1970 (29 U.S.C. 669 and 671), NIOSH is authorized to gather information and develop recommendations for improving occupational safety and health.

More than 8 million health care workers are employed in the United States, and they constitute about 6 percent of the entire workforce. These workers represent many different occupations and are found in a wide variety of work settings.

Since health care workers have very diverse functions and duties, they are exposed to many hazards. These hazards include radiation, toxic chemicals, biological agents, ergonomic stressors, violence, stress, and physical hazards such as heat and noise.

Few workplaces are as complex as hospitals, where more than 50 percent of health care workers are employed. The number and types of hazards in hospitals are extremely large. For example, maintenance workers may be exposed to solvents, asbestos, and electrical hazards. Housekeepers are exposed to detergents and disinfectants that can cause skin rashes and eye and throat irritation. Also, housekeepers may be exposed to infectious diseases such as hepatitis or acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) from hypodermic needles that have not been properly discarded. Nurses confront such potential hazards as exposure to infectious diseases and toxic substances, back injuries, radiation exposure, and stress.

In 1988, NIOSH published the Guidelines for Protecting the Safety and Health of Health Care Workers. However, since that time, knowledge concerning these hazards has increased, and additional recommendations have been made. For example, CDC recommendations for protecting health care workers from tuberculosis and AIDS have changed significantly, as have NIOSH recommendations concerning relevant respiratory protection.

NIOSH is aware that a number of directions can be taken to update the document; therefore, a draft document outline and list of issues have been prepared by CDC to ascertain the appropriateness of the proposed document content and format. NIOSH is soliciting comments on the document outline provided below:
