

6. Has the ADR provider received such training from a well-reputed program?

7. What kind of experience does the ADR provider have with the particular ADR process to be used in terms of the years of experience with the process, the number of disputes resolved, the amount in controversy and the complexity of the issues involved?

8. Is the ADR provider an attorney? If so, what kind of experience does the provider have in terms of type of practice, years of experience, complexity of cases and issues and litigation involving governmental entities?

9. Does the ADR provider have expertise in the issues or facts in controversy?

10. When the parties are paying for the services of an ADR provider, are the rates fair and reasonable for resolving a governmental dispute?

Training

SBA is committed to educating its personnel regarding the benefits and potential uses of ADR. To that end, SBA has begun ADR training. It expects to add ADR training to existing Agency training programs and to develop additional training devoted primarily to ADR. SBA also intends to work in partnership with other federal agencies to take full and efficient advantage of training which these agencies already have developed. SBA has already trained a number of its personnel throughout the United States to serve as mediators in disputes involving federal agencies. For example, the administrative judges in the Office of Hearings and Appeals have completed mediation training. SBA will explore additional training in this area.
