire gap between the rule of law and the rule of men, and it is a dangerous irony that when we need the rule of law the most, the rule of men is at its most seductive.

> It is a universal truth that the loss of liberty at home is to be charged to the provisions against danger . . . from abroad.

Let me repeat that.

> It is a universal truth that the loss of liberty at home is to be charged to the provisions against danger . . . from abroad.

That is from James Madison, the father of our Constitution. He made that prediction more than two centuries ago. If we pass immunity, and put our President's word above the courts and witnesses and evidence and deliberations, we bring that prophecy a step closer to coming true.

I repeat it again:

> It is a universal truth that the loss of liberty at home is to be charged to the provisions against danger . . . from abroad.

James Madison.

So that is the deeper issue behind this bill. That is the source of my passion, if you will. I reject President Bush's ''trust me'' because I have seen what we get when we accept it.

I go back and mention just the maze, the list of egregious violations of the rule of law over the last 6 years. With that aside, were this a Democratic administration that would suggest this, I would be as passionate about it, not because I distrust them necessarily but because once we succumb to the passions or the desires of the rule of men over the rule of law, then we trade off the most important fundamental essence of who we are as a people.

We are a nation of laws and not men. How many times have we heard that? You learn that in your first week of constitutional law. You learn in your American history class as a high school student the importance of the rule of law. If we walk away from that, then, of course, we walk away from who we are as a people.

After all of that, President Bush, of course, comes to us in all innocence and begs, once again: Trust me. He means it literally. Here in the world's greatest deliberative body only a small handful of Senators know even the barest facts; only a tiny minority of us have even seen the classified documents that explain exactly what the telecoms have done, exactly what actions we are asked to make legally disappear.

I have been a Member of this body for over a quarter of a century. I am a senior member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I have no right to see this? As a Member of this body, as a senior member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I am prohibited. Only the administration can see this and one or two people here who are granted the right to actually see and understand what went on.

So we are being asked as a body to blindly grant this immunity, take this issue away entirely so no one can ever learn anything more about 5 long years of millions—millions—of Americans, with their private phone conversations, their faxes, and e-mails. Every word uttered is now being held and kept. And this administration knows it. The people in charge of it know it. And we want to find out why this happened, who ordered this, who provided this. If we grant this immunity, we will never know the answers to those questions.

So as far as the rest of us—we are flying blind. And in that state of blindness, we can only offer one kind of oversight. The President's favorite kind: the token kind. And here, in the dark, we are expected to grant President Bush's wish. Because, of course, he knows best. Does that sound familiar to any of my colleagues?

In 2002, we took the President's word and faulty intelligence on weapons of mass destruction, and we mistakenly approved what has become the disaster in Iraq.

Is history repeating itself in a small way today? Are we about to blindly legalize gravely serious crimes?

If we have learned anything—if we have learned anything at all—it must be this: Great decisions must be built on equally strong foundations of fact. Of course, we are not voting to go to war today. Today's issue is not nearly as immense, I would argue. But one thing is as huge as it was in 2002; and that is, the yawning gap between what we know and what we are asked to do.

So I stand again and oppose this immunity—wrong in itself, grievously wrong, I would add, in what it represents: contempt for debate, contempt for the courts, and contempt for the rule of law. As I did in December, I will speak against that contempt as strongly as I can.

So I will reserve further debate and discussion for tomorrow, as we go forward with this. I say this respectfully to my colleagues. I do not know if a cloture motion will be filed or not, but I hope there will be enough people who will join me.

This bill can go forward without this immunity in it. And it ought to go forward. There are some amendments that will be offered, some of which I will support. There are ideas to improve on the FISA provisions of the bill to see to it that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act will do exactly what we want it to do: to allow us to get that surveillance on those who would do us harm and simultaneously make sure that basic liberties are going to be protected.

But I will do everything in my power, to the extent that any one Member of this body can, to see to it we do not go forward in the provision of this bill that grants retroactive immunity for the egregious misbehavior, to put it mildly, that went on here.

The courts may prove otherwise. I do not know. Maybe someone will prove what they did turned out to be legally correct. But we are never going to know that if we, as a body—Democrats and Republicans—walk away from the rule of law and deny the courts of this land which have the ability to do this. The argument that you cannot rely on the courts to engage in a deliberation involving information that should be held secret is wrong. We have done it on thousands of cases over the years, and we can do it here.

So I hope there will be those who will join me in saying to the President: If you want to veto this bill, go ahead. You veto it because you did not get your corporations' immunity. You explain that to the American public, why we did not have the tools available that kept America safe from those who would do us harm—because a handful of corporations decided to violate the law, in my view, and did so because the Bush administration asked them to do that. You are going to veto this bill to deny us those tools that our intelligence communities ought to have to protect American citizens at a dangerous time. You make that decision.

So when this debate continues tomorrow, I will offer some additional thoughts in support of the Leahy amendment. I will be offering my own amendment, to strike retroactive immunity, and I will be considering other amendments along the way.

If all of that fails, then I will engage in the historic rights reserved in this body for individual Members to talk for a while, to talk about the rule of law, and to talk about the importance of it. I do not think I have ever done this before. I have been here a long time, and I rarely engage in such activities. I respect those who have.

The Founders of this wonderful institution granted the rights of individual Senators to be significant, including the power of one Senator to be able to hold the floor on an important matter about which they care deeply. I care deeply about this issue. I think all of my colleagues do. I just hope they will care enough about it to see to it this bill does not go forward with the precedent-setting nature of granting immunity in this case. It is not warranted. It is not deserved. It was not a minor mistake over a brief period of time.

There is a pattern of behavior, and it went on for too long, and it would still go on if it had not been for a report done by a newspaper and a whistleblower who stood up within the phone company, who had the courage to say this was wrong, or we would still be engaged in these practices today.

I think we as a body—Democrats and Republicans—need to say to this administration, and all future administrations, that you are not going to step all over the liberties and rights of American citizens in the name of security. That is a false choice, and we are not going to tolerate that and set the precedent tonight or tomorrow by agreeing to such a grant of immunity in this bill.

Mr. President, I appreciate the patience of the Chair and yield the floor.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HONORING VERNON RAY ROSE

HON. RON LEWIS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. LEWIS of Kentucky. Madam Speaker, I rise today to recognize Master Sergeant Vernon Ray Rose, a remarkable man with a long history of service to his country and community.

Mr. Rose had a distinguished 18-year career in the United States Army leading men into combat during a tour of duty in Southeast Asia. He was a platoon sergeant of an infantry platoon with A Troop, 7th Squadron, 17th Cavalry, Air, during the Vietnam war. His platoon had the responsibility of rescuing downed U.S. helicopter pilots. In March 1968, Mr. Rose was severely wounded by an enemy hand grenade and was medically retired from the Army.

Vernon Ray Rose was the recipient of many honors during his exemplary military career including the Bronze Star Medal, a Purple Heart, the Army Commendation Medal, the Good Conduct Medal, the Army Occupation Medal, the National Defense Service Medal, the Vietnam Service Medal, the Combat Infantryman Badge, the Republic of Vietnam Campaign Ribbon, the Parachutist Badge, and the Ranger Arc Tab.

Mr. Rose's service did not end once he retired from the military. Mr. Rose chose to become a National Veteran Service Officer, dedicating his life to serving veterans over the course of three decades.

It is my privilege to honor Vernon Ray Rose today, before the entire United States House of Representatives, for his service to our country and to his fellow veterans. His contributions are worthy of our collective appreciation and respect.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION COMMEMORATING THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE GALLATIN PLAN

HON. EARL BLUMENAUER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. BLUMENAUER. Madam Speaker, today I am introducing, along with Mr. OBERSTAR, Mr. DEFAZIO, Mr. WALSH, Mr. PETRI, and Mr. FARR, a resolution to commemorate the bicentennial of the Gallatin plan for infrastructure investment. This plan built on George Washington's vision of connecting the interior settlements with the markets and ports of the East Coast through a network of roads and canals. As Congress looks at major infrastructure investments for this century, it is worthwhile to remember that the achievements of the past were based on sound planning, and important to note that the value of infrastructure investments is dependent on national planning efforts. As we embark on efforts to improve our Nation's civil infrastructure, we should acknowledge and honor the plans that laid the groundwork for our Nation's greatness.

HONORING AMANDA TAVARES

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. ORTIZ. Madam Speaker, I rise today to congratulate Amanda Tavares of Robstown, TX, for her hard work in successfully completing the Congressional page program. Amanda has been a shining example of the potential and leadership skills those selected for this selective honor entail.

Amanda, who hails from my hometown, has taken full advantage of this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to learn firsthand how Congress works while gaining valuable experience about the legislative process. She excelled in the challenging environment of the Capitol, got to know new and interesting people, and attend the prestigious House Page School with some of the country's brightest young minds.

Prior to her time in Washington, DC, Amanda was involved in numerous activities at her school and church. She has served as a mentor, tutor, and missionary to an orphanage in Reynosa, Mexico. In addition, she has done home improvement work with the Nehemiah project of World Changers in Norfolk, VA.

Amanda's sparkling personality and engaging demeanor have been appreciated by my office and her fellow pages. The people whom a page meets here will be the movers and shakers in the country for the rest of their life. Washington, DC, is an exciting place and every page who leaves the program tells us the experience profoundly changed their life. Amanda has shared that sentiment and I have no doubt that her time as page will influence her goals.

As Amanda heads back to Texas, I am sure that she will take many of the lessons learned here and apply to her all life and activities. I am proud of hard work and accomplishments, despite being so far from her home and her family. I wish her the best of luck when she returns to school, and know she will use her experiences here to go on and do great things.

HONORING JIM CARROLL

HON. RON LEWIS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. LEWIS of Kentucky. Madam Speaker, I rise today to recognize Mr. Jim Carroll, a proud veteran and dedicated public servant. Mr. Carroll is retiring this year after 38 years of Federal service, most of which has been spent with the National Park Service at Mammoth Cave National Park.

Jim Carroll grew up in Hart County, Kentucky, and graduated from Munfordville High School in 1966. He was drafted into the Army in 1968 and served in Vietnam. Upon his return, he enrolled at Western Kentucky University and graduated in 1975.

Mr. Carroll began his tenure with the Park Service in 1972 as a seasonal guide at Mammoth Cave National Park. After a brief assignment at Biscayne National Park in Florida, he returned to Mammoth Cave as a full time Park Ranger. Mr. Carroll then served as a Split Ranger, working with the law enforcement and resources management divisions of the park. Mr. Carroll has been supervised nearly all aspects of Mammoth Cave National Park.

In 1995, Mr. Carroll was named Chief of the Division of External Programs. His responsibilities have included media relations, publications, information technology, concessions management, and community relations.

It is my privilege to honor Jim Carroll today, before the entire United States House of Representatives, for his service to Mammoth Cave National Park. I wish Jim, and his wife Sina a safe and happy retirement.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION COMMEMORATING THE CENTENNIAL OF PRESIDENT THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S CONFERENCE OF GOVERNORS

HON. EARL BLUMENAUER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. BLUMENAUER. Madam Speaker, today I am introducing, along with Mr. OBERSTAR, Mr. DEFAZIO, Mr. WALSH, Mr. PETRI, and Mr. FARR, a resolution to commemorate the centennial of President Theodore Roosevelt's Conference of Governors. That conference, which included many State Governors, the members of President Roosevelt's Cabinet, Members of Congress, professional organizations, and Government bureaus—and which served as the first meeting of what today has become the National Governors Association—resulted in a report that incorporated the growing interest in conservation as well as articulated the need for future investments in civil infrastructure. The conference laid the groundwork for many of the critical investments of the 20th century and serves as an important reminder that the value of infrastructure investments is dependent on national planning efforts. In the past few decades, our critical infrastructure has fallen into disrepair. As we embark on efforts to improve our Nation's civil infrastructure, we should acknowledge and honor the plans that laid the groundwork for our Nation's greatness.

HONORING NANDO GOMEZ

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. ORTIZ. Madam Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to one of my most trusted staff members, my Chief of Staff, Fernando P. "Nando" Gomez, Jr. After working in Congress for 7 years, the past 2 as my chief of staff, Nando will be joining the private sector.

Nando's dedication to and interest in public service has led him from the small town of Gregory, TX, to the corridors of two Capitols. During his senior year at the University of Texas in 1994, he began working for the Texas House Speaker James E. "Pete" Laney. Nando worked for Speaker Laney for nearly 5 years and was appointed the House reading clerk during the 74th and 75th Legislative Sessions.

He then moved to Washington, DC, in 2001 and worked for Congressman Martin Frost, serving as legislative assistant and then as legislative director. He joined my staff in 2005 and rose from legislative director to chief of staff.

Words cannot begin to describe what Nando has meant to me, my staff, and the people of the 27th District of Texas. I have relied on Nando for his professionalism, work ethic, and friendship. He takes pride in his work, which is especially personal to him because he was born and raised in the district I represent. For him, it has not just been about serving as my chief of staff—it is about advocating for the issues of his hometown, his family, and his roots.

Nando has also taken an active role with local youth. He serves in Brothers/Big Sisters Mentor program, where he has had the honor of serving as big brother to his little brother, Franklin, for nearly 5 years. Nando is an avid sports fan whose allegiances lie with the Texas Longhorns, Houston Astros, San Antonio Spurs, and the Dallas Cowboys.

Though I bid Nando a sad farewell from my office, it will certainly not be a good-bye. I look forward to seeing him around the Capitol when he comes up to catch up with old friends.

Nando remains a trusted member of my family, and I will always seek his counsel on matters political and personal. I wish him, his wife Kristy and son Dominic the best of luck during the new phase of his life.

FREEDOM FOR RAUDEL MARTINEZ GOMEZ

HON. LINCOLN DIAZ-BALART

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. LINCOLN DIAZ-BALART of Florida. Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak about Raudel Martinez Gomez, a political prisoner in totalitarian Cuba.

Mr. Martinez Gomez is a member of the Plantados Movement for Cuban Freedom. He along with fellow dissidents Victor Yunier Ferenandez Martinez and Joenny Alonso Asiz, were arrested in February 2006 for a crime the Cuban dictatorship calls "dangerousness." In sham trials they were each convicted, with Mr. Martinez Gomez sentenced to 3 years in prison.

Unfortunately, his imprisonment for what is really political dissent is nothing new for his family. While Mr. Martinez Gomez was facing trial before the dictatorship's facade of a judicial system, his father was imprisoned in a Cuban gulag for nothing more than participating in a peaceful pro-democracy protest outside the French embassy in Havana. The Cuban regime released his father this past May without formally charging him with any crime.

Shortly after his father's arrest, the local chief of the so-called "Committee for the Defense of the Revolution" came to the home Mr. Martinez Gomez shared with his father. Mr. Martinez Gomez was forced out of his home along with his wife, who was 7 months pregnant at the time. But these local vigilance committee goons were not content with forcing Martinez Gomez and his pregnant wife from their home, they wanted to add insult to injury. So they sent a group of ruffians to shout insults and obscenities at Martinez Gomez and his wife as they left the home they had known for the last 11 years.

What exactly did Mr. Martinez Gomez do to cause his conviction for the so-called crime of "dangerouness?" This is impossible to fully know in the totalitarian circus of present day Cuba but perhaps the regime was afraid of the courage repeatedly demonstrated by Mr. Martinez Gomez.

Madam Speaker, this is just another condemnable occurrence in the constant pattern of brutality by the totalitarian tyranny just 90 miles from our shores. And yet, though the tyranny has attempted to stop Mr. Martinez Gomez, he will never cease in his commitment to freedom for Cuba. My colleagues, we must demand the immediate release of Raudel Martinez Gomez and all prisoners of conscience in totalitarian Cuba.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. PHIL HARE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. HARE. Madam Speaker, on Tuesday, January 22, 2008, I was unavoidably detained. I ask for unanimous consent that the RECORD reflect had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 19, H.R. 4211—To designate the facility of the United States Postal Service located at 725 Roanoke Avenue in Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, as the "Judge Richard B. Allsbrook Post Office"; and I would have vote "aye" on rollcall No. 20, H. Res. 866—Honoring the brave men and women of the United States Coast Guard whose tireless work, dedication, and commitment to protecting the United States have led to the Coast Guard seizing over 350,000 pounds of cocaine at sea during 2007, far surpassing all of our previous records.

HONORING DALLAS CHRISTIAN SCHOOL ON ITS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JEB HENSARLING

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. HENSARLING. Madam Speaker, today I would like to rise to recognize Dallas Christian School and join with them in celebrating their 50th anniversary.

In 1957, Dallas Christian School was established with a mission to train students academically, physically, and spiritually. Five decades later, this nationally recognized Blue Ribbon School continues to accomplish its mission by supplementing its academic curriculum with daily Bible classes and chapel services, college courses, extracurricular activities, and an athletic department.

Located in Mesquite, Texas, 90 percent of Dallas Christian School graduates attend institutions of higher education, and since 1992, 20 seniors have qualified for the National Merit Scholarship.

Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Fifth District of Texas, I am honored to recognize Dallas Christian School's 50th anniversary, and I would like to commend the students, board of directors, faculty, and staff for helping to shape a brighter future for our community and our country.

RECOGNIZING REV. CHARLES L. MOSELEY ON THE OCCASION OF HIS RETIREMENT

HON. J. RANDY FORBES

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. FORBES. Madam Speaker, I rise today to recognize my pastor and dear friend, Rev. Charles L. Moseley on the occasion of his retirement from nearly 40 years of service as pastor of Great Bridge Baptist Church in Chesapeake, VA.

Charles Moseley was born in Camden, SC, the fifth child and only son of Fred and Julia Moseley. Growing up in a small town, Charles felt the influence of his godly mother and father. One evening in October 1949 after a revival service at First Baptist of Camden, while Charles and his friends were watching an eclipse of the moon, he felt the call of God to full-time Christian ministry.

Charles started his higher education achieving his associate of arts degree from Wingate Jr. College in January 1952. He went on to receive his bachelor of arts degree in English from Coker College in January 1954. Continuing to be led by the Lord, Charles then entered Southeastern Seminary at Wake Forest, NC, and graduated with a bachelor of divinity in January 1958. He later earned a master of divinity from Southeastern Seminary in the early 1970s. Throughout these years of college, Charles continued to see God's hand on his life in many ways through financial help, mentoring from professors, and preaching in churches in the area.

During his time at seminary, Charles preached in many churches but was led to pastor two churches in Dillon County, SC. He would travel between the two churches on Sunday preaching at one at 10 a.m. and the other at 11 a.m. It was during this time in December 1956 that he met his future wife, Louise Martin. At the time, Lou was serving as education director of the First Baptist Church of Dillon, SC. They were married in June 1957.

As a senior at seminary, many offers from churches came for him to serve as pastor but Charles was not led to any of them until he received an offer from a small church in Valdese, NC, in early 1958. Abee's Grove Baptist was a small country church located in the mountains of North Carolina with a Sunday morning attendance between 100 to 150 people.

Pastor Moseley and his family left this church in 1962 to begin a ministry at the First Baptist Church of Carthage, NC. Located near Pinehurst, NC, First Baptist was a dignified little church with a beautiful pipe organ, stained glass windows, and friendly congregation.

From the beginning of his studies, Charles had the desire to be a chaplain in the Air Force but that was not the Lord's path for him. He did however, serve in the National Guard and proudly retired from the U.S. Army Reserve with 23 years of service.

Even in the beginning of his ministry, Charles had always thought he would be the pastor of a small church, never imaging that the Lord would lead him to shepherd a large, vibrant, and growing church. However, in 1969 Charles and his family felt the call to Great Bridge Baptist Church, a church of 650 members in a rural area near Norfolk, VA. Throughout his ministry at Great Bridge Baptist, Pastor Moseley has always maintained that he is a pastor first, serving his people wherever their needs are. His greatest desire is to be a servant reaching out to his congregants during their most important times—marriage, birth, death, crisis, sickness, sorrow, fear, joy.

When asked what he would say is a highlight of his ministry at Great Bridge Baptist, Pastor Moseley recalled that one of the greatest of his delights is experiencing someone coming to know the Lord. The blessing of leading a person to know Christ as his/her Savior is the joy of his life.

Madam Speaker, in the nearly 40 years of service at Great Bridge Baptist Church, Pastor Moseley has steadfastly led his congregation in the footsteps of Christ, touching thousands of lives with the joy and peace of the Lord. Through the many years that my family and I have attended Great Bridge Baptist, I have come to know Rev. Moseley as a model of selfless service and great spiritual leadership. Today we thank him for his service to us and most importantly his service to the Lord and we ask God's special blessing on him and his family as they pursue the joys and challenges of this next phase of his life.

HON. TIMOTHY V. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Madam Speaker, unfortunately yesterday, January 22, 2008, my flight to Washington, DC was delayed, and I was unable to cast my votes on H.R. 4211 and H. Res. 866 and wish the RECORD to reflect my intentions had I been able to vote.

Had I been present for rollcall No. 19 on suspending the rules and passing H.R. 4211, naming the Judge Richard B. Allsbrook Post Office, I would have voted ''aye.''

Had I been present for rollcall No. 20 on suspending the rules and passing H. Res. 866, honoring the brave men and women of the United States Coast Guard whose tireless work, dedication, and commitment to protecting the United States have led to the Coast Guard seizing over 350,000 pounds of cocaine at sea during 2007, far surpassing all of our previous records, I would have voted ''aye.''

AMERICAN JOBS CREATION AND ECONOMIC STIMULUS ACT OF 2008

HON. DONALD A. MANZULLO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. MANZULLO. Madam Speaker, last week, the Congressional Budget Office, CBO, released its report outlining options for responding to the Nation's short-term economic weakness. One key finding of the report contains a warning: Any stimulus that a short-term economic package ''can provide to the economy depends on how much of the resultant spending goes to purchase domestically produced goods. The degree of stimulus that a policy can provide to the economy also depends on how much of the resultant spending goes to purchase domestically produced goods. If the additional consumption, or investment, demand is satisfied by imported goods, the income of foreign producers will rise, and the stimulus essentially will be exported.''

Simply put, the benefits of the proposed $145 billion U.S. economic stimulus package should not go abroad. The benefits of this package should help Americans as much as possible. That's why I, along with Representatives BILL LIPINSKI, ERIC CANTOR, WALLY HERGER, and JEFF FORTENBERRY, am proud to introduce today the American Jobs Creation and Economic Stimulus Act of 2008. This bill will provide a quick power boost to the economy that does not cost too much and rewards companies for keeping and adding jobs in America. This proposal simply accelerates the phase-in of the domestic manufacturing tax benefit by 2 years. Any economic stimulus package that is crafted by Congress should include this provision.

The domestic manufacturing tax deduction, now section 199 of the U.S. Tax Code, started in 2005 at 3 percent as part of the 2004 law that replaced the Foreign Sales Corporation/Extraterritorial Income, FSC/ETI tax structure, which was ruled as an illegal export subsidy by the World Trade Organization, WTO. Last year, the domestic manufacturing tax deduction increased to 6 percent. The final phase—raising the domestic manufacturing deduction to 9 percent—is scheduled to start in 2010. The American Jobs Creations and Economic Stimulus Act of 2008 simply changes the start date of the 9 percent domestic manufacturing tax deduction from January 1, 2010, to January 1, 2008, thus providing an additional 3 percent tax incentive for all domestic manufacturers right now.

According to the Internal Revenue Service, IRS, 378,627 small and large manufacturers, as broadly defined by the U.S. Treasury, were helped by this benefit in 2005. One year later, that number grew to over 400,000. The domestic manufacturing benefit applies to firms of all types—C Corporations, S Corporations, Limited Liability Companies, LLCs, and sole proprietorships.

This tax deduction is ideal because it only applies to revenue generated by operations based in the United States and discourages the ''off-shoring'' of American production. No other economic stimulus idea ties tax relief to requiring companies to keep production and jobs in the United States. The American Jobs Creation and Economic Stimulus Act of 2008 is a simple bipartisan low-cost idea that will make a real difference right now. It also fits within the parameters, as outlined by the President on Friday, of what could be included in an economic stimulus package.

Madam Speaker, I respectfully urge the inclusion of accelerating the phase-in of the domestic manufacturing tax deduction in any economic stimulus legislation that will be voted on by the House this year.

''ONE LESS ANGEL WILL CRY''

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. DUNCAN. Madam Speaker, I was recently visited in my office by one of my constituents from the second district of Tennessee, Julie Rich. Julie is one of six winners in a nationwide contest for the March for Life Education and Defense Fund of 2008. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues and other readers of the RECORD her winning poem.

ONE LESS ANGEL WILL CRY

A guardian angel looks up from Earth
And prays each day to the Lord in the hope
That one particular baby will survive until birth
The mother does not want it; she is scared
She has by now reached the end of her rope
O Lord! Please let the child be spared!
She throws up her hands and yells, ''I'm through!
I don't want to be in this position
I will abort. It's something I must do!''
The angel wept
What a horrid decision!
Up to heaven the angel and the baby's soul leapt
The gates were wide open and the soul was ushered in
And why not
For one whose lifespan was tremendously thin?
The devastating thought of abortion should be left far behind
It is like a blot
On all of mankind
''Build Unity on the Life Principles throughout America.
No Exception! No Compromise!''
We must be strong with these words, America
Because millions upon millions have died this way
Abortion has claimed too many lives
Babies perish like this every single day
What if it had been you? One of the ones killed?
You would not know
Your body would have been chilled
Mothers please do not tell your infants goodbye
Let the babies live, let them grow!
And one less angel will cry

RECOGNIZING TIBOTEC THERAPEUTICS FOR THEIR INNOVATION AND CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITY IN DEVELOPING NEW TREATMENTS FOR AMERICANS WITH HIV/AIDS

HON. ROBERT E. ANDREWS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. ANDREWS. Madam Speaker, I rise today to commend and congratulate Tibotec Therapeutics for their innovation and corporate responsibility in developing new, effective treatments for people living with HIV/AIDS. On Friday, January 18, 2008, the Food and Drug Administration approved Tibotec's second HIV drug, INTELENCE™, for the treatment of HIV infection.

We are all aware of the success HIV therapies have had on prolonging and enhancing the quality of life for those infected with HIV/AIDS. As the infected population lives longer and becomes increasingly resistant to current treatment regimens, there is a growing need to focus on access to newer therapies for treatment experienced. HIV drug manufacturers are being challenged to meet the treatment needs of this changing population.

Tibotec Therapeutics, an operating company of Johnson & Johnson, has a strong history of advancing the science of HIV treatment, and INTELENCE™ is another shining example of this cutting-edge research and development.

INTELENCE™, also known as TMC125. is the first new drug in the NNRTI class to be approved in a decade. It brings new hope to HIV patients whose HIV virus has become resistant to other HIV therapies, including drugs in the same NNRTI class.

I would also like to recognize Tibotec Therapeutics for their outstanding work with the HIV patient and physician communities during the development and approval of both PREZITSA™ and INTELENCE™. Tibotec Therapeutics worked closely with leaders in the HIV community on the development of the pivotal clinical trials that led to FDA approval of this product. Notably, the FDA approved INTELENCE™ through an accelerated approval procedure—a process that is reserved for the early approval of drugs that show a meaningful therapeutic advantage over existing treatments for serious or life-threatening diseases.

In addition, Tibotec Therapeutics acted responsibly in pricing INTELENCE™, a fact recognized by many leaders in the HIV community. In fact, one leading HIV patient advocate stated, ''With the introduction of INTELENCE, Tibotec Therapeutics has demonstrated exceptional leadership in working with the HIV community in an effort to address pricing and access issues. Tibotec has repeatedly recognized the necessity of responsibly pricing HIV products and should be commended for its leadership in this regard.''

Once again, I commend Tibotec Therapeutics for its innovation and corporate responsibility. I applaud the fact that Americans living with HIV/AIDS will now have access to a new and important treatment option, affording them the possibility of living healthier and productive lives.

TRIBUTE TO SERGEANT JAMIE O'DELL MAUGANS

HON. TODD TIAHRT

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. TIAHRT. Madam Speaker, today I have the honor to introduce a bill naming the post office in Derby, KS, after a fallen hero, SGT Jamie O'Dell Maugans. Sergeant Maugans was the first casualty of the Global War on Terror from the 4th District of Kansas. A Derby native, Sergeant Maugans graduated from Derby High School and attended the University of Kansas and Cowley County Community College before joining the Army.

Sergeant Maugans was an ordnance disposal specialist and stationed in San Diego when our Nation was attacked on September 11, 2001. He was deployed to Afghanistan in connection with Operation Enduring Freedom—Afghanistan.

On April 15th, 2002, while disposing of ordnances near Kandahar, Afghanistan, Sergeant Maugans was killed along with three others, including fellow Kansan SSG Justin Galewski, from Olathe. He was only 27 years old.

Sergeant Jamie Maugans' family, including his mother Kathy Wurdeman, his father Bryce Maugans and stepmother, Mary Maugans, his brother and four sisters, are very proud of him. His commitment to family, friends and country are well known. By naming this post office, I hope that everyone in South Central Kansas will come to know and remember this young man and his sacrifice. We all owe a debt of gratitude to Sergeant Maugans and his fellow servicemen and women.

Naming the post office in Derby after Sergeant Jamie Maugans is but a simple way we can honor his memory and the memory of all those who have fallen in battle for the defense of this nation. I ask my colleagues to support this important effort.

HONORING CAPTAIN WILLIAM HENRY MULLIGAN

HON. TIMOTHY H. BISHOP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. BISHOP of New York. Madam Speaker, I rise to honor and recognize Captain William Henry Mulligan for his extraordinary career and accomplishments as he plans to step down as president of the Suffolk County Police Superior Officers Association (SOA).

Bill Mulligan was raised in the great town of Hempstead, NY. He proudly served our country in the United States Navy, from 1961 to his honorable discharge in 1964.

Bill joined the Suffolk County Police Department (SCPD) in August of 1967 as a patrolman, and his commitment to law enforcement led to numerous promotions within the department and the Suffolk County Superior Officers Association (SOA). Among the police department, Bill was known for his dedicated work as an officer and as a lover of sports. Bill managed and played for the SCPD softball team which won medals in the New York State Police Olympics and gained national notoriety for its outstanding play.

In 2005, Captain Mulligan was named president of the Suffolk County SOA. The SOA is responsible for representing the labor interests of its members in the Suffolk County Police Department. The organization acts as the exclusive majority representative in negotiating for improved wages, hours, working conditions, welfare and job security, as well as for all other aspects of collective bargaining. As president, Captain Mulligan represented over 500 supervisors and administrators in the Suffolk County Police Department and he has held the position with distinction for the last 3 years.

Today Bill lives in the town of Riverhead, NY with his wife of 42 years, Janet, and their three beautiful daughters, Janine, Elizabeth and Michele.

I am proud to honor Captain William Henry Mulligan for his service to our country and our community. Madam Speaker, on behalf of all New Yorkers, it is with great pride that I recognize and thank Captain Mulligan for a truly distinguished career. We wish him and his family the best in the future.

IN MEMORY OF WILLIAM ''SYKES'' HARRIS

HON. MIKE ROSS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. ROSS. Madam Speaker, I rise today to honor the memory of William ''Sykes'' Harris of Warren, AR, who passed away January 15, 2008, at the age of 89.

Sykes Harris was a true pioneer in the wood flooring business in south Arkansas. After nobly serving his country in World War II, he returned to his childhood home of Warren, where he began a lifetime in business making a positive impact on countless Arkansans through Wilson Oak Flooring, which he would successfully own and operate for nearly 25 years.

Although Sykes Harris had a career in business, his calling and real passion was in community development. The City of Warren and its residents were extremely fortunate to gain from his selfless gifts of time and energy to make his community a better place to live. He took a keen interest in seeing businesses flourish throughout Warren and Bradley County, and this was evident through his service in the Warren Rotary Club, the Warren Country Club and the Warren Bank and Trust Company.

In addition, Sykes Harris was deeply honored to be appointed by then-Governor Bill Clinton to serve on the board of trustees of the University of Arkansas in 1983. Upon completing his 10-year term, the City of Fayetteville recognized his invaluable contributions and efforts by naming him an honorary citizen and presenting him with a key to the city. When Sykes was not working in business or giving back to the community, he could be found relaxing and sitting on his floating duck blind in Arkansas City with any number of family and friends.

I send my deepest condolences to his daughter, Sally Harris Barnett, of Casscoe, AR; his sister, Frances Harris Hedrick of Warren, AR; and to his numerous grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Sykes Harris will be missed by his family, his community and all those who knew him and called him a friend. His focus on the community and his spirit of selfless service to others will never be forgotten. I will continue to keep his family in my deepest thoughts and prayers.

BAYTOWN, TEXAS

HON. TED POE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. POE. Madam Speaker, the city of Baytown, Texas will celebrate its 60th anniversary on January 24, 2008. Baytown's rich history of rugged Texas pioneers, oil boom settlements and economic contributions to Texas span more than 150 years.

Some of the first settlers to the area included Nathaniel Lynch who set up a ferry crossing in 1822 at the junction of the San Jacinto River and Buffalo Bayou. The crossing, now known as the Lynchburg Ferry, continues in operation today by Harris County.

William Scott, one of Stephen F. Austin's Old Three Hundred families, received a land grant in 1824. A settlement grew near his home on San Jacinto Bay which included a small store and a sawmill. This settlement became known as Bay Town.

The story of the present Baytown also encompasses the cities of Goose Creek and Pelly. The discovery of oil was the common thread that wove the three cities' history together.

In 1916, the Goose Creek oilfield became famous as the first offshore drilling operation in Texas. Both of the towns of Pelly and Goose Creek developed around the oil field. Ross S. Sterling and his business associates built a refinery near Goose Creek in 1917 and founded the Humble Oil and Refining Company which later became Exxon Company U.S.A.

Humble Oil purchased 2,200 acres in the area and called it Baytown. The town grew up around the refinery as the company built streets, sold lots, provided utilities and offered financing for workers to purchase a home.

Each city operated independently for several years but talks began to arise among residents of consolidating the three cities after World War I. After several failed attempts at consolidation, the cities reached an agreement in 1947. On January 24, 1948, the city of Baytown was officially established.

Today, Baytown continues to live up to its rich legacy of industry and community spirit. Exxon is still a major part of the city's petroleum industry along with several other major oil companies. Baytown is now also home to Goose Creek Consolidated ISD and Lee College which provide outstanding educational opportunities for students. The future of Baytown shines bright as a great city in which to live, work and play.

There are two well-known landmarks in Baytown, a giant live oak tree and the Fred Hartman Bridge. One landmark illustrates the rich history of the city's past and the other symbolizes its promising future.

The live oak tree, estimated to be more than 1,000 years old, grows in the center of West Texas Avenue. It has lived since Native Americans roamed the coastal plains, the battles of the Texas Revolution were fought and the Texas oil field discoveries were made.

The 440-foot tall Fred Hartman Bridge, a steel cable bridge that spans across the Houston Ship Channel, is Baytown's symbol of modern engineering and Texas-sized strength.

It is an honor to represent a part of Baytown as a portion of the Second Congressional District. My fellow colleague and friend, GENE GREEN represents the other part of Baytown in the United States Congress. Congressman GREEN and I are proud to have worked with Baytown Mayor Stephen DonCarlos and the city council on numerous projects concerning the city. They are commended for their leadership in helping Baytown grow.

I look forward to seeing Baytown prosper in the future and wish the city Happy Birthday as it celebrates its 60th anniversary.

And that's just the way it is.

TRIBUTE TO TIBOTEC THERAPEUTICS

HON. G.K. BUTTERFIELD

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. BUTTERFIELD. Madam Speaker, I rise today to commend and congratulate Tibotec Therapeutics for their innovation and corporate responsibility in developing new, effective treatments for people living with HIV/AIDS. On Friday, January 18, 2008, the Food and Drug Administration approved Tibotec's second HIV drug, INTELENCE™ (etravirine), for the treatment of HIV infection.

In my home state of North Carolina, there are an estimated 31,000 people living with HIV/AIDS, many of whom may not be aware that they are infected with this life-threatening illness. Unfortunately, the Black Community in North Carolina as well as others across the southern United States are disproportionately impacted by HIV/AIDS. A high percentage of people in these communities are diagnosed in the later stages of HIV disease—a fact that further complicates their chances for successful ongoing treatment. Furthermore, Black women are disproportionately impacted by HIV/AIDS in our state, with an HIV infection rate almost 17 times higher than among non-Hispanic white women.

We are all aware of the success HIV therapies have had on prolonging and enhancing the quality of life for those infected with HIV/AIDS. As the infected population lives longer and becomes increasingly resistant to current treatment regimens; there is a growing need to focus on access to newer therapies for treatment experienced. HIV drug manufacturers are being challenged to meet the treatment needs of this changing population. Federal and State governments, public health programs, medical and community-based providers in addition to drug manufacturers are all challenged to find ways to better serve disproportionately impacted and underserved communities.

Tibotec Therapeutics is also a leader in reaching out to underserved communities highly impacted by HIV. A primary example of this is Tibotec's GRACE study, a first-of-its-kind clinical trial that will compare gender differences in the efficacy, safety and tolerability of an FDA-approved HIV therapy in women, and will also explore racial differences in treatment outcomes.

Tibotec Therapeutics, an operating company of Johnson & Johnson, has a strong history of advancing the science of HIV treatment, and INTELENCE™ is another shining example of this cutting-edge research and development. INTELENCE™, also known as TMC 125, is the first new drug in the NNRTI class to be approved in a decade. It brings new hope to HIV patients, whose HIV virus has become resistant to other HIV therapies, including drugs in the same NNRTI class. Notably, the FDA approved INTELENCE™ through an accelerated approval procedure—a process that is reserved for the early approval of drugs that show a meaningful therapeutic advantage over existing treatments for serious or life-threatening diseases.

Finally, Tibotec Therapeutics acted responsibly in pricing INTELENCE™, a fact recognized by many leaders in the HIV community. In fact, one leading HIV patient advocate stated, "With the introduction of INTELENCE, Tibotec Therapeutics has demonstrated exceptional leadership in working with the HIV community in an effort to address pricing and access issues. Tibotec has repeatedly recognized the necessity of responsibly pricing HIV products and should be commended for its leadership in this regard." This type of responsible corporate behavior is especially welcomed in my state of North Carolina, which has struggled in the past to provide access to HIV therapies for eligible lower-income individuals.

In closing, I would like to once again, I commend Tibotec Therapeutics for its innovation and corporate responsibility. I applaud the fact that North Carolinians living with HIV/AIDS will now have access to a new and important treatment option, affording them the possibility of living healthier and productive lives.

TRIBUTE TO DONALD GILMER

HON. FRED UPTON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. UPTON. Madam Speaker, I rise today to honor the inspiring career of Donald Gilmer, of Augusta, MI. A dedicated and selfless individual, Don has enthusiastically served the public for the past 33 years.

Don's career has served as an example of the definition of "public servant" and could be added to any dictionary listing.

Don has served Michigan citizens in a wide variety of significant roles, including 11 terms as a member of the Michigan House of Representatives, 3 of which he served as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Don has also served on the Kalamazoo County Board of Commissioners, as Michigan's lottery commissioner, as Governor John Engler's budget director, and most recently, as Kalamazoo County's Administrator. His services to Kalamazoo County and to the State of Michigan are truly commendable.

As my good friend retires, he closes one chapter of his inspiring career and embarks on a new phase of his life. I am confident that this retirement is far from the end of Don's public service and that he will remain committed to the citizens of our great State and community. Don's humor and kind heart will be greatly missed by his colleagues. I wish Don all the best in retirement.

Mr. KIND. Madam Speaker, on January 16, 2008, I erroneously voted in favor of an amendment offered by Representative JOE WILSON (SC) to H.R. 2768 (roll No. 8), the Supplemental Mine Improvement and New Emergency Response (S–MINER) Act. ## HONORING JACQUELINE MONTEIRO DACOSTA

HON. PATRICK J. KENNEDY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam Speaker, I rise today to express my sympathies to a wonderful Rhode Island family who has lost a devoted loved one named Jacqueline Monteiro Dacosta and to briefly share with you the impact she had on so many lives just by being kind.

Jackie was a loving mother, sister and daughter who always exuded a sense of comfort to all. That's why she was perfect for her job as a constituent case worker in my district office in Rhode Island. For the past 11 years she reached out to countless people who sought her advice and help on a multitude of issues and she always put them at ease while they told her their life problems. She reassured them—people she had just met—that she would do what she could to help, and then she did. I have a file of letters in my office from people who wrote to me just to praise Jackie for her hard work and more than that, to recognize her kindness.

Her sudden passing took us all by surprise. We knew instantly our office would never be the same without her presence, her funny stories, her smile. When thousands showed up for her wake and funeral to celebrate her life, it was such a testament to how truly loved she was in the community. No one had seen anything like it. Her family has been overwhelmed with an outpouring of support and sympathy from all over the state.

On my next trip to Cape Verde, her family members and I will plant a tree in Jackie's memory. Her spirit on earth will be forever surrounded by the unspoiled beauty of her homeland and the sounds of the island music she loved so much. We will never forget Jackie and her special qualities that touched so many lives and made life that much better.

We join Jackie's parents, Jose and Adelisa Monteiro; her children Stephanie and Justin and her siblings, Filomena, Osvaldo and Jose Jr. in continuing to honor Jackie's memory and her joyous spirit.

HONORING ISAIAS R. GOMEZ

HON. JOE BACA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. BACA. Madam Speaker, I stand here today to honor and remember a community activist, friend, loving husband, and father—Isaias R. Gomez.

Isaias passed away on January 18, 2008 at his home in Colton, California.

He was born in Gallup, New Mexico, and was a resident of Colton, which is in my Congressional District, for almost 55 years.

While born in New Mexico, Isaias was raised in Jalostotitlan, Jalisco, Mexico. There he met and married his wife, Jessie Gomez. He and Jessie returned to Gallup, where Isaias began to work in the coal mines. Then in 1953, he and Jessie moved to Colton, and Isaias went to work for the Santa Fe Railroad.

Isaias and Jessie's 6 children—Rosa, Eloise, Isaias Jr., Yolanda, Tommy, and Terri—where all raised in Colton. After initially working with the railroad, Isaias eventually became a successful real estate developer and builder.

I had the great privilege of knowing Isaias personally through his daughter Eloise and her husband Frank Reyes, who are both good friends of mine.

In fact, I gave Eloise Reyes a "Woman of the Year" award in 1993, when I was in the California State Legislature. She was recognized for all her great work in the community, and for being a true trailblazer as the first Hispanic, female attorney in the Inland Empire.

Isaias always let everyone know that his family was his greatest blessing. He cherished his time with them—especially the time he spent with his 9 grandchildren.

Isaias will always be remembered for his amazing work ethic and his unending dedication to friends and family. His great influence on those around him is evidenced in the outstanding character of his children and grandchildren.

In addition to his children and grandchildren, Isaias is survived by his wife Jessie; his sisters Angelita, Alfonsina, and Isabel; and his brothers Joel, Jesus, and Arturo.

Let us take the time to pay tribute to this wonderful man. Let us celebrate the life he lived and the example he led.

Although he is no longer with us, Isaias's legacy and spirit will continue to live on through the lives of everyone he has touched.

The thoughts and prayers of my wife Barbara, my family and I are with his family at this time.

HONORING MR. STU PIKEN

HON. MIKE FERGUSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. FERGUSON. Madam Speaker, I rise to honor Mr. Stu Piken upon his retirement from civil service in February.

For the past 10 years, Mr. Piken has served as Deputy District Engineer for Project Management in the New York District of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. He is the senior civilian responsible for more than $650 million in projects for civil works, military, hazardous and toxic waste remediation and interagency agreements.

After my first election to the House in 2000, I have worked closely with him on a project of great importance to the 7th District that I represent, the Green Brook Flood Control Project.

In September 1999, portions of my district were devastated by Hurricane Floyd. Among the areas hardest hit were the communities of Manville and Bound Brook, New Jersey. The flooding in these communities resulted in two deaths, the evacuation of thousands of citizens, damages exceeding $100 million, major disruption to municipal services, and disruption to the lives of thousands of my constituents.

The Green Brook Flood Control Project began in response to Floyd and other storms. The Army Corps of Engineers is implementing the project—which includes a system of levees, flood walls, flood gates, pumping stations, and retention basins—to protect low-lying communities along flood plains of the Raritan River and its tributaries. Green Brook has received more than $65 million in federal funding since 2001, and Mr. Piken has been instrumental in its progress.

Before his current assignment, Mr. Piken served in the North Atlantic Division, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, on a special assignment as the Director of Programs. In that position, he was responsible for the development of the water resources program for the Northeast as well as the management of all military design and construction in the Northeast and Europe.

I join the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in thanking Stu Piken for his dedicated service—especially to the constituents I represent—and I wish him the best in his future endeavors.

TRIBUTE TO SERGEANT PHILLIP A. BOCKS

HON. JOE KNOLLENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. KNOLLENBERG. Madam Speaker, I want to pay tribute to a hero from my congressional district, Sergeant Phillip A. Bocks of Troy, Michigan. Today, I ask that the House of Representatives honor and remember this incredible young man who died serving his country.

Phillip Bocks was not one to back down from a challenge. From the time he was five years old, Phillip insisted on skiing adult courses, and at age fourteen, joined a hockey league even though he had never worn a pair of ice skates. While in high school, Phillip was a member of the swim team, acted in plays, and developed a flair for cooking.

After graduating from high school, Phillip joined the Marines in 2000 and was assigned to the Marine Corps Mountain Warfare Training Center in Bridgeport, California. As an instructor, Phillip trained Marines how to survive and fight in rugged terrain. On November 9, 2007, while on a mission to a village near Aranus, Afghanistan to make sure the residents had medical supplies and food, Sgt. Bocks was killed in an ambush.

My thoughts, prayers, and deepest gratitude for their sacrifice go to Phillip's family. There are no words that can relieve their pain and I can only offer to convey my deep respect and highest appreciation.

Madam Speaker, Sgt. Bocks gave the ultimate sacrifice not only for the freedom and security of his family and our country, but for the people of Afghanistan. I wish to remember his bravery and selflessness as he is honored today.

COMMENDING DISTRICT 02 FIRE DEPARTMENTS FOR A JOB WELL DONE

HON. STEVE ISRAEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. ISRAEL. Madam, Speaker. I rise today to congratulate the brave men and women from the Deer Park, Lindenhurst, North Babylon, West Babylon and Wyandanch Fire Departments. There is no question as to why the firefighters belonging to the FDNY are considered New York's bravest. The exemplary behavior and actions of these fine individuals represent just that, bravery.

When a fire broke out at Our Lady of Miraculous Medal Church in Wyandanch fire fighters' from not only this town, but surrounding towns, joined together. They used their resources and managed to put out a fire that was large enough to severely damage the church rectory, food pantry, and community outreach center. They managed to achieve this with no fatalities or injuries.

Our Lady of Miraculous Medal Church has provided outreach services for over 30 years. While it saddens me that an individual would intentionally start a fire at a place that has provided such charity, I feel a sense of ease at knowing that the brave fire fighters worked so quickly to counter these acts.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I want to commend the emergency responders for their bravery and a job well done. I would also like to express my deep gratitude to these men and women for their services not only on December 30th but on every day that they go out and risk their lives for others.

HONORING CATHY AND LEN UNGER

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. BERMAN. Madam Speaker, my colleague, Congressman HENRY WAXMAN and I rise to pay tribute to our good friends, Cathy and Len Unger, who are being honored by the American Jewish Committee, AJC, at the Ira E. Yellin Community Leadership Award Dinner on January 24, 2008.

The AJC has chosen to recognize Cathy and Len, two remarkable leaders for their deep commitment to ensuring equal opportunities for all people and protecting their essential rights and liberties. For over 100 years, the AJC has been a vital organization in the Jewish community. It has continued its efforts to combat anti-Semitism, promote pluralism and democratic values, support Israel's quest for peace and security, advocate for energy independence and strengthen Jewish life.

As with all of us, Cathy and Len are the products of their family experiences. Len was born in a displaced persons camp after his parents survived the Holocaust. Although Cathy's father is a native Angeleno, Cathy's mother fled Germany with her family in 1933.

Cathy and Len were introduced to the AJC by Cathy's father, but their active participation started after a trip to Israel, organized by Ira Yellin, where they witnessed firsthand the impact of this outstanding organization. Upon their return, they joined the board of the Los Angeles chapter and have worked diligently to help the AJC attain its important mission.

Len graduated from UCLA and received his JD degree from Boalt Hall at UC Berkeley. Cathy also graduated from Berkeley. Len began his legal career in New York, where his pro bono work in a death penalty case earned him a Thurgood Marshall Award from the New York City Bar Association. When he relocated to Los Angeles, he joined the law firm of Levine and Krom, now Levine and Unger, where he currently practices.

Cathy became involved in politics, first working as a staff member for former Congressman Mel Levine during his tenure as a State Assemblyman, and then as a political and non-profit fundraiser. Both Cathy and Len have been politically active at local, State and national levels.

Their community interests involve many organizations. Cathy was appointed to the board of governors of the California Community Colleges. She is active on the local and national boards of Planned Parenthood and currently serves as chair of its Advocacy Project. She co-chaired the Women's Political Committee. Len is a member of the board and former chair of the southern California chapter of the Arthritis Foundation and is a recipient of the organization's Jane Wyman Humanitarian Award. He served as vice-chair of the national board of trustees of the Arthritis Foundation, and he currently sits on the board of Reprise! Broadway's Best, as well as on the boards of several charitable foundations. He also serves as a trustee of the investment board of the Los Angeles County Retirement Association.

Cathy and Len are the proud grandparents of Jack, Emma and Nate, children of Laura and Randy Dudley; and of Dylan, daughter of Susan and Daniel Unger.

We ask our colleagues to join us in saluting Cathy and Len Unger for their long-time commitment to public service.

Had I been present for rollcall No. 20, H. Res. 866, a bill honoring the brave men and women of the United States Coast Guard whose tireless work, dedication, and commitment to protecting the United States have led to the Coast Guard seizing over 350,000 pounds of cocaine at sea during 2007, far surpassing all of our previous records, I would have voted ''yea.''

TWELVE PENELLAS COUNTY CITIES HONORED BY THE ARBOR DAY FOUNDATION

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Madam Speaker, twelve Pinellas County, Florida cities were honored by the Arbor Day Foundation this year for their commitment to improving the environment.

This Tree City USA designation recognizes the commitment of towns and cities throughout our nation to preserving open lands and to beautify their streets and public lands through the planting of trees and other natural vegetation. Pinellas County, which I have the privilege to represent, has taken significant steps to maintain and enhance our state's natural beauty, even though it is Florida's most densely populated county.

The U.S. Forest Service's Urban and Community Forestry program provides key federal support for these efforts through state and local grants as well as with advice to local community leaders. Together, this federal, state and local initiative is making our communities better places to live.

The 12 Pinellas County communities honored this year as Tree Cities USA are the Town of Belleair led by Mayor George Mariani; the City of Clearwater led by Mayor Frank Hibbard; the City of Dunedin led by Mayor Robert Hackworth; the City of Gulfport led by Mayor Michael Yakes; the City of Largo led by Mayor Patricia Gerard; the City of Oldsmar led by Mayor Jim Ronecker; the City of Safety Harbor led by Mayor Andy Steingold; the City of St. Petersburg led by Mayor Rick Baker; the City of Seminole led by Jimmy Johnson; the City of South Pasadena led by Mayor Dick Holmes; the City of St. Pete Beach led by Mayor Ward Friszolowski; and the City of Treasure Island led by Mayor Mary Maloof.

Madam Speaker, in closing, I would ask my colleagues in the House to join me in congratulating these 12 cities and the commitment of their residents to making them such special places to live, to work, and to play.

Employers in the county trusted that any candidate she sent to them would be a viable and well-prepared applicant. Mary Lois McMillan is known throughout WorkForce Essentials as a dedicated team player with a tremendous work ethic. She will clearly be missed.

In addition to her efforts at the Career Center, she has consistently given back to the community through her volunteer work with the Williamson County Chamber of Commerce, the Carnton Plantation, the Heritage Foundation of Franklin and Williamson County, and the Dress for Success program.

Please join me in thanking Mary Lois McMillan for her contributions to our community and to Tennessee. We should all be proud of the work she has done.

Mr. MILLER of Florida. Madam Speaker, on behalf of the United States Congress, it is an honor for me to rise today in recognition of Captain David Martin Karasek upon his retirement from the Florida Highway Patrol.

Captain Karasek's commitment to his country and community spans several decades. For over 10 years, Captain Karasek served various communities in the State of Florida and attained numerous promotions. In 1990, Lieutenant Karasek transferred to the Florida Highway Patrol Training Academy where his experience and dedication made him instrumental in the fashioning of future State Troopers. A year later, Lieutenant Karasek was promoted to Captain and District Commander, where he has served for almost 17 years.

Throughout his 30 year career with the Florida Highway Patrol, Captain Karasek has been awarded Trooper of the Month on six separate occasions, and in 1981 he was elected Exchange Club Trooper of the Year. From 1992 to 1994, Captain Karasek served as Vice President of the First Judicial Circuit Law Enforcement Association. Escambia County and Northwest Florida communities are deeply indebted to Captain Karasek, whose continual commitment provided safety and security for our roads in Florida.

Madam Speaker, on behalf of the United States Congress, I am proud to honor Captain David Martin Karasek for his enduring allegiance to the State of Florida and our great Nation.

Prior to July, 2004, he commanded the Fleet and Industrial Supply Center Norfolk, the Navy's largest supply center. In that position, Heckelman was also responsible for Program Manager, Supply and Logistics for the Commander, Navy Region Mid-Atlantic.

He has served in the United States Navy in several abroad tours. He served as supply officer for the nuclear powered aircraft carrier

USS Abraham Lincoln while on deployment to the Persian Gulf and North Arabian Ocean and he was recognized as having the best service and sales operations among Navy aircraft carriers. In June, 1995, he acted as the Executive Officer in Yokosuka, Japan.

Heckelman was selected by the Undersecretary of the Navy to serve in the Department of the Navy's 1995 Base Realignment and Closure team, acting as the Infrastructure Analyst and the senior Supply Corps officer.

He served as the Executive Assistant to the Commander, Naval Informative Systems Management Center in Washington, DC.

Before receiving his master's degree of business administration from the University of Michigan, he served on the USS Carl Vinson as Stock Control and Readiness Officer.

His first command was on the destroyer USS Bigelow, first as Distributing Officer and quickly advancing to Sales Officer.

Highlighting his career in the United States Navy, Captain Heckelman has earned many awards including the Legion of Merit, Meritorious Service Medal, Naval Commendation Medal, Navy Achievement Medal, Military Outstanding Volunteer Service Medal, and the Meritorious Unit Commendation award.

I would like to convey my gratitude and congratulations to Captain Loren V. Heckelman for his 28 year commitment to the United States Navy and wish him the best in his future endeavors.

HONORING THE ACADEMY REVIEW BOARD AND ACADEMY NOMINEES FOR 2008

HON. RODNEY P. FRELINGHUYSEN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Madam Speaker, every year, more high school seniors from the 11th Congressional District trade in varsity jackets for Navy pea coats, Air Force flight suits, and Army brass buckles than most other districts in the country. But this is nothing new—our area has repeatedly sent an above average portion of its sons and daughters to the Nation's military academies for decades.

This fact should not come as a surprise. The educational excellence of area schools is well known and has long been a magnet for families looking for the best environment in which to raise their children. Our graduates are skilled not only in mathematics, science, and social studies, but also have solid backgrounds in sports, debate teams, and other extracurricular activities. This diverse upbringing makes military academy recruiters sit up and take note—indeed, many recruiters know our towns and schools by name.

Since the 1830s, Members of Congress have enjoyed meeting, talking with, and nominating these superb young people to our military academies. But how did this process evolve? In 1843, when West Point was the sole academy, Congress ratified the nominating process and became directly involved in the makeup of our military's leadership. This was not an act of an imperial Congress bent on controlling every aspect of Government. Rather, the procedure still used today was, and is, a further check and balance in our democracy. It was originally designed to weaken and divide political coloration in the officer corps, provide geographical balance to our armed services, and to make the officer corps more resilient to unfettered nepotism and handicapped European armies.

In 1854, Representative Gerritt Smith of New York added a new component to the academy nomination process—the academy review board. This was the first time a Member of Congress appointed prominent citizens from his district to screen applicants and assist with the serious duty of nominating candidates for academy admission. Today, I am honored to continue this wise tradition in my service to the 11th Congressional District.

The Academy Review Board is composed of six local citizens (several of whom are distinguished veterans) who have shown exemplary service to New Jersey, to their communities, and to the continued excellence of education in our area. Though from diverse backgrounds and professions, they all share a common dedication that the best qualified and motivated graduates attend our academies. And, as true for most volunteer groups, their service goes largely unnoticed.

I would like to take a moment to recognize these men and women and thank them publicly for participating in this important panel. Being on the Board requires hard work and an objective mind. Members have the responsibility of interviewing upwards of 50 outstanding high school seniors every year in the academy review process.

The nomination process follows a general timetable. High school seniors mail personal information directly to the Military Academy, the Naval Academy, the Air Force Academy, and the Merchant Marine Academy once they become interested in attending. Information includes academic achievement, college entry test scores, and other activities. At this time, they also inform my office of their desire to be nominated.

The academies then assess the applicants, rank them based on the data supplied, and return the files to my office with their notations. In late November, our Academy Review Board interviews all of the applicants over the course of two days. They assess a student's qualifications and analyze character, desire to serve, and other talents that may be hidden on paper.

This year the board interviewed 38 applicants. Nominations included 10 to the Naval Academy, 8 to the Military Academy, 5 to the Merchant Marine Academy, and 5 to the Air Force Academy—the Coast Guard Academy does not use the congressional nomination process. The recommendations are then forwarded to the academies by January 31, where admissions staff reviewed files and notified applicants and my office of their final decision on admittance.

As these highly motivated and talented young men and women go through the academy nominating process, never let us forget the sacrifice they are preparing to make: to defend our country and protect our citizens. This holds especially true at a time when our Nation is fighting the war against terrorism. Whether it is in Afghanistan, the Iraq, or other hot spots around the world, no doubt we are constantly reminded that wars are fought by the young. And, while our military missions are both important and sometimes dangerous, it is reassuring to know that we continue to put America's best and brightest in command.

HONORING THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CLARENCE CENTER VOLUNTEER FIRE COMPANY

HON. THOMAS M. REYNOLDS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. REYNOLDS. Madam Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today to commemorate the 100th Anniversary of the Clarence Center Volunteer Fire Company of Clarence, New York. For a century the members of the Clarence Hose Company have been volunteering to protect their neighbors.

The Clarence Center Volunteer Fire Company became the first fire company in the Town of Clarence in 1908. The company began as a stock company and was able to purchase a hand drawn hose cart and chemical fire extinguishers. Land for a fire hall was donated to the Fire Company by a local businessman, and fundraising for the construction began in July 1908 with the First Firemen's picnic in Clarence. With the help of a local farmer, Wesley Williams, the Company raised enough money to construct Williams Hall.

The year 1922 marked a milestone for the Clarence Center Volunteer Fire Company. In February of this year the Company was able to purchase its first fire truck. The acquisition of this truck was important to the protection that the fire company offered the people in Clarence. Additionally, the first annual Labor Day Picnic was held in 1922. This is a time-honored event in the town of Clarence; not only is it a way for the fire company to raise funds for improvements to the equipment used to serve the people of Clarence, but it is an event that families throughout the town look forward to every year.

Since its beginnings the Clarence Volunteer Fire Company has become an indispensable part of the town. The Company remains committed to providing fire, rescue, and EMS services to the citizens that reside within the district boundaries. They've continued to meet the needs of the rapidly growing population of Clarence Center. As we reach the 100th anniversary of this fire company the volunteers continue to dedicate themselves to serve and assist the members of their community.

Thus Madam Speaker, in recognition of its 100th Anniversary of tremendous service in the Town of Clarence, I ask this honorable body join me in honoring the Clarence Center Volunteer Fire Company.

HONORING HRANT DINK

HON. ZOE LOFGREN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Ms. ZOE LOFGREN of California. Madam Speaker, I rise today to honor Hrant Dink. He was a Turkish-Armenian journalist and a defender of the freedom of the press. His belief in this freedom never wavered despite his prosecution and conviction under Article 301 of the Turkish Penal Code, which makes it a crime to discuss the Armenian Genocide. Sadly, Mr. Dink's life was taken one year ago on January 19, 2007.

I am proud to cosponsor H. Res. 102, which condemns the assassination of Hrant Dink. This bill urges the Turkish government to continue to investigate and prosecute those responsible for Mr. Dink's murder and to protect the freedom of speech in Turkey by repealing Article 301. The repeal of this Article will ensure that Hrant Dink's legacy will live on and that his death will not have been in vain.

HONORING MARY LOUISE PLUNKETT

HON. JOSEPH CROWLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. CROWLEY. Madam Speaker, I rise to pay tribute and say thanks to Mary Louise Plunkett one of the most influential people in my life for more than 25 years, and one of the most valued members of the Queens community for more than 50.

I was blessed to meet Mary Lu in my early twenties, when I stopped into the Queens Democratic County Headquarters while running errands for my Uncle Walter. That day was the start of one of the important friendships in my personal and political life.

But, long before Mary Lu became a valued part of my life, she was already a valued and well-established force in Queens County.

Brooklyn-born Mary Lu moved to Jackson Heights in 1949 with her husband, Jack. Mary Lu was quick to engage in her community and church, and we were just as quick to forgive Mary Lu for her Brooklyn past.

Mary Lu's foray into politics started when she joined the Amerind Democratic Club. She went on to volunteer at Queens County Democratic Headquarters, where she became a full time member of the staff in 1956. While working at County headquarters, Mary Lu served some of Queens finest leaders, including Moses Weinstein, Jim Roe, and Tom Manton. And, her influence on them and our community was felt by all.

No political event or dinner was held without Mary Lu and her charm. She helped to welcome such dignitaries as Jack Kennedy, TED KENNEDY, Jimmy Carter, Hugh Carey, Ed Koch, Mario Cuomo, and Bill and HILLARY CLINTON in to our Queens family.

Her intelligence, warmth and kindness made all people feel welcome and comfortable.

However, Mary Lu's reach went far beyond local politics. When she was not at County headquarters, she was working to create a better Queens. For example, she hosted an annual fundraiser to help the children of St. Gertrude's Parish in Far Rockaway.

On top of all she does for others, most important to her is her role as mother and grandmother. There is nothing Mary Lu won't or hasn't done for her two children—Steven and Jamie and her three grandchildren—Matthew, Christopher and Caroline.

I have tremendous respect for Mary Lu and all she has accomplished, but as her friend I am most proud of how she has led her family.

In the coming weeks, my fellow friends and colleagues in Queens will gather to honor Mary Lu for her lifetime of service to Queens, New York.

We will applaud her for her charity, wit and political skill. And, I will thank her for being a mentor and friend.

Mary Lu, congratulations on a lifetime of achievements.

SUNSET MEMORIAL

HON. TRENT FRANKS

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. FRANKS of Arizona. Madam Speaker, because the end of the hour grows close, I would now come before this body with a sunset memorial. We intend to repeat this from time to time to chronicle the loss of life by abortion on demand in this country.

Madam Speaker, it is January 23, 2008, in the land of the free and the home of the brave, and before the sun sets today in America, almost 4,000 more defenseless unborn children were killed by abortion on demand just today.

Exactly 35 years today, the tragic judicial fiat called Roe v. Wade was handed down. Since then, the very foundation of this Nation has been stained by the blood of almost 50 million children. Madam Speaker, that is more than 16,000 times the number of innocent lives lost on September 11.

Each of the 4,000 children that we lost today had at least four things in common. They were each just little babies who had done nothing wrong to anyone. And each one of them died a nameless and lonely death. And each of their mothers, whether she realizes it immediately or not, will never be the same. And all the gifts that these children might have brought to humanity are now lost forever.

Madam Speaker, those noble heroes lying in frozen silence out in Arlington National Cemetery did not die so America could shred her own Constitution, as well as her own children, by the millions. It seems that we are never quite so eloquent as when we decry the genocidal crimes of past generations, those who allowed their courts to strip the black man and the Jew of their constitutional personhood, and then proceeded to murderously desecrate millions of these, God's own children.

Yet even in the full glare of such tragedy, this generation clings to blindness and invincible ignorance while history repeats itself and our own genocide mercilessly annihilates the most helpless of all victims to date, those yet unborn.

Perhaps it is important for those of us in this Chamber to remind ourselves again of why we are really all here.

Thomas Jefferson said, ''The care of human life and its happiness and not its destruction is the chief and only object of good government.''

Madam Speaker, protecting the lives of our innocent citizens and their constitutional rights is why we are all here. It is our sworn oath. The phrase in the 14th amendment capsulizes our entire Constitution. It says: ''No state shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law.''

The bedrock foundation of this Republic is the Declaration, not the casual notion, but the Declaration of the self-evident truth that all human beings are created equal and endowed by their creator with the unalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Every conflict and battle our Nation has ever faced can be traced to our commitment to this core self-evident truth. It has made us the beacon of hope for the entire world. It is who we are.

And yet today, Madam Speaker, in this body we fail to honor that commitment. We fail our sworn oath and our God-given responsibility as we broke faith with nearly 4,000 innocent American babies who died without the protection we should have been given them.

Madam Speaker, I believe that this discussion presents this Congress and the American people with two destiny questions.

The first that all of us must ask ourselves is very simple: Does abortion really kill a baby? If the answer to that question is ''yes,'' there is a second destiny question that inevitably follows. And it is this, Madam Speaker: Will we allow ourselves to be dragged by those who have lost their way into a darkness where the light of human compassion has gone out and the predatory survival of the fittest prevails over humanity? Or will America embrace her destiny to lead the world to cherish and honor the God-given miracle of each human life?

Madam Speaker, it has been said that every baby comes with a message, that God has not yet despaired of mankind. And I mourn that those 4,000 messages sent to us today will never be heard. Madam Speaker, I also have not yet despaired. Because tonight maybe someone new, maybe even someone in this Congress, who heard this sunset memorial will finally realize that abortion really does kill a baby, that it hurts mothers more than anyone else, and that nearly 50 million dead children in America is enough. And that America is great enough to find a better way than abortion on demand.

So tonight, Madam Speaker, may we each remind ourselves that our own days in this sunshine of life are numbered and that all too soon each of us will walk from these Chambers for the very last time.

And if it should be that this Congress is allowed to convene on another day yet to come, may that be the day that we hear the cries of the unborn at last. May that be the day we find the humanity, the courage, and the will to embrace together our human and our constitutional duty to protect the least of these, our tiny American brothers and sisters, from this murderous scourge upon our Nation called abortion on demand.

This is a sunset memorial, Madam Speaker. It is January 23, 2008, in the land of free and the home of the brave.

NEW TREATMENT FOR HIV/AIDS

HON. MARY BONO MACK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mrs. BONO MACK. Madam Speaker, I rise today to celebrate the approval of a new treatment that will provide renewed health and hope for people living with HIV/AIDS. On Friday, January 18, 2008, the Food and Drug Administration approved INTELENCE™, for the treatment of HIV infection. Tibotec Therapeutics innovative efforts in developing new, effective treatments for people living with HIV/AIDS should be commended.

We are all aware of the success HIV therapies have had on prolonging and enhancing the quality of life for those infected with HIV/AIDS. As the infected population lives longer and becomes increasingly resistant to current treatment regimens, there is a growing need to focus on access to newer therapies for treatment experienced. HIV drug manufacturers are being challenged to meet the treatment needs of this changing population.

INTELENCE™, also known as TMC125, is the first new drug in the NNRTI class to be approved in a decade. It brings new hope to HIV patients, whose HIV virus has become resistant to other HIV therapies, including drugs in the same NNRTI class.

Tibotec Therapeutics has worked with the HIV patient and physician communities in the 45th Congressional district among many others during the development and approval of INTELENCE™. The results of these efforts and clinical trials have been positive; patients are achieving and maintaining suppressed viral loads with minimal side effects. Notably, the FDA approved INTELENCE™ through an accelerated approval procedure—a process that is reserved for the early approval of drugs that show a meaningful therapeutic advantage over existing treatments for serious or life-threatening diseases.

I applaud the fact that Americans living with HIV/AIDS will now have access to a new and important treatment option, affording them the possibility of living healthier and productive lives.

HONORING THE LIFE OF DIANE WOLF

HON. JOHN L. MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. MICA. Madam Speaker, I rise today to honor the life and special contributions of Diane Wolf who passed away unexpectedly at age 53 on January 12, 2008.

Our nation's capital city has lost one of its great cultural patrons. The Wolf family has lost a beloved daughter, sister and loved one and I have lost a wonderful friend. Diane Wolf was blessed to be part of one of America's most successful families. Through the years, I have had the privilege of knowing and working with her. She devoted her boundless energy, time and resources to advance history, art and culture not only for Washington, DC, but also for the people of our country. I had the honor of working with her to raise private funds for construction of the new visitor center for our U.S. Capitol building. Her service on numerous boards aided the National Archives, the Kennedy Center, the National Gallery of Art, and the Smithsonian Institution.

In New York City, Diane Wolf was renowned for her work and support of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Whitney Museum of American Art, and the Frick Collection.

Miss Wolf was appointed by President Reagan in 1985 to serve on the U.S. Commission of Fine Arts. She also served on the U.S. Senate Preservation Board of Trustees, and the Washington National Opera Board of Trustees.

A graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and with a master's degree from Columbia University, she went on to earn a law degree from Georgetown University.

Miss Wolf also served as president of the Capitol Hill Federal Bar Association.

Of all the individuals I have worked with in our nation's capitol during the past three decades, no one has been more personally dedicated to making a difference in promoting artistic and cultural endeavors than Diane Wolf.

Miss Wolf was born in Cheyenne, Wyoming and raised in Denver, maintained residences in New York City and Washington, DC.

To her parents, Erving and Joyce Wolf; and two brothers, Daniel Wolf and Matthew Wolf; and on behalf of the House of Representatives, we extend our deepest sympathy.

HONORING JUDGE PHILLIP FIGA

HON. THOMAS G. TANCREDO

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. TANCREDO. Madam Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to U.S. District Judge Phillip Figa, who passed away earlier this month at his home in Greenwood Village, Colorado after a struggle with cancer.

A native of Chicago, Illinois, Judge Figa received his legal credentials from Cornell Law School in 1976 before becoming a highly-successful litigation lawyer and co-founding the Burns, Figa & Will P.C. law group, where he built a reputation for fairness and impartiality. He became Chair of the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee in 1984 and eventually President of the Association in 1995.

In 2003 President Bush appointed Judge Figa to the U.S. District Court for Colorado where he served our nation as a fair and dedicated jurist. Colorado has lost a fine public servant with the passing of Judge Figa. Our best wishes and heartfelt condolences go out to all who knew and loved him.

TRIBUTE TO TOM TERRELL

HON. ANTHONY D. WEINER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. WEINER. Madam Speaker, I rise today to honor Tom Terrell, a versatile music journalist, promoter and DJ, who was among the first industry insiders to focus attention on reggae and world music. Tom was a cornerstone of the New York music community for 16 years before returning to his native Washington, DC, where he passed away on November 29, 2007, after a brave battle with prostate cancer. He was 57 years old.

Mr. Terrell, who was ubiquitous in Washington music circles in the 1970s and 1980s, seemed to know everyone and to be ahead of every trend. After beginning his journalistic career at Howard University, he worked as a disc jockey at local stations and wrote about music for the Unicorn Times, the Washington City Paper, and other publications. As the house DJ at d.c. space and the 9:30 Club, he introduced audiences to an eclectic selection of records reflecting his interest in soul, jazz, New Wave, reggae, and African music.

Mr. Terrell's unique, humorous, insightful, and always honest voice was ubiquitious in places such as Vibe, Essence, JazzTimes, the Village Voice and National Public Radio. Mr. Terrell's journalism was often a spirited blend of autobiography and musicology, leavened with slang, profanity, and the knowledge of every trend in popular music for the past half-century. He wrote about virtually every form of music from Africa and the Americas.

Between his DJ work and writing, he promoted concerts for artists as diverse as Cab Calloway, the Art Ensemble of Chicago and Mali's Salif Keita. After moving to New York in 1990, he worked in marketing for Island Records, Gee Street Records, and Verve, wrote for magazines and served as the DJ for jazz giant Ornette Coleman's 70th birthday party. Mr. Terrell was also an accomplished photographer who photographed hundreds of musicians in performance.

Back in Washington, one of his final projects was to write liner notes and record video interviews for a six-CD box set of Miles Davis's ''On the Corner'' recordings of the early 1970s.

Mr. Terrell was much more than a talented writer and musicologist with a gift for discovering artists and musical developments. He was a radiant, joyful presence, whose enthusiasm and appreciation for life, music, and a good joke will continue to inspire those who were fortunate enough to know him. Above all, his life represented the ideal that music could be a beneficial force in the world, uniting people across racial, social and geographical boundaries. This was his magic.

As his sister Bevadine Z. Terrell says, ''He loved bringing new music to people. He loved bringing people together, not just African Americans, but white people, Asian people, African people.''

Mr. Terrell set a great example of community for artists to follow. ''How can I help you?'' was a question Tom was always asking. May his memory serve as a reminder to all of us to keep asking that question.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Ms. ROYBAL-ALLARD. Madam Speaker, I was unavoidably detained and was not present for rollcall Nos. 19 and 20 on Tuesday, January 22. Had I been present, I would have voted ''yea'' on rollcall No. 19 to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 4211 to designate the facility of the United States Postal Service located at 725 Roanoke Avenue in Roanoke Rapids, NC, as the ''Judge Richard B. Allsbrook Post Office'' and ''yea'' on rollcall No. 20 to suspend the rules and pass H. Res. 866 honoring the brave men and women of the United States Coast Guard whose tireless work, dedication, and commitment to protecting the United States have led to the Coast Guard seizing over 350,000 pounds of cocaine at sea during 2007, far surpassing all of our previous records.

HONORING JEANNIE HASTINGS

HON. MARSHA BLACKBURN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mrs. BLACKBURN. Madam Speaker, this weekend, the Family and Children's Services of Nashville, Davidson County, TN will honor the dedication and service of a trusted and treasured volunteer, the late Jeannie Hastings.

Jeannie loved the organization and served it well, providing both guidance and leadership as it worked to fulfill its mission to provide needed services to Nashville families. Jeannie Hastings loved people and loved doing good for her community. It was apparent in how she chose to spend her time and energy—working for a better quality of life for everyone.

Mrs. Hastings graduated from Milan High School and with honors from the University of Tennessee, Knoxville. With her husband Jim, she raised three sons and co-founded Hastings Architecture Associates, LLC. As a community leader, she served as president of the University of Tennessee National Alumni Association, chairman of the Nashville Symphony Board and was a member of the Volunteer Council Board of Directors for the American Symphony Orchestra League and the Nashville Chamber of Commerce Board.

She also chaired the Nashville Downtown Partnership Board, the Women's Fund of the Community Foundation Advisory Board, the TSU Foundation Board, the Nashville Symphony Guild, the Arthritis Foundation Nashville branch and the Heart Gala Board of Directors.

She also found time to serve on the Family and Children's Services Board, the Nashville Sports Council Board and the University of Tennessee Alumni Board of Governors. She was also a member of the Downtown Exchange Club and Leadership Nashville.

Madam Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in reflecting on the remarkable example of balancing family, business and community service that Jeannie set. I am so pleased to count myself among the many Tennesseans who are better for having known her.

INTRODUCTION OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 2008

HON. JOHN LEWIS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Madam Speaker, today I rise to introduce the Civil Rights Act of 2008. This legislation will keep the promise of equality that this Congress has made in passing our civil rights laws and ensure that discriminators are held accountable for their actions. Over the years, Congress has addressed some of our most pressing civil rights concerns by passing bipartisan legislation, legislation that protects American workers from discrimination on the basis of color, race, religion, age, disability, and sex. Our civil rights laws have strengthened our country, providing opportunity to those who had been denied opportunity and affording the Nation the benefit of abilities that would have otherwise been wasted. They have brought us closer to the beloved community where all people are able to succeed based on their abilities.

Unfortunately, over the years, the Supreme Court has weakened some of these basic protections in ways that Congress never intended. They have undermined the protections for workers, for older Americans, for the disabled, for racial and ethnic minorities, for women, and for those in the military. So today, I join Senator EDWARD KENNEDY in introducing the Civil Rights Act of 2008 to restore workers' rights and strengthens and reaffirms our commitment to the promise of equal opportunity. The bill corrects the misinterpretations of our civil rights laws that have left too many American workers without a remedy when they have suffered discrimination.

The relationship between workers and civil rights in America runs wide and deep. It was the laborers—the sharecroppers, the sanitation workers, the teachers, the students, the construction workers, and the street sweepers—who tore down the walls of racial segregation in the South. It is these ordinary men and women with extraordinary vision who have sacrificed their lives in confrontations throughout American history to help build this democracy. We cannot stand by and let their hard-earned victories be erased.

This bill better protects workers from discrimination in agencies that receive Federal money, defends students against harassment, fortifies civil rights for State employees, and prevents employers from forcing workers to give up their right to a day in court. It also ensures remedies for undocumented workers who are victims of unfair labor practices. It restores the individual right to challenge practices that have an unjustified discriminatory effect based on race, color, national origin, disability, age, or gender. It ensures that members of the Armed Forces who work for State governments are protected from discrimination.

If you work for a State government, you should have the same protections from discrimination as a person working in private industry—but the courts didn't see it that way. Students who are victims of sexual harassment shouldn't have to meet a higher standard of proof than their teachers—but the courts didn't see it that way. Members of the uniformed services should be able to get relief if they are discriminated against while they are on active military duty, whether they are employees of State governments or the private industry—but the courts didn't see it that way.

The struggle for civil rights is beyond one bill, one vote, or one judicial decision. It's beyond one Presidential term or act of Congress. Ours is the struggle of a lifetime, and each generation, each citizen, each president and each member of Congress must do his or her part. Together all of our efforts comprise the struggle of a nation to build the beloved community, a nation at peace with itself and its own ideals. This bill is just another step in that struggle to ensure the freedoms of all Americans to pursue their dreams.

FAMILY SECURITY AND SMALL BUSINESS STIMULUS ACT OF 2008

HON. JOE KNOLLENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Mr. KNOLLENBERG. Madam Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Family Security and Small Business Stimulus Act of 2008. It is impossible to ignore the economic indicators that suggest our economy is slowing down. In my own home State of Michigan, citizens have been faced with a sluggish economy for some time now. We can and should take steps to give the economy a shot in the arm. This is a problem facing all Americans, and it will take a strong, bipartisan effort to solve it.

One important way to address this problem is to reduce the tax burden on families and small businesses. My bill utilizes three ideas to accomplish these goals: A new, permanent 5 percent tax bracket; an instant advance on this tax cut for 2008; and increasing the limit of small business expensing.

The Family Security and Small Business Stimulus Act of 2008 will create a new, permanent 5 percent tax bracket, reducing taxes by either $400 for an individual or $800 for a family per year. This is critical as we try to enable families to keep more of their hard-earned money in their pockets, allowing them to use it for their ever-increasing expenses. Families would receive this tax cut in the form of an instant advance payment, to be delivered upon 30 days after enactment.

Additionally, my bill will increase the Section 179 small business expensing limit from $125,000 to $375,000 per year for 2 years. Increasing the amount a small business could expense encourages capital purchases. When a small business knows it can expense a new purchase, it is more likely to make the investment. Enabling small businesses to invest in new equipment and expand their operations will promote significant economic growth at a time when job creation is crucial.

We shouldn't stop here. We need to make the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts permanent, and pass other important pro-growth legislation. But this is something we can come together and accomplish quickly.

It is time for us to lift ourselves out of our current economic slowdown and restore our strength in the global economy. That is why I have introduced this legislation. I hope you will help America succeed by joining me on this important legislation.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

SENATE—Thursday, January 24, 2008

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m. and was called to order by the Honorable AMY KLOBUCHAR, a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Barry C. Black, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Merciful Father in Heaven, we pray today for the hurting people of our Nation and world. Use us to help the poor, the homeless, the hungry, and the jobless. Make us Your instruments to bring relief to those who live in daily fear of financial calamity.

We pray for the Members of the Senate who feel the hurt of the marginalized and are working for equitable and just legislation. Give them wisdom and courage as they bear the burdens of our society in domestic and international affairs.

We pray for those outwardly composed who suffer within and are not free to verbalize their pain. Comfort them with Your presence. Help us all to know You better that we may love You more. We pray in the Name of Him whose love is unconditional and whose care is unlimited. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. REID. Madam President, today, we are going to quickly resume consideration of S. 2248, the FISA legislation. Currently, the Judiciary Committee substitute amendment is pending. We hope to reach a time agreement with that amendment soon. I hope we can do it prior to the 12:30 event that we Democrats always have on Thursday. I hope we can do that. I hope there will be a number of rollcall votes today on FISA-related amendments, that we can complete action on this important legislation as quickly as possible.

FISA

Mr. REID. Madam President, as I indicated, we started this debate again last evening. Both the Senate Intelligence and Judiciary Committees have jurisdiction over this legislation. Senators ROCKEFELLER and BOND, Senators LEAHY and SPECTER worked very hard on their particular aspects of this legislation.

We, under the regular order, in a case of sequential referral—that is what we have in this matter—the Intelligence Committee text is the underlying bill, and the Judiciary Committee text is automatically pending as a complete substitute.

Last night, Chairman LEAHY, with the authorization of a majority of the committee, sent a slightly modified version of the Judiciary Committee amendment to the desk. We will have a vote on that amendment sometime today. The Judiciary Committee made what I believe to be some important improvements in this legislation, adding protections for the privacy of law-abiding Americans.

This is a strong bill. I will support it. I encourage my colleagues to do so as well.

In the event the full Judiciary Committee bill is not accepted by the Senate, I hope we can adopt some of the individual improvements from the Judiciary bill that is now in the form of an amendment.

Several of my colleagues, many of whom serve on the committees of jurisdiction; that is, both committees, plan to offer pieces of the Judiciary Committee bill as separate amendments.

In addition to considering the procedures included in title I of the bill, we will also debate the question of whether telephone companies that allegedly facilitated President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program should be granted retroactive immunity from civil lawsuits.

Senators DODD and FEINGOLD will seek to strike that immunity title. They will seek to strike it in its entirety. I personally oppose immunity and will support that amendment. But, of course, others disagree. If this amendment is not adopted, there will be other amendments to limit the immunity provisions in the Intelligence bill.

I hope there will not be extended time on these amendments. We can work through this. Friday is tomorrow. We have to finish this legislation, and we have to do it this week. It is an important piece of legislation. I have requested a 30-day extension. That is not going to be given. So everyone should understand, we have to go forward with this legislation.

Senators SPECTER and WHITEHOUSE have an amendment they plan to offer, as do Senators FEINSTEIN and NELSON of Florida.

As I have said before, if there are Senators who do not like these amendments and think they should be subjected to 60-vote thresholds, these Senators are going to have to engage in an old-fashioned filibuster. We are not going to automatically have these 60-vote margins. These amendments are by and large germane. They should be adopted if a majority of the Senate supports them.

Finally, yesterday, as I have indicated, I sent a letter to the President asking for a brief extension. I have heard from many sources that is not going to be granted.

The Senate will work as quickly as we can, but I think it is going to be very difficult for both Houses to negotiate and pass a final bill prior to the February 1 expiration date. But that is what we have to do, so we have no alternative.

Republicans have objected to my requests for a 30-day extension of the act, as I have mentioned. This matter is too important for us to be bogged down in procedural matters at this time.

I look forward to working with my colleagues on a bipartisan basis to provide our intelligence professionals with the tools they need to combat terrorism, while protecting the privacy of law-abiding American citizens.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized.

FISA

Mr. MCCONNELL. Madam President, we may only be a few days into the session, but it is not too early to note a change in tone from last January. Talks are moving forward on an economic growth package between the Secretary of the Treasury, the House Republican leader, and the Speaker, and there is good reason to expect an important national security achievement on FISA at the latest by next week.

I had hoped we would move to FISA first, since nothing could be more urgent than protecting this vital national security tool before its expiration on February 1. Our first duty is to protect Americans from harm, and we know for a fact this law has helped us—helped us—detect and disrupt terrorist plots. It would be grossly irresponsible for Congress to weaken it or to let it lapse. And the notion that some in Congress would even consider filibustering this vital antiterror tool is difficult to comprehend.

Fortunately, common sense seems to have prevailed. I was encouraged to see that my good friend, the majority leader, believes we can pass a FISA bill with sufficient time to get it signed before it expires. I am very pleased to see that the chairman of the Intelligence Committee believes the bipartisan version reported out of his committee last fall will be the one that will ultimately pass, hopefully, by February 1. This is good news not only because the Intelligence Committee's version is the best, but, most importantly, with some modification it is also the only one the President will sign.

We have put this off long enough. Let's work to pass this bill. I know the majority leader believes we should move forward on it as well. I certainly concur in his judgment on that matter.

TRIBUTE TO THE AMERICAN PRINTING HOUSE FOR THE BLIND

Mr. MCCONNELL. Madam President, I rise because yesterday marked the 150th anniversary of the American Printing House for the Blind. Located in my hometown of Louisville, KY, the American Printing House for the Blind is the national source of reading materials and learning aids for over 10 million blind and visually impaired Americans. Thanks to this Kentucky institution, they can now fully participate in the American dream.

Until the founding of APH, different schools for the blind across the country each prepared their own materials. But soon educators realized the need for a national printing house to fill this role. Louisville was chosen for its central location in the country and because it is situated on the Ohio River.

On January 23, 1858, the Kentucky General Assembly passed an act to charter the American Printing House. In 1879, the Federal Government designated APH the official source of learning materials for blind students across the Nation, and the facility has continued to receive Federal support since then. Thanks to that support, sales, and donations as well, APH has been able to create some remarkable products that have changed the lives of many blind and visually impaired Americans.

The facility published its first book, ''Fables and Tales for Children,'' in 1866, using the raised letters that were then the standard. In 1893, they published their first books in Braille. Today, they have helped the blind engage the 21st century with talking books, magazines, and even a recorded talking encyclopedia.

They have developed computers to help the blind access the Internet or read recorded books. They have even created a sonar aid for the blind to use that can detect how far away objects are by emitting tones that sound like chirping birds.

Before the American Printing House for the Blind existed to create all of these wonderful products, it was widely assumed that the blind and visually impaired just were not capable of learning as much as everyone else. Today, of course, we know that is completely untrue.

I want to share with my colleagues a letter APH received that illustrates the point very well.

A young fourth-grade girl in Nebraska named Ruthie was so grateful for a computer software program called Math Flash, developed at APH, that she wrote the facility to thank them. This is what she had to say:

> I used to hate math because everyone else was smarter than me. Math Flash makes it easy and fun because it has adding and subtracting games that help me remember. I can practice whatever I want with no help from my teacher or my mom. I could even be a math teacher maybe.

When you realize that most teachers or parents would be ecstatic to hear of such a passion for learning in any student, whether sighted or visually impaired, you begin to see the miracle the American Printing House for the Blind has made possible. They have opened up a world of knowledge and information to millions of Americans.

The city of Louisville and the Commonwealth of Kentucky are proud to be the home of the American Printing House for the Blind, which adds much to our community. The APH Museum attracts many visitors from around the globe every year to see important historical artifacts, such as Helen Keller's Bible in Braille.

I want to thank the Senate for its unanimous approval yesterday of a resolution I sponsored expressing this Nation's gratitude—gratitude—to the American Printing House for the Blind for its 150 years of service to this Nation. Their efforts have been essential to allowing the blind and visually impaired to be fully included in education.

CHIEF PETTY OFFICER GREGORY J. BILLITER

Mr. MCCONNELL. Madam President, I rise today to pay tribute to a 15-year veteran of the U.S. Navy who was lost in service to his country. That man is CPO Gregory J. Billiter of Villa Hills, KY. He was 36 years old.

Chief Billiter was serving near Kirkuk, Iraq, as part of a Navy Explosive Ordnance disposal unit charged with defusing the many improvised explosives and booby traps that terrorists have set in Iraq. He was the tactical commander of the third vehicle in a five-vehicle convoy patrolling the area. On April 6, 2007, his vehicle was struck by explosives, tragically taking Chief Billiter's life.

Assigned to Explosive Ordnance Disposal Unit 11, based out of Whidbey Island, WA, this was Chief Billiter's third tour of duty in Iraq. For bravery and valor while wearing the uniform, he received numerous medals and awards, including the Bronze Star Medal with Combat Distinguishing Device for Valor and the Purple Heart.

To recount Chief Billiter's life and career is to recount one achievement after another, because Greg was no stranger to success. ''The driving force in all those things was competition,'' says Barry Billiter, his father. ''He was very competitive.''

> Growing up, Greg led his friends in whiffleball games, racing Big Wheels, or swinging over the creek on a vine, Tarzan-style. He played basketball and soccer in high school, and whatever they played, Greg often declared himself the winner or demanded a rematch. He was a ''dyed-in-the-wool'' Cincinnati Bengals fan.

He was a good kid—the police only had to visit Greg's parents once. That was the time Greg, his brother Jeff, and some neighborhood friends sat on a rock in the woods and refused to budge for the bulldozers that had come to clear the way for a new shopping center.

''Greg was all of 6 years old at the time,'' the Billiter family writes in a letter about Greg sent to family and friends that they have generously shared with me. ''How was he ever able to get security clearance with that on his record?''

Greg attended St. Pius X and St. Joseph Elementary Schools. As a fourth-grader, one of his teachers told him he would never make it at Covington Latin School, a competitive private high school in northern Kentucky. If anything could motivate Greg, it was a challenge. He graduated from Covington Latin in 1987 at the age of 16.

Greg went to the University of Dayton and graduated with a bachelor's degree in marketing at age 19. After college, Greg worked for a while at the Levi Strauss Company but was unfulfilled. So one day he came home to his parents and announced he had joined the Navy, just like his father, Barry, a Navy veteran. Greg entered basic training in January 1992 in Orlando, FL, and graduated as the Honor Recruit.

He served aboard many ships, including the USS Durham, USS Duluth, USS Carl Vinson, USS Ronald Reagan, and USS Nimitz. In 1994, he qualified for and finished Navy Seal training. After a knee injury, he could no longer continue as a Seal but qualified as a surface warfare specialist. Chief Billiter kept busy. He also qualified as a Naval parachutist, a scuba and MK–16 mixed gas diving supervisor, a demolitions operations supervisor, and a helicopter rope suspension tactics specialist.

From 1997 to 2001, Greg served in Canton, OH, as a Naval recruiter. Then he transferred to specialize in explosive ordnance disposal and found that defusing explosives was the job he had been looking for.

''When he talked about it, his eyes would light up,'' says Greg's aunt, Paula Snow. ''He loved the science of it.'' Explosive ordnance disposal specialists are trained to deal with explosive threats on land or underwater, including anything chemical, biological, and even nuclear. Greg conducted numerous EOD missions throughout the world and trained the foreign special operation units of France, Uruguay, Chile, Peru, and Qatar.

During his third tour in Iraq, Greg's team contributed to the collection and destruction of over 2,500 ordnance items, totaling over 5,800 pounds of net explosives weight. When he was off duty, he organized sports games, such as an Ultimate Frisbee competition of the older sailors versus the younger ones. He competed in the Navy's Ironman competition.

In 1994, while serving on board a ship home-ported in San Diego, Greg met April, a middle-school science teacher in that city. She understood a sailor's life well, having grown up the daughter of a Navy chief corpsman.

Greg and April married in November 1996 at St. Joseph Church in Crescent Springs, KY. Together they had a son, Cooper John Billiter. Greg hoped little Cooper would grow up to play sports.

Greg will be forever loved and remembered by his family and loved ones who are in my prayers now as I relate Greg's story to the Senate. Those family members include his wife, April; his son, Cooper; his mother, Pat; his father, Barry; his brothers Jeff, Kevin, and David Billiter; his sisters Beth Billiter and Jill New; his aunts Paula Snow and Barbara Horton; and his grandmothers Virginia Billiter and Clara Bosch.

When Greg was a senior in high school, he attended a Senior Christian Awakening Retreat. For the first time, he told his parents: Thank you for being such a good Mom and Dad and thank you for all the sacrifices you have made for me.

This young man who learned the meaning of sacrifice at an early age grew up to become a beloved husband and father himself who made the ultimate sacrifice for his country. I want the Billiter family to know that America and the U.S. Senate will always remember that sacrifice, and we salute CPO Gregory J. Billiter and his service to our country.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the leadership time is reserved.

FISA AMENDMENTS ACT OF 2007

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 2248, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2248) to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, to modify and streamline the provisions of that Act, and for other purposes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Madam President, the Senate now returns to the consideration of S. 2248, the FISA Amendments Act.

As I said in December when we debated the motion to proceed to this bill, I believe this legislation is critical to our Nation's security. That phrase is thrown around a lot—''our Nation's security.'' It does have meaning. To protect America from the panoply of threats we face around the world, we must know what our enemies are planning and what they are doing. We get that information through our intelligence agencies, and one of the most useful sources for them is communications intelligence.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, gives the Government the authority, with court approval, to collect communications intelligence inside the United States. Unfortunately, the law has not kept pace with the incredible advances in telecommunications technology of the last 30 years.

As this debate proceeds over these coming days, it is important for all Members to understand why FISA exists and why it is necessary for us to update it. The Congress passed FISA to protect Americans inside the United States from inappropriate eavesdropping by the Government. The FISA statute created a system that allowed the Government to go to a special court and show probable cause that someone inside the United States was an agent of a foreign power. If it agreed, if the court agreed, the court then issued an order allowing the Government to collect the intelligence.

Over time, the flow of global communications changed. The nature of these communications changed. The system of fiber optic cables carrying international communications grew, and wireless technology began to dominate our domestic system. This was a marked change from the communications architecture that existed in 1978, when FISA was started, when local calls were transmitted over a wire and international ones usually went via satellite.

As technology changed and America became the hub for international communication, our intelligence agencies were presented with collection opportunities that were never envisioned—never even thought about in 1978. But because of the way that FISA was drafted, they were unable to take advantage of the new opportunities to collect significant intelligence inside the United States against targets located overseas.

After September 11, 2001, the President chose to deal with the problem unilaterally and created a warrantless surveillance program that relied on, to my mind, questionable legal justification. I think that was a mistake. I believe the President should have sought, and would have received from Congress, the necessary changes to FISA to accommodate the international communications he wished and needed to target.

The public disclosure of the warrantless program ultimately led the President to seek approval from the FISA Court and then to seek additional authority from the Congress, which is where we are.

Our first attempt to address this issue was the Protect America Act passed last August. That legislation allowed our intelligence community to undertake the collection needed to monitor terrorist communications, but the PAA, as we shall call it, is flawed legislation that does not achieve the balance between protecting security and preserving our civil liberties, which is so essential. It provided an expanse of new authority to collect intelligence inside the United States, with little court involvement or oversight from the Congress.

But we had the foresight to include in the PAA—the Protect America Act—a 6-month sunset. That 6-month period allowed us the time we needed to craft a bill that does achieve this important balance: Security and civil liberties. It gives the intelligence community the authority it needs to keep us safe, and it puts in place the safeguards needed to protect America's liberties. That is the bill the Senate is now considering; i.e., S. 2248.

This bill was reported to the Senate last October on a strong bipartisan vote under Senator BOND and myself, Vice Chairman BOND and myself, by a vote of 13 to 2. Vice Chairman BOND and I worked hard to craft a bill that would garnish support from both sides of the aisle and that would have the support of the administration, leaders of the intelligence community and, most importantly, would achieve our twin goals of protecting the security and privacy of Americans. I should say at this point we went to great lengths to check all our bases in this process. We didn't do this in a cocoon and we didn't do it in a partisan way. We reached out to the experts, whether they were inside the administration or outside the administration. We wanted to do it so we could make this legislation as effective as possible.

