During Phase II, a national study was designed based on results from the nine State survey, with the assistance of a Technical Advisory Panel, consisting of nationally recognized foster care experts; a thorough literature review; and input from organizations with interest in foster children, a national study is designed during Phase II. Phase III will be conducting the national study, analyzing the data, and preparing a final report. This will include in-depth site visits to seven States, purposively sampled from the 34 States that are able to identify whether children are placed with relatives or with non-relatives. State child welfare administrators and workers and foster parents will be selected for in-depth interviews. Additionally, the research team will also extract information from case records and gather demographic data and fiscal information from the States visited.
