would not make sense in a particular context.

The guidance states that a certification body should immediately notify FDA and the establishment it is certifying if an auditor finds or discovers a situation in which there is a reasonable probability that the food or feed from the audited establishment will cause serious adverse health consequences or death to humans or animals. We believe that such reporting is appropriate. Although the certification body is not a regulatory entity, we believe it would help protect public health for such circumstances to be reported to FDA so that we can investigate the situation. The guidance also notes that an establishment that receives this information may be subject to the requirement imposed by section 1005 of the Food and Drug Administration Amendments Act of 2007 to report certain information to FDA via an electronic portal.

The guidance states that while FDA may provide incentives for participation, neither establishments nor certifying bodies are under an obligation to participate. FDA does not intend to target uncertified establishments or products for inspection or sampling, for example, based solely on their lack of certification.

One comment raised a concern regarding the ability of a foreign Government to serve as a certification body. As in the draft guidance, the guidance states that foreign Government may be certification bodies. More specifically, the definition of certification body states that it could be a Federal, State, local, or foreign Government agency, as well as a non-Government entity that is independent of the businesses it certifies and free from conflicts of interest.

This guidance is being issued consistent with FDA’s good guidance practices regulation (21 CFR 10.115). The guidance represents the agency’s current thinking on voluntary third-party certification programs for foods and feeds. It does not create or confer any rights for or on any person and does not operate to bind FDA or the public. An alternative approach may be used if such approach satisfies the requirements of the applicable statutes and regulations.