But, as with any legislation, this bill is not perfect. I have welcomed the input from others as we have moved forward. On this point, I must particularly acknowledge the work of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary and Intelligence Committees shared jurisdiction over FISA. The Judiciary Committee also happens to be led by two individuals with considerable knowledge and experience with these issues from the perspective of both committees. It may not be known to all, but Senator PAT LEAHY served as vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee in the mid-1980s, and Senator SPECTER served as chairman in the mid-1990s. I appreciate the time and thought they have put into this legislation.

The Judiciary Committee considered the Intelligence Committee bill on sequential referral and has reported a proposed amendment to our bill. That amendment is now the pending amendment. The Intelligence Committee bill and the Judiciary Committee amendment take a similar approach to addressing the underlying problems with FISA—not a huge difference. The Judiciary Committee included several provisions that I think further improve the already robust protections for privacy contained in S. 2248. We were enriched by working with them.

I intend to support amendments to incorporate many of these changes into the underlying bill, which is the Intelligence Committee bill, and even though I cannot support everything in the Judiciary Committee substitute amendment, nevertheless, there is very good material there.

Before I discuss possible amendments, let me take a few minutes to walk through the bill before us today. I apologize, but I think this is necessary as we begin this debate on what is a highly complicated and somewhat arcane subject.

In crafting this legislation, the Intelligence Committee set out to accomplish four main goals.

First, we wanted to ensure that activities authorized by this bill are only directed at persons outside the United States. The bill requires the FISA Court to approve targeting procedures designed to accurately make the determination of whether someone is outside the United States. For individuals inside the United States, the existing procedures under FISA continue to apply. Individual court orders, FISA orders, are still required.

Secondly, our bill improves the protection of information from or about a U.S. person. Unlike the Protect America Act, this bill provides for court review of the so-called minimization procedures. These are procedures used to shield information about Americans who may be overheard or mentioned in the conversation of foreign targets.

Court review of these procedures is central to the protection afforded under FISA. But the FISA Court's role was left out of the Protect America Act.

Third, the bill includes a new protection for U.S. citizens outside the United States. The Intelligence Committee rejects the proposition that Americans lose their privacy rights because they travel or work elsewhere in the world.

Under current law, the intelligence community can target U.S. citizens outside the U.S. solely on the authority of the Attorney General. Our bill requires an order of the FISA Court before an American can be targeted, regardless of the American's location. This is a concept that both committees endorsed, and it enjoys bipartisan support. Director of National Intelligence Mike McConnell also endorsed this in testimony before the Intelligence Committee. This is an area of law, however, that requires careful attention to avoid, as the Director described, ''unintended consequences.''

Both the Intelligence Committee and Judiciary Committee approaches need further refinement. Therefore, I believe we have reached an agreement on a bipartisan amendment that would reconcile the approaches of the two committees and resolve the concerns of the administration. Vice Chairman BOND and I will offer this modification as part of the managers' amendment.

Finally, the Intelligence Committee bill adds significant new oversight authority to collect inside the United States against foreign targets. The new oversight will be conducted by all three branches of Government.

The bill includes a series of annual reports to Congress on the authorized collection, including instances of noncompliance; inspector general reviews by the Justice Department and the Intelligence Committee; and FISA Court review and approval of acquisition and minimization procedures.

Beyond these steps to update FISA, the other major component of the bill passed by the Intelligence Committee—and, unfortunately, not included in the Judiciary Committee amendment—is liability relief for companies that may have helped the Government collect critical intelligence after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

I understand this is controversial. But everybody should know that this is an issue the Intelligence Committee has considered very carefully. We had a number of hearings on this subject. In reviewing the record of correspondence from the administration to these companies, I and most members of the committee became convinced that companies acted in good faith. They relied on the legal conclusion of the Nation's most senior law enforcement official, and they provided assistance because they wanted to help stop terrorist attacks.

The companies received letters, and I tried very hard to convince Steve Hadley—Director McConnell very much approved of this—to make it possible for every Member of the Senate to have those letters that the companies received from the National Security Agency, so Members could understand that this was not some kind of a game, that this wasn't ''wordsmithing.'' What these letters stated was that the companies' assistance was ''required,'' that the requested assistance was based on an order of the President, and that the Attorney General had certified the legality of the order. And then the NSA Director, as I say, required, compelled these companies—there were various uses of words, but they were all very firm, leaving no wiggle room—to comply. And they did. They did it because they were told to do so by the highest authorities in the land. They did so because—I believe it is possible to say this—there are a lot of big corporations that are very patriotic.

Private companies should be allowed to rely on this assertion from these high officials. They should be allowed to do that. Our longstanding legal structure is specifically designed not to force a private company to second guess the Government in these circumstances. I know many colleagues on the other side believe that the President acted with his constitutional authority when he established this program. I believe the legal foundation for this program was questionable at best and was part of an overarching legal framework that sought to dramatically alter the balance of power between the branches of power in favor of the executive. But that is a dispute that needs to be settled between the President, the Congress, and the courts. We should not allow private companies who simply wanted to come to the aid of their country, or were required or compelled to do so, to be caught in the crossfire of this disagreement.

A bipartisan consensus of the Intelligence Committee supported the narrowly drawn liability relief included in the bill. We did not include the open-ended immunity sought by the administration that would have prevented suits against the Government, or Government officials who knowingly broke the law.

The committee's liability relief provision applies only to companies who may have participated in the warrantless surveillance program after September 11, 2001, until January 2007, when the whole matter was placed under FISA Court authority. That is why there can be no question about prospective; it is retrospective.

The question of whether the President had the authority to launch the warrantless surveillance program leads me to the issue of exclusivity. This is whether FISA is the exclusive means by which the President may authorize the surveillance of Americans for foreign intelligence purposes.

The President's justification for creating the warrantless surveillance program relied in part on a claim that the legislation authorizing the use of military force after 9/11 somehow gave him the authority to ignore the FISA statute. I don't buy this argument.

The President also claims he has the authority, as Commander in Chief, to approve surveillance even when statutes of this coequal branch of Government would prohibit him specifically from so doing. No act of Congress by itself can finally resolve the debate between Presidential and congressional authority.

We can make it clear, however, which statutes authorize the use of electronic surveillance. This is not academic. It is important to clarify this point for the future. When the Nation next faces a military emergency, we don't want Congress to hesitate while it debates whether its authorization to use force will have unintended consequences, such as authorizing the President to spy on Americans.

To avoid this situation, both the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees included provisions intended to clarify which statutes constitute the exclusive means for conducting electronic surveillance. I have worked with Senator FEINSTEIN, who serves on both committees, and Senator LEAHY on an amendment that will bridge the differences between the two bills and will settle this issue in a way that I think clarifies the statute.

Another important provision is the sunset. This bill provides a significant new authority, and it is essential—because it is a significant new authority in what is still emerging in the collection of intelligence—that we carefully monitor the implementation of this authority and revisit it to ensure it is working as we now envision.

The Intelligence Committee bill includes a 6-year sunset. The Judiciary Committee has a 4-year sunset. I will join with Senator CARDIN and others in support of an amendment to incorporate the Judiciary Committee 4-year sunset into the underlying bill. Four years will ensure that the decision on permanency is made during the next Presidential term.

As we proceed with this debate, every Member should have the same two goals we had in the Intelligence Committee: providing our intelligence professionals with the tools they need to keep us safe, and establishing a system with sufficient safeguards to ensure that Americans' civil liberties are protected over the long term. I think the Intelligence Committee bill does that, and with a few changes it will be even stronger.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON from Nebraska). The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, again, we rise with a renewed consideration of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Amendments Act, or the FISA Amendments Act, of 2008.

I thank the chairman for his very powerful and thoughtful statement on behalf of the original bill presented by the Senate Intelligence Committee, with the managers' amendments that we will incorporate.

Simply put, this legislation gives the Intelligence Community the tools it needs right now, and over the next 6 years, to protect our country. The Protect America Act, passed by Congress in August of this past year, allowed the intelligence community to close critical intelligence gaps. I disagree that the Protect America Act was flawed. It was a temporary measure. It didn't deal with all of the subjects we needed to deal with, including protections for carriers alleged to participate. But it did not cut back on any of the basic protections in FISA, and it served to provide us the means in this 6-month period to collect vitally needed intelligence on foreign subjects who might be planning attacks either on our troops abroad or in the United States. But this vital legislation expires in 1 week, and we must not let those gaps reopen.

We initially began debate on the FISA Amendments Act in December of last year. As was their right, several Members of this body decided a filibuster was a better course for our national security. So we listened for hours to unfounded allegations about the terrorist surveillance program and to mischaracterizations about the Intelligence Committee's FISA bill. Ultimately, this bill was pulled from the floor and further debate was postponed until now.

Early this week, we returned to the Senate. Now, given that the Protect America Act expires in a few short days, one would have thought that FISA would be the first up on the agenda. I don't want to minimize the importance of Indian health legislation, or any other important legislation that the Senate should consider, but let's be clear: If the intelligence community cannot protect this country from terrorist attacks, then it doesn't matter much what else we debate or pass. We have to protect the country first and protect our troops and other personnel abroad in order to have a country, and we must improve upon other legislation. But here we are, only a few days shy of the PAA's expiration, and the drumbeat is there already by some stating we need more time to consider the Intelligence Committee bill; we should just do a short extension of the PAA. That is a bad idea. Some have called it flawed.

I believe it is important, but I believe the Intelligence Committee bill goes much further and does what we absolutely must do to make sure not only that we have the ability to collect on foreign terrorists who are planning attacks here or abroad but also to protect the constitutional rights, the privacy rights of Americans.

The Intelligence Committee spent over 9 months looking at FISA modernization. We have held hearings. We have gone out to NSA and watched its implementation. We have reviewed the terrorist surveillance program. We have looked at the implementation of the PAA. We have gone to review all the documents upon which the TSP—the terrorist surveillance program—was based, and we have come with a solid bipartisan bill. We are ready to act, and the intelligence community is waiting for us to act, and so are our allies abroad who have relied very heavily and continue to rely upon our collection ability to help keep their countries safe. Every day, we hear about attacks that have been disrupted by allies across the world. Without being specific in any areas, I think one can generally assume that our collections have helped our allies protect themselves against attacks in their countries.

There is no reason to extend the PAA, much as I liked it. We have a bill that is responsible, and it is more effective. It addresses concerns about the PAA. It gives our intelligence operators the tools they need, and it ensures that our private parties will continue to cooperate with the Government. I am pleased the majority leader and minority leader have come to agreement on this fact.

As the majority leader stated appropriately 2 days ago when he supported moving to this legislation immediately—and I thank the majority leader for that—we need to act now, and I hope we will be able to pass a solid FISA bill in short order. Some hope today. I join with that hope. I am not an incurable optimist, but we can always hope.

We have before us the Senate Intelligence Committee bill, S. 2248, which was passed out of the committee by a 13-to-2 vote. We need bipartisan legislation. This is bipartisan. Nothing is ever going to be unanimous in an area that is this technical and this important, but we passed it 13 to 2. This bipartisan bill will give the intelligence community the authority and flexibility it needs to track foreign terrorists quickly and efficiently.

In November, the Judiciary Committee reported a substitute on a straight party-line vote. The substitute added numerous provisions that were not fully vetted with the intelligence community. Regrettably, it ignores significant concerns expressed by working-level officials in the Department of Justice and the intelligence community—the very operators who know how this complex, technical, and overwhelmingly supervised and reviewed system works. The Judiciary Committee also ignored the concerns of its own minority members. As a result, this totally partisan substitute changed the Intelligence Committee bill in ways that will gut—gut—our intelligence surveillance capabilities. This substitute amendment is what we will be considering first this morning.

Last night, at the very last minute, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee filed a new substitute that modified the original Judiciary Committee substitute. Regrettably, the Judiciary Committee did not share this with my staff, and we only received the strikeout version, one that shows the changes between the substitute that has been at the desk for 2 months now and this last-minute switch. We received it from the ranking member's staff late last night.

After a quick review, my staff and I can tell my colleagues that the core problems remain, and although the DNI and the Department of Justice also have had little time to digest it, they have told us that their primary concerns remain. They cannot support this new substitute. It does not get the job done.

Conversely, the Intelligence Committee's bipartisan bill was drafted after months and months of studying the collection program. Members of our committee went out to the National Security Agency—we refer to it as NSA—to see how the program worked and to inspect the layers of protection built into their collection methodologies to make sure the agency stayed within the bounds of law.

Over several months, Chairman ROCKEFELLER and I put together an agreement with our committee on both sides which adds more protections to the constitutional rights and the privacy rights of American citizens. I can be very proud and I think the Members of this body can be very proud that we have extended and improved protections for American citizens.

We worked with the intelligence community representatives and the Department of Justice lawyers to make sure our legislation would work and would not impede vital collection—more protection but keep the system working. I think that is where we ought to be, and that is where we are in the underlying Intelligence Committee bill.

Most importantly, we fashioned a legislative solution that both Democrats and Republicans could accept. I thank our Intelligence Committee members and staffs for their efforts, long and hard work, to come up with this bipartisan bill. Our bill has been publicly available for scrutiny for over 3 months now, and it remains the most solid bipartisan way to move forward.

Two provisions of the bill, however, were added to the initial markup without the input of the intelligence community. As a result, both provisions in the bill could cause unintended operational consequences, and they needed to be fixed. Chairman ROCKEFELLER, Senator WHITEHOUSE, Senator WYDEN, and I worked together with the community to come up with solutions to these problems, and I hope we can have broad support for a managers' amendment to remedy that situation. One of these provisions provided important new protections, but it had to be reworked to protect Americans abroad in a manner which was consistent with our structure of laws and those of other countries.

The DNI has told us that with the managers' amendment fixing these two problems, the community will support our bill. That is important for Chairman ROCKEFELLER and me because we want to pass a bill that works and will become law. It would do no good to pass a bill that some may feel good about or may pass for good politics but does not work for those who protect us in all of our intelligence agencies. So the DNI's support of this bill, in particular, is critical. Consequently, with these fixes applied, we will also have a bill the President will sign into law.

My intention as a floor manager—and I believe Chairman ROCKEFELLER stands shoulder to shoulder with me in this—is to pass a bill that the DNI supports and that the President will sign. I believe we have that right now with the fixes to be applied.

If we attempt to change key painstakingly constructive provisions or to add bad provisions, however, we could hinder the intelligence community's ability to do its job and jeopardize the DNI's support for this bill and the chances of it becoming law. With the expiration of the PAA in a few days, I believe this is not the path we should take in the Senate. Anyone who has read FISA knows that it is very technical and each word matters. So it is imperative we do not add provisions without the input of the intelligence community, and we need to listen to their concerns. They are experts. They operate an incredibly technical and complicated system that is overlaid with legislation carefully drafted to recognize their capabilities, their limitations, and, most importantly, protections for U.S. persons and American citizens. We saw firsthand how difficult it is to deal with amendments that are not cleared with the intelligence community to make sure they work.

Let me just say that the Department of Justice and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence have been very helpful throughout the process, but we should not mistake their willingness to provide technical support to avoid operational problems with support for certain provisions. So while the DNI may have provided some technical support, there are several amendments that I believe, if added to our bill, could cause problems for the intelligence community, lose the support of the DNI and thus our ability to get this bill signed by the President.

First, I expect there to be some efforts to undo or modify the civil liberty provision in the Intelligence Committee's bill. Chairman ROCKEFELLER has already delivered a very strong and persuasive argument for this liability protection. It has been said once very well by the chairman, but this being the Senate, it needs to be said again, and I will be happy to do so.

This provision is essential to foreign targeting authorities. Without retroactive and prospective civil liability protection, it becomes much less likely that our private sector partners will be able or willing to assist us in the future. That means the intelligence community would have to spend great time compelling telecommunications providers in each instance who are reluctant for fears of civil lawsuits to assist, to work with us to track terrorists.

The committee studied this issue, and we reached a broad bipartisan consensus that civil liability protection is for providers and not immunity for Government officials. That was the appropriate action. I repeat, the civil liability provision in this bill is for private parties who may have assisted the Government. There is no immunity or protection for the Government itself.

Additionally, the concept of ''substitution,'' where the Government is substituted for the private party as a defendant in court, is not an acceptable alternative. That would allow litigation to continue, including discovery against the providers, thereby risking the disclosure of our sensitive intelligence sources and methods.

At his confirmation hearing, I asked General Hayden, the nominee for the head of the CIA, who had previously been the head of NSA, how badly the disclosures of our intelligence collection methods had hurt us in the battle to get the intelligence we need. General Hayden told us ruefully that we are now applying the Darwinian theory to terrorists: We are only capturing the dumb ones.

With substitution, we would not only be risking disclosure of sources and methods, we would also, however, embitter private parties against us whose cooperation becomes public, thus endangering their personnel, their facilities, and their business reputation here and abroad, with grave consequences to those who had participated, as Chairman ROCKEFELLER said, in compliance with a Government directive from the highest officials in the land, and we would put taxpayers' dollars at risk for trial lawyers' coffers. We would also incur great expense in defending those lawsuits. The orders were issued—and I will discuss more about this later—under the President's article II constitutional power and responsibility to conduct foreign affairs.

Let me say a few words about an idea that came up shortly before the debate in the summer. Some are suggesting that before civil liability protection is granted, the FISA Court, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court—and I will refer to it as the FISC—the FISC or other court must determine that those providers who allegedly assisted the Government with the terrorist surveillance program acted in good faith and pursuant to an objectively reasonable belief that the directives were lawful.

As reflected in the Intelligence Committee report accompanying S. 2248, the committee has already made this determination. We have studied this issue extensively, and we concluded that civil liability protection was the best and only solution. Why would Congress want to turn over its collective judgment to a single judge and pass a law stating that judge's ruling would be the final word on this issue? We don't even know what that ruling would be. This does not make much sense to me. We already went through this problem with the judicial variance on the FISC before, remember? The President's program was put under FISA, and then changes within the court, different judges, led to a problem with the intelligence gaps that spurred the need for short-term legislation last August. Congress should not roll the dice on this issue, close our eyes, cross our fingers and say: Whatever judge happens to be on call the day this issue comes up, well, that will be the final word on this question. Remember, the FISC's function is to approve applications for electronic surveillance. It is not set up for nor has established competence in this area. It makes no sense.

The providers need civil liability protection, and they deserve it now, not the prospect of further proving their good faith before yet another court. The longer this litigation drags on, the more likely it is that our intelligence sources and methods will be disclosed and the communications providers' businesses will suffer and they, their facilities, and their personnel will be at risk. It also becomes more likely and understandable that these companies, on which both the law enforcement and the Intelligence Committee rely for critical and timely information, could refuse to assist us in times of our need because of valid business reasons about the potential for further lawsuits. And I am not just talking about terrorist threats, I am talking about a provider refusing to give information voluntarily to help find a kidnapped child or help to find those who sexually entrap children on the Internet or proliferation or what have you. Should we be willing to take this risk? I don't think so.

Now, let me move to some of the issues the Judiciary Committee modified in our bill to the detriment of the overall product. Let me be clear, the new substitute that was filed last night is the same old wolf in different clothing. It does not alleviate any of these concerns. The Intelligence Committee bill included, as part of our compromise, a reiteration of the exclusive means provision in the current law, which states that FISA is the ''exclusive means'' in statute for conducting electronic surveillance. No statute that Congress ever passes can trump the President's article II powers. Numerous courts, and even the FISC itself, have reviewed this and stated the powers given to the President under the Constitution cannot be extinguished by a law passed by Congress. Even though we have passed a law on exclusive means, we have also passed a law called the Authorization for the Use of Military Force, which has to be read in conjunction with FISA.

Clearly, even those who believe a statute can somehow impinge on the article II constitutional powers of the President must recognize the powers of the President, if they were lessened by FISA, were reinvigorated by AUMF. Congress is making a statement in ''exclusive means'' that we want to see surveillance conducted under FISA. We have seen many attempts to broaden this language, but this is an area that calls for extreme caution. Exclusivity is more than a policy statement, it has a real operational component.

As we now know from our own experience in drafting this provision, the slightest word change can impede vital intelligence collection. I believe the Intelligence Committee's version addresses Members' views about exclusivity and further strengthens that statement, while at the same time preserving the ability to gather intelligence. Conversely, the majority's Judiciary Committee substitute now requires an act of Congress after the next attack, potentially before our intelligence professionals can do what they need to protect us. There is no exception if the attack comes from al-Qaida or another terrorist organization.

Now, it doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that as we stand here today, we have no idea where or when the next attack may come. Are we, each of us, willing to take the risk that Congress may not be able to act; that for whatever reason Members cannot make it back to Washington, DC, we cannot get a bill passed and signed by the President, which would leave our intelligence community without the authorities it needs to counter the threat or protect this country? I, for one, don't want to be explaining that back home to my constituents in Missouri. It is another nice sounding idea politically to some that makes no sense operationally and shuts down some potential intelligence collection.

Moreover, the Judiciary Committee's bill, and the latest substitute, would allow the FISC to assess compliance with the minimization procedures used for the acquisition of foreign intelligence information from individuals outside the United States. Minimization procedures are designed to protect U.S. identities if communications of U.S. persons are accidentally swept up in a surveillance operation or if a U.S. person is party to a conversation with a target—a lawful target—but that U.S. person is not of intelligence interest him or herself. We minimize, suppress, don't even record the name of that U.S. person. If there is no intelligence value, then that person is not at risk. To be at risk, that person would have to be receiving or instituting a call to a lawful target. That means that if somebody is calling a family member abroad, a business activity abroad, then there is no reason to fear that even those conversations would be picked up. But if others are picked up that are of no intelligence value, they would be minimized or suppressed.

Giving the court the ability, supposedly, or the responsibility to assess compliance may sound like a good idea in the abstract, but when we talk about foreign targeting, we are outside the FISC's expertise. The FISC was created solely to issue orders for domestic surveillance on a particular target. Congress, in 1978, recognized the court's expertise over domestic matters but specifically left foreign surveillance activities to the executive branch and the intelligence community and the oversight of the intelligence committees. By now requiring judicial review of minimization procedures for a foreign target, we would take a huge step back from a system that worked well for almost 30 years. So there is a red line, and I need to draw it.

But that line is already drawn. As a practical matter, when the FISC assesses compliance with minimization procedures, it would be second-guessing trained analysts' decisions about which foreign terrorist to track and how to do that. The FISC knows what to look for when it issues a warrant to tap someone's phone in Virginia, but when it comes to analyzing intelligence leads and deciding which foreign terrorists or spies should be surveilled, the court is simply not competent to make these judgments. This is what assessing compliance would have them do. The court knows this. Let me point to the court's own words from its published opinion on December 11, over a month ago, in the case In re: Motion for Release of Court Records. There the FISC judges say they are:

> Not expected or designed to become experts in foreign intelligence activities, and do not make substantive judgments on the propriety or need for a particular surveillance. Even if a typical FISA judge had more expertise in national security matters than a typical district court judge, that expertise would still not equal that of the Executive Branch, which is constitutionally entrusted with protecting the national security.

That is a quote from the court which some want to give this responsibility which they say they do not have. We need to heed the words of the FISC and not require them to make judgments they themselves believe are better left to the executive branch.

Let me repeat for my colleagues to hear clearly. The FISC, the FISA Court itself, is virtually saying: Congress, don't do this. We are not the right ones to make this determination. We should be wary to disregard their own assessment of their own competency in this vital intelligence collection area.

Additionally, throughout this debate, we must remember we are talking about foreign terrorists operating in foreign countries intent on harming us and our interests. Senator LEAHY's new substitute slightly modifies a requirement from the original substitute that the Department of Justice inspector general conduct a comprehensive review of the President's Terrorist Surveillance Program. That modification, however, does not address the underlying concerns with his provision. This review simply is not necessary and is beyond the expertise of the DOJ inspector general.

The Intelligence Committee has had numerous briefings and hearings on the TSP. We have spoken at length with lawyers from the Department of Justice and with the operators, and we have read document after document on which this program was based. We have spent more time on FISA than I ever dreamed possible or that I ever wanted to do. Yet I have not heard one convincing argument as to why this review must be conducted. Again, it may look good politically, it may make good sound bites, but we have reviewed this program to death over the past year. Yet another review is redundant, unnecessary, and because of that is wasteful.

Finally, as a part of my agreement with Chairman ROCKEFELLER, we included a 6-year sunset in the bill. Personally, I think sunsets are a bad idea when we are talking about national security. The Attorney General, General Mukasey, has stated repeatedly, ''There are no sunsets in our enemies' fatwas.'' I understand what he is getting at. The terrorists' desire to get after us is not limited. We should give our intelligence operators something they can hang their hat on when they retool their systems and move forward with intelligence collection.

If there is a debate about sunsets, I am considering saying we ought to get rid of even the 6-year sunset. I agreed to 6 years to get this bill moving, but shorter than that I don't believe is acceptable. If we provide stricter, shorter term sunsets, that would tell the private entities and our intelligence communities that Congress's view on civil liability protection is only temporary and the power for our intelligence collection is only temporary. This new statute gives our operators confidence in the new statute. It gives our collaborating allies abroad confidence we will be there.

Let me make one thing clear. Our job in the Senate Intelligence Committee, and the same on the House side, is to review intelligence collection methods. We review it on a semiannual or even monthly basis. If we find there is a problem with this bill, we should not have to wait until the sunset comes to change it. We see a problem, we need to fix it. We don't need to wait for 6 years or 4 years to fix it. If there is a problem, let's start fixing it as soon as we find it.

A sunset does not prevent us from passing new legislation when we see fit. No sunset at all would put even greater pressure on us to make sure it is working properly. If in 1 year the bill was shown to be inadequate, we should act immediately to fix it, not wait until the sunset. So I don't like sunsets, but the 6 years was a compromise with the chairman and other members of the committee to produce this bill.

The Judiciary Committee, in this new substitute, seeks to further shorten the time frame to 4 years. Our intelligence collectors, our troops on the battlefield, the private parties who depend on this authorization need certainty, not authorities that change depending on what year it is. A 4-year sunset would not give them the certainty they need.

In conclusion, our intelligence collectors, our troops who are in harm's way, need this legislation, and our country needs this legislation. But let me talk about the troops. In May, when I visited Iraq, I talked directly with the commander of our Joint Special Operations Command, who told me the limitations under the old law, shutting down of the collection that occurred because of the new technology, so adequately described by the chairman, prevented him from collecting key information he needed to protect our troops in the theater, on the battlefield. My son happened to be one who was there at the time. That got my attention. It had the attention of the troops and the commanders. The commander told us he could kill or capture top al-Qaida leaders, but he was not able to collect signals intelligence on them. Does that make sense? No.

The bottom line in this story of FISA is terrorists were able to use technology and our own outdated laws to stay a step ahead of us. We can't afford to give them that step. The Intelligence Committee's bill gives our intelligence operators and law enforcement officials the tools they need to conduct surveillance on foreign terrorists and foreign countries planning to conduct attacks inside the United States against our troops and against our allies. It is the balance we need to protect our civil liberties without handcuffing our intelligence professionals.

I hope we can do the right thing—pass this bill, with the perfecting managers' amendment but without any additional changes that will compromise its functionality and prevent it from becoming law. We need a bill both Democrats and Republicans support, the DNI supports, that is good for the intelligence community, and that the President will sign into law.

That means we need to dispense with the Judiciary substitute that is immediately before us and proceed with consideration of amendments to the bipartisan Intelligence Committee bill. I look forward to making this happen.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following my remarks, the Senator from Florida, Mr. NELSON, be recognized for his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I strongly support Senator LEAHY in his effort to replace the Senate Intelligence Committee bill with the version passed by the Judiciary Committee. I am a member of both of these committees. As a member of both committees, I have been deeply involved in the process of having looked at those two products.

Having been involved in helping shape them, I urge my colleagues to support the Judiciary Committee version of this legislation. Indeed, I had hoped very much that the Senate would take up that bill to begin with rather than the flawed Intelligence Committee bill.

In December, I along with 13 other Senators, urged the majority leader to make the Judiciary Committee bill the base bill on the Senate floor. Unfortunately, our request was denied. So it is very disappointing that we are now forced to fight an uphill battle of offering the Judiciary bill as an amendment.

I would like to lay out the reasons the Senate should support the Judiciary Committee bill rather than the Intelligence Committee bill. One obvious reason is the Judiciary Committee bill, unlike the Intelligence Committee bill, does not contain unjustified retroactive immunity for companies alleged to have participated in an illegal wiretapping program.

I do not want to spend a lot of time on this today because there will be an opportunity to debate this issue as the Senate's consideration of this legislation moves forward. But I will say that having spent the last year and a half studying what happened at the NSA from 2001 to 2006, I strongly oppose immunity.

Under current law, telecom companies already get immunity as long as they follow certain requirements that are clearly spelled out in the law. I see no reason for Congress to change the rules this late in the game.

Today, I would like to focus on the other significant parts of these bills, the part contained in title I of each bill that contains sweeping new changes to the FISA law for years to come. Let me start off by pointing out that there are a number of similarities between title I of the Intelligence Committee bill and title I of the Judiciary Committee bill. Their basic structure is the same.

Title I of both bills authorize the Government to conduct surveillance of individuals reasonably believed to be overseas without court approval for individualized warrants. Both bills authorize the Government to develop and implement procedures to govern that type of surveillance and provide the procedures to the FISA Court for review after they have gone into effect.

Now, let's be clear. These are extraordinary powers that both bills give to the executive branch. And there is no difference between these two bills in terms of the intelligence they permit the Government to acquire. No difference between the bills as regards to the effort to go after those who may be trying to do us harm in this respect. Rather, the differences between these two bills comes in the form of critically important checks and balances on those powers.

The Judiciary bill contains a number of important changes to improve court oversight of these broad new executive branch authorities and to protect the privacy of law-abiding Americans—the privacy of law-abiding Americans. The Intelligence Committee bill, on the other hand, leaves it up to the executive branch to police itself, an approach that has all too often proven to be a bad idea throughout American history. I would say particularly under this administration.

Let me state as clearly as I can the differences between these two bills have nothing—nothing—to do with our ability to combat terrorism. They have everything to do with ensuring that the executive branch follows the rule of law and does not unnecessarily listen in on the private communications of Americans who are doing absolutely nothing wrong.

This debate is about whether the court should have an independent oversight role and what protections should apply to the communications of Americans that somehow get swept up in these broad new surveillance powers. If you believe the courts should have a meaningful oversight role with regard to Government surveillance, then you should support the Judiciary bill.

If you believe that Congress should safeguard the communications of Americans at home that could be swept up in a broad new surveillance program that is supposed to be focused on foreigners overseas, then you should support the Judiciary bill. It is as simple as that.

That said, the Judiciary Committee bill is not perfect. More still needs to be done to protect the privacy of Americans. That is why it should be an easy decision to support the Judiciary Committee bill as our starting point on the floor of the Senate as we work on this legislation.

Let me also remind my colleagues that the process by which the Judiciary Committee considered, drafted, and amended and reported out its bill was an open one, allowing outside experts and the public at large the opportunity to review and comment. With regard to legislation so directly connected to the constitutional rights of Americans, the result of this open process should be accorded great weight, especially in light of the Judiciary Committee's unique role and expertise in protecting those rights.

I also point out that several of the administration's criticisms of the Judiciary Committee bill have been based on technical drafting concerns. But in the version that Chairman LEAHY has brought to the Senate floor, he has made the changes necessary to address those technical concerns. So I hope we do not hear any arguments in this floor debate about these issues that have already been addressed.

Exactly what are the differences between these two bills? First, the Judiciary bill gives the secret FISA Court more authority to operate as an independent check to the executive branch. For example, one provision in the Judiciary bill fixes an enormous problem with the Intelligence Committee bill; that is, the complete lack of incentives for the Government to target people overseas rather than to target people in the United States.

The Judiciary bill solves this problem by giving the FISA Court the discretion to limit the use of information concerning Americans when that information is obtained through procedures that the FISA Court ultimately finds are not—are not—reasonably designed to target persons overseas.

Another provision of the Judiciary bill ensures that the FISA Court has the authority to oversee compliance with what are called minimization procedures. Minimization procedures have been held up as the primary protection in the Intelligence Committee bill for the privacy of Americans whose communications get swept up in this new surveillance authority.

Now, I do not think current minimization procedures are strong enough to do the job. But to the extent that minimization can help protect Americans' privacy, its implementation surely needs to be overseen by the court. So that means giving the court the authority to review whether the Government is complying with the minimization rules and to ask for the information it needs to make that assessment.

Now, without this provision from the Judiciary bill, the Government's dissemination and use of information on innocent law-abiding Americans will occur without any checks and balances whatsoever, no checks and balances at all.

Once again, ''trust us'' will have to do. Now, I believe in this case, as in so many others, ''trust us'' is not enough. The Judiciary bill offers other types of oversight, as well. For one thing, it requires relevant inspectors general to conduct a complete review of the President's illegal wiretapping program, which, frankly, is long overdue.

It improves congressional access to FISA Court orders. The Intelligence Committee bill required the Congress to be provided with orders, decisions, and opinions of the FISA Court—that includes significant interpretations of the law—within 45 days after they are issued.

Now, that is good as far as it goes. But the Judiciary Committee bill adds that Congress should be provided with the pleadings, the pleadings filed with the court associated with the opinions that contain significant interpretations of law.

At times, the court's opinions merely reference and approve arguments made in the Government's pleadings. In that case, the pleadings may be critical to understanding the reasoning behind any particular decision. It is not enough just to have the cursory court opinion.

It also requires that significant interpretations of law not previously provided to Congress over the past 5 years be provided. Congress needs to have the full story of how the law has been interpreted in the past in order to make the right decisions on what changes in the law should be made in the future.

The Judiciary bill also does a better job of protecting Americans from widespread warrantless wiretapping. First, it provides real protection against what is called reverse targeting. It ensures that if the Government is wiretapping a foreigner overseas in order to collect the communications of the American with whom that foreign target is communicating, it gets a court order on the American. Specifically, the Judiciary Committee bill says the Government needs an individualized court order when a significant purpose of its surveillance is, in fact, listening to an American at home.

The Director of National Intelligence himself said reverse targeting violates the fourth amendment. All this provision that I am raising does is simply codify that principle. The administration continues to oppose this provision.

I have a simple question: Why? Why is it opposed to a provision that prohibits a practice that its own Director of National Intelligence says is unconstitutional?

The Judiciary Committee bill also prohibits something called bulk collection. Now, that is this sweeping up of all communications between the United States and overseas. The DNI said in public testimony that this type of massive bulk collection would be—would be—permitted by the Protect America Act that is currently in effect. But he has also said that what the Government is seeking to do with these authorities is something very different.

It is, he said:

> Surgical. A telephone number is surgical. So, if you know that number, you can select it out.

So if the DNI has said he does not need broader authorities, there should be no objection to this modest provision which, again, simply holds the DNI to his word.

The prohibition against bulk collection ensures that the Government has some—some—foreign intelligence interest in the communications that it is collecting and not just vacuuming up every last communication between Americans and their friends and business colleagues overseas.

Targets do not need to be known or named individuals; they can be phone numbers, which is how the DNI has described how the Government collects. And the Government does not have to identify or explain its interest in the targets to the FISA Court. It merely has to make a general certification that individual targets exist.

As was already alluded to on the Senate floor, the Judiciary Committee bill also has a sunset of 4 years rather than 6 years, ensuring that Congress will reevaluate this law at least once before the end of the next Presidential term. And, critically, it contains a strong statement that Congress intends for FISA to be the exclusive means by which foreign intelligence surveillance is conducted. It also closes purported statutory loopholes that the Justice Department relied on to make its torture arguments that the congressional authorization for the use of force in Afghanistan authorized the President's illegal wiretapping program. The Judiciary bill makes clear, once and for all, that the President must follow the law.

For all of these reasons, the Senate should support the Judiciary Committee's product. Let me repeat what I said at the outset. The differences between these two bills have nothing to do with our ability to combat terrorism. Nothing. They have everything to do with ensuring that the executive branch adheres to the rule of law and does not necessarily listen in on the private communications of Americans. The fact that the administration is so strongly resisting these commonsense protections really says a lot. It ought to give pause to those who are considering opposing it.

It is time for Congress to stop being an enabler when it comes to this administration's indifference to the rule of law and, instead, start being a protector of the rights and freedoms of our citizens.

I urge my colleagues to support the Judiciary Committee bill.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Florida.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. President, I, as the Senator from Wisconsin, my colleague, have had difficulty as we sit side by side in the Intelligence Committee with the issue of immunity.

First of all, I want to say that I think the intelligence community, headed by Admiral McConnell, is doing an excellent job. They are correcting colossal mistakes. We had a colossal mistake on intelligence on September 11. We had another colossal mistake of intelligence leading up to the Iraq war. And in order for us to protect ourselves, we, in fact, have to have information in order to disrupt the plans to attack us, to harm the Nation.

So I give credit to Admiral McConnell, the Director of National Intelligence. I give credit to General Hayden, the head of the CIA, to Steve Kappes, the Deputy Director of the CIA. I think they are doing a terrific job.

I compliment the chairman and the vice chairman of our committee, and they are within earshot, and I want them to hear how much this Senator appreciates their cooperation between each other to work in a bipartisan fashion. They are talking right now, so I am not sure they are hearing me. I want them to know my personal appreciation for how they have taken a bipartisan approach. It is important that we thank people for the work they are doing.

This legislation is an attempt to be crafted so that these folks can better perform their job but at the same time protecting the precious civil liberties Americans have that make us unique from any other society on planet Earth. We want to protect those rights of privacy. I believe there are protections in this bill that will extend to Americans, regardless of their physical location. One of the things we amended in the Intelligence Committee was that it doesn't make any difference, if an American is here in the United States or if they are abroad, if you are going after an American as a target, they ought to have to go to the FISA Court to get a court order called a warrant, regardless of where that American is, if they are a target of surveillance. That is important. It is important to support our constitutional protections of privacy and that the Government can't come and intrude in our lives. I think we have started off in the right direction.

As the Senator from Wisconsin has said, I have a problem with the blanket immunity as well. I agree with Admiral McConnell. At the end of the day, we have to have the cooperation of the 10 communications companies, and they should not have the threat of a spurious lawsuit hanging over their heads, thinking they are going to be dragged out in public court over time as a means of trying to extract a pound of flesh from them. There should be every opportunity and encouragement for the telecommunications companies to cooperate with the U.S. Government intelligence community for the protection of the country. The bill before us does, in fact, give that immunity for any of the surveillance that did not have a warrant from the FISA Court from the period of September 11, 2001, to January 17, 2007.

The problem I have with that is, I am not sure the telecommunications companies were attending to their knitting, as to whether they were getting legal orders from the United States Government, not in the first year after September 11, not in the second year, perhaps not even in the third year after the attack on New York City and the Pentagon and the attempt on other facilities in Washington. I am talking about this went on for a fourth year and a fifth year. I am not sure that, in fact, they had the legal basis to say that the Government, in fact, was complying with the law. Of course, I make that judgment, and my judgment is based on something I can't say here on the Senate floor, because it is not only highly classified; it is highly compartmented. I have read the documents. I have a problem with that.

At the end of the day, if it means we have to pass the bill and it has immunity in it, I am going to vote for the bill, because it is much more important that we go ahead and have a procedure set out by which we can try to protect ourselves from the bad guys and at the same time protect the civil rights, the right of privacy of our citizens. That is contained within the committee bill, and that is the way I voted in committee. I voted against the immunity, but that amendment only got three votes. When it came to passage of the final bill, I voted for it, because that is in the interest of the country. If that is what I am confronted with here, that is the way I am going to vote and support the chairman and vice chairman of our committee.

Maybe it doesn't have to be as stark as Senator FEINGOLD has said, that it is either immunity or no immunity. Maybe what the issue ultimately ought to be is somewhere in between. That is the Feinstein-Nelson amendment that will be offered later in which it will put a review of the telecommunications carriers' actions squarely under the jurisdiction of the special Federal court set up to handle these top-secret matters called the FISA Court. The court would review all aspects of the telecommunications carriers' involvement and make a decision on immunity based on three criteria. No. 1, if the court decided that the telecommunications carrier did not provide the assistance as alleged, then, of course, the court would dismiss the lawsuit against the company. No. 2, if the assistance was provided, the court then would determine whether the documentation sent by the U.S. Government to the companies met the requirements of the law and was adequate. This law that would have to be met states that a telecommunications carrier needs a court order or a written certification from the Attorney General that no court order is required. It further has to state that all statutory requirements have been met. So then this FISA Court, in other words, would, in fact, judge that. If the conditions of the statute had been met, then the companies would be shielded from the lawsuit and the lawsuit would be dismissed.

Or the third criteria the court would look at: If the special Federal court, the FISA Court, found there was no certification given to the telecommunications company, then the court would examine whether the company acted in good faith and with an objectively reasonable belief that it was legal. If the court determined that, then the immunity would be provided.

That seems to be a way in which the companies would be protected, and at the same time we can get to this issue of this third year, fourth year, and fifth year that the United States Government is saying this is legal without a court order, when, in fact, it seems to me that the CEOs of those companies and the general counsels of those companies ought to have been jumping up and down saying: Wait a minute. We want additional information. The amendment to be offered by the Senator from California and me creates a series of three requirements that must be met in order for the telecommunications companies to receive immunity. It is going to preserve the rights of private citizens to make their case in front of a judge without jeopardizing these highly sensitive kinds of not only top-secret but compartmented material that need to be classified for the protection of the country.

Practically speaking, what is going to happen? We can't pass anything around here unless you get 60 votes. That is a huge threshold. As this comes before the Senate, I doubt the Feingold amendment is going to get 60 votes to cut off debate. I doubt the Feinstein amendment is going to get 60 votes. That brings us right back to the Intelligence Committee bill which is before us right now, in which case, on final passage, I am certainly going to vote for that. But there is another opportunity to address this specific issue. It is unlikely that the House of Representatives is going to pass this legislation with the immunity for the companies. Therefore, there will be a huge difference between the Senate bill and the House bill, as the clock continues to tick down toward the deadline in which agreement is going to have to be reached. It seems to me the Feinstein-Nelson approach is a reasonable compromise at that point.

I hope in time we are going to be able to pass this, that we will pass it before the deadline which, to my knowledge, is in a week or so, maybe a week and a half. The majority leader says he is going to keep us in all weekend in order to get this passed. If I were he, I would do the same. It is so critically important to our country that we pass this legislation.

So on we go. Let the legislative process work itself out. Hopefully we will get this thing passed.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN). The senior Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Texas to yield for a unanimous consent request and then she will be recognized after that.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Would the distinguished vice chairman be willing to yield for a parliamentary matter?

Mr. BOND. Please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time until 2 p.m. today be for debate prior to the vote in relation to the Judiciary Committee amendment, as modified, with no amendment in order to the amendment prior to the vote, with all time equally divided and controlled between Senators LEAHY and BOND or their designees, with the 30 minutes prior to the vote divided as provided above, with Senator LEAHY controlling the final 15 minutes and the vote will be at 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, since we have had two speakers on the majority side, I ask unanimous consent that Senator HUTCHISON and then Senator BROWNBACK be recognized on our side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Thank you, Mr. President.

First, Mr. President, let me say, while the distinguished chairman and ranking member of the Intelligence Committee are both on the floor, that I believe the Intelligence Committee has done a fine job on this very important legislation, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Amendments Act, that will modernize and allow our law enforcement officials to have the tools they need to protect our country.

The Intelligence Committee voted the bill out on a bipartisan basis. It was certainly debated and balanced within the committee. I think this Senate should support the Intelligence Committee and all the work they have done to prepare this very important legislation. So to Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND, I say thank you for doing a great job.

I do rise today to support this bill. It is essential that we do so to protect our country. I was proud to join my colleagues last August in passing the Protect America Act. It will expire in 8 days—in 8 days. The majority leader has said we are going to pass this legislation this week out of the Senate. That is a good thing. The House needs a week to look at it and determine if they will pass it. I hope they will pass the same legislation that is before us from the Intelligence Committee and send it to the President without amendment.

Our enemies are not going to expire in 8 days. Al-Qaida, we know, uses cell phones and wireless Internet networks and countless other technologies that were not in place when the original FISA passed 30 years ago. Thirty years ago, we did not have cell phones. Thirty years ago, you would go to a court and say: We want to tap the phone line of this number. Today, a cell phone can be thrown away before you can go to get a court order.

So in the act we passed last year, we determined that you could get a court order to intercept the communications between suspected terrorists and you can go to the person rather than to a phone number, which would be unusable by the time you could get a court order. So that is one way we have begun to upgrade the technology to match the threat. Because our enemy is very technologically capable. We must be able to meet that with law enforcement. Delays could mean the difference between life and death.

Unless we take action, this protection of our ability to intercept potential plots against our country will go out of existence. We cannot, in good conscience, let that happen.

Let's talk about the litigation aspects because that is going to be the first amendment we vote on. The first amendment we vote on is going to be out of the Judiciary Committee. There will be other amendments, I know, that have already been discussed on the floor regarding litigation against telecom companies.

After 9/11, the Federal Government requested that America's telecom companies share proprietary information to help prevent future terrorist attacks. After the existence of the national security program was illegally leaked 2 years ago, America's telecom companies began to get hit with dozens of class action lawsuits that could expose them to catastrophic liabilities.

Originally, the telecom companies had nothing to fear from those lawsuits because they had evidence that what they did was at the request of our law enforcement officials. But due to the sensitive nature of the Government's request of these companies, the law enforcement officials barred the telecom companies from the release of certain documents that they needed for their trials. So we have created a situation in which companies have cooperated with law enforcement to keep our country safe, and then, when the lawsuits arose, they were not allowed to defend themselves. Now, some of my colleagues say: Well, that is tough. They should have known better.

We are talking about the security of our country. The people who are in the business of telecommunications were asked to be patriotic Americans. And they said yes. So if we do not give them protection for these actions, as well as those going forward, we are going to put our businesses in an untenable situation. Either they can help law enforcement, be sued and hampered in their legal defense because they are not able to introduce certain types of evidence because of security reasons, or they can say no to law enforcement and put our country in jeopardy.

Now, I will tell you that I have talked to the CEO of one of our major telecommunications companies. He has said: Senator, I am going to do what is right for America. That is my first responsibility as a citizen of this country. But, Senator, I don't think I should be put in jeopardy for my shareholders and my consumers while being a patriotic American.

The Senate must act responsibly. We must be able to go to a company and say: help our country. Because in the past a terrorist could communicate between two countries overseas, and we would have the right to intercept those messages. I wish I could say we have no enemies inside our country who would communicate with a terrorist outside our country, but we all know that is not the case. We all know there are people in our country today plotting to kill innocent Americans. We know because plots have been uncovered. And we know because that is what happened on 9/11. There were people inside our country who were aiding and abetting, living in our country, and planning to kill innocent Americans.

So we must have the capability to give protection to a telecommunications company that would cooperate with our Federal law enforcement officials to intercept messages between al-Qaida in Pakistan or Afghanistan or anywhere in the world communicating with a terrorist sympathizer in our own country. It is our responsibility to do this for the safety and security of Americans.

We must pass this bill. We must pass it in the form that the Intelligence Committee did on a bipartisan basis. We must respect the work that has been done by those who have heard hours and hours and hours of testimony and seen classified information about the threats to our country. We must do our part, along with the President, with the Members of the House of Representatives, and with our law enforcement officials to ensure that no stone is left unturned to uncover a plot against innocent Americans.

If that is not the duty of the U.S. Senate, Mr. President, I ask you, what is? That is our responsibility. That is why we were elected: to protect our country. I hope this body, of which I am so proud to be a Member, will do the right thing and extend this act and give our law enforcement the tools they need to do the job we are asking them to do to protect America.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. BROWNBACK. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

I join my colleagues, particularly my colleague from Texas and my colleague from Missouri, in supporting this bill and in opposition to the Leahy amendment.

My colleague from Texas identified a number of the issues that are in the amendment. I serve on the Judiciary Committee. It is a great committee. Senator LEAHY does an excellent job leading the committee. But on this particular issue it is my belief, as a Judiciary Committee member, that we should recede to what the Intelligence Committee has put forward on a bipartisan basis and move forward with this bipartisan bill we have rather than going with, essentially, the substitute that the Judiciary Committee came up with, which was put forward on a partisan basis.

My colleague from Texas noted we have 9 days until this legislation expires. If we go with the Leahy substitute—as much as I respect Senator LEAHY—the President is going to veto this bill and we are going to be in a nonfunctional position for a period of time while we get things put back together. There is no reason to do that. We have a bipartisan bill.

The Intelligence Committee bill passed with only two dissenting votes. The Judiciary Committee substitute, in essence, that is being put forward—it has been modified and changed, but, in essence, it is what came forward from the Judiciary Committee—came out on a strictly partisan party-line basis.

Why wouldn't we go with the bipartisan bill that passed, I believe, 13 to 2 rather than go with the partisan bill that will be vetoed and then we will just be back here? We are not going to have the votes for a veto override. We would then go without this needed law provision so we can provide for the security of the country, as well as protect the civil liberties and rights of individuals within America.

I want to note in particular on this issue of telecommunications companies and the information they provide, I think we need to provide some level of immunity for companies to participate and work with the Federal Government on information that the Federal Government has legitimately requested.

In case people think, ''Well, OK, you are just giving a pass to the telecommunications companies,'' I want to read what the requirements are within the Intelligence Committee bill toward the telecommunications companies. The telecommunications carriers face a series of threats and lawsuits presently over their complying with what the Federal Government required. But the Senate Intelligence Committee immunity provisions do not just simply dismiss the cases outright. Instead, the bill sets forth a process for the Attorney General to submit a certification to the court that the telecom carriers either, one, did not provide the Government the alleged assistance in the first place, or, two, provided assistance pursuant to a valid request, directive, or order indicating that the activity was authorized by the President and determined to be lawful. The court would then separately review the Attorney General's certification for an abuse of discretion. This multilevel certification and review process will ensure an underlying assessment by the Government and the courts of the genesis of the carriers' role, if any.

The immunity provisions would not apply to the Government or Government officials. Cases against the Government regarding the alleged programs would continue. And the provisions would apply only to civil and not criminal cases.

All in all, I think the Intelligence Committee bill strikes the right balance between intelligence gathering and protections for civil liberties.

My point in bringing this out is that this is not some blanket waiver toward telecommunications companies. It goes through a multilevel court and administrative review procedure that has to pass through both in order for the telecommunications company to be able to get this immunity from liability exposure. It is not just the Attorney General; it is also the court that is involved with this as well.

I would hope my colleagues who have concerns about civil liberties would look at that and say: Well, this is going to be reviewed in both places. This should be sufficient to require them—the telecommunications companies—to participate in this program, and to give them the immunity from liability, if they do this according to the law as determined by both the Attorney General and as determined by the court.

That seems to me to be a good level and a good balance of our intelligence needs, which are significant, and our civil liberties guarantees and requirements, which are required—that we guarantee civil liberties for the individual and that I want to see protected. But at the same time I want to see our citizens protected as well. And we have to be able to have some access to information of these communications—with intelligence, with terrorist organizations, individuals—that may be taking place.

All in all, I think the Intelligence Committee has done an excellent job of striking that balance between providing for our security needs and guaranteeing civil liberties of the individual. It has provided a multilayered process for this immunity to be able to be granted by different entities within the Government. It has done so in a balanced fashion. It has done so in a bipartisan fashion. I don't know why, for the life of me, we would want to go with something on a partisan basis that is not going to get through the process, when we need the bill now and we have a good bill put forward by the Intelligence Committee.

So as a member of the Judiciary Committee, I would urge us to support the Intelligence Committee and not support the Leahy substitute. As much respect as I have for the chairman, I do not think that is the way for us to go in bringing this bill forward to closure for the good of the country.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The assistant majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I will support the Judiciary Committee substitute to the FISA Amendments Act.

As a member of the committee, I wish to commend Chairman LEAHY for his leadership. I think we have struck the right balance to give the Government the power they need to keep us safe but to protect our privacy, which we cherish so much as Americans.

I wish to commend the majority leader, HARRY REID, for bringing the FISA Amendments Act to the floor as one of our first items of business this year. I wish to thank my colleague and friend from the Senate Intelligence Committee, Senator ROCKEFELLER. Though we may disagree on some aspects of this bill, he has been a real leader on an issue of great complexity.

Last August, Congress responded to the administration's request to approve foreign surveillance legislation on an expedited basis. Remember, we didn't come to this issue because the administration felt they needed to deal us into the picture. We came to this issue because the New York Times finally published an article and told us about this warrantless surveillance that was going on all across America for years, surveillance that was not approved by Congress and was clearly not allowed by law but continued by this administration with impunity until they were caught with their hands in the cookie jar by the New York Times. Then they came to Congress and said: Well, why don't you write a law. Can we help you write a law?

After 9/11, I can remember Senator ROCKEFELLER, Senator LEAHY, Senator SPECTER, and so many others who rose to the occasion and said: We will come together on a bipartisan basis to keep our country safe. We lost 3,000 innocent people. We don't want that to ever happen again. We passed the PATRIOT Act. It wasn't perfect, but it was bipartisan. It had a sunset built into it. We tried to give this Government the tools to keep America safe. There wasn't a lot of grandstanding and speechifying. We did our job.

Then what happened? The Bush administration decided, in so many different aspects of this war on terrorism, to deal Congress and the American people out of the picture from that point forward. We heard rumors about secret programs, and a handful of Members were briefed, I guess; I wasn't one of them. Then, it wasn't until the New York Times told the whole story that we were kind of drawn into this situation, where we are trying to write a law to approve a course of conduct which the administration was undertaking, at least to some degree, without even consulting or conferring with Congress in its constitutional capacity.

The Senate Intelligence Committee and the Senate Judiciary Committee have held a lot of hearings. They have debated how to write this law and voted on a lot of amendments. We are now facing the reality that the Protect America Act, which was passed a short time ago, will expire next Friday, February 1.

Under any circumstances, it would be difficult for the Senate to pass a bill of this complexity, reconcile our differences with the House, and get it all wrapped up in a week. But the President has made it clear he is not going to sign this bill unless it includes an amnesty for telephone companies that cooperated with the administration's warrantless surveillance program. This is a difficult, controversial issue many Members feel very strongly about. I am one of them. The President insists that an amnesty provision for telephone companies be included, and I think that is going to make it impossible for us to meet the February 1 deadline.

Senator REID, the majority leader, has asked for a 30-day extension of the Protect America Act. Let's continue the current law for 30 days. Let's try to work out our differences. Let's do this in a responsible way. Senator MCCONNELL on the Republican side objected—objected to carrying on the current law for 30 days while we tried to work out our differences. That objection speaks volumes. Even though he opposed the Protect America Act, the majority leader I think was acting in good faith and taking the sensible course of action: Let's try to work these things out and not punish anybody in the process. The current law would stay in effect for another 30 days. The Republican Senate leadership, MITCH MCCONNELL, said no.

Well, that is unfortunate. The spokesperson for the White House said on Tuesday:

> The Protect America Act expires in just 10 days, yet after nearly 6 months of delay, Congress still has not taken the necessary action to keep our Nation safe. For the sake of our national security, Congress must act now.

So said the White House 2 days ago.

I can't follow this logic. On the one hand, the White House claims we face grave national security threats if this program expires, and on the other hand, when Senator REID tries to extend the program for 30 days, the Republican leadership objects. I am sorry, but that doesn't follow.

It is worth recalling what brought us to this point. It is difficult to believe it has been over 6 years since the terrorists struck our country on 9/11. I will never forget that terrible day, and most Americans will not either. And we will never forget what happened afterwards when Congress came together and tried to respond and make our country safe. Sadly, today Osama bin Laden is still on the loose, and al-Qaida is still around and may be growing in size.

I wish the administration had continued the spirit of bipartisanship of the PATRIOT Act. They would have had the full support of Congress and the American people. We showed that with the passage of the PATRIOT Act. But even as we were debating that important law, the administration was secretly implementing torture and surveillance policies totally inconsistent with the values of our Nation. They didn't ask Congress to approve the warrantless wiretapping of innocent Americans or torture techniques such as waterboarding. Instead, they based their policies on the extreme view of some in the administration that the President, as Commander in Chief, was not bound by the law.

They discarded the Geneva Conventions after decades of America saying that was a significant underpinning of our relationship with the civilized world. They rejected it. They called it obsolete, the Geneva Conventions. They opened Guantanamo, which has become an international embarrassment. Former Secretary of State Colin Powell has joined so many others in saying: Close this embarrassment. Yet they continue.

The Justice Department's infamous torture memo narrowly redefined torture as limited only to pain equivalent to organ failure or death. Senator JOHN MCCAIN, a man who was a prisoner of war during Vietnam for years and years, spoke out and led a bipartisan fight to establish standards when it comes to the treatment of prisoners. I was happy to join him on a bill that had more than 90 votes, a strong bipartisan sentiment, a bill which sadly was watered down by a signing statement from this President, and I am afraid—though we may never know—I am afraid it has been ignored at many levels by this administration.

We still fight the Taliban and al-Qaida in Afghanistan, and while we are doing it, the administration has launched a misleading propaganda campaign leading perhaps to the greatest foreign policy blunder in American history: the war in Iraq.

It is worth noting that in a new report issued this week, the Center for Public Integrity concluded:

> President George W. Bush and seven of his administration's top officials, including Vice President CHENEY, National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice, and Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, made at least 935 false statements in the two years following September 11, 2001, about the national security threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq. An exhaustive examination of the record shows that the statements were part of an orchestrated campaign that effectively galvanized public opinion and in the process led the Nation to war under decidedly false pretenses.

Is there any more grievous sin in a democracy than for leaders at the highest level to mislead the people of a Democratic Nation into a war with such tragic consequences? Almost 4,000 of our best and bravest—innocent, hard-working, dedicated, and patriotic soldiers—have given their lives. Countless thousands have been injured because we were misled into a war by this administration.

The administration brooked no dissent from their misleading campaign for war or their misguided counterterrorism policies. If anyone raised an objection, they were branded as soft on terrorism. Who can forget John Ashcroft, our former Attorney General, blaming critics of the administration for spreading ''phantoms of lost liberty'' and warning ''your tactics only aid terrorists''?

Time and again, the administration and their allies pressured Congress to consider controversial proposals immediately before elections. Oh, that is when all the warning bells went off and the threat level colors were changed. We were told there was a threat on the way, and how were we to come to any other conclusion if we didn't see the evidence? What a coincidence that most of those warnings came right before an election. It was Karl Rove's playbook and the administration ran that play over and over and over again.

In 2002, the administration insisted Congress must vote to authorize the war in Iraq before the election or our security would be at risk. Why? White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card explained that ''from a marketing point of view'' that was the right time to ''introduce new products.''

In 2004, the administration and its Republican allies in Congress claimed it was imperative to reauthorize the PATRIOT Act before the election or our security would be at risk. This despite the fact it didn't expire until December 31, 2005. Congress chose this date for the express purpose of depoliticizing this debate.

For years, the administration insisted the President had unilateral authority to detain enemy combatants and try them in military commissions. Again and again our Supreme Court rejected the administration's arguments. Suddenly, shortly before the 2006 election, the administration changed course, insisting that Congress must vote to authorize military commissions or our security would be at risk. In fact, the administration's bill included amnesty for administration officials who had authorized illegal torture techniques. How will history judge us, granting amnesty to those who engaged in torture?

It is more than a year since Congress passed the Military Commissions Act. Despite their claims of urgency, the administration has failed to bring a single terrorist to trial.

In the 2006 election, the American people took a stand and rejected the politics and policies of fear and they rejected this administration's scare tactics. One would hope the administration would have learned a lesson. But in 2008, another election year has arrived and, unfortunately, here we go again with an administration continuing to stake out divisive positions on terrorism.

The administration claimed Attorney General Mukasey would turn a new page at the Department of Justice, but he has refused to say even now whether torture techniques known as waterboarding are illegal. During his confirmation hearing, Judge Mukasey promised to review the administration's classified interrogation techniques and assess their legality. It has been 2 months since then and yesterday I wrote to the Attorney General to remind him about that commitment. He has had ample time to study this issue.

Yesterday, the administration announced they were going to renominate Steven Bradbury to be head of the Office of Legal Counsel. This is the office that issues binding legal opinions for the executive branch, including having issued the infamous torture memo. I have repeatedly urged President Bush to withdraw this nomination of Mr. Bradbury because of his involvement in authorizing the administration's controversial interrogation and surveillance policies.

Now, the administration claims our security is at risk in this election year because Congress is allowing the Protect America Act to expire, even though Senator REID 2 days ago tried to extend it for a month, and the Republican leadership objected. Well, no surprise.

Yesterday, Vice President CHENEY weighed in. He gave a speech praising the administration's counterterrorism efforts. He ignored the lessons of the last 6 years. He praised Guantanamo Bay, even though his President has called for closing it, and he praised what he called the CIA's ''tougher interrogation program.'' Well, there is a phrase that is loaded. He claimed the CIA's interrogation techniques comply with our treaty obligations, although the military's top lawyers and others say they violate the Geneva Convention. He said Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of 9/11, had been subjected to the CIA's ''tougher'' techniques. But the Vice President neglected to mention that 6 years after 9/11, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and the other 9/11 planners still have not been put to trial. Some experts say it will be impossible to convict him because he was subjected to waterboarding and other torture techniques.

The Vice President urged Congress to pass FISA legislation. Quoting President Bush, he said:

> The lessons of September 11 have become dimmer and dimmer in some people's minds.

Mr. Vice President, the American people haven't forgotten 9/11, and we never will.

We also have not forgotten that Osama bin Laden is still free and the resources needed to track him down were diverted to a war in Iraq.

We have not forgotten that the war in Iraq has cost our Nation billions and, tragically, the lives of almost 4,000.

We have not forgotten that instead of working with Congress to prosecute the war on terrorism in a bipartisan fashion that respects American values, this administration chose to go it alone.

We will never, ever forget the blood, sweat, and tears shed by countless American heroes, who fight even as we speak to defend what makes America unique in the world. They fight not to defend any race, religion, or ethnic group; they fight to defend a value—the value upon which our country was founded. We are a nation of laws, not men—not this President, not any President.

In his speech yesterday, the Vice President noted:

> The terrorists waging war against this country don't fight according to the rules of warfare, or international law, or moral standards, or basic humanity.

That is true, but America is a lot better than the terrorists.

Ironically, the Vice President also noted:

> This cause is bigger than the quarrels of party and agendas of politicians.

Well, that is true as well. I only wish the Vice President and the administration would have heeded his own words and stopped politicizing so many national security issues.

I urge my colleagues to reject the politics of fear and reject the scare tactics of this administration. Support the Judiciary Committee substitute, support the majority leader's request for a 1-month extension in the Protect America Act. We can give the Government the power it needs to protect us, and we can still uphold the rule of law and protect the precious liberties of the American people.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I have sought recognition to comment about the pending legislation on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and the so-called Leahy substitute. We are engaged here in the continuation of a historic debate. Confronted by terrorism on 9/11, the response has been made to legislate on the PATRIOT Act and the Protect America Act, in order to deal effectively with the terrorists. At the same time, there is great concern that there be an appropriate balance. While it is indisputable that our first duty is to protect America, it is also equally fundamental that the constitutional protections have to be kept in mind at all times, and it requires a balance.

The beauty of the Constitution is the doctrine of separation of powers, so that no one branch has too much. This has been a classic confrontation of the executive asserting its authority under article II, and disregarding statutes, such as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, disregarding the statutory requirement that the Members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees be informed of activities like electronic surveillance, with the President asserting that authority under article II, saying that it supercedes a statute.

Congress has been ineffective on congressional oversight. The courts have filled the void, undertaking very significant action. A key part of what we are considering here today is whether there will be jurisdiction stricken on the pendency of many cases in the Federal courts challenging what the telephone companies have allegedly done or whether there will be continued access to the courts. It is my view, for reasons which I will amplify in the course of this floor statement, that there can be an accommodation to keep the courts open and to allow the electronic surveillance to continue. That can be accomplished by an amendment Senator WHITEHOUSE and I intend to offer later today or perhaps tomorrow—at the first opportunity we have—where the litigation against the telephone companies would proceed, but the U.S. Government would be substituted as the party defendant.

There is no doubt that the telephone companies have been good citizens in whatever it is they have done. Yet there is nothing on the record as to what really happened. Whatever it is they have done, the indicators are that they have been good citizens, although, in the course of having the Federal Government substituted for the telephone companies, there will have to be evidence of compliance with the governmental request, a compliance in good faith.

The likelihood of verdicts being rendered, I think, in my legal judgment, is very remote. But that doesn't eliminate the requirement and the practice of keeping the courts open to make that determination.

The Specter-Whitehouse substitution amendment will place the Government in the shoes of the telephone companies to have the same defenses—no more and no less. For example, the doctrine of governmental immunity would not be available to the Government. There have been those who have criticized the Specter-Whitehouse amendment, who have ignored the very basic proposition that the suits cannot be dismissed because of governmental immunity.

On the other hand, by the same token, the state secrets defense will be available. In the lawsuits that are being prosecuted now against the telephone companies, the government has intervened to assert the state secrets doctrine. In fact, the Government has precluded the telephone companies from saying very much under that doctrine. When the Government is substituted for the telephone companies, the Government will retain the defense of the state secrets doctrine.

Before going into the body of the argument in support of the Specter-Whitehouse substitute approach, I wish to comment briefly on the substitute offered by the Judiciary Committee and by our distinguished chairman, Senator LEAHY, as the pending business.

I begin by commending Senator LEAHY for his work on the committee. For many years, we have worked together. His work as chairman has been exemplary, and there have been improvements that have been made by the modified Leahy substitute. Improvements have been made in that it clarifies that when surveillance occurs overseas, the FISA Court's role is limited to assessing probable cause and not the means of collection. It has further been improved by extending the length of emergency surveillance to conform to the Intelligence Committee bill's 7 days instead of 3 days. It has been improved by eliminating certain language criticized by the administration—and I think justifiably—as being overly broad. But it does retain the basic concept that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is the exclusive statutory procedure. So you preempt the Government argument that the Authorization for the Use of Military Force preempts and supersedes FISA. That argument has been made by the administration. I think it is a vacuous argument. In any event, this legislation would restate the proposition that the AUMF, or legislation like that, would not supersede FISA.

The substitute offered by the distinguished chairman also has a change which allows the continuation of surveillance pending en banc review by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. It also improves a provision calling for an inspector general review of the terrorist surveillance program.

I think, in essence, the substitute provision Senator LEAHY has offered is an improvement over the prior bill. I regret that I cannot support it because it leaves out the provision with respect to immunity. While I do not like the provision with respect to immunity and think we can improve upon it, as I have said, by the approach of substituting the Federal Government for the telephone companies, I believe it is important to keep protecting the telephone companies in the picture and to benefit from the activities which they are undertaking. Therefore, I will not be able to support the substitute offered by Senator LEAHY.

It is my hope that the Specter-Whitehouse amendment will be adopted, substituting the Government. If that fails, then with reluctance I will support retroactive immunity. To repeat, I think that is not the preferable course.

In dealing with the fundamental proposition of keeping the courts open, we have had an extended history in the past 2 or 3 years of the ineffectiveness of dealing with the expanded executive authority with congressional oversight. The PATRIOT Act reauthorization came out of the Judiciary Committee in 2005. I chaired it and was managing the bill on the floor of the Senate back in mid-December of 2005. I was very surprised that morning to read in the New York Times that the Federal Government had been undertaking the terrorist surveillance program without notifying the Intelligence Committees, as required by the National Security Act of 1947, and without notifying the chairman or ranking member of the Judiciary Committee. That was more than a surprise; it was a shock.

We were nearing the end of the consideration of the PATRIOT Act reauthorization, and all of the indicators were that we would get it passed. Some appeared on the floor of the Senate that day to say that they had intended to support the PATRIOT Act reauthorization, but no longer, in light of the fact that there had been the terrorist surveillance program, unknown to Congress, in violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and in violation of the National Security Act of 1947.

Now, it may be that the President was correct in asserting that he had article II power under the Constitution. If the President did have power under article II as Commander in Chief, then such power could not be reduced by legislation. That is a basic constitutional principle. But the determination of that really doesn't reside with the President alone.

I then introduced legislation to bring the terrorist surveillance program under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. I will not take the time now to go through the lengthy efforts made in that regard. Suffice it to say that congressional oversight was not satisfactory. Where there has been a conflict between the Congress and the White House, the tools available to the White House have rendered the congressional oversight ineffective. When the Judiciary Committee has issued subpoenas, the subpoenas have been ignored by the White House, and the enforcement procedures are insufficient, really nugatory.

In the first place, if litigated, they take at least 2 years to have a judicial decision. The law requires the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia to bring the action. The U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia is part of the executive branch, and some in the Department of Justice have said forget about having the action brought. It is theoretically possible to have a contempt citation on the floor of the Senate, but it is a practical impossibility. So the efforts at enforcement of congressional oversight through the subpoena process has been to no avail.

On the other hand, the courts have been effective. When the issue has arisen as to the detention at Guantanamo, the Supreme Court of the United States said in Hamdan that the Geneva Conventions applied, and in Rasul that habeas corpus was in effect, notwithstanding the fact Guantanamo was outside the territorial limit of the United States because the U.S. Government controlled Guantanamo.

Where the Congress has responded with legislation, the issue is now before the Supreme Court of the United States again in the Boumediene case. The courts have been effective in asserting a balance, in asserting constitutional governance. A whole series of court cases have shown the effectiveness of the courts. For instance, in the Hepting case that is pending on the terrorist surveillance program, the district court rejected a blanket application of the state secrets doctrine. In the Padilla case, the Supreme Court's decision to take up the case led the government to file criminal charges. A New York case involving the national security letters, Doe v. Gonzalez, found that certain NSL gag orders were unconstitutional in light of the First Amendment.

The Hamdan case involved a detainee by the U.S. Government. There the Supreme Court held that the President does not have a blank check to deal with detainees and that Congress had a role to play.

In the Al-Haramain case, the Terrorist Surveillance Program was litigated by an Islamic charity that allegedly had a TSP derived transcript. The case Ninth Circuit decision upheld the government's assertion of the state secrets doctrine in that case.

I do not go into great length on these judicial decisions but to note that when the court issues a order and insists on witnesses being presented on pain of having the case dismissed or on pain of having adverse action taken against the party who doesn't follow the court order, the courts have been effective. That is why, on a constitutional balance, I think it is very important not to foreclose action by the courts, not to, in effect, strip the Federal courts of jurisdiction of the many pending cases which have been brought against the telephone companies, and it can be done in a practical way, preserving the importance of law enforcement activities for whatever it is the telephone companies are doing by substituting the Federal Government as the party defendant.

I am especially concerned about this issue in the context of what occurred back in June of 2006, when the Judiciary Committee, while I was chairing it, was trying to exercise congressional oversight, assert a constitutional balance with the executive branch, and we were unsuccessful for a variety of reasons. Where the Federal Government had the defense of executive privilege, it was impossible to move effectively on congressional oversight. But when it became known about the alleged activities of the telephone companies, I sought, as chairman, to have subpoenas issued. The Vice President then contacted Republican members of the Judiciary Committee, in effect, behind my back—the protocol is to call the chairman first; if not to call the chairman first, to call the chairman sometime—leading me to write a letter, dated June 7, 2006.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks this letter, dated June 7, 2006.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TESTER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I did not like sending the Vice President a lawyer's letter, three pages, single spaced. It starts off—and I will read a short paragraph:

> Dear Mr. Vice President, I am taking this unusual step in writing to you to establish a public record. It is neither pleasant nor easy to raise these issues with the administration of my own party, but I do so because of their importance.

And then I go into the issues of the expansion of executive authority in many directions, the refusal of the executive branch to accommodate legitimate congressional oversight, and complain about the Vice President's activities in contacting Republican members of the Judiciary Committee.

To have the record complete, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the Vice President's response to me, dated June 8, 2006.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, with that background, there is a particular sensitivity on my part to having retroactive immunity which I think would be an open invitation in the future for the executive branch to continue to ignore the statutes as the executive branch apparently ignored the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that sets the exclusive way of getting wiretapping, a statement of probable cause to a judge, to ignore the National Security Act of 1947 in failing to notify the Intelligence Committees of the House and Senate as mandated, positively required, under that statute, to ignore that under the assertion of article II power. But the judicial branch of Government is the ultimate arbiter. To move to close the courts is a very serious and unwise step, especially when the objective can be retained of the law enforcement tools and having the litigation continue, of having the U.S. Government as the party defendant. I don't believe there will be verdicts against the Government, but if there are, it is part of the cost of doing business, part of the cost of fighting terrorism, and it ought to be borne by the U.S. Government, as opposed to being borne by the telephone companies which presumably have been good citizens, something they have to establish under the Specter-Whitehouse amendment to have the Government step in as a substitute.

Where we stand at the present time is on the substitute offered by the distinguished chairman. Again, I compliment him for the work he is doing generally and specifically about our Judiciary Committee activities on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. I have noted a number of particulars where I think Senator LEAHY's revised substitute has made improvements. To repeat, I regret I cannot support it because it leaves out the immunity provision. Again, I do not like the immunity provision and think we can improve it with the Specter-Whitehouse amendment. But if I am unsuccessful on that, then I will have to, at least speaking for myself, swallow the retroactive immunity provision on a balance of my own judgment as to the importance of having that kind of electronic surveillance, whatever it is, go forward, even with the retroactive immunity.

It is my hope, when we consider the ramifications, that we can command the majority in this body, work through the legislation with the House of Representatives, and find a way to allow the Government to have the advantages of the electronic surveillance but not foreclose the courts by the remedy of having the Government substituted as the party defendant.

I yield the floor.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, June 7, 2006.

Hon. RICHARD B. CHENEY,
The Vice President,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I am taking this unusual step in writing to you to establish a public record. It is neither pleasant nor easy to raise these issues with the Administration of my own party, but I do so because of their importance.

No one has been more supportive of a strong national defense and tough action against terrorism than I. However, the Administration's continuing position on the NSA electronic surveillance program rejects the historical constitutional practice of judicial approval of warrants before wiretapping and denigrates the constitutional authority and responsibility of the Congress and specifically the Judiciary Committee to conduct oversight on constitutional issues.

On March 16, 2006, I introduced legislation to authorize the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to rule on the constitutionality of the Administration's electronic surveillance program. Expert witnesses, including four former judges of the FISA Court, supported the legislation as an effective way to preserve the secrecy of the program and protect civil rights. The FISA Court has an unblemished record for keeping secrets and it has the obvious expertise to rule on the issue. The FISA Court judges and other experts concluded that the legislation satisfied the case-in-controversy requirement and was not a prohibited advisory opinion. Notwithstanding my repeated efforts to get the Administration's position on this legislation, I have been unable to get any response, including a ''no''.

The Administration's obligation to provide sufficient information to the Judiciary Committee to allow the Committee to perform its constitutional oversight is not satisfied by the briefings to the Congressional Intelligence Committees. On that subject, it should be noted that this Administration, as well as previous Administrations, has failed to comply with the requirements of the National Security Act of 1947 to keep the House and Senate Intelligence Committees fully informed. That statute has been ignored for decades when Presidents have only informed the so-called ''Gang of Eight,'' the Leaders of both Houses and the Chairmen and Ranking Members on the Intelligence Committees. From my experience as a member of the ''Gang of Eight'' when I chaired the Intelligence Committee of the 104th Congress, even that group gets very little information. It was only in the face of pressure from the Senate Judiciary Committee that the Administration reluctantly informed subcommittees of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees and then agreed to inform the full Intelligence Committee members in order to get General Hayden confirmed.

When there were public disclosures about the telephone companies turning over millions of customer records involving allegedly billions of telephone calls, the Judiciary Committee scheduled a hearing of the chief executive officers of the four telephone companies involved. When some of the companies requested subpoenas so they would not be volunteers, we responded that we would honor that request. Later, the companies indicated that if the hearing were closed to the public, they would not need subpoenas.

I then sought Committee approval, which is necessary under our rules, to have a closed session to protect the confidentiality of any classified information and scheduled a Judiciary Committee Executive Session for 2:30 P.M. yesterday to get that approval.

I was advised yesterday that you had called Republican members of the Judiciary Committee lobbying them to oppose any Judiciary Committee hearing, even a closed one, with the telephone companies. I was further advised that you told those Republican members that the telephone companies had been instructed not to provide any information to the Committee as they were prohibited from disclosing classified information.

I was surprised, to say the least, that you sought to influence, really determine, the action of the Committee without calling me first, or at least calling me at some point. This was especially perplexing since we both attended the Republican Senators caucus lunch yesterday and I walked directly in front of you on at least two occasions enroute from the buffet to my table.

At the request of Republican Committee members, I scheduled a Republican members meeting at 2:00 P.M. yesterday in advance of the 2:30 P.M. full Committee meeting. At that time, I announced my plan to proceed with the hearing and to invite the chief executive officers of the telephone companies who would not be subject to the embarrassment of being subpoenaed because that was no longer needed. I emphasized my preference to have a closed hearing providing a majority of the Committee agreed.

Senator Hatch then urged me to defer action on the telephone companies hearing, saying that he would get Administration support for my bill which he had long supported. In the context of the doubt as to whether there were the votes necessary for a closed hearing or to proceed in any manner as to the telephone companies, I agreed to Senator Hatch's proposal for a brief delay on the telephone companies hearing to give him an opportunity to secure the Administration's approval of the bill which he thought could be done. When I announced this course of action at the full Committee Executive Session, there was a very contentious discussion which is available on the public record.

It has been my hope that there could be an accommodation between Congress's Article I authority on oversight and the President's constitutional authority under Article II. There is no doubt that the NSA program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act which sets forth the exclusive procedure for domestic wiretaps which requires the approval of the FISA Court. It may be that the President has inherent authority under Article II to trump that statute but the President does not have a blank check and the determination on whether the President has such Article II power calls for a balancing test which requires knowing what the surveillance program constitutes.

If an accommodation cannot be reached with the Administration, the Judiciary Committee will consider confronting the issue with subpoenas and enforcement of that compulsory process if it appears that a majority vote will be forthcoming. The Committee would obviously have a much easier time making our case for enforcement of subpoenas against the telephone companies which do not have the plea of executive privilege. That may ultimately be the course of least resistance.

We press this issue in the context of repeated stances by the Administration on expansion of Article II power, frequently at the expense of Congress's Article I authority. There are the Presidential signing statements where the President seeks to cherrypick which parts of the statute he will follow. There has been the refusal of the Department of Justice to provide the necessary clearances to permit its Office of Professional Responsibility to determine the propriety of the legal advice given by the Department of Justice on the electronic surveillance program. There is the recent Executive Branch search and seizure of Congressman Jefferson's office. There are recent and repeated assertions by the Department of Justice that it has the authority to criminally prosecute newspapers and reporters under highly questionable criminal statutes.

All of this is occurring in the context where the Administration is continuing warrantless wiretaps in violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and is preventing the Senate Judiciary Committee from carrying out its constitutional responsibility for Congressional oversight on constitutional issues. I am available to try to work this out with the Administration without the necessity of a constitutional confrontation between Congress and the President.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

EXHIBIT 2

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
Washington, DC, June 8, 2006.

Hon. ARLEN SPECTER,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your letter of June 7, 2006 concerning the Terrorist Surveillance Program (TSP) the Administration has described. The commitment in your letter to work with the Administration in a non-confrontational manner is most welcome and will, of course, be reciprocated.

As recently as Tuesday of this week, I reiterated that, as the Administration has said before, while there is no need for any legislation to carry out the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the Administration will listen to the ideas of legislators about terrorist surveillance legislation and work with them in good faith. Needless to say, that includes you, Senator DeWine and others who have ideas for such legislation. The President ultimately will have to make a decision whether any particular legislation would strengthen the ability of the Government to protect Americans against terrorists, while protecting the rights of Americans, but we believe the Congress and the Administration working together can produce legislation to achieve that objective, if that is the will of the Congress.

Having served in the executive branch as chief of staff for one President and as Secretary of Defense for another, having served in the legislative branch as a Representative from Wyoming for a decade, and serving now in a unique position under the Constitution with both executive functions and legislative functions, I fully understand and respect the separate constitutional roles of the Congress and the Presidency. Under our constitutional separation between the legislative powers granted to Congress and the executive power vested exclusively in the Presidency, differences of view may occur from time to time between the branches, but the Government generally functions best when the legislative branch and the executive branch work together. And I believe that both branches agree that they should work together as Congress decides whether and how to pursue further terrorist surveillance legislation.

Your letter addressed four basic subjects: (1) the legal basis for the TSP; (2) the Administration position on legislation prepared by you relating to the TSP; (3) provision of information to Congress about the TSP; and (4) communications with Senators on the Judiciary Committee about the TSP.

The executive branch has conducted the TSP, from its inception on October 4, 2001 to the present, with great care to operate within the law, with approval as to legality of Presidential authorizations every 45 days or so by senior Government attorneys. The Department of Justice has set forth in detail in writing the constitutional and statutory basis, and related judicial precedents, for warrantless electronic surveillance under the TSP to protect against terrorism, and that information has been made available to your Committe and to the public.

Your letter indicated that you have repeatedly requested an Administration position on legislation prepared by you relating to the TSP program. If you would like a formal Administration position on draft legislation, you may at any time submit it to the Attorney General, the Director of National Intelligence, or the Director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) for processing, which will produce a formal Administration position. Before you do so, however, it might be more productive for executive branch experts to meet with you, and perhaps Senator DeWine or other Senators as appropriate, to review the various bills that have been introduced and to share the Administration's thoughts on terrorist surveillance legislation. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel Steven G. Bradbury are key experts upon whom the executive branch would rely for this purpose. I will ask them to contact you promptly so that the cooperative effort can proceed apace.

Since the earliest days of the TSP, the executive branch has ensured that, consistent with the protection of the sensitive intelligence sources, methods and activities involved, appropriate members of Congress were briefed periodically on the program. The executive branch kept principally the chairman and ranking members of the congressional intelligence committees informed and later included the congressional leadership. Today, the full membership of both the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (including four Senators on that Committee who also serve on your Judiciary Committee) are fully briefed on the program. As a matter of inter-branch comity and good executive-legislative practice, and recognizing the vital importance of protecting U.S. intelligence sources, methods and activities, we believe that the country as a whole, and the Senate and the House respectively, are best served by concentrating the congressional handling of intelligence matters within the intelligence committees of the Congress. The internal organization of the two Houses is, of course, a matter for the respective Houses. Recognizing the wisdom of the concentration within the intelligence committees, the rules of the Senate (S. Res. 400 of the 94th Congress) and the House (Rule X, cl. 11) creating the intellgence committees mandated that the intelligence committees have cross-over members who also serve on the judiciary, foreign/international relations, armed services, and appropriations committees.

Both in performing the legislative functions of the Vice Presidency as President of the Senate and in performing executive functions in support of the President, I have frequent contact with Senators, both at their initiative and mine. We have found such contacts helpful in maintaining good relations between the executive and legislative branches and in advancing legislation that serves the interests of the American people. The respectful and candid exchange of views is something to be encouraged rather than avoided. Indeed, recognizing the importance of such communication, the first step the Administration took, when it learned that you might pursue use of compulsory process in an attempt to force testimony that may involve extremely sensitive classified information, was to have one of the Administration's most senior officials, the Chief of Staff to the President of the United States, contact you to discuss the matter. Thereafter, I spoke with a number of other Members of the Senate Leadership and the Judiciary Committee. These communications are not unusual—they are the Government at work.

While there may continue to be areas of disagreement from time to time, we should proceed in a practical way to build on the areas of agreement. I believe that other Senators and you, working with the executive branch, can find the way forward to enactment of legislation that would strengthen the ability of the Government to protect Americans against terrorists while continuing to protect the rights of Americans, if it is the judgment of Congress that such legislation should be enacted. We look forward to working with you, knowing of the good faith on all sides.

Sincerely,

DICK CHENEY.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Connecticut has the floor at this point, but I wonder if he will yield to me for about another minute.

Mr. DODD. Absolutely.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I appreciate the comments of the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania. I have enjoyed my work with him. Of course, we have been friends from the time we first met when we were both young prosecutors.

Mr. SPECTER. Younger prosecutors.

Mr. LEAHY. I note that my amendment on the Judiciary Committee bill does not preclude a debate on the question of immunity for the telecommunications carriers. It speaks to what the FISA Court can or should do with this new surveillance authority.

If my amendment is voted down, several parts of it will be debated again. Many parts of this amendment will be germane after cloture, and we will be debating those as separate amendments. On the immunity issue, there will be an amendment by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island on the issue of substitution. We will vote either up or down on that amendment. My amendment is about the oversight of the FISA Court and Congress.

I understand the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I hope he will look carefully at a number of the provisions in this bill. If he is unable to vote for the overall amendment, I hope he will support many of its provisions in separate amendments.

I have taken the time of the Senator from Connecticut who has worked with me and has been one of the leading voices on the important issue of oversight for electronic surveillance. We all want to be able to collect as much intelligence as we can against those who would act against the United States of America, but we have also lived long enough to see the danger when there are not enough checks on the government. We remember COINTELPRO and other circumstances where the government has used the great resources of this country not against enemies but against Americans. No voice in this body has been stronger on that issue than the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I thank both my colleague from Vermont, the chairman of the committee, and the Senator from Pennsylvania as well. I arrived in this body in January of 1981 with a very engaged Senator from Pennsylvania as a new Member that day in January of 1981. The Senator from Vermont had already been here for a term. They do a tremendous job, and their voices are worth listening to on matters affecting civil liberties and the rule of law.

I spoke at some length last evening and back in December on the issue of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act amendments and what I consider to be the most egregious provision in the Intelligence Committee bill: retroactive immunity for the telecommunications companies that may have helped this administration break the law. I have objected to that immunity on very specific grounds because it would cover an immense alleged violation of trust, privacy, and civil liberties.

But even more importantly, immunity is wrong because of what it represents: a fatal weakening of the rule of law that shuts out our independent judiciary and concentrates all the power in the hands of one branch—the executive branch.

We know there has been a pattern of behavior over the past 6 or 7 years. As I said last evening on this floor, had this been the first instance of an administration overreaching, candidly, I would have had some difficulty in objecting to the Intelligence Committee's proposal. If the alleged violation had been limited to a period of a few months, 6 months, a year even after 9/11, I might not have objected.

But all of us in this Chamber know there has been a 6 or 7 year pattern of this administration's abuses against the rule of law and civil liberties. And this alleged violation went on not for 6 months or a year but for 5 years—and it would still be ongoing today had it not been for a whistleblower in an article in a major publication, which revealed this program's ongoing activities to literally vacuum—and I am not exaggerating when I say ''vacuum''—every telephone conversation, fax, and e-mail of millions of people in this country. I would object to retroactive immunity not just in this administration but in any administration, Democratic or Republican, that sought immunity to this extent, that sought to concentrate such power in the hands of the executive branch.

The Founders of this great Republic strenuously argued for a process that concentrates power not in one branch but provides a balance of that power, a tension, if you will, between the judicial, the legislative, and the executive branches. To grant such power to one branch, as this bill seeks to do, is a dangerous step. And it would be no matter which administration requested it.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, as we have seen, was written precisely to resist that concentration. When we divide power responsibly, terrorist surveillance is not weakened; it is strengthened, Mr. President, made more judicious, more legitimate, and less subject to the abuse that saps public trust. I firmly believe any changes to this FISA bill must be in keeping with the original spirit of shared powers and the respect of the rule of law.

If we act wisely, as every previous Congress has for 30 years when amending the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, then I think we can ensure terrorist surveillance remains inside the law—not an exception to it. The Senate should pass a bill doing just that.

But the FISA Amendments Act, as it comes to us from the Intelligence Committee, is not that bill, Mr. President. Its safeguards against abuse, against the needless targeting of ordinary American citizens, are far too weak. The power it concentrates in the hands of the executive branch is far too expansive. However, the Senate also has before it a version of a bill that embodies a far greater respect for the rule of law, and that is the proposal before us at this hour, offered by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator PATRICK LEAHY of Vermont. Both versions of the bill—both versions—authorize the American President to conduct overseas surveillance without individual warrants.

Both of these bills allow the President of the United States to submit his procedures for this new kind of surveillance for the review of the FISA Court after those procedures are already in place. But only one version of the bill balances these significant new powers with real oversight from the Congress and the courts, and that is the Leahy amendment.

That is the balance we need to strike. That is what every Congress has done for three decades—for three decades—with over 35 different changes to this bill, since its adoption in the late 1970s, passing every Congress almost unanimously, with the approval of Democrats and Republicans alike, balancing the tension between our determination to keep us safe from those who would do us harm with our need to protect the rule of law and the rights of the American people. That is the tension, that is the balance that we have struck over the last 30 years.

After three decades of maintaining that long-held balance, we are about to deviate from it. The intelligence version of this legislation, I am afraid, is a bill of token oversight and very weak protections for innocent Americans. Specifically, the intelligence version of the bill fails on five specific counts.

First, its safeguards against the targeting of Americans—its minimization procedures—are insufficient. The Intelligence Committee bill significantly expands the President's surveillance power while leaving the checks on that power unchanged. The intelligence version provides practically no deterrent against excessive domestic spying and no consequences if the court finds that the President's—any President's—minimization procedures are lacking. If his targeting procedures are found lacking, the President hardly has to worry. They administration can keep and share all the information it has obtained, and it can continue its actions all the way through the judicial review process, which can take months, if not years.

It should be clear to all of us that real oversight includes the power of enforcement. The Intelligence Committee's bill offers us the semblance of judicial oversight—but not the real thing. Imagine, if you will, a judge convicting a bank robber and then letting him keep the loot he stole, as long as he promises to never, ever, ever do it again. That might as well be the Intelligence version of the bill.

In fact, the Intelligence version would allow the President to immediately target anyone on a whim. Wiretapping could start even before the court has approved it. In the Intelligence Committee bill, oversight is exactly where the President likes it—after the fact. Don't get me wrong, Mr. President, when a President—any President—needs immediate emergency authority to begin wiretapping, that President should have it. All of us, I think, agree with that. We find that obvious.

The question is what to do in those cases that aren't emergencies—because not every case is an emergency. In those cases, I believe there is no reason that the court shouldn't give advice and approval beforehand. President Bush disagrees. He believes in a permanent state of emergency.

Second, the Intelligence Committee bill fails to protect American citizens from reverse targeting—the practice of targeting a foreign person on false pretenses without a warrant in order to collect the information on an American on the other end of the conversation. Reverse targeting, according to Admiral McConnell, the Director of National Intelligence, says:

> It is not legal. It would be a breach of the fourth amendment.

That is according to the Director of National Intelligence. He is absolutely correct, of course, which is why it is so vital the FISA bill before us contain strong enforceable protections against reverse targeting. Unfortunately, the Intelligence Committee version doesn't have one.

Third, the intelligence version, by purporting to end warrantless wiretapping of Americans, might actually allow it to continue unabated. That is because the bill lacks strong exclusivity language—language stating that FISA is the only controlling law for foreign intelligence surveillance. With that provision in place, surveillance has a place inside the rule of law. Without it, there is no such guarantee, Mr. President.

Who knows what specious rationale this or any administration might cook up for lawless spying? The last time, as we have seen, Alberto Gonzalez—laughably, I might add, if it weren't so tragic—tried to find grounds for warrantless wiretapping in the authorization of force against Afghanistan. Those are the legal lengths to which this administration has proved willing and able to go to in order to achieve its goals.

As I mentioned last evening, Senator Daschle, the former majority leader, who was deeply involved in the negotiations of the authorization language to use force in Afghanistan, wrote an op-ed piece absolutely debunking the argument that any part of that negotiation included granting the administration the power to conduct warrantless wiretaps. He was offended by the suggestion that somehow we in this Congress, on a vote of 98 to nothing, gave the administration the power to conduct warrantless wiretappings. He was directly involved in those negotiations. It never, ever, ever came up. It is offensive that Alberto Gonzalez argued that Afghanistan justified warrantless wiretapping is offensive—but it is a good example, Mr. President, of what can happen if you don't have exclusivity.

FISA is the vehicle, and has been for 30 years, by which we allow for warrants to be granted to conduct surveillance when America is threatened. What is next without strong exclusivity language? The Intelligence Committee version of the bill would leave that question hanging over our heads.

Fourth, Mr. President, unlike the Leahy amendment, the Intelligence Committee version of the bill lacks strong protections against what is called ''bulk collection''—the warrantless collection of all overseas communications, a massive dragnet with the potential to sweep up thousands or even millions of Americans, without cause. Today, bulk collection is not feasible. But Admiral McConnell said:

> It would be authorized, if it were physically possible to do so.

Before any administration has that chance, I think it is important that we should clearly and expressly prohibit such an unprecedented violation of privacy. The intelligence version fails to do so.

In fact, I would suggest that the previous collection of data by the telecom industry, in fact, nearly approached such bulk collection: as we now know, millions and millions and millions of faxes, of e-mails, and of phone conversations were swept up over 5 years, without any warrants whatsoever.

Now, the legality of that is an unanswered question—but we are never going to know the answer if we grant retroactive immunity. We would shut the door forever on determining whether it was legal.

Even though global bulk collection is not yet feasible, we have already seen a vacuum operation sweep up millions of conversations, e-mails, and faxes. So we know the will for true bulk collection is there, and the Director of National Intelligence has admitted as much. So failure of the Intelligence version of the bill to prohibit bulk collection ought to cause us all some concern.

Fifth, and finally, Mr. President, the intelligence committee version of the bill stays in effect until 2013, through the next Presidential term and into the next one after that. Compare that to the 4-year sunset in the Leahy amendment. I believe that, when making such a dramatic change in the Nation's terrorist surveillance regime, we ought to err on the side of some caution. Once the new regime has been tested, once its effectiveness against terrorism and its compromises of privacy have been weighed, we deserve to have this debate again. Hopefully we will all be more informed when that happens; I trust that it will be a much less speculative debate.

And there is another advantage to coming back to this bill with greater frequency. We are learning painfully that the abilities those who would do us harm are growing more sophisticated year by year. We need to be flexible, as well. To not allow for a review of this legislation until 2013, except under extraordinary circumstances, locks us in place for far too long. We ought to come back and review whether we are facing additional problems that didn't exist even a year ago, given the warp speed with technology changes globally. We shouldn't wait 6 years. Given the ever-changing terrorist threats we face, taking another look at this bill sooner is in our security interest.

Mr. President, I said last evening that I admire the work of Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND, and the members of the Intelligence Committee. And I know people say, ''Oh, you are just being collegial.'' But this is not easy work. I know they struggle with these issues, and I don't want my criticism to be interpreted to suggest that I don't respect the work they do. I clearly respect it.

But this is such a critical issue, and maybe I have more of a passion about it, because it is so important. Once you begin to accept expanded executive power, it is so easy to move to the next step and the next step—and we have to be so careful about that.

We are mere custodians, those of us who serve here, over our rights and the rule of law. We are relying on the work of those who have preceded us. And I think all of us admire immensely what various Congresses have done over three decades since the adoption of the original FISA bill, which was done in a bipartisan, almost unanimous fashion. But the issue we face today is historic. It is not something that began just after 9/11. The tension between keeping us safe and protecting our rights has been an ongoing debate for more than two centuries, and it will be a continuous debate.

It will be a contentious debate. But striking that balance is what is so important. And the temptation to err on one side of that balance is so strong. James Madison warned more than two centuries ago that our willingness to give up domestic rights is always contingent upon the fear of what happens abroad. So while all of us here want to make sure we are doing everything to keep our country secure, we do not want to be willing to give up the basic rule of law here, and denigrate the importance of those rights.

It is very dangerous to confront the people of this country with a choice between rights and security. It is a false choice. In truth, we become more secure when we protect our rights. We have learned that over the years. And if we forget that lesson now, I believe we will come to deeply, deeply regret it.

This bill, the Intelligence Committee bill, reduces court oversight merely to the point of symbolism. It allows the targeting of Americans on false pretenses. It opens us up to new, twisted rationales for warrantless wiretapping, the very thing it ought to prevent. It would allow bulk collection as soon as this administration—or any administration—has the wherewithal to do it.

Mr. President, we are letting this debate become one of Republicans versus Democrats, liberals versus conservatives. But the Constitution is not a partisan document. It is a document which all of us embrace. It deeply troubles me that we have allowed things to come to this point instead of insisting that we can find the wisdom and the ability to keep America safe without compromising the rule of law.

In sum, the Intelligence version is entirely too trusting a bill, and not just for this administration. People say: If there were a Democrat sitting in the White House, you would not be saying this. Yes, I would. If any Democrat tried to do this, I would speak just as passionately, maybe more so, offended that someone I thought I shared some values with was suggesting a similar course of action.

My concern with what we are doing is not just about the next year; it is for the years and years and years to come, for the precedent we are setting, not only for this administration, but for all those that will follow.

So my passion about this is not rooted in partisanship; it is rooted in my deep conviction that abandoning or undermining the rule of law—we don't have the right to do that. We are temporary custodians of the Constitution of the United States.

So the Intelligence version is too trusting, as I said. With its immunity provisions, with its wiretapping provisions, it simply responds to the executive branch's offer of ''trust me'' with an all-too-eager to say ''yes.''

I leave my colleagues with a simple question: Has that trust been earned, not just by this President, by any President? What would our Founders think? Why did they craft a system which insisted that there be a judicial, a legislative, and an executive branch? If we walk away from that balance, then we walk away from the very trust we were endowed with by those who elected us to this office and the oath we took here.

So I urge my colleagues to support the substitute being offered by Senator LEAHY.

Again, I commend Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND and members of that committee who worked hard at it. There are a lot of good ideas, outside of immunity, in the Intelligence Committee version of the bill. I think we can improve it; and the Leahy amendment does that.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. President, while I have great admiration and respect for my friend from Connecticut, this is an issue upon which we simply disagree.

I rise today in opposition to the Judiciary substitute amendment to S. 2248, the FISA Amendments Act.

This legislation would strike, in its entirety, the bipartisan bill voted out of the Intelligence Committee by a 13-to-2 vote and replace it with a bill full of limitations on our foreign intelligence collection.

There are serious differences between the Judiciary Committee's substitute and the bill voted out of the Intelligence Committee. The Intelligence Committee bill is the result of a long drafting process where the committee reviewed the classified mechanisms under which FISA operates. As a result, the bill reflects the minimum tools our intelligence community needs to improve our foreign intelligence collection. Some of the provisions of the Judiciary bill seem to ignore the needs of our intelligence analysts and instead seek to hamper our ability to protect the Nation from hostile foreign intelligence collection and terrorists.

I believe the Judiciary Committee bill is seriously flawed, and I would like to highlight just two examples of how seriously flawed this amendment is.

First, it seeks to impose an unreasonable new restriction on the use of foreign intelligence information.

If the FISA Court finds the minimization procedure is deficient in some manner, information, including information not concerning U.S. persons obtained or derived from those acts, may not be kept. Our intelligence community analysts have used and complied with minimization standards for over 25 years. They know how to do it. They are familiar with when and how to minimize information in order to protect the identity of U.S. persons.

It is important to point out that minimization is used when disseminating important foreign intelligence. In other words, an intelligence analyst has determined that the information contains relevant foreign intelligence. Under the Judiciary Committee provision, if the FISA Court determines that the general proscriptions on how to minimize need improvement, the intelligence community may not use any previously gathered intelligence. This allows the FISA Court to second-guess trained analysts. The FISA Court's own opinion from December 11, 2007, recognizes that the executive branch has the expertise in national security matters, that the court should not make judgments as to which particular surveillances should be conducted.

Second, the Judiciary Committee amendment contains no provision for retroactive or prospective immunity for communications providers.

After careful review of the President's terrorist surveillance program, a bipartisan majority of the Intelligence Committee believed that providing our telecommunications service providers immunity for their assistance to the Government is absolutely necessary.

I think without question this is such a critical part of the bill that came out of the Intelligence Committee for all of the right reasons. The Intelligence Committee heard testimony and reviewed the President's specific intelligence program. The President granted the committee members and staff access to the legal memoranda and other documents related to this program. As stated in the committee report accompanying this legislation, the committee determined:

> That electronic communication service providers acted on a good faith belief that the President's program, and their assistance, was lawful.
> The committee reviewed correspondence sent to the electronic communication service providers stating that the activities requested were authorized by the President and determined by the Attorney General to be lawful, with the exception of one letter covering a period of less than 60 days, in which the Counsel to the President certified the program's lawfulness.

The statement continues:

> The committee concluded that granting liability relief to the telecommunications providers was not only warranted, but required to maintain the regular assistance our intelligence and law enforcement professionals seek from them. Although I believe that the President's program was lawful and necessary, this bill makes no such determination. This is not a review or commentary on the President's program.

I urge my colleagues to support the determinations of the Intelligence Committee, which is charged with regularly reviewing the intelligence activities of the United States and all of the agencies included within the intelligence community. Providing our telecommunications carriers with liability relief is the necessary and responsible action for Congress to take.

The Government often needs assistance from the private sector in order to protect our national security, and in return, they should be able to rely on the Government's assurances that the assistance they provide is lawful and necessary for our national security. As a result of this assistance, America's telecommunications carriers should not be subject to costly legal battles.

This is not the last time that the private sector is going to be asked to come to the aid of the American people in protecting us on a matter of national security. There will be other days when the private sector will be called upon by the Government to act in concert and in partnership to protect the American public. If we do not grant immunity in this particular instance, should we expect the private sector to be cooperative with us in the future? I think the answer to that is pretty clear.

That was the gist of the bipartisan discussion and agreement within the Intelligence Committee about the main reason why, if no other reason, we should seriously look and give the immunity to the telecommunications providers that may have been involved in this situation.

I urge my colleagues to reject the Judiciary Committee substitute amendment, which contains numerous problematic provisions which will hamper and try to micromanage our intelligence collection, and support the carefully crafted bipartisan bill passed out of the Intelligence Committee.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent the time be equally divided on both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I will be speaking more at about 1:30 on the Judiciary Committee substitute, but I thought I would clarify a few concerns that have been raised that I have heard. I know there are a number of Members coming down, and I do not want to hold them up, but I do want to point out that my good friend, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, was concerned that the President's terrorist surveillance program was not briefed to Members of Congress. It is my understanding it was briefed to the leadership of the Intelligence Committee and the leadership on both sides. Personally, I would have preferred that more Members be briefed, but it is my understanding that when these leaders were briefed, it was their view that in light of the urgency and the need and the difficulties of explaining what we were going to do prior to—which could delay the implementation of the terrorist surveillance program, that it was a consensus of these meetings that the President should not bring a measure before Congress modifying FISA to take account of the new means of electronic surveillance and electronic communication.

Secondly, my good friend, the senior Senator from Connecticut, in his comments urged that we ban reverse targeting. I would call his attention to section 703(b), subparagraph 2 and subparagraph 3, which do explicitly ban targeting of overseas terrorist activities in order to gain information on U.S. persons. That is explicitly banned.

The Senator from Connecticut also spoke warmly of the exclusive test that existed in FISA from the period from 1978 forward.

We have included in the bill the exclusive means test that worked for some 30 years. That is in section 102. Without getting into classified information, we can say that this bill does not allow our intelligence community to listen in on conversations or read mail unless those persons are afforded the protection of the Intelligence Committee bill. To clarify that, the collection is carefully limited and overseen. There have been comments that the collection efforts by the NSA are not subject to oversight. I can only suggest to the people who have raised those concerns to ask members of the Intelligence Committee how much time we have spent looking into electronic surveillance. I can assure them that we enjoy looking into all these issues. We do so on a continuing basis. We have done so extensively over the last 9 months. I am sure they can count on us continuing to exercise that oversight. The Intelligence Committee has been set up specifically to review all of the intelligence collection methods of our intelligence community. They do a great job. We look over their shoulders and suggest ways they can improve the collection and analysis and also take steps to ensure they stay carefully within the boundaries of the Constitution and the laws that apply to them. With respect to collection methods such as 12333, we also oversee that as well.

So the people of America can be assured that the laws, the Constitution, and the regulations are being complied with. That is our job in the Intelligence Committee. We intend to continue to do so. I didn't want to leave without clarification of the suggestion that some of these matters were not attended to.

I see my colleague from Utah. I thank him for his great work. He is not only a valuable member of the Intelligence Committee but his work on the Judiciary Committee reflects his keen understanding and devotion to ensuring that we do a proper job of oversight and legislation when it comes to these very important collection methods.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I thank my dear colleague from Missouri for the leadership he has provided, along with Senator ROCKEFELLER, on the Intelligence Committee and throughout this process. We ought to be listening to him. This is a very important bill, one of the most important in the history of the country, and we have to get it right. I congratulate him and thank him for the hard work he has done, and also Senator ROCKEFELLER who, as chairman of the committee, led us in this matter.

As the only Republican on both the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees, I have been very involved in the process of developing the FISA modernization bill with a unique understanding of the journey this bill has taken through the Senate. I continue to express my full support for the bill as passed out of the Intelligence Committee and encourage my colleagues to reject the risky and problematic Judiciary substitute amendment.

The seeds of discontent with the Judiciary substitute were sown from the very beginning of that committee's consideration. Late in the afternoon the day before the markup, a Judiciary substitute amendment was circulated that replaced the entire first title of the Intelligence Committee-reported bill. This substitute included 10 Democratic amendments and no Republican amendments. It was eventually adopted on a party-line vote. Unfortunately, the careful bipartisan balance crafted by the Intelligence Committee was irrevocably altered and effectively nullified by partisan maneuvering. The Judiciary Committee was not able to coalesce to advance a compromise bill, as evidenced by the consistent 10-to-9 party-line votes on amendments and final passage. These votes typified the approach the Judiciary Committee undertook.

We know that this bill, like all national security legislation, needs bipartisan support to pass. The Judiciary substitute simply doesn't have it. I remind my colleagues that on November 14, 2007, Attorney General Mukasey and Director of National Intelligence McConnell sent a letter to the chairman and ranking member of the Judiciary Committee stating:

> If the Judiciary substitute is part of a bill that is presented to the President, we and the President's other senior advisors will recommend that he veto the bill.

In addition, on December 17, 2007, a statement of administration policy was distributed for S. 2248 which stated:

> If the Judiciary Committee substitute amendment is part of a bill that is presented to the President, the Director of National Intelligence, the Attorney General, and the President's other senior advisors will recommend that he veto the bill.

Both of these letters illustrate extensive problems with provisions included in the Judiciary substitute and in very specific terms. These warnings from the very people in the Government who are asked to protect us from terrorist threats should be heeded. We disregard these warnings at our own peril.

I ask unanimous consent that both of these letters be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ADMINISTRATION POLICY

S. 2248—TO AMEND THE FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE SURVEILLANCE ACT OF 1978, TO MODERNIZE AND STREAMLINE THE PROVISIONS OF THAT ACT, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

(Sen. Rockefeller (D–WV), Dec. 17, 2007)

Protection of the American people and American interests at home and abroad requires access to timely, accurate, and insightful intelligence on the capabilities, intentions, and activities of foreign powers, including terrorists. The Protect America Act of 2007 (PAA), which amended the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA) this past August, has greatly improved the Intelligence Community's ability to protect the Nation from terrorist attacks and other national security threats. The PAA has allowed us to close intelligence gaps, and it has enabled our intelligence professionals to collect foreign intelligence information from targets overseas more efficiently and effectively. The Intelligence Community has implemented the PAA under a robust oversight regime that has protected the civil liberties and privacy rights of Americans. Unfortunately, the benefits conferred by the PAA are only temporary because the act sunsets on February 1, 2008.

The Director of National Intelligence has frequently discussed what the Intelligence Community needs in permanent FISA legislation, including two key principles. First, judicial authorization should not be required to gather foreign intelligence from targets located in foreign countries. Second, the law must provide liability protection for the private sector.

The Senate is considering two bills to extend the core authorities provided by the PAA and modernize FISA. In October, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (SSCI) passed a consensus, bipartisan bill (S.

2248) that would establish a sound foundation for our Intelligence Community's efforts to target terrorists and other foreign intelligence targets located overseas. Although the bill is not perfect and its flaws must be addressed, it nevertheless represents a bipartisan compromise that will ensure that the Intelligence Community retains the authorities it needs to protect the Nation. Indeed, the SSCI bill is an improvement over the PAA in one essential way—it would provide retroactive liability protection to electronic communication service providers that are alleged to have assisted the Government with intelligence activities in the aftermath of September 11th.

In sharp contrast to the SSCI's bipartisan approach to modernizing FISA, the Senate Judiciary Committee reported an amendment to the SSCI bill that would have devastating consequences to the Intelligence Community's ability to detect and prevent terrorist attacks and to protect the Nation from other national security threats. The Judiciary Committee proposal would degrade our foreign intelligence collection capabilities. The Judiciary Committee's amendment would impose unacceptable and potentially crippling burdens on the collection of foreign intelligence information by expanding FISA to restrict facets of foreign intelligence collection never intended to be covered under the statute. Furthermore, the Judiciary Committee amendment altogether fails to address the critical issue of liability protection. Accordingly. if the Judiciary Committee's substitute amendment is part of a bill that is presented to the President, the Director of National Intelligence, the Attorney General, and the President's other senior advisors will recommend that he veto the bill.

THE SENATE SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE BILL

Building on the authorities and oversight protections included in the PAA, the SSCI drafted S. 2248 to provide a sound legal framework for essential foreign intelligence collection in a manner consistent with the Fourth Amendment. As in the PAA, S. 2248 permits the targeting of foreign terrorists and other foreign intelligence targets outside the United States based upon the approval of the Director of National Intelligence and the Attorney General.

The SSCI drafted its bill in extensive coordination with Intelligence Community and national security professionals—those who are most familiar with the needs of the Intelligence Community and the complexities of our intelligence laws. The SSCI also heard testimony from privacy experts in order to craft a balanced approach. As a result, the SSCI bill recognizes the importance of clarity in laws governing intelligence operations. Although the Administration would strongly prefer that the provisions of the PAA be made permanent without modification, the Administration engaged in extensive consultation in the interest of achieving permanent legislation in a bipartisan manner.

The SSCI bill is not perfect, however. Indeed, certain provisions represent a major modification of the PAA and will create additional burdens for the Intelligence Community, including by dramatically expanding the role of the FISA Court in reviewing foreign intelligence operations targeted at persons located outside the United States, a role never envisioned when Congress created the FISA court.

In particular, the SSCI bill contains two provisions that must be modified in order to avoid significant negative impacts on intelligence operations. Both of these provisions are also included in the Judiciary Committee substitute, detailed further below.

First, as part of the debate over FISA modernization, concerns have been raised regarding acquiring information from U.S. persons outside the United States. Accordingly, the SSCI bill provides for FISA Court approval of surveillance of U.S. persons abroad. The Administration opposes this provision. Under executive orders in place since before the enactment of FISA in 1978, Attorney General approval is required before foreign intelligence surveillance and searches may be conducted against a U.S. person abroad under circumstances in which a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy. More specifically, section 2.5 of Executive Order 12333 requires that the Attorney General find probable cause that the U.S. person target is a foreign power or an agent of a foreign power. S. 2248 dramatically increases the role of the FISA Court by requiring court approval of this probable cause determination before an intelligence operation may be conducted beyond the borders of the United States. This provision imposes burdens on foreign intelligence collection abroad that frequently do not exist even with respect to searches and surveillance abroad for law enforcement purposes. Were the Administration to consider accepting FISA Court approval for foreign intelligence searches and surveillance of U.S. persons overseas, technical corrections would be necessary. The Administration appreciates the efforts that have been made by Congress to address these issues, but notes that while it may be willing to accept that the FISA Court, rather than the Attorney General, must make the required findings, limitations on the scope of the collection currently allowed are unacceptable.

Second, the Senate Intelligence Committee bill contains a requirement that intelligence analysts count ''the number of persons located in the United States whose communications were reviewed.'' This provision would likely be impossible to implement. It places potentially insurmountable burdens on intelligence professionals without meaningfully protecting the privacy of Americans, and takes scarce analytic resources away from protecting our country. The Intelligence Community has provided Congress with a detailed classified explanation of this problem.

Although the Administration believes that the PAA achieved foreign intelligence objectives with reasonable and robust oversight protections, S. 2248, as drafted by the Senate Intelligence Committee, provides a workable alternative and improves on the PAA in one critical respect by providing retroactive liability protection. The Senate Intelligence Committee bill would achieve an effective legislative result by returning FISA to its appropriate focus on the protection of privacy interests of persons inside the United States, while retaining our improved capability under PAA to collect timely foreign intelligence information needed to protect the Nation.

THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE PROPOSAL

The Senate Judiciary Committee amendment contains a number of provisions that would have a devastating impact on our foreign intelligence operations.

Among the provisions of greatest concern are:

An Overbroad Exclusive Means Provision That Threatens Worldwide Foreign Intelligence Operations. Consistent with current law, the exclusive means provision in the SSCI's bill addresses only ''electronic surveillance'' and ''the interception of domestic wire, oral, and electronic communications.'' But the exclusive means provision in the Judiciary Committee substitute goes much further and would dramatically expand the scope of activities covered by that provision. The Judiciary Committee substitute makes FISA the exclusive means for acquiring ''communications information'' for foreign intelligence purposes. The term ''communications information'' is not defined and potentially covers a vast array of information—and effectively bars the acquisition of much of this information that is currently authorized under other statues such as the National Security Act of 1947, as amended. It is unprecedented to require specific statutory authorization for every activity undertaken worldwide by the Intelligence Community. In addition, the exclusivity provision in the Judiciary Committee substitute ignores FISA's complexity and its interrelationship with other federal laws and, as a result, could operate to preclude the Intelligence Community from using current tools and authorities, or preclude Congress from acting quickly to give the Intelligence Community the tools it may need in the aftermath of a terrorist attack in the United States or in response to a grave threat to the national security. In short, the Judiciary Committee's exclusive means provision would radically reshape the intelligence collection framework and is unacceptable.

Limits on Foreign Intelligence Collection. The Judiciary Committee substitute would require the Attorney General and the Director of National Intelligence to certify for certain acquisitions that they are ''limited to communications to which at least one party is a specific individual target who is reasonably believed to be located outside the United States.'' This provision is unacceptable because it could hamper U.S. intelligence operations that are currently authorized to be conducted overseas and that could be conducted more effectively from the United States without harming U.S. privacy rights.

Significant Purpose Requirement. The Judiciary Committee substitute would require a FISA court order if a ''significant purpose'' of an acquisition targeting a person abroad is to acquire the communications of a specific person reasonably believed to be in the United States. If the concern driving this proposal is so-called ''reverse targeting''—circumstances in which the Government would conduct surveillance of a person overseas when the Government's actual target is a person in the United States with whom the person overseas is communicating—that situation is already addressed in FISA today: If the person in the United States is the target, a significant purpose of the acquisition must be to collect foreign intelligence information, and an order from the FISA court is required. Indeed, the SSCI bill codifies this longstanding Executive Branch interpretation of FISA. The Judiciary Committee substitute would place an unnecessary and debilitating burden on our Intelligence Community's ability to conduct surveillance without enhancing the protection of the privacy of Americans.

Part of the value of the PAA, and any subsequent legislation, is to enable the Intelligence Community to collect expeditiously the communications of terrorists in foreign countries who may contact an associate in the United States. The Intelligence Community was heavily criticized by numerous reviews after September 11, including by the Congressional Joint Inquiry into September 11, regarding its insufficient attention to detecting communications indicating homeland attack plotting. To quote the Congressional Joint Inquiry:

''The Joint Inquiry has learned that one of the future hijackers communicated with a known terrorist facility in the Middle East while he was living in the United States. The Intelligence Community did not identify the domestic origin of those communications prior to September 11, 2001 so that additional FBI investigative efforts could be coordinated. Despite this country's substantial advantages, there was insufficient focus on what many would have thought was among the most critically important kinds of terrorist-related communications, at least in terms of protecting the Homeland.''

(S. Rept. No. 107–351, H. Rept. No. 107–792 at 36.) To be clear, a ''significant purpose'' of Intelligence Community activities is to detect communications that may provide warning of homeland attacks and that may include communication between a terrorist overseas who places a call to associates in the United States. A provision that bars the Intelligence Community from collecting these communications is unacceptable, as Congress has stated previously.

Liability Protection. In contrast to the Senate Intelligence Committee bill, the Senate Judiciary Committee substitute would not protect electronic communication service providers who are alleged to have assisted the Government with communications intelligence activities in the aftermath of September 11th from potentially debilitating lawsuits. Providing liability protection to these companies is a just result. In its Conference Report, the Senate Intelligence Committee ''concluded that the providers . . . had a good faith basis for responding to the requests for assistance they received.'' The Committee further recognized that ''the Intelligence Community cannot obtain the intelligence it needs without assistance from these companies.'' Companies in the future may be less willing to assist the Government if they face the threat of private lawsuits each time they are alleged to have provided assistance. The Senate Intelligence Committee concluded that: ''The possible reduction in intelligence that might result from this delay is simply unacceptable for the safety of our Nation.'' Allowing continued litigation also risks the disclosure of highly classified information regarding intelligence sources and methods. In addition to providing an advantage to our adversaries by revealing sources and methods during the course of litigation, the potential disclosure of classified information puts both the facilities and personnel of electronic communication service providers and our country's continued ability to protect our homeland at risk. It is imperative that Congress provide liability protection to those who cooperated with this country in its hour of need.

The ramifications of the Judiciary Committee's decision to afford no relief to private parties that cooperated in good faith with the U.S. Government in the immediate aftermath of the attacks of September 11 could extend well beyond the particular issues and activities that have been of primary interest and concern to the Committee. The Intelligence Community, as well as law enforcement and homeland security agencies, continue to rely on the voluntary cooperation and assistance of private parties. A decision by the Senate to abandon those who may have provided assistance after September 11 will invariably be noted by those who may someday be called upon again to help the Nation.

Mandates an Unnecessary Review of Historical Programs. The Judiciary Committee substitute would require that inspectors general of the Department of Justice and relevant Intelligence Community agencies audit the Terrorist Surveillance Program and ''any closely related intelligence activities.'' If this ''audit'' is intended to look at operational activities, there has been an ongoing oversight activity by the Inspector General of the National Security Agency (NSA) of operational activities and the Senate Intelligence Committee has that material. Mandating a new and undefined ''audit'' will divert significant operational resources from current issues to redoing past audits. The Administration understands, however, the ''audit'' may in fact not be related to technical NSA operations. If it is the case that in fact the Judiciary Committee is interested in historical reviews of legal issues, the provision is unnecessary. The Department of Justice Inspector General and the Office of Professional Responsibility are already doing a comprehensive review. In addition, the phrase ''closely related intelligence activities'' would introduce substantial ambiguities in the scope of this review. Finally, this provision would require the inspectors general to acquire ''all documents relevant to such programs'' and submit those documents with its report to the congressional intelligence and judiciary committees. The requirement to collect and disseminate this wide range of highly classified documents—including all those ''relevant'' to activities ''closely related'' to the Terrorist Surveillance Program—unnecessarily risks the disclosure of extremely sensitive information about our intelligence activities, as does the audit requirement itself. Taking such national security risks for a backwards-looking purpose is unacceptable.

Allows for Dangerous Intelligence Gaps During the Pendency of an Appeal. The Judiciary Committee substitute would delete an important provision in the SSCI bill that enables the Intelligence Community to collect foreign intelligence from overseas terrorists and other foreign intelligence targets during an appeal. Without that provision, we could lose vital intelligence necessary to protect the Nation because of the views of one judge.

Limits Dissemination of Foreign Intelligence Information. The Judiciary Committee substitute would impose significant new restrictions on the use of foreign intelligence information, including information not concerning United States persons, obtained or derived from acquisitions using targeting procedures that the FISA Court later found to be unsatisfactory for any reason. By requiring analysts to go back to the databases and pull out certain information, as well as to determine what other information is derived from that information, this requirement would place a difficult, and perhaps insurmountable, burden on the Intelligence Community. Moreover, this provision would degrade privacy protections, as it would require analysts to locate and examine U.S. person information that would otherwise not be reviewed.

Requires FISA Court Approval of All ''Targeting'' for Foreign Intelligence Purposes. The Judiciary Committee substitute potentially requires the FISA Court to approve ''[a]ny targeting of persons reasonably believed to be located outside the United States.'' Although we assume that the Committee did not intend to require these procedures to govern all ''targeting'' done of any person in the world for any purpose—whether it is to gather human intelligence, communications intelligence, or for other reasons—the text as passed by the Committee contains no limitation. Such a requirement would bring within the FISA Court a vast range of overseas intelligence activities with little or no connection to civil liberties and privacy rights of Americans.

Imposes Court Review of Compliance with Minimization Procedures. The Judiciary Committee substitute would require the FISA Court to review and assess compliance with minimization procedures. Together with provisions discussed above, this would constitute a massive expansion of the Court's role in overseeing the Intelligence Community's implementation of foreign intelligence collection abroad.

Amends FISA to Impose Burdensome Document Production Requirements. The Judiciary Committee substitute would amend FISA to require the Government to submit to oversight committees a copy of any decision, order, or opinion issued by the FISA Court or the FISA Court of Review that includes significant construction or interpretation of any provision of FISA, including any pleadings associated with those documents, no later than 45 days after the document is issued. The Judiciary Committee substitute also would require the Government to retrieve historical documents of this nature from the last five years. As drafted, this provision could impose significant burdens on Department of Justice staff assigned to support national security operational and oversight missions.

Includes an Even Shorter Sunset Provision Than That Contained in the SSCI Bill. The Judiciary Committee substitute and the SSCI bill share the same flaw of failing to achieve permanent FISA reform. The Judiciary Committee substitute worsens this flaw, however, by shortening the sunset provision in the SSCI bill from six years to four years. Any sunset provision, but particularly one as short as contemplated in the Judiciary Committee substitute, would adversely impact the Intelligence Community's ability to conduct its mission efficiently and effectively by introducing uncertainty and requiring retraining of all intelligence professionals on new policies and procedures implementing ever-changing authorities. Moreover, over the past year, in the interest of providing an extensive legislative record and allowing public discussion on this issue, the Intelligence Community has discussed in open settings extraordinary information dealing with intelligence operations. To repeat this process in several years will unnecessarily highlight our intelligence sources and methods to our adversaries. There is now a lengthy factual record on the need for this legislation, and it is time to provide the Intelligence Community the permanent stability it needs.

Fails to Provide Procedures for Implementing Existing Statutory Defenses. The Judiciary Committee substitute fails to include the important provisions in the SSCI bill that would establish procedures for implementing existing statutory defenses and that would preempt state investigations of assistance allegedly provided by an electronic communication service provider to an element of the Intelligence Community. These provisions are important to ensure that electronic communication service providers can take full advantage of existing liability protection and to protect highly classified information.

Fails to Address Transition Procedures. Unlike the SSCI bill, the Judiciary Committee bill contains no procedures designed to ensure a smooth transition from the PAA to new legislation, and for a potential transition resulting from an expiration of the new legislation. This omission could result in uncertainty regarding the continuing validity of authorizations and directives under the Protect America Act that are in effect on the date of enactment of this legislation.

Fails to Include a Severability Provision. The Judiciary Committee substitute, unlike the SSCI bill, lacks a severability provision. Such a provision should be included in the bill.

The Administration is prepared to continue to work with Congress towards the passage of a permanent FISA modernization bill that would strengthen the Nation's intelligence capabilities while protecting the constitutional rights of Americans, so that the President can sign such a bill into law. The Senate Intelligence Committee bill provides a solid foundation to meet the needs of our Intelligence Community, but the Senate Judiciary Committee bill represents a major step backwards from the PAA and would compromise our Intelligence Community's ability to protect the Nation. The Administration calls on Congress to forge ahead and pass legislation that will protect our national security, not weaken it in critical ways.

NOVEMBER 14, 2007.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter presents the views of the Administration on the proposed substitute amendment you circulated to Title I of the FISA Amendments Act of 2007 (S. 2248), a bill ''to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, to modernize and streamline the provisions of that act, and for other purposes.'' We have appreciated the willingness of Congress to address the need to modernize FISA permanently and to work with the Administration to do so in a manner that allows the intelligence community to collect the foreign intelligence information necessary to protect the Nation while protecting the civil liberties of Americans. With all respect, however, we strongly oppose the proposed substitute amendment. If the substitute is part of a bill that is presented to the President, we and the President's other senior advisers will recommend that he veto the bill.

In August, Congress took an important step toward modernizing the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 by enacting the Protect America Act of 2007 (PAA). The Protect America Act has allowed us temporarily to close intelligence gaps by enabling our intelligence professionals to collect, without a court order, foreign intelligence information from targets overseas. The intelligence community has implemented the Protect America Act in a responsible way, subject to extensive congressional oversight, to meet the country's foreign intelligence needs while protecting civil liberties. Unless reauthorized by Congress, however, the authority provided in the Protect America Act will expire in less than three months. In the face of the continued terrorist threats to our Nation, we think it is vital that Congress act to make the core authorities of the Protect America Act permanent. Congressional action to provide protection from private lawsuits against companies that are alleged to have assisted the Government in the aftermath of the September 11th terrorist attacks on America also is critical to ensuring the Government can continue to receive private sector help to protect the Nation.

In late October, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence introduced a consensus, bipartisan bill (S. 2248) that would establish a firm, long-term foundation for our intelligence community's efforts to target terrorists and other foreign intelligence targets located overseas. While the bill is not perfect, it contains many important provisions, and was developed through a thoughtful process that ensured that the intelligence community retains the core authorities it needs to protect the Nation and that the bill would not adversely impact critical intelligence operations. Importantly, that bill would afford retroactive liability protection to communication service providers that are alleged to have assisted the Government with intelligence activities in the aftermath of September 11th. The Intelligence Committee recognized that ''without retroactive immunity, the private sector might be unwilling to cooperate with lawful Government requests in the future without unnecessary court involvement and protracted litigation. The possible reduction in intelligence that might result from this delay is simply unacceptable for the safety of Our Nation.'' The committee's measured judgment reflects the principle that private citizens who respond in good faith to a request for assistance by public officials should not be held liable for their actions. The bill was reported favorably out of committee on a 13–2 vote.

We respectfully submit that your substitute amendment to Title I of the Senate Intelligence Committee's bill would upset some important provisions in the Intelligence Committee bill. The substitute also does not adequately address certain provisions in the Intelligence Committee's bill that remain in need of improvement. As a result, we have determined, with all respect to your efforts, that the substitute would not provide the intelligence community with the tools it needs effectively to collect foreign intelligence information vital for the security of the Nation.

I. LIMITATIONS ON INTELLIGENCE COLLECTION AND NATIONAL SECURITY INVESTIGATIONS

The substitute would make several amendments to S. 2248 that would have an adverse impact on our ability to collect effectively the foreign intelligence information necessary to protect the Nation. These amendments include the following:

Prohibits Intelligence and Law Enforcement Officials From Using Valuable Investigative Tools. The substitute contains an amendment to the ''exclusive means'' provision of FISA that could severely harm our ability to conduct national security investigations. As drafted, the provision would bar the use of national security letters, Title III criminal wiretaps, ad other well-established investigative tools to collect information in national security investigations.

Threatens Critical Intellilgence Collection Activities. The ''exclusive means'' provision also could harm the national security by disrupting highly classified intelligence activities. Among other things, ambiguities in critical terms and formulations in the provision—including the term ''communications information'' (a term that is not defined in FISA) and the introduction of the concept of targeting communications (as opposed to persons)—could lead the statute to bar altogether or to require court approval for overseas intelligence activities that involve merely the incidental collection of United States person information.

Limits Existing Provisions of Law that Protect Communications Service Providers. The portion of the substitute regarding protections to communication service providers under Government certifications contains ambiguities that could jeopardize our ability to secure the assistance of these providers in the future. This could hamper significantly the Government's efforts to obtain necessary foreign intelligence information. As the Senate Intelligence Committee noted in its report on S. 2248, ''electronic communications service providers play an important role in assisting intelligence officials in national security activities. Indeed, the intelligence community cannot obtain the intelligence it needs without assistance from these companies.''

Allows for Dangerous Intelligence Gaps During the Pendency of an Appeal. The substitute would delete an important provision in the bipartisan Intelligence Committee bill that would ensure that our intelligence professionals can continue to collect intelligence from overseas terrorists and other foreign intelligence targets during the pendency of an appeal of a decision of the FISA Court. Without that provision, whole categories of surveillances directed outside the United States could be halted before review by the FISA Court of Review.

Limits Dissemination of Foreign Intelligence Information. The substitute would impose significant new restrictions on the use of foreign intelligence information, including information not concerning United States persons, obtained or derived from acquisitions using targeting procedures that the FISA Court later found to be unsatisfactory. By requiring analysts to go back to the databases and pull out the information, as well as to determine what other information is derived from that information, this requirement would place a difficult, and perhaps insurmountable, operational burden on the intelligence community in implementing authorities that target terrorists and other foreign intelligence targets located overseas. This requirement also strikes us as at odds with the mandate of the September 11th Commission that the intelligence community should find and link disparate pieces of foreign intelligence information. The requirement also harms privacy interests by requiring analysts to examine information that would otherwise be discarded without being reviewed.

Imposes Court Review of Compliance with Minimization Procedures. The substitute would allow the FISA Court to review compliance with minimization procedures that are used on a programmatic basis for the acquisition of foreign intelligence information by targeting individuals reasonably believed to be outside the United States. This could place the FISA Court in a position where it would conduct individualized review of the intelligence community's foreign communications intelligence activities. While conferring such authority on the court is understandable in the context of traditional FISA collection, it is anomalous in this context, where the court's role is in approving generally applicable procedures rather than individual surveillances.

Strikes a Provision Designed to Make the FISA Process More Efficient. The substitute would strike a provision from the bipartisan Senate Intelligence Committee bill that would allow the second highest-ranking FBI official to certify applications for electronic surveillance. Today, the only FBI official who can certify FISA applications is the Director, a restriction that can delay the initiation of surveillance when the Director travels or is otherwise unavailable. It is unclear why this provision from the Intelligence Committee bill, which will enhance the efficiency of the FISA process while ensuring high-level accountability, would be objectionable.

II. NECESSARY IMPROVEMENTS TO S. 2248

The substitute also does not make needed improvements to the Senate Intelligence Committee bill. These include:

Provision Pertaining to Surveillance of United States Persons Abroad. The substitute does not make needed improvements to the Committee bill, which would require for the first time that a court order be obtained to surveil United States persons abroad. In addition to being problematic for policy reasons and imposing burdens on foreign intelligence collection abroad that do not exist with respect to collection for law enforcement purposes, the provision continues to have serious technical problems. As drafted, the provision would not allow for the surveillance, even with a court finding, of certain critical foreign intelligence targets, and would allow emergency surveillance outside the United States for significantly less time than the bipartisan Senate Intelligence Committee bill had authorized for surveillance inside the United States.

Maintains a Sunset Provision. Rather than achieving permanent FISA reform, the substitute maintains a six year sunset provision. Indeed, several members on the Judiciary Committee have indicated that they may propose amendments to the bill that would shorten the sunset, leaving the intelligence community and our private partners subject to an uncertain legal framework for collecting intelligence from overseas targets. Any sunset provision withholds from our intelligence professionals the certainty and permanence they need to conduct foreign intelligence collection to protect Americans from terrorism and other threats to the national security. The intelligence community operates much more effectively when the rules governing our intelligence professionals' ability to track our adversaries are established and are not changing from year to year. Stability of law, we submit, also allows the intelligence community to invest resources appropriately. In our respectful view, a sunset provision is unnecessary and would have an adverse impact on the intelligence community's ability to conduct its mission efficiently and effectively.

Fails to Remedy an Unrealistic Reporting Requirement. The substitute fails to make needed amendments to a reporting requirement in the Senate Intelligence Committee bill that poses serious operational difficulties for the intelligence community. The Intelligence Committee bill contains a requirement that intelligence analysts count ''the number of persons located in the United States whose communications were reviewed.'' This provision would be impossible to implement fully. The provision, in short, places potentially insurmountable burdens on intelligence professionals without meaningfully protecting the privacy of Americans. The intelligence community has provided Congress with a further classified discussion of this issue.

We also are concerned by other serious technical flaws in the substitute that create uncertainty.

The Administration remains prepared to work with Congress towards the passage of a permanent FISA modernization bill that would strengthen the Nation's intelligence capabilities while respecting and protecting the constitutional rights of Americans, so that the President can sign such a bill into law. We look forward to working with you and the Members of the Judiciary Committee on these important issues.

Thank you for the opportunity to present our views. The Office of Management and Budget has advised us that from the perspective of the Administration's program, there is no objection to the submission of this letter.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL B. MUKASEY,
Attorney General.
J.M. MCCONNELL,
Director of National Intelligence.

Mr. HATCH. On numerous occasions I have voiced very specific concerns with the Judiciary substitute. I again want to list some of the reasons that illustrate why I oppose this measure. One phrase that has been expressed on the floor of the Senate is that the Judiciary substitute supposedly ''strengthens'' oversight. That might sound like a good talking point, but what does it mean? Does it mean that the Intelligence Committee version is weak on oversight? Based on their previous statements, some of my colleagues seem to believe this. One of my colleagues described the Intelligence Committee bill as ''a bill of token oversight and weak protections for innocent Americans.'' This same colleague also stated that ''it really reduces court oversight nearly to the point of symbolism.'' Another colleague stated the bill will allow the Government to ''review more Americans' communications with less court supervision than ever before.''

The truth is actually much different. The Intelligence Committee bill contains extensive new oversight provisions for the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and Congress. I think it should be perfectly clear that it is a fallacy to claim that the Intelligence Committee bill does not have adequate oversight. On the contrary, it has a level of oversight that is unprecedented and quite possibly provides the most comprehensive oversight of any historical bill relating to foreign intelligence gatherings.

We have also heard the contention that this bill would provide broad new surveillance authorities. Since I have discussed the expanded oversight, I wish I could put up some charts that illustrate this so-called massive expansion of surveillance authority. The problem is that expansion is not in the bill. It doesn't exist. Despite the phrase being repeated over and over, this bill simply contains no new broad and unprecedented surveillance authorities.

For the first time, the Federal Intelligence Court will review and approve targeting procedures used by the intelligence community. For the first time since 1978—it wasn't done before—FISC will determine whether the procedures are reasonably designed to ensure targeting is limited to persons outside the United States.

This bill simply accounts for the technological change in international communications from over the air to cable. It is the bare minimum, but it does give them what they need.

Given the amount of opposition to the Judiciary substitute, I wish to highlight one of the controversial provisions added in the Judiciary Committee relating to ''reverse targeting.''

One of the basic requirements of any FISA modernization proposal is that we should not have any provisions which could be interpreted as requiring warrants to target a foreign terrorist overseas. Quite simply, foreign terrorists living overseas should never receive protections provided by the fourth amendment to the Constitution. They never have and they never should. Reverse targeting refers to the possibility, as alleged by critics of lawful Government surveillance, that the Government could target a foreign person when the real intention is to target a U.S. person, thus circumventing the need to get a warrant for the U.S. person. Reverse targeting has always been unlawful in order to protect the communications of U.S. persons. Contrary to what most people believe, the legitimate definition of U.S. persons is not limited to U.S. citizens.

What is a United States person? ''An alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence'' and ''a corporation which is incorporated in the United States.''

So from an intelligence-gathering standpoint, reverse targeting makes no sense. From an efficiency standpoint, if the Government were interested in targeting an American, it would apply for a warrant to listen to all of the American's conversations, not just conversations with terrorists overseas. But let's not let logic get in the way of good conspiracy theory.

Even though reverse targeting is already considered unlawful, a provision is included in the Intelligence bill which makes it explicit. This provision is clearly written and universally supported. However, the Judiciary Committee passed an amendment by a 10-to-9 party-line vote which altered the clear language of this provision. Where before the provision said you cannot target a foreign person if the ''purpose'' is to target a U.S. person, the new language adds the ambiguous term ''significant purpose.'' If this amendment became law, an analyst would now have to ask himself the following question when targeting a terrorist overseas: Is a ''significant purpose'' of why I am targeting this foreign terrorist overseas the fact that the terrorist may call, A, an airline in America to make flight reservations or, B, a terrorist with a green card living in the USA? If the answer is yes, then the language in this amendment would require a warrant to listen to that foreign terrorist overseas. Do foreign terrorists overseas deserve protections from the courts in the United States? Of course not. The ambiguous and unnecessary text of this amendment should not be left up to judicial interpretation. Enactment of this amendment could lead to our analysts seeking warrants when targeting any foreign terrorist, since the analyst may be afraid he or she is otherwise breaking our new law.

Now we should remember that the Intelligence Committee spent months working on a bipartisan compromise bill. This amendment I have been talking about was not in the Intelligence bill. So people should assume that the Judiciary Committee spent a great deal of time debating this amendment, right? Wrong. The Judiciary Committee spent 7 minutes debating this amendment before it was adopted on a 10-to-9 party-line vote. Let me repeat that number: 7 minutes.

Now, the inclusion of this amendment alone would cause me to vote against this Judiciary substitute. But there are many more provisions that were added via party-line vote which I strongly oppose.

The Judiciary Committee also adopted an amendment to shorten the length of the sunset in the Intelligence Committee's bill. There are a few quick things we should realize when talking about sunsets.

It takes a great deal of time to ensure that all of our intelligence agencies and personnel are fully trained in any new authorities and restrictions brought about by congressional action. This is not something that happens overnight. We cannot just wave a magic wand and have our Nation's intelligence personnel instantaneously cognizant of every administrative alteration imposed by Congress. Like so many things in life, adjusting for these new mechanisms takes time and practice.

While certain modifications are necessary, do we want to make it a habit of consistently changing the rules? I do not think so. Don't we want our analysts to spend their time actually tracking terrorists? Or is their time better spent navigating administrative procedures that may constantly be in flux? I can tell you clearly what I want, and that is for our analysts to use lawful tools to keep our families safe. I do not want to see them unnecessarily diverting their attention by burying their heads in administrative manuals whenever the political winds blow. After all of the efforts to finally write a bill that provides a legal regime that governs contemporary technological capabilities, I am certainly not alone in my opposition to this sunset provision. In fact, my views are completely in line with what this body has done in the past when amending FISA. Remembering that FISA itself had no sunset—the 1978 bill had no sunset—let's look at how Congress has previously legislated in this area: Sunsets are not common in previous laws amending FISA. Other than the PATRIOT Act and the PATRIOT Act reauthorization, seven of the eight public laws amending FISA had no sunsets on FISA provisions, and the remaining public law had a sunset on only one of the provisions.

Now this statistic speaks for itself. What is so different about this bill? I do realize that it contains massive new oversight which could possibly hinder our collection efforts, and that we may need to revisit it for this reason. However, if this is the case, we obviously do not need a sunset to do this. We can legislate in this area whenever we want to.

The fact that the Judiciary Committee shortened the length of an already unnecessary sunset is yet another example of why I will oppose the Judiciary substitute amendment.

We all realize that the Judiciary Committee's bill also removed the bipartisan immunity provision. I have come to the floor on numerous occasions to articulate why this provision is so vital and so necessary. I will do so again when we debate the misguided amendment to strike this bipartisan compromise provision.

We are enacting national security legislation, and it is our responsibility to ensure that this bill does not lead to unintended consequences which provide protections to terrorists. I have no doubt that provisions in the Judiciary Committee substitute could significantly harm—significantly harm—our national security. I am not willing to take that chance. I am not willing to support a bill which raises operational hurdles that impede collection of foreign intelligence. I am not willing to support initiatives that would allow our collections to go dark during the appeal of a ruling from one judge. I am not willing to support a bill which handcuffs our intelligence agencies. I am not willing to support a bill which provides excessive and obtrusive oversight that placates fringe political groups at the possible expense of national security. The stakes are too high. The damage that can be done if we get this wrong is too great.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for an additional 30 seconds to finish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. I will never apologize for voting in favor of provisions which protect national security and civil liberties. During the remainder of this debate, I will continue to support initiatives that properly protect the lives and liberty of Americans. I am hopeful my colleagues will do the same. And I hope we will table this Judiciary Committee partisan amendment.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. President, I will speak later on the floor on the FISA amendment. I want to say that I think the Judiciary Committee amendment is careful and balanced and takes into account both security and liberty. I also note, my colleague from Utah talked about the fact that every citizen would need a warrant in terms of wiretapping. There always has been, and will be in this bill, an emergency exception. So if we have to quickly find someone, there will be an ability to wiretap, and then go get the warrant. We do insist, however—and this is one of the big differences on oversight—to make sure those emergency provisions and the other provisions are being used according to law, and it is not willy-nilly, whatever anybody wants at any time in any place.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The remarks of Mr. SCHUMER are printed in today's RECORD under ''Morning Business.'')

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues to support the substitute amendment and pass the FISA bill reported by the Judiciary Committee. Since I introduced the original FISA legislation over 30 years ago, I have worked to amend the FISA law many times and I believe that only the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee is faithful to the traditional balance FISA has struck. FISA remains an essential tool in our battle against America's enemies, and the bills introduced by both the Judiciary Committee and the Intelligence Committee give the executive branch vast authority to conduct electronic surveillance that may involve Americans. But the Intelligence Committee bill lacks safeguards to provide oversight and prevent abuse, and Americans deserve better. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is one of our landmark statutes. For three decades it has regulated Government surveillance in a way that protects both our national security and our civil liberties and prevents the Government from abusing its powers. It is because FISA enhances both security and liberty that it has won such broad support over the years from Presidents, Members of Congress, and the public alike. It is important to remember that before this administration, no administration had ever resisted FISA, much less systematically violated it.

When the Bush administration finally came to Congress to amend FISA after its warrantless wiretapping program was exposed, it did so not in the spirit of partnership but to bully us into obeying its wishes. The Protect America Act was negotiated in secret at the last minute. The administration issued dire threats that failure to enact a bill before the August recess would lead to disaster. Few, if any, knew what the language would actually do. The result of this flawed process was flawed legislation which virtually everyone now acknowledges must be substantially revised.

I commend the members of the Intelligence Committee for their diligent efforts to put together a new bill. They have taken their duties seriously and they have made notable improvements to the Protect America Act. But their bill is deeply flawed and I am opposed to enacting it in its current form. This bill fails to protect America's constitutional rights and fundamental freedoms. It is not just that the Intelligence Committee bill gives retroactive immunity to telecoms, which I strongly oppose; there are also many problems with title I of the Intelligence Committee bill.

First: It redefines ''electronic surveillance,'' a key term in FISA, in a way that is unnecessary and may have unintended consequences. We have still not heard a single good argument for why this change is needed.

Second: Court review occurs only after the fact with no consequences if the court rejects the Government's targeting of minimization procedures. This is a far cry from the traditional role played by the FISA Court.

Third: It is not as clear as it should be that FISA and the criminal wiretap law are the sole legal means by which the Government may conduct electronic surveillance. This leaves open the possibility that future administrations will claim that they are not bound by FISA.

Fourth: Its sunset provision is December 31, 2013. For legislation as complicated, important, and controversial as this, Congress should evaluate it much sooner. After all, the principal argument in support of reforming FISA is that technology has evolved rapidly and the law must change to take this into account. Because this legislation will make major untested changes to the FISA system and the pace of technology change will only increase, we should evaluate it sooner rather than later.

The bill purports to eliminate the ''reverse targeting'' of Americans, but does not actually contain language to do so. Reverse targeting can occur if the Government wiretaps someone abroad because it wants to listen to a correspondent in the United States, thereby evading the traditional warrant requirement for domestic surveillance. The Intelligence Committee bill has nothing similar to the House bill's provision on reverse targeting which prohibits use of the authorities if ''a significant purpose'' is targeting someone in the United States.

Mr. President, this legislation does not fully close the loophole left open by the Protect America Act, allowing warrantless interception of purely domestic communications. The administration has acknowledged that when it knows ahead of time that both the person making the call and the person receiving the call are located inside the United States, it should have to get a court order before it can listen in on that call. But the language of the bill doesn't clearly require it.

It does not require an independent review and report on the administration's domestic warrantless eavesdropping program. Only through such a process will we ever learn what happened and achieve accountability and closure on this episode. It is enormously important, Mr. President, that we find out exactly what happened during this period of our history.

Add it all up, and the sum is clear: This bill is inconsistent with the way FISA was meant to work and with the way FISA has always worked.

Fortunately, the Judiciary Committee's FISA bill shows that there is a better way, one that is faithful to the traditional FISA balance. The Judiciary Committee bill shares the same basic structure, but it addresses all of the problems I listed earlier. The Judiciary Committee bill was negotiated in public, which allowed outside groups and experts to give critical feedback. It was also negotiated later in time than the Intelligence bill, meaning we had the benefit of reviewing their work.

Like the Intelligence Committee's bill, the Judiciary Committee's version also gives the executive branch significantly greater authority to conduct electronic surveillance than it has ever had before. Make no mistake, it, too, grants substantial power to the intelligence community. But unlike the Intelligence Committee's bill, the Judiciary Committee's version sets reasonable limits to protect innocent Americans from being spied on by their Government without justification.

No one should underestimate the importance of title I of FISA. The rules governing electronic surveillance affect every American. They are the only thing that stands between the freedom of Americans to make a phone call, send an e-mail, and search the Internet, and the ability of the Government to listen in on that call, read that e-mail, and review that Internet search.

In our information age, title I of FISA provides Americans essential protections against Government tyranny and abuse. We have a choice. We can adopt the Judiciary Committee's bill and preserve those protections or we can adopt the Intelligence Committee's version of title I and abandon them.

As I have said before, I also strongly oppose title II of the Intelligence Committee bill, which grants retroactive immunity to the phone companies. At the appropriate time, I will come to the floor and explain why we must strike title II.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the bipartisan FISA legislation passed by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. This legislation, which was passed by the Intelligence Committee on a 13–2 vote, will give the intelligence community the tools it needs to effectively protect our Nation. It is not a perfect bill, but it is the balanced product of months of hard work by the Intelligence Committee members and their staff.

On the other hand, the substitute amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee would have substantially weakened the Intelligence Committee legislation and our nation's ability to protect itself. Unlike the bipartisan Intelligence Committee bill, the Judiciary Committee legislation was passed on a series of party-line 10–9 votes. The substitute would have added onerous and unnecessary hurdles to the collection of vital national security intelligence. It would have hamstrung our intelligence community at a very dangerous time in our country's history. I am pleased that the Senate quickly rejected the Judiciary Committee substitute. It would have been foolhardy for the Senate to hinder America's ability to protect itself from terrorists and other threats by gutting the Intelligence Committee bill.

Perhaps the biggest failure of the Judiciary substitute is its lack of a retroactive immunity provision for electronic communication service providers who are alleged to have assisted the government with intelligence activities in the aftermath of September 11. The telecommunications companies that lawfully responded to written requests from their government to help protect the nation need and deserve immunity from frivolous lawsuits that seek hundreds of billions of dollars in damages.

The Intelligence Committee bill includes a responsible retroactive immunity provision to protect the telecommunications companies that aided the government in the wake of the September 11 attacks. However, it leaves legal actions against the government and government officials untouched. The Judiciary Committee substitute does not address the critical need for retroactive immunity for cooperating companies and would risk a future where companies refuse to cooperate with vital government intelligence operations, lest they risk massive legal liability. Without immunity, our Nation faces a substantial decrease in future intelligence. Such a decrease would endanger American lives and is simply unacceptable.

Again, while not a perfect bill, the Intelligence Committee legislation would appropriately balance national security and individual civil liberties. Our intelligence community must be able to gather the information necessary to effectively protect the country. The Intelligence Committee bill is a bipartisan compromise with effective safeguards. The Senate should quickly pass this legislation to give the intelligence community the tools it needs to protect America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SALAZAR). The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be given the full 15 minutes that was allotted to us before the 2 o'clock vote. I have some remarks, and I believe Senator ROCKEFELLER, if we need that, would like the full 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, last night, as I was preparing to leave my office, I learned, with surprise, that Senator LEAHY had made significant modifications to the pending Judiciary Committee substitute.

Our study during the night of these modifications revealed that the partisan, Democratic-only Judiciary Committee substitute remains deeply flawed.

While some aspects of the modified substitute have been cleaned up—and, in fact, appear to borrow language that Senator ROCKEFELLER and I have been negotiating over the past several months as part of our perfecting managers' amendment—the substitute contains many problematic provisions that I cannot support.

In contrast to the underlying Intelligence Committee bill, I doubt that the problematic provisions in the modified substitute were vetted with the Republican Judiciary Committee members, the intelligence community, or the Department of Justice.

It should be no surprise, then, that the DNI and the Department of Justice continue to oppose the modified substitute.

Let me clarify some matters that were brought up by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts. First, the Protect America Act, which expires on February 1, was not negotiated in secret. The DNI asked the Intelligence Committee in April to consider a bill he set up. He came before our committee and testified openly in May. He came before the Senate in a classified meeting in S–407 in June. When we had not been able to get a markup in the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and time was running short, he offered a stripped-down version that would allow intelligence collection to continue. We were unable to get a markup, so we filed with Leader MCCONNELL the bill on Wednesday. That bill sat on the floor Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

There were secret negotiations, but those were on the majority side. The chairmen of several committees worked without informing the members of the Intelligence Committee or, to my knowledge, any Republicans on any of the committees, and they finally presented that to us less than an hour before we went to the floor. So that was negotiated in secret. It was unacceptable, and it did not allow intelligence collection to continue. I am glad to say, on a bipartisan basis, we rejected the secretly negotiated bill and passed the Protect America Act.

The Protect America Act did not expand on the authorities of FISA, other than to clarify the means of collection, which previously were by radio. Most communications overseas are by radio. Many communications were going through America. This bill before us today, the Intelligence Committee bill, does not, as my friend said, expand on the powers of the intelligence community to collect. In fact, they impose more restrictions to guarantee the privacy rights and the constitutional rights of Americans. Those are in the bill. Those were negotiated. We pushed the DNI and the Department of Justice lawyers as far as we could to build in additional protections. Those are in the bill.

Now, if one reads the bill, you would see that reverse targeting is prohibited in section 703(b), subparagraphs 2 and 3. It does strengthen the privacy protections. That is why the Senate Intelligence Committee bill is the bill that we should pass.

Moving back to the Judiciary Committee substitute, there is no provision for retroactive or prospective immunity for communications providers or for preemption of State investigations into providers' alleged assistance to the Government in relation to the terrorist surveillance program.

The distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator ROCKEFELLER, laid out at length, and very forcefully, why this protection is needed. This protection is needed to assure that we can have the continued assistance of carriers who might be called on not only in terrorist matters but on many domestic crimes to provide assistance. Furthermore, if we don't have that protection, if these lawsuits continue, it is quite likely that the court proceedings will get into details further on how the collection of electronic information and communications is accomplished. Every time we talk about that and lay out more, we give more information and more guidance to the terrorists themselves on how to avoid our surveillance. We don't want to be in that position.

The next problem with the substitute from the Judiciary Committee is that, unlike the managers' amendment that Senator ROCKEFELLER and I intend to offer for the Senate's consideration, the new substitute doesn't fix the reporting problems of the Wyden amendment, which had a great objective—and I agreed with the objective—but it is unworkable. We are going to make it workable in our bill.

Furthermore, it requires the intelligence community to perform the impossible task of estimating and recording U.S. person communications in its possession. Anybody who wants to know why that is so, we would be happy to meet with them in a closed meeting and explain why that is not workable. It would be an impossible burden, one we cannot undertake on the committee.

Next, the substitute modifies the exclusive means provision from the original substitute, but it is still problematic and requires an express statutory authorization. That presumes that after the next attack Congress will be in a position to act quickly to pass necessary authorizations. I don't think we want to impose that provision.

The underlying Intelligence Committee bill provides the same exclusive means, directions, and limitations that were in the FISA bill initially.

Another problem with the Judiciary Committee bill is that it places a provision in the Intelligence Committee bill that would have allowed collection to continue until the FISA Court of review has—if they had gotten an unfavorable ruling from one judge, it allows collection to continue until the court of review rules on it. This is a real problem if there is one unfavorable opinion that might put us deaf to collections that are necessary.

The Intelligence Committee determined that anything except an automatic stay through the FISA Court of review could jeopardize our intelligence collection. This was already a compromise from the full automatic stay that was in the Protect America Act.

Next, the substitute would impose unreasonable new restrictions on the use of foreign intelligence information, including information not concerning U.S. persons, obtained or derived from acquisitions using targeting procedures that the FISA Court found to be deficient in some manner, throwing out vital terrorist information because we didn't protect the constitutional rights or there were some procedural flaws in targeting a foreign terrorist in a foreign land.

It creates a superexclusionary rule in the foreign intelligence arena that is at odds with the 9/11 Commission's mandate for the intelligence community to find and link disparate pieces of foreign intelligence information.

Read what they said. It was important. They said we are not sharing information, and we need to share information within the community if we are going to have a chance to prevent the next 9/11.

On reverse targeting, the substitute changes the bright-line reverse targeting provision in S. 2248 to a new rule that changes ''the purpose'' to ''a significant purpose.'' This change is a significant concern to the DNI and DOJ. They told us it creates so much uncertainty in the appropriate legal standard for collection, and it may confuse analysts trying to follow the standards. This could inadvertently lead to less robust intelligence collection.

Under the bulk collection, while the new substitute modifies the bulk collection prohibition in the original Judiciary Committee substitute, it doesn't solve the problem. This provision could have significant unintended operational consequences, and it is unnecessary given restrictions in S. 2248 about intentionally targeting persons in the United States.

As I said, for example, if a general is about to order troops into Fallujah, this prohibition could impede the ability of the intelligence community to listen to calls coming into and out of that city without a court order.

The FISA Court would be commanded, under the Judiciary Committee's substitute, to assess compliance with minimization procedures used for the acquisition of foreign intelligence information from individuals outside the United States. As I reported earlier in my floor speech, there is a FISA Court opinion, In Re: Motion For Release, December 11, stating:

> The Court recognizes the executive branch has the expertise in national security, and the Court should not be making judgments as to which particular surveillance unit should be conducted.

Finally, it replaces a 6-year sunset with a 4-year sunset. As the Senator from Massachusetts said, this bill ought to be reviewed continually. Exactly. That is what the intelligence community should do. We should not have a provision that would sunset the authority for our collection of vital information. But we should have continuing oversight which the Intelligence Committees have provided and will continue to provide to make sure that collection is proceeding in a manner consistent with the Constitution, with the laws, and the regulations overseeing it.

We provide a robust oversight of the NSA collection. That collection must be done in a manner consistent with the guidelines that Congress has laid down, the Constitution has laid down, and the administration has laid down. If there is any problem with that, then it is up to the Intelligence Committees of both Houses to bring before the Congress, if we cannot correct it by interceding with the people in the agency, a bill to change it.

I see my chairman, Senator ROCKEFELLER, is here. I will be glad to yield the remaining 3 minutes of my time to the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri controls 2½ minutes. The Senator from Vermont controls 14 minutes.

The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I wish to take a few minutes to describe to the Senate my views on the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee, and why I will be opposing the amendment when we vote at 2.

First, I wish to repeat a few comments I made in my opening remarks when we debated the motion to proceed to S. 2248 in December.

From the beginning of the Senate's consideration of foreign intelligence surveillance legislation in 1976, the resulting law—the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978—has been the joint responsibility of both the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees. FISA is, after all, a law that concerns both intelligence collection and judicial proceedings.

The bill now before the Senate, S. 2248, was reported to the Senate by the Intelligence Committee last October, and then sequentially reported to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee in November.

As a parliamentary matter, the measure as reported by the Judiciary Committee is the pending amendment to the bill reported by the Intelligence Committee.

I agree with a number of the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee. I have been pleased to work with members of the Judiciary Committee on modifications that address particular concerns that had been raised by the administration.

I will accordingly support individual amendments to add those recommendations, as modified when necessary, to S. 2248. These include a strengthened exclusivity provision, a 4-year sunset, court review of compliance with minimization procedures, and an inspectors general report on the President's warrantless surveillance program in order to ensure there is a comprehensive historical record of that experience.

While I support many aspects of the Judiciary amendment, I cannot agree with recommendations of the Judiciary Committee that may have an adverse impact on U.S. intelligence collection or collection analysis, and that are not warranted by a realistic concern about U.S. privacy interests.

If any of those provisions are offered as individual amendments, I will, of course, study them, but must reserve the right to oppose them.

I will illustrate my concern by describing two provisions of the Judiciary amendment.

The Judiciary Committee substitute contains a ''significant purpose'' requirement. This has been described as a way to prevent reverse targeting—that is, conducting surveillance of a person overseas when the real target of the surveillance is a person within the United States.

The Intelligence Committee bill already explicitly codifies the existing prohibition on reverse targeting. What the Judiciary Committee substitute actually does is turn the reverse targeting prohibition on its head. I fear it would impose a new affirmative requirement that the government must seek a FISA Court order when in the course of targeting a foreign person outside the United States the government incidentally collects the communications of U.S. persons.

This is unworkable and would create untenable gaps in our intelligence coverage without significantly enhancing the privacy of Americans. Incidental communications with or about Americans should be handled properly, through minimization—a process that is strengthened in our bill. But the fact that there may also be a foreign intelligence interest when a foreign target is in contact with the United States should not be the cause of making it more difficult to undertake the surveillance of the foreign target.

The Judiciary Amendment also includes a provision altering the consequences of a FISA Court determination that there is a deficiency in the Government's targeting or minimization procedures under the new foreign targeting authority that will be enacted in S. 2248. Upon such a court determination, the Intelligence Committee bill would require the Government to either correct the deficiency or cease new acquisition.

The Judiciary Committee provision goes beyond the requirement that deficiencies be corrected or new acquisitions ceased. It would take the further step of preventing all use of information already acquired under the new procedure that concerns U.S. persons, unless the Attorney General determines that the information indicates a threat of death or serious bodily harm.

The provision is impractical. And it creates risks that we will lose valuable intelligence.

The Judiciary Committee provision would require intelligence analysts to go through all of the intelligence that had been collected under the new process—presumably a very large collection of materials—to identify information that might be subject to the restriction and make sure that it had been not used in disseminated intelligence.

Even for minor deficiencies in procedures, this provision would therefore require the Intelligence Community to discard information that might constitute significant intelligence, and to focus its analytical resources on satisfying this provision rather than collecting and analyzing new intelligence. In my view, this allocation of resources makes no sense.

At the end of our debate this morning, the Senate will be asked to vote on the pending Judiciary Committee amendment as a whole, either by way of a tabling motion or directly on the amendment.

Although, as I have indicated, there are parts of the Judiciary amendment that I look forward to supporting, there are two reasons, with all respect to the members of the Judiciary Committee, why I cannot support the pending substitute amendment as a whole.

The first is that the form, and consequently the effect of the amendment, goes beyond what the members of the Judiciary Committee decided during their deliberations, and guts key parts of S. 2248 beyond any reasons agreed to by a majority of the Judiciary Committee.

S. 2248 has two substantive titles, in addition to a third title on transition procedures.

The first title addresses intelligence collection; it is the direct replacement of the Protect America Act.

The second title addresses the many lawsuits against telephone and internet companies for their alleged cooperation with the Government.

At its markup, the Judiciary Committee rejected, by a clear 7-to-12 vote, an amendment to strike title II on liability protection. Previously, the Intelligence Committee had voted against striking title II by a 3-to-12 vote. In short, while there may be good ideas, that certainly merit debate, about improving title II, there has not been majority support in the Senate for striking it.

Yet, notwithstanding the lack of support in either the Judiciary or Intelligence Committee for striking title II, the form in which the Judiciary Committee reported its amendment would do just that.

We will welcome a debate about improving title II, but on behalf of the Intelligence Committee—which voted overwhelmingly for title II—I must defend keeping title II in the base text before the Senate. For that reason alone, I must oppose the Judiciary amendment, even as I support individual elements of it.

Second, as I have previously mentioned, even with respect to title I, there are portions of the Judiciary amendment that I must oppose on the ground that they will have an adverse impact on intelligence collection or the use of intelligence that is not warranted by a realistic concern about U.S. privacy interests.

Accordingly, with great respect for my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee, I will vote against the Judiciary amendment. I also look forward to joining them in urging the adoption of specific amendments to improve the Intelligence Committee bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, obviously I disagree with the description of the Senate Judiciary Committee's amendment. I spoke on this yesterday, but I am going to take a few minutes to describe what is in the Judiciary Committee's bill.

I support the Judiciary Committee amendment to the FISA Amendments Act of 2007. The Judiciary Committee amendment would make important improvements to the Intelligence Committee bill, at the same time maintaining its structure and its authority.

The so-called Protect America Act was rushed through the Senate last summer in an atmosphere of fear and intimidation. We even saw a key member of the administration make commitments to numerous Senators, Republicans and Democrats, on that bill and then break his word, first to us and then on national television.

It was a bad bill that has provided sweeping new powers to the Government. It imposes no checks on the Government and provides no oversight or protection for Americans' privacy.

The Intelligence Committee did important work last fall in crafting a bill that begins to walk back from the excesses of the Protect America Act. I commend both Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND for that. But two committees in the Senate have jurisdiction over FISA the Intelligence Committee and the Judiciary Committee.

The Intelligence Committee acted first to establish a good structure for conducting critical overseas surveillance. The Judiciary Committee's amendment maintains that structure and the authority for surveillance. But in my view and in the view of many Senators, the Intelligence Committee bill does not do enough to protect the rights of Americans. Indeed, many members of the Intelligence Committee voted for that bill knowing that the Judiciary Committee would have an opportunity to improve it, and they expected us to do that.

FISA is among the most important pieces of legislation this Congress has passed. It is there to provide a mechanism to conduct surveillance, it is critical to our security, but also protect the privacy and civil liberties of all Americans.

Let's be clear, this new authority expands FISA to allow more flexibility to conduct surveillance. If we are going to expand surveillance, we have to take great care to protect American civil liberties, and that is what the Judiciary Committee adds.

I praise the members who serve on both the Judiciary and Intelligence Committees—Senators FEINSTEIN, FEINGOLD, and WHITEHOUSE, who contributed so much to the Judiciary Committee's efforts to improve this legislation. These Senators and others on the Judiciary Committee worked hard to craft amendments that preserve the basic structure and authority in the bill reported by the Select Committee on Intelligence, while adding crucial protections for Americans.

The Judiciary Committee bill makes about 12 changes to the Intelligence Committee bill. Let me address a few of them.

First, the Judiciary Committee bill contains a very strong exclusivity provision. This provision makes clear that the Government cannot claim authority to operate outside the law—outside of FISA—from measures that were never intended to provide such exceptional authority.

This administration argues that the Authorization for the Use of Military Force, passed after September 11, provided the justification for conducting warrantless surveillance of Americans for more than five years. No, what it did was authorize going into Afghanistan to get Osama bin Laden—the man who masterminded the attacks on 9/11. Not only did the administration fail to do that, it took our troops out of Afghanistan—when they had bin Laden cornered—to invade Iraq.

When we authorized going after Osama bin Laden, we did not authorize explicitly or implicitly the warrantless wiretapping of Americans. Yet this administration still clings to this phony legal argument. The Judiciary Committee bill would prevent that dangerous contention with strong language reaffirming that FISA is the exclusive means for conducting electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes. The Senate Intelligence Committee's bill would do nothing to preclude the AUMF argument in the future.

We also provide a more meaningful role for the FISA Court in this new surveillance. This court is a critical independent check on Government excess in the sensitive area of electronic surveillance.

The fundamental purpose of many of the Judiciary Committee changes is to ensure that this important independent check remains meaningful, while maintaining the flexibility of ''blanket'' orders, which we all agree are necessary. The Intelligence Committee bill would give the FISA Court only a very limited role in overseeing surveillance.

The Judiciary Committee bill would give the FISA Court the authority it needs to assess the Government's compliance with minimization procedures. It would allow the Court to request additional information from the Government, and allow the Court to enforce compliance with its orders. The amendment would also give the court discretion to impose restrictions on the use and dissemination of Americans' information if it is collected unlawfully.

The Judiciary bill would make other important changes. It reduces the sunset for this new law from 6 years to 4 years. This was Senator CARDIN's amendment. There is too much here that is new and untested to allow the authorities go longer than even the next President's term before requiring a thorough review. It clarifies that the bill does not allow bulk collection that would simply sweep up all calls into and out of the United States. It also clarifies that the Government may not use this new authority to target Americans indirectly if they are not allowed to do it directly. The administration says it would never do this. They have no credibility. The Judiciary Committee's bill would make sure they keep their word.

Finally, the Judiciary Committee bill includes a requirement that inspectors general, including the Department of Justice inspector general, conduct a thorough review of the so-called Terrorist Surveillance Program and report back to the Congress and, to the extent it can in an unclassified version, to the American people.

The Department of Justice inspector general will have the responsibility to look at, among other things, the process at the Department of Justice that limited knowledge and review of important legal decisions to a tiny group of like-minded individuals, at great cost to the rule of law and American values. This is a key measure that would finally require accountability for this administration. We have not yet had anything close to a comprehensive examination of what happened and how it happened. We cannot expect to learn from mistakes if we refuse to allow them to be examined.

I strongly oppose a provision in the Intelligence Committee bill that would grant blanket retroactive immunity to telecommunications carriers for their warrantless surveillance activities from 2001 through earlier this year. That provision goes even beyond the so-called Protect America Act. It would insulate this administration from accountability for its lawbreaking. The Judiciary Committee bill does not have that provision. I know that will be a separate debate on this floor.

With the authority of a majority of the Judiciary Committee members, I made a few changes to the amendment as we reported it in November. There are no major additions or deletions. The original 12 changes are still there. The revised version makes some changes to address technical issues and concerns the administration raised about our substitute. We have considered the Statement of Administration Policy from last December and we have talked with the administration. We have listened and made changes that we think address some legitimate concerns.

For example, we have revised the exclusivity provision. The provision in the earlier version of the Judiciary Committee amendment could have been read to extend the scope of FISA in a way that was not intended. We corrected that.

Another concern we addressed was about the issue of staying FISA Court decisions pending appeal. The Intelligence Committee bill would automatically stay FISA Court decisions, thereby requiring possibly illegal surveillance to continue throughout a lengthy appeal process. The original Judiciary Committee amendment left the decision about a stay to the discretion of the FISA Court judges—which is how it is typically done in courts. The administration was concerned that this left too much power to stop surveillance in the hands of a lone judge. We listened and made a change that would permit the stay decision to be made—promptly—by a panel of the FISA Court of Review.

Another change we made to address an administration concern was the important IG audit provision. That provision now makes it clear that no department inspector general has the authority to conduct a review of another department.

These revisions make the Judiciary Committee's product stronger. I think overall the Judiciary Committee's bill dramatically improves the Intelligence Committee bill. As the distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee said, we included a number of items he supports. If this gets voted down, these are changes that Senators will have to offer piece by piece, and will. Most of it will be germane after cloture. If we really want to conclude this FISA debate quickly, adopting this amendment will save the Senate countless hours of debate. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment. Now, Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has 2 minutes 40 seconds.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, let me just talk about this a little bit.

Incidentally, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. BOND. I am going to offer a motion to table, but yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There appears to be a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, we all want to be able to collect intelligence on terrorists. When I came here, during the Cold War, we wanted to be sure we could collect on our adversaries. We still want to be sure we can do that. That is why I have voted for dozens of changes to FISA over the years, requested by both Republican and Democratic administrations. I voted for them because the administrations made a clear and convincing case each time that we needed a change to keep up with the technology or to keep up with a changing threat.

But let's not be so frightened by terrorists that we go back to the situation we had during the Watergate era, when we found our Government was spying on people who disagreed with it. The government spied on people who had legitimate concerns about, for example, the war in Vietnam or the excesses of J. Edgar Hoover. The government could do that back then because there were no checks and there was no oversight. We do not want to go back to that time. We can do our intelligence gathering and protect Americans at the same time.

Now, Mr. President, has my time expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has 30 seconds.

Mr. LEAHY. Is that the only time anybody has?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LEAHY. I yield back all time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I move to table, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There appears to be a sufficient second.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the Judiciary Committee substitute, as modified. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DURBIN. I announce that the Senator from New York (Mrs. CLINTON) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. OBAMA) are necessarily absent.

Mr. KYL. The following Senators are necessarily absent: the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. GRAHAM) and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. MCCAIN).

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEBB). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 36, as follows:

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOND. I move to reconsider the vote and to lay that on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, there will be an amendment offered by Senators ROCKEFELLER and BOND. It is a substitute that will be pending for a while. What we are going to try to do over here, I have spoken to a number of Members who want to offer amendments relating to title I. We are working out an order in which they will be offered. What we would like to do is have a number of them offered, debated, and have a time this afternoon that we can vote on all of them in succession. We will try to finish all the title I amendments, and then we will move to title II. We hope there isn't a lot of time spent on each amendment, but Members have a right to take whatever time they want. In an effort to make this more understandable, rather than jumping back and forth, title I and title II, on this side we will try to offer amendments as they relate to title I.

We understand there is no requirement to do this. But if there are amendments the minority wants to offer, we will certainly be cooperative and make sure we have the ability to go back and forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be set aside and I call up amendment——

Mr. REID. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has been very patient. As soon as Senators ROCKEFELLER and BOND finish offering their substitute, I ask unanimous consent that Senator FEINGOLD have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I will object momentarily. I wish to discuss the matter with the majority leader. Let's have Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND go ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mrs. MURRAY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 3911

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and Senator BOND and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER], for himself and Mr. BOND, proposes an amendment numbered 3911.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The amendment is printed in today's RECORD under ''Text of Amendments.'')

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, the distinguished vice chairman, Senator BOND, and I have joined in a bipartisan amendment to S. 2248, the FISA Amendments Act of 2008. The Rockefeller-Bond amendment perfects various details of the underlying bill but its main purpose is to provide explicit statutory protection, for the first time in the 30 years of FISA, for Americans who are outside the United States.

The amendment stands for the simple proposition that Americans, whether they are working, studying, traveling or serving in our Armed Forces outside the United States, do not lose their rights as Americans when it comes to the actions of their own Government. In 1791, when the Bill of Rights was ratified, including, of course, the fourth amendment, which protects our people from unreasonable search and seizure, there were 4 million Americans. That was it. Now that very number of Americans, 4 million, lives outside the United States and, of course, many millions more travel each year outside the United States.

Because this amendment is so important and because it has gone through so much development to reach the point at which we have now arrived, I would like to take, frankly, a few minutes to describe its origin and evolution, with the forbearance of my colleagues.

The protection of Americans outside the United States may have been the single most important piece of business left undone by the original FISA statute created in 1978. To fill that void, President Reagan issued an executive order, Executive Order 12333, that addresses the use of intelligence techniques such as electronic surveillance or unconsented searches against Americans abroad.

Executive Order 12333 requires that intelligence agencies have procedures and that those procedures protect the constitutional rights of Americans overseas. It also requires the Attorney General to determine that there is probable cause to conclude that the American overseas is an agent of a foreign power before the U.S. Government undertakes electronic surveillance or conducts searches abroad against that person. That was good but insufficient. In our country of laws, we do not usually leave it, outside of an emergency, to any Attorney General to decide alone whether there is probable cause for a search. That is a decision which we entrust to neutral judges.

Our bipartisan amendment—Senator BOND's and mine—makes sure Americans do not lose that important protection by setting foot outside the United States.

Vice Chairman BOND and I took the first step when we included, in our October Intelligence Committee mark, a provision concerning acquisition by the intelligence community of the communications of U.S. persons abroad.

We focused our proposal on the circumstance when the Government is seeking those communications from electronic communication providers within the United States. We did not address the targeting of U.S. persons overseas by intelligence community collection methods that are employed outside the United States.

The provision before the Intelligence Committee in its October markup would have allowed the Attorney General to determine that a U.S. person outside the United States was a foreign power, agent of a foreign power, or an officer or employee of a foreign power, and then target that person for collection. Under our proposal, the Attorney General would then have been required to submit that probable cause determination to the FISA Court for review.

But as the chairmen and ranking members of committees sometimes learn from their full membership of their committees, important ideas may require broad solutions.

During our committee markup, Senator WYDEN offered an amendment on targeting U.S. persons abroad that substituted two new sections in place of the language described above on targeting U.S. persons abroad.

First, the Wyden amendment required the Government to obtain a standard FISA order for electronic surveillance—known as a title I order—before the Government could target U.S. persons outside the United States by seeking their communications from providers in the United States.

Thus, rather than the new procedure described in our chairman and vice chairman mark, the amendment required a title I FISA application and order whenever the collection against an American abroad occurred with the assistance of a provider in the United States.

Second, the Wyden amendment required that the Government, when acting outside the United States, obtain a FISA Court order before targeting the communications of U.S. persons located outside the United States.

Specifically, it required a FISA Court order that there was probable cause to believe that the U.S. person who was the target of surveillance was, in fact, a foreign power or an agent of a foreign power before the Government employed surveillance techniques outside the United States. This second part of the Wyden amendment implemented an entirely new concept of law.

A court order has never before been required for foreign intelligence collection that is conducted entirely outside the United States, even if that collection involves U.S. persons. But while new, it quickly became evident it was an idea whose time had come. The Wyden amendment passed the committee with a vote of 9 to 6.

Yet, as often is the case for an initial amendment of such magnitude, it was also immediately clear that further work needed to be done before the proposal became law to make sure it worked well in practice.

During the markup, Senator WHITEHOUSE, who is a member of the Judiciary Committee—and in his first year in this body has already emerged as a leading legal voice among us—stated he would be willing to work on the language of the amendment in the Judiciary Committee, on which he also serves, during the sequential referral process to ensure that it achieved its desired goal and did not result in unintended decreases in collection.

Senator WHITEHOUSE, working with the Department of Justice, was largely responsible for the changes made to the provision on U.S. persons outside the United States that is included in the Judiciary Committee substitute amendment. It is a good amendment.

He focused his efforts to changes on the second part of the section, the portion relating to collection of electronic communications outside the United States. The provision requiring a traditional FISA electronic surveillance application for collection inside the United States remained mostly unchanged in the Judiciary Committee markup.

The Judiciary Committee amendment makes some necessary technical fixes to the section on collection outside the United States. It stressed that the FISA Court would only be permitted to assess the question of probable cause for collection outside the United States, not the methods of acquisition of the information, as any such inquiry might delve into very sensitive intelligence matters.

The Judiciary Committee section on collection outside the United States also made three other important changes:

First, the addition of emergency procedures, similar to those included in other parts of FISA, that would allow the Attorney General to acquire the information as long as a subsequent order is obtained; second, a more explicit, individualized review of minimization procedures; and, third, the addition of procedures to transition current acquisitions under Executive Order 12333 over to the new procedure.

The managers' amendment, offered by Senator BOND and myself, now seeks to complete this process by fully integrating the new procedure into the overall reforms contained in the FISA Amendments Act of 2008 and does so in a manner that maintains an effective system of intelligence collection.

In the course of doing that, we have sought to resolve, in conjunction with the Department of Justice and the intelligence community, several problems identified with the Judiciary Committee substitute.

The most significant changes in the managers' amendment have been made to the first part of the Wyden amendment: the requirement that the Government obtain standard electronic surveillance—title I—orders for the targeting of U.S. persons abroad that occurs within the United States.

That provision, as of this moment, remains a part of our base bill and will remain so until an amendment is adopted. As I will discuss in more detail, our proposed changes are required because the language of this provision, as reported out of both the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees, would prevent certain types of important foreign intelligence collection.

First, the definition ''agent of a foreign power'' in FISA, which requires a U.S. person to have engaged in certain types of wrongdoing, is different than the definition of ''agent of a foreign power'' that has traditionally been used in overseas collection against Americans.

The Director of National Intelligence has therefore proposed, and we agree, that collection against a U.S. person abroad should be expanded beyond ''agent of a foreign power'' to ''an officer or employee of a foreign power,'' to cover the types of collection that have traditionally been allowed against U.S. persons overseas.

For example, the notorious Charles Taylor, the former President of Liberia, who is now charged with crimes against humanity, is an American who was an officer of a foreign power.

Second, the Judiciary Committee provision did not deal with the issue of stored electronic communications or stored electronic data, the collection of which is dealt with under title III rather than title I of FISA and which are an important part of the acquisition system that is established by the new title VII that S. 2248 will add to FISA.

To address this issue, the managers' amendment that Senator BOND and I are proposing, after extensive technical consultations with the intelligence community and the Department of Justice, adds two sections to the new title VII in our committee's bill, and, in so doing, addresses the intelligence collection concerns identified by the Director of National Intelligence.

By placing all the relevant detail for collection against U.S. persons overseas in the same new title of FISA—title VII—that includes all other procedures for persons outside the United States, the managers' amendment provides a comprehensive, consolidated roadmap for all those in the intelligence community, the Department of Justice, and the FISA Court who will have the responsibility to implement our amendment.

In conclusion, I would like to underscore some major points.

As is evident from everything I have described, it is important to thank two members of our committee for their work on this issue of targeting Americans overseas.

Senator WYDEN, obviously, is one of those. I wish to recognize his leadership at all times in this area. He recognized the importance of the issue and successfully offered an amendment at the Intelligence Committee mark-up that broadened the protections contained in our bill.

Senator WHITEHOUSE has been indispensable contributor to the effort on this provision as well, quietly working out problems and making things work better. His work goes a long way toward ensuring that the provision can be successfully implemented by the intelligence community, which is key.

By adopting this amendment on a bipartisan basis, the Intelligence Committee—and now the vice chairman and myself in our managers' amendment—seek to ensure that Americans are protected from unwarranted surveillance, whether they are inside or outside the United States.

This is a significant new protection for U.S. persons. When the United States conducts foreign intelligence collection overseas on a U.S. person located outside the United States, currently only the Attorney General, not a court, makes a probable cause determination. I have said that. U.S. citizens have never before been entitled by statute to court protection in this area. Now, hopefully, they will be.

Our bipartisan goal is clear: A court must be involved when U.S. persons are targeted for surveillance, no matter where those persons are located or how they are targeted.

We are also in agreement that our original committee provision and the work of the Judiciary Committee needed refinement to ensure it did not have unintended consequences that might limit the collection of foreign intelligence information. The purpose of our amendment is to make sure we do not reduce the scope of any current intelligence collection.

Our managers' amendment accomplishes this goal. Under the managers' amendment, if a U.S. person is targeted overseas by using a communications provider within the United States, FISA will now require that the Government submit an application to the FISA Court and obtain a FISA Court order. Although the process to obtain the order is tailored to address some of the operational concerns relevant to the issue of collection on U.S. persons located outside the United States, and consolidated in a new title of FISA, the procedures are as robust and protective of the privacy rights of U.S. persons as existing FISA procedures.

If the acquisition occurs outside the United States, FISA will now require that the FISA Court issue an order finding that there is probable cause to believe the U.S. person who is the target of the acquisition is an agent, officer or employee of a foreign power, without involving the FISA Court in the methods of overseas collection.

Those methods of overseas collection will continue to be governed by applicable executive branch directives, such as Executive Order 12333, which impose limits on intelligence agencies in order to protect the constitutional rights and other legal rights of Americans.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I thank the chairman for his extensive discussion of this measure. This is one of the significant additions we are making to the preexisting FISA law. It is something that was brought up and discussed in the committee. There was general agreement that an American or a U.S. person who goes abroad ought to be provided some form of protection. We discussed it at length.

The objective was provided in a very brief statement in the amendment that appeared before the committee. I was very concerned about it because I knew just enough about the FISA law to be thoroughly confused about how it would work. I voted against it but expressed my desire and willingness to work with the sponsor of this amendment and the other members of the committee because it was a good idea.

Well, we found out how complicated it is to amend and to change the FISA law because of the many working parts, not only within the law but within the actual means of interception.

Well, we worked for better than a month on a bipartisan basis with the proponents of this measure—and I consider myself a proponent of this measure—with the intelligence community, lawyers for the Department of Justice, and we came up with a simple little 25-page statutory provision. It is now included in the managers' amendment.

Should anyone think it is simple to amend FISA, I suggest you begin reading at page 5 of the measure before us, and read through page 29, I believe it is, to show how it is accomplished. Nevertheless, this puts in a new layer of protection for U.S. persons. Obviously, we are concerned. Those are American citizens who are abroad.

There were questions raised: Well, if I go abroad, can the intelligence community tap my phone without a court order? Well, first of all, the intelligence community is not going to be tapping anybody's phone or trying to listen in on any—intercept any conversations unless they have good, solid information that that phone is in a terrorist's hands. They have to have intel before they even look at that conversation. That intel could come in many forms which I won't describe here, but that—first of all, if you are abroad, you would not have been targeted unless you had certain reasonable connections with a terrorist activity or a terrorist who would give the Attorney General and the intelligence community the basis for asserting that there was a terrorist content to the phone conversation.

Now, why do they do this? Because they have more communications than they can handle. They have more terrorist communications almost than it is possible to keep up with. The last thing they want to do is target a conversation of a U.S. person or an American abroad who doesn't have any connection to terrorist activities. So previously, only if there was one of the connections that would give reasonable grounds to lead the Attorney General to say that there was valuable foreign intelligence collection would you collect on it. But now, if that is an American citizen or, more broadly, a U.S. person, they have to go to the intelligence court, the FISC, to get an order—two different kinds of orders depending upon how the collection is going to occur—and get an order finding that there is probable cause to believe, as the chairman has said, that this person is an agent, officer, employee of a foreign power and has foreign intelligence information that may be communicated.

So this is a protection that I hope those concerned about the use of electronic surveillance will understand is a significant step we have taken toward protecting the rights of American citizens. But I point out the fact that it took us a month and about 24 or 25 pages to accomplish it. But with that being said, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support it. This is a major new expansion of protection for American citizens, U.S. persons, and this is one of the privacy constitutional right protections added by this bill that was never there before. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 3909 TO NO. 3911

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 3909.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. FEINGOLD] proposes an amendment numbered 3909 to amendment No. 3911.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: To require that certain records be submitted to Congress)

Strike subsection (b) of section 103, and insert the following:

(b) REPORTS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL ON CERTAIN OTHER ORDERS.—Such section 601 is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

''(c) SUBMISSIONS TO CONGRESS.—The Attorney General shall submit to the committees of Congress referred to in subsection (a)—

''(1) a copy of any decision, order, or opinion issued by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court or the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review that includes significant construction or interpretation of any provision of this Act, and any pleadings associated with such decision, order, or opinion, not later than 45 days after such decision, order, or opinion is issued; and

''(2) a copy of any such decision, order, or opinion, and the pleadings associated with such decision, order, or opinion, that was issued during the 5-year period ending on the date of the enactment of the FISA Amendments Act of 2008 and not previously submitted in a report under subsection (a).''.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator DODD be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, this amendment is a straightforward reporting requirement that is critical if Congress is to understand how the foreign intelligence surveillance laws it passes, including this one, are being interpreted and applied. The issue is very simple. If the FISA Court makes a significant interpretation of the law, I think Congress should know about it. Congress can't conduct oversight of intelligence unless it knows what the court is and is not permitting the administration to do. Congress can't pass new legislation without knowing how the court has interpreted current law.

This issue is absolutely fundamental to our constitutional system. Congress has a responsibility to understand the impact of the laws it is passing. The courts should have the assurance that when they interpret the law, those interpretations will be communicated to the legislature. This isn't some unusual idea; this is how our system of government has operated from its inception.

Specifically, this amendment does two things. First, it requires that when the court issues an opinion that includes a significant legal interpretation, the Government must provide the Government's pleadings associated with that decision to Congress. Now, these pleadings are often critical to understanding the legal interpretations of the court. This is in part because at times the court's opinions merely reference and approve the Government's arguments made in those pleadings. So it is really necessary to be able to review the pleadings themselves if you are going to understand the court's decision. They are also necessary to understand how the Government interprets and seeks to implement the law.

Neither Congress's oversight of the intelligence community nor any responsible legislating in the area of foreign intelligence surveillance can be effective without these documents. Yet, even today, as Congress considers this FISA legislation, the administration continues to refuse to provide Congress with important FISA Court pleadings.

The other reason is this: The amendment requires that the Government provide Congress with FISA Court orders that include significant interpretations of law over the last 5 years. Now, this is necessary because there was an enormous loophole in previous statutory reporting requirements that would be closed for the first time by this Intelligence Committee bill.

The Government didn't previously have to provide Congress with significant interpretations of law if they were included in court orders rather than court decisions or opinions. But we know from the administration's public announcement in January about the President's wiretapping program that such legal interpretations are, in fact, found in orders. For Congress to have any sense of how the court has interpreted the FISA statute, therefore, it is critical to understand recent jurisprudence. Congress needs to have access to FISA Court orders not just going forward but for the past 5 years as well.

This is not theoretical. The administration has refused to provide to Congress orders containing significant interpretations of law, and that is just what we know of. Without this amendment, we might never know what other important legal interpretations are out there.

To be clear, I first offered an amendment to require that FISA Court orders and other documents be provided to Congress through the intelligence authorization bill. It was approved on a bipartisan basis. It was later removed from the authorization bill, and only a watered-down version was included in the Intelligence Committee FISA bill. What my amendment today does is merely put the language back that has already been given the support of a bipartisan majority of the Intelligence Committee.

The most appropriate arrangement for Congress to obtain information related to the FISA Court would be for the court to provide it directly, without the involvement of the executive branch. So granting the executive branch any role in an exchange between the two other branches of Government, which is what my amendment actually allows, is, in fact, already a compromise.

But this amendment is a direct response to the administration's assertion that it can withhold FISA Court opinions and documents that include significant interpretations of law from Congress—not letting us read these things. Imagine if the administration tried to keep Supreme Court decisions from Congress. Even worse, imagine if the administration tried to keep from Congress a decision like Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which rejected the administration's military commissions, just as Congress was considering the Military Commissions Act. Congress wouldn't stand for it. Yet that is exactly what is happening in the world of intelligence.

There are really no serious, substantive reasons to oppose this amendment. Orders and pleadings will be provided to the Intelligence Committee in a classified and, if necessary, redacted manner, just as FISA Court decisions are now. This is the furthest thing from an onerous reporting requirement. If there are FISA Court orders that include significant interpretations of law, Government lawyers certainly know what they are and where to find them.

It is sometimes said that intelligence in technical terms ''belongs'' to the executive branch. I disagree. But in any case, such an argument simply doesn't apply here. This amendment relates to the documents of an article III court. Just last month, that court confirmed in a rare public opinion that it has ''inherent power'' over its own records—in other words, they do not belong to the executive branch.

Finally, let me stress the scope of the information Congress needs before it can conduct effective oversight and legislative responsibility.

While the public is understandably focused on the FISA Court's involvement with regard to the President's warrantless wiretapping program, the FISA Court is actually responsible for interpreting all of the FISA statutes. Now, that includes the electronic surveillance issues we are considering here today but also physical searches of Americans' homes and the collection of sensitive business records, including library and medical records. Just as Congress should know how the Protect America Act and this FISA bill will be interpreted, it should have similar information with regard to the FISA provisions related to the PATRIOT Act and any other legislation that governs surveillance and affects the rights of Americans.

This simple reporting requirement is critical to congressional oversight, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I support Senator FEINGOLD's amendment to provide Congress with additional materials from the FISA Court to enable Congress to conduct more effective oversight. This amendment is one of the many improvements to the Senate Intelligence bill adopted by the Judiciary Committee and included in the Judiciary Committee's substitute amendment. Regrettably, that substitute was tabled by the full Senate earlier today. But I urge Senators to reconsider their votes with respect to this simple but critically important reporting requirement.

Under current law, semi-annual reporting requirements allow the government to wait up to a year before informing the Congress about important interpretations of law made by the FISA Court. The Senate Intelligence bill took a step in the right direction by requiring that Congress be provided with the orders, decisions and opinions of the FISA Court that include significant interpretation of law within 45 days after they are issued.

Senator FEINGOLD's amendment would go a step further to ensure sound oversight by Congress of the activities of the FISA Court. It would require that, when the FISA Court issues an opinion containing a significant legal interpretation, the government must provide Congress with the government's pleadings related to the case. This is critically important because, where the FISA Court simply adopts the government's reasoning in one of its decision, Congress will have no way of knowing the true basis for the court's ruling without access to the government's pleadings.

The Feingold amendment would also require that Congress now be provided with any significant interpretations of law by the FISA Court that were not provided to Congress over the past 5 years. Access to past jurisprudence, as well as current decisions, is critical to Congress's understanding of how FISA is being interpreted and implemented.

Opponents of this amendment say that it may create additional ''paperwork.'' But if Congress can be better informed about the workings of the FISA Court—a court Congress created—and can more effectively oversee the government's advocacy in that Court, then any incremental additional paperwork is clearly in the best interests of the American public. Opponents also say that the pleadings may reveal sources and methods, and therefore cannot be turned over to the Congress. This is a red herring. As Senator FEINGOLD has stated repeatedly, this amendment is not intended to compel disclosure of this kind of information, and nothing in the amendment could be construed to change the time-tested practice of redacting information that could reveal sources and methods.

I urge all Senators to support the Feingold amendment, and to reject any attempts to water down this important reporting requirement by way of second-degree amendments.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, this measure has been considered in the Intelligence Committee. I believed it was not necessary to require additional paperwork, but also I think it is important to note that some of the charges made about the powers given to the intelligence community are way out of bounds.

This measure before us does, in fact, put further constraints on the intelligence community. There are powers that exist in both the intelligence community and in law enforcement agencies which may not be affected here. But to say this offers broad new means of getting into business records and other personal effects of individuals—this is a bill devoted to electronic surveillance. The reason we needed to do the bill on electronic surveillance was the fact that the means of electronic surveillance have changed, and the old FISA law did not permit the kind of collection that previously was permitted when communications outside the United States were by radio rather than by cable.

The whole purpose of this bill is to ensure that there are procedures in place to permit surveillance targeting people reasonably believed to be outside the United States who have connections with terrorist activities, so that they are an agent or an employee or an officer of a foreign power and have legitimate foreign intelligence information. That is the test. That is what this does. Arguments about the nature of foreign intelligence surveillance should be limited to this bill.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, might I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin a question. As I read the amendment, it is silent with respect to the ability of the administration to—or the appropriate authorities to redact material in the interests of protecting their sources and methods. Is it assumed in the amendment that the authority to redact would exist?

Mr. FEINGOLD. Not only is it assumed, but I just stated specifically on the floor a few minutes ago that it would exist.

Mr. KYL. I thought I had heard the Senator indicate that redaction would be permitted, and that is the intent of the amendment; is that correct?

Mr. FEINGOLD. Correct.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3916 TO AMENDMENT NO. 3909

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I send a second-degree amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOND] proposes an amendment numbered 3916 to amendment No. 3909.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, line 8, strike all after ''subsection (a)'' through page 2, line 14, and insert the following: '', with due regard to the protection of the national security of the United States—

''(1) a copy of any decision, order, or opinion issued by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court or the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of review that includes significant construction or interpretation of any provision of this Act, not later than 45 days after such decision, order, or opinion is issued; and

''(2) a copy of any such decision, order, or opinion that was issued during the 5-year period ending on the date of the enactment of the FISA Amendments Act of 2008 and not previously submitted in a report under subsection (a).''.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, as the sponsor of the first-degree amendment has noted, this was debated and it was adopted on I believe a 10-to-5 or 9-to-6 vote in the committee, but we found out there were substantial problems with this amendment to which the intelligence community objected. We modified it to the provisions that are now in the current managers' amendment and the underlying bill.

The major problem with this amendment is the pleadings. Pleadings have historically been protected during any litigation involving FISA. Congress has only received limited access to certain pleadings, certain actions for audit purposes in controlled circumstances.

