Congressional Committees

Over the last few years, the Department of Defense (DOD), under authorization from the Congress, has conducted a demonstration program to evaluate the feasibility of using private contractors to identify overpayments it had made to vendors. Identifying and recovering overpayments is referred to as recovery auditing. In December 1998, we reported that although DOD was experiencing difficulty in obtaining recovery of about $17 million identified under the program, the concept of recovery auditing offers potential to identify overpayments.¹

In House Report 105-532, which related to a bill providing for fiscal year 1999 DOD authorizations, DOD was directed to implement the expanded recovery audit demonstration program of section 388, P.L. 105-85, by selecting at least two commercial functions within its working capital fund and issuing a competitive request for proposal by December 31, 1998. The House report also directed us to provide an initial review of the expanded programs by April 1, 1999. This report responds to the reporting requirement in the House report.

Results in Brief

DOD did not select at least two commercial functions within its working capital funds accounts and issue a competitive request for proposal by December 31, 1998. However, in response to an August 1998 DOD memorandum encouraging the use of recovery auditing, three working capital funds activities--the Defense Commissary Agency, the Defense Logistics Agency (DLA), and the U.S. Transportation Command—told us they are developing plans to use recovery auditing. The Defense Commissary Agency said it plans to have a contract for recovery auditing services by March 31, 1999. The Defense Logistics Agency plans to expand the use of recovery auditing from the demonstration program in place at the Defense

Supply Center, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania to its other four supply centers.² However, as of February 5, 1999, DLA had not published a schedule to show when it plans to have contracts for these supply centers. Finally, the U.S. Transportation Command began planning to contract for audit recovery services, although it has not established an implementation schedule. Each of the services also expressed an interest in recovery auditing and is evaluating whether to use it.

Of the other recipients of the August 1998 DOD memorandum, the Defense Finance and Accounting Service plans to use recovery auditing at some future time. The Defense Information Services Agency does not plan to use recovery auditing because it claims to have a successful track record with vendors in offsetting overpayments. Finally, the Joint Logistics Systems Center does not plan to use recovery auditing because it is scheduled to deactivate this March.

Agency Comments

On February 12, 1999, we requested comments from the Secretary of Defense on a draft of this report. On February 22, 1999, the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense, Comptroller, informed us that DOD concurred with the contents of this report.

Scope and Methodology

To determine DOD's efforts to expand the use of recovery auditing, we obtained information from the offices of the DOD Comptroller; the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology; the three military services; and the working capital fund agencies discussed previously on the status of efforts to select a commercial function and issue a competitive request for proposal by December 31, 1998. We also discussed the agencies' future plans for using recovery auditing.

We performed our review from January 1999 through March 1999 in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards.
