SITTING FOR THE

TRIAL OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,

LATE SECRETARY OF WAR,

ON THE

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT EXHIBITED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

WASHINGTON:

1876.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RELATING TO THE

IMPEACHMENT OF WM. W. BELKNAP,

LATE SECRETARY OF WAR.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1876.

Mr. CLYMER, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, submitted to the House the following report:

The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department would respectfully report:

That they found at the very threshold of their investigation such unquestioned evidence of the malfeasance in office by General William W. Belknap, then Secretary of War, that they find it to be their duty to lay the same before the House.

They further report that this day at eleven o'clock a. m. a letter of the President of the United States was presented to the committee accepting the resignation of the Secretary of War, which is hereto attached, together with a copy of his letter of resignation, which the President informs the committee was accepted about ten o'clock and twenty minutes this morning. They therefore unanimously report and demand that the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be dealt with according to the laws of the land, and to that end submit herewith the testimony in the case taken, together with the several statements and exhibits thereto attached, and also a rescript of the proceedings of the committee had during the investigation of this subject. And they submit the following resolutions, which they recommend shall be adopted:

Resolved, That William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office.

Resolved, That the testimony in the case of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to prepare and report without unnecessary delay suitable articles of impeachment of said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed and instructed to proceed immediately to the bar of the Senate, and there impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and to inform that body that formal articles of impeachment will in due time be presented, and to request the Senate to take such order in the premises as they deem appropriate.

Mr. CLYMER read the evidence and the accompanying papers, exhibits, and statements in the case. He then demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

After an hour's debate, in which Mr. ROBBINS of North Carolina, Mr. BASS of New York, Mr. HOAR of Massachusetts, Mr. BLACKBURN of Kentucky, Mr. DANFORD of Ohio, and Mr. KASSON of Iowa participated, the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The Speaker appointed as the committee called for in the second resolution, Mr. CLYMER, Mr. ROBBINS of North Carolina, Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. BASS, and Mr. DANFORD.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1876.

Mr. CLYMER rose to a question of privilege. The evening previous, he stated, a subpœna, issued by the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a criminal court for this District, was served upon him, and he believed upon the other gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. The one served upon him was a duces tecum, commanding him to bring with him certain papers and to testify with relation to charges pending in that court against the late Secretary of War.

Mr. CLYMER proceeded to state that that morning, accompanied by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROBBINS] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] he appeared before that court, and, by the permission of the president judge, he made, on behalf of himself and the committee, a statement. He said that in obedience to the law they appeared at the bar to obey any order the court might make; that as a member of the committee of the House he felt that it would be prejudicial to the best interests of the country to compel them to state what had transpired in the room of the committee of which they were members; that he believed that it would not only close the mouths of all witnesses, but would in many cases drive them from the land. He said furthermore that, while not pleading their privileges as members of this House, as they might have done, they yet protested against being examined; and that they would only consent to be so examined after an order made specially to that end by the court. The court was kind enough to take time for deliberation, and determined that if it needed them hereafter it would send for them. He concluded by asking that the House would take such action upon the question as it might deem necessary, right, and just.

After discussion, the following preamble and resolutions, offered by Mr. LAMAR, of Mississippi, were adopted by a vote of 132 ayes against 75 nays, 82 members of the House not voting:

Whereas the Speaker of this House did, on the 20th of December, 1875, appoint the following Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, to wit: HIESTER CLYMER, WILLIAM M. ROBBINS, JOSEPH C. S. BLACKBURN, LYMAN K. BASS, LORENZO DANFORD; and whereas thereafter, on the 14th of January, 1876, this House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the several committees of this House having in charge matters pertaining to appropriations, foreign affairs, Indian affairs, military affairs, naval affairs, post-office and post-roads, public lands, public buildings and grounds, claims, and war claims be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, so far as the same may properly be before their respective committees, into any errors, abuses or frauds that may exist in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting said branches of the public service, with a view to ascertain what change and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein; that the Committees on Expenditures in the State Department, in the Treasury Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, in the Post-Office Department, in the Interior Department, in the Department of Justice, and on Public Buildings, be, and they are hereby, instructed to proceed at once, as required by the rules of the House, to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures of the respective Departments submitted to them, and to examine and report particularly whether the expenditures of the respective Departments are justified by law; whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amount; whether any, and what, retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments, without detriment to the public service; whether any, and what, abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others, and to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several Departments and the accountability of their officers; whether any offices belonging to the branches or Departments, respectively, concerning whose expenditures it is their duty to inquire, have become useless or unnecessary; and to report from time to time on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also to examine into the pay and emoluments of all officers under the laws of the United States and to report from time to time such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require. And for the purpose of enabling the several committees to fully comprehend the workings of the various branches or Departments of Government, respectively, the investigations of said committees may cover such period in the past as each of said committees may deem necessary for its own guidance or information or for the protection of the public interests, in the exposing of frauds or abuses of any kind that may exist in said Departments; and said committees are authorized to send for persons and papers, and may report by bill or otherwise.

"Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate and inquire into all matters set forth in the foregoing resolutions in the legislative departments of the Government, except in so far as the Senate is exclusively concerned, particularly in reference to the public printing and binding, and shall have the same authority that is conferred upon the other committees aforesaid."

And whereas in the discharge of the duties imposed by said order the said Committee on Expenditures in the War Department did enter upon an examination into the said accounts of said Department and into the administration thereof, and did send for persons and papers to investigate certain acts of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, on which being reported to this House by said committee it has taken action to impeach the said William W. Belknap of high crimes and misdemeanors; and whereas the supreme court of the District of Columbia, by process bearing date March 6, 1876, has commanded HIESTER CLYMER to "bring all papers, documents, records, checks, and contracts in your possession, or in the possession of the Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the War Department, in relation to the charge against said defendant of accepting a bribe or bribes while Secretary of War of the United States, and to attend the said court immediately to testify on behalf of the United States, and not depart from the court without leave of the court or district attorneys:" and whereas the mandate of said court is a breach of the privileges of this House:

Resolved, That the said committee and the members thereof are hereby directed to disregard said mandate until the further order of this House.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1876.

Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was refered the resolution of the House directing them to prepare suitable articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, submitted the following report, accompanied by a resolution, which was adopted without a division:

The Committee on the Judiciary would respectfully report that, in pursuance of the instrucions of the House, they have prepared articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, but that, since preparing the same, they have been informed and believe that Caleb P. Marsh, upon whose testimony before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and referred to them by the House, said articles were framed, has gone beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, and that probably his attendance as a witness before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment cannot be procured; and that they are also informed and believe that other evidence may be procured sufficient to convict said William W. Belknap of high crimes and misdemeanors in office as Secretary of War. They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to prepare articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, be recommitted to said committee with power to take further proof, to send for persons and papers, to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report at any time.

Your committee, impressed with the importance of securing the fullest indemnity to such witnesses as may be required to testify in behalf of the Government before either House of Congress, or any committee of either House, or before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, would also recommend the immediate passage of the accompanying bill, entitled "A bill to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases." They would further recommend that the accompanying bill, entitled "A bill in relation to witnesses," be introduced, printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report thereon at any time.

Mr. KNOTT also reported from the Committee on the Judiciary the following bill; which was discussed and passed by a vote of 206 yeas against 80 nays, 82 members of the House not voting:

A bill (H. R. No. 2572) to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever any person shall be required to testify against his protest before either House of Congress or any committee thereof, or the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, and shall so testify under protest, he shall not thereafter be held to answer criminally in any court of justice, or subject to any penalty or forfeiture, on account of any fact or act concerning which he shall be so required to testify: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to relieve any person from liability to impeachment.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1876.

Mr. KNOTT rose, he said, to make a privileged report. The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the resolution of the House directing them to prepare and report articles in support of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, had directed him to report such articles and an accompanying resolution for the action of the House. He asked that the report be printed and recommitted, and he gave notice that he should call it up for action at a convenient hour on the day after the next. He presumed it would be unnecessary to occupy the time of the House in reading those lengthy articles. He moved that they be printed for the use of the House and recommitted to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The report was as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the resolution of the House directing them to prepare and report articles in support of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, respectfully report the following articles and accompanying resolutions for the action of the House:

Resolved, That the following articles be adopted and presented to the Senate, in maintenance and support of the impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors in office of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in the names of themselves and of all the people of the United States of America, against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors while in said office.

[These articles will be found on pages 2 and 3.]

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by ballot to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

SATURDAY, April 1, 1876.

Mr. HUNTON, of Virginia, a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, stated that the chairman of that committee, [Mr. KNOTT,] who was unavoidably detained from the House that day on the business of the House, had requested him to give notice he will call up the articles of impeachment of the late Secretary of War on Monday next immediately after the morning hour.

MONDAY, April 3, 1876.

Mr. KNOTT called up the resolutions which he had reported on the 30th ultimo from the Committee on the Judiciary, and the first one, with the accompanying articles and specifications, was adopted without debate and without a division. The second resolution was amended as follows, and adopted:

Resolved, That Messrs. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, of Kentucky; SCOTT LORD, of New York; WILLIAM P. LYNDE, of Wisconsin; JOHN A. MCMAHON, of Ohio; GEORGE A. JENKS, of Pennsylvania; WILLIAM A. WHEELER, of New York; and GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER asked to be excused from service as a manager.

His request was granted, and on his motion the vacancy occasioned by his resignation was filled with the name of his colleague, Mr. LAPHAM.

At the request of Mr. KNOTT the name of Mr. LORD, of New York, was placed at the head of the list of managers.

Mr. CLYMER offered the following resolutions; which were modified and adopted:

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against William W. Belknap, late Secretary, of War, in maintenance of their impeachment against him of high crimes and misdemeanors in office be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed Mr. SCOTT LORD, of New York; Mr. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, of Kentucky; Mr. WILLIAM P. LYNDE, of Wisconsin; Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON, of Ohio; Mr. GEORGE A. JENKS, of Pennsylvania; Mr. ELBRIDGE G. LAPHAM, of New York; and Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts, managers to conduct the impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against said William W. Belknap, and that the Clerk of the House do go with said message.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1876.

Mr. WHEELER, Speaker pro tempore, directed that business would be suspended to receive a report from the managers on the part of the House of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The managers appointed by the House to conduct the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, appeared at the bar of the House, when

Mr. LORD said: Mr. Speaker, the managers of impeachment beg leave to report to the House that the articles of impeachment prepared by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, have been exhibited and read to the Senate, and the presiding officer of that body stated to the managers that the Senate would take order in the premises, due notice of which would be given to the House of Representatives.

MONDAY, April 17, 1876.

The following resolution was received from the Senate:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 17, 1876.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is sitting in its Chamber and ready to proceed with the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the members.

After discussion, the House voted, on motion of Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, that it would at one o'clock precisely resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and as such committee attend the trial of the Ex-Secretary of War in the Senate Chamber, accompanied by the Clerk and the Speaker.

Accordingly (at one o'clock p. m.) the House, as in Committee of the Whole, preceded by its chairman, Mr. RANDALL, and accompanied by the Speaker and Clerk, followed the managers of the House to the Senate Chamber. On the return of the Committee of the Whole, (at one o'clock and thirty-five minutes,) the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. RANDALL made the following report:

Mr. Speaker, the House as in Committee of the Whole, pursuant to order, accompanied the managers on the part of the House to the Senate to be present at the opening of the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Later in the day, a message was received from the Senate announcing that the Senate had adopted a resolution setting the time for the trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, upon articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and transmitted to the House a copy of the plea of the said Belknap.

Mr. HOAR, one of the managers, asked unanimous consent that the communication from the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment and the copy of the plea of the Secretary of War be referred to the managers on the part of the House. There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SITTING FOR

THE TRIAL OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,

LATE SECRETARY OF WAR,

ON THE

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT EXHIBITED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1876.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives at twelve o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m., by the hands of Mr. GREEN ADAMS, its Chief Clerk:

Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed and instructed to proceed immediately to the bar of the Senate, and there impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and to inform that body that formal articles of impeachment will in due time be presented, and to request the Senate to take such order in the premises as they may deem appropriate.

And it has

At one o'clock p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the committee from the House of Representatives, who appeared at the bar of the Senate.

The committee advanced to the area in front of the Chair, when

Mr. CLYMER said: Mr. President, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives we appear before you, and in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, we do impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office; and we further inform the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same. Ordered, That the message of the House of Representatives relating to the impeachment of William W. Belknap be referred to a select committee to consist of five Senators.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer this order in accordance with the usual precedents. Proceeding upon the principle of the thing, I should think it would be better to refer a message of this kind to some one of the standing committees of the Senate; but following the usual course in such cases, I have framed the order in this way.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether that is the usual course?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; that is the usual course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. EDMUNDS, CONKLING, FRELINGHUYSEN, THURMAN, and STEVENSON were appointed.

MONDAY, March 6, 1876.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the select committee to whom was referred the message of the House of Representatives respecting the impeachment of William W. Belknap to report a preamble and resolution, and I ask for their present consideration. This is a mere formality as the next step in the orderly progress of the affair, according to the precedents.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 3d day of March, 1876, by five of its members, Messrs. CLYMER, ROBBINS, BLACKBURN, BASS, and DANFORD, at the bar of the Senate, impeached William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said William W. Belknap to answer the said impeachment: Therefore,

Ordered, That the Senate will, according to its standing rules and orders in such cases provided, take proper order thereon, (upon the presentation of articles of impeachment,) of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives herewith.

MONDAY, April 3, 1876.

Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance of their impeachment against him of high crimes and misdemeanors in office be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed Mr. SCOTT LORD, of New York; Mr. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, of Kentucky; Mr. WILLIAM P. LYNDE, of Wisconsin; Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON, of Ohio; Mr. GEORGE A. JENKS, of Pennsylvania; Mr. ELBRIDGE G. LAPHAM, of New York; and Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts, managers to conduct the impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against said William W. Belknap, and that the Clerk of the House do go with said message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment agreeably to notice received.

The Clerk of the House thereupon withdrew.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1876.

The managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar (at one o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives are admitted and the Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct them to seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were thereupon escorted by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Chair.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives are ready to exhibit on the part of the House articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye! hear ye! hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. Manager LORD rose and read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the names of themselves and of all the people of the United States of America, against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors while in said office.

ARTICLE I.

That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States; that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; that thereafter, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, the said Caleb P. Marsh and one John S. Evans entered into an agreement in writing substantially as follows, to wit:

Articles of agreement made and ent ered into this 8th day of October, A. D. 1870, by and between John S. Evans, of Fort Sill, Indian Territory, United States of America, of the first part, and Caleb P. Marsh, of No. 51 West Thirty-fifth street, of the city, county, and State of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, namely:

"Whereas the said Caleb P. Marsh has received from General William W. Belknap, Secretary of War of the United States, the appointment of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid; and whereas the name of said John S. Evans is to be filled into the commission of appointment of said post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid, by permission and at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this agreement; and whereas said John S. Evans is to hold said position of post-trader as aforesaid solely as the appointee of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purposes hereinafter stated:

"Now, therefore, said John S. Evans, in consideration of said appointment and the sum of $1 to him in hand paid by said Caleb P. Marsh, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hereby covenants and agrees to pay to said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $12,000 annually, payable quarterly in advance, in the city of New York aforesaid; said sum to be so payable during the first year of this agreement absolutely and under all circumstances, anything hereinafter contained to the contrary notwithstanding; and thereafter said sum shall be so payable, unless increased or reduced in amount, in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this agreement.

"In consideration of the premises, it is mutually agreed between the parties aforesaid as follows, namely:

"First. This agreement is made on the basis of seven cavalry companies of the United States Army, which are now stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Second. If at the end of the first year of this agreement the forces of the United States Army stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid shall be increased or diminished not to exceed one hundred men, then this agreement shall remain in full force and unchanged for the next year. If, however, the said forces shall be increased or diminished beyond the number of one hundred men, then the amount to be paid under this agreement by said John S. Evans to said Caleb P. Marsh shall be increased or reduced in accordance therewith and in proper proportion thereto. The above rule laid down for the continuation of this agreement at the close of the first year thereof shall be applied at the close of each succeeding year so long as this agreement shall remain in force and effect.

"Third. This agreement shall remain in force and effect so long as said Caleb P. Marsh shall hold or control, directly or indirectly, the appointment and position of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Fourth. This agreement shall take effect from the date and day the Secretary of War aforesaid shall sign the commission of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid, said commission to be issued to said John S. Evans at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and solely for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this agreement.

"Fifth. Exception is hereby made in regard to the first quarterly payment under this agreement, it being agreed and understood that the same may be paid at any time within the next thirty days after the said Secretary of War shall sign the aforesaid commission of post-trader at Fort Sill.

"Sixth. Said Caleb P. Marsh is at all times, at the request of said John S. Evans, to use any proper influence he may have with said Secretary of War for the protection of said John S. Evans while in the discharge of his legitimate duties in the conduct of the business as post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Seventh. Said John S. Evans is to conduct the said business of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid solely on his own responsibility and in his own name, it being expressly agreed and understood that said Caleb P. Marsh shall assume no liability in the premises whatever.

"Eighth. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the stipulations and covenants aforesaid are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, and administrators of the respective parties.

"In witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

"JOHN S. EVANS. [SEAL.]
"C. P. MARSH. [SEAL.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of—
"E. T. BARTLETT."

That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, and that at divers times thereafter, to wit, on or about the 17th day of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500, in consideration of the appointment of the said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time; whereby the said William W. Belknap, who was then Secretary of War as aforesaid, was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE II.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the 4th day of November, 1873, willfully, corruptly, and unlawfully take and receive from one Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, in consideration that he would continue to permit one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, which said establishment said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, was authorized by law to permit to be maintained at said military post, and which the said Evans had been before that time appointed by said Belknap to maintain; and that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, for said consideration, did corruptly permit the said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post. And so the said Belknap was thereby guilty, while he was Secretary of War, of a high misdemeanor in his said office.

ARTICLE III.

That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876; that as Secretary of War as aforesaid said Belknap had authority, under the laws of the United States, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, not in the vicinity of any city or town; that on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; and that said John S. Evans, by virtue of said appointment, has since, till the 2d day of March, 1876, maintained a trading establishment at said military post, and that said Evans, on the 8th day of October, 1870, before he was so appointed to maintain said trading establishment as aforesaid, and in order to procure said appointment and to be continued therein, agreed with one Caleb P. Marsh that, in consideration that said Belknap would appoint him, the said Evans, to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, at the instance and request of said Marsh, he, the said Evans, would pay to him a large sum of money, quarterly, in advance, from the date of his said appointment by said Belknap, to wit, $12,000 during the year immediately following the 10th day of October, 1870, and other large sums of money, quarterly, during each year that he, the said Evans, should be permitted by said Belknap to maintain said trading establishment at said post; that said Evans did pay to said Marsh said sum of money quarterly during each year after his said appointment, until the month of December, 1875, when the last of said payments was made; that said Marsh, upon the receipt of each of said payments, paid one-half thereof to him, the said Belknap. Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time, and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War, and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service.

Whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE V.

That one John S. Evans was, on the 10th day of October, in the year 1870, appointed by the said Belknap to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post on the frontier, not in the vicinity of any city or town, and said Belknap did, from that day continuously to the 2d day of March, 1876, permit said Evans to maintain the same; and said Belknap was induced to make said appointment by the influence and request of one Caleb P. Marsh; and said Evans paid to said Marsh, in consideration of such influence and request and in consideration that he should thereby induce said Belknap to make said appointment, divers large sums of money at various times, amounting to about $12,000 a year from the date of said appointment to the 25th day of March, 1872, and to about $6,000 a year thereafter until the 2d day of March, 1876, all which said Belknap well knew; yet said Belknap did, in consideration that he would permit said Evans to continue to maintain said trading establishment and in order that said payments might continue and be made by said Evans to said Marsh as aforesaid, corruptly receive from said Marsh, either to his, the said Belknap's, own use or to be paid over to the wife of said Belknap, divers large sums of money at various times, namely: the sum of $1,500 on or about the 2d day of November, 1870; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of January, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 18th day of April, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 25th day of July, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of November, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 15th day of January, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 13th day of June, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of November, 1872; the sum of $1,000 on or about the 28th day of April, 1873; the sum of $1,700 on or about the 16th day of June, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 4th day of November, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of January, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of April, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 9th day of October, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 24th day of May, 1875; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of November, 1875; the sum of $750 on or about the 15th day of January, 1876; all of which acts and doings were while the said Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as aforesaid, and were a high misdemeanor in said office.

And the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said William W. Belknap may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair informs the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

The managers thereupon withdrew.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That the articles of impeachment presented this day by the House of Representatives be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, April 5, 1876.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the attention of the Senate to a matter which I, after consultation with as many Senators as I could find, think it necessary to bring to the notice of the Senate respecting the matter of the impeachment to-day. The third rule of the Senate in regard to impeachments provides that on this day at one o'clock—

The presiding officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the members of the Senate then present, and to the other members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

But on examination we are unable to find any statute of the United States which authorizes the President of the Senate or the presiding officer to administer this oath. It stands upon the rule alone. The language of the statute about the authority of the presiding officer is that, when Senators appear to take their seats upon an election to this body, the presiding officer shall swear them in, and any Senator may administer a similar oath to the Vice-President, the President of the Senate, when he appears; and there the statute stops except in respect of witnesses who are by law to be sworn by the President of the Senate.

In this state of difficulty and in the very grave doubt, at least, that in the minds of all the gentlemen whom I have been able to consult there is about this being a constitutional compliance with that requirement which obliges us to be under oath, (which, of course, implies a legal and binding oath,) we have thought it best for this occasion, until provision can be made by law, to submit to the Senate a proposition that the Chief Justice of the United States be invited to attend at one o'clock to-day to administer these oaths, there being no question about his authority to do so. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this portion of Rule 3 which I have read, respecting the administration of the oath by the presiding officer, shall be suspended for this day; and if that be unanimously agreed to, as of course it requires unanimous consent to suspend this rule, I shall then offer an order which will accomplish the next step in the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has heard the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, that so much of the rule as pertains to the swearing in of the Senators by the presiding officer be suspended for to-day. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none. The order is unanimously made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now offer the following order:

Ordered, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the Chief Justice of the United States and invite him to attend in the Senate Chamber at one o'clock p. m. this day to administer to Senators the oath required by the Constitution in the matter of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator from Vermont inform us if the authority of the Chief Justice is statutory to administer oaths in cases of impeachment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; not to administer oaths in cases of impeachment; but there is a general authority given the judges of the courts of the United States to administer any oath that it is lawful for any person to take, to swear persons upon affidavits, or swear any body into office, or administer any other oath in the course of proceedings, as we understand the law.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Vermont if he knows certainly that it will be within the power of the Chief Justice to attend, and if not, I suggest whether it would not be well to make his resolution in the alternative, in case the Chief Justice should not be able to attend, then some associate justice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that may be very well, and I will modify the resolution by adding, "or, in case of his inability to attend, any one of the associate justices."

While that correction is being made we propose, as is suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] to introduce a bill presently to provide for cases of this character, and also to provide, as probably we ought, (although that would be a matter for consideration,) an authority to the Secretary or the Chief Clerk to administer oaths to witnesses, which by statute does not now exist, though that has usually been practiced; but it is certainly not authorized by law, so far as can be discovered.

Mr. BOGY. I could not very distinctly hear what the Senator from Vermont said; therefore I am a little at a loss, and would like to know the reason why the presiding officer cannot administer the oaths required on this occasion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reason I stated was that, as we understand it, in order to make an oath a lawful oath, it must be administered by some person authorized by law to administer oaths, and there is no law that can be discovered which confers that authority, the present law merely conferring it upon the presiding officer in the case of the first appearance of Senators when elected.

Mr. BOGY. The difficulty was that I had not heard the Senator from Vermont distinctly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask to have the resolution reported as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the Chief Justice of the United States and invite him to attend in the Senate Chamber at one o'clock p. m. this day, or, in case of his inability to attend, any one of the associate justices.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] as the committee.

The Chief Justice of the United States, Hon. Morrison R. Waite, subsequently entered the Senate Chamber, escorted by Messrs. EDMUNDS and THURMAN, the committee appointed for the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Senate, according to its rule, will now proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Chief Justice will take the seat provided for him at the right of the Chair.

The Chief Justice took a seat by the side of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will give attention while the constitutional oath is being administered.

The Chief Justice administered the oath to the President pro tempore, as follows:

You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws: So help you God.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now call the roll of Senators alphabetically in groups of six, and Senators as they are so called will advance to the desk and take the oath.

Mr. MORTON. If there be no objection on the part of any Senator, I suggest that all the Senators be sworn at once, standing in their places. I see no objection to that. It will save time and some trouble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THURMAN. There may be some doubt about verifying who are sworn if we proceed in that way. I think we had better follow the precedent heretofore established.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll alphabetically, and the Chief Justice administered the oath to Senators ANTHONY, BAYARD, BOGY, BOOTH, BOUTWELL, BRUCE, CAMERON of Pennsylvania, CAMERON of Wisconsin, CLAYTON, COCKRELL, COOPER, CRAGIN, DAVIS, DAWES, DORSEY, EATON, EDMUNDS, FRELINGHUYSEN, GORDON, HAMILTON, HAMLIN, HARVEY, HITCHCOCK, INGALLS, JONES of Florida, KELLY, KERNAN, KEY, LOGAN, MCCREERY, MCDONALD, MCMILLAN, MAXEY, MERRIMON, MITCHELL, MORRILL of Vermont, MORTON, NORWOOD, OGLESBY, PADDOCK, RANDOLPH, SARGENT, SAULSBURY, SHARON, SHERMAN, SPENCER, STEVENSON, THURMAN, WALLACE, WEST, WHYTE, WINDOM, WITHERS, and WRIGHT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absentees on the call will now be called, so that in case they have entered the Chamber since the oath has been administered they may come forward.

The Chief Clerk called the names of the absentees, as follows: Messrs. ALCORN, ALLISON, BURNSIDE, CAPERTON, CHRISTIANCY, CONKLING, CONOVER, DENNIS, ENGLISH, GOLDTHWAITE, HOWE, JOHNSTON, JONES of Nevada, MORRILL of Maine, PATTERSON, RANSOM, ROBERTSON, and WADLEIGH.

The Chief Justice thereupon withdrew from the Senate Chamber, escorted by Messrs. EDMUNDS and THURMAN.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the following order, and ask for its present consideration;

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

The order was agreed to.

At one o'clock and forty minutes p. m. the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct the managers to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats assigned them within the space in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen managers, the Senate is now organized for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. Manager LORD rose and said: Mr. President, we pray for the issuing of process against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, on the articles hitherto presented.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I offer the following order:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of impeachment, to William W. Belknap, returnable on Monday, the 17th day of the present month, at one o'clock in the afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the proposed order, and it was agreed to.

Mr. Manager LORD. That is satisfactory to the managers.

The managers thereupon withdrew.

Mr. STEVENSON. If there is no further business I move that the court adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that is precisely the proper motion to make under the rules. I think we ought to adjourn until the day at which the summons is returnable; and therefore——

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether the counsel of General Belknap are satisfied with the period of time fixed for his appearance?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to know whether there has been any conference with General Belknap's counsel to learn whether the period fixed for his appearance is ample enough to meet with their wishes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not authorized to speak for anybody but myself. Speaking for myself, I say, as a Senator sitting on this trial and as a judge, that I have not had and do not expect to have any conference with the counsel of General Belknap; but I have proposed this period of time as a reasonable and suitable one. Of course, when he appears, if he needs further time he will apply for it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I did not suppose there was any impropriety in the question, nor did I suppose that there was anything that could be implied by the question; but certainly a good deal of time may be saved to the Senate, and I see no impropriety in the managers, if they think proper, before the time is fixed, having a friendly interview with the counsel of General Belknap as to what would be a proper time. If we adjourn now until Monday week, and then ten days more should be asked, we shall lose that much time, which it seems to me might be avoided by some conference with the counsel of General Belknap. That was the only reason I made the suggestion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure the Senator ought not to have understood me as intending to reflect on the propriety of his question, but only as stating my own view of what it would be proper for me to do under the circumstances. I move that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn until the 17th instant.

Mr. BOGY. Before the motion to adjourn is put I should like to make an inquiry; and I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what I am about to state. I see by the twenty-fourth rule that the summons has to be returned to the Senate or to the court at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., and this order speaks of one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn does not fix the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has turned to a form, and that form happens to say twelve o'clock and thirty minutes, but the Senate has ordered, changing that form which I thought it was convenient to do, and as it was merely a form I did not suppose it was necessary to make a separate motion on that subject to make the form say "one o'clock," in order that the necessary preliminaries from half-past twelve, usual on such occasions, might take place beforehand.

Mr. BOGY. That may be; I speak on this subject with very great modesty, for I really know nothing about it; but, nevertheless, the forms being given in the rules, I am of the opinion that they are a part of the rules, and unless a very good reason can be given why the forms should be departed from, it may be that the very first step we take in this proceeding may possibly be wrong. The form is given in a joint rule, and it would be a very easy thing to conform to that form which appears to be a part of that joint rule as adopted for this specific purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a joint rule, but a rule of the Senate. It is a form of the Senate rather than a rule.

Mr. BOGY. It is a Senate rule, nevertheless; and why not conform to the rule?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would have been very well to have made that suggestion before the order of the Senate had been adopted fixing the hour of one o'clock as the moment at which this accused person should appear. But if the Senate has adopted an order which is contrary to a form which it had previously adopted, I take it that the adoption of this order must, for the time being, override the form of the writ of summons fixing a different hour.

Mr. BOGY. I would suggest to the Senator is it not a rule? The form makes it a rule. Is it not so?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose that to be so, if the Senate, without objection, orders that a particular moment named in the rule shall be for a particular occasion changed to another moment, I take it that order making the change would be binding nevertheless. Certainly the Senate, in the presence of the managers, has ordered that this summons shall issue for this person to appear on the 17th instant, at the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon, which is, to be sure, a half hour later than the form of the summons names. So the present order of the Senate is that the summons go in that way; and until that order is reversed, I take it, it will bind the President of the Senate and the executive officers to follow it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until the 17th instant.

Mr. BOGY. The suggestion I have made has not been disposed of. Perhaps there is nothing that the court can dispose of. Nevertheless it does seem to me that the form is a rule, a rule prescribed by the Senate for the government of the Senate when it sits as a court. This body in its capacity of a court has changed that rule. It may be altogether proper; I am not clear that it is proper. If there could be any way by which we could retrace our steps and conform to what appears to me to be a rule, because it is a form prescribed by the Senate as a Senate for the government of this court as a court of impeachment, and which we as a court perhaps cannot well change, it is a subject worthy of being considered, and I suggest that the matter be more thoroughly investigated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it right to say to my friend from Missouri that so far from our inability to change the forms of procedure sitting as a court, as the expression is, when the late Chief Justice of the United States appeared, these rules having been adopted by the Senate before he did appear to preside at the trial of Mr. Johnson, the President of the United States, he thought, and submitted to the Senate that it ought to adopt these rules while we were sitting as a court, inasmuch as its composition was such that a new element was introduced into it on that occasion. And accordingly the Senate sitting as a court, or sitting for the trial of the impeachment, which is the same thing, adopted over again these rules as part of its orders. So I think there can be no question, judging from the previous consideration given to the subject, that it is perfectly competent for us to change or to modify these forms by any order that we choose to make sitting as a court. That was the general opinion at that time. Although it was thought by many Senators that it was quite unnecessary to adopt them over again merely because the Chief Justice, a new element, had come in, yet everybody agreed that it was competent to do it; and, out of respect to his wishes, it was done.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand it, the Senate have only fixed one o'clock as the hour for the return of the process. It seems to me we ought to adjourn until half past twelve o'clock, with a view to making the necessary preliminaries before that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, that is the time the rule provides we shall meet.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see that there is any difficulty. The summons calls on General Belknap to appear at one o'clock. That is not at all inconsistent with the rule; but the court is to convene at half past twelve o'clock for the purpose of making preliminary orders and arrangements. The action of the Senate thus far is in perfect harmony with the rules.

Mr. BAYARD. All that I have to guide my mind is the rules of the Senate on the subject. Looking at them, it seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is entitled to a great deal of consideration. Rule 7 provides that—

The presiding officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the presiding officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate are sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for.

There is in the twenty-fourth rule a special provision, according to my understanding, of the form of the summons to be served upon the party impeached, and that form requires the impeached party—

To be and appear before the Senate of the United States of America, at their Chamber in the city of Washington, on the —— day of ——, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes after noon, then and there to answer to the said articles of impeachment, &c.

By Rule 9 it is provided that—

At twelve o'clock and thirty minutes after noon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the form following.

Then follows the form prescribed for the returning officer. The tenth rule provides that—

The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him. If he appear, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself, or by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing, and the capacity in which he appears.

It seems to me, with all due respect for the superior experience of those who have heretofore sat in business of this kind, that the language of the rules is directory, and I cannot imagine any inconvenience or ill to follow from our following their language with precision. If the Senate has, from inadvertence or from any other cause, fixed a time for the appearance contrary to that prescribed by the form contained in Rule 24, it seems to me that it is erring upon the side of caution if it follows the rule by amending the order lately made. I see no possible objection to the amendment of the order, and if it be fixed at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes of the afternoon of the day named for the return of the writ, then it will be in precise accordance with the form prescribed in Rule 24 and also in accordance with Rules 9 and 10, which fix the time of the return of that writ for the swearing of the officer as to the true service of the process and of the appearance of the party, either in person or by attorney. I think it is just possible that there might be a technical objection made to the hour and minute of the return of this service. It may not be one of substance; but even if of form, if it be necessary for the Senate then to pass upon it, certainly the necessity for passing upon it can be saved by an amendment of the order of the Senate as made just now.

Therefore I trust there will be a reconsideration of that order for the purpose of having an order made in accordance with the twenty-fourth rule. No harm can come, but much difficulty may be saved.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the President of the Senate whether it is not proper for us in the first instance, as a court, to adopt the rules of procedure by the Senate in cases of impeachment? It was the opinion of the Chief Justice in the trial which last took place in this Hall that while the Senate might as a Senate in its legislative capacity adopt certain rules in regard to impeachment, it was necessary for the Senate when sitting as a court of impeachment to adopt those rules as such court. Therefore I suggest to the Chair whether it is not proper for us in this instance to adopt the rules before we discuss any questions arising under those rules?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist upon the motion I made, that the Senate, sitting for the trial of this impeachment, stand adjourned until the 17th instant at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. BOGY. Before that motion is put I hope that this matter may be further considered. I intend to present a motion that the order which has been made, for the return of service at one o'clock, be amended so as to make the return at half past twelve.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That cannot be properly done without the presence of the managers.

Mr. BOGY. Why is it not proper?

Mr. EDMUNDS. And there is not the slightest need of it.

Mr. BOGY. I can see no reason for the Senator's suggestion. Any order made by a court can be changed by the court on a proper case being made out. I desire to present the question to this body in a proper way. The very limited discussion which has taken place upon the subject has tended to confirm me in the belief that we are departing, in the very first step we take, from the rules prescribed for our guidance. If the motion of the Senator from Vermont be insisted upon, I hope it will not be carried, so that I may make a motion to amend the order which has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until the 17th instant at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. BOGY. The motion I would make of course cannot be entertained if that motion is carried.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is so.

Mr. BOGY. I am extremely sorry that at the very first step the Senator from Vermont should be rather disposed to cut short and be curt about this thing. I desire no offense to him and do not question anything he may have done. I am inclined to think we have committed an error; and the views expressed by the Senator from Delaware confirm me in that opinion. To dispose of this thing in that manner, I think, is not treating the subject or those persons that do not agree with the Senator with much courtesy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to make an observation, as all this debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that as different Senators were speaking he supposed it was done by unanimous consent. The rule is explicit that there shall be no debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unnanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state to my honorable friend from Missouri that I have not intended to be either curt or short; but after the subject has, by unanimous consent, been considered upon both sides of the views it struck me that the simplest way of testing the sense of the Senate upon this question of half past twelve or one o'clock would be to make this motion. If a majority of this body are of opinion that we have exceeded our jurisdiction in making this order returnable at one o'clock instead of half past twelve, of course it will be their bounden duty to refuse to adjourn and to send for the managers and have the order amended; but if they are of opinion that this court can change one of its forms by making an order inconsistent with it as to an hour, without violating the Constitution of the United States, then I take it the Senate will be willing to adjourn until that time. Making this explanation to my friend, lest he may have misunderstood the spirit in which I made the motion, I take my seat.

Mr. BOGY. I shall feel compelled under the circumstances to call for the yeas and nays upon the question, a thing which I have never done in this body before. I think we are starting wrong in this thing, and therefore I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of adjournment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators who have been duly sworn.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, as directed; and the result was announced—yeas 38, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cockrell, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Whyte, and Withers—10.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Cragin, Ferry, Harvey, Ingalls, Sharon, Stevenson, and Thurman—7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment stands adjourned until the 17th instant, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

MONDAY, April 17, 1876.

The Chief Justice of the United States entered the Senate Chamber, escorted by Messrs. EDMUNDS and THURMAN, the committee appointed for the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock and thirty minutes having arrived, in pursuance of rule the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Chief Justice took a seat by the side of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make the opening proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now call the names of those Senators who have not been sworn, and such Senators as they are called will advance to the desk and take the oath.

The Secretary proceeded to call the names of the Senators who had not been heretofore sworn; and the Chief Justice administered the oath to Senators ALLISON, BURNSIDE, CAPERTON, CHRISTIANCY, CONKLING, CONOVER, DENNIS, GOLDTHWAITE, HOWE, JONES of Nevada, MORRILL of Maine, RANSOM, and ROBERTSON.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is in its Chamber and ready to proceed with the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the members.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will invite the House accordingly.

At one o'clock p. m. William W. Belknap entered the Senate Chamber, accompanied by his counsel, Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, Hon. Montgomery Blair, and Hon. M. H. Carpenter, who were conducted to the seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the right of the Chair.

At one o'clock and two minutes p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers will be admitted and conducted to seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to seats provided in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the left of the Chair, namely: Hon. SCOTT LORD, of New York; Hon. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, of Kentucky; Hon. WILLIAM P. LYNDE, of Wisconsin; Hon. J. A. MCMAHON, of Ohio; Hon. G. A. JENKS, of Pennsylvania; Hon. E. G. LAPHAM, of New York; and Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, in accordance with the invitation extended, the House of Representatives has resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole and will attend upon this sitting of this court on being waited upon by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will wait upon the House of Representatives and invite them to the Chamber of the Senate.

At one o'clock and five minutes p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the presence of the members of the House of Representatives, who entered the Senate Chamber preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania,) into which that body had resolved itself to witness the trial, who was accompanied by the Speaker and Clerk of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the minutes of the sitting on Wednesday, the 5th instant.

The Secretary read the Journal of proceedings of the Senate sitting for trial of the impeachment of Wednesday, April 5, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the summons directed to be served.

The Secretary read the following return appended to the writ of summons:

The foregoing writ of summons addressed to William W. Belknap and the foregoing precept addressed to me were duly served upon the said William W. Belknap by delivering to and leaving with him true and attested copies of the same at No. 2022 G street, Washington City, the residence of the said William W. Belknap, on Thursday the 6th day of April, 1876, at six o'clock and forty minutes in the afternoon of that day.

JOHN R. FRENCH,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that Rule 9 will be suspended for reasons already stated, and the Chief Justice will now administer the oath to the officer attesting the truth of this return.

The Chief Justice administered the following oath to the Sergeant-at-Arms:

I, John R. French, do solemnly swear that the return made by me upon the process issued on the 6th day of April, by the Senate of the United States, against W W. Belknap, is truly made, and that I have performed such service as therein described: So help me God.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will please escort the Chief Justice to the Supreme Court room.

The Chief Justice retired, escorted by the committee, Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. THURMAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will now call William W. Belknap, the respondent, to appear and answer the charges of impeachment brought against him.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. William W. Belknap, William W. Belknap, appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, William W. Belknap, a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa, in obedience to the summons of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment to try the articles presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, appears at the bar of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment and interposes the following plea; which I will ask the Secretary to read and request that it may be filed.

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. } Upon articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said William W. Belknap, named in the said articles of impeachment, comes here before the honorable the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment, in his own proper person, and says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment exhibited and presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, because, he says, that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap, by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now an officer of the United States; but at the said times was, ever since hath been, and now is a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa; and this he, the said Belknap, is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment whether this court can or will take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
District of Columbia, ss:

William W Belknap, being first duly sworn on oath, says that the foregoing plea by him subscribed is true in substance and fact.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 17th day of April, 1876.

DAVID DAVIS,
Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, Hon. Montgomery Blair, and myself also appear as counsel for Mr. Belknap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will note the appearance of the respondent and the presence of the counsel named.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the managers pray a copy of the plea that has been filed, and the House of Representatives ask time to consider what replication to make to the plea of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, to the jurisdiction of this Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection, I believe, to the filing of the plea of the respondent. The Chair hears no objection; it will be filed. The managers will please reduce their motion to writing.

Mr. Manager LORD. We will do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the officers and members of the House of Representatives, that if it is to their convenience to withdraw at any time, they are at liberty to do so.

The House of Representatives then withdrew.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I have sent to the Secretary the request of the managers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers submit a motion, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives request a copy of the plea filed by W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and the House of Representatives desire time until Wednesday, the 19th instant, at one o'clock, to consider what replication to make to the plea of the said W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, you have heard the motion of the managers. Those who concur will say ay; those who nonconcur will say no, [putting the question.] The ayes have it; the Senate so orders.

The Chair will ask the gentlemen counsel for the respondent if they will be ready to proceed at the time named in the motion submitted by the managers?

Mr. CARPENTER. That will depend entirely upon what the managers do. We cannot anticipate. If they do what we suppose they will do, we shall be ready. If not, we shall have to consider what we will do next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Have the managers on the part of the House of Representatives anything further to propose?

Mr. Manager LORD. We have nothing further to propose at this time. With the leave of the Senate we beg permission to retire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Leave is granted. Have counsel for the respondent anything further to propose?

Mr. CARPENTER. Nothing, Mr. President.

The managers and counsel thereupon withdrew.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until Wednesday next, at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourned to Wednesday, the 19th instant, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

WEDNESDAY, April 19, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock and thirty minutes having arrived, according to the rules the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will open the session by proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Messrs. Black, Blair, and Carpenter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair observes that the managers are not present. If there be no objection, the Secretary will inform the managers, before the minutes are read, that the Senate is ready for the trial; pending which, if there be no objection, the Secretary will call the roll of Senators who were heretofore absent and have not been sworn.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the names of the Senators who have not been heretofore sworn; and the President pro tempore administered the oath to Senators ENGLISH and PATTERSON, a law having been passed providing for the administration of oaths by the presiding officer of the Senate.

At twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m., Mr. G. M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives have adopted a replication to the plea of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to receive the managers.

At twelve o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct the managers to the seats prepared for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers (with the exception of Mr. KNOTT, who was not present) were conducted to the seats assigned them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the minutes of the last day's proceedings.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, of Monday, April 17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message received from the House of Representatives will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 19, 1876.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House, informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the plea of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen managers, in accordance with the order of the Senate fixing the hour of one o'clock as the time at which it will hear you, the Senate is now ready to hear you.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the House of Representatives having adopted a replication to the plea of William W. Belknap to the jurisdiction of this court, as advised by the resolution just read, the managers are instructed to present the replication to the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, and to request that the same may be read by the Secretary and filed among the Senate's papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The replication will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States in their own behalf, and also in the name of the people of the United States, to the plea of William W. Belknap to the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate against the said William W. Belknap.

The House of Representatives of the United States, prosecuting, on behalf of themselves and the people of the United States, the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against said William W. Belknap, reply to the plea of said William W. Belknap, and say that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William W. Belknap from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that at the time all the acts charged in said articles of impeachment were done and committed, and thence continuously done, to the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, the said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as in said articles of impeachment averred, and, therefore, that by the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives had power to prefer the articles of impeachment, and the Senate have full and the sole power to try the same. Wherefore, they demand that the plea aforesaid of the said William W. Belknap be not allowed, but that the said William W. Belknap be required to answer the said articles of impeachment.

II.

The House of Representatives of the United States, so prosecuting in behalf of themselves and the people of the United States the said articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against the said William W. Belknap, for a second and further replication to the plea of the said William W. Belknap, say that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William W. Belknap from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that at the time of the commission by the said William W. Belknap of the acts and matters set forth in the said articles of impeachment he, said William W. Belknap, was an officer of the United States, as alleged in the said articles of impeachment; and they say that the said William W. Belknap, after the commission of each one of the acts alleged in the said articles, was and continued to be such officer, as alleged in said articles, until and including the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and until the House of Representatives, by its proper committee, had completed its investigation of his official conduct as such officer in regard to the matters and things set forth as official misconduct in the said articles, and the said committee was considering the report it should make to the House of Representatives upon the same, the said Belknap being at the time aware of such investigation and of the evidence taken and of such proposed report.

And the House of Representatives further say that, while its said committee was considering and preparing its said report to the House of Representatives recommending the impeachment of the said William W. Belknap for the matters and things set forth in the said articles, the said William W. Belknap, with full knowledge thereof, resigned his position as such officer on the said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, with intent to evade the proceedings of impeachment against him. And the House of Representatives resolved to impeach the said William W. Belknap for said matters as in said articles set forth on said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876. And the House of Representatives say that by the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives had power to prefer said articles of impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, and that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has full power to try the same.

Wherefore the House of Representatives demand that the plea aforesaid be not allowed, but that the said William W. Belknap be compelled to answer the said articles of impeachment.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

GEORGE M. ADAMS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the replication will be filed. The Chair hears none. Have the managers anything further to offer?

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I understand that we have nothing further to do until we hear from the other side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen of counsel, what have you to offer?

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, Mr. Belknap, the respondent, wishes a copy of the replications which have been filed to his plea in abatement, and for time to consider the same and frame pleadings in reply; and I suggest Monday next as the day, and submit a written motion to that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the motion.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. } Upon articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives against the said William W. Belknap.

Mr. President, the respondent asks for copies of the replications this day filed by the managers and asks for time until Monday next to frame pleadings to meet the same.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to offer an order upon this subject in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be put in writing and reported.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, we desire of course to offer all possible indulgence to the other side, and we do not deem that the request for time until next Monday is in itself unreasonable, and yet there are reasons, which need not now be stated, for having this matter hastened as much as is possible. The managers therefore instruct me to ask that the day be fixed on Friday next, instead of Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I have reduced an order to writing which I submit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent file his rejoinder on or before the 24th day of April, instant, and that the House of Representatives file their surrejoinder, if any, on or before the 25th day of April, instant.

Ordered, That the trial proceed on the 27th day of April, instant, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes afternoon.

Mr. CONKLING. What days are they?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The 24th is Monday; the 25th, Tuesday, and the 27th, the day of trial, Thursday, of next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, you have heard the motion proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall then propose that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn until the last day named, the 27th instant.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I desire to understand that order. The 24th is Monday, as I understand, and the court is not to be in session on that day.

Mr. CONKLING. How will the rejoinder be received?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be filed with the Clerk.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, we desire not to deal with anything less than the court in our pleadings from beginning to end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will modify it by adding "file and serve on the other party copies," so as to save the necessity of any further order on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will modify the order accordingly and will report it as modified.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senate that we cannot serve any papers on the other side. We have no standing in the House of Representatives. The courtesy that the Senate has extended to us to be here has not been extended by the House. I do not see how we can serve any papers on the House. We cannot get in.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I move to amend the order so as to provide that the papers referred to shall be filed with the Secretary, and that he deliver copies to either side promptly on application.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will commit the amendment of the Senator from New York to writing.

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President, I respectfully suggest, at the request of my associates, that we do not understand in what position the House of Representatives will be placed under that order. Certainly it is not in accordance with their custom to make application to the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. Manager LORD. I would suggest, Mr. President, as relieving the difficulty, that the Secretary be directed to serve a copy on the Clerk of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection, Mr. President, to so modifying my amendment. Let it be that he send copies to the managers on the one side and the counsel on the other, or that he send a copy to the Clerk of the House of Representatives on the one side and to the counsel on the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York modifies his amendment as he has stated. The Secretary will reduce to writing the amendment proposed.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, we are taken quite by surprise by this order. We have always supposed that no paper could be filed in the court of impeachment except by special leave of the court. Are we to come here on the 24th and file anything we please, orderly or disorderly, in form or out of form, and does that become the basis of the action of the House? I supposed that as in the Supreme Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction not a paper could be filed in this court without the order of the court when the court should see what the paper was. It seems to me we shall be very likely to get into a jangle in the filing of papers unless we do it in the presence and with the approbation of the court on each paper filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now report the resolution first proposed and then the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York.

The SECRETARY. The order is as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent file his rejoinder on or before the 24th day of April instant, and that the House of Representatives file their surrejoinder, if any, on or before the 25th day of April instant.

It is proposed to be amended so as to read:

Ordered, That the respondent file his rejoinder with the Secretary on or before the 24th day of April instant, who shall deliver a copy thereof to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and that the House of Representatives file their surrejoinder, if any, on or before the 25th day of April instant, a copy of which shall be delivered by the Secretary to the counsel for the respondent.

Ordered, That the trial proceed on the 27th day of April instant, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the motion suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to that. I accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be so modified; and the question recurs on the order as so modified.

The order as modified was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, now I move that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn until the 27th instant, at half past twelve o'clock afternoon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourned until April 27.

THURSDAY, April 27, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock and thirty minutes having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended and the Senate will now proceed, pursuant to order, to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make the opening proclamation.

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The respondent appeared with his counsel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is now ready for the trial of the impeachment and that provision has been made for the accommodation of the managers and the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] was not present when the oaths were administered and is now here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the names of Senators who have not been sworn.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the names of the Senators who have not been heretofore sworn, and the President pro tempore administered the oath to Senator WADLEIGH.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I am instructed by my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] to state that he is detained from his seat in the Senate by the serious indisposition of a member of his family.

At twelve o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the presence of the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct the managers to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats provided for them

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minutes of the proceedings of the last trial-day will now be read.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, of Wednesday, April 19, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the rejoinder submitted by W. W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read the rejoinder, as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. } Upon articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said William W. Belknap saith that the replication of the House of Representatives first above pleaded to the said plea of him the said Belknap, and the matters therein contained in manner and form as the same are above pleaded and set forth, are not sufficient in law for the said House of Representatives to have or maintain impeachment thereof against him, the said Belknap, and that he, the said Belknap, is not bound by law to answer the same.

And this the said defendant is ready to verify. Wherefore, by reason of the insufficiency of the said replication in this behalf, he, the said Belknap, prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain this impeachment against him, &c.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. } Upon articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said William W. Belknap, as to the second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, saith that the said House of Representatives ought not, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he says that it is not true, as in that replication alleged, that he, the said Belknap, was Secretary of War of the United States from any time until and including the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and of this he, the said Belknap, demands trial according to law.

II.

And the said Belknap further saith, as to the said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, that the said House of Representatives ought not, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he saith that it is not true, as in that replication alleged, that he, the said Belknap, was Secretary of War until the said House of Representatives, by any committee of the said House raised or instructed for that purpose, or having any authority from the House of Representatives in that behalf, had investigated the official conduct of him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War, in regard to the matters and things set forth as official misconduct in the said articles of impeachment; and of this he, the said Belknap, demands trial according to law.

III.

And the said Belknap, as to the said second replication of the said House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives ought not, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he says that at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, at ten o'clock and twenty minutes in the forenoon of that day, he, the said Belknap, resigned the office of Secretary of War, by written resignation under his hand, addressed and delivered to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States then and there accepted the said resignation, by acceptance in writing under his hand, then and there indorsed upon the said written resignation; so that the said Belknap then and there ceased to be Secretary of War of the United States, and since that time he, the said Belknap, has not been an officer of the United States, but has been a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa, as stated by said Belknap in his said plea; and that at the time he, the said Belknap, resigned as aforesaid, and the said resignation was accepted as aforesaid, the said House of Representatives had not taken any proceeding for the investigation or examination of any of the charges set forth in the said articles of impeachment as official misconduct of him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War; nor had the said House of Representatives raised any committee of the said House, nor directed, nor instructed any committee of the said House to make inquiry or investigation in that behalf.

And this the said Belknap is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the said impeachment against him the said Belknap.

IV.

And the said Belknap, as to the said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives of the United States, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, ought not to have or maintain the said impeachment against him the said Belknap, because he says that, when the said House of Representatives took the first proceeding in relation to the impeachment of him, the said Belknap, and when the matter was first mentioned in the said House—that is, in the afternoon of the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876—the said House of Representatives was fully advised and well knew that he, the said Belknap, had before then resigned the said office of Secretary of War, by resignation in writing, under his hand addressed and delivered to the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States had also before that time, as President as aforesaid, accepted the said written resignation, by acceptance in writing, signed by him and indorsed on the said written resignation, and that he, the said Belknap, was not then an officer of the United States, as the facts were.

And this he, the said Belknap, is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap.

V.

And the said Belknap, as to the said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives of the United States, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, ought not to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he says that, although true it is that a certain committee of the said House, called the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, had been pretending to make some inquiry into or investigation of the matters and things set forth in said articles of impeachment as official misconduct of him, the said Belknap, but without any authority from or direction by the House of Representatives in that behalf, yet he, the said Belknap, says that said committee had not completed its said pretended investigation, but was engaged in the examination of witnesses, when said committee was informed that the said Belknap had resigned as Secretary of War, by resignation in writing, under his hand, addressed and delivered to the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States had accepted the said resignation by acceptance in writing, under his hand, indorsed upon the said written resignation; that said committee received the said information during and before the completion of the said pretended investigation into the alleged facts in that behalf, to wit, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and that thereupon the said committee declared that they, the said committee, had no further duty to perform in the premises.

And this the said Belknap is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap.

VI.

And said Belknap as to said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives ought not, by anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain said impeachment against him, said Belknap, because he says that, although true it is that he did resign his position as Secretary of War on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, at ten o'clock and twenty minutes in the forenoon of that day, at the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, by a resignation in writing, under his hand, addressed to and then and there delivered to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States did then and there accept said resignation, by acceptance in writing, under his hand, then and there by him indorsed upon said written resignation, nevertheless it is not true, as alleged in that replication, that he, said Belknap, resigned his said position with intent to "evade" any proceedings of said House of Representatives to impeach him, said Belknap; but, on the contrary thereof, he avers the fact to be that a standing committee of said House, known as the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, without any authority from or direction of said House of Representatives to examine, inquire, or investigate in regard to the matters and things set forth in said articles as official misconduct of him, said Belknap, had examined one Marsh, and he had made a statement to said committee, which said statement, if true, would not support articles of impeachment against him, said Belknap, but which said statement was of such a character in respect to other persons, some of whom had been and one of whom was so nearly connected with him, said Belknap, by domestic ties as greatly to afflict him, said Belknap, and make him willing to secure the suppression of so much of said statement as affected such other persons at any cost to himself, therefore he, said Belknap, proposed to said committee that, if said committee would suppress that part of said statement which related to said other persons, he, said Belknap, though contrary to the truth, would admit the receipt by him, said Belknap, of all the moneys stated by said Marsh to have been received by him from one Evans, mentioned in said statement, and paid over by said Marsh to any other person or persons, but said committee declined to accede to said proposition, and Hon. HIESTER CLYMER, chairman of said committee, then declared to said Belknap that he, said CLYMER, should move in the said House of Representatives, upon the statement of said Marsh, for the impeachment of him, said Belknap, unless the said Belknap should resign his position as Secretary of War before noon of the next day, to wit, March the 2d, A. D. 1876; and, said Belknap regarding this statement of said CLYMER, chairman as aforesaid, as an intimation that he, said Belknap, could, by thus resigning, avoid the affliction inseparable from a protracted trial in a forum which would attract the greatest degree of public attention and the humiliation of availing himself of the defense disclosed in said statement itself which would cast blame upon said other persons, he yielded to the suggestion made by said CLYMER, chairman as aforesaid, believing that the same was made in good faith by the said CLYMER, chairman as aforesaid, and that he, said Belknap, would, by resigning his position as Secretary of War, secure the speedy dismissal of said statement from the public mind, which said statement, though it involved no criminality on his part, was deeply painful to his feelings, and did resign his said position as Secretary of War, as hereinbefore stated, at ten o'clock and twenty minutes in the forenoon of the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876; and at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the day and year last aforesaid he, said Belknap, caused said committee to be notified of his said resignation and of the acceptance thereof by the President of the United States as aforesaid; all of which was in pursuance and in consequence of the said suggestion so made by said CLYMER; and thereupon said committee declared that they, the said committee, had no further duty to perform in the premises. And he, said Belknap, submits that, while said House of Representatives claims that said CLYMER was acting on its behalf in said pretended examination of said Marsh, said House ought, in honor and in law, to be estopped to deny that said CLYMER was also acting on behalf of said House in suggesting the resignation of him, said Belknap, as aforesaid, and ought not to be heard to complain of a resignation thus induced.

And this he, the said Belknap, is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the impeachment against him, the said Belknap.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rejoinder will be considered duly filed, if there be no objection. The Secretary will now read the surrejoinder of the House of Representatives to the rejoinder of William W. Belknap.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. } By the House of Representatives of the United States, April 25, 1876.

The House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, say that the said first replication to the plea of the said William W. Belknap to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him as aforesaid, and the matters therein contained, in manner and form as the same are above set forth and stated, are sufficient in law for the said House of Representatives to have and maintain the said articles of impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, and that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine the same; and the House of Representatives are ready to verify and prove the same, as the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment shall direct and award: Wherefore, inasmuch as the said William W. Belknap hath not answered the said articles of impeachment or in any manner denied the same, the said House of Representatives, for themselves and for all the people of the United States, pray judgment thereon according to law.

II.

And the said House of Representatives as to the first and second subdivisions of the rejoinder to the second replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the defendant to the said articles of impeachment, wherein the said defendant demands trial according to law, the said House of Representatives, in behalf of themselves and all the people of the United States, do the like; and as to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth subdivisions of the rejoinder of the said defendant to the said second replication, they say that the said House of Representatives, by reason of anything by the said defendant in the last-named subdivisions of said rejoinder above alleged, ought not to be barred from having and maintaining the said articles of impeachment against the said defendant, because they say that, reserving to themselves all advantage of exception to the insufficiency of the said subdivisions of said rejoinder to said second replication, they deny each and every averment in said several rejoinders to said second replication contained, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts and intents charged against said defendant in said second replication, and they re-affirm the truth of the matters stated therein; and this the said House of Representatives pray may be inquired of by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

Wherefore the said House of Representatives, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, pray judgment thereon according to law.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEO. M. ADAMS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The surrejoinder will be considered as duly filed also. The Senate sitting for the trial is now ready to hear the parties.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I am directed on the part of the managers to make a statement to this court and to request the entry of an order which I will presently send to the Secretary to be read. The respondent has not answered the charges contained in the articles of impeachment.

The pleadings now filed relate only to the question of jurisdiction of the Senate, tendering issues of fact and raising a question of law. The managers deem it the proper mode, and suppose it will be most desirable to the defendant and most convenient to the Senate, to have the evidence given bearing on the question of jurisdiction before the arguments shall be presented on that question; and, therefore, they move that an order be entered which they send to the Secretary to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

On motion of the managers,

Ordered, That the evidence on the questions pertaining to the plea to the jurisdiction of this court be given before the arguments relating thereto are heard, and if such plea is overruled that the defendant be required to answer the articles of impeachment within two days, and the House of Representatives to reply if they deem it necessary within two days; and that the trial proceed on the next day after the joining of issue.

Mr. Manager LORD. With the permission of the court, Mr. President, I will give the following reasons why we think this order should be entered:

All of the issues of law and fact relate to the question of jurisdiction. It is but a single question, upon which the Senate can make but one decision, and the facts pertaining thereto should be proved before the arguments, so that the questions of law and of fact may be considered and decided at the same time. This is the course in all legal tribunals in which questions of law and fact are decided by the same judge or judges.

Now let me refer to some authorities on this point:

In cases where the jury are to decide on both the law and the fact, a general verdict may be rendered on the whole matter. (Starkie's Law of Libel, page 203.)

In the case of Baylis vs. Laurance, 11 Adolphus and Ellis, 920, referred to by Starkie on the same page, it was held that the law was the same in regard to both civil and criminal cases.

The same author, page 580, states:

A jury sworn to try the issue may give the general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter put in issue, * * * and shall not be required or directed by the court or judge * * * to find the defendant or defendants guilty merely on the proof of the publication.

When by the Constitution the sole power to try impeachments was conferred upon the Senate without any direction as to the mode of procedure, it must have been intended that the rules governing the House of Lords when sitting as a court of impeachment, so far as applicable, should control the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

Mr. Erskine, before the Court of King's Bench, in the case of the Dean of Asaph, in regard to the abolition of the king's court and the distribution of its powers, says:

The barons preserved that supreme superintending jurisdiction which never belonged to the justices, but to themselves only as the jurors in the king's court.

And in a note to his argument found in Goodrich's British Eloquence, page 659, it is said:

During a trial before the House of Peers every peer present on the trial has always been judge both of the law and the fact; hence no special verdict can be given on the trial of a peer.

Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, volume 2, page 540, says:

A special verdict is one by which the facts of the case are put on the record and the law is submitted to the judges.

See also Bacon's Abridgment, Verdict, D, A.

A special finding or verdict is therefore only necessary when the questions of fact are found in one tribunal and the law is applied by another.

But there is a direct authority on this question from a court of impeachment only second in dignity to this high tribunal. The court of impeachment of the State of New York is composed of the president of the senate, who is the lieutenant-governor, of the senators, and of the judges of the court of appeals. In the case of the People of the State of New York against George G. Barnard, then one of the justices of the supreme court, (see volume 1, pages 106–108,) the respondent interposed a plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that the articles of impeachment were not adopted by the assembly by a vote of the majority of all the members elected thereto, as required by the constitution. A replication to the plea was filed that the assembly did impeach the respondent by a vote of a majority of all the members elected thereto. Witnesses were then examined in regard to this question on both sides; counsel were heard for the respondent in support of the plea, and for the prosecution in opposition; after which the president stated that the question before the court was whether the plea of the respondent should be sustained. Upon the decision not to sustain the plea replications were filed, and the trial on the merits proceeded.

This precedent sustains the motion in this case more fully for the reason that the respondent in that case more than a month before he interposed the plea to the jurisdiction had pleaded to the merits by filing a general answer denying each and every allegation in the articles of impeachment; but discovering a month afterward, as he thought, that the articles of impeachment had not been properly presented, on the ground that a majority of the members elected to the assembly had not concurred therein, he put in a plea to the jurisdiction, and the proceedings were had which I have already stated.

Therefore we submit to this honorable court that the managers by asking the entry of this order have suggested the proper method of trial.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I suppose it will be necessary some time in the course of these proceedings to close the issues of fact on this plea to the jurisdiction, and we may as well do it now. I therefore offer, to be filed, the similiter, which will close the issues of fact, and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the paper.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA } Upon articles of impeachment of the House vs. } of Representatives of the United States of WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. } America of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said Belknap, as to the surrejoinders of said House of Representatives to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth rejoinders of the said Belknap to the second replication of said House of Representatives above pleaded, whereof said House of Representatives have demanded trial, the said Belknap doth the like.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall this similiter be filed? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I am very happy indeed to find myself supported by the honorable House of Representatives through their managers in what has been for years with me a favorite doctrine, that in all criminal cases the jury were judges of law as well as of fact. I have contended for that strenuously for many years in the courts of law, but, I am bound to confess, without success in a single instance.

Before, however, proceeding to the discussion of the order which has been offered by the House of Representatives as well for the regulation of their side of this case as of ours, we wish to make a motion in the case, which, if granted, will supersede the present adoption of the order asked for by the managers.

Considering the importance of this case and the circumstances which surround us at present, we have concluded to ask the Senate for an adjournment of the further hearing and trial of this matter until the first Monday of December next. We regard this as a very important motion, and we desire to be heard upon it somewhat at length; and we therefore ask that, if the motion should be objected to on the part of the managers, the twentieth rule of this court may be suspended for the purpose of the argument of this question, or the time therein fixed (which is one hour on a side) may be enlarged so as to enable us to present this question fully to the court. I think the court may rely on the counsel for the defendant not wantonly wasting its time. But the matter, in our opinion, is so important that we desire in justice to our client to present it fully to the Senate; and we therefore ask that on the hearing of this motion the time fixed by that rule may be enlarged so as to enable us fully to submit the argument upon our side of the application.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the managers object to the postponement requested or to the entry of the order.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then, Mr. President, we ask for an order enlarging the time, under the twentieth rule, for the argument of this motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire whether the motion of the counsel specified any enlarged time or was merely in general that an enlargement be given.

Mr. CARPENTER. It did not specify the time; but I would suggest two hours on a side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives have submitted to Senators for their decision the order which has been read in their hearing. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think the first question is on the application of the counsel for the respondent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in the form of an amendment. Each proposition stands of itself and should be put in the order of submission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it is a counter-motion, may it please your honor, to postpone the whole question until the first Monday of December. They desire to be heard upon that, and ask that the Senate enlarge the time to two hours. I think that is the first question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question if desired upon enlarging the time, under Rule 20, for that purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest, so as to avoid turning everybody out, that the Senate retire to the reception-room provided for the purpose.

Mr. Manager LORD. Will the Senate allow me one moment, Mr. President? The managers desire me more specifically to object to the postponement of the trial or to the enlargement of the time.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand the motion made on behalf of the defendant is to extend the rule so as to allow two hours' argument on the motion made by counsel.

Mr. CARPENTER. Two hours on each side.

Mr. THURMAN. On the motion to continue?

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. I think we had better retire to consider that, and also the order offered by the managers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate retire for deliberation.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to ask a question for information, which I believe is in order. Am I right in supposing that, if the motion made by counsel for the respondent shall prevail, the effect will be that two hours on each side may be devoted to discussing the motion to postpone, in place of one hour; in other words, that the entire time given to the consideration of this motion may be four hours in place of two hours, as it could be now under the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands—two hours on each side.

Mr. CONKLING. Then if it is in order I say that I hope the Senate will not retire to consider that mere question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate retire for deliberation.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the counsel, Mr. Carpenter, that the time fixed by the twentieth rule be extended to two hours on each side, instead of one.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hope we shall divide on that question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew the motion of my colleague that the Senate retire for deliberation. It is not debatable, but I hope the Senate will retire for deliberation.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that motion in order after it has been voted down?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has refused to retire, and the motion is not in order.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to extend the time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire that this question should be stated with more precision than I think it was by the Chair in last putting it to the Senate. The motion of one of the counsel for the respondent in this case was for a suspension of the twentieth rule. The question as put by the Chair, according to my understanding, was that there should be an enlargement of the time from one hour under the present rule to two hours on each side; but I think it should, if passed upon by the Senate, be restricted to the present motion now made on behalf of the respondent, and not become an alteration of the rule and applicable to the discussion of all questions which may arise during this hearing. We had better understand whether this motion is to be restricted to the hearing of the present motion of the defendant, or whether this increase of time is to be extended to all interlocutory motions during the trial of this impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the motion of the counsel, Mr. Carpenter, was to modify this rule, so far as this motion is concerned, so as to enlarge the time to four hours, two hours on each side, instead of, as the rule reads, one hour on each side.

Mr. CONKLING. For this one motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know debate is entirely out of order, but I ask unanimous consent to say one word. The twentieth rule provides for this very case; the time allowed is one hour on each side unless the Senate shall by order extend the time. The substance of the application is that the time be extended to two hours under the rule, and not in suspension of it. The counsel cannot move to suspend the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. The motion as made is for the enlargement of time under Rule 20 to enable us to argue the question. We suggest two hours on each side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate enlarge the time to two hours instead of one? on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The roll will now be called on that question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 48, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Whyte, and Windom—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Eaton, Hitchcock, Howe, Key, Merrimon, Sargent, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, and Withers—13.
NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bruce, Clayton, Dorsey, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Kernan, Wallace, and Wright—10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate orders the extension of time to two hours on each side.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, in behalf of the managers, I would inquire whether this application is to be supported by any affidavits. I do not understand that in any court it is proper to postpone merely on the ipse dixit of counsel. I suppose that any postponement whatever should be supported by affidavits when the order has been made that the trial proceed to-day. Therefore, I inquire whether the order asked for is to be supported by affidavits? If not, I desire to raise that point of order in the case.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, we have no affidavits. We mean to submit the question on the considerations which we shall address to the Senate. Shall I proceed, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Counsel will proceed. The Senate will please give attention.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President and Senators, the grounds on which the counsel for the defendant in this case feel compelled to ask the postponement of this trial are those which will address themselves to the Senate as a body taking notice of the history of the times.

The first ground upon which we ask this continuance is because of the advanced period of the session, and the limited time which we can therefore be allowed to prepare for this inquiry. It is impossible, I think, for counsel in the time to which the session in its usual course will extend, to do justice to the great question involved in this inquiry. At the threshold you are met by a fundamental constitutional question, the question whether a private citizen is subject to be impeached. We, as the counsel of the accused, have not had the opportunity to investigate that subject as it ought to be investigated, by going to original sources of information upon a matter so grave, and we cannot have that time at this season of the session of the Senate. It would be unjust to this body, it would be unjust to the people of the United States, for us to go into the consideration of so grave an inquiry at this period of the session, with the limited time which you can afford us to prepare for it.

The second ground upon which we place this application for a continuance is, that in the articles and in the presentation which is made here by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, they ask the liberty to furnish additional articles; and it is a fact of which this body will take notice, as one of the matters of current history, that the committee which presented the charges already presented is proceeding day by day with inquiries to lay the basis for additional articles. From the other end of the Capitol and from the committee in which these inquiries are proceeding we have an outpouring day by day, through the public press, of testimony to prejudice the public mind and this body against the party accused. Are we to have impeachment in broken doses? Is it fair and just that while you are here deliberating upon these articles, the public mind and this body should be affected by incriminations which we have no opportunity to answer? We do not object to that proceeding; we want it to go on; we want this continuation for such an examination to proceed. We want it to go on all summer; and we want everything which can be found and investigated throughout the official life of the accused to be examined in detail and with scrutiny by this committee. If there is any additional charge to be presented, we want an opportunity to meet it squarely, and not to feel the effect indirectly in this trial of having the sluices of calumny opened and pouring in upon us with respect to other matters with no opportunity of defense. I see in the averted countenances of this Senate to the accused that these daily outpourings from the committee-room have affected the minds of Senators toward him before they have heard a syllable of testimony against him.

When this committee shall have closed its examinations, we shall have either the confession that there is nothing more to add to the charges pending here, or, if we have the results of the investigations spread before us in the shape of specific charges, we shall be ready to meet them. In case no more charges are presented here after this investigation, and we are confident it will come to that, we shall have the confession before this body and the country that this man's official life has been ransacked by those now in charge of his Department, who look upon him with no kindly eye, and that there is naught against him except what is embodied in the articles now presented to the Senate. How differently will he then stand here, a man who won his station in the counsels of the President not by manipulating the primaries nor by contributions or material aid in the election, but by gallantry on the field of battle! For this he was raised to his position by the President of the United States. When such a man as that is accused before this body upon these articles, and this calumny-mill is stopped, and he appears before you to answer the specific allegations which are now here with a confession that after the closest scrutiny of his official life nothing else can be alleged against him, this Senate will be very slow to believe on the evidence of a confessed accomplice that he is guilty of the baseness of which he is accused.

But, finally, I appeal to the Senate to postpone the consideration of this question for a third and still stronger reason than any I have submitted; and that is, that from the nature of the charge itself and the circumstances under which it is presented the fair consideration of questions involved in the case will be embarrassed by the political contest now in progress. How can it be otherwise when the trial is to take place before a body consisting of the most active partisans of both parties, one of which seeks to cast the odium heaped upon the defendant upon the other party? That other party, enraged at the imputation, seeks to repel it by surpassing its rival in the severity of its dealing with the offender.

It is no disrespect to this body to call its attention to these facts. It would be a want of respect to it to shrink from speaking the truth for fear of giving offense, even though the object should be to show that the circumstances are such as to incapacitate it at this time from giving that fair and judicial consideration to the constitutional question involved in this case which its importance requires.

Every lawyer knows who practices before the Supreme Court of the United States that that court, though removed from all participation in political affairs, avoids giving its judgment on questions which affect the party politics of the day while the elections are pending. I may mention to the Senate the Dred Scott case, which was argued elaborately before the Supreme Court of the United States in the winter of 1855; but that body refused to mix itself in the politics of the day by deciding that question in anticipation of the election that occurred in 1856, and laid it over until the election had passed, that it might not be said that its decision was influenced by partisanship. If such a course was thought proper by a tribunal so much further removed from partisanship than this body, to secure itself in dealing with great constitutional questions free from party influences, it certainly would not be unbecoming in this body, whose members are all actively engaged on one or the other side in the great battle now going on, to imitate the court in guarding itself from such influence when called upon to establish a precedent restricting the power to impeach a private citizen.

Every Senator can recall many instances where the ablest, the most honest, and the most impartial men have been induced by influences, similar to those which now surround them, to commit the grossest injustice. But I will call your attention to a few facts that have occurred in the history of this case, from the official records, to show this body how the ablest, the purest, and the firmest men have overruled their own deliberate judgment and disregarded their avowed convictions.

The Senate will take notice from the official record that these charges were investigated one day only in the committee, one witness only being examined, that the committee reported the next day to the House, that the previous question was called, and this impeachment put through without debate substantially. One or two of the members of the House, consisting in great part of learned lawyers, protested against the manner in which this business was conducted, and ventured to call attention to the fact that the commentators on the Constitution of the highest repute held that there was no jurisdiction in such a case as this. One of these was one of the managers here now prosecuting this case. He said on that occasion:

> Now, Judge Story, after full discussion, lays down the doctrine that it cannot be done. In England any citizen can be impeached, and therefore the English case of Warren Hastings does not apply. In America no man can be impeached but a civil officer, and when he ceases to be a civil officer he ceases to be within the literal construction of the Constitution.

And yet, notwithstanding this emphatic protest, that able, resolute, and honest man was so overborne that he actually voted against the opinion which he had been bold enough for a moment to proclaim, and no one was found bold enough to withstand the tide, and impeachment was voted unanimously. It was a party necessity. Each party must clear itself from all suspicion of complicity with corruption, and hence it would not do to let even the Constitution stand in the way of prosecuting corruption by impeachment, when it was once proposed in the present morbid state of the public mind.

What harm can result from the postponement we request? No public exigency requires that this proceeding should be forced on at this time. The defendant is not in office; he "has done the State some service," and is at least entitled to a fair trial.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the counsel making this application have finished their opening, I move that the Senate withdraw for consultation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Have the counsel closed their opening?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the counsel have not closed their argument. We supposed that one of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives would now proceed with the argument on their side and that the counsel would follow and close by either Mr. Carpenter or myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I repeat that, if the counsel for the respondent have finished their opening of the application, I move that the Senate withdraw for consultation. If counsel have not finished their opening of the application, of course I do not make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair put that question, and counsel will please state to the Chair whether they have closed their opening, so that the Chair can communicate the fact to the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Well, we have not closed our opening. We have not closed the argument which we desire to submit to the Senate before there is any deliberation upon the subject; but we expected one of the gentleman on the part of the House of Representatives to proceed and state the objections they have to this motion.

Mr. President, if it be the pleasure of the court that we proceed without waiting to hear anything from the other side, we shall go on; otherwise we suppose that the arrangement made between us and the managers will be carried out, and that one of them will now address the court.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I will say that this arrangement to which the counsel refers is of course one entirely within the control of the Senate, and under the suggestion made we do not feel at liberty to proceed until the opening on the other side is completed.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President and Senators, since it seems to be your order, I will state somewhat more fully the ground upon which this motion bases itself; and I will give some of my reasons for believing that it ought to meet with no opposition from any quarter.

The managers and members of the House of Representatives, moved by considerations which they think right and proper, are bent upon the destruction of the citizen at the bar. To that end they have dragged him here and demand his conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors before a body whose general functions, like their own, are purely political. You have put on your judicial robes for the purposes of this particular case; and when this occasion is once overpassed, you will lay them aside as suddenly as you put them on. They have therefore good reason to suppose that here they will meet with all possible sympathy. The demand they make is spoken with a voice potential, for it is backed by your constituents as well as their own; that is to say, by the whole body of the American people. When they say, as they do in their articles of impeachment, that they impeach him in the name of the whole people, they are using no mere formal solemnity, but they are averring a literal fact that is well known to be true.

In these circumstances the duty of the accused is plain enough. It requires him to be, to do, and to suffer whatever you in your wisdom may decree. But duties like that are always reciprocal. If he owes obedience to the laws of his country, the country owes him a fair trial. When I say a fair trial, I do not mean merely an honest trial, for that he will be sure to get, whether he gets it to-day or to-morrow or at some other time; I mean a trial free from all disturbing influences, where everything for him and against him will be weighed with scrupulous accuracy in scales perfectly poised, from which even the dust of the balance will be blown away as carefully as possible.

This case has its intrinsic difficulties, such as the judges of the highest courts might be unwilling to cope with in the face of an adverse public opinion.

At the very threshold of the case you encounter a grave question of constitutional law; new, doubtful, difficult, it must be admitted, because there is great conflict of opinion about it among those who ought to understand it best.

On the part of the managers, doubtless, there will be powerful arguments in favor of the jurisdiction which they have invoked. I do not mean that they will use mere declamation "to split the ears of the groundlings," but strong, weighty, impressive arguments, fit to be addressed to the understanding and conscience of this the most dignified body in the world. On the other hand, I might say that it will be met by us with a demonstration as clear as the light of the sun at noonday. But I do not say so, because I am admonished that he "that girdeth on his harness" must not "boast himself as he that putteth it off."

It is a matter of transcendent importance to you, to the public, to this party, to hundreds of other parties who sooner or later may be in the same situation that this point should be decided exactly right. If you take a jurisdiction which does not belong to you it is a most alarming usurpation of undelegated power. If you have the jurisdiction and refuse to exercise it, it is a gross dereliction of your duty. Of course you can steer your vessel between Scylla and Charybdis with perfect safety if you have calm weather to do it in, but that is a kind of navigation which certainly ought not to be undertaken in the midst of a storm.

After you have reached the conclusion, if you ever do reach it, that you have jurisdiction, then will come the investigation of the merits. Remember, to begin with, that he is innocent. I have a right to say this here and now for the purposes of the present motion. If I had the voice of a thousand trumpets I could not speak it more loudly than I have a right to speak it, because, in the first place, that is the presumption of law; and, secondly, I have not seen any legal, sufficient, or satisfactory evidence of his guilt. Neither have you.

Standing, then, before you in that attitude, as an innocent man accused of an infamous offense, he demands a rigid scrutiny of the evidence against him and a patient hearing of his answer. I am far from saying that the managers will not make out a most formidable case. They have not come here with a mere empty accusation which we can afford to despise. They have not made this assault upon the accused without weapons in their hands which they think will fatally wound him. No Quaker-guns are mounted upon their battery. The artillery leveled upon us is loaded to the muzzle with what kind of ammunition I am not sure that I know just yet. But every fact and circumstance, moral or material, which they are able to produce will be met by a clear and simple though it may be an elaborate explanation. The answer will be satisfactory when it comes, but it is inexpressibly painful to produce it. Rather than bring his real defense before the public, my unfortunate client would suffer anything except the total loss of his reputation. But he has earned a good name by a life-time of well-doing. It is the immediate jewel of his soul, and, like every gentleman who is properly constituted, he dreads the loss of it a thousand times more than death. The House took him at a horrible disadvantage. If that Committee on War Expenditures, which has pursued him with such remorseless activity, had taken him out and shot him in the public square it would have been a visitation of mercy in comparison with what they did do. If they are his mortal enemies, (which I do not believe they are,) let them rejoice, for the day of his calamity is come. He has already suffered as much torture as human nature is able to bear.

Is this a case to be tried before a political body in the midst of a presidential election? Why, the stump and the newspaper will take the jurisdiction out of your hands in spite of all you can do. Conventions and caucuses will make their own decrees in the cause and demand their affirmance here. The tempest of passion, which already frights the nation from its propriety, is rising higher and higher every day, and the thunders of popular condemnation which break over us become louder and louder at every burst. The wrath of the country waxes hotter as it burns, and it threatens not only to consume the accused but to scorch and blister every one who stands up to give him aid and comfort in his adversity.

Can you give him the fair, impartial, and unprejudiced trial to which he is entitled? I answer, yes. It is possible to free yourselves from all these disturbing influences. You can disregard all political considerations and trample the passions of the hour under your feet. You can rise to the loftiest height of judicial virtue and look down with contempt upon the stream of prejudice as it rushes along below you. You can throw away the chances of your friends for that high office which makes ambition virtue. You can dismiss from your hearts the natural love which all public men have for the pride, pomp, and circumstance of political domination over a great country. You can defy the criticism of your own constituents and all their power. You can look in the omnipotent face of the whole people, and tell them that their evil is not good, a hardship upon you to require that you should. There is no man here, I think, who does not intend to do all this and more. Every Senator believes that he, for his own part, will come up to that heroical standard of judicial virtue. But is there a man among you who believes that the others can do it?

Mr. President and Senators, if we had but one party against us, we could stand it well enough; if one were hostile and the other neutral. This is a case in which all parties, who agree with one another in nothing else, unite in a chorus of execration against a single individual. The democracy, as soon as the accusation was made, remembering its traditional love of everything that is pure and good in government and acting upon its profound hatred for all manner of corruption, broke out into a loud explosion of anger the moment they heard the accusation, without stopping to consider whether it was exactly true or not. The general shout which they sent up shook the whole country from sea to sea, and completely stampeded the party of the Administration. Everywhere they broke from their corrals, snapped their halters, and went wild in scattered confusion. Some rather heavy stock that had never raised a trot before went over the plains on a furious gallop. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will here remind those occupying the floor as well as those in the galleries that applause is entirely out of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President and Senators, there is an institution among us called the Department of Justice. On its seal is the legend, Qui pro domine justitia sequitur. It is headed just now by a gentleman renowned for his legal learning and for his love of everything that is just and right. It is his special business to hold the executive head level on subjects of this kind. He heard that his friend, brother, and colleague was accused by a committee—not proved to be guilty, but simply accused. Did he throw the broad ægis of the Constitution and the laws over him to protect him and shield him and save him? No. He resolved on the instant that he would burn with an indignation as fierce as the most virtuous of democrats.

Without warrant, without process of any kind, without an oath, without proof of probable cause, he surrounded him with a body of armed policemen, filled his house with them, put them at the front door, at the back door, in hall, parlor, and kitchen. If you had seen him in that condition you might have supposed him to be the fallen minister of some Turkish despot surrounded by the janizaries of the Sultan and waiting quietly for the bowstring.

When a lawless outrage like this can be perpetrated by the Department of Justice; when the Attorney-General, the special guardian of the law, can be lifted from his feet and carried away by the tide of prejudice, have we not reason to distrust the fairness of politicians in general?

Mr. President, I would make this same appeal for continuance to any court of justice. This is no unjudicial call upon your discretion. It does not imply any imputation upon you

If the judges of the ordinary courts would listen to such a proposition as this, founded as it is upon the facts which have been mentioned, how much more necessary is it that a political or legislative body should be careful how it exercises its power in a case like the present at a time so unpropitious?

Judges suppose themselves to live in an atmosphere above the reach of public clamor; but the door of a legislative hall cannot be closed upon those influences. Legislators regard it as a virtue to represent their constituents truly, and to gratify them as much as possible. Look at the judicial acts of the English Parliament. The history of impeachments and of bills of pains and penalties, and bills of attainder, which for a long time came in place of impeachments, is the history of the shame and the misfortune of that country. Three-fourths of the judgments, nearly all of them, given in times of political excitement, were reversed by the body that pronounced them.

You know, as everybody knows, that the truest and best men that ever lived have fallen under such proceedings as these. Some of those judgments stand yet to disgrace the age in which they were pronounced. Take, for instance, the case of Floyd in the reign of James I. He was a gentleman, but poor enough to be imprisoned for debt. He made some flippant expression concerning the Elector-Palatine. It excited the intense indignation of divers persons who heard it, and the excitement spread from one to another until at last he was dragged before Parliament. They had no jurisdiction to punish him. His offense was below the competence of a common court; it was no offense at all; it was a mere slighting expression that did no harm and was not intended to harm any human being; but in order to gratify the rage of the populace the two houses of Parliament agreed between them that he should be punished thus: He should be compelled to ride on horseback through the principal thoroughfares of London on two different days without a saddle, with his face to the horse's tail and with the tail in his hand; that on his return from each of these journeys he should stand in the pillory for two hours to be pelted by the mob; that he should be whipped upon his bare back; that he should be branded in the forehead with the letter K, and finally he should be kept in Newgate prison for the whole of his natural life.

That was not done by a set of barbarians. The greatest of that time among them the wisest men of any time, were members of the Parliament that inflicted this outrage upon humanity. Among others was Coke, the father of the common law; and he was carried away by the passion of the multitude in the wickedness.

We have had some cases in this country, not cases in which anything like this which I have recited as having been done there was perpetrated; but here in 1839, or thereabouts, a Mr. Swartwout was charged with being a defaulter to the amount of $1,300,000. He was not; he had never spent or appropriated to his own use any dollar of the public money; but his papers were in a state of utter confusion; he was not able to prove his innocence, and so he ran away incontinently. Everybody believed him to be guilty, including both political parties. Suppose he had been tried before the great men who were members of this body in 1840 in the midst of that exciting presidential election, what earthly chance would he have had of escape? It would have been impossible.

There are other instances which I need not enumerate of strong delusions. Everybody threatens to be excessively angry unless something be done with the gentleman who is now at this bar, and especially our friends in the House of Representatives will be very much excited by any disappointment.

Just at this time the United States are nearly in the condition of one of the Roman cities about the beginning of the second century. The public authorities had sent off to Africa and at very considerable expense they had secured and brought home a lion of great strength and ferocity. Great pleasure, gratification to the people was expected if they could only get a man for the lion, but it seemed for a while as if there might be some disappointment about that. On the eve of the day when the games were to begin somebody caught a man and dragged him before the magistrates, charged with the crime of Christianity. He was convicted. But suppose the judges had refused to take jurisdiction, or, having taken jurisdiction, had acquitted him upon the ground that he was a good pagan, what would have happened to the judges? They themselves would have been thrown to the lion, and the people would have had their sport anyhow.

What do these examples of popular fury, and legislative ferocity in consequence of the popular fury, teach us? History, says Hume, is philosophy teaching by examples. What is the lesson taught us by all the examples we know in the history of this country and of past times? Why this, that when the people rage and imagine a vain thing and demand the sacrifice of a victim against which their wrath is directed, that is the very time that you should not take cognizance of the charge, that you should wait quietly until the times change. It teaches that you should wait, as the prophet Elijah waited when he came out of the cave, until the earthquake ceased to shake the mountain, until the mighty wind had blown past, until the great fire had burned itself out, and then listen as he listened for "the still small voice" that speaks of justice, liberty, law, divine and human.

We have a very recent example which shows that legislative bodies are not infallible, although they are composed of the wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best men in the world. It is but a few days ago that the House of Representatives took up a man, and without jurisdiction, without paying the slightest attention to his defense, and though he was not guilty, rushed him into prison. That was done, remember, by a House nearly all of whose members had distinguished themselves by their devotion to the great principles of human liberty, habeas corpus, and the right of trial by jury. One of them, only two or three weeks afterward, stood up on his feet in the House and confessed that the accusation and punishment were the result of partisan zeal on the one side and partisan timidity on the other. When that thing can be done by a House of Representatives so illustrious and filled with so many great and distinguished men, it surely is not wrong for me to say that possibly the same thing may happen here where distinguished men and great statesmen are equally plenty.

Now, if you will put this off until the gentlemen who are managers get through with the trial which they are conducting against my client behind his back, and until there shall be no further political occasion for convicting him, when there shall be nothing but the ends of justice to answer, you will pronounce then a judgment in the cause which will do you honor and save him from great wrong. In the mean time I beg my friends at the other table not to let their zeal run away with them, not to be troubled, not to fret. The thing will all come right in due time. They shall have their day and their hearing, and they shall get all they want if they are entitled to it. In the mean time it will do them good, I am sure, to sprinkle some cool drops of patience upon their fiery spirits.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, what is the danger to the State, what is the calamity impending to free institution which this prosecution must be hastened to avert? What great end is to be secured by a final trial on this impeachment at this session that cannot as well be attained by a trial at the next session of the Senate? What is the overwhelming evil this proceeding is to correct? Is any public officer undermining our liberties or using his power to oppress the people, and who is therefore such an enemy to humanity that he must be arrested in his wicked career by an almost instantaneous conviction? No; for no public officer is touched by this proceeding. It contemplates nothing but the infliction of political disabilities upon a private citizen of the State of Iowa.

This is unquestionably a great court, but this can hardly be called a great cause. Congress has been constantly engaged for many years in removing political disabilities resulting from treason; not mere theoretical and constructive treason; not the preaching of a sermon containing tenets not fashionable at court, like that for which a clergyman was once impeached in England; not merely the writing of essays to satisfy the people of the right of rebellion, like that which sent Algernon Sydney to ignominious execution; but treason defiant and organized; treason with uplifted crest and outstretched arm; treason which drenched the land with blood and darkened our homes with mourning. You have been engaged for years in removing political disabilities from men guilty of such treason, quickening them with capacity for political and official life, until they have at last gained possession of the southern wing of this Capitol. And this proceeding is their first signal exercise of authority; and they come to the bar of this court heralded by proclamations and surrounded with pageantry which fills your galleries when nothing is to be done but the filing of a single paper. And all this to fix upon a citizen of Iowa, a Union officer, the disabilities which the generosity of the North has removed from offenders in the South.

There are some incidents of this proceeding, apparently ordered by Providence, to suggest a pause. These articles of impeachment were served upon General Belknap at five o'clock and forty minutes in the afternoon of the 6th day of April, 1876. On the 6th day of April, 1862, at about the same hour, General Belknap was in the fore-front of the line of Union troops who made their last stand and rolled back the confederate forces on the bloody field of Shiloh. The former good character and distinguished services of the respondent may not avail him on the final question of innocence or guilt, but may properly be considered in disposing of this motion, which is addressed to the sound discretion, in some sense the grace and favor, of this honorable court.

There is no necessity for a speedy trial. The public safety is in no way in peril. No officer is to be removed, for no officer is touched by these proceedings. The prospect is not brilliant for his nomination by the President for any office pending these proceedings, and if he were nominated the Senate would probably not confirm him. Therefore no great public interest demands an immediate trial. In the case of Blount's impeachment the trial was had at a session subsequent to that at which the articles were presented. Judge Peck's trial was postponed to a subsequent session on the motion of Mr. Webster. And in this case, whether political disabilities shall or shall not be laid upon General Belknap is not a question of such pressing importance that its determination cannot be postponed to a calmer hour. Not only has General Belknap maintained a good character, but he has rendered important and eminent services to the Republic, and he stands to-day with honorable place in history, with reputation unquestioned save in regard to the transaction now under consideration, testified to only by a single witness, and that witness the feeble tool of one woman bent on the destruction of another.

Every Senator who hears me knows that I am especially estopped to utter one disrespectful word to this body. I have experienced its generous kindness so often that I can never entertain aught but the highest respect for the Senate and the warmest affection for its members; and no one will do me the injustice to suppose that my advocacy of this motion is inspired by any want of confidence in the ability or integrity of this court. But I remember a proceeding in this body some years ago, in which a Senator was on trial, and I happen to know that at that time another Senator, who had been a member of the committee which reported the case to the Senate and had what was, substantially, a judicial duty to perform in the premises, was in the daily receipt of numerous letters from his warmest friends and leading politicians of his own party at home, assuring him that if he did not do everything in his power to expel the accused he never could be re-elected. The Senator thus warned pursued the course which his convictions dictated, but the predicted consequence was realized.

Of course, I do not know that you, Senators, are daily receiving such letters in regard to this trial. But I should not be astonished to learn that some person, unacquainted with the proprieties of this proceeding, had written a similar letter to some Senators.

The coming presidential campaign is already dawning upon us, and will increase in warmth and interest day by day. It is impossible for this court to sit, amid the excitement of a political canvass, entirely unaffected by political influences; and no harm can come to the public, while the respondent's chances of impartial justice at your hands would be greatly increased by postponement of this trial until the coming political contest shall be settled.

We all know what the next campaign is to be. The democrats, who have been so long out of office, rely upon the watchword "anti-corruption" to win the people to their support. This the republicans must meet by exhibiting greater detestation of corruption than the democrats profess. The democrats can only exhibit their virtue by finding corruption in the republican party to be rebuked, and republicans can exhibit their virtue only by out-Heroding Herod in punishment of whatever corruption democrats may pretend to find. Both parties are therefore interested in making the most of the alleged misconduct of the respondent. The democrats have found nothing, in all their investigations, against any other officer, and nothing against the respondent except the particular matter set out in these articles of impeachment, and that alleged by only one witness, and he durst not remain in the country twenty-four hours after he had testified. The campaign, therefore, must turn upon the guilt or innocence of Belknap, both parties being interested to establish his guilt. He will therefore be made the object of attack from every stump, in every newspaper, and in every hamlet in the land. And the question is, whether this is a favorable time for him to receive a perfectly calm and dispassionate trial.

Consider what has already transpired. A report was made by a committee to the House of Representatives about three o'clock in the afternoon of April 2, 1876. The committee had no authority to make the investigation or the report; but the tenor of the report was so grateful to the House that, without printing the testimony, and under the stress of the previous question, amid a scene of excitement and confusion which the Speaker characterized as "disgraceful disorder," the impeachment was carried by a unanimous vote. It is worthy of remark, as evincing the excitement of the hour, that one of the firmest and ablest lawyers of the House, one of the honorable managers now present, after declaring that the House had no authority to impeach Mr. Belknap, then out of office, was so carried away as to vote in favor of impeachment.

After this remarkable proceeding on the part of the House, the Attorney-General, a mild-mannered gentleman, with a kind heart and high sense of propriety, was so excited by the fear that a democratic House was getting ahead of a republican administration that in open defiance of the Constitution, which declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized," without oath or affirmation establishing probability of guilt and without warrant issued for arrest, issued his lettre de cachet to the chief of a band of detectives belonging to the Treasury Department to exercise the strictest surveillance over the respondent. And in pursuance of this despotic and void order Belknap's house was surrounded with armed policemen and filled from cellar to garret with these detectives. The Attorney-General had no more authority to seize Belknap's house and imprison him therein than Belknap had to imprison the Attorney-General, and no more authority than had any private citizen to thus imprison them both. And, apart from the motive which inspired it, this proceeding of the Attorney-General is as much more deserving of impeachment than the transaction set out in these articles as the violation of a plain provision of the Constitution in favor of the people's rights is more dangerous to liberty than the violation of a particular penal statute. This proceeding of the Attorney-General, however, is only mentioned to show how political excitement could overcome the prudence of a high executive officer and transform the head of the Department of Justice into a minister of injustice.

Let this trial go over until the political contest shall be ended. The respondent will not attempt to escape; will not, like his accusers, flee into Canada; but will be present whenever this court requires his presence.

My colleague has referred to the case of Swartwout, and it is full of instruction for the present hour. He was accused of unparalleled dishonesty in office. And his supposed dishonesty has given a new word to our language. "Swartwouting" is equivalent to embezzlement and official peculation. He was set upon by pamphlets and speeches, political vituperation and popular denunciation; the press opened upon him like the Russian artillery upon the fated six hundred, and "volleyed and thundered" until Swartwout, in utter consternation, sought safety beyond the seas. There he remained until the presidential campaign was closed, the public mind had resumed its normal state, the storm had subsided, and the uproar ceased. Then he returned, and upon a deliberate and honest settlement of his accounts it was ascertained that, so far from his having been a defaulter, the Government was indebted in a small sum to him.

This lesson ought not to be lost upon the lovers of justice when, in the hour of high political need, a victim is singled out to be pursued to the death—when a citizen is required as a scapegoat for a party.

When we come to consider the final issues in this case, if we ever reach them, then the considerations which we now urge may be unimportant. But upon this question, When shall Belknap be tried? his former good character and honorable public services are properly urged upon the court; for surely such a man should be denied nothing which may secure to him the calmest, most impartial trial. And then, if for the imprudence of others justice can only be appeased by the disgrace of one who has rendered such service and bears such honors, so be it. But let this great act of justice proceed from deliberate judgment, and do not let it stand in our history as an instance of political injustice to crimson the cheeks of our children with shame.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, with a possible view of saving time, I move that the Senate withdraw for consultation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate now withdraw for deliberation.

A division was called for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to retire the roll-call will proceed, a division being called for.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 24; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate orders a retirement for consultation.

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President, before the Senate retires, I ask its consent to call attention to one other matter, and that is that the Senate will consider whether the rule of parliamentary law which prohibits the discussion in the Senate of what has taken place in the House of Representatives is a rule governing the proceedings of this trial, in order that the managers who represent the House may govern themselves accordingly. I am led to allude to the subject from the fact that one of the learned counsel has been permitted to state that a scene of disorder took place in the other branch of Congress on a certain occasion to which he referred. I do not make any motion upon this subject, but desire to call the attention of the Senate to the matter, that we may understand what our rights and duties are in the premises.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, in behalf of the defendant we wish to say that before that very important question shall be decided by the Senate we desire to be heard upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now retire.

The Senate, at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m., retired to the conference chamber.

The Senate having been called to order in the conference chamber,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore stated the question to be on the motion for continuance submitted by Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent.

Mr. EDMUNDS moved that the motion of the respondent to postpone the further hearing of the impeachment until the first Monday in December next be denied.

After debate,

Mr. SHERMAN moved to substitute for Mr. EDMUNDS's motion "that the President pro tempore ask the managers if they desire to be heard on the pending motion of Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent."

Mr. MERRIMON moved that the Senate return to its Chamber without action; on which motion the question, being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, West, and Windom—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Morton, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Withers—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anthony, Bruce, Clayton, Dorsey, English, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Kernan, Wallace, Whyte, and Wright—11.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. SHERMAN, the yeas were 28, and the nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, and Windom—28.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anthony, Bruce, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, English, Gordon, Kernan, Paddock, Wallace, Whyte, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the yeas were 59, and the nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Whyte, Windom, and Withers—59.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bruce, Clayton, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, English, Gordon, Kernan, Sharon, Spencer, Wallace, and Wright—12.

So the motion was agreed to.

At four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m. the Senate returned to the Senate Chamber, and the President pro tempore took the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Presiding Officer is directed to state to the counsel for the respondent that their motion is denied. The question now recurs on the motion submitted by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives. Do the counsel on the part of the respondent desire to be heard upon it?

Mr. BLAIR. We wish to be heard on that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the motion be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the motion.

The Secretary read as follows:

On motion of the managers,

Ordered, That the evidence on the questions pertaining to the plea to the jurisdiction of this court be given before the arguments relating thereto are heard, and if such plea is overruled, that the defendant be required to answer the articles of impeachment within two days, and the House of Representatives to reply, if they deem it necessary, within two days, and that the trial proceed on the next day after the joining of issue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now hear the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, if the counsel will give way, I move that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourned until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

FRIDAY, April 28, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap,

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Blair and Mr. Carpenter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now ready to receive the managers and the House, provision being made for their accommodation.

At twelve o'clock and thirty-six minutes p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the presence of the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives, and they were conducted to the seats provided for them.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate yesterday sitting for the trial of the impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to proceed with the trial. The Secretary will report the pending motion submitted by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
vs.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

On motion of the managers,

Ordered, That the evidence on the questions pertaining to the plea to the jurisdiction of this court be given before the arguments relating thereto are heard, and, if such plea is overruled, that the defendant be required to answer the articles of impeachment within two days, and the House of Representatives to reply, if they deem it necessary, within two days, and that the trial proceed on the next day after the joining of issue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are the managers ready to go on?

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I think the managers presented yesterday on that question all that they desire to submit at the present time until the other side are heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Do gentlemen of counsel desire to be heard?

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President and Senators, the same reason which induced us to move yesterday for a continuance of the trial of this cause until after the coming political campaign induces us now, since the Senate has determined to try this cause at the present term, to hurry it forward as fast as we can before the political furnace becomes heated seven times hotter than its wont. I therefore say to the Senate that we shall ask no unnecessary delay in this case; we shall interpose no dilatory plea or motion which, in our judgment, is not essential to the merits of the case, and shall do everything in our power to speed the trial and terminate it as soon as possible, having due regard to the importance of the cause and to the proper defense of this respondent.

The first part of this order, "That the evidence on the questions pertaining to the plea to the jurisdiction of this court be given before the arguments relating thereto are heard," we have no objection to. It is a matter of total indifference to us what is the order which the Senate may make in that particular. Whether the testimony shall be taken and the argument on the facts and the law in regard to the jurisdiction of the court be heard together, or whether they shall be proceeded with at different times is a matter of indifference to us.

To the residue of the order, however, we do seriously object upon several grounds. In the first place, we object to the managers controlling this case on both sides. We are perfectly willing that they should ask such orders as they please for their own government and their own pleadings; but we object to their fixing or asking any order in regard to our pleadings. This part of the order is:

And if such plea is overruled, that the defendant be required to answer the articles of impeachment within two days.

I suppose that means answer the articles on the merits.

