

standards for electric non-self-cleaning ovens could be technically feasible and could save significant energy. However, because ovens are not tested currently and therefore performance data on specific ovens does not exist, it is unknown whether all non-self-cleaning electric ovens, if insulated and vented as their self-cleaning counterparts, would meet a specific performance standard. Consequently, there is a risk that in order to bring some electric non-self-cleaning ovens into compliance with a performance standard, manufacturers would need to use additional design options. The analysis found no other design options for either gas or electric ovens to be cost effective. Thus, the Department does not expect to establish performance standards for any cooking products including non-self-cleaning electric ovens.

The Department is changing the name for this rulemaking from "kitchen ranges and ovens" to "cooking products." This change is made because the term "kitchen ranges and ovens" does not accurately describe the products considered which include conventional ranges, cooktops and ovens and microwave ovens. To be consistent with this change, the Department expects to add a regulatory definition of "cooking products" that is the same as the existing definition of "kitchen ranges and ovens."

The Department solicits public comment on the supplemental analysis and its implications for this rulemaking, specifically with regard to the extension of the prohibition on standing pilot lights.

Issued in Washington, DC, on January 26, 1998.

Dan W. Reicher,

Assistant Secretary for Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy.