This amendment I have offered incorporates the national security protection, which the author of the underlying amendment suggested, and it does provide for the 5 years of back opinions from the FISC. This gives the 5 years. We have had semiannual reports from the FISC on all of the opinions handed down in the previous 6 months.

It is somewhat burdensome, but I have been negotiating with the Department of Justice lawyers. They say while it is burdensome, this is not objectionable. They prefer not to have it, but the one thing on which they are standing firm and believe they cannot accept is to require turning over the pleadings.

The pleadings are actually some of the most sensitive intelligence information we have because in those pleadings the Government has to describe the facilities to be used, the targets of the collection, the information, and how the information is going to be collected, who gave them the information, how they got it. This is the ultimate description of sources and methods. Any time the sources and methods or the assets are disclosed, it is possibly a death sentence to someone who is working with us undercover or as an agent. The Department of Justice believes this information is so sensitive that it has to be kept extremely closely held within the court and the people who must see it to issue the order. Without that protection, they believe that our most sensitive assets, our means of collection, where the facilities are, the whole framework of our intelligence system could be brought down. The opinions themselves go into legal reasoning; they give the justifications. They are the end product of the work of the FISC.

What the Department of Justice says the intelligence community is unwilling to give is to lay out and submit to Congress the whole list of information of sources, methods, facilities, targets, the names of assets, or the identification of assets that could result in death for the informant, the agents, or the assets.

We have accepted a portion of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. This accepts another portion, but that final portion is objectionable and is a red line. I urge my colleagues not to support the amendment which turns over the very most secret sources and methods which the intelligence community cannot afford to share.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the second-degree amendment. This is a classic example of people hiding behind a tragedy in this country to make arguments that have no merit. This argument, that the provision of pleadings, legal arguments by the Government, will somehow compromise sources and methods and bring down the intelligence system, has no merit.

When the Senator from Arizona asked me specifically whether my amendment allows for certain sensitive information to be redacted, my answer was yes, and he didn't respond. In fact, I had already stated that in my opening statement. Everything the Senator from Missouri referred to—confidential information, sensitive information about individuals we are going after, critical intelligence—all of that can be redacted. What the Senator wants to help the administration do is prevent Members of Congress—and by the way, these are kept classified; it is only people who have certain clearances who can see them—from seeing the pleadings provided to an article III court. That is the basis for their arguments.

As I pointed out in my statement, a lot of times the court just refers to the pleadings in its orders. So if we don't have the pleadings, we have no idea what the order is about.

Listen very carefully because this kind of argument is going to be used with regard to every aspect of this bill. Everything is a red line. I want to tell you something, Mr. President, it is not a red line for the duly elected representatives of the people of this country in a classified setting to be able to review documents from a court proceeding. That is a ridiculous notion and disrespectful to the United States Congress that has an oversight role.

I was involved in the debate, as the Senator from Missouri knows, in the Intelligence Committee. We won fair and square on this vote by a majority bipartisan vote when it was first offered to the Intelligence Authorization bill. Because of various issues and pressures relating to other matters, we later had to compromise, and ultimately they said, why don't you do it on the FISA bill, which is exactly what I am doing. But the idea that somehow this endangers America to allow certain Members of Congress and a few staff members who have been cleared to look at the pleadings of the Government in a court proceeding takes this way too far.

There are no substantive arguments against doing this, and I urge Senators to reject the second-degree amendment and adopt the underlying amendment.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak on the managers' amendment, as offered earlier by the distinguished chairman and vice chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished chairman of the committee and the distinguished vice chairman because they have worked with me many hours on this issue. It is an extraordinarily important issue as it relates to the rights of Americans in the digital age, and I appreciate the involvement the chairman and vice chairman have had with me on this matter.

What this debate is all about, and I know it is very hard to follow the complicated legal language that is associated with this discussion, is the proposition that Americans ought to have the same rights overseas that they have inside the United States. Now, the chairman and the vice chairman have worked with me through the last few weeks to ensure that we can embed this basic proposition in this FISA legislation and do it in a way that is not going to have any unintended consequences or any impact on our national security.

I have long felt, literally for decades, that the FISA law has represented the ultimate balance between America's need to fight terrorism ferociously and to protect the constitutional rights of our people, and it is a balance that should not be eliminated because an American leaves U.S. soil. It ought to always mean something to be an American, and that ought to apply even outside the United States. Now, under current law, before conducting surveillance on an American citizen within the United States, the Government must establish probable cause before a criminal court for law enforcement cases or before the FISA Court for intelligence cases.

So what this means is the U.S. Government needs a court-approved warrant to deliberately tap the phone conversations of a person living in Medford, OR; or Kansas City, MO; or Arlington, VA; or anywhere else. This protection, however, is not extended to Americans who are outside the United States. So if the U.S. Government wants to deliberately tap the phone conversations of the same Americans on business in India or serving their country in Iraq, the Attorney General can personally approve the surveillance by making his own unilateral determination of probable cause.

During the Senate Intelligence Committee's consideration of legislation that would revise FISA, I offered the amendment that has been discussed by the distinguished chairman and the vice chairman to require the Government to secure a warrant from the FISA Court before targeting an American overseas.

This amendment was cosponsored by our colleagues, the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. FEINGOLD, and the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. WHITEHOUSE. It was, as the chairman of the committee has noted, approved on a bipartisan basis. It has largely been incorporated into the Senate Judiciary Committee approach as well.

Since then the administration has raised concerns about this issue. There have been concerns raised by several others. And we have sought to address those through many hours of negotiations so that we can make sure in the digital age, when Americans travel so frequently, we are not seeing their rights go in the trash can when they travel outside U.S. soil.

We have almost reached a final agreement on this important issue, but I wanted to take just a minute. I see the distinguished chairman on the Senate floor and the distinguished vice chairman. I would like to just outline very briefly for them what my remaining concern is because my hope is we can work this out.

I would also like to say that throughout this day the Justice Department, as we have been looking at it, has been talking to our staffs as well. I think they have been very cooperative also.

The issue that is outstanding, I would say to my colleagues, is the managers' amendment does not require the Government to specify what facilities it is targeting, even in situations where the Government has historically been required to do so. So one automatically thinks of a hypothetical kind of situation that goes something like this: Under current law, the Government has to specify, for example, that it is going to do surveillance on an apartment dweller on a military base overseas. That is something that has to be approved with specificity, and that is required under current law.

What I am troubled about is the hypothetical possibility. That is what we are dealing with now, hypothetical possibilities. And if the language is not written carefully with respect to facilities—and my concern is that it has not yet been dealt with adequately—the Government could, in effect, do surveillance on that military base for all of the apartment dwellers in the building or conceivably all of the people on the military base at large.

Now, my friend, the distinguished vice chairman of the committee, clearly does not want to see that happen, nor does the chairman of the full committee. So what I have been trying to do, and had some discussion with the Justice Department about, is to try to persuade the Justice Department to take the precise language they have found acceptable in title I and move it over to the title VII that we have all been working on in a cooperative kind of fashion. It deals with what is called the after acquisition issue, to again make sure we are able to stay on top of the serious threats our country faces but not at the same time overreach and sweep all kinds of individuals like, say, an apartment dweller on a military base oversees into a surveillance program.

So I am going to continue, and I want to make this clear to the vice chairman who is on the Senate floor, and the chairman who has had to leave the floor for a few minutes, that I want to continue to work with them. This is an important issue. In the digital age, it makes no sense for Americans' rights and freedoms to be limited by physical geography. That is what we got bipartisan support for in the Intelligence Committee. Suffice it to say, there is a history of support for this kind of approach. During the initial consideration of the first FISA Act back in 1978, many Members of Congress argued for the inclusion of protections for Americans overseas.

All of the committees that debated the bill noted the significance of the issue. But at that time there was a judgment made that it was best to deal with this matter by separate legislation.

For example, the Senate Intelligence Committee in the 1978 report on FISA stated:

> Further legislation may be necessary to protect the rights of Americans abroad from the improper electronic surveillance by their Government.

It seems to me, 30 years later, it is time to take action. So we are going to continue these discussions. I want to express my appreciation to the vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee and his staff. They have put many hours into this matter working with us and clearly have sought to make sure that we can modernize this particular part of the FISA statute, and do it without what all of us have said are the unintended consequences or potential impact on national security.

I think we are there once we deal with this remaining issue. I think it would be very hard for any of us to explain how it is that current law has to specify what facilities are being targeted and then, now, in the name of the so-called reform approach, adopt something that hypothetically—again, I talk only hypothetically about it—might sweep some, for example, soldiers on a military base overseas into a surveillance program. I do not want that. The distinguished vice chairman of our committee, Senator BOND, does not want that.

So we are going to keep working on this matter. I see my friend from Missouri has indicated his desire to speak. As always, I am anxious to hear his thoughts on it and to work with him.

I ask unanimous consent to have a few, perhaps up to 10 additional minutes after the vice chairman has had a chance to address us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. MCCASKILL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Madam President, I thank my colleague from Oregon. As usual, he states objectives that he and I agree with. We both have the same desire, to protect American citizens, U.S. persons, certainly military men and women and their families on military bases.

I would say to my friend, under the clear provisions of section 703 and 704, if they are an American military person overseas, the first test would be: Are you an officer or an employee of a foreign government?

Obviously, they are employees of our Government. But you would have to be acting as an agent of a foreign power, and, furthermore, there would have to be intelligence information provided showing that there was reasonable grounds to believe there was intelligence information.

Now, there could be the situation, as there has been in the past—it has happened within the CIA; it has happened within the military—that some person may turn into an agent of a foreign power even though they are wearing our uniform. That is a very rare situation. But in that instance, then, you would be able, if you had intelligence information, to suggest this person was acting as an agent and had the appropriate foreign intelligence.

Absent that, nobody is going to sweep them up, nobody is going to listen in, nobody is going to listen in to their phone calls back home to their families or their families' calls to them.

Now, my colleague mentioned some other questions about collection. And this is a very important discussion, a complicated discussion, but regrettably a classified discussion. So let me suggest to him that we understand. He has talked to the Department of Justice. I believe they have had some confidential discussions. We would be happy to have more with him. I regret we cannot have them on the floor of the Senate because they go into matters which are classified.

But he and I share the same objective. We have slightly different ways of getting there. There are certain items I think have to be discussed off the Senate floor.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WYDEN. Madam President, I will be very brief in terms of responding to the distinguished vice chair. I also note the person we look to for counsel on these matters, Senator WHITEHOUSE, is here. I want to express my appreciation to him for all of his assistance. If anyone is capable of, once again, stepping in and bringing together all of the parties—Senator BOND, the Bush administration, Senator ROCKEFELLER, myself—Senator WHITEHOUSE is that person. He has done it repeatedly, and we thank him for all of his help.

On the one remaining issue, just to be very brief in terms of responding to the vice chairman, the vice chairman is spot on with respect to the fact that in most respects, the language of our joint efforts does seek to zero in only on the legitimate targets. And that is all to the good.

What we are concerned about, and again, steering clear of anything classified, is some of the technical issues with respect to the definition of ''facilities,'' which lead us to be concerned that others could be swept in. That is what we still need to resolve.

So let's do this. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island wants to have a chance to speak on this issue. This is not going to be the last word on the subject. But I would say this is an opportunity, after months and months of discussion, to get it right in terms of modernizing the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Thirty years ago, it was a big issue. It is an even bigger issue today. I think a business person, for example, in Kansas City, MO, or Portland, OR, or anywhere else, when they travel the globe and are doing business, speaking to loved ones, they have an expectation that their rights are not thrown into the trash can when they leave the soil of the United States.

We have taken steps to ensure, under the efforts of Senator ROCKEFELLER, Senator BOND, myself and others, we have gone a long way to extending the overseas protections for our people that they have here. We are not quite there yet. We have one issue left to deal with, and it is an important issue.

We are going to continue to have these discussions, and they will certainly be good-faith discussions. I hope we can persuade all parties, and particularly those in the administration, to support our efforts to deal with this one remaining matter, which literally is a question—we have staff on the floor—of importing language that the administration says works in other parts of this legislation, into this area which we think is substantially the same.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Madam President, first, let me thank the Senator from Oregon for his very kind words, probably too kind words, but that is one of the glorious conventions of this body.

I salute his leadership in this area because perhaps the most significant thing that has been accomplished so far in this FISA dispute, that has been accomplished in a bipartisan fashion, in a manner in which great credit reflects on Vice Chairman BOND who is here on the Senate floor, is consensus has been reached that when an American travels overseas, the rights they believe they enjoy here in these United States, the rights the Constitution guarantees them here in these United States, travel with them and cannot be overruled at the whim of the very same branch of Government that seeks the surveillance. And the reason that was able to take place is because the Senator from Oregon had the foresight to put together the amendment that he and Senator FEINGOLD and I argued for in the Intelligence Committee. I express my personal appreciation to him for his wisdom in that regard.

I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be set aside in order that I might call up amendment No. 3908.

Mr. BOND. Madam President, I must object to that. I do commend the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Oregon for their leadership on the issues which they have addressed. They have made a strong push, and they worked with us through the 20-plus pages of construction to get a workable means of achieving the goal they so eloquently champion. We will continue to work with them on those efforts dealing with the items the Senator from Oregon addressed. However, I must object to setting aside the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Madam President, I am disappointed to hear that. The Senator, of course, clearly has that right. As everyone in this body knows, we are facing a deadline of February 1 to conclude this legislation. There is considerable other business related to the stimulus package, given our economic concerns in this country, and I would hope now that the FISA bill has been called up, that we are on this bill here on the floor, that amendments to the title I provisions we are working on now could be called up and considered. It would certainly move things along in the process if they could be called up and debated so that when it came time for a vote, we could move more expeditiously through the process. I hope very much this is not a signal that it is anyone's intention to slow down this process.

We saw in August how unfortunate the result can be when this body's time to give a major issue such as this significant attention is compressed. Indeed, I refer to that unfortunate August situation as ''the August stampede.'' I don't think we reflected great credit on this institution when we did what we did back then.

The effort we are undertaking now is an effort, in fact, to remedy some of those concerns. There has been significant bipartisan effort to get us to this point. While there are clearly remaining points of disagreement, I would think it would be in everyone's interest to work through those issues and to give these different amendments a chance to be voted on. For instance, the amendment I had hoped to call up is one that is supported not only by myself but Chairman ROCKEFELLER, the distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee. It is supported by Chairman LEAHY, the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee. It is supported by Senator SCHUMER, the distinguished Senator from New York. It is supported by Senator FEINGOLD, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin who serves, like myself, on both the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees. It addresses a very important issue to this body which is the terms on which we will allow this administration to spy on Americans.

It is an amendment that a lot of work has gone into. It reflects a convergence of ideas that was developed by Senator SCHUMER and Senator FEINGOLD in the Judiciary Committee, that we developed in the Intelligence Committee, again, through an often bipartisan process. Senator FEINGOLD played a critical role in both committees in advancing this issue. We have worked very carefully with the Department of Justice to incorporate changes that they have recommended as technical assistance. It is a meaningful, worthy, well-thought-out amendment that merits consideration and discussion on the floor. It relates to an issue that is a fairly simple one but in order to understand it, you have to have a basic understanding, at least, of wiretap surveillance.

As United States Attorney and as Rhode Island's Attorney General, I oversaw wiretap and surveillance investigations, and I am familiar with the procedures. With any electronic surveillance, whether it is in a domestic law enforcement context or intelligence gathering on international terrorism, what you find is that information about Americans is intercepted incidentally. You have, as all the prosecutors in this body well know, including the distinguished Presiding Officer, the target of your investigation. The target has certain rights; a warrant requirement under the Constitution, for instance. But what you find is that once you have surveillance up on your target, they obviously talk to other people. Those other people who are incidentally intercepted in the surveillance also have rights as well.

In domestic law enforcement, there are clear and established procedures for what is called minimizing the interception of the conversations to the extent that they touch on the incidentally intercepted person who is not the target of the surveillance. The minimization procedures govern the collection and the retention of this information to ensure that the privacy of innocent Americans is protected. These are sensible measures. I have been in the trailers with the FBI agents as they are switching on and off to honor the minimization procedures. But one of the key elements of these minimization procedures is the knowledge on the part of the surveilling agency that they are subject to court oversight. That is natural in the domestic law enforcement context. You are operating under a court order to begin with. In the domestic context, it happens as a simple consequence of there being a court order in the first place.

When you are dealing with Americans abroad and when they are swept up in international surveillance for national security purposes, the situation can be different. We have had to provide for these minimization procedures. Under the Senate Intelligence bill, the court, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, is now being given the authority to approve the minimization procedures when an American is listened to incidentally in surveillance that targets another individual. The court has the authority to approve the procedures. But what was missing is that the court did not have the authority to determine whether the procedures it has approved are actually being followed. You would think that would be obvious. If you are going to set it up so that the court can approve minimization procedures, should it not follow as a matter of simple logic that the court should have the authority to see whether the procedures the court approved are in fact being followed?

We have worked very carefully with Vice Chairman BOND, with Chairman ROCKEFELLER, with the technical folks at the Director of National Intelligence Office, and at the Department of Justice. At present, we have a situation in which it has been agreed that the court will have the power to determine whether its rules are being followed if the target of the surveillance is an American in the United States. We have also reached agreement that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will have the authority to determine whether its rules are being followed if the target is an American overseas. The issue that remains involves those cases in which the target is a foreign person but they are in touch with a U.S. person, an American, who is being incidentally intercepted because they are in touch with a foreign target—because the foreign target has called them, because the foreign target is discussing them, because they have called the foreign target, whatever.

I cannot for the life of me understand why this is a difference that we are obliged to come to the Senate floor to decide. It would seem to me that when the purpose of the exercise is enforcing minimization procedures that benefit the U.S. person who is incidentally intercepted, it should not matter whether the target is an American in the United States or an American overseas or a foreign person. The person we are trying to protect is the U.S. person incidentally swept into the surveillance. So the purpose of this amendment, if I were to be permitted to call it up, would be to see to it that the court, which has the authority to determine the minimization procedures when there is a foreign target who talks to a United States person, should have what would seem to me obviously consequent authority to determine whether those rules it has approved are being followed.

It may even be that it is so inherent in the nature of a court that subsequent litigation would determine that in fact the court does have that right. It comes, in its very nature as an article III court, to have the authority to determine whether its rules and whether its orders are being followed. But rather than force it to that point, it would be better if we simply cleared up the matter here.

Again, I regret that merely calling up the amendment at this point is being objected to. I hope this is not a signal that we are trying to recreate, to put it mildly, the hectic atmosphere of the August stampede. I would like as quickly as possible to work through the amendments that relate to title I. There are a number of them. I expect we will be staying rather late if we can't start working through them now. But when the time comes, I will come back to the floor and again seek permission to call up this amendment; I hope at that time with more success.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Madam President, we too want to move through this bill. This amendment, sponsored by the Senator from Rhode Island, was included in the Judiciary Committee substitute for the Intelligence Committee bill. We defeated that.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee has said we are going to come back and vote on all of these amendments one by one. At this point I think it is appropriate that the leaders are discussing or will discuss how we are going to proceed. In the meantime, we are not going to set aside amendments until we have some direction from the leadership on how they wish to handle these amendments.

On the substance of the amendment, earlier today in discussing the Judiciary Committee substitute, I pointed out that the FISA Court, or the FISC as it is called, has said: We are not going to get into this area. We don't want to get into the business of trying to oversee how foreign intelligence is collected. That means whether it is collected or whether there is incidental collection, those challenges are significantly different from the challenges that the FBI would face in carrying out their court order.

But it should be noted, as I believe the Senator from Rhode Island has, that the FISA court order, the FISC, will set out the requirement that minimization procedures be followed. There will be significant review and oversight of those because the person conducting the surveillance has a supervisor who will look over their shoulder. That supervisor knows there will be a representative of the inspector general who is watching, who is looking for any problems. That inspector general knows there will be a lawyer from the Department of Justice overseeing it to assure there is compliance.

We have an Intelligence Committee with a very able staff, some of whom understand very well how the NSA programs work, whether it is under the FISC or under the previous time. It is our job, under our challenge, our charter, as an oversight committee of the intelligence community, to make sure these laws are followed. So I will say that when the FISC was challenged to take on a broader role in handling foreign intelligence, they stated in the December 17 released opinion, In re Motion for Release of Court Records, at the very bottom of page 19, footnote 31, the appellant claimed that the court could conduct a review because it is a ''specialized body with considerable expertise in the area of national security.'' The FISC itself said that this overstates the FISC's expertise:

> Although the FISC handles a great deal of classified material, FISC judges do not make classification decisions and are not intended to become national security experts. . . . (FISC judges are not expected or desired to become experts in foreign policy matters or foreign intelligence activities, and do not make substantive judgments on the propriety or need for a particular surveillance). Furthermore, even if a typical FISC judge had more expertise in national security matters than a typical district court judge, that expertise would still not equal that of the Executive Branch, which is constitutionally entrusted with protecting the national security.

They cite a case, which says:

> . . . (''a reviewing court must recognize that the Executive departments responsible for national defense and foreign policy matters have unique insights'' into national security harms that might follow from disclosure). . . .

At the end it says:

> For these reasons, the more searching review requested by the [appellant in that case] would be inappropriate.

So while there are court orders that the minimization procedures be followed, there is an existing framework for significant oversight, and there is the oversight not only by the executive branch but by the legislative branch, and the FISC says that is not the business they are to get into.

We will have an opportunity to revisit this when the matter is brought up. But I wanted to advise my good friend, a diligent worker on the Intelligence Committee, why we had argued against that provision in the amendment or the substitute that the Judiciary Committee proposed.

I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SANDERS). The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Mr. President, I thank the very distinguished vice chairman of the committee for his description of his views on this matter. I know they are honestly held and founded in his beliefs.

I do take some issue with his recollection of the travel of this in the Intelligence Committee. I thought I heard the distinguished vice chairman say this amendment had been voted down in the Intelligence Committee. It is my recollection that I withdrew it because there were technical concerns that were described by some of the officials from the Office of National Intelligence and from the Department of Justice who were present.

Indeed, it was that withdrawal and willingness to work to try to find a better amendment that resulted in the very commendable process by which the distinguished vice chairman agreed to allow the court to oversee compliance with its own rule in those two circumstances I mentioned earlier: Where the target is an American, either overseas or at home.

Other than that, the only other point I would add is that I think it is probably a situation unique in the annals of American law that an American court would be provided the authority to approve a rule or make an order but denied the authority to determine whether it was complied with. I can certainly think of no situation in our law or in our history where that has ever been the case.

I know the distinguished Senator from Maryland seeks the floor. I yield the floor, and I thank the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CARDIN. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be set aside so I can offer amendment No. 3859.

Mr. BOND. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, if I may respond to the Senator from Rhode Island—I apologize to the Senator from Maryland—I say to the Senator from Rhode Island, what I said was his provision was in the Judiciary substitute that we defeated. We did not deal with his amendment in the Intelligence Committee. We discussed it. He offered it, and it was accepted in the Judiciary substitute. That amendment was defeated.

What I raised was the concern that our leadership has about going back and revisiting all the elements of the Judiciary substitute.

I thank the Chair, and my apologies and thanks to my colleague from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. President, let me point out to the cochair of the Intelligence Committee and the distinguished Republican whip on the floor why I asked for this amendment to be called up. I hope there will be a time when we will have a chance to vote on this amendment. It is one I hope would gain some broad support in this body.

What this amendment would do is to change the automatic termination date that is in the statute, the bill now—which is at 6 years—to 4 years. I know there are some Members of this body who are opposed to any termination date. The administration is opposed to a termination date.

I applaud the Intelligence Committee for including a termination date, a sunset in the legislation, recognizing it is our responsibility to make sure we are included in the appropriate oversight with the executive branch. Knowing the history of this legislation, knowing how quickly technology changes, it is important that Congress be intimately involved in reviewing the operations of this statute, the changing technology, and that we have the full attention and cooperation not only of the intelligence community but also the White House and the executive branch of Government.

The reason why I believe the 4 years is much more preferable than 6—I urge my colleagues to please follow this debate—with a 4-year sunset, it will be a requirement of the next administration to be involved in this FISA statute. They are not going to be able to sit back for their entire term and say: Gee, we have this authority; there is no need to make the information readily available to Congress.

Let me remind my colleagues, it was not easy to get information from the executive branch on the use of their authority, of which for some we recently found out the full extent of the use of their authority. So if we keep a 6-year sunset, there will be no legal need for the next administration to work with Congress to make sure there is broad support for what the administration is doing, to make sure we do not have another situation where there was the use of power by the executive branch that, quite frankly, we did not know about, and that we will at least know whether the technology is the right technology. We will have much better attention.

So for the purposes of our oversight, our responsibility as the legislative branch of Government, we should make it clear to the next administration: Sure, you have plenty of time under this authority. You do not have to worry about this authority terminating. You have almost your entire term in office. But we want you to focus on it, and make sure we are not only protecting the rights of Americans, that we are not only making sure the intelligence community has the tools it needs, but we are making sure that as technology changes during the next years—and technology is changing very quickly—we are all engaged in the subject.

We are ready to take action as the legislative branch of Government to make sure we are working with the executive branch to give the intelligence community the tools it needs to gather the information on foreign targets, and that they are also doing it in ways, as the chairman and vice chairman of the committee and the committee have said, that respect the rights of Americans and the civil liberties of the people of our Nation.

It is for that reason that I urge we find a time to take this up. I took this few moments now in the hopes that when we come back to this amendment we will not quite need as much time. I do hope the Members will understand this is being offered so we in the Congress can carry out our responsibility.

It is interesting that there were several debates on the floor of this body when the original PATRIOT Act was passed and the Protect America Act was passed to make sure there were sunsets in it. We are now amending the bill today. The chairman and vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee just brought forward a set of amendments, and as I listened to the chairman and vice chairman talk, they said: We want to make sure we get it right.

There were a lot of technical changes made as of today. I do not think anyone here feels totally comfortable that we got it right. We are going to have to stay engaged on this subject. I think it is critically important we have the attention of the next administration to make sure we can do the right thing for the people of this Nation to keep them safe and to protect their civil liberties.

So that is the reason I intend to offer this amendment. It was in the Judiciary Committee substitute. We debated it in the committee. We had a good debate in the Judiciary Committee. Senator KENNEDY had offered a 2-year sunset. We talked about that also. There are others who have been interested in this. I am not alone in this request. I know I am joined by Senator MIKULSKI as a cosponsor of this amendment, who serves on the Intelligence Committee, and was part of getting that bill together. I know Senator ROCKEFELLER is sympathetic and supportive of this issue, as is Senator LEAHY.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to take a careful look at this amendment when we come back to it. Hopefully, I will have your support.

With that, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. INHOFE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized for up to 15 minutes as in morning business.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, if I may, I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized following the remarks of Senator INHOFE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. INHOFE. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

(The remarks of Mr. INHOFE pertaining to the introduction of S. 2551 are printed in today's RECORD under ''Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.'')

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Senator KENNEDY and I have offered an important amendment to ensure that there will be some measure of accountability for the unlawful actions of this administration in the years following 9/11. Regrettably, those opposing this commonsense review have so far succeeded in stopping the full Senate from even considering its merits.

It is a sad day for the American public when its elected officials stonewall a measure designed to shed light on the Government's efforts to unlawfully spy on its own citizens. I urge Senators across the aisle to allow this amendment to be called up, debated, and given an up-or-down vote.

As we all now know from press accounts, in the years after 9/11, the Government secretly conducted surveillance on its own citizens on a massive scale through what has become known as the Terrorist Surveillance Program, TSP. It was done completely outside of FISA, the law specifically drafted to regulate such conduct. And it was done without the consent or even the knowledge of the Congress. It is crucial that Congress and the American people understand why and how these decisions were made, both in the months after 9/11, and in the several years following that difficult time. This inspector general review amendment will provide that accountability.

This review would be conducted jointly by the Offices of Inspectors General of each component of the intelligence community that may have played any role in the TSP, including the inspector general of the Department of Justice. It will examine the circumstances that led to the approval of the TSP, as well as any procedural irregularities that may have taken place within the Department of Justice Office of Legal Counsel—the part of the Justice Department that is supposed to give unvarnished legal advice to the President. It will result in a final report to be submitted to the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees in the House and Senate within 180 days, containing recommendations and a classified annex. There has been no such comprehensive review to date.

This amendment is particularly important because the administration and some of its allies in Congress are relentlessly arguing for retroactive immunity for the 40 or so lawsuits against those telecommunications companies that may have assisted in conducting this secret surveillance. They are trying to shut down avenues for investigating and determining whether their actions were lawful. This amendment will ensure that there will be an objective assessment of the lawfulness of the secret spying program and the manner in which the Government approved and carried out the program.

Critics of the amendment claim that Congress has already conducted sufficient oversight of the TSP, and that no further review is warranted. That is simply not true. Only a small number of Senators and Representatives have been granted access to classified documents related to the TSP. Those of us who have been granted access can provide a measure of oversight by reading through documents to try to piece together how the Government decided to spy on its own citizens, for years, and how the Justice Department came to bless this unlawful conduct. But the documents don't tell the full story. As we learned from Jack Goldsmith, the former head of the Office of Legal Counsel, the President's program was a ''legal mess'' when he took over. It is crucial to understand how this ''legal mess'' got approved in the first place. Who was responsible? Were the normal procedures followed at the Office of Legal Counsel? And, perhaps most importantly, how can we stop something like this from ever happening again?

This amendment is one of the many improvements to the Senate Intelligence bill that were adopted by the Judiciary Committee and included in the Judiciary Committee's substitute amendment. Regrettably, that substitute was tabled by the Senate earlier today. I urge Senators to reconsider their votes with respect to this simple but critically important accountability measure.

If the critics succeed in quashing not only the outstanding lawsuits seeking accountability, but also congressional efforts to arrive at the truth through a comprehensive review of the TSP, the American public will never forgive us. This administration is hoping it will end its time in office without any meaningful review of its more than 5 years of illegal surveillance. We must not let this happen. I urge all Senators to support this commonsense amendment to ensure accountability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. REID. I note the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, is one of the managers on the floor? Yes. I have been in contact with the distinguished Republican leader. I ask unanimous consent that Senator KENNEDY be recognized for 5 minutes for purposes of offering an amendment, and following his 5 minutes, that Senator FEINSTEIN be recognized for 5 minutes, and following their statements and their attempt to offer amendments, that I then be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KYL. I didn't hear the last half.

Mr. REID. Following their 5-minute statements, I be recognized.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, as propounded, I object to the request, but I have no objection to Members each asking consent to which there would be no objection and certainly not to their speaking for whatever length of time or whatever order the leader would desire.

Mr. REID. So you have no objection to Senator KENNEDY being recognized for 5 minutes and Senator FEINSTEIN being recognized for 5 minutes?

Mr. KYL. Absolutely no objection to that.

Mr. REID. And then following their statement, that I be recognized?

Mr. KYL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, at the appropriate time, I hope the Senate will permit us to take action on an amendment I will offer on behalf of myself and Senator LEAHY and others. This amendment we have prepared is very simple, but it is absolutely critical to this bill.

The amendment would require the inspectors general of the Department of Justice and the National Security Agency and other relevant offices to work together to review the Bush administration's warrantless wiretapping program. The inspectors general will analyze this program and then issue a report on what they find. Members of Congress will receive a classified version of the report. The public will receive an unclassified version of the report.

Simply put, there is no other way to put this episode behind us. Court cases looking into the administration's warrantless wiretapping have been stymied by concerns about standing, mootness, and the state secrets privilege. If Congress grants retroactive immunity, some of these cases will be eliminated altogether.

But either way, court cases are no substitute for an inspector general review when it comes to finding and reporting the facts. Traditional rulings will tell us whether any laws were broken and which ones. The inspector general review will tell us why and how this happened, and it will help us avoid a similar lapse in the future.

The administration has decided to share documents with the Senate Judiciary Committee but not with the House Intelligence Committee, or the Judiciary Committee whose FISA bill it doesn't like. It has refused to share any documents with other Members of the House and Senate who are now expected to vote on this legislation. So where are we now?

We know that for 5 years the Bush administration conducted a massive program of warrantless surveillance that may have violated the rights of literally millions of innocent Americans. What we do not know is how this program was started, why it was started, what it covered, how many Americans were spied on, or what happened to the information it collected. We are being kept in the dark about one of the most significant and outrageous constitutional violations by the executive branch in modern history.

An inspector general review is the only way to shed light on this abuse, the only way to document and assess the administration's warrantless surveillance activities over the past 6 years. The review will help bring clarity, closure, and accountability to this episode. It will help us draw lessons and move on from it.

Millions of Americans have been secretly spied on for years. They at least deserve to know the reason. The Senate also deserves to know. Senators who vote to pass this amendment will be not only honoring their constituents' right to learn what was done to them, they will also be enabling themselves to serve their constituents better in the future.

The inspector general report will produce information that will assist us in our legislative duties. When Congress takes up FISA in the future, the results of this report will be enormously valuable in helping us to enact legislation to meet the genuine national security and civil liberty needs of the Nation.

It is revealing in how quiet the White House has been in opposing the inspector general review. Make no mistake, they have been clear they don't want any kind of investigation into what they did. But their arguments against the inspector general review have been very quiet, indeed, perhaps because they know how transparently weak and self-serving their arguments are. They said we should not have an inspector general review because it might reveal classified information or help our enemies. This argument is nothing more than a scare tactic.

The inspectors general public report will contain only unclassified material.

Any classified material will go into a classified appendix. It has been said an inspector generals' review might fuel a partisan witch hunt. Senator LEAHY and I have drafted this amendment to be tightly limited to the warrantless wiretapping program. The inspectors general will have a very specific mandate, and they will do their work without any political influence whatever.

Understanding what happened to the rights of Americans over the past 6 years is not a partisan effort. All Members of Congress should want to learn about the activities in which the administration has engaged. The American people are concerned about what their Government has been up to. They need an independent review to restore trust in the Government and to feel confident that both their security and their liberty are being protected.

Finally, I have heard it said the inspectors general are not the appropriate entity to conduct this review. The question is, if not the inspectors general, then who? The inspectors general are experienced and independent; they are trusted by Congress and the American people. They frequently conduct confidential investigations and have procedures in place to protect classified information. It is precisely for situations such as this that we created the inspector general.

It has been reported that the Justice Department recently reopened the Office of Professional Responsibility's investigation into the warrantless surveillance program. That is a positive step, but it is not relevant to this amendment. The scope of the OPR investigation is severely limited. It deals with attorney misconduct, and it is confined to the Justice Department. By contrast, the inspector general review will cover all of the relevant agencies, including the National Security Agency, and it will examine the use of warrantless surveillance much more fully.

Moreover, the inspectors general are more independent than OPR, and for investigating a warrantless surveillance program authorized by the President, independence is of critical importance.

Inspectors general also have a proven track record that gives them unique credibility. For example, the inspector general report on national security letters showed widespread abuse by the FBI, and it helped Congress understand what needs to be done.

There is one reason, and only one reason, to oppose this amendment, and that is to cover up the administration's actions. A vote against the inspector general review is a vote for silence and secrecy, for stonewalling and denial. It is a vote to erase the past.

Many of the issues we have been debating on FISA are difficult and complicated, and there is room for reasonable people to disagree. But there is no such room on this amendment. It is simple and straightforward. Its potential benefits are great, and its costs are negligible.

No matter where one stands on the issues of retroactive immunity for the phone companies, this amendment should be a no-brainer. In fact, for my colleagues who want to eliminate the court cases against the phone companies, this should be even more critical because it will at least preserve some measure of accountability. It will give the Senate critical information to fulfill its constitutional duty to protect the rights of Americans, the separation of powers, and our national security.

Many Senators who have been defending retroactive immunity have done so by emphasizing that the phone companies were just following White House orders. If you believe that argument, you should be especially in favor of this amendment because it places the inquiry exclusively on the White House. Here is what the amendment says:

> The unclassified report shall not disclose the name or identity of any individual or entity of the private sector that participated in the program or with whom there was communication about the program.

Even though we oppose retroactive immunity, Senator LEAHY and I included that provision because we want to make this amendment as uncontroversial as possible. We want to make it crystal clear that all Senators who take their constitutional duties seriously, whether they are Democrats or Republicans, need to support this amendment.

I urge all of my colleagues to pass this amendment and take a vital step toward restoring honesty and the rule of law in America's surveillance policy.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, I wish to speak for a short period of time on an amendment that I would like to offer, in the event I am given the opportunity to do so.

The Terrorist Surveillance Program began in mid-October of 2001, and it operated until January of 2007. It operated outside of the jurisdiction of the FISA Court during that period of time. That is 5 years and 2 months, when a program operated with no court review or no court approval.

Now, I must regretfully say the United States—long before this President and the prior President, but for decades—has had a rather sordid history of misusing foreign intelligence for domestic political purposes. This was well outlined in the Church Committee's report, which led to the development of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act—which is the bill we are talking about—in 1978.

If you go back and read the record, you will see that President Carter signed the bill. In his signing statement, as well as the record of the deliberations of the Congress at that time, he tried to overcome this sordid history by making the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act—this bill—the exclusive authority for electronic surveillance of Americans for the purpose of foreign intelligence. That was the bottom line, so that never again could foreign intelligence be used politically against American citizens domestically.

FISA has continued over the decades, and I think it has served this Nation well.

What we have seen develop now is a Presidency and a President who believes very strongly in his executive authority and has tried, through many different ways, to enhance that executive authority. One of those ways has been signing statements—more signing statements by this President, saying what part of the law he would follow and what part he would not follow; the concept of the unitary Executive, which has been espoused, whereby all commissions, even the FCC, would be subject to the will of the Presidency and by his use of article II authority—asserting that authority under the Constitution as supreme to any statute.

The battle over FISA going back to 1978—was to give FISA statutory authority that would be supreme in this one particular area. The President strove to do it at the time, and the Congress strove to do it at the time. The Judiciary Committee bill has this strong statement of exclusivity in it, which I will propose in an amendment to this bill. The amendment is cosponsored by the chairmen of both committees, Intelligence and Judiciary, Senators ROCKEFELLER and LEAHY; Senator NELSON, who serves on the Intelligence Committee; Senator WHITEHOUSE, who serves on both committees along with myself; Senator WYDEN from the Intelligence Committee; Senator HAGEL from Intelligence; Senator MENENDEZ; Senator SNOWE from the Intelligence Committee; and Senator SPECTER, the ranking member of the Judiciary Committee.

All of us together believe there should be strong exclusivity language that reinforces the intent of the Congress, that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act be the exclusive authority for the wiretapping of Americans for the purpose of foreign intelligence. It makes sense and should be the case.

Finally, the administration said in January of last year: OK, we will try to put the program under the FISA Court. In fact, the program today is under the FISA Court through the Protect America Act. So there is a court review and, where warranted, court warrants are granted for the collection of content. That is the way it should be. As we move to this bill, minimization strictures will be spelled out, approved by the court prior, and that is the way it should be.

We would like to add to this bill the exclusivity language contained in the Judiciary Committee bill. All of us are in agreement, whether we are Intelligence Committee members or Judiciary Committee members, that FISA should become the exclusive authority, and we should try to reinforce it so that in 2 years, 10 years, or 20 years we will not be right back to where we are today.

Let me quickly describe the amendment, and shortly I will try to send a modification of the amendment that is at the desk now, which has some technical corrections in it.

Let me describe this amendment briefly. We add language to reinforce the existing FISA exclusivity language in title 18 by making it part of the FISA language, which is codified in title 50.

The second provision addresses the so-called AUMF loophole. The administration has also argued that the authorization for the use of military force against al-Qaida implicitly authorized warrantless electronic surveillance.

The amendment we would offer states that only an express statutory authorization for electronic surveillance in future legislation shall constitute an additional authority outside of FISA. This makes clear that only a specific future law that provides an exception to FISA can supersede FISA. Only another statute specific can supersede FISA.

Third, the amendment makes a similar change to the penalty section of FISA. Currently, FISA says it is a criminal penalty to conduct electronic surveillance, except as authorized by statute. The amendment replaces that general language with a prohibition on any electronic surveillance except as authorized by FISA, by the corresponding parts of title 18 that govern domestic criminal wiretapping, or any future express statutory authorization for surveillance.

Finally, the amendment requires more clarity in any certification that the Government provides to a company—in this case, a telecom company—when it requests assistance for surveillance and there is no court order.

The FISA law provides only two ways to do electronic surveillance. One of the ways is a court order. That is clear, that is distinct, that is understandable.

The second way provides that if assistance is based on statutory authorization, a certification is sent to the company, in writing, requesting assistance and saying that all statutory requirements have been met.

Under this amendment, the certification must specify what provision in law provides that authority and that the conditions of that provision have been met. This adds specificity to the certification process which today is called for by the FISA law. I believe this is something that is necessary to have in law.

In good conscience, I could not vote for any law that did not make the test case that we need to make, which is our legislative intent that FISA is intended to be the exclusive authority for the collection of electronic surveillance, foreign intelligence involving a U.S. person.

It should be subject to FISA law. I don't think any one of us would want to vote to prevent that from happening.

I believe this amendment could be adopted given a chance. We have vetted it. It will not interfere with the collection of intelligence. We have vetted it with the Department of Justice and with the intelligence agencies. As I say, it is bipartisan.

What I would like to do at this time is call up the amendment. It is No. 3857, and I ask unanimous consent to send a modification to the desk to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to setting aside the pending amendments?

Mr. KYL. For the reasons Senator BOND explained earlier, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The majority leader.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, yesterday our Vice President gave a speech at the Heritage Foundation talking about the need to pass the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Today, the President gave a statement; it was a brief statement. The President gave a statement following up on the Vice President's speech yesterday. The Vice President gave a speech; the President gave a statement today.

Among other things, he said:

> If Congress does not act quickly, our national security professionals will not be able to count on critical tools they need to protect our nation, and our ability to respond to new threats and circumstances will be weakened. That means it will be harder to figure out what our enemies are doing to recruit terrorists and infiltrate them into our country. . . .
> So I ask congressional leaders to follow the course set by their colleagues in the Senate Intelligence Committee, bring this legislation to a prompt vote in both houses. . . .
> Congress' action—or lack of action—on this important issue will directly affect our ability to keep Americans safe.

Let the record be spread with the fact that all 51 Democrats joined with 49 Republicans in that we want to do everything we can to make our homeland safe. We want, if necessary, within the confines of the law, to do wiretapping of these bad people. But having said that, we want to do it within the confines of the law and our Constitution. We want to make sure this wiretapping does not include innocent Americans who happen to be part of what they are collecting. That is what the American people expect us to do.

So I again say, no one can question our patriotism, our willingness to keep our homeland safe. We have tried to move forward on this legislation. We have tried in many different ways. What we have been doing today and yesterday is moving forward on this legislation. As the distinguished Senator from California said, there are amendments that will make this legislation better. That is in the eye of the beholder, and we all understand that. But shouldn't the Senate have the ability to vote on those amendments because no matter what we do as a Senate, it has to have a conference with the House. They have already passed their legislation. We have been stalled every step of the way—every step of the way.

The Feingold amendment, for example, was offered. It certainly is germane. But we are being told he cannot get a vote on this amendment because it concerns FISA's court orders. His amendment was discussed at length previously. Half of it was accepted on a bipartisan basis, the other half was not. But certainly he is entitled to a vote.

Senator FEINGOLD and I do not mean to embarrass him—is a legal scholar. He is a graduate of one of our finest law schools in the world. He is a Rhodes Scholar. Senator WHITEHOUSE has been attorney general of the State of Rhode Island and is certainly known all over the country as someone who understands the law. He has been a tremendously good person as a Member of the Senate. He serves on both committees, the Intelligence Committee and on the Judiciary Committee, and he is a thoughtful person.

He thought the legislation that came out of the Intelligence Committee should be improved, and as a member of the Judiciary Committee, he worked to have it improved. He sought to offer a germane amendment a short time ago concerning minimization. What does that mean? That means if you pick up by mistake an American, that you drop it. You push that out of the way, that isn't going to be made public in any manner. We want to vote on that amendment. It seems everyone would vote for it. I certainly hope so. But there is an objection to even having a vote on that amendment.

Senator CARDIN, a long-time Member of Congress, a relatively new Member of the Senate, but a long-time, experienced Member of the Congress of the United States sought to offer a germane amendment shortening the sunset provision. The bill that is before us that came out of the Intelligence Committee is for 6 years. Things are changing rapidly in our country and in the world as it relates to electronics. We don't know what is going to take place in regard to terrorism, violence or what is going to take place with our ability to do a better job electronically to uncover some of what we believe should be uncovered. He wants this legislation to be for not 6 years but 4 years. That is a pretty simple amendment. I support it. I think it is a good amendment. But he has been unable to offer that simple amendment.

Senator FEINSTEIN has given a very fine statement seeking consent to offer a germane amendment on exclusivity, meaning that FISA is the only basis for the President's eavesdropping. There have been editorials written virtually in every State of the Union in the newspapers saying that should be the law, but she has not been able to offer that amendment.

Senator KENNEDY wanted to offer an amendment that is so rational, so important. He says: Let's have the inspector general do an investigation about the whole wiretapping program to find out what has taken place, who has been involved in it, and report back to Congress, not tomorrow; he sets a reasonable time that be done. But guess what. We cannot even vote on that amendment. He cannot even offer the amendment.

I say to my friends it does not matter what we try to do, we cannot do it. It appears the President and the Republicans want failure. They don't want a bill. So that is why they are jamming this forward.

I am going to vote against cloture. It is not fair that we have a major piece of legislation such as this and we are not allowed to offer an amendment as to whether the bill should be 4 years or 6 years, and we are not allowed to offer an amendment as to minimization, that is whether Americans picked up by mistake are going to be brought out in the public eye, or Senator FEINGOLD's germane amendment dealing with how court orders are issued, a real good amendment, an important amendment.

If there were ever a Catch-22, this is it because what we are being asked to do is irrational, irresponsible, and wrong. From where does this ''Catch-22'' come? We all know it was a best-seller. Joseph Heller wrote this book. He was a pilot during World War II. Joseph Heller thought he was crazy. He was a bomber pilot. We all know how difficult it was to fly those big airplanes in World War II. The casualty rate was high. If you were crazy and you said so, you would be grounded from flying these big bombers. But the officials of the military would say: We are not going to let you not fly airplanes because you have to be crazy to fly one of these in the first place. That is what Joseph Heller was stuck with because it was crazy to fly bomber missions, and they would immediately make you fly more bomber missions.

That is what we have today. We are trying everything we can do, but no matter what we do, we step on each other in the process.

I suggest we were doing this the right way. We were looking at title I, which deals with procedures of this FISA legislation, and then we were going to come later and offer amendments to title II. For example, one of the difficult issues is whether there should be retroactive immunity for the phone companies. Senators DODD and FEINGOLD want to offer an amendment to strike from the provisions of the bill retroactive immunity. That is something on which we should be able to vote.

Senator LEVIN came up with the idea, and there are others—I believe Senator WHITEHOUSE also wanted to offer an amendment dealing with substitution, saying: OK, if there is going to be retroactive immunity, have the Government pay for it, not the phone companies, because if, in fact, they were entitled to immunity, that means they were forced into something they shouldn't have been forced into. That is something I think is reasonable and logical to vote on, but we will not be able to vote on it.

I asked unanimous consent that we extend this matter for 30 days because it is very apparent, unless cloture is invoked—and I say to my Democratic colleagues I think this is an example of something on which we should not invoke cloture—if cloture is not invoked, this bill is not going to be finished by February 1 and this program will expire.

So we say to the President, who gave this statement today saying he wants the program to continue, he needs to talk with his Republicans in the Senate and say: OK, let's get an extension; let's see if we can work something out. Two weeks, a month, we are willing, if the President wants, to continue this awful program for a year, 15 months, wait until the next President comes along. We are willing to do that, and he will still have his authority.

We know one of his counsel, Mr. Yu, says he doesn't need this anyway; he can do what he wants without this legislation. But we are willing to do whatever is within the realm of possibility.

I said we will take a 30-day extension. We will take a 2-week extension. We will take a 12-month extension. We will take an 18-month extension. I tell all my friends, I have been told—and I appreciate very much my distinguished counterpart, Senator MCCONNELL, who has told me he has a cloture motion, it is all signed, and he is going to file it as soon as I yield the floor to him—I say to all my friends, under the regular order, we will have this vote Monday. If, in fact, cloture is invoked, we will have to have the vote early Monday because the 30 hours begins running, and we will have to finish it because we have so much to do before the final week. I explained all this to the distinguished Republican leader.

If cloture is going to be filed, and I know it is going to be, and if cloture is invoked, we have to have a vote no later than 1 p.m. on Monday, so the 30 hours runs out at a reasonable time on Tuesday so we can do other things. If cloture is not invoked—and I am not going to vote for cloture—unless the President agrees to some extension of time, the program will fail. I don't know any way out of that. But I, in good conscience, cannot support this legislation, at least unless we have a vote on retroactivity of immunity. I can't vote for cloture unless some of the very basic amendments that people want to offer are allowed. They all have asked for very short time limits. No one is questioning spending a lot of time. We Democrats are not in any way trying to stall this bill. We have been trying to expedite it for a long time now.

For purposes of making the record clear, and for my distinguished counterpart, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of S. 2541, which is a 30-day extension of FISA, and that the Senate then proceed to its consideration; that the bill be considered read a third time, passed, and the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITEHOUSE). Is there objection?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to modify the request so that instead of passing the House bill, we will now pass the bill we know the President will sign. So, therefore, I would ask the pending amendments to the substitute be withdrawn and the substitute offered by Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND be agreed to; that the bill be read a third time, and passed.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we have, Republicans and Democrats—I acknowledge more Democrats than Republicans—who believe this Intelligence Committee bill can be improved upon, and I so appreciate the Judiciary Committee working in good faith with the Intelligence Committee. We think there are some tuneups that can be done to this bill to make it much better, and it is not fair, I say respectfully to my friend from Kentucky, it is really not fair that we be asked to just accept this without the ability to have a vote on a single amendment.

So I respectfully object to my colleague's request to modify the unanimous consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. Is there objection to the majority leader's request?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I am now going to ask unanimous consent to pass the House bill, which was passed by the House last November.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 517, H.R. 3773, which is the House-passed FISA bill; that the bill be read three times, passed, and the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The Republican leader.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I am sure those watching C–SPAN 2 are probably thoroughly confused with all of the parliamentary discussion back and forth and the parliamentary nuances attached thereto. Obviously, there are two sides to every story.

In fact, in April of 2007, the DNI—the Director of National Intelligence—asked for this FISA bill to be passed. Our good friends on the other side of the aisle delayed it. In June and July of 2007, the DNI actually pleaded—pleaded—for help. Our friends on the other side delayed right up until the August recess, at which time we did pass the Protect America Act, which was a 6-month authorization.

Now, during September and October, the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, in a bipartisan way, produced the Bond-Rockefeller compromise, which is the pending proposal before the Senate. It was, I gather, a painful series of compromises that brought the two sides together 13 to 2 on this extraordinarily important piece of legislation to protect our homeland. And that is the pending issue before us.

Now, we all know on an issue as important as protecting the homeland we don't get the job done unless we get a Presidential signature, and we do know the President of the United States will sign the Rockefeller-Bond proposal that is before us. So my strong recommendation to our colleagues is that we avail ourselves of the opportunity to pass this measure, which is already the product of substantial bipartisan compromise between the chairman and vice chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and also the members, who approved it 13 to 2.

A way to do that, obviously, would be to invoke cloture on that proposal, indicating that 60 or more Members of the Senate believed this bipartisan compromise, which we know will get a signature by the President of the United States and go into effect, would be a good bipartisan accomplishment for the Senate, and ultimately for the House and for America.

CLOTURE MOTION

Bearing that in mind, Mr. President, I send a cloture motion on the substitute amendment; that is, the Rockefeller-Bond proposal, to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, do hereby move to bring to a close debate on the pending substitute amendment to S. 2248, Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 Amendments Act of 2007.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I am, of course, disappointed we are where we are, but that is where we are. I have had a conference just now with the distinguished Republican leader, and what we are going to do is to vote on this cloture motion at 4:30 on Monday. I have gotten agreement, and we will formalize that in just a bit. I have agreement that the vote will be as if it occurred at noon that day, so if in fact cloture is invoked, we can start something at 6 o'clock on Tuesday because we have a lot to do.

So having said that, Mr. President, we have one call to make, which I think will be fine, and I will make the request at a later time when we do have agreement of what we want to do. I will formalize that as soon as we make a phone call.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Ms. CANTWELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE STIMULUS PACKAGE

Ms. CANTWELL. Mr. President, as my colleagues are trying to sort out issues related to scheduling votes, and I certainly do care about the pending issue and making sure that we come to a resolution that will protect a variety of interests, I rise now to speak specifically about the economic stimulus package which the Senate is going to take up next week.

We all know there has been a downturn in the economy caused by persistent high energy costs and an ongoing mortgage crisis, and we know we are seeing damages to both individual households and to businesses. We know that layoffs are accelerating, gas and home heating prices are skyrocketing, making us face some of the biggest economic challenges we have seen in years. So I think it is very important, Mr. President, that we continue on this rapid pace to get a stimulus package. And that is the good news; that in a bipartisan effort we have been working diligently along with the White House to immediately get some stimulus into the economy and help working people and businesses that are struggling.

I think our goal should be that we identify measures that are timely, targeted, and, when possible, address the underlying causes of our economic problems—that is getting money in people's pockets, I believe, must be a key component of this package. I have been following what the other side of the Capitol has been doing, the House of Representatives is working on a formidable package, and I know we are discussing a variety of issues here. But I believe any package should take the opportunity to invest in critical business stimulus measures that can alleviate some of the underlying problems that are causing Americans economic heartburn.

We are seeing oil prices in recent weeks hovering around $100 a barrel and natural gas prices remaining at exceedingly historic highs, which I think is adding great impact to what Americans are doing in trying to deal with this economy. In fact, a Los Angeles Times article in December cited economists' fear that high energy costs could ignite inflation. This would just aggravate our economic problems further.

High energy costs make it much more difficult for our manufacturing and agricultural sectors to make ends meet. Today the National Farmers Union came out in favor of a proposal that I think we should put into our stimulus package, and one that I am about to describe. It is an opportunity to include in the stimulus package incentives that both dramatically boost economic activity in 2008 and take an important step toward reducing energy costs.

I believe we should consider an extension of the clean energy tax incentives in the stimulus package. They meet the definition of short-term stimulus, targeted and timely. They have the benefit of getting immediate short-term results—that is, significant economic activity and new jobs in 2008. And they also result in long-term benefits which will help us deal with the underlying problem that is causing so much havoc with our economy, and that is high energy costs.

Mr. President, the American Wind Energy Association estimates that extending the production tax credit will result in as many as 75,000 new jobs in 2008 and $7 billion of capital spending over the next 12 months. All by Congress making the right decisions about tax incentives for the wind industry.

I think that would be a big boost to our economy. Wind generation alone has accounted for over 30 percent of our new generation placed in service last year. This industry is well beyond what some might consider a pilot phase and has significant sources of job diversity for the United States.

Likewise, the solar industry estimates that up to 40,000 new jobs could actually be lost in the next 12 months if we do not extend the investment tax credit. That is right; not only do those tax credits add stimulus to the economy, we should understand that by not doing them, by not passing them, we are actually taking away economic opportunity and investment plans that people would be making this year.

Included in this package are also four energy efficiency incentives for consumers. As a Deutsche Bank report released last November said:

Gains in efficiency will have the effect of muting the effect of expensive oil.

If we want to get consumers to go shopping, why not encourage them to buy items that will reduce their energy costs? Everybody wins when this happens. Consumers get lower bills, retailers get more economic activity, and it reduces the upward pressure on prices by mitigating demand. All of which helps the overall economy rebound faster.

This is the kind of economic stimulus we need. It helps with jobs, it helps diversify the energy industry. The clean energy industry is one of the few bright spots in an otherwise slumping economy. Unless those incentives are extended in this quarter, we are taking a risk at an even steeper downturn in an industry that saw remarkable results in 2007.

Mr. President, that's why we need to make sure we extend these critical clean energy tax incentives. I will remind my colleagues that the three times Congress let the clean energy tax incentives lapse, the wind industry saw a 75- to 93-percent decline the following year, because we were not giving them the predictability in tax incentives. So while I am very happy to make sure the public is getting the incentives in the form of rebate checks, I also want to say to my constituents that we are also putting a variety of solutions on the table, that we are trying to deal with problems that will help them not just in the near term, but also to solve the underlying problem of high energy costs that is a drag on our economy.

I know some of my colleagues will probably talk about lots of different ways we can stimulate infrastructure development, but I will say that this is about a business tax investment strategy. These clean energy incentives will stimulate billions of dollars of capital outlay now in the next 12 months, and be a huge source of new job creation.

An immediate cash infusion into the economy is necessary, but we should not lose sight of the fact that this has the additional benefit of helping us with our long-term problem.

I look forward to working with my colleagues on an extension of these clean energy incentives as part of the stimulus package, and to demonstrate the leadership and foresight that we have here in the Senate to make the right decisions about a package that will simultaneously provide us near term economic boost, prevent job loss, and help solve high energy costs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the cloture motion just filed occur on Monday, January 28, at 4:30 p.m.; that the requirements of rule XXII be waived; that if cloture is invoked, all postcloture time during a recess or adjournment would be counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. REID. Also, Mr. President, when we get the vote, the vote be deemed as having occurred at 12 noon on Monday, January 28.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The assistant majority leader.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, at the direction of the majority leader, I announce there will be no further votes today. The next vote is scheduled for 4:30 on Monday. It will be a cloture motion filed by Senator MCCONNELL relative to the bill on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The Senate will be in session tomorrow at 9:30 for morning business and debate. Members who care to may come to the floor to discuss issues of their choosing. I would say on behalf of the majority leader as well our frustration that we have reached this point. We have a deadline of February 1 to enact this new FISA act. The President has argued he needs this to keep America safe. We have offered to the Republican side an extension of the current law so that the President would be able to continue this policy and program uninterrupted for a month, several months, as long as a year and a half, and we have been rejected. The Republican leadership on the floor has argued they do not want to extend this program as we try to work out differences on the issue of the liability of telephone companies that provided information to the Federal Government. That is unfortunate.

It is also unfortunate that we had Members of the Senate come to the floor in good faith to offer amendments to this bill. I can tell you, having spoken to those on our side of the aisle, each of the amendments was prepared and offered to the Republican side for their review, no surprises. We understood that they would offer their own amendments in response. That is certainly proper. It would engage the Senate in debate on some very important issues relative to national security. But it was the decision of the Republican leadership they wanted no amendments, they wanted no debate. They wanted the President's version of this bill, take it or leave it. They would rather run the risk of closing down this program of surveillance of terrorists than perhaps give us a chance for a few amendments to be debated and voted on in the next 24 hours. That is an unfortunate start to the 2008 Senate session.

In the last year of the Senate, the Republicans were responsible for some 62 efforts to stop debate on the floor, 62 efforts at filibusters, which is a modern record; in fact, it is an all-time record for the Senate; 62 different occasions the Republicans engaged in filibusters to stop debate.

We were hopeful as we talked about the stimulus package and bipartisanship, working together, that things had changed. And then within a matter of hours, the Republican leadership came to the floor to stop us from having any amendments, any debate in a timely fashion on this important bill, and also to stop us from extending this bill, this law, so the President can use this program, and that America would never have its security at risk.

I think the Republicans have taken an untenable, indefensible position. They do not want the law extended so the President can use it. They do not want us to enact any revision to the law or even debate it on the off chance that there might be a change. They have taken the position it is their way or the highway.

Well, we will have a vote on Monday, an unfortunate vote that would have been avoided with a modicum of cooperation here in the Senate.

So there will be no further votes today; the first vote will be at 4:30 on Monday.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to a period of morning business, with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON of Florida). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITEHOUSE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE STIMULUS

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I wish to take the floor for a few minutes before we adjourn today to talk about the economy and about this stimulus package we are hearing the House is developing and will send over here some time in the next few weeks.

I must say, first, it is clear that there is a downturn in the economy that is causing a lot of anxiety among all Americans. It is clear we need to do something. Over the last 6 years, I must admit, I have been disturbed by the lack of fiscal discipline by this White House and by this Congress, as the deficits have piled up.

Think about this: In 2001, when President Clinton left office, we had surpluses. We were going to have surpluses as far as the eye could see. We were talking about paying down the national debt, saving our Social Security system. That all changed. It all changed because the new President came in and said: What is more important than paying down the debt, paying our bills, putting us on a sound fiscal basis? What is more important than that is tax cuts for the wealthiest people in our country. Oh, sure, everybody got a little bit, but a lion's share of it went to the wealthiest in our country.

I guess I shouldn't have been too surprised. The President's philosophy has always been one of trickle down, trickle-down economics. How many times do we have to keep enduring trickle-down economics when time after time we know it does not work? It may give you a little bit of a good feeling for awhile, but it always leads to disastrous consequences.

So that is what we had in 2001. We had trickle down, give the most to the wealthiest in the country; it will trickle down to everybody. It didn't trickle down. What it did was widen the gap between the rich and the poor. The very highest income earners in our country have gotten wealthy beyond Midas' imagination and the rest are down here, and the poor have gotten poorer and they have gotten to be a bigger part of our population. Children in poverty have gone up since 2001.

I suppose it was a nice dinner party for those who were at the top of the ladder for the last 5, 6 years, a wonderful ride, but look what it has led to. Now we have these huge deficits. The debt has piled up. We are now stuck in a war in Iraq that is costing us $10 billion to $12 billion a month, with no end in sight. Still we have these big tax cuts for the very wealthy going on and on.

Again, here we are. And, now we have a downturn. What do we do? We have to do something. There are times when deficit spending in the short term is prudent and necessary. That is when there is an economic downturn. But during the times when the economy is sound, that is when you ought to be paying down your debts. When the economy was sound for the last few years, we gave it all away. We gave it away, again, mostly to the wealthiest in our country. Now we are in a situation in which we want to ward off a deep recession.

Recessions always hurt those at the bottom worst. And now we are going to have to, because we don't have any money, do it with deficit spending, which I don't like, but we are going to have to do it.

I think it behooves us if, in fact, we are going to have to ask our grandkids and great-grandkids to pay the bill—that is what the national debt is; they have to pay it—if we are going to borrow from them for right now to get us through a recession, then we ought to be prudent about what we do with that money and how we do it.

I guess from my standpoint, taking a bunch of money and throwing it out there is not the way to do it. Don't throw money at the problem. That is why I have very serious reservations about what I hear coming from the other body. We haven't seen anything. All I know is what I read in the paper and see on the news and what I hear about what the White House is doing.

I have no doubt the House is acting in good faith. I am all for a bipartisan solution. But I remind both the President and my colleagues that we in the Senate are going to have some say-so in shaping the final stimulus package. Any bill that comes from the House is going to be fully amendable here, and I intend to be here with a number of my colleagues to amend it if what I hear is coming from the House, and that is mainly a rebate. I don't know what the parameters are of the rebate. That is to be decided yet. But I hear the rebate can go to couples making $150,000 a year. I guess when you figure out what the average income of Americans is, that is pretty high.

Everybody likes free money. Hey, come on, everybody likes to have the Government send them a check. Why not? I repeat, if we are going to borrow money from our grandkids and great-grandkids, let's be prudent about it. Let's put the money where it is most effective and where it is most needed, and that is not some kind of a general rebate for people.

We have unemployment rising, house prices are falling, and the home construction industry is in a severe slump. That affects everything, not just the house that is going to be built or is not being built. That is the window manufacturers, the tubing, the piping, the plumbing, the heating and air conditioning, and everything else down the line.

That is a real factor, something about which we should be concerned. Furniture makers, appliance makers, so many are also affected. Millions of Americans face the prospect of foreclosure, losing their homes. Banks are tightening their lending requirements. New credit is drying up. Even as the Fed reduces their interest rates, banks are tightening up the requirements. And who always gets hit the hardest? You got it, low-income people.

Prices are rising. I need not tell everybody about the rising price of fuel. But I also have to tell you that in many cities in this country, the price of a gallon of milk is higher than a gallon of gasoline. I read where somebody said once a price of gasoline may not affect a lot of low-income people because they ride mass transit and they don't have a car. They eat. And when the price of a gallon of milk is higher than a price of a gallon of gasoline, you don't have much choice.

If a gallon of gasoline is high and you don't like it, I supposed you can ride mass transit, ride a bicycle, or walk. If you are hungry, you have to have food. I don't know any substitute yet for food.

We need a stimulus package, but we have to get it right, targeted to those who have been hit the hardest and invest in the growth in the U.S. economy. Don't think about this as a one-time thing, if we spend a lot of money now that will get us through it. If you have someone who makes $150,000 a couple or $75,000 for, let's say, a single person, you give them 600 or 700 bucks, what they are talking about, I think studies have shown a big portion of that will be saved. There is nothing wrong with that. That is fine. I am all for saving. People ought to save more. But another portion of that will be used to pay past bills, and another portion of that, guess what, is going to be used to buy things. One might say: That is the deal, we want people to buy things; that is the idea of a stimulus. Yes, but what are they going to buy? Are they going to buy a new flat-screen TV made in China? Are they going to buy a new electronic game made overseas? So many of those items are made in foreign countries, so a lot of money will flow from here right to China, Japan, Korea, or who knows where else.

You can buy clothes. Most of our clothes are made overseas. You can buy a pair of shoes. We don't make many shoes here anymore. I am saying you have to think about who is getting helped and where is the money going, and is it going to help build the structure of America and make for our economy to be sound.

On that score, the proposal I see from the House does not quite do it. There are three big items, as I understand, that they leave out. The first is food stamps. I was in my office today listening and I heard some speakers on the floor talk about all we need in a stimulus package. Some of them never even mentioned food stamps, and yet these are the people hit the hardest by a recession. We know the multiplier effect of food stamps is better than any other single program in which we can invest. Here is a chart that indicates that. This is prepared by Moody's Economy. It is not a Government source. Here are the proposals that deliver the demand generated by $1 of stimulus. For $1 of stimulus, what do you get back? For business investment writeoffs, if you invest $1, you get 27 cents; extend the Bush tax cuts, you get 29 cents. Who is going to invest a dollar to get back 29 cents, I ask you. Then income tax cuts, payroll tax rebates, aid to States, unemployment, food stamps, a $1.73 multiplier effect for every dollar you put in. These are the people hit the hardest. We know food prices are extremely high. A gallon of milk is more than a gallon of gasoline. There is no substitute for food.

It seems to me that if we are going to invest in a stimulus package, this is a key place where we ought to be investing our money. Not only does it help the poorest in our Nation, to give them the food they need, but think about it in another way. When you give someone food stamps, they can't spend it on a flat-screen TV made in China, they can't spend it on a new electronic game or an iPod; it has to be food. For the most part, most of that food is grown in the United States, it is processed in the United States, it is packaged in the United States, it is shipped in the United States, and it is sold in stores in the United States. And, they will spend it all. That is why the multiplier effect is so big.

Now, from what I hear, the House proposal has zero in it—zero—for food stamps. Well, that has to be taken care of. And when that bill comes, if it doesn't have it in here when it comes here, I, along with others—and I see my colleague from Ohio, who I know is going to be stalwart on that too—we are going to demand that any stimulus package have food stamps. Food stamps. And why shouldn't it? That is the biggest bang for the buck right there.

Now, again, everybody likes rebates and stuff. Maybe I am a little more conservative on this issue than others and I see it in those terms, that we have to be very careful about how we are spending deficit money. Put it here and it gets spent and it will go for everything made in the United States. You get a big multiplier effect on that. And it has to be a distinct change.

Here is what I would propose that we do on food stamps. First of all, raise the asset level for which you qualify for food stamps. Right now, it is $2,000. Let me make it very clear what I mean by that. Let's say that you are a single parent, you are working at a low-income job, and you temporarily get unemployed, which is what is happening now because unemployment goes up in a recession, and you find it necessary to get food stamps for your children. If you have $2,000 that you have salted away in a savings account, in a 401(k), no matter what, if you have $2,000 salted away, you don't get food stamps.

Now, that level was set in 1977—in 1977. What if that had just kept pace with inflation through all these years? What if we had the same asset level exclusion today in real dollar terms as we had in 1977? What would it be? I will tell you right now. It would be about $6,000. So what we are saying to food stamp recipients today is: You are worse off, you are worse off than a food stamp recipient was in 1977. So the first thing we have to do is raise the asset level for which you qualify for food stamps, and we ought to raise it up to what the level would be had it kept pace with inflation, and that is roughly in the neighborhood of about $6,000. Imagine that, $6,000.

We want poor people to save. One of the reasons people get stuck in poverty is they do not save any money. Yet we tell them: If you save and you hit a rough patch and you get unemployed, guess what, no food stamps. You have to spend your savings. What kind of message does that send? So that is No. 1.

Number 2, we ought to take off the childcare cap. Take it off. Now, I will admit that the Bush administration, in their farm bill proposal they sent down, also asked that we take off the cap. So there shouldn't be any argument there. So if you have to have childcare, whatever you spend for childcare is not taken into account. You get to deduct all that. You get to deduct whatever the cost of childcare is from your income. Right now, it is capped at $175 per month. That is not enough and it is very hard to work with young children with no one at home to take care of them without child care. So we shouldn't have the argument from the administration since they proposed that too.

The third thing is to exempt from your savings, from your income, anything that you put into an education account or into a 401(k). That ought to be exempt. The administration proposed that, also, so we shouldn't have any problem there.

The fourth thing we need to do is to raise the standard deduction. Now, the standard deduction is a deduction that applies to a family who depends basically on income and depends on how many kids you have. That standard deduction was set in 1996—welfare reform. Guess what. It hasn't changed since then. So the standard deduction needs to be raised to keep pace with inflation, and it needs to be indexed. We need to index both the asset level and the standard deduction so that in the future we don't have this problem anymore.

We should do those four things.

Now, the fifth thing we ought to do is to recognize that many people who get food stamps don't get enough food stamps. During an economic downturn, a lot of people rely upon our food banks to get food for the rest of the month. You can go to any food bank in your cities, anywhere, and they will tell you that the third and fourth weeks of the month is when they get hit the hardest because people run out of food and come in there to supplement their food. But our food banks are in dire need of more food. So I would suggest, modestly suggest, that we ought to put somewhere in the neighborhood of about $100 million in this stimulus package to go out—that is under the Emergency Food Assistance Program—to be able to get food to our food banks. Again, not only does this go to people who are on food stamps but also to homeless people, soup kitchens, and the things that really help the poorest people in our country. Yet this is nowhere in the stimulus package. Again, keep in mind this money would be spent for food produced in the United States, processed, packaged, and for people who work in a lot of our food banks and in our soup kitchens and places such as that.

So, again, those are five things which need to be done on food stamps.

The second thing we need to do is to extend unemployment benefits. Second only to food stamps, unemployment benefits give you the biggest return on every dollar—$1.64 for every dollar spent. After all, isn't that what we are talking about, people who have been on unemployment but their benefits have run out? They should be extended. I mean, common compassion would tell you they ought to be extended, but common sense should also tell you that too. In a stimulus package, we ought to extend our unemployment benefits for those who no longer have jobs. Yet, as I hear about and read about the House package, that is not there. That is not there.

Now, the third thing we have to do is invest in the future structure of America so that we have some investments that will lead to a better economic footing for this country. As I said, and I will repeat myself for emphasis' sake, if we just give someone money and they spend it on a flat-screen TV made overseas, some of that helps here, but a lot of it doesn't. What is there that we can invest in that will put people to work right away, spend money in this country, and most of the money stays right here in America? What that means is infrastructure money. That is money that goes out for repairing our roads and bridges and sewer and water systems, school construction and weatherization.

There was some talk that we need to put money in here for LIHEAP, the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program. It is a vital program. It helps a lot of low-income elderly heat their homes during the winter and, in the South, cool their homes in the summer. We ought to be putting money into weatherization programs for insulation and things such as that for these homes as well to save for the long term and also to create jobs. It puts people to work.

I actually did a workday once with a weatherization group, and when you think about it, you get this done, and then their heating bills for the next 5 to 10 years will be lower. That is what we need, to invest in the infrastructure of our country.

Right now, I know that in the Department of Agriculture, we have over $1 billion backlogged right now for just sewer and water projects, just sewer and water programs. Many are ready to go with all of the plans that are there, designs all set, but they just don't have the money. Small towns and communities could benefit from this, and it would put a lot of people to work. School construction—so many of our schools have outdated heating systems that cost a lot of money every year. They may need to expand, or they may need new fire and safety materials. Sometimes they just need to build new schools. A lot of these are ready to go. Why not invest the money there? Roads and bridges, our interstate highways and bridge rehabilitation projects that are ready to go, courthouses that need to be built with the plans done but are waiting for funds. People could be at work on these by this summer. Some time government will be paying for these projects. Why not do the work this year when it will help a weak economy?

I hope people don't get deluded into thinking that all we have to do is pass $150 billion, throw it out there in the next couple of months, and it is all over with. That is not going to happen. Better we do it carefully. If we can get this money out by this summer and put people to work, it would be one of the best things we could do.

Again, keep in mind, when you give aid to the States for infrastructure—think about this—put a new roof or remodel the school or whatever—think about this—the work is all done here. You can't outsource that. So the work is done here, the people who work here are paid here, and they spend their money here.

Secondly, most of the materials that go into construction are made in America—your lights, your heating, your wiring, your drywall, windows, doors, and rerods. When you think about it, it is almost all made in America. There may be some things made elsewhere, but probably 90 percent of all the construction materials we use in this country are made in America. That is why this multiplier effect is so big. So not only do you employ people here, who spend their money here and help their families out, you are buying materials that are made somewhere else in America. That helps those jobs and helps those people go to work, whether it is making windows or doors or floors or faucets or piping or wiring or lightbulbs or whatever it might be.

So that is why I say that what I hear about coming from the House I think really misses the point. It misses the point. Don't just throw money at the problem. Don't just throw money at it. And don't throw money at it in a way that people who make a lot more money than poor people get a bigger piece of the pie. Let's put it where it really has an effect—food stamps, unemployment benefits, and investment in needed infrastructure. If we just did those three things, that would do more to stop a recession in this country than anything we could do, and it would do more to build for the future—to build for the future—than anything else we could do.

So I hope, Mr. President, we get a better package than what I am reading about. I hope when it comes over here that we will have it on the floor, it will be open, and we will be able to offer amendments, and I hope we can be heard on this and we can offer these amendments to try to focus this where it is really needed. To me, that is what a stimulus package ought to be about. No more trickle down. No more just throwing money out there.

Everybody loves free money. What the heck, everybody loves free money. That is not the point. The point is, we are borrowing from our kids and grandkids. We ought to treat it carefully, be conservative about it, and we ought to do what will get the most bang for the buck and lead to a more sound economy in this country.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, first of all, I thank the Senator from Iowa for his terrific work on advocating for those who are most victimized by this recession, the elderly who need help on their heating and weatherization of their homes, the people who need food stamps, people who have lost their jobs, people who have lost their health insurance, people who are struggling the most. I wish to thank Senator HARKIN for his work.

I wish to tell a story that I think illustrates the hardship among middle-class Americans, middle-class Ohioans, people who have worked hard, played by the rules, have seen their unemployment run out, or seen their job lost or seen the prices of gasoline and home heating and food go so high that they cannot afford the middle-class lifestyle or even the subsistence living that has afflicted their lives.

I mentioned this story on the floor a couple times, but it so much illustrates Senator HARKIN's words and Senator HARKIN's solutions of extending unemployment, that gets money in people's pockets quickly; of helping with food banks and food stamps and LIHEAP and all that.

Congress's response needs to be twofold. We need to stimulate the economy, and the House version is a start, it is a good start, and we need to help those who are most victimized by the recession.

In Logan, OH, in Hocking County, a county halfway between Columbus in Central Ohio and Athens on the Ohio River, in Logan, OH, a southeast Appalachian county, on a cold December day about a month ago, at 3:30 in the morning people began to line up outside the United Methodist in Logan, the county seat of Hocking County, to get food. It was 3:30 in the morning on a cold winter day. By 8 o'clock, cars were snaked around the church and the neighborhood and up and down the streets when the food panty opened. By 1 o'clock in the afternoon, 2,000 people—2,000 people in a county of about 30,000—7 percent of the county, had come to this food pantry.

Many of those in this county had driven 20, 25 or 30 minutes to get there, a county that has had problems in the past but a county where that food bank served only a few dozen people 3 or 4 or 5 years ago.

Across the State, in Warren County, a relatively affluent community overall, a larger county northeast of Cincinnati down in southwest Ohio, the head of the United Way told me 90 percent of their people who come to their food pantries in their county, 90 percent of the people have jobs.

The mayor of Denver told a group of us, the Presiding Officer was there, that 40 percent of the homeless people in greater Denver are employed. Underemployed, perhaps, employed obviously in low-wage jobs.

Tim, a gentleman from Cleveland, used to donate time and money to the local food bank and soup kitchen. He is still employed, but the costs were consuming him and his family. He quit giving money to the food bank but continued to volunteer there. Now he is in a position where he relies on those resources himself. He said he used to be middle class, but he does not consider himself middle class any more because his wages have not kept pace with the cost of basic needs such as food, heat, and shelter.

He spoke of the great humility it took to go to the food bank for his own household. He said it is merely a drop in the bucket compared to what his family needs.

Today my office received an alarming e-mail from Ohio's Second Harvest. Second Harvest is a group of food banks that serve our State. The e-mail mail explained that Second Harvest Food Bank of Southeastern Ohio, which serves the area where Logan is, the community I mentioned earlier, is nearly out of food. For the fourth time in just over a year, the e-mail said, they have come very close to closing their doors; there is no relief in sight.

This problem is not unique to Ohio, it is affecting cities all over this country. It is affecting rural areas, large cities, small towns, and suburbs. No community seems to be immune from this.

That is why our efforts are so very important. Senator HARKIN had a chart that showed the importance of putting money directly into the pockets of those who are most afflicted by this recession. That means people who go to food banks; it means people on food stamps; it means people who have problems paying their heating bill; it means people whose unemployment has run out.

I appreciate the House action. As I said, the House has a good start, putting money into the pockets directly of middle-class taxpayers, of working families. But we need to do more. The best thing we can do while we want to stimulate the economy, the best thing we can do is extend unemployment compensation. Because that money will be spent by those people who are hurting because they lost their job, they cannot find work, and their unemployment has run out.

Our proposal of $40 million that I introduced back in December may need to be more than that, but that would be a good start, to get people over December, January, February as these food banks have run out of food. That $40 million spread around the country will matter, as these food banks say they are in the worst shape than any time in the last 20 years. They are in worse shape because grocery stores donate less because they are more efficient, they damage fewer cans, they have less oversupply or waste that they donated to food banks in the past.

Obviously, the demand on these food banks is so much greater than it has been. Again, I would also add that donations are down in January. They always are after Christmas. People, as generous as they are at Christmas, sometimes sort of forget in January, so they are not getting help from the individuals and the community. Of course, the demands on those food banks are higher.

So that stimulus package, while a good start in the House, putting money in the pockets of middle-class Americans and working Americans, needs to go further and needing to go further is helping the most afflicted, pained, the people who need it most and have been victims of this recession.

As Senator HARKIN said, that money will then be spent in our communities with American-made products and will have a very good multiplying effect for jump-starting our economy.

No one should go hungry in the richest country in the world. We are spending $3 billion a week on the war in Iraq. The tax cuts the President gave over the last 6 years resulted in huge numbers of dollars to the richest people, the richest 1 percent in this country. It is time we dealt with some of the problems that are hurting people in Steubenville and Lima and Zanesville and Dayton and Cleveland and Akron and Youngstown and Warren in my State.

So I ask, as this bill comes to the Senate after House passage, that we look seriously at the proposal Senator HARKIN had to take care of food stamps and food banks, to extend unemployment benefits, to take care of seniors who simply cannot meet their heating bills as the winter moves on.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. President, I rise to speak on the stimulus package and the progress we are making, and the further progress we must make.

As is being reported, this morning the House is very close—probably already there—on a bipartisan stimulus package. This in itself is good news. Our economy is in poor shape. It is not simply the housing markets—where this started—but it is also now consumer spending. As housing prices go down, because of the subprime crisis, consumers spend less, and it also creates a credit freeze. Now we are finding credit problems not only in subprime loans and subprime securities but also with the insurers, the insurance, the mortgage and other insurers, which makes the markets wonder: Are there credit problems elsewhere, which is the most frightening issue we might have.

With all of this happening, Chairman Bernanke's swift action made a good deal of sense. But it must be matched by swift action by the executive branch of Government and the legislative branch of Government in putting together a stimulus package. I think the package—I have always said, and I think most Democrats and Republicans would agree—the centerpiece ought to be a tax cut, a tax refund check sent to the middle class.

It is the middle class that needs the help. It is the middle class that would spend it the most quickly. It makes a great deal of sense. It also makes sense to send it to those who are the working poor—not quite middle class—for the same reasons, even if they do not pay an income tax. It also makes sense to send those checks to people on Social Security who would file a tax return but might not pay even a payroll tax.

The bill the House has done in terms of the centerpiece is very good progress. It has taken the tax rebate checks and aimed them right at the middle class, where it should be, whereas the President's proposal aimed them significantly higher. In the President's initial proposal, someone making $300,000 or $400,000 a year would get the full rebate, and families earning between $30,000 or $40,000 would get less than the full amount, or nothing at all. So that is great progress.

I salute the House and Speaker PELOSI and Secretary Paulson and Minority Leader BOEHNER for their progress. But the package is not complete. While it is a very good first step, we need to move a little further. One of the things many of us on this side have always felt is that spending stimuli are necessary. Most importantly—for efficiency reasons, to get the economy moving—the rebate tax checks will not get into people's hands until May, at the earliest, maybe June, or maybe even July. Some say they will spend the money in anticipation of those checks but not very many. Rebate tax checks, while they do have a very significant effect on boosting the economy, do not come close to being as efficient as unemployment insurance and lengthening the time, and maybe changing and expanding the benefit temporarily.

CBO—nonpartisan—estimates for every $1 you spend on unemployment insurance, you get a $1.64 boost to the economy. That is great. That is phenomenal. For every $1 you spend on a tax refund—it is still very good, and still should be done—it is only $1.26.

We have always felt, again, that there ought to be two bookends, one on each side of the centerpiece on tax spending refunds. One should be business tax cuts. They should be aimed to be speedy and quick, but they should be balanced off by some spending stimuli.

The House bill does not have spending stimuli, and it is something I believe many of my colleagues—certainly myself—are going to try very hard to add to the package. Those spending stimuli should focus on employment insurance but could be for other things: money for summer jobs; money, if it can be spent quickly, for infrastructure; money for nutrition assistance, things such as that. I think that will add more balance to the package, but it will also make it more effective as a tool to stimulate the economy.

The second change I think we need is a focus on the housing prices. I salute my colleagues in the House—Speaker PELOSI, Congressman FRANK—because they worked hard to add some things we have been talking about for a long time to deal with the housing crisis, the conforming loan limit, and FHA reform. Those are very good and important because, after all, if the housing crisis is at the center of our problems, to ignore it, to work around it, is not doing everything we can to help eliminate or at least reduce the severity of a recession.

There are some other issues we should consider looking at as we move the bill in the Senate. Most importantly, dollars—some spending; it will not be very much, actually, but some spending for counseling, foreclosure avoidance counseling, which could prevent tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of homes from being foreclosed on unnecessarily. There are many people in these homes who do have the ability to refinance given their income, given their FICO scores, but there is no one there to help them do it because the banks are no longer on the scene. These counselors would work. Secretary Paulson has told me the administration has no problem with this kind of proposal.

We did put $180 million in the last omnibus budget bill. Senator CASEY, Senator BROWN, myself, with Senator MURRAY's great help, spearheaded the charge on that. But we should do more. We should look at other housing additions as well. Again, they will have to be broadly supported, bipartisan, and not hold up the package.

Finally, the third aspect we should talk about is we do need a second stimulus package to look at the long-range problems. We have many different structural problems in the economy now. A long-range package that would focus more on infrastructure, on trade adjustment assistance, on reforming unemployment insurance, and many other things, is very much needed. On the business side, too, tax credits for energy, for instance, for clean energy and green energy, are something we should seriously consider.

The third point I would make—and this is not at all a criticism of the House because we always intended there be a first package that is quick, gets into the economy quickly, does not create controversy—we need a second package aimed at the longer term.

In conclusion, this is a very good start. Again, I particularly salute Speaker PELOSI and the House Democratic leadership for so improving the President's proposal on the tax refund. I also salute Minority Leader BOEHNER and his Republican colleagues for working so closely with the Democratic leadership on this issue.

But we do need more. We need some spending stimuli. We need more done to deal with the housing crisis, which is at the center of these economic troubled times. And we do need a long-range package that aims at the structural problems in the economy. If we can do that, and add on to the great start that has been made by the House, we will have done the right thing in a bipartisan way to move this country forward and avoid a recession—unlikely, but it may be possible; let's hope and pray—certainly a deep and long recession that would hurt so many people and families.

RECONCILIATION IN THE REPUBLIC OF GEORGIA

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, on Sunday, January 20, Mikhail Saakashvili was reinaugurated as President of the Republic of Georgia. He won an election that the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, OSCE, referred to as ''the first genuinely competitive presidential election in the country, enabling the Georgian people to express their political choice.'' I wish President Saakashvili and the people of Georgia well.

President Saakashvili's program of reform and integration into Euro-Atlantic institutions, such as NATO, depends on the strength of Georgia's democracy. At the same time, membership in those institutions will reinforce and protect Georgia's democracy.

When I spoke with President Saakashvili in November, I was confident that he understood the close connection between these two goals. In order to achieve them, reconciliation between the President and his political opponents is essential.

Despite the findings of OSCE international monitors, the Georgian opposition repudiated the election's results and took to the street. In 16 years of independence there has never been a peaceful transfer of power in Georgia. Perhaps the time has come to move the debate off the street and into Parliament.

In my 35 years in the Senate, I have seen just how powerful a vehicle for change a democratically elected body can be. I hope the opposition parties will focus their energies on April's parliamentary elections, reinvigorating the Parliament and promoting progress from within.

On the same day that they gathered to elect a President, 73 percent of the Georgian electorate affirmed their interest in Georgia joining NATO. I support their aspirations and I am confident that the people of Georgia, united by a sense of common purpose, can and will realize their full potential and achieve great things.

BUDGET SCOREKEEPING REPORT

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I rise to submit to the Senate the fourth budget scorekeeping report for the 2008 budget resolution. The report, which covers fiscal year 2008, was prepared by the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to section 308(b) and in aid of section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended.

The report shows the effect of congressional action through January 23, 2008, and includes legislation that was enacted and or cleared for the President's signature since I filed my last report for fiscal year 2008. The new legislation includes:

P.L. 110–53, Implementing Recommendations of the 9/11 Commission Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–84, the College Cost Reduction and Access Act;

P.L. 110–85, the Food and Drug Administration Amendments Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–89, an act to extend the trade adjustment assistance program under the Trade Act of 1974 for 3 months;

P.L. 110–90, the TMA, Abstinence Education, and QI Programs Extension Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–114, the Water Resources Development Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–116; the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 2008;

P.L. 110–135, the Fair Treatment for Experienced Pilots Act;

P.L. 110–138, the United States-Peru Trade Promotion Agreement Implementation Act;

P.L. 110–140, the Energy Independence and Security Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–142, the Mortgage Forgiveness Debt Relief Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–150, a bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to extend the authority of the United States Postal Service to issue a semipostal to raise funds for breast cancer research;

P.L. 110–160, the Terrorism Risk Insurance Program Reauthorization Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–161, the Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2008;

P.L. 110–166, the Tax Increase Prevention Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–173, the Medicare, Medicaid, and SCHIP Extension Act of 2007;

P.L. 110–175, the OPEN Government Act of 2007; and

H.R. 4986—pending Presidential action as of January 22, 2008—the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008.

The estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues used in the report are consistent with the technical and economic assumptions of S. Con Res. 21, the 2008 budget resolution.

The estimates show that current level spending is below the budget resolution by $24.4 billion for budget authority and $13.5 billion for outlays while current level revenues are below the budget resolution level by $19 billion.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter and accompanying tables from CBO be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, January 24, 2008.

Hon. KENT CONRAD,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The enclosed report shows the effects of Congressional action on the fiscal year 2008 budget and is current through January 23, 2008. This report is submitted under section 308(b) and in aid of section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended.

The estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues are consistent with the technical and economic assumptions of S. Con. Res. 21, the Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 2008, as approved by the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Pursuant to section 204(a) of S. Con. Res. 21, provisions designated as emergency requirements are exempt from enforcement of the budget resolution. As a result, the enclosed current level report excludes these amounts (see footnote 1 of Table 2 of the report).

Since my last letter, dated July 26, 2007, the Congress has cleared and the President has signed the following acts that affect budget authority, outlays, or revenues for fiscal year 2008: Implementing Recommendations of the 9/11 Commission Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–53); College Cost Reduction and Access Act (Public Law 110–84); Food and Drug Administration Amendments Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–85); An act to extend the trade adjustment assistance program under the Trade Act of 1974 for three months (Public Law 110–89); TMA, Abstinence Education, and QI Programs Extension Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–90); Water Resources Development Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–114); Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 2008 (Public Law 110–116); Fair Treatment for Experienced Pilots Act (Public Law 110–135); United States-Peru Trade Promotion Agreement Implementation Act (Public Law 110–138); Energy Independence and Security Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–140); Mortgage Forgiveness Debt Relief Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–142); A bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to extend the authority of the United States Postal Service to issue a semipostal to raise funds for breast cancer research (Public Law 110–150); Terrorism Risk Insurance Program Reauthorization Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–160); Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2008 (Public Law 110–161); Tax Increase Prevention Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–166); Medicare, Medicaid, and SCHIP Extension Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–173); and OPEN Government Act of 2007 (Public Law 110–175).

In addition, the Congress has cleared the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008 (H.R. 4986) for the President's signature.

The effects of those actions are detailed on Table 2.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. SUNSHINE
(for Peter R. Orszag, Director.)

Enclosure.

TABLE 1.—SENATE CURRENT LEVEL REPORT FOR SPENDING AND REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR 2008, AS OF JANUARY 23, 2008

(In billions of dollars)

| | Budget resolution [1] | Current level [2] | Current level over/under (-) resolution |

| ON-BUDGET | | | |
| Budget Authority | 2,357.5 | 2,333.0 | −24.4 |
| Outlays | 2,359.6 | 2,346.2 | −13.5 |
| Revenues | 2,019.6 | 2,000.7 | −19.0 |

[1] S. Con. Res. 21, the Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 2008, as adjusted pursuant to section 207(f), assumed approximately $0.6 billion in budget authority and $48.6 billion in outlays from emergency supplemental appropriations. Such emergency amounts are exempt from the enforcement of the budget resolution. Since current level totals exclude the emergency requirements enacted in P.L. 110–28 (see footnote 1 of table 2), budget authority and outlay totals specified in the budget resolution have also been reduced (by the amounts assumed for emergency supplemental appropriations) for purposes of comparison.

Additionally, section 207(c)(2)(E) of S. Con. Res. 21 assumed $145.2 billion in budget authority and $65.8 billion in outlays for overseas deployment and related activities. Pending action by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, the Senate Committee on the Budget has directed that these amounts be excluded from the budget resolution aggregates in the current level report.

[2] Current level is the estimated effect on revenue and spending of all legislation that the Congress has enacted or sent to the President for his approval. In addition, full-year funding estimates under current law are included for entitlement and mandatory programs requiring annual appropriations, even if the appropriations have not been made.

[3] Excludes administrative expenses of the Social Security Administration, which are off-budget, but are appropriated annually.

[2] For purposes of enforcing section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act in the Senate, the budget resolution does not include budget authority, outlays, or revenues for off-budget amounts. As a result, current level excludes these items.

[3] Periodically, the Senate Committee on the Budget revises the totals in S. Con. Res. 21, pursuant to various provisions of the resolution:

[4] S. Con. Res. 21, as adjusted pursuant to section 207(f), assumed $605 million in budget authority and $48,639 million in outlays from emergency supplemental appropriations. Such emergency amounts are exempt from the enforcement of the budget resolution. Since current level totals exclude the emergency requirements enacted in P.L. 110–28 (see footnote 1), budget authority and outlay totals specified in the budget resolution also have been reduced (by the amounts assumed for emergency supplemental appropriations) for purposes of comparison.

[5] Section 207(c)(2)(E) of S. Con. Res. 21 assumed $145,162 million in budget authority and $65,754 million in outlays for overseas deployment and related activities. Pending action by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, the Senate Committee on the Budget has directed that these amounts be excluded from the budget resolution aggregates in the current level report.

THE MATTHEW SHEPARD ACT OF 2007

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to speak about the need for hate crimes legislation. Each Congress, Senator KENNEDY and I introduce hate crimes legislation that would add new categories to current hate crimes law, sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society. Likewise, each Congress I have come to the floor to highlight a separate hate crime that has occurred in our country.

On September 22, 2007, Matthew Shetima was walking through an alley in Farmington, NM, when he encountered three men. Shetima, a gay man, claims that Scott Thompson, 21, Jerry Paul, 40, and Craig Yazzie, 37, all from New Mexico, called him over as he walked by the men. According to the police report, the three men began to hit Shetima, all of them calling him derogatory names as they struck him. According to the police report, when he fell to the ground, at least one of the men asked him if he wanted to die as they continued to kick him. Shetima was then pulled into the hotel room the three men were staying in, where the assault continued. Fortunately, Shetima was able to escape. The district attorney prosecuting the case is seeking sentencing enhancements for all three men under New Mexico's hate crime law.

I believe that the Government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Matthew Shepard Act is a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation and changing current law, we can change hearts and minds as well.

MICHIGAN TECH'S TUITION OFFER

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, Michigan Technological University's recent decision to offer in State tuition to the children or spouse of anyone on active military duty, regardless of their State of residence, deserves our recognition and praise.

We are all deeply indebted to our men and women in uniform for their bravery and sacrifice. Michigan Tech is expressing thanks and showing support for the families of those serving in our armed services in a way that will make a real difference.

While out-of-State students at Michigan Tech pay over $21,000 for tuition, in State tuition is less than $10,000 each year. This savings will be available to the families of the 1.3 million men and women who are on Active Duty in the Air Force, Army, Coast Guard, Marines, Navy, National Guard and Reserve, as well as the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration and United States Public Health Service Corps. We believe that Michigan Tech is the first college or university in the Nation to extend in State tuition to the families of all military personnel serving on Active Duty.

The idea developed after an applicant to a State university in Michigan received an admission offer but was denied in State tuition even though he graduated from a Michigan high school. His father was serving on Active Duty and had been stationed in Michigan but was moved out-of-State, prompting the tuition decision. Michigan Tech's new policy would allow this student, along with many others, to receive in State tuition if admitted. Hopefully this decision will be followed by other colleges and universities as well.

The university's fight song, ''Fight Tech, Fight!'' includes the line: ''From Northern hills we'll sound our cry, we'll ring your praises to the sky!'' This is an important decision by Michigan Tech that deserves praise and, from the hills of Michigan's upper peninsula, it is a decision that will undoubtedly be heard and appreciated by military families across the country and our brave men and women stationed around the world.

U.S. WITHDRAWAL OF LETTERS TO CUBA

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. President, with Florida's marine environment and tourism economy threatened by potential drilling a mere 45 miles off its coast, and a communist regime ruling Cuba, we find ourselves in a difficult situation. We must do all that we can to protect our Nation's natural treasures while at the same time emphasizing that the undemocratic Castro government has no right to speak for the people of Cuba.

That is why I have asked President Bush to withdraw the letters that the United States exchanges with Cuba every 2 years. This exchange of letters is the only thing enforcing the 1977 Maritime Boundary Agreement between the United States and Cuba, and incidentally, one of the only rationales the Castro government has for drilling just 45 miles off of our pristine coast.