And the House of Representatives to reply, if they deem it necessary, within two days; and that the trial proceed on the next day after the joining of issue.

I submit to this honorable court that a proper reply to the managers of the House in regard to this part of the proposed order would be the famous reply which Coke made to the king: "When the question arises and is debated, I will do what is fit and proper for a judge to do; and further, I decline to pledge myself to your majesty." When this plea to the jurisdiction shall be disposed of, the defendant may demur to the articles of impeachment, or may not, as he shall be advised; and what will be the circumstances of this court, or of the counsel, or even of the managers, who, although numerous, are not incorporated and are still mortal, this court cannot to-day determine. They may not want to make their reply to whatever we may say so speedily as they now think.

In the next place, if the court please, while as I say we shall not attempt to make any delays in this case beyond what are absolutely necessary, the argument of the question of the jurisdiction of this court cannot be made properly on the day indicated in this order. The defendant has been compelled to employ counsel, and the counsel whom he has employed have been actively engaged, were at the time of their retainer, and have been ever since, in other professional employments in which they were previously engaged. The Supreme Court of the United States has been in session all the time and is still in session. Other courts in the States where Judge Black has had engagements have been in session also, and he has been compelled to be absent from Washington most of the time. Mr. Blair has also been engaged in the Supreme Court and in other professional employments. Therefore it has been impossible for us up to the present time to do more in this case than to attend to its current necessities. We have had no opportunity to make any preparation for the argument of what in my belief is the gravest question ever presented to a tribunal in this country, namely, whether this Senate has an undefined criminal jurisdiction over forty million people.

There is another practical difficulty that has been in our way, which was mentioned yesterday, and that is that all the books on the subject are out of the Library being examined, I suppose, by the committees of the House or by Senators, and we have therefore had no opportunity to reach the books which we desire to examine previous to this argument; and every lawyer in the Senate knows that such a question cannot be properly prepared on our side without a thorough examination of the authorities, the matters of law decided in other tribunals, and the history of the proceedings in England from which we have borrowed this procedure.

I wish in this connection to say to the court that we cannot be ready to present our side of this question, and properly present it as the importance of the question requires, present it as is due to this court, due to ourselves, and, above all, due to our client, in less than two weeks. We, therefore ask that this matter may be postponed until two weeks from to-day; and after that, unless in case of sickness or some calamity which cannot be foreseen, I think we shall ask for no other delays except in the necessary preparation of pleadings or otherwise as will be conceded to be entirely proper.

In connection with the request that we shall have two weeks to prepare for this argument, I repeat my assurance that it is not for delay; it is not to waste the time of the court; and it will not have that effect, for I understand you have some things to do besides hearing this case—I refer to your legislative business—and our only object is to be able to present the question as its importance demands.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, I desire to call the attention of this court to the proceedings had on the 17th of the present month. I do not intend in the least to call in question the good faith of the counsel who has just addressed this tribunal, but I may refer to what I am about to refer to, in order to show this court the good faith of the managers in making this motion. On the 17th of the present month this occurred. The Chief Clerk read:

"The managers on the part of the House of Representatives request a copy of the plea filed by W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and the House of Representatives desire time until Wednesday, the 19th instant, at one o'clock, to consider what replication to make to the plea of the said W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, you have heard the motion of the managers. Those who concur will say ay; those who non-concur will say no, [putting the question.] The ayes have it; the Senate so orders.

The Chair will ask the gentlemen counsel for the respondent if they will be ready to proceed at the time named in the motion submitted by the managers?

The learned counsel who has just addressed the court answered:

That will depend entirely upon what the managers do. We cannot anticipate. If they do what we suppose they will do, we shall be ready. If not, we shall have to consider what we will do next.

Now, if the court please, this answer of the counsel was supposed to refer to a general replication; in other words, he said in substance to this tribunal that if the managers put in a general replication he would be ready to go on with the argument. At least, so we understood; and it is difficult for me at the present time to give any other possible interpretation. The counsel could not have intended to trifle with this court He could not have said that he would be ready to go on provided we were ready to come in here and abandon this impeachment. Therefore all that he could have intended, in our judgment, was this: "If the managers put in a general replication to the plea of the defendant, then and in that case we shall be ready to go on immediately upon that question."

We did not put in simply a replication relating to the principal question; we put in something more than a general replication, namely, a special replication, and therefore the counsel is not bound to go on under his statement.

But this is the point: The counsel says he wants time to prepare, because the question to be decided by this court is whether it has criminal jurisdiction over forty millions of people. That question would be presented by the general replication, and, if the counsel would have been ready on the 19th day of the present month to argue that question, why is he not ready now?

Let me call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the other questions bearing on this matter, contained in the special replication. In this special replication three issues are tendered. In the first place, the replication affirms that William W. Belknap was in office until and including the 2d day of March—the day upon which he was impeached. We also affirm that the House of Representatives through a proper committee had taken jurisdiction of the case, and that the impeachment proceedings were pending when the defendant resigned. We also affirm that the defendant resigned to avoid the impeachment; and allow me to call the attention of the court, in passing, to the rejoinder of the defendant, in which he substantially admits that he resigned for the purpose of avoiding the impeachment. He gives another reason for it, it is true, than guilt, but no matter, the fact is substantially admitted in his rejoinder that he resigned for the purpose of avoiding this impeachment. Therefore there will be no great difficulty in regard to the question of fact raised on that part of the rejoinder to our replication.

Then, on the second question, the proceedings before the House of Representatives, they are very easily proved; and as to the question of whether he was in office on that particular day, it is a matter of history that he did not resign until the 2d of March, and therefore he was in office on that particular day.

Now, if the court please, the questions relating to these facts: first, the question relating to the defendant's power to evade the Constitution and the punishment of the Constitution by resigning; second, the question relating to dividing a day into fractions; third, the question relating to the proceedings before the House of Representatives; that is to say, the relation of the impeachment to the commencement of the proceedings, and also another question as to the effect of the adoption of those proceedings by the House of Representatives—all these are questions, I say, with which all lawyers are familiar, more or less; and certainly the distinguished counsel on the other side must be familiar with all these questions.

As will be seen, the facts pertaining to these questions are within a very narrow compass, can be easily educed and easily considered. If we understood rightly the suggestions of counsel on yesterday, they claim to be thoroughly familiar, all of them, with what has transpired before the committee of the House and what has transpired in the House of Representatives. However unjustly they stated these facts, however erroneously, nevertheless they will undoubtedly hold on to their present view in regard to them until they are convinced by the evidence; and therefore it is that under these circumstances the managers feel constrained, being ready here to-day with the witnesses, to ask this court to go on with the trial and take the testimony bearing on the question of jurisdiction; and after the testimony is in, it will be in the discretion of the court to grant one, two, three, or more days, or longer time; I mention this number of days as sufficient in my judgment for counsel to prepare; but it will of course be in the discretion of the court to grant such further time as the court may deem proper.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I ask permission to say a word in reply to the argument of the honorable manager so far as it relates to me personally. After we had filed our plea, and the managers had asked time to reply, the President inquired of the counsel for the defense if they would be ready to proceed after the managers had filed their replication. To that I replied that if the managers did what we supposed they would, we should be ready to proceed—not proceed to argue any question; not proceed to take testimony; but proceed to file a counter-pleading; and I had then with me (supposing that they would demur to our plea, which stated nothing but facts) a joinder in demurrer. If they had filed their demurrer that day, I should have filed the joinder in demurrer the next moment. My reply simply was that we should be ready to proceed on that day if they did what we supposed they would; that is, if they demurred to our plea we should be ready to join in demurrer. No question was asked as to when we should be ready to proceed with the actual trial.

Everything done here is a proceeding in the trial. When this court by its order directed that the trial should proceed on the 27th, what was intended? Simply that the next step should then be taken. The motion to continue it over this session was a proceeding in the trial. We proceeded with the trial all that day, and are proceeding to-day; but to proceed with the trial and to be ready to argue a particular question, are very different things.

The honorable managers, I suppose, have been investigating this question for weeks. They have had the opportunity to do so, being excused, I suppose, from duty in the House, and allowed to sit in committee during the sittings of the House. They have had weeks to devote to this subject and had the books at hand. We have not; and we have been engaged in other necessary professional employments during this time. If this order is to be passed in this form, and this question is to be argued to-day or to-morrow, it is impossible for us to argue it. The honorable managers might as well ask for an order that we should not be heard at all. Even the Almighty employs human means and instrumentalities to execute His providences. Belknap could not do any better. He has to rely upon mortal men; and, if he is to get a lawyer who will devote his entire time to this case from the day of its inception to its end, he must get a lawyer who has no other case. The lawyers who have no cases are, as a general thing, the lawyers to whom a man in such a case would not want to intrust his interests.

We are not asking, I assure the Senate, for a single moment's delay for the sake of delay. We ask nothing but such time as in a case pending in the Supreme Court under its original jurisdiction not one of the honorable managers would refuse to opposite counsel, as a matter of professional courtesy. Undoubtedly if the honorable manager who has just addressed the Senate was opposed to me in a case under the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, a case not under peremptory call, and I should ask him as a courtesy for two weeks to prepare an argument and brief in the case, he would never think of denying it, as I certainly should not to him.

Although this is a great court, and a great case in the estimation of the managers, it is still a lawsuit, and must be tried as other lawsuits, if it is tried at all. And I am astonished that the managers feel bound to deny us a courtesy which I state professionally, upon my honor as a lawyer, is absolutely necessary to enable us to present this question at all as becomes either the court or the cause.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, it certainly is the fault of the counsel for respondent, and not the fault of the managers, that we have misapprehended his position; and I apprehend that there was no person in this august court on that day among the hundreds who were here who did not fully understand the counsel when he responded to the question of the court to mean that he would be ready to proceed that day, not by the filing of a mere formal paper which his clerk could draw, but that on that day he would be ready to proceed with the trial. What was the language used? What was the question of the President?

The Chair will ask the gentlemen counsel for the respondent if they will be ready to proceed at the time named in the motion submitted by the managers?

The counsel says he meant he would be ready to proceed to file a paper! Ready to proceed to do a clerk's work! Nobody under heaven understood him so. Of course we are bound to take the explanation of the counsel, but when he so responded he was responsible for saying that which led everybody in this court-room but himself to understand that he would be ready to proceed with the trial, and therefore the managers felt bound on their part to take such action as was necessary for an immediate trial.

Now I apprehend that this is not a question like the case suggested by the counsel; this is not a court in which a manager has a right to extend the courtesy which one who has the supreme control of a case may do at the circuit or in the Supreme Court, to take the illustration of the counsel. But this court proceeds upon its own rules, and the circumstances surrounding this case make it proper that the managers on the part of the House of Representative should urge all reasonable diligence. The House of Representatives was compelled under the evidence to present this impeachment to this high tribunal. There is no reason for delay. The counsel well knows, much as he is engaged in the courts, extensive as is the legal business which he conducts, that "where there's a will there's a way," and that he can put his will behind this case and say that owing to the august character of this court, and owing to the nature of the charge, and owing to all the circumstances surrounding the case, which I need not detail here, this matter ought to be tried and ended; the House of Representatives should be freed from unnecessary and protracted labor in this matter. The counsel speaks of extended business. The managers who are present, while they wish to submit with all cheerfulness to any order of the court, and while they desire to extend every possible courtesy in their power to the other side, feel, representing the House here under the circumstances to which I have referred and in view of other circumstances which will present themselves to the minds of the Senate, that there is no reason for any delay of this case beyond that which is required not by an absolute necessity but by a reasonable necessity.

If the counsel should present an affidavit showing engagements which he had entered into prior to his engagement in this case, even then this court might say that he ought to make his application to some other tribunal for a postponement. Without disputing in the least his engagements, without having any doubt whatever but that he is engaged every moment of his professional time, we do feel constrained on our part to ask this court, under the circumstances which have been developed in this case and which surround every case of this character, that its order require the defendant to proceed with all due diligence; and we do not think the order we ask is unreasonable in that regard.

The counsel says he does not find books. I would say that all the books I have examined, and I have examined many, with the exception of two or three that are in court on a comparatively preliminary question, were in the law library when I examined them and are there now; and if the managers have any books which the counsel desires, he can have them at any time.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, before coming to the matter of time or delay, I wish to offer an order relating as I think to a more important matter than the simple question of the day on which the trial shall begin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York proposes an order which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office. The motion that testimony be heard touching the exact time of such resignation, and touching the motive and purpose of such resignation, is reserved without prejudice till the question above stated has been considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be upon this motion first.

Mr. CONKLING. It may be that the managers, or the counsel, or both may wish to be heard upon the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to inquire of the managers if they desired to be heard on this motion.

Mr. Manager LORD. We do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager will proceed.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, it seems to me that under the authorities adduced yesterday such a course of procedure would be protracting the trial and entirely unnecessary. Several authorities were produced yesterday to show that a special finding or verdict is only necessary when the questions of fact are found in one tribunal and the law is applied by another. This question of jurisdiction is a single question, and it ought not to be divided and subdivided. The evidence should be in before the judgment of the court is taken on the question of jurisdiction; and this I understand the other side concede. Very great embarrassment might arise, very great delays might ensue from dividing this question. I cited yesterday an authority in the State of New York, to which I will again call the attention of the Senators, the Barnard case.

The court of impeachment in that State, composed of the president of the senate, the lieutenant-governor, the senators, and the judges of the court of appeals, had precisely this question before them. A plea to the jurisdiction was interposed, as follows:

And the said respondent in his own proper person, and by his counsel, John H. Reynolds and William A. Beach, comes and says that this court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the articles of impeachment, or any or either of them, presented in this court against him, because he says that the said articles of impeachment were not, nor were any nor was either of them, adopted by the assembly of this State by a vote of a majority of all the members elected thereto, as required by section 1 of article 6 of the constitution of this State.

A replication was put in to that plea, asserting—

That it is not true that the articles of impeachment now presented against the said respondent do not appear to be and are not articles of impeachment adopted by the assembly of the State, but that the said articles do appear to be and are articles of impeachment adopted by the said sasembly.

Then Edward M. Johnson and Charles R. Dayton were called and sworn on the part of the respondent. Hon. C. P. Vedder and Hon. Thomas G. Alvord were called and sworn on the part of the prosecution, these being respectively members or officers of the house. Counsel then argued the case, Messrs. Beach and Reynolds, of counsel for respondent, and Mr. Van Cott, of counsel for the prosecution.

The president stated that the question before the court was whether the plea of the respondent should be sustained.

Mr. Lewis moved that the chamber be cleared for private consultation.

The president put the question whether the court would agree to said motion, and it was determined in the affirmative.

The president put the question whether the court would sustain said plea of the respondent, and it was determined in the negative, as follows.

Chief Judge Church, of the court of appeals; Judge Allen, also of the court of appeals, and Senator Murphy in that case voted in the affirmative; the other senators in the negative. I refer to this case of The People vs. Barnard to show that in a court of impeachment composed of the senators of the State of New York and the judges of the court of appeals of that State the precise order was taken for which we move: the evidence was in before the question of jurisdiction was passed upon. Why should we be driven to one single question when there are three or four, and all of them I apprehend exceedingly important questions in this case? Perhaps in one view it may be the question of the case whether the defendant resigned for the purpose of evading this impeachment. Why should we try one question at one time and try another question at another time?

I sincerely hope, on behalf of the managers, that this court will adopt the order proposed by them on this question, changing the time as in its discretion it may deem proper. The first part of the order presented by the managers is concurred in by the defendant, who through his counsel makes no objection to that part of the order.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President and Senators, the pleadings proper in this case consist of the articles of impeachment, the plea to the jurisdiction, and the first replication of the House of Representatives to which there is a demurrer by us and a joinder by the managers. Strictly speaking, that is the only issue that could be made in this case. The honorable managers, however, saw fit, without asking leave, to file two replications, instead of one, to our plea. We of course did not care how fully they went into this question; we were ready to follow them in disregard of technical pleading.

I never heard of a case in a court where a single plea had led to an issue of law and fact or where a declaration or any proceeding whatever was followed by two issues, one of law and one of fact, that the court did not always first dispose of the question of law. That being disposed of, the question of fact may or may not be necessary to be inquired into. While on the part of Mr. Belknap we make no objection to this proceeding, its regularity is a question for the court to determine. It seems to me that the more regular proceeding is that indicated by the order offered by the Senator from New York, that the law of this question should be first settled. If we had been captious about pleading, and had moved the court to strike out this second replication, which is drawn not according to common-law form, but according to the free-and-easy style of the New York code, this court would have stricken it out as having been improperly filed, permission not having been granted to reply double. We did not object because we did not care for forms, and we followed them after their kind in our reply to their pleas. But certainly the course most in harmony with the method pursued in courts of law would be to settle the law upon this point first. If the Senate has no jurisdiction over a man who is not in office at the time the impeachment commences, that ends the question. That is a mere question of law; and we shall contend, of course, that any officer of the Government has a perfect right to resign at any moment and that the motives of a man's resignation cannot affect the legal consequences which follow the act of resignation. The Supreme Court of the United States has held where a citizen who wishes to have a litigation with a citizen of his own State moves into another State for the express purpose of giving the Federal courts jurisdiction, that is no objection to the jurisdiction; that a man may change his residence from one State to another for the purpose of obtaining a footing in a Federal court, as well as he may change it for the purpose of improving his health or his financial condition.

I do not regard the issues made as of any substantial consequence to this case. We care nothing about them. We are willing to try them or not try them, as the court directs. But the question is whether this man was in office at the time he was impeached by the House of Representatives? That is fully presented by the articles, by our plea to the jurisdiction, and by the first, which is the only regular, replication on the part of the House and our demurrer thereto. If the Senate shall be of opinion that none but a person in office can be impeached, of course that ends this proceeding. At all events, the method suggested by the order last offered is the method which would be pursued in a court of law. It will be borne in mind that we interposed the first demurrer, and are therefore entitled to open and close in the argument.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senators in regard to the evidence itself that it will take but a very brief period to present it. It is principally documentary evidence. The managers do not think that over one hour, certainly not over two, would be consumed in taking the testimony. It does not involve the merits of the case in the least. It is simply evidence that was before the committee, and certain documents from the House of Representatives.

Now it seems to me—Senators will pardon me for repeating perhaps what I have already said at least in part—that it would only create delay to adopt the resolution offered by the honorable Senator, because it involves discussing only the abstract question whether a citizen can be impeached, or whether a citizen who has been in office and is now out of office can be impeached. That is by no means the only question in this case; and we have authorities to show that a person is not allowed to resign for the mere purpose of evading an impeachment. If the resolution of the honorable Senator should be adopted, and this court should go on and hear arguments upon that one question, that does not end this matter if the decision is adverse to the jurisdiction. The House of Representatives has still a right to be heard on the question whether a man, when his sin finds him out, as is charged in these articles, has the right to resign and defeat the Constitution, defeat the disqualification which the Constitution has provided for the very purpose of protecting the people against themselves. A high officer may commit high crimes and misdemeanors, and on some wave of fanaticism be returned to power. As is charged in this case he may for long years have been receiving bribes and yet be restored to favor. I cannot say what the fact is; in this case I am now speaking of what the articles charge, that for many years the defendant has received bribes, rendering himself in the judgment of the nation, in the judgment of this court, utterly unfit to hold office; and yet when he is confronted with the evidence, for the very purpose of defeating the disqualification of the Constitution, he resigns.

It is said that the sentence of a court can be passed upon him disqualifying him. That is true as the law now stands; but I call the Senators' attention to this position: that the statute may, at any time, be repealed. The defendant in this case might be disqualified by the judgment of a court, and the very next day after that disqualification the statute might be repealed with an enactment that the disqualification be removed; or the President might pardon him, as he could without the statute being repealed. Therefore if that sentence should be pronounced in this case, if there is a case before this court which demands the judgment of disqualification, as the articles of impeachment, if true, most clearly and emphatically show—not leaving it to the favor of the President to pardon him; not leaving it to legislative enactment to free him from the penalties of his crime—then this court ought to hear the whole case, and it seems to me it would be a mere waste of time to hear arguments on this abstract question when it is so closely identified with the other part of the case. If you hold favorably to the position of the House of Representatives on that point, the trial it is true would go on; if you hold adversely to your jurisdiction, then we should have to institute another trial upon the second replication.

The counsel criticises somewhat this replication and speaks of it as belonging to the New York practice. No matter what practice it belongs to, in putting in that replication the House of Representatives simply did its duty and only its duty. What would be thought by the forty millions of people to whom the learned counsel just referred if the managers on the part of the House had neglected to bring before this body these facts; should have neglected to aver what we believe to be true, and what the respondent by his rejoinder has confessed to be true, that he resigned for the very purpose of escaping this impeachment—not, as he says, because he is guilty, but to save a laceration of his feelings? No matter what his motive, the fact stands confessed on this record that he resigned for the purpose of escaping impeachment, the impeachment provided by the Constitution and the disqualification provided by the Constitution. What would those forty millions of people to whom the learned counsel so eloquently referred think of us if we had allowed that fact to go without notice?

And then again we have authorities from a court as high as the court of appeals of the State of New York, authorities in England, many authorities, showing that the other point, whether he was in office until and including the 2d day of March, is a most important question. There is an issue also in regard to the proceedings in the House of Representatives before its committee. We allege that that committee had properly entertained jurisdiction of this case before Mr. Belknap resigned, and we affirm that when the House impeached him that impeachment related back to the commencement of the proceedings. The learned counsel on the other side, understanding the force of this position, denies in his rejoinder that that committee had any authority to inquire into these facts. I repeat the defendant denies that that committee had any authority whatever to entertain any proceeding against the defendant. Is not this an important issue? Do not the lawyers in this court, now judges, remember enough of the doctrine of relation to know that when that impeachment was made it related back to the commencement of the proceedings? Therefore, it being affirmed on the other side as a matter of defense that that committee had no jurisdiction whatever, that the House had in no manner authorized it to institute these proceedings, is not that an important fact to bring before this court?

I close, Senators, by saying that this question of jurisdiction cannot be subdivided. It is but a single question, and this court ought to pass upon it but once. I repeat that under the resolution presented by the honorable Senator this court may be called upon to pass on the question of jurisdiction twice. This should not be done. Therefore the managers submit that the order asked for by them should be granted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the proposed order read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office. The motion that testimony be heard touching the exact time of such resignation, and touching the motive and purpose of such resignation, is reserved without prejudice till the question above stated has been considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Do the counsel for the respondent wish to be heard further?

Mr. CARPENTER. No, your honor; we are willing to submit it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if we were in an ordinary court——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator from Ohio that the question is not debatable.

Mr. THURMAN. Is it not debatable on these orders?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish it were.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I move that the Senate withdraw.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate retire for deliberation.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senate will not withdraw, I move to suspend the rules, if it is in order to make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. HAMLIN. It can be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent a rule may be suspended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel obliged to object. I do not think debate is the thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer an amendment to the order proposed by the Senator from New York. I move to strike out the last paragraph of his order in the following words:

The motion that testimony be heard touching the exact time of such resignation and touching the motive and purpose of such resignation is reserved without prejudice till the question above stated has been considered.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material.

So as to read:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Do the managers desire to be heard upon the amendment?

Mr. Manager LORD. I will say on behalf of the managers, Mr. President, that they are satisfied with this amendment offered by Senator EDMUNDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the counsel for the respondent if they desire to be heard?

Mr. CARPENTER. We are satisfied to submit the matter.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the rules be suspended so far as to permit the Senator from Ohio to speak, under the limitation which is upon the body when we retire—ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has objected. The rule cannot be suspended except by unanimous consent. The motion therefore is not in order.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; objection was made to a general suspension of the rule, but I now ask for a suspension of the rule for ten minutes only in order to allow the Senator from Ohio to speak.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope my friend from Maine will not press that motion. I do not want any privilege on this floor that every other Senator does not possess; but I want this question discussed here or elsewhere.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is what I want.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule cannot be suspended without unanimous consent.

Mr. ANTHONY As business has been transacted since the motion to retire was negatived, I renew the motion that the Senate now withdraw for consultation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment having been offered, the Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate retire for deliberation.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now retire.

The Senate, at one o'clock and thirty-three minutes p. m., retired to the conference chamber.

The Senate having been called to order in the conference chamber,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore stated that the question was on the amendment proposed by Mr. EDMUNDS to the resolution submitted by Mr. CONKLING.

Mr. THURMAN moved to amend the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS by adding to the words proposed to be inserted the following:

And whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. CONKLING, as amended,

Mr. THURMAN moved further to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting:

That the Senate will first hear the evidence on the issues of fact relating to the question of jurisdiction, and after hearing the same will fix a time for hearing the argument upon the questions of law and fact relating to such jurisdiction.

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. CONKLING, as amended, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithsanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material, and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following order for consideration.

Ordered, That the hearing proceed on the 4th day of May, 1876; and that three of the managers and three of the counsel for the respondent be heard thereon, as follows: One counsel for the respondent shall open and shall be followed by one manager, and he shall be followed by one counsel for the respondent, who shall be followed by two managers, and one counsel for the respondent shall close the argument; and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

Mr. ANTHONY moved to amend by striking out "4th" and in lieu thereof inserting "15th."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURNSIDE moved to amend by striking out "4th" and in lieu thereof inserting "16th."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE moved to amend by striking out "4th" and in lieu thereof inserting "8th."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Robertson, Sargent, and Saulsbury—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Hamilton, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—32.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Dawes, Dorsey, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Kernan, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, West, Windom, and Wright—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting—

That the hearing proceed on the 4th day of May, 1876, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.; that the opening and close of the argument be given to the respondent; that three counsel and three managers may be heard in such order as may be agreed upon between themselves; and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

After debate,

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution of Mr. EDMUNDS, as amended, was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, the Senate resolved to return to its Chamber.

At four o'clock and forty minutes p. m. the Senate returned to the Senate Chamber, and the President pro tempore took the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Presiding Officer is directed to state to the parties that the Senate have made several orders, which will now be reported by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first order is as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second order will be read.

Ordered, That the hearing proceed on the 4th of May, 1876, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.; that the opening and close of the argument be given to the respondent; that three counsel and three managers may be heard in such order as may be agreed on between themselves; and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate, sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment, adjourn to the 4th of May at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. Manager LORD. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly, I am willing to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I am desired by the managers to say that we should like to be heard on the question of the right to open and close, and also in regard to the number of managers who shall be allowed to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What has been read is an order of the Senate. Does the Senator from Ohio renew his motion that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn to the time named?

Mr. ANTHONY. Is there not any way of reaching what the managers propose?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a motion?

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, on this side of the Chamber we did not hear what was the request of the managers.

Mr. ANTHONY. I asked if there was no way of considering whether the request can be granted.

Mr. CRAGIN. The suggestion of the Senator from Ohio was that he did not hear the request of the managers.

Mr. THURMAN. With respect to time, the order is unlimited. Unlimited time is allowed for the argument, both in the opening and the closing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One of the managers, Mr. LORD, has asked to be heard on the order just read. That was the request of the manager.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would ask the Chair whether there is any objection to hearing the managers now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None. They may be heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The managers can move to set aside the order, just as they could in court, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot suggest to the managers. They can proceed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, had we better not adjourn and meet to-morrow?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; let us end this matter now.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It is almost five o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can end it in fifteen minutes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It would be very unpleasant to interrupt the managers after they begin to speak. We shall hardly get through by a reasonable hour to-day. I move, therefore, that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday at twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are not in legislative session, and the motion cannot be entertained.

Mr. McDONALD. If a motion was made to rescind the order, would that give the managers the opportunity they desire?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that motion is made by a Senator and agreed to by the Senate, the question of the order will be open. It lies with the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The managers can be heard by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated that the managers will be heard.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I make a motion to rescind the order on the points which I have stated, and desire that Mr. HOAR be heard on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the manager that a motion by him to rescind the order of the Senate would not be in order; but the manager is permitted to address the Senate.

Mr. Manager LORD. I was informed by a Senator that the motion would be in order; but I will put it in any shape the President may suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager, Mr. HOAR, has the floor and is entitled to be heard.

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President and Senators, I had not expected that this question would arise at this moment for discussion; but I believe I can make a very compact and brief statement of what we have to submit.

I understand that the rules of proceedings upon impeachment are not governed by the principles or precedents of ordinary criminal courts. The House of Lords or the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment undoubtedly derives great light in the application of the principles of common justice and of law from the sages of the law; but nevertheless impeachment is a proceeding which stands on its own constitutional ground. It is an investigation into the guilt of great public offenders abusing official trusts, by the legislative bodies of the country where that practice prevails. In that investigation, as everywhere else, those legislative bodies are equals. Neither branch of the American Congress stands as a suitor at the bar of the other; neither branch of the British Parliament stands as a suitor at the bar of the other; but the concurrent judgment of the two branches is necessary to an impeachment, just as the concurrent judgment of the two branches is necessary to an act of legislation. In the English Parliament the House of Commons brings to the bar of the Lords every bill which it passes, and requests the assent of the Lords thereto, just as in the English Parliament the House of Commons brings to the bar of the House of Lords the fact that it has ascertained the guilt of a great public offender in the course of its official duty, and asks the judgment of the House of Lords as to his guilt and his punishment.

It is an absolutely settled principle of right that upon all questions which arise in the trial of an impeachment the House of Commons has the right to reply. It is a principle which has existed in England for four hundred years, which, when the term "impeachment" is used in our Constitution in clothing this body with one of its highest functions, was imported as all the other constitutional attendants of an impeachment were imported, except where they are expressly varied by the Constitution itself.

This question arose in the trial of President Johnson, and with the leave of the Senate I will cite that authority and the English authority on which the Senate then based its action. After a discussion of a question of practice which came up, as to the course of proceeding in the trial, the Chief Justice, then presiding in the Senate, after the managers for the House had closed what they had to say, inquired of the counsel for the President respondent whether they desired to reply to what had been said by the managers, and the managers representing the House interposed with this suggestion:

Mr. Manager BINGHAM. Mr. President, with all respect touching the suggestion just made by the presiding officer of the Senate, I beg leave to remind the Senate, and I am instructed to do so by my associate managers, that from time immemorial in proceedings of this kind the right of the Commons in England, and of the Representatives of the people in the United States, to close the debate has not been by any rule settled against them. On the contrary, in Lord Melville's case—

And this, I believe, is the last case of impeachment which has taken place in England—

if I may be allowed and pardoned for making reference to it, the last case, I believe, reported in England, Lord Erskine presiding, when the very question was made which has now been submitted by the presiding officer to the Senate, one of the managers of the House of Commons arose in his place and said that he owed it to the Commons to protest against the immemorial usage being denied to the Commons of England to be heard in reply to whatever might be said on behalf of the accused at the bar of the Peers. In that case the language of the manager, Mr. Giles, was:

"My lords, it was not my intention to trouble your lordships with any observations upon the arguments you have heard; and if I now do so, it is only for the sake of insisting upon and maintaining that right which the Commons contend is their acknowledged and undoubted privilege, the right of being heard after the counsel for the defendant has made his observations in reply. It has been invariably admitted when required." (29 State Trials, page 762, 44-46 George III.)

Lord Erskine "responded the right of the Commons to reply was never doubted or disputed."

Following the suggestion of the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat, I believe that when that utterance was made it had been the continued rule in England for nearly five hundred years.

In this tribunal, in the first case of impeachment that ever was tried before the Senate of the United States under the Constitution, (I refer to the case of Blount,) the Senate will see by a reference to it that although the accused had the affirmative of the issue, although he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, the argument was closed in the case by the manager of the House, Mr. Harper.

In response to that claim, the distinguished and able counsel for the President, who, I need not remind many of the most distinguished members of this body, fought every inch of ground, yielded to the demand; and throughout the President's trial, from that time, the House of Representatives was heard in reply upon every question that arose, whether a question of the admission of evidence, of the proceedings, or the final question, following therein the English precedents for five hundred years and the precedent adopted in the first case of impeachment in the Senate, and acting therein also in accordance with what, so far as I have been able to examine, has been the proceeding in every case of impeachment in a State tribunal in this country.

In addition to these two sources of authority upon this point, I desire for one moment to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the managers undertake here the affirmative of this issue. It is true that the respondent has interposed what he calls a plea to the jurisdiction, and that the jurisdictional question has been raised by making an issue upon that plea; but that is a matter of form and not of substance. If the counsel for the respondent had seen fit to enter a general plea of "not guilty," the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to try and convict would have been involved in the final vote upon that question. To show the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the inquiry is a part of the affimative issue involved in the presentment of articles. So that by the logic of ordinary practice we are brought to the same result as we should be if it were not a question of the prerogative of the House, and the accustomed and well-settled methods of proceeding in impeachment. In the Blount trial, I believe I have stated with sufficient distinctness, the plea being that William Blount was a Senator of the United States and therefore not an impeachable civil officer, and also that he had laid down his office before the proceedings were instituted—upon that issue, which presented simply the question of jurisdiction, the opening and close were with the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn until half past twelve o'clock, afternoon, of the 4th day of May.

Mr. McDONALD. If the Senator will withdraw the motion——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw it.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire, Mr. President, to move to reconsider the vote in regard to the order of proceeding in the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will submit his motion in writing.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator whether his purpose is to enter the motion now and leave it to stand undetermined until the 4th of May, or to have immediate action upon it now? And if it be not out of order, I will assign as a reason for my inquiry that if the motion to reconsider be entered and left to stand, no gentleman who is to engage in the conduct of this proceeding on either side will understand what is incumbent upon him or to be incumbent upon him when the 4th of May arrives. So I suggest to the Senator that he would hardly make the motion to reconsider and leave it standing, thus untying everything that has been done and leaving both sides in doubt.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I submit that the motion of the Senator from Indiana must be to rescind the whole order, not a part of it. The order has been adopted. We cannot reach a part until the whole is placed before the court again.

Mr. CONKLING. This was a separate order. There were two orders.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg pardon; I thought it was all one order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two orders. The Senator from Indiana will submit his motion in writing.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reminds Senators that debate is out of order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not propose to debate; but a motion was made to adjourn to the 4th day of May, and I was going to ask whether it would not be better that the Senator from Vermont should change his motion and move that we adjourn until Monday next at half past twelve?

The motion of Mr. McDONALD being reduced to writing was read by the Chief Clerk, as follows:

Ordered, That the vote by which the order in regard to the order of discussion of the jurisdictional question was adopted be reconsidered.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] I will say that I have made the motion to reconsider; and of course it is with the Senate whether they will consider it now or at a future time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us dispose of it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] just read.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the name of Mr. ALLISON.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I should prefer that the vote would not be taken on this motion at the present moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. WHYTE. Is it in order to make such a motion while the roll-call is going on?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no response to the call.

Mr. WHYTE. The first name was called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But not responded to. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] moves that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion. By unanimous consent, the managers were heard on the question of changing this rule. It seems to me that it would be proper to extend the same courtesy to the counsel for the respondent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not intend to debate; but I rise to a question of order. I think I can move to amend the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin by proposing that we shall adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. HOWE. I will withdraw the motion I submitted just now, for the time being, in order that the question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] may be considered.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that the counsel have the least desire to be heard; but common courtesy, it seems to me, would demand the extending to them of the same privilege that the Senate has extended to the managers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his motion. Do the counsel on the part of the respondent desire to be heard?

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, from the course of the argument of the honorable manager [Mr. HOAR] we are very much in doubt whether we have any concern with this business. It seems to be rather a conference between the two Houses than a proceeding in this trial. We are informed by the honorable manager that we have been tried and convicted in the other end of this Capitol, and that they have simply brought their judgment here for ratification and concurrence; and they are only now investigating the question as to how and in what form the Senate is to concur in the judgment which the House of Representatives has rendered against us. That, of course, is a mere question of practice between the two Houses, which we are understood to have no interest in and no right to interfere with.

On the merits of this motion to rescind, twenty-five years' practice has satisfied me that it is always safe to leave a court to vindicate its own order; and when this court, after full deliberation and consultation in private, has made an order, we assume that that order will be adhered to.

In the next place, whatever may be the precedents in the House of Lords in trying an impeachment, we have the authority of the honorable manager himself who has just taken his seat that they are not binding at all in a trial of impeachment under our Constitution. In the debate which took place in the House (if it can be called a debate where nobody was allowed to speak) as to the ordering of the impeachment, the honorable manager himself stated that the British rules were not applicable, and consequently no aid could be drawn from the trial of Warren Hastings. Now I submit that whatever may have been the rule in the trial of impeachments in England this court should make its own rule, and that should be the rule of right and justice.

I deny, as respectfully as a man may deny anything that comes from a co-ordinate branch of this Congress, that the House appears here in any other attitude than we appear here, a suitor in this cause. Is it possible, where the Constitution says we are to have a trial, and the House of Representatives presents itself here as the accuser, that it is a part of the court; that it is entitled to any favor here that we are not entitled to? The rule uniformly adopted by the courts of law is a rule which the experience of hundreds of years has determined to be wise and proper, and that is the rule which I understand this Senate has ordered for this trial. Is it desired by the honorable managers that the ordinary course of justice should be changed on this trial, that we should be invited to new entertainments, and that we should be borne down here by oppressive precedents in the House of Lords, and especially after the manager himself, with an independence which was all worthy of him, has in his own branch of Congress put aside the authority of the precedents of the House of Lords in impeachment cases?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion submitted by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD.]

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President, I ask leave to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager asks to be heard. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. Manager HOAR. I desire to say, Mr. President, that the learned counsel has imitated one of his associates in strangely misunderstanding and misapplying some observations which he attributes to me. I do not, however, propose to be drawn into a discussion of what took place in the House of Representatives. The proposition which I made and to which he has undertaken to reply was that the House of Representatives brings to the Senate a charge the truth of which it has ascertained in the course of its public legislative duty. Undoubtedly it has the burden of maintaining that charge and of proving every fact which is involved in it; and undoubtedly the defendant has the full right to every constitutional or legal principle or presumption of innocence which exists anywhere. But the burden and the duty is on us of proving that charge according to the precedents of this Senate and of all senates, according to the precedents of the House of Lords in England sitting as a court of impeachment, and not according to the precedents of police courts or inferior courts of any other kind sitting anywhere. And the precedents of this Senate and of all senates sitting as a court of impeachment have adopted the rule practiced upon in the English House of Lords, from which impeachments come, for five hundred years, that on all questions the party instituting the proceeding and having the burden of proof throughout the whole issue has the right to reply. That is the proposition, and to that proposition no answer whatever has been vouchsafed or suggested by the honorable counsel for the defendant.

The further proposition, to which no reply has been suggested, was that in this particular on this special issue now made up, the precedent of this Senate and of all senates sitting as a court of impeachment, precisely corresponds and agrees with the precedents of all courts whatever, that where a plea to the jurisdiction is interposed and to that plea a demurrer is filed, which—leaving out now this second matter of fact—is the question here, the party demurring has the affirmative and the reply in support of his demurrer.

So that, taking the first issue presented here, the two modes of determing what is the proper course concur and coincide, and if the issue of fact tendered by the House of Representatives affecting the jurisdictional question be to any extent considered by the Senate, it is also clear that upon that issue of fact the party tendering that would be entitled in any court of equity or law to the right to begin and the right to reply.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, may I request the Chair to ask the manager to point out to the Senate the demurrer of the House of Representatives to the plea?

Mr. Manager HOAR. I will. It is the first replication:

> The House of Representatives of the United States, prosecuting, on behalf of themselves and the people of the United States, the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against said William W. Belknap, reply to the plea of said William W. Belknap, and say that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William W. Belknap from answering the said articles of impeachment.

And then they merely re-affirm a fact which had been affirmed in the original articles, that he was before that time Secretary of War, which is not a matter denied in the original plea; so that this first proposition is nothing but a demurrer to the plea, though it is called a replication.

I was saying, therefore, that if the second issue of fact be considered by the honorable Senate in any degree the party having the affirmative of that issue of fact is entitled to the right to begin and the right to reply. So, then, the learned counsel for the respondent asks the Senate to overthrow the uniform course of practice in England, and the course of practice settled by itself in the first case in this country, where four of the most distinguished lawyers of the land were employed on the one side and on the other, and admitted and conceded in the trial of the President, as many gentlemen whom I see here very well know.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I now renew my motion that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, adjourn until twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I renew my amendment to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state his amendment to the motion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the court now sitting adjourn until Monday at half past twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves, as an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the time fixed shall be Monday, instead of to-morrow, at half past twelve o'clock. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the Senate sitting in trial adjourn until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion submitted by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOWE. If it is not too late, I think I shall ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to adjourn. I do not think it is the purpose of the Senate to drive us to a vote on the motion of the Senator from Indiana at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks for the yeas and nays on the question. Unless there is objection, the Chair will inquire if there is a second to the demand.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cooper, Dawes, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Windom—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Maxey, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—31.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bruce, Clayton, Cockrell, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Kernan, Logan, Morton, Sharon, Stevenson, Wadleigh, West, and Wright—18.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now move that the Senate sitting as a court adjourn till Monday at twelve and a half o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has refused to agree to that motion already.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. This is a new motion, if the Chair please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate refused the motion of the Senator prior to the yea and nay vote just taken.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The question was divided. Mine was an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And it was rejected by the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think I have a right now to make a new motion that the Senate sitting as a court adjourn until Monday at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will modify his motion so as to fix the time five minutes later, it will be in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Then I will make it five minutes after that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.

MONDAY, May 1, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having announced the arrival of the time to which the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment had adjourned,

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Blair and Mr. Carpenter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now ready to receive the managers and the House, provision being made for their accommodation.

The Sergeant-at-Arms announced the presence of the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives; and they (with the exception of Mr. MCMAHON, who was absent) were conducted to the seats provided for them.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate of Friday, April 28, sitting for the trial of the impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is ready to proceed with the trial. The pending motion will be reported, proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] upon which the yeas and nays will be taken.

The Secretary read the order of Mr. MCDONALD, modified from the form in which it was originally submitted, to read as follows:

> Ordered, That the vote by which it was ordered that the respondent be entitled to conclude the argument upon the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to entertain the articles of impeachment against the respondent be reconsidered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I feel bound, after what has taken place in the argument, to move that the Senate withdraw for consultation.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, before the motion is put, I should like to be heard for a few moments by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President and Senators, when this question was mooted at the last session of this court, I had not been able to give any attention scarcely to the subject, and was therefore wholly unprepared to make any remarks whatever upon it. Since that adjournment, however, I have looked into the matter with such opportunity as the time afforded me would enable me to do, and upon examination of some of the precedents, which I think will be more authoritative than those stated by the managers, I hope that the Senate will not recede from the order it has taken in this matter.

The first to which I will call the attention of the Senate is the case of Barnard, with which the managers have shown their familiarity, having referred to it in connection with this plea in abatement. Throughout that case the rule which obtains in courts of justice was adhered to, that counsel who maintained the affirmative of the issue had the opening and reply upon such issue. I would also say—and I am making my remarks very brief—in regard to the affirmative of the issue that this is substantially a demurrer to the articles, because every lawyer knows that in a proceeding like this the articles themselves must allege all the facts necessary to give the jurisdiction in the case alleged and proved. This court of impeachment is a court of limited jurisdiction under the Constitution, and in every court of that character the facts upon which the jurisdiction rests must appear on the complaint by which the case is initiated and inviting the action of the court.

Now, every party demurring has the opening and closing, and the argument which is addressed to the court on the other side, that, as they have the affirmative of the general issue, therefore they ought to be heard in opening and replying upon all the questions arising in the progress of the case, would with equal propriety give the plaintiff in every other court the reply on all such questions, whether applied to a question of law or a question of fact. But that is not the rule. In this case we demur, and thus say that, assuming all the facts alleged to be true, the House of Representatives has no case. That is an affirmative proposition that no impeachment can be maintained on the facts charged, and therefore we are entitled to the opening and conclusion of the argument.

It is altogether a mistake, also, that this proceeding was ever otherwise considered here or in England as standing upon any different footing in its general principles than any other proceedings at law. Woodeson, in his lecture on the subject of impeachment, (volume 2, page 596,) treats it as a suit. His language is that "the House of Commons, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice." Wilson in his Parliamentary Law speaks of the articles as analogous to an indictment, and hence the rules of practice ought to conform to those of the courts in analogous circumstances, and if they vary from them in England, it does not follow a practice there which does not conform to the general principles recognized here. We have greatly restricted the impeachment proceeding; it is not the proceeding here as there in many of its essential features.

This is all I think it necessary to say in support of the judgment of the Senate establishing the rule of proceeding under consideration. I premise the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, upon whose motion it was made I believe, has made himself familiar with this subject. I hope I may be allowed to say in conclusion, that as American lawyers are not very familiar with this proceeding of impeachment, for it is very unusual in this country, if the Senate does retire to consider this matter, it will take into consideration the question of giving us a little more time; and I am sure our brethren, the managers, will not oppose it on further consideration. We do not ask it for the purpose of making any display. We want to investigate this subject, so as to save the time of the Senate in presenting it briefly and in an orderly manner; and we can save the time of the Senate, its valuable time at this season of the session, if we are allowed some time to read and digest our reading before discussing this very important constitutional question to be considered.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the managers being heard? The Chair hears none.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, on the question of time referred to last by the counsel who has addressed the court, the managers have already said all that they desire to say, and simply announce that we adhere to positions formerly taken.

On the question of the opening and closing of the argument, the managers desire to be further heard through Mr. HOAR, and I will say now, so that I need not rise again, that the managers also desire that four of their number may be allowed to argue the questions now before the court. It will be seen by the orders of this court that there are five principal questions presented—I need not now refer to them—four of them by the pleadings and the fifth by the order of the court, to wit, whether the matters contained in the second replication of the House of Representatives ought not to have been presented in the original articles. These five questions being before us, the managers suggest that four of their number should be allowed to argue them.

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President and Senators, I desire to say a few sentences only in reply to what has fallen from the learned counsel for the respondent and I desire to state exactly what is the fundamental proposition on which we rest the claim which we presented to the Senate on Friday. It is this, that a court of impeachment, a parliamentary process for the investigation of the guilt of great public offenders, has had from time immemorial, both in this country and England, its own rules of evidence, its own rules of pleading, and its own methods of practice, settled by immemorial usage and adopted by our Constitution when it used the word "impeachment" as one of the powers with which the Senate is clothed. Those rules of evidence, practice, and pleading are not the rules which obtain in the courts of the common law, but are other and different rules.

Do not let me be misunderstood or misrepresented when I make this statement. The rules of pleading and of evidence and of practice, which are based upon common right and which secure to a defendant a fair and impartial trial and protection against oppression, the presumption of innocence, all rules of substance, apply here. This court sits to apply in all its proceedings the rules of common justice and of common right, and is the highest court in the country authorized to apply those rules to this class of offenders. But it applies these rules by its own methods. If in any respect a rule of procedure existing in the court of impeachment is less favorable to a defendant at its bar than the process in a criminal court in an analogous case, Senators will remember the immense constitutional equivalent which is given him. He is entitled, for his judges and for his jurors both, to have impaneled seventy-four Senators of the United States, selected by the various States which make up this Republic as the first men in character, in capacity, in knowledge of the Constitution that those various communities present; and he cannot be convicted unless by a two-thirds judgment of the court so made up. In this he finds an equivalent for every possible inconvenience which the application of the rules which prevail in a court of impeachment may cause him.

I speak at this moment only from memory, but I do not understand that the learned counsel correctly states the only American precedent to which he has referred—the case of Barnard. In Barnard's case a plea was interposed to the jurisdiction, in substance the same plea which is interposed here, applying to several of the articles. That plea was argued by itself, and upon that argument the counsel for the State had the opening and the close. In regard to the English precedent, I beg leave respectfully to refer honorable Senators to a report of which Mr. Burke is the author from a committee appointed by the House of Commons to inspect the journals of the Lords with a view of ascertaining the occasion of the great delay which had happened in the trial of Warren Hastings. This inspection and report were made in the seventh year of that trial. Mr. Burke makes in this report a most ample and thorough discussion of the entire procedure in cases of impeachment in Parliament. He begins by considering the matter of pleadings and the matter of evidence and other matters of procedure, and states in the fullest manner the principle upon which the claim of the managers rested. I do not mean to say that he states anything in regard to this particular question of the opening and close. The report is silent upon that particular subject, but he states the doctrine. He begins by saying:

> Your committee finds that the Lords, in matter of appeal or impeachment in Parliament, are not of right obliged to proceed according to the course or rules of the Roman civil law, or by those of the law or usage of any of the inferior courts in Westminster Hall; but by the law and usage of Parliament.

Then he cites various precedents from the earliest times, and finds that always the court proceed according to the law and usage of Parliament. Then he cites Lord Coke:

> As every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction, some by the common law, some by the civil and canon law, some by peculiar laws and customs, &c., so the high court of Parliament, suis propriis legibus et consuetudinibus subsistit. It is by the lex et consuetudo parliamenti that all weighty matters in any parliament moved, concerning the peers of the realm, or Commons in Parliament assembled, ought to be determined, adjudged, and discussed by the course of the Parliament, and not by the civil law, nor yet by the common laws of this realm used in more inferior courts.
> This is the reason that judges ought not to give any opinion of a matter of Parliament, because it is not to be decided by the common laws, but secundum legem et consuetudinem parliamenti; and so the judges in divers Parliaments have confessed.

Then he goes on under the "rule of pleading:"

> Your committee do not find that any rules of pleading as observed in the inferior courts have ever obtained in the proceedings of the high court of Parliament in a cause or matter in which the whole procedure has been within their original jurisdiction. Nor does your committee find that any demurrer or exception, as of false or erroneous pleading, hath been ever admitted to any impeachment in Parliament, as not coming within the form of the pleading; and, although a reservation or protest is made bythe defendant—matter of form, as we conceive—"to the generality, uncertainty, and insufficiency of the articles of impeachment," yet no objections have in fact been ever made in any part of the record.

I do not think it is worth while to detain the Senate with reading very full and copious extracts from this report. I will take the liberty of placing the book where it will be reached by Senators when they discuss this question.

Let me say again that it is not claimed that in any particular the rules of pleading, of evidence, or of practice, which as matter of common right and of common justice are essential to giving the defendant a fair trial, to requiring of his accusers the fullest proof and giving him the entire benefit of the presumptions of innocence, do not obtain in this high court; but the law and custom of Parliament have been adopted with the adoption of impeachment itself, and one of the well-settled methods of practice against which no authority has been cited is that in all matters the House of Commons or the House of Representatives have the right of reply.

The learned counsel has called attention in the second place to the character and form of these pleadings upon the first issue which is made up; and with the leave of the Senate I desire to explain precisely how that stands. The House of Representatives, in the first instance, allege in the original articles:

ART. 3. That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876.

Now, if the Senate will be good enough to observe the plea which was put in by the honorable counsel, it is this:

That this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment exhibited and presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, because he says that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap, by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States.

In that replication there is an ambiguity. If the respondent had said that at the time of the presentment of the articles of impeachment he was not a civil officer it would have presented the naked question of jurisdiction without ambiguity or difficulty, and the House would have demurred; but he inserts the word "before." That may have one of two meanings. It may amount to an allegation that he was never, before the original articles of impeachment were presented, a civil officer of the United States. I do not say that that astute purpose was in the mind of the counsel who drew the pleading. If we had demurred simply, if we had made a simple demurrer, the respondent might then have come before the Senate and argued that he had responded to the articles that he never was a civil officer of the United States at any time before they were presented, and we should have been left to a discussion upon the verbiage of the article and to the danger of being excluded from court by a blunder in not giving the proper construction to the defendant's language. Accordingly we set up no new matter but we simply re-assign, in regard to the fact which is left doubtful on the expression of the defendant's plea, what we said in our original articles; in other words, we say, "We mean to say that you were a civil officer of the United States until the 2d of March; and therefore, that being the meaning of our original article, your plea presents no legal or proper response." It is a case therefore of a re-assignment or a re-affirmation of a fact originally set forth in a mode in which the meaning of the original allegation cannot be questioned, and saying that therefore, that fact being considered, the plea of the respondent shows no answer in law. Thus we have presented to the Senate in substance an issue made here in this way: a statement of the original articles that the defendant was a civil officer of the United States down to the 2d day of March, reaffirmed in the replication; a statement by the defendant that before these articles were presented he had ceased to be such civil officer; and a statement on the part of the House of Representatives that that last allegation is no defense to the charge; in other words, a simple demurrer to what is pleaded and well pleaded in the original article; and on such demurrer by the invariable rule of courts both of law and equity the party sustaining the demurrer has the affirmative.

Upon the larger question (setting aside now the pleadings and taking the substance of the issue upon the question of jurisdiction) the plaintiff always has the affirmative. If the respondent had contented himself with introducing a naked plea of "not guilty," he could have availed himself of his objection to the jurisdiction upon that plea, and it would have required the judgment of the court to be given against him or in his favor, without setting up the fact at all, because the original articles do not allege that at the time of the presenting of the articles he was a civil officer of the United States.

And it may be proper to say one further word in conclusion. I understand, in accordance, as was suggested in the very significant question put I think by the honorable Senator from New York, that the true rule of pleading in impeachment cases is this: The House of Representatives present articles setting up the substance of the transaction on which they rely, not in the form of an indictment or of a bill in equity or of a civil declaration certain to a certain intent in general, but setting forth the substance of a transaction. It is not necessary to give dates. You may say "on or about the time." It is not necessary to give legal results or intendments. Then the defendant comes in and in his answer either denies the whole matter if there was no such transaction as is set up, or if there was a transaction of the kind but an innocent and not a guilty one, with certain different and other circumstances, he tells the story as he alleges it to be, setting up at the same time all special suggestions of law or of defense of fact on which he relies; and the pleadings are made up in that way by a joinder of issue. I do not think it is in the power of parties by pleadings of fact such as take place in ordinary courts of law to compel the Senate to determine, except in its discretion, several issues of fact in succession. Suppose an issue of fact were made up on this question of jurisdiction, is the Senate to be compelled to lay aside its legislative business and determine that, and then the defendant answer over, perhaps setting up some other matter strictly in bar, and have that determined, and so the Senate put to a trial of half a dozen successive issues of fact? I respectfully submit that that is not the rule, but that the proper method of pleading is the one which I have first stated.

Undoubtedly it would have been very proper that the matter set up in this second replication should have been set up in the original articles; but it is also well settled in matters of impeachment that the House of Representatives has in its discretion the right at any time to file additional articles if it see fit. It is also true that this new matter set up in the second replication has been pleaded to without objection on the part of the defendant; that it is before the Senate as an allegation in the cause presented by the authority of the House; and whether it should or should not have been originally inserted in the articles becomes now of no consequence.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like under the rule, through the Chair, to make an inquiry of the manager now on the floor. I would like to have read from Blount's case, if that was the case to which the manager referred, or from the case of Chase, if that was the case to which he referred on Friday, the passage in the report in which it appears that the Senate held the affirmative to be with the managers, regardless of the nature of the issue, regardless of the question whether they were the propounding party in respect of that particular issue or not.

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to express my gratitude to the honorable Senator for putting that question, because it reminds me of what I had meant to say if I was called upon to address the Senate again this morning.

Blount's case was the case to which I referred. In the haste of replying to the learned counsel I used the phrase, "the rule settled by itself for the Senate in the first case which came before them." In point of fact, it appears upon the report that the order of proceeding was settled by the four distinguished counsellors who took part in it by an agreement, and there is no vote or other express action of the Senate to be found; and it was my purpose, on the suggestion of one of my honored associates, to have made that explanation to the Senate at this time, but it passed from my mind. But Blount's case seems to me to be a very significant and important authority, for it is not credible that those four lawyers, four as able lawyers as the bar of the United States afforded at that time, Mr. Jared Ingersoll, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Harper, and Mr. Dallas, would have conceded so important an advantage to the managers on the part of the House of Representatives without any equivalent, unless they had understood the practice to be so.

Mr. CONKLING. That was a demurrer by the House, though.

Mr. Manager HOAR. That was a demurrer by the House to a plea on the question of jurisdiction, so that the Senate, and the Senate without any objection, allowed the practice as settled by the counsel among themselves to be adopted and acted on. It is not, however, strictly accurate to say that the Senate settled the practice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask (through the Chair) the manager whether the House in the Blount case, being the demurring party, were not entitled on ordinary judicial principles and practice to go forward without relying upon their privilege?

Mr. Manager HOAR. Undoubtedly. Our replication is a copy of the Blount replication.

Mr. McDONALD. I was about to ask if the replication is not a copy of what is termed the demurrer in that case?

Mr. Manager HOAR. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the manager to read the replication in the Blount case and the replication in this case.

Mr. Manager HOAR. I have not here the Blount case.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can furnish the managers with the case if they desire it. [Sending a book to the managers.]

Mr. LOGAN. Before the manager reads that, I desire to ask a question merely to have him give his comments in reference to it. The replication on the part of the House to the first plea of the respondent is claimed by the managers to be a demurrer. Then there is a demurrer by the respondent, and the managers follow with their joinder in demurrer to the demurrer of the respondent. I ask whether by that joinder in demurrer to the respondent they do not waive that which they claim to be their demurrer in the replication to the first plea of the respondent? I should like to hear the manager on that point.

Mr. Manager HOAR. I am not sure that I correctly apprehend the force of the question of the honorable Senator from Illinois; but if I do, with all due respect, I can express my opinion by saying that it refers rather to what the successive steps in the pleading are labeled by the parties, than to what they really amount to. The substance of this issue is this: The House of Representatives say the defendant did certain acts as Secretary of War, and remained Secretary of War until the 2d day of March. The defendant replies, "I was not Secretary of War when you presented your articles, or before," leaving it ambiguous whether he means never before, or that there was a time before when he did not hold the office. In order not to be entangled by that ambiguity, the House of Representatives say, "We mean to assert, as we said before, that you were Secretary of War down to the 2d day of March; and the fact that you have gone out since (which is the only fact, as we understand the pleadings, now newly set up by you) is not a sufficient answer to our original article."

Mr. LOGAN. The question I asked, though, if I can make myself understood, is merely this, boiled down to a point, whether the managers, by joining in demurrer to the demurrer of the respondent to the replication of the managers, do not then make the issue on that demurrer, and waive what they claim as a demurrer on their part to the plea of the respondent?

Mr. Manager HOAR. I do not so understand. I understand that the question which the Senate ought to determine is this—this is the substance of the whole thing: Is the fact newly affirmed, and first affirmed by this respondent, to wit, the fact that he had ceased to be Secretary of War when these articles were presented, a sufficient answer to the charge? You cannot escape that simple proposition. That is what you have got to try: Is the fact newly set up by the defendant, that he had ceased to be Secretary of War when these articles were presented, a sufficient answer to this charge? He sets that up and the House of Representatives say that is no sufficient answer; and that is a demurrer in substance and in fact; and on the question whether a fact so set up by my antagonist newly, for the first time in the case, is a sufficient answer to what I have said, I am always entitled to the opening and close.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. Manager HOAR. I desire the honorable Senator to remember that I have been quite led away from the previous request of the honorable Senator from New York.

Mr. MAXEY. I should be glad to call the manager's attention to one point. The plea in response to the articles of impeachment declares that before and at the time of the beginning of the proceedings for impeachment—that is in substance what it is—the respondent was not an officer of the United States. The managers in their reply to that, in their first replication, neither affirm nor deny that fact, but they go on to say that that plea is not good and sufficient in law, because they say that at the time of the commission of the offenses as set forth in the articles of impeachment he was such officer. That is the substance of that. Now it is claimed by the managers that that is in substance a general demurrer to the defendant's plea. Various other pleadings go on. The defendant then comes in and demurs to that first subdivision of the House's replication. To that demurrer of the defendant the managers or the House put in a similiter, join in demurrer. Now, I am like my friend from Illinois; I wish to understand if the effect of that in law would not be, by joining in the defendant's demurrer, to waive the House's demurrer? I should be glad to hear what they have to say on that point, if that is not the effect of the pleading, if joinder in the defendant's demurrer is not a waiving and abandonment of the first demurrer.

Mr. Manager HOAR. I should be constrained, I think, to answer by saying that I do not think that would be good practice, and a court of law would order those pleadings to be reformed and the matter to stop at the first demurrer and everything else to be stricken out. But at any rate——

Mr. MAXEY. I will state in addition, Mr. President, that so far as concerns the demurrer, which is joined, of the defendant, that demurrer does contain an offer to verify, which is unusual also in a demurrer, I think. Still having joined in that, I ask whether that joinder does not waive the demurrer of the managers?

Mr. Manager HOAR. I do not so understand.

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SARGENT. Rule 18 provides:

If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order—except a motion to adjourn—it shall be reduced to writing and put by the presiding officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair formerly ruled that debate was out of order; but he does not consider the manager a witness in the case. Senators asked unanimous consent to put questions to the manager to draw out information on the subject which he is discussing, and by unanimous consent the Chair allowed it.

Mr. SARGENT. I can see that if we indulge in questioning counsel on the respective sides at any length a great deal of time will be consumed, and perhaps the result will be much more unsatisfactory than even if we allowed general debate. I think I shall feel called upon hereafter to insist that it be not allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator objects, the Chair will rule it out of order.

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President and Senators, I have simply one thing to say in conclusion, and that merely a summing up of what has been already said. The substance of this whole matter, stripped of its form, is an affirmation by the party presenting articles of impeachment to the Senate that the Senate has the jurisdiction, and on that matter the House always has the affirmative and the right to reply. No plea was necessary of any kind to raise it. It is involved in the final determination of the issue.

In the next place, upon the pleadings as they stand the affirmative of the issue made up still rests upon the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I sent a question in writing to the Chair which I ask that the Chair may have read to the managers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont proposes a question which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Will the managers read the replication in Blount's case?

Mr. Manager HOAR. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask the Secretary to read it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the replication called for.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, in their own behalf and also in the name of the people of the United States, to the plea of William Blount to the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States to try the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate against the said William Blount:

The House of Representatives of the United States, prosecuting, on behalf of themselves and the people of the United States, the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against the said William Blount, reply to the plea of the said William Blount, and say that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William Blount from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that by the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives had power to prefer the said articles of impeachment and that the Senate have full and the sole power to try the same. Wherefore they demand that the plea aforesaid of the said William Blount be not allowed, but that the said William Blount be compelled to answer the said articles of impeachment.

Mr. McDONALD. I would ask that the plea to the jurisdiction, to which the replication of the House was filed, be also read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES vs. WILLIAM BLOUNT. } Upon impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 24, 1798.

The aforesaid William Blount, saving and reserving to himself all exceptions to the imperfections and uncertainty of the articles of impeachment, by Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas, his attorneys, comes and defends the force and injury, and says that he, to the said articles of impeachment preferred against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, ought not to be compelled to answer, because he says that the eighth article of certain amendments of the Constitution of the United States, having been ratified by nine States, after the same was, in a constitutional manner, proposed to the consideration of the several States in the Union, is of equal obligation with the original Constitution and now forms a part thereof, and that by the same article it is declared and provided that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

That proceedings by impeachment are provided and permitted by the Constitution of the United States only on charges of bribery, treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors alleged to have been committed by the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States, in the execution of their offices held under the United States, as appears by the fourth section of the second article and by the seventh clause of the third section of the first article and other articles and clauses contained in the Constitution of the United States.

That, although true it is that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to, yet that he, the said William, is not now a Senator, and is not nor was at the several periods so as aforesaid referred to an officer of the United States; nor is he, the said William, in and by the said articles charged with having committed any crime or misdemeanor in the execution of any civil office held under the United States, or with any malconduct in civil office or abuse of any public trust in the execution thereof.

That the courts of common law of a criminal jurisdiction of the States wherein the offenses in the said articles recited are said to have been committed, as well as those of the United States, are competent to the cognizance, prosecution, and punishment of the said crimes and misdemeanors, if the same have been perpetrated, as is suggested and charged by the said articles, which, however, he utterly denies. All which the said William is ready to verify and prays judgment whether this high court will have further cognizance of this suit and of the said impeachment, and whether he, the said William, to the said articles of impeachment, so as aforesaid preferred by the House of Representatives of the United States, ought to be compelled to answer.

JARED INGERSOLL.
A. J. DALLAS.

Mr. Manager HOAR. I now ask the Secretary to read, as was requested by the Senator from New York, the first plea in the present case.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to submit a question in writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager has desired to have a plea read before any other business is transacted. It will be first read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA vs. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. }

The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, in their own behalf and also in the name of the people of the United States, to the plea of William W. Belknap to the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate against the said William W. Belknap.

The House of Representatives of the United States, prosecuting, on behalf of themselves and the people of the United States, the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against said William W. Belknap, reply to the plea of said William W. Belknap, and say that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William W. Belknap from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that at the time all the acts charged in said articles of impeachment were done and committed, and thence continuously done to the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, the said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as in said articles of impeachment averred, and therefore that, by the Constitution of the United States, the House of Representatives had power to prefer the articles of impeachment and the Senate have full and the sole power to try the same. Wherefore they demand that the plea aforesaid of the said William W. Belknap be not allowed, but that the said William W. Belknap be required to answer the said articles of impeachment.

Mr. Manager HOAR. It will be seen that the only allegation of fact there is a statement that the fact is as the original articles averred.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I now ask that my question be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan proposes a question which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

1. If, as the managers contend, the first reply to the plea is a re-assignment of matters of fact, can it be at the same time a demurrer?
2. Is it claimed that the second replication is also a demurrer?
3. Are not the commencement and conclusion or prayer of the second replication the same as in the first?

Mr. Manager HOAR. I do not understand, Mr. President and Senators, that the second replication is also a demurrer. I do understand that where a plea is ambiguous and the reply contains a re-assignment of a matter of fact affirmed in the original charge it can be at the same time a demurrer. I answer, therefore, the first proposition of the honorable Senator very confidently in the affirmative.

In regard to the commencement and conclusion or prayer of the second replication being or not the same as the first, I cannot, without a little examination, answer. The honorable Senator can answer it for himself; but I do not understand that this is a question of prayer, or of conclusion, or of labels, or of formalities. It is a question of what is the substance of the issue, no matter what is put on the back of the paper or foot of a paper which makes up the issue. The substance of this issue is that the House of Representatives now have upon them the burden of satisfying the Senate that it has jurisdiction over this offense and that the matters of fact alleged by the defendant in opposition to that jurisdiction are immaterial. That is the substance of a demurrer, and entitles us, as matter of substance, to the reply.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the counsel proceeds I ask leave to submit one other question to the manager.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The inquiry of the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Is there any allegation in the articles that Mr. Belknap was Secretary of War down to the 2d day of March, 1876?

Mr. Manager HOAR. That would require a discussion of the question whether the meaning of the phrase "down to a day" and the meaning of the phrase "until a day" is the same. The honorable Senator from Vermont can answer as well as I can. The third article alleges that the "said William W. Belknap continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876," and the fifth article alleges that "from the 10th day of October, in the year 1870, * * * continuously to the 2d day of March, 1876," he held the office.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I shall have to ask the manager to speak a little louder. We cannot hear him on this side.

Mr. Manager HOAR. The honorable Senator from Vermont inquired whether there was any allegation in the original articles that the defendant held the office of Secretary of War down to the 2d day of March, 1876, which is the allegation of the replication set forth in the articles, to which I reply that one article alleges that he held the office until the day, and another that he held it from a certain date continuously to that day; and unless there be some distinction, which I cannot understand, between those expressions and the word "until" they do so allege.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the managers and also to the counsel of the defendant an inquiry in regard to another branch of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Will it meet the convenience of the managers and the counsel for the defendant to be allowed on each side a limited number of hours for the argument on the question made as to the jurisdiction of the Senate, such time to be apportioned among the counsel as each side may desire? If so, what number of hours do they desire as the limit?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Have the counsel anything to say?

Mr. BLAIR. I will state for the counsel for the defendant that we could not answer that question without consultation with our absent colleague, [Mr. Black.]

Mr. Manager LORD. We are in the same condition, Mr. President, in that regard. We shall have to confer with the other counsel before we can answer the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Do the gentlemen counsel desire to be heard upon the motion?

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, before proceeding to speak on this question, I wish to know whether I correctly understood the honorable manager who last addressed the Senate to say, that the presumption that the defendant is innocent, which is recognized in every criminal court of the land, is not to be applied in this case?

Several SENATORS. O, no!

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President, I am very unfortunate in the choice of language to make my meaning clear to the learned counsel on the other side, as I have experienced once or twice before.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the manager will pardon me, it is not his misfortune in using language but our misfortune that we were too far away to hear what he said.

Mr. Manager HOAR. I thought I had said very distinctly that in my judgment everything of substance which secured a full and fair trial would be given to the defendant here, was his due according to the practice of the courts of impeachment, and that this included the operation of the presumption of innocence which ever attends him as a matter of common justice and common right.

Mr. CARPENTER. I desire, Mr. President, to return my thanks to the honorable manager and through him to the House of Representatives for that concession. My colleague and myself, unable to hear the honorable manager, understood him to say exactly the reverse. We thought it could not be possible, but to be certain about it I put the question to him.

Mr. President, so far as regards the argument of the question of jurisdiction in this case, it is entirely indifferent to me which side shall be permitted to open and close the argument. In summing up complicated questions of fact before a jury, this might be an important privilege; but, in arguing questions of law before this court, I do not regard it as of the slightest consequence.

But we all know how precedents imperceptibly become law. A course pursued on this trial without objection, may be cited in the next impeachment trial as settling a question which may be very important then, although wholly immaterial now. So that lawyers who appear here in the defense of particular cases owe not only a duty to their clients, but also a solemn duty to justice whose ministers they are, and to the forty millions of people now sought to be subjected to the criminal jurisdiction of this tribunal.

In Blount's trial the House of Representatives had interposed the first demurrer, and therefore the managers were entitled to open and close the argument. In the report of that case, 2 Annals of Congress, page 2248, it is said:

Mr. Bayard, the chairman, having communicated with Mr. Ingersoll, the leading counsel for the defendant, it was agreed between them that the managers should proceed in the argument first on the part of the prosecution, and that the right to reply should belong to the managers.

That is, the managers and the counsel for the defendant, being good lawyers, were agreed that the managers were entitled to open and close the argument upon the demurrer interposed by them. Such is the rule in all courts of justice. And yet the honorable manager [Mr. HOAR] refers to this understanding between counsel as to the rights of the managers, in that case, to show that the managers, in all cases, are entitled to open and close the argument upon a demurrer interposed by the defendant; which would be exactly the reverse of the rule in courts of law.

Indeed, the broad proposition is maintained by the honorable manager, that in the argument of every question to arise in this case, upon every motion made by either side, and upon every demurrer, no matter by which side interposed, the managers are entitled to the opening and close. And I understood him to contend at your last sitting that this was conceded by the eminent counsel who defended the impeachment against President Johnson, when the question was first raised by Mr. Manager Bingham; and that the court, and counsel on both sides, thereafter proceeded on that hypothesis.

But an examination of the report of that trial shows that the honorable manager was under a total misapprehension. I read from page 77 of the first volume of the congressional edition of that trial:

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. Manager BINGHAM rose at the same time.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. Manager BINGHAM. On the part of the managers I beg to respond to what has just been said.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to call the attention of the President to the rules that govern the body.

Mr. Manager BINGHAM. I will only say that we have used but thirty-five of the minutes of the time allowed us under the rule.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chair announced at the last sitting that he would not undertake to restrict counsel as to number—

They had been restricted as to time—without the further order of the Senate, the rule not being very intelligible to him. He will state further that when counsel make a motion to the court, the counsel who makes the motion has invariably the right to close the argument upon it.

Several SENATORS. Certainly.

Mr. Bingham, however, wished to be heard, and by unanimous consent was heard, just as this body, unquestionably by unanimous consent would hear any manager on this honorable board, who might ask such indulgence. So Mr. Bingham was heard. It is true that in his remarks he set up this unwarrantable claim, which has been repeated by his successor, that the House of Representatives had the right to close every argument whether they had the affirmative of the particular issue or not; but the silence with which the Senate listened leads me to infer that they were perfectly satisfied with the ruling of the Chief Justice, made before Mr. Bingham took the floor, and never recalled, and which was supported by "several Senators" answering from their places "certainly." No vote was taken on the question. It was an interlocutory question. I believe, a motion by the defendant for additional time to answer.

The Chief Justice ruled emphatically, that whichever party made a motion, the counsel who made it had invariably the right to close the argument upon it, and several Senators responded "certainly." And nothing occurred to show that the remarks of Mr. Bingham affected the opinion of the Chief Justice or of the Senators who responded in approval. Certainly the ruling was not changed.

It is certain that neither of the cases relied upon by the honorable manager give the slightest countenance to his proposition; and it is difficult to see upon what reasoning it can rest.

The manager concedes that the general principles of law and maxims of justice are to be respected in this trial; and that charity—the crowning excellence of our holy religion—charity that thinketh no evil, and is embodied in the law in the maxim that every one is presumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty, is to rule in the conduct of this trial.

There is no question as to what is the rule in the courts of law. There it is well settled that the party demurring has the right to open and close the argument. The rules of pleading and proceeding in the ordinary courts of justice, no less than the great canons of the common law, have resulted from centuries of practical experience in the administration of justice, and have been approved by the sages of the law as the best methods to elicit truth and administer justice. If these rules are wisely devised to insure these ends, why should they be departed from in this trial? Is there other motive here than to ascertain the truth and do justice? One of two things is clear; those rules should be observed here, or abolished there. It is impossible to maintain that one system of procedure will secure justice in one tribunal and produce injustice in another. And the question is whether the methods which have been established, and from time to time improved, in the courts of law, which are in almost continuous session and dealing with endless variety of causes, are less reliable than rules which might be adopted in a court like this which sits only occasionally after long intervals, and where the personnel of the court is likely to be wholly changed between one trial and another.

But I understand the honorable manager to rest his claim upon the prerogative of the House of Representatives. In his conception this is not the trial of a cause, but a great political and legislative proceeding, in which the House and the Senate are on terms of perfect equality; the managers representing the majesty of the House, with as much right to declare what shall be the ruling of this court, as this court itself. Prerogative has been the watchword of tyranny for centuries. Whenever the Tudors or the Stuarts determined to take any illegal or arbitrary proceeding, it was always justified as part of the prerogatives of the Crown.

I understand that, in every debate between a man and woman, the woman is entitled to the last word. But I was not prepared to hear the honorable managers claim a privilege which gallantry only concedes to the weaker sex.

This is a trial upon accusation of crime; a trial secured by the Constitution. What is a trial? It is a proceeding before a competent forum, where two opposing parties contend for judgment; two parties standing as to rights and privileges upon a footing of absolute equality. Here the House of Representatives is the prosecutor. It has chosen several lawyers to manage its side of the case; and the respondent has chosen three to manage his defense. And it is essential to the right conduct of any trial that the court should look impartially upon the respective parties and their counsel. What preference is to be accorded to the managers over the counsel for the defense? Is an argument coming from them to have greater weight than an argument of equal strength presented by the defense? It is true that at each opening of this court the managers come heralded by proclamation, and are conducted to their seats by the Sergeant-at-Arms. This is not necessary in our case, for we can easily remember from day to day where our seats are. But after the managers have reached their seats in safety, their derivative majesty vanishes, and they are then mere lawyers.

To show that this is the real character of this trial, let me read from Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies. Section 2535 says:

> It has already been stated, that Parliament exercises a judicial power, for the trial and punishment of offenders, in certain cases, by means of bills of attainder and of pains and penalties. In proceedings of this description each house participates as a legislative body, and the concurrence of both is necessary. The person, against whom the bill is directed, is tried, so far as any trial takes place, first by the one house and then by the other, and if the bill passes is found guilty by both. There is also another form of proceeding, in which one house, the Commons, appears solely in the character of complainants or accusers, and the other, the Lords, performs the functions of a judicial tribunal. A prosecution of this character is known by the name of impeachment. * * *
> 2548. The House of Commons prosecutes an impeachment by the agency of managers previously appointed for the purpose from among their own members. The managers exercise the ordinary functions of counsel, and open the case, and examine witnesses to sustain the charges in the same manner as on the trial of an indictment.
> When the case has been concluded on the part of the prosecution, the managers for the Commons are answered by the counsel for the accused, who also call and examine witnesses for the defense, if they think proper, according to the usual course of criminal proceedings. When the case for the defense is closed, the managers have the right to reply. The House of Commons proceeds to the place of trial, and there attends, in a body, each day, during the trial, as a committee of the whole, and returns to its house in the same manner. In the performance of their several duties, both the managers for the Commons and the counsel for the accused are subject to the direction and supervision of the court and are bound to conform to the rules of proceeding which are observed in other judicial tribunals. The managers for the Commons are bound to confine themselves to the charges contained in the articles of impeachment.

Reference is here made, in a note, to the trial of Warren Hastings. Burke, in one of his philippics, uttered language importing charges of crime not mentioned in the articles of impeachment. Hastings, by petition, informed the Commons, and inquired whether they intended making such accusation against him. The Commons made the matter a special order for a subsequent day, when it was fully considered. They summoned the stenographer to bring his notes of Mr. Burke's speech, that they might know precisely what he had said. The offensive words were placed upon the journal, and a resolution was adopted, declaring that Burke had no authority from the Commons to utter such language against Warren Hastings. A resolution was then offered, thanking Burke and his associate managers for the zeal and ability with which, in general, they had prosecuted the impeachment. This was rejected; showing that the Commons regarded it as a grave offense on the part of Mr. Burke to go outside of the articles to accuse the defendant. (44 Commons Journal, page 320.)

This illustrates how carefully the rights of Englishmen are protected in all judicial proceedings.

Now let me briefly state the condition of the pleadings in this case.

To the articles of impeachment the respondent interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, averring that, when the House ordered the impeachment, and when the articles were exhibited, he was not an officer of the United States, but was a private citizen, &c.

It is contended by some that a citizen holding one office may be removed by impeachment for prior misdemeanors in another office. If this be sound, then the plea to the jurisdiction set up new matter, that is, that he was not in any office. Some of the articles of impeachment did not show that he was out of office as Secretary of War, and none of them averred that he was a private citizen. To this plea the House of Representatives replied double; first, that he was Secretary of War, when the acts complained of were done, and continued in such office "down to the 2d day of March, 1876;" second, that he was in such office "until and including the 2d day of March, 1876," and until the House, by its committee, had completed an investigation, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. This is a replication.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly, and so they call it.

To the first replication the respondent interposed a demurrer; found on page 8 of printed proceedings. And the managers filed a joinder in demurrer; found on page 9.

The honorable manager [Mr. HOAR] now claims that the first replication was a demurrer. An inspection will show that it was not. It does not object to the plea as insufficient in matter of law, but because of certain facts therein set forth. We demurred to this replication, and they joined in demurrer.

If all the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment are regarded as immaterial, then the substance of the matter is, we have demurred to the articles. And a demurrer to the articles is an affirmative assertion that, conceding the truth of the matters therein contained, they are insufficient in law; and upon this proposition we hold the affirmative.

Senators, I have not detained you thus long because the particular question, who shall open and close the argument upon the matter of jurisdiction, is of any importance to the respondent in this case. It is important, however, that every step in this proceeding should be taken with anxious circumspection. What you do here will be followed in other cases. And if you shall finally decide that impeachment lies against others than officers of the United States; decide that, when a citizen has once held a Federal office, he remains subject to impeachment by an opposite administration, for conduct not previously defined as crime; without limitation as to time, assert a jurisdiction from which the grave alone can give immunity; and hold that, when brought here for trial, the law fixing his offense is to be declared for the first time, by the judges before whom he is on final trial; and add to this the further doctrine, now contended for, that the trial is to be conducted without regard to forms and usages familiar to the people; we, as counsel for this respondent, wish to have it appear of record that principles so dangerous to liberty were not established with our silent acquiescence, but against our solemn protest.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to propound a question to the managers which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Do the managers claim to reply in the discussion of all questions, as a matter of right, or only on the ground of practice, which the court may in its sound discretion rightfully change?

Mr. Manager HOAR. I respectfully reply to that question that we do not concede that whatever be the constitutional and lawful prerogatives of the House of Representatives in this regard can be rightfully changed without the assent of the House itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate withdraw.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate retire for consultation.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 40, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Wright—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Conover, Dawes, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Logan, Maxey, Mitchell, Paddock, Sargent, Spencer, West, Windom, and Withers—18.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bogy, Bruce, Clayton, Cockrell, Cragin, Dorsey, English, Hitchcock, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Ransom, Sharon, and Wallace—13

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at two o'clock and twenty-one minutes p. m.) retired to the conference chamber.

On the question to agree to the motion of Mr. MCDONALD,

After debate,

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Withers—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Christiancy, Conkling, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Eaton, English, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Randolph, Sharon, Sherman, and West—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, it was Ordered, That four managers on the part of the House of Representatives may be allowed to submit arguments upon the question whether the respondent is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office, and whether the issues of the fact presented in the pleadings are material, and also whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the Senate returned to its Chamber.

At two o'clock and fifty-three minutes p. m. the Senate returned to the Senate Chamber and the President pro tempore took the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presiding officer is directed to state that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the order of argument was made is overruled, and also to state that an order is made granting the request of the managers on the part of the House that four of the managers be permitted to argue the case.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment adjourn until Thursday next at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap adjourned until Thursday next at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

THURSDAY, May 4, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having announced the arrival of the time to which the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment had adjourned,

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Blair, Mr. Black, and Mr. Carpenter.

The managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that there is a Senator present who has not been sworn. The Secretary will call the names of absentees who have not been sworn.

The Chief Clerk called the names of the Senators who had not been heretofore sworn; and the President pro tempore administered the oath to Senator JOHNSTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will give the usual notice to the House of Representatives. The minutes of the trial-day of Monday last will now be read.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap of Monday, May 1, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to proceed with the trial. The Secretary will report the two orders made by the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

Ordered, That the hearing proceed on the 4th of May, 1876, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.; that the opening and close of the argument be given to the respondent; that three counsel and four managers may be heard in such order as may be agreed on between themselves; and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen of counsel will now proceed with the opening of the argument.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, in the present attitude of affairs, I wish to suggest to the court, (and I believe I shall not be opposed in the request by the managers,) that if an adjournment of the Senate is to take place for a week, which adjournment will certainly come in the middle of the argument—for it is impossible to conclude it in the remainder of this week and nobody expects that that can be done—I presume it will be more convenient for the counsel on both sides, and I should suppose for the court also, to let the argument come after that adjournment. That would give us a little additional time for preparation which on the part of the defendant we really need. We had all been so much occupied with other engagements that until Monday I believe none of us had sat down to a preparation for the argument of this question. Its importance both to this case and to the public, if it is to stand as a ruling upon a great constitutional question, certainly demands that we should give it a more thorough preparation than we have been able to do in two or three days. Now, as there seems to be a probability at least that the Senate will adjourn, I submit to the court the propriety of our commencing the argument after the Senate resumes its session.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, we prefer of course to go on with this argument if we can have a consecutive hearing from day to day; but the case is somewhat different if the argument is to be broken into by the adjournment of the Senate—and I confess it looks very much as though it would—because from my experience here on Saturdays and Mondays I do not think very much would be done on those days in the presence of the great celebration to which reference has been made. And therefore, on behalf of the managers, I say that unless it is certain that this court can sit from day to day until the arguments are all in, the managers prefer that there should be an adjournment.

Mr. CARPENTER. I ask for an order, Mr. President, to that effect that the further trial of the case be postponed to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the counsel reduce his motion to writing?

The motion was reduced to writing, and read by the Secretary, as follows:

Ordered, That the further trial of this cause be postponed until Monday, the 15th of May.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I submit an order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order submitted by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That this court adjourn until Monday, May 15, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., and that the argument of the question of jurisdiction be confined to eight hours on each side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SARGENT. Is an amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to strike out the words of limitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California will reduce his amendment to writing.

The amendment was reduced to writing and read, as follows:

Strike out these words: "and that the argument of the question of jurisdiction be confined to eight hours on each side."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on this amendment to the order proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the order of the Senator from Ohio as amended.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the order as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That this court adjourn until Monday, May 15, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Burnside, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, and Windom—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Dawes, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—40.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bayard, Cragin, English, Gordon, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, and West—11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate declines to make the proposed order. Senators, the counsel on the part of the respondent submit for your decision a motion which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the further trial of this cause be postponed until Monday, the 15th of May.

Mr. THURMAN. After the amendments made to the former order that was offered, it was left precisely what this is. It is precisely the same proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in the same language.

Mr. THURMAN. It is the same in substance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One adjourns the trial and the other postpones the trial.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President and Senators, I am requested by the counsel on both sides, by the managers and the counsel for the accused, to say that if this continuance be granted we will accept the limitation all around, and I think that will bring the argument to a conclusion about as soon as it would come if a part of it were commenced now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will then renew the motion as I originally submitted it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order, the Senate having declined to so order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can change it by a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain any motion that is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will make the time nine hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the order as now proposed.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That this court adjourn until Monday, May 15, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.; and that the argument of the question of jurisdiction be confined to nine hours on each side, to be divided between them as the managers and counsel may agree.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senate, as I find that I was not entirely understood by all the managers, that if we could be certain of a consecutive hearing at this time the managers would prefer it; but, not being certain of that, we authorized, in part at least, Mr. Black to make the suggestion he has made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion proposed by the Senator from Ohio as just read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Thurman, Whyte, and Windom—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Wadleigh, Wallace, Withers, and Wright—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cragin, Dorsey, English, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, and West—12.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please give attention.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President and Senators, the first question before the court is whether a private citizen is subject to impeachment, either without regard to the time or manner of his leaving office or when he may have resigned to avoid impeachment upon an assurance from the chairman of the prosecuting committee that he was in such case not to be prosecuted. The second question is whether all the allegations of fact which are necessary to maintain jurisdiction must be alleged in the articles, or whether they may be supplied in subsequent pleadings.

These are the two questions which I understand are now to be discussed.

Upon the first question I do not know how the managers are to maintain the jurisdiction of this court upon any other principle than that which was asserted in the Blount case, which was that "all persons are liable to impeachment" (Annals of Congress of 1797, volume 2, page 2251,) because, as was alleged there, all persons are liable in England, the country from which we borrow the proceeding, and to whose laws and usages we must therefore look for the extent of its application. But as the court on that occasion overruled this doctrine, and the decision has been acquiesced in for seventy-eight years, the managers ought not now to expect this court to overrule it. In that case it was pleaded "that although the defendant was a Senator at the several periods in said articles of impeachment referred to, yet he is not now a Senator or officer of the United States." And the court held this plea to be sufficient upon demurrer. This decision is as conclusive against the proposition maintained by the managers in this case as it was against that of the managers in Blount's case. The fact that the defense rested in that case chiefly upon the ground that the defendant was not a Senator at the date of the several acts charged, a civil officer, does not make it less conclusive upon the point that impeachments lie only against civil officers, because the effect of the decision is to declare that the fourth section of the second article defines the persons against whom it may be brought, and that section limits it to officers.

The question thus adjudicated is not an open question, it having been decided that any person may not be impeached whether in or out of office, and hence we must look to the words of the Constitution to ascertain who may be impeached. It is only those persons who are specially described in the Constitution are subject to be impeached.

And if the court will consider the reasons upon which it acted in that instance it will be found that they are fully as applicable here. The proposition now maintained by the managers is repugnant to the policy of the English government; it is against the fundamental doctrines upon which our own Government was founded, and it is against the letter of the Constitution. All the best writers and the accepted authorities who speak of this proceeding in England say that its appropriate sphere is against great offenders, possessing the power of the government, whom it is necessary to bring to bay by the organized power of the people in their House of Commons.

Impeachment as a mode of enforcing penal law stands on a different footing than the trial by jury, which is dear to the hearts of the English-speaking race, while the history of impeachment associates it with the terrors of bills of attainder, a kindred proceeding. It is an invasion upon Magna Charta, which provides that no man shall be condemned save by the lawful judgment of his peers or according to the law of the land, and it was introduced into English practice long subsequent to the adoption of Magna Charta and is said to have been the growth of necessity to bring to justice great offenders who had the power of the government in their hands. Blackstone, in the fourth volume of his Commentaries, (by Chitty,) page 260, says:

The high court of Parliament; which is the supreme court in the kingdom, not only for the making, but also for the execution of laws; by the trial of great and enormous offenders, whether lords or commoners, in the method of parliamentary impeachment. As for acts of Parliament to attaint particular persons of treason or felony, or to inflict pains and penalties, beyond or contrary to the common law, to serve a special purpose, I speak not of them; being to all intents and purposes new laws, made pro re nata, and by no means an execution of such as are already in being. But an impeachment before the Lords by the Commons of Great Britain, in Parliament, is a prosecution of the already known and established law and has been frequently put in practice; being a presentment to the most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction by the most solemn grand inquest of the whole kingdom. A commoner cannot, however, be impeached before the Lords for any capital offense, but only for high misdemeanors; a peer may be impeached for any crime. And they usually (in case of an impeachment of a peer for treason) address the Crown to appoint a lord high steward for the greater dignity and regularity of their proceedings; which high steward was formerly elected by the peers themselves, though he was generally commissioned by the king; but it hath of late years been strenuously maintained, that the appointment of an high steward in such cases is not indispensably necessary, but that the house may proceed without one. The articles of impeachment are a kind of bills of indictment, found by the House of Commons and afterward tried by the Lords; who are in cases of misdemeanors considered not only as their own peers, but as the peers of the whole nation. This is a custom derived to us from the constitution of the ancient Germans, who in their great councils sometimes tried capital accusations relating to the public: "licet apud consilium accusare quoque et discrimen capitis intendere." And it has a peculiar propriety in the English constitution; which has much improved upon the ancient model imported hither from the continent.

Now mark:

For, though in general the union of the legislative and judicial powers ought to be more carefully avoided, yet it may happen that a subject, instructed with the administration of public affairs, may infringe the rights of the people, and be guilty of such crimes as the ordinary magistrate either dares not or cannot punish.

To the same effect the court will find the doctrine laid down by Wooddeson in his lecture upon parliamentary impeachment. In the edition in my hand, the law library edition, the marginal page is 335:

It is certain—

that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the injury or ruin of the community, and at the same time in offenses not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents, and the nature of such offenses, may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court, and the wisdom of the sagest assembly. The Commons, therefore, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice; and they cannot, consistently either with their own dignity or with safety to the accused, sue to any other court but that of those who share with them in the legislature.

The author, after having explained thus the origin and nature and proper subjects of impeachment, goes on in the most pregnant language to show how the proceeding has been abused to the oppression of persons who had not the power which alone made it proper to have them arraigned in such a tribunal, and how it has been abused to the oppression of private and innocent persons, to the ruin of their private fortune. In a note to this edition he says at marginal pages 369–370:

It deserves consideration, whether the expenses of defendants in impeachments should not be the subject of legislative provision; otherwise, it is in the power of the prevailing party to crush any obnoxious individual by a mere accusation. For the last century and a half private persons impeached by the Commons have either sunk under the unequal struggle with the guardians of the public purse or have been only preserved by large fortunes from absolute ruin.

Now I ask this court do any of the considerations so forcibly put by these well-recognized writers on the English law apply to this defendant or to other persons in private station? Is there anything in his circumstances which makes it necessary that any offense which he may have committed should be tried in this august tribunal, with all attendant expenses, which, while absolutely ruinous, will yet be insufficient to enable him to cope with the overwhelming power brought to bear against him? Is he or any other private man in a condition to combat such a power on such a forum? Do any of the circumstances so forcibly laid down by these authors as the only justification for the violation of Magna Charta exist here? You have before you a citizen without any of the attributes of power which alone, according to the standard authors I have read, make such a proceeding proper under the English law. I therefore say that the proceeding is contrary to the true spirit of the English constitution. Having no written constitution, it is to their best writers we must turn to know what it is, and we find by those authors that according to English law, as it ought to be accepted and not as it has been abused, no private man can be subjected to such an ordeal.

There are great historic scenes in which impeachment has formed the background for the most illustrious characters. When Stafford, backed by royal authority, then held in awe by the people as divine, having trampled upon Ireland, had returned to England to become the king's chief counsel in all his arbitrary measures, it needed the organized power in the Commons and the courage of John Pym to bring this proud and powerful nobleman to justice. The ordinary tribunals were at his command, and no man in England would have dared to accuse him before them. But when the great machinery of the House of Representatives is turned upon a mere private citizen in this country, it is application of a great power to an unworthy purpose, and it is as derogatory to the dignity of the people as it is unjust to the rights of the citizen.

If such a proceeding would be violative of the English constitution as expounded by its accredited commentators, a fortiori is it an infraction of the fundamental principles of ours. These governments, which, having much in common, use a common, popular language and the same legal terms in the structure of their institutions, differ widely in their general character. The diverse theories upon which they are founded make practical divergences inevitable. In one the theory is that all power is derived from the king—the people have no rights except those granted by royal charter. Here the Government has no powers save those contained in its charter from the people. It is a government of limited powers; and, although terms are used in its charter which, like our mother tongue, have been borrowed from the mother-country, yet they are carefully limited in their use in the grants made to the Government. It results from this general principle that, as the United States had no judicial power before the framing of its present Constitution, it has none now not specifically granted in the Constitution. All judicial power, civil and criminal, was formerly held by the States, and such judicial power as this Government now exercises is derived by express grant in the Constitution itself; and it has been said by the courts again and again (beginning with the case of The United States vs. Worrall, 2 Dallas, 384, succeeded by The United States vs. Burr and The United States vs. Hudson and Goodwin, in 7 Cranch, 32, and the 1st of Kent, 331) that the courts of the United States have no common-law jurisdiction in criminal cases; and this is equally true of this as of other courts of the United States. The Supreme Court, in 7 Cranch, says:

> The courts of the United States can be vested with no power but what the power ceded to the General Government will authorize them to grant.

And the court says in the conclusion of its opinion:

> Certain implied powers must result to our courts of justice from the nature of these institutions, but jurisdiction of crimes against the state is not one of them.

Nor has jurisdiction ever been assumed by these courts in civil cases even, outside of the classes enumerated in the Constitution. This settles the principle upon which impeachment must be exercised. It is strictly confined to the cases expressly enumerated in the Constitution, as much so as any other court established by the Federal Constitution.

And this brings me to the consideration of what are the cases enumerated by this Constitution as within the power of impeachment. There is no other enumeration except what is contained in the fourth section of the second article, as follows:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The enumerated cases of persons, therefore, against whom this court can entertain articles of impeachment are, "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States;" not persons who have been President, Vice-President, or civil officers, but only persons who can be at the time truly described as President, Vice-President, or as civil officers, and who can "be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of treason," &c. "If there must be a judgment of removal," says Story, "it would seem to follow that the party was still in office;" but it is not necessary to rely upon this inference, plain and necessary as it is, because the only persons specified as subject to impeachment are officers, and it would be equally plain that only officers were amenable to impeachment if nothing was said in the section about removal and it were simply "that the President, Vice-President and all civil officers, shall be subject to impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery," &c, because it is only by these descriptions as officers that they are made subject to impeachment. Hence, the only question before the court is whether the term "officer" can be applied to a person not at the time in the holding of an office.

And this has been the accepted construction. From the day when Blount was tried until now no attempt has been made to impeach a private citizen, and that not because there have not been plenty of proper subjects for impeachment if the law had authorized the proceeding against ex-officers. Within a few years past it is notorious that a number of officers who were under investigation and who were threatened with impeachment resigned to avoid it, and the proceedings against them were abandoned. Several judges were among the number, all whose names I do not now recall, and it is not necessary to do so, because the Senate knows to whom I refer, who resigned their places and thereby arrested the proceedings. So in New York, where the high court of impeachment is composed of the judges of the court of appeals and the senate, and the provisions of whose constitution, if not in identical words with those of the national Constitution, are substantially the same, an impeachment was dismissed against Judge Cardozo, within a few years, on the presentation of his resignation. The judiciary committee of the house of representatives of that State, composed of persons who will, I understand, be recognized by some of the managers as among the ablest lawyers of that State, reported against the power of impeachment of any person not actually in office. The language of the resolution in Fuller's case (the case referred to) is:

> That no person can be impeached who was not at the time of the commission of the alleged offense and at the time of the impeachment holding some office under the laws of the State.

This resolution and the accompanying report form part of the report of the trial of George G. Barnard, page 158.

I have examined all the constitutions of all the States with reference to the provisions therein contained on the subject of impeachment. With two exceptions, they correspond in substance with the national Constitution; and I have not learned that any impeachments against ex-officers have taken place under those constitutions.

Such a proceeding was not considered legal by the court of impeachment in New York, one of the great States, and whose judicial and legal talent will be recognized as among the foremost in this country. I am unable to state whether a different construction has been given to this provision in the other States; but I have not heard of any case where any party has been prosecuted in any of those States where the language of their constitutions is similar to that here under consideration. There is a noticeable difference, however, in the constitutions of two of the States, the States of Vermont and Georgia, from the Constitution of the United States with regard to impeachment, and I beg leave to call the attention of the court to it.

In that of Georgia, by the eleventh article and fourth section, it is provided that—

> The house of representatives has power to impeach all persons who have been or may be in office.

This provision is contained in the first constitution of Georgia, which was nearly contemporaneously formed with that of the United States.

By the Vermont constitution of 1793, part 2, section 24, it is provided that—

> Every officer is liable to be impeached, either when in office or after his resignation or removal, for maladministration.

This language, occurring in constitutions adopted nearly contemporaneously with the Constitution of the United States, shows that the language under consideration was not deemed sufficient to embrace persons who had been in office, and that in order to reach them it was deemed necessary to use other language.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to propound a question to the counsel, which I send to the Chair in writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of the Senator from California will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Was the resolution referred to by counsel for respondent in Barnard's case adopted?

Mr. BLAIR. It was adopted, I understand, by the house of representatives; and the prosecution against Fuller was abandoned, as it certainly was in Cardozo's case, wherein an impeachment like Barnard's, which had been found and was actually pending before the senate, was dismissed by the senate when his resignation was presented.

I wish to add, as matter of contemporaneous construction also, the language of Luther Martin, who, it is known to the Senate, was a distinguished member of the convention which formed our Constitution, and one of the ablest lawyers in our country. The language was used in the defense of Judge Chase, who was in office, and therefore the construction which he gave was not necessary to his client. He said, after quoting this language of the Constitution:

> This clearly evinces that no persons but those who hold offices were liable to impeachment.

That language will be found in the Annals of Congress for 1805, page 431.

I have examined every reference to the subject of impeachment found in Madison's reports of the debate of the convention, and I have an abstract of the book so far as it bears upon the subject. There was considerable controversy in the convention as to the tribunal before which impeachments should be prosecuted, whether before the Senate or before the Supreme Court, or whether before a court composed of judges from the States. A variety of propositions of that kind were made. There were several plans for a constitution introduced, all save Patterson's having provisions for the impeachment of the national officers or the Chief Executive. A series of resolutions, which embodied provisions to the effect "that the Executive shall be removable on impeachment and conviction for malpractice or neglect of duty," was reported by the committee of the whole house on the 20th of July, 1787. On that occasion Messrs. Pinckney and Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out that part of the resolution in relation to the Executive, and upon that motion considerable debate occurred, which I will not trouble the Senate with reading, but will state the general purport.

Messrs. Pinckney and Morris opposed impeachment altogether, upon the ground that with the short terms proposed it was unnecessary; and that if impeachment was prosecuted, unless the Executive was not suspended from office pending it, the malpractice and misgovernment would go on; and if he was suspended, the effect would be the same as if he was convicted. The effect would be to put the Executive too much in the power of Congress.

Mr. Madison, Colonel Mason, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Davie, and other leading men in the convention insisted that impeachment was necessary for the protection of the public interests. The debate proceeded throughout upon the assumption that impeachment would be directed against no others than persons then actually holding executive power. There was no provision in the plan of Pinckney or in the plan of Paterson, of New Jersey, which were referred to the committee of detail with the series of resolutions on which this debate occurred, providing for any judgment of disqualification; the convention had not that subject before them; it was not a subject for their discussion or consideration. But it was assumed on all sides in the debate referred to that none but officers would be amenable to impeachment. The committee on detail, to whom these resolutions were referred, with the plans of Pinckney and Paterson, when they came to report on the 6th of August, added the article as an article providing for the punishment of the accused which now stands in the Constitution, disqualified him from holding office upon impeachment and conviction. In no part of the debate, from the beginning to end, was that a subject of discussion. And it has in fact no relation to the subject, which was simply whether the Executive should be removed by impeachment. It is but an addition to the judgment, which might or might not be added if impeachment should take place.

The case of Blount, to which I have adverted, determined that the disqualification clause did not enlarge the category of persons subject to impeachment. If the power given to adjudge disqualification could have that effect, the effect would be to subject anybody to impeachment, and the jurisdiction would be unlimited, which, as before said, the case of Blount and the whole philosophy of the Government negatives.

I call the attention of the Senate to extracts from Judge Story's Commentaries. In volume 1, section 803, Story says:

It would seem to follow that the Senate on the conviction were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice, and it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the State against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity.

At section 790 he says:

From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers—

That is the point I have been considering—of the United States, including the President and Vice-President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that kingdom all the King's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament, though it is asserted that commoners cannot now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution in Parliament. There seems a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeaching power to persons holding office. In such a government all the citizens are equal and ought to have the same security of a trial by jury for all crimes and offenses laid to their charge when not holding any official character.

Mr. CONKLING. From what do you read?

