SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:

I. Abstract

In the Fall of 1994, the Census Bureau conducted the National Employers Survey (NES) for the National Center on the Employment Quality of the Workforce (EQW), a non-profit research group. The NES collected data for a regression-based econometric study of how employment, hiring, training, investment, and productivity relate to each other. We surveyed a representative panel of just over 3,000 domestic business establishments with 20 or more employees. In the Spring of 1995, we conducted the NES-II, a follow-up survey of the business establishments that completed the interviews in the original survey. These surveys were the first attempts to measure these factors. The EQW began issuing findings from the study in February 1995 and the results generated great interest from all levels. Subsequently, they released several studies and they are performing additional analyses which will generate further studies.

(The EQW's continued work on how employment, hiring, training, investment, and productivity relate to each other is now being sponsored by the Consortium for Policy Research in Education (CPRE) and the new National Center for Postsecondary Improvement (NCPI). CPRE is located at the University of Pennsylvania and the NCPI is a joint endeavor of Stanford University, the University of Pennsylvania, and the University of Michigan.)

Major findings included information on what attributes firms looked for when hiring employees. They found that attitude and communications skills were highly valued by employers while grades and teachers' recommendations were not. Their analysis indicates that investment in human capital (training) had at least as big a return, (in many groups, including services, a bigger return) on investment in physical capital. They also were able to estimate production functions, using regression-based techniques, from the data sets. These findings provide a baseline for employers, public and private, for formulating and gauging human resources decisions and policies in a manner that will provide the most effective return on productivity in the workplace.

The NES-3 is designed to provide more precise measurements of the relationship between employers and the providers of educational and training services. It will ask questions that will identify the apparent disconnect between schools and employers the previous surveys found.

In all, we plan to complete 6,500 interviews with business establishments throughout the United States. In order to reduce burden and increase information, the NES-3 will exclude those with under 20 employees as this group accounts for a large number of establishments (with a relatively small number of employees) that generally do little training and do not have complex hiring and workplace-related practices. If these smaller establishments were included in the panel, it would have increased the number of businesses substantially while providing little information. The panel oversamples the large establishments and those in manufacturing as these units have programs and policies the survey is measuring.

The NES-3 panel has three components:

- A national sample of 4,000 that will produce about 3,000 completed observations.
- A sample of five States (California, Kentucky, Michigan, Maryland and Pennsylvania) of about 3,300 that will produce 2,500 completed interview that will include a few questions on State-specific programs to explain their effect and to relate their impact to the Nation as a whole.
- Those business establishments that completed the first two NES surveys—about 1,300—that will produce about 1,000 completed interviews to investigate stability and dynamics.

In addition to the Department of Education, other governmental agencies have shown a strong interest. These include the General Accounting Office and the Department of Labor. Education, in particular, has a direct interest in and need for some of the information from the proposed survey. They have requested that the survey include questions to collect information to measure two indicators (job turnover and remedial education) that will be used by the Department of Education to assess the progress and results from the implementation of the School-To-Work Act.

II. Method of Collection

We will continue to use Computer Assisted Telephone Interviewing (CATI) to collect the information from the respondents in the NES-3, as it proved very efficient and effective. CATI minimizes improper responses as the interviewers are well trained and the data can be edited and corrected while the respondent is on the phone. In this survey, CATI should also minimize response time by automatically skipping unnecessary questions based on prior responses or specific characteristics and by ensuring that the proper person or office answers the questions. We have designed the interview to be as conversational as possible. Most of the questions request information on characteristics, programs and policies. Quantitative questions are very broad and we encourage reasonable estimates as it keeps the flow of information moving. On the whole, respondents of the previous surveys found the interview to be fast paced and even enjoyable. Response rates for these voluntary survey were quite good—around 75 percent. As with the original surveys we will provide all respondents with a copy of the findings.

We will send an advance letter to 8,600 businesses in the panel, giving a basic overview of the survey. We estimate that it will take the respondent ten minutes to read the letter. It will not ask them to answer any questions in advance of the interview. As the survey requests only general information and accepts estimates, we expect the respondent would require very minimal time to prepare for the interview. Based on our experience with the previous surveys, the NES-3 interview should require an average of thirty minutes to complete.