We have seen what oil spills have done in other parts of the country and around the world. I am not prepared to take chances with Florida's coral reefs and other marine life, nor with the livelihoods of millions of Floridians who depend on tourism for their economic well-being. The continued exchange of these letters leaves the door open to economic and environmental disaster and the enrichment of the Castro regime.

And so, I urge the administration to join me in closing this door on disaster and to protect Florida by withdrawing these letters now. Should Cuba gain a democratically elected government as envisioned by the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity—or LIBERTAD—Act of 1996, we could consider renegotiating our boundary agreement so that it clearly protects the environment. Until that time, however, withdrawing these letters is the best and first step towards protecting the people and environment of Florida.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

RECOGNIZING THE VILLAGE OF EASTLAKE

● Mr. CARPER. Mr. President, I wish to recognize and congratulate Leon N. Weiner & Associates for their success with the Village of Eastlake in Wilmington, DE. For almost 60 years, Leon N. Weiner & Associates has been doing outstanding work for the housing industry in Delaware and surrounding areas. Their work on the Village of Eastlake has made such a positive impact that the readers of Affordable Housing Finance Magazine recently named it the Nation's best affordable home ownership development.

The Eastlake neighborhood, which was built in 1943, was locally known as ''the Bucket,'' meaning if people lived in Eastlake, they had hit the bottom of the bucket. The 267-unit public housing development, one of many in a crime-ridden neighborhood, became dilapidated despite the best efforts of the Wilmington Housing Authority. Violent crime and drug abuse grew to proportions exceeding some of the worst per capita crime rates in the Nation. In 1997 alone, Wilmington police were called to Eastlake over 5,000 times.

After a decade of work, Leon N. Weiner & Associates transformed the site, which is about the size of three city blocks, into the Village of Eastlake, an affordable housing project consisting of 70 rental and 90 home ownership units. Furthermore, their work here has helped jumpstart additional affordable housing projects in the city of Wilmington. A nonprofit and a for-profit firm have teamed up to build 72 town homes in the neighborhood, as well.

All 90 units—62 town homes and 28 duplexes—at Eastlake consist of three bedrooms. The homes are reserved for households with widely varying incomes—as low as 26 percent of the area median income up to a high of 115 percent. Fifty-nine homes are reserved for households earning between 26 percent and 80 percent of the area median income.

The success of Eastlake could not have been reached without the added help and efforts of many other entities, including the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, PNC Bank, the Federal Home Loan Bank of Pittsburgh, and the State of Delaware, which provided much needed funds.

Once again, I wish to recognize Leon N. Weiner & Associates. Their work in the Eastlake community is commendable and most deserving of Affordable Housing Finance Magazine's Reader's Choice Award. They are an invaluable asset to our community, and I wish them all the best.

On a point of personal privilege, Leon Weiner, who passed away in 2002, was a personal friend of mine for over three decades. In fact, he was one of the first people I met after enrolling in the University of Delaware's MBA program in 1973. More importantly, throughout his life he was one of the strongest voices in this country calling for the creation of affordable housing for all Americans. He fervently believed that all families need and deserve a decent place to live, and he worked tirelessly to ensure that government, the private sector, and nonprofits work together in pursuit of this goal. Unfortunately, he did not live to see one of his last dreams Eastlake become a reality, but it serves as a fitting memorable to him and to the team of dedicated men and women he led at Leon N. Weiner & Associates. Together, they demonstrated and continue to demonstrate that it is possible to do good and do well at the same time.●

Colonel Bruno served with distinction in a series of senior leadership positions as Army nurse corps staff officer, AMEDD personnel proponency directorate, chief nurse, 30th Medical Brigade deputy commander for nursing, chief nurse 67th Combat Support Hospital personnel management officer, and chief, perioperative nursing services. Colonel Bruno's accomplishments are eloquent testimony to her talent, dedication, loyalty, and determination to see that the best possible nursing care is always available to our soldiers, their family members, and our deserving retirees. ### TRIBUTE TO THE VANDERVLIET FAMILY

● Mr. THUNE. Mr. President, today I honor the 2008 Agri-Business Farm Family of the year. This award goes to the VanDerVliet family: Rod and Lois VanDerVliet and their children, Ryan and Sarah VanDerVliet, Lisa and Jamie Johnson, and Lori and Ryan Fods; and their grandchildren Rhegan Oberg, Tyson VanDerVliet, Weston VanDerVliet, Parker Johnson, Devin Fods, and Clara VanDerVliet.

For over 30 years the VanDerVliets have raised livestock and grain on their farm west of Colton, SD. Today, Rod's son Ryan, daughters Lisa and Lori, and son-in-law Ryan are an important part of the farm operation. Over the past several years the family has navigated the quickly changing farm industry and successfully utilized technology to ensure that the farm stays competitive and productive.

Although Rod VanDerVliet sees farms becoming more business oriented than ever, he and his family love the farming lifestyle. Rod enjoys it because of its flexibility, connection to nature, and most importantly, because it is something that involves the whole family. Ryan shares his dad's love of farming and says he ''like[s] being around the animals and the farming lifestyle.'' Both men would like to pass this way of life on to the next generation. And, with six grandchildren under the age of six, there shouldn't be any shortage of help.

The family's hard work has passed beyond the farmyard and into the community. The children grew up participating in 4–H and FFA. Rod has served on the Colton Farmers Elevator Board for more than 20 years and the MCWC Rural Water Board; Ryan serves on the township board, and the entire family is involved in numerous community organizations and activities.

The VanDerVliets are an example of families that embody South Dakota values and form the bedrock of our great State. I am very proud to see a family-run farm successfully evolving in the changing industry while maintaining a commitment to their community and family. I commend them for this award, and I wish them continued success in the years to come.●

TRIBUTE TO LARRY HEALY

● Mr. THUNE. Mr. President, today I honor Larry Healy, who has been named the 2008 Agri-Business Citizen of the Year. Larry has been employed by Campbell Supply Company for 20 years, and currently manages one of its Sioux Falls stores. He is also actively engaged in community activities and embodies the true spirit of the American farmer.

Larry grew up in Montrose, SD, where he first worked in his father's welding and repair shop before becoming employed in the farm department at Campbell Supply in Sioux Falls. In 1990, he was promoted to store manager at the Rock Rapids, IA, store, a position in which he proudly served for 11 years.

In 2001, Larry transferred back to Sioux Falls where he continued to serve as store manager. Since then, Larry has become involved with the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce Agri-Business Division, where he has served on the Agri-Business Division Council and volunteers with Agri-Business activities.

Larry chaired the Ag Appreciation Day for 2 years and has worked with the chamber and hundreds of volunteers on events such as an event during the Sioux Empire Fair that provided a complimentary meal to approximately 5,000 area farmers. He also chaired the Ag Division in 2006–07.

Larry is proud to work for Campbell Supply Company, which has been family owned since its founding. The Campbell family believes in giving back to the community and supporting local agriculture, something Larry sincerely appreciates because he understands the important role farmers play in American cities and towns.

Larry sets a fine example for all involved in advancing our Nation's great agricultural foundations. I commend him for this award, and I wish him continued success in the years to come.●

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. INHOFE (for himself, Mr. CRAIG, Mr. DEMINT, Mr. BARRASSO, Mr. BOND, Mr. ALEXANDER, and Mr. CRAPO):

S. 2551. A bill to provide for the safe development of a repository at the Yucca Mountain site in the State of Nevada, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Mr. INHOFE. Mr. President, today I rise to introduce the Nuclear Waste Policy Amendments Act of 2008.

I have said many times on this Senate floor that we do have a crisis in energy and that we need all of the following: We need nuclear energy, but we also need clean coal technology, we need oil and gas, we need renewables. We need all of the above. I feel very strongly about this, and I know there is a disagreement on that issue, even within our committee. But I am concerned about the continued delays in opening our Nation's repository at Yucca Mountain, that it would hinder the resurgence of nuclear energy in the United States. It seems as though right now we are making a major breakthrough. People who were objecting to nuclear energy just a few years ago are now realizing that it is clean, it is safe, it is abundant. Not that I use France as our model very often, but in this case, they are between 80 and 90 percent nuclear, and they have done the right thing.

A bit of history on this. The Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 established a program to locate and develop a repository for nuclear waste, including both Defense waste, a legacy from the Cold War, and civilian spent fuel. In 2002, after 20 years of research, the President recommended to the Congress that Yucca Mountain should be developed as the repository. The State of Nevada objected. I wasn't surprised to see that happen, and it did. It certainly is their right to do so under the Nuclear Waste Policy Act. However, Congress passed a joint resolution affirming or reaffirming the administration's recommendation of Yucca Mountain with strong bipartisan majorities in both Houses.

The location has been decided. The debate is no longer in existence of whether a repository should be built at Yucca Mountain. That decision was made in 2002. The task that remains is to develop a repository that protects public health and safety and the environment, a permanent solution for our Nation's nuclear waste. It is high time we accomplish these tasks now. This is very serious. We passed laws and resolutions to do it. We have collected over $27 billion—that is with a ''b''—$27 billion for electricity from consumers to pay for it. The courts have affirmed and reaffirmed that we have the obligation—not the legal right to do it, the legal obligation.

Now, I am frustrated that the Department of Energy is 20 years behind schedule. However, I am pleased that DOE appears to have made significant progress in the past few years and will hopefully file a license application this year, despite the persistent assault on program funding.

I understand that opposition to Yucca Mountain remains, advocating that we abandon it in favor of interim storage. There have been many proposals on interim storage, and I expect there will be more in the future, but we have interim storage right now at 121 locations in 39 States. Make no mistake, interim storage is a temporary fix. It forces future generations to solve a problem that we ought to be resolving today. It is time to move forward with a permanent solution at Yucca Mountain.

I have visited the site. I have a question for those who would want to abandon Yucca Mountain: If you can't build a repository in the middle of a mountain in the middle of a desert, where should it be?

Let's think about this for a minute. The logical first step to finding a new repository site is to begin by reevaluating sites that have been considered before. I have a map—which is not here, but it will be here before I finish talking—showing the 37 States that DOE and its predecessor, the Energy Research Development Administration, have evaluated in the past based on the presence of favorable geologic formations. Those States are Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Georgia, Idaho, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, and it goes on and on, including my State of Oklahoma—37 of the 50 States. Now, 37 States have been considered as possible candidates for developing a repository. Does it really make sense to abandon a site where we have already invested 25 years and $8 billion before the Nuclear Regulatory Commission even considers it, only to turn around and start from scratch, reevaluating sites in 37 States? I don't think so.

As the generation that has benefited from the use of nuclear energy and the resulting spent fuel, I believe it is incumbent upon us to manage spent fuel in a manner that is fair to current generations and generations to come, and the bill I am introducing now will do just that.

DOE has indicated there are legislative provisions they need to complete the licensing process and begin construction of the repository our electricity consumers have paid some $27 billion for already. Senators DOMENICI and CRAIG introduced their NU-WAY bill, S. 37, which includes those provisions within the jurisdiction of Environment and Public Works. My bill includes the remaining DOE provisions that are within the jurisdiction of the Environment and Public Works Committee. My bill goes beyond that. My bill will incorporate a flexible framework for future generations to apply their knowledge and innovations to improve the repository.

The task at hand is to develop a safe repository using state-of-the-art technology and cutting-edge science. The trouble is technology that is state of the art now won't be 50 years from now, much less 100 years from now. When you are making decisions on how to develop a facility that will be safe for up to a million years, we should not limit ourselves to science and technology that is available today. We should establish a flexible framework that incorporates technological advances into the facility design over time, one that allows our grandchildren and great-grandchildren to improve on the project we have started. In other words, we know that even though we are using the million-year benchmark, things are going to happen next year and the year after and the year after where we can have dramatic improvements. But the one thing we have to do is make the decision today—or keep the decision that has already been made.

Several international bodies, including the National Academy of Sciences and the International Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development's Nuclear Energy Agency, have advocated repository development in stages that will incorporate technological advances over time—just what we are talking about. The reformed licensing process in this bill integrates that concept into the current licensing process. My bill reforms the licensing process for authorizing construction, operation, and closure of the repository.

I have to say we have come a long way already on this. When I became chairman of the Subcommittee on Clean Air within this committee, we had not had an oversight committee hearing on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for 12 years. I don't care what the bureaucracy is, you have to have oversight. Well, we have come a long way.

The threshold for approval of construction of a repository is based on a determination that the facility could be safely operated for 300 years. During this time, a long-term science and technology program will be established to monitor and analyze the repository's performance and to conduct research into technologies that would improve the facility. The repository license will be amended every 50 years at a minimum to incorporate these improvements. During this phase, waste would remain retrievable so that future generations may recover valuable material or upgrade disposal systems, for example.

When the DOE applies to permanently close the repository, it must then demonstrate compliance with EPA's radiation standard before ceasing operations at the site. Until then, the facility will be subject to the strict NRC regulation and oversight as an operating facility.

Today, this program has been litigated into a corner. After several lawsuits, the EPA has responded by drafting a radiation standard for 1 million years. That is right, based on what we know today, DOE must prove a reasonable expectation that Yucca Mountain will be safe for 1 million years before DOE can even begin building a repository. This is a ridiculous and arrogant requirement that assumes we know right now all that will ever be known about the management of spent nuclear fuel and its impact on public health and safety. That compliance decision only makes sense when DOE decides to close the repository and cease operations. Until that time, repository enhancements reflecting 300 years of scientific innovation will improve its protection of public health and safety and, I might add, the environment.

Now, my approach is not about kicking the can down the road and forcing future generations to solve the problem. That is what concerns me about a lot of the things we do around here. My wife and I have 20 kids and grandkids, and they are the ones who are going to be doing a lot of the things we should be doing today. My approach is about meeting a legal and moral obligation to build the best facility we can now, laying a solid foundation for future generations to improve it based on what they learn.

I am confident we can build a repository that will protect public health and safety and the environment, but I am equally confident that 50 years from now our grandchildren could build a better one. Fifty years from now, they will have learned a lot about the actual performance of repositories; something we can only predict right now, they will know by that time. Fifty years from now, the waste placed in the repository may require isolation for a few hundred years instead of a million.

Lastly, my bill includes provisions necessary to support new nuclear plant construction. Before receiving a license, nuclear plants must meet two requirements. The first is that companies must sign a contract with DOE to provide for the disposal of spent fuel. My bill modifies those provisions in the Nuclear Waste Policy Act to make them current. The second is known as waste confidence. Nuclear plants must demonstrate there is confidence that the spent fuel will be managed and disposed of in a manner that protects health and safety. My bill clarifies that the repository program meets this requirement for disposal.

So when a society takes on the task of building a complex, first-of-a-kind facility envisioned to remain robust for a million years, it immediately raises questions about generational equity. As Senators, we must balance fairness to the future generations that haven't been born yet with fairness to the generations we currently represent. Finding that balance must be based on several principles, including protecting the health and safety of current generations; protecting the health and safety of future generations; minimizing the impact on the environment; meeting the need for reliable, cost-effective energy; meeting legal obligations; minimizing taxpayer liability; and the costs are covered by those who benefit from the waste. My bill adheres to these principles and strikes that balance.

Rumors of Yucca Mountain's demise have been highly exaggerated. It is time we focus on developing the safest state-of-the-art repository we can, one step at a time. We owe it to our generation and to the generations that follow.

I have to say, regarding all of the emphasis recently on the concern we have for the environment, nothing is cleaner, nothing has been shown better for the environment than this type of energy, which we have to have in our mix.

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DODD, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. KERRY, Mr. HARKIN, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. AKAKA, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. FEINGOLD, Mrs. MURRAY, Mr. DURBIN, Mr. SCHUMER, Ms. CANTWELL, Mrs. CLINTON, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. OBAMA, Mr. MENENDEZ, Mr. CARDIN, and Mr. BROWN):

S. 2554. A bill to restore, reaffirm, and reconcile legal rights and remedies under civil rights statutes; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am honored to join my colleagues Senators LEAHY, DODD, BINGAMAN, KERRY, HARKIN, MIKULSKI, AKAKA, BOXER, FEINGOLD, MURRAY, DURBIN, SCHUMER, CANTWELL, CLINTON, LAUTENBERG, OBAMA, MENENDEZ, CARDIN, and BROWN in introducing the Civil Rights Act of 2008. This legislation is vital to realizing the full promise of our civil rights laws and labor laws to protect all of America's people.

Civil rights is still the unfinished business of America. Prejudice, discrimination, and outright bigotry continue to limit the lives of large numbers of our people. Unfortunately, in recent years, the Supreme Court has rolled back some of the core statutory protections for civil rights and workers' rights. The Civil Rights Act of 2008 will strengthen existing civil rights protections and restore the bedrock principle that individuals may challenge all forms of discrimination in public services.

It has long been clear that effective enforcement of civil rights and fair labor practices is possible only if individuals themselves are able to seek relief in court. Our legislation will strengthen existing protections in cases where the courts have let us down by narrowing individuals' right to demand accountability for discrimination.

Key elements of our proposals will make it easier for working women to enforce their right to equal pay for equal work. Our bill enhances protections against discrimination in federally funded services, and enacts needed safeguards for students who are harassed because of their national origin, gender, race, or disability.

We make sure that victims of discrimination and unfair labor practices can receive meaningful damages where appropriate. Our legislation will also enable members of our Armed Forces to enforce their Federal right to be free from discrimination by States because of their military status.

In addition, our legislation will ensure that older workers who suffer age discrimination are not denied the chance to seek relief because they work for a State government. It will also prevent employers from requiring workers to sign away their right to bring discrimination claims and fair labor claims in court, in order to obtain a job or keep a job.

This bill is a needed step in restoring the effective remedies that our civil rights laws and fair labor laws must have in order to ensure accountability for discrimination. America will never be America until we do.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, our great Nation was founded on the fundamental principle that all persons are created equal. We have long committed, and recommitted, ourselves to ensuring that all persons have the right to prosper through hard work and ingenuity. However, for many Americans, those rights still remain illusory. Today, we introduce a comprehensive bill to vindicate our founding principles and make the promise of equal opportunity in the workplace a reality for all Americans.

I am proud to cosponsor the Civil Rights Act of 2008, and I thank Senator TED KENNEDY for his leadership in the Senate on this issue, and Representative JOHN LEWIS for his leadership in the House. I have been a long-time supporter of efforts to rid the workplace of unlawful discrimination, and I believe the Civil Rights Act of 2008 is critical to achieving that important goal. We must continue to fight to end all workplace discrimination, including discrimination based on sexual orientation.

This legislation we are introducing today responds to several disappointing decisions by conservative courts. These court rulings have misconstrued congressional intent, and have had the effect of limiting important civil rights protections provided by Congress.

A 2000 decision from the Supreme Court of the United States greatly restricted the capacity of workers who suffer age discrimination to sue for full relief. In Kimel v. Florida Board of Regents, the Supreme Court ruled that, contrary to Congress's original intent, State employers do not have to provide back pay or other monetary damages when workers are discriminated against based on age. As a result, millions of State workers who are 40 or over lost the right to back pay. This bill would restore Congress's original intent that State employers give workers full relief for age discrimination, including back pay.

The bill would clarify the standard for challenging employment practices that have an unjustified discriminatory impact on older workers. It would make clear that the standard of proof in cases alleging a disparate impact based on age is the same as in cases alleging a disparate impact based on race, color, gender, national origin, or religion.

The bill would also restore the rights of victims of discrimination—in the workplace or otherwise—to challenge practices that have a disparate impact on certain communities based on race, national origin, sex, age, or disability. Since the Supreme Court's decision 7 years ago in Alexander v. Sandoval, individuals can no longer challenge discrimination by entities that receive Federal funding without facing the high burden of proving purposeful discrimination.

Currently, only the Federal Government has the right to challenge sophisticated forms of discrimination—by federally funded entities—that fall disproportionately on certain minority groups. So if a State decided to administer a driver's license exam only in English, rather than administering the exam in multiple languages, a non-English speaker would be denied his or her right to have their day in court. This measure returns the Federal law to our original intentions by allowing individuals a right to challenge such practices:

These added protections provide a significant step forward in the fulfillment of our goal to eliminate the footprint of unlawful discrimination from the workplace and broader society. Civil rights legislation over the last 44 years—including antidiscrimination in the workplace laws—represents some of Congress's greatest achievements. With the passage of the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1991, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, and the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, Congress gave victims of discrimination a way to address the wrongs that they have suffered and put teeth into the sanctions faced by those who unlawfully discriminate against their victims.

Despite these gains, efforts to eliminate bias from the workplace and larger society have been largely eroded by decisions from conservative jurists on the Supreme Court and other Federal courts. Year after year, conservative courts have rolled back rights by denying certain types of relief and taking certain tools—designed to fight intentional and sophisticated forms of workplace discrimination—from individual workers. This bill would reverse that rollback, and restore the rights of victims to have their day in court and to have meaningful remedies when those rights are violated.

Discrimination on the basis of certain personal characteristics has no place in any workplace or in any State in America. It is long overdue for Congress to reinforce Americans' protections against bias in the workplace and eradicate barriers to full and equal participation in our society.

The time for this bill is now. It is particularly important that, on the week our Nation observes and honors the legacy of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Congress has introduced this bill. We must remain vigilant in ensuring our precious civil rights, which generations of Americans fought and bled to protect, remain available for our children and grandchildren.

(a) STANDING AND CAUSE OF ACTION.—A United States citizen shall have standing to bring a cause of action for damages (as specified in subsection (d)) or declaratory or injunctive relief against the United States if that individual has refrained or is refraining from communications because of a reasonable fear that such communications would be the subject of electronic surveillance conducted without an order issued in accordance with title I of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (50 U.S.C. 1801 et seq.) or a joint authorization by the Attorney General and the Director of National Intelligence issued in accordance with title VII of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, as added by this Act, under a claim of Presidential authority under either the Constitution of the United States or the Authorization for Use of Military Force (Public Law 107–40; 115 Stat. 224; 50 U.S.C. 1541 note).

(6) It shall be the duty of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia and the Supreme Court of the United States to advance on the docket and to expedite to the greatest possible extent the disposition of the action and appeal.

(c) MOOTNESS.—In any civil action filed under subsection (a) for declaratory or injunctive relief, a defendant's claim that the surveillance activity has been terminated may not be grounds for dismissing the case, unless the Attorney General files a declaration under section 1746 of title 28, United States Code, affirming that—

(1) the surveillance described in subsection (a) has ceased; and

(2) the executive branch of the Federal Government does not have legal authority to renew the surveillance described in subsection (a).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FISA

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I was hoping that at this time today we would be talking about the work we had done on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. But we were unable to do that. What an unusual day. We were not allowed to vote on anything on this bill. I hope our friends in the press have been able to witness what took place today.

We talk about last year the Republicans having caused us to try to invoke cloture more in 1 year than had ever happened in a Congress before. In 1 year, they obstructed more things than ever in the history of the country.

Now we are starting this year, and they are objecting to their own bills. The President wants the bill passed. Every one of the Republicans—all 49 of them, I assume—will vote for this bill. So all they would need to pass it is two Democrats. I would have to suggest they probably could do that. They are so afraid they may take a vote that may not be something they want to take that they stop everything.

This is the President's program. It is not our program. We have stood by since 9/11 telling the President: Anything that you need, we are here at your disposal. Just tell us what you need and we will do it. We only have one request—let's do it legally, constitutionally. If the present law is not sufficient, tell us what you need changed.

We have been standing with our arms out since 9/11. But what we have learned now, since 9/11, is basically the President does not care what we do because he has been told—and he accepts the advice given to him by a man by the name of John Yoo, among others—that the President does not need to follow any law that Congress passes, that he is above the law. I am not making this up. This is the fact. Mr. Yoo has stated so before the world on television: The President does not need to follow any law that we pass. But in spite of that, we have said: Mr. President, we are willing to work with you. We don't think you have that authority. But here we are today, with the law about to expire, and the Vice President having made a speech yesterday, and the President making a statement today saying: They have to pass that bill.

As I explained in some detail earlier today, they put us in a Catch-22. No matter what we do, it does not meet their expectations. So I again repeat, I hope the press is watching this. I hope people who believe in good government are watching this. I hope the people are not going to accept Monday night, during the speech that he is going to give, or any statements made between now and the State of the Union Address, that we are holding up his legislation. We are not holding it up. The Republicans in the Senate are holding it up.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask that morning business be closed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand adjourned until 9:30 a.m. Friday, January 25; that on Friday following the prayer and pledge, the Journal of proceedings be approved to date, the morning hour be deemed expired, and the time for the two leaders be reserved for their use later in the day; and the Senate then resume consideration of S. 2248, the FISA legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, today Senator MCCONNELL filed cloture on the Rockefeller/Bond substitute amendment. Under the rule, the filing deadline for the first-degree amendments to the substitute amendment is 1 p.m. tomorrow.

As I announced earlier, there will be no rollcall votes tomorrow due to the parliamentary situation created by the minority. We now find ourselves in that situation.

The next vote will occur at 4:30 p.m. on Monday. That vote will be on the motion to invoke cloture on the substitute amendment. If cloture is not invoked, the way I understand the rules, there will be a vote on our cloture motion that I just filed.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. REID. Mr. President, if there is no further business to come before this body, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand adjourned under the previous order.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 8:09 p.m., adjourned until Friday, January 25, 2008, at 9:30 a.m.

SENATE—Friday, January 25, 2008

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m. and was called to order by the Honorable SHELDON WHITEHOUSE, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Today, retired Navy Chaplain Dr. Alan Keiran, the chief of staff of the Senate Chaplain's Office, will lead the Senate in prayer.

PRAYER

The guest Chaplain offered the following prayer:

Let's pray together.

Lord God, on this anniversary of Saint Paul's conversion, we are reminded of the positive impact people of faith have made in human history. So we ask that You equip all of us with the wisdom, strength, and perseverance needed to overcome any obstacles we will face in serving this Nation and its citizens.

Bless our Senators with opportunities to advance democracy, justice, and economic parity. Bless their staff members as they labor to support the honorable men and women they serve.

For military men and women deployed in harm's way, and their families, we pray Your providential protection, comfort, and peace.

O Lord, our precious Saviour and eternal King, equip leaders across this great land with the wisdom and endurance to meet the challenges ahead.

In Your holy Name we pray. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable SHELDON WHITEHOUSE led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, January 25, 2008.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable SHELDON WHITEHOUSE, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,

Mr. WHITEHOUSE thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 2248 as soon as I leave the floor. This is the FISA legislation. There will be no rollcall votes today. As a reminder, Senators have until 1 p.m. today to file germane first-degree amendments to the Rockefeller substitute.

FISA

Mr. REID. Mr. President, as I said twice yesterday—and I will just say it briefly this morning—Democrats believe there are a lot of bad people out there and that there should be some form of collecting information over the telephone. But we believe it should be done in an orderly way in keeping with our Constitution. It appears, based on Republican actions yesterday, they want no controls whatsoever on the President. They want exactly what he has been doing now, which is violating the law.

Mr. President, we have offered a 2-week extension of the bill, a 30-day extension, a 15-month extension. If this bill that we have now before us is not enacted, it is not because of Democrats, it is because the Republicans, in conjunction with Vice President CHENEY and the President, have made some determination that there should be no FISA legislation.

I, frankly, do not think that cloture will be invoked Monday afternoon. That being the case, it is virtually legislatively impossible to do anything by February 1. Remember, the House is out of session all but 1 day next week.

So the record should be very clear, we believe there are very bad people out there. We believe there should be some way of collecting information. But we believe, as does the vast majority of the American people, it should be collected in some way that is within the bounds of our Constitution.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized.

FISA

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, let me respond briefly.

I think it is a little early in the session to begin the finger-pointing. We have here—I had hoped—a good, sort of bipartisan start to the session. The facts are that we have a bill before us, the Rockefeller-Bond bill, that we know will get a Presidential signature and protect the homeland. That is before us. We have an opportunity, on Monday, by invoking cloture, to pass a bill that we know will become law.

So I hope we do not sort of get back into the pattern that sort of underscored the early part of the first session of the 110th of just sort of endless finger-pointing and game-playing. I filed a cloture motion because I knew this was a bill that would get a signature. This is something that could become law. And if the House acted rapidly, it would become law before the deadline—a great bipartisan accomplishment.

We have that opportunity Monday. I hear my good friend and counterpart saying cloture will not be invoked, so I assume it will not be invoked. But I think that is a great mistake. This would have been a wonderful way to begin the session with a high point of bipartisan cooperation.

CORPORAL JOSHUA M. MOORE

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise to speak about a young Kentuckian who was taken from this world entirely too soon. CPL Joshua M. Moore of Lewisburg, KY, was lost in Baghdad while serving our country. He was 20 years old.

In the early morning hours of May 30, 2007, Corporal Moore was driving a humvee when an improvised explosive device set by terrorists went off. The force of a 55-gallon drum of homemade explosives overturned the humvee and tragically took Corporal Moore's life.

For his valor in uniform, Corporal Moore received numerous medals and awards, including the Bronze Star Medal and the Purple Heart. His family saw him laid to rest in Lewisburg, in Logan County, KY, with full military honors, including a 21-gun salute and a flyover of military aircraft.

Corporal Moore's funeral service was held at Lewisburg Elementary School, where Josh had attended years before and where he returned every time he came home on leave to speak to the young students about his life of service as a soldier.

This remarkable young man, who did not live to see 21, believed it was important to describe the honor of fighting to defend one's country with the young children in his hometown.

''He has set a good example for the young kids around here. A lot of kids looked up to Josh. He will be missed greatly,'' says his mother, Carolyn.

Josh worried what to say about the reality of war to kids as young as 7 years old. But his father, Seymore, encouraged him to talk about the dedication a soldier must have. He told him to describe the rigorous physical training, the strange new places he saw, and the new friends he made.

After Josh would return to Iraq, the students he had met would write him letters to read the next time he came home. ''He sat and read these—every one of these before he went back,'' said Seymore.

Surely to Carolyn and Seymore, it seems like just yesterday when Josh was a child himself. When he was 3 years old, Josh found his dad's old Cub Scout uniform and wore it all the time. He even insisted on wearing it in his preschool picture—against his mother's better judgment.

After attending Lewisburg Elementary, Josh went on to Lewisburg Middle School and Logan County High School and was a consistently strong student. He played basketball at Lewisburg Middle, became a Babe Ruth baseball all-star, and made the Logan County High baseball team—all despite the fact that, at 5 foot 6, his friends teasingly called him ''Little Moore.''

As important as sports were to Josh, however, this young man learned early the importance of patience. When he was almost 16, Josh wanted to buy a new car. His parents offered to help pay up to $500. But Josh had his eye on a neighbor's car, a burgundy Pontiac Grand Am with a $1,500 pricetag.

Carolyn and Seymore told Josh he would have to come up with the rest of the money, so he quit high school sports and got a part-time job. Two weeks before his 16th birthday, Josh approached his parents and slapped $1,000 onto the coffee table. He said, ''Here is my part. Where is yours?'' That Grand Am was his by his 16th birthday.

Josh graduated from Logan County High in 2005 and hoped one day to join the Kentucky State Police. But after working for a short time at a factory, one day Josh came home to his family and announced, ''I am the property of the U.S. Government.''

''They are going to shave your head,'' Josh's mother said.

''They have to leave an inch of hair,'' replied Josh.

His parents were nervous for their son and suggested he try a different branch of the service. A relative in the Navy offered to help.

But Josh was not interested. ''Josh wanted to be where the action was,'' says Seymore, and to him that meant serving as an infantryman in the U.S. Army. ''No matter what he did,'' Carolyn adds, ''he wanted to be the best.''

Josh did his basic training at Fort Benning, GA, and graduated among the top 20 soldiers in his class. Of the many things he learned there, one was the ability to say when he had been wrong. And in a letter to his mom, Josh admitted, ''I am bald.''

Corporal Moore was assigned to C Company, 1st Battalion, 18th Infantry Regiment, 1st Infantry Division, based out of Schweinfurt, Germany. In addition to Germany and Iraq, Corporal Moore saw service in Kuwait.

While in the Middle East, a lieutenant asked Josh's commanding officer who his smartest and quickest soldier was, and the officer said Corporal Moore, thinking Josh would receive an award. Instead, the lieutenant made Josh a radio operator.

At first Josh thought he had been demoted. But his old drill sergeant told him this was an honor, as communications were critical to the unit. After this pep talk, Josh assumed his new role with relish.

The lieutenant who selected him later told Josh's family that when Josh was away on leave, it was hard on the unit because no one else could meet the high standard he set for the job.

This wonderful Kentucky family is in my thoughts and prayers today as I recount Josh's story. He is loved and remembered by his mother, Carolyn Moore; his father, Jeff ''Seymore'' Moore; his brother, Richard Pierce; his sisters, Carrie Cantarelli and Ashley Moore; his grandparents, Jeanette Rose and David and Barbara Knight; his girlfriend, Amber Miles; and many other beloved friends and family members.

Corporal Moore's funeral service was held at Lewisburg Elementary School, the only place in Logan County large enough to hold the hundreds—hundreds—who came to pay their final respects.

Ronnie Forrest, Josh's pastor for many years, from Lewisburg's Mount Pleasant Baptist Church, expressed best how this young man inspired so many in his short time on this Earth.

This is what he said: Josh ''didn't want to die, he didn't intend to die, but he was willing to lay down his life.'' Pastor Forrest said at the service: ''That's what a hero is.''

No words that Mr. Forrest could say, I could say, or anyone could say will fill the void in the hearts of Josh's family and friends. But I hope the knowledge that those who knew Josh saw him for what he was—a hero—fills them with pride. And I am proud to recount his story for my fellow Senators.

Today, this Senate expresses its deepest gratitude for CPL Joshua M. Moore's service. He laid down his life for his country, his loved ones, and his young pen pals from Lewisburg Elementary. We will forever honor that sacrifice.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I certainly join with my friend from Kentucky in the respect we show for this young man.

IRAQ

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we have lost about 4,000 soldiers in Iraq. Thirty-five thousand have been wounded. About a third of them have been grievously wounded. As we know, about 40 percent of the men and women coming back from Iraq have what is now called—we used to call it, after the Second World War, shell shock. Now they call it post-traumatic stress syndrome.

I just wrote a letter to the Nevada parents of a young man who was killed. I have done that lots of times. I was unable to speak to them, and that is why I wrote the letter. Most of them I try to visit. But the family has been split up a little bit, and it was not possible for me to do that.

Mr. President, I hope we can figure out a way to get our troops home soon. General Petraeus said the war cannot be won military, and every day that goes by that is proven certainly so. The Iraqi Government has nothing to move toward a settlement of this situation. There are far too many stories like Josh.

I hope we can work on a bipartisan basis on many matters. We hope, for this package which is coming from the House maybe sometime next week dealing with the stimulus, that we can work on a bipartisan basis. From all accounts I got yesterday, that, in fact, will be the case. Senators BAUCUS and GRASSLEY, who have jurisdiction of 85 or 90 percent of the potential matters that go into the bill, have indicated they are going to have a bipartisan markup next week, and hopefully we can take a look at that piece of legislation in a bipartisan way and get it to the President as quickly as possible. There are many other things we have to work on, on a bipartisan basis, and I look forward to that.

I say with all due respect to my friend—and he is my friend—the Republican leader, that one thing the President has done and done very well these past years is frighten the American people, and it appears we are entering into another zone of frightening the American people. It started a couple of days ago with the Vice President, and the President followed him by a day, and we have the State of the Union coming. It is obvious that this FISA bill—which I hope something works out so it can be passed, but unless there is a way to amend it, it certainly doesn't appear that it is going to be. The President's State of the Union and certainly leading up to it will, again, frighten the American people. The best way to take that away is for the President to work with us. Are we asking for the impossible?

There have been efforts to amend this FISA legislation. In title I, there are probably five or six amendments we would want to vote on. Title II, which deals with immunity, Senators DODD and FEINGOLD for a long time have said they wish to have a vote on that. That is not unreasonable. Many of us support that. I can't imagine why we can't move forward on that, unless this is something the President wants to ratchet up so that he has something to frighten the American people about on Monday night when he gives his State of the Union, that we are not protecting the American people. We are protecting the American people, just as this young man, Josh, was, whom the Republican leader talked about. I wrote a letter, as I indicated, to the Gaul family a couple of days ago.

We need to enter into a new era of bipartisanship where we are not frightening the American people but we are trying to work with the American people, to move out of some of the areas in which we find ourselves bogged down. I hope this year will allow us to do that.

MEASURE PLACED ON THE CALENDAR—S. 2556

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I understand S. 2556 is at the desk and due for a second reading.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the bill by title for the second time.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2556) to extend the provisions of the Protect America Act of 2007 for an additional 30 days.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I object to any further proceedings with respect to this bill at this time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

FISA

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, just one further observation with regard to my friend's remarks.

The Bond-Rockefeller bill is exactly the way we ought to be doing our business. It came out of the Intelligence Committee 13 to 2. It is supported on a bipartisan basis. It is supported by the President of the United States. We have a product that was carefully negotiated by Senator BOND and Senator ROCKEFELLER, approved by the Intelligence Committee 13 to 2, and supported by the President of the United States. That is my definition of a bipartisan accomplishment. Now the question is, Can we finish the job and get a signature?

This is not about frightening the American people. The American people should be frightened, and remember full well what happened on 9/11. They also remember with gratitude that it has not happened again for 6 years. The reason for it, obviously, is we have been on offense, going after the terrorists where they are, and we have improved our defense.

An integral part of protecting the homeland is the measure before us, carefully crafted on a bipartisan basis, supported by the President of the United States. If we want to finish the job and have a bipartisan accomplishment that all of us can be proud of, the way to do that is to pass this bill, send it to the House, urge them to take it up and pass it, and send it to the President, who awaits it to affix his signature.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, there is no question that Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND have worked hard on this legislation. Also, we have had good work from Senator LEAHY and Senator SPECTER of the Judiciary Committee. Senator ROCKEFELLER wants a piece of legislation to pass very badly. He does not support cloture in this effort that is going to take place on Monday because he believes the bill needs to be changed. Just because there is a bill that comes out of committee doesn't mean we shouldn't deal with it here on the floor. Senator ROCKEFELLER is not going to support cloture on this bill on Monday. It is a decision he made, and he has made it because we have not had the opportunity to do things to this piece of legislation that he believes should happen. It is a rare piece of legislation that comes out of one of these major committees that comes to the floor that doesn't require some improvement.

So it is simply unfair to say that Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND's piece of legislation should go through as if it were written in script on top of some big mountain. It was written in a committee room with a lot of discussion and votes, and some of the amendments passed, some didn't. It came to the floor. We all are happy it came to the floor. But at this time, even Senator ROCKEFELLER believes there should be changes in it, and he will not support cloture, as he told me last night, because he feels it has been handled so poorly by the minority here on the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

FISA AMENDMENTS ACT OF 2007

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, we are on the FISA bill, I believe. Has the bill been reported? Is it before us?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not yet been reported.

The clerk will report the pending business by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2248) to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, to modernize and streamline the provisions of that Act, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Rockefeller/Bond amendment No. 3911, in the nature of a substitute.

Feingold/Dodd amendment No. 3909 (to amendment No. 3911), to require that certain records be submitted to Congress.

Bond amendment No. 3916 (to amendment No. 3909), of a perfecting nature.

Reid amendment No. 3918 (to the language proposed to be stricken by Rockefeller/Bond amendment No. 3911), relative to the extension of the Protect America Act of 2007.

IRAQ

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I wish to address the FISA bill. I also commend our majority and minority leaders on their statements about the lives that have been lost by our brave troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

I believe there are a couple of comments that are appropriate.

Number 1, it was said that General Petraeus said the war is not going to be won militarily. That is the key point which General Petraeus has brought to the battle. There is a kinetic and nonkinetic impact of the counterinsurgency strategy that General Petraeus has laid out and that is showing such great progress in Iraq.

Today, the news is not dominated by Iraq. Those people who have been criticizing it don't talk about it because General Petraeus's strategy is working. It is not just the surge; it is the strategy, the counterinsurgency strategy, or COIN, as it is sometimes called. That involves clearing, holding, and building.

There is a real difference between the approach we took right after the fall of Saddam Hussein, which has been haphazardly called the ''whack a mole'' theory—we would go out, send our troops out, trying to keep a small footprint. We would also send our troops out where there was an al-Qaida stronghold and try to suppress them, and then we would leave. The problem is that al-Qaida would come back, and they would take vengeance on anybody thought to have cooperated. That strategy, apparently pushed by those who felt it would be—we wanted to maintain a small footprint and not appear to be taking an occupier's role—was not working.

General Petraeus expanded upon the usual doctrines of counterinsurgency, and he brought a new approach beginning over a year ago. He said: We will send in troops to clear areas, working with the Iraqi security forces. When they clear an area, they will stay there to maintain security—that is clear—and then hold. And holding involves the U.S. forces working with the Iraqi security forces to train them, to provide them intelligence, logistics, medical support, to ensure that they can sustain the peace and the security in the area. Once they do that, then the U.S. Government has come in either with aid in dollars or with the work of the troops in the field to help build the infrastructure to provide the services, whether it is health care, whether it is reparations for damages, and show the Iraqi people that we want to turn over that country to the Iraqi security forces to maintain the stability and security which is necessary for the long-term process of establishing a democracy.

I was there with a group of my colleagues from the Senate Intelligence Committee in early May, and we were seeing the beginnings of the effectiveness of that strategy. We went into Al Anbar Province. Six months before, it had been regarded as the headquarters of al-Qaida. They were in control. It was their area. It was a Sunni area. The only way the American troops could get into the capital of Ramadi was to fight their way in, and then they would usually have to withdraw. But on this occasion, four of us went in, in a Cougar, with the commanding general of the region and two marines. We drove into the center of Ramadi, got out, and walked around Firecracker Corner—so-called because of the continuing firefights going on there previously—and we went to visit the embedded American marines with the Iraqi Army, who had bunked there, and the Iraqi police who were serving that area. They live together, they work together, they train together. You know something. It was working.

We even went out to see the Blue Mosque, one of the holy places for the Sunni in Al Anbar Province, which had been badly hurt by gunfire, by artillery and rockets and bombs. The marines had gone in and helped repair and clean up the Blue Mosque, so it was open for worship again.

The Iraqis began to understand that we would work with their security forces to help them take control of the area, and that is what they were doing. It continued to get better. I know personally from reports I had from one marine there, the scout snipers found that by midsummer, their services were not necessarily needed in Al Anbar because if somebody planted an IED—an improvised explosive device—or a terrorist came to town or somebody set up a vehicle factory to build explosive vehicles, the Iraqi Sunni watch told the Iraqi security forces, and they went and took care of it. The Iraqi Sunni police took care of it. This continued to spread throughout Al Anbar.

Now, one of the helps—quite honestly, everybody will admit that one of the things that made it so easy for us to work with the Sunnis was that al-Qaida had shown their true colors. They are terrorists first, second, foremost, and last. They went in and they terrorized the people, even the people who at first were cooperating with them because they thought they were Sunni brethren. Well, they were not. They went in and had forced marriages, rape, pillage, murder, torture. They disrupted the activities, the business activities of the Iraqi Sunni leaders in the area, and they quickly learned that al-Qaida was not their friend and they needed us there temporarily to help them take control of their country. That is what we are doing. It is not done all over. There are still areas where we have not been able to provide Iraqi security forces sufficient training, sufficient personnel to take control of the area.

Now, the majority leader said: We want to bring our troops home as soon as possible. As one who supported the war, I agree with him wholeheartedly. I had a personal stake in it. I wanted to see our troops come home. But as the President said, we need to return on success. We need to bring those troops home when they have succeeded in their missions. because as several men on the ground who have seen their comrades killed said: We have made too many contributions and too many sacrifices to see a political defeat declared by Congress, forcing us to withdraw, so that those contributions and sacrifices will be for nothing.

When you ask the American people do they want to see the troops come home, sure, they do; we all do. But we want them to come home and not leave Iraq in chaos and to return on success. That is where the American people are. And they are returning on success. The 2/6 Marines cleared Al Anbar and came home several weeks early. General Petraeus says more will be coming home. But we have a vital stake in making sure Iraq does not fall back into chaos and confusion.

We have laid the groundwork. There is much more political work to do at the national level, but political reconciliation is occurring from the ground up. The Shia in Baghdad are beginning to recognize they must provide financial assistance and support to the Sunnis. Recently, the Iraqi Parliament passed a reform of the debaathification law, which put out of the Government anybody who had been associated with Saddam Hussein. It was probably a bad idea that our original U.S. coalition commanders had to fire all the Iraqi soldiers and send them home with no pay, no jobs but their weapons; to throw out of office all the former Government bureaucrats who worked for Saddam Hussein. They are going to have to move carefully but quickly to get those people back who know how to make government run.

General Petraeus has said that as we continue to build these forces—the forces of peace who can run the Government—we will bring our troops home. We have been in Germany and Korea for decades. We have been in Kosovo for years. We need to have a minimal presence there, probably for a long time. But the primary responsibility of maintaining peace and security in Iraq is being turned over and must be turned over to the Iraqi security forces. We can back them up and make sure al-Qaida doesn't make another run at them, doesn't bring in external fighters. These are the ones causing the most trouble, people coming in from Syria, or Saudi Arabia through Syria, and other areas—the terrorists. We have the ability to assist the Iraqi security forces to do that.

Why is it so important we leave Iraq secure and stable? Well, Saddam Hussein was a real threat to us. Even though he did not actually have any weapons of mass destruction that we could find, we know he used them. We know he had the ability to restart at any time and that he had attempted to begin a nuclear weapons program. Most of all, he had a country where terrorists were running wild. We heard a lot about Abu Mus'ab al-Zarqawi, of Ansar al-Islam, the infamous butcher who delighted in decapitating people for television. His group became al-Qaida in Iraq. Fortunately, we killed him. He and other terrorists were running loose in Iraq. They were waiting to get their hands on weapons of mass destruction.

With the decline and decapitation of the Saddam Hussein regime, we made it much less likely the Government was going to provide weapons of mass destruction. But that was what the Iraqi survey group said was the greatest danger, that made Iraq far more dangerous than we knew, because with Saddam Hussein in control, terrorist groups running wild in a chaotic country could have provided the weapons of mass destruction the terrorists seek, and continue to seek, to use against our allies, our troops abroad and us here at home.

If the place falls into chaos, there is likely to be broad-ranging genocide among the parties in Iraq, settling old grievances. That could bring other countries into the region, starting a regionwide civil war. But the most important thing is Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri, his No. 2 man, said the purpose of their struggle is to establish the headquarters of their caliphate at the land of the two rivers. That is Iraq, Baghdad and Ramadi. They want to get their hands on the oil resources. If they have unfettered access for establishing camps to recruit, train, develop weapons, issue command and control, then we in this Nation are much less safe. Return on success, yes. The 2/6 Marines have come back and others will come back on success. That is the strategy we have now and it is the right one.

Mr. President, I needed to say that.

FISA

It is now important to talk about FISA. I am glad we are on the floor. I think, as the majority leader has said, all first-degree amendments need to be filed by 1 o'clock this afternoon. We are available to do business and we look forward to working with our colleagues to see if we can make this happen in a timely fashion.

I believe it is important this morning, for the RECORD and for the benefit of my colleagues and the American people, to clear up several things mentioned in yesterday's consideration of the FISA bill. When I say ''FISA,'' I mean the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act—the act that authorizes the President and the intelligence community to use electronic signals collection to get information on terrorist enemies and other threats to the United States.

First, I will state the obvious. Yesterday, we had a very positive result in the Senate. The Senate Judiciary Committee substitute to the Senate Intelligence Committee bill failed on a clear vote. I believe the Members of this body recognized it was a partisan, unworkable, inadequate bill. It was written without any consultation with the intelligence community or the lawyers who know how FISA works and how signals intelligence is carried out. It was done without the participation of any of the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee, and it failed.

Chairman ROCKEFELLER and I have, as has been said, a bipartisan bill worked out over a number of months, as the occupant of the chair knows so well. We worked long and hard. We didn't always agree, but we came to a bill that passed 13 to 2.

There were two problems with the bill—a good idea but unworkable as introduced. So we worked with the sponsors of that provision and had a very good idea that we need to protect American citizens, when they are abroad, from warrantless surveillance. It took 24, 25 pages to work out the details for it. But I believe that provision we now have in the managers' amendment, the pending amendment before us on this bill, accomplishes the purposes all of us on the committee support.

I voted against the original proposal in the committee because I didn't think it was workable, but we have fixed that, and I am proud to support it.

These are the fixes Chairman ROCKEFELLER and I put together, with the help of Senator WYDEN and the occupant of the chair, so we now have a functional, working amendment. The drafting has been fixed, and I believe we have a much better bill. We have an improvement over the original FISA bill and the Protect America Act, which was a necessary short-term extension that allowed the continuation of electronic intercepts against foreign targets overseas, without having a court order, which was absolutely necessary because the change in the technology in electronic communications had put too many of the overseas collections, which used to be outside the scope of FISA, within the scope of FISA.

The Protect America Act had a lot of nasty things said about it yesterday. They were all wrong. What the Protect America Act did not do, however, involves two very important things the Senate Intelligence Committee did. By a 13-to-2 vote, we added the protection for American citizens overseas. It is very important. It added other protections as well. It also said those companies, the carriers that may have worked with the intelligence community in adopting or effectuating the collection of signals intelligence against terrorists planning attacks in the United States, should not be sued in civil court. That provision—protecting any private sector entities that cooperated but not Government officials from lawsuits—was necessary to end a string of lawsuits brought by opponents of intelligence collection who want to destroy the system, who seek money damages but who really seek to harass and drive communication companies out of the business of cooperating with intelligence officials.

If they are successful, if they can drive and harass and bludgeon private sector entities from cooperating with intelligence officials, then our country will be significantly less safe. Those of us who have been on the Intelligence Committee heard the discussion that there are threats that continue to be raised and that this world is still a dangerous place. We need to be able to find out what our enemies are planning. We cannot have the entire Nation as fortified as the Capitol grounds and the White House grounds. We have a free and open country. Our only hope of being safe is to identify planned terrorist attacks before they occur.

So what we have before us today is a workable, bipartisan bill. It is supported by the Director of National Intelligence. I will refer to Admiral McConnell as the DNI, the head of that agency, and the President would sign it into law. We started with a solid bipartisan update to FISA that is needed to protect the country to increase civil liberty protections and protections for the privacy rights of Americans. We should now all heed the first law of responsible leadership, and that is, first and foremost, do no harm with any amendments to be considered in the bill.

I hope my colleagues will think long and hard before offering amendments, to make sure they have no unintended consequences and that they do no harm.

One good way to do that is to talk with the intelligence community. Talk with the office of the DNI, talk with the Department of Justice. If you have a good idea, talk with them. Maybe there is a way your objectives can be achieved without interfering with the ability to collect information. If you don't, if things are offered that would significantly impair our intelligence community's ability to collect the vitally important intelligence we need to have, then I will have to oppose it and I will urge my colleagues to oppose it.

We constructed a delicate, bipartisan compromise that is a good bill. I hope we will refrain from trying to deconstruct it or try to make the bill worse in any way before final passage. The American people want to have well-regulated intelligence collection that keeps the country safe, and they deserve no less.

That brings us to where we are today. Senator FEINGOLD yesterday offered an amendment over which the Department of Justice expressed real concerns. I understand those concerns, so I offered a second-degree amendment that gives the Senator from Wisconsin three-quarters of what he sought, yet refrains from mandating that the executive branch provide Congress with pleadings containing very sensitive sources and methods submitted to the FISA Court. I will refer to that court as the FISC, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

Three months ago in a committee compromise, I agreed to include the provisions of the Senator from Wisconsin in our bill, which calls for the opinions, orders, and decisions of the FISC prospectively, and in my second-degree amendment, I propose to go further and agree with him to accept his mandate to require the community to go back 5 years to dig up all the past orders and opinions which are of significant consequence but go back and find all those and give them to us.

We have received in the Intelligence Committee, on a semiannual basis, the reports of FISC, orders and opinions of significance, and they have been available for review by our staff for each 6-month period. But we will order them to go back and provide them. I am not sure what he is digging for, but I think we are willing to work with him. It will be a burden on the community, but I think that is information that might arguably be useful to those of us with oversight responsibility.

I am not willing to agree to mandating that pleadings be turned over, and my second-degree amendment eliminates them from his mandate. It also stipulates that this mandate would be levied with due regard to sensitive sources and methods.

Even though I believe this mandate for tranches of documents, truckloads perhaps, puts a tremendous burden on officials in the Department who have already given us semiannual reviews, since now they will have to go back and find, produce, screen, redact, and submit them to Congress, I am willing to work with the Senator from Wisconsin and others to include them up to the point of pleadings. I hope this will be viewed as a reasonable compromise.

Regrettably, instead of working with me on this issue, the Senator from Wisconsin attacked my efforts to reach a compromise saying ''a ridiculous notion and disrespectful of the United States Congress.'' I was accused of ''hiding behind a tragedy in this country to make arguments that have no merit'' and trying to help the intelligence community ''prevent the Members of Congress from seeing the pleadings provided to an article III court.''

These insinuations are not only inaccurate, but I believe they come close to violating debate rule XIX of the Senate, which says:

> No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

I do not believe the accusations against me were appropriate in the debate. They only underscore the divisive and partisan intentions behind some of the efforts we are seeing on the floor, and I hope we can avoid future such accusations.

I will restate for the record my reasons for eliminating pleadings from the required submission to the intelligence communities. These are not policy documents, policy of which the Intelligence Committee said: We don't like the policy of where you are going. These are not broad issues for legislative implementation. They are detailed analyses of sources and methods for collecting intelligence. They are submitted to the article III judge sitting at that time as the FISC judge to provide a basis for a warrant based on probable cause to allow electronic surveillance of persons within the United States, U.S. persons.

It is possible those pleadings would include, No. 1, the name or other identifying features of the sensitive sources who provided the intelligence information they set forth. That could risk getting somebody killed. They could provide the identification and location of the collection facility. They could provide information on the means of collection. They would obviously have to provide information on the target and other relevant information.

In the intelligence business, these are the ultimate sources and methods. They are highly classified because, if they were to leak out, there would be very serious harm done to individuals and perhaps even locations where collection occurs.

So I believe the intelligence community has a legitimate reason for saying we are not going to share the sources and methods that identify the names of the individuals, the sources. I do not see that is a necessary element of our oversight, to know Joe Doe was the one who gave us the information on Ralph Roe and they needed to get the information through facility X using means Y. That is kept at a closely compartmental level.

We have already in the bill that Senator ROCKEFELLER and I have been able to forge with great bipartisan support a solid compromise piece of legislation, and that is the model on which we should move ahead.

Today we have heard again some accusations that the minority side—my side—is stalling this important legislation. A quick review of the FISA legislation history over the past year is in order.

The President declared he was bringing the surveillance program under FISA in January of 2007, 1 year ago. In April of last year, because of some changes in court orders, the DNI asked us to modernize FISA so it would be compatible with new technology. On May 1 of last year, he testified in open session before our committee and again he asked us to modernize FISA. Shortly thereafter, we were informed in the Intelligence Committee about the ruling of the FISC that altered the collection ability of that program, to the point where our intelligence agencies were shut down with regard to vital intelligence collection that would protect us.

What was the response of our Intelligence Committee? Regrettably, nothing. We did absolutely nothing. I urged that we act, that we move forward on it, but our committee and Congress did nothing.

Through May, June, and July of last year, the DNI's pleadings to modernize FISA grew stronger. After he came before our committee in May, he came before Members of the Senate in closed session in our confidential, secure hearing room. Over 40 Members were there, and he told us in July it was absolutely essential we move, that everybody said it was essential we move. We did not move until the final week, and we still did not have a committee hearing.

I brought the DNI's bill, the Protect America Act, to the floor on Wednesday, before we had a vote on it on Friday. There were comments yesterday about how partisan and secret and one-sided the negotiations were, but it was not our efforts for the support of the DNI that were secret and one-sided. There were secret negotiations on the majority side prior to the passage of the Protect America Act.

Several committee chairmen got together, shutting out Republicans and shutting out members of the Intelligence Committee from any consideration of their proposals. They were not vetted with the Director of National Intelligence.

The DNI has been accused of going back on his word. I managed to get in finally at the end of some of those negotiations, and I can tell you that the DNI said he will go back and check with his lawyers on these issues. He did not agree to incorporate the changes that were suggested and, as suspected, when he viewed some of the proposals, he found they were unworkable.

We never saw the bill the committee leaders on the majority side proposed to offer until less than an hour before it appeared on the Senate floor—before we were voting, actually, when it appeared on the Senate floor.

During that time, the majority and minority members of the Intelligence Committee asked me for more information about the Protect America Act. I had a session in my office for members of the committee, bipartisan, going over with the DNI what the details of the Protect America Act were.

Fortunately, on a bipartisan basis, we approved the Protect America Act. It was a stopgap. It was meant to serve for 6 months, but it got us back in the business of collecting vital signals intelligence. That is where we needed to be. We were not there.

That was on August 3. Fortunately, on August 4, the House passed the bill, and on August 5, the President signed it, and we were back in business collecting information on new targets who were coming up on our screen.

Because of the need to add a 6-month sunset, which I agreed with all parties on both sides was a good idea, that 6-month sunset expires in 1 more week. It expires next Friday. Knowing that this law would soon expire, when the Senate returned from the August recess in September, the Intelligence Committee began working on a new FISA bill, and after 6 weeks of constant work, deliberations, compromise, extensive discussions among staff, with staff, the members, with the DNI—and the occupant of the chair knows how much time and effort went into that—we produced the carefully crafted compromised legislation before us today on a 13-to-2 vote out of the committee.

This is a model for the law we should pass in the Senate, a bipartisan product. The majority leader tried to bring up this bill in December before the recess, and I commend him for it. But majority Senators filibustered the bill.

Make no mistake about it, the majority stalled FISA last month and filibustered the bill. At that time, the majority leader made a commendable plea to his colleagues. He stated any amendment offered to this bill, in view of its delicate nature and the bipartisan compromise it represents, should be required to meet a 60-vote threshold to clear any procedural hurdles in the Senate. This would also ensure it remained a bipartisan product.

If we look at the history of the important legislation we passed, it passed this past year with 60 votes—60 votes—to ensure there will be a bipartisan bill. Neither party can pass something alone, without bipartisan compromise—getting 60 votes. The Protect America Act required 60 votes: That is how it was brought to the floor. The partisan majority committee leader's bill came to the floor with a 60-vote requirement and it failed. We got the Protect America Act by meeting the 60-vote threshold.

Sixty votes, for those who may be following this elsewhere, is what is needed to invoke cloture to shut off a filibuster, but it is a good principle when you have a very contentious, important, and technical bill.

I commended the majority leader for his leadership and agree wholeheartedly with him now. In fact, if he were able to follow through with that offer now, then we would have already passed FISA last night. The fact is there is a majority of Senators who will not give their consent for such an agreement. They would prefer to deconstruct the Senate Intelligence Committee compromise and, by simple majority vote, transform the bill before us into a partisan product, thus gutting the bipartisan support—and the DNI's support, I would add—in this important legislation. That is little bit shortsighted, I believe.

If a majority can be mustered to undo the important compromises worked out with the intelligence community, with the DNI, you can go through the act of passing the bill, but it is not going to be signed, and the monkey is going to be back on our back. We have an opportunity to pass a bill here that can be signed into law to keep our country safe. If we want to be in the situation where we were last summer, where our intelligence community was effectively deaf and blind to terrorist threats, then go ahead and tear up this bill, take it apart, leave it with no support from the intelligence community. And, by definition, if it is not supported by the intelligence community, it will not be signed into law by the President.

I am asking that we go back to the procedure we followed before in passing the Protect America Act, that we used in passing other important pieces of legislation, and make it a bipartisan effort. The people of this country are crying out for bipartisanship. We got the Protect America Act on a bipartisan basis. We passed a bill out of the Senate committee that far exceeded the 60-percent test. We need to deal with this bill under the same rules. Gutting the bill with a bare majority, and plurality, as could happen under the current situation, is a bad approach. I say to my colleagues that if they can agree to a 60-vote threshold for all amendments offered, then we can start voting on any and all of them right now, and we will go through them. There are some very important amendments, and there are very good arguments for those amendments. I hope my arguments on the other side are better. But we have to deal with this on a 60-vote basis. What I am not willing to do right now, and our minority leader is not and our side of the aisle is not, is to allow this bipartisan product to be dismantled on the Senate floor by partisan efforts that make FISA unworkable, loses the DNI's support because it won't work, and thus the President's signature. It makes for good politics but it fails to protect America.

If the majority will work with us, then we are happy to have any and all amendments. I know the leaders may still come up with an agreement of that sort, but barring that, I don't see a way around this because we are not going to accept, by majority vote, a jumbled-up structure that leaves the intelligence community without the ability effectively, efficiently, and within proper constitutional and statutory restrictions to collect the intelligence we need to keep this country safe. We have to have a good bill. We have incorporated far more protections in the Senate substitute than have ever been in FISA before, and I think those of us on the Intelligence Committee, the occupant of the chair, can take great credit for protections we have added.

National security is not red or white, it is red, white, and blue. The blues and the reds need to work together on this, passing a product the DNI supports so the President will sign it into law. Anything else and we are not helping the country. We are ready to consider amendments; we simply don't want to see the bill destroyed through partisan ploys.

Mr. President, seeing no other Senators present, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. President, I would inquire as to what the pending business is before the Senate.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. S. 2248, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Amendments Act.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. I thank the Chair, and I rise to support the managers' amendment on this piece of legislation as proposed by Chairman ROCKEFELLER and Vice Chairman BOND. This is the result of a bipartisan discussion which included the Office of Director of National Intelligence and the Department of Justice. I commend Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND on drafting this complicated yet critical piece of legislation.

The Senate has had a healthy debate while considering the Judiciary Committee's substitute amendment. I was pleased to see a majority of the Senate reject that bill, and I hope the Senate can now move past that flawed bill rather than offering a number of amendments which contain fragments of it. There is no benefit to rehashing the same points in the Senate bill that was just handily tabled versus the Rockefeller-Bond compromise piece of legislation that came out of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

The Director of National Intelligence, the National Security Agency, and the Department of Justice have stated their opposition to a number of proposed amendments which were part of the failed Judiciary Committee's substitute. The DNI has made it clear he would recommend to the President that he veto this legislation if it does not contain immunity for communication carriers, and rightly so. Some Members offered amendments to strike title II from the managers' amendment or to substitute the Government as the defendant in these lawsuits.

But substitution will not give the carriers protection, nor will it protect our national security. The plaintiffs can still seek documents and other evidence from them through the discovery process at trial. This risks exposing our intelligence sources and methods, and there is simply no doubt about that fact.

The Government can assert the states secrets privilege, but the ongoing litigation has shown that courts reject this theory. Even the FISA Court, which operates in secret and handles classified information, is not suited to handle these cases. The FISA Court primarily reviews ex parte requests and was not meant to hear regular trials. The members of the FISA Court are sitting district court judges and have their own full dockets.

The risk of unnecessarily exposing some of our most sensitive collection if litigation continues is too great. The best remedy is to provide immunity to the telecommunication providers as the managers' amendment does. Other amendments propose unnecessary additions to provisions already included in the managers' amendment. For example, the managers' amendment contains a 6-year sunset and an exclusivity provision. Yet amendments have been offered to make this legislation expire in 2 years or 4 years.

Additionally, an amendment has been offered to state that absent some other expressed order from Congress, FISA and title XVIII are the exclusive means to conduct electronic surveillance. This would require Congress to pass a law authorizing the President to conduct electronic surveillance after an attack on our country.

What if Congress were not able to meet, let alone agree on language authorizing electronic surveillance after an attack on our country? This amendment ignores longstanding debate regarding article I and article II powers, a debate the courts have dodged time and again. I support the bipartisan language in the managers' amendment which maintains the status quo of this important constitutional question.

Finally, an amendment has been offered requiring an audit of the terrorist surveillance program. As I stated earlier in comments yesterday, the Intelligence Committee has conducted a thorough review of this program over many months, which included testimony, extensive document reviews, and even trips out to our intelligence agencies to witness how this program is operated.

I understand that sometimes partisanship impedes action in Congress. But I do not recall when some of my colleagues have had such little faith in the bipartisan findings and conclusions of a committee in this body.

This amendment disregards the committee's finding and asks for yet another retrospective review of this program. This is not only duplicative, but it is unnecessary. The Protect America Act expires a week from today; the threat from al-Qaida will not expire a week from today.

It is now time for Congress to act and to fix FISA so our intelligence community has the tools it needs to do its job in a very professional manner and gather information necessary to protect our national security.

Protecting our national security is in the interest of all Americans, and Congress should seek to ensure that our Nation is protected fully. The members of the intelligence community say the managers' amendment contains many tools they need to protect our country. I urge my colleagues to support the managers' amendment.

I yield the floor and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ECONOMIC STIMULUS

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I had earlier this morning intended to spend a few minutes talking about the stimulus package that was at least agreed to between the leadership of the other body and the administration, a matter that will be coming here and the Senate will have an opportunity to express its will on that matter.

But I wanted to speak on it for a moment, at least as Chairman of the Senate Banking Committee that will have at least a small part of that discussion, because of the inclusion of the FHA proposals as well as the loan limits within the GSEs, which I commend the administration for including. These are critical elements.

We must, of course, deal with people's problems. But is something else again to deal with the problems that have caused people's problems. In my view, the deeper problem is the foreclosure crisis. That is the underlying issue, in my view, and therefore to have dealt with a short-term stimulus package that did not include some measures and steps that would address the housing issue and the foreclosure issue would have been shortsighted. So I was pleased to see that in addition with some rebates and refundable tax assistance, even to those who have very limited incomes, as well as assistance to those with young children and families. All are wonderful ideas.

I know Senator BAUCUS, who will have the bulk of the responsibility in the Finance Committee for dealing with this, along with others who want to add elements of dealing with such things as unemployment insurance or food stamps or low-income energy assistance and the like, will have some additional thoughts on this short-term package. But I felt it was important to express some optimism about the direction it is going in and to note how important it is for consumers and investors to begin to have their confidence restored.

FISA

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise this morning to continue the debate and discussion on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Let me underscore the point that Majority Leader REID and others have made. I listened carefully to the comments of Senator MCCONNELL, the distinguished Republican leader.

I have served in this body for more than a quarter of a century now, and it is unfortunate that we seem to have come to a point where not as much is happening as should be happening, in my view.

I brought committee products to the floor on many occasions, and I am sort of envious of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky—because as a committee chairman, I love nothing more than to bring a product out of my committee. Many times I brought them out with unanimous votes, only to have to spend days here on the floor as amendment after amendment was being offered to change, in some cases dramatically, the substance of our bill, which we had worked on for weeks and months and years in some cases.

So it is a new idea here to just accept committee product and say the other 90 or 85 Members should respect the work of our colleagues, and acknowledge that and pass the legislation as if we had all had some input here. That is unique and, I suppose, an idea that most of us would like to embrace at one point or another. But this is the Senate. This is not an operation that runs by fiat.

This institution has an historic responsibility. In this institution, every single Member has the opportunity to express themselves, not only rhetorically for unlimited amounts of time, but also with the ability to contribute to the policy products we frame. To suggest that other Members, including members of a committee that had commensurate jurisdiction, the Judiciary Committee, ought to be excluded from adding their thoughts and ideas, is ridiculous. Even members of both Committees, Judiciary and Intelligence, are excluded, such as Senator FEINGOLD. It was his amendment, as a member of both of these committees, that the Republican leadership would not even consider debating or acknowledging with a vote. So that is unique in any regard. Anyone who has observed this institution for more than an hour—or less—understands how this works.

So the idea that we should accept this bill because the President will sign it, is nice to hear, but I have been around long enough to know that Presidents will sign things they did not think they would in time, and particularly if we can add some thoughts that Members have.

I do not want to dwell on the procedural aspects of all of this, but I wanted to underscore the point that Senator REID, our leader, the majority leader, made this morning, on the unique idea that Members who have substantive ideas and thoughts and amendments should somehow stick them back in their pockets, accept the product of the Intelligence Committee and go home, because the President will sign that bill. I will be anxious to raise the argument in future dates when I bring a bill to the floor and I find that the Republican leadership is going to offer some amendments to my ideas, reminding them of their eloquence in suggesting a different approach to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Last night, we saw into the heart of the minority's priorities. Since last month, day after day, opponents of retroactive immunity have been warning about its underlying motive: shutting up the President's critics. Pass immunity, we have said, and the debate will be shut down, the critics will be shut up, and the actions of the President's favored corporations will be shut in the dark for good.

Last night, we saw the mindset of the minority. Several of my Democratic colleagues have brought to the floor their carefully prepared amendments, many of which do their part to right the balance between security and civil liberties.

The Cardin amendment, which would allow us to revisit the bill in 4 years instead of 6, not exactly a frightening proposal. It would be a simple debate; we could decide if he's right or wrong—make your case either way. I happen to believe he is right. Amendments from Senator FEINGOLD prohibiting the dangerous and possibly unconstitutional practice of reverse targeting and bulk collection. The Leahy amendment, requiring the inspectors general of the Director of National Intelligence and the Department of Justice and the National Security Agency to investigate possible illegal domestic spying. The Feinstein-Nelson amendment allowing the FISA Court to determine whether immunity should apply to the telecommunications companies; and several more amendments as well.

These are all very serious amendments. The Presiding Officer himself has one of these amendments. Some of them I support, others I would probably end up opposing. Nonetheless, I acknowledge the seriousness of their proposals.

I am concerned, however, about amendments that expand the authority of the FISA Court beyond what Congress intended when it originally passed FISA. While I respect the motives behind such proposals, Congress needs time to fully consider their implications.

Further, I am concerned that such proposals put excessive power in the hands of a secret court whose members are all appointed by one individual. In other words, I am concerned this is yet another concentration of power, the implications of which we don't fully understand and ought to consider carefully. Yes, secrecy is necessary at times in the life of every nation. But it is a bedrock principle that democracy should always err on the side of less secrecy. For that reason I believe cases against the telecoms are best handled in our standard Federal courts—which, by the way, have shown time and time again that they know how to protect State secrets.

None of that is the real issue this morning. Whether you agree with any of these proposals or not, each amendment deserves consideration. Senators are not entitled to see their amendments agreed to, but they are entitled to this: a good-faith debate, honest criticism, and, ultimately, a vote on their ideas. Last evening, they didn't get that. Our Republican colleagues, assuming they would lose those votes, effectively shut down the work of the United States Senate. In the words of the cliche, they have taken their ball and run home.

I don't think that is far off base, in seeing in this egregious shutdown a parallel to retroactive immunity itself. Both attitudes privilege power over deliberation, over consensus, over honest argument. Like immunity, pulling these amendments down shows a contempt for honest debate and a willingness to settle issues in the dark, in the back rooms, rather than in the open, where the law lives, where the American people can see it.

President Bush wants to shut down the courts whose rulings he doesn't like. Last night, Senate Republicans showed when they don't like the outcome of a debate, they shut down that as well. It is one thing for a President to express that kind of contempt for the process of legislation. It is yet another for the coequal Members of this legislative branch to express it themselves.

I have spoken repeatedly about the rule of law. The rule of law is not some abstract idea. It is here with us. It is what makes this body run and has for more than two centuries. It means we hear each other out. We do it in the open. And while the minority gets its voice, its right to strenuously object, the majority ultimately rules. Standing for the rule of law anywhere means standing for it everywhere—in our courts and in the Senate.

The circumstances are different, of course, but the heart of the matter is the same. Last evening, I believe the Republican Party forfeited its claim to good faith on this issue. They are left to stake their case on fear. Whether that be enough, the next few days will tell.

But I want to talk about the issue of the underlying bill, the substance of it. As my colleagues here know, I care deeply and passionately about several aspects of this bill. Again, I have great respect for the work it takes to strike the balance between the need for have surveillance of those terrorists who would do us great harm, and the protection of civil liberties, rights, and the rule of law. It is not an easy balance. I will be the first to acknowledge that the tension between those two goals has been an ongoing tension since the founding of this Republic. It is not just new since 9/11. It goes back to the very first days of our Republic.

In fact, James Madison spoke eloquently about the tensions in civil liberties and rights and, with a great deal of prescience, recognized that it is usually threats from outside our country that have the most influence on endangering the rights and liberties we embrace at home. He acknowledged that more than two centuries ago.

So the debate we are engaged in today is a historic one, historic in the sense that it has been ongoing. No Member of this Chamber wants to sacrifice the security of our country, and my hope is that no Member of this body wants to sacrifice our liberties and rights either. I want to believe that very deeply. While we are debating how best to do that, my fear is that we are about to adopt legislation that will deviate from a 30-year history of actually achieving that sense of balance, by and large with the almost unanimous support of Members who have served here during that 30-year period.

I spoke yesterday about a crime that may have been committed against millions of innocent Americans: their phone calls, their faxes, their e-mails, every word listened to, copied down by Government bureaucrats into a massive database. I spoke about how our largest telecommunications companies leapt at the chance to betray the privacy and the trust of their own customers. That spying didn't happen in a panic or short-term emergency, not for a week, a month, or even a year. It went on relentlessly for more than 5 years. If the press had not exposed it, it would be going on at this very hour. This was not a question where a program started up and someone realized they had done something wrong, shut it down, and we discovered it later. This program has been ongoing and would have been ongoing arguably for years had the New York Times and a whistleblower not stepped forward to acknowledge its existence.

We saw how President Bush responded when this was exposed—not by apologizing, not even by making his best case before our courts, but by asking for a congressional coverup: retroactive immunity. He asked us to do it on trust. There are classified documents, he says, that prove his case beyond a shadow of a doubt, but, of course, we are not allowed to see them. I have served in this body for 27 years, and I am not allowed to see these documents. Neither are the majority of my colleagues.

And when we resist his urge to be a law unto himself, how does he respond? With fear. When we question him, he says we are failing to keep the American people safe.

Shame on the President and shame on these scare tactics.

I have promised to fight those tactics with all the power any one Senator can muster, and I am here today to keep that promise. For several months I have listened to the building frustration over this immunity and this administration's campaign of lawlessness. I have seen it in person, in mail, online—the passion, the eloquence of average citizens who are just fed up with day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year of this administration, in one case after another, trampling all over the basic rights of American citizens. They have inspired me more than they know, these citizens who have spoken up.

But almost every time telecom immunity comes up, there is the inevitable question: What is the big deal? Why are so many people spending so much energy to keep a few lawsuits from going forward?

Because this is about far more than the telecom industry. This is about a choice that will define America—the rule of law or the rule of men. It is about this Government's practice of waterboarding, a technique invented by the Spanish Inquisition, perfected by the Khmer Rouge, and in between banned—originally banned for excessive cruelty even by the Gestapo.

It is about the Military Commissions Act, a bill that gave President Bush the power to designate any individual he wants as an unlawful enemy combatant, hold him indefinitely, and take away that individual's right to habeas corpus, the centuries-old right to challenge your detention.

It is about the CIA destroying evidence of harsh interrogation—or, as some would call it, torture.

It is about the Vice President raising secrecy to an art form.

The members of his energy task force? None of your business, we are told.

His location? Undisclosed.

The names of his staff? Confidential.

The visitor log for his office? Shredded by the Secret Service.

The list of papers he has declassified? Classified.

It is about the Justice Department turning our Nation's highest law enforcement offices into a patronage plum and turning the impartial work of indictments and trials into the machinations of politics.

It is about Alberto Gonzales coming before Congress to give testimony that was at best wrong and at worst perjury.

It is about Michael Mukasey coming before the Senate and defending the President's power to break the law.

It is about extraordinary renditions and secret prisons.

It is about Maher Arar, the Canadian computer programmer who was arrested by American agents, flown to Syria, held for some 300 days in a cell 3 feet wide, and then cleared of all wrongdoing.

It is about all of that. We are deceiving ourselves when we talk about the torture issue or habeas issue or the U.S. attorneys issue or the extraordinary rendition issue or the secrecy issue. As if each one were an isolated case. As if each one were an accident. We have let outrage upon outrage upon outrage slide with nothing more than a promise to stop the next one.

There is only one issue here—only one—the law issue. Attack the President's contempt for the law at any point, and it will be wounded at all points. That is why I am here today. I am speaking for the American people's right to know what the President and the telecoms did to them. But more than that, I am speaking against the President's conviction that he is the law. Strike it at any point, with courage, and it will wither.

That is the big deal. That is why immunity matters—dangerous in itself but even worse in all it represents. No more. No more. This far, Mr. President, but no further.

More and more Americans are rejecting the false choice that has come to define this administration: security or liberty but never, ever both. It speaks volumes about the President's estimation of the American people that he expects them to accept that choice.

The truth, I would say, is that shielding corporations from lawsuits does absolutely nothing for our security. I challenge the President to prove otherwise. I challenge him to show us how putting these companies above the law makes us safer by one iota. That, I am convinced, he cannot do.

The truth is that a working balance between security and liberty has already been struck. It has been settled for decades. For three decades, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act has prevented executive lawbreaking and protected Americans, and that balance stands today. In the wake of the Watergate scandal, the Senate convened the Church Committee, a panel of distinguished Members, Republicans and Democrats, determined to investigate executive abuses of power. Unsurprisingly, they found that when Congress and the courts substitute ''trust me'' for real and true oversight, massive law breaking can result. They found evidence of U.S. Army spying on the civilian population, Federal dossiers on citizens' political activities, a CIA and FBI program that opened hundreds of thousands of Americans' letters without warning or warrant.

In sum, Americans had sustained a severe blow to their fourth amendment right to be ''secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures.'' But at the same time, the Senators of the Church Committee understood that surveillance needed to go forward to protect the American people. Surveillance itself is not the problem: unchecked, unregulated, unwarranted surveillance was. What surveillance needed, in a word, was legitimacy. In America, as the Founders understood, power becomes legitimate when it is shared; when Congress and the courts check the attitude which so often crops up in the executive branch: If the President does it, it is not illegal.

The Church Committee's final report, ''Intelligence Activities and the Rights of Americans,'' puts the case powerfully. Let me quote, if I can, from that report. The Church Committee—Republicans and Democrats—said:

> The critical question before the Committee was to determine how the fundamental liberties of the people can be maintained in the course of the Government's effort to protect their security. The delicate balance between these basic goals of our system of government is often difficult to strike, but it can, and must, be achieved.
> We reject the view that the traditional American principles of justice and fair play have no place in our struggle against the enemies of freedom. Moreover, our investigation has established that the targets of intelligence activity have ranged far beyond persons who could properly be characterized as enemies of freedom. . . .

The report further states:

> We have seen segments of our Government, in their attitudes and action, adopt tactics unworthy of a democracy, and occasionally reminiscent of the tactics of totalitarian regimes.
> We have seen a consistent pattern in which programs initiated with limited goals, such as preventing criminal violence or identifying foreign spies, were expanded to what witnesses characterized as ''vacuum cleaners,'' sweeping in information about lawful activities of American citizens.

The Senators concluded:

> Unless new and tighter controls are established by legislation, domestic intelligence activities threaten to undermine our democratic society and fundamentally alter its nature.

That report is more than 30 years old. But couldn't those words have been written this morning? We share so much with the Senators—Republicans and Democrats—who wrote them. We share a nation under grave threat—in their case, from communism and nuclear annihilation; in ours, from international terrorism. We share, as well, the threat of a domestic spying regime that, however good its intentions, finally went too far.

Senators in my lifetime have already faced this problem, and I believe their solution stands: The power to invade privacy must be used sparingly, guarded jealously, and shared equally between all three branches—all three branches of Government.

Three decades ago, Congress embodied that solution in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA. FISA confirmed the President's power to conduct surveillance of international conversations involving anyone in the United States, provided that the Federal FISA Court issued a warrant, ensuring that wiretapping was aimed at safeguarding our security, and nothing else.

The President's own Director of National Intelligence, Mike McConnell, explained the rationale in an interview this summer: The United States, he said: ''did not want to allow [the intelligence community] to conduct . . . electronic surveillance of Americans for foreign intelligence unless you had a warrant, so that was required.''

As originally written in 1978, and as amended many times over the last three decades, FISA has accomplished its mission. It has been a valuable tool—a tremendously valuable tool—for conducting surveillance of terrorists and those who would harm our country.

Every time Presidents have come to Congress openly to ask for more leeway under FISA, Congress has worked with them; Democrats and Republicans have negotiated; and together, Congress and the President have struck a balance that safeguards America while doing its utmost to protect privacy.

This summer, Congress made a technical correction to FISA, enabling the President to wiretap, without a warrant, conversations between two foreign agents, even if those conversations are routed through American computers. For other reasons, I felt this summer's legislation went a bit too far, and I opposed it. But the point is that Congress once again proved its willingness to work with the President on FISA.

Shouldn't that be enough?

Just this past October and November, as we have seen, the Senate Intelligence and Judiciary Committees worked with the President to further refine FISA and ensure that, in a true emergency, the FISA Court could do nothing to slow down intelligence gathering.

Shouldn't that be enough?

And as for the FISA Court? Between 1978 and 2004, according to the Washington Post, the FISA Court approved 18,748 warrants—18,748 warrants. It rejected five, between 1978 and 2004. Let me repeat the numbers. They granted 18,748 warrants, and rejected 5 of them over that almost 30-year period.

The FISA Court has sided with the executive 99.9 percent of the time.

Shouldn't that be enough? One would think so. Is anything lacking? Have we forgotten something? Isn't all of this enough to keep us safe?

It took three decades, three branches of government, four Presidents, and 12 Congresses to patiently, painstakingly build up that machinery. It only took one President to tear it down. Generations of leaders handed over to President Bush a system that brought security under the law, a system primed to bless nearly any eavesdropping he could possibly conceive or think of. And he responded: No, thank you; I'd rather break the law.

He ignored not just a Federal court but a secret Federal court; not just a secret Federal court but a secret Federal court prepared to sign off on his actions 99.9 percent of the time. And he still has not given us a good reason why. He still has not shown how his lawbreaking makes us safer.

So I am left to conclude that, to this President, this is not about security. It is about power: power in itself, power for itself.

I make that point not to change the subject, but because I believe it solves a mystery. That is: Why is retroactive immunity so vital to this President? The answer, I believe, is that immunity means secrecy; and secrecy, to this administration, means power.

It is no coincidence that the man who declared ''if the president does it, it's not illegal''—Richard Nixon—was the same man who raised executive secrecy to an art form in an earlier generation. The Senators of the Church Committee expressed succinctly the deep flaw in the Nixonian executive. I quote from them: ''Abuse thrives on secrecy.'' And in the exhaustive catalog of their report, they proved it.

This administration shares a similar level of secrecy, and a similar level of abuse, I would add. Its push for immunity is no different. Secrecy is at its center. We find proof in their original version of retroactive immunity. Remember, this was their idea: a proposal not just to protect the telecoms but everyone involved in the wiretapping program. That is what they sought of the Intelligence Committee. Everyone involved in that program was to be protected. In their original proposal, that is, they wanted to immunize themselves.

Think about that. It speaks to their fear and, perhaps, their guilt: their guilt that they had broken the law, and their fear that in the years to come they would be found liable or convicted. They knew better than anyone else what they had done. They must have had good reason to be afraid.

Thankfully, immunity for the Executive is not part of the bill before us. But the original proposal—the original proposal—to immunize everyone involved ought to be instructive to Members here. Why did they seek such broad authority to immunize every individual? Why? What was behind that proposal? This is, and always has been, a self-preservation bill.

Otherwise, why not have the trial to get it over with? If the President believes what he says, the corporations would win in a walk. After all, in the administration's telling, the telecoms were ordered to help the President spy without a warrant, and they patriotically complied.

Read Justice Robert Jackson's briefs after Nuremberg. The 21 defendants at Nuremberg made that case, that they were only complying with orders they were given. And the court in the Nuremberg trials, in 1945, rejected that argument. Robert Jackson reminded us, in subsequent decisions he handed down as a Supreme Court Justice, that that argument, ''we were ordered to do it,'' is not a legitimate defense when you know what you are doing is wrong.

And when you hear the President's story, ignore for a moment that in America we obey the laws, not the President's orders. Ignore that the telecoms were not unanimous; one, Qwest, wanted to see the legal basis for the order. They never received it, of course, and so they refused to comply. Ignore that a judge presiding over the case ruled that—and I quote—''AT&T cannot seriously contend that a reasonable entity in its position could have believed that the alleged domestic dragnet was legal.''

Ignore all of that. If the order the telecoms received was legally binding, they have an easy case to prove. The corporations only need to show a judge the authority and the assurances they were given, and they will be in and out of court in five minutes.

If the telecoms are as defensible as the President says, why doesn't the President let them defend themselves? If the case is so easy to make, why doesn't he let them make it?

It can't be that he is afraid of leaks. The Federal court system has dealt for decades with the most delicate national security matters, building up expertise in protecting classified information behind closed doors—ex parte, in camera. We can expect no less in these cases, as well.

No intelligence sources need to be compromised. No state secrets need to be exposed. And after litigation at both the district court and circuit court level, no state secrets have been exposed.

In fact, Federal District Court Judge Vaughan Walker, a Republican appointee, I might add, has already ruled that the issue can go to trial without putting state secrets in jeopardy. Judge Walker reasonably pointed out that the existence of the President's surveillance program is hardly a secret at all. I quote from him. He stated:

> The government has [already] disclosed the general contours of the ''terrorist surveillance program,'' which requires the assistance of a telecommunications provider.

That is from Judge Walker. In his opinion, Judge Walker argued that even when it is reasonably grounded:

> the state secrets privilege [still] has its limits. While the court recognizes and respects the executive's constitutional duty to protect the nation from threats, the court also takes seriously its constitutional duty to adjudicate the disputes that come before it. To defer to a blanket assertion of secrecy here would be to abdicate that duty, particularly because the very subject matter of this litigation has been so publicly aired.

That is Republican appointee Vaughan Walker speaking to the administration. He further goes on to say:

> The compromise between liberty and security remains a difficult one. But dismissing this case at the outset would sacrifice liberty for no apparent enhancement of security.

That ought to be the epitaph of this administration: sacrificing liberty for no apparent enhancement of security. Worse than selling our soul, we are giving it away for free.

The President is equally wrong, I would suggest, to claim that failing to grant this retroactive immunity will make the telecoms less likely to cooperate with surveillance in the future.

The truth is that since the 1970s, FISA has compelled telecommunications companies to cooperate with surveillance when it is warranted. And what is more, it immunizes them. It has done that for more than 25 years.

So cooperation in warranted wiretapping is not at stake today. Collusion in warrantless wiretapping is. And the warrant makes all the difference, because it is precisely the court's blessing that brings Presidential power under the rule of law.

In sum, we know that giving the telecoms their day in court—giving the American people their day in court—would not jeopardize an ounce of our security. The conclusion, I again repeat, is clear: The only thing that stands to be exposed if these cases go to trial is the extent of the President's lawbreaking, of the administration's lawbreaking. That, he will keep from the light of a courtroom at all costs.

This is a self-preservation bill. And given the lack of compelling alternatives, I can only conclude that self-preservation—secrecy for secrecy's sake—explains the President's vehemence.

Well, you might say, he will be gone in a year. Why not let the secrets die with this administration and start afresh? Why take up all the time on this matter?

Because those secrets never rightfully belonged to him. They belong to history, to our successors in this Chamber, to every one of us. Thirty years after the Church Committee, history repeated itself. If those who come after us are to prevent it from repeating again, they need the full truth. We need to set an unmistakable precedent. Determining guilt or innocence belongs to the courts, not to 51 Senators who may carry the day by a vote here, or the President, for that matter—that is what the courts are for. Lawless spying will no longer be tolerated. And, most of all, the truth is no one's private property.

Which brings us, unfortunately, to economics. Because once the arguments from state secrets and patriotic duty are exhausted, immunity's defenders make their last stand as amateur economists.

Here is how Mike McConnell put it:

> If you play out the suits at the value they're claimed, it would bankrupt these companies. So . . . we have to provide liability protection to these private sector entities.

To begin with, that is a clear exaggeration. We are talking about some of the wealthiest, most successful companies in America. Let me quote an article from Dow Jones MarketWatch. The headline reads: ''AT&T's third-quarter profit rises 41.5 percent.'' I will quote the article:

> AT&T, Inc. on Tuesday said third-quarter earnings rose 41.5 percent, boosted by the acquisition of BellSouth and the addition of 2 million net wireless customers. . . . Net income totaled $3.6 billion . . . compared with $2.17 . . . a year ago.

I should note that AT&T has posted these record profits at the same time of this very public litigation.

Now, granted, that is only one quarter, and I understand that AT&T's most recent earnings aren't as large as the ones I have just quoted; but I think the point still stands. A company of that size, capable of posting a $3 billion quarter, couldn't be completely wiped out by anything but the most exorbitant and unlikely judgment.

To assume that the telecoms would lose and that their judges would hand down such backbreaking penalties is already taking several leaps. The point, after all, has never been to financially cripple our telecommunications industry; the point is to bring checks and balances back to domestic spying. Setting that precedent would hardly require a crippling judgment.

It is much more troubling, though, that the Director of National Intelligence has begun talking like a stockbroker, pronouncing on ''liability protection for private sector entities.'' How does that even begin to be relevant to letting the case go forward? Since when did we throw out entire lawsuits because the defendant stood to lose too much?

Translate the point into plain English, and here is what Admiral McConnell is arguing: Some corporations are too rich to be sued. Even bringing money into the equation puts wealth above justice, above due process. I have rarely in public life heard an argument as venal as this one.

But this administration would apparently rather protect the telecoms than the American people. In one breath, it can speak about national security and bottom lines. Approve immunity, and Congress will state clearly: The richer you are, the more successful you are, the more lawless you are entitled to be. A suit against you is a danger to the Republic. So at the rock bottom of its justifications, the administration is essentially arguing that immunity can be bought.

The truth is exactly the opposite, in my view. The larger the corporation, the greater potential for abuse. Not that success should make a company suspect at all. Companies grow large and essential to our economy because they are excellent at what they do. I simply mean that size and wealth open the realm of possibilities for abuse far beyond the scope of the individual. After all, if everything alleged is true, the President and the telecoms have engineered one of the most massive violations of privacy in American history. A violation such as that would be inconceivable without the size and resources of a corporate behemoth behind it.

If reasonable search and seizure means opening up a drug dealer's apartment, the telecoms' alleged actions would be the equivalent of strip-searching everyone in the building, ransacking their bedrooms, and prying up all the floorboards. That is the massive scale we are talking about, and that massive scale is precisely why no corporation must be above the law.

Ultimately, that is all I am asking—not a verdict of guilty or innocent. I have my own views, but I don't have a right to pronounce those views. That is why there is something called the third branch of Government. It is called the courts—the courts. A simple majority of this body doesn't get the right to decide the guilt or innocence in this particular case. But when the day in court comes, I have absolutely no investment in the verdict either way. Just as it would be absurd for me to declare the telecoms clearly guilty, it would be equally absurd to close the case today without a decision. But their day in court, as far as I am concerned, is everything.

Why? Because surveillance demands and deserves legitimacy, and the surest way to throw legitimacy away is to leave all of these questions hanging.

Few things are as vital to our national security as giving domestic surveillance the legitimacy it deserves and needs to sustain public support. Because ''the threat to America is not going to expire.'' ''Staying a step ahead of the terrorists who want to attack us'' is ''essential to keeping America safe.'' In the end, ''Congress and the President have no higher responsibility than protecting the American people from enemies who attacked our country and who want to do it again.''

Those aren't my words; they are George Bush's words. He says all of this, yet he says he will veto the entire bill—this vital bill, this bill which is essential to protecting our very lives—all to keep a few corporations safe from lawsuits.

There, at last, as honest as you will ever hear them, are this President's true priorities: secrecy over safety, favors over fairness. Marry those priorities to a contempt for the rule of law, and the results have been devastating. I don't have to repeat them. They aren't secret anymore.

No, Mr. President we can't go back. We can't un-pass the Military Commissions Act. We can't un-destroy the CIA's interrogation tapes. We can't unspeak Alberto Gonzales's disgraceful testimony. We can't un-torture those who have been apprehended and held wrongfully. We can't undo all this administration has done in the last 6 years for the cause of lawlessness and fear.

But we can do this: We can vote down this immunity. We can do this: We can grab hold of the one thread left to us here and pull until the whole garment unravels. We can start here.

And why not here? Why not today?

Why not provide for the protections we need, the surveillance we need, but without this grant of immunity? It is unwarranted, it is unneeded, it is unfair, it is wrong, and it is dangerous.

So, on Monday, I hope my colleagues will reject the motion on cloture, allow these amendments to go forward, allow us to have a debate and a discussion, and then send a clean bill to the President—one that enhances our security and protects our civil liberties.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak as in morning business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask unanimous consent that when I finish with my remarks, the Senator from Texas be recognized.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPUBLICAN RETREAT

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. President, I would say to the Senator from Connecticut, welcome back. We are glad to have him here. He has traveled some roads that I know pretty well. We have missed some of his vigor and passion.

Sometimes the American people say they don't like to see us engage in partisan bickering, and I am going to say something about that in just a minute. But what I think they do like to see us do, if I may say so, is what the Senator from Connecticut was doing just then and what the Senator from Arizona did on Friday: They were debating the balance of each American individual's right to liberty versus each American individual's right to security—coming to different conclusions but having a serious discussion about an issue that affects every single American in this country. That is what the people expect of the Senate.

I come to a different conclusion than he does. We are moving to vote on cloture on a bill on Monday that has come out of the Intelligence Committee by a bipartisan majority of 13 to 2. But this is the kind of debate the Senate ought to have, and I am glad I got to hear his speech even though I disagree with much of it.

The Republican Senators gathered in a retreat at the Library of Congress on Wednesday. This is something we do each year, and the Democratic side does it each year as well. We think about our responsibilities, and we look forward to the future. Many of our Members have said to me that this was one of our best days of retreat. In the first place, it was very well attended: 44 out of 49 of us were there, and 3 of those absent were campaigning in Florida, and 1 was ill. So we had virtually perfect attendance. Most of those attending spoke and participated and made proposals. Every single Republican Senator with whom I have talked since that meeting on Wednesday has told me he or she felt rejuvenated and looks forward to this year. I believe the reason for that is because of the way we conducted the day.

It takes me back to what I just said a moment ago. Unless we are tone-deaf, I think we can hear what the American people are saying to us, especially through the Presidential campaign, which is that they are tired of the way we are doing business in Washington, DC, and they want us to change it. They want us to take the playpen politics and move it off the Senate floor and put it in the national committees or in the nursery where it belongs, and spend our time on big issues that affect our country—maybe in vigorous debates of the kind Senator DODD and Senator KYL would have on the intelligence bill, but spend our time on the serious issues facing our country. Then, after we have had our debate, work across the aisle to get a result.

There are only two reasons to work across the aisle to get a result. One is, it is the right thing to do for our country. This is our job, and that is why they pay us our salaries. That is why they sent us here. No. 2, if you can count, it takes 60 votes to get anything meaningful done in the Senate. So if you want to get a result, you have to work across party lines because neither side has more than 60 votes.

So what we Republicans did on Wednesday was say this: We have heard the talk that this is a Presidential year and we may get nothing done in Congress, and we reject that.

Our leader said—MITCH MCCONNELL—on Tuesday when he spoke:

> Republicans are eager to get to work on the unfinished business from last year. We are determined to address the other issues that have become more pressing or pronounced since we last stood here. We have had a presidential election in this country every 4 years since 1788 we won't use this one as an excuse to put off the people's business for another day.

So there is no excuse for Congress to take this year off, given the serious issues facing our country. We want to change the way Washington does business, and we know how to do it; that is, get down to work on serious issues facing our country, propose specific solutions that solve problems, and then work across the aisle to get a result. We are not here to do bad things to Democrats; we are here to try to do good things for our country.

That was the spirit of our retreat on Wednesday. I believe that is the way most Members on the other side feel. The more of that we do, the better. I would submit the approval rating of the Congress and of Washington, DC, will gradually go up if we were to do that.