Mr. BLAIR. Story's Commentaries on the Constitution. Judge Story further says:

To subject them to impeachment would not only be extremely oppressive and expensive, but would endanger their lives and liberties by exposing them against their wills to persecution for their conduct in exercising their political rights and privileges. Dear as the trial by jury justly is in civil cases, its value as a protection against the resentment and violence of rulers and factions in criminal prosecutions makes it inestimable. It is there, and there only, that a citizen in the sympathy, the impartiality, the intelligence, and incorruptible integrity of his fellows impaneled to try the accusation may indulge a well-founded confidence to sustain and cheer him If he should choose to accept office, he would voluntarily incur all the additional responsibility growing out of it. If impeached for his conduct while in office, he could not justly complain, since he was placed in that predicament by his own choice; and in accepting office he submitted to all the consequences. Indeed, the moment it was decided that the judgment upon impeachment should be limited to removal and disqualification from office, it followed as a natural result that it ought not to reach any but officers of the United States. It seems to have been the original object of the friends of the National Government to confine it to these limits; for in the original resolutions proposed to the convention and in all the subsequent proceedings the power was expressly limited to national officers.

I call the attention of this court to this carefully weighed language of the most authoritative commentator upon our Constitution. I have already called attention to the proceedings in the convention upon which he comments, showing plainly that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated the prosecution of anybody not at the moment holding office. All the reasons upon which the proceeding was supposed to be necessary were applicable only to a man who wielded at the moment the power of the Government, when only it was necessary to put in motion the great power of the people, as organized in the House of Representatives, to bring him to justice. It is a shocking abuse of power to direct so overwhelming a force against a private man. It may be deemed by some of small moment, because it can only effect his disfranchisement. But the effect is to dishonor him, and it is simply tyranny to put this man's honor in peril by the application of that overwhelming force. The great authors of England, as well as the great commentator on our Constitution mentioned, ought only to be brought into action to arrest the wrong-doing of another power in the Government. The arena of impeachment is in fact a place in which a controversy takes place between the high powers of the Government. The only theory upon which it can be justified is to enable the people, massed and organized in their representative houses, to assail their oppressors, armed with the power of the Executive and the patronage and prestige which that gives them. Do you seek to prostitute that power to the oppression of a private individual, wasting his means by an action that, as this author says, has invariably ruined every private man who has been the subject of it in Great Britain. Is this a time, is this a country, is this a place, which would tolerate such an abuse? If this be the case, who would be safe that ever held an office? The great officers of this Government, the heads of Departments, are obliged to exercise their powers in a large degree by subordinates. If there is no limitation upon impeachment to persons holding office when a political adversary is installed in power, he may assail any man whom it may be thought necessary to assail for party or personal cause. We know, and it is one of the saddest commentaries upon poor human nature, that the subservient sycophant who basks in the smile of power is ever ready to prostrate himself before any other power which may succeed, and is ever ready to desert and betray the unsuccessful.

How eager are many who were obsequious enough to the defendant within the year now to rush forward to aid in his destruction! How they press forward to make their peace with his enemies now installed in office! How easy it would be for experts in the great Departments to suppress part of the truth and discolor what may be preserved, so as to pervert an honorable act to the destruction of men who may have held positions in them. If this court is to be opened to the persecution and prosecution of private men, and party passion and personal hate are to be invited to set themselves here upon private men because they may have been obnoxious officers, we have not yet passed by the days of tyranny. Man's nature has not changed. It is only by the limitations of constitutions and powers that a limit and a check can be put upon his malignant passions. If this Senate can be tempted to break down in moments like this the wise limitations which our great fathers put upon this sort of prosecution, they will have found an easy way to the oppression of the innocent by the hand of power.

From the remarks to which I have called the attention of the Senate it will be seen that a large body of the ablest men who sat in this convention were opposed to impeachment altogether, seeing in it a machinery of oppression. What did they suggest as a means and a sufficient means to meet the evil of abuse and corruption in office? Short terms of office, in order to let the people pass upon these supposed delinquents. That was the theory of Gouverneur Morris, Charles Pinckney, and many other able men in the convention which formed the Constitution. Their hand is seen in the provisions which limit this prosecution to persons in office. It was intended to permit those who were not willing to stand the brunt of party excitement for the moment to retire and wait for more auspicious seasons to vindicate themselves before the people.

When Andrew Johnson was being pursued here and when articles were found against him it was not for any crime; it was because he honestly adhered to the law and the Constitution as delivered by the fathers of the Government.

Suppose that he had chosen to retire and appeal to the people against the Senate and say, "I am adhering to the Constitution and my habitual enemies are seeking to overthrow it, and desire to sacrifice me because I oppose them;" could the Senate have gone on and disqualified him from holding office and thus taken away his power of appeal to the people, and thus have frustrated the design of the framers of the Constitution that a man might retire when faction triumphed and appeal to the patriotism of the people. The views of constitutional power which he then adhered to are believed to be sound by a great portion of the people, (and yet they were regarded as sufficient to justify his impeachment by almost the requisite number of Senators to convict and disqualify him.) I think it a fair construction of the Constitution that he might have resigned pending the impeachment, and thus have escaped liability to it, and been in a condition to make an appeal to the people, which Pinckney and Morris believed to be the safer tribunal, and hence the form of language adopted, and which admits of this action as not inadvertently adopted. The gap was purposely left open. We are not arguing now anything except in reply to what is asserted here as a reasoning.

It is argued that if a resignation should be permitted under such circumstances the people would be defrauded out of their rights to have the offender disqualified. The argument is that as the party ought to escape, the law does not prevent it. But this does not follow. It might be the common case of a casus omissus. But I contend that it is not a casus omissus, and point to the debates to show that it was never contemplated that any but persons holding office should be impeached, and also to show that, so far from being a fraud upon the jurisdiction of the Senate to resign pending an impeachment, those debates show that an influential part of the convention was opposed to impeachment altogether, and thought the better way was an appeal to the people by the accused party; and it is, therefore, consistent with the views of all sides in the convention that a way of escape by resignation should be left to an accused officer in order to enable him to have his day when a more auspicious period for a fair and just judgment could be had upon his case, while effecting the only object contemplated, namely, the removal of the officer. No evil or abuse can result from the resignation. It is a purely imaginary ill which can arise from withholding the hand that would disfranchise a citizen and disable him from vindicating himself in a calmer moment.

As Judge Story says, from beginning to end of the debates on the Constitution there was no proposition considered but one of removal, and when the resolutions reported by the committee of the whole and the plans of Pinckney and Patterson, neither of which contained any provision for disqualification, were on 20th of July sent to the committee of detail, and that committee reported the disqualifying clause as the judgment to be rendered, they did not intend to disregard the known will of all sides of the house and report a provision inconsistent with their declared wishes. The committee of detail knew that the convention did not contemplate any one not actually in office. Hence the disqualifying clause was not intended to give any such power. That was the limitation which the whole debate shows was in the mind of every member of the convention. Hence you are not now asked to contravene the ideas of the framers of the Constitution in dismissing this proceeding.

I pass now to the second branch of the question presented by the order of the Senate, and that is on the materiality of the allegations of the second replication and of our rejoinder. We did not regard the replication as tendering a material issue, and for that reason we might, and perhaps ought to have, demurred; but having, as we believed, a conclusive answer to it in the rejoinder which we made, we chose that course, preferring that in this maneuvering for position—that is all it amounts to—our friends on the other side should not have the advantage of us.

It needs no argument to show that if only persons holding office are amenable to impeachment it must be charged in the articles that they hold office; and describing the defendant as "late Secretary of War" does not bring him within the description of persons given in the Constitution as amenable to impeachment. It would not be sufficient for them to have alleged that "the defendant does not now hold office, but was an officer at one time, and resigned in order to avoid impeachment." That would not have been sufficient certainly, for, if so, an ordinary court of justice might entertain jurisdiction of a person who had not been served with process upon an allegation that the defendant, hearing that it was intended to serve process upon him, had incontinently taken himself out of the jurisdiction of the court. There is no imaginable difference between the cases. We heard that they intended to impeach us, and, as the Constitution limited the prosecution to persons in office, we stepped over the line, just as a citizen of the United States who happens to be in New York, and learns that somebody there wants to serve him with a writ, betakes himself to New Jersey.

A man has a right to avoid law-suits. The defendant here had a right, however innocent he might have been, to avoid the ruin which the law-books tell him attend invariably the prosecution of a private person by this overwhelming power. No sensible man, unless he had ample means, would undertake a conflict of that sort if he could avoid it and character enough to stand before the country to justify his action. But the Supreme Court of the United States have settled again and again an analogous question, that a man residing in one State may convey his property to persons outside of it to give a court jurisdiction, provided he does it in good faith. That principle was decided in the case of McDonald vs. Smalley, 1 Peters, 120; also Smith vs. Kernochen, 7 Howard, 198; Jones vs. Lee, 18 Howard, 76; Briggs vs. French, 2 Sumner, 252.

The court also holds in those cases that a man may change his residence from a State in order to assert his title to property within that State in the Federal courts against persons holding it adversely, provided he changes his residence in good faith. Does anybody doubt that we resigned in good faith? Does anybody suppose or suspect that the defendant's was a colorable resignation; that he is to be restored to office when this prosecution ceases? Certainly not. And therefore the case corresponds entirely in principle to the decision I have cited. If jurisdiction may be obtained by the voluntary act of a party done in good faith, no reason can be suggested why a jurisdiction may not be avoided by a voluntary act done also in good faith. We were inclined to demur to the original pleading, and the original pleading is defective in the point that I have already brought to the attention of the court in not describing this defendant as one subject to impeachment, and in describing him in fact as a person who is not subject to impeachment, because it says that he was "late Secretary of War."

On the third question which is presented for consideration by the order of the Senate I think little need be said. They cannot amend their articles by a new assignment in a replication. Nobody ever heard of an amendment of an indictment; and I may add that the court in the case of Barnard held that articles of impeachment were not amendable. I could, by looking over the books, perhaps find some accidental decision of a refusal of a court to allow an indictment to be amended. Indictments are quashed for defects which could be amended at any stage of a civil action as of course, and a new indictment must be found before further proceedings can be had. This, with the decision in the case of Barnard, at page 192, volume 1, that there could be no amendment of articles of impeachment, will dispose of the question suggested by the order of the Senate as to whether a necessary allegation not made in the articles could be supplied in the subsequent pleadings.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate sitting for this trial take a recess for thirty minutes.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate sitting as a court take a recess for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment took a recess for fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at two o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) resumed the chair.

Mr. SARGENT. I move a call of the Senate, as there is not a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call will proceed.

The Secretary called the roll, and 53 Senators were found to be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives will now proceed with the argument. Senators will please give their attention.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, if I had any personal desire in the matter of postponement beyond the wish that this argument should not be divided in twain, it was that the managers might have some more time to condense their positions and authorities; but, as it is, I shall be compelled to read more from books than I otherwise should. In the first place I desire to call the attention of this court to some of the positions taken by the learned counsel who has just addressed you. First, as to the Cardozo case, I think altogether too much weight has been given to it. It occurred in the State in which I reside; and I think that the Senators from that State will concur with me when I say that the report of the judiciary committee in the assembly of that State was not regarded as at all conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction.

Then, again, the counsel called your attention to various authorities or suggestions that an impeachment of a citizen or the impeachment in fact of any person might prove ruinous to that person. I fail to see what that has to do with the question of the jurisdiction of this Senate, and, therefore, I proceed in the line of my argument to call your attention to the pleadings in this case. Before that, however, as the counsel on the other side did not state precisely the questions before this court, as I have understood them, I crave leave to refer to the order under which this argument is proceeding:

Ordered, That four managers on the part of the House of Representatives may be allowed to submit arguments upon the question whether the respondent is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office, and whether the issues of the fact presented in the pleadings are material, and also whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

For the proper consideration of these questions it is expedient that at this stage of the case I call your attention precisely to what the issues are. I do not intend to read the pleadings in full, but only such parts of them as may be necessary for the understanding of this point. Article 1 presents as follows:

That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States; that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post.

* * * * * * *

That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, and that at divers times thereafter, to wit, on or about the 17th day of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500 in consideration of the appointment of the said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time.

Then in article 3:

Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service.

Whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

The defendant in this case answered to these articles:

And the said William W. Belknap, &c., says, that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States.

The House of Representatives duly adopted and filed a general and special replication. A part of the latter is as follows:

The House of Representatives of the United States say that the said William W. Belknap, after the commission of each one of the acts alleged in the said articles, was and continued to be such officer, as alleged in said articles, until and including the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and until the House of Representatives, by its proper committee, had completed its investigation of his official conduct as such officer in regard to the matters and things set forth as official misconduct in the said articles, and the said committee was considering the report it should make to the House of Representatives upon the same, the said Belknap being at the time aware of such investigation and of the evidence taken and of such proposed report.

And the House of Representatives further say that, while its said committee was considering and preparing its said report to the House of Representatives recommending the impeachment of the said William W. Belknap for the matters and things set forth in the said articles, the said William W. Belknap, with full knowledge thereof, resigned his position as such officer on the said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, with intent to evade the proceedings of impeachment against him. And the House of Representatives resolved to impeach the said William W. Belknap for said matters as in said articles set forth on said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876.

To this replication the defendant rejoins, among other things, that the—

Chairman of said committee then declared to said Belknap that he, said CLYMER, should move in the said House of Representatives, upon the statement of said Marsh, for the impeachment of him, said Belknap, unless the said Belknap should resign his position as Secretary of War before noon of the next day, to wit, March the 2d, A. D. 1876; and, said Belknap regarding this statement of said CLYMER, chairman as aforesaid, as an intimation that he, said Belknap, could, by thus resigning, avoid the affliction inseparable from a protracted trial in a forum which would attract the greatest degree of public attention and the humiliation of availing himself of the defense disclosed in said statement itself which would cast blame upon said other persons, he yielded to the suggestion made by said CLYMER, chairman as aforesaid.

There is a joinder in demurrer and a surrejoinder by the House of Representatives, a portion of which surrejoinder I will read:

And the said House of Representatives, as to the first and second subdivisions of the rejoinder to the second replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the defendant to the said articles of impeachment, wherein the said defendant demands trial according to law, the said House of Representatives, in behalf of themselves and all the people of the United States, do the like.

Now, I call the attention of this court to the fact that in regard to two of the allegations made in the second replication by the House the defendant tendered issues and the House of Representatives joined in such issues, and I shall argue to this court and produce authorities presently to show that the defendant, having thus tendered issues joined in by the House, he cannot go behind them, and cannot question the right of this tribunal to hear and determine the matters thus brought before it.

Then there are four special rejoinders which the defendant made. One of them I have read to this court. In regard to each of the other three not read, the House of Representatives tendered an issue to be tried by this court; and what does the defendant do? Does he say that these matters are improperly before this court? Does he say that any injury will result to him in having these facts fully and fairly and truthfully investigated by this tribunal? Not at all. So far from it, with great formality he tenders a similiter in the following words:

And the said Belknap, as to the surrejoinders of said House of Representatives to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth rejoinders of the said Belknap to the second replication of said House of Representatives above pleaded, whereof said House of Representatives have demanded trial, the said Belknap doth the like.

We say that they are estopped upon every principle known to legal proceedings, known to the trial of cases in court, from attempting now to evade these issues. It was very proper on the part of this tribunal to raise this question, if it saw fit; but I apprehend, when the authorities are reviewed upon this point, it will be seen that it was too late for anybody to raise this question. Of course any question involving the jurisdiction of this court may be raised at any time; but on questions which do not involve its jurisdiction, but only facts pertaining thereto, no matter in what form of pleading these facts get before it, it is too late, when both parties have so tendered issues to be tried by this tribunal, for the defendant or for any member of this court to prevent such trial; and this I shall show abundantly by the authorities. If otherwise this tribunal, the most august in the land, supposed above all others capable of reaching to the direct truth regardless of forms and ceremonies, has not the power of a court of a justice of the peace; for I affirm that on the other side not one authority can be found, in the whole range of authorities, showing that when issues are joined on questions of fact before the most inferior court it has not the power to try and determine them; and therefore the question amounts to this: Has this tribunal less authority than the most inferior court in the United States, or in any other land?

The first authority I introduce upon this point affirms this doctrine, that the plaintiff in his replication may introduce new matter to fortify his declaration. Now what is the question before this court? The very resolution gives us the victory in this regard; it assumes that such facts are in aid of a pertinent question before this court in support of its jurisdiction. I admit we could allege no new offense in this way; we could tender no new or distinct issue upon the merits as to the crime or misdemeanor which this defendant committed; but the question which he raises is a dilatory one, it is not one relating at all to his guilt or his innocence. It is a question of jurisdiction. He raises that question and affirms certain facts relating thereto; and we, in aid of that jurisdiction, bring in certain other facts relating thereto. This is the true statement of the case; we did what we have done in aid of the jurisdiction, and this the pleader may always do.

It was decided in Hallett vs. Slidell, 11 Johnson's Reports, page 55, and has been in other cases, that—

A plaintiff in his replication may introduce new matter to explain and fortify his declaration.

I choose to read this to the court from the case in order that nothing may be taken upon what I have said, because while of course I intend to state things correctly, yet one may be mistaken in attempting to state the precise language from a book:

A plaintiff in his replication may introduce new matter to explain and fortify his declaration; and where such new matter is introduced, he may conclude with a verification. (11 Johnson's Reports, page 55, supra.)

I also call the attention of the court to Gould's Pleadings, chapter 3, section 170, page 142. This relates to a point which the counsel suggested, and that is that in these pleadings we use the term "late Secretary of War." I shall show presently in this argument that this is utterly immaterial in any view of the case. We had the right to state the precise fact, and if it appears, as I think it most abundantly will, that the law takes no notice of fractions of a day and that by well-settled principles and a long and unbroken series of decisions he should have resigned the day before he was impeached in order to escape the penalty of his crime, yet I want to show to this court at the outset that the word "late" makes no possible difference in dealing with the facts and questions of this case. It is but surplusage, though perhaps in one view a proper allegation. If mere surplusage, this is the law:

Surplusage, by which is meant matter that is altogether superfluous and useless, does not in general vitiate the pleadings, even in point of form, the maxim being utile per inutile non vitiatur. (Gould's Pleadings, chapter 3, section 170.)

It has been decided in Shook vs. Fulton, 4 Cowen's Reports, page 424, that where two pleas were pleaded, neither of which was a defense standing alone, though both joined together would be a defense, yet if the plaintiff replied it cured the difficulty. What was the situation in that case, decided in the supreme court of the State of New York under the old régime? As the pleas put in separately did not amount to a defense, the plaintiff could have demurred or could have made a motion to strike out, and yet instead of this he joined issue and cured the difficulty. When I show to this court, as I shall presently, that on account of its high position and of the magnitude of the questions which it has to decide, the ordinary rules of pleading do not control it, then do not these cases from the common-law courts show that this question of the form of pleading facts is one of no consequence in this tribunal, having nothing to do with the question of jurisdiction or with the real merits of the case?

The defendant in this case saw fit to raise the question of jurisdiction, a jurisdiction which would be assumed, because this court, by the Constitution of the land, is the court for the trial of impeachments; and therefore we were not compelled to allege in the articles that it had jurisdiction. It would have been entirely surplusage, at least entirely unnecessary, to do so; and when the defendant steps in and says this court has no jurisdiction on account of some fact personal to himself or otherwise, we have the right to do as we did do in our second replication, state facts in aid of the jurisdiction, which would be assumed, as before stated, until called in question.

On the question of pleadings in this court I call attention in the first place to Rawle on the Constitution, page 205, and the chapter on impeachments, in which he says:

Articles of impeachment need not be drawn up with the precision and strictness of indictments. They must, however, be distinct and intelligible. No one is bound to answer to a charge so obscure and ambiguous that it cannot be understood. Additional articles may be exhibited perhaps at any stage of the prosecution, certainly before the defendant has put in his answer or plea.

Now you will see, Senators, one reason why I read the pleadings in this case. Is there anything in these pleadings that is not distinct and intelligible? Is there anything so obscure and ambiguous that the defendant and his learned counsel did not understand the allegations? Could the English language more correctly charge the bribery and crimes which this man, if these articles are true, has committed, than has been done in these articles? And are not all the facts, whether in the articles or in the replication or in the surrejoinder, distinctly and fairly before this tribunal? And is this tribunal, in the presence of this nation and of the world, to refuse to decide these facts on the ground that the pleadings are not formal, when all of the parties are before it and have voluntarily waived all technical objections which might have been taken before joining issue?

Is this the tribunal to shelter itself behind such a technicality? I apprehend not.

I call attention next to 1 Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, § 808:

§ 808. The articles thus exhibited need not, and indeed do not, pursue the strict form and accuracy of an indictment. They are sometimes quite general in the form of the allegation; but always contain, or ought to contain, so much certainty as to enable the party to put himself upon the proper defense, and also, in case of an acquittal, to avail himself of it as a bar to another impeachment. Additional articles may be exhibited perhaps at any stage of the prosecution.

In regard to the question of additional articles, I will say there never have been articles of impeachment drawn, so far as I have been able to discover—and I presume the researches of the counsel on the other side has resulted in the same conclusion—without the reservation of the right to present such further articles as the House of Commons or the House of Representatives might see fit to present. I assume, therefore, in this case that it will be held by the Senate that unquestionably we might have presented further articles; and therefore, even if we had stated another offense, the matter would—if issue had been taken—have been before this court. If we had charged upon him a violation of duty in regard to some other post-tradership, if we had charged in the replication any other high crime or misdemeanor, and he, instead of objecting, had joined issue, that question would be fairly before this court, just as much as though presented by additional articles. But we are not in this position, and need not go to this length, because, I repeat, our position is that, he having challenged the jurisdiction of this court, we had the right to state any fact in aid of that jurisdiction. This principle is as old as the common law. It is not a departure; it is not a new assignment, as the learned counsel suggested; it has no relation to a departure; it has no relation to a new assignment. It is simply the statement of facts, which could always have been stated in all the ages of the common law, in aid of a fact alleged in the original articles, and which the other side disputes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the manager which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon propounds an inquiry which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Does the doctrine of the law that the plaintiff may introduce new matter to explain and fortify the position taken in the declaration apply in criminal cases?

Mr. Manager LORD. It applies in cases of impeachment. This is partly a civil and partly a criminal proceeding. In all the modes of procedure, this is a civil proceeding. In regard to the attitude of the defendant and the punishment to be pronounced upon him, it may be called a criminal proceeding; and perhaps I concede too much in saying this, because some writers have gone so far as to affirm that in no sense is the removal and disqualification directed and allowed by the Constitution a punishment; they say these sentences simply protect the people against themselves and against a bad and corrupt officer after he is impeached; the Constitution thrusts such a one out of his office upon his conviction; and when he has been guilty of crimes and misdemeanors which show that he is polluted, that he is intrinsically dishonest, the Constitution permits the Senate to say that he shall be forever disqualified. Therefore we might say that this is not a criminal proceeding either in the sense of trial or of punishment; but inasmuch as replications and rejoinders and surrejoinders are allowed, so far it is a civil proceeding. Who ever heard of a replication or a rejoinder or a surrejoinder or a similiter under an indictment? Therefore we are not to be brought within that narrow range; no legal right is to be crushed out of this case; the defendant is not to be permitted to escape because in some of its analogies this may be regarded as a criminal proceeding. I affirm in regard to the pleadings that in all respects it is a civil proceeding, and more than that, that there is far more latitude, as I shall presently show, in this court than there is in any lower court in regard to pleading.

I call the attention of the court now to the report of a committee of the British House of Commons, a learned and intelligent committee, a committee which has made a report that will go down with the ages, and I apprehend be received as the law on this subject so long as civilization exists. I call attention to Burke's Works, seventh volume, page 490, where the committee consider the "rules of pleading in courts of impeachment." I never have heard yet of any rule as to pleadings in a criminal court besides the indictment and the plea. Sometimes a defendant puts in what we call a special plea. If a question of jurisdiction is raised, it is usually raised ore tenus. But what are the rules of pleading in this court? Such committee say:

> Your committee do not find that any rules of pleading, as observed in the inferior courts, have ever obtained in the proceedings of the high court of Parliament, in a cause or matter in which the whole procedure has been within their original jurisdiction. Nor does your committee find that any demurrer or exception as of false or erroneous pleading hath been ever admitted to any impeachment in Parliament as not coming within the form of the pleading.

The members of this court know the distinguished character of Mr. Walpole not only as a lawyer, but as a statesman.

> "Those learned gentlemen (Lord Wintoun's counsel) seem to forget in what court they are. They have taken up so much of your lordships' time in quoting of authorities and using arguments to show your lordships what would quash an indictment in the courts below, that they seem to forget they are now in a court of Parliament, and on an impeachment of the Commons of Great Britain."

> A great writer on the criminal law, Justice Foster, in one of his discourses, fully recognizes those principles for which your managers have contended, and which have, to this time, been uniformly observed in Parliament. In a very elaborate reasoning on the case of a trial in Parliament (the trial of those who had murdered Edward the II) he observes this: "It is well known that in parliamentary proceedings of this kind, it is, and ever was, sufficient that matters appear with proper light and certainly to a common understanding, without that minute exactness which is required in criminal proceedings in Westminster Hall. In these cases the rule has always been loquendum et vulgus."

We say, therefore, if the articles are defective and the second replication not of strict right, all is cured by rejoinder, surrejoinder, and similiter. And in regard to the main question presented by the second replication—not the most conclusive question perhaps, but it may be called the main question of the second replication—namely, whether this defendant has the right to evade the Constitution and defeat its operations by his own will, he confesses and avoids. He admits on the record that he resigned for the purpose of evading this impeachment. It is true he says he was not guilty, and resigned for other purposes; but that is utterly immaterial to this question, because he does admit, I repeat, that he resigned for the purpose of defeating this impeachment.

I will not stop, Senators, to answer the suggestion of counsel, that the chairman of that committee had the right, in behalf of this nation, and in behalf of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, to make a contract with the defendant that if he would get out of the office of Secretary of War before a certain hour he should not be impeached for these high crimes and misdemeanors, which, if these articles are true, had polluted him for years, and made him of all men that have ever appeared in a court of impeachment the most unfit to hold civil office. I deny such a right. I am astonished that counsel of respectability and of high standing should stand in this court and assume for a moment that the chairman of a committee had a right to make any such infamous contract; but that is one of the issues. I was surprised the more to hear it stated here, because it is one of the issues. The allegation of such agreement we absolutely deny; we deny that any such contract was made. By our surrejoinder we tender an issue upon that question, and it is accepted by the other side by filing their similiter.

Reference has been made also to the fact that the Constitution leaves the defendant subject to an indictment, and that an indictment may be found against him. The two proceedings, Senators, are entirely and absolutely distinct. One has nothing to do with the other, for the statute to which the counsel referred (section 1781 of the Revised Statutes) does not pretend to change the law or rules of impeachment.

Now I wish to call the attention of this tribunal to another consideration; and that is that on this question you are not to give the defendant the benefit of any of those rules which are provided for criminal cases. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that he is accused as a criminal and that this proceeding is a criminal proceeding, so that when we get to the merits he may say that he is entitled to the presumption of innocence, that he is entitled to be defended by counsel—and certainly he has illustrious counsel—that he would be entitled to the right of challenge if before a jury, and is entitled to confront the witnesses; assuming that this was an indictment and he was before one of the courts of the land and should stand up and claim all these privileges, they of course would be given to him, and we do not care about challenging them here. For the sake of the argument, we admit that here upon the merits he has all these privileges, so far as applicable in this court. What I say is that on this question of jurisdiction he has no such privilege; on the contrary, he has not as many privileges, as the authorities will show, as he would have in a civil action.

This is not one of the questions over which the law watches with such jealousy to guard the rights of a defendant. So long as it is true that no case of fact can be made, no evidence can be offered under which speculation may not peer; so long as it is true that sometimes innocent men suffer; so long as that maxim exists in our law that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men go free than that one innocent man suffer, the common law will allow a person accused of crime the presumption and privileges we have referred to. But what have these questions to do with a mere abstract question of law? The question now presented to you has nothing to do with his guilt or innocence; it has nothing to do with his imprisonment; it has nothing to do with any question personal to himself. It is purely a legal one, and must be considered precisely as though it arose in a civil action, excepting as before suggested that he has not all the privileges in this regard that he would have in a civil action. When a defendant in a criminal action raises a dilatory plea it does not receive the consideration which it does in a civil action.

What is the object in pleading in criminal actions? Allow me to call the attention of the court to 2 Archbold's Criminal Practice and Pleadings, sixth edition, volume 2, page 206:

> The object of pleading, whether in civil or criminal actions, is to inform the parties of the facts alleged by each against the other with such clearness and distinctness as to enable them to prepare for the trial of disputed facts or for the application of the law to those which are admitted. In its application to criminal cases, it is a statement of a crime imputed to the prisoner with such a particularity of circumstances only as will enable him to understand the charge and prepare for his defense, and as will authorize the court to give the appropriate judgment upon conviction.

At common law a defendant in a criminal action was not allowed to plead in abatement as in civil action, (1 Archbold, page 110; Barber's Criminal Law, page 343,) and cannot tender a bill of exceptions. (Garbett's Criminal Law, volume 2, page 521.) Therefore you see, Senators, that while the law has always been watchful to protect life and liberty, intending that no innocent man should be falsely accused of crime, yet in regard to the surroundings of the case, in regard to the mere question of pleadings, he has certainly had no more privilege and certainly has now no more privilege than in a civil action.

Bishop on Criminal Procedure, volume 1, page 324, says:

The extreme kind of certainty, called certainty to a certain intent in every particular, is required by the tribunals when a party pleads any matter not entering into the merits of the case but going merely to defeat the pending proceeding against him. And this kind of certainty is demanded on the very just ground that he who stands on a technicality to ward off inquiry into his conduct in distinction from defending himself upon the merits shall himself stand very technically erect.

Allow me to call attention for a moment to an authority introduced the other day by the learned counsel for the defendant, from Cushing's Parliamentary Law, in which it appears that Mr. Burke was called to account for stating certain things against the defendant, Warren Hastings, not charged in the articless of impeachment. I hardly know why this was introduced, it is so utterly different from this case. In that case, without any allegation in the articles, without any allegation in the replication, without any issue joined upon any fact, Mr. Burke saw fit in his philippic to arraign the defendant for crimes not charged; and this the House of Commons said he had no right to do. I have sufficiently said in this case that the matters we propose to try are all in the pleadings.

One branch of this argument on our part will be very brief. The learned counsel, Mr. Blair, suggested that we should be driven to the position of asserting that a citizen who had never held office was impeachable. We claim no such thing. We claim first, and admit, that the authorities have settled that a mere citizen cannot be impeached; and if the authorities had not settled it, the Constitution, not by express words but by its intent, does exclude the idea of impeachment as against a mere private citizen.

But at this point I may as well inquire whether the Constitution, in regard to a civil officer, is a mere rope of sand? If we find by the intention of the Constitution that a man cannot be impeached while a mere citizen; if that is its obvious intent, notwithstanding the generality of the language, why then may we not, by applying the same rule as to its intent, show that the Constitution never intended that any person, when his sin finds him out, shall be permitted to abnegate or defeat that Constitution in this regard?

There are cases—such is the judgment of the law, such was the judgment of the common law, such is the judgment of the Constitution—there are cases where a man has shown such depravity that he ought to be disqualified for all the days of his life. Now, shall this provision of the Constitution, Senators, be defeated by the will of the criminal? It is answered that here is a statute which provides that if found guilty he shall be disqualified. That statute certainly is a mere "rope of sand." The whole disqualification can be removed by the pardon of the President, (but you will recollect that the President cannot pardon in a case of impeachment,) or the Legislature may repeal the law under which he was convicted and restore him to citizenship. Therefore, if it is true that sometimes the people need protection against themselves; if it be true that a far-sighted and ambitious man may, years after his crimes have been committed, ride into power on some wave of fanaticism or corruption; if this be true, so that the Constitution wisely provided that a man thus guilty of disqualifying crimes should forever be disqualified, then ought we to be asked to fall back on a statute which may be at any time repealed or the force of which the President may at any time remove by a pardon?

But there are high crimes and misdemeanors not punishable by statute or any law, and I will call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the remarks in this regard of one of the counsel in the Blount case. I read from page 2316 of the Annals of Congress, Fifth Congress, volume 2:

It seems to me—

Says the learned counsel—

that the power of impeachment has two objects: First, to remove persons whose misconduct may have rendered them unworthy of retaining their offices and, secondly, to punish those offenses of a mere political nature, which, though not susceptible of that exact definition whereby they might be brought within the sphere of ordinary tribunals, are yet very dangerous to the public.

Now, that this matter may be fully before the Senate, I desire to call attention to all the provisions of the Constitution relating to impeachment, for the purpose of showing beyond all reasonable doubt—though we are not driven to that point here—that it was the intention of the convention which framed the Constitution and the intention of the States in adopting it to allow a person to be impeached who had held office after he should have gone out of office. I have carefully copied word for word in their order all the provisions of the Constitution relating to impeachment.

First, the House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment." The last clause of section 2, article 1.

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

Last two clauses of section 3, article 1.

The President—

Shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

First clause, section 2, article 2.

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Section 4, article 2.

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.

Last clause of section 2, article 3.

Let me call your attention, Mr. President and Senators, particularly to this point. What is there in all these provisions that limits the power of impeachment? If we adopted in regard thereto by these provisions the rules of the common law, why is not the common law in force in regard to impeachment? Not by reason of any of these words that I have read to you, not because the Constitution says that the punishment shall not go beyond removal from office and disqualification, for its object was to prevent attainder and confiscation; and when it says that the punishment shall, at least in the case of one in office, extend to removal from office, it does not say but that any inferior sentence may be pronounced. Therefore, so far as the clauses read are concerned, when you put them in connection and consider them, you will find that there is nothing to prevent the House of Representatives of the United States exercising the right to impeach the citizen as fully as can the House of Commons of Great Britain. But why do we say that no mere citizen can be impeached? Simply because of the obvious scope of the Constitution, because we find another provision which guarantees to every citizen the right of trial by jury, which cannot be taken from him except by express enactment; because we find provisions which guarantee to the States the rights which they have not conferred and confine the United States to the rights which are conferred; and therefore when we take into view the whole scope and intent of the Constitution we find that impeachment was only intended for a public officer, either while in office or after he has left office, for offenses committed while in office.

I may say in passing, if the court please, that while in my view of the Constitution if the defendant here should be convicted, an inferior sentence, like that of censure, might be pronounced, yet I apprehend no such question will arise in this case, because, if it be true, as charged in the articles, that he is guilty of this long series of criminal transactions, if he has thus polluted his honor and his hands with bribes during these long years, then, as before suggested, if a case can be conceived in which disqualification was demanded it is this case. Therefore, we claim that the limitation of the Constitution is not as to time; it simply relates to a class of persons; and the word "officer" is used as descriptive precisely as it is used in the very statute to which the counsel referred. If it be true because the word "office" or "officer" is used in the Constitution, without saying anything about a person after he is out of office, that the defendant is not impeachable, then he cannot be indicted, because the statute relating to his indictment simply speaks of him as an officer.

What is the real intent and meaning of the word "officer" in the Constitution? It is but a general description. An officer in one sense never loses his office. He gets his title and he wears it forever, and an officer is under this liability for life; if he once takes office under the United States, if while in office and as an officer he commits acts which demand impeachment, he may be impeached even down to the time to which the learned counsel, Mr. Carpenter, so eloquently referred the other day—down to the time that he takes his departure from this life.

It is supposed by many that because an officer must be removed, no judgment can be pronounced without pronouncing the judgment of removal. This it seems to me is a very great error. If he is in office, of course under the Constitution he must be removed; but if out of office, the sentence of disqualification or some inferior sentence may be passed upon him, for the obvious reason that the sentence is divisible. This was distinctly held in the Barnard case, to which reference has been made. In that case the court proceeded unanimously to vote that he should be removed from office; but when the question came up on the other point, shall he be disqualified? several members of the court voted in the negative.

I do not see, then, any possible view in which there is difficulty; and the learned counsel on the other side will not be able to create any difficulty excepting under the claim that a person in office, having so conducted himself as to be worthy of impeachment, finding that it is impossible to escape the facts or pervert them, may, I repeat, defeat the Constitution for the purpose of preventing his punishment.

It is said that under the parliamentary law this House could not pronounce judgment until the House of Representatives demanded that such judgment be pronounced. Suppose that Mr. Belknap in this case had not resigned; suppose he had made up his mind that he would not confess this sin, that he would not attempt to evade impeachment, but that he would prove the real facts in the case as he alleges them—and certainly if they are true they are susceptible of proof, even though you assume that he cannot be sworn as a witness, or that his wife cannot be sworn; yet if she had this large fund of which he supposed he was receiving the interest, in some way this fact could be proved, brought to the attention of the Senate—suppose he had seen fit to take that course, and stood up and said, "I am innocent; I demand a trial on the merits;" and suppose that he had been convicted, and this House was waiting for the demand of the other House to have judgment pronounced upon him; or suppose that this learned tribunal had retired or cleared these galleries for the purpose of ascertaining what judgment ought to be pronounced; if the logic of the other side is true, after such conviction, by an arrangement with the President, he could resign his office and have the resignation accepted, and defeat the judgment. It comes to this. To this conclusion you must come, if you come to the conclusion that the Constitution intended that no officer should be impeached after he had retired from the office.

But we have authority upon this point. Of course the nearer we come to the age of the Constitution the more we can gather from men who aided in the work of the Constitution or men who were their contemporaries, as to the real intent of the instrument. Rawle, a celebrated lawyer of Pennsylvania, known to some of the counsel, the author of a work upon the Constitution, the compiler of five volumes of reports, and I believe of some nineteen more in connection with Mr. Sergeant, says, and I call the particular attention of Senators to this:

From the reasons already given it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office All executive and judicial officers, from the President downward, from the judges of the Supreme Court to those of the most inferior tribunals, are included in this description.—Rawle on the Constitution, page 203.

I also call the attention of the court to the language of Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist, which, although not quite as conclusive, is nearly as much so as that which I have just read. I call attention to pages 300 and 301, No. 65, where Hamilton says:

A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained in a government wholly elective.

* * * * * * *

The delicacy and magnitude of a trust which so deeply concerns the political reputation and existence of every man engaged in the administration of public affairs speak for themselves.

* * * * * * *

What, it may be asked, is the true spirit of the institution itself? Is it not designed as a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men? If this be the design of it, who can so properly be the inquisitors for the nation as the representatives of the nation themselves?

When Alexander Hamilton, that logician and scholar, that man who always measured his words so well, spoke of impeachment as to public men, what was in his mind? Did he imagine simply that officers actually in office could only be impeached? I apprehend not. I apprehend the learned counsel, Judge Black, who answers in the affirmative, has not ceased to be a public man because he is out of office. He is enrolled to-day in the common judgment of mankind as among the public men of this country. Alexander Hamilton was not a loose writer in a matter of this kind, in a matter where he bent every endeavor of his intellect to speak accurately and concisely. He was not a man who would speak of public men when he meant only a person holding office.

This claim is not a singular one, if the court please. If a person has usurped an office and a quo warranto is issued against him and he resigns, still the quo warranto proceedings may go on to judgment, notwithstanding his resignation. For authority I refer to King vs. Warlow, 2 Maule and Selwyn, 75; and King vs. Payne, 2 Chitty, King's bench, 367.

This, if the court please, is all that I have deemed necessary to say on the question of impeachment generally.

I now propose to call the attention of the court to the other questions of this case referred to in the order of the Senate. The first question of the second replication is: "Can the defendant escape by dividing the day into fractions?" This question is also presented by the articles and plea. The allegation on page 5 is not denied. Therefore, as I propose to show this court by an unbroken series of decisions that the law does not permit a day to be divided into fractions in such a case as this, and if it be true that the defendant was Secretary of War on the 2d of March, on any part of that day, and therefore impeachable, then that question, perhaps, can be argued independent of this replication. I propose, now, to argue the question under the second replication. The authorities will bear upon both the plea and replication. First, I say a judicial act dates from the earliest minute of the day in which it is done. I call the attention of the court to 3 Douglas, page 273, the case of Lord Porchester vs. Petrie, because it is one of the earliest cases, though not as decisive upon the point as some others to which I shall presently make reference.

The reporter adds, he heard that it was adjudged that the plaintiff had the better right, because he claimed to be in under a judgment, and all the term is only one day in law. In that case the attempt was to make a fraction of a day, and the defendant pleaded that his statute was before the judgment, but the court would not allow it.

Therefore, under the common law, such was the weight given to a judgment that where a statute was passed on the same day and before the judgment the judgment related back and defeated the statute.

I next call the attention of the court to Edwards vs. Reginam, 9 Exchequer, 631, 632. This is a decision by Coleridge, justice:

The doctrine that judicial acts are to be taken always to date from the earliest minute of the day in which they are done stands upon ancient and clear authority, and upon this doctrine alone the present judgment may well be sustained. The Crown not being bound by the provisions of the statute of frauds respecting writs of execution, or by the statutes of bankrupts, the writ of extent, like any other judicial writ of execution at common law, takes effect upon the day of its teste, and is in operation for the whole of the day, from the earliest to the latest minute, without any division. This is a general rule, quite apart from all considerations of prerogative, and was recognized and acted on in the much-considered and celebrated case of Shelley. There Edward Shelley covenanted to suffer a recovery on the 9th of October, the first day of the term; he died between five and six in the morning; afterward on the same day the recovery passed with a voucher over, and immediately after judgment given an habere facias seisinam was awarded. The Lord Chancellor and all the judges of England held that the recovery was well suffered, though the death took place before the court sat, "because the record is to be understood of the whole day, and relates without division to the first instant of the day." And, although the court will inquire at what time a party does an act, as filing a bill, or delivering his declaration, and for that purpose will take notice of the usual hours for sitting, (see 2 Levinz, page 141, 176; Buller's Nisi Prius, page 137,) it is otherwise with regard to a judicial proceeding. This distinction is pointed out in Lord Porchester's case by Lord Mansfield, and recognized by Buller, J., in Pugh vs. Robinson.

I next call the attention of the court to the case of the Queen vs. The Inhabitants of St. Mary, 1 Ellis and Blackburn, page 816. In reading these cases I wish again to remind the court that on this question the law is to be held precisely as though the action was civil; that no intendment whatever is to be held in favor of the defendant; and that if there was a judicial proceeding in his case, occurring on the same day that he performed the personal act of resigning, the judgment reaches back of it, and he was properly impeached:

A building was let, at £30 per annum, to C by a written agreement stating that C had taken it "from the 30th day of September, 1850;" "the tenancy is for one year, commencing on the 30th day of September instant," (1850.) C entered at noon on 30th September, 1850, and quitted at four in the afternoon of 29th September, 1851.

Held, that C gained a settlement by renting and occupying a tenement "for the term of one whole year at least," within statute 1, William IV, chapter 18, section 1.

Let me call the attention of the court more particularly to what this case is. Here was a statute which provided that before a person could obtain a residence in any particular place he must have occupied a tenement there "for the term of one whole year at least." He took a lease for a year, which ended on the 29th day of September, 1850, and quit the premises at four o'clock in the afternoon of the 29th of September. On page 827, Lord Campbell, chief justice, says:

I am glad that we have decided cases, on an act of Parliament similar to that before us, in favor of the only view which is consistent with common sense. Any one, talking of these facts in ordinary language, would say that the pauper occupied for a year. I would abstain from so holding if any recognized rule or direct decision militated against it; but really law and sense concur. The general rule is that the law does not regard fractions of a day.

I next call attention to a case directly in point as to the effect of a judicial act, in Wright vs. Mills, Hurlstone and Norman, 490–493. I will read the syllabus in order to get the facts before the court, and then I will read what the court says:

Judicial proceedings are to be considered as taking place at the earliest period of the day on which they are done. Therefore, where judgment was signed at the opening of the office at its usual hour, eleven a. m., and the defendant died at half past nine a. m. on the same morning: Held that the judgment was regular.

At page 490 the court say:

Pollock, C. B.—We are all of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The principal authority on the subject is the case in the exchequer chamber of Edwards vs. Reginam—

Which case I have already read.

It was there expressly stated that the court will inquire at what time a party does a particular act, for instance, filing a bill or delivering a declaration; and for that purpose will ascertain the hour at which the courts were sitting, &c.; but the court lays down this rule: "It is otherwise with regard to a judicial proceeding." And Shelley's case is there cited, where a recovery suffered on the first day of term was held good, although the party had died that morning before the court sat. I consider that case of Edwards vs. Reginam as an undoubted authority, to which we ought to conform. Now, it appears to me that signing judgment is a judicial proceeding, and consequently to be considered as having taken place at the earliest period of the day when it is done, and therefore not invalidated by what occurred in the present instance.

In Blydenburgh vs. Cotheal, 4 Comstock's New York reports, page 418, the court held—

Fractions of a day are not in general regarded, except for the purpose of preventing injustice.

Therefore, an appeal perfected before the judgment-roll is filed, but on the same day, is regular.

Bronson, chief justice, says:

As a general rule the court does not inquire into the fractions of a day, except for the purpose of guarding against injustice. (Small vs. McChesney, 3 Cowen, page 19; Clute vs. Clute, 3 Denio, page 263.) We think that a sufficient answer to this motion.

In the case of Small vs. McChesney, 3 Cowen, the supreme court of the State held in these words:

The whole proceeding is on the same day, which the law will not divide into fractions unless this be necessary for the purpose of guarding against injustice.

In Jones vs. Porter, 6 Howard's New York Reports, page 286, the court held in these words:

This rule will be adhered to in considering a jurisdictional question—

And held the question of jurisdiction involved in the case of Blydenburgh vs. Cotheal, 4 New York, page 418. It only remains to show that which I need not perhaps take any time to show, that the impeachment by the House of Representatives was a judicial act.

In 2 Wooddeson's Lectures, the House is called in this regard "the grand inquest of the nation."

I refer also to Tomlin's Law Dictionary, title, "Impeachment:"

An impeachment before the Lords by the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament is a prosecution of known and established law, and hath been frequently put in practice, being a presentment to the most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction by the most solemn grand inquest of the whole kingdom.

And then, to define particularly an inquest, I call the attention of the court to the same volume, under the title "Inquest:"

The term inquest is used to signify the persons to whom the trial of any question, civil or criminal, is committed.

I also call the attention of the court to 1 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, page 715:

INQUEST. * * * The judicial inquiry itself, by a jury summoned for the purpose, is called an inquest. The finding of such men, upon an investigation, is also called an inquest, or an inquisition.

The next question presented by their replication is, Did the impeachment relate back to the inception of the proceedings by an authorized committee of the House? Whether the committee was authorized or not is a question of fact. Therefore the comments of the learned counsel relating thereto were not in order, because it is affirmed on the part of the House of Representatives that this committee had authority. If it should appear that the committee had no authority, then another principle would be invoked, and that is the principle of adoption. But it is not necessary to discuss that now, because, for the purposes of this argument, the authority is conceded. In regard to the principle of relation it is this: that the House of Representatives before this resignation having instituted proceedings against Mr. Belknap for the purpose of investigating these crimes and for the purpose of impeaching the defendant, when the impeachment was made it related back to the original proceeding which was instituted, as is confessed, before this resignation. When divers acts concur to a result, the original act is to be preferred, and to this the other acts have relation. In Lord Porchester vs. Petrie, 3 Douglas, 273, it is said as follows:

In Miller vs. Bradley the defendant moved to have the execution set aside, because the judgment on which it was taken out was not really a judgment till the morrow of the Holy Trinity, and so was not sufficient to warrant the issuing of the execution; but the court said that it was a judgment of the first day of the term in which it was obtained, by relation.

In Wright vs. Mills, 4 Hurlstone and Norman, 493, 494, the court say:

It is clear that this judgment would have been good at common law, for it would have related back to the first day of the term.

In Viner's Abridgment, volume 1, title "Relation," pages 289–293, the following authorities are found, and as two of these authorities relate to the criminal law, I have thought they might throw light upon this case.

I read at page 289:

Where the teste of the writ of appeal of death is within the year, and the return and the demise of the king is after the year, there by re-attachment the year shall be saved by relation to the original.

Many of this court remember that this writ of appeal of death was issued at the instance of a private suitor for the purpose of trying the question whether some relative of his had been murdered by the person against whom the writ was issued; and ordinarily such person had the right of "wager of battle." The writ must be returnable within one year, and yet in the case cited here, although the year had elapsed, by issuing a re-attachment it was said that the original proceedings were saved by relation.

Again, at page 290:

Where there are divers acts concurrent to make a conveyance, estate, or other thing, the original act shall be preferred, and to this the other act shall have relation.

At page 293:

A constable took a man who struck another, and after suffered him to go; and after, the party struck died of the blow. This escape is not felony, and yet it shall have relation to the striking in respect of him who struck; ex prima causa oritur omnis actio; but shall not have such relation in respect of the constable who suffered the escape.

As the law then stood, the person being out of custody, it was necessary to connect him with the original transaction by relation. The constable was not connected, because he was innocent of the original wrong. I refer also to Ashford vs. Thornton, Barnewall & Alderson, 405, 923; Jackson vs. McCall, 3 Cowen, 80; Jackson vs. Bull, 1 Johnson, 90. I will read a part of the note to this last case, 1 Johnson, 90:

Relation is a fiction of law, resorted to for the promotion of justice and the lawful intentions of parties, by giving effect to instruments, which without it would be invalid.

* * * Where there are divers acts concurrent to make a conveyance, estate, or other thing, the original act shall be preferred, and to this the other act shall have relation.

This last case, it is true, refers particularly to a conveyance, but it does not alter the principle, for the court will see that through every form of civil and also criminal proceedings from that based upon the appeal of death to the case of the assault and subsequent death, it has been held that where there are several acts concurring to an end all the subsequent acts relate back to the original act. This rule is never changed or varied excepting to prevent injustice. In this case we claim that the House of Representatives, having obtained jurisdiction of the subject-matter by instituting these proceedings against the defendant, he could no more defeat them by resigning midway than he could defeat the Constitution itself. When the House of Representatives by its solemn act impeached him of high crimes and misdemeanors, that was a judicial act, the highest judicial act that can be performed in this nation save one, and that is the act to be performed by this tribunal when it pronounces "guilty" or "not guilty" upon the proofs before it.

Therefore, we say the defendant in this case should not be allowed his dilatory plea, because these proceedings had been instituted against him long before he had resigned his office, long before he had attempted to escape the penalty due to his crime by this resignation. This impeachment is in furtherance of justice, not in furtherance of injustice. It is due to the defendant; it is due to the dead whom he claims to represent; it is due to all the associations that surround him if he is an innocent man that he establish his innocence in this tribunal. Therefore to hold jurisdiction in this case, to give him the opportunity to establish his innocence, or the House of Representatives to establish his guilt, is in furtherance of justice. To deny jurisdiction under these circumstances would be in furtherance of injustice.

In this case before the court the doctrine of relation prevents injustice, for it changes no rule of evidence, and does not affect the merits.

It only remains for me to call the attention of the Senate to one question, and that is, Can the defendant evade impeachment by resignation? That this was his object is confessed. That has already appeared by the sixth subdivision which has been read, and it presents the questions: Can he thus defeat the object of the Constitution? Can he thus take advantage of his own wrong?

But the learned counsel on the other side, who addressed the court on this point, assume that this is a very simple thing; that because a man has the right to change his residence by crossing a State line, or a right under certain circumstances to convey his property, therefore he has the right, when confronted with his crime, when the Constitution pronounces against him the decree of disqualification, when good morals, when the judgment of mankind, when justice to the country demand that that judgment of disqualification shall be pronounced, to defeat the Constitution and prevent the just retribution due to his crimes. I apprehend if the learned counsel cannot see the difference in their zeal for their client, that the common sense of mankind will see it. I think that the well-known common sense of these counsel, when they disrobe themselves of their duty to their client, will enable them to see the wide and marked distinction between the crossing of a State line and this act by which their client seeks to evade the judgment of the law.

But we have some authorities on this point to which I wish to call the particular attention of this tribunal. The learned counsel on the other side has aided me. He has introduced the authorities. I propose to show on this point, by the judgment of men who helped make the Constitution, by men who lived in the day when it was perhaps more thoroughly understood as to its intents than now, that we are right in this position and that the defendant cannot evade the judgment of the law by his voluntary resignation. The counsel in the Blount case conceded that a person could not evade the judgment of the law by a voluntary resignation and stood up before this tribunal and said: "We will never be found alleging that a man can escape the penalty due his crime, or evade the Constitution by a voluntary resignation."

Allow me briefly to call the attention of the court to the circumstances of the Blount case before I read from the arguments of the counsel. Mr. Blount was impeached by the House of Representatives on the 7th of July, 1797. He was expelled the next day by the Senate. Articles of impeachment were presented the next year, some seven months thereafter, namely, on the 7th of February, 1798. Mr. Bayard, one of the managers, page 2232, says:

It is also alleged in the plea that the party impeached is not now a Senator. It is enough that he was a Senator at the time the articles were preferred.

Allow me to say here in passing that it will be seen from the position which this gentleman took that it made no difference about Blount having been a Senator when the articles were preferred. Mr. Bayard says further:

If the impeachment were regular and maintainable, when preferred, I apprehend no subsequent event, grounded on the willful act, or caused by the delinquency of the party, can vitiate or obstruct the proceeding. Otherwise the party, by resignation or the commission of some offense which merited and occasioned his expulsion, might secure his impunity. This is against one of the sagest maxims of the law, which does not allow a man to derive a benefit from his own wrong.

More significant still, I read from the remarks of Mr. Dallas, page 2278. Mr. Dallas was one of the counsel for Senator Blount—

The articles of impeachment—

He says—

do not charge William Blount with any crime or misdemeanor committed in the execution of his office with any act which might not have been committed by any other citizen as well as a Senator; that there was room for argument whether an officer could be impeached after he was out of office; not by a voluntary resignation to evade prosecution, but by an adversary expulsion.

What does this learned counsel, Mr. Dallas, say? He says there is room for argument as to whether a man can be impeached after he has been expelled from office, but he affirms that there is no room for argument against his liability for impeachment after a voluntary resignation to evade prosecution.

Mr. Jared Ingersoll was one of the persons who signed the Constitution, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, a person who helped make that Constitution, a lawyer of transcendent abilities, a person who measured his words well, as you may see by reference to his argument. What does he say upon this point on page 2294? He says:

It is among the less objections of the cause that the defendant is now out of office not by resignation.

I call the attention of Senators particularly to these words:

I certainly shall never contend that an officer may first commit an offense, and afterward avoid punishment by resigning his office.

Then he adds—

But the defendant has been expelled.

Mr. Ingersoll then makes this argument:

Can he be removed at one trial and disqualified at another for the same offense? Is it not the form, rather than the substance of a trial? Do the Senate come, as Lord Mansfield says a jury ought, like blank paper, without a previous impression upon their minds? Would not error in the first sentence naturally be productive of error in the second instance? Is there not reason to apprehend the strong bias of a former decision would be apt to prevent the influence of any new lights brought forward upon a second trial?

This last argument of Mr. Ingersoll had such weight upon the minds of some of the annotators that they affirmed that jurisdiction was denied on the ground of Mr. Blount's expulsion. That I do not understand to be the ground. I understand that jurisdiction was declined because a Senator is not a civil officer within the meaning of the Constitution. Mr. Ingersoll argues that even if he were a civil officer within the meaning of the Constitution he had been summarily tried by the Senate and expelled, and the Senate having pronounced one judgment upon him could not pronounce a further judgment of disqualification at a different time.

If the court please, further authorities showing that no superstructure can be built on the ground of evasion or fraud and that a person intending to defeat the law cannot do it by his own evasive act need not be quoted in this tribunal.

I have said all that I deem necessary in opening this case. I have endeavored to bring before this tribunal fairly and truthfully our legal positions, and I think, and so the managers think, and so does the House think that the defendant is impeachable notwithstanding he has resigned his office.

We affirm that there is nowhere in the Constitution any inhibition against his impeachment. On the other hand, the whole intent and scope of the Constitution point toward his impeachment. The Constitution nowhere says that he must be impeached while in office. Senators will recollect that in one of the authorities introduced by the counsel, [Mr. Blair,] Story on the Constitution, the very words are used, "while in office." The Constitution does not say that he must be impeached "while in office," but it describes him as an officer and allows his impeachment down to the day of his death for any act committed by him while in office. Of course, the good sense of the House of Representatives would prevent an impeachment after a long lapse of years, unless for an imminent reason. This question, Senators, must be left to the discretion of the House of Representatives.

In conclusion, we affirm this court has jurisdiction because the defendant has been Secretary of War. We also affirm under our special replication in aid of the jurisdiction, first, that this court has jurisdiction, because the law will not divide the day into fractions to defeat the judicial act of impeachment; second, that under the doctrine of relation the impeachment of the defendant can be sustained; third, that he is subject to impeachment because he resigned with the intent to evade the disqualification of the Constitution. The House of Representatives of the United States, having impeached the defendant of high crimes and misdemeanors, through their managers demand that he be tried by this court, and, if found guilty, that he be disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER, [after a pause.] Mr. President, I supposed another manager would speak on that side. It certainly should be so arranged. It can hardly be supposed that the other three managers are exactly going to repeat what has been said by their chairman. If there are new points to be made in the case, we certainly should hear some more of them before we are asked to speak further. We ought to hear at least two managers now, and not pile the whole three upon the counsel who closes this case.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, I supposed the understanding was perfect between the counsel and myself that he was to reply and then that three other managers, under the order of the court, would go on. The Senate will see at once that we ought to hear more from the other side. It would be unjust to compel two managers to go on now, having heard only one upon the other side.

Mr. CARPENTER. We have no understanding made with us that we understand upon that subject. There was some conversation upon it.

Mr. Manager LORD. That was the last suggestion which we made.

Mr. CARPENTER. Some conversation passed upon it. At all events, the fair way to do is for two managers to speak now and then the other two before the case is closed by the counsel for the defendant.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. CARPENTER. I desire to say that unless an arrangement is made, if another manager does not come next, it will fall upon me to proceed on the part of the defendant. I certainly cannot proceed to-night for I am not in a state of health to do so. I had not expected to be called on to-day. I have some briefs that are being printed, which I expect to be able to use to-morrow or the next day; but it would be impossible for me to go on to-night with any justice to the case, or to myself, or to anybody else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion proposed by the Senator from Kansas that the Senate sitting for this trial take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall not take a recess. I do not care how long we sit, but I think we had better not go down street and come back again this evening.

Mr. COOPER. I move that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment do now adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. Until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. CONKLING. The rule fixes the hour at half after twelve.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better fix it at twelve.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate sitting in trial do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap adjourned until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

FRIDAY, May 5, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having announced that the time had arrived fer the consideration of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap,

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Blair, Mr. Black, and Mr. Carpenter.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will give the usual notice to the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting yesterday for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to proceed with the trial. The counsel will now be heard. Senators will give attention.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President and Senators, under the order made by the court I had hoped and expected that at least two of the managers would be heard before I should have to address the Senate; but this seems not to be convenient for them. The only real difficulty I feel in presenting this case to the Senate is that it requires a more vivid imagination than I possess to conceive what is to be said or can be said by the other side.

Briefly, the attitude of the case is this:

The articles of impeachment charge that the respondent, Belknap, was at one time Secretary of War, and, while holding that office, did certain things which are declared by said articles to be high crimes and misdemeanors.

The respondent pleads to the jurisdiction of the court that, when this proceeding was commenced, he was not an officer of the United States, but was a private citizen.

The first replication avers that he was Secretary of War when he committed the acts complained of, and the respondent has demurred.

A second replication by the House charges that after the acts were committed the House had commenced an investigation, with a view to impeachment, and that the respondent, with full knowledge of the fact, resigned his office, with intent to evade impeachment. This replication has closed in issues of fact, which are pending for trial.

The court has ordered an argument in regard to the sufficiency of the plea in abatement, the materiality of the issues of fact, and also whether the House can support the jurisdiction by matters alleged in subsequent pleadings, but not alleged in the articles of impeachment.

I shall endeavor to maintain the following propositions:

1. That articles of impeachment cannot be entertained against a private citizen in any case whatever.

2. That wherever articles of impeachment are exhibited, they must set forth every fact essential to constitute a high crime or misdemeanor, and every fact necessary to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the court; and

3. That the issues of fact arising upon the plea in abatement are immaterial.

I. Can proceedings by impeachment be maintained against a private citizen?

There are two theories of the Constitution in regard to impeachment.

1. That the provisions which give the House the power to impeach, and the Senate the sole power to try impeachments, confer a power as broad as that before then exercised by the British Parliament in regard to the persons who may be impeached and the crimes for which impeachment may be had. And that the provision, "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office," &c., is a mere limitation upon the power to punish; and that the provision, "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office by impeachment, for," &c., merely declares what the punishment shall be, when the person impeached happens to be such officer.

2. The other theory is, that impeachment, as authorized and regulated by the Constitution, is only a proceeding to remove an unworthy public officer.

One or the other of these theories must be accepted; there is no middle ground. And the importance of judging correctly which is the proper construction cannot be exaggerated.

If the former theory be adopted, it will follow that every inhabitant of the United States, citizen or alien, male or female, may be impeached for any conduct or transaction which, in the opinion of the Senate for the time being, may be characterized as a high crime or misdemeanor.

The Constitution provides—

1. The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 1, section 2.)

2. The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments, and the judgment in such cases shall extend no further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold office.

3. But the party convicted shall be liable to indictment, &c. (Article 1, section 3.)

4. The President shall have no power to pardon in cases of impeachment. (Article 2, section 2.)

These provisions regulate the accusation, trial, and judgment in cases of impeachment, but do not determine who shall be subject to impeachment, beyond the strong inference arising from article 1, section 3, clause 7, which provides that the judgment shall not extend beyond removal from office AND disqualification to hold office.

But this is settled by article 3, section 4, as follows:

There are a few fundamental principles never to be lost sight of in any constitutional discussion. Sovereignty with us resides in the people. They have delegated to the State governments the attributes of sovereignty so far as deemed consistent with free institutions. The Constitution of the United States establishes a government with supreme powers over certain subjects. In other words, the sovereign powers possessed by the people are distributed between the Federal and State governments; and it is well settled by the courts, and conceded by all sound statesmen and good lawyers, that the State governments possess all the powers consistent with free institutions, except those which are denied to them by their own or the Federal Constitution. That, whenever a power is denied to a State, the objection can be supported only by pointing out a constitutional prohibition. But, on the other hand, the Federal Government possesses no power not conferred by the Federal Constitution, either by express words or necessary implication. And by necessary implication only such powers are granted as are essential to the execution of the powers which are expressly granted. And, manifestly, a claim of jurisdiction in this court, which, if conceded, would subject forty millions of people to its power in all matters of high crime or misdemeanor, must find support in clear grant in the Constitution, and is not to be assumed upon forced construction or doubtful implication.

Bearing these principles in mind, if I can establish that no warrant is found in the Constitution for impeachment of a private citizen in any case whatever, this proceeding must fall. To say that a private citizen may be impeached. but only for crimes committed in some office formerly held by him, would be to establish a distinction as arbitrary and capricious as to say he can only be impeached for crimes committed by him while he was between thirty and forty years of age. The question is whether a private citizen can be impeached at all. If so, he may be impeached for whatever the Senate for the time being may consider a high crime or misdemeanor, without regard to the time, place, or circumstance of committing the offense.

I shall endeavor to show, from the text of the Constitution, from the debates of the convention which framed it, contemporaneous writings of public men, commentaries of recognized authority, and the decisions of this court, that the only office which impeachment can perform is removal from office or removal and disqualification, in the discretion of the court. If I shall succeed in this endeavor, it will follow that impeachment can only be brought against one who is an officer of the United States at the time of impeachment.

I shall first refer to the debates and proceedings of the Constitutional Convention, which will be seen to shed a flood of light upon this question.

After several plans had been submitted and discussed in Committee of the Whole, the committee, on the 13th day of June, 1787, reported to the convention a general scheme of the Constitution, in the form of resolutions, nineteen in all. Two of these resolutions touch the subject of impeachment.

The ninth resolution relates to the Executive;—how he should be elected, what his powers should be, to be ineligible a second time, "and to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty."

The thirteenth resolution was in regard to the judiciary, and proposed "that the jurisdiction of the national judiciary shall extend to all cases which respect the collection of the national revenue, impeachments of any national officers, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony." (2 Curtis's Constitution, pages 86, 87.)

Here, manifestly, impeachment is regarded as a proceeding 1or the removal of a public officer. The ninth resolution declares that the President shall be removable on impeachment; and the thirteenth, which relates to the exercise of the power to try impeachments, is confined to "impeachments of any national officers."

Again, the ninth resolution proposes the removal of the President "on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty." That is, that the President should only be impeached while in office, because the object of impeachment was to remove him. In the thirteenth resolution the power is to try "impeachments of any national officers;" not impeachment for misconduct in office, but impeachments of national officers.

These resolutions exclude the idea that impeachment was intended to reach any one not in office, because it is manifest that the power to impeach could not extend beyond the power to try impeachments; and this was confined to impeachment of officers.

On the 20th of July, the ninth resolution was considered by the convention; and the subject of impeachment was discussed quite at length. Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Morris moved to strike out the clause subjecting the President to removal by impeachment.

Mr. Pinckney observed he ought not to be impeached while in office.

Mr. DAVIE. If he be not impeachable while in office, he will spare no efforts or means whatever to get himself re-elected. He considered this as an essential security for the good behavior of the Executive.

Mr. Wilson concurred in the necessity of making the Executive impeachable while in office.

Mr. MORRIS. He can do no criminal act without coadjutors, who may be punished. * * * Is the impeachment to suspend his functions? If it is not, the mischief will go on. If it is, the impeachment will be nearly equivalent to a displacement, and will render the Executive dependent on those who are to impeach.

Dr. Franklin was for retaining the clause as favorable to the Executive, upon the ground that, if not removable by impeachment, recourse would be had to assassination, by which he would not only be deprived of his life, but of all opportunity to vindicate his character.

Mr. Madison thought impeachment necessary to defend the community against the incapacity, negligence, or perfidy of the Chief Magistrate.

Mr. Gerry urged the necessity of impeachments. A good magistrate will not fear them; a bad one ought to be kept in fear of them.

Mr. King maintained that only those officers who held during good behavior ought to be impeached.

Mr. Randolph was in favor of impeachments as a check upon the Executive; especially in time of war, when the military force, and in some respects the public money, will be in his hands. Should no regular punishment be provided, it will be irregularly inflicted by tumults and insurrections.

Dr. Franklin cited the bad conduct of the Dutch Stadtholder and the evil which resulted from his not being impeachable.

Mr. King remarked that the case of the Stadtholder was not applicable. He held his place for life, and was not periodically elected. In the former case impeachments are proper to secure good behavior. In the latter they are necessary.

Mr. Morris, at the conclusion of the debate, said that his views had been changed by the discussion. The Executive ought to be impeachable. He should be punished not as a man, but as an officer, and punished only by degradation from his office.

And on the question, "Shall the Executive be removable on impeachment," the vote by States was—yeas 8, nays 2.

This was the principal debate in the convention upon this subject, and shows conclusively that no member of the convention entertained the idea that impeachments should be employed against any but public officers.

On the 6th of August the committee of detail reported their first draught of the Constitution. It provided, (article 4, section 6:)

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Article 10, section 2, provided:

He [the President] shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction, in the Supreme Court, of treason, bribery, or corruption.

Article 11, section 3, extended the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to "the trial of impeachments of officers of the United States." And section 5, article 11, contained the provision as to punishment, as it now stands in the Constitution.

This draught of the Constitution clearly confines impeachment to "officers of the United States;" because the power to try impeachments is so confined.

August 31, such parts of the Constitution as had been postponed, and such parts of reports as had not been acted on, were referred to a committee of eleven. This committee, on the 4th day of September, made a partial report, in which they recommended that the latter part of section 2, article 10, should read as follows:

He [the President] shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction by the Senate, for treason or bribery.

The committee explained the reason for giving the power to try impeachments to the Senate, instead of the Supreme Court, to be that the judges would be appointed by the President, and therefore ought not to try him on impeachment.

On the 8th of September the report was considered, and the provision as to impeachment of the President was amended, on motion of Colonel Mason, by adding after the word "bribery" the words "other high crimes and misdemeanors against the state." And for the word "state" the words "United States" were substituted, to avoid ambiguity.

Colonel Mason's first motion was, to insert after the word "bribery" the words "or maladministration."

Mr. Madison objected to this term which, he said, was so vague that the President's tenure would be during the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. MORRIS. It will not be put in force, and can do no harm. An election of every four years will prevent maladministration.

Colonel Mason then withdrew "maladministration," and substituted "other high crimes and misdemeanors."

It is evident from this that the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" was used in the sense of official misconduct amounting to crime or misdemeanor. The phrase was substituted for "maladministration" only because that word was too vague and general.

After this, on motion, and without debate, the following, "The Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction as aforesaid," was added to the clause on the subject of impeachments.

This left the provision of the Constitution as follows:

He [the President] shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives and conviction by the Senate, for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States. The Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction as aforesaid.

In this condition the matter went to the committee on style and arrangement. This committee made its report on the 12th day of September, and their draught contained the provisions as finally adopted, except that the words "or affirmation" were subsequently added to the requirement that Senators should be "on oath" in the trial.

It is thus seen that not a word was uttered by any member of the convention, and nothing appears in its proceedings, giving the slightest support to the theory that impeachment extends to any but those who are holding office at the time of impeachment. It is manifest that impeachment was intended as a method of removal from office, and that the cause for removal from office should be official misconduct.

These proceedings of the convention show conclusively that the framers of the Constitution intended to provide only for the impeachment of those holding office, for misconduct in such office. And, if the Constitution reaches private citizens, it is certain that it was not intended to do so, and its framers failed to employ language to secure the end they had in view. Such charge has never yet been made, and cannot be maintained, against those illustrious statesmen.

The only proper rule of construction, whether applied to a constitution, a statute, or a contract, is to ascertain the intention of those who made it; and, when such intention is ascertained, it must be carried into effect.

Upon no other principle can the jurisdiction of this court be maintained in any case whatever. If we are to consider the mere language, apart from the intention of those who framed the Constitution and the amendments, it is demonstrable that impeachment will not lie even against a public officer for any act which falls within treason, bribery, or other high crime or misdemeanor, created or defined by any statute, or known to the common law. This is a startling proposition, but clearly tenable upon construction of the language of the Constitution and amendments, apart from the known intention of those who framed and adopted them.

It is well known that the Constitution was not acceptable to many of the States which ratified it; and that it was ratified with the expectation that it would be immediately amended. And several of the States, at the time of ratification, suggested amendments intended to limit, and more carefully define, the powers of the General Government. In accordance with this expectation the first Congress under the Constitution proposed several amendments, which were ratified by the States, materially changing the Constitution. But these amendments have generally been regarded as though they had been contained in the original instrument. Everybody understands that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments have wrought material changes. They were intended so to do, and are construed accordingly. And yet it is manifest that the first eleven amendments fall within the same canons of judicial construction; and that each must be considered as repealing any provision of the original instrument with which, when properly construed, it conflicts.

Let us turn now to the fifth and sixth amendments, and consider their language, without regard to the intention with which, and the objects for which, they were adopted.

The original Constitution provides in words, that officers of the United States may be impeached by the House and tried by the Senate, for treason, bribery, or any other high crime or misdemeanor; and that, too, without regard to whether such offense was committed in an office by misuse of its functions, or while holding an office, the offense not being connected with the office; or committed at any time even previous to holding an office. And that the officer, after being tried by the Senate, and punished to the extent of removal, or removal and disqualification, may be indicted, tried, and punished by the ordinary courts of law for the same offense. That is, he may be twice tried and twice punished for the same offense.

The fifth and sixth amendments of the Constitution are as follows:

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

"No person"—persons include every inhabitant of the United States, citizen or alien, male or female, in office or not—"shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless upon presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, &c.; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy, &c. * * * In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury," &c.

The respondent in this case is held to answer for an infamous crime, without presentment or indictment of a grand jury; and his case did not arise in the land or naval forces, within the meaning of the Constitution, even conceding him to have been in office at the time of the impeachment. The Secretary of War is a civil, not a military, officer. An impeachment is a criminal prosecution, and this trial is a trial for crime. This is established by article 3, section 2, as follows:

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.

It cannot be denied that the fifth and sixth amendments, construed according to the plain import of the language employed, is in conflict with and repeals the provisions of the original Constitution in relation to impeachment. The crime of bribery, which these articles are intended to charge, is made an indictable offense by the statutes of the United States. And, if this court shall hold that only the language shall be considered in construing the original Constitution, the same rule must be applied to these amendments, and the power of impeachment is abolished. There would be no escape from this result, under these amendments; but that we know as matter of history they were not so intended.

If I could show that it was objected to the ratification of the Constitution that the power of impeachment ought not to exist; that an officer of the United States ought not to be liable to be twice put in jeopardy before different tribunals; if I could read the debates in Congress when these amendments were proposed, showing that it was intended to abolish impeachment, no one would deny that the language of the amendments was adequate to the purpose. And the only possible answer to the proposition that impeachment is abolished by the amendments, is that they were not designed to produce that effect.

Reading the Constitution in the light of the circumstances which surrounded its adoption, and the known purpose of its framers; and reading the amendments in view of the objections to the original instrument, and the purpose of those who framed the amendments, the amendment may be so construed as not to impair the power of impeachment. This method of construction was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace, page 36. The court, speaking of the true import of the amendments of the Constitution, say:

The most cursory glance at these articles discloses a unity of purpose, when taken in connection with the history of the times, which cannot fail to have an important bearing on any question of doubt concerning their true meaning. Nor can such doubts, when any reasonably exist, be safely and rationally solved without a reference to that history; for in it is found the occasion and the necessity for recurring again to the great source of power in this country, the people of the States, for additional guarantees of human rights; additional powers to the Federal Government; additional restraints upon those of the States. Fortunately that history is fresh within the memory of us all, and its leading features, as they bear upon the matter before us, free from doubt.

And in the light of this history, and to secure the purpose for which it was adopted, the court proceeded to construe the fourteenth amendment, limiting its operations to much less than its language imports.

I am content in this case with this rule of construction; content that the intention with which the power of impeachment was incorporated in the Constitution, that is, to remove unworthy officers of the United States, should be applied to that instrument; content that the same rule should be applied to the fifth and sixth amendments. But, if this rule be rejected as to the Constitution itself, it cannot be applied to the amendments; and the power of impeachment is gone altogether.

Speaking of the text of the Constitution, I may refer to the method adopted in its frame-work, of first conferring a power, and then proceeding to define it. For instance, article 1, section 1, provides, "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The Constitution then proceeds carefully to enumerate the powers and privileges of the respective Houses, and the legislative powers they shall exercise.

Article 2, section 1, declares, "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America;" and then follows an enumeration of the powers which shall be exercised by the President.

Article 3, section 1, provides, "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time ordain and establish;" then follows a declaration of the nature and extent of the power to be exercised by the courts.

Bearing in mind this method, when we read that the "House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment; and the Senate, the sole power to try impeachments;" and learn from the debates in the convention, that impeachment was intended as a method of removal from office, we naturally look elsewhere in the Constitution for the extent of this power; in other words, for the officers who may be removed by this method, which we find in section 4 of article 2, as follows:

> The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment, &c.

There is a strong implication arising from the provision that punishment in cases of impeachment shall extend no further than removal from office, or removal and disqualification, that impeachment only lies against those in office. But section 4 of article 2 is perfectly conclusive.

Consider the language of this fourth section of the second article. The President shall be removed, &c. Suppose General Jackson still alive, and to be impeached to-day for removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States. Who would preside over the trial?

Section 3 of article 1 provides,

> When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside.

Suppose General Jackson living, and impeached for removing the deposits. Would the Chief Justice preside? Manifestly not, because General Grant is President, and the case supposed would be an impeachment of a private citizen, and not of the President. And yet, upon the theory now maintained, that once a President is always a President for the purposes of impeachment, the Chief Justice would have to preside. This is as absurd as it would be to construe a statute giving members of Congress the franking privilege, as giving that privilege to every one who had been a member of Congress.

The Constitution does not authorize the impeachment of certain crimes, that is, crimes committed in offices, but it authorizes an impeachment of certain persons, described by the class to which they belong; that is, civil officers of the United States.

I may assume, therefore, that the purpose for which the power of impeachment was incorporated in the Constitution will be observed by this court, in exercising the jurisdiction which the Constitution confers. And upon this subject the debates in the convention are not only satisfactory, but absolutely conclusive.

Before passing from the subject of these debates, let me say that considerable opposition was developed against embodying this power in the Constitution. Those who opposed it did so upon the ground that conferring the power would make the President a subservient tool of Congress, and destroy the proper equilibrium of the three departments. On the other hand it was urged that without the impeachment clause it would be in the power of the President, especially in time of war, when he would have large military and naval forces at command, and public moneys at his disposal, to overthrow the liberties of the people. Near the close of the debate, Mr. Morris said his views had been changed by the discussion, and he expressed his opinion to the effect that—

> The Executive ought to be impeached. He should be punished, not as a man, but as an officer; and punished only by degradation from his office.

This was the only debate upon the general subject of impeachment. Thus it will be seen that those who favored, and those who opposed, incorporating the power in the Constitution, contemplated the impeachment of officers while holding office.

There was a subsequent debate, in regard to the tribunal to be charged with the trial of impeachments; and the Senate was selected, instead of the Supreme Court, for the reason that a few judges, separated from the people by the nature of their office, would not be able to handle those great offenders, in possession of the overwhelming powers of the Government, whose enormous crimes might make the blood of ordinary criminal courts run cold; and whose power might set at naught the authority of such courts. The Senate was selected because its members would be more numerous, its connections with the people more intimate, and hence its power would be more efficient to deal with the President or other high officer of the Government controlling the physical force and financial resources of the Government. The President or the Secretary of War, with half a company of regulars, might disperse the grand jury of a court; but could not interfere with the functions of the Senate, without arousing the indignation of the people.

So that this, like the former debate, shows that nothing was contemplated but the impeachment of persons holding office at the time of impeachment. Indeed the remarks of every member of the convention, who participated in either of the debates, as well those in favor of, as those opposed to, the power of impeachment, shows that impeachment of officers only was contemplated; and not a word was uttered by any member of the convention giving the slightest countenance to the idea that a private citizen was subject to impeachment.

And before passing from this subject, let me repeat that the phrase "high crime or misdemeanor," so terrible because so indefinite, was inserted in the Constitution in place of the still more ambiguous phrase "maladministration;" and because the power of removal by impeachment for maladministration would enable the Senate to remove a President on a mere difference of opinion as to the propriety of the exercise of a power clearly confided to the President. And the object of this amendment was to declare that the maladministration, to be cause of removal, should amount to a crime or misdemeanor as defined by the common law or some statute of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. What was said about the provision that the Chief Justice shall preside on the trial of the President?

Mr. CARPENTER. The time allowed me by the Senate to prepare for this argument does not enable me to say that the subject was not mentioned in the convention; but I may say that I have not been able to find that it was, and I think this provision was inserted by the committee on style and arrangement. This committee observed the votes of the convention, but, in matters not settled by votes, exercised their discretion with considerable freedom.

Let me repeat another remark. It is manifest from the discussions in the convention, that impeachment was regarded as a check or curb upon the exercise of power in the possession of those subject to impeachment; and not as retribution or punishment against those who had ceased to hold office, for former misconduct in office.

This conclusion is supported by text writers, and the only adjudication on the subject in this court.

Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, section 803, says:

> As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution "that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than a removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," and in another clause that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," it would seem to follow that the Senate, on the conviction, were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice. And it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the state against gross official misdemeanors.

Curtis, in his History of the Constitution, says:

> Although an impeachment may involve an inquiry whether a crime against any positive law has been committed, yet it is not necessarily a trial for crime, nor is there any necessity in the case of crimes committed by public officers for the institution of any special proceeding for the infliction of the punishment prescribed by the laws, since they, like all other persons, are amenable to the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts of justice, in respect of offenses against positive law. The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law has been committed, as where the individual has from immorality, or imbecility, or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office. The rules by which an impeachment is to be determined are therefore peculiar, and are not fully embraced by those principles or provisions of law which courts of ordinary jurisdiction are required to administer.

No. 65 of the Federalist, written by Alexander Hamilton, says:

> The subjects of impeachment are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may with peculiar propriety be denominated POLITICAL, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself.

The learned manager, Mr. LORD, yesterday referred to this quotation, and relied upon the phrase "public men" as proof that Mr. Hamilton supposed that impeachment would lie against prominent citizens, though not in office. He referred to my honorable colleague (Judge Black) as a public man, though no longer in office. I concede that my colleague is a public man, and very distinguished among public men. But it is evident that he is not included within the category of those supposed by Mr. Hamilton to be subject to impeachment.

Mr. Hamilton says:

> The subjects of impeachment are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, "from the abuse or violation of some public trust."

Judge Black, though a public man in the popular sense, is not at present charged with the administration of any public trust.

In Blount's case, where the question I am discussing was first presented to this court, Messrs. Bayard and Harper, managers, understanding the task before them, grappled with the subject, and maintained the broad ground that the power of impeachment under our Constitution reached to every inhabitant of the United States. Blount, not as a Senator, but while a Senator, had committed the acts charged in the articles of impeachment. He pleaded to the jurisdiction, first, that he was not an officer of the United States when he committed the acts complained of, and, secondly, that he was not even a Senator at the time of the impeachment. It appeared from the record that he was a Senator at the time the acts were committed. The managers argued that a Senator was a civil officer. But they also contended that whether a Senator was a civil officer or not, was immaterial; because impeachment was not confined to civil officers. And there was no fault in their reasoning, upon their premises. If impeachment lies against any private citizen of the United States, then Blount should have been convicted; because surely he could not interpose his senatorial character as a shield against an impeachment maintainable against any private citizen. And so the question was distinctly presented, whether or not impeachment lies against a private citizen.

The court, as is well known, decided that there was no jurisdiction. And this decision is an authoritative declaration that impeachment cannot be maintained against a private citizen.

I need not take the time to show why the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, should be bound by its former adjudications. In the proceeding of impeachment so much is necessarily left without definition or regulation, that the determinations of the court, after able argument and full consideration, should not be departed from, except for irresistible reasons.

In the case of President Johnson the managers concluded that the object of impeachment was removal from office. General Butler, in opening the case, submitted a brief prepared by Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, member of Congress from Ohio, the burden of which is that the sole object of impeachment is the removal of an unfit public officer. This brief may be found in the first volume congressional edition of the trial, page 123. I will give some extracts from this brief bearing upon and supporting our present position.

On page 124 is the following:

In England impeachment may, to some extent, be regarded as a mode of trial designed, inter alia, to punish crime, though not entirely so, since a judgment on an impeachment is no answer to an indictment in the King's Bench. Here impeachment is only designed to remove unfit persons from office, and the party convicted is subject to indictment, trial, and punishment in the proper courts.

On page 126, after referring to the principles which governed impeachment in England, prior to the adoption of our Constitution, he says:

With these landmarks to guide them, our fathers adopted a constitution under which official malfeasance and nonfeasance, and, in some cases, misfeasance, may be the subject of impeachment, although not made criminal by act of Congress, or so recognized by the common law of England or of any State of the Union. They adopted impeachment as a means of removing men from office whose misconduct imperils the public safety and renders them unfit to occupy political position.

All this is supported by the elementary writers, both English and American, on parliamentary and common law; by the English and American usage in cases of impeachment; by the opinions of the framers of the Constitution; by contemporaneous construction, all uncontradicted by any author, authority, case, or jurist, for more than three-quarters of a century after the adoption of the Constitution.

On page 134 he says:

The Constitution contains inherent evidence that the indictable character of an act does not define its impeachable quality. It enumerates the classes of cases in which legislative power may be exercised, and it defines the class of persons and cases to which the judicial power extends; but there is no such enumeration of impeachable cases, though there is of persons.

In England and some of the States the power of removal of officers by the executive on the address or request of the Legislature exists, but the Constitution made no provision for this as to any officer, manifestly because the power of impeachment extended to every proper case for removal.

As to the President and Vice-President, there is this provision, that "Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, * * * declaring what officer shall then act * * * until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected." (Article 2, section 1.)

It has already been shown that the framers of the Constitution regarded the power of impeachment as a means of defending "the community against the incapacity" of officers. This clause of the Constitution recognized the same view, (article 2, section 1:) "Congress may by law provide for the case of * * * inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected."

This, and the power of impeachment are the only modes of getting rid of officers whose inability from insanity or otherwise renders them unfit to hold office, and whose every official act will necessarily be misdemeanor. As to the President and Vice-President, it was necessary to give Congress the power to designate a successor, and so to determine the disability. As to all other officers, the Constitution or laws define the mode of designating a successor, and it is left to the impeaching power to remove in cases of insanity or misdemeanor arising from that or other cause. It cannot be supposed the whole nation must suffer without remedy if the whole Supreme Court or other officers should become utterly disabled from the performance of their duties. Such an occurrence is within the range of possibility, if not probability.

On page 140 he says:

The first case tried, that of William Blount, a Senator of the United States from Tennessee, simply decided that none but civil officers can be impeached, and that a Senator is not such civil officer.

These are the grounds upon which the House of Representatives demanded the conviction of President Johnson. It would be a burlesque of justice to suppose that the House of Representatives could demand the conviction of Belknap by denying the principles upon which they demanded the conviction of Johnson.

But we are not left to the doctrine of this House upon the subject. We have the opinions of Senators upon this point.

Senator HOWE, volume 3, page 68, said:

I hold, with the elder authorities, with the late authorities, with all the authorities, that impeachment is a process provided, not for the punishment of crime, but for the protection of the state. And so holding, I must give judgment, not as to whether the acts proved upon the respondent are declared by the criminal code to be crimes, but whether I think them so prejudicial to the state as to warrant his removal.

Senator EDMUNDS, ibid., page 89, said:

Punishment by impeachment does not exist under our Constitution. The accused cannot thereby be deprived of life, liberty, or property. He can only be removed from the office he fills, and prevented from holding office, not as a punishment, but as a means merely of protection to the community against the danger to be apprehended from having a criminal in office.

Senator Garrett Davis, page 156, said:

First. No person but civil officers of the United States are subject to impeachment.

Senator Sumner, page 249, said:

It [impeachment] is not in the nature of punishment, but in the nature of protection to the Republic. It is confined to removal from office and disqualification; but, as if aware that this was no punishment, the Constitution further provides that this judgment shall be no impediment to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment "according to law." Thus again is the distinction declared between an impeachment and a proceeding "according to law." The first, which is political, belongs to the Senate, which is a political body; the latter, which is judicial, belongs to the courts, which are judicial bodies. The Senate removes from office; the courts punish. I am not alone in drawing this distinction. It is well known to all who have studied the subject. Early in our history it was put forth by the distinguished Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, the father of Senators, in the case of Blount, and it is adopted by no less an authority than our highest commentator, Judge Story, who was as much disposed as anybody to amplify the judicial power. In speaking of this text he says that impeachment "is not so much designed to punish the offender as to secure the state against gross official misdemeanors; that it touches neither his person nor property, but simply divests him of his political capacity. (Story, Commentaries, volume I, § 803.) All this seems to have been forgotten by certain apologists on the present trial, who, assuming that impeachment was a proceeding "according to law," have treated the Senate to the technicalities of the law, to say nothing of the law's delay.

And again, at page 270, he said:

This is a trial of impeachment, and not a criminal case in a county court. It is a proceeding for expulsion from office on account of political offenses, not a suit at law.

On page 67, volume 2, Mr. Manager BOUTWELL says:

The object of this proceeding is not the punishment of the offender, but the safety of the state.

And on page 99:

They have brought this respondent to your bar, and here demand his conviction in the belief, as the result of much investigation, of much deliberation, that the interests of this country are no longer safe in his hands.

The learned manager evidently considered that removal from office, not punishment of the offender, was the only object of the constitutional provision for impeachment.

We have been unable to find a single case in which impeachment has been sustained where the accused was not in office at the time of impeachment.

In the case of Barnard, in New York, he was impeached for, among other things, offenses committed in a former term of the same office. But he was in the same office at the time of impeachment. In the first volume of the Trial of Barnard, page 151, we find the argument of Mr. Beach for the defendant, who cites the report of the judiciary committee of the house of New York in the case of Philip C. Fuller:

The house directed the judiciary committee to inquire and report,

First. Whether a person could be impeached who, at the time of his impeachment, was not the holder of an office under the laws of the State.

Second. Whether a person could be impeached and deprived of his office for malconduct, or offenses done or committed under a prior term of the same or any other office.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Weeks, from the judiciary committee, reported that—

The only clause in the Constitution relating to judgments upon impeachments provides that judgments in such cases shall not extend further than the removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under this State; but the party impeached shall be liable to indictment and punishment according to law.

From this and from the theory upon which our Government is based, the committe have come to the conclusion:

First. That no person can be impeached who was not, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, and at the time of the impeachment, holding some office under the laws of this State.

That the person impeached must have been in office at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, and at the time of the impeachment holding some office under the laws of this State.

That the person impeached must have been in office at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, is clear from the theory of our Government, namely: That all power is with the people who, if they saw fit, might elect a man to office guilty of every moral turpitude, and no court has the power to thwart this their will, and say he shall not hold the office to which they have elected him. A contrary doctrine would subvert the spirit of our institutions.

It is equally clear, from the tenor of the Constitution, that the person must be in office at the time of the impeachment. This instrument provides that two modes of punishment, namely: Removal from office, or removal or disqualification to hold office. In either mode of punishment the person must be in office, for removal is contemplated in both cases, which cannot be effected unless the person is in office.

The courts are the only tribunals that have jurisdiction over a delinquent, after his term of office has expired, to punish him for offenses committed in the discharge of the duties of his office.

The committee have further come to the conclusion:

Secondly. That no person can be impeached and deprived of his present term of office, for offenses alleged to have been committed during a prior term of the same, or any other office.

Neither by the Constitution nor by our laws is there any period limited in which an impeachment may be found. It is but fair, therefore, to infer that the intention was to confine the time to the term of office during which the offenses were alleged to have been committed; any other conclusion would lead to results which could not be sustained, for who can say but that the people knew of this malconduct, these offenses, and elected the individual notwithstanding; true, an extreme case might be put of fraud committed on the last day of the term of an office, to which office the individual might be immediately re-elected; yet who could say this was not known to the people. How is the matter to be settled? The mere statement of the question shows the dilemma in which we would be placed at every election, if the tenure of stability of an office depended upon a legal inquiry as to whether the people knew the characters of the individuals they had elected to office, and had exercised a proper discretion.

However much it may be desired to have men of high integrity and honesty to fill our public offices of trust and honor, yet, by our Constitution and the fundamental principles of our Government, no particular scale of integrity, honesty, or morality is fixed. No inquisition as to what character had been can be held; it is enough that the people have willed the person should hold the office, and the courts, which are but the mere creatures of the public, will have no power to interfere.

The Constitution provides, as we have seen, that a person cannot be impeached after he is out of office; then, if the same person should be re-elected to the same office a year afterward, would this right of impeachment be revived? In fine, by his re-election, would he incur any other liabilities or acquire any other rights than those incident to his present term of office? We think a moment's reflection would convince each person that it would not.

Again, could an officer be deprived of his present office by impeachment for malconduct in another and different office, or even the same office, twenty years before his present term commenced? If not, could he after one year or one moment had elapsed? The time is nothing; the question is, is he out of office? It matters not if the next moment he is inducted in.

The committee think it clear, in every light they have been able to view this matter, that the Constitution intended to confine impeachments to persons in office, and for offenses committed during the term of the office for which the person is sought to be removed. In pursuance of this conclusion, the committee recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of investigation into the official conduct of State officers, and of persons lately but not now holding office, be instructed—

1. That a person whose term of office has expired is not liable to impeachment under section 1, article 6, of the Constitution.

2. That a person holding an elective office is not liable to be impeached under section 1, article 6, of the Constitution for any misconduct before the commencement of his term, although such misconduct occurred while he held the same or another office under a previous election.

We have been unable to find any case in which a private citizen has been held subject to impeachment for misconduct in an office formerly held by him. In the Barnard case, it is true, the court held that the accused might be convicted and removed from office on account of offenses committed in a former term of the same elective office which he was holding at the time of impeachment.

In the State of Ohio Messrs. Pease, Huntingdon and Tod held a certain act of the Legislature unconstitutional and void. At the session of the Legislature 1807–'8 steps were taken to impeach them therefor, but the resolution was not acted upon at that session. But at the next session steps were taken toward the impeachment of the offending judges, and articles of impeachment were reported against Pease and Tod, but not against Huntingdon, who, in the mean time, had been elected governor of the State, and, of course, had ceased to be a judge of the court. This discrimination is an authority in favor of the proposition that no man can be impeached after he is out of office. (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, page 160, note 3.)

To all this the managers, as I understand them, have nothing to oppose but the arguments in Blount's case, and three words from Rawle on the Constitution. I shall refer to both; I ask the Secretary to read from the argument of Mr. Bayard in that case, 2 Congressional Annals, page 2261.

The Secretary read as follows:

I observe, it is stated in the plea, that William Blount was not an officer of the United States at the time of the act done charged in the articles of impeachment. This objection is removed if either of the grounds which we have taken be maintainable: First, that impeachment is not confined to officers, but exends to every citizen; second, that a Senator is an officer of the United States.

It is also alleged in the plea, that the party impeached is not now a Senator. It is enough that he was a Senator at the time the articles were preferred. If the impeachment were regular and maintainable, when preferred, I apprehend no subsequent event, grounded on the willful act, or caused by the delinquency of the party, can vitiate or obstruct the proceeding. Otherwise the party, by resignation or the commission of some offense which merited and occasioned his expulsion, might secure his impunity. This is against one of the sagest maxims of the law, which does not allow a man to derive a benefit from his own wrong.

Mr. CARPENTER. Please read from the argument of Mr. Dallas, page 2278, the passage marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

It would be permitted to him, however, cursorily to remark that the articles of impeachment do not charge William Blount with any crime or misdemeanor committed in the execution of his office with any act which might not have been committed by any other citizen as well as a Senator; that there was room for argument whether an officer could be impeached after he was out of office; not by a voluntary resignation to evade prosecution, but by an adversary expulsion.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now read from Mr. Ingersoll, page 2294.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is among the less objections of the cause, that the defendant is now out of office, not by resignation. I certainly shall never contend that an officer may first commit an offense, and afterwards avoid punishment by resigning his office; but the defendant has been expelled.

Mr. CARPENTER. They also cited Rawle on the Constitution, page 213, for the benefit of three words only. On page 213 Mr. Rawle says:

From the reasons already given it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office.

Three words, "or have been," is all they claim any comfort from in this passage from Rawle—an instance of the caution of a writer, in laying down a general proposition, to throw in here and there qualifications which may or may not exist. He does not discuss the question at all, or give any reason why men should be impeached after they are out of office.

In regard to the argument of Blount's counsel, it may be remarked that the question was not involved in that case. Blount had not resigned. Neither Mr. Dallas nor Mr. Ingersoll had been retained to compose an essay upon the subject of impeachment, but simply to take care of Blount in that case. It is the constant habit of counsel, in arguing a particular cause, to concede a proposition from the other side which does not affect their client. It is much easier to confess a proposition and avoid it by showing that the case is not within it, than to answer the proposition itself. Judges hold that they are not bound by an opinion upon a state of facts not before them. An obiter dictum does not bind the court, and a fortiori should not be regarded as the deliberate opinion of counsel. It was a proposition wholly immaterial in that case; and therefore counsel might confess and avoid, instead of taking time to answer the proposition on its merits. The question of jurisdiction depends upon whether the respondent holds or does not hold an office, and not whether he got out of it by expiration of his term or by resignation.

The honorable managers rest their side of this question upon three words in Rawle's Commentaries; and the admission of two lawyers in arguing a cause where the question was wholly immaterial.

Mr. McDONALD. I propose a question to the counsel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Indiana.

The Secretary read as follows:

If the term of office of the accused should terminate or expire pending the trial, would that operate to discontinue or abate the cause?

Mr. CARPENTER. I think it would.

Mr. THURMAN. I suppose that some time during the day the Senate will take a recess for a few minutes; and I would like to inquire of the counsel if it would suit his convenience for the Senate now to do so?

Mr. CARPENTER. I should like to go on for a few moments.

If I am right in saying that the only purpose of impeachment is to remove a man from office, when the man is out of office the object of impeachment ceases, and the proceedings must abate. There would be no further object to attain by the proceeding. Suppose the man committed suicide while his trial was progressing, would not that be good matter of abatement? Suppose he commits official suicide, by resigning, why should this not have the same effect? I have attempted to show that the sole object for which the power of impeachment was given is removal from office.

There is another proposition which I intended to argue in that connection. The disqualification clause of punishment was evidently put in for the purpose of making the power of removal by impeachment effectual. After providing that the officers of the United States might be removed on impeachment, although the President could not pardon the offender convicted and removed, yet if he could re-instate him the next morning he would have substantially the power of pardon. To prevent this was the object of the disqualifying clause; which Story says is not a necessary part of the judgment. You might impose it where you had removed an officer appointed by the President whom the President could re-instate. You could stop that by fixing disability upon the officer; and that I take to have been the sole purpose of this clause.

If I am right in this position, if the man died in the middle of the trial, or if he died after finding against him, but before judgment had been pronounced, the suit would abate. Must this court go on and sentence a man after he is dead,—either physically or officially dead? It is equally absurd to talk of removing a man from an office which he no longer fills, as to talk of removing a man from office after he is dead. So far as its effect upon the suit is concerned I see no difference between the case of his natural death and his official death. The suit abates because there is no further object to be attained by its prosecution.

Let me remind the Senate that there is not a writer on this subject who does not maintain that the power of impeachment was never intended for punishment.

This is conclusively shown by the fact that the party, after he is impeached, is to be indicted and punished for his crime. And it should be remarked that, if impeachment lies against one not in office, he must either not be punished at all, which would show the absurdity of the proceeding; or you must inflict the disqualification, which, Story says, you need not inflict on one removed from office.

Returning from this digression to the line of my argument, let me say that Rawle's Commentaries and the report of the Blount case were considered by Judge Story in writing his Commentaries; and he quotes from them both, but evidently disagrees with Rawle's parenthetic suggestion, and the concessions made by the counsel of Blount.

I read from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, § 789. The fourth section of the second article is quoted as follows:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Story then proceeds:

From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice-President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that kingdom all the king's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament, though it is asserted that commoners cannot now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution in Parliament. There seems a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeaching power to persons holding office.

I will not take the time to read further from this section, but it proceeds in answer to the suggestion made by Rawle and to the argument of Mr. Bayard and the concession made by the counsel for Blount to get rid of a point which conceded did not harm their client, or affect his case, and which they would rather concede than to argue.

Here is what Story says of Rawle, § 801:

A learned commentator seems to have taken it for granted that the liability to impeachment extends to all, who have been, as well as to all, who are, in public office.

Section 802 and section 803 bear upon the same point. I will read section 803:

As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution "that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than a removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," and in another clause that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors," it would seem to follow that the Senate, on the conviction, were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice. And it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the State against gross official misdemeanors.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the counsel. I ask it that I may understand fully his answer made to the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York propounds a question, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Is there no distinction on the point of jurisdiction to try an impeachment between the case of a resignation before articles are found and the case of resignation not till after articles have been found?

Mr. CARPENTER. That is like the question considered by Messrs. Dallas and Ingersoll in their case, and which they conceded, rather than stop to answer. It is a question not material in this case, because here the resignation preceded the exhibition of the articles. Still, to answer the question, I think that even such resignation would abate the proceedings.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate sitting for this trial take a recess of twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock p. m.) the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment took a recess for twenty minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, at two o'clock and twenty minutes p. m., resumed the chair.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President and Senators, during the recess I have reflected upon the questions proposed to me by two of the Senators; that by the Senator from Indiana, which is:

If the term of office of the accused should terminate or expire pending the trial, would that operate to discontinue or abate the cause?

And the other by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING:]

Is there no distinction on the point of jurisdiction to try an impeachment, between the case of a resignation before articles are found, and the case of resignation not till after articles have been found?

When these questions were propounded to me, I had in mind precisely the difficulty that I have inherited from the course pursued by Messrs. Dallas and Ingersoll. I was determined that the counsel who shall follow me in the next impeachment case, should not be embarrassed by any inconsiderate admission of mine. I therefore met the questions as I thought, at the moment, they ought to be answered.

The question put to me by the Senator from New York is very specific, and, in reply, I would say that a distinction exists between the case where a resignation precedes the exhibition of the articles, and the case where a resignation comes between the exhibition of the articles and final judgment. And this court might hold that after jurisdiction had attached by exhibition of the articles, or even by the formal impeachment which precedes exhibition of articles, the jurisdiction had attached, and resignation would not prevent final judgment. Speaking, however, for myself, I still incline to the opinion that, if the officer, who alone can be impeached, is out of the office before judgment of removal passes, this would abate a proceeding, which, I have endeavored to show, can only be had for the purpose of removal. It is said the law will not require a vain thing; from which I infer that the highest court in the Republic will not render a vain judgment. Having thus performed my duty to the next impeachment case, I return to my argument in this case.

I have read to the court three sections from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, to show that he did not accept the parenthetical suggestion of Mr. Rawle, nor the concessions made by counsel for Blount. Candor compels me to read from the Commentary of Judge Story:

SEC. 805. It is not intended to express any opinion in these commentaries, as to which is the true exposition of the Constitution on the points above cited. They are brought before the learned reader, as matters still sub judice, the final decision of which may be reasonably left to the high tribunal constituting the court of impeachment, when the occasion shall arise.

