Message on National Women's Health Week, 2025

May 12, 2025

During National Women's Health Week, we promote and support the health and well-being of our Nation's mothers, daughters, sisters, wives, and friends.

From my first day in office, my administration has worked to protect women and girls from gender extremism and has brought common sense and biological reality back to America. Moreover, the Make America Healthy Again Commission was established to address the root causes of our Nation's health crisis—from poor nutrition and chronic diseases to preventable conditions—issues impacting women across the Nation. By advancing food transparency, promoting physical fitness, and restoring health education, we are working to give women, and all Americans, stronger futures and better quality of life.

My administration is confronting the high cost of health care, which places a tremendous toll on American families. We are working to improve price transparency, stop surprise billing, and ensure patients have clear information about their coverage before receiving care. Historic steps have been taken to lower prescription drug prices, including capping the cost of insulin and expanding access to low-cost generics. By holding providers accountable and putting patients first, we are lowering costs, improving care delivery, and restoring fairness to the American health care system.

This week, we reaffirm our commitment to improve women's health so that they may live fuller and healthier lives, ensuring that all generations of American women thrive and continue to drive the success of our Nation.