Let me say a word about exactly what we talked about on Wednesday—the kind of approach that one can expect from Republican Senators this year.

First, of course, is that we are here and ready to go to work on these specific solutions based on Republican principles, and we are either looking for bipartisan support or already have bipartisan support on many issues. Of course, to begin with, we know Americans are hurting and anxious because of the housing slump, because of gasoline prices, because of rising health care costs, and we are ready to work with the House and the President, across the aisle, to find the appropriate action to take to try to avoid an economic slowdown.

I imagine the Senate will have some of its own views about its proposals when the House brings its proposal here. But we want a result. I, for one, would like to see—and I believe most of my colleagues on this side of the aisle would like to see—a proposal that grows the economy and not the Government. But we will have a debate about that. That is not partisan bickering; that is the Senate in its finest tradition addressing an issue that is central to every single family in this country.

We know we need to intercept the communications of terrorists so we can keep our country safe from attack. We know when we do that, we have to carefully balance each of our right to liberty versus each of our right to security.

Samuel Huntington, the Harvard professor, once wrote—he was President of the American Political Science Association—that most of our politics is about conflicts between principles or among principles with which almost all of us agree. That is important to Americans because what unifies us, other than our common language, is these few principles, security and liberty being two.

Republicans support the Rockefeller-Bond bipartisan proposal which passed 13 to 2 by the Intelligence Committee. We want to make sure those companies which help us defend ourselves aren't penalized for helping to make the country secure, while at the same time protecting individual liberties.

We know there are 47 million Americans who don't have health insurance, and Republican Senators said in our retreat on Wednesday that we are ready to go to work this year to make sure every American is insured. Some say put it off a year. Well, perhaps we can't get it all done in 2008, but we can surely start. Senator BYRD and Senator DEMINT and Senator BENNETT and Senator CORKER, among others, spoke at our retreat on this issue. We would like to get going now. We could begin with the Small Business Health Insurance Act, which would permit small companies to pool their resources and offer more health insurance at a lower cost to their employees. That would be a beginning.

Many of us on the Republican side have sponsored a bipartisan bill—one of two or three that have the same general approach to reforming the Tax Code, to put cash in the hands of American families and individuals so they can afford to buy their own private insurance, putting together four words that usually don't go together: ''Universal access'' and ''private insurance.'' Those are based on principles we Republicans agree with: Free market and equal opportunity. We know on this side of the aisle—and I suspect many over on that side know as well; I know they do—if we don't do something about the runaway growth of Medicare and Medicaid—entitlement spending, in other words—we will bankrupt our country. Every year that we wait to deal with that is a year that makes the solution harder.

So Senator GREGG, at our retreat, talked about his proposal with Senator CONRAD, a Democratic Senator, to create a base-closing-task-force-type task force for the sole purpose of recommending to the Congress a way to control entitlement spending and force an up-or-down vote on that. That is the principle of limited government. That is a principle that most Republicans and a proposal that many Democrats can support.

We know there is a great force in Washington, DC, to spend more money, to issue more regulations and rules, and there are almost no countervailing forces to spend less money, repeal rules, and revise regulations. So Senators DOMENICI, ISAKSON, and SESSIONS, among others, have proposed an idea to change our budgeting and appropriations process from 1 year to 2 years. That may help us get appropriations bills done on time so we can save money in our contracting in the Defense Department and Department of Transportation, for example. But more important to me, and to many on this side of the aisle, it would create a countervailing force of oversight so that every other year we would spend most of our time on oversight, meaning we could review, repeal, and change and improve laws, regulations, and rules that have been in place for a long time.

We want to keep jobs from going overseas, and we believe we know how to do it. Last year, we worked with Senator BINGAMAN and others on the other side to pass the America COMPETES Act. This is an extraordinary response to our challenge to keep our brain power advantage so we can keep our jobs, in competition with China and India. Senator HUTCHISON has been a leader on this issue. She, with Senator BINGAMAN, began the effort to fully fund advanced placement courses so more children could take those courses. So we are ready—many on this side of the aisle—to implement the advanced placement provisions in the America COMPETES Act. That will help 1.5 million children to have those opportunities.

We are ready to implement the provision that would put 10,000 more math and science teachers in our classrooms. Many of us are ready to implement the recommendation that we pin a green card to every single foreign student legally here and who graduates from an American university in science, technology, engineering, or mathematics. Some proposals ought to be bipartisan, but they are not—or at least they weren't. I made one, and we talked about this for a while on Wednesday.

In order to encourage unity in this country, we need a common language. That seems to be common sense. Therefore, we ought to pass a law making it clear that the Federal Government should not be suing the Salvation Army, telling them they cannot require employees to speak English on the job. We got it through the Senate and to the House, where the Speaker stopped it. Now Senator CONRAD has joined in support, as have Senators MCCONNELL, BYRD, LANDRIEU, and NELSON of Nebraska. So now we have a bipartisan approach on another important issue.

We talked about the idea and the problem of the number of rural women in this country who are pregnant and cannot get the proper prenatal health care. OB/GYN doctors are leaving rural areas because runaway malpractice lawsuits are running malpractice insurance over $100,000 a year. So the pregnant women are having to drive 70 miles to Memphis or other big cities to see a doctor and get the prenatal health care they need and to have the baby. We have proposals to stop it in the way Texas and Mississippi did. We invite bipartisan proposals on that.

Mr. President, the Republican agenda will emerge over time. What I would like to say to our colleagues on the other side of the aisle and to the American people is, we want to change the way Washington does business, and we believe we know how. The way is to stand up every single day and week with new specific proposals on real issues and have a debate where one is needed. Let Senator DODD and Senator KYL have a principled argument about security versus liberty. That is in the finest tradition. Let's cut out the playpen politics. Let's don't have that, and let's earn back the confidence of the American people by dealing with specific solutions. That is what you are going to hear from Republican Senators.

No sooner had I heard some encouraging remarks from the majority leader, out comes this release from the Senate leadership and majority leader HARRY REID:

For immediate release. Democratic policy experts discuss President Bush's legacy of broken promises.

That was announced. This is playpen politics. I am sure we do it here sometimes, but I will do my best as the Republican conference chairman to make the political reward for this playpen politics so low that this kind of release and activity is moved into the nursery school where it belongs, over to the national committee where it belongs, whether it is the Democratic playpen or the Republican playpen, and that we devote ourselves to the issues facing our country.

How can we help the economy? How can we help every American be insured? How can we stop the terrorists? How can we implement the America COMPETES Act? Those are the debates we ought to have. I hope that is clear to the American people and to our colleagues. We are looking forward to this year. Republicans are ready for change in the way we do business in Washington. The people of this country are ready for that, too. I look forward to it.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CORNYN. Mr. President, I express my gratitude to Senator ALEXANDER, my colleague from Tennessee, for his comments and for his leadership. We decided it would be helpful to come to the floor and talk a little bit about the retreat that Senator ALEXANDER laid out and our reasons for believing that it is important that we not take the year off just because it is a Presidential election. I think Senator MCCONNELL most recently pointed out that we have had elections in this country every 2 years since 1788. So if we are going to use that as an excuse for not getting things done, we will never get anything done. We have a lot of important issues we need to address, and we will.

The month or so that we were in recess, from the Wednesday before Christmas until we came back the day after Martin Luther King's national holiday, I enjoyed being at home in Texas. As always, I traveled around the State and talked to a lot of people. But I also listened. What I heard from my constituents is the same thing I bet virtually every single Senator heard, and that is that people are sick and tired of the bickering and partisanship. They are sick and tired of seeing Congress not solving problems that only Congress can solve. Frankly, they are beginning to feel more and more like Congress is irrelevant to their daily lives. I think that is what accounts for the historically low approval rating we have seen of the Congress in the last year.

The problem is—and the occupant of the chair knows as well as I do—that I don't think the public differentiates between Republicans and Democrats when they give Congress a low approval rating, by and large. I think it is up to us, working together, to try to elevate that low approval rating by doing what our constituents expect us to do, and that is to work together when we can, without sacrificing our basic principles.

Let me say a word about that. Lest anybody confuse what Senator ALEXANDER and I are saying, that we are somehow taking leave of our principles, that is absolutely not true. In Washington, I usually tell folks that we have Democrats in Texas and we have Republicans in Texas. They are all pretty much conservative by national standards, Washington standards. But the fact is, my constituents expect for me to get something done. But that is not done by sacrificing principles. I do think we have important differences, and I think those should be debated, and then we should vote. We should be held accountable in the next election for our votes and for what we have done or not done.

I think there is an important difference between standing on your principles and then looking for common ground to try to come together and solve problems. I agree with what the Senator from Tennessee said. We all know it is a fact of life in the Senate that you cannot get anything done without bipartisan support. Our 60-vote rule for cloture to close off debate in order to have an up-or-down vote requires it. So why not recognize that, sure, we can say no, no, no, but occasionally I think we ought to look for an opportunity to say yes where it doesn't sacrifice our principles, but it does find common ground to try to get things done on behalf of the American people.

I have constituents who asked me, as recently as last night: Don't you find life in the Senate and in Washington and in the Congress frustrating? Many say I could never do what you do because I would be so frustrated by it. I think there is plenty of opportunity for frustration, if we dwell on that. But I prefer to look at the opportunities for making life better for the American people and for offering solutions on the difficult issues that confront us. To me, that is what I get up and come to work for. That is why I enjoy being in the Senate. I believe it gives me a chance, as one American, to do what I can to try to make life better and to make a difference. It is not about sacrificing principles. It is doing what we said in the preamble to the Constitution when we said:

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, ensure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity. . . .

We said that in 1787, in a document that was ratified by all of the States by 1790. That should be our goal still today—to be true to that statement of principle about what our goals are as a nation.

The Senator from Tennessee did go through a number of concrete proposals and talked about what our alternative will be to the proposals being made on the other side of the aisle. Again, I agree with him, that the American people don't expect us to come here and split the difference on everything in order to come up with an agreement if they believe that outcome is devoid of principle or sacrifices fundamental values. There are differences between the parties. Those differences ought to be reflected in a dignified and civilized and respectful debate that highlights those differences, and then we have a vote on those different points of view. We will either pass legislation or not based on that vote. But I think it will be acting in the greatest tradition of the Senate, and in a way that our constituents back home earnestly wish we would act and, unfortunately, in a way that we have not always acted.

I have to believe all Members of this body want to see our economy as strong as it can possibly be going forward. They want to see that our Nation is secure and our defense remains the best in the world; that all Americans have access to quality health care; that taxpayers not be compelled to foot the bill for wasteful Washington spending. I have to believe that all of our constituents, and indeed all Members of the Senate, believe that we need a sustainable energy policy that allows us to turn away from our over-reliance on imported oil and gas from dangerous parts of the world.

I think, as Senator ALEXANDER pointed out, principled differences on important legislation need to be debated in the Senate and voted on and resolved rather than be left without a solution and unaddressed.

We do have an opportunity, I believe, this new year as we have come back not just to say no, no, no, to every idea that is offered on the floor but to say: Here are our alternative solutions to the problems that confront America.

Mr. President, you will be hearing us on the floor of the Senate on a weekly basis not only addressing legislation offered by the majority—and, of course, it is the majority leader's prerogative to set the agenda to call up bills; we will not be able to do that as Members of the minority—but what you will hear from us is a principled proposal to solve the problems that confront America on each of the big issues this Nation wants us to address and wants us to expend our very best efforts to try to solve.

I am delighted we have seen a sort of renewed enthusiasm for finding solutions in a principled way. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee, the retreat we had I thought was one of the most hopeful retreats I have ever participated in as a Member of the Senate because I think what we saw is a recommitment to try to solve problems, to avoid the partisan bickering and the divisiveness that has resulted in the historically lower approval rating of Congress and which turns off so many of our constituents.

Of course, as we all know, as elected officials, if we do not respond to our employer and try to address the concerns our employer has—and our employers are our constituents—then our employers may look for somebody else to do the job in the next election.

It is up to us to be responsive to those concerns, and I think without sacrificing principles, by staying true to those values we brought with us but looking for common ground. That is the art in our job, and it is more art than science. I have said it before and I will say it again, I think compromise for compromise's sake is overrated because if all compromise means is sacrificing your principles in order to get a problem behind you, I don't think you have done your job. Doing your job means standing on your principles but looking for common ground, consistent with those principles, to solve problems. There is plenty of common ground to find if we will work a little bit harder and a little bit more in earnest to try to find it.

I yield the floor, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS SUBJECT TO THE CALL OF THE CHAIR

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate recess subject to the call of the Chair.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:04 p.m., recessed subject to the call of the Chair and reassembled at 12:07 p.m., when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Ms. KLOBUCHAR).

Mr. BOND. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FISA AMENDMENTS ACT OF 2007—Continued

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Madam President, I ask that the pending amendment be set aside so I may call up amendment No. 3905.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOND. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Madam President, I guess I would like to start by saying I appreciate very much the sentiments that were recently expressed by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Texas, who is my friend who served with me as attorney general at the same time in our respective States, Texas and Rhode Island. I ask them to let me know when that new approach will begin because I am, frankly, not seeing much of it in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act procedures we are going through on the floor. I confess, I am a new Member of this body, and I do not understand why.

We heard Senator DODD, the very distinguished Senator from Connecticut, who has served in this body for 27 years, describe how important this Chamber is and that it is the right of Senators to debate matters, not for the sake of ventilating themselves but toward actually getting a vote on a real amendment on a matter of real significance.

We had one vote on a committee amendment. Not one Senator has achieved getting a vote, and we are on a very short timeframe. I may be new, but I will tell you that in the 1 year I have served, I have presided a great deal. The Presiding Officer, the Senator from Minnesota, and I have both spent a lot of time in that chair. It is a wonderful place to sit, and you get a great view and a great education as to what goes on in the Chamber.

I can recall over and over hearing my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle, as mad as they could be, complaining bitterly because the majority had offered them only 10 amendments on a bill or only 20 amendments on a bill. I cannot get one called up.

Let me first say, this is an important issue. On the one hand, we have to deal with perhaps the greatest danger our country faces at this moment, which is the threat that comes from international terrorism, and we have at the same time to deal with one of the basic principles of our Government—freedom, freedom from, among other things, Government surveillance, unless it is done properly and by the law.

This is not some new idea. It goes back to the Bill of Rights, where the very Founders of this country mandated that before the Government could intrude into the persons, places, houses, and effects of Americans, they had to get permission from a court.

The balance between freedom and security is an important one, a historic one. So this is no minor issue on which to avoid real debate, and the amendments are important ones. The amendments involve the immunity issue about which Senator DODD spoke so passionately. This is a very important issue.

As I see it, we have some cleaning up to do in this body as a result of a real mess the Bush administration left us. They could have gotten a court order, and we know perfectly well that if a court order had been obtained, there would be no issue of immunity for us to address. A company following a court order is protected. End of story. They couldn't be troubled to get a court order to protect these companies they are so concerned about now. But you do not necessarily need a court order. You can actually get a certification from the appropriate Government official using language this Congress has provided, and it will also provide protection to companies that cooperate in Government surveillance, as long as they have been notified properly through the certification process.

One would think the litigation would be over, if that certification process had been complied with. It would be a slam dunk. Which raises the logical conclusion that for some reason, the Government did not comply with the certification process. I don't know why they did that. I don't know if anybody else knows why they did that. It could be being obtuse and stubborn and insisting it had to be done under the President's unitary article II authority that they purposefully, deliberately failed to follow the certification process to prove that point they wanted to prove.

If that is the case, they have walked these phone companies into all this concern we now have to address for no purpose whatsoever. But now we do have to address the problem. No matter how they got into it, we have this problem to address, and it is not an easy problem.

One side says: Well, blanket immunity. Well, that is fine, but you are taking away rights and due process of people who are in court right now. A judge has looked at this case and he didn't throw it out. There is nothing to suggest that the litigation going on right now is not entirely legitimate. So if we do that, we are taking away real rights of real Americans that are currently in play right now before a court.

I don't know of a time the Congress has ever done that. As a former prosecutor, like the Presiding Officer, the very notion that it is the legislature's job to go into ongoing legitimate litigation and make decisions about who should win and who should lose seems to me a spectacular trespass over the doctrine of separation of powers. I hope my colleagues in this body who are in the Federalist Society would be concerned about this separation of powers.

On the other hand, we could strip the legislation of its immunity entirely and leave the companies in the litigation. That is not a great solution either. There is a problem with that solution. The problem with that solution is that the Bush administration has bound and gagged the company defendants—instructed them they may not defend themselves. So here you have legitimate American corporations in legitimate litigation being told by the Government that they may not speak, they may not answer, they may not defend themselves. That doesn't seem like a great outcome either.

Well, an amendment I wish to offer, the one I just tried to call up, proposes a potential solution. If the Government is going to tell them they can't defend themselves, then in all decency shouldn't the Government step in for them and say: OK, we are going to bind you and we are going to gag you in this ring of litigation combat, but we are going to step in for you and not leave you unable to defend yourself? Isn't that the most decent, basic thing you could expect the Government to do? That is what this amendment would do. It would substitute the Government for the defendant corporations that the Government has bound and gagged in this litigation—muzzled.

It would do another thing: It would make sure that a court decided that these companies had in fact acted in good faith before they were given that relief. They have told us they have acted in good faith, but we are a legislature. Good faith is a finding the courts make. We are not judges. We haven't heard from all sides. We haven't had hearings, such as a court would have to get to the bottom of this.

There is an easy way to do it. You let the FISA Court, which has the secrecy necessary to get to the bottom of this, make the determination, the fundamental determination: Did these companies, in fact, act in good faith? That is a basic point of entry. We have all assumed it to be true, but it is not our job as Members of Congress to decide on the good faith of an individual litigant in a matter that is before a court.

I think this is a very legitimate amendment. It may not be germane postcloture. It may never come up as a result of this. Maybe it is just the new Senator. Poor kid, all this work on these bills. Doesn't he know the merits don't matter around here? Maybe it is a situation related to me not knowing my way around here yet. But I don't think so. Because Senator FEINSTEIN, who has been here for a very long time, who is very distinguished, who is one of the most bipartisan Senators in this Chamber, if not the most bipartisan Senator in this Chamber, has a very similar piece of legislation. She has taken the good faith test in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and picked it out as a separate, solitary piece of legislation, and she is pursuing that. That amendment can't be called up either.

You could say: Well, maybe it is because I am a Democrat; they are shutting down all the Democrats. But my amendment is cosponsored by ARLEN SPECTER, the very distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, who has been the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. It is the Specter-Whitehouse amendment. I don't see how you could have a better credential, a better bipartisan credential than to have the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee as the cosponsor of the amendment. And yet we can't call it up, and because of the cloture motion that has been filed, it may never be called up.

I think we are doing serious work, and I think we should get votes on these amendments. I know some of my colleagues have said: Well, you should defer to the committee bill. The committee bill was so good, it was bipartisan, it passed 13 to 2. Well, I was in that committee. Yes, it passed 13 to 2, but an awful lot of us said in our remarks on that bill that we passed it out of that committee in order to work on it further in the Judiciary Committee and in order to move amendments on the floor. It did not pass with a 13-to-2 vote of Senators saying this is ready to go to the President; this is ready to clear the Senate. It passed on a 13-to-2 vote of Senators who knew that the bill was going to the Judiciary Committee and who knew that the bill was going to the floor and had reason to expect the ordinary courtesies of this body to be able to offer amendments would be honored.

In fact, the amendment I tried to offer yesterday that was objected to, that I can't call up, I raised in the Intelligence Committee. I was told by the executive branch officials there—and I should say that throughout this process I hope nobody would challenge how carefully my office has worked with the administration to get these things right, to get technical language worked through properly—I was told by the executive branch officials that the way I had written the amendment caused technical difficulties. So I didn't pursue it in the Intelligence Committee. I withdrew it, noting that we would work through the technical difficulties and then bring it up again later on.

Nobody said then, oh, Senator WHITEHOUSE, there is going to be no later on; the committee vote is all you will get. Nobody said that. Because that would violate the history and traditions of the Senate, because it would be wrong, and because it wasn't the program. It wasn't the plan at the time. I feel it has been represented to me that these amendments would be voted on, and I feel that representation has been dishonored by the procedure we are in right now.

I want to read something. I prepared remarks in the event that this amendment was going to go in. Of course, I thought it was going to go in. I had the Republican former chairman of the Judiciary Committee as a cosponsor and it addresses the biggest question in this legislation. It provides a potential resolution of the conflict between the two arguments. Why on Earth would it not be something that I would be able to exercise my traditional right to raise on the floor? So I planned ahead and I wrote remarks for that occasion. Here is what I wrote at the very end of the remarks.

Madam President, whether this amendment passes or fails, I would like to say that it is the product of a truly commendable process. Everybody here knows the old saw that the making of law is like the making of sausage. You might like the results, but you don't want to see what goes into making it. Not so here. This amendment and Senator Feinstein's are the results of many hours of thoughtful, bipartisan consideration, hard work by Senators and their staffs, reasoned and respectful committee debate, and what I am sure will be thorough debate on the floor.

Those are the remarks I wrote. And I have to say right now, those words taste like ashes in my mouth. I hope the spirit that Senator ALEXANDER and Senator CORNYN brought to the floor a moment ago will begin to animate the FISA debate, and that legitimate—and I believe my Republican colleagues will concede these are legitimate—and sincere—and I believe my Republican colleagues will concede these are sincere—and important amendments have a chance to be raised and debated and voted on here on the floor of the Senate.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. BOND. Madam President, first, I express my admiration for the Senator from Rhode Island. The hard work he has put in on the Senate Intelligence Committee and the experience he brings to that committee is very important. We have worked with him on many issues that we were able to accomplish in the committee. I agree with his assertion that we need to balance freedom and security. That is one of the heavy responsibilities we have in the Senate Intelligence Committee.

He talks about an amendment he has presented on a bipartisan basis, and he and his Republican cosponsor feel very strongly about it. I would be happy at the appropriate time to have debate and a vote on this very important measure. But I also happen to agree with the Senate majority leader, who said back in December that the issues before us on this FISA bill are so important that we must ensure they have a 60-vote margin for passage, the same vote that would have to occur if we were to overcome a filibuster. That will ensure that there will be no filibuster of the bill.

We filed cloture to make sure we could go forward with the bill. We are waiting to see how that works out. But the measures, as I have stated earlier—and the proponent of this amendment had the distinct misfortune to be in the chair when I addressed this earlier today—but for my colleagues, I would say that we have before us a very carefully crafted bipartisan compromise to improve the FISA, Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, significantly and to ensure that it can work to keep our country safe.

Passing these measures on a 60-vote margin is nothing new. When I brought the Protect America Act to the floor on August 3, I brought it on an agreement that we had to have 60 votes to pass it, because it is a very important bill. And I assume that this bill, which I hope will pass, will have to pass with 60 votes.

I think it is a reasonable proposition to say that a 60-vote threshold must be achieved to ensure there is bipartisan agreement on something that is this important to our security and our freedom.

Now, my colleague raised the question about why the immediate interception of foreign intelligence did not go forward right after 9/11, when the President determined there must be interception of telephone and other electronic transmissions coming from foreign terrorists abroad into the United States.

I am told the administration met with the Gang of 8, leaders of the House and Senate and the House and Senate Intelligence Committees. They were faced with the problems that arose when the court order occurred in the spring of last year, saying the existing FISA law did not permit interception of communications coming through the way—coming the way by which they now come, through cable and wire.

Previously, collections occurred routinely against foreign sources by radio wave. And there were minimization procedures. But the FISA Court was not involved. Because of the change in technology, as the order of the court indicated last spring, FISA applied to collection of most of the foreign terrorist communications, whether they were coming into the United States or into other areas.

We were advised by the commanding general, Special Operations Command General McCrystal, that the limitations of FISA in April and May and June and July prevented our intelligence authorities from collecting vital signals information on communications among terrorists in the battlefield, putting our troops at risk.

He begged and pleaded to get it done. Well, despite the begging and pleading to get it done, you have seen how long it takes us to get FISA changed. As I understand the conversations held in the aftermath of 9/11, when we knew there were other attacks being planned and we needed to get control of them, there was general agreement among the parties, legislative and executive, that we could not afford to try to take the time to try to change FISA, to make it work with the new electronic signals means of communication in time to stop further terrorist attacks.

How long has it taken to get FISA passed? Well, the Director of National Intelligence sent up a bill in April pointing out that the old FISA law did not permit collection of foreign signals intelligence from known terrorist targets abroad. He sent it up in April. He testified before our committee in May. He came to the Senate and had a hearing in our classified room telling leaders of both parties how important and how sensitive it was.

Another month passed. Nothing happened. He came back with a short-term extension that had to have a 6-month sunset on it. We passed that. We passed that with a 60-vote margin. That has become standard for any controversial and important legislation coming before this body, which is applied not only in FISA but many other circumstances.

So we got a 6-month extension. Now, we are still debating whether to have a slightly longer extension of the FISA bill. We reported the bill on a bipartisan 13-to-2 majority in October. It sat for 2 months. The majority leader tried to bring it up, but he was filibustered from bringing it up.

We are now at the end of January, when the Protect America Act expires on February 1. We need to move forward to get this bill passed. We need to move forward as promptly as we can. But we need to move forward on the same ground rules by which other major legislation and which the Protect America Act came to the floor; that is, a 60-vote margin to ensure there is bipartisan agreement on something as important as the freedom and security framed by the FISA debate.

Let me add a word or two about the FISA Court. I had thought the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island was going to offer an amendment on assessing compliance and toss that to the FISA Court. Well, the FISA Court, or FISC as we call it, was created in 1978 to issue orders for domestic surveillance on particular targets.

Congress specifically left foreign surveillance activities to the executive branch and to the intelligence community. The FISA Court, they are article III judges who are called in from time to time to make the judgments of probable cause for issuing warrants. They have expertise in issuing warrants for surveillance on a domestic basis.

The bill before us gives them that responsibility, as did the other FISA, the old FISA, for issuing those orders for people or facilities in the United States. The old one said ''facilities in the United States.''

Well, that court is not set up to deal with foreign intelligence surveillance. As I quoted yesterday, the court's own words said—and this is the December 11, In re: Motion for Court Records. The court stated that: The FISA Court judges are not expected to or desire to become experts in foreign intelligence activities and do not make substantive judgments on the propriety or need for a particular surveillance. Even if a typical FISA judge has more expertise in national security matters than a typical district court judge, that expertise would still not equal that of the executive branch which is constitutionally entrusted with protecting national security.

So I expect we will get to the point where we will be debating the distinguished Senator's assessing compliance amendment. But he has brought today the substitution amendment.

I have already explained why we could not get through signals collection immediately after 9/11 if we had gone to the old FISA. How many months would it have taken? Well, the leaders who apparently spoke with the intelligence community and the White House said they did not want to highlight the fact that we were going to be listening in and they did not think it would work quickly.

The intelligence committee has carefully assessed the orders which were given to the telecommunications carriers which may or may not have participated in the Terrorist Surveillance Program. And they were based, yes, they were based largely on article II.

The FISC has already indicated nothing Congress can do can extinguish the President's authority under article II, but Congress also passed the authorization for use of military force, which was a counterbalance in the weighing of the constitutional arguments of article II with the provisions of the FISA law.

I have reviewed the Attorney General's findings, the Department of Justice findings. I have read the authorizations and the directives. It is clear to me, and clear to others, most of the others who have reviewed it, they were clearly acting under the color of law.

I happen to think they were right. You can make an argument that maybe they were not right. But the carriers that may have participated were not in a position to challenge those. They got a lawful order from the head of the intelligence community, based on authorization from the President, in a manner cleared by the Department of Justice. Under those circumstances, I believe it would not only have been unpatriotic, but it would have been willful for the carriers to refuse to participate. Yet they are being sued.

I think the suits are designed to cripple our intelligence community. There are not going to be significant judgments awarded no matter what they say because anybody who was intercepted would have to come in to court and say they were intercepted and prove harm. I really question whether they can do that. But under the substitution argument, the disaster to our intelligence operations is clear, as is the damage to the reputation and the business of any carriers which may have participated.

Back in 2006, right after the disclosure of this and the terrorist finance tracking measure, when the newspapers carried it, television carried it, terrorist leaders—very bright people—abroad learned of it, communicated about it on their own communications, and those communications, I was told in the field, went down significantly.

So I asked General Hayden, at his confirmation hearing to be head of CIA, how badly these disclosures hurt us. And he said at the time that we are applying the Darwinian theory to terrorists; we are only capturing dummies. The more we disclose about the workings of our intelligence intercept capabilities, the more those whom we would target know how to avoid them. And they are taking steps; they know too much about it. Any further disclosures would further complicate and damage the collection capabilities of our intelligence community.

Moreover, the damage to the reputation of the carriers would be significant. The damage would occur likely in exposing the carriers—their employees and their facilities—to terrorist activities or vigilante activities. It would destroy their business reputation, cause untold harm in the United States, and probably effectively curtail their ability to operate overseas. If they are put out of operation or if they are limited in their operations, then the intelligence community loses a substantial means of acquiring the intelligence we need.

So when this bill comes up—I expect it will come up, but I believe it must come up under a 60-vote rule or we are going to go through the normal process of getting to 60 votes, and we will never get anywhere. I think both sides of the aisle should recognize that. I will be happy to make these arguments.

I know my colleague from Rhode Island is a very skilled lawyer, a very effective debater. He will present his arguments, I will present my arguments, and there will be others who will join with us. So while I would love to get on with the debate and votes, we are not going to go there until we resolve the question of whether there is a 60-vote margin.

So I thank the Chair, and I thank my colleague from Rhode Island.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Madam President, I appreciate very much the arguments made by the very distinguished Senator from Missouri, who is also the vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee and possesses great experience in this area. My point, though, is that all these arguments are for naught if the simple courtesy of a Senator being allowed to vote on his amendment is not honored.

This particular amendment being nongermane postcloture means it may very well be squeezed out by the procedural devices the Republican leader has applied. So my simple question is, if I may ask it through the Chair to the distinguished Senator from Missouri, the Republican manager of this bill, can we assure Senator SPECTER and myself that this amendment will, at the appropriate time in this legislation, receive a vote?

Mr. BOND. Madam President, I am happy to respond as soon as we go back to the normal means of proceeding on FISA matters, establishing a 60-vote threshold, which is the standard I had to meet to bring the Protect America Act to the floor. I would certainly expect that his amendment would be brought up, fully discussed, and debated. This is one of the major issues we have to decide. But we have to decide it on a 60-vote point of order.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BOND. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to a period of morning business with Senators permitted to speak for up to 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from North Dakota.

FISA

Mr. DORGAN. Madam President, we are talking about FISA we use a lot of acronyms in Washington, DC, unfortunately—the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. It is a complicated subject, and one, if people have been watching the debate, that is also controversial. There is a lot of passion about this subject. We have people standing up and saying: None of this should be disclosed. We should not be talking about this. This is about the ability to protect our country against terrorists. Of course, we have to listen into communications and intercept communications. It is the only way to find out if there are terrorist acts being plotted by terrorist groups, and so on. There is that kind of thing.

There are concerns on the other side by people who say: Wait a second. There is something called a Constitution in this country. There is a right to privacy, a right to expect that the Government will not be spying on American citizens without cause.

This is a very controversial and difficult subject. Frankly, nearly everyone, with the possible exception of the chairman and ranking member or maybe one or two others on the Intelligence Committee, knows very little about that which we are discussing.

Let me put up a photograph of a door. This is a door in San Francisco, CA, a rather unremarkable photograph of a door. This is a door that is in AT&T's central offices in San Francisco. A courageous employee of AT&T named Mark Klein, who had been with the company for 22 years, blew the whistle on what was happening behind this door. According to Mark Klein, the National Security Agency had connected fiber optic cables to AT&T's circuits through which the National Security Agency could essentially monitor all of the data crossing the Internet. Here is what Mr. Klein had to say went on behind this door:

> It appears the [National Security Agency] is capable of conducting what amounts to vacuum-cleaner surveillance of all the data crossing the Internet—whether that be people's e-mail, web surfing, or any other data.

The description of what was happening at this one telephone company in this one location in San Francisco was this: the intercepting of communications at the AT&T Folsom Street facility, millions, perhaps billions of communications from ordinary Americans coming into and through the facility, which would normally have been the case for a telephone company, and a splitter being used, according to the discussion by Mark Klein, splitting off all of this conversation into an NSA-controlled room, to be eventually evaluated with sophisticated programming, and then going back out in order to complete the communication. So you have effectively a copy of everything that is happening going through with a splitter to a secret room.

When this became public, when a whistleblower working for the company said, here is what is happening, there was an unbelievable outcry on both sides. Some people said: What on Earth is happening? We have secret rooms in which the National Security Agency is running all this data and all this information through and spying on American citizens? Others said: What is going on? Who on Earth would have decided they should disclose this publicly? They are going to alert the terrorists to what we are doing. We had both sides aghast that this was disclosed. It is important to say that, initially, almost no one in an official capacity was willing to admit to this. Finally, it was admitted, yes, there was a program. The President said: Yes, there is a program—speaking, apparently, of just this program; we don't know of other programs that exist or may exist, but this program existed without our knowledge. The President indicated this program existed because we are going after the bad guys, and we have a right to do that. And we did this program because the process that had been set up because of abuses with respect to eavesdropping and spying on American citizens decades ago, that process was way too cumbersome, took far too much time, and we needed to streamline that. That is a paraphrase. But there was an admission that this program existed and no additional legal authority needed to empower the President to do it.

So that is where we are. Most of us don't know the full extent of this program at all. In fact, my understanding is that rooms like this exist in other parts of the country with other telephone companies where splitters are used to move data to separate rooms and data is evaluated.

This whole process comes from several decades ago when something called the FISA Court was set up, a court to evaluate the questions about when it is legal and appropriate and when the Government is able to intercept communications. The FISA Court was established for the very purpose of trying to make the judgment about when it is appropriate to go after the bad guys and how to protect our civil liberties at the same time.

The FISA Court was an outgrowth of concern by the Congress when we discovered that there was a time in this country when we had the National Security Agency running secret projects called Shamrock and Minaret to gather both international communications and also domestic communications. Project Shamrock actually started during the Second World War when major communications companies of the day gave the Federal Government access to all of their international traffic. One can imagine, in the fight against the Nazis and the Japanese Imperial Army, the desire for international communications to evaluate things that might threaten this country's security. But the Shamrock program then, as we know, changed over time.

At first the goal was to intercept international telegrams relating to foreign targets. Then, soon the Government began to intercept telegrams of U.S. citizens. By the time there were hearings held in the Congress, the National Security Agency was intercepting and analyzing about 150,000 messages per month.

Data from Project Shamrock was then used for another project code named Project Minaret, which we now know spied on perceived political opponents of the then-administration of Richard Nixon. Under this program the NSA added Vietnam war protesters to its watch list. After there was a march on the Pentagon, the Army requested that they add antiwar protesters. The list included people such as folk singer Joan Baez and civil rights leader Dr.

Martin Luther King, Jr. We just celebrated within the week the Federal holiday celebrating the birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr. Yet it was not too many decades ago that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was under surveillance by his own Government.

The Congress passed its findings, when it did investigative hearings, and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act created the FISA Court.

Here is the experience with the FISA Courts. Between 1975 and 2006, there were 2,990 warrants issued by the FISA Court. Only five were denied. What that suggests is that it is not too difficult to get approval by the FISA Court for surveillance. But the President and Mr. McConnell, the head of our intelligence agency, have indicated that there has been a problem.

For example, Mr. McConnell cited the capture of three American soldiers who were later killed in Iraq. Right after they were captured there was a period of time when it was critically important to be able to intercept communications in Iraq, and they were encumbered at a time when it was critical to find out who held these soldiers.

That is not accurate, and the head of intelligence would have known that. I don't know why he represented that. There is a period of time when in an emergency situation, you can begin surveillance without having to go to FISA. You have to go FISA after that period of time, but you are given an opportunity for emergency surveillance even before you get the approval or even before you go to the FISA Court.

What we have learned, however, through all of this process is from a December 2005 report in the newspapers. President Bush had authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without warrants inside the United States which bypassed the entire FISA Court system. It turns out that most of the large telephone companies in this country had gone along with the administration's request for that activity.

We are told that the administration, Attorney General Gonzales, and others furnished the telephone companies with some sort of letter, a certification of sorts. We don't know what that letter was, however, because the administration, citing the State Secrets Act, refuses to allow that to be disclosed.

I think if they provide certification to a telephone company—and the telephone company relies on that—by officers of the Federal Government, in good faith, let's have that disclosed. Why should we wonder about the actions of a telephone company? If, in fact, you have an Attorney General of the United States who is certifying, let's find out what this administration did. Let's find out how they did it. Let's not have them tell us you cannot even see what was provided to a telephone company in terms of certification. That, in my judgment, does not pass the red face test.

I hope very much we will begin to learn at some point what this administration has done, when they did it, and what the consequences of it are. This issue of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act has become a political football by this administration. The last time we debated this, some while ago, it was quite clear that the politics of it were viewed as wonderful politics by the other side and by the White House. But this ought not be about politics at all. This ought to be about two issues, both of which are critically important: One is protecting this country's interests, yes, giving us a chance to make sure we understand what the terrorists are doing, how to foil terrorist attempts to injure this country—it is about that; and that is very important—but it is also about civil liberties and protecting the rights of the American people at the same time.

We thought we had done that by putting together the FISA Court. We thought we had done that by establishing a procedure that needed to be followed. We now understand the President, with his lawyers, says those laws do not matter. There is in the Constitution, they say, something about the powers of the Commander in Chief, and he can do whatever he wants. That is a pretty dangerous interpretation of the U.S. Constitution.

We debate this in so much ignorance because almost no one knows what this administration has done, and they are preventing us from knowing as much as we should know, in most cases, by claiming protection under the State Secrets Act, and not even allowing the release of the letter that was provided to the telephone companies that cooperated that describes to them the legal authority for doing so.

I think there is much to be learned here, much we need to know. I think it is very important, as we reach an agreement on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act—and we should because it is an important circumstance by which we need, in certain cases, when we believe there is information being passed from terrorist to terrorist, and so on—if those communications are being run through this country, we need to be able to intercept and interpret what is happening—but it is critically important we not allow a kind of an approach to this where there is no oversight, there is no check.

We have a government of checks and balances. What the President and his people seem to be saying to us is: We are not interested in checks and balances. We have the authority in the Constitution, as we interpret it, and that means it exceeds every law you can pass. We are going to do what we want to do. And if you don't like it, tough luck. And if you don't like it, by the way, what we will say to the American people is you are not willing to stand up for the security of this country.

It is outrageous. It is dragging this issue smack-dab in the middle of their little political balloon. But this is a much more important process than that. We need to do this, and we need to get it right in order to protect America. We need to do this, and we need to get it right in order to protect the interests of the American people as well—and that interest of privacy and that interest of making sure that ''big brother government'' is not running all of your telephone calls and all of your e-mails and all of your information through its drift net to find out what you are saying and what you are doing and who you are talking to.

That is not what I understand to be the best interests of this country or the guarantees that exist in the Constitution for the American people. That is why this is worth an important controversy and an important fight. It is why it is for us to take enough time to get it right. This is a big issue. We do a lot of things on the floor of the Senate that are not so big—not big issues. They are smaller issues in consequence. This issue is about freedom and liberty and the guarantees given the American people in the Constitution. It is about whether there is a check on Presidential power that assumes they have the power that exceeds all other laws. If we do not have that kind of check and balance in this Government, then we have bigger problems than I thought.

So I only wanted to say, with respect to this issue, we do not know much about it. We know at this point that behind this door, as shown on this chart—behind this door—exists information split off what is called a splitter from the main line. Massive amounts of information come into it—in this case, it was AT&T; it could have been other telephone companies—it is split off, and then all of it is evaluated to find out: Is there something there that is suspicious? It is not the way America has ever worked, and not the way it should work.

So the more we know, I think the more we will be able to better understand how to do two things at once: protect our country against terrorists, and protect the civil liberties of the American people. Both are important. At least there is one group of people in this political system of ours that believes the first is far more important than the second. They are wrong. They are both important, and both worth standing up for.

STIMULUS PACKAGE

Mr. DORGAN. Madam President, I want to talk for a few moments about the so-called stimulus package we are assembling to help our economy. What

I want to say, first of all, is we have an economy that is a remarkable engine. This little spot on the planet—the United States of America—is quite an unbelievable economic engine. It has provided bounties and benefits to a group of people that exceed that provided to almost anybody else on this planet.

But we have run into some real problems. We now find ourselves in the year 2008 where we have a stock market that is wildly gyrating up and down. We see these dramatic swings in the stock market. That is a reflection of a substantial amount of concern and nervousness about what is happening in the economy and where we are heading.

In the last several decades we have morphed into a global economy. I have never questioned that. I have always questioned why the rules have not kept up. But the global economy is a different kind of economy for us. We are now told by those who wanted to create their own set of rules that the American people should compete with folks who work in Shenzhen, China, for 20 and 30 cents an hour making bicycles and little red wagons. There is downward pressure on income in this country. There is great concern by the American people about the loss of jobs and the loss of benefits. So there is a lot happening that is of great concern.

In addition to these dramatic yo-yo swings in the stock market that reflect widespread concern about the economy—we have at the same time some real fundamental structural problems in the economy. Because it appears the economy is now weak, we have more people unemployed. We have fewer housing starts. We have a whole range of issues that demonstrate a serious economic problem: A slowdown certainly, a recession very likely. Because of that, we are told there needs to be some short-term stimulus to provide a spark to help crank up this economy again.

Well, we always talk about that in an economic slowdown. We have put economic stabilizers in place over a long period of time—two to three to four decades—that have been very helpful in moderating the recessions we have had. Normally speaking, the recessions we have had have been shallower recessions because of economic stabilizers that have been put in place. But that does not mean you will not ever have recessions.

We might be in a recession now. So the Federal Reserve Board decided, earlier this week, cuts interest rates by 75 basis points. That was a big, bold, dramatic move by the Fed. These people wear gray suits and do not do anything very boldly, but this week they decided: Man, we are going to do something bold—so three-quarters of a percent interest rate cut.

It is expected, then, in monetary policy—having been moved by the Fed earlier this week—in fiscal policy our responsibility in Congress is to do something as well. So we in the Congress are putting together a fiscal policy approach. That approach is a stimulus package.

Well, the stimulus package would typically be some sort of tax rebate to people, perhaps some investment tax incentives to stimulate capital acquisition by businesses.

The House and the White House have moved now to agree on something that is going to come to us from the House of Representatives. I think that is good news. It has been a long time since we have seen much cooperation from the White House. I think it is good news this week. The Fed moved. The White House is interested in an agreement. So we are going to have a stimulus package. I think the sooner the better. We need to tell the American people we are moving. I also want to say this about a stimulus package. I think there are two steps to it. One is shorter term—rebates for individuals, incentives for business investments, and so on—but, second, and I think very important, is to understand one of the quick ways to put people back to work and also to invest in America's future, to help build America, is in infrastructure: roads and bridges and dams and all the things that have been deteriorating.

We are so far behind in infrastructure. If we are going to be a world class economic power, we need to invest in infrastructure. We can do that and should do that as also part of a second step in a package to stimulate this economy.

Having said that, let me make a couple other points. If all we do is genuflect about a stimulus package, and then we step back and say, ''Well, we are out of breath now. We have done that''—if that is all we do, this country is in deep trouble.

Let me describe what I think the significant causes of our trouble are. No. 1, we have a President who says, through his Vice President: Deficits don't matter. Well, of course he is wrong.

Paul O'Neill, the first Secretary of the Treasury under the Bush administration, and one of the real straight shooters in this town—he's a guy I liked; he said it the way he felt it and thought it, and you could believe him—Paul O'Neill, conservative Republican Secretary of the Treasury—well, he got fired. Do you know why he got fired? Because DICK CHENEY came into his office and, according to the things I have read, said: Deficits don't matter. Don't you understand? Deficits don't matter.

Well, Paul O'Neill did not believe that for a minute. Because he did not believe that, he was not part of the team, and he got fired.

Deficits do matter. This administration inherited a budget surplus of well over $200 billion a year and has turned it around into a huge budget deficit. This administration has added over $3 trillion to the debt. It ran into a recession, a terrorist attack, a war in Afghanistan, a war in Iraq, and now a subprime loan scandal.

Some of us stood on the floor of the Senate and said: Mr. President, don't push this issue of giving huge tax cuts on expected surpluses that are going to occur but have not yet occurred. What if something happens? The President said: Not on your life. We are going forward with my plan.

He pushed it through this Congress. I did not support it. But the result was big budget surpluses were turned into record budget deficits, because now we had all these unexpected circumstances happen.

Well, the President said: We are going to fight a war, but we are going to send soldiers to Iraq and Afghanistan and we are not going to pay for it. We are going to send soldiers abroad to fight, but we are not going to ask anybody to pay for it. We will add it to the debt. So a little over two-thirds of a trillion dollars has been added to the Federal debt.

Last year, the President sent us a request saying: I want $196 billion over and above that which I have asked for the Defense Department as an emergency. I want none of it paid for, and I want it now: $196 billion. That is $16 billion a month, $4 billion a week, and I don't want to pay for any of it, he said.

This is a reckless fiscal policy that has been running this country into a ditch. Now you add to that fiscal policy from this administration—which is supposed to be a conservative administration—you add to that the trade deficit. The trade deficit is $2 billion a day, every single day, 7 days a week. Every single day, we import $2 billion more than we export—over $700 billion a year in trade deficit.

We are not only shipping our money overseas, which then gives the Chinese and the Japanese the opportunity and responsibility to finance our debt, but they then begin to buy a fair amount of our country. We have just seen it in recent weeks. Citigroup went to Singapore for $12.5 billion. GE Plastics got $11.6 billion from the Saudis. Dow Chemical got $9.5 billion from Kuwait. Citigroup needed more money; they got $7.5 billion from United Arab Emirates. Where do you think they got this money? They got it from us, with these huge trade deficits. So we have a trade deficit that is well above $700 billion a year.

I know the administration says: Well, the budget deficit is $200 billion, $300 billion. That is not true at all. It is if you take away the Social Security surplus and misuse it, and continue with fiscal policies that are not paid for. We are going to add roughly $600 billion to the federal debt in this fiscal year. So $600 billion in budget deficit, $700 billion in trade deficit, and you are talking $1.3 trillion or roughly 10 percent of the economy this country will borrower in 1 year. That is unbelievable. There are people who are drunk who think they are invisible. Well, I am not suggesting we are drunk here in the Congress. However, I am saying that both the President and the Congress seem to think we are invisible in terms of our public policies. The rest of the world sees what is happening—that our trade deficit and budget policies are way out of control.

Now add to those two things one other element: The subprime housing loan scandal that comes because federal regulators were asleep and too cozy because they didn't want to regulate those they were supposed to regulate. So we had a bunch of high flyers and hot shots who took off—many of them have now been fired but went out the door with $100 million or $200 million, and what they were doing was providing and selling, through high pressure sales techniques, mortgage loans to people who could never possibly repay them. The refrain—if you saw it on your television set or heard it on your car radio, as many people did—you wondered: How could this be? The refrain on the television advertising was hey, you know something? If you have bad credit, come to us. If you have filed bankruptcy, come to us. If you can't make your house payments, come to us. We have a loan for you. Do you want to cut your loan payment every month? Do you have bad credit? Come to us. We want to give you a loan. All over this country you heard that sort of refrain. Well, guess what: This was mortgage brokers. It was mortgage banks. It was a bunch of high-flying folks who not only were putting out bad mortgages, but then they were doing as they did in the old meat-packing plants when they put sawdust in sausage. You took bad mortgages and good ones, mixed them up, put them in a case and sliced them and securitized it all and put them all in hedge funds. Soon nobody knew what they had, but they were grinning from ear to ear because they had high returns, high yields, and high fees on the origination of these securities. It turns out a lot of them were bad securities and nobody even knows who has them. Nobody knows which ones are bad. But 3 years after the loan is put out and the interest rate is reset, we discover that loans were given to people who couldn't possibly pay them. Then we discover that those who purchased them and those who sold them can no longer claim they are good assets. They file for bankruptcy. So we have all of this going on.

Now, there is another thing that is happening at exactly the same time and is also causing great danger to our economy. Even as this subprime loan mortgage scandal is happening, we have the growth of hedge funds and derivatives, and they too are outside of the purview of regulators. With respect to the subprime mortgage loans, we had regulators who were asleep or dead from the neck up. They wanted to serve here, but didn't like Government, and didn't want to do anything. That is what happened there. On hedge funds, Senator FEINSTEIN and I and others have been on the floor for years saying: We have to regulate hedge funds. We have to understand what is happening with derivatives.

Well, guess what. If you go into a casino in Las Vegas, you are going to lose what is in your back pocket in most cases. Well, sometimes you might be able to sign for a loan, but in most cases you only lose that which you have. Hedge funds are unregulated, No. 1, and, No. 2, have unbelievable amounts of leverage, unbelievable borrowing.

A reasonably new derivative called credit default swaps have a notional amount of $43 trillion. I said $26 trillion earlier this week. That was the end of 2006. In 2007, the notional amount of credit default swaps, which most people would believe to be a foreign language, was $43 trillion. It is not a foreign language at all. These are sophisticated financial instruments that represent an unbelievable amount of speculation that in my judgment put this country's economy at great risk.

So we have budget deficits that are way out of control, and a trade deficit that is an outrage. We also have regulators who have no interest in regulating, allowing the subprime mortgage loan scandal, and hedge funds that we have had an aggressive fight on the floor about. We have the administration and others who are not interested in having any regulation of hedge funds, are unconcerned about what kind of liability exists with derivatives, and ignore the problem of this unbelievable leverage. If we don't deal with those four areas, we can stimulate forever. We can come here in the morning and stimulate every day on the floor of the Senate, if you like. It is not going to solve what is wrong with this country. If you don't put the foundation in order, if you don't lay the bricks right in the foundation, there is no structure you can build above it that is going to withstand the kind of problems that exist internally in this economy.

This country is too good a country for us to decide not to care about fixing these problems. President Bush came to the Congress and said: I am a conservative. Well, there is nothing conservative about an administration that runs up this sort of red ink. We are drowning in red ink. There is nothing conservative about an administration that has regulators who have decided they don't have any interest in regulating. It doesn't matter what the subject is: unsafe toys from China, you name it. We have regulators who are apparently collecting a Government paycheck and don't have the foggiest interest in regulating. That is how the scandal of subprime mortgage loans has happened and that has caused great injury to our country. It is also what is happening as a result of those who are preventing us from knowing what is going on with hedge funds and derivatives, which can cause a much greater level of damage than even the subprime mortgage loan scandal.

As I said, most Americans wouldn't have heard or know very little about credit default swaps and would hardly know what it means. These numbers are in the trillions. Hedge funds are about $1.2 trillion of our economy. People say: Well, that is not so much. Gosh, there is $9 trillion in mutual funds, there is roughly $40 trillion of stocks and bonds out there. Mr. President, $1.2 trillion in hedge funds. Hedge funds conduct one-half of the daily trades on the New York Stock Exchange. Think of that. One-half of the trades by hedge funds. In addition to the $1.2 trillion, you have unbelievable amounts of leverage.

So I think we face a lot of big challenges. If I didn't have great hope for the future, I wouldn't want to get up and come to work in the morning. But I have a great reservoir of hope. I believe we can fix these things. But we need leadership from the White House. We need to work together here. We need to understand that it is not just about stimulating a short-term response; this is about fixing the foundation and setting things right. I think it was Thomas Wolf who talked about an indestructible belief, a quenchless hope, a boundless optimism. I have all of that. But we have to start now and understand what we need to do to put this country back on track toward a better and brighter future, one that grows and provides opportunities for all Americans.

Madam President, I yield the floor, and I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Could the Senator withhold the quorum call?

Mr. DORGAN. I will be glad to withhold the quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

RECESSION

Mr. CASEY. Madam President, I commend our colleague from North Dakota for highlighting some of the challenges we face economically. He did it in a very compelling way, as he always does. We are grateful for his leadership on these issues.

I stood before the Senate a couple of days ago and talked about the fact that we have a war in Iraq that we cannot forget about. In fact, if you listen to some of the news, you would think there are only one or two issues we have to worry about, but the war continues to be a central issue for the American people. We also have to be very concerned, as Senator DORGAN and others have reminded us, about the economy.

I was asked recently by a reporter—a couple of different reporters, actually—who said to me very simply—or asked me, I should say, very simply the question: Are we in recession? I answered them without blinking, without even stopping to think, because I know it is the truth, and the answer is yes, we are in a recession. I don't care about, nor do I need to wait, for some academic dissertation or some economist to tell us what is the textbook definition of a recession. We are in a recession. We have to do something about it. I think it is as plain as could be.

So what do we do about this recession? How do we respond to it? Thank goodness, there is a lot of bipartisanship on this issue, both parties coming together to try to do something about it. But I think we have to describe for people in Washington what this means for real people. I will talk about it in the context of Pennsylvania and Pennsylvania families, by way of highlighting this issue. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two pages I am going to be referring to from the Joint Economic Committee, Pennsylvania Economic Snapshot, dated January 23, 2008.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Over the past seven years, the Bush economy has made it more difficult for most Americans to get ahead. Under the current Administration, the basic goals of the American dream—raising a family, owning a home, paying for college, saving for retirement—have become intimidating hurdles for hardworking people. Slow growth in families' wages has been compounded by double-digit cost increases for health care, energy, and college tuition. Democrats are fighting for a new direction in economic policy, aimed at restoring broad-based growth, reducing the high costs of health care and energy, improving retirement security, and increasing prosperity for all Americans.

REAL HOUSEHOLD INCOME HAS STAGNATED; JOB CREATION HAS BEEN ABYSMAL

Pennsylvania's Median Household Income Increased By Only 1.3 Percent Since 2000. In Pennsylvania, real median household income averaged $48,148 over the 2005–2006 period, compared with $47,524 over the 1999–2000 period. Despite strong gains in productivity, workers' wages are only marginally higher than they were 25 years ago, and nationally, the inflation-adjusted income of a typical American household fell by $962, or 2.0 percent, to $48,201 between 2000 and 2006.

Pennsylvania's Job Growth Under the Current Administration Lags Far Behind Previous Presidents. The current president is competing with his father for the worst job creation record of any president since Herbert Hoover. Since taking office in January 2001, only 6 million jobs have been created, as compared with 20.8 million new jobs created during the Clinton administration at the same point in time. In Pennsylvania, only 101,900 new jobs have been created since Bush took office—or 1,200 new jobs per month—as compared with a total of 528,900 new jobs under Clinton—or 6,400 per month. In particular, the manufacturing sector has been hit hard by the economy under the current Administration, with payrolls nationwide declining by 3.2 million jobs between January 2001 and December 2007, and by 202,000 in Pennsylvania over the same period.

FAMILIES ARE FEELING THE SQUEEZE OF RISING EXPENSES

Rising Energy Costs Lead to Higher Gas and Home Heating Prices for Pennsylvania Residents. Rising energy costs are making it more difficult for Pennsylvania families to stretch their household budgets. In January 2001, the average retail price per gallon of gasoline in Pennsylvania was $1.43. The average gas price per gallon is $3.15 as of January 18, 2008. When adjusted for inflation, this represents an increase of 86 percent. At the same time, this winter is expected to hit Pennsylvania families hard, as average home heating costs have risen by 18.9 percent per household from $1,216 to $1,447 in the past year.

Health Care Premiums Rose 45.8 Percent in Pennsylvania Since 2000. In 2005, the average inflation-adjusted health care premium for family coverage in Pennsylvania was $11,470, a 45.8 percent increase from 2000, while the average premium for individual coverage was $4,332, an increase of 50.0 percent since 2000. Nationwide, the inflation-adjusted average monthly premium for family health coverage in the United States rose by 39.7 percent from 2000 to 2005, even as real median household income declined by 2.7 percent over the same period.

Pennsylvania College Tuition Rose 32.5 Percent Since 1999. Pennsylvania parents of college age students have also been hard hit under the current Administration, as inflation-adjusted tuition for Pennsylvania's four-year public colleges increased 32.5 percent between the 1999–2000 and 2005–2006 school years to $8,994 per year. With that $2,208 increase over just six years, Pennsylvania families are finding it more and more difficult to afford to send their children to college, and they are not alone. Nationally, public college tuition has risen at more than double the rate of inflation in recent years. Between the 1999–2000 and 2005–2006 academic years, average inflation-adjusted tuition and fees at U.S. public colleges and universities increased by 36.3 percent.

Child Care Costs For Two-Child Families Averaged $1,273 Per Month in Pennsylvania. Child care continues to be a hefty burden on the budgets of Pennsylvania parents, with inflation-adjusted monthly care for an infant averaging $689, and monthly care for two children averaging $1,273.

THE HOUSING CRISIS IS ERODING HOME WEALTH, HURTING THE BROADER ECONOMY

The Subprime Mortgage Crisis Is Impacting All Pennsylvania Homeowners. Under the Bush administration's watch, unregulated mortgage originators were given financial incentives to sell risky, unaffordable subprime mortgages to vulnerable borrowers. As these adjustable rate mortgages reset to higher rates, the number of families unable to afford their payments and threatened with foreclosure is skyrocketing. In Pennsylvania, mortgages in delinquency have increased from 81,900 in the third quarter of 2005 to 121,100 in the third quarter of 2007. According to a recent report published by the Joint Economic Committee (JEC), the number of subprime foreclosures in Pennsylvania will total 45,500 between third quarter 2007 and the end of 2009.

High Foreclosure Rates Drag Down Neighboring Property Values and Household Wealth. The mortgage foreclosure crisis will have severe costs for Pennsylvania homeowners, not only in direct costs, but in its effect on home values and declining property taxes. According to the JEC, subprime mortgage-related foreclosures will cost Pennsylvania $2.46 billion over the second half of 2007 through the end of 2009. Nationally, the expected economic costs of forecast foreclosures total nearly $104 billion. Moreover, these numbers do not include the larger effects that the foreclosure crisis may have on the economy. Home prices, which drove up consumer spending when they rose earlier this decade, are in decline now, and consumers may begin to draw back on spending, negatively impacting GDP growth.

THE ECONOMIC COST OF THE IRAQ WAR IS STAGGERING

The Iraq War Will Cost $36,900 Per Pennsylvania Household. According to the JEC's recent report, the direct and indirect costs of the Iraq War will be massive, especially if the Bush administration continues to keep large numbers of troops there. Even assuming significant force reductions, the cost of the Iraq War will total $107 billion for Pennsylvania taxpayers by 2017; the total cost to the country will be an estimated $2.8 trillion.

POVERTY REMAINS PERSISTENTLY HIGH

In Pennsylvania, 1.4 million Residents Were Living in Poverty Over Last Two Years. In Pennsylvania, 1.4 million residents were living below the poverty line during the 2005–2006 period, an increase of 28.8 percent over the 1999–2000 period. Unfortunately, this problem is not confined to the adult population as 17 percent of Pennsylvania's children are living below the poverty line. Nationally, 12.3 percent of Americans were living in poverty as of 2006.

THE RANKS OF THE UNINSURED CONTINUE TO GROW

Over Last Two Years, 1.2 million Pennsylvania Residents Had No Health Insurance. A growing number of Pennsylvania residents are living without health insurance. During the 2005–2006 period, an average of 1.2 million Pennsylvania residents—9.9 percent of the state's population—had no health insurance; this was 274,000 more than during the 1999–2000 period. Furthermore, 7.4 percent of Pennsylvania's children had no health insurance. Across the country, the number of Americans without health insurance totals 47 million, up 8.6 million since the current Administration took office.

Mr. CASEY. Madam President, I want you to know I will not read these two pages, but I want to highlight a couple of data points in this summary—two pages, four or five highlights.

First, delinquencies, mortgage delinquencies, are up from the third quarter of 2005 to the third quarter of 2007, up by some 40,000 mortgages, just in Pennsylvania. Then, stretching back over a couple of years, we look at gas prices. From January of 2001 forward, up 86 percent, gas prices in Pennsylvania; home heating costs, in 1 year—1 year—up 18.9 percent; health insurance for families. If you look at it over a 5-year period, 2000 to 2005, health care premiums for families are up 45.8 percent. And one more: Childcare costs per month for two children, which is the case for a lot of families, childcare costs per month for two children is averaging $1,273.

That is just in one State and a couple of highlights. We could go on and on, but I won't.

There are the economic realities for Pennsylvania families, and we could add more to that list. So when a reporter or anyone else asks me, Are we in a recession, my answer is, You bet we are. A lot of families in Pennsylvania and across the country think we have been in a recession, or their families have been in a kind of recession for years now—not just since the holidays, not just in the last year, but for many years. So I think the data is compelling and overwhelming and irrefutable.

But let's think about it even more broadly. In terms of health care, Families USA did a report this past November—again, just in Pennsylvania—and they have done it for a lot of States, but Pennsylvania was the first one they announced. I will read one sentence from a long report, one sentence from this report by Families USA on the issue of health care. I think one sentence tells the story. During this same period that they referred to earlier in the report, meaning 2000 to 2007, during that 7-year period:

> The average worker's share of annual family premiums rose from $1,656 to $3,281, an increase of more than 98 percent.

What they are saying in that one sentence is that in the State of Pennsylvania, over that 7-year period of time, the workers' share of annual family premiums went up 98 percent—98 percent in one State, the workers' share on health care. I don't even need to refer to the rest of the report. That tells the story.

So that is all the information. That is all the data. But what do we do with it? We saw in the news today and yesterday that there has been an agreement of sorts that has been brought about on the economy, and I think we should all be encouraged by the fact that the President and the Congress are working together on a stimulus package. But what does that mean, and what are the elements of it? I won't go into all of it, but I think one thing we have to be guided by—and we have heard over and over again this sound bite in Washington, but we should say it again. These are not my words. We have all quoted these, but they summarize it pretty well: Whatever stimulus package we have in place for the American people has to be timely, has to be temporary, and has to be targeted. Another way to say that is we have to put in place policies for the stimulus that we know will work.

I want to refer to a chart here that tells that story pretty well. We have seen this chart before, but it bears repeating. Other Members of the Senate have used it. The targeted stimulus proposals, the ones that deliver far more bang for the buck. It is very simple: What do you get for a buck in stimulus expenditure?

We know this from the data. This isn't some Democratic operative; this is what Mark Zandi from economy.com put forth: food stamps, spend a dollar and get $1.73 back; unemployment, spend a dollar in stimulus, get $1.64 back. States are in a fiscal mess. We won't go into that, but if you spend a dollar, you get $1.36 back in return. Then it goes down from pay, with payroll tax rebates and temporary income tax. We know that expending tax cuts for the wealthy, which is on the table right now, doesn't work. We know what works.

We have to make sure, in my judgment, that if we put together a bipartisan stimulus package—and we still have to work on this in the Senate—that we invest in strategies that will work, not what we would like to do or hope to do or not what one side or the other believes is a good idea. We have to invest in strategies that work: Food stamps, not just because it helps individual Americans and their families, but we know by investing in that strategy, they will spend the money quickly. We need people to spend money very rapidly to dig us out of the hole we are in. Food stamps, unemployment benefits, and aid to the States—we have to provide investments in strategies that will work.

Another thing we have to do is make sure that when we are dealing with the housing crisis, we spend dollars and have strategies that lead to help in the short run. I was one of three Senators who put in the budget $180 million for counseling. It is not some far-reaching plan to deal with the subprime crisis; it is dollars right now. In fact, the dollars for counseling would get dollars into the hands of nonprofit groups in the country to help families out of this next month, so to speak. Those dollars—$180 million—will begin being spent in March. That will work. Those counselors are experts. They are certified, and they know how to work with families. We have to invest in that.

I will conclude with this thought. If you walked through the streets of New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina, I don't think many people would be scratching their heads and wondering whether that was a category 5 hurricane or a category 4. It didn't matter; it was devastating. I don't think we ought to wonder whether an economist tells us we are in a recession. We are in a recession.

We know something about the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. When all of the reporting was done, when that horrific nightmare engulfed so many families, who were washed out of their homes and their hopes and dreams were gone, I think we learned a lot from what didn't happen before the hurricane.

We know as Americans that devastation doesn't always come with the awful swiftness of a hurricane. Sometimes it happens much more gradually, over time, when you don't make the right decision and prioritize and when you don't make the right investments. We are not doing that right now. We are not making the investments we should make in children in the dawn of their lives. We are not making an investment in fiscal responsibility to the extent we should. We are not investing in our infrastructure. Maybe all of those decisions can lead to a kind of slower moving Katrina or slower moving hurricane, which is an economic hurricane, or a devastating hurricane that dashes the hopes and dreams of children and their families.

So when we make a decision about what will be in the stimulus package to help people in the short run, we also have to get to work on a long-term strategy for economic growth, investing in our children, and making sure families can grow. I am concerned about how we are doing that or not doing it in Washington. We should learn from the horrific nightmare that was Hurricane Katrina. We should learn from, frankly, information such as this that tells us what will work in the short run to get us out of this mess and stimulate the economy and get dollars in the hands of Americans who will spend the dollars, which will jumpstart or jolt our economy. I think we can come together and do that. I don't think what we have seen so far gets us to that point.

I am grateful for the opportunity to talk about these issues. I know they are central not just to Pennsylvania and our families but in States such as Minnesota and other States across this country. We have a lot more work to do to get the stimulus package right to help our economy.

LANCE CORPORAL CAMERON M. BABCOCK

Mr. BAYH. Madam President, I rise today with a heavy heart and deep sense of gratitude to honor the life of a brave soldier from Plymouth, IN. LCpl Cameron Babcock, 19 years old, died January 20th at Twentynine Palms Marine Base in California. Lance Corporal Babcock was killed as the result of a firearms accident in his barracks. Cameron was a committed soldier and servant to his country.

Cameron was a 2006 graduate of Plymouth High School and was a gifted musician. He played the trumpet in the Big Red Marching Band and was a member of the Plymouth High School

Advanced Jazz Band. In 2005, he competed at the State Jazz Festival in LaPorte with the Advanced Jazz Band. He was also a member of the Wind Ensemble, comprised of some of the school's top music students. Cameron also played the guitar and enjoyed four-wheeling.

After graduation, Cameron fulfilled a lifelong goal by enlisting in the Marines, telling his family it was what he had always hoped to do. He was promoted to private first class after boot camp and was a rifleman in the infantry. With his assignment to Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, Cameron served an exemplary tour in Iraq in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom. He was a decorated soldier and received numerous awards during his tour in Iraq including the National Defense Service Medal, the Iraqi Campaign Medal, the Global War on Terrorism Service Medal, the Combat Action Ribbon, the Sea Service Deployment Ribbon and the Certificate of Commendation.

Cameron was awaiting his second tour of duty in Iraq when he died. He is survived by his parents, Jeffery and Ann Smith Babcock; his sisters Kailey, Abigail, and Hope Babcock; and his brother, Samuel Babcock. The Babcock family resides in Plymouth.

Today, I join Cameron's family and friends in mourning his death. While we struggle to bear our sorrow over this loss, we can also take pride in the example he set, bravely fighting to make the world a safer place. It is his courage and strength of character that people will remember when they think of Cameron. Today and always, Cameron will be remembered by family members, friends and fellow Hoosiers as a true American hero, and we honor the example he set in serving his country.

It is my sad duty to enter the name of LCpl Cameron M. Babcock in the RECORD of the U.S. Senate for his service to this country and for his profound commitment to freedom, democracy and peace. When I think about the unfortunate pain that comes with the loss of our heroes, I hope that families like Cameron's can find comfort in the words of the prophet Isaiah who said, ''He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces.''

May God grant strength and peace to those who mourn, and may God be with all of you, as I know He is with Cameron.

MAJOR ANDREW J. OLMSTED

Mr. SALAZAR. Madam President, I rise today in honor of MAJ Andrew Olmsted, who was killed on January 3 in an attack near Sadiyah, Iraq. Major Olmsted was assigned to the 1st Brigade of the 1st Infantry Division out of Fort Riley, KS, but he and his wife, Amanda Wilson, lived together in Colorado Springs, CO. Andrew was 37 years old. He was the first American casualty in Iraq of 2008.

Major Olmsted was a proud soldier whose sense of duty took him to Iraq—whose commitment to his fellow soldiers earned him their deepest respect—and whose compassion put him in the line of fire the day he died.

Andrew was also an exceptionally talented writer. He shared his experiences and perspectives in Iraq with the world on blogs, including one he wrote for the Rocky Mountain News entitled ''From the Front Lines.'' The thousands of readers who followed Andrew's deployment had the privilege of his frank, thoughtful, stirring, and often humorous take on the war, the Army, and politics.

For a writer and reporter as gifted as Andrew, it is hard to find the words to properly honor his life and his sacrifice. I would rather let him speak for himself and reflect on his memory by sharing with my colleagues portions of Major Olmsted's final posting. He asked a friend to post this on his blog in the event of his death. In its eloquence, power, humor, and tragedy, it is one small way in which we may remember the mark that Andrew made on our world:

This is an entry I would have preferred not to have published, but there are limits to what we can control in life, and apparently I have passed one of those limits. . . .

What I don't want this to be is a chance for me, or anyone else, to be maudlin. I'm dead. That sucks, at least for me and my family and friends. But all the tears in the world aren't going to bring me back, so I would prefer that people remember the good things about me rather than mourning my loss. (If it turns out a specific number of tears will, in fact, bring me back to life, then by all means, break out the onions.)

I had a pretty good life, as I noted above. Sure, all things being equal I would have preferred to have more time, but I have no business complaining with all the good fortune I've enjoyed in my life. So if you're up for that, put on a little 80s music (preferably vintage 1980–1984), grab a Coke and have a drink with me. If you have it, throw ''Freedom Isn't Free'' from the Team America soundtrack in; if you can't laugh at that song, I think you need to lighten up a little. I'm dead, but if you're reading this, you're not, so take a moment to enjoy that happy fact. . . .

I suppose I should speak to the circumstances of my death. It would be nice to believe that I died leading men in battle, preferably saving their lives at the cost of my own. More likely I was caught by a marksman or an IED. But if there is an afterlife, I'm telling anyone who asks that I went down surrounded by hundreds of insurgents defending a village composed solely of innocent women and children. It'll be our little secret, ok?

I do ask (not that I'm in a position to enforce this) that no one try to use my death to further their political purposes. I went to Iraq and did what I did for my reasons, not yours. My life isn't a chit to be used to bludgeon people to silence on either side. If you think the U.S. should stay in Iraq, don't drag me into it by claiming that somehow my death demands us staying in Iraq. If you think the U.S. ought to get out tomorrow, don't cite my name as an example of someone's life who was wasted by our mission in Iraq. I have my own opinions about what we should do about Iraq, but since I'm not around to expound on them I'd prefer others not try and use me as some kind of moral capital to support a position I probably didn't support. Further, this is tough enough on my family without their having to see my picture being used in some rally or my name being cited for some political purpose. You can fight political battles without hurting my family, and I'd prefer that you did so.

On a similar note, while you're free to think whatever you like about my life and death, if you think I wasted my life, I'll tell you you're wrong. We're all going to die of something. I died doing a job I loved. When your time comes, I hope you are as fortunate as I was. . . .

Those who know me through my writings on the Internet over the past five-plus years probably have wondered at times about my chosen profession. While I am not a Libertarian, I certainly hold strongly individualistic beliefs. Yet I have spent my life in a profession that is not generally known for rugged individualism. Worse, I volunteered to return to active duty knowing that the choice would almost certainly lead me to Iraq. The simple explanation might be that I was simply stupid, and certainly I make no bones about having done some dumb things in my life, but I don't think this can be chalked up to stupidity. Maybe I was inconsistent in my beliefs; there are few people who adhere religiously to the doctrines of their chosen philosophy, whatever that may be. But I don't think that was the case in this instance either.

As passionate as I am about personal freedom, I don't buy the claims of anarchists that humanity would be just fine without any government at all. There are too many people in the world who believe that they know best how people should live their lives, and many of them are more than willing to use force to impose those beliefs on others. A world without government simply wouldn't last very long; as soon as it was established, strongmen would immediately spring up to establish their fiefdoms. So there is a need for government to protect the people's rights. And one of the fundamental tools to do that is an army that can prevent outside agencies from imposing their rules on a society. A lot of people will protest that argument by noting that the people we are fighting in Iraq are unlikely to threaten the rights of the average American. That's certainly true; while our enemies would certainly like to wreak great levels of havoc on our society, the fact is they're not likely to succeed. But that doesn't mean there isn't still a need for an army (setting aside debates regarding whether ours is the right size at the moment). Americans are fortunate that we don't have to worry too much about people coming to try and overthrow us, but part of the reason we don't have to worry about that is because we have an army that is stopping anyone who would try.

Soldiers cannot have the option of opting out of missions because they don't agree with them: that violates the social contract. The duly-elected American government decided to go to war in Iraq. (Even if you maintain President Bush was not properly elected, Congress voted for war as well.) As a soldier, I have a duty to obey the orders of the President of the United States as long as they are constitutional. I can no more opt out of missions I disagree with than I can ignore laws I think are improper. I do not consider it a violation of my individual rights to have gone to Iraq on orders because I raised my right hand and volunteered to join the army. Whether or not this mission was a good one, my participation in it was an affirmation of something I consider quite necessary to society. So if nothing else, I gave my life for a pretty important principle; I can (if you'll pardon the pun) live with that. . . .

I write this in part, admittedly, because I would like to think that there's at least a little something out there to remember me by. Granted, this site will eventually vanish, being ephemeral in a very real sense of the word, but at least for a time it can serve as a tiny record of my contributions to the world. But on a larger scale, for those who knew me well enough to be saddened by my death, especially for those who haven't known anyone else lost to this war, perhaps my death can serve as a small reminder of the costs of war. Regardless of the merits of this war, or of any war, I think that many of us in America have forgotten that war means death and suffering in wholesale lots. A decision that for most of us in America was academic, whether or not to go to war in Iraq, had very real consequences for hundreds of thousands of people. Yet I was as guilty as anyone of minimizing those very real consequences in lieu of a cold discussion of theoretical merits of war and peace. Now I'm facing some very real consequences of that decision; who says life doesn't have a sense of humor? . . .

But for those who knew me and feel this pain, I think it's a good thing to realize that this pain has been felt by thousands and thousands (probably millions, actually) of other people all over the world. That is part of the cost of war, any war, no matter how justified. If everyone who feels this pain keeps that in mind the next time we have to decide whether or not war is a good idea, perhaps it will help us to make a more informed decision. Because it is pretty clear that the average American would not have supported the Iraq War had they known the costs going in. I am far too cynical to believe that any future debate over war will be any less vitriolic or emotional, but perhaps a few more people will realize just what those costs can be the next time.

This may be a contradiction of my above call to keep politics out of my death, but I hope not. Sometimes going to war is the right idea. I think we've drawn that line too far in the direction of war rather than peace, but I'm a soldier and I know that sometimes you have to fight if you're to hold onto what you hold dear. But in making that decision, I believe we understate the costs of war; when we make the decision to fight, we make the decision to kill, and that means lives and families destroyed. Mine now falls into that category; the next time the question of war or peace comes up, if you knew me at least you can understand a bit more just what it is you're deciding to do, and whether or not those costs are worth it.

''This is true love. You think this happens every day?''—Westley, The Princess Bride

''Good night, my love, the brightest star in my sky.''—John Sheridan, Babylon 5

This is the hardest part. While I certainly have no desire to die, at this point I no longer have any worries. That is not true of the woman who made my life something to enjoy rather than something merely to survive. She put up with all of my faults, and they are myriad, she endured separations again and again . . . I cannot imagine being more fortunate in love than I have been with Amanda. Now she has to go on without me, and while a cynic might observe she's better off, I know that this is a terrible burden I have placed on her, and I would give almost anything if she would not have to bear it. It seems that is not an option. I cannot imagine anything more painful than that, and if there is an afterlife, this is a pain I'll bear forever.

I wasn't the greatest husband. I could have done so much more, a realization that, as it so often does, comes too late to matter. But I cherished every day I was married to Amanda. When everything else in my life seemed dark, she was always there to light the darkness. It is difficult to imagine my life being worth living without her having been in it. I hope and pray that she goes on without me and enjoys her life as much as she deserves. I can think of no one more deserving of happiness than her.

''I will see you again, in the place where no shadows fall.''—Ambassador Delenn, Babylon 5

I don't know if there is an afterlife; I tend to doubt it, to be perfectly honest. But if there is any way possible, Amanda, then I will live up to Delenn's words, somehow, some way. I love you.

Mr. President, our thoughts and prayers are with Amanda, Andrew's parents, and all of his family. May they soon find comfort and respite from their grief. May we always remember Andrew for his life, service, and sacrifice. And may countless others have the blessing of reading his words.

STAFF SERGEANT JUSTIN R. WHITING

Madam President, I rise today to honor the memory of SSG Justin R. Whiting, a Green Beret with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Special Forces Group, out of Fort Campbell, KY. On January 19, Sergeant Whiting was leading a convoy through the streets of Mosul, Iraq, when a bomb exploded near his vehicle. He was killed at 27 years old.

Sergeant Whiting was born in Belton, TX, but at a young age moved to Hancock, NY, where he developed a love for the great outdoors. Justin was an avid hunter who reveled in the rugged landscape near the Delaware River.

Those who knew him describe Sergeant Whiting as an adventurer. It was this virtue, coupled with his deep-seated love for his country, which led him to join the Army just 2 months after his high school graduation.

In the Army, he chose the most difficult path he could pursue, that of becoming a Green Beret. The Special Forces soldiers I know are the pride of our country. All at once, they are soldiers, intelligence officers, diplomats, tacticians, linguists, trainers, and advisors. They are at the tip of the spear of our national defense. The Green Beret that they wear, said President Kennedy, is ''a symbol of excellence, a badge of courage, a mark of distinction in the fight for freedom.''

Sergeant Whiting was on his third tour in Iraq, on a mission to help bring security and stability to a region torn by violence and tragedy. Every day, he and his unit put themselves in harm's way to give Iraqi citizens a chance at a society governed by the rule of law, free from the threats of sectarian strife, terrorism, or autocratic rule. He served bravely and was highly decorated. Among many other honors, he earned the Bronze Star, one of the highest awards given for combat service, for his bravery and selflessness.

For those of us who did not know Justin personally, it is difficult to know what inspired his extraordinary sense of duty or what fueled his courage on the battlefield. Alexander Hamilton, a Founding Father and an Army officer, explained that ''There is a certain enthusiasm in liberty that makes human nature rise above itself in acts of bravery and heroism.'' I imagine that Justin found his strength in many sources—friends, family, and fellow soldiers—but I imagine that he, too, was motivated by an enthusiasm for liberty and a passion for justice. In his life, he consistently chose the path that was most challenging so that he could offer our country his highest service. He was a true patriot.

To Justin's mother, Estelline, to his father, Randall, to his sister, Amanda, and to his brother, Nathan, our thoughts and prayers are with you. I hope that in time, your grief will be assuaged by the pride you must feel in Justin's service and by the honor he bestowed upon his country. May we never forget his service and his sacrifice.

By Mr. DODD (for himself and Mr. MCCAIN):

S. 2559. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to increase the level of earnings under which no individual who is blind is determined to have demonstrated an ability to engage in substantial gainful activity for purposes of determining disability; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today with my colleague from Arizona, Senator JOHN MCCAIN, to reintroduce legislation that we've sponsored in the past, the Blind Persons' Earnings Fairness Act of 2008. This legislation would restore the 20-year link between the earnings limits under Social Security for blind people and senior citizens. Restoring this connection would have a tremendous impact on the lives of many blind people, helping them become more self-sufficient and productive members of society and giving them the chance to live fuller lives.

Today there are nearly 1.3 million Americans who are blind, with 75,000 more becoming blind each year. With today's technology, blind and visually-impaired individuals can do just about anything. Blind people today are employed as farmers, lawyers, secretaries, nurses, managers, childcare workers, social workers, teachers, librarians, stockbrokers, accountants, and journalists, among many other things. Unfortunately the unemployment rate among the blind is still at an unconscionable 74 percent. The Federal Government should do all within its power to facilitate and encourage the blind and visually-impaired to enter the workforce. A variety of public and private initiatives have been launched over the years to provide the technologies and assistance necessary to educate and employ the blind at the same level as their sighted peers. For example, the National Federation of the Blind, NFB, has created an institute to utilize technological advancements for the blind in an effort to promote employment of the blind throughout the Nation. The NFB helps employers provide adaptive technology, consultation, and training so that they can better accommodate the needs of blind and visually-impaired employees. Now the challenge goes beyond giving the blind the tools to compete in the workforce, now we need to give hem the freedom to do so without fear of losing their essential Social Security benefits.

In 1996, Congress passed the Senior Citizens Freedom to Work Act, which broke the longstanding linkage between the treatment of blind people and seniors under Social Security. This allowed the earnings limit to be raised for seniors at a far faster rate than for the blind. As a result, the earnings limit for blind people has not kept up with modern day costs and earnings. So, blind people do not have the opportunity to increase their earnings without jeopardizing their Social Security benefits. In 2008, that limit was at $18,840. If a blind individual earns more than that, his or her Social Security benefits are not protected.

The purpose of the Senior Citizens Freedom to Work Act was to allow seniors to continue contributing to society as productive workers while still receiving needed social security benefits. Historically, the earnings test treatment of seniors and blind people was identical under Title II of the Social Security Act. With this legislation, we seek to restore that connection and do the same for the blind population of America as we have done for the seniors. We must provide blind people the same opportunity to be productive and contribute to their own stability. We must not discourage these individuals from working within an unreasonably low earnings limit.

The current earnings test provides a disincentive for the blind population, many of whom are working age and capable of productive work. Work provides one of the fundamental ways individuals express their talents and allows them to make a contribution to society and to their loved ones. Blind individuals face constant hurdles when it comes to employment. Parents, teachers, or counselors may tell them they can't do it. Employers sometimes don't even give them the opportunity to try. But blind people and others with severe visual impairments take great pride in being able to work, just like the rest of us. They are likely to respond favorably to an increase in the earnings test because they want to work. We don't want to leave in place yet another hurdle to employment for blind individuals with the Social Security earnings test. By allowing those with visual impairments to work more without penalty, we would increase both their tax contribution and their purchasing power. By doing so we would also bring additional funds into the Social Security trust fund and the Federal Treasury.

I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this important legislation to restore the fair and equal treatment for the blind citizens of America. The Blind Persons' Earnings Act of 2008 will provide the blind population with the same freedom and opportunities as our Nation's seniors and the rest of the citizens of this Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be placed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 430—DESIGNATING JANUARY 2008 AS ''NATIONAL MENTORING MONTH''

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. BAYH, Mr. BURR, Ms. CANTWELL, Mr. CARPER, Mr. CASEY, Mrs. CLINTON, Mr. COLEMAN, Ms. COLLINS, Mr. DODD, Mr. DURBIN, Mr. FEINGOLD, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. ISAKSON, Mr. KERRY, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mrs. LINCOLN, Mr. MENENDEZ, Ms. MURKOWSKI, Mr. OBAMA, and Mr. SPECTER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 430

Whereas youth mentoring establishes a structured and trusting relationship that brings young people together with caring individuals who offer guidance, support, and encouragement;

Whereas a growing body of mentoring research provides strong evidence of success in reducing delinquency, substance use and abuse, and academic failure;

Whereas research also shows that formal mentoring, aimed at developing the competence and character of the young person, promotes positive outcomes such as improved academic achievement, self-esteem, social skills, and career development;

Whereas mentoring offers a supportive environment in which young people can grow, expand their vision, and achieve a future that they never thought possible;

Whereas more than 15,000,000 young people in this Nation still need mentors, falling into a ''mentoring gap'';

Whereas more than 4,300 mentoring programs in communities of all sizes across the United States focus on building strong, effective relationships between mentors and mentees;

Whereas public-private mentoring partnerships bring State and local leaders together to support mentoring programs by preventing duplication of efforts, offering training in industry best practices, and helping them make the most of limited resources to benefit the Nation's youth;

Whereas coordinated national, State, regional, and local efforts continue to need Federal support to allow more youth to be connected with the power of mentoring;

Whereas several Federal agencies have come together to coordinate approaches to mentoring within the Federal Government through the Federal Mentoring Council and National Mentoring Working Group under the Corporation for National and Community Service;

Whereas the designation of January 2008 as National Mentoring Month will help call attention to the critical role mentors play in helping young people realize their potential;

Whereas the month-long celebration of mentoring will encourage more organizations across the United States, including schools, businesses, nonprofit organizations, faith institutions, foundations, and individuals to become engaged in mentoring;

Whereas National Mentoring Month will, most significantly, build awareness of mentoring and encourage more people to become mentors and help close the Nation's mentoring gap; and

Whereas the President has issued a proclamation declaring January 2008 to be National Mentoring Month and calling on the people of the United States to recognize the importance of mentoring, to look for opportunities to serve as mentors in their communities, and to observe the month with appropriate activities and programs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) designates the month of January 2008 as ''National Mentoring Month'';

(2) recognizes with gratitude the contributions of the millions of caring volunteers who already serve as mentors and encourages more individuals to volunteer as mentors; and

(3) encourages the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate ceremonies and activities that promote the awareness of, and volunteer involvement with, youth mentoring.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join many of my colleagues in submitting a resolution recognizing January 2008 as National Mentoring Month.

We all know the extraordinary help and support that a good mentor can give to a child. High-quality mentoring programs can make all the difference to students in need. They can reduce negative outcomes, and help keep children on track. They can reduce drug and substance abuse and delinquency. They can enable students to stay in school instead of dropping out.

By promoting such positive outcomes, mentors enable students to obtain the skills they need to succeed in school and in life. They improve academic achievement, and they also improve self-esteem and social and communications skills.

National Mentoring Month is an opportunity to recognize and commend the many mentors across the country who are doing their part. It is also an opportunity to raise awareness about the real value of mentoring, and encourage more adults to become mentors. Experts estimate that nearly 18 million young students could benefit from being matched with a mentor, but only about 3 million of these youth are in such a relationship today. Fifteen million youth need a mentor—but they do not have one.

Mentoring a young person doesn't just pay off for the youth; it can be beneficial for the mentor as well. For the past 12 years, I have participated in the Everybody Wins Program at Brent Elementary School near the Capitol. Once a week during the school year, I spend an hour with an elementary school student. We read together, share stories, and learn from each other. This year, my first reading partner is finishing high school, and next year she will be starting college. She has stayed in touch, and it has been amazing to see her grow.

Robert Kennedy often spoke of the ripples of hope that people send forth each time they act to help others. Mentors are a proven example of the power of each citizen to create such ripples, and we should do what we can to recognize and support them. I urge the Senate to approve this resolution.

SENATE RESOLUTION 431—CALLING FOR A PEACEFUL RESOLUTION TO THE CURRENT ELECTORAL CRISIS IN KENYA

Mr. FEINGOLD (for himself, Mr. SUNUNU, Mr. CARDIN, Mr. KERRY, Mr. BROWN, Mr. DODD, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MENENDEZ, Mr. DURBIN, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. BIDEN, Mrs. CLINTON, Mr. OBAMA, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. COLEMAN, Mr. HAGEL, Mr. BROWNBACK, and Ms. SNOWE) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 431

Whereas on December 27, 2007, Kenyan citizens went peacefully to the polls to elect a new parliament and a new President and signaled their commitment to democracy by turning out in large numbers, and in some instances waiting in long lines to vote;

Whereas election observers reported serious irregularities and a lack of transparency that, combined with the implausibility of the margin of victory, and the swearing in of the Party of National Unity presidential candidate Mwai Kibaki with undue haste, all serve to undermine the credibility of the presidential election results;

Whereas the Government of Kenya imposed a ban on live media broadcasts that day, and shortly after the election results were announced, in contravention of Kenyan law, the Government also announced a blanket ban on public assembly and gave police the authority to use lethal force;

Whereas subsequent to declaring Mr. Kibaki the winner, the head of the Election Commission of Kenya (ECK) stated that he did not know who won the presidential election;

Whereas in the aftermath of the election announcement, significant violence began and continues to flare;

Whereas on January 1, 2008, 4 commissioners on the ECK issued a statement which called for a judicial review and tallying of the vote;

Whereas the head of the European Union Election Observation Mission stated that ''[l]ack of transparency, as well as a number of verified irregularities... cast doubt on the accuracy of the results of the presidential election as announced by the ECK'' and called for an international audit of the results;

Whereas the Attorney General of Kenya has called for an independent investigation of the tallying of votes and for the votes to be retallied;

Whereas observers from the East African Community have called for an investigation into irregularities during the tallying process and for those responsible for such irregularities to be held accountable;

Whereas some estimates indicate that at least 700 people have died and as many as 250,000 have been displaced as a result of this violence, which continues;

Whereas the economic cost to Kenya of the violence and civil unrest in the wake of the disputed polls is estimated at $1,000,000,000;

Whereas the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs traveled to Nairobi in an attempt to mediate between the 2 leading presidential candidates and has stated that ''serious flaws in the vote tallying process damaged the credibility of the process'' and that the United States should not ''conduct business as usual'' in Kenya; and

Whereas Kenya has been a valuable strategic, political, diplomatic, and economic partner to those in the subregion, region, and to the United States and has been 1 of the major recipients of United States foreign assistance in sub-Saharan Africa for decades: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) commends the Kenyan people for their commitment to democracy and respect for the democratic process, as evidenced by the high voter turnout and peaceful voting on election day;

(2) strongly condemns the violence in Kenya;

(3) urges all politicians and political parties to immediately desist from the reactivation, support, and use of militia organizations that are ethnic-based or otherwise constituted;

(4) calls on the 2 leading presidential candidates to—

(A) engage in an internationally brokered dialogue, which results in a new political dispensation that is supported by Kenyan civil society; and

(B) respect the will of the Kenyan people;

(5) simultaneously—

(A) supports a call for electoral justice in Kenya, including a thorough and credible independent audit of election results with the possibility, depending on what is discovered, of a recount or retallying of votes, or a rerun of the presidential elections within a specified time period; and

(B) encourages any political settlement to take into account these recommendations;

(6) calls on Kenyan security forces to refrain from use of excessive force and respect the human rights of Kenyan citizens;

(7) calls for those who are found guilty of committing human rights violations to be held accountable for their actions;

(8) calls for an immediate end to the restrictions on the media, and on the rights of peaceful assembly and association;

(9) condemns threats to civil society leaders and human rights activists who are working towards a peaceful, just, and equitable political solution to the current electoral crisis;

(10) holds all political actors in Kenya responsible for the safety and security of civil society leaders and human rights advocates;

(11) calls on the international community, United Nations aid organizations, and all neighboring countries to provide assistance to Kenyan refugees who have fled in search of greater security;

(12) encourages others in the international community to work together and use all diplomatic means at their disposal to persuade relevant political actors to commit to a peaceful resolution to the current crisis; and

(13) urges the President of the United States to—

(A) support diplomatic efforts to facilitate a dialogue between leaders of the Party of National Unity, the Orange Democratic Movement, and other relevant actors;

(B) consider the imposition of personal sanctions, including a travel ban and asset freeze on leaders in the Party of National Unity, the Orange Democratic Movement, and other relevant actors who refuse to engage in meaningful dialogue to end the current crisis; and

(C) conduct a review of current United States aid to Kenya for the purpose of restricting all nonessential assistance to Kenya, unless all parties are able to establish a peaceful, political resolution to the current crisis, which is credible with the Kenyan people.

(B) the electronic communication service provider did not provide the alleged assistance.

(2) SUBSTITUTION.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B), and subject to subparagraph (C), upon receiving a certification under paragraph (1), a Federal or State court shall—

(i) substitute the United States for the electronic communication service provider as the defendant as to all claims designated by the Attorney General in that certification, consistent with the procedures under rule 25(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, as if the United States were a party to whom the interest of the electronic communication service provider in the litigation had been transferred; and

(ii) as to that electronic communication service provider—

(I) dismiss all claims designated by the Attorney General in that certification; and

(II) enter a final judgment relating to those claims.

(B) CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN CLAIMS.—If a certification by the Attorney General under paragraph (1) states that not all of the alleged assistance was provided under a written request or directive described in paragraph (1)(A)(ii), the electronic communication service provider shall remain as a defendant.

(C) DETERMINATION.—

(i) IN GENERAL.—Substitution under subparagraph (A) shall proceed only after a determination by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court that—

(iv) DECLARATIONS.—If the Attorney General files a declaration under section 1746 of title 28, United States Code, that disclosure of a determination made pursuant to clause (i) would harm the national security of the United States, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court shall limit any public disclosure concerning such determination, including any public order following such an ex parte review, to a statement that the conditions of clause (i) have or have not been met, without disclosing the basis for the determination.

(3) PROCEDURES.—

(i) the claim shall be deemed to have been filed under section 1346(b) of title 28, United States Code, except that sections 2401(b), 2675, and 2680(a) of title 28, United States Code, shall not apply; and

(iv) for any amended claim under clause (ii) the United States shall be deemed a proper defendant under any statutes described in that clause, and any plaintiff that had standing to proceed against the original defendant shall be deemed an aggrieved party for purposes of proceeding under section 2712 of title 18, United States Code, or section 110 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (50 U.S.C. 1810).

(C) DISCOVERY.—

(i) IN GENERAL.—In a covered civil action in which the United States is substituted as party-defendant under paragraph (2), any plaintiff may serve third-party discovery requests to any electronic communications service provider as to which all claims are dismissed.

(ii) BINDING THE GOVERNMENT.—If a plaintiff in a covered civil action serves deposition notices under rule 30(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or requests under rule 36 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for admission upon an electronic communications service provider as to which all claims were dismissed, the electronic communications service provider shall be deemed a party-defendant for purposes rule 30(b)(6) or rule 36 and its answers and admissions shall be deemed binding upon the Government.

(d) CIVIL ACTIONS IN STATE COURT.—For purposes of section 1441 of title 28, United States Code, any covered civil action that is brought in a State court or administrative or regulatory bodies shall be deemed to arise under the Constitution or laws of the United States and shall be removable under that section.

(e) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.—Except as expressly provided in this section, nothing in this section may be construed to limit any immunity, privilege, or defense under any other provision of law, including any privilege, immunity, or defense that would otherwise have been available to the United States absent its substitution as party-defendant or had the United States been the named defendant.

(f) EFFECTIVE DATE AND APPLICATION.—This section shall apply to any covered civil action pending on or filed after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 704. ACQUISITION INSIDE THE UNITED STATES OF UNITED STATES PERSONS OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES.—An acquisition authorized under subsection (a) that occurs inside the United States and—

''(A) constitutes electronic surveillance (regardless of the limitation in section 701(a)), or

''(B) is an acquisition of stored electronic communications or stored electronic data that otherwise requires a court order under this Act, may not intentionally target a United States person reasonably believed to be outside the United States, except in accordance with title I or III. For the purposes of an acquisition under this subsection, the term 'agent of a foreign power' as used in those titles shall include a person who is an officer or employee of a foreign power.

SEC. 705. OTHER ACQUISITION OF UNITED STATES PERSONS OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES.—

''(A) JURISDICTION AND SCOPE.—

''(i) JURISDICTION.—The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court shall have jurisdiction to enter an order pursuant to subparagraph (C).

''(ii) SCOPE.—No element of the intelligence community may intentionally target, for the purpose of acquiring foreign intelligence information, a United States person reasonably believed to be located outside the United States under circumstances in which the targeted United States person has a reasonable expectation of privacy and a warrant would be required if the acquisition were conducted inside the United States for law enforcement purposes, unless a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has entered an order or the Attorney General has authorized an emergency acquisition pursuant to subparagraphs (C) or (D) or any other provision of this Act.

''(iii) LIMITATIONS.—

''(I) MOVING OR MISIDENTIFIED TARGETS.—In the event that the targeted United States person is reasonably believed to be in the United States during the pendency of an order issued pursuant to subparagraph (C), such acquisition shall cease until authority is obtained pursuant to this Act or the targeted United States person is again reasonably believed to be located outside the United States during the pendency of an order issued pursuant to subparagraph (C).