Every lawyer knows that Judge Story was in judicial office while he was writing these commentaries; every lawyer knows his method in regard to undecided questions, in all his legal writings. When he came to any important questions, not settled by judicial decisions, he gave the arguments pro and con, and invariably declined dogmatical declarations, but it is never difficult to discern the leaning of his own mind; notwithstanding his repeated assertion that he does not intend to express an opinion. And when he says, from a particular provision of the Constitution it seems to follow so and so, or that from a provision of the Constitution it seems to result so and so, we get the inclination of his mind, although he protests he is not giving an opinion, which, indeed, might embarrass him if the question should come before him judicially.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I send to the Chair a question which I submit for the counsel to answer at this point of the argument.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio propounds an inquiry, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Do or do not the remarks you have read from the debates in the constitutional convention relate exclusively or mainly to the question whether the chief executive officer in the Government should be unaccountable, as in Great Britain, or should be responsible?

Mr. CARPENTER. There were but two principal debates upon this subject in the convention. One was upon the question whether the power of impeachment should be incorporated in the Constitution; and the other was in regard to the question whether the trials of impeachments should be had in the Supreme Court or in the Senate. I do not think the precise question proposed by the Senator from Ohio was debated in the convention at all. The doctrine of kingly immunity, I think, was not debated at all. The principal point in debate was whether the power of impeachment should be conferred in regard to the President, whose tenure was only for a short term.

Mr. President, the question now pending before this court is not prejudiced by even the opinion of the House. When the report of the committee against this respondent was made in the House, the proceedings which followed were not such as to give any weight to the conclusion which was reached. Having referred on a former occasion to the disorder amid which the impeachment of the respondent in this case was carried, I will now refer to what was said by the Speaker of the House upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is resolved that this solemn business shall not proceed in such disgraceful disorder, and he therefore appeals respectfully and personally to every member upon this floor to aid him in restoring and maintaining order.

That was my authority for saying that these proceedings went on in the House under a state of things denominated by the Speaker as "disgraceful disorder." If there be any appeal from the Speaker of the House of Representatives, it certainly is not to the counsel for Belknap. We are bound by the ruling of the Speaker on that question.

Let me read the remarks of Mr. HOAR in the House, not so long ago as to have been forgotten by him, in a proceeding which he denominates judicial, a manager, too, on this occasion.

I thank the honorable manager for the suggestion made the other day that, when the proceeding took place, he was acting judicially, for that gives the more weight to the opinion he then expressed:

Mr. HOAR. The division of this hour, the committee being unanimous in one opinion, both republicans and democrats, seems to me to imply the opinion on the part of the chairman of the committee that it is in some way a political question. I utterly disclaim and repudiate such an idea. No person can be more desirous to punish any public officer found guilty of a crime like this charged upon the late Secretary of War than the republican members of the House. I wish simply to call attention to one matter. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROBBINS] alluded to the fact of the hasty acceptance of this resignation.

That is, the resignation of Belknap—

This House solemnly determined in the case of Whittemore that the formal act of resignation by the officer terminates the office, and that any American citizen can lay down an office held by him without the consent or acceptance of anybody whatever; it is a mere formal matter.

It is more than a matter of form to get into office, but according to the ruling of the learned judge [Mr. HOAR] it is a mere matter of form to get out. A mere resignation accomplishes this result.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] says he has not investigated the question whether after the civil office has terminated the officer can be impeached, but he thinks that the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] who said he had not looked at the authorities, as I understood him, has investigated it more than any other member of the committee.

Precisely what Mr. ROBBINS had read, this opinion of Judge HOAR does not state. I proceed now with the opinion:

Now, Judge Story, after full discussion, lays down the doctrine that it cannot be done.

We certainly shall not hear from the managers that Judge Story does not support the position for which we contend.

Now, Judge Story, after full discussion, lays down the doctrine that it cannot be done. In England any citizen can be impeached, and therefore the English case of Warren Hastings does not apply. In America no man can be impeached but a civil officer, and when he ceases to be a civil officer he ceases to be within the literal construction of the Constitution. In America the only judgment rendered is removal from office as the principal with the incident of perpetual disqualification to hold office, and the Constitution provides that the punishment of the offender shall take place as if the impeachment had been had by trial before a jury and a judge.

The judge (Mr. HOAR) proceeds:

Now, for these offenses there is provided in the statutes of the United States a punishment of fine and imprisonment, and perpetual disqualification to hold office. Now, sir, this man being out of office, and if found guilty it being impossible to get him back into another, I protest against this hot haste without even having the testimony printed, and determining the question whether it is expedient that all the authority of this House shall be exercised, when it is very likely that when this evidence is printed it may be found that the House may adopt the conclusion to which the committee have arrived; but it seems to me unworthy of this great occasion, and if

I stand alone, I stand here to say that this distinguished officer should not be impeached in this way under the previous question, without having the evidence in print on which he is charged, without giving these gentlemen who are sworn to support the Constitution an opportunity to decide upon the question on which such a jurist as Judge Story has expressed an opinion.

But against this array of authorities, showing that a private citizen cannot be impeached, the managers say that Belknap was in office at the time of the impeachment. It is not denied that Belknap resigned, and his resignation was accepted by the President, at ten o'clock and twenty minutes a. m., March 2, 1876; nor is it denied that the first proceedings in the House in relation to him took place after three p. m. of that day. But the managers say that, in legal contemplation, he was in office at the time of impeachment, because the law will not notice fractions of a day; and, second, that he resigned to evade impeachment, and therefore was in office for the purpose of impeachment after his resignation was accepted.

Fractions of a day! I did not suppose this case would be determined on a question of special pleading, or a fiction of law, until I heard the argument of the learned manager [Mr. LORD] yesterday. I supposed we could strike through the fog and place our feet upon the solid rock of jurisdiction. But the managers propose to hold us by a fiction. They maintain that, although the respondent had resigned, and his resignation had been accepted, nevertheless, this court must decide that he was in office all day, and until after his impeachment on the afternoon of that day, because this court cannot distinguish between the forenoon and afternoon of a day.

Suppose a man is sentenced by a criminal court to be hanged at two p. m. of a certain day; and suppose the President pardons him at ten a. m. of that day. Must he be hanged at two p. m., because the law knows no fraction of a day? We have heard of men being hanged on the gallows; hanged at the yard-arm; but we never heard of a man being hanged on the fraction of a day.

Suppose in time of war the colonel of a regiment is relieved from duty, or his resignation accepted at nine o'clock in the morning, and at four p. m. of the same day the regiment is engaged in battle. Could the colonel be court-martialed because he was not at the head of his regiment at four o'clock?

But having answered the managers on the substance of their claim of jurisdiction, we shall not yield to their fictions.

Broom's Legal Maxims, page 122, says:

It has indeed been affirmed as a broad general principle that "the truth is always to prevail against fiction," and hence, although for some purposes the whole assizes are to be considered as one legal day, "the court is bound, if required for the purpose of doing substantial justice, to take notice that such legal day consists of several natural days, or even of a fraction of a day." Evidence may therefore be adduced to show that an assignment of his goods by a felon, bona fide made for a good consideration, after the commission day of the assizes—was in truth made before the day on which he was tried and convicted, and on proof of such fact the property will be held to have passed by the assignment.

That is the term—

This matter is very fully discussed, exhaustively so, in 12 Common Bench Reports, at page 55, the case of Whitaker vs. Wisbey. Maule, judge, in stating the opinion says:

This case has been argued before us in a very learned and elaborate manner. Every authority which could have the remotest possible bearing upon the subject has been referred to; but I must own that I have not throughout entertained the slightest doubt. The action was in trover, to which there was a plea of not possessed. The plaintiff claimed the goods in question under a deed of assignment executed on the 20th of March, 1851, by Thomas Whitaker, the plaintiff's brother. It appeared that Thomas Whitaker, the assignor, and George Whitaker, his father, were tried and convicted of felony at the last spring assizes for the county of Cambridge; that the commission day of the assizes was the 19th of March; and that the trial and conviction of the prisoners took place on the 22d. The substantial defendants in this action were the corporation of Cambridge, who claimed as grantees of the goods and chattels of felons convict, &c. It was found by the jury that the conveyance under which the plaintiff claimed was executed bona fide and for a valuable consideration; and he had, no doubt, a good title, unless it was taken away by the assignor's conviction.

Then he proceeds to consider the authorities, and affirms the doctrine to be found in the syllabus, which I will read:

An assignment of a felon's goods, bona fide made for a good consideration, after the commission-day of the assizes, but before the day upon which he was actually tried and convicted, will pass the property.

The particular point decided is of no consequence, but it contains an examination and discussion of all the modern cases on the subject. The question came before Judge Story, (2 Story's Reports, 571,) a case remarkable for the clear manner in which the question was presented to the court. The syllabus of the case is this:

The doctrine, that, in law, there is no fraction of a day, is a mere legal fiction, and is true only in respect to cases where it will promote right and justice.

By the Constitution of the United States, every bill takes effect as a law, from the time when it is approved by the President, and then its effect is prospective and not retrospective.

A petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act was filed in the district court on the 3d day of March, 1843, about noon; the act of the 3d of March, 1843, repealing the bankrupt act, passed Congress, and was approved by the President, late in the evening of the same day. Held, that the court had jurisdiction of the petition at the time when it was filed and acted upon, and that it had full jurisdiction to entertain all proceedings thereon, to the close thereof, according to the provisions of the bankrupt act.

I should say here that the repealing act saved all cases and permitted them to proceed to final termination, which were commenced before the repeal of the act. This petition was filed about noon. The act was not repealed till late in the evening, and Judge Story held that he would take notice of the fraction of a day, and sustained the proceeding—the jurisdiction of the court. This decision contains a full examination of all the authorities on the question.

II. I come now to the question of the materiality of the issues of fact joined in this case upon pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment; or, to state the question in different terms, if a private citizen cannot be impeached for offenses committed in an office previously held by him, or during the time he held a public office, can he be amenable to impeachment, provided he resigned the office for the purpose of evading impeachment?

In general, it may be said that the legal effect of an act which one has a right to perform, and does perform, cannot be affected by the motive which induced its performance. The respondent was Secretary of War, and on the 2d day of March, 1876, at 10.20 a. m., he resigned, and the President accepted his resignation. It will be conceded that from that moment he was out of the office and became a private citizen. The consequences which result from his leaving the office and becoming a private citizen attach absolutely to the resignation and acceptance. Whether he resigned because he was weary of the office, dissatisfied with the compensation, or because he no longer wished to perform the duties and meet the responsibilities and incur the liabilities incident to a public officer, is immaterial as regards the effect or consequence of his resignation. If, as I have endeavored to show, no one who is a private citizen can be subject to impeachment, then the only material question is whether or not Belknap ceased to be Secretary of War on the 2d of March, at 10.20 in the forenoon, and became a private citizen. If the resignation was only pretended, not actual, if what took place between him and the President was a mere sham and did not vacate the office of Secretary of War, then of course he remained Secretary of War and subject to impeachment; and if this court should sustain jurisdiction upon the ground that what took place did not vacate the office, and on the final trial should acquit Belknap of these charges, it would follow that Belknap, never having ceased to be Secretary of War and being acquitted of the charges, is Secretary of War still, and he must be re-instated in the office. This is a reductio ad absurdum. For, proceeding upon the resignation as a fact, the President has nominated and the Senate confirmed Mr. Taft as successor to an office rendered vacant by Belknap's resignation.

The principle that the consequences of an act legally performed attach to its importance, without regard to the motives which induced it, is settled by the Supreme Court in McDonald vs. Smalley and others, 1 Peters, 320. The Constitution and laws give the Federal courts jurisdiction over controversies between citizens of different States. McArthur, a citizen of Ohio, claimed title to a piece of land in that State which was also claimed by other citizens of that State. Owing to a conflict of decisions between the State courts of Ohio and the circuit court of the United States for that district, McArthur's title would have been held void by the State courts and valid in the United States court. And McArthur, to evade the jurisdiction of the State courts, conveyed the land to McDonald, a citizen of Alabama, for a stipulated price, and received payment. Suit was brought by McDonald in the Federal court for Ohio, and the jurisdiction of the court was contested, and denied by that court, upon the ground that the motive for the conveyance was to give the grantee a status in the Federal court. The case was brought to the Supreme Court, where Marshall, C. J., delivered the opinion. He says:

The single inquiry must be whether the conveyance from McArthur to McDonald was real or fictitious. * * * The testimony shows, we think, a sale and conveyance to the plaintiff which was binding on both parties. * * * The motives which induced him [McArthur] to make the contract, whether justifiable or censurable, can have no influence on its validity. They were such as had sufficient influence with himself, and he had a right to act upon them.

And the court held that jurisdiction attached after the conveyance, without regard to the motives which induced the conveyance. This principle was repeated in Smith vs. Carnochan, 7 Howard, page 198.

Suppose two citizens of the same State are involved in an important controversy, and one of them, for the purpose of suing the other in a Federal court, removes to another State, and commences suit in the Federal court of the State from which he removed, is it not manifest that the only question which could affect the jurisdiction would be whether his removal was real or only colorable? If he had in fact become a citizen of the other State, his right to sue in the Federal court could not be questioned. If, on the contrary, he had only pretended to remove, and had not actually removed, then he would remain a citizen of the former State, and be incapable of invoking Federal jurisdiction. Many years ago one of the honorable managers, [Mr. LYNDE,] then a patriarch, and myself, a neophyte in the profession, in our own State, were retained for a client in a controversy with a railroad company of that State. Under professional advice, the soundness of which, I believe, never was questioned, he removed to Illinois, and commenced and successfully prosecuted his suit in the Federal court for Wisconsin. His removal was actual, and nobody denied the consequence of his citizenship in Illinois, although everybody knew that he had acquired that citizenship in order to enjoy the benefit which it conferred upon him to sue in the Federal court for Wisconsin.

So in this case, Belknap having actually resigned, and his resignation having been accepted, so as to vacate the office, as matter of fact; having laid aside his official character, and resumed that of a private citizen, is entitled to enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities pertaining to private citizenship; not the least of which, I reckon, is exemption from the criminal jurisdiction of this court. And hence it follows that the issues of fact joined in this cause, as to whether or not he resigned, and resumed the character of a private citizen for the purpose of enjoying the immunity belonging to it, are immaterial to the proper determination of this cause.

III. Can the House of Representatives support the jurisdiction of this court by new matter alleged in its pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment?

This court can only acquire jurisdiction, in a proceeding of impeachment, by articles presented by the House, showing a case of impeachable criminality; that is, a case where the act complained of is impeachable, and the actor subject to impeachment. In other words, the articles must be such as to require no aid from subsequent pleadings. In this case the articles describe the respondent as "late Secretary of War." Within the strictness of allegation required by common law criminal courts such descriptio personæ would not be equivalent to an allegation that he was no longer in that office. Therefore, and to meet the view sometimes entertained that a citizen holding one office may be impeached for misconduct in another, we interposed the plea to the jurisdiction, stating affirmatively that, at the time of impeachment, the respondent was not any officer of the United States. He was impeached at the bar of the Senate—if formal announcement that articles would be presented against him is an impeachment—on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876. Some of the articles charge that he continued to be Secretary of War to or until (I forget which) the 2d day of March. This excludes the 2d day of March from his holding office; therefore, if we are right in contending that only a person holding office can be impeached, the articles fail to show a case within jurisdiction.

And I think it would have been safe for us to demur to the articles. But not wishing to take risks upon a technical construction, we thought it safer to plead affirmatively the fact that the respondent was not holding any office at the time of impeachment. Undoubtedly, to any plea of the respondent in confession and avoidance of the articles, the prosecution might have replied in confession and avoidance; but not so to a plea which, in substance, is a denial of any fact which should have been stated in the articles, to show jurisdiction. If the articles themselves are deficient in not stating any fact necessary to entire jurisdiction, jurisdiction of the offense and the offender, then this court never acquired jurisdiction.

It results from the fact that this court has only a special jurisdiction, that the first pleading must show a case within the jurisdiction. This was held with regard to jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States in Brown vs. Keene, 8 Peters, 112; Jackson vs. Ashton, 8 Peters, 148; Hodgson vs. Bowerbank, 5 Cranch, 303; Mossman vs. Higginson, 4 Dallas, 12; and Jackson vs. Twentyman, 2 Peters, 136.

The honorable manager [Mr. LORD] yesterday referred us to two cases,—2 Chitty's Reports, 367, and 2 Maule & Selwyn, 75. These were actions of quo warranto, that is, civil suits to try the title to an office, to be followed by a judgment for damages and costs. The court held, what everybody would concede, that resignation did not preclude final judgment.

One Senator at least, Senator HOWE, will remember a somewhat remarkable case of this kind in our own State, where he happened to be on the winning, and myself on the losing, side. I refer to the case State on the relation of Bashford vs. Barstow. In this case, after the court had declared its jurisdiction, the attorney-general came into court, and filed a discontinuance.

But the court held that the case was really a civil cause, in favor of the relator, against Barstow, who was in possession of the office; that the State had no interest in the question, and was only a formal party.

The learned manager also asserted that in a criminal cause there could be no such thing as a replication and rejoinder. If he will take the trouble to examine Wentworth's Pleadings he will find that he is in error; and if he will examine Archbold's Criminal Pleadings, he will find the very forms from which we have drawn our pleadings subsequent to the plea in abatement.

Senators, I have performed my duty in the argument of this question; and have but to thank you for the patient attention you have given me. I consider this the most important question ever submitted to a court in the United States. If we would avoid the convulsions which disturb and disgrace South American republics, this jurisdiction must be denied.

If, in the revolutions which occur in politics, an administration is not only to be driven from power, but subjected to impeachment; if political overthrow is to be followed by criminal convictions and political disfranchisement, at the hands of an incoming administration, which is to take its course in office, and in turn to be subjected to like disgrace and condemnation, it will not be long until impeachments, instead of being the nation's great effort to punish enormous offenders in the interests of the people, will be degraded, and only perform the office of the guillotine upon displaced statesmen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers will proceed. Senators will please give their attention.

Mr. Manager KNOTT. If the court please, Mr. President, in a government instituted by a free people for the preservation of their own liberties, the protection of their own interests, and the promotion of their own prosperity, it is certainly a matter of paramount consequence that the amplest possible provision should be made for securing the purity and efficiency of its administration, not only by the prompt removal of those who may be guilty of criminal misconduct in office, but if necessary by signalizing their infamy, as Mr. Hamilton felicitously expresses it in one of his essays in the Federalist, "by a perpetual ostracism from the esteem, and confidence, and honors, and the emoluments of their country."

So far as the executive and judicial departments of our own Government are concerned, it is evident that the framers of our Federal Constitution intended to accomplish this important end through the various provisions relating to the subject of impeachment contained in that instrument; and the real question now under consideration is whether they failed to accomplish that object or not; whether the means devised by them for that purpose are sufficient to enable the people of this country, acting through their regularly constituted authorities, to preserve the purity and maintain the integrity of their own Government, or whether those means are so ill-adapted to the great end designed, so utterly and ridiculously inadequate in fact, that any official criminal, no matter how flagitious his conduct may be, can literally set them at defiance. In a word, whether you exercise the functions devolved upon you to-day as the highest court known to our Government by virtue of a constitutional power, or merely at the will and pleasure of the accused. For, sir, these are the elements of the proposition now seriously introduced and gravely insisted upon here, that a party may be guilty of any criminal misconduct in office and evade the penalty prescribed for his crimes by the simple act of resignation.

The mere statement of such a proposition is sufficient to indicate the gravity of its nature, and perhaps it is not too much to say that one of greater importance or of profounder interest could not be presented for the consideration of this exalted tribunal. However disreputable the offenses may be which are charged against the defendant, however much he may deserve the execration of his fellow-men if those accusations are proven to be true, the mere question of his guilt or innocence sinks into insignificance when compared with the one under immediate discussion, not only because the latter calls in question one of the most important prerogatives of the House of Representatives as well as one of the highest powers of the Senate; not merely because it denies the power of the people to protect and maintain the purity and the integrity of their Government in the amplest manner prescribed in their Constitution, but because it has now for the first time to be authoritatively determined, and because that determination, whatever it may be, will stand as a precedent through all coming time, or at least until the nature and character of our institutions shall have been completely transformed.

It is true, sir, that a somewhat similar question was raised in the very first impeachment which occurred after the adoption of our Federal Constitution, the case to which such frequent allusion has been made since the institution of the present proceedings. I allude of course, as the Senate well understand, to the case of Blount, who was impeached in 1798 for conduct inconsistent with his station and duties as a Senator of the United States; but in that case the point was but feebly insisted upon, and never decided by the Senate at all; the whole case having turned, as this court well understands, upon the point that a Senator of the United States was not, in the contemplation of the Constitution, amenable to the process of impeachment under any circumstances whatever. I may add, however, that even the decision of that point has not been accepted by some of the ablest commentators upon the Constitution as sufficient authority to establish a principle; not only because it was the decision of a divided court, 14 to 11, but because the arguments by which it was sought to be sustained, so far as they have been preserved, appear to be, to say the least of them, more technical and specious than sound. But so far as the question at bar is concerned, the Blount case cuts no figure as authority at all for the reason I have stated, that it was not adjudicated by the court at all. The only adjudication from which anything resembling a legitimate analogy to the point under discussion may be drawn, is the case to which frequent allusion has also been made by both the learned counsel for the respondent, that of Judge Barnard, of New York; and their remarks and my own upon that case may serve as illustration of how very widely lawyers upon the opposite sides of the same case may differ in their views in regard to authorities adduced.

If the court will pardon me, I will call attention as briefly as I can to the point in that case which bears some analogy to the question now under consideration. Barnard was impeached as a judge of the supreme court of the State of New York during his second term of service in that office. In eleven out of the thirty-eight articles of impeachment preferred against him he was accused of malconduct committed during his former term, which, as a matter of course, had expired before the articles of impeachment were preferred. To these eleven articles he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court upon precisely the ground taken by the counsel for the respondent in this cause, that the tenure of office during which those offenses were committed having expired his amenability to impeachment for those offenses expired with it. That was the point made, that the very moment his term of office expired by lapse of time that very moment the jurisdiction of the assembly to prefer articles of impeachment against him and of the high court of impeachment of New York to try him was gone. And it should be borne in mind that upon the trial of the issue raised upon that plea-matter of Phil. C. Fuller, which has been dwelt upon with considerable unction by both the learned counsel on the other side, was brought fully into review and deliberately repudiated and overruled by the highest court of the very State in which it occurred, and in the lower house of the Legislature the resolutions that have been insisted upon here as authority upon the point under consideration were offered. A Senator very pertinently inquired upon yesterday whether the resolutions reported in the case of Fuller and which had been referred to by the learned counsel had been adopted by the house in which they were offered. The learned counsel was unable to give the Senator the desired information, and so am I, because I have not considered the question of sufficient importance to investigate it, simply for the reason that, whether adopted or not, the doctrine they announced was distinctly and deliberately repudiated and overruled by the only court in which they were ever cited as authority before this, and that, too, by the highest court in the State in which the transaction took place, and upon an issue almost precisely similar to the one at bar.

The plea to the jurisdiction in that case as to the eleven articles I have referred to was, after elaborate argument, overruled by a vote of 23 to 9; nineteen senators and four judges of the court of appeals holding that a party could be impeached notwithstanding the expiration of the term of office in which he committed the offense, against the votes of six senators and three judges who held that he was not so impeachable.

There, sir, is the whole of the Barnard case, so far as there is anything in it applicable to the question under discussion. I will add, however, that the most cogent reason urged by counsel in support of the plea to the jurisdiction in that case, as it seems to me, was that the office held by the accused was an elective office; that the people themselves had it directly in their own power to preserve its purity by refusing to re-elect a man who had abused their confidence and betrayed his trust by the perpetration of official crimes; that they had condoned his offenses, if he were in fact really guilty, and that the court of impeachment had no authority consistently with the theory of government in that State to countervail the will of the majority by removing a man from office for offenses alleged to have taken place before his election and of which the electors were supposed to be aware when they elected him.

If, therefore, the decision in that case is entitled to any consideration whatever as authority here, it derives additional weight from the fact that, in that instance, the people had the power to protect themselves at the ballot-box; notwithstanding which, the court intervened, and, in order to maintain the purity of an office intended for the protection of their interests, convicted and removed an officer therefrom, on account of crimes committed before his election, and which, so far as their votes could do it, had been by them condoned; whereas in the case at bar the only security the people can have is in the conviction and disqualification of the accused, if he should be proved to be guilty of the crimes alleged against him.

I apprehend, however, that the question now under consideration will be settled upon its own peculiar grounds; that it will be determined not by what the framers of the Constitution did not do in convention, but by what they did; not by what they omitted to express upon the face of the instrument framed by them, but by what they there declared should be the fundamental law of the land. In a word, that it will be determined upon a fair and reasonable construction of the various provisions of the Constitution relating to the subject of impeachment, considered as component parts of a plan of government instituted by the people themselves for the promotion of the general good; that the object and purpose for which those provisions were enacted will be kept constantly and distinctly in view; and that the language in which they are expressed will receive at your hands such a construction as will promote, and not defeat, those objects and purposes; that no theory which may be predicated upon any isolated provision will be permitted to countervail the general intent of the whole.

These views, which I think are fairly deducible from leading decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States, are expressed far more succinctly, far more elegantly, and far more forcibly than I have the capacity to express in section 419 of Mr. Story's Commentaries upon the Constitution, to which I beg leave to call attention. After having reviewed a number of leading cases upon constitutional construction, he says:

§ 419, (4.) From the foregoing considerations we deduce the conclusion that, as a frame or fundamental law of government, the Constitution of the United States is to receive a reasonable interpretation of its language and its power, keeping in view the objects and purposes for which those powers were conferred. By a reasonable interpretation, we mean that, in case the words are susceptible of two different senses—the one strict, the other more enlarged—that should be adopted which is most consonant with the apparent objects and intent of the Constitution; that which will give efficacy and force, as a government, rather than that which will impair its operations and reduce it to a state of imbecility. Of course we do not mean that the words for this purpose are to be strained beyond their common and natural sense; but, keeping within that limit, the exposition is to have a fair and just latitude, so as on the one hand to avoid obvious mischief and on the other hand to promote the public good.

I will not consume the time of Senators or abuse their patience by an attempt at an idle and unnecessary display of irrelevant learning, but with these principles in view will simply ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read the various provisions of the Constitution relative to this subject, in the order in which they should be collated if they are to be considered as a systematic whole; and in my comments upon them I do not wish to be understood that the House of Representatives, which I in part represent here, and very imperfectly at that, shall be held responsible for or in any manner bound by anything I shall say. It may be true, as argued by the learned counsel, that Mr. LAWRENCE constituted the soul and essence of the Fortieth Congress, and because he saw proper of his own volition and for his own amusement or improvement to supply the honorable managers of the impeachment of President Johnson with a vast array of authorities, whether relevant or irrelevant, that therefore not only the Fortieth Congress but all subsequent Congresses are bound to admit everything contained in his collation of adjudged cases as law. I will not dispute that proposition with the learned counsel. I only desire to say that so far as I am concerned I do not wish to be understood as being the House of Representatives myself or as having it in my power or as even wishing to estop them from asserting any views they may see proper in opposition to my own opinions either now or hereafter.

The first provision on this subject which locates the power of instituting the proceedings by impeachments is the fifth clause of the second section of the first article, and is as follows:

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

The second, which designates the tribunal in which the trial shall be had and prescribes certain general regulations with regard to the procedure, is found in the sixth clause of the third section of the same article, and is as follows:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

These are the jurisdictional clauses. The fourth section of the second article prescribes peremptorily what judgment shall be given upon impeachment and conviction in certain particular cases, taking away from the court all discretion in that regard whatever, in the following terms:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The seventh clause of the third section of the second article, which was evidently intended to limit the extent of the judgment and define the boundary beyond which the court, in no instance, is authorized to go, is as follows:

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

While, to conclude the whole, the last sentence of the first clause of the second article places the restoration of the party convicted forever beyond the reach of executive clemency by providing that the President—

Shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

I have now read everything contained in the Constitution in any manner relating to the subject; and if any respect is to be paid to the language employed, as is required by the first and most obvious of all the rules of legal interpretation, it will be observed that there is not a solitary syllable in any of the provisions to which I have called attention which either expressly or by any necessary implication limits the power of the House of Representatives to prefer or of the Senate to try articles of impeachment to the time during which the party accused shall remain in office, or to any other time whatever. We may concede, if we see proper, that a person can be impeached for no offense unless it be committed while in office. We may even go further; we may admit that the offense must be under color of the office or in some manner connected with the discharge of official duty; but the very moment the impeachable offense is committed, whatever that offense may be, the guilty party becomes liable to impeachment, and there is not a word in any clause of the Constitution which upon any reasonable construction can be said to relieve him from that liability upon the simple termination of his official service, whether it be by resignation or otherwise. The very moment the offense is committed, the power of the House to impeach attaches; that very instant it becomes complete; and unless there is some positive provision of law taking that power away or limiting its exercise to some particular time or by some particular circumstance, it seems to me that it must necessarily continue in full until it is exhausted upon the trial and acquittal or conviction of the accused whether he remain in office or not.

Learned counsel for the defendant, however, have affected to discover some such limitation in the fourth section of the second article, which provides that "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office upon impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors;" and in the other provision which prescribes that judgments in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; and they have invoked the authority of Mr. Justice Story in aid of that theory, quoting section 803:

SEC. 803. As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution that "judgment, in cases of impeachment, shall not extend further than a removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States;" and in another clause, that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors," it would seem to follow that the Senate, on the conviction, were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification.

But why, may I be permitted to ask, should it follow, or even seem to follow, from the premises laid down by the learned commentator, that the Senate are bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office? I grant that, if at the time of conviction the party convicted is in office, all discretion is taken from the Senate; by the fourth section of the second article they are then bound to remove him. But there is not a syllable in either one of these provisions which, either expressly or by any necessary or reasonable implication, takes away from the Senate the power to disqualify, although the power to remove may have been taken away by the resignation of the party accused.

For centuries and down to a time within the memory of many Senators present, the sixth year of the reign of George IV, I believe, certain classes of persons in England were allowed, upon being convicted of particular felonies, to plead the benefit of clergy, and, in case their prayer were allowed, instead of being hanged, as they otherwise would have been, the judgment prescribed by the statute was that they should be burned upon the brawn of the thumb of the left hand. Now, if you would fully appreciate the logic of the text; if you would realize to its utmost extent the force of the position that you cannot disqualify because you cannot remove, that you cannot render a portion of the judgment because you cannot the whole, you have simply got to imagine the Lord Chief-Justice of the court of King's Bench, wrapped in the amplitude of his magisterial gown, solemnly announcing to a trembling culprit whose left hand had been amputated that he must go hang because it was a physical impossibility for the sheriff to apply the branding-iron to the precise spot prescribed by law! The commentator continues:

If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice.

Certainly it would seem to follow, if the party was in office, that the Constitution contemplated that he should be removed upon conviction, for that is precisely what the Constitution prescribes. It is evident that this learned writer has simply transposed the terms of the proposition. Had he said, "if then the party was still in office at the time of impeachment, it would seem to follow that there must be a judgment of removal from office," he would have said precisely what the Constitution says; only that and nothing more; and he would have conveyed precisely the idea intended to be conveyed by the framers of the Constitution in employing that language. He proceeds:

And it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable.

Certainly, it might be argued with some force, if it were true that the only object, as argued by learned counsel on the other side, or even the most important object of an impeachment, was simply the removal of the official criminal from office. But such, I apprehend, is not by any means the only or the most important object to be attained by this mode of procedure, as we shall presently see.

And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office.

Of course not. If you pronounce a judgment of disqualification absolute, that ipso facto removes the delinquent from office; there can be no doubt about that.

There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender, as to secure the state against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity.

This closing sentence suggests directly what it seems to me is the pivotal idea on which the question under discussion must turn, and that is, what is the real object and purpose of impeachment?

Mr. President, I dislike exceedingly to ask the favor at the hands of the Senate, but I am really suffering such physical pain that it would be a great accommodation to me if the court would adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn; and that by the rules will be until twelve o'clock to-morrow, rather than half past twelve o'clock. This will save half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 6, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap,

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-arms.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Blair and Mr. Black.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will give the usual notice to the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting yesterday for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

Mr. THURMAN. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves a call of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the roll-call will proceed.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and forty-two Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a quorum present. The Senate is now ready to hear the managers.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have in my hand two questions, which I wish to ask, and I will send them up now as there is less likelihood of there being an interruption to the managers at this time than after they have proceeded with the argument.

The Secretary read as follows:

1. If two persons guilty of crime in office cease to be officers at the same time, one by removal and the other by resignation, is one rather than the other subject to impeachment afterward? If a distinction between the two cases exists, please state it.

2. Is a private citizen liable to impeachment under the Constitution of the United States?

If his having previously held an office distinguishes him in this respect from other citizens, please trace the distinction to the clause of the Constitution, or to the principle in which it is found.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to submit an inquiry at this time, so as not to interrupt the managers after they proceed.

The Secretary read the question of Mr. MITCHELL, as follows:

The Constitution provides that when the President of the United States is tried on impeachment, the Chief Justice shall preside. Suppose a late President were impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors committed while President, and presented at the bar of the Senate for trial, who would preside, the Chief Justice or the President of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to hear the managers.

Mr. Manager KNOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please give their attention.

Mr. Manager KNOTT. When the Senate did me the very great kindness to adjourn yesterday evening, I was suffering intensely from a very painful affection of the eyes, with which I have been afflicted for some time. I am sorry to say that I find myself in no better condition this morning. By an arrangement between my colleagues and the counsel who is to conclude this argument, I ask the privilege of the Senate to conclude my remarks on Monday, inasmuch as the argument will not be closed before that time, and that in the mean time my colleagues who desire to be heard may proceed. If there is no objection to that arrangement, I hope it will be made, as it would be a matter of considerable inconvenience for me to go on at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to that arrangement.

Mr. Manager JENKS. Mr. President and Senators, with reference to the questions which have been submitted by the honorable Senators, I will say that if in the course of the discussion of the subject, as we shall enter upon it and conclude it, they are not answered, we shall then take them into consideration. They will be considered in the course of the argument before the managers shall have closed the discussion. At present I conceive to a great extent they will be discussed in what I shall present in the body of my argument.

The resolution on which this discussion is progressing is the following:

That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material, and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

There are two main propositions involved in this resolution; first, whether the Senate, notwithstanding the resignation of the defendant, can take jurisdiction of this cause; and, second, whether the facts surrounding his resignation are pertinent to be considered with reference to the effect of that resignation. As a general answer to this, we would say that any and every case should always be adjudged upon its own standing, because you can seldom, if ever, find two cases that are strictly analogous. You cannot determine the effect of this resignation without inquiring concerning all the facts and circumstances surrounding it. As was stated by the learned counsel for the defendant yesterday, the fact whether it was colorable or not might be a pertinent question. The fact whether it was bona fide intended that it should be really an existing resignation or whether it was only a temporary resort to evade this proceeding, might be a material question. Whether it is charged that that is so or not does not affect the relevancy of the consideration of all the facts attending it; but you must judge every case upon its own merits, and whatever facts are essential to arrive at a correct conclusion in that case should be taken into consideration.

Of the second portion of this proposition, which is concerning the collateral facts, I shall say but little, if anything, more than this: It has been considered by the chairman of the managers; he has advanced three or four propositions in support of the view that it is material to consider all the surrounding facts. One of those propositions is, that in law there is no fraction of a day. He has cited authorities to establish that; that was the general rule, that in law there is no fraction of a day. This being the general rule, an exception was introduced by the honorable counsel for the defendant, that is, that if it be necessary to subserve the purposes of justice, a court will consider the fractions of a day. Then the matter stands thus: As a rule, courts will not recognize the fractions of a day; but as an exception, if it be necessary to subserve the purposes of justice, they will recognize the fractions of a day. Hence, when the counsel cited those authorities to show that they would consider it as an exception, it was essential to show that it was necessary to subserve the purposes of justice to bring his case within the exception. He left off just where the real contest began: is it necessary to subserve the purposes of justice that this court should recognize the fractions of a day? It seems to me that there is no necessity in subserving the purposes of justice, that this court should recognize any fraction of a day. Put the question in this form: How can it subserve the interests of justice, when a defendant is charged with having surreptitiously filched from the pockets of from eight hundred to a thousand men from ten to twenty-five cents every day for five years, that that defendant shall plead this as an excuse that the ends of justice are subserved by recognizing the fractions of a day? If he had discussed this, and shown that this defendant would have been wronged did you not consider it, he would then have brought his case within the exception; but, having failed to do that, he leaves it as my colleague, the chairman, left it; that is, that the general rule, if the defendant have not brought himself within the exception, still exists, and the court will not recognize the fractions of a day.

With reference to the question of relation, that was not considered at all by the counsel for the defendant, and we shall leave it as our chairman has left it, with you, and enter upon what to us seems to be the main and material question in this cause, and one in which with all deference we feel satisfied that the constitutional law sustains our position. That is, has the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment jurisdiction over a defendant who by his resignation after the crime committed claims to be placed beyond its jurisdictional power? Jurisdiction is limited in one or more of three ways. It is limited territorially, or as to place; it is limited as to subject-matter; or it is limited as to person. Territorially, jurisdiction may be waived or may be conferred. As to subject-matter or as to person, it is never too late to plead it, and it can neither be waived nor conferred at the will of the parties. Then we will consider this in these three aspects.

Territorially, the Senate of the United States has jurisdiction co-extensive with the earth. Whether the offense be committed in Washington, London, Rome, or Pekin does not affect the right to judge the offender.

As to the character of the offense, it takes cognizance rightfully of all impeachable offenses. As the plea in this case does not deny the offense charged in the articles to be impeachable, it is unnecessary to discuss what constitutes an impeachable offense, except so far as the question may incidentally arise in determining the persons who are criminally answerable before this tribunal.

In further illustration of this, we would here state that it does become material to consider what impeachment means, in order to determine how far the jurisdiction of this court extends as to persons.

By the prosecution it is maintained that any person who is or has been a civil officer of the United States who while in office committed an impeachable crime is before this court subject to trial and punishment.

By the defense it is claimed that, if the criminal resign at or before the time the proceedings for his punishment are instituted, thereby the jurisdiction of the court is ousted and the criminal as to the punishment consequent upon impeachment is forever discharged. The antagonism between these two propositions is what the court by the defendant's plea and the replication on the part of the House of Representatives and the people is called upon to settle. On account of this issue the case under consideration is one of supreme importance. On the one hand, if a criminal may commit a crime of character so atrocious that the lives of thousands or the liberties of millions are endangered or destroyed thereby and by his own act it will condone the offense, then the power of impeachment granted by the Constitution for the maintenance of official purity is a chimera, the august tribunal established by the Constitution for its judgment almost an idle pageant.

On the other hand, if after the commission of an impeachable offense no life of purity, no years of penitent grief, no deeds of patriotic devotion, can efface the stain, but the citizen must be forever at the mercy of the prosecuting tribunal, until only in the rest of the grave oblivion is found, then official life is truly one of grave responsibility. To determine this contention no authority except the Constitution can be adduced. Other courts, like the planets, may shed their reflected light of precedent; the musty volumes of historic lore may afford analogies; adjudications of similar tribunals may suggest parallels; but from no source except the Constitution, illuminated by the sunlight of reason, can the command come: Thus shall this judgment be rendered.

In the second section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that—

> The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

If the word "sole," which only qualifies the power by preventing any other person or branch of the Government from exercising it were left out, the clause would read:

> The House of Representatives shall have the power of impeachment.

It is not a possible grant of power, but an absolute one. If this clause had declared "the House of Representatives may have the power" it would indicate a grant that might exist or might not, dependent upon some contingency outside of the Constitution, such as the willingness of the Senate to entertain the impeachment, or the willingness of the defendant to be impeached, or many other contingencies that might be imagined; but the people in the organic law have said the power shall exist. Whatever that power may be is granted, not in part, not with qualification, but in full plenitude, as the words signified at the time of the formation of the Constitution, unless by some succeeding article in the fundamental law that power is restricted. What the power of impeachment consisted in will be considered as further progression is made in the argument.

The present inquiry will be, are there any restricting or limiting clauses in the Constitution which take away any portion of that which has been considered.

In the third section of the first article the court is constituted before which the power of the House of Representatives shall be exercised in the following words:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

The first clause of this portion of the third section, "the Senate shall have sole power to try all impeachments," is the constitutional grant of jurisdiction to this honorable court. Whatever or whoever is embraced in this grant may rightfully be called to answer at this bar. In itself it is manifestly co-extensive with the power to impeach. And, in that "all impeachments" are expressly included in the grant, it would seem to forbid that some who have committed impeachable crimes could, by their own act or the act of any earthly power, place themselves without the pale of this comprehensive declaration.

In addition to this grant of jurisdiction, the clause contains the general rule of practice in this court: the judgment it may pronounce and a limitation on the effect of that judgment. It will not be maintained that the second part which relates to the rule of practice limits the generality of the grant. If any limitation is therein contained, it must be found either in that which relates to the judgment or in the limitation on the effect of that judgment. Does this language, "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," limit the general jurisdiction contained in the first part of the clause which includes "all impeachments?" To effect this result it must operate as an exception out of the previously-granted power, in that its provisions are so contradictory that both cannot stand together.

It is not contradictory of the extent of the grant so as to forbid the impeachment of one who at the time of trial or judgment held no office, as it only fixes the utmost limit to which the punishment may extend. It does not require that the criminal shall be removed from office, but, if the circumstances and criminality justify, the judgment may include a removal from office. If he be not in office that portion of the judgment cannot be inflicted, but still whatever judgment the circumstances warrant, not exceeding full disqualification, may be imposed. He may be reprimanded; he may be disqualified to hold a judicial office, or a military office only, or all offices, as may seem just. This clause finds a striking parallel in most of the penal statutes, which empower courts to impose a penalty of fine or imprisonment not beyond a given limit, or both, or either, in which case any part of the penalty may be inflicted.

Under a similar constitutional power the senate of Pennsylvania, in the trial of Judge Addison, who had been impeached for an impeachable crime in the discharge of a judicial office, sentenced him only that he should not exercise under the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania a judicial office during the term of his life. A strong and very convincing argument was made in that case that the sentence need not and should not go so far, but should only extend under the circumstances of the case to mere reprimand; and it seemed to be conceded that under this clause a mere reprimand might have been given, and nothing further. So there are any number of punishments that may be inflicted upon a defendant independently of that of removal from office, still coming under the clause of disqualification to hold an office.

And herein I would also notice this distinction, that the power to disqualify from holding office does not, per se, involve the necessity to remove from office, because your sentence may not be that he shall be disqualified from holding the particular office he is then enjoying; but he may be disqualified from holding some other office, or some other sentence that the court may see proper to inflict. That, then, is not a correct construction of this clause of the Constitution which says that disqualification necessarily involves removal from office, because you need not give full disqualification, but only partial, as your judgment. It is hence relieved from that notice taken by Judge Story and to some extent conceded by others in their discussions of this question.

Hence it does not seem to contravene the general grant of power. The last part of this clause, which says, "but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law," only guards against the pleading of this official punishment for official or impeachable crime as a defense in the courts of law, and has no significance as a limitation of the power of the court of impeachment.

The only remaining provision in the Constitution which requires consideration in this stage of the inquiry is the fourth section of the second article, which is:

> The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Prior to the introduction of this section, the power of this court had been declared to include "all impeachments." The mode of practice had been in a general way established; its judgment had received its limitations and qualifications; the subject of the tribunal for impeachment had been fully considered and finished. The second article, which embraces the executive department of the Government, was then taken up. The subject under consideration in this article in the minds of the constituent delegates did not include the jurisdiction of any court. They were providing a mode by which the several officers included in this department of the Government they then had under consideration, in case their longer continuance in office should endanger the Republic, should be removed. If this section were intended as a definition of the powers of the court of impeachment, either as to the persons on whom these powers should be exercised or the crimes of which it should take cognizance, the location is truly remarkable. The naturalist would not be more surprised to find the orange or palmetto-tree growing in full luxuriance in Greenland than the constitutional commentator would be to find a section with such an object among the powers and duties of the Executive. It is truly thus located a rare exotic. Judge Story remarks:

> By some strange inadvertence this part of the Constitution has been taken from its natural connection, and with no great propriety arranged under the head which embraces the organization and rights and duties of the executive department.—Story's Commentaries, volume 1, section 788.

We maintain that there is no mislocation; it is not thrown out of its regular order. The character of those who gave language to this voice of the people, the Constitution, was so high, that it can scarcely be conceived that they would be guilty of so illogical a thing as to finish a court of impeachment, then step clear out of the judiciary, step outside of the duties of the Senate, step outside of the duties of the court, and then distinctly in a separate clause define the powers of a court which they had already fully defined; because we maintain that impeachment itself is a complete definition of those powers, and a definition that in itself is amply sufficient for a limitation of jurisdiction and for the conferring of the ample powers of the grant.

Such a mislocation of this section is not conclusive that it is not a new jurisdictional clause, but is sufficient to excite inquiry and suggest a doubt. To sustain the plea to the jurisdiction in this case, this clause must be construed—

First. To limit the grant of power to try "all impeachments" to impeachments against civil officers; and to this I would call your special attention, because that is all we propose to discuss especially.

Second. To such civil officers as shall at the date of and during the trial choose to continue in office and abide the judgment of the court. I say "during the trial," because if it be true that the removal from office is the reason why this is a jurisdictional grant, the person impeached might, after you had gone through all the formalities of trial, then resign and bid you defiance and say, "You cannot remove me from office; having no power to execute, you have no power to judge." As we progress further in the argument, we shall show that this is in opposition to every recognized principle of law that has ever been adopted in other judicatures.

Third. To change that clause of section 3 of article 1 so that instead of leaving a discretion in the court as to the extent of the punishment, it will require that in all cases of impeachments, on conviction the defendant impeached must be removed from office. To this I would call your attention also, that the clause which conferred the power upon the court clearly intended that there should be a discretion in this court, at least in some cases; and if there is a discretion in some cases to be left to this court, this clause cannot be a definition of the power of impeachment.

Another assumption must follow, that all impeachments should be limited to "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors," or all the prior assumptions are vain; for if judgment of removal from office be not such a necessary and indispensable part of the judgment as to oust the jurisdiction of the court in case it cannot be rendered, still this section would leave the defendant liable to trial and judgment by this tribunal. None of these postulates would be granted; but, on the contrary, the better reason would as to each, it is claimed, on careful examination be found to be in the negative. But to enter fully into the discussion of each would require a more full treatise on the subject of parliamentary impeachment than either the time or the necessities of this trial would permit or require. Hence, except as they may incidentally occur in the consideration of the second, no further notice will formally be taken of any of them.

The defendant was a civil officer of the United States at the time of the commission of all the alleged crimes charged in the articles. If his case be not included in the general jurisdictional clause granting the Senate power to try all impeachments, it must be because this section is to operate as an exception out of the general power, in that he is not now an officer of the United States, or as a proviso qualifying it in such a way that it should be construed to read, "the Senate shall have power to try all impeachments, provided at the time of trial the accused shall continue in office," or it must be a particular clause repugnant to the generality of the grant. It need not be considered whether it be an exception or proviso, as its collocation forbids such a construction.

The only debatable ground is the question whether this clause is repugnant to the general grant. The first power is that which is placed in the House of Representatives, which shall have "the sole power of impeachment." This clause leaves it discretionary with the House whether all impeachments shall be prosecuted or not, implying, if the offense be trivial, the offender insignificant, or the crime of rare occurrence, the discretion will not be exercised. On the other hand, if the offense be heinous, the offender conspicuous, and the crime common and polluting to the administration of government, this tribunal shall be invoked to restore safety and purity.

The word "sole" forbids any private person to start the machinery of impeachment and denies to all the world the right to legally dispute the propriety of the prosecution, if an impeachable crime has been committed, after the House shall have determined upon instituting proceedings.

I should call your attention to this: that as the people have seen proper to confer upon the House of Representatives the right to prosecute impeachments, and as that power must be conferred upon somebody, they have assumed that the House will not exercise this discretionary power except when the emergencies of governmental safety shall require it, so that the Senate need not inquire, nor have they a right to inquire, whether the House will exercise this power improvidently or thoughtlessly. When the House has made up its mind that a crime is of a terrible character, the people have said you have the right to judge whether it shall be prosecuted or not. The House may, I maintain, prosecute a common custom-house officer when it sees proper; but if it see proper to prosecute even the lowest of the officers of the Government, and conceives that it is its duty so to do, it exercises its constitutional rights, and it is the duty of the Senate to try it; but it is not probable, and the people so thought when they gave this power of attorney, the Constitution, to their Representatives, that it would not be exercised unless it were necessary to subserve the general good of the Republic.

So that this discretion is in the House whether they will prosecute or not; and the learned counsel need give himself no trouble as to the probability of your ever being called upon to try offenses committed by forty millions of people, because the House of Representatives will eliminate from the forty million all that the general safety and general welfare of the Republic do not demand ought to be prosecuted. But we do not maintain—and I wish now to state it lest I may be misunderstood from what I have now said—that we have any right to prosecute any other than official crime. The House of Representatives cannot prosecute a private citizen who has not been guilty of official crime. It is not included in the powers of impeachment in England or elsewhere. I shall consider this further, however, as we proceed in the argument.

The second grant of the people is "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." In consequence of the infrequent use of this power its definition is at first glance uncertain. If the term "murders" or "all prosecutions for murder" were substituted for the word "impeachments," so that the clause should read "to try all murders" or "to try all prosecutions for murder," it would take a very distinctly-expressed repugnant clause to divest the jurisdiction of the court. Then if the word "impeachments" had a meaning to the framers of the Constitution as definite as "murder," or if it had any meaning whatever, that word indicated must require a no less distinctly-expressed repugnant clause to divest this court of the right to adjudge it. And here in the language of Professor Dwight, which is found in 6 American Law Register, New Series, page 257:

> The Constitution refers to impeachment without defining it. It assumes its existence, and silently points to English precedents for knowledge of detail. We are reminded of the statement that the Constitution is an instrument of enumeration, and not definition.

The Constitution then has named the power, assuming that the sig-nification of that name was known. The language is that of English parliamentary law; and whatever it then signified the framers of the Constitution meant it should signify here; otherwise it is meaningless, and the whole grant an inanity.

Impeachment, like the common law, was a work of time. At first but indistinctly limned out, but little by little, with each recurring case, its characteristics were developed until finally in the Constitution of our country it stands forth with fully-delineated features. Of German origin, there the accusing and adjudicating tribunals were one and the same, but then, although in the constitution of the tribunal the maxim which forbids the prosecutor to be the judge was violated, the crime to be punished was official crime, visited with civil and official punishments. Imported into England, the prosecuting and judging tribunals were separated. The Commons prosecuted; the Peers judged. This was one step toward the perfection of the proceeding. There, as in Germany, the crimes impeachable were official crimes, and the punishment was alike civil and official, as in Germany. By the judgment of the high court of impeachment the officer was often deprived of his office and politically disqualified. But the citizen, too, by the same judgment in the same case, was often deprived of his life or his property. The punishment of the officer and citizen was merged in one heterogeneous sentence. As the English constitution improved on the German by separating the prosecuting from the judging tribunal, so the Constitution of the United States improved on that of England by separating the conviction and the punishment of the officer from that of the citizen. By the Constitution the officer is to be judged by one tribunal for his official crime. He is to be judged by another as a man or citizen. By one tribunal he is sentenced for his official crime, a sentence that operates on him only as an officer; by the other he is sentenced as the citizen by the deprivation of some of his personal rights. The sentence of one tribunal may be removal from office and disqualification to hold any office under the Government, which amounts to official death, or any other official punishment of inferior degree. In the other he may be sentenced to physical death, or any other usual personal punishment of inferior degree. The one tribunal deals with the officer as an officer, and on conviction inflicts an official punishment; the other deals with the offender as a citizen, and on conviction imposes a personal punishment.

This separation between the officer and the citizen is that which now perfects the jurisdiction of this court and fully defines what ought to be the power of a court of impeachment. It treats the two subjects as though they were different men: the officer as one man, the citizen as another. Although it may be the same individual that commits the two crimes, yet he is adjudged for each crime in its own appropriate tribunal. Hence our system has perfected that which was born in Germany, matured partially in England, and completely consummated here.

This brief résumé leads to the definition of impeachment as used in the Constitution as the parliamentary prosecution of official crimes. No formal definition perhaps has been announced. But with this view no work within our reach has been found to disagree. Impeachable crimes, as administered in courts of impeachment, have always been official crimes.

On this subject I wish to call your attention to a complete review of the authorities. I have not made it here, because it would be a work of days, and it would be trespassing upon your time more than would be justified. But if you go over the cases cited in Comyns's Digest, Bacon's Abridgment, or any other work treating of the subject of impeachment, you will find that there is no case in which the crime was not official crime. The case that comes nearest contravening this definition is that of Doctor Sacheverell, a parson of the English Church, who was prosecuted for preaching a seditious sermon. Here at the first blush it might seem as though it was a private citizen who was prosecuted. But when you go back to the facts of the case, this state of facts exists. In England there is an established church; he was a minister or parson of this church, officiating ministerially, and under the established church. At first advowsons, as you will all recollect, were presentative, collative, and donative. Donative are those which are held by the king in his own person. An advowson, "the right of presentation to ecclesiastical benefices." The king appoints in all donative advowsons either himself or a subject to whom he has granted the franchise to appoint in his stead. Justice Blackstone says that in the first instance all were donative; those that are not now donative, that are presentative or collative, have become so through time, but they all trace back to the great fountain of office and honor, the king. He commissions. They are really officers of the Government; they are really discharging duties under the laws of that government, commissioned by the king, directly or indirectly receiving their emoluments and pay from the government. Hence that case, which is the only one that can be found that appears in any way to contravene the general definition is not in collision with that definition, but rather in support of it.

But I may say here that a sporadic case can be found in opposition to almost every principle on earth; and he who is so omnivorous as to take down everything that comes before him must inevitably have much food that is difficult of digestion. Even if a single case were found which differed from this definition, it would not break down the great principle running through hundreds of years.

Then, if official crime was always that which was prosecuted by impeachment, as understood by our fathers, it covers the Blount case in this: The Blount case decided that it must be an officer of the United States who was impeached. The very definition of impeachment says it must be an officer of the United States, because an officer of a State as to the United States is a mere citizen, and you cannot impeach a citizen in any court of impeachment. So that this definition of impeachment, which will be found to be consistent with as I believe every decided case, and if it be not with every case, the case that does not conform to it is exceptional, we say it completely embraces the Blount case without calling into requisition anything from the fourth section of the third article of the Constitution with reference to it.

In Rawle on the Constitution it is asserted:

> In general those offenses which may be committed equally by private persons or public officers are not the subjects of impeachment.

That is the way our ancestors understood it, that an offense which could be committed only by an officer was all that was the subject of impeachment. This statement Judge Story cites with approval, as found in 1 Story, section 801.

I made inquiry also of Mr. Spofford, the Congressional Librarian, and on research he states to me that he found no case that did not come within the statement that officers only were prosecuted, and his researches, as you all know, are usually exhaustive and complete. Hence I will assume that this is the definition of what impeachment means, official crime per se; and the Constitution, when it says the Senate shall have the power to try all impeachments, says this Senate shall have power to try all cases of official crime; the House of Representatives, it is to be remembered, is the power to prosecute, the House having a discretion whether they will call all official crime before you or not.

I wish also to cite from Blount's case as an authority to show that in that case this view was asserted and not denied; that is, that the definition of impeachment itself meant official crime. On page 2266 of the volume of the Annals of Congress containing that trial, I read from the argument of Mr. Dallas—and here I may say that Wooddeson himself, by not considering the force of what Justice Blackstone had said, left the impression that commoners as commoners, not in office, were subject to impeachment, and that is commented on by Mr. Dallas in his argument. He says:

Speaking of Wooddeson's lectures—

> That all the king's subjects are impeachable in Parliament; but with this distinction, that a peer may be so accused before his peers of any crime, a commoner (though perhaps it was formerly otherwise) can now be charged with misdemeanors only, not with any capital offense." This position, however, must be understood in coincidence with the general policy previously stated; and then all subjects are impeachable, because all subjects may be magistrates and public officers. The instances specified in Wooddeson are all of an official nature; and no other description of impeachment by the Commons can be traced in the English books.

So that Mr. Dallas has made the same investigation apparently that I have with reference to this subject, and came to the conclusion, after examining the authorities cited by Mr. Wooddeson and the several digests, and found that the very word "impeachment" itself defined that it included nothing but official crime.

The Constitution recognizes two characters of crime as distinct; those committed by an officer in his official relation, to which an official punishment as a penalty is affixed; the other, individual crime by the citizen, of which a personal punishment is the incident; and although the officer and the citizen may be one, and he may commit two crimes, the official and personal, by one act he cannot in the same tribunal receive punishment for both, but if both are to be punished, the operation of two different tribunals must be invoked. The official crime, as such, cannot be punished in the ordinary courts of law. Then if the official crime is not to pass unpunished, it must be punished by this court. To justify the conclusion that a character of crime that strikes at the foundation of civil government is by a subsequent repugnant clause in the greater number of instances placed beyond the reach of the powers of the only court by which it can be punished, is scarcely to be credited. If to this be added the fact that such a conclusion must always leave it to the option of the criminal whether he will be punished or not, requires a larger development of credulity than the most of mankind can ever be expected to possess.

Now, is there such a repugnancy between this clause and the general grant which went before as to call for this superabundant credulity? If this section be considered in the view that it has some jurisdictional power or effect more than merely to require upon the commission of a given character of impeachable offense by a certain class of officers and conviction therefor a fixed punishment must be inflicted, which is the view most favorable to the defendant, then it must be claimed a repugnancy arises from the fact that the criminal must be a civil officer of the United States. This is not repugnant to the general grant, as it is only one who is or was an officer of the United States who could commit an impeachable crime, as the offense must be official. In this we join hands with the honorable counsel and say that he must be an officer of the United States. But the material question arises after this, When must he be an officer of the United States? At the time he committed the crime, or at the time he is convicted?

Unless this question is to be answered in opposition to all the course of procedure in criminal law, it is the locality or status of the criminal at the commission of the crime that establishes alike his guilt and the jurisdiction to which he should be held amenable.

If this clause of the Constitution may be viewed in three different aspects, the aspect that he might be impeached after election for an offense committed before he went into office would fill all that has been discussed by the counsel for the defendant. That is, a man might commit treason to-day, he might commit bribery to-day, he might have received a presidential pardon therefor, and four years from this time he might be elected to office; and, if his being in office and conviction of treason and bribery, according to the limitations they propose to use this article for, were the terms that defined the impeaching power, he could, for that bribery for which he had been pardoned, still be impeached and removed from office. This is not true. There is some time at which it means he shall be an officer. It does not mean that he shall always have been an officer, but it means some specific time, and we maintain that that specific time, in accordance with every precedent in criminal law, is the time at which the offense was committed. It is the locality or status of the criminal at the commission of the crime that establishes alike his guilt and the jurisdiction to which he shall be amenable.

If the crime be committed in one county or district and after the deed is done the criminal escapes into another county, the jurisdiction of the court where the crime is committed is never questioned. An illustration was used by one of the defendant's counsel to show that they could step out of the jurisdiction of a criminal court. He called to his assistance the fragile fabric of civil cases to illustrate this criminal one. I take the ground now distinctly that this is a criminal case; that removal from office and disqualification is a punishment; and, in support of this, the case of Cummings vs. State of Missouri, 4 Wallace, and In re Garland, in the same volume, fully corroborate me that it is a punishment; and we think that this is conformable to the doctrine asserted on impeachments heretofore.

If a statute declare that certain acts of a cashier of a bank or other trustee shall constitute embezzlement, it would never for a moment be entertained that the criminal by resigning the office of cashier or trustee could thereby escape the punishment for his crime by pleading that at the time of information or trial had he was not cashier or trustee, and therefore was not covered by the provisions of the penal statute. All the statutes with reference to that subject speak of the crime, that if the cashier did so and so, or if the trustee did so and so, he shall suffer such and such punishment. Should not this case receive the same construction? Substitute for cashier or trustee the case of a President committing treason, bribery, &c., and what interpretation would you give it? You would say it did not mean he must be President at the time of trial. You would say that it does not mean he must be President at the time of conviction or at the time of sentence. But you would say it means he must be President at the time he did this wrong. As to the illustration proposed by defendant's counsel, if General Jackson were living at the Hermitage to-day and the House should see proper to impeach him for some removal of the deposits from banks while he was President would you have authority to try? I say if he committed the crime while in office and the House of Representatives of the United States, endowed as they are with the right to judge whether he shall be impeached or not, say he should be impeached you have the power to try him, whether it was General Jackson or no matter who it was.

There is no limitation to crime except that by express statutory enactment. Limitations to crime are made by statute, and not by inferences. At the common law, if a servant killed his master or a wife her husband, it was petit treason. If a servant should plead that the deceased, at the time of information made or at the time of verdict rendered, was not his master, that would be the truth; still the court would reply, as we reply to this defendant, "You were his servant at the time of the commission of the crime, and your condition at the time you did the deed is that which fixes your guilt or innocence." Almost every penal statute for the punishment of crimes by an officer speaks of the subject of the statute as an officer of the United States; yet it never occurred that it at all implied that the criminal should, at the time information was made against him, be an officer of the United States. He may have resigned, but the stain of his crime remains.

This we will illustrate by the very case under discussion. Allow me to call your attention for a minute to the very statute under which in a criminal court this defendant would have to be brought to the bar, (section 1781, Revised Statutes.) If a court should give the same construction to the statute which the counsel for the defendant ask you to give to the Constitution of the United States, they would have to refuse jurisdiction, for it speaks of him as an officer of the United States. Take section 1781:

Every member of Congress or any officer or agent of the Government who directly or indirectly takes, receives, or agrees to receive any money, property, &c.—

Going on and giving the limit of the punishment. The language is—

Every member of Congress or any officer or chief of any Department of the Government.

Their plea to the court of the District of Columbia would be, "I am not an officer of the United States, as that statute says. Not being an officer of the United States, can you prosecute me? Have I not made out a full and complete case?" Senators, how can you say that the Constitution, using identically the same language that is used in every statute relating to the same subject-matter, shall receive a different construction from that which every court under all circumstances has given to such statutes? We maintain that there is not even plausible color for such an argument as that. If you yourselves should appear in any court of criminal jurisdiction with such a plea, it occurs to me that you would feel that you were disgraced in your professional character.

Then that portion of the section, "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall," &c., by the ordinary rules of construction signifies that the time when the accused was required to be an officer of the United States is at the time of committing the crime.

I refer to the case of Lord George Sackville, who at the battle of Minden commanded the British forces under Prince Ferdinand, who for disobedience to the command of his superior officer or cowardice fell into disgrace. In September, 1759, he resigned. His resignation was accepted immediately, and he was dismissed from all official employment. In February, 1760, a court-martial was called to try him. The question was submitted to the twelve judges of England whether a citizen could be subjected to a court-martial. The judges responded that he could. After full consideration they decided him subject to the judgment of that tribunal, notwithstanding his resignation. He was accordingly tried by court-martial and convicted.

On this same subject I will call the attention of the Senate for a moment to Scott on Military Law. With this authority one of the honorable counsel for the defendant must be very familiar, for he delivered an opinion upon it, I see at the foot of the page. But I shall not quote his opinion as an estoppel. Estoppel seems to be the favorite doctrine of the counsel for the defendant. I will not ask that he shall be estopped by it, but I will ask if it is the truth you shall accept it.

Section 630 is as follows:

No person shall be liable to be tried and punished by a general court-martial for any offense which shall appear to have been committed more than two years before the issuing of the order for such trial, unless the person, by reason of having absented himself, or some other manifest impediment, shall not have been amenable to justice within that period.

I now read from the note:

In the only instances in which this phase of the question of jurisdiction has been passed upon by the civil courts of our own country, it has been affirmed that the jurisdiction of courts-martial comprehended all offenses committed while the offender is subject to the Rules and Articles of War, whether he had or had not continued in the military service.

That is, all offenses committed while he was subject to the Articles of War, whether at the time of trial he had or had not continued in the military service.

Mr. Cushing at one time delivered an opinion that he could not be tried; that whenever he went out of service the power of the court-martial to try him was gone; that its jurisdiction was divested. In consequence of this opinion of Caleb Cushing, an express statutory enactment was made to repudiate that doctrine as found in a section in the same work. I have not the sections rightly numbered, and, as it will take me too long to find it, I will not read the section enacted for the purpose of avoiding the opinion given by Mr. Cushing. This is Mr. Cushing's opinion:

Attorney-General Wirt was of opinion that soldiers discharged in consequence of the re-organization of 1821 were no longer subject to military law, at least for the completion of a punishment which in its character looks to their restoration to the military service when the punishment shall be over, as sentences to confinement, hard labor, &c. There is color for the opposite opinion, but I hold this to be the safest and soundest on the law as it stands.

Judge Black, while Attorney-General, delivered the following opinion:

It is by no means clear that this circumstance [the dismissal of the officer whose case was then under advisement] placed him beyond the jurisdiction of a court-martial.

He remarked also that—

In England the jurisdiction of a court-martial under such circumstances was unanimously sustained by the twelve judges in the case of Lord George Sackville, and their decision is recognized as the law by Tyler, page 113, in Griffith's Notes, page 32, and in other respectable works on military law and courts-martial.

This point was incidental only to the question before Mr. Black, and he explained that its introduction—

Was not for the purpose of pronouncing an opinion upon it, but to avoid misconception, because silence would have been regarded as an admission that the jurisdiction of a court-martial expires with the soldier's term of service.

Section 1070 of Scott's Military Law reads as follows:

This article of war—

Section 630, which I have read—is a statute of limitations in case of proceedings to punish persons for offenses "arising in the land forces." As at present advised, I do not see what provision of the Constitution, or statute, or principle of common law can be invoked to prevent the arrest and trial of a person by court-martial for a military offense committed while such person was an officer or soldier of the Army of the United States after— after the expiration of the term of service, so that the order for the trial is issued within the time limited by the Article of War.

That is, within two years.

And so in principle it seems to have been held in the case of Lord George Sackville, as reported by Tyler in his treatise on courts-martial.

1071. In that case it appeared that, as the defendant had been dismissed from His Majesty's service previously to the prosecution against him, it was doubted under the mutiny act whether he was subject to the jurisdiction of the court; upon which that question was referred to the twelve judges, who certified that under the circumstances of the case they saw no reason to doubt the jurisdiction of the court-martial.

1072. In re William Walker, decided by Mr. Justice Wilde, of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and after consultation with and with the concurrence of his brother judges, and reported in American Jurist, April number, 1830, it was held that a seaman who had committed a naval offense, and had been arrested therefor on the day preceding the expiration of his term of his service, might be detained for trial and punishment after the expiration of such term. In the course of the opinion the learned judge cites the case of Sackville, cited supra, with approval; and upon the general question says:

"It is true that a seaman is not bound to do service after the term of his enlistment. But within that term he is bound to observe the rules and regulations provided for the government of the Navy, and is punishable for all crimes and offenses committed in violation of them during his term of service. There is no limitation of time within which he is to be prosecuted and tried for such offenses, but if there were it would be sufficient to show that the prosecution was commenced within the time of limitation."

In corroboration of this view, I suggest the principle that when any one enters upon an office he is not relieved from all the duties and responsibilities of that office, civil and criminal, until they are fully discharged.

The punishment by impeachment is an incident of a civil office, and he can no more throw off his responsibility criminally than he could throw off his responsibility civilly to account for the moneys that came to his hands. His official duties are not consummated until after he shall have performed all and subjected himself to every requirement of the law under which he went into office.

Therefore, it seems to me there is not even color for saying that this man is now out of office for the purpose of this prosecution, because he has not fulfilled all his responsibilities nor discharged all his duties. If he had retained some money that might have come to his hands, for which he was by law accountable, would his resignation discharge him from his obligation to account for it? Not for a moment. If he has violated duties more sacred than that, will his resignation discharge him? It does not seem to me that such an allegation conforms to reason

The case of a discharged soldier seems a case much stronger than the present, as the courts-martial, with their judgments and sentences, are limited in jurisdiction, obnoxious to the common law, and always watched with suspicious vigilance. If a court-martial, whose jurisdiction is limited to the soldiery, a jurisdiction which we as freemen have always been taught to regard with the utmost vigilance and against which we would give the strictest construction, would not say that they could not take cognizance of a crime committed by a soldier when he was not in the Army because he was discharged, can this court of impeachment acting as the representative of thirty-seven sovereign States? I would not say that you will give a different construction to that power of attorney, the Constitution of the United States, by which the people have authorized you to act. It is a question that ought to be decided, and ought to be decided in favor of that which requires the highest degree of care, and imposes upon the officer the fullest responsibility that he assumed at the time he entered on the duties of his office. The status of the criminal when he commits the crime is the plane on which he is to be judged.

The next ground on which it may be claimed that this clause is repugnant to the general grant of jurisdiction is that all civil officers who are convicted on impeachment of treason, bribery, or high crimes and misdemeanors should be removed from office. From this it is argued if the court, from the condition of the criminal, cannot inflict the whole punishment prescribed by law, it has no jurisdiction and cannot inflict any portion of it. Such a statement in the ordinary courts of justice would meet with little favor. In larceny, the judgment usually prescribed is that the goods be returned with fine and imprisonment. If the criminal was likely to be prosecuted he could go back and restore the goods, and if this principle should hold, plead that the whole sentence which he had the lawful right to receive could not be inflicted, and therefore he would not submit to any trial or punishment. The pauper who should commit a crime which would entitle him to fine and imprisonment would plead his insolvency and divest the jurisdiction of the court. The felon who for some previous crime had been imprisoned for a limited time in those States in which murder in the first degree is punished with imprisonment for life might with impunity murder his jailer or any of his fellow-prisoners with whom he might be brought in contact, and when called to the criminal bar plead to the jurisdiction of the court that they could not imprison him for life in that he was now under a sentence for a part thereof, and as he could not receive from the hands of the court his full and just deserts he must have the right to claim exemption from trial and judgment.

This mode of reasoning is treating the punishment as a right of the criminal, instead of his ignominy, his punishment. The criminal cannot assign as error that the judgment was more favorable to him than the case required. (4 Blackstone, page 395.) Then it is not for this defendant to complain if his punishment in case of conviction is not commensurate with his deserts.

I may state here as a general principle that the fact that a court has not power to enforce its judgments is never a ground on which you can divest jurisdiction. If it were, what would be the condition of our civil courts now? In one-half or one-third of all the judgments they render, to use a common phrase, they get beaten in the execution; they cannot enforce their judgment. They put out their execution; but they cannot collect the money And say this defendant's counsel: "If you cannot enforce your sentence, you have no jurisdiction; you cannot give a judgment." You cannot argue from the want of bility of the court to carry out that which it decides that it has no jurisdiction to decide. It has never been admitted, and never will be, I think. In the case of Rhode Island vs. Massachusetts a bill was filed by the solicitor of Rhode Island in the Supreme Court of the United States to settle the boundary between the State of Massachusetts and the State of Rhode Island, and this very plea was interposed that the court could not enforce its sentence; "how will you issue an execution or issue any mandate to a sovereign State saying you shall abide by this boundary or this judgment which we shall render?" The Supreme Court, after considering it fully, and after it had been argued by the first lawyer of the nation at that time, decided they had jurisdiction. Because they could not carry out their decree could not prevent the court from rendering a judgment that would be binding. It does not follow that the court cannot enter into a case for want of jurisdiction. The personal inability of a defendant to receive and suffer the full sentence of a court cannot be interposed as a ground why the jurisdiction of the court shall not be sustained. That was well illustrated by my colleague yesterday [Mr. KNOTT] concerning the benefit of clergy. Because the thumb cannot be burned, therefore there can be no judgment by the court, and therefore the jurisdiction of the tribunal would be ousted! Can you sustain such a view as that in this tribunal?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, before the manager leaves that part of the case which he was discussing under the Articles of War relative to courts-martial, I have a question to propound.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Illinois.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Article 61 of the Articles of War provides that any officer who is convicted of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman shall be dismissed from the service. In a case where an officer of the Army should be tried under this article of war, after becoming a private citizen, what would be the judgment of the court-martial?

Mr. Manager JENKS. The judgment would be nothing, as it was in the case of Rhode Island vs. Massachusetts. It does not divest the power of the court to try; it does not say that the court is powerless because the defendant is incapable to receive sentence. This is the want of capacity of the defendant, and not of the court; and a plea to the jurisdiction must be to the court, and not to the defendant. The plea on the part of the defendant of his incapacity must be to the court, and not to the defendant. A plea on the part of the defendant of his incapacity must be put in bar. For instance, a criminal court cannot convict an insane person; but suppose one who is insane had committed a murder and he came into court under proper process, would the attorney for that insane man plead "the court has no jurisdiction," or would he plead the incapacity of the defendant? If they change their plea, and say "we are incapable," then that question would be pertinent; but this is a question of jurisdiction as to the court, and not of capacity as to the defendant. We say he may be as incapable as can be, but that does not affect your power; it does not affect this question; so that you cannot reason at all, from the fact that the defendant cannot comply with the sentence of any court or that you cannot put any penalty upon him, that you are powerless. It is he that is impotent, not the court.

My colleague [Mr. HOAR] also suggests (but the answer I have given I believe is the legal answer) that that is a case where the whole penalty is removal from the service. It would then come within the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives to judge—that is their discretionary power—whether they would impeach or not. It would not be a question for the Senate, but a question of propriety on the part of the House, whether they would impeach; and, after they have passed upon the propriety of that, whether you can render a judgment or not is immaterial if you have power to try.

I would also call your attention very briefly a little further to this view of the case, that the personal incapacity of a defendant never divests the jurisdiction of a court. On that point I would refer to an authority not altogether unfamiliar, I apprehend, Blackstone's Commentaries. Treating of this subject concerning those who after judgment cannot receive sentence, he says:

Another cause of regular reprieve is if the offender becomes non compos between the judgment and the award of execution; for regularly, as was formerly observed, though a man be compos when he commits a capital crime, yet, if he becomes non compos after, he shall not be indicted; if after indictment, he shall not be convicted; if after conviction, he shall not receive judgment; if after judgment, he shall not be ordered for execution; for furiosus solo furore punitur, and the law knows not but he might have offered some reason, if in his senses, to have stayed these respective proceedings. It is therefore an invariable rule, when any time intervenes between the attainder and the award of execution, to demand of the prisoner what he hath to allege why execution should not be awarded against him; and if he appears to be insane the judge in his discretion may and ought to reprieve him. (Blackstone's Commentaries, Book 4, chapter 31, pages 395, 396.)

That is, it amounts to a suspension of judgment. Suppose this defendant, after the prosecution had been instituted, had resigned; if the want of power to inflict the sentence is a question which is addressed to the jurisdiction of the court, then he could come in and plead that you cannot judge this case, and you would have to stop right there. Then, if he should be appointed to office again, what would be the result? It would then just come in the same position of an insane man; you would proceed with the judgment; and, if the removal must divest your power to pass any sentence and take away from you the right to disqualify, (which we maintain it does not by any logical view of the case,) all you could do would be simply to find the truth, and reserve your judgment, as the court would in a case of insanity, until he should be competent to receive the judgment.

But let us take another view of this case. Suppose a man had been found guilty of murder, and he had been sentenced, and the day for execution had been fixed, and in order to avoid that execution he should drink himself into a state of maudlin insanity, and then, as you could not inflict punishment upon one insane, he would insist that you could not proceed with your execution. This would apply in this defendant's case. He himself, by his own act, has rendered himself incompetent, if he is rendered incompetent, and he cannot plead that more than a man who drank himself drunk to prevent execution could prevent execution thereby. Wherever it is the fault of the defendant himself that he is disqualified, although he may be maudlin and really insane, yet he must suffer the punishment of the law when that weakness or incapacity is artificial, made by himself. So this defendant, if he comes in after you have granted him a reprieve, and says, "I have resigned for the purpose of dodging your jurisdiction," you would say, as the executioner would say, "No man can take advantage of his own default to clear himself from the result of his demerits."

But this may be viewed in another aspect. If the reason why this court has not jurisdiction is that the judgment of removal from office cannot be rendered, then if he were re-appointed he would be within the reach of that portion of the judgment; the reason would cease to exist and he would be subject to impeachment. The court of impeachment would have jurisdiction every time he might be re-appointed, but that jurisdiction would be divested as often as he might resign; and if it is only because the judgment of removal cannot be rendered that the jurisdiction of the court is divested, the defendant need not resign till after the trial shall have been fully gone through with, all except the judgment. If he finds it is going against him he can resign, and, as a plea to the jurisdiction is never too late, he may plead it before the sentence, and the court, perhaps after weeks or months of laborious investigation, can only dissolve and make its best bow to the citizen of Iowa or elsewhere for having arrogated to itself the right to try a private citizen whom the House of Representatives of the United States had been so presumptuous as to arraign at its bar. After the court should have dissolved and the House of Representatives had got fairly established at their legislative duties, the President, as some kind of compensation or atonement to this private citizen for the persecution to which he had been subjected, could re-appoint him to the same office; and, as often as the pertinacity of the people should demand a new prosecution, a new resignation and a new re-appointment could be gone through with and the very purpose of all the provisions of the Constitution with reference to impeachment be thwarted; and this, too, in the face of the constitutional provision which denies to the President the power of pardon in cases of impeachment.

This, with other similar considerations, leads us to conclude that the signification of this clause with reference to the subject of impeachment should not be construed as repugnant to the general grant to the Senate of power to try all impeachments, but simply signifies that if the criminal civil officer shall not before have been removed, the removal shall in all cases be inflicted as part of the sentence of the court.

Then to this grant in the Constitution which is general there is no proviso, no exception or repugnant clause within which the case under discussion comes. This view is corroborated by Mr. Rawle, who in his Commentaries on the Constitution, after discussing the persons who are liable to impeachment, concludes in the following language:

From the reasons already given it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office. (Rawle on the Constitution, page 243.)

And this "have been" is not in parenthesis, as the honorable counsel for the defendant seemed to think it was. It is a distinct substantive part of the sentence, and the best-considered part of the sentence probably in the whole paragraph. Judge Story expressly leaves it an open question, dismissing its further consideration by saying of it and a cognate question—

They are brought before the learned reader as matters still sub judice, the final decision of which may be reasonably left to the high tribunal constituting the court of impeachment when occasion will arise. (Story on the Constitution, § 805.)

In reference to Judge Story, the defendant's counsel have quoted that authority as corroborating the view that an officer is not impeachable after he shall have resigned. Such is clearly not what Judge Story meant. As in all the rest of his works, he presented the arguments pro and con, usually as they had been presented by others. If he had a distinctly formed opinion of his own, he announced it; if he had none, he left it open. If there had been a judicial investigation of the subject and it had passed under judgment, it was then announced. So Judge Story meant just what he said when he said it must be left to you, and you alone, to settle this question; and now it is for you to settle.

English precedent, whence the framers of the Constitution derived their opinions on the subject, are distinctly in favor of the court retaining its jurisdiction in this case. In the impeachment of Warren Hastings it appears that resolutions were passed for his recall from India as governor-general of Bengal, in consequence of which, on the 16th of June, 1785, he returned to London, and the first step toward his impeachment was not taken until the 17th of February, 1786, which was a motion made by Mr. Burke for a copy of the correspondence between him and the company from January, 1785, to January, 1786; and on the 4th day of April, 1786, articles of impeachment were by Mr. Burke presented to the House of Commons against Warren Hastings, late governor-general of Bengal, as "late Secretary of War" here. This case has a peculiar significance when it is remembered that it was so very recent as to be immediately in the presence of the framers of the Constitution—their daily reading at the very time they were engaged in their labor. In discussing the subject of impeachment, Colonel Mason expressly cited it to show the scope of the power of impeachment in England, as appears by the Madison Papers, volume 3, page 1528.

This case was immediately before the convention that framed the Constitution at the time they framed it, and when it was before them and it was a known fact that he was only a subject of England. If the convention had meant to say that it was not the status of the criminal at the time of committing the crime that fixed the jurisdiction, would they not have taken some pains to make the distinction between the English constitution and ours in regard to this subject? To me this seems a pregnant negative. If they had not meant that this very case which was then cited before them, was in their daily papers, should not be regarded as anything of a guide as to what impeachment meant, is it not singular that they never thought to guard this by an express clause that an officer could not be impeached after he had gone out of office?

On a prior day from the same authority we learn that the query with those who framed the Constitution was not, as it is with us, whether one who had been an officer but was out of office could be impeached, but the very reverse; whether it would be proper to impeach the President or Vice-President while in office.

In the Madison Papers, volume 2, page 1153, the following discussion occurred, as cited by the honorable counsel for the defendant. Allow me to read to you first the resolution, because you cannot derive the full signification of the motion unless you know the resolution on which it was founded, and in this resolution you will note the fact that it was only with reference to the President. There were no "civil officers" included in the clause, concerning which this motion was made, but only the President. It is article 9, as introduced by the committee:

9. Resolved, That a national executive be instituted, to consist of a single person, to be chosen by the national legislature for the term of seven years, with power to carry into execution the national laws, to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for, to be ineligible a second time, and to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractices or neglect of duty.

This has reference only to the President. Mr. Pinckney and Gouverneur Morris made the following motion with reference to that resolution:

Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out this part of the resolution:

To be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty.

Mr. Pinckney observed, he ought not to be impeachable while in office.

Not while out of office, but he ought not to be impeachable while in office. The query with them was whether he should be impeachable only in office. Did not that in itself imply that he was to be impeachable when out of office? The clause conferring the general power of impeachment had gone before; but here it was proposed to impose a special penalty on the President who should be guilty of these particular crimes, "malpractice or neglect of duty." This clause alone referred to him; and then the motion was to strike out removal from office, because he ought not to be impeachable while in office, leaving him subject to the general jurisdiction which had gone before, that he should be impeachable at the discretion of the House. But the inquiry was should he be subject to punishment of removal and other disqualifications? Then Mr. Davie, in reply to this motion that the President ought not to be impeachable while in office, said:

If he be not impeachable while in office he will spare no efforts or means whatever to get himself re-elected. He considered this as an essential security for the good behavior of the Executive.

What good would it do him to be re-elected if he could not be impeached anyway if he was out of office? If it meant, as the learned counsel suggested it did mean, that he should not be impeached after he had gone out of office, how would it be a harbor of safety for him to seek a re-election? This is what Mr. Davie said: "He would then spare no means to secure re-election" to avoid impeachment. He need not take that pains according to the learned counsel for the defendant, because when he had gone out of office he would become a citizen, and he would make his best bow to the tribunal and say, "You cannot impeach a citizen." So we say that the very reverse of what the counsel for the defendant has cited this for is what the framers of the Constitution meant.

Mr. WILSON concurred in the necessity of making the Executive impeachable while in office.

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. He can do no criminal act without coadjutors, who may be punished. In case he should be re-elected, that will be a sufficient proof of his innocence. Besides, who is to impeach? Is the impeachment to suspend his functions? If it is not, the mischief will go on. If it is, the impeachment will be nearly equivalent to a displacement, and will render the Executive dependent on those who are to impeach.

Colonel MASON. No point is of more importance than that the right of impeachment should be continued.

They were not discussing, as the learned counsel says, whether the right of impeachment should exist at all, but whether the President, speaking of him alone and no other civil officer, should be removed. The query was whether he ought to be impeached while in office or left until after he had gone out, as indicated by Mr. Mason:

Shall any man be above justice? Above all, shall that man be above it who can commit the most extensive injustice? When great crimes were committed, he was for punishing the principal as well as the coadjutors.

So that it seems to me that this authority, instead of sustaining the eccentric view of it taken by the learned counsel for the defendant, is the very reverse. After very elaborate discussion our ancestors concluded that a President might be impeachable while in office. During all that discussion on this very subject, it never occurred to any one to doubt the propriety of impeachment after the criminal had gone out of office. Had the learned counsel for the defendant been there with this plea and suggested that the President could not be impeached after he was out of office, how completely would the subject of impeachment have been exhausted. Mr. Pinckney would have denied the propriety of impeachment while in office. The learned counsel would have chimed in with the impropriety of impeaching the President after he had gone out of office. The result would have been pretty nearly what it would be now if resignation could be pleaded in bar of jurisdiction on impeachment. This subject of impeachment would have been completely eliminated from the Constitution.

Another case of impeachment in the English House of Lords occurred in 1806, which, as a precedent, from the facts on which it was founded, may afford some light on the question now to be decided. Viscount Melville was appointed to the office of treasurer of the navy on the 19th of August, 1782, in which he continued till the 10th of April, 1783. He was re-appointed on the 5th of January, 1784, and remained in office until the 1st of June, 1800. On the 8th of April, 1805, Mr. Whitbred introduced resolutions of censure and on the 9th moved in the House of Commons an address to the king praying his removal from the king's council. He had been transferred from treasurer of the navy to the king's council in the mean time. While this matter was under discussion Viscount Melville, on the 10th of April, resigned, just as this defendant resigned while this discussion was pending in the House of Representatives. The resignation was accepted the same day (as this was) and notice thereof officially communicated to the House of Commons on the 29th of May, 1805. Mr. Whitbred gave notice in the House of Commons of a motion for the impeachment of Lord Melville. In pursuance of this motion articles were drawn, including, among others, transactions that occurred in the first term of his incumbency of the office of treasurer of the navy; and, although at the time of trial he held no office in England and it had been twenty-two years since he had first laid down the office which he held at the time of the commission of some of the alleged crimes, the House of Peers took cognizance of the case and fully tried the defendant. At the time of trial twenty-four years had elapsed since some of the alleged criminal acts had been done.

This case would establish at the same time that resignation did not divest jurisdiction and that without an express statutory enactment official impeachable crime is without limitation as to the time of its prosecution. Once guilty, he is for life at the mercy of the impeaching tribunal.

The case of Judge Barnard has been cited by several of my colleagues and discussed somewhat at length. It is the only American precedent directly upon the question under consideration. As to that, it is only necessary to say that the court sustained the jurisdictional power of impeachment. The likeness between that and this is more than an analogy.

Blount's case has been cited by the learned counsel, and one of them asserted as a part of his discussion of this case that we must stand upon the same principle that was there asserted, that all persons are liable to impeachment; and it has been announced by the second counsel who spoke for the defendant that the question you were to decide was whether you had jurisdiction over forty million people. We take no such ground as that, but distinctly repudiate it, and say that our definition of impeachment, which we maintain is correct and derived from the whole series of adjudicated cases, confines this; that the jurisdiction of the Senate by the very naming of impeachment per se is confined to official crimes, and there are not forty million officers in the United States, although there is a considerable number of them. But you have jurisdiction of every criminal official offense, of every official crime which may be committed by an officer, and it is in the discretion of the House of Representatives whether they will prosecute all official crimes before you or not. It was anticipated, doubtless, by the framers of the Constitution that the House of Representatives would eliminate all cases from those within their discretionary power except such as from their character deserved judgment from this tribunal. So we do not stand upon that ground, but the very reverse; that no person can be impeached here who did not commit an official crime, and that no one who has not been an officer of the United States can commit an official crime.

The Senator is not an officer of the United States; the Congressman is not an officer of the United States. Why? In the formation of our Government three elements entered. There were the people, the States, and the General Government. The people are represented by the Congressmen; they receive their commissions directly from the people. They are the officers of the people of a State, and not of the United States. They may do official duty with reference to the United States, as some other State officers do now; but they are still officers of the State. The Senators represent the sovereignity of the several States; they represent the States, and as such are officers of the States, and not of the United States. So that a Senator is not impeachable in that he is not an officer of the United States. A Congressman is not impeachable in that he is not an officer of the United States but an officer of the people of a State.

It leaves it, then, that those cognizable before this court are only those who are the Government officers of the United States, who are officers alike for every State, who receive their powers alike from every State, directly or indirectly, who are commissioned by the people of all the States, or who are commissioned by some person representing the people of all the States. So that the officers of the United States are those included in the executive department of the Government, and every officer of that executive department we conceive to be impeachable before this tribunal.

Now, why should it be that a civil officer should be impeachable rather than a military officer? Is the one more dangerous than the other? Were the framers of the Constitution more careful to guard one than the other? No. They simply took this into consideration: This provision simply meant that it was imperative that on impeachment for certain crimes of a high grade, civil officers should be removed. Why not military officers? Because military talent is of a peculiar character. One man in an army may not represent only one man, but his name may be good for a thousand, ten thousand, or more. Suppose you take the case of the Duke of Marlborough—a man noted perhaps for his avarice—a man who, if he had been prosecuted for official malpractice under our Constitution, would have been removed from office had this power been extended to military officers as well as civil officers; but to remove the Duke of Marlborough from the head of the armies of England would have been equivalent to yielding her place as a military nation in the face of the world. So there is a reason why military officers should not be necessarily removed. You may remove them. If the demands of the Republic require you should remove them you should do it, but you are not compelled by the Constitution to do it. That is why it was made applicable to civil officers alone, and in reference to civil officers we have daily and hourly indications that if the very best of civil officers were to be removed, highest or lowest, abundance of people would spring up, numerous as the frogs of Egypt, fully competent and amply willing to fill the places. It was restricted as to military officers because of the character of the duties they have to perform; it was restricted as to naval officers for the same reason; and it was not, as I apprehend, for the cause suggested by Judge Story: that there were courts-martial to try their crimes.

The spirit of our institutions is that the people shall all the time hold their hand on every officer in the United States. As to those that were elected by themselves, Congressmen, they placed it in the power of Congress to remove them. As to those that represented the States, they placed it in the power of those representing the States to remove them. That is, they held the power of removal all the time, directly or indirectly, and intrusted it to no single individual. As to the officers of the United States, who are those under the Executive, they meant to hold the same hand upon them, and they did hold it. They meant that the military, the maritime, and the civil alike shall be subject to impeachment and trial, and that if it is necessary this court can drag from his height the military hero or may drag from his depths the depredating custom-house officer. This is the view we take of this, and nothing more. We do not stand in opposition to any principle contained in the Blount case; but in that Blount case there was nothing decided by the court that in any way collides with the views we have announced.

I will now only call attention to the final resolution in that case, because I have already consumed almost double the time I intended.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the manager enters upon another point, if it will not incommode him I should like to make an inquiry touching a statute he cited, and the argument he derived from it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The inquiry of the Senator will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

Section 1781 of the Revised Statutes, cited by Manager JENKS, concludes thus: "And any * * * officer convicted of a violation of this section shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States."

If the respondent be convicted on the indictment said to be pending under this section, can the judicial court pronounce the judgment required if in the mean time the Senate pronounces it; or should the court first pronounce judgment, what would be the weight of the fact in determining the province of the Senate?

Mr. Manager JENKS. We regard that fact as having little or no weight with reference to determining the authority of the Senate, because, as I have already discussed and expressed my views, from the fact that the court has not power to inflict any portion of its sentence you cannot infer that the court has not power to try. Jurisdiction means the right to try and decide. If you take the definition of jurisdiction, it is the right to try and decide. To judge is what it means. It does not necessarily imply to execute. Hence you try and decide and execute so far as the circumstances of the criminal will permit, as I have already illustrated. This case would have no relevancy if that be the correct view, that you cannot argue from the fact that the court cannot inflict part of a punishment that therefore its jurisdiction is divested.

With reference to the trial of President Johnson, as cited by the last counsel for the defendant, I have looked in vain to see any relevancy in that argument or in the opinions there quoted. Those opinions were delivered with reference to the case they were then trying. The question whether one who was not an officer is impeachable was not before the court. Anything that a court or a judge thereof may incidentally say in arguing the proposition before his mind is not to be considered as even the opinion of the individual who may have been deciding the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the counsel to read the finding in the Blount case.

Mr. Manager JENKS. Yes, sir. I was drawn away from that by the question of the honorable Senator from New York. There were two motions made, and from the two the action of the court is derived. This was the motion made in the Senate:

Resolved, That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and, therefore, liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives;

That, as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled.—2 Annals of Congress, page 2318.

It was substantially this: that a Senator of the United States is not a United States officer; and the whole argument in that case is embraced in the two propositions which were announced by Mr. Dallas as the two propositions which they would undertake to maintain, which are found on page 2263:

1. That only civil officers of the United States are impeachable; and that the offenses for which an impeachment lies must be committed in the execution of a public office.

I may say here that the word "civil" was not discussed at all. It was not a matter of any account whether they were civil or military. We exactly assent to the proposition that it is only an officer of the United States—that is, an officer at the time of committing the crime—who is impeachable; and that the crime must be committed in the execution of public office. That was the argument of Mr. Dallas, and we stand exactly upon that.

The next proposition is:

2. That a Senator is not a civil officer impeachable within the meaning of the Constitution; and that, in the present instance, no crime or misdemeanor is charged to have been committed by William Blount in the character of a Senator.

These were the two propositions that Mr. Dallas and Mr. Ingersoll undertook to maintain. They did maintain these propositions, and we exactly accord with the view stated in these resolutions. I have read the resolution which was first offered in the Senate. I now read what followed:

After debate, on motion, the court adjourned till twelve o'clock to-morrow.

* * * * * * *

The court proceeded in the debate on the motion made on the 7th instant.

That is—

That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives.

That, as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled.

And, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 14.

A counter-resolution was then offered, which is found on page 2319:

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed.

This resolution was adopted by a converse vote of 14 to 11. The matter alleged in the plea on which these resolutions are founded is as follows, and thus italicized:

That although true it is that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to, yet that he, the said William, is not now a Senator, and is not, nor was at the several periods so as aforesaid referred to, an officer of the United States.

"Is not nor was an officer of the United States" was the substance of their plea. You will see from the argument of Messrs. Dallas and Ingersoll that they distinctly discussed the question whether he was an officer of the United States, and the finding was in conformity with the proposition as I have heretofore stated it. So that the case of Blount in no way contravenes the view which we take of this case, but, on the contrary, rather corroborates it.

Then, Senators, this proposition of the defendant presents itself to us in one general view, and I shall not consume more than five or ten minutes more at most. There was a contest in the history of English law between prerogative and law. It was maintained by the adherents of the Crown that prerogative was above law. The earlier Stuarts contended for that principle, and when Parliament passed a law that did not accord with the views of the king, at occasional intervals the king assumed the right to suspend the law, maintaining that he had that prerogative. The contest never came between those two propositions distinctly until in the time of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, and he among others finally asserted (being an officer of England) "that the little finger of the king should prove thicker than the loins of the law." That placed the issue distinctly before the people. Shall the king's little finger be greater than the loins of the law was the proposition they discussed, and the stake was the life of a mighty nobleman. That stake was played for, and the freemen of England won. They said that the law is above every man; that the king cannot and shall not suspend it. Then, Senators, can this defendant suspend the Constitution of the United States? It gives you the full power to try all impeachments. It gives the House of Representatives full authority to impeach. Is his little finger mightier than the loins of the Constitution? Should that proposition be maintained? Shall official corruption maintain itself as superior to the great organic law of this mighty Republic? We say neither he nor the Chief Executive is above the law. I make no charge against the Chief Executive, because I maintain it was only the perfidy of the defendant that induced the acceptance of the resignation.

No man is above the law. If the decision were that you have no power to punish this crime, it is equivalent to saying that official crime can go unpunished at the option of the criminal. This would not be conformable to what we believe to be right. It is not conformable to the general principles of right and justice. It was an infamy for him to go and withhold material facts to get his patron. the Chief Executive, who had trusted him, to accept his resignation, It was in itself a crime; and can he by heaping crime upon crime relieve himself from all punishment? It seems unreasonable. It is true it might be maintained upon the principle which we often find announced as an irony. Jean Jean, for stealing a loaf of bread, may be consigned to the galleys, and with ball and chain, in the burning sun, may be made to work for years and years, although that loaf of bread was to supply the wants of hungering children. But it has passed into an irony that if a man has stolen a hundred, let him steal a million and he passes from the grade of a criminal to a model speculator, and even sometimes is regarded as a benefactor. In this tribunal at least that principle ought not to exist. The assertion which is made in bitter irony upon the justice of our country is the very principle upon which the defendant stands. "I was a criminal; I had done harm enough apparently, but I see myself in danger, and I commit the additional perfidy of betraying him who had trusted me, and by doing this additional crime I have heaped up crime enough to get beyond the range of the law. I made my former crime, which was insufficient perhaps, a million instead of a hundred." They urge the bitter irony of the crowd as the principle on which this case should be decided. We insist that this principle be not recognized. What does he bring here to this tribunal as an expiation for his offense? He brings his own perfidy; his own betrayal of trust. He does not bring the last drop of the patriot hero's blood; he does not bring the last sigh of devoted love; he does not bring the tear of the penitent; but he says, "I hold up my own perfidy, my own betrayal of my patron, as a screen. Under this panoply I stand, and by this I divest the jurisdiction." Senators, shall this be recognized as a sufficient shelter for the defendant in this case?

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate sitting in the trial of this case take a recess for twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment took a recess for twenty minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore resumed the chair at two o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. Manager HOAR. Mr. President and Senators, the House of Representatives, in the name and for the protection of the whole people, demands of the Senate its judgment that William W. Belknap, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, be forever disqualified to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. For all purposes of the present argument the guilt of the defendant is admitted. He meets the demand by a denial of the authority of the House to impeach and of the jurisdiction of the Senate to convict for any official misconduct when the party accused has, under whatever circumstances laid down his office.

The issue so made up is a simple and narrow one. Two or three brief sentences of the Constitution, two or three American precedents—there is nothing else that speaks with absolute authority on this subject. Yet, simple and narrow as is the question which is now for the first time directly presented to this tribunal for its judgment, there can be no doubt that it would have been deemed by the framers of the Constitution one of the most important to which it could give rise. The attempt is to abridge, by much more than one-half, the compass of the most august judicial proceedings and the powers of the most august judicial tribunal known to our Government.

The Constitution itself is a document of a few pages. A few legislative and executive and judicial processes, a few principles of universal application, a few impregnable barriers, have been deemed adequate provision alike for the exertion of the national forces and the protection of the rights of the American people for all coming time.

The convention that framed the Constitution depended upon the process of impeachment to secure the people against two great dangers: usurpation of executive power and official corruption. Their debates, the debates in the State conventions, the countless arguments addressed to the people through the press, all show that the men of that generation expected the Constitution to stand or fall as it had solved the problem of protection against these two dangers, executive usurpation and use of office for corrupt personal ends. The discussions were of methods which should afford protection against executive power and executive corruption; the maxims cited were the maxims which restrain executive power and executive corruption. Treason and bribery are expressly named and coupled together in the Constitution as the two great heinous crimes against the existence of the nation itself. Which of these two high crimes thus joined together our fathers would have deemed the worst, they have left nothing on record to show. But I fancy, if those honest and frugal patriots had been asked the question, the answer would have shown something of the temper which the great English historian ascribes to the younger Pitt, that in an hour of temptation he might have been induced to ruin his country, but he never would have stooped to pilfer from her.

The political history of the country from which our fathers came, a history in which the framers of the Constitution were profoundly versed, was a history of perpetual strife with these two evils. From the time of the conquest down to a period within their own memory, in every generation, the heads of the men who had aided and the heads of the men who had resisted the usurpations of the Executive had given place to each other on Temple Bar. When Dr. Franklin was in England, in 1757 or from 1764 to 1775, he might have witnessed the scene, which Mr. Disraeli, the present prime minister, says took place in the House of Commons every session down to the time of the American war, when the secretary of the treasury used to sit at the gangway and, at a stated period of the session, give a five-hundred pound note to every man who supported the government.

I will read Mr. Disraeli's statement from his speeches on parliamentary reform. He says:

> Why, before the American war—a period not yet very remote—the secretary of the treasury used to sit at the gangway—just where the honorable member from Devonport is now accustomed to sit—and at a stated period of the session, the end or the beginning, gave, in the house, to the member who supported the government, a routine douceur of a £500 note; which was as little looked upon as bribery as head-money by a freeman. [A voice: "Walpole!"] No, no; much later than Walpole, and quite distinct from secret bribery. It was a practice which the manners of the age and the low tone of public feeling permitted.

As a bridle on executive usurpation and a remedy and punishment for official corruption, this power of impeachment, with the smaller penalty of removal from office and the greater penalty of perpetual disqualification beyond hope of pardon to return to it, was inserted in the Constitution. It was provided that the source of executive power should be, mediately or immediately, the people; but it was never dreamed that the public officer would be free from the temptation to usurp powers not belonging to him, or to use power corruptly because he owed his office to the people. No purpose can be traced in the history of those times to limit or impair in the least these constitutional securities. On the contrary, the debates in the conventions, national and State, and all the public discussions, show the great anxiety on these points. I do not think I need argue to those who took part in the last great trial of an impeachment, or to any person who takes part in this, that the Constitution has no securities to throw away.

It adds much to the gravity of this inquiry when you recall the fact that although this will be the judgment of a legislative body, it will be the judgment of a legislative body clothed with judicial functions. If you determine that you cannot rightfully exercise the jurisdiction now invoked, your decision is binding on your successors for all time. It has been well said by an eminent member of this court:

> You hold this great power in trust, not for yourselves merely, but for all your successors in these high places, and for all the people of the country. It is your duty to preserve and to transmit unimpaired to your successors in these places all the constitutional rights and privileges guaranteed to this body by the form of government under which we live.—Speech of Manager Boutwell on the trial of the President.

These constitutional securities are for all ages, for times like those of Charles II or James II, as well as like those of Washington; not only for times of few wants and simple manners, but for times when universal corruption and a universal tendency to usurp power on the part of public officers may prevail. That Senator will have inflicted an irreparable injury upon his country who by his vote shall forever limit the powers of his successors to reach the guilty counsellor of the Executive or the usurping or corrupt officer, to remove him and to place him in respect to public office, beyond the power to pardon and beyond the power to restore.

