

Commission-jurisdictional interconnection agreement with the transmission system owner/operator and whether the resource is synchronous or non-synchronous.

b. If reactive power produced by a distribution-connected resource cannot be dispatched by the transmission system operator to provide voltage support to the transmission system, should a distribution-connected resource be compensated through transmission rates for its reactive power capability? Why or why not?

c. If distribution-connected resources are dispatchable for reactive power by the transmission provider, to what extent are distribution-connected resources able to provide reactive power capability service to the transmission system? Are there physical characteristics (e.g., distribution-connected resource characteristics and location, system topology, etc.) or other indicators that could be analyzed to determine accurately whether a distribution connected resource is able to provide reactive power capability service to the transmission system?

d. Are resources connected to a distribution system subject to reactive power capability testing requirements? If so, what are those requirements?