''(II) APPLICABILITY.—If the acquisition could be authorized under paragraph (1), the procedures of paragraph (1) shall apply, unless an order or emergency acquisition authority has been obtained under a provision of this Act other than under this section.

''(B) APPLICATION.—Each application for an order under this paragraph shall be made by a Federal officer in writing upon oath or affirmation to a judge having jurisdiction under subparagraph (A)(i). Each application shall require the approval of the Attorney General based upon the Attorney General's finding that it satisfies the criteria and requirements of such application as set forth in this section and shall include—

''(i) the identity, if known, or a description of the specific United States person who is the target of the acquisition;

''(ii) a statement of the facts and circumstances relied upon to justify the applicant's belief that the target of the acquisition is—

''(I) a United States person reasonably believed to be located outside the United States; and

''(II) a foreign power, an agent of a foreign power, or an officer or employee of a foreign power who is reasonably believed to have access to foreign intelligence information;

''(iii) a certification or certifications by the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs or an executive branch official or officials designated by the President from among those executive officers employed in the area of national security or defense and appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate—

''(I) that the certifying official deems the information sought to be foreign intelligence information; and

''(II) that a significant purpose of the acquisition is to obtain foreign intelligence information;

''(III) that designates the type of foreign intelligence information being sought according to the categories described in section 101(e); and

''(IV) including a statement of the basis for the certification that the information sought is the type of foreign intelligence information designated;

''(iv) a statement of the proposed minimization procedures consistent with the requirements of section 101(h) or section 301(4);

''(v) a statement of the facts concerning any previous applications that have been made to any judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court involving the United States person specified in the application and the action taken on each previous application; and

''(vi) a statement of the period of time for which the acquisition is required to be maintained, provided that such period of time shall not exceed 90 days per application.

''(C) ORDER.—

''(i) FINDINGS.—If, upon an application made pursuant to subparagraph (B), a judge having jurisdiction under subparagraph (A)(i) finds that—

''(I) on the basis of the facts submitted by the applicant there is probable cause to believe that the specified target of the acquisition is—

''(aa) a person reasonably believed to be located outside the United States; and

(bb) a foreign power, an agent of a foreign power, or an officer or employee of a foreign power who is reasonably believed to have access to foreign intelligence information;

''(II) the proposed minimization procedures, with respect to their dissemination provisions, meet the definition of minimization procedures under section 101(h) or section 301(4);

''(III) the certification or certifications required by subparagraph (B) are not clearly erroneous on the basis of the statement made under subparagraph (B)(iii)(IV), the Court shall issue an ex parte order so stating.

''(ii) PROBABLE CAUSE.—In determining whether or not probable cause exists for purposes of an order under clause (i)(I), a judge having jurisdiction under subsection (A)(i) may consider past activities of the target, as well as facts and circumstances relating to current or future activities of the target. However, no United States person may be considered a foreign power, agent of a foreign power, or officer or employee of a foreign power solely upon the basis of activities protected by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

''(iii) REVIEW.—

''(I) LIMITATIONS ON REVIEW.—Review by a judge having jurisdiction under subparagraph (A)(i) shall be limited to that required to make the findings described in clause (i). The judge shall not have jurisdiction to review the means by which an acquisition under this section may be conducted.

''(II) REVIEW OF PROBABLE CAUSE.—If the judge determines that the facts submitted under subparagraph (B) are insufficient to establish probable cause to issue an order under this subsection, the judge shall enter an order so stating and provide a written statement for the record of the reasons for such determination. The Government may appeal an order under this clause pursuant to subparagraph (E).

''(III) REVIEW OF MINIMIZATION PROCEDURES.—If the judge determines that the minimization procedures applicable to dissemination of information obtained through an acquisition under this subsection do not meet the definition of minimization procedures under section 101(h) or section 301(4), the judge shall enter an order so stating and provide a written statement for the record of the reasons for such determination. The Government may appeal an order under this clause pursuant to subparagraph (E).

''(iv) DURATION.—An order under this paragraph shall be effective for a period not to exceed 90 days and such order may be renewed for additional 90-day periods upon submission of renewal applications meeting the requirements of subparagraph (B).

''(v) COMPLIANCE.—At, or prior to, the end of the period of time for which an order or extension is approved under this paragraph, the judge may assess compliance with the minimization procedures by reviewing the circumstances under which information concerning United States persons was disseminated, provided that the judge may not inquire into the circumstances relating to the conduct of the acquisition.

''(D) EMERGENCY AUTHORIZATION.—

''(i) AUTHORITY FOR EMERGENCY AUTHORIZATION.—Notwithstanding any other provision in this subsection, if the Attorney General reasonably determines that—

''(I) an emergency situation exists with respect to the acquisition of foreign intelligence information for which an order may be obtained under subparagraph (C) before an order under that subsection may, with due diligence, be obtained; and

''(II) the factual basis for issuance of an order under this section exists, the Attorney General may authorize the emergency acquisition if a judge having jurisdiction under subparagraph (A)(i) is informed by the Attorney General or a designee of the Attorney General at the time of such authorization that the decision has been made to conduct such acquisition and if an application in accordance with this subsection is made to a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court as soon as practicable, but not more than 168 hours after the Attorney General authorizes such acquisition.

''(ii) MINIMIZATION PROCEDURES.—If the Attorney General authorizes such emergency acquisition, the Attorney General shall require that the minimization procedures required by this subparagraph be followed.

''(iii) TERMINATION OF EMERGENCY AUTHORIZATION.—In the absence of an order under subparagraph (C), the acquisition shall terminate when the information sought is obtained, if the application for the order is denied, or after the expiration of 168 hours from the time of authorization by the Attorney General, whichever is earliest.

''(iv) USE OF INFORMATION.—In the event that such application is denied, or in any other case where the acquisition is terminated and no order is issued approving the acquisition, no information obtained or evidence derived from such acquisition, except under circumstances in which the target of the acquisition is determined not to be a United States person during the pendency of the 168-hour emergency acquisition period, shall be received in evidence or otherwise disclosed in any trial, hearing, or other proceeding in or before any court, grand jury, department, office, agency, regulatory body, legislative committee, or other authority of the United States, a State, or political subdivision thereof, and no information concerning any United States person acquired from such acquisition shall subsequently be used or disclosed in any other manner by Federal officers or employees without the consent of such person, except with the approval of the Attorney General if the information indicates a threat of death or serious bodily harm to any person.

''(E) APPEAL.—

''(i) APPEAL TO THE COURT OF REVIEW.—The Government may file an appeal with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review for review of an order issued pursuant to subparagraph (C). The Court of Review shall have jurisdiction to consider such appeal and shall provide a written statement for the record of the reasons for a decision under this paragraph.

''(ii) CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT.—The Government may file a petition for a writ of certiorari for review of the decision of the Court of Review issued under clause (i). The record for such review shall be transmitted under seal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which shall have jurisdiction to review such decision.

''(F) JOINT APPLICATIONS AND ORDERS.—If an acquisition targeting a United States person under paragraph 1 or this paragraph is proposed to be conducted both inside and outside the United States, a judge having jurisdiction under subparagraph (A) and section 103(a) may issue simultaneously, upon the request of the Government in a joint application complying with the requirements of subparagraph (B) and section 104 or 303, orders authorizing the proposed acquisition under subparagraph (B) and section 105 or 304, as applicable.

''(G) CONCURRENT AUTHORIZATION.—If an order authorizing electronic surveillance or physical search has been obtained under section 105 or 304 and that order is in effect, the Attorney General may authorize, during the pendency of such order and without an order under this paragraph, an acquisition under this paragraph of foreign intelligence information targeting that United States person while such person is reasonably believed to be located outside the United States. Prior to issuing such an authorization, the Attorney General shall submit dissemination provisions of minimization procedures for such an acquisition to a judge having jurisdiction under subparagraph (A) for approval.

The Government may appeal an order under this clause pursuant to subsection (f).

''(B) the factual basis for issuance of an order under this subsection to approve such acquisition exists,

the Attorney General may authorize the emergency acquisition if a judge having jurisdiction under subsection (a)(1) is informed by the Attorney General, or a designee of the Attorney General, at the time of such authorization that the decision has been made to conduct such acquisition and if an application in accordance with this subsection is made to a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court as soon as practicable, but not more than 168 hours after the Attorney General authorizes such acquisition.

''(3) LIMITATIONS.—

''(A) MOVING OR MISIDENTIFIED TARGETS.—In the event that the targeted United States person is reasonably believed to be in the United States during the pendency of an order issued pursuant to subsection (c), such acquisition shall cease until authority is obtained pursuant to this Act or the targeted United States person is again reasonably believed to be located outside the United States during the pendency of an order issued pursuant to subsection (c).

PETER N. KIRSANOW, OF OHIO, TO BE A MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD FOR THE TERM OF FIVE YEARS EXPIRING AUGUST 27, 2008, VICE RONALD E. MEISBURG, WHICH WAS SENT TO THE SENATE ON JANUARY 9, 2007.

SENATE—Monday, January 28, 2008

The Senate met at 2 p.m. and was called to order by the Honorable JIM WEBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Dr. Barry C. Black, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

O God of divine love, help our Senators today to rise to the challenge of the needs of our world. Inspire them to do this by making new commitments to You, followed by faithful service. Make them strong in Your strength, that they will not become weary in doing Your will. Help them to understand that the riches of our lives and this great land have been given to us by Your loving providence.

Remind them also that to whom much is given, much is expected, and that they are accountable to You for their stewardship as they journey through life. Empower our lawmakers to use their considerable abilities to serve You and humanity.

We pray in the Name of Him who gave His life for all. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable JIM WEBB led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, January 28, 2008.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable JIM WEBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,

Mr. WEBB thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

RENDERING PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, a year ago today, the Presiding Officer gave one of the classic speeches in American history as a freshman Senator responding to the State of the Union Message. It was a message that was accepted on both sides of the aisle by the people of Virginia and everyone in this country. I wish to remind the Senator what a great public service he rendered last year in giving this speech.

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. REID. We are going to try to get approved very quickly—we are cleared on this side; we are waiting to have the Republicans clear Governor Schafer to be the Secretary of Agriculture. We would like to get that done in the next little bit. After we do this, it takes the White House a number of hours to get all the paperwork in order so that he can be sworn in. It would be really nice if we could get him to attend the State of the Union Address tonight. This would be extremely good.

President Bush has nominated him. This will be the last State of the Union speech the President will give, and it would be good if he had a Secretary of Agriculture there during those proceedings. So as soon as it is cleared by the Republicans, we will clear Governor Schafer to be the Secretary of Agriculture.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—S. 2248

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the previously scheduled cloture vote on the substitute amendment occur at 4:40 p.m. today and that all provisions under the previous order remain in effect. Our staffs have talked; I am confident the Republican leader is aware of this.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, this afternoon the Senate will be in a period of morning business until 3 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak for up to 10 minutes each, with the time equally divided and controlled between the two leaders.

At 3 p.m., the Senate will resume consideration of the FISA legislation. The time until 4:40 p.m. will be equally divided and controlled between the two leaders or their designees, with the final 20 minutes equally divided and controlled between the two leaders, with the majority leader controlling the final 10 minutes.

At 4:40 p.m., the Senate will proceed to vote on the motion to invoke cloture on the Rockefeller-Bond substitute amendment. If cloture is not invoked on the substitute, the Senate will then proceed to a second vote on the motion to invoke cloture on the Reid amendment to the underlying bill.

As a reminder, there is a 4 p.m. filing deadline for second-degree amendments.

At 9 p.m. tonight, the President will deliver the State of the Union Address to a joint session of Congress. Senators will gather in the Senate Chamber at 8:20 p.m. and then proceed as a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives at 8:30.

Senators are encouraged to attend the Secretary of the Senate annual State of the Union supper tonight at 6:30 p.m. in S–211.

MEASURE PLACED ON THE CALENDAR—S. 2557

Mr. REID. Mr. President, S. 2557 is at the desk and due for a second reading.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the bill by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2557) to extend the Protect America Act of 2007 until July 1, 2009.

Mr. REID. I object to any further proceedings with respect to this bill at this time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

REMEMBERING GORDON B. HINCKLEY

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I would say very briefly that someone I have gotten to know over the last number of years died last night at 7 o'clock—the leader of the Mormon Church, a man who has been instrumental in the tremendous growth of the church. During his period of time, the church has grown by millions of new people coming into the church. He has been a phenomenal builder, building scores of new temples around the world. As we speak, there is one new church building being built every day, being dedicated every day. That is a lot of construction. I was told last week that the largest single builder of buildings in the United States next to the Federal Government is the LDS Church, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, of which this good man was the leader.

He is someone who has done some very unique things. He started what is called the Perpetual Education Fund. About half the members of the church are located outside of the United States. Millions of members of the church are located in Mexico, Central and South America. He started what is, as I have indicated, called the Perpetual Education Fund, which is a voluntary contribution made from members of the church to help these people who are coming into the church be educated. As a result, tens of thousands of people are now educated and are now church and community leaders around the world.

There is so much more that could be said about this good man who was kind and gentle and epitomized everything that is good in mankind, and certainly on a personal basis I will miss him greatly.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized.

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I am not aware of any problems with regard to the nominee for Secretary of Agriculture, and we are running a hotline on this side. I anticipate that it will be cleared shortly, and that will be a confirmation we hopefully can get out of the way at some point this afternoon.

WORKING OR BLAMING

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, tonight, in keeping with an old custom, the President will speak to Congress and the Nation about the state of the Union. Every President since George Washington has given these periodic updates because the Constitution requires them to do so.

While the Constitution makes no similar demands on congressional leaders, there is no doubt that this year the American people are demanding something from us. They are looking for proof that Republicans and Democrats can come together to get a few things done on their behalf.

Just 1 week into the session, and we are faced with a crucial test, two issues of vital significance to every American citizen: Will we reauthorize a terror-fighting tool that we know has made us safer, and will we put money back into the taxpayers' hands quickly enough for it to have a positive effect on the Nation's economy? It is not an exaggeration to say that the choices we make on these issues will show the public whether we are serious about protecting them from harm and serious about protecting their wallets. So the question is this: Will we find a way to work together or will we find a way to get out of it and then blame the other side?

We got off to a good start. Last Thursday, millions of Americans were absolutely stunned to turn on their television sets and see the Democratic Speaker of the House and the House Republican leader standing together on a stage behind the Treasury Secretary from the Bush administration and nodding in agreement about an economic growth package they had all worked out among themselves. It was the kind of scene many people have wondered if they would ever see again.

For the first time in years, the parties have come together in good faith and responded swiftly to a pressing national concern. They sensed that the Nation was impatient for action, and so they gave up a lot of what they wanted in order to find common ground. House Republicans made major sacrifices. So did House Democrats. Now the Nation's attention turns to us, to the Senate, to see if we are capable of the same. Here is our moment to show that we are.

A number of Senators have expressed a desire to add to this package tens of billions of dollars in spending on contentious programs. But we don't have the time for ideological debates. In order for this plan to work, Congress needs to act and to act at once.

This is not the package, frankly, that I would have put together. In my view, the best way to stimulate the economy would be to lower marginal rates. But neither is it the package my good friend, the majority leader, would have put together. I gather from his public statements he would prefer there be more spending on Government programs. The Speaker and the House Republican leader would also have built a package differently if they had written it on their own, but they put their differences aside because they know we will all get nothing if we are not willing to make some serious sacrifices.

The editorial writers at the Washington Post urged us Friday not to let the perfect be the enemy of the good. Low- and middle-income taxpayers certainly agree. They are tapping their fingers wondering if we can do it.

Americans are also wondering if we can agree on something as fundamental as our national security, and for good reason. We saw some worrisome signs last week that some of our friends were looking for a way out of what would be and could be a good bipartisan achievement on reauthorizing a terrorist surveillance program.

They should remember that 3 years ago, following the lead of the 9/11 Commission, Congress came together to create the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, approving the bill that established it by a vote of 89 to 2. The Director of National Intelligence was supposed to be the person who would connect the dots, who would make sure intelligence gaps were closed, who could look across the entire intelligence landscape and tell us about our vulnerabilities before terrorists discovered them on their own.

Last year, he did just that. The Director of National Intelligence came to Capitol Hill and asked us to either fix the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that allowed us to monitor foreign terrorists overseas or risk weakening this vital intelligence-gathering tool.

Our friends across the aisle put off action for months before finally passing a temporary revision right up against the August recess. Then they delayed again last fall, pushing us up against the expiration of the temporary extension. Now they are delaying again.

There is only one version of a long-term extension that agrees with the recommendations of the Director of National Intelligence, and that is the pending Rockefeller-Bond substitute bill. This bill was carefully crafted on a strong bipartisan basis and reported out of the Intelligence Committee on a vote of 13 to 2. It is the only version the Director of National Intelligence has approved. It is the only version the President would sign. Therefore, it is the only one that has any chance of becoming law before the current extension expires on Friday of this week.

The time to act has long since passed. We need to approve Rockefeller-Bond, and we need to do it this week.

Some of our friends on the other side say they will not vote for cloture on Rockefeller/Bond because they could not amend it. No one should be deceived by this complaint. The amendments they want would transform it into a replica of the partisan bill that was reported out of the Judiciary Committee last fall. In other words, allowing amendments would guarantee failure.

Some of our friends on the other side say they want a 1-month extension. Never mind that we have had 10 months to act already. No one should be deceived by this complaint either. The real reason for the 1-month extension, of course, is to give Members who vote in favor of it the political cover they need to vote against Rockefeller/Bond. This is another clever way to make the bill fail.

Some of our friends on the other side say we are wrong to insist that phone carriers who may have cooperated with the Government in tracking terrorists be immune from lawsuits. The implication is that this is some kind of a favor for big business. But this advice is coming from the intelligence community, not politicians, because they know that we could never expect these companies—or any others—to cooperate in the future as long as the threat of a lawsuit looms.

Finally, some of our friends accuse us of being scaremongers for urging passage now. But the terrorist threat has not diminished since 9/11. It hasn't expired. The Director of National Intelligence assures us it hasn't. The memory of 9/11 tells us it has not. Attacks in Madrid and London and Bali tell us it has not. And the terrorists themselves tell us it has not. The threat is real. And we cannot let success in preventing another one keep us from staying on offense with all the tools and resources we have. The bottom line is this: by voting for cloture on Rockefeller/Bond, Members will guarantee that this important antiterror tool does not expire. And those who vote against it are voting either to delay its reauthorization or to weaken, not strengthen, our terror-fighting tools.

Fixing FISA is within our grasp. Will we come together and embrace the compromise approach that protects us, and doesn't force companies to make a false choice between the good of the firm or the good of the country or will we go the partisan route? It would be a worrisome sign indeed if the first bill Democrats filibuster this year deals with national security. We must resist the mistakes of last year, and act.

Last week, we saw the kind of tough compromise that's necessary when lawmakers are more concerned about making a difference than making a political point. Now it is our turn. The second session is young. But the choices we make this week will define us. And in my view, it is a welcome opportunity.

Here in the second week of the session we have a chance to show Americans that we can work together on their behalf, to solve problems; to protect their security and protect their wallets. This is a defining moment for the 110th Congress. Let's put the mistakes of last year behind us. Let's show that the U.S. Senate can get the job done.

I yield the floor.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, leadership time is reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period of morning business until 3 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 10 minutes each, with the time equally divided between the two leaders or their designees.

The Senator from Utah is recognized.

DEATH OF GORDON B. HINCKLEY,

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, as the majority leader noted, last night Gordon B. Hinckley, the oldest serving president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the history, passed away. He was 97 years old. Many might think that in lasting until 97 he passed away as a wasted, worn-out man. That is not true. President Hinckley was energetic and enthusiastic and fully engaged within just a day or two of his passing. With my senior colleague Senator HATCH, I have had meetings with him and the other leaders of the church and was always amazed at how well connected he was. He read the papers. He watched the television. He knew what was going on in the world outside the church every bit as much as we did. His memory was phenomenal. There are many people who were 20 to 30 years his junior who could not remember current items of news as well as he could.

So it is appropriate we take a moment or two to comment on the stewardship and contribution of this great man at the time of his passing. We do not mourn for him. He has joined his wife, his parents, and those others who have gone before him who may have a little sense of ''Gordon, what took you so long?'' But he stayed at his job and he fulfilled his stewardship in an impressive manner. The mourning we have on this occasion is mourning for ourselves, for the loss we have sustained in seeing this great and good man go on.

I have made mention of his energy. I should also mention his enthusiasm. He had a great zest for life. He was always looking forward to the next activity and the next opportunity. Along with his energy and enthusiasm, he was a man of humility and humor. You were never quite sure when he stood at the pulpit to speak if he was going to say something that would put you at ease and make you laugh, because that happened much more often than it did with some others who were a little more serious in their message. His messages were always serious, but they always had that touch of humor.

The last message we heard from him, speaking to the entire world in general, and to the church specifically, was his sermon of last October. I am sure he did not know that would be his final sermon to the members of the church. But it started out again with a touch of Hinckley humor. He noted, as he stood to speak, that singers will sing the same song over and over again, as people ask them to perform; orchestras will play the same symphony over and over again; but speakers are always expected to say something new. He said that bothered him a little, as he was going to repeat a sermon he had given before. After we smiled at his early comments, we heard a lecture on anger. He talked about the toxic effects of anger and how we should do our very best, both in our personal lives and in our professional lives, and, if I may, here in the Senate in national dialog, to do away with the sense of anger.

I have just returned from the annual session in Davos, Switzerland, where I heard a lot of people who could benefit from that sermon, as there was a lot of anger people had toward other governments and other government officials.

I will not in any way attempt to capsulize what President Hinckley had to say about anger, except to demonstrate that this was his benediction prior to his death to the members of his church, telling them not to be angry with their families, not to be angry in their communities, and not to be angry with the world.

A former Apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ, Paul, spoke in his letter to the Corinthians about the three most important attributes of a Christian: Faith, hope, and charity. Gordon B. Hinckley spoke of these same attributes and lived them in his life. But he put them, if you will, in modern terms: Optimism, confidence, and love. A sermon telling us not to be angry with our fellow men is a fitting capstone to the stewardship of this man. It is a modern way of saying Paul's term ''charity'' or the pure love of Christ. We shall miss him.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah, Mr. HATCH, is recognized.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for about 5 minutes on Gordon B. Hinckley.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I associate myself with the remarks of my colleague from Utah, Senator BENNETT. He basically stated in very articulate terms how important President Gordon B. Hinckley was, not just to Senator BENNETT and myself, but to people all over the world.

I express my deepest empathy, sympathy, and love to the family of Gordon B. Hinckley. I agree with Senator BENNETT, that President Hinckley in dying was happy to go and again be with his beloved eternal companion, Marjorie, whom he missed, who died about 4 years before him, and to be with others he has known here on this Earth, and others he would like to know who helped to make this country the greatest in the world, and many others as well. I extend my deep sympathy to his family—a wonderful family; they are terrific people.

President Hinckley was as ecumenical as a person could be. He led a worldwide church, the fifth largest church in America, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He basically taught all of us to understand that all religions are good and that we should work together. I don't think there has been a humanitarian mission or a major disaster anywhere in the world where the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints—nicknamed the Mormons—hasn't cooperated with Catholic charities and other Christian charities—especially Catholic charities—to immediately go into action and provide the needed food, clothing, pharmaceuticals, et cetera, all over the world. These two charities have done so much. He made sure our members—13 million strong around the world—participated in each humanitarian concern. In fact, we have thousands and thousands of humanitarian missionaries all over the world. Many are older people who are retired and are giving 18 months, or even more, of their time—and some less—to be able to bring humanitarian help to people all over the world. This man led that. He was also a great business leader. Imagine, we had a man like this run this very important worldwide church.

Senator BENNETT mentioned his sense of humor. You hardly heard a set of remarks by President Hinckley where he didn't very wittily make his points even better than he would have if they were just stern and tough. He was never stern and tough, unless it was essential. He was always kind and loving. He was kind to me. Elaine, my wife, and I personally love him and we are going to miss him very much. He traveled all over the world. I have traveled all over the world, and generally have done it on military planes with military liaisons helping us and carrying our bags, doing everything to make it a reasonable trip. I come back beat every time. In every case, I wanted to kiss the ground when I got back here. He traveled extensively all over the world, almost a million miles. In that regard, I pay tribute to Jon Huntsman, Sr., who made it possible in his later years for him to have a very good airplane that I think extended his life for a longer period of time for the benefit of mankind all over this world. It was a wonderful thing.

He had love for all human beings and he expressed that love not only through his words but also through his actions.

I might add that, as Senator REID mentioned, he established the perpetual education fund where members of our faith donate millions of dollars every year to help unfortunate young people in these foreign lands to be able to go to school and raise their educational level so they can become leaders in their own country, and so they can make great contributions. I think it is one of the most inspired things I have ever seen. We have thousands of young men and women who are now leaders in their countries—teachers, doctors, lawyers, and others—all because of the vision of this great man, whom we call a prophet.

I might mention that in his travels he dedicated dozens of temples, the most of any president of the church, all over the world. To LDS people those temples are extremely important. We believe marriage is so sacred and it is for all eternity, not just this life. Frankly, we try to live that way. Many do. These temples are extremely important to us. He went all over the world doing it.

I can truthfully say this is a man I loved. He was a profound influence on Senator BENNETT, me, and millions of others. He was a man who got along with leaders of other faiths. He taught us we must respect everybody.

Today I add my voice to those of 13 million other members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in bidding farewell to our beloved prophet, President Gordon Bitner Hinckley. His death late yesterday in his home in Salt Lake City has reminded us that all good things must come to an end. It is a sad day for all Utahns. We have lost our friend, our leader, and our fellow servant. President Hinckley lived great, and he died great in the eyes of God and his people, leaving behind him a fame and a name which will be known for generations to come.

In our effort to follow in President Hinckley's footsteps, Latter-day Saints found they had to lengthen their stride to keep up with him. Even into the sunset of his life, President Hinckley was indefatigable. He set a vigorous pace, traveling the world and sharing his message of service, love, and compassion with millions of all faiths. Everywhere our prophet traveled, he succored the weak, lifted the hands which hung down, and strengthened the feeble knees. When I think of the blessing President Hinckley was to those around him, I am reminded of the words from the great Mormon hymn, ''Every day some burden lifted, every day some heart to cheer, every day some hope the brighter, blessed honored pioneer.''

President Hinckley was born to humble surroundings on June 23, 1910, in Salt Lake City, UT. He attended public schools, and graduated with a bachelor's of arts from the University of Utah. His first job was as a newspaper carrier for Utah's Deseret News. This modest start with a newspaper was a prelude of things to come. President Hinckley became the most media savvy leader the LDS Church has ever known, sharing his warmth and spirit with countless reporters, cultivating great friendships with notables like Larry King and Mike Wallace. Wallace once described President Hinckley as ''a man I admire and I love really, because he's just an extraordinary guy.''

As many Latter-day Saints do, Gordon B. Hinckley served a mission for the church while he was young. President Hinckley served in Great Britain in the 1930s, sharing the gospel's message of peace and hope during a time of great political and economic turmoil. Discouraged by the lack of receptivity he found among the Britons, he confided his dismay to his father, who instructed the young Gordon to ''forget himself and go to work.''

Young Gordon did, both in Great Britain and in the 70 years of service that followed.

His love of God fueled his love of country. President Hinckley carried the torch of patriotism, and the spirit of America burned in his heart. He once said, ''I love America for [its] great constitutional strength, for the dedication of its people to the peace and the prosperity of the entire earth. I love America for the tremendous genius of its scientists, its laboratories, its universities, its researchers, and the tens of thousands of facilities devoted to the improvement of human health and comfort, to the extension of life, to better communication and transportation. Its great throbbing and thriving industries have blessed the entire world. The standard of living of its people has been the envy of the entire Earth. Its farmlands have yielded an abundance undreamed of by most people of the Earth. The entrepreneurial environment in which has grown its industry has been the envy of and model for many other nations.''

President Hinckley's patriotism inspired him to great acts of civic service, in addition to his church duties. He was a chairman or board member of many businesses and educational entities. He received honorary doctorates from five colleges and universities, the Distinguished Service Award from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Silver Buffalo Award from the Boy Scouts of America, and special recognition for his contributions to tolerance from the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

President Hinckley's ministry earned him national prominence. In 2004, President George W. Bush awarded our prophet with the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the Nation's highest civil award. President Hinckley was one of the spiritual leaders President Bush invited to the White House following the September 11 attacks. It was a great honor, both for him and our faith, that the President invited him to that gathering. A few months later, on the eve of the Winter Olympics in 2002, President Bush said, ''President Hinckley represents a great religion, he is a strong part of the American scene.''

But President Hinckley never let his love of the United States obscure his vision for the rest of the world. Prior to becoming the LDS president in 1995, Hinckley supervised the church's organization in Asia, Europe, and South America. During his tenure, the number of members living inside North America was surpassed by those living outside of it. The nations of the Earth heard his voice and he brought them a knowledge of the truth by the wonderful testimony which he bore.

As president, he administered to both the ecclesiastical and temporal needs of the church, whose 13 million members are spread over some 160 nations and territories. President Hinckley lifted his voice on every continent, in cities large and small, from north to south and east to west across this broad world. One global vision President Hinckley had for the LDS Church was a perpetual education fund, whereby members in wealthier nations could donate to the education of those in developing nations, thereby empowering them to help themselves and strengthening the infrastructure in struggling parts of the world, particularly Latin America.

When he became president of the church in 1995, the church had only 47 temples, our special meeting houses such as the magnificent one in nearby Kensington, MD. Thanks to President Hinckley's vision of expansion, today there are 124 in operation, and 12 more are under construction.

One of his first messages upon becoming our prophet in 1995 was a proclamation to the world, declaring the divine nature of the family unit and providing direction on how to nurture strong family relationships. There is no greater duty or privilege among the Latter-day Saints than to serve our families. President Hinckley admirably demonstrated that service as a grandfather, father, and husband to his eternal companion, Marjorie, who walked side by side with him for two-thirds of a century.

Now he and Marjorie are walking together in the fields of paradise, enjoying a richly deserved peace in the Lord. I am sure at this time he would remind us that death is the great equalizer. No matter what a man or woman may accomplish in this life, this final inevitability is waiting for them. Shortly before his own passing, perhaps seeing the end was nigh, President Hinckley told church members, ''A man must get his satisfaction from his work each day, must recognize that his family may remember him, that he may count with the Lord, but beyond that, small will be his monument among the coming generations.''

Our heads are bowed now, as we bid him farewell. Gordon Bitner Hinckley joins the ranks of departed prophets, on whose shoulders he stood and in whose mighty company he can now proudly mingle. God be with you, our friend, till we meet again.

I have to say, he stood for everything that was good, and I love him.

I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

FISA

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I have sought recognition to speak briefly in opposition to the motion to invoke cloture. The amendment which I have filed goes to the heart of the issue on removing liability from the telephone companies to impose retroactive immunity. The amendment which I have filed and has been discussed on the floor of the Senate would substitute the Government for the party defendant, where the Government would have the same defenses—no more, no less.

For example, the telephone companies do not have the defense of governmental immunity; and the Government, when substituted, would not have the defense of governmental immunity. The telephone companies can plead state secrets to foreclose the litigation; and when the Government would be substituted, for example, the Government could assert the doctrine of state secrets in order to foreclose the litigation.

If the motion to invoke cloture is granted, I am advised by the Parliamentarian my amendment would not be germane and, therefore, would be stricken. We went through a long session last year where the argument was made, repeatedly and persuasively, not to invoke cloture—the argument advanced on this side of the aisle—in order to give Members on this side of the aisle an opportunity to propose their amendments. Now we have the first situation sought to be applied, and it is my hope this body will reject the cloture motion.

There has been very little time spent on this very important subject in this body, and when you have a matter of the importance of retroactive immunity, where you are going to shut off the courts of the United States from hearing cases that are already pending, there ought to be time for consideration of an amendment such as the one Senator WHITEHOUSE and I have offered to substitute the U.S. Government.

The purpose of our amendment is to comport with the basic constitutional provision of separation of powers, which is the cornerstone of the Constitution, and we have found, regrettably, it has been inadequate to have congressional supervision, congressional oversight, because of its ineffectiveness. For example, when the Judiciary Committee seeks to obtain records on the destruction of CIA tapes, you find the administration resisting and the inevitable argument of politics. When the court issues an order, as the Federal Court did last week for a report on the destruction of documents, seeking to find out what happened on the destruction of the CIA documents, the court can't be charged with politics. We find in Rasul, and in other litigation matters, the judicial branch has been effective in maintaining the separation of power.

One further comment. It is a surprise to me that the amendment which I have offered with Senator WHITEHOUSE has been ruled nongermane. I took a look at Webster's International Dictionary and germane is defined as:

closely or significantly related; relevant; pertinent; closely akin.

I consulted with a Parliamentarian and asked why our amendment was ruled as nongermane, and the answer given was because there was no specific statement of the underlying bill on governmental liability. In pursuing the issue with the Parliamentarian, I then said: I am going to seek to change the rules.

It seems to me peculiar, if not absurd, that my amendment, the Specter-Whitehouse amendment, would not be germane under the common meaning of the English language. I said: Suppose we change the rules to provide that it was relevant? And the answer I got, and I don't want to misquote anybody, was that: Yes, that would stand the test of relevancy. As he put it, a more permissive standard.

So then I checked the definition of relevant in Webster's International Dictionary, and it says:

Bearing upon or connected with the matter in hand; to the purpose; pertinent, raise, lift up, syn applicable, germane, appropriate, suitable, fitting.

Well, the key part about the definition of relevant is that one of the synonyms is germane, just as one of the synonyms of germane is relevant. Now, it is a loss to me. I have been here a while, and I have had a hard time understanding the ruling of what is germane, and I have never seen one as close to the core point as putting the Government as a substitute for the telephone companies, but somehow it is not germane.

So I wish to put my colleagues on notice that I intend to try to change the rules. I can't see why one is necessary when Webster's has germane as a substitute for relevant and relevant as a substitute for germane. If the Parliamentarian thinks that relevant is OK, it is, again, hard for me to see why germane is not. A little surprising.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for question? I don't want to interrupt his comments.

Mr. SPECTER. I will.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, morning session is up at 3, and I am scheduled for 15 minutes. I might ask to extend the time. I don't know how much time the Senator is going to use, but I want to make certain I have the opportunity that was previously ordered, for 15 minutes on this side.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is 10 minutes, 12 seconds remaining, and morning business is under the control of the majority.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, how much additional time does the Senator from Pennsylvania need?

Mr. SPECTER. Less than a minute.

Mr. DORGAN. Let me ask unanimous consent that we extend by 5 minutes the time for morning business so it terminates at 3:05.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DORGAN. I thank my colleague for his courtesy.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

Well, I have made my argument. I think it is important to have a ruling, a vote by this body on whether we are going to apply retroactive immunity to the telephone companies. I said on the floor last week that if my amendment is not adopted, I will support retroactive immunity. I think it is a bad practice, but I think, as bad as that practice is, it would be worse to cut off the information which our intelligence community thinks we need. I think it is not advisable. And when we have a method of having both objectives, that is to have the Government have access to the information and at the same time not impose the cutting off of the judicial system for checks and balances, I think that ought to be adopted.

And further, a final comment on the hard-to-understand definition of germane. The dictionary defines it as being relevant, and the dictionary defines relevant as being germane, with the Parliamentarian giving a supplemental opinion that if the standard was relevance, it would be appropriate to have the amendment.

I thank the Chair, and I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota.

ECONOMIC STIMULUS

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, tonight we will hear from the President in his annual State of the Union Address. I know the President is expected to talk a great deal about the economy and the need for an economic stimulus package. I wanted to talk for a moment about this because I think it is important for us to understand what is happening to our economy.

I know there are some who think the field of economics is some field with precision and elegance and that we are dealing with the ship of state. If we can find our way to the engine room and find all the knobs and gauges and valves and levers and turn them the right way, such as providing an investment credit and bonus depreciation, that somehow we will get this ship of state moving again. Of course, that is not what is at stake at all. There isn't an engine room with knobs and valves and gauges. This is the field of economics, which I have said previously is a lot like psychology pumped up with helium.

So we talk a lot about knowing what is going on. The fact is we are going to now do a stimulus package because there is a notion that there is a problem with the economy. Well, there is more than a problem, there is a very serious problem with this economy. Take a look at the stock market, which is a barometer of confidence—up and down similar to a yo-yo—mostly down. The housing market has cratered, with construction of new homes and apartments in 2007 down 25 percent from the prior year. That is one of the giant job engines in our economy—the housing market. The unemployment rate has jumped, with some 1.4 million workers without a job for 27 months or longer. The trade deficit recently hit a 14-month high. Oil prices are still way up. Retail sales are their worst in years. So we have a very serious problem.

Now, the Federal Reserve Board took bold action last week and that is unusual for the Federal Reserve Board. They all wear gray suits and wire-rimmed glasses and seldom do anything that is very bold, but last week they did. They cut interest rates by three-quarters of 1 percent. So the expectation is that because the Fed is taking that action and seems to be very concerned about the economy, that we should take a look at our fiscal policy, so there is talk about a stimulus.

Frankly, I think a stimulus package is fine. I don't think it does all that much. But the absence of doing something on the Senate side of Congress would send the wrong signal. Psychologically, it is important we work on a stimulus. We are talking about a stimulus that is probably 1 percent of our economy, so it is not exactly going to jump start the American economy. In addition, if all we do is a stimulus package and we continue to ignore the fundamentals, the things that are structurally wrong in this economy, the things that have not just caused the economy to be in some trouble but caused the American people and people all around the world to look at us and say: You know something, you are off track. You are not addressing the things that matter, and this is unsustainable. If we don't do something to address those things, we will not be addressing the basic problem of our economy.

So let me talk about that. No. 1, a fiscal policy. A reckless fiscal policy. I mean, in recent years, think of it. This administration inherited a large budget surplus. Then we got hit with a recession, a war in Afghanistan, a war in Iraq, a war on terrorism—and a whole series of events—including Hurricane Katrina. Many of us said to the President: Don't propose we spend surpluses that don't yet exist. Let us be conservative. He said: Katy bar the door, let us have big tax cuts and most of it for the wealthy, and he pushed it through Congress.

Now, I didn't push for it, he did, and we ran up a huge deficit because of all these unexpected circumstances we were confronted with. So now, in recent years, we have sent soldiers off to war, and the President says to Congress: We are sending soldiers to go fight, but we don't intend to pay for it. I want the Congress to provide emergency spending in order to pay for that, and we will add it to the debt. Last year, he asked Congress for $196 billion for the current fiscal year. That is $16 billion a month, $4 billion a week, none of it paid for, and all of it added to the debt. As if to say to the soldiers: You go fight, and when you come home, we will have you and your kids pay the bills. That is a fiscal policy that is completely off balance.

We are going to borrow about $600 billion this year. That is how much will be added to the debt. I know that is not what they say the deficit is. They say the deficit is lower because, among other things, they are taking all the Social Security surplus from the trust funds and using it to show a lower deficit. We are going to borrow about $600 billion a year to sustain the budget policies of this administration. Add to that a $700 billion to $800 billion a year trade deficit, $2 billion a day every single day, and you are talking about a combined red ink in our budget and trade policies of some $1.3 trillion. That is almost 10 percent of the American economy. Think of that. That is unsustainable.

Now, add to a reckless fiscal policy and a trade policy in which we are hemorrhaging red ink and exporting American jobs, regulators who were asleep on the job—people who came to Government but didn't want to regulate—and the subprime loan scandal occurred right under their noses. We all heard the advertisements. When you turned on the television, you heard the ads. It couldn't have escaped the notice of the regulators, surely. The ads said: Have you been bankrupt? Do you have trouble getting credit? Have you been missing your house payments? Come to us. We have a loan for you. We will give you a new home mortgage. And so they did, with a teaser rate at 2 percent and unbelievable circumstances.

Everybody was making lots of money. The brokers were making millions, the mortgage banks were making a lot of money, and then they were packing these mortgage loans, the good ones, with the bad ones, just like they used to pack sausage with meat and sawdust. They would use the sawdust as filler back in the old days.

Well, during unregulated times, just like packing sawdust into sausages, what these folks did is, they took good loans and bad loans, packaged them up. They sliced them up, then they securitized them, and sent them out, sold them, and everybody was happy and everybody was fat and everybody was making a lot of money, until it all came home to roost. A whole lot of folks could not make housing payments.

So what we found with the subprime loan scandal is 2.2 million families with subprime loans will lose their homes to foreclosure; 7.2 million with subprime mortgages have an outstanding mortgage value of $1.3 trillion. And when those interest rates reset, a whole lot of them will not be able to pay the bills to keep their homes.

All of this happened under the nose of regulators who came to Government not wanting to regulate. And it caused severe damage to our country. Now, add to that a reckless fiscal policy, a trade deficit in which we are hemorrhaging in red ink and shipping jobs overseas and a scandal in the home mortgage industry that caused enormous damage to our country, made a lot of folks rich in the short term, and victimized a lot of others. Add to that the unbelievable speculation that is going on in hedge funds, most all of it outside of the view of regulators.

Hedge funds are about $1.2 to $1.5 trillion in value; but that does not describe their importance to the economy. They are heavily leveraged. That $1.2 to $1.5 trillion of hedge funds is engaged in one-half of all of the trades every day on the New York Stock Exchange. They are engaged in, among other things, credit default swaps.

There is something called credit default swaps, derivatives, with notional values of $43 trillion. There is so much unbelievable speculation with dramatic amounts of leverage in hedge funds and derivatives that it is scary. Nobody knows what is going on because it is outside the view of regulators. That is the way they want to keep it.

We will talk about stimulus; we will talk about short-term measures. But if we do not deal with this issue of a fiscal policy that is way off track, a trade policy that is an abject failure, regulators who have no interest in regulating, scandals will develop and mature right under their noses, this country is not going to recover. Our economy is not going to thrive and grow. It is fine to do a stimulus package of 1 percent of GDP, I do not object to that. We will borrow the money from China, likely, to do it; perhaps put some money in the hands of people who will go to Wal-Mart and buy goods from China, for all I know.

But, psychologically, I think it is fine to create a fiscal policy initiative that compliments what they are doing at the Fed with monetary policy. But that will not solve the underlying problems in our economy. We have deep abiding problems in fiscal policy, trade policy, and regulatory failures.

This Congress and this President have a responsibility to address them. Talking about stimulus, and just talking about stimulus, means we have not addressed that which moves this ship of state forward in the future, creating expansion opportunities and jobs and economic health. The only way we do that is to stare truth in the eye and understand what is causing the problems in the country and how to fix it.

There is an old saying on Wall Street I was told by a friend: You cannot tell who is swimming naked until the tide goes out. Well, the tide has gone out, and now we are going to see some sights that are not very pretty. It has to do with speculation and a whole series of things that we have to correct. And my hope is, starting this evening at the State of the Union Address and following that, at last long last, we might see a President and a Congress work together to face the truth about fiscal policy, trade policy, and inept regulation that has put this country in significant difficulty and trouble.

We need not have a future that manifests that trouble forever. If we take bold action and courageous action to understand what is wrong and what the menu of items are that we need to go to fix it, I think we can have a much better and brighter economic future in this country. I want to be a part of that work, and I know many of my colleagues do as well. So let's hope the first step to do that begins this evening at the joint session of the Congress at the State of the Union Address.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

NOMINATION DISCHARGED

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to executive session, that the Agriculture Committee be discharged of PN 1112, the nomination of Ed Schafer, to be Secretary of Agriculture; that the Senate proceed to the nomination, that the nomination be confirmed, and the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table; that any statements relating to the nomination be printed in the RECORD, the President be immediately notified of the Senate's action, and the Senate return to legislative session.

My understanding is this was cleared on both sides. I am particularly proud to make this request. Former Governor Schafer is a distinguished former Governor from our State. It is a great honor for our State to have him nominated.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BOND. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I wish to join with the Senator from North Dakota, who is doing a fine thing. We appreciate the support on both sides of the aisle. We obviously need a good and strong Secretary of Agriculture, and we are pleased to see this body move forward. I do not object. I thank the sponsors.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, might I also say as we ask for the consent that my colleague, Senator CONRAD, worked very hard to accomplish this in the Agriculture Committee. He joins me as well.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nomination considered and confirmed is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Ed Schafer, of North Dakota, to be Secretary of Agriculture.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now return to legislative session.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

FISA AMENDMENTS ACT OF 2007

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 2248, which the clerk will report by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2248) to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, to modernize and streamline the provisions of that Act, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Rockefeller/Bond amendment No. 3911, in the nature of a substitute.

Feingold/Dodd amendment No. 3909 (to amendment No. 3911), to require that certain records be submitted to Congress.

Bond amendment No. 3916 (to amendment No. 3909), of a perfecting nature.

Reid amendment No. 3918 (to the language proposed to be stricken by Rockefeller/Bond amendment No. 3911), relative to the extension of the Protect America Act of 2007.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the time until 4:40 shall be equally divided and controlled between the two leaders or their designees with the final 20 minutes equally divided between the two leaders, with the majority leader controlling the final 10 minutes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I have at least 10 minutes to give my remarks on FISA.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have been to this floor on numerous occasions to aggressively support the immunity provisions of the FISA modernization bill. I cannot understate my passion for this issue. I am of the firm belief that the lawsuits facing the telecom providers constitute a grave threat to national security. The potential risks from inadvertent disclosure of classified information cannot be understated. The potential damage to our intelligence sources and methods from allowing these lawsuits to go forward is substantial. Unfortunately, the more we delay this legislation, the more likely it is that our sensitive intelligence methods will be exposed, and not just exposed to the American people but to al-Qaida and thousands of other terrorists and enemies around the world. Remember, the very point of these lawsuits is to prove plaintiffs' claims by disclosing classified information through the discovery process.

Let's think about this. Do we really want any person to be able to make accusations that are utter hearsay and then be given the ability to jeopardize the intelligence community's sources and methods by demanding discovery during frivolous litigation?

We simply cannot do this. We should never reveal our intelligence agencies' technical capabilities, who they work with, who they target, or what their strengths and weaknesses are. We on the Intelligence Committees have that assignment because we are expected to honor the classified nature of those matters. The reasons should be obvious to all of us.

Here is an example that illustrates this point: If criminals are running drugs northbound along I–95, they may have an idea that they will encounter police checkpoints. But they need to transport the drugs, so they will balance this risk. But what if they know for sure there is a checkpoint in a specific State? What if they then find out the checkpoint is at a specific mile marker? Will they change their routes and methods? You better believe they will. They are not stupid and neither is al-Qaida. Does it really make sense for us to broadcast across the globe, over the Internet, how we work? Do we want to replace the uncertainty of how we track terrorists with established fact?

Confirmations or denials of the allegations in the lawsuits will certainly reveal certain intelligence agencies' sources and methods. Even when the proceedings are in camera or ex parte, this risk is still apparent. I cannot stress this point enough: The identity of any company that may or may not have cooperated with the Government with the terrorist surveillance program is highly classified. Accusations and hearsay do not confirm any relationship. The very activities these cases seek to disclose could reveal whether a company has or hasn't assisted the Government. In addition, any verdict in the case would likely provide the same type of information, and replacing the Government for these companies in the litigation does not solve the problem.

Our enemies have tough decisions to make regarding how they communicate. They cannot stay silent forever, and they have to weigh the need to communicate against the chances that their communications are intercepted. We know they are carefully watching us and following every proceeding to see how our Government collects information. If they think they see a weakness in our collection capabilities, they will certainly try to take advantage of it. Make no mistake, al-Qaida and the other terrorist organizations would benefit tremendously from learning the identity of any company that assisted the Government following the attacks of 9/11.

A few of my colleagues and many in the outside media have highlighted accusations from a former telecom employee. His name is Mark Klein. Mr. Klein claims he has proof that computers diverted domestic electronic communications from a phone company directly to the NSA, the National Security Agency. In fact, his accusations play a major role in one of the lawsuits currently facing a telecom provider.

It is important to note the Government chose not to classify Klein's declarations or exhibits in one of the lawsuits. The Government could have, but it didn't. So Klein's court documents are public. Due to the ongoing litigation, I do not want to speak directly to his claims, but I will highlight a statement that was made by an official representing the Government during a court proceeding in one of the lawsuits against a telecom provider. This statement was from the Assistant Attorney General on June 23, 2006, in front of Judge Vaughn Walker. Here is what was said about the decision not to classify Klein's declarations. This is the Government statement regarding Mark Klein:

> We have not asserted a privilege over the Klein declarations or exhibits. Mr. Klein and Marcus never had access to any of the relevant classified information here, and with all respect to them, through no fault or failure of their own, they don't know anything.

I cannot understate the importance of this quote as it has never been mentioned during this debate. No further commentary on it is needed, but I think its meaning is extremely important when Senators and the public weigh the relevancy and reliability of Klein's accusations. I am particularly hopeful that three of my distinguished colleagues who have highlighted Klein's claims on this floor are aware of these statements from the Government. I hope we all realize Klein's accusations highlight only one side of the story.

I also want to draw attention to another claim repeatedly made on this floor: the false declaration that the immunity provision in this bill will ''close the courthouse door.'' These claims seek to convey the false impression that the immunity provision in this bill will halt all litigation relating to the terrorist surveillance program, or TSP.

This is absolutely false. There are no fewer than seven lawsuits currently pending against Government officials that are related to the TSP. The immunity provision in this bill will not—I repeat that, will not—affect any of those cases. These cases are completely unaffected by the immunity provision in this bill.

Here are the cases. Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, Inc. v. George W. Bush; ACLU v. National Security Agency; Center for Constitutional Rights v. George W. Bush; Guzzi v. George W. Bush; Henderson v. Keith Alexander; Shubert v. George W. Bush; Tooley v. George W. Bush.

Finally, it is imperative for us to understand national security is greatly dependent on the cooperation of telecom providers. We cannot do it by ourselves. Yet many foreign governments are in quite the opposite situation, one which gives them an advantage in certain electronic interceptions. Many foreign telecoms are run by the respective host government. Many others have government officials with controlling authority. These countries do not have to worry about telecom cooperation. They can simply force the telecoms to comply.

We have chosen not to have that system in our great Nation. Rather, we rely on the voluntary assistance of telecommunication providers. When these companies are asked to assist the intelligence community based on a program authorized by the President and based on assurances from the highest levels of Government that the program has been determined to be lawful, they should be able to rely on these representations.

For those who argue we need a compromise, let me be clear: We already have a compromise. The Government wanted more than what is represented in this bill, and they did not get it. The chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence stated the following in the Intelligence Committee report:

> The [Intelligence] Committee did not endorse the immunity provision lightly. It was the informed judgment of the Committee after months in which we carefully reviewed the facts in the matter. The Committee reached the conclusion that the immunity remedy was appropriate in this case after holding numerous hearings and briefings on the subject and conducting thorough examination of the letters sent by the U.S. Government to the telecommunications companies.

The immunity provisions in this bill are limited in scope. Not everyone is going to be happy with them, and that is the whole point. I, for one, wanted to see more protection for companies and Government officials in this bill, but I am willing to accept the compromise, and my colleagues should be willing to do the same. We are not all getting what we want. We are getting what the public has to have—what the public needs.

We have been working on legislation to modernize FISA since at least April of 2007. I am extremely proud of the bipartisan efforts that led to this bill in the Intelligence Committee where all of the investigations were made, where the intelligence was protected. We found a balance. Let's show the confidence and resolve to vote on this compromise, not back away from it.

I will support cloture on the Rockefeller-Bond substitute amendment, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

In that regard, I pray that my colleagues will listen to the distinguished ranking member of the Intelligence Committee, Senator BOND, who has played a significantly proper and important role in helping to get this bill through the committee and to the Senate floor. This is a major bill of protection for our country, and I attribute much of the success of it to Senator ROCKEFELLER, the chairman of the committee, and Senator BOND, the ranking member, both of whom have been sterling leaders on this issue. I hope it is not true that anybody in this body will support some of the amendments that may be brought to the Senate floor because we have looked at this issue frontwards, backwards, all over the place. We have examined it. We spent many months on this subject in the Intelligence Committee. That should not be ignored. It passed the Intelligence Committee 13 to 2 compared to the substitute we defeated with cloture that was 10 to 9 in the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, I ask that we support cloture on this bill.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I believe our time on this side has expired. I thank my colleague from Utah, who is a valued member of the Intelligence Committee and the Judiciary Committee, truly a real authority in this area. When he speaks, he speaks from not only a great deal of knowledge but study. We are grateful for his assistance. He is a tremendous asset to this body in many ways but none more so than on the Intelligence Committee.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the vote to invoke cloture on the FISA bill. I have no choice but to vote against cloture in order to preserve the rights of my colleagues to have their amendments to this landmark legislation considered.

It has been a very weird process. The FISA legislation before the Senate has been taken, in effect, hostage. In a transparent attempt to score political points off of national security issues, the White House has decided, once again, that scaring the American people with unfounded and manipulative claims is in order.

The President's decision to use the FISA bill in a game of chicken represents a new low, even by Washington standards.

The administration's practice of placing politics above national security when it serves the poll-driven agenda of its advisers has become an addiction in this White House. Even when the Senate is on the verge of producing much needed national security legislation that the President supports and wants, the addictive political cravings that have coursed through the administration's body for the past 7 years kick in once again.

As is often the case, addictions produce behavior that is both irrational, and in this case more, unfortunately, self-destructive. In this case, the White House has misguidedly calculated that it is worth jeopardizing passage of a bill which they support, which strengthens the collection of foreign intelligence, in order to obtain a short-term political objective.

The White House is gambling with the safety of Americans and the continued cooperation of companies that we rely on to aid in our efforts to protect our country. It is time for the Senate to take a stand and reject these reprehensible tactics.

The Senate Intelligence Committee took enormous care to craft legislation that would give our intelligence community greater latitude to conduct surveillance of foreign targets while not compromising the constitutional and statutory protections afforded to Americans both here and overseas.

Senator KIT BOND and I worked extremely closely on that, as we did, as I will explain, with many others. This was a painstaking process. It went over many months, but it ultimately produced this balanced legislation that the vice chairman and the committee and I sought.

It is a solid bill. And I believe with some limited changes it can be a better bill; limited changes, I might add, that will in no way impede or in any way intrude into the collection of the intelligence we need.

Every step of the way during the process of producing this bill gave me great satisfaction. We worked in a consultive way with the administration. These discussions have always been in good faith. We have talked as professionals, trying to work out a hard problem to which most people do not pay a lot of attention but which has enormous consequences for our country, and we have done it in good faith, the very good faith that the actions of the White House now threaten to unravel.

From when the Intelligence Committee called on the administration to propose a FISA modernization bill last spring—the vice chairman and I did that—to the many committee hearings that followed, to section-by-section, line-by-line, word-by-word consultations too numerous to count that we had with the lawyers and intelligence experts in the Justice Department, from the National Security Agency, from the Office of the Director of National Intelligence to outside experts, we have worked in good faith with the administration to achieve, against, frankly, considerable odds, the unthinkable, to wit: a bipartisan bill dealing with the issues of profound complexity that has the endorsement of not only the President but also of the intelligence community professionals who will be the ones who carry out this surveillance. They want this bill.

The committee included in its FISA bill a narrowly crafted provision that would provide immunity for telecommunications companies that participated in the President's warrantless surveillance program after September 11 and until the program was placed under court authorization last January.

We rejected the administration's proposed open-ended language in defining very tailored immunity language. We rejected their open-ended language to extend immunity to Government officials. That was taken out. So if there was wrongdoing somewhere, do not make the assumption automatically, without thinking this thing through deeply, that it came from a private sector entity as opposed to public officials.

I realize this is a controversial matter with many of my colleagues, particularly on my side of the aisle, but I reject the games that are being played on both sides: by those Senators who are prepared to filibuster the bill due to their opposition to narrow immunity, and the administration's wishes to prevent the Senate from considering any alternative amendments to the immunity provision.

We should debate the liability issue fully, and the Senate should be allowed to consider alternative amendments. And I say this, and I think the vice chairman would agree with me, out of an abundance of confidence that the committee position will ultimately be sustained by the Senate in the end.

The majority leader has made prompt passage of the FISA bill the top priority for the Senate. He pushed off other subjects so that it could be conferenced with the House and eventually be placed on the President's desk for his signature. If allowed, the Senate can complete action on the FISA bill in a matter of a few days. Unlike many bills the Senate considers where the number of amendments that can be disposed of can approach or exceed 100 or 150 or 175, passage of the FISA bill will probably involve relatively modest numbers of amendments and a very manageable number of amendments.

I estimate that number would be somewhere in the 12-to-15 amendment range, probably fewer. Some of these amendments I would support as needed as improvements to the bill of the committee, the Intelligence Committee. Many I would oppose because of my concern that it would undo the careful balance we achieved in the underlying Committee bill. This is a stitched piece of work between collection of intelligence for the national security and the rights and privacy of individuals. I will oppose anything that undoes that balance.

The amendments that are likely to pass with a majority vote, at least in my view, such as the Feinstein exclusivity and Cardin sunset amendments, are further refinements of provisions already in the Intelligence Committee bill, and they in no way bear on the collection of intelligence authorities sought and provided by our bill. Those that would undercut these authorities to be able to do collection, I am confident, would go down to defeat.

But the Republican leadership, under orders from the White House, objected to these amendments being considered and voted on, and the bill passed before the February 1 expiration of the temporary and flawed Protect America Act passed last August. So that is where we are going to be unless we can resolve this in the Senate, which we could do by the end of the week.

Why? Why has the White House used obstructionist tactics to prevent the Senate from passing a FISA bill that it wants, that it has declared acceptable?

The President says he wants the Intelligence Committee bill passed as soon as possible. He said as recently as last Friday that he understands there may be some limited number of changes that will be needed to make the bill stronger. Others, including Minority Leader MCCONNELL and Vice Chairman BOND, also have acknowledged the reality that amendments will have to be brought up and voted on before the Senate can pass the bill. That is, after all, the way of the Senate.

Why, then, are they preventing the Senate from voting on the limited number of amendments before us and passing the bill, a bill that they want? Why? A bill that has everything to do with the future of our country, our national security, and a bill which we will not soon come to again if we don't achieve success in the coming days.

The majority leader has repeatedly offered the proposal to extend the February 1 expiration date in the current stopgap law 30 days to allow sufficient time to complete our work on the legislation. But each time this 30-day extension consent request was sought, it was killed by the Republican leadership under orders from the White House.

Why in the world would a temporary extension be objectionable to a President who is on record as saying he doesn't want the current law to expire without a more lasting FISA modernization bill in place? Yet, in one of the most astounding ''Alice in Wonderland'' moments I have ever witnessed in my time in the Senate, the White House announced last week that the President would veto a 30-day extension of the current foreign collection authorities passed by Congress.

So let's recap. The President wants the FISA bill passed by the Senate, but he has sent the decree down to the Republican leadership that they are to prevent its prompt passage. Well, prompt passage we have to have. The President does not want the current 6-month Protect America Act to expire this Friday. He does not want that to happen. But he has stated he will veto any extension and thereby ensure that it will expire. What more evidence is needed to demonstrate the irrational and self-destructive political addiction that drives this White House? Doesn't drive the vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee, I guarantee that.

Under the tortured logic of protecting America against terrorism, the White House has decided to exercise, frankly, its own form of political terrorism and has taken the FISA bill hostage.

From the beginning, the administration has demonstrated a deep-seated contempt for the role of Congress in authorizing and monitoring intelligence activities.

Whether it is the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program or the Central Intelligence Agency's secret detention and interrogation program, the White House for over 5 years walled off the Congress and the courts from conducting the sort of meaningful oversight and checks and balances that are essential to making sure our intelligence programs are on sound legal operational footing.

To make matters worse, the administration has successfully used objections and delaying tactics over the past 3 years to keep the intelligence authorization bill from being passed and signed into law. It is this flawed policy of Executive Branch unilateralism that has created the mess we are now dealing with.

There is no possible way I can overstate the importance of this bill. But it is hard to explain. Everybody can grasp on to the immunity issue, leap to one side or the other, often without sufficient thought. But the bill as a whole, meshed together as a whole like an Appalachian quilt, is a thing of beauty, can be improved, and should be passed.

Nevertheless, I urge my colleagues to oppose the Republican cloture motion on the FISA bill so that we can reassert something called the role of Congress that we must play on these and other important national security matters. Oversight is what we do. We don't write a lot of bills in the Intelligence Committee, but we do oversight. But it is not welcome in the current atmosphere.

I urge my colleagues to oppose the Republican cloture motion so that we can consider on their merits the limited, manageable number of amendments to the bill and, in the process, push bipartisan FISA reform across the finish line.

I know Vice Chairman BOND and others are ready to get back to business and start disposing of amendments. I feel confident that he and I, as managers of this bill, will work closely, as we have in the committee, to ensure that we do no unintended harm to this bill in the matters of collection of intelligence or any other unbalancing of this Appalachian craftwork.

There is still time for the Senate to work its way on the FISA bill and pass it before the week's end. I hope we do so.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, it is my understanding that this side has 40 minutes of debate; is that correct?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's side has 46 minutes.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that be divided; that I be allocated 15 minutes and that I be notified when my 15 minutes is up; that at the appropriate time, the Senator from Texas be recognized for 15 minutes; and then, after intervening discussion from the other side, the Senator from Georgia, Mr. CHAMBLISS, be recognized for 5 minutes. I would reserve the remainder of the time for closing argument.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, we began consideration of this bill on December 17, the FISA Amendments Act of 2007. As my friend the chairman said, it was passed by the Senate Intelligence Committee with overwhelming bipartisan support. It has garnered the support of the Director of National Intelligence, and I believe it is the way forward.

I was a bit amused to hear my friend say that the FISA bill was being taken hostage; they were scoring political points. I haven't heard from the White House anything other than they want to have this bill passed.

We have sought to protect the rights of Republican Members on the minority side. We have suggested that this bill is so controversial, as all intelligence bills are, that amendments be subjected to a 60-vote majority. The simple fact is, we could pass perhaps a number of amendments that could destroy the structure of the bill we have presented and put us in the position where it would not get the 60 votes needed to pass.

My suggestion is that we move forward accepting some amendments. There are amendments on both sides, I agree with the chairman, that can be accepted. Maybe we could even accept them without a vote or accept votes on others at a simple majority, a 51-vote majority, and then on certain controversial ones, we may have to have 60 votes. But we are ready to move forward. We are not the ones who have held up this bill. Very briefly, in April, the Director of National Intelligence, Admiral McConnell—and I will refer to him as the DNI—sent a bill to the Senate Intelligence Committee and said FISA is out of date. It has to be updated. He came before us and testified in May. I asked him to do something. Nothing happened. He came before the full Senate, actually, in closed session, all Senators invited; that was in June. He explained how urgent it was and how we were being left deaf and blind to communications of terrorists. Nothing happened.

It was at the end of that session, going into the August recess, that he proposed a temporary shortened version of FISA which became the Protect America Act. I was pleased to support that in the Senate. It passed the House and was signed.

We came back in September, knowing we had to work together on a bipartisan basis, and the Senate Intelligence Committee and staff worked very hard on a bipartisan basis to produce a bill, a very good bill. It was the ultimate compromise. There were some on both sides who were sullen but not rebellious. But we got the job done. We provided the tools the intelligence community needed and significantly expanded the protection of American civil liberties and privacy rights.

The bill sat on the floor in October. It finally came to the floor December 17. A number on the majority side spoke out against the civil liability protection afforded providers who allegedly assisted the Government with the President's terrorist surveillance program, or TSP. They criticized various provisions in the Intelligence Committee bill. They spoke in favor of what regrettably was a partisan Judiciary Committee substitute.

Debate is good for democracy but only if it is based on facts. Unfortunately, during the December filibuster, we heard a number of allegations, accusations, and even misrepresentation about the committee's bill and the TSP. Some of those comments will be repeated today.

Our intelligence community professionals must have the tools they need to protect us. This is not the time to pass legislation that will make people feel good or will score political points. We must pass a bill the DNI will support and, thus, the President will sign. That should be our goal. Distorting the truth will not help us get there.

The record must be set straight, and these are some of the myths we have heard. What are the facts? We were told that a ''new and aggressive'' interpretation of article II authority was used to justify the TSP. There is nothing new or aggressive about relying on the President's article II authority in the context of foreign intelligence surveillance.

Courts, including the FISA Court of Review in the 2002 In re: Sealed Case decision and the Fourth Circuit in the Truong case, have long recognized distinctions between domestic and foreign surveillance and the President's constitutional authority to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance. Nor is it ''an invitation to lawlessness'' to argue that the President has inherent constitutional authority to wiretap without a court order. The Constitution is the highest law of the land and trumps any statute.

In 1978, when Congress recognized the tension between FISA and the President's inherent authority under article II, they noted that warrantless surveillance for foreign intelligence gathering has been an integral part of our Nation's foreign intelligence. During World War II, our warrantless surveillance of the German and Japanese militaries and the breaking of their codes preserved our democracy. More recently, the Clinton administration conducted a warrantless search of the residence of convicted spy Aldrich Ames.

The Intelligence Committee conducted a comprehensive, bipartisan review of the TSP. There is no evidence to substantiate the claims that the administration began its warrantless surveillance before September 11 or that the TSP covered domestic calls between neighbors, friends, and loved ones. As the President has stated, the TSP collected international calls involving members of al-Qaida.

For many months, critics have argued that TSP could have been conducted under FISA. That argument needs to be laid to rest. A decision by a FISA court last spring proved that the TSP could not have been done under FISA as it existed. The court decision resulted in significant intelligence gaps which led to the passage of the Protect America Act.

I was not there, but I understand this matter was discussed by the President with the top leaders of this body and the other body, as well as the Intelligence Committee, and was told at the time it would not be possible to redraft and change the old FISA law in time to collect the critical information they hoped to gather before attacks occurred immediately following September 11.

The liability protection for those carriers who allegedly assisted the Government with the TSP lies at the heart of this legislation. The President did what he had to do under article II, and our country was safer for it, and our country was safer because some of the carriers alleged to have participated acted in reliance and good faith on orders of the Attorney General, transmitting the President's order—and the intelligence community.

In his original FISA modernization request in April of 2007, the DNI asked for full liability protection for all those allegedly involved. Some Members have attacked DNI McConnell's integrity, calling him ''an accidental truth teller'' and accusing him of backing out of an agreement made under the PAA. These comments are not only unjustified, unwarranted, and unfair, they are counterproductive. Throughout this debate, the DNI and other intelligence professionals have given us unbiased advice and technical assistance. They have assisted Democrats and Republicans. We need to focus on the task at hand, not engage in personal attacks against a man who has served his country honorably in the military and the intelligence community, and continues to do so as head of the community.

Some of the Members have downplayed the need for liability protection. They argue that carriers already have statutory immunity and that continued litigation will not harm providers or our intelligence efforts. These statements reflect a startling lack of knowledge about our intelligence collection, which is dangerous to the continued operation of our gathering.

First, the companies cannot prove they are entitled to statutory immunity because the Government must assert state secrets to protect their intelligence collection methods. Second, while it is true that the existence of the TSP has been revealed, there are still, fortunately, a few details about the program that have not. Each day the lawsuits continue—with the prospect of civil discovery—there come new risks that sensitive details about our intelligence sources and methods will be revealed. As General Hayden stated a year and a half ago: The disclosure of the TSP has had a significant impact on intelligence gathering of terrorists. We are applying the Darwinian theory. We are only capturing the dumb ones. We should not give terrorists additional insight through continued TSP litigation.

Further, our intelligence and law enforcement agencies rely on the willingness of providers to cooperate—in emergencies, as with the kidnapping of a child, or when court orders are not required. Yet some carriers have already told us if they do not get liability protection, they will not be able to risk their business, their reputation, by continuing to help without court orders. That would be devastating to our intelligence collection.

Our committee weighed all these arguments for and against liability protection. We concluded by a 12-to-3 bipartisan vote that civil liability protection for providers—and only providers, not Government officials—was not only fair, it was the only way to safeguard our intelligence sources and methods, and to ensure the continued cooperation of the providers.

Substitution is not a solution since it would allow civil discovery to proceed against providers, still leaving them open to disclosure and exceedingly serious competitive and reputational harm, perhaps even physical retaliation by radicals who oppose our intelligence gathering. The intelligence community advised us through testimony and gave us documents that these companies acted in good faith, and we in the committee agreed with them. The providers who may have participated relied upon representations from the highest levels of Government.

There is no need to create a statutory mechanism for a court, whether it be the FISA Court or any other, to second-guess this determination. Allowing a court to do so would throw uncertainty into an area where the committee's intent is clear: The ongoing civil litigation against providers must end. On this last point, the term ''amnesty'' was tossed around in December. But that incorrectly assumes that alleged carriers did something illegal. These carriers do not need amnesty. They did nothing wrong. They deserve liability protection.

As I mentioned earlier, the DNI said he will support the Intelligence Committee's bill with two revisions. Yet some Members insist there are fatal flaws. We heard, No. 1, that there are no consequences if the FISC rejects the targeting/minimization procedures; No. 2, the bill does not contain a ''reverse targeting'' prohibition; and, No. 3, it allows warrantless interception of purely domestic communications. A plain reading of our bill shows that each one of these arguments is false.

The bill that came out of our committee goes farther than ever before in providing a meaningful role for the courts and Congress in overseeing acquisitions of foreign intelligence. The FISA Court will review the targeting and minimization procedures to ensure they comply with the law. If the court finds any deficiency, it can order the Government to correct the deficiency or cease the acquisition.

There is nothing—I repeat, nothing—in this bill that will allow warrantless wiretapping of Americans in violation of title III criminal wiretaps or FISA. There are explicit prohibitions against ''reverse targeting'' and the targeting of the person inside the United States without a court order. Americans abroad are given new FISA Court protections. The acquisitions must also comply with the fourth amendment. These are major new protections for Americans. Yet in spite of these measures—protections we have never seen before in the world of foreign targeting—we have been told the intelligence community will still target innocent Americans, listening to calls between parents and children overseas, between students and their friends studying abroad. That is absolute nonsense. The Intelligence Committee's bill only allows targeting of persons outside the United States to obtain foreign intelligence information. This is not a dragnet of surveillance. We are not listening to, quote, completely innocent people overseas, unquote, as some have claimed. The targets must be foreign targets—suspected terrorists or terrorist group members—and the Attorney General and the DNI must certify that a significant purpose of the acquisition is to obtain foreign intelligence information.

For example, if a foreign target is believed to be an agent or member of al-Qaida, then all communications will be intercepted. Only Americans who communicate with that target will have those specific conversations monitored. If those same conversations turn out to be purely innocent, they will be ''minimized,'' or suppressed. Even if the communication contains foreign intelligence information, it is likely, in many instances, the identity of any U.S. person will be masked—or protected—in any intelligence reporting. Americans' privacy rights are protected up to the point where they are actually engaging in a terrorist operation.

Mr. President, I see my time is running out. I will reserve the remainder of my time. I will give the rest of my remarks at a later time.

Thank you.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I yield 7 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, I thank the chairman of the Intelligence Committee.

The Senate should not be having a cloture vote on this legislation today. What we should be doing is considering and voting on the amendments that I and my colleagues tried to bring up last week, and other amendments that have been proposed to improve this badly flawed bill. But the minority does not think we should have the right to actually legislate here. They expect this body to rubberstamp that bill.

I am afraid I have to say the conduct of the minority has been very disturbing on this. They insisted for weeks that it is absolutely critical to finish the FISA legislation by February 1, even going so far as to object repeatedly to efforts by the majority leader to extend for only 1 month the Protect America Act—a law they rammed through this Chamber in August—and they still don't want to give us another month so the Senate can carefully consider changes to it.

So the majority leader brought to the floor the Intelligence Committee bill, the legislation that the minority wanted to consider and urged the Senate to stay in session through the weekend to complete work on it. I criticized the majority leader for bringing the Intelligence Committee bill to the floor because I thought the Senate should be working from the much better bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, on which I also serve, but I would have thought the minority would be pleased by the majority leader's decision.

So what have they done in response? They have obstructed all efforts to actually work on this bill. They will not allow me to get a vote on the one amendment I have offered—an amendment cosponsored by Senator HAGEL—and they will not allow me or anyone else to offer any other amendments. They filed for cloture the day this Senate began working on the bill, after allowing only a single amendment to be called up. They have effectively halted Senate consideration of this bill, despite the fact they are the ones—they are the ones—who are arguing that the February deadline is so critical. They seem to think that scare tactics peddled by administration officials, such as the Vice President, will be enough to pressure the Senate into letting them have their way. I certainly hope they are wrong.

Mr. President, as you well know, this legislation is in serious need of fixing. It authorizes widespread surveillance involving Americans at home and abroad. Yes, it does. Despite what the Senator from Missouri said, it certainly does do that. I have a number of amendments I want to offer, both to ensure that the FISA Court has more authority to oversee these authorities, and to guarantee Americans their fourth amendment rights. But I cannot even get a vote on the one, simple, straightforward, and extremely modest amendment I offered last week. This demonstrates how brazen these tactics are. This bipartisan amendment would merely require that the Government provide copies of important FISA Court orders and pleadings for review to the committees of jurisdiction in a classified setting, so that Members of Congress can understand how FISA has been interpreted and is being applied. You would think this amendment would be, as they say, a no-brainer, and yet the minority will not even consent to a vote on that.

But at least that one amendment is pending, and we will get a vote eventually. If the Republicans succeed in cutting off debate on this legislation, the Senate will not be able to vote on any other amendments, including the amendment Senator DODD and I wish to offer to deny retroactive immunity to telecom companies that allegedly cooperated with the administration's illegal wiretapping program. It is unconscionable to think that the Senate should have to make a final decision on this legislation without even having an opportunity to debate and vote on whether to grant retroactive immunity to companies that allegedly cooperated with an illegal program.

And why are we in this situation? Because the minority and the administration think they are entitled to ram the deeply flawed Intelligence Committee bill through the Senate without any changes. It seems they are worried the Senate might actually pass some of the very reasonable amendments I and others would like to offer if they give us a chance to do so or perhaps they are trying to sabotage the bill and then figure out a way to blame that outcome on Democrats.

No Senator—no Senator—should go along with these cynical, strong-arm tactics. We have to stand up to the administration and stand up for our rights.

I strongly urge my colleagues to oppose cloture. Invoking cloture on this bill would be an abdication of our responsibility to consider legislation that will have a huge impact on the American people for years to come. I hope even those who support the Intelligence Committee bill will think twice before voting to make this body a rubberstamp.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CORNYN. Mr. President, I don't know why any Member of the Senate would object to procedures we would employ within the bounds of the law to listen to communications of terrorists in order to detect and deter further terrorist attacks on our own soil or against Americans or our allies. That is what this legislation does. Unfortunately, I think we are beginning to see a dangerous trend on the part of the Senate: Never failing to put off until tomorrow what we could and should do today.

This legislation has been considered for an awfully long time, as we all know, in a bipartisan vote of the Senate Intelligence Committee, 13 to 2. In October, this legislation was voted out of the Intelligence Committee in a carefully crafted attempt to consult with the Director of National Intelligence, the head of the Central Intelligence Agency, and all other intelligence community members who might be impacted by this legislation. There has been opportunity after opportunity for input into this legislation by Members of the Senate. Yet we hear today there are those on the floor of the Senate who are saying: Well, let's not vote on this legislation now. Let's kick the ball down the road another month so we can have the same debate, the same discussion we have been having for all those many months leading up to this point. The only reason we are where we are today is because we were unable to get a lengthy extension of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in August. Because of objections by those on the other side who are complaining about this legislation again today, we were only able to pass this legislation until December and then another extension was granted until February 1, when this Protect America Act expires of its own terms. I would hope this body would continue to act in a strong bipartisan manner in which the Intelligence Committee has voted this bill out of the Intelligence Committee by a vote of 13 to 2.

I appreciate the fact that this body tabled the Judiciary Committee's partisan substitute and sent a signal that bipartisanship and consensus may once again become ascendant in matters of national security in the Senate. I think we would see that as a welcome development. At a time when we are talking about an economic stimulus package and seeing cooperation from the Speaker and the minority leader in the House and the President of the United States on matters affecting the economy, why can't we get that same sort of bipartisan cooperation on matters affecting national security?

Today, the Senate is poised to move this critical national security legislation one step closer to the President's desk. Today's vote will tell us much more about whether this Senate is ready to set aside partisanship and willing to get the job done.

Members of this body will remember that in December we had to pass an Omnibus appropriations bill that affected all discretionary spending of the U.S. Federal Government because we had been unable to pass 11 out of the 12 appropriations bills that it was our responsibility to pass. Unfortunately, this Senate has an unfortunate recent tendency to put off things until tomorrow what we should and could be doing today, and we should not let that happen. We need to finish this legislation to give Members a chance to debate and then to vote.

I don't favor each and every provision included in the bipartisan compromise that is sponsored by Chairman ROCKEFELLER and Vice Chairman BOND, but I do appreciate the fact that it is a carefully crafted compromise. It is a bipartisan compromise. It is the product of extensive consultation and negotiation with the experts in our intelligence and defense communities.

In other words, this legislation reflects the valuable and necessary input of the very men and women who are currently intercepting phone calls, text messages, and e-mails between al-Qaida and their operatives—those who wish to do America and America's interests harm.

The Senate has two choices today as the deadline for action rapidly approaches on February 1. On the one hand, we can show the American people that at least when it comes to matters of national security, it is possible to put partisanship aside and to get the job done in a bipartisan way. The other choice, which the majority leader has proposed, is we ask the American people for an extension, that we kick the can down the road for another month, only to find ourselves back in precisely the same posture we are in today: With no issues resolved and with the same old debates to be rehashed when we ought to finish the job today and follow the path of maximum responsibility.

I ask my colleagues: What excuse could there possibly be to put the tough choices off for another month? What justifies asking the American people for more time to get the job done when we know what the choices are and we have simply to make those choices by our vote today. We have had 6 months since the Protect America Act was passed in August of last year to get the job done. In that time, this legislation has been subjected to scrutiny by two Senate committees, and there has been significant time debating this legislation on the floor.

The fact is there is no acceptable excuse for failing to do our duty and our job. The excuses offered for delay are as compelling as the old school house claim that my dog ate my homework, I couldn't get it done.

I say no more excuses, no more extensions. It is time for Congress to come together in a bipartisan fashion in the national security interests of the United States.

It is specious to say there is no consequence to another extension, and it is the height of irresponsibility to argue that delay is the only responsible choice. As America's elected leaders, we have a responsibility to keep America safe. We cannot simply close our eyes and wish away the terrorist threat. It is easy this many years after September 11 to be lulled into a false sense of security as time takes us further away from that terrible attack on American soil. But it is undeniable that the threat from al-Qaida and Islamic extremists remains.

In the face of the very real threat of radical Islamic terror, Congress must be resolute and we must eschew attempts to split along partisan lines, and we must embrace bipartisan solutions to our very real national security problem. That is what a vote on the Senate Intelligence Committee bill would reflect: A bipartisan solution to a national security challenge.

That is why it defies credibility to argue that the responsible thing to do is to put the job off for another month. The majority leader's plea for an extension implies that the only two choices we have are, on the one hand, an extension for 1 month and, on the other hand, no bill at all. Neither of those is a responsible choice.

In fact, there is a third option, and that option is for the Senate to pass a consensus bill that has the bipartisan support of the chairman and vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee and a bipartisan majority of the Senate, experts in the intelligence community, and the President of the United States.

Let's be clear about what an extension means. An extension means further delay. It means putting off tough choices. It means not only to do so in a time of war but in a time of economic fragility, when we have other work we need to be doing on the floor of the Senate that is being taken up unnecessarily by repeating the same arguments over and over without any conclusion. It also means Congress has lacked the courage to relieve some of America's leading companies from the burdens and costs of litigation arising from their cooperation in the war on terror.

Let us remember the telecommunications companies that may have cooperated with our Government at the request of our President, and upon the certification of the Attorney General, the chief law enforcement officer, that what they were being asked to do was within the law. To continue to subject them to litigation for doing their civic duty, to incur ongoing expense and inconvenience and to risk information that is sensitive to our security coming out during the process is simply not a responsible option.

Some in Congress apparently think these companies should have second-guessed the legal representations made by the President and the Attorney General in the days and weeks and months following the 9/11 attacks. Some in Congress have argued that the companies had a duty not to cooperate, a duty to refuse to assist this Nation's intelligence community with tracking terrorists during wartime. That is, unfortunately, how far we have come in this debate and how off the mark some have come.

These companies, as every good citizen who cooperates with their Government to try to keep America secure in good faith, deserve the protection we are being asked to give them in this legislation. These costly lawsuits have not only put in jeopardy the future cooperation of these firms but also the critical national security concerns potentially exposed to the discovery process in civil litigation. It may be popular in some quarters to bash corporate America, but that rhetoric is sorely misplaced in this debate. The men and women who manage these companies made a good-faith decision to do their patriotic duty—to help their Government to track terrorists and to save American lives, and they should not be punished for it. They should be thanked for their cooperation.

For Congress to allow these burdensome lawsuits to continue this long is unfortunate and unjust indeed, but for Congress to continue to put off the tough choices and leave these companies in legal limbo is not only unfortunate and unjust, it is also irresponsible. Now is the time for Congress to decide the question—no more excuses, no more delays, no more extensions. Today, the Senate can choose a path forward, a bipartisan path on critical national security measures, and I urge all my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to work together to move this bipartisan bill forward by voting for cloture at 4:30.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. President, I rise today in support of cloture on S. 2248, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Amendments Act, or FISA Amendments Act. Time is running out on congressional action to fix FISA. The Protect America Act, which Congress passed in August to close gaps in our foreign intelligence collection, expires this Friday, February 1, 2008.

Prior to congressional action in August, our intelligence community was unable to collect vital foreign intelligence without the prior approval of a court. And I emphasize in that ''foreign'' intelligence. This will be the case again if we do not make permanent these changes. Before August, if our intelligence community wanted to direct surveillance at an al-Qaida member located in Pakistan who was communicating with an operative terrorist in Germany, they would have to first petition the FISA Court for approval. In August of this year, our intelligence community told us that without updating FISA, they were not just handicapped, but they were hamstrung.

The Protect America Act temporarily fixed the intelligence community legal gaps. The Director of National Intelligence highlighted some of the critical intelligence gained under the Protect America Act, including: insight and understanding leading to disruption of planned terrorist attacks; efforts of an individual to become a suicide operative; instructions to a foreign terrorist associate about entering the United States; efforts by terrorists to obtain guns and ammunition; terrorist facilitator plans to travel to Europe; identifying information regarding foreign terrorist operatives; plans for future terrorist attacks; and movements of key extremists to abate a risk. With the Protect America Act set to expire, Congress must act swiftly before our core collectors are faced with losing this kind of valuable intelligence as a result of inaction by Congress.

Although the Protect America Act enabled the intelligence community to continue its important work, Congress would be derelict in its duties to merely extend the expiration of this act.

The Senate Intelligence Committee has been reviewing and drafting FISA legislation since April of last year. Last fall, the committee considered and passed the bill that is now before us. In December, the bill came to the Senate floor for consideration, but some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle delayed its consideration. We are now faced, after almost 10 months of thorough consideration, with the ability to pass legislation which will improve our intelligence collection and which contains safeguards for U.S. citizens' privacy rights that the Protect America Act does not contain.

The FISA Amendments Act contains a clear prohibition against intentionally targeting persons located inside the United States and a prohibition on reverse targeting of U.S. persons, which the Protect America Act does not. The FISA Amendments Act makes clear that the FISA Court approval is required for intentionally targeting U.S. persons abroad and requires that any collection be consistent with the fourth amendment. Most important, the FISA Amendments Act contains retrospective immunity for our telecommunications carriers that may have assisted the Government in protecting American lives.

Extending the Protect America Act does not ensure the continued and necessary cooperation of those who may have assisted the Government with the terrorist surveillance program after September 11.

The Government often needs assistance from the private sector in order to protect our national security. Telecommunications carriers may provide the Government access to communication contents and records pursuant to many Federal processes, including judicial warrants, subpoenas, title III orders, FISA orders, attorney general certifications, administrative subpoenas, national security letters, and other statutory authorizations. In return, they should be able to rely on the Government's assurances that the assistance they provide is lawful and necessary for our national security.

In Smith v. Nixon, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia suggested that the Government's request to wiretap a home telephone was illegal. Yet they dismissed the telephone company from any liability because of the assurances they received from the Government, the reasonable expectation of legality, and their limited technical role in assisting the Government in surveillance initiated by the Government.

As precedence suggests, America's telecommunications carriers should not be subjected to costly legal battles and potentially frivolous cases, yet ones which could expose intelligence sources and methods, harming our national security, merely for their goodfaith assistance to the Government. It is necessary and responsible for Congress to provide telecommunications carriers with liability relief.

I urge my colleagues to support cloture on the Rockefeller-Bond substitute amendment and oppose a simple extension of the Protect America Act. Senators ROCKEFELLER and BOND have worked hard and long hours to make sure we got it right in this bill that came out of the Intelligence Committee. After many hours of negotiating, debate, and hard work, it would a shame to see this bill not come to fruition and pass this body at this point in time. Our intelligence community needs the tools and additional safeguards provided in the FISA Amendments Act to keep our people safe, and Congress needs to act quickly before the Protect America Act expires and these tools are taken away.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I rise today in opposition to the Intelligence Committee's version of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Amendments Act of 2007. It is without question that I support giving the administration the surveillance tools it needs to keep us safe. But Congress has both a duty to keep the American people safe and uphold the Constitution.

It is therefore incumbent upon us in the Senate to craft clear legislation that protects both our national security and our civil liberties. We can do that by passing the Judiciary Committee substitute, which gives the administration the tools it needs to collect foreign intelligence and protects innocent Americans by ensuring that the FISA Court, and not the Attorney General, decides whether surveillance of a U.S. person is proper.

One of the defining challenges of our age is to combat international terrorism while maintaining our national values and our commitment to the rule of law and individual rights. These two obligations are not mutually exclusive. Indeed, they reinforce one another. Unfortunately, the President's national security policies have operated at the expense of our civil liberties. The examples are legion, but the issue that prompted the legislation before us today is one of the most notorious—his secret program of eavesdropping on Americans without congressional authorization or a judge's approval.

After insisting for a year that the President was not bound by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act's clear prohibition on warrantless surveillance of Americans, the administration subjected its surveillance program to FISA Court review in January of last year.

Then, last August, citing operational difficulties and heightened threats that required changes to FISA, the administration passed the Protect America Act—over my objection and that of many of my colleagues. The Protect America Act, which sunsets at the end of this month, amended FISA to allow warrantless surveillance, even when that surveillance intercepts the communications of innocent American citizens inside the United States.

The administration identified two problems it faced in conducting electronic surveillance under FISA. First, the administration wanted clarification that it did not need to obtain a FISA warrant in order to conduct surveillance of calls between two parties when both of those parties are overseas. Because of the way global communications are now transmitted, many communications between people all of whom are overseas are nonetheless routed through switching stations inside the United States. In other words, when someone in Islamabad, Pakistan, calls someone in London, that call is likely to be routed through communications switching stations right here in the United States. Congress did not intend FISA to apply to such calls, and I support a legislative fix to clarify that point.

The second problem the administration identified is more difficult. Even assuming that the government does not need a FISA warrant to tap into switching stations here in the United States in order to intercept calls between two people who are abroad—between Pakistan and England, for example—if the target in Pakistan calls someone inside the United States, FISA requires the government to get a warrant, even though the government is ''targeting'' the caller in Pakistan.

The administration wants the flexibility to begin electronic surveillance of a ''target'' abroad without having to get a FISA warrant to account for the possibility that the ''foreign target'' might contact someone in the United States. I agree with the administration's assessment of the problem, but I don't support its solution.

The administration's proposal, which is reflected in the Intelligence Committee's version of the FISA Amendments Act, would significantly expand the scope of surveillance permitted under FISA by exempting entirely any calls to or from the United States, as long as the government is ''targeting'' someone reasonably believed to be located outside the United States.

The government could acquire these communications regardless of whether either party is suspected of any wrongdoing. The Attorney General and the Director of National Intelligence would make the determination about whom to target on their own, and they would merely certify, after-the-fact, to the FISA Court that they had reason to believe the target was outside the United States, regardless of how many calls to innocent American citizens inside the United States were intercepted in the process.

This Intelligence Committee bill authorizes surveillance that is broader than what is necessary to protect national security and that is why I oppose it.

The Intelligence Committee bill offers no protection for the innocent Americans who communicate with overseas relatives, business partners, or friends. Indeed, it allows the government unfettered access to these innocent Americans' communications. And once the government collects these communications, it can share them with other agencies throughout the government.

The Judiciary Committee substitute—which authorizes much broader surveillance powers than the government had under FISA before the Protect America Act became law—offers several significant protections. I will mention a few: First, the Judiciary Substitute protects against the ''bulk collection'' of communications by requiring the government to target a specific person or phone number abroad, rather than allowing the acquisition in bulk the millions of communications going into and out of the United States. Second, it requires the government to obtain an individualized warrant from the FISA Court if the government's acquisition of a person inside the United States becomes a significant purpose of its surveillance of the foreign target. Third, it provides for much more robust and meaningful congressional oversight. And fourth, it does not provide retroactive immunity for the telecommunications carriers.

I oppose granting retroactive immunity because if the carriers violated clearly stated Federal law, they should be held accountable. Cases against the carriers are already making their way through the courts. Retroactive immunity would undermine the judiciary's role as an independent branch of government. Furthermore, the provision that holds carrier liable for violations of the act is an important enforcement mechanism. It is fundamental to securing the privacy rights that FISA was meant to protect.

When the Senate passed FISA, after extensive hearings, 30 years ago by a strong bipartisan vote of 95 to 1, I stated that it ''was a reaffirmation of the principle that it is possible to protect national security and at the same time the Bill of Rights.'' I still believe that's possible, but not if we enact the Intelligence Committee bill.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARDIN). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum we will go into be equally divided between Senators BOND and ROCKEFELLER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBLISS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, how much time is remaining on our side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twelve and a half minutes.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, while we are waiting for Members of the other side to come forward, I will make a few remarks, and we will see if we have some others join us.

I was talking about some of the proposed amendments and questions that have arisen about this bill. There are some who would demand that a court order be obtained any time a call involved a U.S. citizen. But anybody who understands FISA or intelligence collection knows that is operationally impossible.

For 30 years, the intelligence community has used minimization procedures when inadvertently intercepted calls come to or from nontargeted U.S. persons. So far, we are totally unaware of any abuses of this system. The minimization procedures have worked well. They worked well when information was being collected by radio, without a FISA Court order, and they continue to work well because the well-trained people who run the NSA operations are overseen by multiple layers of supervisors and inspectors general and attorneys from the Department of Justice.

There is no way to know, when a terror suspect places a call from a location in the Middle East, whether that person is going to call someone in his country or a neighboring country or the United States. So if you say you cannot intercept that call if it goes to a U.S. person, what, in effect, you are saying is you cannot intercept that call because you don't know where the call is going. So it means there will have to be an order for every foreign terrorist surveillance conducted by the NSA, and that is totally unworkable. We have seen that before. That shut the system down. It is unsound policy to require a FISA Court order if a terrorist target abroad calls a U.S. person. That may be the most important call to intercept in order to protect us from a terrorist attack at any time, and time matters. Do we really mean that the call cannot be intercepted until a court filing is prepared and reviewed by Government lawyers and that the FISA Court must review the application and supporting amendments? I hope not. Our enemies are not stupid. They would figure out very quickly that they can slow us down and bring our intelligence community to a halt simply by placing periodic calls to the United States.

Some believe that the FISA framework in place is enough to keep us safe and that we don't need the Intelligence Committee bill. I find that comment disturbing. It is the FISA framework that created significant intelligence gaps threatening the security of our Nation. It is only because we passed the Protect America Act that those gaps were closed.

I have already spoken about the problems with the Judiciary Committee bill. I wish to address some concerns and some ideas raised about the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, the FISA Court.

I think our bill out of the Intelligence Committee strikes the appropriate balance between providing tools needed to collect intelligence and a meaningful oversight role for Congress and the FISA Court.

There are a lot of misperceptions about the FISA Court. As mentioned previously, for example, there are those who suggest the court should have decided whether providers acted in good faith before immunity is granted. We were told this makes sense because the court ''sits 24/7 and this is all they do. They would act en banc.'' That is not accurate. The FISA Court does not sit 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. It is composed of U.S. judges from U.S. district courts throughout the country who have their own full caseloads and come to Washington, DC, on a rotating basis simply, as the enabling legislation says, to issue FISA Court orders. As a result, it would be difficult to get them to sit together.

Given the court's facilities, it is not set up to preside over litigation. We were told that this is why the FISA Court was set up, but the legislative history and the measures——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that he is going into the time reserved for the Republican leader.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I will then close and urge that our colleagues adopt cloture so that we may move forward on this very important bill.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, how much time remains on our side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nineteen and a half minutes, with 10 minutes reserved for the leader.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I yield 9½ minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I thank the manager of the legislation, Senator ROCKEFELLER. Once again, I will say that I have great admiration for the work done by the committee. It is not an easy matter. The Intelligence Committee has serious work to do. Much of what they have done, I agree with. My objections here this afternoon are focused on one aspect of the legislation rather than the cumulative effort the committee has made.

Let me address the issue we will be voting on, and that is cloture. That is a critical issue for all of us.

Aside from the question of whether I agree or disagree with various amendments, or even the bill, we find ourselves in the midst of a parliamentary nightmare. We have been in this position since late last year, going back to December.

So much hinges on this bill. It will set America's terrorist surveillance policy well into the next Presidential term and beyond if a period of 6 years is adopted or even the 4 years suggested by Senator CARDIN and others. Depending on the outcome of the debate, this legislation has the power to bring that surveillance under the rule of law or to confirm the President's urge to be a law of his own. It has the power to bring the facts of warrantless spying to light and to public scrutiny, or to lock down those facts as the property of only the powerful.

It has the power, obviously, to declare the same law applies to all of us regardless of economic circumstances, well connected or not, or to set the precedent that some corporations are far too rich, far too affluent to be sued, that immunity can effectively not be brought against them.

Wherever you come down on these choices—and I know there are those of us who have different opinions—you certainly cannot be neutral, in my view. None of us can be neutral on a matter such as this. This is one of the most important and contentious pieces of legislation we will debate in this session, and I argue any session of Congress, and yet the Senate is frozen today.

I objected passionately to retroactive immunity, but I did not shut out debate. Republicans have frozen this body since debate began, not only last week but going back further, and they unwittingly created a perfect microcosm of retroactive immunity right here in this body. Because both flow from the same impulse: shutting down the organs of Government—in this case, the legislation, the courts, and now, because of the procedural nightmare we find ourselves in, the Senate—when you are afraid, of course, you will not get your way. That is why President Bush wants his favored corporations saved from lawsuits, it appears. That is why the minority party wants this bill saved from any and all amendments, saved from serious and thoughtful discussion.

As a committee chairman myself, as I pointed out the other day, I wish I had the privilege being requested by the minority. I sometimes wished the bills we passed out of committee would have swept out of this body when I came to the Senate floor without a single amendment. That is not how this body works. It was never intended to work that way. It is certainly not the way the Founders intended it to work.

Amendments are not entitled to pass, but they are entitled to a fair hearing, a fair debate, and a fair vote. The minority can object as strenuously as it wants, but it must do so fairly. I accept that principle, even when it does not go my way; even on immunity itself, I understand a minority cannot stand forever. Is it too much for Republicans to extend the same courtesy?

On a bill as important as this one, it would be ridiculous to curtail debate, shut out new ideas, or rush to a conclusion without even extending the Protect America Act for a month to give us the time we need. Whether you agree with them or not—and some I disagree with myself—the amendments offered by my Democratic colleagues are serious proposals and deserving of serious consideration.