One of the learned counsel told you the other day that "the history of impeachments and of bills of pains and penalties and of bills of attainder is the history of the shame and the misfortune of England." And he cited the case of Floyd, a Catholic gentleman, sentenced to a cruel and ignominious punishment in the reign of James I for some idle expressions touching the Elector Palatine. Floyd was not impeached; nor is the counsel right in his general assertion. The learned counsel confounded together two things altogether distinct. Bills of attainder have never found in this country anywhere either a place or a defender. But the great judicial power of impeachment has, I believe with scarcely an exception, been exerted in England justly and with the most beneficent effects upon public liberty and public virtue. I have not examined every recorded case. If I had I ought not to weary you with their recital. But I will cite one weighty authority, which you will, I think, accept as decisive of this question. Hallam, the great historian of English constitutional liberty, says of the impeachment of the Earl of Middlesex, in the time of James I:

> This impeachment was of the highest moment to the commons, as it restored forever that salutary constitutional right which the single precedent of Lord Bacon might have been insufficient to establish as against the ministers of the Crown.—Hallam's Constitutional History, volume 1, page 401.

Again, in summing up the results of one of the most memorable Parliaments of James I, he says:

> The commons had been engaged for more than twenty years in a struggle to fortify their own and their fellow-subjects' liberties. They had obtained in this period but one legislative measure of importance, the late declaratory act against monopolies. But they had rescued from disuse their ancient right of impeachment; and of these advantages some were evidently incomplete, and it would require the most vigorous exertions of future Parliaments to realize them. But such exertions the increased energy of the nation gave abundant cause to anticipate. A deep and lasting love of freedom had taken hold of every class, except perhaps the clergy.

But there is no better evidence of the character and value of the process of impeachment than its incorporation into the constitution of every American State in force before 1787 excepting, possibly, those still under charter government, and into the Constitution of the United States. Does the learned counsel think that John Adams, who drafted the Massachusetts constitution of 1780; that Jefferson, who inspired the Virginia constitution of 1776, with the fires of the Declaration of Independence burning in heart and brain; that Hamilton, and Franklin, and Morris, and Madison, and George Mason knew nothing of the history of English liberty? Why, the Declaration of Independence caught its flame from the constitution of Virginia. The two torches were lighted by the same hand and in the same summer; and yet the constitution of Virginia expressly provides for the impeachment of the governor after he leaves office, and for the impeachment, whether in or out of office, of every other civil officer whatever. It is to the writings of these men you must look for the best exposition of the constitution of England. When they provided this weapon for the arsenals of the State, they knew well enough on which side it would be drawn and used.

The learned counsel for the defense have made a comparison between this body and the courts of the country, implying that they expect less of judicial calmness and freedom from undue bias from the Senate than from them. Not so judged the framers of the Constitution. In that remarkable number (64) of the Federalist, which is one of the few the authorship of which has been claimed for all three of the great men who joined in that work, (it is No. 64 in Mr. Dawson's edition, No. 65 in the older editions,) the author—I will not detain the Senate by reading his entire language—goes on to discuss the question and to answer the question of the capacity of the Supreme Court to be clothed with this high constitutional function. He says:

> It is much to be doubted whether the members of that tribunal would at all times be endowed with so eminent a portion of fortitude as would be called for in the execution of so difficult a task; and it is still more to be doubted whether they would possess a degree of credit and authority which might on certain occasions be indispensable toward reconciling the people to a decision that should happen to clash with an accusation brought by their immediate representatives.

He then pronounces, as the convention had already pronounced, that this body—numerous; secure in its long constitutional term of office; secure in its election by bodies in the States themselves removed one step from popular impulse and movement and violence; secure in its character, in its authority, and in its numbers—was the only body to which such a question as this could safely be committed.

The history of impeachments in this country has proved the correctness of this opinion. Before what State senate, in what case before the Senate of the United States has the party impeached failed of an impartial trial and a righteous judgment? The advantages of the accused in an ordinary criminal trial are outweighed a thousand times by the selection for his judges of the seventy-four citizens of the Republic first in official rank and the requirement of a two-thirds vote for his conviction. It was said by the counsel for the defendant that this was a question whether the Senate had power to try forty millions of American citizens for crime. I do not think the number of American citizens who have committed high crimes and misdemeanors in national office is or ever will be very large. Jurisdiction in impeachment extends only to abuses of official trust. The jurisdiction of the Senate is a national one, and is limited to abuses of national official trust.

The time for the determination of this question seems to me a peculiarly fortunate one. We are in no tempest of political passion threatening to disturb the serenity of this Chamber. There is no political division in this presentment. The House, with entire unanimity and with no distinction of party, has expressed its judgment both of the guilt of the defendant and the power to institute the process. He has already removed himself from office. The right to hold office under the United States hereafter is likely to be of equal value to him whether he escape trial by this plea or be convicted of the offense by the Senate and on that conviction receive the full constitutional sentence. If there be any rumors or excitements anywhere the only persons concerned in this trial whom they have moved are the counsel for the defendant when they were led to think that the Senate of the United States on oath could not fairly try whether $12,000 a year paid by a post-trader to the man who got him his place was divided with the Secretary who made the appointment. If the defendant be indeed innocent, or if, as his counsel says, he have a reputation which he values more than life, the only haste in the course of these proceedings which has in the least prejudiced him is the haste with which his counsel advised him to lay down his office, and the only wrongful judgment is the judgment which determined him to keep his own story of the transaction from the knowledge of his countrymen and from you who are to judge him.

The people of this country are just. The Senate is just. No defendant, if innocent, need fear to trust his vindication to either.

It is therefore a great right of the American people, and not the fate of an individual culprit, with which you have to deal to-day.

I have one other preliminary remark only. Surely if any occasion can arise which will justify the appeal to this great remedy it is a well-founded charge of bribery against the head of the Department of War. Corruption in the legislator, in the Senator, or the Representative, is inexpressibly base and infamous. But the legislator frequently lays down his office. He acts as only one of a numerous assembly, in the gaze of the whole people, answerable to a jealous constituency and watched by a jealous opposition. Corruption in the judge is odious and degrading. But the judge acts on principles which he must state in public and which must conform to the precedents known by heart to a learned profession. He shares his duties with juries and with associates. His court is open. Opposing counsel must be heard and opposing suitors must be present at every step. The persons must be few whom he can wrong with any hope to escape detection and punishment.

But the Secretary of War is intrusted with the constant care and supervision of Government property of vast amount and value. He has practically, and in spite of every possible precaution that you as legislators have been able to devise, power over large contracts to be entered into and performed at remote places. He has the right, without appeal, to allow large claims against the Government. He has the power most seriously to affect the fortune of all persons who might suspect abuses and whose duty it would be to make complaint. But this is by no means all or the largest part of it. He is the head of that one Department in our Government, or rather one of the two Departments in our Government, whose ruling principle is honor. The Army and the Navy are the spotless lilies of the national service. Everywhere else it is enough to obey the law and to perform the duties of office. But the soldier must attain and conform to a loftier standard of personal character and conduct. Any conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman is sufficient to drive him from the service and degrade him irrevocably in the estimate of mankind. The example of bribery in the head of the War Office must inevitably debauch the entire military service of the country.

Here let me refer in his speech on the impeachment of Warren Hastings, to Burke's description of the effect of bribery in the governor-general of India:

> But, my lords, when the vices of low, sordid, and illiberal minds infect that high situation; when theft, bribery, and peculation, attended with fraud, prevarication, falsehood, misrepresentation, and forgery; when all these follow in one train; when these vices, which gender and spawn in dirt and are nursed in dung-hills, come and pollute with their slime that throne which ought to be a seat of dignity and purity, the evil is much greater. It may operate daily and hourly; it is not only imitable, but improvable, and it will be imitated and will be improved, from the highest to the lowest, through all the gradations of a corrupt government. They are reptile vices. There are situations in which the acts of the individual are of some moment, the example comparatively of little importance. In the other the mischief of the example is infinite.—7 Burke's Works, pages 280, 281.

Our people, Senators, feel a just pride in the Military Academy at West Point. Some of you have witnessed in person the effect of that wonderful system of military education which the wisdom of our Government has planned and brought to so much perfection for the instruction of our regular officers. You have seen how the youth, coming often from the humblest places in life is transformed by its four years of discipline. By that austere training—the training alike of the scholar and the knight—the youth is brought to cherish truth, to despise wealth and luxury, to be content with frugal and simple living. In a report on West Point signed with the names of J. W. STEVENSON and JOHN SHERMAN and addressed to W. W. Belknap in 1870, I find "a high sense of honor, a sacred regard to truth, and a feeling of individual responsibility to God" stated as the fundamental principles which that institution seeks to instill into its pupils. But what notions will the cadet get of these virtues who sees on commencement-days the Government, to him in loco parentis and to whose service his life adorned and consecrated by these virtues is to be devoted, represented by a Secretary of War whose hands are filled with bribes, a practice with which falsehood and deceit are inseparably connected?

There are four principal sources from which we can derive aid in determining the extent of our constitutional power to render judgment on impeachment:

First, the history of these clauses of the Constitution as found in the debates and journals of the convention of 1787;

Second, the opinion of other tribunals or public men or writers of authority;

Third, the argument derived from the language of the Constitution; and Fourth, the broader argument derived from a consideration of the great public objects to be accomplished.

I hope to satisfy the Senate that all these point the same way; the history of the steps by which these constitutional provisions found their place, the few authorities which can be found on the subject, the narrower argument drawn from the language of the Constitution and the broader argument drawn from a consideration of the great public object to be accomplished all point the same way and bring us irresistibly to the conclusion that the power of the Senate of the United States over all grades of public official national wrong-doers, a power conferred for the highest reasons of state and on fullest deliberation, to interpose by its judgment a perpetual barrier against the return to power of great political offenders, does not depend upon the consent of the culprit, does not depend upon the accidental circumstance that the evidence of the crime is not discovered until after the official term has expired or toward the close of that term, but is a perpetual power, hanging over the guilty officer during his whole subsequent life, restricted in its exercise only by the discretion of the Senate itself and the necessity of the concurrence of both branches, the requirement of a two-thirds' vote for conviction and the constitutional limitation of the punishment.

I desire to read very briefly an account of the method by which these clauses found their place in the Constitution. I confess when I heard what was said by the honorable counsel for the defendant on that subject the other day I was absolutely amazed that two pairs of eyes looking at the same text with a different intent could reach such different conclusions. The honorable counsel told the Senate that two of the most famous lawyers of our great constitutional period, one of them a man who had set his name to the Constitution itself, made to your predecessors, when a great constitutional question was up, a statement of what their individual opinion was upon a question like the one we are now dealing with, and he thought that the reason Jared Ingersoll and Mr. Dallas made this pregnant and important statement of their opinion to the Senate of the United States was because they had not had a shilling to state it otherwise. Whether the learned counsel has had or is to have a shilling or whether the effect of that shilling upon his vision has been that which he attributes to the absence of the same coin in the case of Mr. Dallas and Mr. Jared Ingersoll, it would be presumptuous in me to inquire or even to speculate. But I think I can show to the Senate of the United States, from the history of the formation of this Constitution, that the jurisdiction conferred was complete, and that the unanimous purpose of the convention to confer the power of impeachment over everybody committing crime in office is to be found and proved by its debates, and that the clause saying that civil officers can be removed on conviction is put there as an exception to the clauses which previously had determined the tenure of those offices. In other words, the framers of the Constitution had given the power of impeachment to the House, given the power of trial to the Senate, extended the power to all cases of national official wrong-doers, prescribed the mode of proceeding, the numbers necessary to convict, limited the judgment, and passed from that question. But when they came to deal with the power of pardon, in order that there might be no apparent repugnance, they said that the President may pardon "except in cases of impeachment." When they came to provide for a trial by jury, in order that there might be no suggestion of a repugnance, they said "except in cases of impeachment." When they came to provide that the judge should hold office during good behavior, and that the President should hold for four years, and the Vice-President also, in order that there might be no apparent repugnance, they said these officers may be removed, however, on judgment and conviction on impeachment.

The learned counsel, in opening, when he read to you certain passages of the history of the steps by which this last paragraph, to which I have referred, traced how it got its place in the Constitution; but he left out the fact that the authority which we invoke, the general power to impeach, to try, and to convict, had been already conferred in the amplest manner, limited only as I have already stated. The debates in the convention of 1787, as reported by Mr. Madison and Mr. Yates, show no difference of opinion in the convention as to the propriety of giving to the House of Representatives the general power of impeachment of public officers. There was difference of opinion whether the trial should be by the Supreme Court, by a special court, or by the Senate, and whether the President should be liable to be impeached while in office or only after the expiration of his term.

If the original proposition had prevailed, first made to the convention in a series of resolutions by Mr. Randolph—and, Senators, remember that Mr. Randolph's resolutions are the backbone of the Constitution—there would be no doubt. They were presented, referred to the committee of the whole, reported from the committee of the whole, amended, referred to a committee of detail, and finally brought back by the committee of style in the complete and perfect form of the Constitution. But from the embryo to the full birth Mr. Randolph's resolutions are the principle of life of the Constitution, and the resolutions of Mr. Paterson and Mr. Pinckney, which alone Mr. Carpenter read the other day, are merely resolutions which were referred to the same committee, but upon which the convention never took action.

If the original proposition had prevailed, first made to the convention in a series of resolutions by Mr. Randolph, and afterward adopted and reported by the committee of the whole, the general power of trial of all civil officers on impeachment would have been vested in the Supreme Court, leaving the method of proceeding and the limit of jurisdiction and punishment to be ascertained from the common law. There is where you have your first proposition. It is the general power of trial of all civil officers on impeachment vested in the Supreme Court, everything else being left to the English practice, to be ascertained from the common law or determined by legislation, with the limitation on the term of office of the President alone, "to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice and neglect of duty."

On the 13th of June Mr. Randolph's ninth resolution, giving to the Supreme Court unlimited jurisdiction over impeachment of any national officers, was agreed to without dissent.

On the same day Mr. Gorham reported from the committee nineteen resolutions, which contained a plan or scheme of government, of which the ninth and thirteenth were as follows:

Resolved, That a national executive be instituted, to consist of a single person; to be chosen by the National Legislature for the term of seven years; with power to carry into execution the national laws, to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for, to be ineligible a second time, and to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractices or neglect of duty; to receive a fixed stipend by which he may be compensated for the devotion of his time to the public service, to be paid out of the National Treasury.

13. Resolved, That the jurisdiction of the national judiciary shall extend to all cases which respect the collection of the national revenue, impeachment of any national officers, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony.

This committee from which Mr. Gorham reported was the committee of the whole, and you have then this ample jurisdiction reported from the committee of the whole to the convention, containing the unlimited authority to try impeachments of any national officers and vesting it in the Supreme Court.

On the 5th of June Mr. Paterson laid his plan before the convention, which gave the national judiciary "authority to hear and determine on all impeachments of Federal officers," the power to remove the President being vested in Congress on application of a majority of the executives of the States.

July 18, the clause concerning impeachment of national officers was struck out from the enumeration of the powers of the Supreme Court. It is clear from the whole proceedings that this was done for the purpose of transferring the power to try impeachment to some other department of the Government, and not in the least with the object of limiting or destroying it altogether. There is no reason to think that in regard to all officers except the President there arose in the convention debate or question that the power to impeach them should be as unlimited as it was in England, the extent of the punishment alone being restrained.

July 20, the debate arose on the method of electing the President and on the tenure of his office.

On the clause "to be removable on impeachment or conviction for malpractice or neglect of duty" Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out this clause.

Now, remember you had at that time a universal power of impeachment over all national officers. Then they were dealing with the term of office of the President, and they had before them a clause which said that the President should be removable, limiting his four years in that respect upon impeachment.

Mr. Pinckney observed he ought not to be impeachable while in office.

That shows the understanding perfectly, that under the general clause he was impeachable after he left office, but that his four years' term, according to Mr. Pinckney, should go on.

Mr. DAVIE. If he be not impeachable while in office, he will spare no effort or pains whatever to get himself re-elected.

Mr. WILSON concurred in the necessity of making the Executive impeachable while in office.

Colonel MASON. When great crimes are committed, I am for punishing the principals as well as the coadjutors.

That is, Colonel Mason recognized the existence of the general power to punish the coadjutors and other officers as well in as out of office, and was for putting the President while in office on the same ground.

This debate derives great significance from the fact that in two of the States, Delaware and Virginia, the power of impeachment of the executive only existed when he was out of office, and Vermont and Georgia in constitutions adopted a very few years afterward, almost contemporaneous, gave the power of impeachment over all who have been or may be in office, as cited the other day by Mr. Blair. In other words, these men, familiar with constitutions some of which made the officer that is the head of the State, impeachable only after he had left office and others which gave the general power over all the executive officers in or out alike, are dealing with the Constitution of the United States; they put in this universal power of impeachment without an objection from any quarter, reported unanimously from the committee of the whole, and then go on to determine and to debate whether, as in Delaware and Virginia, the executive while in office shall be in the same condition, which would of course make him dependent on the other branches of the legislature, as he would be out of office and as all other executive officers were either in or out.

On the 26th of July the resolutions, as amended, were referred to the committee of detail. As the plan then stood, the power to provide for proceedings and punishment on impeachment would have clearly been vested in Congress without limit.

August 6, Mr. Rutledge reported from the committee of detail a constitution—it had been in a series of resolutions up to that time—which provided:

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 4, section 6.)

The President shall be removable on impeachment by the House of Representatives and conviction in the Senate of treason, bribery, and corruption. (Article 10, section 2.)

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend to the trial of impeachments of officers of the United States. (Article 11, section 3.)

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. But the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. (Article 11, section —.)

This report was first amended August 22, by providing that the trial of judges of the Supreme Court on impeachment should be before the Senate, then on 25th of August by excepting convictions on impeachment from the President's power to pardon, and August 28th by excepting it from the clause guaranteeing trial by jury.

August 27 the clause for removing the President on impeachment and conviction was postponed, on motion of Gouverneur Morris, who thought the Supreme Court an improper tribunal.

August 31 all the postponed clauses and such parts of reports as had not been acted on were referred, on motion of Mr. Sherman, to a committee of one from each State.

September 4 the committee reported, recommending the insertion, instead of the ninth clause, of the words "the Senate of the United States shall have power to try all impeachments; but no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present." They reported also the provision that "the Vice-President shall be ex officio President of the Senate, except when they sit to try the impeachment of the President, in which case the Chief Justice shall preside," &c.

They further reported the clause making the President removable from office on impeachment for treason and bribery. This clause gave rise to some discussion on the question whether the Senate or the Supreme Court were the fitter tribunal to try the President and on the question of authorizing the removal for other misconduct than treason or bribery; whereupon the clause was amended as it now stands.

It was then voted, without debate and apparently without division, to add to the clause making the President the subject of removal the further words "the Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction."

This history of the formation of the Constitution seems to me to show conclusively that article 2, section 4, of the Constitution, which provides that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction, was inserted solely as a limitation on the tenure of office, and not as a limitation on the judgment on impeachment or on the jurisdiction.

When the clause in the Constitution, article 3, section 4, was added the convention was dealing with the tenure of executive office. They had passed from the subject of impeachment. They were not creating the court. They were not defining the judgment or directing the process. All that was complete. There can be no question that the common-law power of impeachment had been vested in the two Houses of Congress, with all needful provisions as to the trial, the conviction, and the sentence. When they vested the pardoning power in the President it was deemed necessary to guard against an apparent repugnance by excepting cases of impeachment. When they secured the trial by jury in the trial of all crimes, it was deemed necessary to guard against a like apparent repugnance by excepting cases of impeachment. When they fixed the tenure of civil offices, providing a tenure during good behavior for the judge, a term of four years for the President and Vice-President, and left the tenure of others to the appointing power or to the law, they guarded against another like apparent repugnance by excepting cases of impeachment.

II. The authorities upon the question are not numerous, but they are all on the side of the power.

Mr. Rawle, a very able and learned writer, takes it for granted that the liability to impeachment extends to all who have been as well as to all who are in public office.

Judge Story, section 803, states one or two arguments of a literal and narrow character against the power to enter judgment of disqualification without judgment of removal, and very clearly, as it seems to me, indicates that the inclination or leaning of his mind in that direction is in favor of the construction contended for by the defendants; but you will remember that Judge Story at that time had not before him this great light which comes from the reading of the Madison papers, as they were not then published. Judge Story was not speaking either under the stimulant of official or judicial responsibility. He had not heard counsel. Judge Story is a writer the habit of whose mind was, as we all know, to state arguments on the one side or the other, giving them their full force without committing himself, but he goes on and expressly declares that—

It is not intended to express any opinion as to which is the true exposition of the Constitution on the points above cited. They are brought before the learned reader as matters still sub judice, the final decision of which may be reasonably left to the high tribunal constituting the court of impeachment when the occasion shall arise.

The question was expressly raised before the Senate in the case of William Blount, the first case of impeachment which arose under the Constitution of the United States. Blount was a member of the Senate who had been expelled a few days before the impeachment for the same offense for which he was impeached.

Blount pleaded to the jurisdiction that a Senator of the United States was not a civil officer; that he had ceased to be a Senator when he was impeached, and that the acts charged were not done in the execution of his office, and the cause was heard on a replication to this plea in the nature of a demurrer.

I wish for a moment to ask the Senate to consider the proposition which the learned counsel on the other side founded upon that judgment. They would have you believe that the judgment of the Senate sustaining that plea, and declining to take jurisdiction, was because they deemed that a person liable to impeachment while in office could not be impeached after he had left it; and it is therefore an authority on their side. If that be true, then the question whether a Senator of the United States can be impeached by the House of Representatives is an open question under our Constitution. That is contrary to the judgment of every text writer, and I venture to say of every member of this tribunal, however he may incline on the final question. If that be true, we have no authority under the Constitution which determines that the House of Representatives cannot impeach one of its own members, or that it cannot impeach one of the members of this body and compel the Senate to put him on trial. No, Senators, the judgment in the Blount case, as has been the unanimous construction given to it ever since, is that the nature of the senatorial office, the nature of the office of Representative in Congress, is utterly incompatible as created in the Constitution with the application to it of the jurisdiction of impeachment. Is it to be tolerated—can two branches of a legislative body dwell together under the Constitution in peace if one of them has the constitutional prerogative to lay its hand upon a member of the other and force that body to which he belongs to put him on trial for an abuse of that very legislative office to which he was elected? That is the limitation of the doctrine in the Blount case. The power of removal is given to each House for those very causes by another and independent and exclusive provision of the Constitution, as my distinguished colleague [Mr. LAPHAM] suggests.

The principal argument on both sides was on the question whether a Senator was an impeachable civil officer, and there is no doubt that the judgment sustaining the plea was on that ground. But the opinions of the very able counsel on both sides constitute very weighty evidence of the contemporaneous understanding of the Constitution. The two managers, Mr. Bayard and Mr. Harper, and the two counsel for the defendant, Mr. Dallas and Mr. Ingersoll, were among the ablest lawyers of their day. Mr. Bayard said:

> It is also alleged in the plea that the party impeached is not now a Senator. It is enough that he was a Senator at the time the articles were preferred. If the impeachment were regular and maintainable when preferred, I apprehend no subsequent event grounded on the willful act, or caused by the delinquency of the party, can vitiate or obstruct the proceeding. Otherwise the party, by resignation or the commission of some offense which merited and occasioned his expulsion, might secure his impunity. This is against one of the sagest maxims of the law, which does not allow a man to derive a benefit from his own wrong.

Mr. Dallas, for the defendant, said:

> There was room for argument whether an officer could be impeached after he was out of office; not by a voluntary resignation to evade prosecution, but by an adversary expulsion.

Mr. Ingersoll, for the defendant, said:

> It is among the less objections of the cause that the defendant is now out of office not by resignation. I certainly shall never contend that an officer may first commit an offense and afterward avoid punishment by resigning his office; but the defendant has been expelled. Can he be removed at one trial and disqualified at another for the same offense? Is it not the form rather than the substance of a trial? Do the Senate come, as Lord Mansfield says a jury ought, like blank paper, without a previous impression on their minds? Would not error in the first sentence naturally be productive of error in the second instance? Is there not reason to apprehend the strong bias of a former decision would be apt to prevent the influence of any new lights brought forward upon a second trial.

It seems to me that the consenting opinion of these leaders of the American bar, two of them making a concession against their client, is entitled to great respect. They all agree that the fact that there can be no judgment of removal is not decisive against the maintenance of the proceeding; for that is true whenever the office has been laid down. But the defendant's counsel confine their objection solely to the fact that the removal has been accomplished by another constitutional mode of dealing with the same offense, and one which has disqualified the tribunal itself from proceeding to give judgment in impeachment.

I do not agree with the distinguished gentlemen on the other side as to the statement of a principle of constitutional law made by Jared Ingersoll and Mr. Dallas—a concession directly against the interest of their client—because they were conceding that under some circumstances a person could be impeached after he had left an office. It was for the interest of their client to maintain the general doctrine that under no circumstances could that be done. One of these distinguished gentlemen says he is not capable, he never will be led by any professional necessity, to argue that a man who lays down his office to avoid the penalty of his crime can so escape, and the others in different language but in substance concurred in the same opinion. They put their argument on the ground that under another constitutional provision the man had been expelled for the same cause from the Senate within a few days. In other words, a constitutional and quasi judicial proceeding had been had which not exempted the defendant but disqualified the tribunal. One of the gentlemen goes on to argue, "how is it possible to have a trial on impeachment before a body that by a two-thirds vote has just determined every question of fact which is involved in the issue?" That was the argument which those counsel submitted to the Senate at that time.

Of the soundness of the decision in the Blount case no question as far as I can remember has been raised since. That the members of either House of Congress should be impeachable by or before the other, or that an officer whose duties are legislative should be called in question elsewhere for official acts, could never be tolerated and is repugnant to the nature of the office itself. The claim that the decision was on the ground that he was out of office cannot be maintained. Would Blount have been impeachable if he had staid in office? Does the learned counsel maintain that? There has been no attempt to do it. Although I am sorry to say there have been cases enough of official misconduct, no attempt has been made to impeach a Senator or Representative from that day to the present.

This question was directly presented in the case of Barnard in New York in the year 1872. After very full and able arguments, the court of impeachment, consisting of the court of appeals and the senate, voted 23 to 9 that the plea of the respondent that he could not be held to answer for offenses committed in a former term of office which had expired be not sustained. The court afterward unanimously found the defendant guilty on most of the articles to which this plea applied.

The counsel attempt to break the force of the decision in the case of Judge Barnard by suggesting that it only decides that a man who holds one office can be impeached for what he did in another. In other words, it is gravely claimed that the decision of Barnard's case is on the ground that you may impeach a civil officer only while he holds office; but that you may impeach him while he holds office for anything whatever which he did before he entered upon it, whether those acts had any relation whatever to the office he holds or not. Can any Senator, after reading the discussions in the Barnard case, believe that any member of the tribunal who composed it rested his decision on that ground? The able and ingenious counsel who defended Judge Barnard did not deem it fit for them to present this ground to the court, so far as I can see, and the counsel who prosecuted the impeachment against him had nothing of the sort to say.

I have, Senators, one other authority to cite on this matter. It is the opinion of an individual statesman, but carrying with it a weight on such a question as this not surpassed by that of anything except a judgment of the Senate itself. If this were a doubtful matter his character and history might have been expected to bring him to another result. He had held every variety of civil office. His life was an example of independence of individual judgment, of a struggle on the side of liberty against authority, against the power of public bodies and of public opinion. His early youth was passed among the opening scenes of a revolution. In middle life he was driven from the Presidency, which he had administered with unsurpassed wisdom and integrity, by a storm of popular delusion and folly. At the age of fourscore, in the cause of liberty he had bared his breast against a dominant majority both of Congress and of people, looking only "to another age" for his vindication. Certainly this man would not incline to extend unduly the power of a political body to punish political offenses by a judgment of political disfranchisement.

Yet John Quincy Adams, in 1846, declared:

> And here I take occasion to say that I differ from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bailey,] and, I believe, other gentlemen who have stated that the day of impeachment has passed, by the Constitution, from the moment the public office expires. I hold no such doctrine. I hold myself, so long as I have the breath of life in my body, amenable to impeachment by this House for anything I did during the time I held any public office.
> Mr. BAILEY. Is not the judgment in case of impeachment removal from office?
> Mr. ADAMS. And disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States forever afterward; a punishment much greater, in my opinion, than removal from office. It clings to a man as long as he lives; and if any public officer ever put himself in a position to be tried by impeachment, he would have very little of my good opinion if he did not think disqualification from holding office for life a more severe punishment than mere removal from office. I hold, therefore, that every President of the United States, every Secretary of State, every officer impeachable by the laws of the country, is as liable twenty years after his office expired as he is while he continues in office.—Congressional Globe, April 13, 1846.

The learned counsel did me the extraordinary honor to quote to the Senate some words which I uttered in another place, the discussions in which are not very proper for consideration here, as it seems to me, when this question was up. The honor was a little diminished by the fact that the same counsel think that the House of Representatives are forever estopped in their great constitutional power of impeachment by the legal opinions of Mr. WILLIAM LAWRENCE in the Fortieth Congress, as matter of law, and as matter of fact by the action of Mr. HIESTER CLYMER in this. I suppose we might perhaps reply by the citation which my honored associate [Mr. JENKS] made of the opinion of Mr. Spofford, the Librarian, who I suppose fairly by the same logic would estop both branches. When the language which Mr. Carpenter quoted the other day was uttered, the question was on passing the resolution to impeach this officer, under the previous question, when a member of the House who has not at all changed his individual opinion on that subject insisted that more delay should be granted, and quoted the opinion of Judge Story, or the inclination of Judge Story's mind, as showing that it was a very grave and serious question. I will not stop to read the language, but I said, "I think very likely that the House will come to the conclusion on examination that it has the power," and, as some gentlemen who now do me the honor to listen to me know very well, I stated to the gentlemen who sat about me at the time my own individual opinion that the power of the House existed and that the jurisdiction existed. Suppose when this trial opened a proposition had been made to limit the distinguished counsel for the defendant to a five minutes' or sixty minutes' defense of their client for a discussion of this great constitutional question, is it not pretty likely that some Senator, whatever might have been his individual judgment as to the law, would have risen in his place and said, "Senators, here is a grave constitutional question about which such a jurist as Judge Story has doubted." Could he not do that without being prejudged or charged with any inconsistency if he should in the end come to the conclusion at which we arrive?

It is proper to say, however, as regards the case of a defendant fleeing from office in order that he may interpose this objection between his crime and his punishment, that the action of the House of Representatives finds great vindication when it determined that at least the proceedings for impeachment should begin on the day when the fugitive sought to avoid them by flight.

The narrower argument drawn from the letter of the Constitution is the chief argument of the defense. The counsel make two points upon the text of the fourth section of the third article. First, "all civil officers of the United States." The defendant is not now a civil officer; therefore he is not included in the description. Second, a judgment of removal is imperatively required. No removal is possible from an office already resigned. Therefore the judgment required by the Constitution has become impossible. On the other hand, we maintain that the language of the Constitution, even expounded as you would expound a deed or a will, without regard to the history of its formation and without resorting to the great public reasons which favor our construction, brings us to the same result as the authorities we have cited.

The articles which provide for the Senate and House contain a complete provision for impeachment. The House is vested with the sole power of impeachment. The Senate is vested with the sole power to try all impeachments. The judgment is limited within certain bounds. The number necessary for conviction, the oath or affirmation, and the calling in the Chief Justice to preside in case the President is tried are prescribed. We have here, then, an adequate and ample provision covering the entire process: authority to institute it, authority to try it, the method of proceeding, and the limitation of the judgment. For what is meant by impeachment, what offenses it shall cover, and what persons are liable to it, for the forms of pleading and rules of evidence recourse must be had to the common law. The power of impeachment is not defined by grant in our Constitution, but by limitation. The general power is conferred, and then a limitation is inserted upon the judgment, which is not to extend further than removal and disqualification, and the power of conviction, which shall only be by two-thirds vote. For everything else we are referred to the common law. Mr. Rawle says:

> Impeachments are thus introduced as a known definite term, and we must have recourse to the common law of England for a definition of them. (Rawle on Constitution, page 198.)

The learned counsel who opened for the defense says that United States courts have no common-law powers; and that is true. He says that is as true of this court as of all other United States courts. That I agree is true. But when a word is used in defining powers granted, you resort to the common law for its meaning. That is so as to the meaning of "admiralty," which is a jurisdiction granted to United States courts, or "maritime." So as to "levying war," "felony," "bribery," as to the term "quorum," by the legislative grant of power, for the limits of the power of pardon, and all these things, although they are granted by the Constitution, you refer for the meaning of the terms used in the grant to the common law, to which those terms belong.

Now, it is well settled that all abuses of official trust are impeachable in Parliament. At common law there is no limit as to person; there is no limit as to time; there is no restriction as to the character of the offense or in the punishment, save the discretion of the two Houses.

Mr. Wooddeson states the law in his lectures, volume 2, page 601:

> All the king's subjects are impeachable in Parliament. Such kinds of misdeeds, however, * * * as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper, and have been the most usual, grounds for this kind of prosecution. Thus, if a lord chancellor be guilty of bribery, or of acting grossly contrary to the duty of his office, if the judges mislead their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, if any other magistrate attempt to subvert the fundamental laws or introduce arbitrary power, these have been deemed cases adapted to parliamentary inquiry and decision. So when a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to neglect the safeguard of the sea, an embassador to betray his trust, a privy councilor to propound or support pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to obtain exorbitant grants or incompatible employments, these imputations have properly occasioned impeachments, because it is apparent how little the ordinary tribunals are calculated to take cognizance of such offenses or to investigate and reform the general polity of the state.

Somers was impeached for putting the great seal to a disadvantageous treaty.

The word "impeachment" meant, when used in the Constitution, the right to proceed according to the usages of Parliament against such persons and for such offenses as those usages permitted.

It has been claimed that no person can be convicted except for crimes or misdemeanors indictable by statute or at common law. But the English authorities, too numerous to be cited, are otherwise. If the question were ever an open one whether an officer can be impeached for high official misdemeanors not prohibited by statute and not offenses at common law, it must be taken to be settled by the judgment of this court in the case of John Pickering, who was impeached, convicted, and removed from office for drunkenness and impropriety of speech on the bench; and by the express and unanimous resolution of the Senate when they expelled Blount, in which they recited that he had been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, which are the terms used in the impeachment clause, although his offense was inciting certain Indian tribes to make war against a foreign power, not, of course, an offense indictable at common law.

There are a thousand cases of the highest official misdemeanor which it is impossible to anticipate by a statute. The giving evil advice to a President by his constitutional counselors for corrupt personal ends, the abuse of the official discretion lodged so largely in the heads of Departments, the appointing a public officer for money before the statute passed making that an offense, the perverse and wanton refusal to discharge official duties imposed on them by law, may surely be reached by impeachment, though not punishable as crimes. So of the judge. It was forcibly put by the counsel for the people in the case of Barnard, in New York:

> For perverting the course of justice, for exceeding a just and lawful discretion, for oppressing suitors, for indecency on the bench, for being a buffoon in the public bar-rooms of the city—for these and other things, for which he ought to be degraded from the judicial office by a court of impeachment, where is the remedy? By indictment? No.—Speech of Van Cott, trial of Barnard, volume 1, page 173.

The judge who sits when his brother is a party, or who is guilty of gross oppression or gross usurpation, cannot be reached by any ordinary criminal process. Yet of his liability to be impeached there can be no question. The authorities on this subject are fully collected in a brief submitted to the Senate in the trial of the President, preferred by Judge LAWRENCE, and annexed by General Butler to his opening argument.

Now then—and this is a point of this argument which I deem a strong one—if it is true that the power to impeach at common law included the power to proceed against any subject for any abuse of public trust without exception, is not the absence of any express limitation in the Constitution almost decisive that it intended to leave the definition of the person to the common law, as it left the definition of the offense?

If there is anything that the framers of our Government did not leave to construction, but expressed in plain English, it was the limitations on the power of dealing with offenses in cases where they thought the interest of justice or of liberty required such limitation. They knew that the grant of the power of impeachment involved in it by the common-law meaning of the term the power to punish for official offenses not indictable, and the power to impeach, try, convict, and sentence after the offender had left office. In the beginning of that century Lord Chancellor Somers, the friend of liberty and the friend of America, had been tried for putting the great seal to treaties disadvantageous to England, on impeachment commenced after he left office. Lord Chancellor Macclesfield in 1725 was impeached for corruption in the sale of offices, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment, on proceedings resolved on by the Commons after he left office. It seems impossible that they should not have expressly confined impeachment to persons in office, if it had been their desire so to confine it. It seems impossible that any provision so confining it would have got into the Constitution without debate.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, not to interrupt the manager, I should like to ask a question which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The inquiry propounded by the Senator from California will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

There are now several members of the Senate who have been in past years civil officers of the United States. Are they liable to impeachment for an alleged act of guilt done in office?

Mr. Manager HOAR. They are undoubtedly. The logic of my argument brings us to that result; and undoubtedly they are as safe from the operation of that process practically as the newly-born infant in his mother's arms. Does anybody suppose that there is to be a two-thirds vote of the American Senate which will rake up and try and punish for political offenses, when the public judgment of this people has demanded an amnesty? The whole power to punish, the whole judgment after the offender has left office is disqualification to hold office, and that judgment is a judgment in the discretion of the Senate. Hunt in Massachusetts, a justice of the peace—the language being exactly the same as this—was sentenced simply to suspension from his office and disqualification to hold any other for twelve months. That was the case of a justice of the peace in the town of Watertown, I think, early in this century.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to propound a further question. I do not desire to interrupt the manager.

Mr. Manager HOAR. I am very happy to answer any question I can.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Then what becomes of the comity between the two Houses on which the learned manager laid stress?

Mr. Manager HOAR. Why, Mr. Senator, I do not understand that there is any comity which prevents pursuing a Senator into this Chamber for any offense that he has committed——

Mr. SARGENT. The necessity for good feeling between the two Houses?

Mr. Manager HOAR. I do not understand that there is any comity or necessity for good feeling between this Senate and any other tribunal whatever which prohibits pursuing him for guilt elsewhere with a lawful or constitutional punishment. He cannot be called in question by the court for anything he does or says in this Chamber, the blackest libel or slander though it might be conceived to be; and he cannot be called in question by the House of Representatives. My argument related to impeaching a Senator for senatorial conduct and for what took place here, and to the indecency of supposing that it ever was thought that the House of Representatives might require the Senate to try at its own bar a member whom it had permitted, without the exercise of its power of expulsion, to remain here. That was the argument, but of course if General Belknap had been elected to the Senate from the State of Iowa in the ignorance of the people, and had taken his seat in the Senate on that election, and after that these acts of bribery had been discovered, the House of Representatives could, and should, and would have demanded that he be sequestered from his seat in this Chamber, and be placed at the bar, as he now stands, as a criminal; and that power would be as necessary for the purity, and the honor, and the dignity of the Senate itself as it is for the protection of the American people.

Let me then sum up the argument, drawn from the language of the Constitution. The power of impeachment is not defined in the grant in the Constitution. It is conferred as a general common-law power. The judgment is then limited to removal and disqualification, and two-thirds required for conviction. No limit of its application to persons is inserted in the grant. But a subsequent limitation on the tenure of office is inserted, namely, the case of a removal by impeachment, to guard against the argument that officers, whose term is fixed in the Constitution, cannot be removed under the power of impeachment, just as impeachment is excepted in the clause securing the right of trial by jury and in the clause conferring the power to pardon.

But suppose we grant the phrase, all civil officers, to be inserted as a definition of the persons who may be reached by this process. Is the definition to be taken to apply to them at the time of the commission of the offense or at the time of the punishment? Suppose a statute enact that all wrong-doers may be punished. Is it not clear that if they be wrong-doers when they commit the act the liability to punishment attaches? The very statute which punishes bribery would fail by this construction to reach anybody, because it is in this respect, as has already been said, almost identical with the provision of the Constitution in its description.

The provision that the judgment shall extend no further than removal from office and perpetual disqualification authorizes any lesser penalty included within those limits to be imposed at the discretion of the Senate. In Hunt's case, in Massachusetts, the sentence was disqualification for a year under a like constitutional provision.

I ought to have added, in further reply to the honorable Senator from California, that if he refers to that large class of cases where the Constitution has expressly imposed a disability, that is, for aid and comfort to the rebellion in the late war, and where the Constitution has expressly provided a means of removing that disability, I should have no doubt that any person whose offense consisted, whether an official offense or an offense as a private citizen, in giving aid and comfort to the rebellion, could plead an exemption from impeachment when he had, under the very provision of the Constitution itself, by the vote of two-thirds of both branches, received his pardon. So that I do not think anybody need be much afraid of what will happen to him or to any person whom he thinks public policy requires should not be further pursued for state crimes, in coming to the conclusion for which we contend.

It certainly will not be seriously maintained that when a statute prescribes two punishments, one of which has become impossible, that the offender is thereby exempted from the other. The penalties provided in more barbarous ages will suggest abundant illustrations. Some of our old statutes provide that an offender be imprisoned or whipped, and in addition have his head shaved or his ears cropped, or labor in the tread-mill. Do the learned counsel think he would get rid of the imprisonment or whipping if he did not happen to have any hair or any legs, or if he had had his ears cropped before?

The whole constitutional provision, so far as affects our present purpose, can be summed up in two sentences which are scarcely a paraphrase or change of the existing text of the existing law, and these two sentences I think state precisely the contentions on the one side and on the other. We say that the Constitution in substance is this: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try impeachments, and civil officers shall be removed on conviction." The counsel for the defendant would state it to be: "Judgment in case of conviction shall be removal from office and disqualification if the defendant is willing!" That is the summing up of the two propositions.

But the meaning of these provisions of the Constitution must be ascertained after all by a broad consideration of the great public objects they were intended to accomplish. "Never forget," says Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch vs. Maryland—and that sentence is the key-note to his whole judicial power—"Never forget that it is a constitution you are interpreting."

It is clear that in the case of high state offenders it was deemed important by the people when they established the Constitution that the judgment of perpetual disqualification to hold office should be imposed in the discretion of the Senate. There is no need to argue that anything which finds expression in the Constitution is of grave national importance. This judgment of perpetual disqualification was provided, among other reasons, to prevent the return to office after removal or resignation of guilty favorites of the Executive. For that large class of impeachable misdemeanors which cannot be described in a statute beforehand it is the only penalty known to the Constitution. The mere removal from office carries with it little terror, and is of little public importance as applied to all officers less than the President himself. By our customs most offices, including those of the judges in many States, are laid down at brief and stated intervals. All officers are removable at the pleasure of the appointing power, with certain exceptions. To be removed from office, of itself, carries with it no degradation. If such removal be for a cause not involving personal infamy, it will in many cases work no disgrace, even if it take place on impeachment, unless the perpetual disqualification be attached to it. John Quincy Adams was right when he said:

> If any public officer ever put himself in a position to be tried by impeachment, he would have very little of my good opinion if he did not think disqualification from holding office for life a more severe punishment than mere removal from office.

A good deal has been said as to whether this constitutional judgment be a punishment or a remedy; but, after all, it seems to me, if we settle what the thing is, it is not necessary to trouble ourselves as to which of these two words is applicable to it. In a certain sense it is a punishment for a member of the House of Representatives not to be re-elected and to lose the confidence of his constituents or for a member of the Senate to lose the confidence of his State Legislature. It is a punishment in some sense for an executive subordinate officer to be removed for cause. And in that sense undoubtedly it was the purpose of the framers of our Constitution to have the terror of this result, whether it be removal or disqualification, held up before the official as a security against his guilt. But in the theological or the old legal sense in which we use the word "punishment"—that is, as an adequate expiation or atonement for an offense, the meting out of justice to the offender—of course this constitutional provision is not a punishment, because the Constitution expressly provides that the party may be held to answer to trial at law in all cases in addition to this. In that sense, therefore, the leading purpose of the Constitution was to secure the people this great remedy against the return to office of the guilty official.

The judgment of disqualification is in all cases, when re-appointment or re-election has taken place, the only method of accomplishing removal. Senators will reflect that this judgment of disqualification involves and includes removal from every office held by the person convicted at the time it is pronounced.

The exception of the judgment on impeachment from the operation of the power to pardon strongly shows the importance attached to that part of it which is to be of perpetual operation. How careful were the framers of our Constitution to mark their sense of the importance of this judgment of disqualification so that the man should never get back. Whittemore was re-elected by the people of his district after he had resigned and fled from the House of Representatives to avoid expulsion; and cases of such offenders may easily be conceived. Of course the expulsion from a legislative body they could not give that effect to, but the framers of the Constitution put into the power of judgment on impeachment this power of perpetual disqualification; and then they added that it should be beyond the reach of the Executive pardon, because it was intended to reach guilty Cabinet officers or counselors of the Executive.

It seems to me the decisive consideration in determining this question is this: The people of the United States are entitled for their protection to a certain judgment. The guilty officer shall be removed, and, if the degree of his guilt warrant the greater condemnation, he shall be incapable of being restored. The Constitution expressly mentions perpetual disqualification beyond the reach of pardon as the judgment which the Senate may think its duty in some cases to pronounce. Now can this protective judgment ever be any the less necessary because the crime has not been discovered until the official term has expired, although perhaps the officer has been re-appointed, or because just before the proceedings begin, or just before the judgment is pronounced, the official has laid down his office? Because the logic of my friends on the other side, as the counsel very frankly admitted, is this: They say that when a man has ceased to be a civil officer you cannot pronounce the constitutional judgment, because the constitutional judgment must be a judgment of removal; and therefore it is true, as the counsel admitted, that if that resignation be made after every Senator has publicly pronounced his opinion of guilt, before the judgment is actually entered, it may be pleaded in arrest of judgment, and the power to pronounce the greater part of the penalty taken from the Senate.

It is true that there are statutes requiring or authorizing the perpetual disqualification to hold office to be inflicted by the courts of the United States as a punishment on conviction of crime. But the existence of these statutes does not meet the difficulty; for a protection to the people provided by the Constitution itself, and depending on the high discretion of this constitutional court, a statute provision, repealable at the will of the Legislature, can never be deemed an equivalent. A constitutional disqualification intended to bar out the guilty counselors of the Executive from a return to political power can only be placed beyond the operation of an Executive pardon when it is pronounced by the judgment of the Senate. The disqualification provided by statute can only apply to that comparatively narrow class of offenses which can be so foreseen as to be described with reasonable certainty in ordinary criminal legislation. Impeachment goes much further.

The whole constitutional theory of impeachment proceeds upon the ground that, while conviction for crime may be safely left to juries and its punishment to the discretion of inferior courts, the protection of the American people against the return to office of the guilty official has been deemed of importance enough to be attained by the mechanism provided by the Constitution of an inquest and impeachment by the Representatives of the whole people and a judgment of the Senate itself. It seems to me a monstrous absurdity to suppose that this great constitutional remedy of a judgment against the return to office of a high political official on account of great political offenses committed at the seat of Government should depend on conviction by a jury drawn by the marshal from the office-holding population of the District of Columbia on a trial conducted and controlled by officers of the executive, and on a sentence of a single judge of a court, however respectable, whose jurisdiction is confined within a couple of square leagues.

Besides, there is certainly a grave constitutional difficulty in supporting much of the legislation by which Congress has undertaken to clothe the national courts with the power of imposing disqualification to hold office as a punishment for crime. If it is to operate as a disqualification to hold those offices whose qualifications are defined by the Constitution, it is liable to the objection of declaring persons disqualified whom the Constitution declares qualified. If it is to operate upon persons holding office at the time of their conviction, it places the power of removal from office in hands where the Constitution has not placed it.

It is further argued that the danger of the return to office of persons guilty of great political crimes is a visionary and not a real danger, because to their restoration to most of the important offices under the Government the consent of the Senate is necessary. But there are many to which it is not necessary. If the guilty public officer whose crimes are not discovered until the expiration of his term of office or who lays down his office to escape conviction can thereby avoid sentence, he of course thereby avoids trial, as the very form of issue which we are now dealing with shows; neither Senate nor people nor President, to whom his claim for new confidence is presented, can have the advantage of any judicial trial, of any inquest, of any process for the discovery of concealed evidence, of any responsible accuser, in determining the question of his former guilt.

It is further suggested, in very influential quarters, that it is the duty of the executive officer by whom the guilty official has been appointed to withhold his acceptance of the resignation of such official until conviction and judgment upon impeachment can be had. This suggestion has hardly enough reason in its favor to merit an answer. In the first place, I deny that the right of any American citizen to lay down an office depends upon any act of acceptance of any person whatever. Any explicit and formal renunciation of the office by the official terminates his relation to it without the consent of any person whatsoever. This was lately held by the House of Representatives in the case of Whittemore, who resigned his seat in that body without its consent when the vote on the question of his expulsion was about to be taken. Does the right of the member of the Cabinet to resign his place to accept a seat in the Senate depend upon the consent of the President? Does the right of the members of this body to lay down their high office, perhaps to assume some other even higher, if there be any higher, depend upon its will? If this were true, must the officer guilty of high crimes be left in charge of his office until the House and the Senate meet and until judgment can be rendered upon impeachment? Must a defaulting Treasurer of the United States be left in charge of the whole Treasury until conviction and sentence? Should the Secretary of War have been forced to remain in charge of the War Office until the close of this trial, a charge including the custody of the documents among the records of his Department upon which his conviction may depend? The power given by the statute to the President to suspend an officer only exists when the Senate is not in session. The acceptance of a resignation is a mere formality, adding no validity whatever to the act. If it were not so, it would be an imperative duty whenever the officer in whom the power of accepting it is lodged believed in the guilt of the party resigning.

There are some authorities, English and American, to the effect that there are certain public offices which cannot be resigned without the consent of the appointing power or of some public board to which the officer belongs. These cases proceed upon the ground that the performance of an office to which the subject has been lawfully called is a duty which he cannot refuse. Wherever that doctrine extends—that is, wherever in England or America it has been held that the acceptance of somebody is necessary to a resignation—the citizen elected or appointed is compellable by mandamus to take the office originally even against his wish. But the American law as applied to offices not municipal or corporate is settled otherwise. (McCrary on American Law of Elections, page 260; People vs. Porter, 6 California, page 26; United States vs. Wright, 1 McLean, page 512; Gates vs. Delaware County, 12 Iowa, page 405; Lewis vs. Oliver, 4 Abbott's Practice, page 121.)

We are therefore brought inexorably to the alternative that proceedings for impeachment can be instituted and go on notwithstanding the withdrawal from office of the delinquent, or that the greater part of a jurisdiction expressly conferred by the Constitution exists and may be exercised, not at the discretion of the Senate, but at the discretion of the accused.

An argument is also drawn from the practice of criminal courts. It is said that when a judgment is required by statute to be for two things it cannot be for one of them alone, and that here the judgment must be by the Constitution either for removal alone or for removal and disqualification. The practice of criminal courts affords no rule binding in this Chamber. Undoubtedly, the laws of common justice and common reason are of universal authority. Undoubtedly, you can derive great aid in discovering and applying those rules from the sages of the law. But beyond these simple precepts of universal application, an attempt to entangle this high court, while exercising its exalted functions, in the technicalities of criminal practice, is, to use Burke's comparison, "as if a rabbit that breeds four times a year should attempt to prescribe the period necessary for the gestation of an elephant."

Such confined and inapplicable rules would be convenient indeed to oppression, to extortion, bribery, and corruption, but ruinous to the people, whose protection is the true object of all tribunals and of all their rules.—Burke's report of committee to inspect the Lord's journals.

Among the narrow, technical, artificial reasons suggested by the practice of the police court, and of doubtful cogency even there, is this doctrine. I do not believe that it will be adopted here, or be relied on by the Senate as the foundation for a determination that where, in the contemplation of the Constitution, the safety of the state entitles the people on demand of its representatives to a solemn resolution of the Senate that a high state offender shall be removed from office and disqualified to return to it, the power to erect this barrier is taken away because the removal has become impossible.

But I do not admit that the Constitution requires this double judgment. The judgment is, in either case, for one thing—a larger or a lesser. It may be for removal simply. It may be for perpetual disqualification simply, which includes removal.

Before dismissing this proposition of the defense, consider exactly to what it would bring us. The proposition is that no judgment under the Constitution can be rendered by the Senate which does not remove from his place a person then holding a civil office under the United States. It applies only to the time judgment is actually pronounced. For all purposes of this argument for the defense, the constitutional remedy is defeated just as much if the offender lay down his office after the trial, after the opinions of Senators have been made known, if the resignation be pleaded in arrest of judgment at any time before judgment be actually pronounced and entered.

The defendant's construction of the Constitution, then, must be rejected, because it destroys for all practical value the most important portion of the authority of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, namely, the power to pronounce judgment of perpetual disqualification. But—and this is the last point I shall have occasion to address to the Senate—it must also be rejected because it leaves the power of removal itself almost entirely destroyed.

The judgment of disqualification is one method of removal. Wherever the officer has been re-elected or re-appointed, whenever he has been promoted to a more important office, wherever the evidence of his crime is not discovered until after the term of office in which it was committed has expired, or is discovered too late for proceedings of impeachment, the public are without other redress. Suppose a President corruptly use his office to secure a re-election. Suppose a Vice-President deal fraudulently with the returns. Suppose a Cabinet officer is an accomplice in such misconduct of the President, or be guilty of bribery just at the close of his term and is re-appointed. Is there no power reserved by the Constitution either to remove him or punish him?

The claim practically limits the constitutional redress to offenses committed during the first three years of a presidential term, unless it be supposed that the President should call an extra session to take steps for his own impeachment or that of his own counselors.

The impeachment of Andrew Johnson was resolved by the House on the 24th of February, 1868; the final judgment of acquittal was pronounced on the 28th of May, a period of three months and four days, precisely corresponding in length with the short session of Congress under our present arrangements. This does not include the time occupied by the House in obtaining the evidence, or in the debates which preceded the resolution of impeachment. This present impeachment has been pressed, I think, more rapidly than any other known in our history; yet nine weeks have already expired since it begun. This fact shows that for any official misdemeanor committed in the last year of his office an impeachment and conviction of the President during his term will in most cases be found wholly impracticable. He may have secured his re-election by unconstitutional or corrupt use of his power, and the people, if he cannot be impeached after his term expires, are wholly without remedy.

The destruction of the power to impeach carries with it the destruction of the power of the House to make the inquest, leaving the people wholly dependent for their protection on the executive power of removal. This power does not extend to all cases. The Executive may be deaf to charges of guilt against officers in whom he has trusted, coming to him without authority and tested by no competent processes of investigation.

It is said that it is a dangerous construction which leaves the public officer exposed to impeachment during his whole natural life. But if he be guilty and deserve impeachment he ought to be so exposed. His safety against unjust prosecution or the revival of old political offenses, which the public peace requires should be buried in oblivion, is abundant. No impeachment can proceed unless both Houses concur.

The judgment of disqualification is clearly discretionary; and the Senate, in my judgment, may refuse even to take up for trial an impeachment presented by the House against an officer out of office in which it is clear that in the exercise of its discretion it would not be expedient to impose a judgment on conviction. No impeachment can proceed unless both Houses concur. No conviction can be had but by two-thirds of the Senate. No judgment of disqualification except in its discretion. When political passion breaks down all these barriers there will be little else in the Republic worth saving.

Impeachment is not likely to be a favorite process with the Senate or the House. There is no likelihood that we shall ever unlimber this clumsy and bulky monster piece of ordnance to take aim at an object from which all danger has gone by.

I wish to say a word or two in regard to the other question. I have dealt, as it was intended I should deal, chiefly with the main question; but, with regard to the question presented so well by my honorable associate who opened this case, [Mr. LORD,] (and that is, where the process of impeachment begins and the term of office ceases on the same day, the law will deem that the resolution of impeachment was adopted at the first moment of that day,) I will not undertake to restate and I certainly cannot re-enforce what my distinguished and able friend so admirably stated upon that subject; but I desire simply to say to the Senate that, if they will consult the authorities cited by my associate and the authorities cited by counsel for defendant, they will find that the two classes of authorities do not in the least conflict.

The principle is a principle in favor of judicial remedy. Every judicial remedy will be held to have begun, every judicial process, whether it be judgment or suit, at that time in the day in which it was instituted which is necessary for the preservation of the remedy which it is designed to secure. That is the rule which all these authorities established, and the authorities where a day was divided for the very purpose of preserving remedies and preventing their defeat are those which have been cited by the counsel for the defense.

I perhaps ought to make one single observation, though it is hardly necessary, in regard to the grave citation to the Senate of the instance where a person is permitted to change his domicile or to go across a State line for the purpose of instituting a lawsuit, and the attempt to extend the analogies of those rules to the cases where a criminal undertakes to flee from the penalties of his crime. Suppose a citizen of the State of New York commit treason against that State and flee into New Jersey, will the court be very likely, when he is brought back for trial, to recognize the doctrine that because he can go over to New Jersey to bring a civil lawsuit he is equally protected by the same logic in going into New Jersey to escape a criminal process against himself?

I claim, then, to have established that the history of the formation of the Constitution, the opinions of the best authorities, the letter of the instrument, and the grand object it was intended to accomplish, concur in reqniring you to overrule this plea to your jurisdiction. To allow it is to put out of your hands the bridle placed by the Constitution in the hands of the Senate as a controlling check upon executive usurpation and executive corruption—the bridle placed in your hands by those men who looked through all ages, both the past and the future, in their far-reaching, statesmanlike discretion, not to be laid down by men with the experience of a single generation. This judgment will not only determine this question for all time for the Senate, but it will speak with an authority not to be disregarded in the construction of like clauses in the constitutions of more than thirty American States. Throughout this broad land, under national and State jurisdiction, the great constitutional power of impeachment, the life of public liberty and of public purity, is to be dwarfed or maintained in its fullest and most beneficent vigor as you shall decide this issue.

I do not stand here, Senators, as the accuser of Mr. Belknap, or as the advocate of the House of Representatives. I am here to speak for a right of the American people; a right which their ancestors secured to them by their Constitution, and which nothing but their own constitutional act can take away. It is that over every public officer, whether he be tempted to abuse or usurp power or to gain wealth by corrupt means in office, shall hang the dread of what the Federalist calls the "awful discretion" of the Senate to try him in the presence of the whole American people and to visit him with the perpetual infamy of its sentence. For the citizen accused of crime is the grand jury, and the indictment, and the statute of limitations, and the jury trial, and the law enacted beforehand. For him is the maxim that it is better that ten guilty escape than that one innocent perish. But for the public officer who voluntarily seeks or accepts these vast trusts, the safety of the whole state demands there shall be a higher responsibility and another method of punishment.

I have thus, Senators, very imperfectly performed the duty assigned to me by the House of Representatives. It has been a dull argument of a dry question of law. Your decision, like every decision affecting permanently the power and authority of the Senate, is to reach in its consequences to a period very far distant in the future. But I am much mistaken if there be not a very deep and present public interest in this issue.

I said a little while ago that the Constitution had no safeguards to throw away. You will judge whether the public events of to-day do not admonish us to look well to all our securities to prevent or power to punish the great guilt of corruption in office. We must not confound idle clamor with public opinion or accept the accusations of scandal and malice instead of proof. But we shall make a worse mistake if, because of the multitude of false and groundless charges against men in high office, we fail to redress substantial grievances or to deal with cases of actual guilt. The worst evil resulting from the indiscriminate attack of an unscrupulous press upon men in public station is not that innocence suffers, but that crime escapes. Let scandal and malice be encountered by pure and stainless lives. Let corruption and bribery meet their lawful punishment.

My own public life has been a very brief and insignificant one, extending little beyond the duration of a single term of senatorial office. But in that brief period I have seen five judges of a high court of the United States driven from office by threats of impeachment for corruption or maladministration. I have heard the taunt, from friendliest lips, that when the United States presented herself in the East to take part with the civilized world in generous competition in the arts of life, the only product of her institutions in which she surpassed all others beyond question was her corruption. I have seen in the State in the Union foremost in power and wealth four judges of her courts impeached for corruption, and the political administration of her chief city become a disgrace and a by-word throughout the world. I have seen the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, now a distinguished member of this court, rise in his place and demand the expulsion of four of his associates for making sale of their official privilege of selecting the youths to be educated at our great military school. When the greatest railroad of the world, binding together the continent and uniting the two great seas which wash our shores, was finished, I have seen our national triumph and exultation turned to bitterness and shame by the unanimous reports of three committees of Congress—two of the House and one here—that every step of that mighty enterprise had been taken in fraud. I have heard in highest places the shameless doctrine avowed by men grown old in public office that the true way by which power should be gained in the Republic is to bribe the people with the offices created for their service, and the true end for which it should be used when gained is the promotion of selfish ambition and the gratification of personal revenge. I have heard that suspicion haunts the footsteps of the trusted companions of the President.

These things have passed into history. The Hallam or the Tacitus or the Sismondi or the Macaulay who writes the annals of our time will record them with his inexorable pen. And now, when a high Cabinet officer, the constitutional adviser of the Executive, flees from office before charges of corruption, shall the historian add that the Senate treated the demand of the people for its judgment of condemnation as a farce and laid down its high functions before the sophistries and jeers of the criminal lawyer? Shall he speculate about the petty political calculations as to the effect on one party or the other which induced his judges to connive at the escape of the great public criminal? Or, on the other hand, shall he close the chapter by narrating how these things were detected, reformed, and punished by constitutional processes which the wisdom of our fathers devised for us, and the virtue and purity of the people found their vindication in the justice of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator whether we had not better fix the hour on Monday a little earlier?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is twelve o'clock by the rules. I will yield to a motion to adjourn to eleven o'clock on Monday. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should prefer to say ten o'clock, so as to certainly avoid a night session; but in order to give counsel ample time on both sides, I will say eleven o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn until Monday at eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment adjourned to Monday next at eleven o'clock a. m.

MONDAY, May 8, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at eleven o'clock, a. m.) The Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, pursuant to adjournment, now resumes its session. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Messrs. Blair, Black, and Carpenter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will notify the House that the Senate is ready to proceed with the trial.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves a call of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the roll-call will proceed.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and thirty-nine Senators answered to their names.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting on Saturday last for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to hear the managers. Senators will please give their attention.

Mr. Manager KNOTT. Mr. President, if the court please, in resuming the remarks which it has devolved upon me to submit upon the question under discussion, I need not promise the court that I shall be as brief as possible. Even if I were in perfect health I do not feel that I am speaking for posterity, and consequently am under no temptation to talk until that audience shall arise. Moreover, the line of remark which I had proposed for myself has been so completely anticipated by the very able and carefully considered arguments of my learned colleagues that, fortunately for the court, there remains but little for me to say except perhaps to recapitulate some of the points and to elaborate to some extent a few of the suggestions so ably presented by them.

When the court did me the favor to adjourn on Friday evening in consequence of the physical indisposition from which I was then and am still suffering intensely, I was about to institute an inquiry suggested to me at that particular moment by the closing sentences in a paragraph which I had just read from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, as to the purpose for which the remedy by impeachment was designed, with the view of determining whether the construction of the various provisions of the Constitution relating to that subject, proposed on behalf of the House of Representatives, was more consistent with that purpose than that insisted upon by the defense. As to what that purpose really was, I imagine there can be but little, if any, dispute. However much controversy there may be with regard to the character of the offenses for which an impeachment will lie, I apprehend there can be but little question that the object for which this mode of procedure was designed was precisely that stated by Judge Story, namely, to secure the state against gross misdemeanors in office.

The framers of our Federal Constitution were perfectly aware that the functions of the Government they were preparing to establish would necessarily have to be committed to those who would be subject to the same frailties and actuated, to some extent at least, by the same passions which influence the conduct of their fellow-men. They knew, moreover, that those who are called to fill the most exalted stations of public trust are frequently, if not always, under the strongest possible temptation to abuse the opportunities afforded by their official position for the promotion of their own aggrandizement, the extension of their own authority, and the perpetuation of their own power, besides being constantly subject to the suggestions of an ignoble appetite for illegitimate emolument. As wise and sagacious statesmen, therefore, fully appreciating the importance of securing every department of the Government from the contamination of official corruption and crime, they devised this mode of procedure as the most practicable and efficient method of preserving the purity and maintaining the integrity of those departments especially which were not designed to be under the immediate, direct control of the people through the ballot. This much I understand to be conceded by the honorable counsel for the accused.

But how was the end proposed to be attained? First, by making it peremptory upon the court by which a criminal official should be convicted on impeachment to remove him immediately from office; and this, say learned counsel, was the only purpose the framers of the Constitution sought to accomplish: "That the sole object for which the power of impeachment was given was removal from office." It seems that those wise and patriotic statesmen thought differently, however. They knew that if the process of impeachment went no further than to remove a criminal or corrupt official from office the whole proceeding would amount to nothing more than a puerile farce. They knew that the party convicted and removed might be immediately restored to the same or appointed to another and perhaps more important position by a corrupt or misguided patron, and to guard against any such possible contingency they went a step further and provided that the court might not only dismiss the delinquent from office but prevent him from again polluting the Government he had already degraded by disqualifying him to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under it, either for a limited period or forever, as the court might see proper, and, to render that disqualification as complete and effectual as possible, exempted the party thus convicted and condemned from the general power of the Executive to pardon.

But was this all? Was the only purpose of this disqualification simply to preserve the Government from the danger to be apprehended from the single convicted criminal? Very far from it, sir! That in reality constituted but a very small part of the design. The great object, after all, was that his infamy might be rendered conspicuous, historic, eternal, in order to prevent the occurrence of like offenses in the future. The purpose was not simply to harass, to persecute, to wantonly degrade, or take vengeance upon a single individual; but it was that other officials through all time might profit by his punishment, might be warned by his political ostracism, by the everlasting stigma fixed upon his name by the most august tribunal on earth, to avoid the dangers upon which he wrecked, and withstand the temptations under which he fell, to teach them that if they should fall under like temptations they will fall, like Lucifer, never to rise again.

The real purpose of proceedings of this kind is presented so beautifully and so forcibly in a single paragraph in the opening speech of Mr. Whitbread upon the impeachment of Lord Melville, who, like the accused here, sought to evade the consequences of his crimes by resignation, that the Senate will pardon me if I read it. He says:

> And here let me observe that all prosecutions of this sort are instituted for the general benefit, and not with the view of harassing any private individual. All punishment is inflicted for the sake of example, and not for the purpose of personal vengeance.
> Mark this:
> It is the morals of a country which in all these inquiries we ought to regard, and it is to this which every honorable prosecutor ought to look, and this every impartial court will respect.
> If I could employ the voice of an angel and render it audible to the remotest corners of the earth, I would caution every friend of virtue before he accepts of any great public engagement I would show him that the temptations are great; and I would invite him to attend to the punishment which would be the consequence of misconduct.

Punishment, sir! Punishment that public and official morals may be purified and preserved; not that a single individual may be harassed, but that the government to which every citizen looks for protection may be kept pure, uncontaminated, and worthy of the confidence of those who are subject to its authority.

Distinguished counsel in his argument the other day insisted very earnestly, and went so far as to cite the opinions of others equally eminent with himself to show, that the idea of punishment is not contemplated in proceedings of this kind. And, sir, I am glad to be able to admit that it is one of the most priceless privileges guaranteed to every citizen by the Constitution of the United States that he may not only entertain but freely express his own opinion upon every subject whatever, no matter who may differ with him. It is therefore not in the power of the Supreme Court to prevent the learned counsel from entertaining or promulgating a different view from that expressed by them in the case of Cummings vs. The State of Missouri, and re-affirmed in the case of Garland, however much they may regret his inability to concur in that opinion.

The court say in the case of Cummings, 4 Wallace:

> The theory upon which our political institutions rest is, that all men have certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that in the pursuit of happiness all avocations, all honors, all positions, are alike open to every one; and that in the protection of these rights all are equal before the law. Any deprivation or suspension of any of these rights for past conduct is punishment, and can be in no otherwise defined.
> Punishment not being, therefore, restricted, as contended by counsel, to the deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but also embracing deprivation or suspension of political or civil rights, and the disabilities prescribed by the provisions of the Missouri constitution being in effect punishment, we proceed to consider whether there is any inhibition in the Constitution of the United States against their enforcement.

But, sir, we have been told that "there were brave men before Agamemnon;" and it appears that there were learned and distinguished lawyers even before counsel were employed in this case who undertook to maintain the view expressed by the honorable counsel here. As far back as the celebrated Blount case, of which the Senate has heard so much during this trial, the same suggestion was made by counsel for the defense, and the argument adduced on that occasion was so eloquently and triumphantly met by Mr. Manager Harper and his reply thereto so pertinent to the remarks of counsel here, that I will read what he said:

> But the learned counsel for the defendant have told us that the power of impeachment is limited in the Constitution itself by the restriction which it imposes on the power of punishment. The power of punishment on conviction by impeachment is restricted, say they, to "removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States;" and it would be absurd to impeach, try, and convict a man who held no office from which he could be removed, and could, of consequence, be no otherwise affected than by a disqualification to hold in future offices which he, perhaps, never had a prospect of obtaining. Of this absurdity the Constitution cannot be supposed to be guilty; and therefore it could not have intended to subject to the power of impeachment any persons except those who actually hold offices and may be punished by removal.
> But where, Mr. President, did the honorable counsel for the defendant learn that disqualification to hold any office of trust, honor, or profit under the Government of our country is no punishment? Would either of those honorable gentlemen think it no punishment in his own case? There are no doubt many men indifferent as to offices of profit, and not ambitious of those of honor or trust. But to be held up to our fellow-citizens as a person unworthy of trust, undeserving of honor; to be stigmatized by a solemn sentence of the law, pronounced by the highest and most awful judicature known to the Constitution; to be excluded by the voice of our country from all hope of participating in those rights, privileges, and advantages which are open to our fellow-citizens; to be disowned by our common mother as degenerate and unnatural sons, unworthy of her confidence; to be deprived, not only of her kindness and her favors, but even of the right which a good citizen holds dearest of all, the right of devoting ourselves to her service, of defending her in the hour of danger and distress—are these not punishments? I know not where the learned counsel learned that they are not; but this I know, that they did not learn it in their own hearts. Yes, Mr. President, a sentence of disqualification, pronounced by this honorable body in the face of the whole American nation, and on a charge of high crimes and misdemeanors by the representatives of the American people, is a punishment; and, as this punishment is applicable to persons who are not officers as well as to those who are, it follows that the power of impeachment, if its extent be measured by that of the power of punishment, is applicable to all persons, whether officers or not.—Annals of Congress, Fifth Congress, (1797-'99,) volume 2.

But, as to the end and final cause of all punishments, every member of this honorable court has long ago been advised when in his youthful days he conned over the pages of Blackstone. He says:

2. As to the end or final cause of human punishments. This is not by way of atonement or expiation for the crime committed, for that must be left to the just determination of the Supreme Being, but as a precaution against future offenses of the same kind. This is effected three ways: either by the amendment of the offender himself, for which purpose all corporal punishment, fines, and temporary exile or imprisonment are inflicted, or by deterring others by the dread of his example from offending in the like way.

There, sir, is the ultimate object to be reached by all such proceedings as this, and I would say to the learned counsel, now and for all, that they are dignifying their client far too much when they suppose that this impeachment was intended simply to harass him, simply to disqualify him from again contaminatin g the Government, if indeed he is guilty; and upon that I beg leave to say I would sedulously forbear to express any opinion at this time. The House of Representatives in sending these articles here had a far higher purpose in view. That purpose was the correction, the purification of public and official morals in this country; and who, sir, that has contemplated the frightful picture of crime and corruption so graphically and powerfully drawn by my distinguished colleague [Mr. HOAR] on last Saturday will deny that it is high time some such corrective process should be put in operation?

Now, sir, if it be true, as I have stated, that the object and design of proceedings like the present are not merely to remove a guilty party from office, not merely to disqualify him to hold any office of honor or trust or profit under the United States, but that it is designed as a great preservative means for securing the purity and honesty of official conduct on the part of all officers of the Government; if it is true that the several provisions of the Constitution relating to the subject of impeachment were intended to protect the Government from official corruption and crime, which if left unchecked would lead to its ultimate overthrow and destruction; if it is true, as it seems to me every rational mind must admit it is, that the only efficacy of those provisions is to be found in the rigid, impartial, certain, and inexorable enforcement of the penalties they prescribe, the question is whether they shall be so construed as to promote the object they were intended to accomplish in the amplest manner consistent with the language in which they are expressed, or whether they shall receive such a construction at your hands as will render them utterly nugatory and worthless.

That, sir, is the plain, simple question before you. Now, will this distinguished tribunal, this tribunal of statesmen, say that notwithstanding the Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the power to institute proceedings by impeachment, and clothes this body with full and complete jurisdiction to try all cases of impeachment; and notwithstanding the plain, obvious principle of law and common sense that when a person enters upon the duties of an office he assumes all the responsibilities of that office, criminal as well as civil—responsibilities of which he cannot divest himself except in pursuance of law—yet neither House can exercise its powers in a case of impeachment except at the option of the party accused? Will you say in the face of the intelligence of this age, and to the civilized world, that our institutions present such a ridiculous anomaly in jurisprudence, such a miserable, pitiable spectacle of imbecility as that?

Yet you must say so; the logic is inexorable; there is no escape from that conclusion, if you hold, as is maintained by the defense here, that a party may commit an offense while in office, and escape the penalty described simply by the act of resignation or by any other act of his except suicide.

But let us look a little more particularly to the two clauses of the Constitution from which this singular conclusion is sought to be deduced. As the Senate is already aware, the fourth section of the second article provides:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The learned counsel consumed nearly two hours of this world's valuable time in a very labored though perhaps not an exhaustive rehearsal of the records of the convention which framed the Constitution to establish the proposition that the idea they meant to convey by the section I have just read was that no man should be impeached unless he should be in office at the time of his impeachment. He finally reached that conclusion and announced it, but by what process of logic I confess I was then and am still unable to appreciate.

If it be true that the framers of the Constitution did intend that no person should be impeached unless he should be in office at the time of the impeachment, learned counsel would have conferred a favor upon this honorable court and have contributed a great deal to the gratification of the unenlightened public if he had told us why they did not say so, why they did not express it in some clause upon the face of that instrument. For instance, when they said "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment," why did they not add the restraining words to that clause, "but no person shall be impeached unless he shall be in office at the time?" Or, leaving that clause, when they came to the one regulating the judgment that should be rendered, why did they not say that "judgment in cases of impeachment shall be rendered against no person unless he shall be in office at the time, and no such judgment shall extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold office?" Or, if these two provisions had passed out of their minds when they came to consider the fourth section of the second article, and they still desired that the American people for whom they were preparing the frame-work of a government should understand that no man should be impeached unless he was in office at the time, why did they not annex the restraining words to that article, why did they not say, "but no person shall be impeached unless he shall be in office at the time?"

The framers of our Constitution were wise and patriotic as well as cultured men. They fully appreciated the magnitude of the work in which they were engaged; they knew that they were preparing a government not for a day, not for a year, but a government that should mold the destinies and affect the interests of a mighty people through long ages to come. They consequently weighed every word they used with the utmost care. So careful were they, in fact, that they even provided a committee on style and arrangement, to whose scrutiny every line and word and syllable of the Constitution was subjected, and whose careful supervision every provision it contains underwent before it was adopted. Would they have overlooked such a glaring omission as the argument of counsel implies? They were men with heads upon their shoulders, and if they had intended that no man should be impeached except he should be in office at the time, they would doubtless have said so in plain, unmistakable terms, or if they did intend it and did not say so, the learned counsel ought to have informed us why; because if there is a man upon the continent capable of giving that information I have no doubt he is the one and the only one; but inasmuch as he failed to do so, I take it for granted that he was simply mistaken as to the intention of the framers of the Constitution on that point. I take it for granted that the very fact that they omitted to make this restriction is conclusive that they did not intend that the power should be so restricted.

It will not do to say that the idea of impeaching a man after he was out of office was never considered by the convention at all; for, as my learned colleagues so clearly and conclusively showed on Saturday, that very question was under discussion when this identical proposition was considered. The question then was, not whether a man should be impeached after he was out of office, but whether the President should be impeached while he was in office. There was no objection anywhere, so far as I have been able to see, to the proposition that he might be impeached after the expiration of his term. But I submit, sir, that this section not only does not require, but it does not admit of interpretation. It is a plain principle of legal construction, as well as of common sense, that where words are so plain that their meaning cannot be mistaken, no interpretation is necessary or to be allowed. The words must be taken for just what they express and no more. This has been settled over and over again by the courts. Now, look at the language of this section. Is there anything dubious about it? Is there anything uncertain or mysterious about it? Is there anything connected with it that a wayfaring man, though a fool, may be mistaken about?

Examine it in what light you will and you cannot make it say more or less than it does. I care not whether the immediate controlling motive in its adoption was to provide a mode for the removal of a guilty official from office, or whether it was intended as a peremptory direction as to the judgment that should be rendered in case he should still be in office when convicted, it simply means that when any civil officer of the United States shall be convicted on impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crime or misdemeanor he shall be removed, and that is all it means. Torture it as you may it is impossible to find in it the remotest insinuation that removal from office is the only object to be effected by impeachment, or that if judgment of removal shall be rendered unnecessary by the resignation or previous removal of the offender the Senate has no power to render a judgment of disqualification either limited or perpetual.

But, sir, it is said that this section should be collated with the seventh clause of the third section of the first article, and both construed together. Very well, let us do so, and what do we find then? We discover that the framers of the Constitution intended that you should have more than the mere power of a motion. We find that they did intend that there should be some other penalty for official crime than the mere removal of the offender from office, and that you should have power to inflict it, too; that you might disqualify him to hold any office of trust, honor, or profit under the United States. Now if it be true that the removal of the guilty official was the sole aim and object, the only purpose to be effected by impeachment, why did not the learned counsel inform us why this provision authorizing disqualification was inserted here? I beg pardon, I believe he did undertake to explain that. He said:

I have attempted to show that the sole object for which the power of impeachment was given is removal from office.

There is another proposition which I intended to argue in that connection. The disqualification clause of punishment was evidently put in for the purpose of making the power of removal by impeachment effectual. After providing that the officers of the United States might be removed on impeachment, although the President could not pardon the offender convicted and removed, yet if he could re-instate him the next morning he would have substantially the power of pardon.

Now, sir, if the convention intended by this power of disqualification simply to prevent the President from violating the Constitution by virtually ignoring the restriction upon his power to grant reprieves and pardons, if it was simply to prevent him from placing the convict back into the same office from which he had just been removed, as learned counsel suggests, can it be imagined that they were guilty of the supreme folly of permitting the guilty official to secure to the President the right to re-appoint him by resigning before impeachment and thus taking away your power to disqualify him at all? Did they intend to say that "we will prevent the President from making the power of removal a nullity, but we will leave that power in the hands of the guilty party himself?" Yet they must have so intended if the gentleman's theory is correct. For he could resign, no matter how guilty before impeachment, and thus not only destroy the power of the House to accuse but yours to try him, and thus be in precisely the condition to enable the President to re-appoint him without having to violate the clause of the Constitution respecting his power to pardon. I repeat, sir, were those wise men guilty of the supreme folly of leaving it in the power of the guilty party to do precisely the thing which counsel himself says they were endeavoring to prevent by this disqualifying clause? And besides, sir, as suggested by my learned colleague, [Mr. HOAR,] if this clause authorizing disqualifications was intended for the purpose indicated by counsel, and that alone, the provision would manifestly have been so framed as to disqualify the convict from holding the particular office from which he might be removed, and not from all offices whatever.

The learned counsel in his remarks the other day invoked the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace, page 36, which I propose to apply to the point I am now endeavoring to discuss, that we should take into consideration in construing the Constitution the facts of contemporaneous history, the circumstances as they existed at the time and before it was adopted. Let us look a little into the circumstances existing at the time and see if we cannot ascertain the true reason why the peculiar verbiage of this clause, which says that "judgments in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," was employed.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to propound a question, which I will read, as I can do it better perhaps than the Secretary:

Whether in England a person who has been punished by the courts for crimes committed in office has, after retiring from office, been impeached and punished by Parliament, or where a person has been impeached and punished in Parliament, has he afterward been punished by the courts for the same offenses?

I should be glad to invite the attention of the honorable manager to that question.

Mr. Manager KNOTT. Mr. President, in answer to the question propounded by the honorable Senator from Indiana, I have to say that I do not know of any case in England in which a conviction had upon impeachment has been followed by a subsequent conviction for the same offense in a court of justice; nor do I know that where a person had been convicted in a court of justice he has afterward been impeached for the same offense. I have never examined the question with a view of ascertaining whether either of the cases supposed by the honorable Senator has ever occurred in England or not. I was, however, approaching that subject, and I think I shall show, whatever may have been the course of adjudication in England in the cases supposed in the honorable Senator's question, the difference between our own law and the English law with regard to impeachments, so far as may be pertinent to the point under discussion, and the reason for that difference.

When the framers of our Constitution came to provide a method by which the Government they were about to establish should be protected from official corruption and wrong, they naturally turned for a model to the country under whose laws they had been reared and with whose institutions they were familiar. There they found the process of impeachment complete; confined, however, to the punishment of political or state offenses to malconduct in office. Copying that model, as had been done in the formation of most of the State constitutions, they located the power of accusation and the necessary power of inquisition with that branch of the legislature emanating directly from and immediately responsible to the people at frequent and stated periods, as being most likely to watch their interests with the most jealous vigilance, while they committed the sole power of trial to that branch of the legislature which, from the nature of its organization and the relation it sustained to the Government and the people, would be most likely to render strict and impartial justice between the accusers and the accused.

When they came to look over the long catalogue of impeachments, however, which had taken place in the parent country, they found that while that mode of procedure had been resorted to mainly, as I have said, for the correction of abuses and the punishment of crimes in office, there had been an almost unlimited discretion exercised in the infliction of penalties upon those convicted. In some cases enormous fines had been inflicted; in other cases fines and imprisonment; in other cases, fine, imprisonment, and the pillory; in other cases death at the block. Choosing therefore, as they did, to remit the offender to the regularly constituted courts of justice for indictment, trial, and the ordinary punishment prescribed by the law applicable to each particular case, and resorting to impeachment only for a correction of official abuses and for the punishment of offenses affecting the purity of the Government by political ostracism, they determined that in this country there should be no more such penalties inflicted by a court of impeachment; that, whereas in England the high court of impeachment had plenary power and could reach not only the liberty and property but the life of the offender, here there should be by such a court no fine, no imprisonment, no pillory, no riding upon horseback with the victim faced to the horse's tail, as in the case referred to some time since by the learned counsel, Judge Black; no beheading upon the block—nothing of that kind; but as the object was simply to preserve the purity and maintain the integrity of the Government, the delinquent should be in the first place removed from office, and in the second place disqualified to hold or enjoy thereafter any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States either for a limited time, or forever, as the court of impeachment might determine.

If I have stated the facts correctly, which I apprehend will not be disputed, there is no longer any mystery about the seventh clause of the third section of the first article. It was simply intended as a limitation upon the judgment that might be rendered, and not in any sense of the word to affect the jurisdiction of the court. The language is plain, simple, and easily understood:

Judgments in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than a removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Now take the two sections together, collated as they are by the counsel for the defendant, and do you find a solitary syllable even remotely intimating that your power to try is taken from you in a case where it is impossible to enforce or unnecessary to render that portion of the judgment which you would be obliged to render on conviction if the party were in office? To make this question somewhat more pointed and plain, suppose the framers of the Constitution had made the limit a little wider, and instead of saying that a judgment in impeachment shall not extend further than disqualification to hold office, they had added, after the words "disqualification to hold office," the words "fine and imprisonment;" could it be maintained then that a criminal official could oust the jurisdiction and escape being fined or imprisoned by resigning his office? Would you have heard learned and lengthy arguments here to convince you that because you could not remove the accused from office that therefore you could not fine him or imprison him? I can scarcely think that learned counsel would present such a proposition as they now do if the three words "fine and imprisonment" had been added to the clause under consideration.

But if resignation would not oust the jurisdiction of the court under the section with these three words added, by what kind of logic can it be said to oust it as the clause now stands? The same rules of construction would have to be applied in both cases.

But there is another principle of construction that should not be entirely lost sight of in considering the provision under discussion; and that is, in construing any law that requires or admits of interpretation, not only the object and purpose of the law must be kept constantly and distinctly in view, but the effects and consequences of the proposed construction in respect of that object should also be carefully considered; that is, will the construction proposed promote the manifest purpose intended, and make the law effective, or defeat the object of the law-maker entirely, and render the enactment an absurdity or a nullity.

Before proceeding to a direct application of this rule, however, I wish at this time to call the attention of the court to a brief recapitulation of the points presented and insisted upon heretofore by the House of Representatives, in order that they may have this rule clearly in view and be able to apply it as it should be. We have endeavored to show on the part of the House of Representatives that the real object sought to be attained by impeachment is not to wantonly harass or needlessly degrade any private citizen, but to preserve the purity and integrity of the Government, and to protect the interest of the people, for whose benefit the Government is established, by confining, as far as possible, the administration of its functions to honest and reputable officials; that that object was sought to be effected by the framers of the Constitution, first by providing peremptorily for the prompt removal of the corrupt and convicted wrongdoer from the office degraded and polluted by his criminal malversation, and second that he may be disqualified, either forever or for a limited period, to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government whose escutcheon he had stained and whose efficiency he had impaired; thus not only placing it beyond his power to repeat his stabs at the vitality of the state in positions which his conviction of official crime has shown him totally unfit to fill, but exhibiting a striking and conspicuous example of the certain and inexorable consequences of official malversation.

In harmony with these purposes and in order to render the means for their accomplishment completely effectual, we maintain that when a person enters upon an office he assumes all the responsibilities pertaining thereto, criminal as well as civil, and cannot divest himself of them by any act of his own, but must continue under those responsibilities until discharged therefrom according to law; that the very moment he commits an impeachable offense he becomes liable to impeachment; and, as there is no provision in the Constitution exonerating him from that liability until his conviction or acquittal on impeachment, it must continue, notwithstanding the termination of his official service, whether by resignation, removal, or lapse of time.

This construction, and this only, we contend can give full and complete effect to the manifest intent of the Constitution with regard to the proceeding by impeachment. On the other hand, we maintain that the construction claimed by the defense, that a guilty party can deprive the House of Representatives of its prerogative to accuse or this Senate of its jurisdiction to try an impeachment, is simply to render the provisions of the Constitution relating to the subject a ridiculous absurdity and to stultify the framers of that instrument.

In the first place it should be remembered that the right of any civil officer of the United States to resign his office at any time is absolute and unqualified. The mere formal acceptance or rejection of his resignation does not in the least affect its validity. He may be guilty of crime in office and can resign before he is suspected of its commission. He can resign after his detection and before his accusation by the House of Representatives. He can take his chances and resign after his impeachment and before his arraignment; or he can resign after his arraignment, he can resign after the evidence is heard, and he is as much out of office as a thousand Senates could put him out by judgment upon impeachment, so far as the mere amotion from office is concerned.

This is the view of my colleagues and myself, it is admitted by counsel, and it is sustained by judicial decision in the only case in which the question has come under judicial review, to my knowledge, in a Federal tribunal. The court said in the case of the United States vs. Wright, McLean's Reports, volume 1, page 512:

> There can be no doubt that a civil officer has a right to resign his office at pleasure; and it is not in the power of the Executive to compel him to remain in office. It is only necessary that the resignation should be received to take effect; and this does not depend upon the acceptance or rejection of the resignation by the President.

The House of Representatives is frequently composed of very enterprising gentlemen, notwithstanding it may require a steam-elevator to bring them up to the level of the contempt of some of the learned counsel. Numerous instances in their past history might be adduced to show their energy in the pursuit of useful knowledge. But pretermitting the mention of all examples of such enterprise at this time, suppose they should set themselves seriously to work to solve the great problem in fiscal science which has so long excited the curiosity and engaged the ingenuity of the American people; suppose they should undertake to determine how it is that an average patriot of moderate means who devotes his gigantic talents to the service of his country upon a salary of $5,000 to $8,000 a year can maintain an establishment in a style of luxury and magnificence that our imperial visitor might envy, and still be able to invest at the end of a few years $100,000 or $200,000 in the remunerative stock of some profitable corporation. Suppose that in the prosecution of that desirable information they should accidentally unearth some plodding public servant steeped to the very eyes in corruption, loaded down to the very guards with official pillage. As a matter of course he would be instantly impeached by the unanimous vote of the House in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States; the damning catalogue of his crimes would be set out in appropriate articles in the stately phrase of legal diction, interspersed and ornamented with the choicest flowers of a florid rhetoric. Managers are appointed and appear at the bar of the Senate, looking as solemn as the pall-bearers at a rich man's funeral; proclamation is made and the defendant appears surrounded by the most distinguished counsel the continent can afford, the latchets of some of whose shoes an average member of the House of Representatives is not worthy to touch with a ten-foot pole. Witnesses are brought from every part of the country. Day after day, week after week, and month after month is consumed in their examination. The argument commences. Counsel for the accused electrify the Senate with bursts of eloquence almost sufficient to rekindle their wonted fires in the slumbering ashes of Sheridan and Burke. Nevertheless the Senate at last finds the defendant guilty by a unanimous vote; notifies the House of Representatives that on a certain day it will proceed to judgment, and adjourns. The day arrives. The House of Representatives, headed by their Speaker and Sergeant-at-Arms, make their appearance. Silence is commanded on penalty of fine and pain of imprisonment. The chivalry and beauty of the capital, collected in the galleries, look down in breathless awe upon the august scene transpiring below. The silence, profound as the hush of death, is at last broken by counsel for the accused, who rises and informs the Senate that the defendant last evening resigned his office, and your jurisdiction is gone, like Othello's occupation. Senators look around on each other in blank amazement at the singular and sudden denouement, until some one less stunned by the announcement than his fellows suggests "that this court do now adjourn sine die." The motion is carried unanimously, and the curtain descends upon the last act of the ridiculous farce, while the House of Representatives "retires to slow music."

Now, I ask you if this proceeding, which you and I and all of us have been taught from our infancy to regard as a great constitutional remedy, can be reduced to such a senseless pageant, such a ridiculous, miserable, contemptible farce as that I have attempted to describe? Yes, sir, it is, if the theory presented here by the defense be true, because there is no limitation upon his right or power to resign; and if his resignation can oust you of jurisdiction at all, it can do so if made at one time just as well as another. If you cannot pronounce any judgment except a judgment to remove the person convicted from office, to be followed in your discretion by the judgment of disqualification, as claimed by the defense, your powers are taken away just as effectually by a resignation made ten minutes before you render your judgment as if made before a single article was drawn or even before his guilt was suspected.

The theory and logic of the defense is that, having removed himself from office, your power to enforce the first part of the judgment is taken away or has become unnecessary; therefore you cannot pronounce the other and more important sentence of disqualification! There is the logic, and I have endeavored to give you an illustration of the theory. I apprehend, however, that the highest tribunal in the country or known to the Constitution will scarcely construe its own functions into such a ridiculous and disgraceful absurdity.

But it may be said, if the theory of the House of Representatives in this case is correct, that a man may be impeached and removed from an office in which he has done no wrong for misdemeanors committed while in some office he may have previously held. Very well, sir, suppose it is so, ought it not to be so? I think I can suggest a case in which it would not only be considered proper, but eminently necessary, if not absolutely indispensable. Before doing so I will invite your attention to the first section of the third article of the Constitution:

> The judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Now, suppose that at some period in the distant future a vacancy should occur in the office of Chief Justice of the United States, and, what would not be at all improbable, that the then acting Attorney-General should be promoted to fill the vacancy. Suppose, moreover, that from the moment of his confirmation by the Senate, his private conduct, as well as his official action, may be as pure as the icicle—

> That's curded by the frost from purest snow,
> And hangs on Dian's temple.

He may be a perfect model of private morality and the paragon of official purity. But suppose it should transpire that while in the occupancy of the former office he was larded all over with bribes, festering with corruption; guilty of having embezzled thousands and tens of thousands of the public money; the patron and emissary of thieves and cut-throats, who were in the habit of regularly dividing with him the ill-gotten booty of their nefarious calling. Suppose that his pals should turn upon him like the hounds of Acteon upon their master, and disclose evidence sufficient to show his guilt to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, and that he should be indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary. Now, it will doubtless occur to Senators that the silk gown of the judge would be a little incongruous with the zebra uniform of the convict. It would not perhaps be a source of a great deal of pleasure to an American Senator to point out to a distinguished foreigner the unostentatious dress and retiring habits of the chief judicial officer of his country. It would certainly be a little inconvenient, not so say somewhat humiliating, to the pride of the American citizen to have him remain there during his whole term—perhaps for twenty years—occupying the position and entitled to the emoluments of the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States while breaking rock in a State prison? But how would you get him out? It may be said that he could be impeached for misdemeanor in office for not appearing upon the bench and performing his duties at the regular terms of his court as required by law. Grant that; but carry the case a step further. Suppose the statute of limitations had barred a criminal prosecution before the ordinary tribunals of the country, so that the impediment of imprisonment would not be in the way of the discharge of his duties as Chief Justice. Must the highest office known to our judicial system be polluted forever by the presence of a known felon? I imagine that if such a case should actually occur the Senate would have very little hesitation in sustaining its jurisdiction. You may say it is an extreme case to suppose, but cases fully as remarkable have more than once occurred in the history of the human family.

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] on Saturday propounded a couple of questions which courtesy to him requires should receive a direct answer. My colleagues inadvertently overlooked them and have requested me to answer them as I am able:

1. If two persons guilty of crime in office cease to be officers at the same time, one by removal and the other by resignation, is one rather than the other subject to impeachment afterward? If a distinction between the two cases exists, please state it.

As to my single self, I say no, sir! It is the guilt that gives you jurisdiction; it is not the person; it is his status at the time he committed the offense, and not his position at the time of the trial. You get at once the jurisdiction of the case on the commission of the offense, and it is no difference, therefore, whether he go out of office by resignation or whether he be removed from office by a superior power; not, of course, upon impeachment. So I say, so far as I am capable of discerning, there is no distinction in the cases. The power to disqualify for the preservation of the Government is as perfect and complete in the one case as it is in the other.

"Second, is a private citizen liable to impeachment under the Constitution of the United States?" I believe that my learned colleague [Mr. JENKS] on Saturday elaborated that proposition; so that perhaps it will not be necessary for me to say anything further in relation to it except this: It does suggest to me to say to the learned counsel that he may with perfect assurance dismiss now and forever the gloomy forebodings which seemed to haunt his imagination the other day. The question is not, as he supposed it, whether this Senate can impeach forty millions of people, men, women, and children. I can assure him that there is not the slightest foundation for his apprehension that impending ruin and destruction hang like the sword of Damocles over the head of every man, woman, and child in the United States. He is entirely mistaken as to the question pending here. That question is simply whether a guilty official can resign his office, and by that act rob the House of Representatives of its prerogative to impeach him and take away the jurisdiction of the Senate, and thus escape the penalty due to his crimes? I will say to him, moreover, and through him to that large and respectable class of my fellow-citizens who need his eminent services in other tribunals, that they may dismiss all fears that if the jurisdiction is sustained in this case impeachments will be so frequent that he will be employed during the remainder of his natural life defending cases of that character in this court. I do not know that anybody in the House of Representatives even suspects that there is to be any other impeachment during the present Congress than the one here pending. If the learned counsel knows of any other Cabinet officer who is making preparations to flee the wrath to come, who is folding his tents, like the Arab, to steal quietly away and dodge the jurisdiction, he has more information I am sure than any gentleman of the House of which I am an humble member. He will have plenty of leisure from his duties in this forum to practice law in the Supreme Court, and you, Senators, will have an abundance of time to transact the ordinary legislative business of the country.

My attention is also called to a question propounded by the honorable Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL:]

The Constitution provides that when the President of the United States is tried on impeachment the Chief Justice shall preside. Suppose a late President were impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors committed while President, and presented at the bar of the Senate for trial, who would preside, the Chief Justice or the President of the Senate?

I suppose if such a case as that were to occur, and the question should be presented at this bar in a practical shape, there might be two opinions very plausibly urged. One party might very forcibly insist that the Chief Justice should preside because the Constitution says so. The other party might contend that there is no necessity for that rule, the reason of the rule having ceased, that reason being that if the Vice-President were to preside it might afford him an opportunity, or at least the temptation, to change the result of the trial, and thus perhaps place himself in a higher office. As to myself, while I would not hesitate one moment to say, as the venerable John Quincy Adams did, that his amenability to impeachment goes with him as one of the responsibilities he took upon himself when he entered that high office to the end of his life, I would be, if a member of the Senate, perhaps equally as clear that the Chief Justice ought to preside, according to the letter of the Constitution. But that is a question of practice and convenience. The Senate would settle that matter, and from their decision there could be no appeal. There is another case not provided for, and that is, who shall preside in case the Vice-President is upon trial? Yet I suppose that no one would pretend that the Vice-President could not be tried because that is an open and unsettled question. These are simply matters that will have to be settled by the Senate when the exigency arises.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, I have said all and perhaps more than I ought to have said upon the question under discussion. I am content to leave it with you, perfectly confident that no large number of right-minded people will accuse the House of Representatives of being either fools or traitors for sending it here, or denounce you for cowardice or corruption, decide it as you will. Whatever your decision may be I trust it will be such as to redound to your own credit as jurists and statesmen, as well as to the permanent good of our common country. "I have neither action, nor utterance, nor power of speech to stir men's blood;" and if I had, I have no appeal to make to your passions or your prejudices. I cannot forget that I stand in the presence of the most exalted tribunal known to the Constitution of my country, sitting to determine one of the gravest questions ever submitted to a human court; not for this hour, but for all time; not for the weal or woe of this individual accused, but for aught I know for the good or ill of generations yet unborn. I would not therefore, if I could, obscure a single ray of the pure, bright, light of truth and reason in which that question should be viewed. I would not, if I could, by any undue influence cause the balance which should here be poised by the firm, steady hand of rigid and impartial justice to change "but in the estimation of a hair."

I know not whether the inexorable pen of history will note the transactions of this hour, but if it should, I trust the record will be in characters imperishable as the rock-ribbed hills that the American Senate, unbiased by personal or party considerations, uninfluenced by private sympathies or popular prejudice, had the sterling virtue to administer the law. In this sentiment I am sure I meet with a cordial response in the bosom of the very distinguished counsel who is to follow me, whose own contribution to the juridical literature of our country—and he will pardon the impulse which inspires the utterance—and whose manly, fearless, unbought vindication of the majesty of that same law have achieved for him a memorial in the affectionate veneration of his country more priceless than sculptured marble and, I trust, more enduring than monumental brass.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to know whether the counsel who is next to speak would prefer a recess to be taken now or at the usual hour of two o'clock.

Mr. BLACK. I prefer to go on, I think, now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now hear the counsel for the accused close the argument. Senators, please give attention.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President and Senators I feel the whole weight of the responsibility cast upon me by being required to close this argument. I do not mention this as an excuse for the imperfections of the argument you are about to hear, but only to ask that if I in my embarrassment or my haste or my imprudence should happen to say something which I ought not to utter, you will visit the consequences upon my head. Spare my client; for he has already suffered enough for the sins of other people.

Like my friend who has just concluded, I feel absolutely sure that every member of this great tribunal desires to decide this cause as it ought to be. It is a supreme necessity that the law should always be followed by those who have its administration in their hands. This is particularly true of the fundamental law; and if there be any part of the Constitution itself which is more important than another, it is that portion which marks the dividing line between the powers, or what our friends call the prerogatives, of the Government on one hand and the rights of individual citizens upon the other.

You know all this as well as I do. I need not say it. If it were otherwise; if you were indifferent whether you decide rightly or wrongly, nothing that I could say would have the effect of waking you up to a sense of your duty and responsibilities. I shall therefore come directly and at once to the subject before you without preface or introduction.

There are three questions which have been raised:

First. General Belknap having relinquished his office by a resignation which the President accepted before this proceeding against him began, did he thereby become a private citizen so as to exempt him from the impeaching power of the House and the jurisdiction of the Senate?

Second. If his resignation would have that effect as a general rule, is his right to plead it here gone when the House shows that he resigned under apprehension of impeachment and for the purpose of avoiding it?

Third. Can an officer who is impeached while in office resign in the midst of the trial and so stop the proceedings? This is a mere speculative point, not even analogous to any question which actually arises. It must be perfectly manifest that when we show the total and original want of jurisdiction over the party we prove nothing from which it follows that the same party could by his voluntary act defeat a jurisdiction which has already attached and to which he has submitted himself. There being no fact in the case upon which this question can be raised, it would be improper for you to determine and wrong for me to discuss it. If any one interrogates you upon it in your judicial capacity, your answer will be, or it ought to be, what Sir Edward Coke gave to the king when he assembled the twelve judges and demanded to know the determination they would make in a certain case where the Crown had an interest. Eleven of the judges answered, "We will of course decide as your majesty shall be graciously pleased to desire;" but the great chief justice stood up and said, "When the case arises in the ordinary course of procedure and is debated before me, I shall then endeavor to do what it may seem fit and proper for a judge to do. Further than that I decline to pledge myself." Coke was honored as you will not be honored, by being deposed from his office, by being compelled to pay a fine of £10,000, and persecuted generally during the whole of that reign.

This last question, therefore, I shall not trouble you or myself by discussing. The second needs very little attention. The strain of the case is upon the first, namely, whether a man who has resigned his office is to be still accounted a public officer for all the purposes of an impeachment against him by the House and before the Senate. On that subject, of course, we have the negative; and I will try to maintain it if I am able to do so.

