Message on National Breast Cancer Awareness Month

October 10, 2025

Every day, breast cancer upends the lives of countless Americans, subjecting them and their loved ones to unimaginable fear, uncertainty, and heartbreak. This National Breast Cancer Awareness Month, we recognize the resilience and courage of those battling breast cancer, and we reaffirm our commitment to ending this horrific disease once and for all.

One in every 8 women in the United States will face breast cancer during their lifetime. My administration is determined to end this tragedy. As part of our historic Make America Healthy Again Commission, we are working to lower cancer rates so that fewer lives, families, and futures will be devastated by cancer's enduring physical and emotional torment.

My administration urges all Americans to prioritize their health by knowing their family history and other risk factors, using methods of early detection, and implementing preventative protocols and lifestyle changes that may reduce cancer risk. We also commit to the continued prioritization of research and medical advancements that accelerate cures.

This month, we rejoice with our Nation's 4 million breast cancer survivors, we pray for those who are fighting for remission and healing, and we mourn with all who have lost a precious loved one. United in purpose, we commit to working towards a healthy, prosperous, and cancer-free American future.