Shouldn't we debate whether this new surveillance regime ought to stay inflexible through the next Presidential term and into the one after that?

Shouldn't we debate whether we are going to categorically outlaw unconstitutional reverse targeting or indiscriminate vacuum cleaner bulk collection?

Shouldn't we debate whether Congress even gets to see the secret rulings of the FISA Court?

Those are some of a few of the well-intentioned proposals we need to consider before we vote on this bill. But across the board, the Republican answer to those questions is absolutely not, in every single instance: No debate, no votes. I disagree, and I will vote against cloture because we haven't done our job yet.

I will also vote against cloture because I cannot support the bill as it now stands, as my colleagues know. First, the legislation still contains some egregious provisions for corporate immunity. I already made my objection to immunity many times over the last number of days. It puts the President's chosen few above the law, in my view; it endorses possibly illegal spying on Americans; and it strikes a harsh blow against the rule of law. I will continue to fight retroactive immunity with all the strength any one Senator can muster.

But I also strongly object to many of the intelligence-gathering portions of the bill, as well as supporting many of them that have been included. This bill reduces court oversight of spying nearly to the point of symbolism. It would allow the targeting of Americans on false pretenses. It opens up new twisted rationales for warrantless wiretapping, which is exactly what it ought to prevent. It could allow bulk collection of communications of millions of Americans as soon as an administration, whether this one or future one, has the wherewithal to build such an enormous dragnet, and it sets all of these deeply flawed provisions in stone for 6 years, depriving us of the flexibility we need to fight terrorism.

For all of those reasons, as well, I will vote against cloture later this afternoon.

Tonight, the President will come to Congress to speak to us and to the American people about the state of our Union. I hope he will use that opportunity to realize the Senate needs more time to do its constitutional duty to debate and consider this important legislation. However, I am concerned that he will instead continue to threaten to veto this legislation unless it includes retroactive immunity for the telecommunications industry.

The President has said this bill is essential to ''protecting the American people from enemies who attacked our country.'' That is a quotation. So why is he trying to stop it? Why is he promising to veto it? Why is he throwing it all away to protect a few corporations from lawsuits?

I fear that if we give this President what he wants, we risk weakening the rule of law and placing the rights of some of the President's favored corporations over the rights of ordinary American citizens.

I hope my colleagues will join with those of us who oppose cloture today on the substitute amendment to allow the Senate the time it needs to debate and improve the FISA Amendments Act. This issue is far too important for the security of our Nation and to our civil liberties to do otherwise.

As we all know, as I have stated over and over, this is historic tension that dates back to the founding of our Republic, of keeping us safe from those who would do us harm, and protecting the rights and liberties of American citizens. It has been a tension that has been debated and argued for more than 200 years, and the adoption of the FISA legislation three decades ago created the means by which that balance could be struck, allowing us to do what is necessary to protect us against those who would do us harm while simultaneously guaranteeing those rights and liberties we enjoy as Americans would be protected in these circumstances.

It is a critical point to maintain that balance. My fear is this legislation, particularly with retroactive immunity, upsets that balance significantly.

As I said before, and I will repeat in closing, had this been a few months, even a year in the wake of 9/11, had this administration had a record of by and large supporting the rule of law, I would not stand here and demand that we not include retroactive immunity under those circumstances. But there has been a pattern of behavior by this administration from the very outset. We now know these warrantless wiretaps began in January or February of 2001, not in the wake of 9/11. So even prior to the tragic events of September 11, 2001, this administration had begun a pattern of seeking warrantless wiretaps on average American citizens without the court orders provided for under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Of course, it went on for 5 years and would still be ongoing were it not for a whistleblower in a report in a major American newspaper uncovering this program.

This went on for 5 long years amidst a pattern of behavior by this administration. I do not think I need to necessarily enumerate the examples of that pattern, beginning with Abu Ghraib, secret prisons and rendition, habeas corpus, the U.S. Attorney's Office, and the list goes on and on. I cannot undo those mistakes, but they are more than just mistakes. They are tragic examples of this administration's trampling all over the rule of law. What we can do this evening and what we can do in the coming days, collectively, Democrats and Republicans, is pass a FISA bill, much of which is included in the work of Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND. There will be some objections, obviously, to some amendments that will be offered, but to get our work done, pass this legislation, and move on to other business. The issues are far too important to leave them otherwise.

I thank, again, Senator ROCKEFELLER for giving me some time and urge our colleagues to vote against the cloture motion when that moment occurs.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, we are now only a few days away from the expiration of the Protect America Act, days away from a situation in which the intelligence community will be unable to freely monitor new terrorist targets overseas. We are flirting with disaster, and the American people deserve to know how we got in this predicament. So let me review it.

Ten months ago, the Director of National Intelligence asked us to reform the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Our friends on the other side waited until July to take up a bill that agreed with his recommendations. It was not until August that Congress finally answered his pleas by authorizing for 6 months the overseas surveillance of foreign terrorist targets with the Protect America Act.

When our friends on the other side got back from the August break, they vowed to quickly address what they decried as the shortcomings of the Protect America Act.

The Senate Intelligence Committee, under the leadership of Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND, took up the task. Reforming FISA was complicated and demanding work, but the committee members came together, as they were intended to, along with the executive branch, which, of course, was necessary.

Everyone involved acted with determination, deliberation, and considerable skill. The process lasted 4 months. It involved numerous hearings, briefings, and negotiation sessions. The final product was a model of bipartisanship and accommodation across the Senate aisle and with the White House. The committee vote was not 15 to 0, but around here 13 to 2 is almost as impressive.

But what was perhaps even more impressive is the fact that such a broad coalition of players had come together to meet the minimum standards required of any legislation that replaces the Protect America Act, something that allows the intelligence community to operate without unreasonable and counterproductive restrictions, which protect phone carriers from frivolous lawsuits for helping the Government hunt for terrorists, and which is guaranteed to be signed into law. All of those things are contained in the Bond-Rockefeller, Rockefeller-Bond proposal.

Unfortunately, it was not until just before the Christmas break that our friends decided to even turn back to this vital issue, and even then we had to listen to a filibuster against FISA reform. Then when we began this session, our Democratic colleagues delayed consideration of FISA reform again by moving to the Indian health care bill instead.

So here we are, once again, pushed up against a looming deadline. During last week's consideration of the FISA reauthorization, the majority said it would not consider a 60-vote threshold for votes. It did not offer time agreements, nor did it make any effort to limit the number of amendments.

In short, the Senate faces a legislative logjam that ensures that we will let the February 1 deadline come and go without making a reasonable effort to enact a law.

It should not have turned out this way. The administration negotiated in good faith with the Democratic majority on the committee that has the technical, operational expertise to handle the subject. And in the course of painstaking negotiations, the administration made tough concessions to our Democratic colleagues. It did this in order to arrive at a fair, bipartisan result that would allow it to continue to protect the homeland. Now that work is being brushed aside.

The menu of amendments to the Intelligence Committee bill is little more than an effort to renegotiate this hard-won deal, an effort to deconstruct the bipartisan Intelligence Committee bill, and reconstruct, amendment by amendment, the divisive Judiciary Committee bill that was tabled by a strong bipartisan majority. That bill will not—I repeat, will not—become law.

Reconstructing the Judiciary Committee bill is a pointless exercise. And with only 5 days until the Protect America Act expires, it is an exercise in which we do not have the luxury to engage.

We can get serious and pass the bipartisan Intelligence Committee product or we can waste time on voting for poison pill amendments that weaken the bill and that will prevent it from becoming law.

I urge our colleagues to make the right choice, to vote for cloture so that we can continue to protect the homeland and against cloture on the 30-day extension. We cannot delay this important legislation for another month. Of course, the President will not sign a 30-day extension.

That said, if we cannot complete this bill, Republicans will not allow this critical program to expire and will offer a short-term extension, if necessary.

To be perfectly clear, I urge that there be a ''yes'' vote on cloture on the bill, a ''no'' vote on cloture on the 30-day extension, an amendment to the bill which actually would not achieve a 30-day extension anyway but I think is a place that we do not want to go on record as having supported because the President will not sign that anyway. And in the next few days, we will consider what kind of short-term options might be appropriate to let us get back to this very important legislation so painstakingly put together by the expert leadership of Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator BOND.

I yield the floor.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask that the time involved be divided between the two sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I apologize to my friends for keeping everyone waiting. It hasn't been long—a matter of a minute or so.

In a few hours, President Bush will stand across the way in the House Chamber and deliver his final State of the Union Address. This will be his eighth State of the Union Address. From what I have heard earlier today in my meetings with the press who met with him, it is a fair bet in this speech that he will continue the drumbeat started by Vice President CHENEY last week by trying to scare the American people into believing that if he does not get his way on the FISA bill now before us, America's national security will be gravely jeopardized.

I have said on more than one occasion in recent days we face a faltering economy here at home and a failing foreign policy abroad. So I call upon all of us, Democrats and Republicans, to rise above partisanship. I have also said on more than one occasion that we extend our hand to the President and congressional Republicans and ask them to join with us in a genuine spirit of bipartisanship. In my nearly 26 years, I have never seen anything quite as cynical and counterproductive as the Republican approach to FISA.

I gave the example in my last statement that it was a Catch-22 the President has put us in. The American people deserve to know when President Bush talks about the foreign intelligence legislation tonight that he is doing little more than shooting for cheap political points, and we should reject any statements he makes about this. Members of Congress from both parties have legitimate policy disagreements on FISA—both parties. Some of us believe that history proves the need for more protections against Government abuse. Others support the law the way it stands. Now, that is appropriate; people have different views and opinions on an important part of our legislation and our laws in the country. But all of us, Members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans, want to wage an effective fight against terror. All of us, Democrats and Republicans, want to give our intelligence professionals the tools they need to win this fight against terror.

We will be taking two votes. The first is on whether to invoke cloture on the Bond-Rockefeller substitute to the FISA bill we have on the floor. The second is a substitute, on whether to extend the authorities of the Protect America Act for another 30 days while Congress works to pass a new FISA bill.

I will oppose cloture on the substitute and support cloture on the extension. The extension will give the Congress time to debate and pass a long-term bill that protects America without compromising the privacy of law-abiding Americans. Both the Intelligence Committee bill and the Judiciary Committee bill authorize the same surveillance tools our intelligence community needs. Democrats and Republicans stand together in all the terrorism fighting components of this bill. Some Democrats, including me, support the additional privacy protections in the Judiciary Committee bill. Others are satisfied with the protections in the Intelligence Committee bill.

Again, people are entitled to their opinions, but all of us believe the Senate should have an opportunity to vote on these important questions.

There was a nice piece written in one of the op-eds today talking about how the Republicans have talked a long time about all we want is an up-or-down vote. Well, if there were ever a time they should follow their own advice it is now—an up-or-down vote.

Many Democrats, including Chairman ROCKEFELLER, who has worked so hard, are going to oppose cloture on the substitute because they object—we object—to the heavy-handed tactics we saw with this legislation this past week. The Republican leader filed cloture on this bill after we had been on the floor for a few hours. Cloture was filed after Republicans blocked every amendment—every amendment—from being offered and blocked all amendments from getting votes. In simple terms, this means the Republicans were filibustering their own bill—their own legislation. Let me repeat that. The Republicans were filibustering their own legislation. In my time in the Senate, I can't remember this taking place.

Meanwhile, at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, President Bush has actually threatened to veto a temporary extension. Talk about trying to figure out what is in the mind of someone who is talking that way. Let us remember, a temporary extension would guarantee that all the terrorism fighting tools remain in effect. There is absolutely no policy or security problem with an extension. All it would do is give us more time to work this out on an uninterrupted basis. There is no reason to vote against an extension or for the President to veto one, except for political posturing.

None of us want the current law to expire. None of us want that to expire, except CHENEY and Bush. But if it does expire because of Republican tactics, surveillance will not end. Even if they stop us from extending the bill, it would not end. Surveillance would not end. All surveillance orders issued under the law we passed last August—the Protect America Act—are effective for a year, so they will continue until at least August of 2008—August of this year.

Even in a last resort—if the current law expires—our intelligence professionals can get surveillance orders under the FISA law as it has existed for decades, before we passed the Protect America Act last August. FISA includes provisions for emergency warrantless surveillance, and it always has. Again, no one is arguing the law should be allowed to expire. Doing so would send the wrong message. But it still is going to allow the collection of this information. The safeguards in place ensure that our war on terror will not be adversely affected, and anyone who says otherwise—from the President on down—is not being truthful.

Why do Democrats seek an extension? We believe bipartisanship is appropriate when possible. The economic stimulus package shows us that when circumstances are difficult, we can work together. The Republican leadership's actions in this FISA debate have not given us reason for confidence that they are interested in working with us, but we owe it to the American people to give them every opportunity to do so.

We have requested a 30-day extension repeatedly—I have done it repeatedly—and each time the Republicans have said no. Compromise is a two-way street. Bipartisanship is a two-way street. As I said last week, we are willing to pass an extension of current law for 2 weeks, 30 days, 18 months, 14 months, 15 months or whatever our colleagues want, but we need to pass an extension now if we are to ensure the law doesn't expire. I have explained if it expires what happens.

The House is going out of session shortly. They have a retreat this week—after tomorrow. Already Democrats have introduced several amendments to strengthen the bill. Senator FEINGOLD sought a vote on his amendment to provide FISA Court documents to the Senate Intelligence Committee. Republicans blocked that. Senator WHITEHOUSE sought to offer an amendment to give the FISA Court authority to review compliance with minimization rules to protect the privacy of Americans whose communications are inadvertently intercepted. We were blocked from having that vote. Senator CARDIN sought to offer an amendment to sunset the legislation in 4 years rather than 6 years. Even that was blocked from having a vote. Senator KENNEDY offered an amendment—or I should say tried to offer one—providing for a report by the inspectors general of the relevant agencies to review the conduct of these programs in the past. No vote on that either. Senator FEINSTEIN sought to offer an amendment making crystal clear that FISA is the exclusive means by which the executive branch may conduct surveillance. Blocked by the Republicans.

Whether these amendments pass or not, we should be allowed to have votes on them. Senator FEINGOLD wasn't saying he wanted to talk for 2 hours. Senator FEINSTEIN wasn't saying she wanted to talk a long time. No one was—a short debate and have a vote on them. We were prevented from doing that.

So what does the Senate do? We take up bills all the time reported to us by committees. This is a little more complicated because we had two committees. It is not often we have concurrent jurisdiction, but there was here. But an eighth grade student could figure out what it is all about. It is not that difficult. Senators offer amendments to these bills and we let the Senate work its will. I don't understand how the Republicans can expect to block us from voting on any amendments and expect us to follow along. Senators are entitled to vote on their amendments.

Now, if someone is stalling—and we all went through that—there comes a time when you shut off the debate. But there is none of that here. With the Republicans blocking the amendments I have talked about, we haven't gotten to the crucial issue of immunity.

Mr. President, I will use my leader time now.

Let us not forget: The question of retroactive immunity wouldn't be before us if President Bush hadn't ignored Congress and established his own process outside the law. But far from taking responsibility for his actions, the President bullies and threatens the Congress he is supposed to be working with. He is similar to the kid in the school yard, the bully who says: OK, you are not doing what I want to do, so I am taking my ball home and none of us will be able to play.

When the President talks tonight about how important this program is and how it must continue, I say to him now that he must consider and reconsider his political posturing and ask his colleagues in the Senate to support an extension, especially when he is going to come and say how much he wants to work on a bipartisan basis.

We are a deliberative body. It was set up that way by the Founding Fathers.

Let us deliberate. I urge my colleagues to oppose cloture on the substitute so the Senate can return to considering this bill. We must pass a bill that gives our intelligence authorities the tools they need while protecting the privacy of all Americans. I urge my colleagues to support the extension so we can ensure current authority doesn't expire while Congress works to pass a new and stronger FISA bill.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, and pursuant to rule XXII, the Chair lays before the Senate the following cloture motion which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, do hereby move to bring to a close debate on the pending substitute amendment to S. 2248, Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 Amendments Act of 2007.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the second vote be of 10 minutes duration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

By unanimous consent, the mandatory quorum call has been waived.

The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on amendment No. 3911, offered by the Senator from West Virginia, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, and the Senator from Missouri, Mr. BOND, to S. 2248, a bill to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, to modernize and streamline the provisions of that Act, and for other purposes, shall be brought to a close?

The yeas and nays are mandatory under the rule.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. DURBIN. I announce that the Senator from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. LIEBERMAN), and the Senator from Florida (Mr. NELSON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) would vote ''nay.''

Mr. KYL. The following Senators are necessarily absent: the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. COBURN), the Senator from North Carolina (Mrs. DOLE), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. ENSIGN), and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. MCCAIN).

Further, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina (Mrs. DOLE) would have voted ''yea.''

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Sentors in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 48, nays 45, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 48, the nays are 45. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is rejected.

The Republican leader.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I wanted to take a moment to explain the next vote. The President indicated over the weekend that he would veto a 30-day extension. We have been dealing with this issue for almost a year. We have in the Rockefeller-Bond proposal a bipartisan compromise that came out of Intelligence 13 to 2. There is no need for a 30-day extension. But even if there were, you wouldn't get a 30-day extension by adding it to this bill. It is extremely important to oppose the 30-day extension. We know it won't become law on this bill. It wouldn't become law if it were passed freestanding, because the President would veto it. We may be talking about a very short-term extension here in the next few days, but we are still on FISA after today. We will not get off FISA until we make some determination of how we are going to dispose of this important measure.

I urge all my colleagues to vote against cloture on the 30-day extension amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Democratic leader.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we all acknowledge the Intelligence Committee did a good job on this piece of legislation. But the Intelligence Committee knew, everyone knew, there was concurrent referral of this legislation. It was always anticipated and believed, rightfully so, that the Judiciary Committee would take up this matter. And they did. They made some suggestions in the way of changes. We are entitled to vote on those. That is all we are asking. That isn't too unreasonable. For the President to not agree to any extension is unreasonable. The House is going to pass a 30-day extension in the morning. They are going to pass that. We are going to have the opportunity to vote on a 30-day extension. This would send an appropriate message to everyone that a 30-day extension is fair and reasonable. As I said in my remarks before the last vote, people are crying wolf a little too often. This legislation we have before us, if it doesn't pass, the work done by the Intelligence Committee and the Judiciary Committee will go for naught. But still, under the legislation we passed previously, the legislation will still be in effect. FISA is not gone. We all want to work to improve this. That is what this is all about. But we need some votes to do that. That is what we are asking.

Everyone here should understand, if you are voting today not to extend this legislation for 30 days, you are going to have to vote on it in the near future because the House is sending us the exact same measure tomorrow.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, pursuant to rule XXII, the clerk will report the motion to invoke cloture.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, do hereby move to bring to a close debate on the Reid amendment No. 3918 to S. 2248.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the mandatory quorum call is waived.

The question is, is it the sense of the Senate that debate on amendment No. 3918, offered by the Senator from Nevada, Mr. REID, to S. 2248, a bill to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, to modernize and streamline the provisions of that act, and for other purposes, shall be brought to a close.

MORNING BUSINESS

HONORING OUR ARMED FORCES

SERGEANT JON MICHAEL SCHOOLCRAFT, III

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I rise today with a heavy heart and deep sense of gratitude to honor the life of a brave soldier. SGT Jon Michael Schoolcraft, III, 26 years old, died January 19 in Taji, Iraq. Sergeant Schoolcraft died of injuries he sustained when an improvised explosive device detonated near his vehicle. With an optimistic future before him, Jon risked everything to fight for the values Americans hold close to our hearts, in a land halfway around the world.

Jon Schoolcraft, called Mike by his friends, graduated from Wapakoneta High School in Ohio in 2001. Growing up in Ohio with his mother, Cindy Schoolcraft-Hooker, Mike also spent time in Madison, IN, visiting his father, Mike Schoolcraft, Jr. Mike excelled at sports and particularly enjoyed skateboarding. His sense of duty to his country and a desire to see the world drove him to enroll in the Army's Delayed Entry Program while in high school.

After serving a first tour in Iraq, Mike reenlisted, telling a friend that he could not imagine doing anything other than being a soldier. In November of last year, Mike married his wife Amber and decided that his next tour in Iraq would be his last so they could begin a family. Mike was assigned to C Company, 1st Battalion, 27th Infantry Regiment, 25th Infantry Division in Schofield Barracks, HI. For his extraordinary service, Mike was posthumously awarded the Purple Heart.

Today, I join Mike's family and friends in mourning his death. While we struggle to bear our sorrow over this loss, we can also take pride in the example he set, bravely fighting to make the world a safer place. It is his courage and strength of character that people will remember when they think of Mike. Today and always, Mike will be remembered by family members, friends and fellow soldiers as a true American hero, and we honor the sacrifice he made while dutifully serving his country.

As I search for words to do justice in honoring Mike's sacrifice, I am reminded of President Lincoln's remarks as he addressed the families of the fallen soldiers in Gettysburg: ''We cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here.'' This statement is just as true today as it was nearly 150 years ago, as I am certain that the impact of Mike's actions will live on far longer than any record of these words.

It is my sad duty to enter the name of SGT Jon Michael Schoolcraft, III, in the RECORD of the U.S. Senate for his service to this country and for his profound commitment to freedom, democracy and peace. When I think about this just cause in which we are engaged, and the unfortunate pain that comes with the loss of our heroes, I hope that families like Mike's can find comfort in the words of the prophet Isaiah who said, ''He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces.''

May God grant strength and peace to those who mourn, and may God be with all of you, as I know He is with Mike.

SMALL BUSINESS STIMULUS ACT

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, over the past few months, our country has experienced instability and volatility in its credit markets. This looming credit crisis is affecting virtually every sector of the economy, including small business financing.

Since its inception in 1953, the Small Business Administration's 7(a) loan guaranty program has become the largest single source of long-term capital for small businesses. However, in the wake of the credit crunch and a slowing U.S. economy, we are now noticing that this essential financing resource is not serving nearly as many small businesses as it should. For example, during the first quarter of the 2008 fiscal year, 7(a) lending was down by 12 percent compared with the same period last year. In addition, at his State of the Agency Address this past Tuesday, SBA Administrator Steven Preston acknowledged that SBA lending was down in its largest program.

The Small Business Stimulus Act of 2008 will help reverse this downward trend in small business lending. The bill will temporarily reduce the fees collected from borrowers and lenders. This will immediately reduce the cost of capital for small businesses. With lower monthly loan payments, more money will be placed into the hands of small business owners money that will be quickly injected into the economy through purchases of inventory, real estate, and equipment. The fee reduction for lenders, coupled with the government guarantee, will give them an incentive to make 7(a) loans, as banks are scrambling for ways to salvage declining revenues and take on less risky loans. A similar stimulus was adopted after 9/11, and lending increased to businesses nationwide, pumping almost $3 billion into local economies and creating or retaining more than 90,000 jobs.

The bill also provides additional funding for the SBA's microloan program. As its name implies, microloans are small-scale business loans, which provide an essential financing source to underserved members of the business population, including women and minorities. This bill provides $12 million to expand the SBA's microloan program, including $2 million that will help leverage nearly $20 million in microloans.

The Small Business Stimulus Act of 2008 also includes two business tax incentives that will help small businesses that are feeling the impact of the economic downturn. The first provision would increase the amount that businesses can expense from $125,000 to $200,000 for 2008. This will help businesses immediately write off business purchases. The second provision increases the net operating carry back period for losses arising in taxable years ending in 2007 and 2008 from 2 years to 5 years. This provision will help business with cash flow. Expanding the carry back allows business owners to balance out net losses over years when the business has had a net operating gain.

I am confident that each of these targeted measures will provide timely, effective incentives to spur spending and encourage new investment and job growth in the hundreds of thousands of small businesses that drive this Nation's economy.

REMEMBERING THE UKRAINIAN FAMINE

Mr. VOINOVICH. Mr. President, I wish to remember the trials faced by the Ukrainian people and to pay tribute to their fortitude and love of freedom. At times in its history, Ukraine has been exploited and suffered greatly under repressive occupations. The Stalinist regime of the former Soviet Union sought to maintain control of the people and resources of the Ukraine through vicious oppression. The Ukrainian people have weathered many trials, but they have always fought for their freedom. It is my belief that as we embrace Ukraine's future, we must always remember the hardships of its past.

The Ukrainian peasantry rebelled against the collectivization policies imposed on them by the Stalinist regime starting in 1925. It is documented that very few farmers voluntarily joined collectives until Soviet secret police and Bolshevik brigades were sent to crush the resistance. As agricultural production fell in 1932 due to drought and these Stalinist policies, the regime attempted to maintain its export level. To do this the regime brutally confiscated grain and foodstuffs from hunger-stricken villages. Trade and supplies of food and goods were banned from those villages which were considered to be ''underperforming,'' while families who resisted were banished to central Asia. The totalitarian regime meted out harsh sentences, even the death penalty, against those who stole even small amounts of grain. We can never forget that over 2,000 innocent people, including children as young as 12 years old, were executed under this law.

In 1932, Stalin imposed barricades throughout the USSR to prevent peasants from fleeing those regions stricken by famine. It was a state-organized program of mass starvation against the nation of Ukraine as a whole and the revived Ukrainian nationalism. It had been inflicted on them deliberately to punish Ukraine and destroy the basis of its nationhood. The famine-genocide of the Holodomor resulted in the tragic and unforgettable loss of millions of Ukrainian lives. Nevertheless, the Stalinist regime denied reports of mass deaths and forbade travel to the area to deter foreign journalists from reporting on these terrible crimes. In fact, these horrible crimes remained largely unknown to the broader world for decades as a result of the denials and coverups of the Soviet authorities and their refusal of offers of international aid.

Through its determination to remember the victims of the famine and Soviet oppression, the Ukrainian American community has helped to bring these events to light. Their efforts have helped to give a voice to the millions of people who suffered, starved, and died as a result of a flawed policy and authoritarian regime.

On the 75th anniversary of the Ukrainian famine-genocide, we must continue the important work of the Ukrainian American community by remembering the cruel injustices suffered by the Ukrainian people during that part of history. By so doing, we are not only honoring the millions of victims of this oppression, but we are helping to prevent a tragedy like this from happening again in the future.

CURRENT ELECTORAL CRISIS IN KENYA

Mr. FEINGOLD. Mr. President, just over 1 month ago, in the days before the December 27 president election, I noted that it had become the closest political contest in that country's history and that the two leading candidates were running robust, active campaigns. Although I also acknowledged the persistence of a deeply entrenched culture of corruption, I was encouraged by the growing engagement of Kenyan citizens and civil society organizations during the relatively peaceful, well-run, and competitive campaign season. I joined many others in hoping that the presidential and parliamentary elections held on that day would confirm Kenya's place among the world's most promising emerging economies and young democracies. Instead, that hope turned to dismay as we watched a blatant disregard for democratic principles and processes by the ruling party and an extraordinary disrespect for rule of law and human rights by both leading candidates' parties. The serious allegations of vote rigging, the rushed declaration of a presidential winner, and the destructive violence that have ensued are not only hurting the Kenyan people—they are jeopardizing Kenya's previous democratic progress.

With Somalia, Ethiopia, Sudan, and Uganda as neighbors in the volatile Horn of Africa, Kenya has long been regarded as a stable country making slow but persistent progress towards democracy. Kenya's press and courts seemed to be asserting their independence from the president-dominated government, and the mere fact that all pre-election opinion polls put the incumbent president neck-and-neck with his challenger from the main opposition party seemed to be an encouraging sign of a vibrant democracy. But on December 27 and in the days that followed, this progress came to a grinding halt. The Kenyan election suffered a fate all too common in Africa, with the votes tallied behind closed doors and the results finally announced by Kenya's Electoral Commission suggesting significant rigging.

The resulting frustration and deadlock have sparked violence, looting, destruction of property, and disruption of normal activity, creating an economic and humanitarian emergency on top of the current political crisis. Hundreds have been killed—some of them because of disproportionate use of force by Kenyan police as they seek to quell protests—and tens of thousands have fled their homes. Trust in the government, law enforcement, and even in one's neighbor has been seriously undermined.

The rival political leaders—incumbent President Mwai Kibaki and leader of the Orange Democratic Movement opposition party, Raila Odinga—can work to end this violence and destruction by refraining from using, inciting or condoning violent tactics. In recent days, Mr. Odinga and his supporters have demonstrated noteworthy restraint and it is essential that both parties respect the importance of a peaceful resolution as they begin to participate in an internationally brokered dialogue, led by former U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan.

It is early days yet, and it remains unclear how committed these leading candidates are to seeing the negotiation through to the finish line. Although he has agreed to participate in an internationally brokered meeting with Mr. Odinga, Mr. Kibaki has been less than cooperative by rushing to appoint his own cronies to top cabinet positions and declaring he will follow the recommendations only of the Kenyan courts, which are also packed with his supporters. A political settlement is a key element in working through this electoral crisis but it must be part of a greater initiative that includes institutional reform. The road ahead is long, and I remain concerned that while both leading candidates have come to the table for negotiations, they could still decide to abandon the effort.

The past few weeks have shown how superficial Kenya's democratic gains may really have been. Now the international community—and the United States in particular—must live up to its rhetoric in favor of free and fair elections and institutional building. Many of the other countries that have suffered botched elections had a long history of such fraud but if this relatively stable and prosperous country is allowed to abandon its democratic experiment, the appeal of democracy will inevitably dim around the world. The citizens of Kenya as well as those from around the world had higher expectations for Kenya.

Resolving Kenya's current political, humanitarian, and economic crisis will require a coordinated international effort to engage all players in identifying and addressing the deeper problems that allowed the election fraud to occur and to ignite such a wave of outrage. Although a power-sharing agreement will likely be part of the solution, serious underlying problems need to be addressed. The challenges facing Kenya include an over-concentration of power in the office of the president, insufficient independence of the judiciary and electoral institutions, the need for professionalization of police and armed forces, and a persistent lack of transparency and inclusiveness throughout the political system. Only by addressing these root causes of the recent conflict will Kenya be able to truly restore stability and emerge from this crisis a stronger and more prosperous nation. Such a task will not be quick, easy, or cheap, but the alternative—not seizing this chance to bring about essential political reform—would be enduring, complex, and costly.

Last week, along with my ranking member on the Senate Subcommittee on African Affairs, Senator SUNUNU, and Senators CARDIN and KERRY, I introduced a resolution to encourage the United States and the wider international community to resist the temptation for a quick fix in Kenya and to instead pursue a more intensive, encompassing plan for political transition and transformation. I hope the Senate will pass this resolution shortly. The administration has played an active role—sending Assistant Secretary Frazer to Nairobi shortly after the elections to meet with both leading candidates—and I know Ambassador Ranneberger has been actively engaged in-country. But we need to see greater collaboration from all donors—with one consistent message that helps move Kenya to the next stage. I hope that Members of Congress from both parties will come together to support this initiative and the diplomatic and humanitarian efforts in Kenya that must follow in the coming weeks and months.

The U.S.-Kenya partnership is a longstanding and important one, but I cannot condone a continued relationship with a government that has apparently stolen an election and uses tactics of fear and intimidation to address dissent. This is not the Kenya I have come to know, and I am sure, not the Kenya its citizens want to know. We must close this devastating chapter by addressing the reasons for the electoral crisis and ensuing violence. Without such vital work, our historic partnership will deteriorate. There is a window of opportunity to ensure this does not happen, and I encourage all key actors to seize upon this opening. Above all, I want to see violence end and hope restored in Kenya.

VOTE EXPLANATION

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. President, I was necessarily absent for today's cloture votes on the Rockefeller-Bond Substitute amendment No. 3911 and the Reid amendment No. 3918 to S. 2246, the FISA legislation. Had I been present, I would have voted ''no'' on No. 3911 and ''aye'' on No. 3918.

I believe that now is the time for the full Senate to consider and debate the difficult questions raised in this legislation. The Senate should consider and vote on important amendments relating to the protection of Americans' civil liberties and the question of immunity for telecommunications providers.

REPORT ON THE STATE OF THE UNION DELIVERED TO A JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS ON JANUARY 28, 2008—PM 35

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was ordered to lie on the table:

To the Congress of the United States:

Madam Speaker, Vice President CHENEY, Members of Congress, distinguished guests, and fellow citizens:

Seven years have passed since I first stood before you at this rostrum. In that time, our country has been tested in ways none of us could have imagined. We have faced hard decisions about peace and war, rising competition in the world economy, and the health and welfare of our citizens. These issues call for vigorous debate, and I think it's fair to say we've answered that call. Yet history will record that amid our differences, we acted with purpose. And together, we showed the world the power and resilience of American self-government.

All of us were sent to Washington to carry out the people's business. That is the purpose of this body. It is the meaning of our oath. And it remains our charge to keep.

The actions of the 110th Congress will affect the security and prosperity of our Nation long after this session has ended. In this election year, let us show our fellow Americans that we recognize our responsibilities and are determined to meet them. And let us show them that Republicans and Democrats can compete for votes and cooperate for results at the same time.

From expanding opportunity to protecting our country, we have made good progress. Yet we have unfinished business before us, and the American people expect us to get it done.

In the work ahead, we must be guided by the philosophy that made our Nation great. As Americans, we believe in the power of individuals to determine their destiny and shape the course of history. We believe that the most reliable guide for our country is the collective wisdom of ordinary citizens. So in all we do, we must trust in the ability of free people to make wise decisions, and empower them to improve their lives and their futures.

To build a prosperous future, we must trust people with their own money and empower them to grow our economy. As we meet tonight, our economy is undergoing a period of uncertainty. America has added jobs for a record 52 straight months, but jobs are now growing at a slower pace. Wages are up, but so are prices for food and gas. Exports are rising, but the housing market has declined. And at kitchen tables across our country, there is concern about our economic future.

In the long run, Americans can be confident about our economic growth. But in the short run, we can all see that growth is slowing. So last week, my Administration reached agreement with Speaker PELOSI and Republican Leader BOEHNER on a robust growth package that includes tax relief for individuals and families and incentives for business investment. The temptation will be to load up the bill. That would delay it or derail it, and neither option is acceptable. This is a good agreement that will keep our economy growing and our people working. And this Congress must pass it as soon as possible.

We have other work to do on taxes. Unless the Congress acts, most of the tax relief we have delivered over the past 7 years will be taken away. Some in Washington argue that letting tax relief expire is not a tax increase. Try explaining that to 116 million American taxpayers who would see their taxes rise by an average of $1,800. Others have said they would personally be happy to pay higher taxes. I welcome their enthusiasm, and I am pleased to report that the IRS accepts both checks and money orders.

Most Americans think their taxes are high enough. With all the other pressures on their finances, American families should not have to worry about the Federal Government taking a bigger bite out of their paychecks. There is only one way to eliminate this uncertainty: make the tax relief permanent.

And Members of Congress should know: If any bill raising taxes reaches my desk, I will veto it.

Just as we trust Americans with their own money, we need to earn their trust by spending their tax dollars wisely. Next week, I will send you a budget that terminates or substantially reduces 151 wasteful or bloated programs totaling more than $18 billion. And this budget will keep America on track for a surplus in 2012. American families have to balance their budgets, and so should their Government.

The people's trust in their Government is undermined by congressional earmarks—special interest projects that are often snuck in at the last minute, without discussion or debate. Last year, I asked you to voluntarily cut the number and cost of earmarks in half. I also asked you to stop slipping earmarks into committee reports that never even come to a vote. Unfortunately, neither goal was met. So this time, if you send me an appropriations bill that does not cut the number and cost of earmarks in half, I will send it back to you with my veto. And tomorrow, I will issue an Executive Order that directs Federal agencies to ignore any future earmark that is not voted on by the Congress. If these items are truly worth funding, the Congress should debate them in the open and hold a public vote.

Our shared responsibilities extend beyond matters of taxes and spending.

On housing, we must trust Americans with the responsibility of homeownership and empower them to weather turbulent times in the housing market. My administration brought together the HOPE NOW alliance, which is helping many struggling homeowners avoid foreclosure. The Congress can help even more. Tonight I ask you to pass legislation to reform Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, modernize the Federal Housing Administration, and allow State housing agencies to issue tax-free bonds to help homeowners refinance their mortgages. These are difficult times for many American families, and by taking these steps, we can help more of them keep their homes.

To build a future of quality health care, we must trust patients and doctors to make medical decisions and empower them with better information and better options. We share a common goal: making health care more affordable and accessible for all Americans. The best way to achieve that goal is by expanding consumer choice, not government control. So I have proposed ending the bias in the tax code against those who do not get their health insurance through their employer. This one reform would put private coverage within reach for millions, and I call on the Congress to pass it this year. The Congress must also expand health savings accounts, create Association Health Plans for small businesses, promote health information technology, and confront the epidemic of junk medical lawsuits. With all these steps, we will help ensure that decisions about your medical care are made in the privacy of your doctor's office—not in the halls of Congress.

On education, we must trust students to learn if given the chance and empower parents to demand results from our schools. In neighborhoods across our country, there are boys and girls with dreams—and a decent education is their only hope of achieving them. Six years ago, we came together to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, and today no one can deny its results. Last year, fourth and eighth graders achieved the highest math scores on record. Reading scores are on the rise. And African-American and Hispanic students posted alltime highs. Now we must work together to increase accountability, add flexibility for States and districts, reduce the number of high school dropouts, and provide extra help for struggling schools. Members of Congress: The No Child Left Behind Act is a bipartisan achievement. It is succeeding. And we owe it to America's children, their parents, and their teachers to strengthen this good law.

We must also do more to help children when their schools do not measure up. Thanks to the D.C. Opportunity Scholarships you approved, more than 2,600 of the poorest children in our Nation's capital have found new hope at a faith-based or other non-public school. Sadly, these schools are disappearing at an alarming rate in many of America's inner cities. So I will convene a White House summit aimed at strengthening these lifelines of learning. And to open the doors of these schools to more children, I ask you to support a new $300 million program called Pell Grants for Kids. We have seen how Pell Grants help low-income college students realize their full potential. Together, we have expanded the size and reach of these grants. Now let's apply that same spirit to help liberate poor children trapped in failing public schools.

On trade, we must trust American workers to compete with anyone in the world and empower them by opening up new markets overseas. Today, our economic growth increasingly depends on our ability to sell American goods, crops, and services all over the world. So we are working to break down barriers to trade and investment wherever we can. We are working for a successful Doha round of trade talks, and we must complete a good agreement this year. At the same time, we are pursuing opportunities to open up new markets by passing free trade agreements.

I thank the Congress for approving a good agreement with Peru. Now I ask you to approve agreements with Colombia, Panama, and South Korea. Many products from these nations now enter America duty-free, yet many of our products face steep tariffs in their markets. These agreements will level the playing field. They will give us better access to nearly 100 million customers. And they will support good jobs for the finest workers in the world: those whose products say ''Made in the USA.''

These agreements also promote America's strategic interests. The first agreement that will come before you is with Colombia, a friend of America that is confronting violence and terror and fighting drug traffickers. If we fail to pass this agreement, we will embolden the purveyors of false populism in our hemisphere. So we must come together, pass this agreement, and show our neighbors in the region that democracy leads to a better life.

Trade brings better jobs, better choices, and better prices. Yet for some Americans, trade can mean losing a job, and the Federal Government has a responsibility to help. I ask the Congress to reauthorize and reform trade adjustment assistance, so we can help these displaced workers learn new skills and find new jobs.

To build a future of energy security, we must trust in the creative genius of American researchers and entrepreneurs and empower them to pioneer a new generation of clean energy technology. Our security, our prosperity, and our environment all require reducing our dependence on oil. Last year, I asked you to pass legislation to reduce oil consumption over the next decade, and you responded. Together we should take the next steps: Let us fund new technologies that can generate coal power while capturing carbon emissions. Let us increase the use of renewable power and emissions-free nuclear power. Let us continue investing in advanced battery technology and renewable fuels to power the cars and trucks of the future. Let us create a new international clean technology fund, which will help developing nations like India and China make greater use of clean energy sources. And let us complete an international agreement that has the potential to slow, stop, and eventually reverse the growth of greenhouse gases. This agreement will be effective only if it includes commitments by every major economy and gives none a free ride. The United States is committed to strengthening our energy security and confronting global climate change. And the best way to meet these goals is for America to continue leading the way toward the development of cleaner and more efficient technology.

To keep America competitive into the future, we must trust in the skill of our scientists and engineers and empower them to pursue the breakthroughs of tomorrow. Last year, the Congress passed legislation supporting the American Competitiveness Initiative, but never followed through with the funding. This funding is essential to keeping our scientific edge. So I ask the Congress to double Federal support for critical basic research in the physical sciences and ensure America remains the most dynamic nation on earth.

On matters of science and life, we must trust in the innovative spirit of medical researchers and empower them to discover new treatments while respecting moral boundaries. In November, we witnessed a landmark achievement when scientists discovered a way to reprogram adult skin cells to act like embryonic stem cells. This breakthrough has the potential to move us beyond the divisive debates of the past by extending the frontiers of medicine without the destruction of human life. So we are expanding funding for this type of ethical medical research. And as we explore promising avenues of research, we must also ensure that all life is treated with the dignity it deserves. So I call on the Congress to pass legislation that bans unethical practices such as the buying, selling, patenting, or cloning of human life.

On matters of justice, we must trust in the wisdom of our Founders and empower judges who understand that the Constitution means what it says. I have submitted judicial nominees who will rule by the letter of the law, not the whim of the gavel. Many of these nominees are being unfairly delayed. They are worthy of confirmation, and the Senate should give each of them a prompt up-or-down vote.

In communities across our land, we must trust in the good heart of the American people and empower them to serve their neighbors in need. Over the past 7 years, more of our fellow citizens have discovered that the pursuit of happiness leads to the path of service. Americans have volunteered in record numbers. Charitable donations are higher than ever. Faith-based groups are bringing hope to pockets of despair, with newfound support from the Federal Government. And to help guarantee equal treatment for faith-based organizations when they compete for Federal funds, I ask you to permanently extend Charitable Choice.

Tonight the armies of compassion continue the march to a new day in the Gulf Coast. America honors the strength and resilience of the people of this region. We reaffirm our pledge to help them build stronger and better than before. And tonight I am pleased to announce that in April we will host this year's North American Summit of Canada, Mexico, and the United States in the great city of New Orleans.

There are two other pressing challenges that I have raised repeatedly before this body, and that this body has failed to address: Entitlement spending and immigration.

Every Member in this Chamber knows that spending on entitlement programs like Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid is growing faster than we can afford. And we all know the painful choices ahead if America stays on this path: Massive tax increases, sudden and drastic cuts in benefits, or crippling deficits. I have laid out proposals to reform these programs. Now I ask Members of Congress to offer your proposals and come up with a bipartisan solution to save these vital programs for our children and grandchildren.

The other pressing challenge is immigration. America needs to secure our borders—and with your help, my administration is taking steps to do so. We are increasing worksite enforcement, we are deploying fences and advanced technologies to stop illegal crossings, we have effectively ended the policy of ''catch and release'' at the border, and by the end of this year, we will have doubled the number of border patrol agents. Yet we also need to acknowledge that we will never fully secure our border until we create a lawful way for foreign workers to come here and support our economy. This will take pressure off the border and allow law enforcement to concentrate on those who mean us harm. We must also find a sensible and humane way to deal with people here illegally. Illegal immigration is complicated, but it can be resolved. And it must be resolved in a way that upholds both our laws and our highest ideals.

This is the business of our Nation here at home. Yet building a prosperous future for our citizens also depends on confronting enemies abroad and advancing liberty in troubled regions of the world.

Our foreign policy is based on a clear premise: We trust that people, when given the chance, will choose a future of freedom and peace. In the last 7 years, we have witnessed stirring moments in the history of liberty. We have seen citizens in Georgia and Ukraine stand up for their right to free and fair elections. We have seen people in Lebanon take to the streets to demand their independence. We have seen Afghans emerge from the tyranny of the Taliban to choose a new president and a new parliament. We have seen jubilant Iraqis holding up ink-stained fingers and celebrating their freedom. And these images of liberty have inspired us.

In the past 7 years, we have also seen images that have sobered us. We have watched throngs of mourners in Lebanon and Pakistan carrying the caskets of beloved leaders taken by the assassin's hand. We have seen wedding guests in blood-soaked finery staggering from a hotel in Jordan, Afghans and Iraqis blown up in mosques and markets, and trains in London and Madrid ripped apart by bombs. And on a clear September day, we saw thousands of our fellow citizens taken from us in an instant. These horrific images serve as a grim reminder: The advance of liberty is opposed by terrorists and extremists—evil men who despise freedom, despise America, and aim to subject millions to their violent rule.

Since September 11, we have taken the fight to these terrorists and extremists. We will stay on the offense, we will keep up the pressure, and we will deliver justice to the enemies of America.

We are engaged in the defining ideological struggle of the 21st century. The terrorists oppose every principle of humanity and decency that we hold dear. Yet in this war on terror, there is one thing we and our enemies agree on: In the long run, men and women who are free to determine their own destinies will reject terror and refuse to live in tyranny. That is why the terrorists are fighting to deny this choice to people in Lebanon, Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan, and the Palestinian Territories. And that is why, for the security of America and the peace of the world, we are spreading the hope of freedom.

In Afghanistan, America, our 25 NATO allies, and 15 partner nations are helping the Afghan people defend their freedom and rebuild their country. Thanks to the courage of these military and civilian personnel, a nation that was once a safe haven for al Qaida is now a young democracy where boys and girls are going to school, new roads and hospitals are being built, and people are looking to the future with new hope. These successes must continue, so we are adding 3,200 Marines to our forces in Afghanistan, where they will fight the terrorists and train the Afghan Army and police. Defeating the Taliban and al Qaida is critical to our security, and I thank the Congress for supporting America's vital mission in Afghanistan.

In Iraq, the terrorists and extremists are fighting to deny a proud people their liberty and to establish safe havens for attacks across the world. One year ago, our enemies were succeeding in their efforts to plunge Iraq into chaos. So we reviewed our strategy and changed course. We launched a surge of American forces into Iraq. And we gave our troops a new mission: Work with Iraqi forces to protect the Iraqi people, pursue the enemy in its strongholds, and deny the terrorists sanctuary anywhere in the country.

The Iraqi people quickly realized that something dramatic had happened. Those who had worried that America was preparing to abandon them instead saw tens of thousands of American forces flowing into their country. They saw our forces moving into neighborhoods, clearing out the terrorists, and staying behind to ensure the enemy did not return. And they saw our troops, along with Provincial Reconstruction Teams that include Foreign Service Officers and other skilled public servants, coming in to ensure that improved security was followed by improvements in daily life. Our military and civilians in Iraq are performing with courage and distinction, and they have the gratitude of our whole Nation.

The Iraqis launched a surge of their own. In the fall of 2006, Sunni tribal leaders grew tired of al Qaida's brutality and started a popular uprising called ''The Anbar Awakening.'' Over the past year, similar movements have spread across the country. And today, this grassroots surge includes more than 80,000 Iraqi citizens who are fighting the terrorists. The government in Baghdad has stepped forward as well—adding more than 100,000 new Iraqi soldiers and police during the past year.

While the enemy is still dangerous and more work remains, the American and Iraqi surges have achieved results few of us could have imagined just 1 year ago:

When we met last year, many said containing the violence was impossible. A year later, high profile terrorist attacks are down, civilian deaths are down, and sectarian killings are down.

When we met last year, militia extremists—some armed and trained by Iran—were wreaking havoc in large areas of Iraq. A year later, Coalition and Iraqi forces have killed or captured hundreds of militia fighters. And Iraqis of all backgrounds increasingly realize that defeating these militia fighters is critical to the future of their country.

When we met last year, al Qaida had sanctuaries in many areas of Iraq, and their leaders had just offered American forces safe passage out of the country. Today, it is al Qaida that is searching for safe passage. They have been driven from many of the strongholds they once held, and over the past year, we have captured or killed thousands of extremists in Iraq, including hundreds of key al Qaida leaders and operatives. Last month, Osama bin Laden released a tape in which he railed against Iraqi tribal leaders who have turned on al Qaida and admitted that Coalition forces are growing stronger in Iraq. Ladies and gentlemen, some may deny the surge is working, but among the terrorists there is no doubt. Al Qaida is on the run in Iraq, and this enemy will be defeated.

When we met last year, our troop levels in Iraq were on the rise. Today, because of the progress just described, we are implementing a policy of ''return on success,'' and the surge forces we sent to Iraq are beginning to come home.

This progress is a credit to the valor of our troops and the brilliance of their commanders. This evening, I want to speak directly to our men and women on the front lines. Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen, Marines, and Coast Guardsmen: In the past year, you have done everything we have asked of you, and more. Our Nation is grateful for your courage. We are proud of your accomplishments. And tonight in this hallowed chamber, with the American people as our witness, we make you a solemn pledge: In the fight ahead, you will have all you need to protect our Nation. And I ask the Congress to meet its responsibilities to these brave men and women by fully funding our troops.

Our enemies in Iraq have been hit hard. They are not yet defeated, and we can still expect tough fighting ahead. Our objective in the coming year is to sustain and build on the gains we made in 2007, while transitioning to the next phase of our strategy. American troops are shifting from leading operations, to partnering with Iraqi forces, and, eventually, to a protective overwatch mission. As part of this transition, one Army brigade combat team and one Marine Expeditionary Unit have already come home and will not be replaced. In the coming months, four additional brigades and two Marine battalions will follow suit. Taken together, this means more than 20,000 of our troops are coming home.

Any further drawdown of U.S. troops will be based on conditions in Iraq and the recommendations of our commanders. General Petraeus has warned that too fast a drawdown could result in the ''disintegration of the Iraqi Security Forces, al Qaida-Iraq regaining lost ground, [and] a marked increase in violence.'' Members of Congress: Having come so far and achieved so much, we must not allow this to happen.

In the coming year, we will work with Iraqi leaders as they build on the progress they are making toward political reconciliation. At the local level, Sunnis, Shia, and Kurds are beginning to come together to reclaim their communities and rebuild their lives. Progress in the provinces must be matched by progress in Baghdad. And we are seeing some encouraging signs. The national government is sharing oil revenues with the provinces. The parliament recently passed both a pension law and de-Ba'athification reform. Now they are debating a provincial powers law. The Iraqis still have a distance to travel. But after decades of dictatorship and the pain of sectarian violence, reconciliation is taking place—and the Iraqi people are taking control of their future.

The mission in Iraq has been difficult and trying for our Nation. But it is in the vital interest of the United States that we succeed. A free Iraq will deny al Qaida a safe haven. A free Iraq will show millions across the Middle East that a future of liberty is possible. And a free Iraq will be a friend of America, a partner in fighting terror, and a source of stability in a dangerous part of the world.

By contrast, a failed Iraq would embolden extremists, strengthen Iran, and give terrorists a base from which to launch new attacks on our friends, our allies, and our homeland. The enemy has made its intentions clear. At a time when the momentum seemed to favor them, al Qaida's top commander in Iraq declared that they will not rest until they have attacked us here in Washington. My fellow Americans: We will not rest either. We will not rest until this enemy has been defeated. We must do the difficult work today, so that years from now people will look back and say that this generation rose to the moment, prevailed in a tough fight, and left behind a more hopeful region and a safer America.

We are also standing against the forces of extremism in the Holy Land, where we have new cause for hope. Palestinians have elected a president who recognizes that confronting terror is essential to achieving a state where his people can live in dignity and at peace with Israel. Israelis have leaders who recognize that a peaceful, democratic Palestinian state will be a source of lasting security. This month in Ramallah and Jerusalem, I assured leaders from both sides that America will do, and I will do, everything we can to help them achieve a peace agreement that defines a Palestinian state by the end of this year. The time has come for a Holy Land where a democratic Israel and a democratic Palestine live side-by-side in peace.

We are also standing against the forces of extremism embodied by the regime in Tehran. Iran's rulers oppress a good and talented people. And wherever freedom advances in the Middle East, it seems the Iranian regime is there to oppose it. Iran is funding and training militia groups in Iraq, supporting Hezbollah terrorists in Lebanon, and backing Hamas' efforts to undermine peace in the Holy Land. Tehran is also developing ballistic missiles of increasing range and continues to develop its capability to enrich uranium, which could be used to create a nuclear weapon. Our message to the people of Iran is clear: We have no quarrel with you, we respect your traditions and your history, and we look forward to the day when you have your freedom. Our message to the leaders of Iran is also clear: Verifiably suspend your nuclear enrichment, so negotiations can begin. And to rejoin the community of nations, come clean about your nuclear intentions and past actions, stop your oppression at home, and cease your support for terror abroad. But above all, know this: America will confront those who threaten our troops, we will stand by our allies, and we will defend our vital interests in the Persian Gulf.

On the homefront, we will continue to take every lawful and effective measure to protect our country. This is our most solemn duty. We are grateful that there has not been another attack on our soil since September 11. This is not for a lack of desire or effort on the part of the enemy. In the past 6 years, we have stopped numerous attacks, including a plot to fly a plane into the tallest building in Los Angeles and another to blow up passenger jets bound for America over the Atlantic. Dedicated men and women in our Government toil day and night to stop the terrorists from carrying out their plans. These good citizens are saving American lives, and everyone in this chamber owes them our thanks. And we owe them something more: We owe them the tools they need to keep our people safe.

One of the most important tools we can give them is the ability to monitor terrorist communications. To protect America, we need to know who the terrorists are talking to, what they are saying, and what they are planning. Last year, the Congress passed legislation to help us do that. Unfortunately, the Congress set the legislation to expire on February 1. This means that if you do not act by Friday, our ability to track terrorist threats would be weakened and our citizens will be in greater danger. The Congress must ensure the flow of vital intelligence is not disrupted. The Congress must pass liability protection for companies believed to have assisted in the efforts to defend America. We have had ample time for debate. The time to act is now.

Protecting our Nation from the dangers of a new century requires more than good intelligence and a strong military. It also requires changing the conditions that breed resentment and allow extremists to prey on despair. So America is using its influence to build a freer, more hopeful, and more compassionate world. This is a reflection of our national interest and the calling of our conscience.

America is opposing genocide in Sudan and supporting freedom in countries from Cuba and Zimbabwe to Belarus and Burma.

America is leading the fight against global poverty, with strong education initiatives and humanitarian assistance. We have also changed the way we deliver aid by launching the Millennium Challenge Account. This program strengthens democracy, transparency, and the rule of law in developing nations, and I ask you to fully fund this important initiative.

America is leading the fight against global hunger. Today, more than half the world's food aid comes from the United States. And tonight, I ask the Congress to support an innovative proposal to provide food assistance by purchasing crops directly from farmers in the developing world, so we can build up local agriculture and help break the cycle of famine.

America is leading the fight against disease. With your help, we are working to cut by half the number of malaria-related deaths in 15 African nations. And our Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief is treating 1.4 million people. We can bring healing and hope to many more. So I ask you to maintain the principles that have changed behavior and made this program a success. And I call on you to double our initial commitment to fighting HIV/AIDS by approving an additional $30 billion over the next 5 years.

America is a force for hope in the world because we are a compassionate people, and some of the most compassionate Americans are those who have stepped forward to protect us. We must keep faith with all who have risked life and limb so that we might live in freedom and peace. Over the past 7 years, we have increased funding for veterans by more than 95 percent. As we increase funding, we must also reform our veterans system to meet the needs of a new war and a new generation. I call on the Congress to enact the reforms recommended by Senator Bob Dole and Secretary Donna Shalala, so we can improve the system of care for our wounded warriors and help them build lives of hope, promise, and dignity.

Our military families also sacrifice for America. They endure sleepless nights and the daily struggle of providing for children while a loved one is serving far from home. We have a responsibility to provide for them. So I ask you to join me in expanding their access to childcare, creating new hiring preferences for military spouses across the Federal Government, and allowing our troops to transfer their unused education benefits to their spouses or children. Our military families serve our Nation, they inspire our Nation, and tonight our Nation honors them.

The secret of our strength, the miracle of America, is that our greatness lies not in our Government, but in the spirit and determination of our people. When the Federal Convention met in Philadelphia in 1787, our Nation was bound by the Articles of Confederation, which began with the words, ''We the undersigned delegates.'' When Gouverneur Morris was asked to draft the preamble to our new Constitution, he offered an important revision and opened with words that changed the course of our Nation and the history of the world: ''We the people.''

By trusting the people, our Founders wagered that a great and noble Nation could be built on the liberty that resides in the hearts of all men and women. By trusting the people, succeeding generations transformed our fragile young democracy into the most powerful Nation on earth and a beacon of hope for millions. And so long as we continue to trust the people, our Nation will prosper, our liberty will be secure, and the State of our Union will remain strong. So tonight, with confidence in freedom's power, and trust in the people, let us set forth to do their business.

GEORGE W. BUSH.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. REID:

S. 2561. A bill to require the Secretary of the Interior to conduct a theme study to identify sites and resources to commemorate and interpret the Cold War; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, 75 years ago yesterday, the U.S. conducted the first nuclear test on American soil—the detonation of a one-kiloton nuclear device in an area known as Frenchman Flat at the Nevada Test Site.

Conducted in extraordinary secrecy, this first nuclear testing program, known as Project Nutmeg, was representative of the efforts of countless Americans in the 50 year struggle we know as the Cold War.

Lasting half a century, the Cold War was the longest sustained conflict in U.S. history. The nuclear capabilities of our enemy posed literally an existential threat to our Nation. The threat of mass destruction left a permanent mark on American life.

The U.S. prevailed over this grave threat, through the technological achievement, patriotism, and sacrifice of the people of the great State of Nevada, and of others throughout the Nation.

It has been 18 years since the Malta Conference that marked the end of the Cold War, yet the contributions and sacrifices of generations of Americans have largely gone unrecognized.

The time has come to recognize and honor those Americans who toiled in relative obscurity to bring us victory during this most dangerous conflict in our Nation's history.

Today I introduce a bill that requires the Department of the Interior to conduct a study to identify sites and resources to commemorate heroes of the Cold War, and to interpret the Cold War for future generations.

My legislation directs the Secretary of the Interior to establish a ''Cold War Advisory Committee'' to oversee the inventory of Cold War sites and resources; for potential inclusion in the National Park System; as national historic landmarks; or other appropriate designations.

The Advisory Committee will work closely with State and local governments and local historical organizations. The Committee's starting point will be a Cold War study completed by the Secretary of Defense under the 1991 Defense Appropriations Act. Obvious Cold War sites of significance include: Intercontinental ballistic missile launch sites; flight training centers; communications and command centers, such as Cheyenne Mountain, Colorado; nuclear weapons test sites, such as the Nevada Test Site; and sites of other strategic and tactical significance.

Perhaps no state in the union played a more sigificant role than Nevada in winning the Cold War.

The Nevada Test Site is a high-technology engineering marvel where the U.S. developed, tested, and perfected a nuclear deterrent that formed the cornerstone of America's security and leadership among nations. Of the 1,149 nuclear detonations conducted by U.S. as part of its nuclear testing program, 1,021 were performed at the Nevada Test Site.

The Naval Air Station at Fallon, NV, home of the Navy's preeminent tactical air warfare training center, was also the site of Cold War-era nuclear testing.

Hawthorne Army Depot, formerly known as the Hawthorne Army Ammunition Plant, likewise played an important role throughout the Cold War, serving as a staging area for conventional bombs, rockets, and ammunition as it had done since World War II.

Nellis Air Force Base outside Las Vegas, home of the first dedicated air warfare and later air/ground training facility, provided to Cold War aviators and continues to provide advanced air combat training for U.S. and Allied forces.

Generations of Nevadans bore and continue to bear extraordinary costs as a result of these critical contributions to the Cold War effort.

The Advisory Committee established under this legislation will develop an interpretive handbook telling the story of the Cold War and its heroes.

I'd like to take a moment to relate a story of one group of Cold War heroes.

On a snowy evening, November 17, 1955, a U.S. Air Force C–54 cargo plane crashed near the summit of Mount Charleston in rural Nevada.

Kept secret for years, we now know that the four aircrew and 10 scientists aboard the doomed aircraft were bound for the secret Air Force Flight Test Center, where they were developing a top-secret spy plane that would become known as the U–2.

These men who gave their lives that day helped build the plane that many critics said could never be built. Owing to the efforts of men like these, the critics were proved wrong: The U–2 remains a vital component of our reconnaissance forces to this day.

As a result of the absolute secrecy surrounding their work, the families of the men who perished on Mount Charleston only recently learned the true circumstances of the crash that took the lives of their loved ones and the nature of their vital work.

This legislation will provide $500,000 to identify historic landmarks, like the Mount Charleston crash site, to recognize and pay tribute to the sacrifices of these men and others.

I would like to reiterate my thanks for Mr. Steve Ririe of Las Vegas, whose tireless efforts brought to light the events surrounding the death of these 14 men on Mount Charleston over 50 years ago, and for the efforts of State Senator Raymond Rawson, who shepherded through the Nevada legislature a resolution honoring these heroes.

A grateful Nation owes a debt of supreme gratitude to the silent heroes of the Cold War. I urge my colleagues to support this long-overdue tribute to the contribution and sacrifice of these Americans.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

SUBMITTED RESOLUTIONS

SENATE RESOLUTION 432—URGING THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY TO PROVIDE THE UNITED NATIONS-AFRICAN UNION MISSION IN SUDAN WITH ESSENTIAL TACTICAL AND UTILITY HELICOPTERS

Mr. BIDEN (for himself, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MENENDEZ, Mr. CARDIN, and Mr. DURBIN) submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 432

Whereas, on August 30, 2006, the United Nations Security Council approved United Nations Security Council Resolution 1706, providing that the existing United Nations Mission in Sudan (UNMIS) ''shall take over from [the African Mission in Sudan (AMIS)] responsibility for supporting the implementation of the Darfur Peace Agreement upon the expiration of AMIS' mandate but in any event no later than 31 December 2006'';

Whereas, on July 31, 2007, the United Nations Security Council approved United Nations Security Council Resolution 1769 reaffirming Resolution 1706 and stating that the Security Council ''[d]ecides . . . to authorise and mandate the establishment . . . of an AU/UN Hybrid operation in Darfur (UNAMID) . . . [and] [d]ecides that UNAMID, which shall incorporate AMIS personnel and the UN Heavy and Light Support Packages to AMIS, shall consist of up to 19,555 military personnel, including 360 military observers and liaison officers, and an appropriate civilian component including up to 3,772 police personnel and 19 formed police units comprising up to 140 personnel each'';

Whereas, on December 31, 2007, the United Nations-African Union hybrid mission formally assumed control of peacekeeping operations in Darfur, but did so with only approximately 9,000 troops and police on the ground, far short of both the authorized and necessary levels;

Whereas the Government of Sudan continues to obstruct implementation of Security Council Resolutions 1706 and 1769 in several respects, including by refusing to conclude a Status of Forces Agreement or to cooperate on issues such as the force composition, the authorization of night flights, customs clearance, land access, and visas for staff;

Whereas, on January 7, 2008, uniformed elements of the army of Sudan attacked a clearly marked UNAMID supply convoy, severely wounding a Sudanese civilian driver;

Whereas rebels, militias, government forces, bandits, and others continue to prey upon the people of Darfur and upon humanitarian workers, increasing the urgency of both deploying the full complement of peacekeepers and police and of reaching a lasting political settlement;

Whereas the preliminary results of a United Nations assessment entitled the ''Food Security and Nutrition Assessment of the Conflict-Affected Population of Darfur (August/September 2007)'' reveal that global acute malnutrition in Darfur increased in 2007, exceeding emergency levels in some regions;

Whereas the United Nations-African Union Mission in Sudan has been hampered not only by obstruction by the Government of Sudan and other obstacles to peace in the region, but by the failure of the international community to commit the resources, equipment, and personnel needed to carry out the peacekeeping mission, most notably the failure to provide critically needed aviation and transportation assets;

Whereas the United Nations-African Union Mission in Sudan needs, among other critical mobility capabilities that have not been met, 18 utility helicopters and 6 tactical helicopters and crews;

Whereas, in a report to the Security Council dated December 24, 2007, the Secretary-General termed these helicopters indispensable and stated that ''UNAMID must be capable of rapid mobility over large distances, especially over terrain where roads are the exception. Without the missing helicopters, this mobility—a fundamental requirement for the implementation of the UNAMID mandate—will not be possible.'';

Whereas a large number of countries possess the military assets that could help to fulfill this requirement;

Whereas the United States continues to lead the world in its contributions to efforts to end the genocide in Darfur, including by providing more than $4,500,000,000 since 2004 in response to the Darfur crisis;

Whereas continued failure on the part of the international community to take all steps necessary to generate, deploy, and maintain an effective United Nations-African Union hybrid peacekeeping force will result in the continued loss of life and further degradation of humanitarian infrastructure in Darfur; and

Whereas it would be inexcusable for the international community to allow an authorized peacekeeping mission intended to help bring an end to genocide and its effects to founder or be compromised because of a failure to commit critical elements, such as the 24 helicopters needed to meet the critical mobility capabilities of the United Nations-African Union Mission in Sudan: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) urges the members of the international community, including the United States, that possess the capability to provide the tactical and utility helicopters needed for the United Nations-African Union peacekeeping mission in Darfur to do so as soon as possible; and

(2) urges the President to intervene personally by contacting other heads of state and asking them to contribute the aircraft and crews for the Darfur mission.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, on December 31, the United Nations and the African Union jointly assumed control of the peacekeeping mission in Darfur. But, sadly, little has changed for the people of Darfur.

The United Nations Security Council has authorized over 26,000 peacekeepers, but just over 9,000 are on the ground in Darfur.

The government of Sudan had promised to abide by the United Nations resolution, but it continues to obstruct it at almost every turn.

Some of the rebel leaders have begun to join in coalitions with one another, an important step for the peace process, but others continue to prey on civilians and humanitarian aid workers and to threaten peacekeepers.

And the nations of the world had pledged to help end the genocide, but they are falling short where it counts.

U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon reports that no one has stepped up to provide the 24 helicopters that are needed to transport and protect the peacekeepers and to give them the mobility that they need to do their jobs.

That is inexcusable. We cannot allow genocide and suffering to continue because the combined nations of the world cannot find 24 helicopters to help stop it.

That is why today, joined by Senator LUGAR and a number of other colleagues, I have introduced a resolution expressing the Sense of the Senate that the world must not allow this peacekeeping mission to founder because we cannot find 24 suitable aircraft within our vast arsenals.

I recognize that helicopters are expensive vehicles that are in short supply, with wars raging in Afghanistan and Iraq and with peacekeeping missions in the Congo and now being deployed to Chad as well.

But a considerable number of nations possess aerial vehicles with the capabilities that are needed for this mission. Together, we could fill this gap.

The United Nations is seeking 18 utility and 6 tactical helicopters. According to a piece in the Washington Post, the member nations of NATO alone possess over 18,000 helicopters.

Not all of these 18,000 aircraft would be suitable for this mission. NATO reserves are taxed in Afghanistan and elsewhere, but the potential vehicles certainly exist. NATO is not alone in this capability. Other countries could also step up to fill this need.

Secretary General Ban has stated that these vehicles are indispensable. He reports that the United Nations-African Union mission must ''be capable of rapid mobility over large distances, especially over terrain where roads are the exception.'' Ban also said that ''Without the missing helicopters, this mobility—a fundamental requirement for the implementation of the [Security Council's] mandate—will not be possible.''

Helicopters alone will not save Darfur. The needs there are immense and growing. The United Nations revealed last month that acute malnutrition in the region is rising and surpassing emergency levels in some areas. To make matters worse, the Government of Khartoum is continuing to obstruct deployment of U.N. peacekeepers. They have objected to non-African peacekeepers, such as a team of Norwegian engineers, and they are slowing deployment by denying visas and land permits and denying night flights. Most seriously of all, earlier this month, Sudanese troops opened fire on a clearly marked U.N. convoy, badly injuring a driver.

The world must not allow the Khartoum government to dictate terms to the UN mission. The European Union and United Nations Security Council should, I believe, join the United States in imposing strong economic sanctions on the Sudanese government.

We should also continue to pressure the rebel groups to cease all attacks on civilians and humanitarian workers and engage in a peace process to bring a real solution for the people of Darfur.

We should do all these things and more, but, first and foremost, we should ensure that the United Nations and African Union have the tools that they need to carry out their mission.

The United States has already provided more than $4.5 billion since 2004 in response to the Darfur crisis. That is an enormous contribution and it should not fall on our shoulders to fill this particular gap in the peacekeeping mission.

That is why I have repeatedly written President Bush asking him to use the powers of persuasion of his office to personally contact other heads of state to ask them to commit the needed vehicles and crews. I have also written the Secretary General of NATO and President Hu of China, asking them to help fill this gap.

Our resolution urges the members of the international community with the necessary assets to contribute the needed vehicles and crews.

Preventing genocide is a global responsibility. Too often the world has failed to keep this commitment, and it has failed Darfur for too long.

We cannot allow the government of Khartoum to block deployment of the 26,000 peacekeepers, but it would perhaps be even more unforgivable if the international community refuses to provide the peacekeepers with the equipment and vehicles that they need. Then we will have done Khartoum's job for them by obstructing ourselves.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Daniel P. Coughlin, offered the following prayer:

Lord God, author of life and source of eternal love, You have revealed Yourself in human terms so that we may sense Your presence and in our minds hold onto Your commands.

Help us in Congress and as a nation to respect one another as You respect all and endow each human life with inalienable rights.

According to Your provident ways each age is blessed with unique personalities and particular persons who are given significant positions and great responsibilities.

Because the President of the United States of America has constitutional duties, overwhelming demands, powerful decisions to make, and enormous influence upon world history, he is always in need of our prayers.

As this Chamber and this body is readied to welcome President George W. Bush for his State of the Union Address, we ask Your blessing upon him, his Cabinet, all his advisers, and especially his family. Guide him, protect him. Grant him health and Your saving grace; that Your people may be united and strengthened in truth, goodness, and peace. This we ask calling upon Your holy name. Amen.

MODERNIZING FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE SURVEILLANCE ACT

(Mr. HOLT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, later this week Congress will return to the issue of how best to modernize the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. In November in this House of Representatives, we passed a very good bill. We would do well to observe the principles established in that bill.

Any final review of domestic surveillance passed by Congress should include court review of executive branch actions. The reason for this requirement is quite simple. Having a legal standard of review provides us both better intelligence and better civil liberty protections for our people. It is simple. It has been demonstrated that when officials must establish before an independent court that they know what they are doing, that they have reason to intercept communications, we get better intelligence. And, of course, that's the point, to have the intelligence to protect the American people from indiscriminate collection and fishing expeditions. Those are not productive.

In November, we passed a bill that would do this, the RESTORE Act. That bill guarantees court review of executive branch actions related to surveillance activities. I would commend that bill to this House.

BONUS DEPRECIATION

(Mr. WILSON of South Carolina asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to thank the bipartisan leadership and the White House for including a bonus depreciation provision in the proposed economic stimulus package.

Currently, the package we plan to vote on tomorrow will include a 50 percent bonus depreciation for the first year for certain machinery and equipment purchases. This increase in bonus depreciation was included in the Jobs Tax Relief Act of 2003 and contributed to the productivity of small businesses, a boost in job creation, and a steady rise in the growth of the economy over the last 5 years. This incentive for small businesses enables them to compete with foreign competitors. The best way to weather this current economic storm is to build on the principles that have made our economy the envy of the world. That means lower taxes, less government regulation, and economic incentives for American businesses. We should promote the concept that the people should keep their own money which they know how to spend best as explained by editor Jerry Bellune of the Lexington County Chronicle.

In conclusion, God bless our troops, and we will never forget September the 11th.

JOBS TRAINING PROGRAM

(Mr. DAVIS of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I know we are going to be looking at economic stimulus packages, and we are going to be trying to jump-start and help our economy. It is my belief that one way that we can do that is to make sure that we provide a jobs training program for the 1 million young people across the country who don't have any money, no job, no employment, many of them are out of school.

Let's consider a job training program for our young people as a part of the economic stimulus package.

UNCLE SAM'S BIG BAILOUT

(Mr. POE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. POE. Mr. Speaker, the gloom, doom, and depressed say the economy is in trouble. The naysayer's solution is a big government bailout.

Since Uncle Sam has apparently spent the money brought in by income taxpayers, he will just borrow $150 billion and give it away to Americans, many of whom don't even pay income tax.

The idea is that Americans will rush out and spend the free money and that will allegedly help the economy. But the last time the Feds gave away money, 75 percent of the recipients paid off personal debt rather than go shopping at the mall.

And where is Uncle Sam going to borrow $150 billion? Probably from Communist China, who already owns much of our debt. You know, the country that sells toys to America that contain lead.

How does borrowing billions with interest expecting our kids to pay off our debt make us better off? The big spending gimmick has all of the earmarks of vote pandering.

No individual or country can spend money it doesn't have and then blissfully claim economic victory.

And that's just the way it is.

WORKING TOGETHER

(Mr. CARNAHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, tonight we expect to hear President Bush's last State of the Union address to this Congress. I hope that the recent days working together with this Congress on a bipartisan economic stimulus package can be a good model for the rest of this year and the rest of this President's term.

We want to extend a hand to work with him when we can, and this is a good example of how we can do it. But if we see continued roadblocks to progress in this country, we must work to break those roadblocks down and continue to work restoring fiscal responsibility in our government, changing course in Iraq, preparing to address global climate change, addressing the military readiness crisis in this country, and restoring America's moral leadership in the world.

I believe we can and we must continue to work together for the great needs of this country. I hope we can continue to do that for the rest of this session.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. PERLMUTTER).

Mr. PERLMUTTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois.

I rise today to pay tribute and say thank you to a Colorado icon and an American hero, Felix Sparks, with H.R. 4240.

Sparks, who recently passed away at the age of 90, lived an extraordinary life that exemplified public service and devotion to one's country.

A Texas native raised in Arizona, Felix Sparks was a part of our ''Greatest Generation'' who answered our Nation's call to duty during the Second World War.

Described as a ''soldier's soldier,'' he would endure over 500 days of combat and partake in three of the most important events that would define modern history.

The Battle of Reipertswiller, the Battle at the Caves of Anzio, and the liberation of the Dachau concentration camp.

One story in particular that I would like to call to your attention which attests to the character of Felix Sparks occurred during the Battle of Reipertswiller, a battle in which 158 enlisted soldiers were killed, 300 men were wounded, and another 426 were captured over a course of only 3 days.

After finding his unit under siege and trapped in enemy territory, Sparks, then a lieutenant colonel, refused to leave behind three of his men who lay incapacitated in the open battlefield.

Facing near-certain death, he courageously left his tank and raced, on foot, directly into the close-range crosshairs of the German gunners to rescue those soldiers.

□ 1415

With only a holstered pistol in tow, he would drag each of his wounded comrades, one by one, to safety.

A personal account of this series of events was uncovered in the memoirs of a German SS officer who had commanded his gunner not to fire on Sparks. The memoir read: ''Those of us witnessing the scene, whether nearby or more distant, instinctively felt there was no honor to be won by firing on this death-defying act of comradeship.''

Sparks also cheated death a year earlier at the Battle of the Caves of Anzio in Italy, where he would be only one of two men in his company to survive. Sparks was part of the first Allied force to witness the horrors and atrocities of the Dachau concentration camp on the discovery of 39 rail cars packed with some 2,000 Holocaust victims. In all, 30,000 prisoners were liberated from Dachau by the Allied Forces; and for the rest of his life, Sparks would continue to speak out at Holocaust remembrance ceremonies.

Based on his experiences at Dachau, Felix was tireless in his efforts to refute those shameless individuals who try to rewrite history and claim the Holocaust and Dachau never occurred. He'd say: ''Tell that to my face'' in a shout and in a voice that indicated he'd been there and saw it personally.

For his service during World War II, he was awarded a Silver Star and two Purple Hearts after being severely wounded on the battlefield. He would continue his military service with the National Guard until his retirement as a brigadier general in 1977.

And upon his return from the war, enamored with stories from his men about their hometowns in the Rocky Mountains, Felix and his wife settled in Colorado. There, the Sparks family would grow to include four children, six grandchildren, and seven great grandchildren.

He would earn his law degree from the University of Colorado and become a Colorado district attorney. Renowned for his commanding speaking ability, Felix would then go on to become the youngest supreme court justice in Colorado's history at just 38 years of age. He would preside over several of the most prolific and high profile cases in our State's history.

After his service on our State's highest court, Sparks, an expert in water law, would serve for over two decades as the director of the Colorado Water Conservation Board. He would write some of the most influential and important groundwater laws that have continued to serve our State for decades thereafter.

I came to know Felix during my days in the Colorado senate after he had testified in my committee with regard to an anti-gun violence measure following the tragic death of his grandchild from a drive-by shooting. His passion and his words live with me to this day. And he was so well respected for his honesty and straightforward testimony.

It is also important to note, after returning home from the war, Felix would continue to personally reach out to console the families of his men and promise them he would never forget.

Mr. Speaker, one of the main reasons I bring this bill to the floor today is so this promise that Felix Sparks made to the families of his men can live on for generations. This bill pays tribute to Felix's men in the 157th Infantry Regiment of the 45th Infantry Division of the United States Army, whose motto since the Spanish-American War has been ''Eager for Duty.''

Our Nation can never adequately repay and give thanks to these individuals for their sacrifices in the battles against tyranny, in the battles for our Nation's freedom. It is my hope the renaming of the Lakewood post office for Felix Sparks will inspire future generations to find a calling in public service.

This bill also pays tribute to Mary Sparks and the Sparks family, who meant so much to Felix and to our community.

In closing, I wish to thank each of my colleagues in the Colorado delegation for joining me in bidding a fond farewell to a man who meant so much to our State and to our Nation.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of H.R. 4240 to rename the Lakewood post office in Felix Sparks' honor.

Mr. WESTMORELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I may consume.

I rise today to honor the memory of a great American, Felix Sparks, who recently passed away at the age of 90. Mr. Sparks' commitment to our country began in 1940 when he joined the 157th Infantry Regiment of the 45th Division. He would go on to fight bravely in World War II, earning a Silver Star and two Purple Hearts. During the war, he even helped liberate 30,000 people from the infamous Dachau concentration camp.

Upon returning to the States, Felix and his wife, Mary, settled in Colorado. Still wanting to continue his service to our country, he then joined the National Guard. He would remain active in the Guard until 1970, when he retired as a brigadier general.

Besides his exemplary military service record, Mr. Sparks also excelled as a civilian. He had a brilliant legal mind. This was reflected in his appointment to the supreme court of Colorado at the age of 38, making him the youngest justice in the State's history.

His expertise was water law, which he applied as director of the Colorado Water Conservation Board for over two decades.

Considering his years of selfless public service to his State and to his country, I believe it is a fitting tribute to name a post office in Colorado in his honor. Hopefully, his life will serve as an example to others to follow.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I might consume.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, I'm pleased to join my colleagues in the consideration of H.R. 4240, which names a postal facility in Lakewood, Colorado, after Felix Sparks.

H.R. 4240, which was introduced by Representative PERLMUTTER on November 15, 2007, was reported from the Oversight Committee on December 12, 2007, by voice vote. The measure has the support of the entire Colorado congressional delegation and provides us with yet another opportunity to pay tribute to an extraordinary American citizen.

Felix Sparks served his country proudly as a World War II Army brigadier and served his community diligently as a member of the Colorado supreme court. For his service in World War II, Mr. Sparks was awarded a Silver Star and two Purple Hearts after being wounded on the battlefield.

Additionally, for over 20 years, Mr. Sparks worked to protect and improve the environment in the great State of Colorado by serving as director of Colorado's Water Conservation Board.

Mr. Speaker, given Mr. Sparks' contribution to Colorado, and to America in general, he deserves to be commended. Therefore, I would urge swift passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WESTMORELAND. Mr. Speaker, I don't have any other speakers, but I want to urge all Members to support the passage of H.R. 4240, the naming of this post office for this great American hero.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have no further speakers and would urge passage.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4240.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds being in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LARRY S. PIERCE POST OFFICE

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 2110) to designate the facility of the United States Postal Service located at 427 North Street in Taft, California, as the ''Larry S. Pierce Post Office''.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The text of the Senate bill is as follows:

S. 2110

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. LARRY S. PIERCE POST OFFICE.

(a) DESIGNATION.—The facility of the United States Postal Service located at 427 North Street in Taft, California, shall be known and designated as the ''Larry S. Pierce Post Office''.

(b) REFERENCES.—Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, paper, or other record of the United States to the facility referred to in subsection (a) shall be deemed to be a reference to the ''Larry S. Pierce Post Office''.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DAVIS) and the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. WESTMORELAND) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I now yield myself such time as I might consume.

As a member of the House Committee on Government Reform and Oversight, I'm pleased to join my colleagues in the consideration of S. 2110, which names the postal facility in the town of Taft, California, after Larry S. Pierce.

S. 2110, which was introduced in the Senate by Senator DIANNE FEINSTEIN of California on September 27, 2007, and passed by the Chamber with unanimous consent on November 16, 2007, was considered and reported out of the Oversight Committee by voice vote on December 12, 2007.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before us seeks to pay tribute to a great American serviceman by requesting that the postal facility in Taft, California, be renamed in honor of Staff Sergeant Larry Pierce, who lost his life at the young age of 24 while fighting for our country in the Vietnam War. A recipient of the Medal of Honor, Staff Sergeant Pierce stands as a reminder to us all of the great sacrifice our men and women in uniform are making on a daily basis to protect America.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues from California in recognizing the contributions of Staff Sergeant Larry S. Pierce and urge swift passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WESTMORELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I may consume. I rise today to honor the memory of Army Staff Sergeant Larry Pierce, a true American hero.

Larry Pierce was raised in Taft, California. He would have graduated from Taft Union High School in 1959, but he chose to enlist in the Army in 1958. Seven years later, having achieved the rank of staff sergeant, Larry found himself in Vietnam as the squad leader of a reconnaissance platoon. On September 20, 1965, his squad was on patrol when it was ambushed by hostile forces. Thanks to Staff Sergeant Pierce's leadership and courage, the squad successfully repelled the attack, driving the enemy away. While in pursuit of the enemy, Pierce's squad came across a dirt road. It was on this road Sergeant Pierce discovered an anti-personnel mine. Knowing it would destroy the majority of his squad who was not aware of its presence, Sergeant Pierce threw himself completely on top of the mine. In this act of unbelievable bravery, Sergeant Pierce saved the lives of all his squad, while sacrificing his own. For his actions he was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor. He left behind a wife and three children.

Sergeant Pierce represents the very best in the tradition of service and selflessness of our Armed Forces. It is fitting that we name this post office in his hometown of Taft, California, in his honor. Surely, his story can live as an example of what it truly means to be a hero.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would continue to reserve.

Mr. WESTMORELAND. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to recognize the author of the companion bill that was dropped here in the House, the distinguished colleague of mine from California (Mr. MCCARTHY) for as much time as he may consume.

□ 1430

Mr. MCCARTHY of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of the legislation, S. 2110, to designate the United States Post Office located at 427 North Street in Taft, California, as the Larry S. Pierce Post Office, the true hometown hero.

U.S. Army Staff Sergeant Pierce was born in Oklahoma in 1941. As a young child, his family moved to Taft, California, which I represent today. Sergeant Pierce attended Taft city schools and would have graduated from Taft Union High School with the class of 1959 but decided to serve his country by joining the U.S. Army in 1958.

Sergeant Pierce served in the 1st Battalion Airborne, 503rd Infantry and the 173rd Airborne Brigade in the Vietnam War.

On September 20, 1965, near Ben Cat in Vietnam, Sergeant Pierce was leading his reconnaissance platoon, was ambushed by hostile forces. Sergeant Pierce and his squad successfully routed the hostile forces from their location. During pursuit of this enemy, Sergeant Pierce heroically sacrificed his own life to save his men. He came upon a road where they found a mine. He threw himself upon it knowing that if this mine went off, it would destroy many and take many lives of his own men.

Upon hearing of this and upon his death, in February of 1966 President Lyndon B. Johnson awarded Sergeant Pierce the Medal of Honor. In this award, he went on to say for his ''inspiring leadership and personal courage,'' and his ''profound concern for his fellow soldiers,'' acting with ''extraordinary heroism, at the cost of his life'' and to ''great credit upon himself and the Armed Forces of his country.''

Sergeant Pierce would have been 66 years old this year. He is survived by his wife, Verlin, who currently lives in Bakersfield, California; his children, Teresa, Kelley and Gregory.

This legislation is a fitting honor for a Vietnam War veteran who sacrificed his life to save the lives of fellow soldiers by naming the post office in his hometown of Taft in his memory.

I do want to thank Senator FEINSTEIN for introducing this legislation and for working with me. Taft is a place where Senator FEINSTEIN's own father worked. She knows of the work of Sergeant Larry Pierce, the hometown hero, as many have gone on to say.

Mr. Speaker, I include for the RECORD a copy of Staff Sergeant Larry Pierce's Medal of Honor and a copy of the Taft City Council letter of support and resolution requesting the post office in his name.

U.S. ARMY—MEDAL OF HONOR CITATION

PIERCE, LARRY S.

Rank and organization: Sergeant, U.S. Army, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 1st Battalion (Airborne), 503d Infantry, 173d Airborne Brigade. Place and date: Near Ben Cat, Republic of Vietnam, 20 September 1965. Entered service at: Fresno, Calif. Born: 6 July 1941, Wewoka, Okla. G.O. No.: 7, 24 February 1966. While pursuing the fleeing enemy, the squad came upon a dirt road and, as the main body of his men entered the road, Sgt. Pierce discovered an antipersonnel mine emplaced in the road bed. Realizing that the mine could destroy the majority of his squad, Sgt. Pierce saved the lives of his men at the sacrifice of his life by throwing himself directly onto the mine as it exploded. ## RICHARD B. ANDERSON FEDERAL BUILDING

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4140) to designate the Port Angeles Federal Building in Port Angeles, Washington, as the ''Richard B. Anderson Federal Building''.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The text of the bill is as follows:

H.R. 4140

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. RICHARD B. ANDERSON FEDERAL BUILDING.

(a) DESIGNATION.—The Federal building located at 138 West First Street, Port Angeles, Washington, shall be known and designated as the ''Richard B. Anderson Federal Building''.

(b) REFERENCES.—Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, paper, or other record of the United States to the Federal building referred to in subsection (a) shall be deemed to be a reference to the ''Richard B. Anderson Federal Building''.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. PETRI) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Texas.

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous materials on H.R. 4140.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4140 is a bill to designate the Federal building located at 138 West First Street, Port Angeles, Washington, as the Richard B. Anderson Federal Building.

Private First Class Richard Anderson was born in 1921 in Tacoma, Washington. He joined the Marine Corps on July 6, 1942, and received his Marine Corps training in San Diego, California.

He died at the young age of 22 during World War II and on Roi Island, part of the Marshall Islands in the Pacific. He was awarded the Purple Heart and the Medal of Honor. His heroism is marked by his actions on Roi Island when he hurled himself on a live grenade in a shell hole to save the lives of many people. He was severely injured and died of his injuries on February 1, 1944. He was buried at sea with full military honors.

In 1945, the U.S. Navy destroyer USS Richard B. Anderson was named in honor of Medal of Honor recipient Anderson.

It is both fitting and proper to honor the life and courageous actions of Richard B. Anderson in this designation. I support this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of our time.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The bill before us designates what is a Federal building in Port Angeles, Washington, as the Richard B. Anderson Federal Building.

Richard Beatty Anderson served in the United States Marines during World War II in the Marshall Islands. He sacrificed his life to save three other marines by throwing his body on a live grenade and taking the full impact of the explosion. Private First Class Anderson was evacuated to a ship where he died of his wounds on February 1, 1944.

His heroism and loyalty in the face of certain death earned him the Medal of Honor. The United States Navy destroyer USS Richard B. Anderson was named in his honor in 1945 and went on to serve in both the Korean and Vietnam Wars, earning 15 battle stars.

This bill is a fitting tribute to Private First Class Anderson's sacrifice and service to his country. I support this measure and urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4140, a bill to designate the Port Angeles Federal Building in Port Angeles, Washington, as the ''Richard B. Anderson Federal Building.''

Private First Class Richard B. Anderson was born in Tacoma, Washington on June 26, 1921 and graduated from Sequim High School in Sequim, Washington. Private Anderson entered the Marine Corps in 1942 and eventually joined his last unit, Company E, 2nd Battalion, 23rd Marines in San Diego, California. He departed for Roi-Namur, an island in the northern part of the Kwajalein atoll in the Marshall Islands, with his unit in January 1944.

While hunting enemy snipers on Roi-Namur, PFC Anderson, a member of the invasion force, hurled himself on a live grenade in a shell hole to save the lives of three Marines. Anderson was evacuated to a ship, where he died of his wounds on February 1, 1944. For his heroic actions, PFC Anderson was posthumously awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor and the Purple Heart.

Mr. Speaker, the House is now considering legislation that will honor PFC Anderson for his heroic efforts on Roi Island. Specifically, this legislation would rename the Federal Building in Port Angeles, Washington after Richard B. Anderson. I urge the House to adopt this important legislation.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4140 designates the Port Angeles Federal Building located at 138 West First Street, Port Angeles, Washington, as the ''Richard B. Anderson Federal Building.''

Private First Class, PFC, Richard B. Anderson was born on June 26, 1921, in Tacoma, Washington. Anderson grew up in Port Angeles, Washington, and attended Sequim High School.

On July 6, 1942, Anderson joined the United States Marine Corps. He received his basic and infantry training at the Marine Corps Recruit Depot in San Diego, California, and was promoted to the rank of Private First Class on April 12, 1943.

Following his promotion, PFC Anderson was assigned to the East Company, 2nd Battalion, of the 23rd Marines. PFC Anderson's unit was deployed to the Marshall Islands in January 1944. On February 1, 1944, his company was part of an invasion force fighting to take control of Rio Island from the Japanese.

During the assault, Anderson and three other Marines jumped into a shell crater to escape enemy fire. As Anderson prepared to throw a grenade from inside the crater, the grenade slipped from his hands and began to roll toward the other three marines in the crater. In an act of selfless heroism, Anderson lunged on top of the live grenade and absorbed the full impact of the blast, saving the lives of his fellow soldiers. Anderson died from his wounds shortly thereafter.

After his death, PFC Anderson was awarded the Purple Heart and the Medal of Honor for his acts of bravery and service to his country.

On October 26, 1945, the United States Navy commissioned a DD–786 destroyer battleship as the USS Richard B. Anderson in honor of the fallen hero. The ship began active service in January 1947, and was used in combat for the Vietnam and Korean wars. The ship remained in active service until December 20, 1975.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 4140.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further speakers, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back my time and urge passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4140.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds being in the affirmative, the ayes have it.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 8 of rule XX and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

AMENDMENT TO THE INTERNATIONAL CENTER ACT

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3913) to amend the International Center Act to authorize the lease or sublease of certain property described in such Act to an entity other than a foreign government or international organization if certain conditions are met.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The text of the bill is as follows:

H.R. 3913

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AMENDMENT TO THE INTERNATIONAL CENTER ACT.

The first section of the International Center Act (Public Law 90–553; 82 Stat. 958) is amended by adding at the end the following new sentence: ''Notwithstanding the foregoing limitations, the property identified by the District of Columbia as tax lots 803, 804, 805, and 806 within the area described in this section may be leased or subleased to an entity other than a foreign government or international organization, so long as the Secretary maintains the right to approve the occupant and the intended use of the property.''.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. PETRI) each will control 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Texas.

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on H.R. 3913.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I'm pleased to support H.R. 3913, a bill to make a needed technical amendment to the International Center Act, P.L. 90–553.

H.R. 3913 authorizes the Department of State to lease land to Intelsat at the International Center, which is located on Connecticut Avenue at Van Ness Street in northwest Washington.

The amendment clarifies and ensures that Intelsat's long-term lease of the land, on which its headquarters is located, is consistent with the International Center Act.

Intelsat was originally established in the early 1900s as an international organization. In 2000, Congress passed legislation which essentially required Intelsat to become a private company.

Unfortunately, at that time, Congress overlooked a change in the ICA that would be necessary when Intelsat completed its transition to a private company, and this bill corrects that omission.

I support this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The bill before us amends the International Center Act to allow the State Department to lease a Federal property in northwest Washington to nongovernmental entities. Currently, the International Center Act only permits the State Department, as has been said, to lease the property to foreign governments or international organizations.

The site is occupied by the international satellite service provider Intelsat, which was privatized by an act of Congress in the year 2000. Prior to its privatization, Intelsat was created as an international organization in the 1960s to establish the world's first global satellite system.

As an international organization, Intelsat leased the property for 99 years from the State Department in accordance with the International Center Act. The bill before us corrects an apparent oversight when Intelsat was privatized by this Congress.

The underlying statute requires a foreign government or international organization to occupy the property, and that was no longer consistent with the lease between the government and Intelsat after Intelsat was privatized. This bill would make the International Center Act consistent with the lease.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3913 amends a provision of the International Center Act (''ICA''), which established the authority for the U.S. Department of State to lease property in the District of Columbia to foreign governments or international organizations.

The ICA (P.L. 90–553), passed by Congress in 1968, authorizes the Secretary of State ''to sell or lease to foreign governments and international organizations'' Federal property located in Northwest Washington, DC, off of Connecticut Avenue. The 47-acre parcel of land authorized by the bill offers space for new embassies, consulates, and international organizations and is commonly referred to as the International Center.

Intelsat was formed in the 1960s as an international commercial cooperative of 142 countries that provided global telecommunications including television, telephone, and data transmission. Intelsat's headquarters are located in the International Center.

In 2000, an act of Congress privatized Intelsat (P.L. 106–180). Since the ICA does not permit the U.S. State Department to lease space within the International Center to a private entity, Intelsat's lease no longer meets the requirements of the ICA. H.R. 3913 makes technical amendments to the ICA to permit Intelsat to continue its tenancy.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 3913.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back my time and urge passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3913.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds being in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HONORING THE TEXAS WATER DEVELOPMENT BOARD

Ms. EDDIE BERNICE JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution (H. Res. 832) honoring the Texas Water Development Board on its selection as a recipient of the Environmental Protection Agency's 2007 Clean Water State Revolving Fund Performance and Innovation Award, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The text of the resolution is as follows:

H. RES. 832

Whereas the Texas Water Development Board (TWDB) was honored as a 2007 recipient of the Environmental Protection Agency's Performance and Innovation in the SRF Creating Environmental Success (PISCES) Award on November 5, 2007;

Whereas the Clean Water State Revolving Fund (CWSRF) program in Texas has been a front-runner and a precedent-setting program in wastewater management for many years, and its CWSRF leveraging practices as well as other established management practices are used by many other States as examples to enhance the management of their funds;

Whereas the CWSRF program in Texas has successfully awarded communities approximately $4,300,000,000 in low-interest loans to finance 472 water infrastructure projects across Texas;

Whereas these projects, which serve approximately one-half of the population of Texas and treat about 2,100,000,000 gallons per day of wastewater, provide direct environmental and public health benefits;

Whereas the TWDB is proposing to increase the marketability and demand for the CWSRF program by pursuing the use of extended loan terms beyond the authorized 20-year term to a 30-year term;

Whereas the TWDB developed a State Revolving Fund Information Management System to satisfy the need for more timely and accurate information on the status of water and wastewater loan projects as those projects move through the phases of the preapplication process and beyond;

Whereas the TWDB has actively encouraged asset management as evidenced by its creation of a Best Management Practices Guide for water conservation;

Whereas the TWDB established direct authority and responsibility for the coordination of the CWSRF program by creating State Revolving Fund Coordinator positions;

Whereas the TWDB's Intended Use Plan Post-Mortem Review was lauded for identifying various activities that will be used in improving future CWSRF Intended Use Plan development processes;

Whereas the TWDB holds interoffice planning meetings that serve as monthly forums to provide for interoffice discussion on State Revolving Fund policies, procedures and processes, and deadlines;