It is not necessary that I should repeat the arguments which you have already heard from my colleague; it would be a waste of your time. I suppose I ought to answer the arguments of the managers; and yet there are some things said by them which I cannot reply to. The honorable manager who spoke last on Saturday made the most elaborate and carefully prepared oration that it has ever been my good fortune to hear. Of course it excited my admiration, as it did yours; but it was filled for the most part with the bitterest abuse of the accused party and of other persons not here but absent and undefended. I cannot have any objection that that gentleman should play the part of Cicero in this proceeding; but I do protest that he has no right to make an imaginary Mark Antony out of General Belknap for the mere purpose of having a subject for his philippic. He not only berated him as guilty of everything set forth in the articles, but he goes out of his way and asserts that the whole country is full of public and notorious corruption which disgraces her in the eyes of all the world. Judges, members of Congress, city corporations, and railroad companies share with one another in the general infamy, and he gives the scandalous hearsay that the President's intimate friends and companions are tainted with the same base crimes. By his account, it will be more tolerable in the day of judgment for Sodom and Gomorrah than for these cities whose wickedness he has been watching. Like Lot, his righteous soul has been vexed from day to day by these iniquities. According to him, all classes of this country are weltering together in one great mass of moral putrefaction. He scoffs at the argument of my colleague as "the jeers and the sophistry of the criminal lawyer." If he were a criminal lawyer, which I suppose by his sneer that he is not—if indeed he were any lawyer at all—and go in a court of ordinary jurisdiction, upon pretense of discussing questions of law, and would attack the opposite party with unfounded abuse, and at the same time give everybody else a lick with the rough side of his tongue, he would be gently reminded that he was traveling out of the record, and if necessary he would be brought back to the point with rather a sharp turn.

I know not what may be your rule when you are sitting here in the exercise of your ordinary function; but it seems to me that when this body resolves itself into a judicial tribunal, it ceases to be a proper place for that kind of oratory which "splits the ears of the groundlings" and calls down the claps from the galleries. If the gentleman desires to show his virtue and the wickedness of other people, let him go to the hustings and call his beloved constituents around him. There his sonorous periods and his well-poised antitheses would excite universal admiration; his friends shout themselves hoarse, and throw up their caps as if they would hang them on the horns of the moon. But this question of law is not to be determined by the vituperation of the managers. It may be that this is not a very good world. It is generally supposed that there are things in it which need correction; but the gentleman has no right to throw those things into the balance here. He may want a victim, as he does no doubt, and if he cannot get one according to law so much the worse for the law, for he intends to have one anyhow. I think he believes in the maxim that it is better ninety-nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer; but he seems to think that more than ninety-nine have escaped already, and that the turn of the innocent man has come.

It is not a part of my duty to examine in detail the authorities which have been cited on both sides; but I shall refer to them in a somewhat compendious way, merely that they may be recalled to your memory.

Blount's case has been much spoken of. Why it should be so I am at some loss to say, except for the purpose of showing that something can be said on both sides of this question. But that does not advance us one step in the argument, since this case itself furnishes you with a demonstration that a great deal can be said on both sides. My colleague who opened the case thought that because the judgment of the courts sustained both the pleas it must be regarded as a decision of the point raised by the second as well as the first. As between the parties that is the technical effect of the record; but I cannot conceal from myself that the turning-point of that case was that Mr. Blount, being a Senator, was not a civil officer and never had been, and therefore it made no sort of difference whether he had resigned or was still in office.

If the mere dicta of counsel can be considered a thing of value, then why did not our friends on the other side take some notice of the opinion expressed by Luther Martin on the impeachment of Judge Chase? He was at that time the acknowledged head of the American bar, and declared it to be his unqualified judgment (which was not contradicted by anybody there) that a person after going out of office was not liable to impeachment for anything done while he was in. Distinguished members of this court, many of them on the most important occasion of their lives, the impeachment of President Johnson, expressed that doctrine deliberately, simply, and plainly. The managers ignore that authority, and think it amounts to very little in comparison of what the counsel on the one side said in Blount's case in face of a flat contradiction from the other side. They do introduce one dictum pronounced in another place, and they make much of it. The manager from Massachusetts cited John Quincy Adams, and coupled the citation with as lofty a eulogy as one man can make upon another. I, of course, do not detract from the merits of that distinguished man. He must have had some attractive qualities, since he was considered by a very large number of his countrymen fit to be set up as a candidate for President against him who was then the foremost man of all this world. But the public history of Mr. Adams shows that he of all men that ever lived was the least reliable upon a question of law. He was too fond of personal controversy to care which side he took. It appears from the citation itself that the general opinion of the House as expressed by other members was that the power of impeachment applied only to persons actually in office. Mr. Adams of course opposed what everybody else believed to be true. Nothing indeed would have given him greater pleasure than to be impeached. It would have given him an opportunity to come over here and lay about him right and left. His organ of combativeness was always in a state of chronic inflammation. He enjoyed nothing so much as he did the certaminis gaudia—the rapture of the strife. That was the strongest passion of his nature. He tried to provoke a motion for his own expulsion from the House, and that failing, he presented a petition from some outside enemy to expel himself.

Another authority from the House of Representatives is cited by one of my colleagues. But I confess I do not claim much by it. The honorable manager who argues questions of jurisdiction in the form of philippics against the accused, declared when this question was first mooted that the House had no power and the Senate no jurisdiction. We would regard that decision as very important if it had not been reversed by the same high authority that made it.

It would be a great prop to our argument if he who put it under us had not afterward knocked it away. But he had a right to change his opinion. No man is bound to live and die by the notion he may take when a question like this is first presented to his mind, and no one here or anywhere has a right to say that the change was not a conscientious one, or that he professes any opinions now which he does not honestly and sincerely entertain. It is true that the change occurred under circumstances of excitement and political terrorism not very conducive to the formation of a sound judgment. He was surrounded by a conflagration of anger and animosity. Paley was right when he said that he must be either more or less than a man who refuses to kindle in the general blaze. It is some honor to that gentleman that he was the last one to take fire, though when he did begin to burn he proved to be rather more combustible than any of the rest. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. DAVIS. I call attention to the disorder in the galleries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will formally remind the occupants of the galleries that applause, either for or against, is out of order. He trusts that due deference will be paid to the Senate; otherwise, the Chair will be compelled to vacate the galleries.

Mr. BLACK. We usually expect to find something on subjects of this kind in the Federalist, showing what was in the minds of those who urged the adoption of the Constitution upon the States and the people; and we do find a little there, not very much. Hamilton says in one of his papers that this power of impeachment gives an "awful discretion" to the Senate, and calls the power in the House of Representatives "a national inquest upon the public men of the country;" from which the inference is a perfectly fair one that he did not think the House of Representatives could throw its drag-net over the whole country and draw in every man, whether he was a public officer or a private citizen, provided he had once held an office. There is no way that I can conceive of in which they can make out that Hamilton was wrong about that or that his remarks cover a case like this except in the way taken by the chairman of the managers when he laid down the broad doctrine that once an officer always an officer. But that cannot be possibly true. When the gentleman [Mr. LORD] crossed the bar and told me, with a severe countenance, that I was still a public officer, it did not alarm me in the least, because I had a perfect inward consciousness that I was not and had not been for fifteen years in the public service. I was and I am a private citizen, clothed with all the immunities and privileges of a private citizen; and, what is more, I can assure the gentleman that there is a fair prospect that I shall, if I live, continue to enjoy that inestimable blessing for a good while to come.

The debates in the convention have been carefully eviscerated by my two colleagues, and it would be gilding refined gold for me to go over the argument which they have made. Suffice it to say that there is not in the whole of them a single trace to be found of any such notion as that which is now urged by the managers.

There is no contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution which favors their view. The debates in the State conventions which adopted the Constitution I would have thought might contain something upon this subject. Perhaps they have not been very fully examined. But there is one remark made by Governor Johnstone, of North Carolina, a man whose blood and judgment were so well commingled that his opinion deserves great attention; a simple statement of his own views on this subject that is most impressive and most direct. Among all the old writers on this subject nothing is clearer, more impressive, or more direct than what he says; and here it is:

> I never thought that impeachments extended to any but officers of the United States. When you look at the judgment to be given on impeachments, you will see that the punishment goes no further than to remove and disqualify civil officers of the United States who shall, on impeachment, be convicted of high misdemeanors. Removal from office is the punishment, to which is added future disqualification. How could a man be removed from office who had no office?—Fourth volume Elliot's Debates, page 35.

Three distinguished jurists of this country have written elaborate books on the Constitution: Rawle, Sergeant, and Story. Sergeant says absolutely nothing about this question; it does not seem ever to have been raised in his mind. Rawle says what is the same as nothing. In describing who are subject to impeachment he says it applies to officers or those who have been in office. If he had said it applies to officers and all those who have held office heretofore it would have been something in their favor; but the grammatical construction of the sentence shows that he intended to be as indefinite as possible. But Story is outspoken and plain; you cannot doubt what he says. It applies, in his judgment, only to persons in the actual possession of offices.

We have, then, to support our view all the jurists, statesmen, and text-writers, except the counsel on one side of the Blount case and John Quincy Adams, whose spirit of universal contradiction drove him to the other side. Such also has been the uniform practice. We have had several great political revolutions in this country, when the party previously occupying the seats of power have been driven out with the wrath of their victorious enemies burning after them. As they came in they were not sparing of their charges. Treason, corruption, and other crimes and misdemeanors were freely asserted. Yet it does not appear to have ever entered into the head of any one that the party coming in could subject their displaced opponents to the power of impeachment. It is impossible to account for this without supposing a universal opinion that no such power existed.

That is not all. There have been a great many particular cases in which it was thought desirable to remove judges, who could be removed in no other way. Investigations have been commenced in the House of Representatives for that purpose; and whenever a judge, pending the investigation, has resigned his office, the prosecution was dropped.

Most of the States have provisions in their constitutions either exactly like that in the Constitution of the United States or so nearly resembling it that a construction of one is a construction of the other; and this is notably true of Pennsylvania and New York.

In the former State, while instances have been numerous in which impeachments were threatened or investigations begun with intent to impeach, a resignation of the obnoxious officer always stopped the proceeding. I think I know that this practice was founded in a belief universal among judges, lawyers, legislators, and every class of public men, that the power did not belong to any branch of the Government after the party accused went out of office. In New York the power was not only never claimed, but it was expressly and most emphatically disclaimed on several memorable occasions. It was admitted not to exist in Barnard's case, in Cardozo's, and in Fuller's, and it was practically acted upon. I do not say that those decisions are binding in any sense which compels you to follow them. If you think that they were wrong, that they were not according to the constitution of that State, or agreeable to the Constitution of the United States, it would be perfectly proper for you to say so and act according to your own convictions, treating this as a case of the first impression; but when you consider all the circumstances attending them, the character of the committee and of the House of Representatives, which declared that to be the law, those decisions are entitled to great weight and respect; and how they can be totally disregarded is what I do not understand, unless you can find some reason for doing it, which to me is, at present, incomprehensible.

I believe that what I have said of New York and Pennsylvania is true of every State in this Union where they have constitutions which upon this point are like that of the United States, and that in no one of them has there ever been an attempt to make any private individual, or any one who has become a private individual by a resignation, amenable to the jurisdiction of the senate or subject to the power of the house by way of impeachment.

Some of the States—as, for instance, New Jersey—have changed their constitutions and put a provision in which authorizes the impeachment of officers for a limited time after they have retired. That shows that when the amendment was added it was believed that the power could not exist without an express and special grant.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate sitting in the trial of this case take a recess for twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and fifty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment took a recess for twenty minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore resumed the chair at two o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President and Senators, as might be expected, there are no judicial authorities to cite upon this subject. The question that you are now considering could not arise directly in the courts, and I believe it has never been collaterally drawn in question. The military cases have no application, inasmuch as the Constitution authorizes a trial by court-martial in all cases arising in the land or naval forces. It was therefore perfectly competent, under the Constitution, for Congress to declare as it did that all officers might be tried by court-martial within two years after their resignation. Remember that the jurisdiction of courts-martial depends upon the nature of the cases, and not, like the power of impeachment, on the status of the party accused.

The British precedents have less authority and less pertinence to this subject than anything that has been cited in the course of the debate. We acknowledge that the power of Parliament in that country is unlimited, and for that very reason there is no resemblance, except in the name of the thing, between impeachment here and impeachment there. The great purpose and object of our Constitution was to protect our people against the power that had been so much abused in England. The omnipotence of Parliament reached to every subject of the realm, to everybody except the supreme executive magistrate, and a power kindred to it, though not called by the same name, was actually exerted in one case upon the King himself. It might take for its victim a peer or a commoner, a prince or a peasant, a priest or a layman, freeholder, cocman or locman, merchant, mechanic, or sailor, and try him for any offense. It is true that they did not often trouble themselves with the trial of any except political offenders, but they were not restricted by any law to that class of cases. Nor were they limited in their judgments. They could hang and quarter a man whom they had convicted, behead him, set him in the pillory, brand him, maim him, imprison him for life, fine him to the whole extent of his estate.

Out of this boundless ocean of power our ancestors took the smallest possible quantum and with many misgivings, and after imposing careful restrictions upon its exercise, they lodged it here in default of some better place to put it. Would you sound the limitless depths of the sea and measure all its vast circumference to ascertain the dimensions of the drop which you hold in the hollow of your hand? If you can do that with respect to the persons who are subject to the power, then you must also do it, or, at least, you may as well do it with regard to the sort of judgment that you will pronounce. If General Belknap, after he has resigned his office of Secretary of War, can be made amenable to it because Bacon was convicted after he surrendered the great seal, then you may put him to death because Stafford was hanged and quartered, or you may set him on the pillory because that was the punishment inflicted on Floyd.

When I heard these cases thus carefully collated, and cited, and laid before you, I could hardly make up my mind what it was that the gentlemen would be at. Of course I dare not call their production of them an absurdity, when I recollect who it is thinks them very sensible and proper; but I may say this, at least, that I cannot understand the logical make-up of the mind which undertakes to measure the limitations of one thing by laying down beside it another thing which confessedly has no limitation at all.

But you may say what you please about the authorities; you may give what weight you like to the dicta of counsel at one time or another; you may adhere or not adhere to the doctrines which you yourselves, or some of you, have propounded before; you may give a great deal of weight, which I do not give, to British precedents and military cases, and the practice of the States. You may infer nothing from the uniform practice. You may turn your thoughts away from all constructions. But you cannot disregard the Constitution itself, which speaks in language too plain to be perverted by ingenuity or obscured by sophistry. That great instrument demands not only the implicit submission of our minds to its supreme authority but it claims our profoundest respect as the work of the greatest and best men of their own age or any other. This part of it was not made to promote the interests of a dominant faction or to gratify the passion of an hour; not an amendment proposed in malevolence and carried through the forms of adoption by force or fraud; but one of those free institutions meant in good faith by just and true men to serve the high objects recited in the preamble. It deserves the eulogium which Bacon pronounced on the laws of Henry the Seventh:

> Deep, not vulgar; not made upon the spur of a particular occasion for the present, but out of providence for the future, to make the estate of the people more and more happy, after the manner of the legislators in ancient and heroical times.

When you approach this part of the subject, you are compelled to look up with an awful reverence, akin to that which Moses felt when he came up to receive the law out of the burning bush: "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet; for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Absolute and implicit obedience to this instrument constitutes the highest obligation of every public man. It is the true test of all patriotism; for the country says to every citizen what the founder of Christianity said to his disciples, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

But before I call your attention to the words of the Constitution, let me speak about the second proposition of our adversaries, this being, as I think, the proper place to notice it.

Their second replication concedes for the purposes of the argument the general principle that a person out of office can not be impeached. But they insist that if he went out by a voluntary resignation with intent to avoid a threatened impeachment his liability is not changed. In other words, the legal effect of his resignation depends, not on the fact itself, but on the motive which led to it. They do not aver that he fraudulently evaded the jurisdiction or that he and the President formed an unlawful conspiracy, the one to resign and the other to accept the resignation, but without impugning the propriety of their acts they yet deny their validity. We maintain that a resignation when duly accepted does proprio vigore make the officer a private man, changes his relations to the Government, divests him of his public authority, releases him from his public duties, and remits him completely to his original status so that he cannot be afterward called a public officer any more than if he had never been commissioned at all. And this effect must be given to the resignation, no matter at what time it took place or what reason induced it. Our simple proposition is that every legal act must be allowed to have its legal effect, that is to say, be followed by its proper consequences; and you cannot defeat its operation by showing that the motive in the mind of the party was reprehensible. The law judges all acts by what it sees and decides upon them according to their true character. If they are legal in themselves you cannot go behind them to defeat their effect by showing the motive, for mere motives are not within the cognizance of human tribunals. This is so plain and so universally acknowledged that I need not dilate upon it.

Several illustrations have been given of this which our friends and the managers do not seem to like. A sheriff has in his hands a warrant which directs him, if the defendant be found in his bailiwick, to take his body. He finds him on the other side of the county line, where he cannot touch a hair of him without becoming a trespasser. Does it make any difference in that case whether the party fled across the line for the purpose of avoiding the arrest or whether he happened to be there by mere accident?

The jurisdiction of the Federal courts and of the State courts often depends upon the civic relation existing between the parties. It has happened many times that parties who desire to give the Federal courts jurisdiction or to take away the jurisdiction from a State court have changed their residence for that very purpose. So, also, it has happened that a man living in the same State with the other party, and who, therefore, cannot bring a suit in the Federal court, but must submit to the jurisdiction of the State court, assigns or sells his claim to a resident of another State for the sole object of having it tried in the Federal court. It has in all those cases been held that it does not make the slightest difference whether these things were done or not for the purpose and with the intent of changing the jurisdiction.

We admit, and the facts set forth in the pleadings show, that at nine o'clock on the morning of the 2d day of March the chairman of the Committee on War Expenditures gave notice, either directly to General Belknap or mediately to him through his counsel, that if he did not retire from office before twelve o'clock on that day, he would at that hour be impeached. It is also true that to avoid the impeachment which was thus threatened against him, he gave in his resignation and at ten o'clock and thirty minutes the President accepted it. By twelve o'clock, and before the House met, the accused was not only out of office but another person was at the head of the War Department performing the duties of Secretary. This was no compact, we admit, with the chairman of that committee. Mr. CLYMER had no right to speak for the House, but General Belknap knew very well that he was a leading member of the House and that whatever he proposed to do was very likely to be accomplished. It was in the apprehension inspired by this warning that General Belknap acted when he resigned. There is the "head and front of his offending." It can hardly be necessary to say that Mr. CLYMER'S conduct was free from blame. He was at once faithful to the public and just to the accused.

Since the managers do not like the illustration given by my colleague, let me furnish another which perhaps is simpler still.

One man claims that another owes him a debt, and he threatens at nine o'clock in the morning that if the debt be not paid before twelve he will bring a suit against him. The alleged debtor says he does not owe this debt, he has a good defense, but he will do anything rather than go through a trial which will destroy his commercial credit and perhaps bring scandal upon his family. Therefore at eleven o'clock he pays the debt and takes a receipt for it. Shall this creditor nevertheless maintain his action on the ground that the payment was a mere evasion of the threatened suit?

Take another case which is more precisely analogous to this. It is a rule of war in all civilized countries that when a fortified place is taken by storm the persons who compose the garrison may be slaughtered; but if the place is surrendered without effusion of blood then the right to massacre them does not exist. Suppose General Belknap to have been the commander of a fort and the chairman of the Committee on War Expenditures the general of certain mad battalions ready to attack him. General CLYMER, marching upon him with "sonorous metal blowing martial sounds," calls him to a parley and says, "I have found a weak place in that part of your wall where your family is lodged, and unless you surrender before twelve o'clock the general camp, pioneers and all, will be pouring through the breach. I will put to the edge of the sword your wives, your babes, and all unfortunate souls that trace you in their line. No boasting, like a fool; I'll do it." Whereupon General Belknap says, "Rather than have the women butchered and the brains of the children knocked out, I will surrender;" and accordingly, at ten and a half o'clock, he throws open his gates. But the bloody general says, "This is a fraud; he surrendered to avoid the calamity that he was threatened with. The uxorious villain has pulled down his flag to save his wife from the brutality of the soldiers. I will not accept any such resignation. His case stands as if he had resisted to the last and he shall be assaulted anyhow. Let the storming party move up to the work."

That would be the chairman of the War Expenditures; but if my distinguished friend, the chairman of the managers, were at the head of the besieging forces, he would raise a fiction of law. He would refuse to count fractions of a day, and justify the destruction of the garrison on the ground that the surrender took place the night after and the assault the night before. As to their fractional theory, we object to having the constitutional rights of a citizen impaled upon a pin's point like that, even if they could show it to be good.

Courts, where it is necessary for the purposes of public or individual justice, will sometimes assume that to be true which they know to be false or which is just as likely to be false as true; but it is an axiomatic principle that this can only be done when it is necessary to save some valuable right, and never can be so applied as to take away an immunity, a privilege, or an estate which was vested in him before the act took place upon which the fiction is raised. Besides that, the criminal law of the country never in any case allows of any fictions at all.

We must then fall back on the one question whether an officer who has resigned is subject to the power of impeachment, or whether he is to be regarded as a private citizen after he goes out and therefore amenable only to the courts.

The words are, "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers." Who is the President? If that means an Ex-President, a person who has once held the office of President but whose term has expired or who has resigned, then the same interpretation must be given to the other words, and the words "the Vice-President and all civil officers" may include all persons who have held office at any period of their lives. When we speak about the President do we ever refer to anybody except the incumbent of that office? A half-grown boy reads in a newspaper that the President occupies the White House; if he would understand from that that all Ex-Presidents are in it together he would be considered a very unpromising lad.

The managers would not assign that absurd meaning to any other part of the Constitution. Where it is provided that the Vice-President shall preside in the Senate, they know very well that nobody is included but the actual incumbent. Statutes have been passed declaring that the members of Congress shall have certain privileges, such as franking letters and receiving an annual compensation out of the Treasury. Did anybody ever claim that this extended to old members retired from public life? Any law which declares that public officers as a class shall be entitled to pay as privileges would be confined to those persons in office, and no sensible man would think of a constitution extending it to former officers. When, therefore, the Constitution says that all civil officers may be impeached, it is a violation of common sense to hold that the power may be applied to a late Secretary of War or other person who does not at the time actually hold any office at all.

The Constitution declares that when the President is impeached the Chief Justice shall preside. The question has been propounded repeatedly, and by several Senators, who would preside if an Ex-President was impeached? I admit that that is a puzzle. The puzzle arises out of the absurdity of impeaching an Ex-President. Our friends on the other side are so hampered by their own theory that they are obliged simply to decline answering. There is one answer and only one consistent with their logic, and that is this: That when an Ex-President is impeached an Ex-Chief Justice ought to preside at the trial.

But then the reductio ad absurdum is furnished to their argument when they read on that the President, the Vice-President, and all other civil officers of the United States shall be removed upon conviction. The single sentence uttered by Governor Johnstone in the North Carolina convention puts this in a light so perfectly clear, that it would be throwing words away to talk about it. How can a man be removed from office who holds no office? How turn him out if he is not in? The object and purpose of impeachment was removal—removal, mind you, not for a day, not for an hour, not a removal which might be rendered nugatory the next moment by his re-appointment or re-election, but a permanent removal. You find an officer misbehaving himself, and you get hold of him while he is still in the possession of power. When you get your grasp upon him you hurl him down, and give him such a pernicious fall that he can never rise again.

Removal is not only the object of impeachment, but it is the sole object. Removal and disqualification are so associated together that they cannot be separated. You cannot pronounce a judgment of removal without disqualifying; and you cannot pronounce a judgment of disqualification without removal, because the judgment which the Constitution requires you to pronounce is a judgment of removal and disqualification—not removal or disqualification; and this is made perfectly manifest to my mind from the experience we have had in Pennsylvania. It was thought by the convention that framed our constitution desirable that the Senate, upon conviction of an offender of this kind, should have the discretion to say that he might be removed without being disqualified; and accordingly they changed the provision which had previously been copied from the Constitution of the United States, and instead of saying what is said here, that judgment shall extend to removal and disqualification, it says it shall extend to removal, or to removal and disqualification. The effect of that was to allow of a judgment of removal alone, but not of disqualification alone—removal alone, or removal and disqualification.

Now how, I should like to know, is this Constitution of ours, upon which so much depends, to be construed? Our friends on the other side say that the Government (they mean the powers of the Government) cannot afford to lose any safeguards. I think that it is much more important to preserve the safeguards of public liberty than the safeguards of political power. If they could manage to make you believe that the Constitution of the United States is made of material so flexible that it will stretch to any extent without tearing or bend in any direction without breaking, then with a good deal of pulling and hauling upon it they might manage to make it cover the nakedness of any claim which they might choose to set up. But that is not the rule; on the contrary, the doctrine laid down by all the men who settled our institutions is precisely the reverse. Wherever a doubt arises about the meaning of a particular provision, that doubt must be resolved in favor of public liberty, and not in favor of the power that is claimed under it. All its authority and jurisdiction are to be confined within the narrowest limits—never to be stretched by construction.

Now, shall you, Senators, who have learned to believe in this doctrine of strict construction, give it up at this time of day? Are you going to surrender it now? No; this is the very time above all others, and this judicial occasion is the proper occasion to show that it is not a mere political dogma, put forth to flatter and cajole the people, but a principle and a truth, founded in conviction and sustained by reason. And do not forget that whatever may seem to be the bad luck which on some occasions has happened to that doctrine, it is inextinguishable; it has a vitality which will arrest the degeneracy which would destroy it.

The men who made the tenth amendment and who faithfully administered the Government upon the principle embodied in it, who at any time would have gone to their graves as freely as to their beds rather than to have seen it violated, are still consecrated in the affections of mankind. No portion of the respect which is due to them has ever been taken away. The colossal grandeur of Washington's character still attracts the admiration of the world; and Franklin's quiet memory climbs to heaven; and the pure philosophy of Jefferson illuminates the path of the statesman; and Madison's wisdom is the standard of orthodoxy, and Jackson's name shall be the watch-word of the free forever.

But suppose you do not think so; suppose you regard this as a great consolidated Government, where all power belongs to the Union, what then? The statutes and ordinances and constitutions and laws which are made by this Government must receive a construction according to the rules of interpretation established for other governments. You will give to this provision at least the kind of interpretation which would be conceded to it if it were an act of the British Parliament, and for that reason the construction contended for by us is just as necessary, according to the common-law principles, as it is if we look for the rule to the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions.

This is a penal provision. When our friends on the other side were ransacking the library to see what they could see in the English cases, it is a pity and a wonder that they did not come across something which would have reminded them that penal statutes are to be construed strictly. This is, according to their own account of it, a penal provision, and all judges in that country from which we derive our notions of law, all judges of every grade, apply that doctrine to such a statute; not merely Coke, and Hale, and Holt, and Mansfield, but others of a lower grade. Jeffreys himself, when he came home redhanded from the bloody assizes, time-serving and blood-thirsty brute as he was, would not have denied that the law had that much humanity.

But there is another ground. Whenever you are considering any special provision of the Constitution which impinges upon some great general right that the Constitution was made for the purpose of protecting, you are always to give it the narrowest construction that you can, so as to take away from the general right as little as possible. This does affect in that way several of the most important rights that were ever claimed by a people or conceded by a government. For instance, all men charged with a criminal offense shall be entitled to a trial by jury. This provision takes away the right of the party accused to a trial by his peers and subjects him to a trial before a political body composed, it may be, of his rivals and his enemies. If the Constitution in plain words says that he shall be deprived of that right, we cannot deny it; but we deny it because it is only by a constrained interpretation that our adversaries would take the right away.

It was the manifest design of those who framed our institutions to provide for a judiciary separate, distinct, apart from the rest of the Government, composed of men having certain qualifications, holding their office by a certain tenure, and paid in a certain way. The Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish. The impeachment provision takes away from all persons who are subject to it the right of having their cases investigated and determined by judicial officers. It takes a portion of the judicial frown away from the courts where the other parts of the Constitution intended to put the whole.

Again, the principle pervading our Constitution and the constitution of every government pretending to be free is that the judicial, the legislative, and the executive departments shall be kept as completely separate and distinct as it is possible to make them. But this provision, as far as it goes, mingles them together and gives a part of the judicial power to a body whose general functions are legislative.

The Constitution declares what Magna Charta had declared before and what was a well-established principle of the common law, that no man shall be twice vexed for the same cause. Here, however, you try a man first and for the same offense you send him into the courts to be tried again.

There is another provision in our Constitution that every man shall have justice done to him at home, where he can be tried by a jury of his neighbors in the vicinage to which he belongs. The Constitution expressly declares that he shall always be tried in the district where the offense was committed, and it provides also that the district shall not be changed by any law passed after the offense was committed so as to put him within a jurisdiction which he was not subject to at the time the deed was done. But this article disregards that principle entirely, and a custom-house officer in Oregon or Alaska may be brought here three thousand miles and tried before the Senate, where the expense of a trial alone would be a loss as great to him as that of conviction.

All these are reasons which you cannot deny to be sound for saying that this provision be construed as strictly as possible and that nothing should be done under it which cannot be done strictissimi juris.

I have finished. I have nothing more to say. I began without an exordium and I will end without a peroration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate be cleared and the doors closed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) proceeded to deliberate upon the question submitted.

Mr. MORTON having modified his inquiry to read as follows—

Resolved, That the power of impeachment created by the Constitution does not extend to a person who is charged with the commission of a high crime while he was a civil officer of the United States and acting in his official character, but who had ceased to be such officer before the finding of articles of impeachment by the House of Representatives—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," in the first line, and in lieu thereof inserting:

That the demurrer of the respondent to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the respondent be, and the same is hereby, overruled; and that the plea of the respondent to the jurisdiction of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, overruled; and that the articles of impeachment are sufficient to show that the Senate has jurisdiction of the case, and that the respondent answer to the merits of the accusation contained in the articles of impeachment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY moved to amend the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, by striking out all after the words "that," in the first line thereof, and inserting:

W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is not amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, he having resigned said office before impeachment.

After debate,

Mr. WRIGHT moved to lay the resolution of Mr. MORTON on the table.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Burnside, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Conover, Johnston, Merrimon, and Sharon—7.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THURMAN submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

1. Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office.

2. Resolved, That the House of Representatives and the respondent be notified that on the — day of ——, at twelve o'clock meridian, the Senate will deliver its judgment in open Senate on the question of jurisdiction raised by the pleadings, at which time the managers on the part of the House and the respondent are notified to attend.

3. Resolved, That at the time specified in the foregoing resolution the President of the Senate shall pronounce the judgment of the Senate as follows: "It is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and going back to the first defect, and it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law, and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught, and said William W. Belknap is ordered to plead or answer to the merits within —— days;" which judgment thus pronounced shall be entered upon the journal of the Senate sitting as aforesaid.

Mr. CONKLING moved to amend the first resolution by inserting at the end thereof "before he was impeached."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING having demanded a division of the question embraced in the resolutions of Mr. THURMAN and a separate vote thereon,

On the question to agree to the first resolution as amended,

Mr. PADDOCK further moved to amend the said resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting:

That William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, having ceased to be a civil officer of the United States by reason of his resignation before proceedings in impeachment were commenced against him by the House of Representatives, the Senate cannot take jurisdiction in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Spencer, West, and Windom—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Conover, Johnston, Merrimon, and Sharon—7.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the first resolution of Mr. THURMAN as amended,

On the question to agree thereto as follows—

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office before he was impeached—

Mr. THURMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Spencer, West, and Windom—29.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Conover, Johnston, Merrimon, and Sharon—7.

So the first resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The question recurring on the second resolution of Mr. THURMAN,

The said resolution having been amended on the motion of Mr. BAYARD,

On the question to agree thereto as amended,

Pending debate,

Mr. HITCHCOCK (at seven o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m.) moved that the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment adjourn to Wednesday next at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. HITCHCOCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morton, Patterson, Spencer, and West—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Conover, Hamilton, Johnston, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Sharon, and Wadleigh—10.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the second resolution of Mr. THURMAN, as amended,

Mr. CHRISTIANCY moved to amend the said resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that no person shall be convicted on impeachment without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present; and whereas more than one-third of all the members of the Senate have already pronounced their conviction that they have no right or power to adjudge or try a citizen holding no public office or trust when impeached by the House of Representatives; and whereas the respondent, W. W. Belknap, was not when impeached an officer, but a private citizen of the United States, and of the State of Iowa; and whereas said Belknap has, since proceedings of impeachment were commenced against him, been indicted and now awaits trial before a judicial court for the same offenses charged in the articles of impeachment, which indictment is pursuant to a statute requiring in case of conviction (in addition to fine and imprisonment) an infliction of the utmost judgment which can follow impeachment in any case, namely, disqualification ever again to hold office:

Resolved, That in view of the foregoing facts it is inexpedient to proceed further in the case.

After debate,

Mr. CHRISTIANCY, by unanimous consent of the Senate, withdrew his amendment.

The question recurring on the second resolution of Mr. THURMAN, as amended, as follows—

Resolved, That the House of Representatives and the respondent be notified that on Thursday, the 1st day of June, 1876, at one o'clock p. m., the Senate will deliver its judgment, in open Senate, on the question of jurisdiction raised by the pleadings, at which time the managers on the part of the House and the respondent are notified to attend—

On the question to agree thereto,

Mr. THURMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 45, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Eaton, Hamlin, McMillan, and Morrill of Maine—4.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Barnum, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Sharon, and Spencer—24.

So the second resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The question recurring on the third resolution,

The said resolution having been amended on the motion of Mr. BAYARD and on the motion of Mr. THURMAN to read as follows:

Resolved, That at the time specified in the foregoing resolution the President of the Senate shall pronounce the judgment of the Senate as follows: "It is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and, it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught;" which judgment thus pronounced shall be entered upon the journal of the Senate sitting as aforesaid.

On the question to agree thereto Mr. THURMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Eaton, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Paddock, Spencer, West, and Windom—22.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Bruce, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, and Sharon—16.

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment adjourns it be to Thursday next at one o'clock p. m.

Mr. WHYTE submitted an order, which was considered by unanimous consent; and the same having been amended on the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was agree to, as follows:

Ordered, That each Senator be permitted to file his opinion in writing upon the question of jurisdiction in this case on or before the 1st day of July, 1876, to be printed with the proceedings in the order in which the same shall be delivered, and the opinions pronounced in the Senate shall be printed in the order in which they were so pronounced.

On motion by Mr. CONKLING, (at nine o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.,) the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourned.

OPINIONS

DELIVERED IN THE

DELIBERATION OF THE SENATE ON THE QUESTION RAISED BY THE DEMURRER OF

WM. W. BELKNAP, THE RESPONDENT,

TO

THE REPLICATION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO THE PLEA TO THE JURISDICTION FILED BY THE RESPONDENT, VIZ: WHETHER SAID RESPONDENT IS LIABLE TO BE IMPEACHED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AND TRIED BY THE SENATE ON IMPEACHMENT FOR ACTS DONE BY HIM AS SECRETARY OF WAR, NOTWITHSTANDING HIS RESIGNATION OF THAT OFFICE BEFORE HIS IMPEACHMENT.

Opinion of Mr. McDonald,

Delivered May 15, 1876.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the question for present consideration before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment is whether the respondent, William W. Belknap, is amenable to trial in this court for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office, and, in that connection, whether the motives which may have influenced him to resign are material as affecting the question of our jurisdiction.

The brevity of the constitutional provisions relating to impeachment and the absence of any precedent in our history add greatly to the difficulties which would ordinarily surround a question of so much importance.

In the first article of the Constitution—the one providing for the organization, prescribing the jurisdiction, and defining the powers of Congress—the sole power of impeachment is conferred upon the House of Representatives, and the Senate is invested with the sole power to try all impeachments. The limitations upon the powers thus conferred, as contained in the same article, are "that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." It will be seen that these are limitations upon the power to punish, and not upon the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine matters that may be the subject of impeachment. It is also contended that a still further limitation is contained in section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution affecting the jurisdiction of this court, wherein it is provided that the "President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high-crimes and misdemeanors." Inasmuch as this section is found in that article of the Constitution which creates the executive and administrative department of the Government, and is designed to provide a mode for the removal of such officers from office, if it limits in any degree the general powers of the co-ordinate branch of Government in which is vested the sole power of impeachment, such limitations could only be by implication, and could not be held to cripple those powers so as to defeat a jurisdiction that had once attached.

At the time these meager provisions were ingrafted into the Constitution it cannot be claimed that the framers of that instrument supposed they were conferring an undefined and undefinable power. On the contrary, they must have taken it for granted that the jurisdiction they were conferring upon the House of Representatives and the Senate in matters of impeachment was as clearly ascertainable as the jurisdiction conferred upon the Federal courts by the same instrument which, by article 3 of the Constitution, embraced all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

At the time the Constitution was framed the jurisdiction of the British Parliament in matters of impeachment was as much a part of the constitutional law of England as was her system of civil and criminal jurisprudence. It rested upon the same immemorial usage as the common law, and might properly be termed a part of it. It performed a similar office in respect to political offenders in the judicial system of Great Britain that courts of equity did in matters of conscience. Courts of equity grew out of the necessity created by the unbending rules and practice of the courts of common law. Equity is defined by one of the eminent jurists of Great Britain to be "the correction of that wherein the law by reason of its universality was defective." A class of offenders whose close relation to the affairs of state as ministers of the Crown or whose personal power and influence made it difficult if not impossible to deal with them in ordinary courts of the common law, made it necessary to clothe some more powerful tribunal with authority to try them, and in such cases the House of Commons in the name of the whole people arraigned them at the bar of the House of Lords as the highest court of judicature in the realm, and this was called impeachment. The usual grounds of accusation were alleged misdemeanors committed by persons employed by the Crown, either at home or in its foreign service, maladministration of justice and extrajudicial conduct by judges of the realm, treason and treasonable practices not specifically named in the statute. These, as will be seen by consulting Hartsell's Precedents of Proceedings in Parliament, were usually classed under the heads of treason, bribery, and high crimes and misdemeanors.

In early times the power to impeach did not seem to be limited to official crimes, or crimes committed by persons holding official stations, but was invoked against such offenders as the House of Commons deemed proper subjects, and for causes the House of Lords were willing to entertain. But in such examination as I have been able to make I have seen no case that received the sanction of both Houses in impeachments against commoners which did not grow out of malconduct in office, or was not for some political offense, such as treason or the like. As for the peers of the realm they could only be proceeded against for treason, or misprision of treason, felony, or misprision of felony, by impeachment. It was sometimes doubted whether a commoner could be impeached for any capital offense, but the weight of authority is against this restriction. It is quite clear, however, that as early as the impeachment and trial of Warren Hastings, commoners were only impeachable for official crimes or political offenses of such magnitude as to take them out of the case of ordinary offenders. Thus stood the law of impeachment at the time the Federal Constitution was framed; and it must therefore be held that this was the power conferred upon the Senate and House of Representatives, to be exercised by each respectively in a manner provided in the sections of the Constitution which I have substantially quoted, limited and controlled by the provisions of that instrument relating to that subject and by the nature and character of our institutions.

The nature of our institutions necessarily eliminated or rendered inoperative all that part of the law of impeachment which related to peers of England as peers of the realm, and left in force only such parts of the law as gave authority to impeach commoners.

The provisions of our Constitution which limited judgment in cases of impeachment to removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, while it subjected the party to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment in the courts according to law, withheld from this court the power exercised by the House of Lords of covering by their judgment the whole punishment attached by law to the offense, and separated the offense into two distinct parts, vesting in the Senate as a court of impeachment the power to impose the political punishment authorized by the Constitution, leaving the party to be tried for the criminal violation of law by a jury. By the judgment in impeachment the offender is simply divested of his political capacity; it touches neither his person nor his property.

Impeachment, therefore, under our Constitution is that procedure by which persons who holding civil offices under the United States, including the President and Vice-President, may be brought to trial for the commission of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeaners committed in office, and be adjudged to suffer such political penalties as are provided in the Constitution. And the question for determination at this time is whether one who while in office has become liable to these penalties can be proceeded against after he has voluntarily terminated his official existence, and when it is no longer in the power of this court to impose the full measure of the political punishment which may be incident to the judgment against him. In other words, is the power to order the removal of the offender from office essential to the jurisdiction of this court, and does the want of such power take away from it the authority to hear and determine the accusation and to impose such political punishment as may remain, namely, to divest him of his political capacity? If this is true, then it must follow, if a party accused should cease to be a civil officer at any time before final judgment is rendered against him and that fact should be made known to this court by proper suggestion, that the proceeding would abate, and therefore the accused might go through the entire trial in the hope of defeating the cause upon its merits, and, failing in that, could at any time he saw proper to do so withdraw himself from the jurisdiction of this court by a voluntary surrender of his office. In the case under consideration, that voluntary surrender of official station took place on the same day and within a few hours before the House of Representatives took cognizance of this case; but if the Senate has no power to try after the judgment of removal could no longer be operative on account of the voluntary act of the accused in vacating the office, it could make no difference when that vacation occurred, provided it antedated the finding and judgment of the court on the merits.

But, as I have already stated, the limitations in the Constitution relied on are not limitations upon the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine matters of impeachment, but are limitations only upon the judgment of the court. These can extend no further than the limitations prescribe; and, while it might be true that the court might be disinclined to go on with the cause when it was informed that no part of a judgment it had power to render could be operative for any cause, yet I apprehend that so long as there was a party against whom the suit might be prosecuted such party could not arrest the power of the court to hear and determine the cause by the interposition of any such plea. Nor could it be claimed that, because the whole judgment which it might be in the power of the court to enter against the party could not in all its parts be effectual, therefore the part which could operate must also fail because it is only a part of what might have been imposed but for the act of the accused.

Such a construction as this, with such results as it would lead to, ought not to be adopted unless, from the provisions of the Constitution, no other could be given to them and at the same time carry into effect the intent of its framers. But there is another consideration that is strongly opposed to the construction that is claimed by the counsel for the accused, and that is the fact that judgments in impeachment are excepted out of the pardoning power conferred by the Constitution upon the President. In England it was a mooted question whether a pardon under the great seal was pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament. It was conceded that the king might pardon after conviction, but it was claimed that he could not arrest the proceedings pending the trial by Parliament. This question, so far as England was concerned, was put at rest by express provisions in the act of settlement adopted and passed in the reign of William of Orange, and was one of the results of the great revolution, by which it was expressly provided that no such pardon was pleadable. The framers of our Constitution undoubtedly had this feature of the British constitution in view when they withheld from the Chief Executive all power over the proceedings and judgments of this court in matters of impeachment, and thus rendered it certain that official offenders liable to the penalties provided for official crime, so far as those penalties were political, could not escape the consequences of their official misconduct, the chief of which is to divest the offender of his political capacity for all time. But if this political incapacity can be avoided by simple resignation, then the safeguards provided against such a result are wholly inefficient.

Entertaining these views, I must of necessity hold that the plea of the accused to the jurisdiction of this court is not sufficient in law, and that the trial may proceed against him on its merits, notwithstanding the facts set up in his plea. It also follows from the views that I have already expressed that the motives which may have induced him to resign his office are wholly immaterial.

Opinion of Mr. Thurman,

Delivered May 15, 1876.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Constitution provides (article 1, section 2, paragraph 5) that the House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment;" and (same article, section 3, paragraph 6) that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." The terms "impeachment," "bill of attainder," "ex post facto law," "reprieves," "pardons," "cases in law and equity," "cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," "crimes," "piracy," "felony," and "jury" are all found in the Constitution; but there is no definition of either of them in that instrument. Nor was any definition necessary, for each of these terms had, when the Constitution was framed and adopted, a definite legal signification; and this known signification must be given to it unless the context requires it to be limited or modified. We are thus brought to the inquiries:

First. What was the legal signification of the technical term "impeachment" when the Constitution was adopted?

Second. Is that legal signification limited or modified by anything found in the Constitution?

To answer the first question we must have recourse to the sources of the common and parliamentary law, in English jurisprudence and history. For no impeachment trials in America, nor any constitutional provisions of the States, or charters of the colonies had established, before the adoption of the Constitution, a meaning of the term "impeachment" peculiar to America, or in any wise different from the signification given to the term in the jurisprudence of the mother country. Indeed no case of a trial upon impeachment, in America, prior to the adoption of our Constitution, has been pointed out.

Turning then to English jurisprudence we find that an impeachment is an accusation against an individual preferred by the House of Commons and tried by the House of Lords; that it was in existence as early as the year 1376, and has been frequently resorted to, especially in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, for the punishment of great offenders; that "all the king's subjects are impeachable," whether in or out of office, but that the procedure has with very few, if any, exceptions been confined to cases of official malfeasance or misfeasance, or of abuse of franchises or privileges granted by the Crown.

In Wooddeson's fortieth lecture, entitled "Of Parliamentary Impeachments," delivered a few years before the formation of our Constitution, and with which, it is probable, the most of the framers of the Constitution were familiar, it is said:

> It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community, and at the same time in a manner not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents, and the nature of such offenses may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court and the wisdom of the sagest assembly. The Commons, therefore, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice, and they cannot consistently either with their own dignity, or with safety to the accused, sue elsewhere but to those who share with them in the legislature. On this policy is founded the origin of impeachments.

And again:

> All the king's subjects are impeachable in Parliament. * * * Such kinds of misdeed however as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper, and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution. Thus, if a lord chancellor be guilty of bribery or of acting grossly contrary to the duty of his office, if the judges mislead their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, if any other magistrate attempt to subvert the fundamental laws, or introduce arbitrary power, these have been deemed cases adapted to parliamentary inquiry and decision. So when a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to neglect the safeguard of the sea, an embassador to betray his trust, a privy counsellor to propound or support pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to obtain exorbitant grants or incompatible employments, these imputations have properly occasioned impeachments; because it is apparent how little the ordinary tribunals are calculated to take cognizance of such offenses, or to investigate and reform the general policy of the state.

Such was the state of the English law when our Constitution was adopted. Impeachment was resorted to, not for the punishment of ordinary crimes cognizable by the ordinary criminal courts, but to punish official misconduct or abuses of public trust. It is true that some acts of official misconduct and some abuses of public trust were punishable in the ordinary courts; but this fact did not deprive Parliament of the jurisdiction to punish them, in its discretion, by the process of impeachment.

It follows that, if the usual legal signification of the term "impeachment" that obtained when the Constitution was adopted is to be followed, General Belknap is subject to the jurisdiction of the Senate upon the articles preferred against him. He is charged with grave misconduct and corruption while in office, and he cannot escape the jurisdiction of the House to impeach and the Senate to try by a resignation of his office, if the common-law definition of impeachment is to prevail. That the expiration of the official term of the offender, whether by resignation or otherwise, does not put an end to this jurisdiction is shown by several cases, and notably by those of Hastings and Melville.

We are next to inquire whether the Constitution limits or modifies the impeachment known to the common law. In some important particulars it does alter and modify it.

First. In England the chief executive magistrate is not impeachable. Under our Constitution he is.

Second. In England all the Queen's subjects are impeachable. In the United States, Blount's case seems to hold that impeachment is confined to treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors of civil officers, (the President and Vice-President included,) leaving military and naval officers to be dealt with by martial law.

Third. Peers are not under oath as judges when sitting as a court of impeachment. Senators are.

Fourth. In the House of Lords a majority convicts. In the Senate a "concurrence of two-thirds of the members present" is necessary to a conviction. (Constitution, article 1, section 3, paragraph 6.)

Fifth. The punishment to be inflicted by the House of Lords may extend to fine, imprisonment, corporal chastisement, loss of limb or even of life, according to the law of the land; for it must be secundum non ultra legem. (Selden's Judicature, 168, 171; Jefferson's Manual, 287.) But under our Constitution—

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law. (Constitution, article 1, section 3, paragraph 7.)

Sixth. The king's pardon cannot be pleaded in bar of an impeachment; but after conviction and judgment he may pardon. The presidential power to pardon does not extend to cases of impeachment at all; and consequently his pardon, however effectual to prevent punishment in the ordinary courts, cannot be pleaded in bar of an impeachment or relieve the convicted offender from the sentence pronounced by the Senate.

In all these particulars, except the second, the changes made by the Constitution are apparent, and that suggested by the second particular seems to be established by Blount's case.

But it has been earnestly contended that it makes another and sweeping change, namely, that it confines impeachment to cases where the accused is in the office which he has abused at the time of his impeachment, conviction, and sentence; and that, consequently, if at any time before sentence he resign, the jurisdiction of the Senate is at an end and no judgment can be pronounced against him.

A proposition that makes the jurisdiction of the Senate depend upon the will of the accused, that would practically annihilate the power of impeachment in all cases of guilt clearly provable, and leave it to exist in those cases only that furnish no reason for its exercise, namely, cases in which guilt, if it exist, cannot be proved, or cases in which there is no guilt at all, is not to be admitted unless the terms of the Constitution are so explicit that it cannot reasonably be denied.

The constitutional provisions cited in support of the proposition are the following:

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law. (Article 1, section 3, paragraph 7.)

It is argued that this latter section is a designation of the persons who are subject to impeachment, and that they are all persons in office; and that consequently no jurisdiction in impeachment can exist against a person not in office. And it is further argued in support of this view that both the cited provisions contemplate a judgment of removal from office in every case of conviction, and therefore negative the idea of a judgment against a person not in office. And it is further said that the object of impeachment is to get rid of a corrupt or dangerous officer, and that when his term of office expires, whether by resignation or otherwise, that object is accomplished and there is no reason left for his impeachment.

And it is further contended that the clauses granting the power of impeachment ought to be strictly construed, because they are, as it is said, in derogation of the provisions of the fifth and sixth articles of amendment to the Constitution relating to criminal proceedings. These are, in brief, the grounds upon which the proposition in question is advocated, and which, it is claimed, fully sustain it. It is not pretended that any provision of the Constitution explicitly denies the power to impeach after the close of the offender's official term, but such a denial is sought to be established by argument and inference.

The question then arises, is the inference thus drawn a necessary one? for if it is not, it cannot with reason be contended that it ought to prevail, in view of the consequences already stated that would result from it. The grant of power to the House to impeach and to the Senate to try all impeachments is clear, and cannot be frittered away or essentially limited by subsequent provisions supposed to be repugnant unless the repugnancy is manifest. (Faw vs. Marsteller, 2 Cranch, 10.)

I do not contend that the well-known doctrine relating to repeals by implication on account of repugnancy obtains in construing the several provisions of the Constitution; but I do contend that all its provisions must, if possible, be interpreted so as to be in harmony with each other, and that, where it contains a grant of power in clear and unambiguous terms, other provisions are, if possible, to be construed so as to be consistent with such grant. And hence, if any provision is capable of two interpretations, one of which is consistent and the other inconsistent with such clear grant of power, the former is to be preferred. And here let me observe that this rule in nowise militates against the doctrine that, the Government being one of delegated powers, the Constitution ought to be strictly construed. I agree that it ought to be strictly construed; but a strict construction is one thing and a construction that annihilates or practically destroys one of its plain provisions is quite another thing. The former preserves the instrument in its integrity according to the intent of those who framed and those who adopted it, but the latter disregards that intent and performs an office of destruction and not of interpretation.

Bearing these principles in mind, let us turn to the provisions relied on by the defense and see whether they are necessarily repugnant to the previous general grant of power to prefer and try impeachments or whether they may be interpreted in harmony with that grant.

The first of these provisions is that already quoted, to wit:

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

The most obvious as well as the literal interpretation of this provision confines it to the subject of judgment. Its obvious intent was to deprive the Senate of the large discretionary power exercised by the House of Lords in the infliction of punishment, and to leave to the ordinary courts of justice the power to inflict those punishments which affect the property, liberty, or life of the accused. In this it is a great improvement upon the impeachment of the common law by removing from the procedure the possibility of those abuses by which it had too often been tarnished and disgraced. There is not a word in the provision that necessarily touches any jurisdiction of the Senate, except its jurisdiction to punish. There is not a word in it that literally, or by reasonable intendment, makes removal from office a necessary part of the sentence. If the accused be in office, the judgment may be removal without disqualification, or both removal and disqualification. If he be out of office, there can be no effective sentence of removal, but there may be a judgment of disqualification.

The remaining clause to be considered is section 4 of article 2:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

At first view it might seem that this section, like the provision just remarked upon, relates wholly to the judgment to be pronounced, and that its sole purpose is to make removal from office a necessary part of the sentence. But it seems to have been considered in Blount's case that its scope is not thus restricted and that other objects were also intended and are accomplished by it. The Senate in that case, whether correctly or not it is unnecessary now to decide, seems to have considered the section as an enumeration of the causes for which an impeachment will lie, and of the persons who commit the impeachable offense.

By this interpretation impeachment is confined to the treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors of persons in civil office. But there is not a word in the section that expressly or by necessary intendment prescribes the time when impeachment may be instituted. Full effect is given to it when we say that the crime must be committed while the person is in office, and that, if he remain in office at the time of his conviction, he must be removed. But, whether in or out of office at the time of impeachment, he is liable to a sentence of disqualification to hold office which he cannot escape by the expiration of his official term. The language, "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States," does not import that the persons holding these offices are to be impeached as officers. It is the person who is impeached, and all the section requires is that he shall have held the office when he committed the crime. The moment he commits it he becomes liable to impeachment, and the Constitution interposes no bar in the nature of a statute of limitations, either by the expiration of his term of office or otherwise, to prevent his punishment. His official character may be gone, but the criminal remains, and his disqualification may be as proper after as before he held official position.

This view might be illustrated by a reference to many criminal statutes, designed for the punishment of official misconduct, under which the crime must of course be committed by a person in office, but the indictment and punishment may be after the close of his official term. Some of these statutes were read in the argument of this cause and others will no doubt be referred to by Senators. I will merely cite one: Revised Statutes United States, sections 5501, 5502, 5503, 5504.

The interpretation I have given to the Constitution gives full effect to every clause in it and makes every provision harmonize with every other provision. The interpretation contended for by the defense makes the clauses discordant and repugnant, and reduces the great and solemn remedy of impeachment, designed for the protection of the Government and people against official crime and corruption, to a miserable absurdity. It introduces an anomaly unknown to civilized man, the doctrine that it belongs to the criminal and not to the Government whose laws he has offended and whose trust he has abused to say whether he shall be punished for his crimes.

It is vain to say that removal from office is the sole object of impeachment, when the Constitution itself authorizes a sentence of disqualification that may be as properly pronounced against the man who has left office as against him who clings to it. It is vain to say that impeachment is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, since it is provided for in the Constitution itself. It is vain to say that it is liable to abuse, for that argument, if admitted, would take from government all its powers, since there is no one of them that is not thus liable. It is vain to say that it may be employed to harass and tyrannize over private men who have ceased to hold office, for the mode of procedure itself negatives the probability, nay, almost the possibility, of its being thus prostituted, to say nothing of the influence of public opinion that would inevitably condemn such an attempt.

A distinguished English jurist has described it as "a safeguard of public liberty well worthy of a free country and of so noble an institution as a free Parliament." (May's Parliamentary Practice, chapter 23.)

Hallam says:

Middlesex was unanimously convicted by the Peers. His impeachment was of the highest moment to the Commons, as it restored forever that salutary constitutional right which the single precedent of Lord Bacon might have been insufficient to establish against the ministers of the Crown. (1 Constitutional History, 372.)

And again:

The Commons had now been engaged for more than twenty years in a struggle to restore and to fortify their own and their fellow-subjects' liberties. They had obtained in this period but one legislative measure of importance, the late declaratory act against monopolies. But they had rescued from disuse their ancient right of impeachment. (Idem., 373.)

Our fathers, like their English ancestors, regarded impeachment as a "safeguard of public liberty," and therefore provided for it in the Constitution, and so general has been this opinion and so proper has impeachment been considered for the repression of official corruption, that nearly every State constitution ever framed in the United States has also provided for it.

It follows from what I have said that in my opinion the articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, and do not need any support from the matters alleged in the subsequent pleadings of the House of Representatives; and that the plea to the jurisdiction of the defendant is insufficient, and ought to be overruled, and an order of respondeat ouster be entered.

Opinion of Mr. Wallace,

Delivered May 15, 1876.

Mr. WALLACE. The first question presented by the order of the Senate is: Is General Belknap amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office?

The proper solution of this question depends upon what is the true meaning of those provisions of the Constitution of the United States which vest the power of impeachment and regulate its exercise.

They are as follows:

First, the House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment." The last clause of section 2, article 1.

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

Last two clauses of section 3, article 1.

The President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

First clause of section 2, article 2.

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Section 4, article 2.

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.

Last clause of section 2, article 3.

The Constitution is a frame of government, it is not a penal statute. It is not to be construed strictly, but it is to be so interpreted that the great objects contemplated in the enumerated powers given to the government it creates, may be attained. Each of the departments created, all of the powers specifically granted, are rounded, complete, and authoritative. No halting opinions, no half-way grant of power, no nerveless, weak, and impotent authority were vested by it in any case in which it expressly granted control to any of its departments. Whatever was necessary to the perfect use of the power specifically given is necessarily implied therefrom. These results naturally flow from the fact that the people created a government, independent and self-existing, and enumerated its powers, and it just as logically follows that in the vast field in which they gave it no power, the States and the people are the depositaries thereof. When it declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States," it is implied that all things necessary to the complete exercise of that power was thereby granted to that office, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution itself. When it declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court," &c., it implied that all things necessary to the full exercise of that power was thereby granted to that tribunal, qualified only by the limitations of the instrument itself. As great powers of the Government created, they were complete within the domain of authority granted. So, too, when the Constitution declares that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment" and that "the Senate shall have the power to try all impeachments," it implied all of the powers essential to the complete exercise of the authority granted, subject only to the limitations imposed upon that authority by the instrument itself. As the words "executive power" or "judicial power" have defined and distinct meaning under our system of laws and precedents, so the power of impeachment thereby given had a defined and distinct meaning.

Webster defines the word "to impeach" thus: "To cite before a tribunal for judgment of official misconduct." This meaning is clearly the proper one as applied to the proceeding either in Parliament or here. For centuries in England it was used as a means of judging and punishing official crime, and in very rare instances was it used upon private persons. It has never been used in this country or understood to apply to the trial or punishment of citizens for personal crime as distinguished from official misconduct. It was the power of "citing before a tribunal for judgment of official misconduct" which came to us with our system of jurisprudence from England, and this is what our Constitution plainly implies when it gave "the power of impeachment." If we trace this power through the early history of the colonies, this becomes apparent. Penn's frame of government in 1682, in the reign of Charles II, gave to us of Pennsylvania open courts, presentment by a grand jury, and a fair trial by a jury of twelve men, as near as may be peers or equals, while at the same time it gave the General Assembly power "to impeach criminals fit to be there impeached," and it vested the council with power to give "judgment upon criminals impeached," and required a two-thirds vote for their conviction. These are the very elements of the provisions of the Federal Constitution in regard to impeachment. Its first use in Pennsylvania was in 1706, when the house impeached James Logan, secretary of the province, for his conduct in public affairs and toward the house and its members.

The characteristics and proper use of this power as it existed and became a part of the Federal Constitution are plainly shown by the language of the first constitution of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It was adopted by the convention that met in July, 1776, of which Dr. Franklin was the president. The whole scope and purpose of the "power of impeachment" were crystallized in that instrument when it gave to the house the power "to impeach State criminals" only, and to the president and his council the right to "sit as judges to hear and determine on impeachments," while it denied them the power of pardon in such cases. These, coupled with the distinct declaration that "every officer of State, whether judicial or executive, shall be liable to be impeached by the General Assembly either when in office or after his resignation or removal for maladministration," clearly define what the freemen of at least one State thought this power was when the Federal convention met. Under the constitutions of the States as they stood when the Federal convention met in 1787, the process had a defined and distinct meaning. In all of them in which the subject was named, nine in number, the house was made a grand inquest to impeach, and the senate or council or the senate and the judges made a tribunal to try. The offenses over which this jurisdiction was vested were official misconduct, maladministration, corruption in office, or offenses against the constitution, or some or all of them, and the power of pardon after conviction was denied to the executive. All of them were plainly embodied in the Federal Constitution. The provision limiting the judgment was copied from the words of the constitutions of New York, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, and that of New York provided for the removal of the official when impeached and for filling the vacancy until he was acquitted or his successor was elected. In Virginia and Delaware the punishment was disability, removal, or other penalty, while in Pennsylvania and South Carolina no punishment was named, thus demonstrating that there were then other punishments contemplated than mere removal.

Assuming, then, that the "power of impeachment" as it then existed was the power "to cite before a tribunal for judgment of official misconduct," or, as we of Pennsylvania wrote it, "to cite State criminals while in office or after before a tribunal for maladministration," it now becomes necessary to inquire whether this authority, full, complete, and rounded as it then existed, given by the Federal Constitution to the House to cite and to the Senate to judge, has been limited, restricted, or shorn of any of its proportions by the words of the Constitution itself.

It is manifest that the last clause of section 3 of article 1 limited the power to punish and placed a barrier in the way of the infliction of any other punishment by the Senate than one purely political: "Judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification" to hold office. It is equally manifest that these words, even in their most technical sense, do not limit or restrict either the power to impeach or to try. As well might it be said that the ordinary limitation of the extent of punishment prescribed by a penal statute limited the power of a grand jury to present or of the proper court to try an offense over which at common law it had jurisdiction. But it is argued that because this limitation as to the extent of the judgment contains both removal and disqualification, that as the Senate cannot impose both penalties upon one who is not in office, the necessary inference is that we can only try officials during their term. If it had been intended to limit the power to impeach to so narrow a field or if the exercise of the then existing view of this subject was to be restricted in the Federal Constitution, it is strange that such a limitation should be left to inference from language used in defining the power of punishment and should not be expressly declared or plainly implied from the terms used in vesting the power to impeach or to try. If the judgment of the Senate must be both and cannot be one or the other, and if these clauses of the Constitution are to be strictly construed, we are placed in the dilemma of finding no one upon whom this judgment of disqualification can operate; for "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers, shall be removed from office" are the words of section 4 of article 2, and this is the only penalty named therein.

By this latter section a specific punishment is imposed. There surely cannot be two punishments for the same offense in the same instrument; and hence it logically follows that disqualification cannot be imposed upon any of the officials named. It would be just as reasonable to argue that, because section 4, article 2, declares that the President shall be removed and omits to say that he shall be disqualified, therefore he cannot be disqualified, as it is to argue that because section 3, article 1, names two punishments, we must impose both or neither. These provisions of the Constitution need no such absurd construction. The latter clause was a limitation of the extent of punishment; the former applied the principle that no man shall be punished until he is proved to be guilty, and was inserted to preserve in his hands the power there vested by the people until a competent tribunal had passed upon his guilt or innocence, as well as to declare his unfitness and compel his removal when convicted. These clauses are descriptive when applied to anything else than their plain purpose, and both of them leave the "power of impeachment" precisely as it stood when ingrafted on the Constitution.

The fourth section of article 2 is a limitation upon the power of impeachment so far as to prohibit the removal from office before conviction, but it does not pretend to restrict the authority given to the House and Senate in any other manner. It describes those who shall be punished when convicted, in general terms. "The President, Vice-President and all civil officers, shall be removed," are its words, but the command to remove the President when convicted does not, and even by a forced construction cannot, prohibit the impeachment, and, upon conviction, the disqualification, of one who had been President, for official crime, if the power to do so be given in other words of the instrument. The words here used are not apt, no necessary implication arises from the whole sentence, nor does a general view of all these provisions require or permit us to limit the express grant of the power of impeachment by this section.

We thus reach the conclusion that the words of the Constitution taken in their plain and ordinary meaning contain no restriction of or limitation upon the "power of impeachment" as it existed at the formation of the Constitution and entered into the government thereby created as a positive and valuable authority.

We now proceed to consider the effect that the construction contended for by the defendant would have upon the power granted and the government created.

It is apparent from what has been already said, as well as from the description of the leading crimes, "treason and bribery," and of the officials to be punished as the highest in the state, "the President and Vice-President," that the objects to be attained by the use of the power granted were the preservation of the integrity and purity of the Government from the temptations that surround those in power and the perpetual banishment from power of those who had betrayed or dishonored it. Official fidelity and official honesty were the ends sought. Forfeiture of official power and dénial of the right to enjoy the marks of confidence of their fellows were the penalties which were meted to those crimes that in former times or in despotic governments were avenged by the knout, the bowstring, or the dripping ax of the headsman. But the defendant argues that if the corrupt official or the traitorous embassador do but resign his place before he is impeached, these penalties are useless and the power of disqualification is gone. Such an argument absolutely destroys the power of punishment with disqualification, for the guilty official will always resign to escape the consequences of his crime, and when he has resigned he is beyond the arm of the law. So absurd and fatuitous a result demonstrates the fallacy of the argument.

It is urged that unless this construction be placed upon the Constitution, impeachments may follow during his whole life any one who has held office and that the passions of political factions will use this weapon to avenge themselves upon their adversaries. It is always safe to trust the people. They will not approve or authorize an unjust or improper use of this power, and the keen sense of parties as to their approval or disapproval will be a sufficient restraint upon those who have power in their attempt to punish for venial offenses those who have lost it. If an officer has been corrupt his crime should follow him. If he has prostituted his high place for gain or betrayed his country, no statute of limitations can be or ought to be interposed for his protection. A rigid rule of official accountability is imperatively demanded in the public service. Proofs of this fact are now abundant, and our highest duty to the state demands the enforcement of every mode of compelling official fidelity. He who owes the Government a debt has no presumption of payment in his favor. The statute of limitations does not run against the state. So he who owes the Government and the people faithful and honest performance of the duties his trust clothes him with, should have no statute or construction for his protection. He takes the office with its grave responsibilities, and only with his life can those responsibilities be shaken off. The close of his official term does not, and it ought not to shield the political criminal. The Constitution has no limitations for the immunity of any such offenders, but it demands of all its officials purity, honesty, and fidelity, and it is plain enough and strong enough to enforce its demands at all times and upon every class of those who enjoy its high places.

The construction claimed by the defendant's counsel, if tested by the action of those who made the Constitution and administered the Government up to 1867, would also have the effect of utterly ignoring the denial to the President of the power of pardon in cases of impeachment. The first clause of section 2, article 2, expressly denies to the President this right, and yet for nearly eighty years the exercise of the power of removal was the exercise of the pardoning power, and that, too, the most odious and dangerous form of that power—a previous pardon. Until the passage of the tenure-of-office act, the construction contended for permitted the President, without the consent of the Senate, to remove his traitorous or corrupt officials, and thus to put them beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate, condone their offenses, and negative one of the plainest provisions of the Constitution. It would necessarily follow such a construction that the power of impeachment would be subject to the whim or caprice of both the President and the accused. The former could remove, and thus pardon; the latter could resign, and escape disqualification. Surely such was not the belief of such men as Jared Ingersoll, James Wilson, or Dr. Franklin, who came to the Federal convention with the full knowledge that the constitution of their own State expressly negatived any such construction, and distinctly declared that an official could be impeached after the expiration of his term, and that one impeached could not be pardoned by the Executive.

From the precedents and history of the power itself, from the necessary implication that follows the words which vest the power, from the absence of any limitation in the words of the Constitution upon the power to cite and to judge, and from the absurd and dangerous results that flow from any other construction, I reach the conclusion that General Belknap is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office, and therefore vote to require him to answer over.

The view which I take of the question considered leaves the remaining ones immaterial.

Opinion of Mr. Morton,

Delivered May 15, 1876.

Mr. MORTON. The constitutional provisions in regard to impeachment can be better understood by grouping them in their natural order. They are now separated into different articles and sections; but that does not affect the sense.

First—

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Second—

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Third—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Fourth—

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

The first provision declares that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, &c. This provision carries with it the power of impeachment for the purpose of removal from office.

The declaration that the President and other civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office upon impeachment and conviction for treason, &c., by necessary implication carries with it the power of impeachment for that purpose. In itself it gives to Congress the power to initiate, try, and execute an impeachment to remove the officers named. The sole purpose for which impeachment is authorized by this provision is to remove persons from office, and it cannot be extended by inference to persons not in office. It does not say that persons may be impeached and removed from office, but that certain officers shall be removed by impeachment and conviction for treason, &c. It mentions impeachment only as the means for removal from office. It does not speak of impeachment with removal from office as an incident, but only as the means by which removal is to be accomplished. It will not be contended that this provision gives the power for impeachment for any purpose but to remove from office, and, if there be any power to impeach a person not in office, it must be sought elsewhere.

The next provision declares—

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

This provides simply that the House shall inaugurate and prosecute impeachments. It defines the office of the House in connection with an impeachment as distinguished from the Senate, but does not assume to determine the causes for which, or the persons against whom, an impeachment may be prosecuted.

Impeachment is a proceeding in which both Houses participate, and this designates the part to be performed by the House.

To the argument that this clause not only designates the part which the House is to take in the proceeding by impeachment, but gives to the House general jurisdiction over persons and the subject-matter, it may be answered that the Senate determined just the other way in the Blount case. In that case it was held that the jurisdiction of the House and Senate in impeachment was absolutely limited by the fourth section of the third article to the President, Vice-President, and civil officers of the United States, so that putting the two clauses together they would read thus:

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment of the President, Vice-President, and civil officers of the United States, who, upon conviction, shall be removed from office.

This fourth section of the second article, which has been recognized as a limitation of the officers who may be impeached, speaks of them only as existing officers, and refers to impeachments simply as the method by which they may be removed.

The third provision, which I have quoted, declares that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice of the United States shall preside, and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

This defines the powers and the duties of the Senate in connection with impeachments. As the House has the sole power to prosecute impeachments, this declares the Senate shall have the sole power to try. The use of the word "sole" in each provision shows that the powers and duties of each House are exclusive of the other, and that this provision simply designates the part which the Senate shall perform in the proceedings of impeachments and regulates its action in such performance.

The Senate has the power to try all impeachments which the House has the power to present.

Neither the provision in regard to the House or the Senate assumes to define the persons or the purpose for which the one may present and the other may try. The provisions that the Chief Justice shall preside and that the concurrence of two-thirds is necessary to convict simply regulate the procedure, and have nothing to do with the question of jurisdiction.

Against what persons and for what causes may the House present articles of impeachment? I answer against officers of the United States to remove them from office as specified in the first section quoted. If the jurisdiction of the House extends beyond the persons and the purpose specified in the preceding section, it must be derived from a source outside of the Constitution, which would be the common law of England, and this would give to the House all the jurisdiction possessed by the House of Commons. If this view be adopted, the preceding section gives to the House of Representatives but a small part of the jurisdiction it possesses, and renders that section wholly unnecessary, for the House would have, anyhow, like the House of Commons, power to remove from office by impeachment; and in this connection it may be observed that the House of Commons has in all cases of conviction on impeachment of persons in office made removal a part of its judgment.

The express authority given to Congress to prosecute and try impeachments in certain cases is in effect the denial of power in all other cases. This seems to be the universal rule applied in the construction of the Constitution. Congress only has those powers which are expressly conferred or which are necessary to carry out those expressly conferred, and does not upon this subject or upon any other inherit powers not granted which belong to the Parliament of England. The common law of England has been adopted to a certain extent by statutes both in the nation and in all the States but one or two. The jurisdiction of all the courts, whether of the nation or of the States, is determined altogether by constitutions and statutes. It is well established both in the nation and the States that the courts have no common-law criminal jurisdiction, and that there are no common-law crimes. Crimes are created alone by special enactment of national and State legislatures. In the use of terms and the construction of statutes, common-law definitions and rules are resorted to as guides only. The rules of evidence and methods of proceeding are borrowed in large part from the common law; but it may be stated as a principle to which there is no exception, in both the nation and the States, that crimes are created and exist only by statute, and that the jurisdiction of courts is established and defined only by constitutions or statutes. The idea that the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction in cases of impeachment which is not specially conferred by the Constitution, or that it is not necessary to the execution of some power or duty enjoined upon Congress by the Constitution, is at variance with every principle of construction that has been applied to it.

The fourth provision says "judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law."

This defines and limits the judgment that may be rendered. It declares that—

Judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Taken in connection with the first provision I have quoted, it makes removal from office an indispensable part of the judgment in all cases of conviction, while disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit is an incident which may or may not be added by the Senate in its discretion. If a person not in office were impeached and convicted and the Senate should be of the opinion that the offenses were not such as to make disqualification a part of the judgment, then there could be no judgment at all, for the judgment of removal when the person was out of the office when the proceeding was commenced would be an absurdity too glaring to be considered. The argument made by the managers that the Senate may have jurisdiction to try and convict in a case where no judgment can be rendered may be considered a reductio ad absurdum in constitutional law.

The last clause of the provision I have just quoted is conclusive upon this question. It declares:

The party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

If there had been room to doubt before, there is none after this provision. It strips the proceeding by impeachment of all purpose for punishment and leaves it simply as the means of removal from office. It provides that in all cases of impeachment the party convicted shall be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. Though the Senate may remove from office and disqualify the party convicted from holding any office under the United States during the term of his natural life, yet such conviction and judgment cannot be pleaded in bar of punishment in the courts. The right of the courts to punish in all cases is reserved, and we cannot conceive that any power of punishment is left in Congress unless it was the intention of the Constitution that a man might be punished twice for the same offense. Such a supposition is not to be entertained for a moment.

The principle that a man cannot be punished twice for the same offense runs through our Constitution and through the constitutions and laws of all the States. It was a right secured to the English people in their early history, and has not for hundreds of years been violated by the parliaments or the courts. Under the English constitution the Parliament is omnipotent and may absorb the whole criminal jurisdiction of the kingdom. It may assume to punish any man for any offense, whether committed in or out of office. Parliament assumes not only the power to remove from office, but to punish for the crime committed. This punishment was often by death, by forfeitures of goods, by attainting the blood, and by banishment from the realm. It extended to persons out of office as well as to those in office. It became a source of the greatest crimes in English history, and it was wisely determined by our fathers in the establishment of Government to dig it up by the roots as an instrument of revenge or punishment. But while impeachment under the English constitution was a prolific source of the greatest crimes, be it said to the honor of the English nation that it was never made to violate the principle "that a man shall not be punished twice for the same offense." If a person were punished by Parliament, he was not afterward punished by the courts for the same crime. If punished by the courts, he was not afterward punished by Parliament. When, therefore the Constitution of the United States provided that the court should have the power to punish crimes committed in office in all cases, and that the judgment of impeachment could not in any case be pleaded in bar, it was a declaration which cannot be misunderstood, that an impeachment is never to be used for punishment, and that its sole purpose is to remove bad men from office.

The right being reserved to the courts to punish by indictment in all cases, if the Senate now, as a matter of punishment, may inflict upon William W. Belknap the disqualification for holding office during the whole or any portion of his life it would clearly subject him to punishment twice for the same offense, because the courts, by the express provision of the Constitution, may go on and punish him again the next day. The fact that different tribunals may inflict different punishments for the same offense does not at all affect the principle, for it is still double punishment. Suppose, for example, that one statute in New York should punish the crime of forgery by imprisonment, another statute should be passed giving to another tribunal the power to punish the same offense by fine; still the punishments, although different, would be for the same offense, clearly in violation of constitutional right.

My conclusion from the foregoing considerations is that the sole purpose of impeachment under our Constitution is the removal of offenders from office, and that, as William W. Belknap was not in office when this proceeding was instituted by the House, the Senate has no jurisdiction whatever over his offenses, and that punishment under the Constitution is left entirely to the courts.

Opinion of Mr. Frelinghuysen,

Delivered May 15, 1876.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I will first call attention to a consideration which has been much pressed upon the Senate, but which is not involved in the question before us, namely: Whether an officer can resign after he is impeached and thus oust jurisdiction.

I will, secondly, consider the true question we are to decide, namely: Have we jurisdiction in this case?

I. The Senate is not called upon to decide whether the resignation of a civil officer after articles of impeachment have been presented against him ousts the jurisdiction of the Senate and deprives it of the power to try the impeachment. That case is not before us. William W. Belknap had resigned the office of Secretary of War, and his resignation had been duly accepted before the House of Representatives impeached him. The suggestion that, inasmuch as the resignation and the impeachment were made on the same day, the law will not take notice of the fact that the resignation was in point of time prior to the impeachment, because the law ignores fractions of days, is unsound. The law does observe fractions of days, whenever any right depends upon its doing so. The law never causes or suffers a citizen to suffer anything by a fiction. Abundant authority and examples to sustain this position could be adduced were it necessary.

But if the question was whether Belknap could have avoided the jurisdiction of the Senate by resigning his office after he had been impeached by the House, much might be said against such a claim. As that question is not before the Senate, I will give no opinion on it. Were it here, it might be argued thus:

It is essential to every investigation that there be some point of time to which the tribunal shall direct its inquiries as to the truth of the facts alleged. That point of time in civil actions is the service of the original process; in criminal proceedings it is the finding of the indictment; and in proceedings for the judgment of impeachment, it is the time of the impeachment by the House. If the action be to eject from lands, the abandoning or vacating the possession of the land after the process is served cannot be pleaded with effect in bar of the suit; but the suit proceeds to a judgment of eviction and for mesne profits and costs as if possession had been retained. If the action is for a nuisance, the judgment is that the nuisance be abated, even although the nuisance was removed immediately after the suit was commenced. If the judgment be for damages for neglecting some duty, such as the execution of an instrument, performance after the suit has been commenced cannot be pleaded with effect as a bar to the action. If the proceeding be by indictment, say against an accessory, the State cannot sustain its charge by proving that defendant, after indictment found, aided the principal to escape. That fact, at most, could only be proven as persuasive evidence of the substantive fact averred in the indictment. In no legal proceeding will any act of the defendant after the suit is commenced, even though it should be the performance of the very thing sought by the suit, be a bar to the action, unless it be accepted by the party who of right is enforcing the duty.

If the House of Representatives had the right to impeach when they presented their articles and thus commenced proceedings, the act of the respondent or of the President could not be pleaded as a bar to the proceeding. Neither can it be said, if the House had the right to impeach at the time they presented the articles, that it is absurd or incongruous that the judgment of removal from office, which under the Constitution must be pronounced on conviction, should be entered against one who, since the articles were so presented, has resigned the office. The right of the House to that judgment existed, if at all, when the proceedings were properly commenced, and all action of the respondent subsequent thereto is, in the eye of the law, in this, as in all like cases, ignored. The House stands before the Senate with all the rights that other suitors have before other courts. Every affirmative judgment in civil or criminal proceedings is a mere judicial declaration of the existence of the right of the actor in the suit to be sustained and assured in the claim made when the legal proceedings were commenced. Where, I ask, would be the incongruity of a judgment of the Senate were it customary to make up a judgment-roll which should in substance read thus:

"William W. Belknap having on the 2d of March, 1876, been impeached by the House of Representatives for high crimes, and the Senate having, on the demand of the House, proceeded to try the truth of the several articles of impeachment so presented, the Senate do, on this —— day of ——, 1876, adjudge that the said articles are sustained, and do pronounce as their judgment that the said William W. Belknap be removed from office, and that he be perpetually disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States."

There would be no incongruity between the judgment and the record, even though it appear that between the time the proceedings by the House were commenced and the rendition of the judgment William W. Belknap had resigned his office. He, by the hypothesis, was an officer when impeached by the House. The evidence had extended to that point of time and not beyond it. Was he, then, guilty had been the question throughout, and the judgment of the Senate in sustaining the claim of the House speaks as of the day the proceedings were commenced. Such a judgment would be no more incongruous than that of a court which, having ascertained that a defendant was in possession of lands when the ejectment was commenced, and that the right of possession was then in the plaintiff, pronounced a judgment that the plaintiff recover, notwithstanding the defendant may have pleaded that he had abandoned the possession. Such a judgment would be no more incongruous than a judgment of six cents and costs against a defendant who, having at the time suit was commenced made default in the execution of an instrument it was his duty to have executed, should make it appear that he did execute it the day after process was served.

It might, in fact, be claimed that the argument in favor of the right of the House to retain jurisdiction, notwithstanding a resignation after the impeachment proceedings were commenced, was much stronger than in the cases supposed. The right of the House is to retain jurisdiction to satisfy their double demand, to wit, that the officer be removed, and that he also be disqualified. It would be a strange ruling which should hold that when jurisdiction had vested by the proceedings being commenced while the official was in office, it was divested by his complying with only half of the demand of the actor in the proceedings, to wit, "removal from office," while the demand for "disqualification" is entirely unsatisfied and forever defeated, because the Constitution only authorizes a judgment of disqualification as an incident to, and as coupled with, a judgment of removal.

If the jurisdiction of the court depended on the parties, plaintiff and defendant, being residents of different States, the fact that the defendant the day after suit was commenced became a resident of the same State in which the plaintiff resided would not affect the jurisdiction. When the jurisdiction of a Federal court depends on the fact that one of several defendants resides in a different State from that in which the plaintiff resides, the death of that defendant does not oust the court of jurisdiction. When jurisdiction has attached, it continues to the end. Jurisdiction attaches, if at all, under and by reason of the circumstances that exist when the proceedings are commenced, and no subsequent act but such as extinguishes the claim or abates the suit can divest that jurisdiction And a judgment which is in harmony with the facts and conditions which exist at the time the proceedings are commenced cannot be called incongruous. Justice Story, who, as we shall see, holds that an officer cannot be impeached except while he is in office, gives no effect on the question of jurisdiction to his resignation after he is impeached. He says: "If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of the impeachment. (2 Story on the Constitution, § 801.) And by military law, while one who, by reason of his term of enlistment having expired, is entitled to his discharge from the service is not afterward subject to a court-martial, yet if proceedings are commenced against him before he is so entitled to his discharge they continue after his term of enlistment expires. (De Hart's Military Law, page 35.) I do not mean to say, however, that resignation of office or its termination by lapse of time while proceedings are pending may not, either upon a plea of puis darrein continuance or a mere suggestion on the record, be specially recited in the judgment so as to correspond with the facts of the case. This would not interfere with the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce the constitutional judgment of removal and disqualification. Nor do I mean to say that the judgment would relate to the time of impeachment to such an extent as to render void the official acts of the officer while proceedings for impeachment were pending. The actual removal from office is only effected by conviction and judgment.

But, as before said, on the question whether one who is impeached by the House while in office can divest the jurisdiction of the Senate by resignation it is not necessary to give an opinion, because that is not before us. It is clear that much is to be said when that case arises. Enough has been said to show that it is very different from the question whether the House can impeach and whether the Senate have jurisdiction over one who at the time of the impeachment had ceased to be a civil officer.

And in determining the true question before us we need not be influenced by the equivocal and undignified position the two branches of the legislative department of the Government would find themselves in if, after the presentation of articles, after a protracted trial, and after deliberate consultation, and when the Senate was just about to pronounce its judgment, the accused could thwart the whole proceedings by a summary resignation. This consideration, presented to our sense of judicial propriety so frequently and with so much address by the managers, does not belong to this case. When the question of the effect of a resignation made after impeachment arises it will be decided.

We have now to do with the effect of a resignation, not after, but before an impeachment by the House.

II. Has the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment jurisdiction to try a citizen whom the House of Representatives claim to have impeached, such impeachment by the House being made when he had ceased to be a civil officer.

The procedure by impeachment was imported into our Constitution from the common parliamentary law of England, but it was placed there clipped and pruned of very many of its baneful incidents. Impeachment, associated with bills of attainder and of pains and penalties and ex post facto laws, was made in Great Britain an instrument of political persecution and partisan aggrandizement. It was through those agencies that the grossest injustice was perpetrated in the name of law; that men of political power were destroyed; that families of influence were blotted out, and that their estates were confiscated to become a reward to those who persecuted those who owned them.

Bills of attainder, which term includes bills of pains and penalties (1 Story on the Constitution, § 1344; Cummings vs. State of Missouri, 4 Wallace 323) were sometimes directed against whole classes of people without naming the individuals. They were sentences pronounced by the legislative instead of the judicial branch of the government. They were often pronounced without evidence, on the surmise or on the clamor, as the old books term it, of the Commons. The investigation, if any, was in the absence of the accused, without his having counsel, and without any recognition of the rules of evidence. The punishment, which was often the deprivation of estate, of inheritable blood, and of life, was determined by no pre-existing law.

Ex post facto laws imposed punishments for acts which were innocent at the time they were performed, or greatly changed and increased the punishments after the act punished was done.

Impeachments extended to other than officers of the government and to acts that no law had declared criminal. And without counsel, witnesses, or jury, a mere majority of the Lords often pronounced the judgment of banishment and often of death against the accused.

Justice Miller, in speaking of the manner in which the framers of the Constitution regarded bills of attainder and of pains and penalties and ex post facto laws, says:

> It is no cause of wonder that men who had just passed successfully through a desperate struggle in behalf of civil liberty should feel a detestation for legislation of which these are the prominent features. (Ex parte Garland, 4 Wallace, page 388.)

And Justice Story, in speaking of the men who framed the Constitution and modified the English procedure by impeachment, says:

> History had sufficiently admonished them that the power of impeachment had been thus mischievously and inordinately applied in other ages; and it was not safe to disregard those lessons which it had left for our instruction written not unfrequently in blood. He then refers to cases where the final overthrow and capital execution of the accused was the result of political resentment. (Story on the Constitution, § 784.)

England had no written constitution, and Parliament was omnipotent; and each political party as it rose to power made use of this machinery of attainder, pains and penalties, ex post facto laws, and impeachments to oppress and weaken the rival party. The fathers of our Republic, familiar with the history of England, to escape these atrocities perpetrated in the name of law, determined that this nation should have a written constitution. They determined that the national Legislature should not be omnipotent, but that it should only possess delegated powers, reserving expressly to the States and to the people all other powers. So careful were they on this point that they even provided that the enumeration in the Constitution of the rights which belonged to the people should not be construed to deny or disparage such rights as were not enumerated in the Constitution.

As to these legalized agencies of tyranny, the framers of the Constitution provided, by article 1, section 9, that Congress should not, and by section 10, that the States should not, pass any bills of attainder, and this includes bills of pains and penalties. And as those provisions did not reach the judiciary, they provided, by article 3, section 3, that no attainder of treason should work a forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted. As to ex post facto laws, they prohibited their passage both to Congress and to the States.

And what did they provide as to the procedure by impeachment? They omitted to abolish or prohibit it, simply because that instrumentality was indispensable to a well-organized government. A President might be convicted of manslaughter, but that would not divest him of the presidential office. The Secretary of the Treasury might be sentenced for the crime of bribery, but he might still remain Secretary of the Treasury. The sentence of a judicial tribunal would not necessarily deprive any civil officer of his office. It was not desirable that the political power of removing from office should be given to the judiciary. Therefore, just as the House and the Senate were by the Constitution possessed with the right by a two-thirds vote to expel any member, so any civil officer, under greater restrictions than those incident to the expulsion of members of Congress, might, on impeachment, by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, be removed from office. It is clear that but for this necessity the procedure by impeachment would never have been found in the Constitution.

The framers of the Constitution, however, in placing even the limited powers of impeachment in the Constitution were careful to divest it of its historic powers for oppression and tyranny. Let us be careful not to destroy the guards our fathers placed around this power.

They first provided that the House of Representatives should have the sole power of impeachment. It is provided that the House alone shall have the sole power to impeach, because there are cases where the Commons and the Lords joined in the impeachment and then the Lords tried the articles. (Selden's Judicature of Parliament, page 38.) So gross an outrage on justice as that of making the accuser and the judge identical it was determined to forbid by the provision that the House should have the sole power to impeach. And it is strange indeed that these words, inserted for so plain and salutary a purpose, should have been, as they have been, wrested from their purpose and are claimed to have the effect of importing into the Constitution the whole common parliamentary law of Great Britain relative to impeachment, and that by force of this provision persons not civil officers are subject to impeachment by the House, and that the Senate are to try those whom the House may impeach, and that this impeachment extends to military as well as civil officers, and to the citizen as well as to the officer.

If any one considers these words so pregnant with meaning his opinion will probably be reversed as we proceed very briefly to consider the provisions of the Constitution.

They also provided that the Senate should have the sole power to try impeachments. This provision was inserted for a like reason as the former. Bills of attainder and pains and penalties, which were legislative conviction, were the work of both Houses of Parliament. And there are cases where the house had even assumed to convict on impeachment. And it was intended that it should be clearly understood that the Senate alone, in a judicial and not legislative capacity, was to try the charges which the House alone could make.

In England every description of person of both sexes was subject to impeachment. As the object in retaining the procedure in the Constitution was the removal from office, the Constitution restricted impeachment in its exercise to the President, the Vice-President, and all civil officers "of the United States." I say restricted the power to those named, because, as the powers of the Constitution are delegated and limited, they can extend no further than is expressed. Unless the provision of the Constitution which declares that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment" imports into the Constitution the entire power of impeachment as it existed under the common parliamentary law of England, it is certainly true that the fourth section of the second article, providing that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, has the same significance as if it stated that no one, excepting the President, Vice-President, and all other civil officers of the United States, shall be liable to impeachment. A person who has duly resigned his civil office before any jurisdiction in impeachment has attached is no more a civil officer than he was before he entered upon the office.

The purpose of the framers of the Constitution was specifically to define who should be subject to impeachment, so as, in view of the scope of impeachment in England, to exclude those they intended should not be so subject. Had they intended to subject to impeachment not only those in office but the larger number of those who ever have been, they would have said so. At all events it is true, according to the established rule of construing a penal provision, that it must be so said before we can by any authority hold that an unmentioned class are subject criminally. Persons not in civil office are not civil officers, and so do not come within the descriptio personæ of the Constitution.

In harmony with the provision that only persons in office at the time they are impeached are liable to impeachment is the mandatory provision of the Constitution that the President and Vice-President and all civil officers shall, on impeachment and conviction of the crimes named, be removed from office.

Nothing can be more incongruous than that a person who is in no office at the time the House impeaches, which is the time to which the judgment must relate, and when the jurisdiction attaches, should be subject to a judgment that he be removed from office.

In still further harmony with the provision that only those in office can be impeached is the provision that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. This provision is introduced in view of the past history of impeachment, where forfeiture, banishment, and death were not unfrequently imposed. The provisions of the Constitution relative to the judgment that may be rendered, taken together, amount to this: The judgment shall be removal from office or removal from office and disqualification.

The judgment of disqualification cannot be severed from that of removal any more than a judge can pronounce as a sentence a less penalty than the minimum prescribed. So both the judgment for removal and the judgment of disqualification require that the person proceeded against be in office when the impeachment is made by the House, to which point of time the judgment relates.

I do not see how the Constitution could more plainly have stated that it intended to circumscribe the ancient procedure by impeachment and intended that under our system it should be restricted to those in office when impeached than by saying in effect, first, that it should be restricted to the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers, (for that is what it does say, inasmuch as those words are found in a constitution of delegated powers,) and by secondly saying that the judgment in impeachment shall be removal from office or removal from office and disqualification.

Again, if impeachment is applicable to those not in office, it must be so applicable as a means of imposing punishment for offenses committed while in office.

But this cannot be so, because the exclusive province of impeachment, as found in our Constitution, is the protection of civil office from vicious men. The judgment must be removal, and, as an incident thereto, may be disqualification. The object of impeachment is in no legal sense punishment. Removal from office and disqualification inflict mortification and suffering; but this is in no true sense punishment; it is rather an incident to than the object of the judgment. The pains thus inflicted are always less severe the more abandoned and vicious is the subject of it, and this is the reverse of the rule upon which punishment is imposed.

The greatest abuse of this procedure in England arose from making punishment the end of impeachment; and hence it is that the Constitution contains the prohibition against any further judgment than removal and disqualification, and, to show that punishment is not the object of the Constitution in that connection, it immediately adds:

> But the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

To claim that the object of impeachment is punishment is to claim that the Constitution is inconsistent with itself.

If disqualification is a punishment, it is an infamous punishment; and, if so, the offense for which it is imposed is infamous; for the character of the punishment is always held to classify the crime. But the Constitution provides (article 5) that no person shall be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentation or indictment of a grand jury. Here is no such indictment, and yet there is, in fact, no inconsistency in the Constitution, because this procedure is not to punish crime; it is to protect the civil offices of the nation. It makes other provision for the punishment of crime, so as not to be misunderstood.

Again, it is contrary to natural justice and to the expressed spirit, if not letter, of the Constitution, and contrary to the common law, that one should be twice punished for the same offense, because the law in each case demands full expiation; but here it is claimed that one is to be punished by the Senate, and then, by the express provision of the Constitution, is to be fully punished in the courts. We impose no punishments; we simply protect the offices of the Republic from bad men.

Again, the Constitution provides that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have a trial by jury, and shall have such trial in the district where the crime was committed. If the proceeding by impeachment is for punishment, it is for the punishment of a crime, and hence comes within the provision of the Constitution which extends to "all criminal prosecutions," and the accused would be entitled to a jury, which is denied him.

There are two criminals before us convicted on impeachments: one is convicted of a treason that has shaken the pillars of the Republic and decimated the land by death; the other is a poor postmaster, who under temptation has appropriated a few stamps; and we are to impose the punishment, and we sentence each to removal from office and disqualification. The claim that our judgment is in any legal sense punishment seems to me an absurdity.

But if the object of the procedure by impeachment is not punishment, what is it that gives us jurisdiction over one out of office? It is not to remove from office, for that is an impossibility. It is not to pronounce a judgment of disqualification, for that the Constitution tells us only extends to one who is a civil officer, and also tells us that the judgment of disqualification must be coupled with a judgment of removal. We have no more authority to pronounce a separate judgment of disqualification than would a judge have to impose a penalty of only $50 for larceny when the statute said the penalty should be twenty days' imprisonment and $50 fine.

No express provision can be found in the Constitution extending impeachment by the House to those who are not, but have been, civil officers, unless, as before stated, the provision that the House shall have the sole power of impeachment imports the whole English system with all its atrocities into our Government. Not only so, but the express provisions of a Constitution conferring limited powers negative such a claim.

If impeachment can be extended to those who have been in office it must be by implication, by inference, and because incident to some power that is conferred and because of its marked propriety.

Can any one believe that the framers of the Constitution, with the history of impeachment and its associate legal instrumentalities before their minds, while they were providing against its being used as an instrument of tyranny by carefully restricting the penalty, when they knew it had been used as a means of political oppression—can any believe that it was their intention, or, more properly, that it is the true intent of the Constitution, when it does not so declare, that impeachments may be resorted to by the successful political party to disable the party defeated from rallying for another contest; that it was intended to place in the Constitution an instrumentality by means of which a popular leader, who perhaps alone could rally the party out of power, could be destroyed; that it is the intent of the Constitution that when the archives have passed into the custody of political opponents, papers misplaced, lost, or intentionally suppressed, that then one who had been honored by the people, had laid down his office without any charge against him, that then he should be called upon, away from his district, without jury, no matter what the lapse of time, to answer a charge the penalty of which is perpetual infamy? My regard for the interests of this nation's future, as well as my sense of justice, were I at liberty, in the absence of any such provision, to have any judgment on the subject, would revolt at any such conclusion.

But it may be said that if an officer cannot be impeached after he is out of office the guilty officer will defeat the provision of the Constitution by resigning when he finds he is about to be impeached; that he may then be elected again; and so a vicious officer hold place.

I answer that if he resigns, removal, the main object of impeachment, is effected.

He is not likely to be elected again; the interests of the nation are safe with the people and with that public sentiment which they create. But, besides, a remedy for this objection can readily be provided by statute by adding the penalty of disqualification to hold office on any one who shall be convicted of crime while in or which relates to any civil office. We have now such a penalty on our statutes as to some crimes.

The provisions of the Constitution on this subject are very few and plain, and may be thus stated:

The Constitution provides—

First. Who may impeach, namely, the House only.

Second. Who may try, namely, the Senate only.

Third. For what impeachment may be presented, namely, for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Fourth. What shall be the judgment, namely, removal from office or removal from office and disqualification.

Fifth. Who may be impeached, namely, the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States.

In the light of these express provisions it is strange that any one should claim that the provision that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment" has the effect of importing the entire English system of impeachment, and that consequently one need not be in office to be subject to the proceeding.

We have been referred to a few authorities on this subject. Rawle, in his work on the Constitution, says, "It is obvious that impeachment extends only to those in office or to those who have been;" and this is claimed to be an authority in favor of the right to impeach one who has ceased to be an officer. I do not so understand it. Mr. Rawle directly negatives the idea that the impeachment procedure of Great Britain has any place in our Constitution, by saying it is restricted to those who are or who have been in office. Again, he is stating a limitation, and says in the alternate that it is obvious that the power of impeachment extends "only to those in office or to those who have been." That few will question.

The Blount case has been referred to. It is this: It appears that Blount was a Senator and had been expelled. His counsel pleaded: 1. That senatorship was not an office. 2. That he was no longer a Senator. It was decided that the Senate had not jurisdiction. Will any one claim that, if the common parliamentary law of England had been introduced into our Constitution by its provision that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment," the Senate would not have had jurisdiction over Mr. Blount's case? It would unquestionably have had jurisdiction.

Barnard's case has been referred to. He was in a civil office when impeached; the judgment of removal was the very judgment that was needed; and the fact that his offense was committed during a prior term separated from its then existing term only by an imaginary point of time does not affect the question. There is no provision of the Constitution that I know of that would prevent a civil officer from being impeached while in office for a crime committed before he became such officer.

Kent, in his Commentaries, (volume 1, pages 238 and 289,) treats impeachment simply as a procedure for the removal of civil officers who have been guilty of crime.

The convention that formed the present constitution of New Jersey had submitted to it by its committee provisions relative to impeachment identical with those of the Constitution of the United States. On motion of Chief Justice Hornblower, that convention composed of distinguished jurists extended the liability of civil officers for two years after the expiration of their term, thereby showing that in their opinion the liability to impeachment under the Federal Constitution was only while in office.

Nearly ninety years have passed since the adoption of our Constitution, and it does not appear that the procedure by impeachment has in any State of the Union or under the Federal Government been invoked against any one who was not in office.

Proceedings in impeachment in the States and under the General Government have been commenced and have uniformly been discontinued on the resignation of the accused.

Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, gives the most thorough dissertation on the subject of impeachment that is anywhere to be found. There is scarcely an authority that he does not refer to or a view that he does not consider. The question we have before us not having been adjudicated, he expresses himself with his usual deference; but no one can read the eight hundred and first section of the second volume of his Commentaries and doubt that the great jurist was clearly of opinion that one could not be impeached except while in office. He says:

> As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution that "judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States," and in another clause that "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," it would seem to follow that the Senate were bound on the conviction in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of the impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary courts of justice.
> And it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the state against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity.

My opinion is that the Senate has no jurisdiction to try William W. Belknap.

Opinion of Mr. Sherman,

Delivered May 15, 1876.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question of jurisdiction presented in this cause depends upon the following clauses of the Constitution:

First—

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 1, section 2, paragraph 2.)

Second—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. (Article 1, section 3, paragraph 6.)

Third—

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Article 2, section 4.)

Other clauses of the Constitution limit the degree of punishment to removal from and disqualification to hold and enjoy office under the United States, forbid pardons for impeachment, and reserve to the courts the power to try the party convicted by indictment, according to law.

The first two clauses confer, in as full and complete a manner as human language provides, upon the House the power of impeachment and upon the Senate the power to try impeachments.

These are the only clauses in the Constitution that confer jurisdiction in cases of impeachment. They are in the ordinary form in which powers are conferred upon the different departments of the Government, whether legislative, executive, or judicial.

Thus the Constitution declares that "the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." This is the general grant of power upon which our whole system of taxation rests. It is limited by other clauses of the Constitution as "that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State," and that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives;" still we rest upon the general power already quoted for the great system of taxation which supports our Government and the public credit.

In the absence of other clauses no one could question the power of the House to impeach or the power of the Senate to try, and the only limitation upon these powers would be drawn from the legal meaning of the word "impeachment." The framers of the Constitution spoke in the legal language of the English law-books, well known to them. The words used in the Constitution carry all the legal incidents and meaning that these words convey according to the established law of the colonies and the mother country, from which we derive our institutions; and in construing them we must give them full force and effect, except so far as they are qualified by other clauses.

It is, therefore, necessary, before considering qualifying clauses, to ascertain the precise meaning of the word "impeachment," when that mode of accusation and trial could be resorted to under the English law, upon whom it could operate, and then limit or enlarge the meaning of the word by other provisions of the Constitution.

Without entering into a detailed statement of the English law of impeachment, I assume that the argument and cases cited clearly establish the following propositions:

First. That no one can be impeached except for official misconduct or misconduct of an officer. "The jurisdiction is to be exercised over offenses which are committed by public men in violation of their public trust and duties." (Story on the Constitution.)

The cases do not sustain the broad assertion by May in Parliament, that "all persons may be impeached for any crimes whatever," for the power was only exercised by Parliament to punish offenses by persons in official trust. It is designed as a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men.

Second. That the king alone is excepted from impeachment. The king cannot be impeached, though others who advise or aid him can be. Only by revolution can the king be removed from office. It was a revolution that deposed and executed Charles I and a revolution drove James II from his kingdom.

Third. Persons not in office may be impeached for official misconduct while in office. The cases cited in the argument conclusively show that such has been the unquestioned practice in Parliament.

The inquiry now is how far the Constitution of the United States qualifies or limits these general propositions of the English law of impeachment.

The fourth section of article 2, already quoted, changes the law of impeachment in several particulars. By clear implication it limits the power of impeachment to "the President, the Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States," and thus excludes all officers of the Army and Navy, who are to be tried by rules and articles of war authorized by the Constitution. The designation of "all civil officers of the United States" includes not only executive but judicial officers, and would only except from the law of impeachment officers of the Army and Navy.

As by the English law the king, the head of the executive authority of the English government, could not be impeached, it might be inferred that the President, the head of executive authority in this Government, could not be impeached without some other provision extending the limit of parliamentary impeachment. It is apparent from the debates in the convention that this question was the chief one in dispute, and that it was settled that the President ought to be subject to impeachment. Therefore the fourth section of article 2 provides expressly that the President and Vice-President shall be removed from office on impeachment, thus extending the power of impeachment to the chief executive officer, not subject to impeachment by the English law.

So far the meaning of this section is clear enough, as it expressly includes the President and Vice President among those who may be impeached, and by clear implication excludes officers of the Army and Navy from trial by impeachment; but it does not in express terms limit the power of impeachment to civil officers while in office. Is the general law of impeachment changed in this respect by this section? If it is, then the judgment of impeachment can be defeated by resignation, and impeachment itself becomes a mere mode of removing an obnoxious officer. Is the term "civil officer" descriptive of the person at the time the offense was committed or must it apply continuously to the time when he is impeached, tried, convicted, and sentenced? The defendant claims, in support of the latter proposition, that, as the judgment, in cases of conviction, must be "removal from office," this necessarily implies that he must be in office at the time of trial and judgment. To this it is replied that the jurisdiction of the Senate is amply conferred by previous clauses; that the fourth section does not limit impeachment to civil officers while in office; that it does not confer jurisdiction, but only makes removal mandatory when civil officers are convicted; that this is not inconsistent with the full power of impeachment conferred by other clauses, whether the "civil officer" was in or out of office when the trial took place. We must construe these clauses together, giving to each full effect as qualified by the others, remembering that no word is used in the Constitution that has not its carefully chosen office and meaning.

The designation "all civil officers" as the persons to be impeached has full effect in excluding a large class of the officers subject to impeachment under the parliamentary law. The object of their exclusion is obvious enough, as the power of Congress to make rules and articles of war furnished the means of punishing such officers in a much more summary and proper way than by impeachment. The primary object of impeachment, which the framers of the Constitution clearly intended to preserve, was to secure the punishment of great offenders for official misconduct. They had extended this process of trial and punishment to the President, the chief executive officer of the United States. They had provided not only for his removal, but for his perpetual exclusion from office. They were familiar with the English precedents which extended this process to all official offenders whether in office or out of office, but made no exception of civil officers who had resigned. They knew the abuses of this great power of impeachment and carefully limited the extent of the punishment. They knew the effect of party heat, and therefore required a vote of two-thirds of the Senate to convict. They knew that persons had been convicted upon insignificant charges, and therefore required the offenses charged to be high crimes and misdemeanors. The debates in the convention show that impeachment was regarded by the framers of the Constitution as a great safeguard to be maintained and preserved, and they conferred it in broad and general language and then sought by qualifications to prevent its abuses. It was not asserted, either in the Convention or in Parliament, that the power to punish by impeachment official misconduct by a person who had resigned his office was an abuse to be guarded against; that a private person could thus be wrongly oppressed or disfranchised. There is no appearance of injustice in the English precedents of impeachment after resignation. The danger of such injustice was not pointed out and no words were either proposed or adopted to confine impeachment to civil officers while in office. All civil officers may be impeached. The time when is not stated, whether before or after resignation, nor was it material by the law of impeachment. The material thing was that the offense must be by a civil officer; that it must be a high crime or misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, that he shall be removed and may be forever disabled from holding an office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. I therefore must hold that the term "civil officer" is used to designate the character of the office held by the accused when the offense was committed, and not to require that he hold the office either at the time of his impeachment or at the time of the trial. The use of this term was not to repeal the established parliamentary law, that the offender should not escape impeachment by resignation, but only to exclude from impeachment officers of the Army and Navy, who could be tried by the Rules and Articles of War upon principles of military honor more exacting than those of civil law. Upon the most careful examination I must conclude that the resignation of the defendant does not affect the jurisdiction of the Senate to try this impeachment. We are neither to assert jurisdiction without clear authority given by the Constitution nor to evade it or surrender it when by our deliberate judgment it is conferred.

The construction I have given to the words "civil officers" in the Constitution is supported by the plain and obvious intent of the word "officers" used in the statutes of the United States punishing the crime of bribery. The Revised Statutes embody the general law against bribery in the language used in all the statutes on that subject. Section 5501 provides that—

Every officer of the United States and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official capacity, under or by virtue of the authority of any Department or officer of the Government thereof, * * * who asks, accepts, or receives any money * * * shall be punished. * * *

Section 5502 provides—

Every member, officer, or person convicted under the provisions of the two preceding sections, who holds any office of profit or trust, shall forfeit his office or place, and shall thereafter be forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Section 5500 provides for cases of bribery of members of Congress.

The law thus provides for the indictment and punishment of members of Congress, officers of the United States, and persons other than officers who hold positions under the Government, that, upon conviction, any such person described as a member, officer, or employé, shall be imprisoned and forfeit his office or place, and be forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. Can it be possible that the resignation of an officer before his indictment under this law can defeat his indictment because he was not an "officer" when indicted or because the judgment of removal from office could not operate in his case? Such a strict construction would hardly be applied by a court to even a criminal law. And yet this is the same construction that would limit the jurisdiction of the Senate to the impeachment of "officers" in office not only when the offense was committed but also continuously through impeachment, trial, and punishment. So strict a construction of the Constitution would cripple all its great powers and leave it a helpless wreck against treason and corruption.

With no desire to enlarge the powers of the Senate I cannot so limit the power of the House to impeach or the power of the Senate to try impeachments.

In considering this question I have not overlooked the danger that may arise in high party times when a reckless majority may by abusing the power of impeachment seek to exclude from high office the most worthy private citizen for old offenses committed when in office. This argument applies as well to all the great and necessary powers of the Government—the power to declare war; to make treaties; to pardon crimes; even the judicial powers may be abused; but still all these powers are essential to the existence of Government. The power of impeachment has been carefully limited by the Constitution in the same mode as other powers that may be abused—as to the power of the Senate to make treaties or the power of either House to expel a member, each of which can only be exercised when two-thirds of the body concur. Other safe-guards have been thrown around the power of impeachment: the nature of the offense is defined, the officers to be affected are described, and the punishment is limited. These safeguards only indicate that if it had been the purpose to further limit impeachment to civil officers while in office it would have been clearly expressed. The precedents of impeachment of persons not in office for offenses committed while in office were well known, and if this had been considered an abuse to be guarded against it would have been done in the same clear manner that the Constitution guards against excessive punishment in cases of impeachment. It is even now in this debate a well-balanced question whether, if we were making a new Constitution, and not construing one, it is not more dangerous to the public to allow an officer to escape impeachment by resigning than it is dangerous to the private citizen to leave him subject to impeachment for alleged high crimes or misdemeanors when in office. Argument drawn from the possibility of the abuse of power can have but little weight in the construction of a written Constitution of express powers; and in this cause such arguments have been greatly exaggerated. Nearly a century has passed away and the plainly expressed power to impeach all civil officers has been rarely exercised. It is not likely that the power to impeach persons not in office, for official misconduct when in office, will often be invoked, and only in extreme cases and when the offender flees from justice by resignation. It may then be the only means of arraignment, exposure, and punishment. The public safety may depend upon its exercise. It has been often said that if this remedy exists it must exist until the grave covers the offender; that there can be no statute of limitations against it. If this be true, it is equally true of civil claims or judgments in favor of the United States. But the limitation of civil suits, judgments, taxes, and duties, as well as of all remedies, is a part of the law-making power. Congress may by law limit the time within which all processes or remedies, whether in the Departments, the judicial courts, or in this high court of impeachment, may be presented. There is no remedy that cannot be limited by a statute of repose. Although the House of Representatives has the sole power of impeachment and the Senate can alone try an impeachment, yet Congress has the power to make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or office thereof.

Under this power statutes of limitation are passed which deprive a citizen of his property without "due process of law," but only by the lapse of time. All rights must be enforced by appropriate remedies within a reasonable time, to be fixed by law, or they are forfeited. The power and jurisdiction of all courts are subject to a qualified limitation by statutes which the courts are bound to respect and enforce, and I see no reason why this principle does not apply as well to the House of Representatives when an accuser and to the Senator when a court as to the ordinary tribunals of civil and criminal justice. If so, this danger of perpetual accusation against a civil officer by impeachment may be guarded against and regulated by law as in ordinary cases of crime or misdemeanor.

But, in the view I have taken of this case, I do not rest upon a comparison of the danger that may flow from asserting or refusing jurisdiction; nor am I at liberty to decide it by the Constitution as I think it ought to be, but only by the Constitution as it is; and upon this basis my conviction is clear that the jurisdiction of the Senate to try this case was not affected by the resignation of the defendant.

Opinion of Mr. Sargent,

Delivered May 15, 1876.

Mr. SARGENT. In the few words that I shall say I propose to give rather my conclusions than the processes of reasoning by which I have arrived at them. I think the jurisdiction of the Senate exists in this case because—

First. The Constitution plainly provides that in cases of high crimes and misdemeanors in office the House shall have the power to impeach and the Senate the power to try offenders.

Second. The jurisdiction inures at the very moment the crimes are committed, whether the House impeaches or not; and the power to impeach and try then exists and continues until completely exercised.

Third. The Constitution fixes no limitation of time during which the power of impeachment may be exercised and at which it shall terminate; and, unless such limitation is affirmatively stated in that instrument or necessarily implied, it cannot be assumed.

Fourth. So far from the Constitution implying any limitation of time, the provision denying pardon to persons removed or disqualified implies the reverse; for no lapse of time, penitence of the criminal, or subsequent exemplary life is potent to secure for him rehabilitation. The reason of the rule is as potent to subject the offender to a trial which will result in disqualification, obviously deemed important to the public safety by the authors of the Constitution.

Fifth. It is assuming a limitation of time at which the power of impeachment shall terminate to hold that the resignation of his office by a high criminal or the expiration of his term defeats the power and ousts the jurisdiction of impeachment.

Sixth. The object of impeachment is the protection of the Government and people, and this object is secured by providing two consequences to follow conviction, namely, removal from office and future disqualification, the latter in the discretion of the Senate.

Seventh. The power to sentence to disqualification to hold office was granted because its exercise may be as necessary to the public safety as removal from office; and it would be difficult to conceive a case where a person would be found guilty of crimes that would, in the judgment of the Senate, be cause for his removal, where the Senate would fail to further sentence him to disqualification.

Eighth. A sentence to disqualification is a humiliating badge affixed to high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and operates for the public safety not only by the exclusion of the criminal from office but as a warning and example to all public officers, tending to purity in office.

Ninth. The power is as much conferred by the Constitution to sentence to disqualification as to removal. If the jurisdiction to impeach inures at the very moment the crimes are committed, it must continue until acquittal or until the power of the court is exhausted, including the power to sentence to disqualification, unless the Senate shall omit disqualification, in its discretion, from its judgment.

Tenth. Congress may have power to enact a statute of limitations on impeachments, recognizing for that purpose the principles on which such statutes are upheld, that they are statutes of repose, going to the remedy and not to the right; but it has not done so.

Eleventh. The words "civil officers" used in the Constitution, designating persons liable to impeachment, were intended to establish a distinction between those who have assumed civil office in the General Government and military and naval officers, as also those of the people never in office, who might be held liable to impeachment without careful exclusion.

Twelfth. The body of the people was excluded from the process of impeachment by apt language because the practice in the English Parliament had given some color to the idea that any subject might be impeached. But the President and Vice-President were included in the number liable to impeachment because that practice had excluded the king from such process.

Thirteenth. The cumbrous machinery of impeachment is not likely to be set in motion for light causes or be unjustly used by an incoming party as a mode of assault on their retiring adversaries. The good sense and rectitude of the people would rebuke such use of this tribunal. Congress has provided other means for the trial of minor offenders, to which they are properly remitted, and the Senate will judge for itself what are high crimes and misdemeanors. But, if this abuse is an inseparable incident to this process, the remedy is in an amendment to the Constitution.

Fourteenth. The allegations of the articles of impeachment, taken as confessed for the purpose of this plea to the jurisdiction, are that the late Secretary of War was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in that office. In my view, his resignation does not oust our jurisdiction to try this impeachment, and, if he is found guilty, to sentence him to disqualification from office.

Opinion of Mr. Edmunds,

Delivered May 16 and 17, 1876.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President: The provisions of the Constitution on this subject, brought together in their order, are as follows:

The House of Representatives shall * * * have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 1, section 2, last clause.)

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. (Article 1, section 3, sixth clause.)

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law. (Article 1, section 3, seventh clause.)

The President shall * * * have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Article 2, section 2, first clause.)

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Article 2, section 4.)

Looking to the language of the Constitution alone, and applying to it the ordinary rules of construction and common sense, I have no difficulty in holding that the right of the House of Representatives to impeach and of the Senate to try a person for high crimes committed in office, does not depend upon the circumstance of holding office at the moment of the impeachment, and, so, is not lost by the fact that the accused party had ceased to hold office before the proceedings began.

It seems to me demonstrable that the grants of the power of impeachment to the House and of the power to the Senate to try are, unless limited or restrained by the fourth section of article 2, complete and unlimited, otherwise than by the import and scope of the term "impeachment," as it was at that time defined and understood. The range of the judgment, which otherwise might have been even death, is limited, but the jurisdiction over the subject and the accused is not.

Leaving out of view, then, for the present, the fourth section of article 2, the question is, what is impeachment? I understand it to be, both in its legal and historical sense, the accusation and prosecution of a person for treason, or other crimes and misdemeanors, affecting the administration of public affairs. (Jacobs's Law Dictionary, title Impeachment; 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, 259; Comyn's Digest, title Parliament.)

It was not, so far as I know, even suspected at the time of framing our Constitution that by the existing definition or practice of impeachment the accused must possess the particular quality of being an office-holder at the time of accusation or trial. The import of the term was not then subject either to doubt or dispute. Its scope, at least as including all high official crimes, was also settled and well known. It had never been asserted, so far as I know, that it did not apply to ex-officials equally with those in office at the moment of presentation. It follows that, if the word was to have any definite meaning and scope in the Constitution, it must have been used in the sense in which before that time it had been known and used. (United States vs. Wilson, 7 Peters, page 150; McCool vs. Smith, 1 Black, page 459.)

To hold otherwise would be to cast doubt and uncertainty upon many other parts of the Constitution. The subjects of jury trial, pardon, habeas corpus, admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, attainder, piracy, and many others, are instances. The Constitution is not an instrument of definitions; it is an instrument of grants and declarations. The only definition in it is that of treason.

The words of the third section of article 1 are not only general as to description of the jurisdiction, but they refer to the accused as a person. They declare that—

When the President is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

The plain meaning of these words to my mind is, that the accused is to be tried in his personal character, and that when he happens to hold the office of President, and is on trial, the Chief Justice shall preside. It does not follow because the President may be impeached and tried while in office that he cannot be afterward.

It has been contended that the clause concerning the judgment in impeachment cases shows that the accused must be in office when impeached and when sentenced. This proposition cannot, I think, be maintained. The clause does not speak of jurisdiction, either in respect of the offense or the offender; but it merely regulates by limitation of extent, the consequences to follow from the exercise of a jurisdiction already granted. It declares simply that the judgment shall not extend further than two things—removal from office and disqualification. The range of the action of the tribunal, after it has found the offender and tried and convicted him, is circumscribed by boundaries. Within these boundaries it may do both or only one of the things allowed, or still less than the extent of either, as by censure or suspension; but the fourth section, hereafter to be considered, requires one of them to be done, if the person convicted happens to be within the category described at the time of judgment.

The two things, removal and disqualification, are not inseparable and to be taken in solido. We are not to go further than both. The clause is negative, and a prohibition against doing more than two things cannot be turned into a command to do both or neither. In the negative form of the clause the use of the conjunction and was indispensable. Had or been used, we should have been prevented from applying more than one of the remedies in any case. Hence it follows that no inference can be raised from these words that the person impeached must be an officer at the time of impeachment. I should myself, indeed, have no hesitation in holding that a person out of office could be impeached for a high crime committed in it if the language of the Constitution had been affirmative, like this: "All civil officers of the United States shall be liable to impeachment for treason," &c. In all such cases the jurisdiction attaches on the commission of the offense, and it attaches to the offense and the person committing it. No difficulty arises from the use of the word office or officer. An office is a function, and an officer is a person performing it. When, therefore, the law provides for dealing with an officer who misconducts himself, all rights and responsibilities are fixed at the moment of the act, and his ceasing to hold office is not of any consequence except as making one part of the judgment unnecessary. It is the individual who has committed the offense while holding a particular relation to a public trust, and it is the individual and not the relation that is to be brought to trial and dealt with for it. The circumstance that one of the duties of the tribunal will be to remove him if it finds him still holding on to a place he has dishonored must not be confounded with the amenability to prosecution, trial, and judgment in his personal character. It is in that character indeed that he is removed from office, which is merely the separation of the individual from the performance of the trust he has betrayed.

There are numerous instances of laws framed on the obvious principle and distinction before stated, under which it is not known that it was ever hinted that the jurisdiction failed because the party had left office, and so a part of the sentence would be unnecessary. The following are a few of them:

By 5 and 6 Edward VI, chapter 16, it is provided that any persons holding office selling appointments under them "shall not only lose and forfeit" their "office," but "shall be adjudged a disabled person to have, occupy, or enjoy the said office."

By 8 George I, chapter 24, section 8, it is enacted that if any "officer of any of His Majesty's ships or vessels of war" shall receive on board merchandise for purposes of trade, every such "officer" shall, upon being convicted thereof by a court-martial, "lose and forfeit his command and office, and shall be forever afterward incapable to hold office, and forfeit all wages due to him."

By Section 5408 Revised Statutes, it is declared that "every officer having the custody of any record," &c., who shall "destroy it, &c., shall pay a fine, and shall moreover forfeit his office and be forever disqualified," &c.

By Section 5444 Revised Statutes, it is provided that every "officer" of the revenue who admits dutiable goods without duty "shall be removed from office and fined," &c.

A case under martial law illustrates these views. The Constitution provides that every person shall be entitled to trial by jury, &c., "except in cases arising in the land and naval forces," or "in the militia when in actual service."

In the war of 1812 the President called for certain regiments of New York militia to enter actual service. One Martin, enrolled in the militia, refused to respond, and remained at home. After the war was over and the militia discharged, he was brought before a court-martial for the offense of refusing to serve. He was tried, condemned, and sentenced to pay a fine. He brought an action against the officer who collected the fine, and the case came to the Supreme Court. That court decided unanimously that, he having committed the offense while he belonged to the militia and when it had been called into actual service, the jurisdiction of the court-martial attached then, and did not depend upon the activity with which it should have been exercised, or the haste with which it should proceed, but that he was amenable to its jurisdiction after the war was over and the militia had been disbanded. (Martin vs. Mott, 12 Wheaton, 28.)

It may well be considered that the matter of removal of the person from office on impeachment is one of necessity or usefulness rather than of jurisdiction to try. The question does not arise until after conviction, and then if the person is not in office the judgment is not necessary, although perfectly regular if pronounced. In the latter case the act required has been performed in advance of the judgment, which could not make the judgment either irregular or erroneous, however vain it might be if it were the only judgment to be pronounced. It would seem to be a waste of time to refer to the instances that illustrate this.

It has been claimed in the argument on one side that, if the respondent was in office at the date of the commencement of proceedings, the jurisdiction then existing could not be defeated even if the Senate would have had no jurisdiction had he vacated the office before. I am unable to perceive the force of such a distinction. Jurisdiction is of two kinds only: first, of the subject-matter so-called in the books, that is, the offense, which in this case it is charged was the taking of bribes while the respondent was in office. This jurisdiction must exist, if it exist at all, at the time the offense was committed, and it cannot under any circumstances be created afterward. So existing, it cannot be lost in any other way than by an abrogation of the law upon which it is founded or by the abolition of the tribunal upon which the jurisdiction is conferred; neither the lapse of time nor the change of circumstances of the offender has any effect upon it whatever. If he has received a pardon or has been before acquitted or convicted of the same offense, or if the statute of limitations has run, the jurisdiction over the subject remains precisely what it was before, and these things are matters of defense, showing, not that the tribunal has no right to try, but that, having the power to try, it is upon such circumstances bound to pronounce judgment in favor of the respondent. But this elementary principle must be so obvious that I will not enlarge upon it.

The other branch of jurisdiction is what is called jurisdiction of the person. It always relates to the individual who is to be brought under the judgment of the tribunal. No matter how many places of trust he may hold or by how many titles he may be described, it is the man in his personal, and not his official, character who is to be confronted with the accusation and with the accuser. Even when the object of the prosecution is not punishment, but to compel the performance of an official act, the judgment of the court always is against the person, commanding him to exercise the office and duty the law has imposed upon him. This being the complete nature of jurisdiction, (and it was never, so far as I know, questioned,) the jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the offense described in the articles, if it ever existed, cannot have been lost by the change of circumstances of the respondent; or, if by possibility it could be lost by such change of circumstances, it must equally be lost when the change occurs after proceedings begun, as well as before. The proceedings themselves cannot create jurisdiction over the subject; they are only in exercise of the jurisdiction residing in the tribunal. But the jurisdiction over the person is first obtained by such exercise in the process of bringing him before the tribunal. And as the jurisdiction over the subject may be lost by abolishing the law creating the offense or abolishing the tribunal authorized to try it, so the jurisdiction over the person may be lost by his ceasing to exist, and in no other way. And at whatever stage in the proceedings this last event happens, the result is the same, subject in some cases, possibly, to the doctrine of relation.

I am, then, clearly of opinion that, viewing the provisions of the Constitution under the appropriate heads of the power of the House of Representatives and the Senate in respect of impeachments, the accused is subject to the jurisdiction of this tribunal, notwithstanding he may have been out office when the impeachment was begun.

But it is suggested that the second article of the Constitution, which relates to the executive power, contains in its fourth section a provision that raises the presumption that jurisdiction to prosecute and try an offender by impeachment is to be confined to cases in which the accused person persists, in spite of his detected crimes and in spite of the danger to the public service, in remaining in office until he is prosecuted, and (as I think it necessarily follows) until he is tried and convicted; for, as I have said, it seems impossible to hold that, if it be the person in his character of an officer who is impeached and that he is in his character of an officer only to be convicted and adjudged, the jurisdiction exists any longer than the official relation does. This section is in the following words:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It will be seen that it does not profess to confer any power, but it imposes a duty to be performed in a certain event. It is not placed in that article of the Constitution which alone grants all the other powers conferred either upon the Senate or House of Representatives, but under the appropriate head of executive powers and liabilities. It provides for the immediate dismissal of offenders in that Department when convicted on impeachment. Obviously that is all there is of it upon its face. Everything else that is to be got out of it must be through the medium of speculative dialectics. Had it been placed in the first article with the provisions upon the subject of impeachment and in the same order in which it now stands, it seems perfectly plain to me that not a cavil even could have been raised upon it in favor of the claim of the respondent. The provisions then would have stood:

First. The House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment."

Second. "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments."

Third. "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law." And "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers, shall be removed" on conviction, &c. So brought together, can the keenest criticism find any ground for claiming that this last clause was intended to impair any power granted in the prior ones, or that the circumstance of holding office at the moment of impeachment was to be made a test of the right to impeach or try anybody?

The fourth section does not declare who may or who may not be impeached, but that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers shall be removed on impeachment for and conviction of treason, &c. It does not hint at jurisdiction, but, on the other hand, it in terms declares what shall follow the exercise of a jurisdiction by conviction of a person holding office. In every other instance in the Constitution where power, authority, or jurisdiction is conferred, entirely different language is employed, clear and affirmative in its character: as in the passages before referred to, and in all grants of power to Congress or either of its Houses, in all grants of power to the Executive, and in the grant of judicial power; and it is amazing that if the framers of the Constitution had intended this section to be one of jurisdiction, and determinable at the will of the offender at that, it should have been left in its present form for policy and conjecture to discover it. It will be observed, too, that it makes no provision at all for disqualification; and if it be the jurisdictional provision, it completely measures the judgment as well as describes the offender and the offense, and it would be difficult to disqualify at all, as removal alone is mentioned; for, as the prior disqualifying clause is in the negative, that could not be resorted to to enlarge the jurisdiction under this section.

But it appears to me that, if this section could be treated as one of descriptive jurisdiction and made like the other jurisdiction clauses of the Constitution, to read affirmatively and specifically, that the House of Representatives shall have power to impeach and the Senate to try the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, and on conviction to remove and disqualify, it would still be clear that retirement from office would not affect the question; for, as has already been shown, if the power granted be to impeach and try the President, &c., for misconduct in office, it is a power to prosecute and try the person who while holding the office committed the offense, without regard to his character at the time the hand of the law is laid upon him. There is no conflict between this section and the provisions of article 1, nor is this a limitation upon them. On the contrary, it is an addition that in respect to persons holding office at the time of conviction, the judgment of removal, that otherwise would have been discretionary and might have been suspension for a limited time or censure, shall be pronounced. And in view of the negative form of the judgment clause in the first article, it might have been open to doubt in the convention whether the President and Vice-President whose terms of office were fixed at four years could be removed without an express provision.

From these considerations confined to the words of the Constitution, I am of the opinion that in order to give effect to all its provisions on the subject, and to carry out the intent of the instrument expressly stated, to provide not only for removal, but (in many instances more important still) for excluding from office citizens who should betray their official trusts, it must be held our jurisdiction is not defeated by the retirement of the offender from office. If, as is claimed, (but which I do not by any means admit,) the Constitution is to be construed in respect of its jurisdictions like a penal statute, the jurisdiction is, I think, still clear. The definition of the terms used was perfectly understood and the expressions employed must in every part be given their fair effect.

I will now proceed to the considerations bearing upon the question, extrinsic to the words of the Constitution, and in the light of which they may, I think, be justly viewed. The state of a subject at the time, the condition of the laws and practice, the mischief to be provided against, and the adequacy of the remedies to be applied, are all just subjects of consideration in seeking for the true construction of a constitution or a statute.

Under this head I refer—

First. To the state of the English law of impeachment at the time the Constitution was framed and adopted. By that law, from which American impeachment was taken, it was settled and universally known that an ex-official could be prosecuted by impeachment and tried for crimes committed in the office he had vacated. And this provision of the English law, instead of ever having been regarded or complained of as an abuse, was considered an essential security of the people, uncriticised by anybody. The case of Warren Hastings then proceeding, was an eminent instance of a prosecution of this character, notorious in every country where the English language was spoken or where English history was known. The chief and necessary object in such a prosecution was the security of the state against the possibility of the return to office of one who had flagrantly betrayed his trust. But in England a pardon granted after conviction and judgment on impeachment operated as any other case of pardon—to relieve the offender from all the effects of the judgment, and to restore to him his full political capacity. The case of Lord Chancellor Bacon was a well-known instance of this character. To guard against the abuse of this power of pardon, the framers of our Constitution carefully provided that there should be no pardon in any case of impeachment. The offender convicted and disqualified by the judgment of the ordinary courts of law could escape the consequences of his crime through the pardon of the executive, and by his favor be again put in charge of the public trust he had abused; but if disqualified by impeachment, the possibility of executive sympathy and favor was put entirely out of reach. It will be seen, too, on a careful consideration, that this exclusion of the power of pardon really has effect only in respect of disqualification, if granted after sentence, for I think it clear that without this exclusion a pardon after sentence of removal actually executed could not restore the offender to his office. Such an act would be nothing less than an executive appointment. But if in a case like the present, the guilty person can avoid all jurisdiction of impeachment by resignation, he is enabled to do for himself the very thing that Constitution says the executive shall not do for him,—that is, relieve himself from any possible disqualification again at the earliest moment, to lay hold of the administration of affairs with a fresh appetite for corruption. Was it not, then, the object of the framers of the Constitution to retain the remedy of impeachment in its full vigor, and to prevent, in the cases supposed, its being frustrated by any action of the Executive and much more by any action of the wicked official?

Second. The state of the law in the States at the time our Constitution was adopted.

Nine of the thirteen already had distinct provisions in their constitutions upon the subject, regarded, evidently, not as instruments of oppression or of danger to private rights, but as essential securities of public liberty and purity of administration.

That of Delaware (September 20, 1776) provided that—

> The president, when he is out of office and within eighteen months after, and all others offending against the State, either by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the Commonwealth may be endangered, within eighteen months after the offense committed, shall be impeachable by the house of Assembly before the legislative council. * * * If found guilty, he or they shall be either forever disabled to hold any office under the government, or removed from office pro tempore, or subjected to such pains and penalties as the law shall direct. And all officers shall be removed on conviction of misbehavior at common law, or on impeachment, or upon the address of the General Assembly. (Article 23, page 213.)

That of Massachusetts (March 2, 1780) provided that—

> The senate shall be a court, with full authority to hear and determine all impeachments made by the house of representatives against any officer or officers of the Commonwealth for misconduct or maladministration in their offices.
> Their judgment, however, shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold or enjoy any place of honor, trust, or profit under this Commonwealth; but the party so convicted shall be, nevertheless, liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to the laws of the land. (Chapter 1, section 2, article 8.)

That of New York (April 20, 1777) was as follows:

>
> A court shall be instituted for the trial of impeachments. (Article 32.)
> That the power of impeaching all officers of the State for mal and corrupt conduct in their respective offices be vested in the representatives of the people in assembly.
> No judgment of the said court shall be valid unless it be assented to by two-third parts of the members then present; nor shall it extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any place of honor, trust, or profit under this State. But the party so convicted shall be, nevertheless, liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to the laws of the land. (Article 33.)

That of New Jersey (July 2, 1776) had this provision:

> Provided always, that the said officers severally shall be capable of being re-appointed at the end of the terms severally before limited; and that any of the said officers shall be liable to be dismissed, when adjudged guilty of misbehavior, by the council on an impeachment of the assembly. (Article 12.)

It will be noticed that this is the only instance in which mere removal from office was the object to be attained.

That of Pennsylvania (July 15, 1776) declared;

> Every officer of State, whether judicial or executive, shall be liable to be impeached by the General Assembly, either when in office or after his resignation, or removal for maladministration. (Article 22.)

That of Virginia (July 5, 1776) provided that:

> The governor when he is out of office, and others offending against the State, either by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered, shall be impeachable by the house of delegates.
> If found guilty, he or they shall be either forever disabled to hold any office under government, or be removed from such office pro tempore, or subjected to such pains or penalties as the law shall direct. (Pages 287, 288, American Constitutions.)

That of North Carolina (December 18, 1776) declared that:

> The governor and other officers offending against the State by violating any part of this constitution, maladministration or corruption, may be prosecuted on impeachment of the General Assembly or presentment of the grand jury of any court of supreme jurisdiction in this State. (Article 23.)
> Governor and other officials offending. (Article 23.)

In this it will be observed that if the ex-official on the grounds insisted upon in this case could not be impeached, he could not be prosecuted in court; for the powers to impeach and to prosecute criminally were stated in exactly the same terms.

That of South Carolina (March 19, 1778) provided:

> That the power of impeaching all officers of the State for mal and corrupt conduct in their respective offices, not amenable to any other jurisdiction, be vested in the house of representatives. (Article 23.)

It will be seen that these constitutions, which must have been familiar to the members of the Federal convention, and which certain literal coincidences in respect of some of them show were actually in their hands, covered every aspect of the question, some, as Delaware and Virginia, withholding the power to impeach the chief magistrate until he should be out of office, and conferring it without distinction as to all others. One—New Jersey—providing this remedy only as a means of removal from office. Some, as Massachusetts and South Carolina, were formed in substance and almost literally like penal statutes, such as I have referred to, against official misconduct, and providing for disqualification as well as removal. Others, as New York, providing a tribunal with general power to try impeachments, and describing affirmatively the power of impeachment as against officers. One—Pennsylvania—providing for the impeachment of an officer "either when in office or after his resignation," using, as it will be seen, the same words of description for the person in office and out of it. Another, as North Carolina, describing the offender as an officer, and providing for his prosecution like the ordinary description of a penal statute.

With all these constitutions before them, and with the knowledge of the settled import and scope of the proceeding, and under the English law, it seems impossible to believe that the members of the Federal convention should not have in affirmative terms declared that no one should be impeached or convicted unless in office at the the time, if they had so intended, when at the same time they studiously set a boundary to the judgment, and put away the possibility of executive interference; and in a case, too, in which, if the claim of the respondent be correct, neither the boundary to the judgment nor the exclusion of a pardon would be of the least consequence without the practical assent of the accused. To reach such a result by force of a supposed implication arising out of the fourth section of the executive article of the Constitution would be most extraordinary. If, as I do not perceive, ingenuity can raise such an implication, the principle of law declared by the Supreme Court in the case Faw vs. Marsteller, 2 Cranch, page 10, would prevent its having the effect claimed. It is there said by Chief Justice Marshall, stating the opinion of the court:

> In searching for the literal construction of an act it would seem to be generally true that positive and explicit provisions, comprehending in terms a whole class of cases, are not to be restrained by applying to those cases an implication drawn from subsequent ones, unless that implication be very clear, necessary, and irresistible.

A cardinal rule in construing all laws, penal as well as others, is that of common sense, and to make an implication extracted from one part of a statute or constitution absolutely nullify an express and wholesome grant of power in another would not, as it seems to me, comport with this rule. I can find nothing either in the words of the Constitution, English law, history, State constitutions, (excepting New Jersey,) existing at the time, the debates in the Federal or State conventions, or in the cases that have arisen, that raises the inference that liability of officers of the United States to impeachment was intended or understood to be affected by their retirement from office after committing a crime. But each and all these sources of information lead me to the opposite conclusion. Some passages in debates and arguments have been referred to, but an examination of them all with the context convinces me that in these passages the idea expressed was that only the misconduct of the person in a national as distinguished from a State office was the subject of impeachment, and that if one holding an office should be convicted he must be removed. Instances in these debates, particularly in State conventions, are too numerous to be cited at large. The following are a few of them that speak in unmistakable language:

In the Pennsylvania convention Mr. Wilson, himself a member of the Federal convention, speaking of the impeachment of Senators (which it then seemed to be understood could be done) and of the supposed improbability of their convicting themselves, said:

> But this will not be always the case. When a member of the Senate shall behave criminally, the criminality will not expire with his office. The Senators may be called to account after they shall be changed and the body to which they belonged shall have been altered. (2 Elliot's Debates, page 477.)

Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention, and also a chief member of the Federal convention, and primus inter pares in both, speaking of the impeachment of the President, said:

> He is responsible in person. If he shall seduce a part of the Senate to a participation in his crimes, those who are not seduced would pronounce sentence against him; and there is this supplementary security, that he may be convicted and punished afterward, when other members come into the Senate, one-third being excluded every two years. (3 Elliot's Debates, page 516.)

In the South Carolina convention General Pinckney, also a member of the Federal convention, speaking of the impeachment of Senators, said:

> Though the Senate are to be judges on impeachments, and the members of it would not probably condemn a measure they had agreed to confirm, yet as they were not a permanent body, they might be tried hereafter by the Senators and condemned, if they deserved it. (4 Elliot's Debates, page 265.)

In another place, referring to the argument that the power of great men might overthrow the Government, he said:

> An appropriate body, immediately taken from the people and returnable to the people every second year, are to impeach those who behave amiss or betray their public trusts; another body, taken from the State Legislatures, are to try them. No man, however great, is exempt from impeachment and trial (4 Elliot's Debates, page 281.)

In Blount's case the respondent was expelled after impeachment, and the plea alleged that he was not ever a civil officer and that he was not a Senator at the time he pleaded. The action of the Senate was first to negative by 14 to 11 a resolution declaring that he "was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution and therefore liable to be impeached;" second, to adopt, by the same vote of the same Senators, a resolution that his plea was sufficient.

I think the inference is fair, taking the two votes together, that the point made in the plea that he was then out of office was not regarded as having any value. The negative of the first resolution, declaring in the past tense that he was a civil officer, was equivalent to declaring that he was not such at the time of his offense, and so the same fourteen Senators declared as a consequence that the plea was good. A careful examination of the whole course of the argument in that case on both sides clearly convinces me that neither the managers nor the counsel supposed that a person holding a civil office and committing a high crime in the course of its administration could escape impeachment by laying down his commission.

It is indeed evident that in the case of offending officials the remedy in courts of law by punishment may often entirely fail; first, when the criminal has the honest sympathy of the executive, whose unlawful orders he may have been executing in committing the offense. In such a case he would receive pardon; second, when, from a belief in his innocence or out of pity for his supposed misfortunes, the prosecuting officers themselves, under the orders of the executive, would be directed not to proceed against him; third, when from corrupt motives the same orders would be given; fourth, when, from party bias or in supposed resistance of it, the same policy of inaction would be adopted. In all such cases the official offender would go "unwhipt of justice" if by his own will he could defeat impeachment by resignation; and impeachment as a practical remedy for security against great official crimes would cease to exist.

We have been pressed with the dangers liable to arise from upholding the jurisdiction. If it be admitted that this is a proper element in the question it must be considered from both points of view. On the one hand, it is asserted that it subjects all the people of the United States who have held office to the power of impeachment without limit of time, and that in the changes of party it may become an instrument of persecution. But this presupposes that a majority of the elected Representatives of the people will have become corrupt and that two-thirds of the Senators will also corruptly and through perjury lend themselves to such schemes. When such a state of society is reached, the power of impeachment will be among the least of evils. On the other hand, if the jurisdiction in such cases as the present does not exist, the great remedy (for it is a remedy rather than a punishment) of impeachment, carefully preserved in the constitutions of all the States, will be shorn of all its value for the protection of the people, as declared in the Constitution, against the return to office of great offenders and against their pardon by a corrupt or misguided Executive. In weighing these suggested dangers on either side, can we hesitate in our choice? In every aspect of the case that has been presented to my mind I cannot doubt that the jurisdiction of the Senate is complete.

Opinion of Mr. Maxey,

Delivered May 17, 1876.

Mr. MAXEY. William W. Belknap stands charged before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, by articles presented and exhibited by the House of Representatives, with being guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors committed in office while Secretary of War, and is specifically charged in said articles with corruptly and unlawfully taking and receiving money while Secretary of War, paid to him with a view to influence his official action as such Secretary, and that he was so influenced in consideration thereof.

The respondent pleads to the jurisdiction of this court, and says that before and at the time when the House of Representatives ordered and directed that he should be impeached at the bar of the Senate and at the time when said articles of impeachment were presented and exhibited against him, he was not, nor has he since been, nor is he now an officer of the United States, but at said times, is now, and ever since has been a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa.

Without analyzing the pleadings, it is sufficient to say that the real question before the court is, Has the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, the constitutional jurisdiction to hear and decide this case? Here is a grave question of constitutional law we are called on to determine.

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Part of clause 5, section 2, article 1, Constitution.)

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. (Part of clause 6, section 3, article 1, Constitution.)

The articles of impeachment were presented by the House. If the House of Representatives had the constitutional power of impeachment in the case at bar, the Senate undoubtedly has the sole power to try the impeachment; so that the question presents itself: Was the power of the House of Representatives constitutionally exercised in the case at bar?

The Constitution does not in terms define impeachment. Whatever meaning the word had at the adoption of the Constitution it has now.

To ascertain this meaning we must ascertain what was understood and acted on as its meaning by the States which framed and ratified the Constitution and by the bodies in England—House of Lords and House of Commons—possessing the sole power to try and the sole power to impeach; for from Great Britain we derived not only our ideas of the common law but our ideas of parliamentary procedure, our systems of practice and pleadings, our maxims and the meaning of technical words and phrases; and the meaning of impeachment, as understood by the framers of the Constitution as derived from our British ancestors at the adoption of the Constitution, it has to-day, subject only to the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution. The procedure is substantially the same as in the British Parliament. The judgment is restricted.

Our Constitution, as I construe it, wisely subjects the person guilty of an impeachable crime or misdemeanor committted while in office, not only to impeachment for the official crime or misdemeanor committed while thus in office, but likewise to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law for the same crime or misdemeanor, the same as any other criminal person. The processes are essentially different, the forums different, and the objects to be accomplished different. The person may be tried, convicted, and judgment rendered against him by the court of impeachment for his official crimes, and yet he may not be indicted, tried, sentenced, and punished in the ordinary course of law; or he may be tried, convicted, sentenced, and punished in the ordinary course of law, while for his official crimes he may not be impeached. The two trials have no necessary connection. Each, however, is a trial, when had, for a criminal offense: The one for a grave official crime or misdemeanor committed in office; the other for an offense against the ordinary criminal laws of the land. The one is an extraordinary trial before a court specially organized under the Constitution for the very purpose of investigating the official crimes and misdemeanors of which the accused may stand charged by articles of impeachment, and of deciding without appeal that very case. When this court of impeachment has performed its functions in that case, it is dissolved and ceases longer to be a court. But the same person may, under the Constitution and by its special provisions, notwithstanding trial, conviction, and judgment against him by the court of impeachment, be tried, convicted, sentenced, and punished by a court of competent criminal jurisdiction organized, not for this particular case, but for the trial of all offenders within its jurisdiction, and it continues to be such court after the trial the same as before. An investigation of the nature of the judgment pronounced by the court of impeachment will aid in the elucidation and solution of the question of jurisdiction before the court.

It has been strenuously argued that the judgment of the court of impeachment, even to the full of the constitutional limit, inflicts no punishment in the sense and meaning of the Constitution. If this be correct, it logically follows that the trial before the court of impeachment is not a criminal trial; for it would be vain to speak of a court having criminal jurisdiction shorn of the power to punish. The law never says or does a vain or useless thing or a foolish thing.

I think this is a grave error.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. (Article 1, section 3, clause 7, Constitution.)

We are not left in doubt as to the meaning of the word "conviction," and the common acceptation and the legal definition are substantially the same.

Webster defines "conviction:"

The act of convicting; the act of proving, finding, or adjudging guilty of an offense.

Bouvier defines "conviction:"

That legal proceeding of record which ascertains the guilt of the party, and upon which the sentence or judgment is founded.

Webster defines "judgment" thus:

Judgment is the sentence of the law, pronounced by a court or a judge thereof, upon a matter in issue in any cause before it; judicial determination; decision of a court.

Bouvier defines "judgment" thus:

The decision or sentence of the law, given by a court of justice or other competent tribunal, as the result of proceedings instituted for the redress of an injury.

Now, we have in the clause of the Constitution last quoted the word "judgment" in respect to impeachment, and the word "convicted," "party convicted" in the same connection, and we have the definition of conviction as that legalproceeding of record which ascertains the guilt of the party, and upon which the sentence or judgment is founded; so that these apt and appropriate words with well-defined meaning in criminal law are found in the seventh clause of section 3, article 1, of the Constitution, limiting the extent of the judgment or sentence on conviction in cases of impeachment, namely, that it shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. It is a limitation on the judgment, and in no sense touches the jurisdiction of the court. The highest punishment to which the court can go in its judgment is fixed by the Constitution. All under this, of the same nature as that fixed, is within the discretion of the court. It is entirely discretionary with the court what shall be the judgment, provided it is of the nature of that set out in the Constitution; and provided it does not go further than the limit fixed by the Constitution, always making removal part of the judgment if the party on trial holds a civil office under the United States.

But I am not confined to the words "conviction" and "judgment" in support of the position which I have advanced, namely, that this is a trial for a criminal offense, an official crime, by a constitutional court with special criminal jurisdiction, namely, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, authorized by the Constitution to hear and pronounce judgment upon conviction.

In further support of this view I quote the following clause of the Constitution:

The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Part of clause 1, section 2, article 2, Constitution.)

In this connection I make the following extract from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States defining "pardon;" namely:

Pardon is an act of grace proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws which exempts the individual from the punishment which the law inflicts for a crime he has committed, (7 Peters, page 150, the passage quoted on page 160.

The position that judgment in cases of impeachment inflicts no punishment is conclusively overthrown by the passage which I have just quoted from United States vs. Wilson, in which the opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall.

Analyze the clause of the Constitution last quoted in the light of the above opinion of the Supreme Court, and by substituting for "pardon" its meaning as defined by Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court, and we have:

The President shall have power to grant reprieves and exempt an individual from the punishment which the law inflicts for the crime he has committed, except that in cases of impeachment he shall not have the power to exempt an individual from the punishment which the law inflicts for the crime he has committed.

So that we have the apt and appropriate words of the criminal law, "judgment" or "sentence," "conviction," "pardon," "punishment," "crime," "punishment," which the law "inflicts," &c., for "crime," all used in respect to impeachment.

The conclusion to my mind is irresistible that this must be held a trial for a criminal offense—an official crime; that this court is a court of special criminal jurisdiction, with the power to inflict punishment upon conviction and judgment, the extreme penalty or limit of the judgment consequent upon conviction being fixed by the Constitution, beyond which the court cannot go.

If this be correct, and if there be nothing in the Constitution to the contrary, and there is not, then the jurisdiction of this court to hear, try, acquit, or convict, and pronounce judgment of acquittal or conviction according to the facts, attached instantly upon the alleged commission of the crimes and misdemeanors imputed to the defendant in the articles of impeachment.

The question of guilt or innocence has nothing whatever to do with the question of jurisdiction. If the House of Representatives had the power to impeach upon the facts averred in the articles, this court has jurisdiction to try. And this jurisdiction attaches in this court according to the facts averred in the articles of impeachment, precisely as jurisdiction attaches instantly to a court of criminal jurisdiction according to the facts averred in the indictment. Jurisdiction in both cases may lie dormant for want of discovery; but, for all that, it exists, and the beginning of proceedings is simply setting in action a pre-existing jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of an ordinary criminal court may also lie dormant for want of indictment, precisely as the jurisdiction of this court may lie dormant for want of articles of impeachment; nevertheless jurisdiction in each case vests upon the commission of the offense. Jurisdiction once attached cannot be divested by the act of the party inculpated so long as he may live. The position of Mr. Rawle, that impeachment will lie against a person "who is or has been" an officer of the United States, for a high crime or misdemeanor committed while in office, is, in my judgment, correct and consonant with the great purposes sought to be accomplished by this grant of power in the Constitution.

In the Virginia convention called to consider the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Madison, while discussing the treaty-making power, referring to the President, said:

* * * If he should seduce a part of the Senate to a participation in his crimes, those who were not seduced would pronounce sentence against him; and there is this supplementary security, that he may be convicted and punished afterward, when other members come into the Senate, one-third being excluded every second year; so that there is a twofold security—the security of impeachment and conviction by those Senators that may be innocent, should no more than one-third be engaged with the President in the plot; and should there be more of them engaged in it, he may be tried and convicted by the succeeding Senators, and the upright Senators who were in the Senate before.—Elliott's Debates on the Federal Constitution, second edition, volume 3, page 516.

It follows for the reasons given, if they be sound, that the plea to the jurisdiction should be overruled.

Second:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. (Part of clause 2, section 5, article 1, Constitution.)

The House of Representatives, under this warrant of the Constitution, and in order to facilitate and expedite business, has subdivided itself into many committees, and among others a Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. This committee, as appears by the defendant's pleas, had this matter under investigation while he was Secretary of War, with the defendant before them in person; had examined a witness, and were proceeding to investigate the matters charged against the defendant. It is true the defendant in the same plea says that said committee had no authority from the House of Representatives to investigate the charges against him, but I apprehend this does not change the fact, nor the ratification of the action of the committee by the House, nor the constitutional power of the committee derived through the House. In my judgment the proceedings begun, had their origin constitutionally, before that committee.

Resolutions ordering articles of impeachment was another step, and still another was taken by presenting and exhibiting articles of impeachment against the defendant at the bar of the Senate. If, then, the more circumscribed view is taken (to which I do not give my assent) that jurisdiction attached by the beginning of proceedings, it attached when the investigation began before the committee, (of which defendant had notice and appeared,) culminating in articles of impeachment; and jurisdiction, having vested, could not be divested by the act of the defendant, and therefore the plea to the jurisdiction should be overruled.

Third. I think it entirely immaterial whether the party against whom articles of impeachment may be presented is in office or not at the time they are found and exhibited.

The essential point is, Was he an officer of the United States at the time the imputed crimes and misdemeanors set forth in the articles are therein charged to have been committed by him as such officer? If yea, the jurisdiction of the court of impeachment instantly attached and became vested by reason of the alleged commission of the high crimes and misdemeanors in office, precisely as the jurisdiction of the criminal court instantly attached and became vested by the alleged commission of the crimes and misdemeanors against the law of the land, considering him the same as any other criminal person. Both jurisdictions spring out of the same acts. There is no reason why one jurisdiction should attach before the other; nor is there any more reason why one jurisdiction should be divested by the act of the party more than the other. The admission of such doctrine renders the Constitution in this regard a dead letter. Now we know that the inculpated party cannot divest the jurisdiction of the ordinary court of criminal jurisdiction by his own act, neither can he divest the court of impeachment of jurisdiction of his official crimes by his own act.

The Blount case, (2 Annals of Congress,) to which reference has so frequently been made, settles nothing in respect to this point. It simply determines, and properly, that a Senator is not a civil officer of the United States, and therefore not impeachable, and this doubtless because his title and commission come from a State, and not from the United States. This exposition, in my judgment, is consonant with right and reason. Not only so; it is the recognized doctrine in England, to which we must look in the absence of a definition of impeachment in the Constitution, and of authoritative precedents in our own country.

The Constitution refers to impeachment without defining it. It assumes its existence, and silently points to English precedents for knowledge of detail. (Professor Dwight in sixth American Law Register, page 257.)

Among the numerous English precedents which might be cited the cases of Warren Hastings and Viscount Melville are in point. Both had resigned their offices; Melville while the subject-matter of his delinquencies was under discussion, Hastings before proceedings had begun. Hastings's trial was pending and had drawn to it unusual attention and interest in Europe and America at the very time the constitutional convention was in session. The debates in the convention on the question of the removability and disqualification by impeachment of the President throw much light on this subject. The question there was not whether the Executive should be impeachable, but whether he should be impeachable while in office. It seems not to have been doubted that he could be impeached after his term expired. We must conclude that the framers of the Constitution had the English precedents before them and had full knowledge that in England the power of impeachment not only existed but was acted on of impeaching persons after they had gone out of office as well as while in office for crimes and misdemeanors committed in office. The conclusion is irresistible that they accepted the word impeachment with its well-understood and recognized meaning, limiting only the power of the court in its judgment to removal and disqualification and commanding removal on conviction where the impeached party was a civil officer of the United States. The power of impeachment being restricted in the matter of judgment, and not otherwise, according to all recognized rules of construction, no other restriction, modification, or qualification was designed or made.

The trial by impeachment was, in my judgment, designed by the Constitution to be a trial for official crime. The punishment is apt and appropriate to official crime: removal from office and perpetual disqualification. Removal from office relatively to perpetual disqualification is a trifling matter. It is done almost every day, sometimes with, sometimes without, cause, and does not have perceptible influence on the politicial or social standing of the officer removed where trial is not had; but the man under sentence of perpetual disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States is as completely ostracised from his fellows as the Man in the Iron Mask was isolated in his lonely cell. The felon may be pardoned; the man disqualified by the judgment of the court of impeachment never. We know not what is the unpardonable sin which excludes its perpetrator from all hope of entering the portals of heaven, but this we do know, that a man who stands convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors committed while in office, and is sentenced by the court of impeachment to perpetual disqualification, is held by public opinion to be a living, moving infamy, a moral leper, shunned by his fellow-man and without hope of pardon this side the grave.

And this supreme punishment is, in my judgment, inflicted not only to get rid of a bad man in office, not only to prevent that man ever being restored to office, but chiefly, by fearful example, to teach all men that American institutions and the perpetuation of free government, of the people, by the people, and for the people, demand purity in office. It says to all the world, in fearful language, that he who obtains office, however exalted be his social and political station, and who betrays his sacred trust by the commission of official crime, and upon fair trial is found guilty and sentenced by this court to perpetual disqualification, unlike the ordinary felon, is beyond pardon, because he has betrayed, to the hurt of all the people, a great trust. It teaches all men that the public offices of the land, to which the humblest citizen may aspire, are forever closed against him, because he has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The Constitution intrusts this fearful power to no ordinary tribunal. The character of this august court gives emphasis to the positions I have presented. Two embassadors from every State in this Federal Union of co-equal States make up this august court, and it is not reasonable and in consonance with human action that they will close the gates forever to political preferment against an American citizen unless they can and ought in truth and conscience to pronounce this weighty judgment.

I have not discussed section 4, article 2, of the Constitution, to wit:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This section, in my judgment, does not touch the question of jurisdiction, nor the power of the court as to its judgment, save as hereinafter stated. The jurisdiction is ample and unrestricted by a former clause:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

The number of the court necessary to convict is also set out in a former clause:

> And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

The nature and extent of the judgment is previously set out.

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

The fact that a party convicted by the court of impeachment cannot plead this conviction in bar to a prosecution by indictment is also set out.

> But the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

If the fourth section of the second article be regarded as jurisdictional, then the judgment of the court under that section is shorn of its principal strength, to wit, disqualification from ever after holding office. This is unreasonable, and conflicts with the universal doctrine of construction, that all parts of a law must be construed to stand according to their plain import, if not manifestly contradictory, which is not the case here.

The fourth section of the second article, in my judgment, means that if the party impeached be a civil officer of the United States, he shall, upon conviction, be removed from office. Construed with the other parts of the Constitution, the whole together means this: We have granted to the Senate the sole power to try all impeachments. We have furthermore directed that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. We now command that if the party convicted be a civil officer of the United States, by your judgment he shall be removed from office. Whether you shall go further in your judgment, and add disqualification, is within your discretion. Whether you convict or not, is to be determined on your consciences according to the facts; but should you convict, you shall remove. This, in my judgment, harmonizes and gives force to every part of the Constitution bearing on impeachment.

It will be noted that in respect to impeachment the sixth clause of section 3, article 1, of the Constitution uses the word "person," not "officer." The seventh clause of the same section uses the word "party," not "officer;" while the fourth section, second article, uses the word "officer." This is not accidental. The greater word "person," "party," in the third section, first article, embraces the lesser word "officer," in the fourth section, second article; so that every part of the Constitution on impeachment can, without the slightest strained construction, be given its full force. And it is also to be observed that there is not a word in the debates of the convention which framed the Constitution indicating an intention to limit or in any manner restrict the broad power previously granted in clause 6, section 3, article 1, nor is there anything in the debates to show a desire or intention to abridge the power of impeachment as exercised in the British Parliament, except in the judgment. The judgment was restricted, not the parties against whom judgment might be rendered. Unless the converse appears, we must conclude that the framers of the Constitution took the word impeachment as they found it, and placed just such restrictions on it, and no more, as they deemed wise. And these I have endeavored to show affect the judgment and not the jurisdiction.

My judgment from every stand-point from which I have earnestly and laboriously examined this grave and most important question, is that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has jurisdiction to try the case at bar, and therefore that the plea to the jurisdiction should be overruled.

Opinion of Mr. Wright,

Delivered May 17, 1876.

Mr. WRIGHT. To the articles of impeachment preferred against him by the House of Representatives, the defendant, William W. Belknap, pleads, among other things, that at the time said articles were exhibited he was not, nor has he since been, nor is he now (at the time of plea pleaded) an officer of the United States. To this the managers on the part of the House of Representatives interpose, in substance, a demurrer, to the effect that, if a civil officer of the United States at the time of the commission of the offense charged, it matters not that he had laid down such trust before said articles were exhibited.

It appears from the pleadings and record that, though said defendant was Secretary of War prior to the 2d day of March 1876, and at the time of the commission of the alleged offenses, he at ten o'clock and twenty minutes of the forenoon of that day tendered his resignation of said office and that the same was then and there accepted by the President of the United States; that the House of Representatives on that day, (to wit, March 2 1876,) after the hour above named resolved to present articles of impeachment against said defendant; that the Senate was notified thereof on the 3d of March by the proper committee of the House; and that the articles were exhibited in proper form and at length on the 4th day of April 1876.

The question of jurisdiction thus raised has been discussed with distinguished and exhaustive ability, and meets us at the very threshold of the investigation. It is one of the utmost gravity, whether viewed as one affecting the rights of one charged or the public service, and especially so since it involves the construction of several most important provisions of the Federal Constitution which are now, at the close of one hundred years of our national history, for the first time presented for authoritative determination by the American Senate.

The question is this: Defendant being a civil officer at the time of the commission of the offenses charged, is he liable to impeachment under articles exhibited against him after he had resigned said office, said resignation having been accepted by the proper executive officer?

Before reaching the main question, however, two or three unimportant ones are perhaps worthy of notice. I dispose of these very briefly.

First. The acceptance of the resignation was in no manner necessary to its validity or completeness. As a rule, and save where a statute otherwise provides, any civil officer may, at his own will and pleasure, lay down any public trust; and, that he may be relieved from further official responsibility and care, it is not necessary that he shall have or obtain the consent of any other official or person thereto. There is no law which forbids the Secretary of War or any other civil officer under the United States, resigning his office, and this resignation, when duly tendered and offered in fact, therefore, as completely and absolutely disrobed the defendant officially before as after its formal acceptance by the Executive. The Executive had no discretion, for he had no power to compel the defendant to remain in office. The law may require the assent of another, or others, to get into office in this country, but, fortunately for the officer, and perhaps for the service, too, he does not need such assent to get out.

Second. Does the motive influencing the resignation in the least affect the question? In other words, suppose the defendant resigned, avowedly, openly, and undeniably, for the purpose of avoiding impeachment, and for no other purpose, could this in any manner be considered in determining our jurisdiction? I answer, most certainly not. The resignation was a legal act and must have, upon every principle known, so far as I am aware, to every system of jurisprudence, its legal effect. The motive influencing is of no more consequence than the color of defendant's hair or his opinion of the impeaching committee or the members of the Senate. Of course, if the resignation was not actual but colorable or simulated, a different question would be presented. But in this case, admitting it to be real or actual, the motive is attempted to be brought in question as of value. With it, I repeat, we have nothing to do.

Third. Had the defendant resigned at the time the House of Representatives took action? It is said he had not, for the reason that, as the House resolved on impeachment on the same day, though at a later hour than the act of resignation, such resolution took effect, by relation, to the first moment of that day, and therefore was prior, in actual or legal time, to the resignation.

I do not stop to inquire whether defendant was actually and in a legal sense impeached, or rather whether a due presentment was made prior to the 4th day of April last, (the day when the articles were finally exhibited,) in the sense and for the purpose now under consideration. For, conceding that he was in law impeached on the 2d day of March, but as matter of fact at an hour after the resignation I am still very clear that the resignation was prior in legal time, and that therefore defendant was not an officer at the time of impeachment. If there are no portions of a day as to the impeachment neither are there as to the resignation, and if one, therefore, goes back to the first moment of the 2d of March, so must the other. And if defendant, therefore, had resigned on that day after the articles were resolved upon, he could claim, in my judgment, with as much propriety as the managers now do, that, as that act went back by relation to the first moment of that day, he was out of office before the House took action. And if, by possibility, in that state of the case, his counsel had so claimed, it is at least probable that such claim would have been resisted as stoutly and ably by the managers as they now insist upon this rule for the people. But I repeat, if it is true in one case or as to one act, it is equally so as to the other, and nothing is gained. It is not true as to either, however, for in our criminal jurisprudence, in a matter so vitally affecting the rights of one charged with the highest offenses, neither the law, justice, nor common reason will allow a technical, barren rule—a rule, too, only to be invoked in furtherance of justice—to give the lie to what is true in fact, or to make that true in law which is false in fact.

I shall assume therefore that the defendant was actually out of office at the time he was impeached, as much so and as completely as if he had resigned or his term of office had expired days or months before, and I shall treat the alleged motive of resignation as of no possible account, and upon these assumptions inquire whether he was still amenable to this constitutional punishment.

Other Senators have, and others doubtless will, discuss the history of the constitutional provisions involved, as also the authorities or precedents bearing upon the same. Because of this, as also because that whole field was exhaustively gleaned by counsel, but more because in my judgment, in view of conflicting opinions and the comparatively little attention heretofore given to the real question here involved, the merest ray of light has on prior occasions been thrown upon it—I say because of these things I shall content myself with stating my conclusion from the provisions of the Constitution itself. I do not think, however, that the authorities help us much, if any, and that it must be treated as a question to be now for the first time authoritatively settled by the American Senate. I may remark, however, in passing, that I by no means believe that the little decided conflicts with the conclusion I reach.

The consequences of the one construction or the other of these constitutional provisions, let me also say, I regard as having legitimately but little weight. The light or aid drawn from the deprecated or to be desired consequences of this construction or that of a statute or constitution is, at best, in most cases of the least value, and indeed not infrequently misleads or ends in error. Then, too, in this case it were difficult to tell in which path we shall find most dangers or in which greater safety. For if only those can be impeached who are in office at the time the articles are exhibited, then it is said the consequences would be most disastrous to the public welfare and the situation most anomalous; because the most hardened and corrupt official could by resignation, even after the Senate had adjudged his guilt and before sentence, cheat the law and go unwhipt of justice.

And the Senator from New Jersey, with a heart that ever beats responsive to the highest moral impulses, feeling and seeing the great wrong which would follow the rule that resignation after trial and immediately preceding sentence could defeat jurisdiction, has attempted to find a middle ground. But I submit just here that there is no middle ground. He cannot find rest for his feet upon any such theory. Indeed his argument rests, he will allow me to say, more in theory than in logic. If only those in office can be impeached, because removal is declared in all cases to be a part of the penalty, then the logic is inexorable and not to be avoided that they must be so at the time the sentence is pronounced. You cannot decapitate a headless trunk, whether the head was off a moment or a year before you came to the execution.

But returning from this digression, I remark that to the argument drawn from such consequences it is answered, grant the premises, yet one liable to impeachment may be indicted and tried in the judicial courts, and that if he escapes the sentence of the impeachment triers and courts, he must still confront the greater and more inexorable judgment of a great people, who, while they judge in mercy, love that which is politically just; and that neither resignations nor forms nor pleas nor judgments of Senates can control or mislead this grandest of inquests. On the other hand, if those once in office and now out can be impeached, if this is the meaning of the Constitution, then in alarm it is said only the grave can bar such prosecutions; and, too, that at each turn of the political wheel in this Government, where elections are frequent and the people's will not the most stable, those displaced may be at the mercy of an exultant and bitterly malignant triumphant majority. To this it is answered, that guilt can only be found by the action of both Houses, the Senate only being allowed to so declare by a two-thirds vote; and that it is not to be presumed that a power so great and so tremendous will be invoked except in cases clearly and justly calling it into exercise. And thus I might at much greater length state the arguments based upon the supposed consequences of adopting this view or that of the Constitution, and their claimed complete refutation; but I dismiss them all; for if the Constitution speaks, and I am to assist in its execution, then with conseqences I have nothing to do, no care. As a member of this court, knowing that I must for myself declare the law, I may happily, in the discharge of that duty, leave consequences to take care of themselves.

What, then, is in the law or the Constitution?

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

This is found in the second section of the first article in its proper and appropriate connection. These words are few, but their meaning is certainly neither obscure nor doubtful. It gives to the House the power to impeach and excludes every other body, for it says the House "shall have the sole power." Nothing is left for interpretation, as to nothing in the sentence need we resort to books or law for explanation but the last word, "impeachment," and which was very fully explained and defined yesterday by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and to it I shall not, therefore, refer more at length. By this clause, then, we have declared the grand inquest which alone can present or exhibit articles of impeachment against those liable to its penalties under our Constitution.

This as clearly confers the power as it would be possible for any words or language to do, and I confess to not a little surprise that any one should say that it does not confer power. If the power to impeach is not conferred here, it is not at all. Why it says that the House shall have the power of impeachment, the sole power. When the Constitution says that Congress shall have the power "to lay and collect taxes," is there no power conferred? When it says Congress shall have power to "borrow money," does it confer the power named? When it says it shall have power to "coin money," do you want more to show that it has power to do this thing? When it says it shall have power to "establish post-offices and post-roads," have we ever doubted that power over these subjects was thereby conferred? When it says that the House shall "elect its own Speaker and other officers," has any one ever denied that this conferred the power to make these selections? And when it says the House shall have the power, the "sole power of impeachment," do we need any more unequivocal and clear or emphatic language to show where this power is lodged or the right and duty to exercise it? Why if the language used in this case does not confer the power claimed, then I repeat it is not found at all, nor has Congress power to do anything whatever upon any subject, for in precisely the same language is all power conferred upon it as a legislative body. No, Mr. President, it will not do to say that this does not confer the very power claimed; and I repeat, as I shall I hope hereafter show, that this provision is the very source of the power invoked in cases of impeachment, and that without it we are driven to rely upon the merest implication.

Having, then, the supreme grand jury, or the proper inquest; having found who alone may impeach, we next inquire who is to try these offenses. This is answered in section 3 of the same article, where it is declared that—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

And thus we see that the power to exhibit articles is given to but one body, and that of trying is in precisely the same terms limited to the Senate. The machinery of impeachment can only thus be set on foot, and when jurisdiction is invoked but one body can exercise it. In other words, we have but one jurisdiction with sole power to present, and the one court having sole and exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine.

And now, having the agencies prescribed or the power given, rather by enumeration than by definition, we may remark, (and this is true of almost the entire Constitution,) we naturally inquire for what may the House impeach and who is liable to the process; and when we have answered these inquiries we have at the same time answered who and what the Senate may try; for I assume that the Senate may and (perhaps) must try such persons and for those matters which the House may constitutionally present.

The first inquiry, for what offenses may this jurisdiction be invoked or for what may the proper persons or officers be prosecuted by impeachment, is not very material, I grant, to the matter now before us, since there is no point made, thus far at least, that the matters charged in the articles exhibited are not impeachable under the Constitution.

We have, then, the only proper body setting on foot this impeachment; this appropriate power has made in due form its complaint to the proper court and for or of a matter for which the defendant is amenable to the penalties provided by the Constitution, unless by his resignation that liability no longer continues.

Then who are liable? I answer, clearly not the private citizen. By this I mean that not every citizen of the land may be impeached. The tie of allegiance which holds or binds the citizen to the Government and to his duties is to be kept in full force and by all proper constitutional and legal means in this country as in England. But this rule, as I regard, of at least the earlier days of the common law, that all citizens or every subject might by impeachment be held to these obligations and punished for their violation, is not the rule of this country. Even in the States where we speak of the common law obtaining, we do not mean all of it, but only such parts as are not changed by statute, and such also as are consistent with the spirit and genius of our institutions and the habits and manners of our people. This prerogative, or power, or right to impeach the private citizen because of infidelity to his obligations to the Government, or for any crime or misdemeanor, never was contemplated by our Constitution as continuing or obtaining, and is no part of the common law of this country or of impeachment. For it was no part of the well-settled parliamentary or common law when the Constitution was framed, and this its framers knew; nor did they ever intend to go so far, as is plain from the Constitution itself and the whole frame-work of the Government.

If citizens, as such, for offenses committed while citizens, are not impeachable, then who are?

This question the Constitution, I admit, does not answer in words. We are left to deduce its meaning, in this respect, largely from its implications and more especially and almost conclusively from the law as it stood before or at the time of its adoption, rather than from any positive command. It does not say that civil officers shall only be impeached while in office. It does not say they shall be liable while in office and for a limited period after they shall either voluntarily lay down their trust or after their terms expire, as in some of the States. Nor does it say in words that they shall be subject to these great prosecutions after they cease to be officers. All we find is this: In the third section of the first article (from which I have already quoted and which I here set out in full the better to see the connection of the entire language) we have this:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.
> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

All the provisions thus far quoted, it will be observed, are found in the first article of the Constitution, which provides for the law-making power and defines or prescribes its powers and duties. In the next article, relating to the Executive, and in its second section, we find that he is given "power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment;" and section 4 of the same article declares that—

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

And thus we have all the constitutional provisions which, as far as I can see, bear upon the question as to who is liable to impeachment.

It will be observed that the provisions of the Constitution assumed rather than declared that any one should be liable to impeachment. For the Constitution does not say that the President and other civil officers shall be liable to impeachment for the offenses named, but rather assuming such liability, and seeing that the power to impeach had already been given, it says that when they are impeached and convicted of these offenses they shall be removed. It assumes the conclusion, in other words, that they may be impeached, and applies or declares certain consequences which are to follow. I deny that this section confers any power to impeach, much less that it is the only part of the Constitution conferring this power. I have already deduced this power from other and unambiguous provisions of the instrument. If there was nothing else than this section, I think it would be exceedingly difficult to find power to impeach, for we would be without a tribunal with power to present or power to hear. If this was the sole source of power, the danger of exercising from mere implication a prerogative so high, and fraught with consequences so great, would be urged upon us with much propriety, and I must say not a little force. And it is passing strange to me that any one should depict the great danger in extending the implications of the Constitution, the necessity of looking for an express grant before exercising a power, and still rest the exercise of this high prerogative upon a section which assumes but does not grant it.

But it is argued that as removal must be and is declared by the Constitution a part of the penalty following the trial and conviction in all cases—that as this is logically as well as practically impossible of enforcement in one out of office, therefore only those who continue in office to the time of their presentment, if not of sentence, are liable to this proceeding. In my opinion the proposition as thus broadly stated, or indeed however stated, assumes too much, and loses sight of other and most material parts of the Constitution.

I do not believe that removal from office is necessarily a part of the punishment in all cases. It is in cases where it can be applied, and not otherwise. I grant, too, that if removal was the only penalty, or if the Constitution contemplated that in all cases it should be a part of the penalty, I should esteem there was but little room for argument in favor of the jurisdiction when the officer had resigned; for I do not agree with the proposition that inability to enforce the order of a court, as applied to such a question, is not to be accepted as a fair and proper test of jurisdiction. The Constitution no more than the law requires or exacts vain or foolish things, and to say that the Constitution expected or ordained that we should go through the farce of inquiring whether we ought to visit a punishment upon an offender which for any cause we no longer have the power to inflict would be illogical in the extreme, and, as I think, in the face of all rules of any value or weight in judicial proceedings.

But, as already stated, I do not believe that removal is necessarily a part of the punishment in all cases. In the first place, I think the connection in which this last provision in relation to removal is found is of no little significance as bearing upon this question. I find the grant of power to impeach in that portion of the Constitution which defines and limits legislative powers and duties. I find in the same place the power given and the tribunal named to try the impeachment. I find there, too, at least some rules of practice and a limitation of the punishment or of the consequences to follow conviction in such cases. Now, if having said this much it had stopped, it would scarcely be claimed that removal from office was in all cases to be necessarily a part of the penalty. Neither do I think would it have been insisted thus far that only those in office at the time of conviction were amenable to impeachment. For if I had found these or like provisions in a statute, I should never have thought, I confess, for a moment that liability depended upon the official status of the person at the time of the trial, but rather at the time of the commission of the act with which he was charged.

But it is said (and I may notice this point here as well as elsewhere) that if those out of office were liable to impeachment, why did not the Constitution say so? Ah, Mr. President, I think this may well be answered in two ways: First, those who had gone out of office, all will admit, were liable to impeachment for acts while in office by the parliamentary law of England. It was never held there that impeachment was confined to those in office at the time of their presentment. Now, is it not fair and legitimate to assume that the framers of the Constitution knew this, acted upon this assumption, and therefore intended that those who had gone out, as well as those in, were amenable to such prosecution? And if so, may I not, in the second place, inquire with the utmost consistency and with next to unanswerable force, that if the authors of the Constitution, with this knowledge before them, intended to include only those in office, why did they not say so? It was very easy if they intended it to say "while in office," or use some like apt words to express their meaning, and thereby change the rule as it then obtained, as all admit, in England and elsewhere.

But to return. The Constitution, in that part setting up the legislative or law-making branch of the Government, finished or concluded, as I have said, all that seemed to be necessary on the subject of prosecutions and trials of impeachment. Then it turned to the work of setting up the executive machinery, and said that he, the Executive, shall have certain powers, and, among others, to be "Commander-in-Chief * * * of the militia of the several States," but not until "called into the actual service of the United States;" to "require the opinion * * * of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments," but not unless the subject thereof related "to the duties of their respective offices;" to "grant reprieves and pardons for offenses," * * * but not "in cases of impeachment;" and so as to other powers and their exceptions. But for the last exception, specially named, he could have pardoned or reprieved in impeachment cases as in the case of all other offenses against the United States. But that is in no sense a limitation or the semblance of a limitation, nor does it seem to indicate the least intention to limit or restrict the grant of power already given, in its appropriate place, over the matter of impeachment.

And the same reasoning applies to the main section relied upon in this connection. The second article, after prescribing the manner of electing the President and Vice-President, their tenure of office, what Congress might do by law in providing for cases of removal, disability, &c., of both, and that the person succeeding to the office of President under such law should hold until the disability should be removed or a President elected, and giving to the Executive the power to appoint judges, embassadors, &c., then, in its last section, (4, the one quoted,) apparently out of abundant caution, and to avoid the possible construction that these officers must, in virtue of what it had before declared, at all events and in any contingency hold for the terms named, it was declared that they and all civil officers should be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of the offenses named. But how does that limit the power to present and try impeachments before given or the persons to be impeached? This section, as before shown, contains no grant of power on this subject. It is as if all the other sections on the subject of impeachment and those governing the tenure of office of civil officers had been collated, and then at the close it had been said: "But all civil officers shall be removed from office when impeached and tried for treason," &c.

And it is not permitted to limit a grant clearly and expressly given over a general subject by a supposed limitation ingrafted, and only to be supported by the most blind and indefinite implication. There is a state of case, it will be seen at once, to which this section can apply in all its force and with the fullest meaning, without invoking its language to limit and restrain all the other sections and provisions quoted. If this is so, then it is my plain duty to so apply it and have all the provisions stand. I must not find conflict if I can by fair construction help it. That construction is always to be preferred and, indeed, adopted which will permit all the provisions of a statute, and especially a constitution, to be of force rather than that which will nullify any. I accept and treat this section (4, article 3) as a simple rule as to what shall be done in cases of impeachment and conviction of those in office and to remove any doubt as to their right to continue to exercise their trusts after their conviction. It does not at all impress me that it confines impeachment to those in office at the time of their trial and conviction. The language used in connection with the other sections is not different from that found in numberless statutes providing for the punishment of official misconduct and under which I never supposed, nor can I think any one ever did, that the official must continue in office in order to incur their penalties.

I am not unmindful that the Constitution (article 1, section 3) says that "where the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside;" and that from this it is argued that this officer can only be impeached when in office, for it is asked, If he is out of office shall the Chief Justice preside? I answer, certainly not. The reason of the provision is clear enough, not doubted by any one; and why shall we attempt to warp or extend its meaning for the purpose of limiting a necessary power, given for wise and necessary purposes by the Constitution?

Mr. President, the Constitution, held up by its four corners and considered as a whole, must receive at our hands a reasonable construction. We must not lose sight of the objects and purposes for which the powers therein given were conferred. As was said by Judge Story, that construction "should be adopted which is most consonant with the apparent objects and intent of the Constitution; that which will give efficacy and force as a government, rather than that which will impair its operations and reduce it to a state of imbecility; * * * the exposition should have a fair and just latitude, so as on the one hand to avoid obvious mischief and on the other hand to promote the public good." It is a charter of life, not of death, to the people, their government, and their interests. Purity in the discharge of official duty and the perpetual exclusion of bad men from all public trusts are quite as essential to this life of the nation as that some defiant little official shall be removed from a trust which he has disgraced.

Under this rule, I think, the construction stated is most clearly to be sustained. Because of this, and because I know, as we all do, as already stated, that neither in England nor elsewhere, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, was impeachment ever confined to those in office at the time of their trial and conviction, and because I must believe that the fathers employed the language of the Constitution with a full knowledge of this fact and of the meaning of the word impeachment as then understood and accepted, I rest my conclusion. I do so, also, because I think it in the face of the letter and in defiance of the spirit of all legislation, as applied to crimes or anything else, to say that any one can avoid liability or responsibility, which has already attached, by voluntarily laying down an office; and, too, because upon every principle, when an officer assumes a trust, he is as much liable after the expiration of the term as while in office to atone to the offended law for any violation of its criminal provisions as he is for the money he controlled or for those acts of commission or omission not involving criminal liability.

Mr. President, allow me to say in conclusion that I trust a pardonable State pride, and certainly a strong personal regard for the accused, inclined me to another conclusion. My first impressions, too, from a casual reading of the instrument, I confess, were against the power. But giving, as my time would allow, my best thought to the discussion and all the provisions of the Constitution, I have, with some reluctance, I admit—if reluctance should ever be indulged in the discharge of duty—been brought to conclude that we have jurisdiction in this case and shall by my vote so declare.

Opinion of Mr. Merrimon,

Delivered May 17, 1876.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I will state briefly a summary of the grounds of my opinion upon the question now before the Senate. After so much has been said and much of it well said by Senators on both sides, more than this from me is unnecessary, especially as time has become so important for the consideration of other business.

The Constitution defines, limits, organizes, and embodies the powers which those who made it deemed necessary to the free operation, protection, and perpetuation of our system of national government. In interpreting its meaning, the purpose contemplated by it must be kept steadily in view. In that light and to that end, its leading provisions and several clauses must receive a fair, just, and reasonable construction. This leading rule ought always to prevail in ascertaining its meaning and giving effect to its several provisions.

Now, the Constitution provides as certainly the method of trial by impeachment as for a judiciary or the trial by jury. This method of trial is intended to answer a distinctive and important purpose, and that must be ascertained by applying the rule just stated in construing the several clauses providing for it.

It is provided in article 1, section 2—

> That the House of Representatives shall * * * have the sole power of impeachment.

By this clause the unqualified power to impeach is conferred upon the House of Representatives.

In section 3 of article 1 it is provided that—

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. * * * Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment according to law.

These clauses confer upon the Senate the sole power and jurisdiction to try all impeachments, limiting only the power of judgment.

Here it is important to ascertain what is meant by impeachment. It is not defined in the Constitution, and we must necessarily look elsewhere to learn its meaning. It is a technical legal term, well understood in the English common and parliamentary law, and to that law, it is agreed by all, we must look for its meaning and use. According to that law, it implies a method of accusation of official crime by which the House of Commons in England preferred charges of crime against some person who, at the time of the commission of such crime, sustained some official relation to the government before the House of Lords. The House of Commons had the right and power to accuse any person who had been guilty of crime while in office under the government of such crime before the House of Lords, and the latter had the right and power to try and acquit or convict the accused and award judgment in its discretion. It was not necessary that the person so accused should be in office at the time of impeachment; but it was only necessary that such person should have been in office at the time of the perpetration of the crime in order to raise the jurisdiction of the court of impeachment. Perhaps, in ancient times, the House of Lords may have had, or exercised arbitrarily, a more extensive jurisdiction in matters of impeachment, but the English law was as I have stated it to be at and for a long while before the time of the formation of our Constitution.

This definition of impeachment being true, then the clauses of the Constitution just cited provide certainly that the House of Representatives, like the House of Commons in England, have the unqualified power to impeach—that is, to accuse—any person of crime perpetrated while such person held office under the United States before the Senate, and the Senate, like the House of Lords in England, have the power to hear, try, and acquit or convict such person so accused, and award judgment. But the power of judgment is limited; it "shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States." The power of judgment was not so limited in the House of Lords. And so, too, it is not material that the person so accused should be in office at the time of impeachment in order to raise the jurisdiction of the Senate to try, acquit or convict, and give judgment, unless there is some provision in the Constitution so providing; it is sufficient that he was in office at the time the alleged offense was committed.

There is nothing in the clauses of the Constitution already cited requiring that the persons impeached must have been in office at the time of impeachment; on the contrary, the limitation in the last clause upon the power of judgment goes to show that it was contemplated that the offending officer, though out of office by resignation or otherwise, might be impeached so that he might be disqualified to hold office afterward. It provides that—

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

To construe this clause as meaning that the guilty officer must have been in office at the time of impeachment is to render it practically nugatory, for he would always resign his office, and thus avoid impeachment. All rules of legal construction, as well as the reason of the thing, forbid such a construction.

The only other clause of the Constitution bearing on this subject is section 4 of article 2. It is in these words:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This clause does not confer jurisdiction, nor does it purport to do so. By the clauses which precede it and which appear in the proper place in the Constitution for that purpose, general jurisdiction is conferred.

If it shall be treated as defining and limiting the class of persons subject to the jurisdiction of the Senate as a court to try impeachment, then it must be so construed, if possible, as to harmonize with the clauses conferring jurisdiction. This may reasonably be done by giving it the effect that all officers in office at the time of impeachment shall be removed from office, leaving the disqualification to hold office to the discretion of the Senate.

If this provision were not in the Constitution, the Senate in cases of impeachment would not be obliged to give judgment of removal from office. It might give any judgment short of that, as of censure, or suspension from office, or the like. This clause by its express mandatory terms prevents this, and requires that any officer convicted for the offenses named shall be removed from office. It is mandatory. As to disqualification to hold office, that is left to the discretion of the Senate, as provided in the clauses giving jurisdiction. There is no word in the clause limiting the power to impeach to the time when such officer is in office, nor is there any such necessary or reasonable implication. Giving the words the plain meaning I have attributed to them, all the provisions of the Constitution cited harmonize, and a manifest general purpose is effectuated; that is, to protect the Government against faithless and corrupt officers and prevent the return of such men to office under the United States. This purpose is aided by another provision of the Constitution, which limits the pardoning power exercised by the President, so that it cannot reach cases of impeachment.

The manifest purpose and spirit of the Constitution is, through the court of impeachment, to protect the Government and people against high crimes and misdemeanors committed by the President, Vice-President, and all other civil officers and perhaps other officers, while in office, by not only removing such offending officers from office, but also by disqualifying them to hold office ever after. Now, if it shall be held that by resigning his office the guilty officer can evade impeachment, or that resignation operates to oust the jurisdiction of the court, then one part of the purpose, and in many cases that might arise, the most important part of the purpose, of the Constitution will be defeated; that is, to disqualify a great, corrupt, and powerful man, after he has because of crime resigned his office, to return to office again by means that he might in many ways employ. Can a construction which leads to such results, that thus defeats a distinctive and important purpose of the Constitution, be allowed? It seems to me that its terms, its phraseology, its manifest purpose and spirit all alike forbid it.

I am therefore of opinion that the plea of the accused to the jurisdiction of the court cannot be sustained; that it must be overruled, and the accused required to answer according to law.

Opinion of Mr. Howe,

Delivered May 19, 1876.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the pending debate has developed two very different theories touching the remedy of impeachment as provided by the Constitution of the United States. Some Senators maintain that the Constitution adopts the remedy known to the parliamentary law of England, subject only to such limitations as are expressly prescribed by that instrument; while others hold that our Constitution borrowed nothing but the name of the remedy from English jurisprudence, and that it confers upon the two Houses of Congress no power in impeachment any more than in legislation not expressly granted. On one side it is argued that Congress may do by impeachment whatever the British Parliament may do, unless prohibited by some clause of our fundamental law. On the other hand, it is contended that Congress can do nothing by impeachment, or any other way, unless expressly authorized by the terms of that law.

In my own judgment the English remedy of impeachment never ought to have existed anywhere, and never was transplanted into this country. I therefore beg leave to submit briefly a view of that strange remedy known in the English law as impeachment.

The British constitution is of volcanic formation. In its successive chapters we see the upheaval of different political convulsions. Human necessity, not human choice, gave shape to the dreadful processes. Sometimes it was the necessities of a prince, sometimes the necessities of a class, sometimes the necessities of the people which dominated the movement. Parliamentary impeachment was the result of one of those convulsions. Impeachment originated in the necessities of a prince, and not in the necessities of the people. Mr. Hallam says the impeachment of Lord Latimer was the first which occurred under the English government. That was during the reign of Edward III. He was an able and not very scrupulous monarch. His ancestors for four reigns had been the vassals, not the sovereigns, of the English nobles. His great great grandfather was that King John from whom the barons of England wrested the great charter at Runnymede. His great grandfather was the third Henry, in whose reign the infamous Albemarle plundered prince and people indiscriminately, and Fawkes de Breauté, when the court had pronounced thirty-five judgments against him for the expulsion of so many freeholders from their possessions, armed his retainers, took the judge from the bench, and imprisoned him in Bedford Castle. His grandfather was Edward I, a prince of great activity and courage. But his authority was defied both by the clergy and the nobility. The archbishop of Canterbury told him he must not assess the church, because the Pope had forbid the clergy to pay taxes. The Earl of Hereford refused to go with his army into Flanders. The king exclaimed to him, "By God, sir earl, you shall either go or hang;" and the earl replied with equal spirit, "By God, sir king, I'll neither go nor hang." In the end, the king was obliged to apologize both to the clergy and the nobility. His father, Edward II, was dethroned and murdered. Admonished by so many examples of the dependence of the Crown upon the peerage, Edward III resolved upon its disenthrallment. He came to the throne when he was only thirteen years of age. He was subjected to a regency, composed of five clerical and seven lay peers. While he was yet an infant he saw the combined power of that regency crumble to dust under the iron heel of the aspiring and lawless Mortimer. When he was but seventeen he seized Mortimer and hung him. At eighteen he assumed the scepter, and laid it down only when he laid down his life forty-six years later, after one of the longest and most triumphant reigns in English annals.

To Edward III history accords whatever of honor is due to the invention of the great process of parliamentary impeachment. Fawkes de Breauté had shown how inadequate were the courts of law to curb the turbulence or check the rapacity of the nobles. The humiliation of his grandfather and the homicide of his father had proved the impotence of regal authority. Weary with the unequal contest between the prerogatives of the king and the power of the nobility, he ventured to unmask before the barons of England a power until then unfelt, but against which the startled peerage saw at once the sovereign authority of the Crown could alone protect them. It was in 1376, just five hundred years ago, when Edward III instructed the Commons of England to appear before the House of Lords, and in that sounding phrase which still thunders in the forms of impeach ment to demand in the name of all the people of the realm judgment against Lord Latimer for high crimes and misdemeanors. No statute gave the new and strange remedy, defined its office, or prescribed its boundaries. No royal grant conceded it. It was not found in the great charter of King John, nor in either of the codicils thereto published by Henry III and the first Edward. As suddenly as the gift of diverse tongues fell upon the apostles upon that memorable day of Penticost, there fell upon the people of England a power to speak with one tongue, to appear as plaintiff against any single subject, to prove the doing of an act merely by averring it, and to subject the act to any penalty which the whim of the hour might suggest by calling it a "high crime and misdemeanor."

The fullest report I have seen of that "leading case" is found in the history of Edward III, by Joshua Barnes, of Emmanuel College. From that report we learn the enterprising prosecutor assumed the right to make the laws which should control his suit. This of course was a legal necessity. There was no law extant declaring what was or was not impeachable conduct, or what penalties might or might not be inflicted upon conviction.

The word impeachment was scarcely known to the English language. The thing itself was wholly unknown to the English polity. Of course there was but one rule for the Commons to follow in framing their indictments or for the Peers to follow in giving judgments. That rule was prescribed by the humor of the times. Accordingly, in some counts the defendant was accused of misconduct in England. In another of misconduct in France. His own conduct was arraigned in one count, and the conduct of his officers in another. The embezzlement of military funds was joined with the loss of a military post. It was a strange event. A suitor, before unknown, appeared in a court before unheared of to demand the infliction of penalties prescribed by no law, upon conduct prohibited by no statute, upon allegations sustained by no proof. Prosecutor, tribunal, crime, and punishment were each and all but the suggestion of the hour. The historian says:

> The said lord answered every objection, as it would seem by the record, and very well voided them in open Parliament.

Nevertheless he was removed from all employments, committed to the Marshalsea, and fined 20,000 marks.

> But the king—

> was pleased wholly to remit both the fine and imprisonment; and the year following, on the Lords and Commons themselves representing to the king that he had been deprived of his offices and put from the privy council by undue suggestions, he was restored unto them again.

However, some weak historians, who resemble the common people in clamor and want of judgment, say how that was done in the king's declining age, after the death of Prince Edward, when he had taken his son, John of Gaunt, to be his assistant in the government. The indignation of the historian is manifestly just. The policy of the king in the impeachment of Latimer gives no indication of the king's impaired vigor, but rather of perfected judgment. He had found it impracticable to make the nobles fear him by any penalties which he could impose. He taught them therefore to fear the people, and to cling to him for protection against the penalties which they could impose. He found that royal pardons were a firmer bulwark of his authority than royal punishments. Such was the origin of the anomalous proceeding by parliamentary impeachment.

During the succeeding seventy-four years it was employed on several different occasions. In 1449 the Duke of Suffolk was impeached. The articles of impeachment embraced eight distinct complaints. The first will suffice for a sample. It accused the defendant that he meant to marry his own son to the daughter of the Duke of Somerset, and then if the king had no issue to make claim to the crown! According to Hallam that was the last impeachment known in England for nearly two hundred years. The character of those times forbids the inference that official life was too pure to furnish occasion for such a remedy. The known character of the monarchs who reigned during that long period compels the inference that they felt no need of the aid of Parliament in disciplining their subjects. The English process of impeachment was therefore indigenous, endemic, intermittent, paroxysmal. It could be prosecuted only by the Commons and tried only by the Lords. But it could be prosecuted against any man whether in or out of office, and for any conduct which the Commons pleased to call "high crimes and misdemeanors." It dispensed the whole arsenal of penalties; removal from office, disqualification, fines without limit, imprisonment without end, banishment, death.

The proceeding did not abate by the resignation or removal of the respondent; not even by his death; not even by the prorogation or dissolution of Parliament. It was probably the only form of suit known to any system of judicature which held its course to the end in spite of the death of all parties—plaintiff, defendant, and umpire. Such a remedy may serve good ends in certain states of society, as lightning may in certain states of the atmosphere, but lightning cannot be profitably employed in fair weather, nor can such a remedy be tolerated under free institutions. It has had its day in England and has doubtless appeared there for the last time. The unwieldy forms of parliamentary impeachment are no longer needed to remove a corrupt minister from office. If Parliament by a majority vote now declares a want of confidence, the minister must remove himself. And the time has long since passed when any nobleman, however exalted, can control the judgment of a court, or punish the judge for rendering it. If now a crime is to be punished, Englishmen would doubtless prefer to employ for that purpose the courts of law rather than the high court of Parliament.

Lord Campbell admits that the attempt to impeach Hastings brought the process into disrepute. Nevertheless it was employed against Lord Melville less than twenty years afterward. But for the last seventy years the great mediæval remedy has had no employment in England. No statute created the remedy; no statute repealed it; it was born of dire necessity. Let us hope that it has perished with its cruel mother. But whatever may be the fate of impeachment in England, it lives here.

The question before the Senate is, upon what conditions does it live here? The procedure known in England as parliamentary impeachment never was imported. Before the Federal Constitution was heard of, several States had provided for a sort of impeachment in their local constitutions; but not one of them permitted the life, the liberty, or the property of a citizen to be touched through its terms. Some States ignored the remedy altogether.

It was scarcely possible the subject of impeachment should have been overlooked by the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. While that convention was executing its great task, England was frenzied with the preparations for that splendid pageant which opened the next year with the impeachment of Warren Hastings. His case was present to all minds, and was debated by all lips. It suggested to the convention the very description of offenses for which officers might be impeached. (See Madison Papers, volume 3, page 1528; remarks of Colonel Mason.)

The most cursory reading of our Constitution shows that it, like the constitutions of each of the States, jealously guarded the life, liberty, and property of every citizen against the process of impeachment. Not a drop of blood can be shed, not an hour's imprisonment, not a dollar in fine can be imposed as the penalty of impeachment. But the question before us is, against whom does the remedy lie? Is it given against officers only, or does it extend to those who have been officers, or may it be employed as well to disqualify those who have never held public trusts from holding one? We know that only the House of Representatives can prosecute an impeachment. We know that only the Senate can try one. We know the utmost extent of its judgment upon conviction. Of what cases it can take jurisdiction we need not now inquire; but of what parties the Senate can take jurisdiction we must now determine. In deciding this question we are compelled to rely mainly upon the text of the Constitution. Beyond that there is little which can be called authority. First, what clause of the Constitution is it which limits the jurisdiction of this court as to parties?

Lawyers do not seem to agree even upon this question. The first reference to impeachment in the Constitution is in the first clause of the first section of the first article, which declares: "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment." It has been argued that that is the jurisdictional clause. Several considerations to my mind seem to repel that conclusion. First, such is not the natural import of the words. They clearly define who may prosecute an impeachment, but do not suggest who may be prosecuted. Second, if that clause gives any power, it gives too much. If it authorizes the House to impeach anybody, it authorizes it to impeach everybody. And every citizen stands to-day within the perils of impeachment unless excepted by subsequent clauses of the Constitution. Third, the report of the debates of the convention indicates unmistakably that the clause in question was designed to point out the party to prosecute, and for no other purpose whatever. That clause was agreed to without debate or division. All in the convention were agreed that only the House should be authorized to impeach. But members differed as to who should try the impeachment, as to who should be impeached, and as to what offenses should be impeachable. But had they understood that this clause did more than define the prosecutor, these differences of opinion would have appeared before the clause was agreed to. Fourth, such a construction is not in harmony with the received interpretation of other and kindred clauses of the Constitution. For instance, the first section declares that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress.

That never was understood as a grant of power to pass any particular law, or as defining legislative power at all. Other and apter clauses were employed for that purpose. So the first section of article 2 declares:

The executive power shall be vested in a President.

But no lawyer understands those words as a definition of executive power. So the first section of article 3 declares:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, &c.

No one ever understood that clause as giving jurisdiction to any court of any particular case. Other provisions were carefully framed for that purpose. It is the established method of the Constitution to nominate first the tribunal to which any class of powers is to be granted, and then to enumerate the powers of that class to be granted.

In harmony with that method the Constitution declares that—

The sole power of impeachment shall belong to the House of Representatives.

But, if we would know what that power of impeachment is, we must search for it elsewhere in the instrument. Undoubtedly the Constitution uses some words and some terms the true meaning of which we can only gather from the common law. Undoubtedly "pardon" is one of those words; probably "jury" is another: probably "due process of law" is one of those terms. Undoubtedly the Constitution uses many words the true meaning of which we can find only in the dictionary. But there are some words and some terms used in the Constitution for the true significance of which we are not left either to the common law or to the lexicographer. "Legislative power," "executive power," "judicial power," are unquestionable examples. "Treason" is unquestionably another; and to my mind "impeachment" is unquestionably another. Each one of those terms was clearly defined in the common law. But the Constitution is careful to define each one of them itself; and when the Constitution takes pains to define a word, it seems to me courts should adopt that definition. I am therefore forced to believe that when the convention declared the House of Representatives should have the sole power of impeachment, they did not mean to make a grant of power, but merely to appoint a grantee to take power. We must look elsewhere in the Constitution for a description of the grant. No one pretends that grant is described in the third section. The words are:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

Of course the power of the Senate to try is not broader than the power of the House to prosecute. The two clauses when taken together obviously mean only this: that when one is to be impeached the House alone shall prosecute him, and the Senate alone shall try him. Neither clause answers, or attempts to answer, the great question who may be impeached. Another provision of the same section is as follows:

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

That provision clearly answers one question, but not the question just asked. In the most explicit terms it limits the judgment which can be rendered in any case, but it does not hint at the sort of a case in which judgment may be rendered. It tells clearly what may be done to one impeached; but does not tell at all who may be impeached. As yet the Constitution has disclosed only three things: First, who may prosecute an impeachment; second, who may try an impeachment; third, what may be the judgment in case of impeachment. But we have not a suggestion as to who may be impeached. I myself find that in the fourth section, second article, and I can find it nowhere else. That section reads:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

In that clause we find the answers to two questions: It tells not only who may be impeached, but also for what one may be impeached. If section 4 had been divided into two sections, if one section reads, "The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States shall be liable to impeachment," and the other reads, "Treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors shall be deemed cause for impeachment," it seems to me there could have been no two opinions upon the true interpretation of either of the five provisions. I think all lawyers and all men of sense would have agreed in that case that the first provision merely appointed the party to prosecute; the second merely the court to try; the third merely the judgment to be rendered; the fourth merely the parties to be prosecuted; and the fifth merely the conduct to be arraigned. There would have been no ambiguity in such provisions and no room for interpretation of them. They would be as plain in themselves as interpretation could make them. But surely it will not be contended that combining the enumeration of offenses with the description of parties to be prosecuted makes either the enumeration or the description less certain. The ambiguity, if any, is in the first part of the section. That does not, in fact, say that the officers described shall be liable to impeachment. It says that they shall be removed from office on impeachment. The other is the more natural form of expression, and is doubtless the form the convention would have used if its method of drafting the Constitution had been those I have employed in interpreting it. If the draughtsman had reflected as he sat down to draft section 4 that the prosecutor and court and judgment had already been provided for and that he had the single purpose to provide who should be liable to impeachment, doubtless he would have employed some such language as I have used. But such was not the course in preparing the instrument; on the contrary, a careful examination of the debates of the convention will discover the fact that until nearly the close of the session impeachment was considered merely as a method of removing the President from office.

The convention opened on the 14th of May. After nearly three months had been expended in deliberation no one had suggested the application of impeachment to any one but the President. On the 6th of August Mr. Rutledge reported from the so-called committee of detail a connected scheme for a constitution, presenting in due form all that the convention had agreed to up to that time. That scheme provided, as the Constitution now provides, that the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. But the only officer or person exposed to impeachment was the President of the United States. In the article creating the executive office it provided that he should be removed from his office by impeachment. It provided for the impeachment of no one else, and therefore they made the Supreme Court, instead of the Senate, the tribunal to try impeachments. It was not until the 8th of September, just one week before the close of the convention, that it was proposed to extend impeachment to any one except the President. On the morning of that day all that had been agreed upon the subject of impeachment was that the House should have the sole power to prosecute; that the court should try; that judgment should extend only to removal or disqualification; that treason and bribery should be the only causes for impeachment, and the President the only subject of impeachment. On that day Mr. Mason moved to add after "treason and bribery" the words or "maladministration." Mr. Madison objected that the term was too vague. Whereupon Colonel Mason withdrew maladministration and substituted "or other high crimes and misdemeanors against the state." That was agreed to. Subsequently, on the same day, "United States" was substituted for State. Then that clause of the tenth article relating to the President stood:

> He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States.

Still impeachment was regarded merely as an incident of the presidential office. Then a new clause was moved in the following words:

> The Vice-President and other civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office by impeachment and conviction aforesaid.

That was agreed to. Then the convention transferred the power to try impeachment from the Supreme Court to the Senate, and provided that a vote of two-thirds shall be required to convict. That completed the plan for impeachment. That day's work virtually completed the Constitution. It was Saturday. On Monday following some motions to reconsider were made. Some general debate was indulged in, and the plan was referred to the committee on style and arrangement. That committee very naturally left the power to impeach to stand where it stood, among the powers of the House. It transferred the power to try impeachments from the article enumerating judicial powers to that section of the first article which treats of the composition and prerogatives of the Senate. It transferred the clause making the President impeachable from that section which enumerates the attributes of the presidential office to that provision which makes the Vice-President and other civil officers removable, and made that section 4 of the Constitution. Section 4, therefore, is compounded of two distinct ideas or plans, adopted by the convention at two different times. One is the plan for removing the President from office, and the other, evolved long afterward, is the plan for employing impeachment. When giving expression to the first idea, it was most natural and most appropriate to say he shall be removed on impeachment. And having that formula right before them when giving expression to the second idea, it was surely more natural, if not so appropriate, to use it for that purpose. But after all, when the statute says that one convicted of murder shall be hanged by the neck until he is dead, and says the same of no other offender, it is quite as clear a limitation of the power of the gallows as if the law said "hanging shall be inflicted only on the murderer." I cannot avoid the conclusion, therefore, that the uses of impeachment are limited in the fourth section of the second article, so far as parties and offenses are concerned. It may be employed against any party and against any offense there named, but against no other.

It has been ably argued that if possible a constitution or a statute should be so construed as to give some effect to every part of it. Within certain limits that rule of construction is a sound one.

The construction I have employed gives not merely some effect, but a distinct office, to every clause of the Constitution relating to impeachment. One appoints the prosecutor. One appoints the umpire. One prescribes the judgment; and another defines the parties and the cases.

But if, on the contrary, we accept the last clause of the second section of the first article as a jurisdictional clause, it will be impossible, it seems to me, to give the slightest effect to one single syllable of the fourth section of the second article. The whole is absolutely without meaning. Will it be said that the fourth section extends impeachment to treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors? Why those are the very words upon which the Commons of England have impeached British subjects for five hundred years. If the first article authorizes the House to impeach for any offense, it authorizes the impeachment for just these offenses and no others. These words embrace all the offenses against which impeachment lies in England.

Will it be said that the fourth section extends the remedy to civil officers? Why, when was it doubted that a common-law impeachment lay against a civil officer? If under the first article the House could impeach anybody, is it not and was it not certain it could impeach a civil officer? Will it be said that the fourth section excludes military and naval officers from impeachment? But it does not exclude military or naval officers. If under the first article the House of Representatives is clothed with the common-law powers of impeachment, the fourth section does not abridge those powers.

Is it supposed that the office of the fourth section is to authorize the removal of civil officers? Was ever a civil officer convicted on impeachment before the House of Lords and not removed?

Was it the office of the fourth section to extend impeachment to the head of the executive department? Why, the records of the convention show that impeachment against the President had been provided in the frame of the Constitution for weeks before the fourth section was thought of.

Unless, therefore, we hold the fourth section to be the clause which confers jurisdiction over parties and causes, it supplies no purpose whatever in the instrument.

Against whom, then, does the fourth section give the remedy by impeachment? Clearly against those enumerated in it, and not against those not enumerated. Against the President and the Vice-President, because they are expressly named, and against all civil officers because they are expressly named. But not against military officers; not against naval officers; not against church officers; not against officers of a municipal or private corporation or of a literary society; least of all against such as are not officers of any possible description.

But when may impeachment be preferred against a civil officer? It seems to me, if we were not more learned than sensible we would conclude at once that the best time to impeach an officer is when he is an officer, and not when he is a priest, a parson, or a private citizen.

Yet it is argued strenuously that if a disbursing officer embezzles the public funds, he may be punished for the act after he has left the office. Undoubtedly he may. And we are asked why he may not then be impeached also, after he has left the office? For the plain and sufficient reason that the two remedies have totally distinct aims, may be therefore applied at different times, though they may be both applied to the same person. One remedy is given against a crime and the other against a position; one is for the punishment of an offender, the other for the purification of the public service; one is meant to reform a criminal, the other is meant to reform an office.

Impeachment under our Constitution is a remedy whereby one who is proved to be unfit to hold office may be removed from it. It is true, disqualification may be an incident of judgment. Quo warranto is a remedy by which one who has unlawfully intruded into an office may be removed from it. Costs are an incident to that remedy. But it is well understood that quo warranto can only be prosecuted against one who is in the office at the time of service. If he vacate the office before commencement of the proceedings, the suit cannot be instituted for the purpose of recovering costs. So different remedies are given against him who unlawfully enters upon real estate. Trespass is given to punish the wrong-doer and to compensate the party injured. That can be prosecuted against the wrong-doer after he has abandoned possession. Ejectment is a remedy provided for removing the unlawful intruder from possession. That, however, can only be prosecuted against the party who is in possession at the time of the commencement of the suit. So replevin is a remedy given against one who unlawfully detains the goods of another; but it can only be prosecuted against him who is in possession of the goods. If he abandon possession before suit is commenced, replevin will not lie; though other forms of procedure are provided by law to redress the injury done to the lawful owner.

Having thus stated my own interpretation of the different constitutional provisions touching impeachment, I proceed briefly to notice what others have said upon this subject. As before remarked, there is very little upon the point we are discussing which can be called authority. Mr. Rawle alludes to and dismisses the subject with this brief remark:

> It is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in office.

That opinion was advanced by Mr. Rawle with but very little consideration of the subject, and is therefore entitled to but very little consideration from us. All we learn from it is that in the opinion of the commentator one who has been in office may be impeached if he has left it. Evidently Mr. Rawle thought that the jurisdictional clause is not in the first article, but, as I have contended, is in the fourth section of the second article.

No man who holds that under the first article the House of Representatives is clothed with the common-law powers of impeachment will seriously insist that only those who are or who have been in office are liable to impeachment. And yet it has been intimated, and more than intimated in the course of this debate, that in England the House of Commons could impeach only those who were in office or who had been in office.

There is no authority for asserting such a limitation. Impeachment, as we have already seen, is in England not a power granted to the House of Commons, but a power assumed to be inherent in it. They impeach, not because any higher power has licensed them to impeach, but because they choose to impeach. Of course they impeach all whom they choose to impeach. If a statute could be found declaring that only those who were or had been in office could be impeached, of course that would be a limit upon the power of impeachment. No such statute has been found. No such statute can be found. Or, if a case could be produced when the house had refused to impeach because the party was only a private subject, that might be construed as a limitation upon the common-law power of impeachment. No such case has been adduced. On the contrary, Mr. Tomlins expressly declares that—

A peer may be impeached for any crime. A commoner cannot, however, be impeached before the Lords for any capital offense, but only for high misdemeanors.

Edward Fitz Harris never held office. He was a papist. He was disqualified for holding office. But in 1681 he was impeached by the House of Commons, and impeached for high treason. It is true the Lords threw out the impeachment, but not for the reason that Fitz Harris had not held office but because he was a commoner and was impeached for a capital offense. But even in that judgment the House of Commons did not concur. On the contrary they voted—

That this refusal of the Lords was a denial of justice, a violation of the constitution of the Parliaments, and an obstruction to the further discovery of the Popish plot.—Kennet's History of England, volume 3, pages 386, 387; Hansard's Parliamentary History, volume 4, page 1263.

Upon the authority of the case of Fitz Harris, Woodeson says:

All the king's subjects are impeachable in Parliament but with this distinction: that the peer may be so accused before his peers of any crime; the commoner (though perhaps it was formerly otherwise) can now be charged with misdemeanors only, and not with any capital offense.

Mr. Bouvier clearly indicates the opinion that the jurisdictional clause of the Constitution is in the fourth section of the second article. He says:

The persons liable to impeachment are the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States.

He does not intimate that any one else can be impeached. But he does not express an opinion as to whether the impeachment must be commenced while the defendent is still in office.

In 1794 William Blount was impeached by the House of Representatives for misconduct while Senator from the State of Tennessee. Blount pleaded, first, that he had ceased to be Senator from Tennessee; and secondly, that a Senator was not a civil officer within the meaning of our Constitution. To that plea the managers on the part of the House demurred. Thus the issue was clearly presented:

Can one not a civil officer under our Constitution be impeached; and, if not, is a Senator a civil officer?

These questions were elaborately argued by Mr. Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas for the defendant, and by Mr. Bayard and Mr. Harper on behalf of the managers. The debate by the Senate was held with closed doors. What was there argued we do not know, but what the Senate decided we do know. Their resolution was in the following words:

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed.

That resolution was confirmed by a vote of 14 to 11. And there is an express judgment of the Senate to the effect that jurisdiction over parties in impeachment is granted by the fourth section of the second article, and not at all by the first article of the Constitution; that such jurisdiction obtains only against civil officers, and that a Senator is not a civil officer. So much has been expressly adjudicated by the Senate of the United States. But in that case the Senate did not declare whether a civil officer might be impeached after he had left his office.

Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, has considered this very question. He has left us the benefit of his opinion. It is explicit and I quote it:

As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution that "judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than a removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," and in another clause that "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors," it would seem to follow that the Senate, on the conviction, were bound, in all cases, to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If then there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice. And it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense, when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. * * * There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the State against any gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity. (Commentaries on the Constitution, § 803.)

It may be said of this opinion that it does not amount to the dignity of an authority; that Judge Story had no case before him on which to give judgment, and that he had not the aid of argument by counsel. It is true, the commentator had no actual case before him. It is, however, equally true that he had all possible cases before him. He saw the question might arise. He considered it as a practical question. It is true, he was not aided by the argument of counsel on either side; but it is equally true that he himself argued it on both sides; and when Judge Story had argued a question on one side or the other he usually lett little for argument to do by way of elucidating it.

But it is said that if impeachment will lie only against one in office, then a corrupt official can escape impeachment by resigning his office before he is impeached. That seems to be true. So also a murderer, not merely after accusation, but after conviction, can escape hanging by cutting his own throat. There are two ways by which the citizen can escape impeachment: one is by resigning office before the proceeding is commenced, the other is by never taking office. I am not sure there are but these two. It seems to me better to leave the citizen these two chances. He must have both or neither. If the first article gives to the House the dangerous power to impeach a man because he has once been in office, it gives it the power to impeach him also because he is in danger of getting into office. One is given as surely as the other.

The rule of construction contended for by the managers clothes these two Houses with the power to disqualify every man known to aspire to the Presidency or to any other office; and to do that upon conviction of any conduct which we deem to be a high crime and misdemeanor, whether any law denounces it as such or not; and to do that regardless of the question whether the aspirant be now in a civil or a military office, or in no office at all.

But again we are admonished that if a corrupt official can escape impeachment by resigning his office, he may thereby escape part of the consequences of his crime. He may avoid disqualification. And it seems to be insisted that the well-being of the Republic depends largely, if not mainly, upon a vigorous administration of disqualifications for holding office. I am less impressed by this argument than perhaps I should be but for two facts: one is that I have been so diligently instructed for these many years past that not merely the welfare but the existence of the Republic depended not upon imposing disqualifications for office, but upon removing them; the other is, that it by no means follows that a delinquent official who avoids an impeachment thereby avoids disqualification also. That depends upon the nature of the offense with which he is charged. If he is accused of an offense for which the law has prescribed disqualification, then he does not escape that infliction by escaping impeachment. Then, although impeachment may not reach him, other criminal process will. The Senate may not try him. The courts can. And that sentence of disqualification which the Senate does not pronounce the courts can inflict. When, therefore, this Senate strains the office of construction in order to take jurisdiction of one not in office, for the mere purpose of disqualifying him from ever entering office, it does so for one or the other of two reasons: either because the Senate desires to disqualify for conduct against which the law has not prescribed disqualification, or because it would disqualify for conduct against which the courts are authorized to pronounce just that sentence, and because the Senate has more confidence in its disposition and ability to do justice than it has in the ability and disposition of the courts of law. If this last is the conviction of the Senate, it is one in which the convention which framed our Constitution never shared. That convention intrusted to the courts of law enormous powers for punishment. It intrusted to this Senate but very feeble powers in that direction.

I am more ambitious myself of persuading the world that the Senate might have been safely intrusted with more, rather than of proving that the little we have is quite too much. But I do not mean to shut my eyes to one of the disasters which are supposed to threaten the Republic. If we disclaim the jurisdiction now urged upon us, if the Senate fails to assert the authority to try one who is impeached after he has left the civil service, it is possible a case may arise in the future in which one may resign an office after the commission of acts for which he should be impeached. It is possible he may resign after the commission of acts for which the statute has not prescribed disqualification. If such a case shall occur it is clear that the individual may escape the sentence of disqualification, and so may be thrown upon the community with the possibility of being restored to office again at some future time. But I console myself with the belief that such a danger is not imminent. The man who resigns an office to avoid impeachment is very apt to resign at the same time all hope of returning to office again. There is very little danger that a sensible people will ever wish to restore to office one who has fled from an office to escape the process of impeachment. But if such a case should occur it is worthy of remark that the penalty of disqualification, if pronounced, would fall quite as much upon the people as upon the delinquent. At the same time that it disqualified the delinquent from returning to office it would disqualify the people from returning him to office.

And, in conclusion, I submit that it is hardly worth while for the Senate to assume a jurisdiction which at best is so doubtful, which never has been asserted, which has so often been doubted or denied, for the mere purpose of administering a penalty which must fall as heavily upon the innocent people as upon the guilty individual.

Opinion of Mr. Christiancy,

Delivered May 19, 1876.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into any elaborate argument nor to make a needless display of learning by the citation of authorities, (very few of which can have any direct bearing upon the case;) but simply to express my opinion upon the questions involved, without any argument not actually necessary to render the grounds of my conclusions intelligible; stating results rather than details.

I may also say here, that in several matters which I shall discuss I have been anticipated by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] My remarks, however, had been prepared before either of those Senators had spoken and without knowing their views. I wrote nothing until I had heard the remarks of the Senator from Vermont on the day he first spoke, and completed my own opinion on the evening of the day after he had closed, except an allusion to the argument of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

But to proceed. This is not a mere ordinary case in a court of law, where the result is to be affected by mere forms, technicalities, or fictions; but a case of impeachment—a great state trial—an exceptional and extraordinary proceeding, before the Senate of the United States, in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. And upon such a trial, before such a tribunal, and at such a time, if we did not disregard mere forms and technicalities and all arbitrary fictions contrary to the acknowledged facts; if we did not look through and beyond all these to the substance of things, to the actual merits of the questions arising upon the facts as they are known and admitted to be, we should deserve the scorn and derision of the American people. And, on the other hand, if we should not give to the respondent all the substantial benefits of the great principles of the common law in criminal cases and the protection of every shield which that law, ameliorated and humanized as it has been by the spirit of the age, has thrown around a defendant on trial for a crime, we should equally deserve the execration of the nation and of the age in which we live. For although this is not, in the ordinary sense, a criminal trial, because the ordinary punishment is not imposed and the respondent is left liable to be tried in the proper criminal court and to be there punished to the full extent of the punishment imposed by the statute for the specific offense or offenses charged, the judgment of removal from office, with or without disqualification to hold office, being, as I think, imposed not for the purpose of punishing the offense as such, and for the ordinary object of punishment, but for the protection of the public against the danger of his continuance in the office whose trusts he has abused and against the risk to be incurred by being again placed in that or any other civil office of the United States after his conviction, and operating only incidentally as punishment upon the offender; yet the proceeding is, in a just and very high sense, a criminal trial for those offenses, so far as they directly affect the administration of the Government. And by the Constitution itself the respondent must be "convicted" by the Senate of the offenses, or some offense, charged, before any judgment can be pronounced against him; and the President has the power to grant reprieves or pardons for "offenses against the United States except in cases of impeachment," (article 2, section 2,) though this conviction and punishment are only for the merely political aspects of the offense, and form no part of, and cannot be pleaded in bar to, the punishment imposed by the statute upon the specific offense when prosecuted in the ordinary manner by indictment.

But the removal from office, as well as the disqualification to hold office, though imposed upon conviction only as a measure of prevention against the possibility of future misconduct in office, does incidentally operate as a punishment, a punishment which to him may be as severe and even more infamous than would follow a conviction in an ordinary court. It is, besides, in ordinary cases and in the constitutional view, so far as it can operate as punishment, additional to that which the statute may provide for the offense when prosecuted in an ordinary criminal court. And it makes no difference that under the particular statute charged in this case to be violated removal from office and disqualification to hold office are imposed upon a conviction by indictment. In all ordinary cases of high crimes and misdemeanors such is not the case, (it being now confined to cases of treason, accepting bribes by judges and by civil officers of the United States,) and the Constitution not requiring, though it may possibly permit, statutes of this kind, it is clear that none of these can affect the power or the nature of the impeachment, unless we can hold that Congress may alter the Constitution.

Such being the nature and character of the proceeding by impeachment, we are bound by the well-settled principle of construction in all courts, as well as by the nature of the question itself, to adopt a strict construction of the constitutional provisions establishing this mode of proceeding. By this I do not mean that we are to adopt an interpretation or construction contrary to what may clearly appear to our own minds to have been the intention of the convention which framed, and of the people who adopted it. But, unless clearly satisfied of the intention to include the case before us, or so long as we have any reasonable doubt that such was the intention, we should decline the exercise of the power; while, if the question were one of mere civil jurisdiction, we might perhaps properly enough weigh conflicting probabilities, and sustain the jurisdiction if the probabilities on that side seem to outweigh those upon the other, though serious and reasonable doubts might remain whether such had been the actual intention.

With these preliminary remarks, I proceed to inquire what is the main question in this case? It is simply whether Mr. Belknap, who had resigned the office of Secretary of War, and whose resignation had been publicly announced to the House before the first step had been taken by the House with a view to impeachment, could be afterward impeached, though on the same day, for prior official misconduct in that office, and is amenable to trial for such acts by the Senate. I state the question in this way, because the official record of the House, of which we are bound to take notice, and upon which the vote for impeachment rests, shows this fact, that prior to the first step taken by the House looking to impeachment, his resignation was announced to the House, which met only at noon, as having been made and accepted at 10.20 of that day.

For convenience I shall call this a question of jurisdiction, though it in fact is more than this, as it includes the question whether the penalty of disqualification is one to which he can be subjected or is at all liable. The question thus presented, like all other questions at the present stage of the case, is a clear, naked, dry question of constitutional law, to be decided, not by appeals to prejudice or passion, nor by any consideration peculiar to the defendant personally, nor by the consideration of the enormity of his particular offense, (which I would not extenuate,) nor of the corruption or degeneracy of the times, (which, though bad enough, is not unprecedented in the history of other countries, and even of this,) nor by what we may any of us think the Constitution ought to have provided as a remedy for such cases, but simply and solely by the provisions of the Constitution which our fathers saw fit to make and did make in reference to impeachments. Our province is not now to make a constitution to meet our own notions, but to interpret and administer that which has been made for us and which we are sworn to obey. As it is sometimes just as important to notice what is not, as what is, involved in the question before the court for decision, it may be proper to say here that the question of jurisdiction in a case where an officer impeached may have resigned after the vote of impeachment by the House or after the articles are presented in the Senate, and therefore after the jurisdiction has attached, is not before us. This may, and, as I am inclined to think, it would, rest upon different grounds. But it is enough for us to decide properly the questions before us, without attempting to settle the law in all other cases which may hereafter arise. It is quite obvious that when the resignation has taken place, as it did here, before the impeachment or any proceedings of the House to that end, the respondent, having already ceased to be an officer, is no longer removable from office, and so much at least of the object of an impeachment has failed. The question, then, is narrowed down to this: Are we satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that, though the defendant is out of office, but liable to prosecution and the ordinary punishment prescribed for his whole offense in a court of law, it was nevertheless the intention of the Constitution that he should still be liable to impeachment for the mere purpose of disqualifying him from holding that or any other office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States?

Upon this precise question we have not the direct authority of any decided case arising under the Constitution of the United States, nor under the constitution of any State, the case of Barnard not falling strictly within the principle, as he occupied the same office without any interval between them, the termination of one term being the beginning of another, the office being still the same for the whole period. Does a man lose his identity when he passes from his twenty-fourth to his twenty-fifth year? And is there any interval between? The only case in which the question ever arose, even incidentally, was Blount's case, in 1798 and 1799. Blount was a Senator of the United States; and, as I remember the case, after the impeachment was voted by the House, and the House had impeached him at the bar of the Senate, but before the articles of impeachment were adopted or presented, the Senate proceeded to expel him from that body. He was a Senator when impeached, and, though not so when the articles were presented, yet, so far as can be ascertained from the arguments of counsel—and unfortunately, as the Senators gave no opinions which have become public, these arguments and the final decision are all we can judge from—the principal if not the only questions thought to be involved, or as I think really involved, were whether a Senator was a civil officer of the United States," within the meaning of that clause in section 4, article 2 of the Constitution, and whether any but civil officers were impeachable; but it did not, in so many words, determine the question whether a person out of office could be impeached for acts done in office, though, as I shall attempt to show, the whole decision was based upon an express ground wholly inconsistent with the idea that such impeachment could be maintained after he had ceased to hold office; for it was decided by a majority that he was not a civil officer, and therefore could not be impeached. The form of the final resolution adopted, it is true, was such that some might possibly have voted for it on the ground that he was not such an officer at the time the articles were presented, because of his prior expulsion, though this is not at all probable. And here it may be proper to say that the opinions expressed by counsel in that case and in some other cases, though gravely cited before us, are entitled to the same consideration as the opinions of the counsel on either side in the present case, and no more.

Much reliance has been placed upon the fact, that in England, persons out of office might be impeached for criminal conduct while they were in office. And this is claimed to be conclusive, on the ground that the Constitution has adopted the proceeding by impeachment without defining it, as it has adopted trial by jury without defining it, and that we are therefore to resort to the meaning of the term as understood by the English law. But if it were entirely true, which I think it is not, that the Constitution has adopted impeachment without defining it, we should have to look to the English law only for the nature and form of the proceeding, not to ascertain, as I think, the persons liable to be impeached. And yet, even in this mode of proceeding, my friend, the Senator from Vermont, has agreed fully with me and strenuously argued, and the majority of the Senate have held, that we are not bound by the English precedents upon the question who should open and close the argument: and he has treated the English precedents in that respect with the disapprobation which they deserve. The facts, as I understand them, are that, by the English precedents—for we can hardly say by English law, where all law was set at defiance and a law made for each case as passion, prejudice, or political partisan advantage might dictate—impeachment was not confined to those who were or had been in public office, under the government, but extended to private citizens who had never been in office, and certainly, if they had but a collateral and indirect connection with a public office or trust, which, it has never until now been seriously claimed is or ever has been the case under our Constitution—and certainly cannot be since the decision in Blount's case. By the English precedents it was the practice to inflict the whole punishment supposed to be due to the offense, and without the restraint of any previous law or of any law but such as the caprice, or passion or malice, or popular indignation might at the moment demand. Such were some of the earlier cases, at least in reference to parties, to modes of proceeding and punishment, which became precedents; and we all know that whatever was once done in England in any judicial, quasi-judicial, or parliamentary proceeding, however awkwardly, unjustly, or unwisely done, was sure to be looked upon as the only proper mode of action in such cases, until the common sense or common humanity of the people forced the courts or the Parliament out of the old ruts into, or towards, the path of reason and humanity; and they have not even yet been driven into the path of equal justice in all things connected with the process of impeachment. Many of the precdents in impeachment cases—like those in their ordinary criminal courts in former times, which denied counsel or a copy of the indictment to a defendant in the higher grades of crimes, or, in capital cases, the privilege of having a witness sworn in his defense, and later, when allowed the privilege of having a witness sworn, if present, yet denied him a subpœna to compel the attendance of his witness, and many other precedents in times when an indictment or impeachment was equivalent to a conviction—are precedents "more honored in the breach than the observance."

But there was one feature of impeachment in England which does not exist under our Constitution, if that is to be construed as some have construed it here. The whole punishment to which the party was liable was imposed by the judgment, or, at least, it was so treated; and, however capricious or extraordinary that punishment was, the conviction and punishment on impeachment were practically a bar to any prosecution or punishment by indictment. And they did not violate the great principle that no man is to be punished twice for the same offense, which would be the case under our Constitution if the judgment on conviction by impeachment is to be considered, in any proper sense, punishment for the offense charged. The impeachment there was, in the full sense, for the purpose of criminal punishment, and the whole of the punishment due to the offense, as well as to get, or keep, the offender out of office. And such would seem to have been the case in Pennsylvania, under the constitution of 1776, which has been cited here, and which the Constitution of the United States certainly did not adopt, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] claims; for the Constitution of the United States does not allow the punishment usually imposed by the statute for the offense to be imposed at all as a consequence, or on the trial, of the impeachment, but leaves the party liable to be indicted and punished for that offense in the proper court; thus showing, as it seems to me, that the only object of the impeachment was to get the officer out of office, and, after his expulsion, to keep him out, though this may and does incidentally operate as punishment to that extent. But, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] it is clear the framers of the Constitution did not consider removal and disqualification by impeachment as, in the just or legal sense, punishment for the offense charged, since they have expressly given to Congress the power to declare the punishment of treason, which is expressly made an impeachable offense. (Article 4, section 3.) And the same may also be said of several other offenses which might be the subject both of impeachment and indictment; and it can hardly be claimed that Congress was to have the right to alter the Constitution. (See article 1, section 8.)

In England impeachment was not founded upon, or in any respect regulated by, any express provision of a constitution or statute. The question must therefore turn exclusively upon the intention to be gathered from the several provisions of the Constitution upon the subject of impeachment, which it must be admitted are not as clear as they might have been made, perspicuity having, as in several other provisions of the same instrument, been sacrificed to brevity. And it is not at all strange that equally honest and equally able minds should reach different conclusions. The arguments are not (in the absence or disregard of precedents, or if the question is to be argued as a new question would not be) all on one side. Others have presented and will present those in favor of the power of impeachment in this case; and it is sufficient for me to point out some of the considerations which lead my mind to the opposite conclusion.

How are we to ascertain the intention of the Constitution, and whose intention is it which shall govern? It is the people of the United States who speak through this Constitution. It derives its force and validity from their adoption and ratification. It is their intent and their meaning we are to seek. As we believe they must have understood it, so we should interpret and obey it. It can make little difference what any particular member or any members of the convention—unless it clearly appears to have been a majority—may have thought of the effect of any particular provision. Some may have understood and intended these provisions in one way, some in another. Some may have voted for it with one object, others for an opposite purpose; but unless it clearly appears that a majority of the convention agreed in one and the same views, what they may have said or thought is of very little importance, as it would not have enabled the people, had they had the debates before them, which (to any considerable extent) they had not, to have determined the intention otherwise than we are ourselves compelled to do; and that is from the language used (in the Constitution) to express it, understood in the light of surrounding circumstances. If they looked to the constitutions of the several States at the time, they would see that upon the question whether a man could be impeached for official misconduct after he had ceased to be an officer, some State constitutions had no provision on the subject. Some States, as Virginia and Delaware, expressly permitted this as to the chief executive of the State; while in at least two others, Massachusetts and New York, it was, I think, very clear from the language of their constitutions that the impeachment could not be sustained after the offender was out of office. And they would also have discovered that the language in reference to impeachment adopted in the Constitution of the United States, was more exactly that of the constitutions of New York and Massachusetts than of any other State. And as the people of each State would naturally have been better acquainted with the constitution of their own State than that of any other, those in different States might possibly understand the same provisions differently.

If we look to the debates before the people and the State conventions, so far as they are preserved, we shall find but little, merely sporadic expressions, sometimes one way and sometimes the other, and showing nothing like a settled, general popular opinion; but as I think, upon the whole, rather opposed to the idea of impeaching a man out of office. And certainly I think this is the case with the series of papers called the Federalist, which probably had quite as much influence before the people as anything else. But look where we will outside of the language of the Constitution and we shall find no such unanimity or preponderance of opinion as to control that language into the support of the jurisdiction in question. We are, then, driven, as the people of that day were driven, (for finding the intention,) to the only legitimate source for them and for us, the language employed to express their intention. And to express my own opinion of that intention to be derived from the language of the Constitution I cannot do better than to cite the views of Judge Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, (third edition, § 803,) which, though not intended to be given as a final or definite opinion, because the precise question had not yet been decided, nevertheless shows the result of his own reasoning; and his work shows that no man has ever examined the question more thoroughly. If the Madison Papers were not then published, the people in adopting the Constitution were as ignorant of them as Judge Story, who says: "As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," and, in another clause, that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," it would seem to follow that the Senate, on the conviction, were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice. And it may be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense, when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable.

Again, Judge Story says, (§ 790,) in commenting upon the fourth section of the second article:

> From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice-President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that kingdom all the king's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament, though it is asserted that commoners cannot now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. Such kinds of deeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper, and have been the most usual, grounds for this kind of prosecution in Parliament. There seems to be a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeaching power to persons holding office. In such a government all the people are equal, and ought to have the same security of a trial by ury for all crimes and offenses laid to their charge when not holding any official character, &c.

These extracts so exactly express my own views that I need say little more upon the main question. It is clear from these extracts (as well as sections 789, 790, 792, and 793) that Judge Story, as I do, and as the Senators from Ohio do, considered the fourth section of article 2 as a designation of the parties liable to impeachment under the Constitution, as well as the causes for such impeachment. But, unlike the Senators from Ohio, he did not draw the conclusion that these various parties when out of office were still impeachable, because he undoubtedly saw, what the Senators from Ohio cannot on reflection fail to see, that if this section be a designation of the parties liable to impeachment, such parties cannot be impeached when out of office, as it clearly refers to them as holding the office at the time of impeachment, and expressly declares that they "shall be removed from office on impeachment;" a thing which could not very conveniently be done, if they were not in office at the time of impeachment. Now whether, as contended by some, it is this section which gives the power of impeachment, or whether that power is given by the provision declaring that "the House shall have the sole power of impeachment and the Senate to try," &c., if this section 4 is to be understood as an enumeration of the parties liable or intended to be made liable to impeachment, then this enumeration operates as a limitation of the power of impeachment to the parties named or enumerated in the section; and there can be no escape from the conclusion that the parties named must be in office at the time of impeachment.

Look at the language, now, understood in the light of such limitation:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Must not the President and Vice-President be in office at the time of impeachment, when the language is that "the President," &c., "shall be removed from office on trial and conviction?" And if such is the case with the President and Vice-President, must it not be the same with all the civil officers mentioned in the same sentence and connected by the conjunction "and?" Certainly no one can deny this. The Senator from Vermont admits, and no one capable of understanding language at all will deny, that under the clause of section 3, article 1, "when the President is tried the Chief Justice shall preside," only applies to the President while in office; and is not this equally clear here?

Having thus shown that, if the fourth section of article 2 is to be understood as an enumeration of the parties intended by the Constitution to be impeachable, there is no escape from the conclusion that they must be in office when impeached; I shall, in the proper place, endeavor to show that this section was intended as an enumeration of all the parties liable to impeachment, as some Senators on the other side expressly, and more of them by necessary implication, admit.

Several Senators admit that none but "civil officers of the United States" can be impeached, and that no one can be impeached except for the very crimes enumerated in this section; in other words, that the power is limited to the parties and offenses spoken of in this section. Certainly there is nothing else in the Constitution establishing the limitation.

For myself, I think the proceeding by impeachment was intended principally to secure the Government against official misconduct, and not at all for punishment, except as the removal and disqualification may incidentally operate as such. The punishment, as was remarked in Blount's trial, touches neither the defendant nor his property, but simply affects his political capacity. And I do not see the force which some Senators appear to see in the analogy so much relied upon between statutes, on the one hand, defining and punishing offenses by indictment, imposing two or more kinds of punishment for an offense, and, on the other, the constitutional provision in section 3, article 1 of the Constitution, which admits both of a removal and disqualification, absolutely requiring the first and admitting the second. The purpose of such statutes as were referred to, was to provide for the full punishment for the crime in the same prosecution by indictment. The whole purpose was punishment, and full and complete punishment, as such, in the ordinary legal sense, and all in the same single proceeding. While such, as I have endeavored to show, was not the direct purpose of the punishment which incidentally springs from removal and disqualification; and the Constitution expressly leaves the party liable to prosecution and punishment by indictment for the full punishment prescribed by law for the offense.

No species of legal argument is so liable to mislead as an argument based upon assumed analogies. Nullum simile est idem—no more like is the same; and before we yield to an argument from analogy, we ought to see that the instance assumed as the basis of analogy or standard of comparison contains all the important or essential elements which are contained in the provisions to be illustrated or the proposition to be demonstrated, and that there are no conflicting elements in the one which involve a different principle from those involved in the other. To give any force to the analogy relied upon, the statutes fixing the several penalties (one of which is found impracticable) should, like the Constitution, provide for a trial of a part only of the penalties at one time, leaving the defendant liable to another trial in another tribunal, and a separate punishment to be inflicted by each tribunal, or for a mere political punishment for the several offenses in one tribunal or at one time, and, for all other purposes and aspects of punishment, in another tribunal or at another time. But all these would not make the analogy complete without a provision tending to show that one of the penalties must in all cases be inflicted, leaving the other discretionary. And this last, without the other characteristics, would of itself be of little or no force. It will be time enough, therefore, to consider the supposed analogy when a statute containing all the foregoing characteristics shall be produced. As yet I know of none.

Again, it is insisted by those who maintain the right of impeachment in the present case, that those provisions giving the House the sole power of impeachment and the Senate the power of trying all impeachments, vests in the House and Senate the full power of impeachment as it existed in England, except as restrained by other clauses referring only to the mode of proceeding and the punishment. In my opinion those provisions amount to nothing more than a declaration that those bodies shall have all the power of impeachment and trial provided for under this Constitution, and that we are to look to article 4 of section 2 to find who are to be impeached, and to the last clause of section 3, article 1, for the judgment which alone can be rendered; that the clauses giving the House full power to impeach and the Senate to try impeachments were intended, as well for the purpose of distributing to each their respective share in the proceeding, as to give the power; and that the real meaning of those clauses, when construed in reference to subsequent clauses is, that the House shall have the power to impeach and the Senate to try impeachments in the cases thereinafter provided.

I listened to the argument of the Senator from Vermont upon this point, as upon every other, with attention, with pleasure, and, it is not too much to say, with admiration; and it is upon the ground upon which he has attempted to sustain the present impeachment that it must stand, if it can stand at all. But if his arguments and conclusions are correct, that we are to look to the English precedents to ascertain the parties who are impeachable, then not only the President and Vice-President, and the civil officers provided for by our Constitution to be appointed by the President or heads of Departments, or by the courts of law, as authorized by the Constitution, are impeachable, but Senators and Representatives and all other persons, at least who may be in any manner employed in the administration or aiding in the performance of the business or the protection of the interests of the Government as servants or as counsel, or otherwise; as all these, at least, would have been clearly impeachable under the English precedents. And the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who adopts, upon this point, the same argument as the Senator from Vermont, boldly accepts this consequence, which, it must be admitted, is inevitable from such premises, and, in answer to the Senator from New York, holds that persons acting merely as counsel for the United States would be impeachable.

But unless we are to overrule and wholly disregard the solemn decision of the Senate in the Blount case (and if we are to be bound by any precedent whatever, it must be the decision of this, our own court) no such doctrine can be maintained; for it was the very ground and the sole and express ground of that decision, the very premises upon which the conclusion of his non-liability to impeachment was drawn, that none but "civil officers of the United States" were impeachable, and that therefore, though Blount was a Senator, he was not impeachable, not being a civil officer of the United States, "within the meaning of the Constitution;" and there is certainly no other provision of the Constitution which has been claimed or can be claimed to confine impeachment to "civil officers of the United States," except the provision of the fourth section of the second article. The inference is therefore absolutely irresistible, that they looked upon this section as limiting the power of impeachment to the parties mentioned in this section; and so Judge Story treats it, and expresses his opinion to that effect without any reservation or doubt whatever. (See section 790 et seq.) But this is not left to mere inference, conclusive as that is. It is in legal effect, expressed in the Blount case that this very section is the one to which they allude for this limitation to "civil officers." Let us see. The plea to the jurisdiction, in legal effect, set up two grounds: one that he was not a Senator of the United States at the time, &c., and, second, that, even if he was a Senator, he was not a civil officer of the United States, within the meaning of the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, to which it expressly refers. (See the plea, Annals of Congress, volume 2; Wharton's State Trials.) The first ground was answered on the argument, according to the admitted fact of the case, that he was a Senator of the United States at the time when the acts charged were done and when impeached, which was true; and this point thereafter seems to have made no figure in the case, and quite clearly had nothing to do with the decision. The argument and the decision turned upon the second ground, whether a Senator was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the fourth section, article 2. Turn, now, to the decision.

The first resolution offered to the Senate, and of course, as sufficiently appears upon its face, this must have been offered by one of the Senators in favor of the jurisdiction, and it will be seen that even these resolutions go upon the admission that none but civil officers of the United States are liable to impeachment under the Constitution—which refers, of course, to this fourth section, as there is no other to which it could refer for such a purpose—but asserts nevertheless that Blount (being a Senator) was such civil officer, (January 7, 1799:)

Resolved, That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives;

That as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled. (See Annals of Congress, volume 2, page 2318, Wharton's State Trials, page —.)

The vote upon the resolution was 11 for, and 14 against it; so that it failed; showing that, by 14 to 11 the Senate determined, in effect, that a Senator of the United States is not a "civil officer of the United States," and was not therefore impeachable. This is clearly enough shown by the vote afterward taken on the 11th day of February, offered manifestly by some one opposed to the jurisdiction, as follows:

The court is of the opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant, is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of said impeachment, and said impeachment is dismissed.—Annals of Congress, volume 2, as above.

The vote upon this shows the Senators divided exactly by the same number, there being 14 for and 11 against it. Then look to the judgment and its announcement to the managers, which is in the following language:

The court, after having given the most mature and serious consideration to the question and to the full and able arguments urged on both sides, has come to the decision which I am now about to deliver.

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of said impeachment; and the said impeachment is dismissed. (Page 3319, volume 2 of Annals of Congress.)

Thus showing that the plea in effect asserting that none but civil officers of the United States could be impeached under the fourth section of the second article (which was expressly referred to) was sustained by the Senate, and on this ground the impeachment was dismissed.

Who does not see that the whole conclusion rests immediately and entirely upon the ground, that none but civil officers of the United States could be impeached under the Constitution, that this is the entire premises from which the conclusion is drawn? Of what consequence was it to inquire whether a Senator was a "civil officer of the United States," if he could just as well be impeached whether a civil officer or not? And where in the Constitution does the limitation of the power of impeachment come from, if not from this section 4? It cannot be pretended there is any other limitation of this kind in the Constitution. Is it not perfectly clear, then, that the Senate treated this fourth section as such limitation or an enumeration of all parties intended by the Constitution to be impeachable? But finally let me ask, if this fourth section does not confine their power of impeachment "to civil officers of the United States," all of whom the Constitution provides shall be commissioned by the President, (article 2, section 3, also article 2, section 2,) why are not Senators and Representatives also impeachable? Why are not military and naval officers also impeachable? Members of both Houses of Parliament and military and naval officers were, I think, clearly impeachable in England. And if we are at liberty to determine the classes of persons liable to impeachment by English precedents, I can see no reason why all military and naval officers and Senators and Members of the House are not as clearly impeachable here as they ever were in England. And this must, I think, be the inevitable result, unless the fourth section of article 2 limits the power to the parties there mentioned. And yet it has been expressly admitted by some Senators who sustain the jurisdiction in the present case, and tacitly admitted, I think, by several of them, that the power, under our Constitution, does not extend to military and naval officers: and no one has yet contended in this discussion that it extends to Senators and Representatives or to military or naval officers. I do not know whether the Senator from Vermont claims that it extends to military and naval officers.

Mr. DAWES. Does not the same removal and disqualification follow a sentence cashiering an officer in the military and naval service as the Constitution imposes upon other officers on conviction by impeachment?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That may be so. But do not the same consequences follow upon conviction by indictment in a criminal court for the very offenses charged upon Mr. Belknap? If the fact of such liability to disqualification, without impeachment, can be alleged as a reason why impeachment should not be sustained in the one case, I do not see why it should not be equally efficacious in the other. Both stand upon the same ground, the authority of an act of Congress only, and not the Constitution. Is it denied that by the English law, or rather precedent, military and naval officers are impeachable? I have not hunted the precedents, taking it for granted that all of the older as well as more modern English writers who assert the power of impeachment to extend to all the King's subjects, knew better than any Senator here how the fact was. But, I read from Comyn's Digest, which I sent for a few minutes since, title Judicature of Parliament, 31, the following passages which show instances of the impeachment of naval officers for official delinquency in office, and there can be no reason for supposing that it did not extend as well to military officers, though, as I have not lately posted myself in English history, I do not happen at this moment to recollect an instance; but other Senators doubtless may. I read from Comyn, at the place cited above:

The Duke of Buckingham was impeached, for that he, being admiral, neglected the safeguard of the sea. (Rush. 308.)

The Earl of Oxford, that he hazarded the navy and had neglected to take ships of the enemy, 8 May, 1701, and for selling goods taken as admiral, for his own use, without accounting for a tenth to others, 8 May, 1701. (Ibid. L. 39.)

I will here say that I see nothing in this book, and recollect nothing in any other English work, ancient or modern, making any distinction between different classes of subjects, whether officers or not, subject to impeachment, nor anything which tends to controvert the assertion of so many English writers, that all the King's subjects were impeachable.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator remember any particular instance of an impeachment of a strictly private person in no way connected with office?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I have not looked for any. When I find all the English writers from the earliest times asserting in effect that all British subjects are liable to it, and no English authority anywhere intimating any distinction between classes subject to it, nor that any but the king are not, the Senator will pardon me if I say I have more confidence in this uniform testimony of the English writers who had the best opportunity to know, than I have in the Senator, or any Senator here, who infers that all these English writers were in error simply because he has not found an instance.

If he were to apply the same reasoning to the common law generally, and deny everything to be law for which he could not find a decided case in the year books or in any English reports, he would leave very large gaps in the English common law.

The fact undoubtedly is that many principles of the common law, as well relating to the power of impeachment as to anything else, had become settled before the earliest reports or parliamentary records now extant, though the mode of exercising the power of impeachment has undergone several changes since the parliamentary records still extant.

I turn now to some miscellaneous citations from Comyn's Digest, lying before me, which happen to be on and near the page just cited, and which, in a miscellaneous manner, may tend to show for what offenses an impeachment would lie in England, and therefore for what they would lie here, if the fourth section of the second article does not limit the offenses for which impeachment may be sustained.

And if this fourth section does not limit the parties liable to impeachment, it does not limit the offenses for which it may be sustained. Nor is there anything elsewhere in the Constitution which would confine impeachments to "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors."

I read these miscellaneous examples, showing for what a man may be impeached. "The Earl of Bristol was impeached (2 Carolus) that he counseled against a war with Spain when that king affronted us, to the dishonor and detriment of the realm, (article 3, 1 Rushworth, 250;) that he advised a toleration of papists, (1 Rushworth, 251;) that he enticed the king to popery, (id., 252, 262;) the Spencers, that they gave bad counsel to the king, (4 Institutes, 54;) the Earl of Oxford, that he advised a prejudicial peace, (8th May, 1701.)

It is true these were privy councilors, but the offense was in giving advice to the king. If the offenses here for which a party may be impeached are the same as in England, (and without the limitation of the fourth section, article 2, as upon the argument of those who support the jurisdiction they must be,) how many Senators may be impeachable for advice given to the President, especially in reference to appointments? Is such advice one of the "high misdemeanors" mentioned in the Constitution?

But what shall we say of advising the toleration of papists? This, according to the English law of impeachment, was as much an impeachable offense as bribery or any other crime or misdemeanor; and upon the argument in favor of the jurisdiction here I see nothing to prevent its impeachment. There certainly is not, unless the fourth section operates as a limitation to the crimes and misdemeanors there mentioned, or the first amendment of the Constitution may so operate. And who in this country would not be liable to impeachment for this cause? Who does not advise the toleration of papists?

Again, the Spencers, father and son, were impeached, among other things, "for that they put good magistrates out of office and advanced bad." (4 Institutes, page 53.) How many Presidents and Secretaries might have been impeached here, if this is an impeachable offense, and how many Senators, as accessories before or after the fact?

Lord Halifax was impeached for obtaining grants of money forfeited for rebellion, (9 June, 1701,) for obtaining grants of money when there was a war and heavy taxes, and grants out of the king's woods, (L. 39,) and so on.

But, to come back now to Blount's case, which clearly settled the point that none but civil officers of the United States are impeachable, and that section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution was intended as an enumeration of all the parties liable to impeachment and of the offenses for which they were impeachable, I will say that decision has, from the day when it was made, been approved as sound law and met the general approval of the legal profession and of the people; and, in my opinion, to change or overturn it now would be justly looked upon as revolutionary. I must, therefore, for this and other reasons already given, with diffidence, and I may say with reluctance, disagree with the conclusion of the Senator from Vermont and other Senators who have adopted his views, and hold Judge Story's view to be founded upon the sounder and the better reasons, and upon authority of a decision of this high tribunal itself.

My friend from Vermont also made, or attempted to make, an argument in support of the jurisdiction, based upon the use of the word "person," in section 3, article 1:

> And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

I agree with the Senator, and do not suppose any Senator will disagree, that, notwithstanding the Constitution in express terms speaks of the impeachment of the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers, yet, when a man who is an officer is prosecuted for an official crime, it is, when we come down to precise accuracy, the man, the person holding the office, who is prosecuted, and that the punishment on conviction is a personal punishment, not official; that, when he is removed from office, it is the man who is removed from the office, and not the office from the man. But these considerations only go to show that the use of the word "person," instead of officer, in the clause cited, whether the man is impeachable after the termination of his office or only while he continues in office, was correct, and entirely and equally correct, upon either view. The Senator will therefore permit me to say, with all deference, that he seems to me to have drawn a very large conclusion from very narrow premises, when he infers from the use of this word in this connection, that a man can be impeached when out of office, when the use of the word is just as consistent with the conclusion that he cannot. Unaided and alone, I certainly could not have drawn such an inference from such premises, and I am equally unable to accomplish the task with the powerful aid of the Senator himself; and he will pardon me for saying that his own effort in that direction seemed to me a little too much like catching at straws.

Mr. President, my conclusions upon the main question are—

First. That the main, direct, and primary purpose of impeachment is to put a man out of the office he may hold at the time of the impeachment.

Second. As a secondary and auxiliary safeguard against future misconduct in office after he has been convicted and expelled, to keep him out of that and all other civil offices of the United States; or, in other words, that the disqualification is but a discretionary incident of removal from office; and, therefore,

Third. That disqualification can only be imposed in addition to, and as a sequence of, the judgment of removal, and not as a single and substantive punishment.

I see no absurdity in this result. The respondent is still liable to be indicted in the proper criminal court and punished to the full extent of the punishment prescribed by the statute creating the offense; and the sacred right of a trial by jury is not to be disregarded, except in the clearest and most extreme cases.

These views render it necessary that I should also consider the other questions involved in the case.

And first, as to the fractional argument, the argument based upon the fractions of a day. And here allow me to say that, with my unsophisticated habits of looking at things as they are in fact, stripped of all mere forms and fictitious coverings, I certainly did not expect to live to hear it asserted in the United States Senate, upon a great state trial, that, though, upon the facts as they are admitted to be, the defendant is not liable to impeachment—and this argument proceeds upon this admission and has no bearing without it—we are at liberty, by a pure fiction, known to be and shown upon the record to be false, to exercise a jurisdiction based upon that falsehood and convict the defendant upon a pure fiction known to ourselves and the world to be a palpable lie. I am not ignorant of the fact that there are many fictions of law contrived for the purpose of justice in civil cases, which are or should be, always liable to contradiction when the rights of parties require it. I will not deny that precedents may be found in courts of law, especially in past ages, where fictions have been resorted to in criminal cases, to the prejudice of the defendant; for there is no enormity for which such precedents may not be found.

But when such precedents are invoked to show that the jurisdiction of a criminal court or the punishment of a defendant charged with a crime can be sustained upon a pure fiction, contrary to the known facts appearing upon the records, these precedents may be piled mountains high, and I shall treat them all with the contempt that all such falsehoods, urged for such purposes, deserve, in an age and a country of liberty and law.

Precedents standing upon palpable absurdities should share the fate of the absurdity upon which they stand.

But let us examine the fiction in the present case. Belknap resigned at 10.20 a. m.; his resignation was announced in the House at noon, or a little after, and late in the afternoon the vote of impeachment was adopted. It is now claimed that the law takes no notice of the fractions of a day, and therefore Belknap must be regarded as in office the entire day, or that the vote of impeachment must be regarded as having taken place at the beginning of the day, or at least before the resignation—for it makes no difference in which shape the falsehood is put, or whether it relate backward or forward. Falsehoods and fictions are very elastic, and very convenient to convict a defendant or to sustain a jurisdiction which cannot be sustained upon the truth of the case; especially if this fiction or falsehood cannot be contradicted and the actual precedence of the respective events shown as they occurred; and it is insisted we cannot inquire into the fact at what time of the day either fact took place, nor which preceded the other; but the whole day must be taken for both, because the law takes no notice of the fractions of a day.

This makes a very pretty argument, and it is a great pity to spoil it by putting a case. But duty compels us to do a great many unpleasant things. Say that on the same day that Belknap resigned a successor was appointed and confirmed—as well he might be—or take the case which did happen, of another Secretary assigned to the duties of the office on the same day and hour of the resignation, and that successor, or the officer so assigned, had, on the afternoon of the same day, been guilty of bribery or other impeachable offense. He is impeached; and on the trial he denies that he was Secretary of War or in charge of the duties of the office on that day, and to prove it shows by the record, or by Mr. Belknap himself, perhaps, that he, Belknap, was Secretary on the morning of that day, and stops there. Has he not made out a complete defense, if the fractions of a day cannot be inquired into? And as the fiction may just as well relate backward to the beginning of the day as forward to its close, why might not Belknap defend himself for bribery committed on the morning of that day, by showing that on that day another Secretary had been assigned to fill the office, whose assignment and responsibility must relate back to the first moment of the day? Now, in the case of these overlapping fictions would not every Senator admit that the truth ought to be allowed to escape between them?

I think I may safely submit it to the candor and good sense of the Senate that the succession of events or acts happening on the same day, and having relations to or affecting each other, may and ought always to be shown, whether in a civil or criminal case, as much as if they had happened on different days; and that our jurisdiction and the prosecution by impeachment can be maintained upon no such trivial falsehood, contradicted by the face of the record.

As to the question, admitting that a resignation in ordinary cases before the vote of impeachment would defeat the impeachment, would it have the same effect though made for the purpose of avoiding the impeachment? Upon this question I can entertain no doubt. The defendant had a perfect legal right to do the act, to make the resignation, and this cannot be rendered illegal or deprived of its legitimate effect, whatever his motive might have been, nor can that be inquired into.

These views render the other point contained in the resolution of the Senate in relation to the pleading, immaterial, and I therefore express no opinion upon it.

In conclusion, I must express my thanks for the indulgence of the Senate, and my regret that I have been compelled to differ with so many able Senators whose legal opinions I always respect and with whom I have generally agreed.

Remarks of Mr. Christiancy on the resolution offered by him May 29, 1876.

The question recurring on the second resolution of Mr. THURMAN, as amended,

Mr. CHRISTIANCY moved to amend the said resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting:

> Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that no person shall be convicted on impeachment without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present; and whereas more than one-third of all the members of the Senate have already pronounced their conviction that they have no right or power to adjudge or try a citizen holding no public office or trust when impeached by the House of Representatives; and whereas the respondent, W. W. Belknap, was not when impeached an officer, but a private citizen of the United States, and of the State of Iowa; and whereas said Belknap has, since proceedings of impeachment were commenced against him, been indicted and now awaits trial before a judicial court for the same offenses charged in the articles of impeachment, which indictment is pursuant to a statute requiring in case of conviction (in addition to fine and imprisonment) an infliction of the utmost judgment which can follow impeachment in any case, namely, disqualification ever again to hold office:
> Resolved, That in view of the foregoing facts it is inexpedient to proceed further in the case.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, it being now manifest that considerably more than one-third of the Senators present on this trial believe there is no jurisdiction in the Senate to try this impeachment, I think the resolution I have submitted makes the proper disposition of the case. I do not propose to argue the question at length, but to state briefly my reasons for this conclusion.

The Constitution declares that—

> No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

What is necessary to, and what is included in, the conviction here alluded to? But one answer can be given to this question, and that is, every constituent element, both of law and fact, necessary to constitute a valid conviction; and the first and most important of all these is the jurisdiction of the tribunal before whom the trial is to be had and the conviction pronounced, the right and power to try the case at all or to declare the conviction. If there be no such jurisdiction, no such power to try, any determination we may make, any conviction we may pronounce, will be simply brutum fulmen, so much empty air; for there will be no power to swear a witness in the cause and all testimony of witnesses, though given under the forms of an oath, must be extrajudicial, without the sanction of an oath, and therefore not evidence which this tribunal have a right to hear or to act upon. From these considerations it is manifest that this question of jurisdiction, though a question of law, is inseparably connected with, and involved in, every question of fact which may arise in the cause.

It is fallacious, therefore, to say that this, being a mere question of law, may be determined by a bare majority, and that the only concurrence of two-thirds required by the Constitution is upon the facts of the case or those facts and the law which would be applicable to them on the hypothesis that we have jurisdiction.

All the questions which can ever arise in any trial are questions of law, questions of fact, and questions of the application of the law to the facts; and these last are mixed questions of law and fact, when the same person or body which finds the facts also applies the law to the facts and declares the combined result of both, like a jury in giving a general verdict.

But there is this difference between a jury and the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, that the jury in matters of law are subject to the instruction of the court presiding over their deliberations and giving them instructions upon the law which they are bound to follow; and in giving their general verdict they find the facts and apply to them the law as given them by the court. Besides, a jury have generally a right to decline the application of the law to the facts by finding a special verdict setting forth the facts found and leaving the court to apply the law.

But in the Senate, on the trial of an impeachment, no such division of functions as to law and fact can be had. No court or officer presides over us with power to give instructions upon or to determine matters of law.

Every Senator, upon a trial on the merits, acts in the double capacity of judge and juror, and must for himself determine both the law and the facts and apply the one to the other according to his own convictions and judgment. And certainly no Senator can be any more bound by the opinion of any other Senator or any number of Senators upon a question of law than upon a question of fact. Each must not only draw his own inference from the evidence, but must apply that evidence to the law as he understands it to be.

It would therefore be just as absurd, under the constitutional provision requiring the concurrence of two-thirds to convict, to hold that a bare majority have a right to bind the minority upon questions of law as to hold that they have the right to bind them upon matters of fact. Propositions of law are as much involved and as essential elements in a valid conviction as propositions of fact, and they are involved in every step taken on the trial. And if this were not so, if a bare majority could control the minority upon questions of law arising upon the trial of an impeachment, such bare majority might also in many cases establish every element essential to a valid conviction in opposition to more than one-third of the Senate.

Let us consider some of the phases of the case and the questions which must naturally be expected and which usually occur upon a trial. On a trial upon the facts in the present case questions of the admissibility and of the materiality of evidence must naturally be expected to arise and almost unavoidably do arise upon all trials of the kind. These are questions of law. Now a bare majority think any particular testimony or piece of evidence offered admissible or material, as the case may be, but more than one-third of the Senate think it inadmissible or immaterial.

The bare majority, no doubt, may admit the evidence, but, in considering its effect upon the case, the minority, if they act upon their own convictions, will of course pay no attention to the evidence or give it any effect. Will any Senator claim that this minority are bound to disregard their own convictions as to the effect of such evidence because the majority hold that effect to be different? Are the minority, I mean, bound thus to yield to the majority when the result is declared upon the question of guilt or innocence? Would not this be allowing a bare majority to control as well upon the facts as upon the law? And would not this effectually fritter away the whole substance and effect of the provision requiring the concurrence of two-thirds to convict?

If, then, the decision of a bare majority in admitting evidence which the minority think inadmissible or immaterial cannot control the minority as to the effect of the evidence or bind them to give it an effect which they do not believe that it has, can or ought such majority to control such minority upon the question whether any evidence is admissible, and compel them to give effect to evidence, all of which they believe inadmissible, because the Senate has no power to try the case or to administer an oath, and because they believe all the testimony given in the case is extrajudicial, and that every witness may testify as he pleases without liability to the pains and penalties of perjury?

Is it not manifest that every proposition of law and fact which constitutes a necessary element of a valid conviction must be found and sustained by the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members present? And that if one if those elements, without which the conviction could not be valid, may be established by less than two-thirds, any other necessary element—and therefore every other—may be established in the same way and by the same course of reasoning? And what element can be more necessary to a valid conviction than the jurisdiction to try the case and declare the conviction?

Upon any question or any matter not an essential element of a valid conviction there is no doubt a bare majority may decide; but upon any proposition of law or fact without the establishment of which no valid conviction could be had, I am compelled to consider any majority less than two-thirds as no majority in the constitutional sense, and of no more binding effect than the decision of a minority.

Opinion of Mr. Whyte,

Delivered May 20, 1876.

Mr. WHYTE. Without entering into an analysis of the pleadings in this case, or expressing any opinion as to the artistic manner of their construction, it is sufficient that the broad question is evolved whether the accused can be tried for offenses alleged to have been committed while in office, upon an impeachment made after he ceased to be Secaetary of War?

In my view of this case, it is not material to the point in issue to ascertain at what precise moment of time Mr. Belknap retired from the War Department.

Whatever may be said as to the abstract question whether private persons, that is persons who have never been in office, may be impeached, from a careful examination of the cases in the British Parliament, from whose parliamentary law we have drawn the principles relating to impeachment, it is clear that except in few and rare instances prosecution by impeachment has by a long line of precedents been confined to offenses of an official character, and as against persons as well in office as those who have vacated their offices. I hold the opinion, therefore, that any person charged with the commission of crime while in office can be impeached after he has ceased to be an officer, whether by expiration of his official term or by voluntary resignation.

I believe there is no limitation as to the time when prosecution for impeachable offenses can be had, save in the sound discretion of the House of Representatives.

Impeachment as a known method of procedure is ingrafted upon our Constitution. As it was understood and exercised at the period when the organic law was framed, subject only to the limitations set forth distinctly in the Constitution, so it is now to be exercised. In the language of Professor Dwight, the Constitution "assumes the existence of this mode of trial in the law and silently points us to English precedents for knowledge of details." Mr. Webster, also, when defending Judge Prescott, and speaking of a clause in the constitution of Massachusetts similar to that in the Federal Constitution, said:

> The Constitution has given this body [the Senate] the power of trying impeachments without defining what an impeachment is, and, therefore, necessarily introducing with the term itself its usual and received definition and character and incidents which belong to it.

Whenever foreign statutes are adopted into our legislation, the known and settled construction of those statutes by courts of law has been considered as silently incorporated into the acts.

So of impeachment; as it was regulated by the parliamentary law of England, so it is to be understood, with its specific limitations, however, as part of the constitutional law of our country.

The framers of the Constitution knew impeachment to be the mode of accusation and trial of "statesmen for misdemeanors in the administration of government." They knew that as early as the reign of Edward I the power of parliamentary impeachment had been exerted, and that judges convicted of exactions had been sentenced to severe penalties by the House of Lords; that during the reign of Richard II and under that of Henry VIII lord chancellors and archbishops and chief justices had fallen under a like condemnation; that under King James I Lord Chancellor Bacon had been the subject of impeachment, and Lord Finch and others had suffered during the reign of Charles I; that under Charles II chief justices of the King's Bench and Common pleas and barons of the Exchequer had been impeached by the Commons for various great official crimes.

Thus they had before them from various epochs of English history many instances of parliamentary impeachment.

It would indeed belittle Madison and Hamilton, Sherman and Pinckney, and the other intellectual giants of that great council to suppose they did not understand in all its scope the power of impeachment, which they were then importing into our federal form of government. Some of them had access to Comyn's Digest, Bacon's and Viner's Abridgments, Rushworth's Historical Collections, and Selden's Judicature of Parliament, and Howell's State Trials; and Pinckney had, indeed, sat at the feet of Gamaliel, for he had listened at Oxford to the splendid law lectures of Blackstone, which now as his Commentaries, more than a century after their delivery, are to be found in the hands of every law student in our land. They knew, also, that in this method of criminal procedure, since the time of Edward III, the House of Commons accused and the House of Lords tried. So they gave the sole power of impeachment to the House of Representatives and the sole power of trial to the Senate. Thus the trial by impeachment, without specially defining it, was adopted from analogy to the English constitution.

The makers of the Federal Constitution gave this power of trial by impeachment to the two Houses, as above stated, in all its plenitude, and then by subsequent special limitations restricted it in its details wherever they intended its power to be restrained. The power itself they never intended to curtail; for, when they added "high crimes and misdemeanors" to treason and bribery, Colonel Mason remarked:

As bills of attainder, which have saved the British constitution, are forbidden, it is the more necessary to extend the power of impeachment.—Madison Papers, volume 3, page 1528.

And it is remarkable if true, as asserted, (and from the similarity in the two instruments the assumption seems to be well founded,) that the impeachment clauses in article 1 of our Constitution were taken from the constitution of New York of 1777, drawn by John Jay; that the word "officers" in the latter constitution is omitted in the Federal Constitution. If the New York constitution was intended to operate only on officers while in office, it is clear that the change in the words in the Federal Constitution by which "person" or "party" is substituted for "officer" was intended to give the power of impeachment wider scope and to cover the cases of those who had gone out of office after the commission of offenses as well as those who were in office at the time of impeachment.

The difference between the two Constitutions is thus shown:

New York constitution, 1777:	Constitution of the United States:
The power of impeaching all officers of the State for venal and corrupt conduct in their respective offices [shall] be vested in the representatives of the people in assembly. * * * No judgment of the said court shall be valid unless it shall be assented to by two-thirds' part of the members then present, &c.	The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. * * * No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

It is clear that it was "persons" who were to be convicted, and not "officers" qua officers, at the period of conviction; thus including ex-officers as well as incumbents of offices.

The framers of the Federal Constitution also took into view the impropriety of allowing the Vice-President to preside over the Senate during the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment, and so they provided that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court should act as presiding officer of the Senate during such trial. In the interest of the accused, under the strong legal presumption of innocence, and to protect against passion, it is seen they required two-thirds of the members present in the Senate to convict. They knew, also, that such was the high authority claimed for the court of Parliament that the House of Commons, in the reign of Charles II, in the case of the Earl of Danby, insisted that no pardon under the great seal should be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons of Great Britain, and this was finally enacted into statute law by 12 and 13 William III, chapter 2.

And so they provided that no pardon of the President should be either pleadable in cases of impeachment or operative after sentence.

They knew the unlimited power of the House of Lords to impose every kind of punishment upon the convicted, and remembering the extreme penalties which had been inflicted, and notably in the case of Lord Chancellor Bacon, who, notwithstanding his high dignity and great personal qualifications, on conviction had been fined £40,000, was ordered to be imprisoned in the tower during the king's pleasure, to be forever incapable of holding any office, place, or employment, and never again to sit in Parliament, or come within the verge of the court, they put a limitation on the judgment to be pronounced by the Senate, and put maximum bounds to its sentence in removal from office and disqualification in the future; but they left the courts of justice to vindicate the majesty of the law by indictment and criminal sentence as in other cases of infraction of the laws.

They were not ignorant that in England, although it was claimed that all subjects were liable to impeachment, yet in rare instances, as I said before, had the power been exerted in any case of offense which was not official crime or the breach of public trust; so they left impeachment where they found it in English practice and hedged about private persons with trial for crime by jury; and the people in the States amplified this protection by fuller and clearer guarantees to accused private persons by the fifth and sixth articles of the amendments to the Constitution. They knew that in England officers who had been guilty of offenses while in office were impeachable after they left office.

They had in mind that Lord Chancellor Somers had been impeached after he was out of office.

They surely were aware of the case of Lord Chancellor Macclesfield who in 1724 was in the zenith of his worldly success; yet they had seen that, shortly after the bursting of the South Sea bubble, the storm of indignation arose and he was compelled to resign his office. They knew full well that, after his resignation, in January, 1725, proceedings were originated in the House of Commons, and subsequently, after a strong speech from Sir George Oxenden, the Earl of Macclesfield was impeached. They had immediately before their eyes the case of Warren Hastings. They knew that he had left India in June, 1785, having surrendered the keys of office. He returned to England, where he was joyfully received by his friends.

On the 10th of May, 1786, Mr. Burke accused him at the bar of the House of Lords in the name of the Commons of England. Preliminary proceedings were conducted during the session of Parliament in 1787, and this case, as we have seen, was referred to on the 8th day of September, 1787, by Colonel Mason, when the clause relating to the removal of the President on impeachment and conviction for treason and bribery was under consideration in the convention, as will be seen by reference to the Madison Papers, volume 3, page 1528. He said, "Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason."

This case was thus fresh before them; and having placed several limitations on the matter of impeachment, they were silent on this important point, and made no question of the right to impeach a party guilty of official crime after he had ceased to be an officer. Besides, the objection of Mr. Pinckney, that the President ought not to be impeachable while in office is the only proposition for any limitation of the time when an offender was to be impeachable; and this is the very converse of the theory that he was impeachable after he had vacated his office.

Giving due weight to the adverse argument based on the expediency of trying a man for official crime after he is out of office and the danger of partisan impeachments, yet, under the sense of duty which impels me to decide this question judicially, I can come to no other conclusion than that, as there is no limitation to the punishment of crime except by express statutory enactment—and there is none in the Constitution as to the time when impeachments will lie—its framers meant, as Mr. Rawle has expressed it, that "persons liable to impeachment are those who 'are or have been in public office.'" And I adopt this language of John Quincy Adams, as quoted by Mr. Manager HOAR:

I hold, therefore, that every President of the United States, every Secretary of State, every officer impeachable by the laws of the country, is liable twenty years after his office expired as he is while he continues in office.

And this very doctrine will do as much as any one principle can to restore the purity of our Government and elevate the standard of official qualification.

The fourth section of the second article of the Constitution has, in my judgment, nothing whatever to do with the matter of jurisdiction in cases of impeachment. That had been granted already. On the contrary, this was a clause, absolutely mandatory in its character, for the removal of officers who were in office at the time of their impeachment and conviction. It was solely to accomplish the removal of the convicted officers; and this is clear from the fact that when it was first inserted in the Constitution (then limited as it was to the Chief Magistrate) it is called, as will be seen on page 1434 of the third volume Madison Papers, "the clause for the removal of the President on impeachment," &c.

It was a limitation upon the official term of a person who, as President, had been impeached and convicted of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," but not a limitation on the power of impeachment. It was inserted in the article of the Constitution defining the Executive department, as indicating how the official term of four years for the President could be cut short, and the insertion of "Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States" was an afterthought, in no way changing or modifying the purpose for which this clause was originally inserted in the Constitution. That purpose was to compel the Senate on impeachment and conviction of the "President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States," for treason, &c., to remove them. The language is, they "shall be removed from office."

The language is imperative; it leaves you no discretion; you cannot stop short of removal from office; you cannot exceed it.

The clause was inserted for this specific purpose; to accomplish nothing more; to leave you in such case power to do nothing less.

Much stress has been laid upon the case of Senator Blount, (Wharton's State Trials 200,) as establishing the doctrine that none but civil officers can be impeached, that is, persons in office at the time of impeachment; but I can draw no such conclusion from that case. All that was decided therein in point of law was that a Senator is not a civil officer of the United States and cannot be impeached. The party impeachable must have been an officer of the United States in reality, and, as a Senator is not an officer of the United States, he is no more liable to impeachment by the House of Representatives than any other officer of any of the States of the Union. A Senator for official crime or misconduct is liable to expulsion from the Senate, as was done in Blount's case; and that precedent was afterward followed in the expulsion of Mr. Smith, of Ohio, who was charged with being connected with the Burr conspiracy. The Constitution protects the people against the misconduct of Representatives or Senators by leaving to the respective Houses of Congress the parliamentary power of expulsion of their unworthy members.

In accordance with these views I do not deem it necessary to consider any question relating to the time or circumstances under which the resignation of the late Secretary of War was tendered or accepted, but considering him out of office on the 2d day of March, 1876, I hold that the Senate is bound under the Constitution to take jurisdiction of this case. The demurrer should be overruled, and going back to the first defect in the pleadings the plea should be overruled and the accused should be required to answer or plead further to the articles of impeachment.

Opinion of Mr. Mitchell,

Delivered May 22, 1876.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the conclusions I have reached on the issue presented, by what is in substance and legal effect the plea of the respondent to the jurisdiction of the Senate, shall be stated briefly, and without unnecessary elaboration as to the reasons guiding me.

The Government of the United States is one of limited powers, the Constitution being the grant, consequently no exercise of any power upon the part of Congress, or either branch thereof, can be justified unless the authority for such exercise can be plainly traced either to some express grant in the Constitution, or to one necessarily implied from the terms of that instrument.

Before proceeding to an examination of the different clauses of the Constitution I will state that I do not deem it proper either to discuss or decide any of the many questions that have been suggested during the progress of this proceeding which are immaterial to the decision of the question now before this court. For instance, I do not feel called upon to answer, either publicly or in my own mind, as to the precise catalogue of offenses that are impeachable under our Constitution, nor whether a military officer may or may not be impeached, nor whether a person in office may be impeached for an offense committed prior to the time he took office, and when he was a private citizen, nor whether a person in office is impeachable for a high crime or misdemeanor committed prior to the time he entered upon that particular office, and while he was holding another office. The decision of these questions as well as many others that have been suggested and argued during this discussion is not absolutely essential to the determination of the issues now before the Senate, which stripped of all complication are simply and purely these:

First. Is the person, William W. Belknap, who has been a civil officer of the United States, but who is not now such officer, and was not at the inception of these proceedings, subject to impeachment for an impeachable offense committed while in such office, without regard to the question as to how he was disrobed of office, whether by resignation, removal, or expiration of his term?

Second. If he is not, then does the fact that he resigned to escape impeachment, or the fact that his resignation occurred on the same day that he was impeached, make any difference?

Should the former question be decided in the affirmative, then the latter also, and those incident to it, become immaterial. Striving therefore to keep steadily in view the precise questions before us, I will state briefly my conclusion, and the reasons that lead to it.

What are the powers conferred by the Constitution, either by express grant or by necessary implication, upon the House of Representatives to impeach and the Senate to try the person impeached? What is the nature and extent of the original grant, and what, if any, are the limitations or restrictions upon it?

In giving construction to the Constitution for the purpose of ascertaining the character and limits of any of its granted powers, all its provisions bearing upon the particular subject under consideration should be considered and construed together, and in such manner as to give legitimate effect to each part, and harmony to all.

Section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution provides, among other things, as follows:

> The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

I regard this as an express, distinct, positive, absolute, and unqualified grant of jurisdictional power to the House of Representatives to impeach. It is not, as has been suggested by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and others, a mere assignment of the part the House is to act in the execution, jointly with the Senate, of a power granted elsewhere in the Constitution. It is not merely functional but jurisdictional; not directory as to manner of procedure, but substantive as to grant of power. It is itself the source of the power to impeach, and not merely a direction in the execution of such power. The grant is express, plenary, unqualified, unlimited, without any word of restraint save that of exclusiveness, and this of course does not operate upon the House of Representatives but rather upon every other Department and officer of Government and upon all private persons as well. "Shall have the sole power of impeachment;" that is to say no other Department, or branch, or officer of the Government, nor shall any private person exercise this power, but the House of Representatives shall have the power of impeachment. The first section of article 1 of the Constitution provides as follows:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Mark the language: not all legislative powers, not all the unlimited powers of legislation known to the English Parliament, but all legislative powers herein granted. The clause assumes that in subsequent parts of the Constitution there will be a separate grant, specific or by necessary implication, of the identical powers of legislation which it is provided by this clause shall be vested in "a Congress." Here then it may with propriety be said that this clause is not a jurisdictional grant of the various powers of legislation, but simply a designation of the depository that shall receive and exercise these powers, namely, a "Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." But compare with this the last clause of section 2 in article 1 relating to impeachment:

> The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Is there any assumption here that further on in that instrument there is to be a separate grant, either expressly or by implication, of the powers of impeachment? Most certainly not. Is there anything in this language that would justify the construction that it is merely functional and not jurisdictional; that it was intended merely as a designation of a particular branch of the Government to perform one part in the proceedings of impeachment, the jurisdictional power of which was to be granted in a subsequent section? Clearly, to my mind, not. Had such been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, it seems to me they would have employed restrictive language similar to that used in the clause designating the repository of all legislative powers. They would have said, "The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment herein granted;" or, "All powers of impeachment herein granted shall be vested in the House of Representatives;" and so also in the clause relating to the trial of impeachments. If it had been the intention to simply designate a certain tribunal as the authority to execute certain powers otherwise and in another section specifically or by necessary implication granted, instead of saying "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," they would have employed different language; they would have followed the precedent laid down in the first section of the first article, and said, "The sole power herein granted to try all impeachments shall be vested in the Senate;" or, "The Senate shall have the sole power herein granted to try all impeachments;" or, as in the clauses relating to executive and judicial power, they would, after designating the different arms of the Government that shall carry on the proceedings in impeachment, have proceeded to say, in the same connection, to what cases the impeachment power should extend, both as to person and offense.

But it is said the clause which in section 1 of article 2 declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America" is in conflict with this argument and opposed to the construction I give to the clause in section 2 article 1 in reference to impeachment. Most assuredly not, for the simple reason that the Constitution, after declaring that "the executive power shall be vested in a President," proceeds in the very same breath, in the same article, in the appropriate place in that instrument, and under the proper head, to designate in specific terms what that power shall be. For instance, "Shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, to nominate and appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not in the Constitution otherwise provided for; to fill up all vacancies that may happen during a recess of the Senate, to convene both Houses on extraordinary occasions, and in case of disagreement to adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper," &c. And so in reference to the clause in section 1, article 3, which declares that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court.

Here again the framers of the Constitution proceed in the same article, in the appropriate place and under the proper head, to state to what cases the judicial power shall extend, and enumerate them at length. But where is the clause in the Constitution which declares that the powers of impeachment shall extend to certain cases, either as to person or offense? Suppose the Constitution had stopped in speaking of judicial power with the simple declaration that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," could it be contended that there was no grant of judicial power to the Government of the United States? Clearly not, and would not all admit in such a case that in determining what that power was we would look to the history of jurisprudence in England? And so in reference to the clause in section 2 of article 1 in reference to impeachment.

But suppose section 1, article 1, were all there was in that instrument on the subject of legislative power. It is clear no power of legislation whatever would have been granted to Congress, because that clause declares that "all legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." That clause, then, is a mere declaration of the particular branch or department of the Government that shall exercise all legislative power, and not a jurisdictional grant of the power itself. This clause is indeed functional and not jurisdictional, and in this it differs widely, in my judgment, from the clauses in sections 2 and 3 of article 1 in referencce to impeachment, which I regard as jurisdictional, and which, in my opinion, are the only clauses in the Constitution that do confer jurisdiction in impeachment, if we may except that clause in paragraph 6 of section 3 of article 1, which reads: "When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside," which clause I think may very properly be construed as a necessarily implied grant of power to impeach the President and thus enlarge in this respect the English parliamentary power of impeachment by extending it to the executive head of the Government, for in England the king could not be impeached. This would not be a forced or unreasonable construction of this clause. Still I incline to the opinion that without this clause, or that of section 4, article 2 of the Constitution, the President would be impeachable under the general grant of power by the House to impeach and the Senate to try, from the fact that the reason for the exemption of the king from impeachment does not hold good as to the President, namely, "that the king can do no wrong." The President, unlike the king, has the power to do wrong, and unfortunately sometimes exercises that power. The more reasonable construction, therefore, to be given to the clause "when the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside" is, that it was not intended as a jurisdictional grant of power to impeach the President, but simply a recognition of such power previously granted with a provision as to the officer that should preside when he was impeached.

But what are we to understand by the phrase "power of impeachment?" The Constitution does not define it. The framers of that instrument did not in their wisdom think proper to specify by limits the extent, the height or depth or breadth or volume of this power. Whatever they understood that power to be, however, according to the usages of Parliament at the time they inserted this clause in the Constitution; whatever the people of the United States understood by this phrase when they, in order to form a more perfect Union, ordained and established the Constitution, whether wide enough to include the right to impeach any person whomsoever for any offense whatsoever against any law or rule of morals of the land, or so limited as to apply solely to civil officers of the Government while in office for offenses committed while in office, they granted it all to the House of Representatives, reserving no part of it to the States or to the people, vesting no portion of it anywhere else. Not the power of impeachment, however, that existed under the lex Parliamenti in 1376, when Richard Lyon was impeached for removing the staple of wool into France and loaning money at usurious rates; not the power necessarily that existed in the fourteenth or fifteenth nor yet in the sixteenth century; but the power of impeachment as it had become crystallized by usage as to impeachable offenses, persons impeachable and judgment on impeachment, in the latter part of the eighteenth century, at the date of the formation of our Constitution. This latter is the power of impeachment that was conferred upon the Government of the United States by the clauses in the first article of the Constitution. This was the power of impeachment it was intended should be exercised by this Government, save and except as it was limited or extended, if at all, either as to person, offense, or judgment, by subsequent provisions of the Constitution.

The Constitution, we are told, is "an instrument of enumeration, and not of definition," consequently the power is granted, while the definition of that power is left undefined: and while English history and English precedents confer no powers on our Federal Government, they are both invaluable as aids in defining the powers that are granted by the Constitution either expressly or by necessary implication. Impeachment had for centuries formed a part of the jurisprudence, if I may so speak, of the English government prior to the formation of our Constitution. The records of the British Parliament for a period of four hundred years were dotted with the history of impeachment trials that had taken place prior to that date. The power of impeachment as exercised in England and the settled usage of Parliament in this respect were then well understood by the statesmen of this country. They had been moulded into shape by the lapse of ages and crystallized into perfect form by an almost unbroken line of notable precedents. The dim, shadowy outlines of the parliamentary lex non scripta of the fourteenth century had become the well-defined parliamentary lex scripta of 1787. In fact, our Constitution was made in the full blaze of light, shed upon the subject by the impeachment of Warren Hastings, the governor-general of India, after his term of office had expired, for offenses committed while in office. The conclusion, therefore, is irresistible and logical that the men who framed our Constitution, the people who ordained and established it, used the terms "power of impeachment" in the sense in which these terms were at that time understood and used in the lex Parliamenti of England, and that they intended by the clause in the second article of the first section of the Constitution to make a full, absolute, express grant of this power in such sense to the House of Representatives, and the further unqualified, express grant of power to the Senate to try all such impeachments by the clause in the third section of the first article, which reads:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

What, then, was the true definition of the power of impeachment in the English parliamentary law at the time our Constitution was framed? For to this great defining power, the law and precedents of England—so often invoked by the highest judicial tribunal of our land—must we appeal for a definition of not only the power of impeachment, but of the persons impeachable. In this connection Mr. Rawle in his Commentaries on the Constitution, in speaking of impeachments, says:

> Impeachments are thus introduced as a known, definite term, and we must have recourse to the common law of England for a definition of them. (Rawle on Constitution, page 198.)

For the purposes of this case it may not be necessary to inquire into the full scope and extent of this definition. It is enough for us to know that according to the usage of Parliament it meant, generically, the prosecution by Parliament of any of the king's subjects for those offenses or "misdeeds" which, as stated by Mr. Wooddeson in his Law Lecture, volume 2, page 601, "peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust;" and although it is generally stated that at common law there is no limit as to the person or character of the offense, in other words, that "all the king's subjects are impeachable in Parliament," yet it is manifest to my mind that prior to the formation of our constitution the usage of the realm had so far limited the exercise of this power, if indeed any wider scope ever attached to it, as to make it apply solely to the prosecution of persons who either were or had been in office, for offenses committed while in office—in other words, for an offense as an officer, or while an officer of the Government, affecting the administration of public affairs.

And again, may it not with perfect propriety be claimed in the light of the English precedents that such has always been the full extent of the power of impeachment in England, and that the general declaration of the books to the effect that all the king's subjects are liable to impeachment should be construed to mean that all subjects who hold or have held office, and who have been guilty of any offense affecting public interests, disturbing the just administration of governmental affairs, are liable to impeachment? And applying the doctrine here, all private citizens are, in a certain sense, subject to impeachment, because all citizens may hold office and may commit impeachable offenses while in office. I must, therefore, not be understood as holding that all private persons are impeachable, but only such as have held office under the United States, and are chargeable with impeachable offenses committed while in office. As to whether the power extends to other than civil officers, it is not now necessary to determine. I am free to admit, however, that if any such limitation exists it is not by virtue of any restrictive provision of the Constitution itself upon the parliamentary power of impeachment, but is to be found in the restricted character of the parliamentary power itself, formed and fashioned by the usages of ages; and that such limitation did not exist in England I would by no means affirm, for I believe no military officer has been impeached for centuries in England, unless he was in some manner connected with the civil administration.

The records of the British Parliament through a history of many centuries, during which scores of impeachment trials occurred, fail to disclose, so far as we have been advised in the investigation of this case, a solitary case of impeachment except for official crime or breach of public trust. The grant, therefore, contained in the two clauses, "the House shall have the sole power of impeachment," and "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," aside from any limitations that may be imposed by other parts of the Constitution, amounts in legal effect to this: That the House of Representatives shall have the power to impeach and the Senate to try all persons impeached for official crime; and by official crime I mean any offense possibly necessarily a high crime or misdemeanor affecting adversely the administration of public affairs, not of course necessarily only such offenses as are indictable either by statute or the common law. And upon this power, as we have seen in so far as this part of the Constitution is concerned, there is no limitation whatever, either as to the place where the offense is committed, the time when it is committed, or the status of the offender, either at the date of the impeachment or the time of trial or judgment. The power, therefore, of the House of Representatives to impeach and the Senate to try all persons for all official crime being plenary and unqualified, in virtue of the two clauses of the Constitution quoted, it follows that all persons now living who have at any time since the formation of our Government, while officers of the Government, been guilty of official crime, as I have defined these terms, are liable to impeachment by the House and trial by the Senate without regard to the question as to whether they have ceased to be such officers, unless indeed there are limitations upon this liability to be found in other portions of the Constitution.

Mr. Hamilton, in No. 65 of the Federalist, in speaking of impeachable offenses, says:

> The subjects of impeachment are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust.

What are these limitations, if any, relating to the character of the offense or the status of the offender, either upon the power of the House to impeach or the Senate to try? The third section of the first article of the Constitution, after prescribing certain rules of practice in cases of impeachment, provides first, that:

> No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

But this is not a limitation upon the exercise of the power previously granted to impeach and try; it is simply a safeguard to the personal rights of the accused, a protection to him against what might possibly be a verdict influenced by high party feeling in a closely divided Senate in times of great party strife. The clause might have been made to read as follows: "No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of all the members present," and still the jurisdictional grant of power to the Senate in the first part of the same section would not have been diminished in the slightest degree. But the same section further provides that—

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

Do these words either in whole or in part in any manner or to any extent limit the grant as to jurisdiction in the Senate to try all impeachments? Clearly they impose a limitation, but such limitation does not attach to the jurisdiction, but to that which follows after jurisdiction has attached. It affects the judgment, and that alone. It operates on that part of the proceeding in impeachment in such a manner as to not trench in the slightest degree on the question of jurisdiction. The Senate could comply literally with this provision in rendering judgment whether the party convicted was or was not in office at the time of impeachment, trial, and conviction. The clause is simply a limitation upon the power of the Senate in reference to the judgment it may pronounce; its language in effect is, "thus far shalt thou go and no farther." If the person convicted is in office at the date of the rendition of the judgment, and that is a civil office, you must remove him, and you may, in addition to this, add disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but beyond this limit you cannot go. If the person is in civil office he, under section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution, must be removed. If he is not in civil office then you may disqualify him for one day or a month or a year or five years or for the term of his natural life from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but beyond this boundary of disability you cannot go. Under the common and parliamentary law of England there was no limit to the judgment the Peers might impose in cases of impeachment save that prescribed by the conscience and discretion of those pronouncing it, and the records of that bloody court show that during the past five hundred years these judgments ranged time and again, all through the whole catalogue of disability and punishment, from that of a mere censure to execution upon the block. This unlimited power in Parliament in the matter of judgment the framers of our Constitution in their wisdom thought should be restricted, and, while as to the persons who should be impeachable they left the matter where the common law and usages of Parliament left it, as to judgment they limited the power of the Senate by declaring that—

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

When, therefore, it is urged that, if we go to English history for a definition of the power of impeachment, we must take that definition in all its unlimited range as to the form and character of judgment, as well as to the persons impeachable; and when, for the purpose of casting the veil of derision upon the assumption here of a position supposed to involve this fatal absurdity, we are pointed, with an air of triumph, to the headless trunks, the pilloried forms, the separated quarters, of those who have fallen beneath the cruel judgments of impeachment in the English Parliament, it is enough that we should answer in the language of the framers of the Constitution, who, while they selected that which was good of English jurisprudence in the matter of impeachment and incorporated it into our fundamental charter, modified and corrected that which was evil in reference to judgment declared:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

The power to disqualify from holding and enjoying office does not depend necessarily for its exercise upon the power to remove from office. The exercise of the one does not necessarily draw with it the exercise of the other. They are two separate and distinct disabilities or punishments, if they may be properly termed such, and not dependent in their infliction the one upon the other. They are not necessarily copulative. They may be disjunctive in application.

But it is said the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution has an important bearing upon the jurisdiction of this court, and while there is quite a diversity of opinion even among Senators who deny this jurisdiction as to the precise office of this section, it is asserted and seriously contended by able lawyers of the Senate that the only grant of power to the United States to impeach at all for any offense is one of implication, resulting from the language here used. It reads as follows:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It is said that, because this section declares that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall, on impeachment for certain specified offenses, be removed from office, it raises a necessary implication, an implied grant of power to the Federal Government to be exercised through the House and Senate to impeach and try such officers for the specified offenses, and that this is the sole jurisdictional grant on this subject. This I cannot agree to.

It is contended furthermore that the sole purpose of impeachment is removal from office, and that, therefore, this clause of the Constitution limits the jurisdiction of this Government as to persons in cases of impeachment to civil officers of the United States while in office. It is difficult of comprehension how it can, with any plausibility, be contended that the sole purpose of impeachment is removal from office, when the Constitution in terms vests in the discretion of the Senate the power to impose upon the convicted party an infliction other than removal from office, and one, too, more terrible in its character; a punishment in comparison with which fine, imprisonment, the pillory, and may we not with propriety say death itself, would seem to be preferable. For an American citizen, who has been honored by elevation to high office, who has stood in the temple of official power, whose sword has been drawn in patriotism and wielded with honor in defense of his country, whose ambition may have led him to grasp still higher at the reins of government, to be denuded by the American Senate, in the presence of over forty millions of people, of all the rights of an American citizen, in so far as they relate to the right to hold and enjoy any office of either honor, trust, or profit under the United States, is, it occurs to me, to suffer upon his part a humiliation, a punishment if you please, which nothing save the security of the rights of the whole people, the integrity of the nation, and an honest and just administration of public affairs would seem to justify.

The sole object of impeachment therefore is not merely removal from office; and while the purpose is not so much the punishment of the offender as the protection of the Government and the people against the venality of dishonest men in office, still the framers of the Constitution evidently regarded the deprivation from holding and enjoying office under the United States equally important to the ends of justice, the correct administration of public affairs, and the general welfare of the Republic, with that of the removal from office of a dishonest man. But, notwithstanding the enormity of this penalty, which in one sense seems to be little else than punishment, it is not after all any punishment within the meaning of that term as used in criminal jurisprudence. Legal punishment in the administration of criminal law is that which in some way, either to a small or large extent, affects the life, liberty, or property of the citizen; and this does neither. It operates exclusively upon his political rights, and no deprivation of political rights of the citizen in our Government is ever inflicted as a punishment of the offender, but solely as a means of protection to the State. The framers of the Constitution did not regard it in the nature of a punishment, and they therefore provided that—

> The party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

As stated by Mr. Justice Story—

> It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the State against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity.

The third section of article 1 of the Constitution, as we have seen, vests a discretion in the Senate within certain limits as to the extent of the punishment to be inflicted. This discretion is not taken away by the fourth section of the second article. The object doubtless of this section was not to confer jurisdiction nor yet to limit that jurisdiction already granted in a former section, but rather to limit the tenure of office; not to impose a limitation upon the power of the court in reference to judgment, but rather to make imperative one part of the judgment to be pronounced in a case where the offender is in civil office at the time of trial and conviction; that is to say, that he shall in such a case be removed from office.

Again, the terms "civil officers," as used in the fourth section of the second article, neither add to nor take from the scope of the jurisdiction of grant in the second and third sections of the first article. The power of impeachment we have seen granted in the clauses, "the House shall have the sole power of impeachment" and "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," is limited to prosecution for official crime; that is to say, for offenses committed while in office affecting public matters. Therefore, all persons who could be impeached under our Constitution, even although the fourth section of the second article were stricken from its provisions, must be or have been officers of the Government, and must be charged with offenses committed while in office affecting the just administration of public affairs.

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin says, in substance, if the second section of the first article gives jurisdiction then the fourth section of the second article has no office; it is useless; its insertion in the Constitution was upon the part of the framers mal entendre. The answer to this, however, is that without this section the vilest criminal in the highest office of the land, impeached by the House and convicted by the Senate of crimes dangerous in the extreme to the well-being of the Government, might, through a false sentiment of pity or error in judgment of one more than one-third of the members present when judgment is pronounced, retain possession of his office.

The fourth section, therefore, of the second article performs in this respect a high function in disrobing the Senate of all discretion, and compelling, ipso jure, removal from office.

The particular location in the Constitution of the fourth section of the second article should, it seems to me, receive consideration in giving construction to its purpose. If we hold that this clause is jurisdictional, if it is a definition of the powers of impeachment, if it is a limitation upon the persons subject to impeachment, or the offenses for which impeachment will lie, then indeed must we agree with Mr. Justice Story in saying:

> By some strange inadvertence this part of the Constitution has been taken from its natural connection, and with no great propriety ranged under the head which embraces the organization and rights and duties of the executive department. (Story's Commentaries, volume 1, § 788.)

If, however, we regard it not as conferring jurisdiction, not as limiting the power of impeachment either as to person, offense, or judgment, but simply as a limitation upon the tenure of office in the case of a person in civil office convicted of some offense included in the designation "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," then we are at once constrained to say that no more appropriate place could have been found for its insertion in our fundamental law. Had it been intended by this clause to confer jurisdiction or limit the power of jurisdiction, either as to persons, offenses, or judgment, why not, as in the case of the article conferring and limiting judicial power, have inserted it under the appropriate head of the grant of legislative powers in proximity with the clause—

The House shall have the sole power of impeachment.

The fact that it appears under the general head of matters relating to the executive department of the Government, placed there in this model production of the century by men so eminent for appropriateness, style, and arrangement as were its framers, is an item not to be overlooked in giving construction to its language. I hold, therefore, that section 4 of article 2 is in none of its features repugnant to the general grant of power in article 1; but that it is in all its parts harmonious and consistent with all former clauses of the Constitution relating to the subject of impeachment; it is in no sense a jurisdictional grant of power either expressly or by implication, nor is it a limitation upon the power before granted either as to persons impeachable, the offenses for which they may be impeached, or the judgment to be rendered; that its meaning is, in short, simply this, nothing more, that in all cases of impeachment of a person who is a civil officer at the time of trial and conviction for any offense included in the designation "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," the persons so convicted shall be removed from office; and if, under the common law and by parliamentary usage, as it existed at the formation of our Constitution, any other persons than civil officers in office could be impeached for any offenses, whether included or not in the catalogue, "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors;" or if, under that law and usage, civil officers could be impeached for any offense not included in that catalogue or designation of offenses—and these are questions I do not decide—that then all such persons as to such offenses can be impeached under our Constitution irrespective of section 4, article 2, and just as though such section were not in the Constitution.

But it is asserted by some who deny jurisdiction in the case at bar, with an air almost akin to defiance, that the universal current of opinion of American commentators is to the effect that impeachment would not lie against a person not in a civil office of the United States at the time. And especially is the commentator Story relied upon as conclusive on the question. To this assumption, and in opposition to it, I refer to Rawle on the Constitution, section 801, in which he uses this language:

From the reasons already given it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office.

Is it conceded by those denying jurisdiction in this case that this indeed is an exception? that here in truth is one American commentator of ability as a writer on constitutional law who holds and states the opinion unqualifiedly that persons who have been in public office as well as persons who are in public office are liable to impeachment? I do not understand this concession to have been made by any either of the learned counsel for the defense or the able Senators who have argued against this jurisdiction. On the contrary, it is contended with earnestness that Mr. Rawle, in the language quoted, did not mean to assert that a person not in office, but who had been, could be impeached. And in this attempt to show that he did not mean this, but did mean something else, the reasons given are diverse and sadly in antagonism with certain other positions taken by advocates on that side of the question. One of the honorable counsel for the defense, Mr. Carpenter, in referring to this clause, disposes of it in this cursory manner:

Three words, "or have been," are all they claim any comfort from in this passage from Rawle—an instance of the caution of a writer in laying down a general proposition to throw in here and there qualifications which may or may not exist.

An argument based upon the limited number of words in which the capability of a writer on constitutional law may enable him to state his conclusions is one hardly calculated to add to the professional fame of such eminent counsel when used in such an important proceeding as this. The question is, what do the words actually used mean, without regard to the number of words employed by the learned commentator.

But it is contended by others, the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] and perhaps others, that what Mr. Rawle meant to be understood as saying by this language, and what he did in effect say, is this: That from the reasons which had preceded it was obvious that there were but two classes of opinion extant in reference to the persons that could be impeached, the one being to the effect that those holding civil public office were liable, and the other, which included both, namely, those "who are or have been in public office." It seems to me, from a careful reading of the clause, giving to each word its legitimate office, it may with much propriety be said that it is obvious that such a construction is illogical, unwarranted, and unsound; besides, Judge Story, upon whose statements so much stress is laid in opposition to this jurisdiction, cites Mr. Rawle as one commentator who held to the doctrine that those who have been, as well as those who are, in public office are liable to impeachment. In referring to this language of Mr. Rawle, Judge Story, section 801, uses this language:

A learned commentator seems to have taken it for granted that the liability to impeachment extends to all who have been, as well as to all who are, in public office.

In the opinion, therefore, of Justice Story, Mr. Rawle, so far from failing to commit himself upon the question, and so far from merely stating the two classes of opinions that prevailed, and which alone for obvious reasons could by any possibility obtain in reference to this subject, had employed such language as showed that he had taken it for granted "that the liability to impeachment extends to all who have been, as well as to all who are, in public office."

It must be conceded, therefore, willingly or otherwise, for whatever it is worth, that Mr. Rawle, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, asserted the doctrine unqualifiedly—and he was a strict constructionist—that under the Constitution all persons who have been, as well as all who are, in public office are liable to impeachment for impeachable offenses committed while in office. And can it be said, even after all that is claimed from Judge Story's opinion on this subject, that he (Story) joins issue with Mr. Rawle in this opinion? Will it be contended in the face of what I am about to quote from Mr. Story that he ever at any time asserted that the contrary of what Mr. Rawle stated was the true doctrine? Most certainly not.

After referring to the several clauses of the Constitution bearing upon the subject of impeachment, and after stating in reference to one clause that so and so appears to be the case, and in reference to another that "it would seem to follow" that so and so were true, he, Judge Story, concludes and dismisses the whole subject in section 805 in these words:

It is not intended to express any opinion in these commentaries as to which is the true exposition of the Constitution on the points above cited. They are brought before the learned reader as matters still sub judice, the final decision of which may be reasonably left to the high tribunal constituting the court of impeachment when the occasion shall arise.

Justice Story, therefore, does not decide the question; he does, if we may take him at his own word, not even so much as "express any opinion" in his commentaries "as to which is the true exposition of the Constitution" in reference to the very questions which to-day separate in opinion and judgment the members of this Senate. On the contrary, he, unlike Rawle, who decided the controversy, simply brings it "before the learned reader as a matter still sub judice, still under consideration, and one which in his judgment should be reasonably left to this high tribunal for final decision when the occasion might arise. That occasion has at last arisen, and here and now the great question must be forever settled. For nearly a century it has been sub judice by American commentators and the American bar; diverse opinions have been held and expressed, it is true, and now it is for the first time before the proper tribunal for adjudication. What has been sub judice for nearly one hundred years must for all future time be res judicata.

It has been suggested that if the impeachment by the House had taken place prior to the act of resignation, that then the case would be different, upon the principle that, jurisdiction having attached, the Senate could proceed to try. The view I take of the Constitution renders it unnecessary that I should pass upon this question. I cannot conceive, however, that it would make the slightest difference in any possible view of the case in so far as the jurisdiction of the Senate to try is concerned.

If the construction contended for by those who deny this jurisdiction is correct; if to confer jurisdiction the accused must be a civil officer; if the sole purpose of impeachment is removal from office; and if no judgment in impeachment can be rendered except there is included in it, and as a part of it, removal from office, then it follows as a legal and logical sequence that a resignation even after the conclusion of the trial, and before judgment pronounced, would oust the jurisdiction of the Senate, prevent any judgment whatever from being rendered, the whole proceeding would abate, the accused though perhaps covered with the infamy of his crime would go forth a free man with the right, provided he could through a repetition of his crime, or otherwise, command the power to receive a new commission the next day, only to be surrendered perhaps after another trial by impeachment in time to again defeat the judgment of the Senate. Any construction, however, of our fundamental law that would make such a course possible; that would make the whole constitutional power of impeachment liable to suspension at the will of the accused criminal; that would, as it unquestionably does in effect, practically destroy this protection to the Government against the evil practices of dishonest men who are in office and of others who have been and may be again, is to my mind unreasonable, illogical, dangerous to the best interests of the Government, and unwarranted either by its letter or spirit.

The fact that the Constitution empowers the Senate to disqualify, as well as remove from office, would, it seems, be a perfect answer to the assumption that the sole purpose of impeachment is the removal from office. To prevent, therefore, in the discretion of the Senate, a return to office of one who had proved unworthy while in office, to the extent of committing an impeachable offense, was evidently regarded as a means of protection to public liberty, so necessary to the guardianship of the high interests of the State as to secure for it a place in explicit terms in our fundamental law. To place upon the Constitution, therefore, such construction as would make it possible for a great public offender, by the simple voluntary act of resignation, to evade this part of the penalty, and thus trample, unchecked and defiantly, upon one of the great constitutional protections with which the rights and liberties of the whole people are surrounded, is, it seems to me, to cast a libel upon the wisdom, the intelligence, the legal learning of the men who made the Constitution.

While to the President was given the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, an exception was made in cases of impeachment. This is the "unpardonable sin" of the Constitution. So dangerous was the commission of an impeachable offense regarded by the framers of the Constitution to the vitality and purity of the life of our body-politic, that the offender is placed forever beyond the reach of restoration through executive clemency; and yet will it be said that the criminal himself, after polluting the official robe and tainting the public virtue by his own official crime, can evade the penalties of the Constitution and batter down the safeguards of the nation by quietly surrendering his office? Can he thus pardon his own offense before conviction? I cannot accept a construction so fatal in its results to the very existence of the power of impeachment incorporated in the Constitution.

I am clear, therefore, in my conviction that the true theory of the Constitution in respect of the power of impeachment was declared by Ex-President John Quincy Adams in the national House of Representatives in 1846, when in speaking of this power he used the following language:

> And here I take occasion to say I differ from gentlemen who have stated that the day of impeachment has passed by the Constitution from the moment the public office expires. I hold no such doctrine; I hold myself, so long as I have the breath of life in my body, amenable to impeachment by this House for anything I did during the time I held any public office.

And when interrupted by Mr. Bailey, of Virginia, with a criticism in the shape of the following interrogatory: "Is not the judgment in case of impeachment removal from office?" The old man eloquent, the veteran statesman of four score years, responded as follows:

> And disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States forever afterward; a punishment much greater in my opinion than removal from office. It clings to a man as long as he lives; and if any public officer ever put himself in a position to be tried by impeachment, he would have very little of my good opinion if he did not think disqualification from holding office for life a more severe punishment than mere removal from office. I hold, therefore, that every President of the United States, every Secretary of State, every officer impeachable by the laws of the country is as liable twenty years after his office expired as he is while he continues in office.—Congressional Globe, April 13, 1846.

But it is said if in this case the Senate should take jurisdiction it opens a door so wide that ex-officials who have years ago retired from office will be dragged from their homes in private life and placed upon trial before a political tribunal for alleged official offenses; that it will establish a rule of construction for the several States that may operate practically in the same way, to the detriment of the administration of public justice and the deprivation of private rights. As a preventive against abuse in this direction may we not with perfect composure rely upon that sense of justice and propriety which must be presumed to exist at all times and under all circumstances, whether under one administration or another, in the national House of Representatives and in the houses of representatives of the several States. May we not with perfect confidence trust to their sound discretion for protection against proceedings by impeachment for offenses that are venial in their character, and those that have been condoned by the lapse of time or pardoned sub silentio by a generous people. The fact that in our whole history of nearly one hundred years since the adoption of the Constitution there have been but six impeachments of persons in office, would seem to warrant the conclusion that no abuse of this great power will be indulged in hereafter by any succeeding House of Representatives.

Holding, therefore, to these views as to the nature and extent of the power of this Government in the matter of impeachment, it follows that the plea of the respondent to the jurisdiction of the Senate must be overruled, and he cited to answer to the merits of the articles of impeachment.

Opinion of Mr. Morrill, of Vermont,

Delivered May 24, 1876.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I shall make no attempt to present an argument here, but merely to give very briefly the conclusions, with some reasons therefor, which I have arrived at after as impartial a consideration of the grave questions involved as I have been able to bestow. I am not eager to convince others, and if I were, I know of no one eager to be convinced. If the cabinet of Mr. Pitt differed both about the impeachment of Warren Hastings and about dropping the impeachment as a question of policy, it is not strange that Senators should differ here about the impeachment of the late Secretary of War as a question of power. I shall claim no more charity for my own opinion than I cheerfully concede to that of others.

As often repeated as they have been, I can hardly make myself understood without reciting all of the words relating to impeachment contained in the Constitution:

> The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 1, section 2.)
>
> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. (Article 1, section 3.)
> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law. (Article 1, section 3.)
>
> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Article 2, section 4.)
> The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Article 2, section 2.)
> The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. (Article 3, section 2.)

These embrace all there is upon the subject. It must in all fairness be conceded that these provisions should be construed to mean no more and no less than the words employed conveyed at the time in the country from which they were borrowed, except so far as the provisions themselves were directly modified and restrained. If for no other purpose, the common law may be resorted to at least to obtain the real significance of the legal terms used in the Constitution, and with as much authority as the English classics may be for the correct usage of other words in our language. Even conceding that the common law gives no additional constitutional power, it will yet interpose against an erroneous definition or any curtailment of the meaning of its phrases.

The case before us arises upon the presentation by the House of Representatives of articles of impeachment against General William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, who pleads that he resigned his office a short time before and on the same day the articles were moved in the House, and therefore is not liable to impeachment. Under the apt and thoroughly defined phrases of the Constitution, and under the circumstances as stated, the question pending is: Has the Senate jurisdiction?

At this point, the question as to the guilt or innocence of the respondent is in no way concerned, and therefore the limitations as to the final judgment of this court, or the consequences which may follow, are not matters for our present consideration. Nor does it affect the case at this or any other stage that he may be tried and punished in the criminal court according to law. That is an incident which may follow any and all impeachments. It may be more important, however, that we should preserve the Constitution in that full but unexaggerated force and in that entire symmetry with which it left the hands of the original framers, and a refusal by the Senate to exercise powers actually conferred, if they have been conferred, denying the right of the House to impeach an officer who has resigned, would go far toward establishing a precedent that might practically destroy the efficacy of all future impeachments, and that in cases possibly much more flagrant and important than the one now presented. Is this to be the last case to appear in our history? Are we to make a breach in the Constitution for the noiseless retreat of a whole class of the greatest official criminals?

As it seems to me, from a common-sense view—and I speak with much diffidence—the points most deserving attention are:

First, has the House of Representatives the power to impeach?

Second, has the Senate the power to try impeachments?

Third, is the identity of the person proposed to be impeached by the House of Representatives established?

Fourth, is the offense charged in the articles of impeachment an impeachable offense?

Upon these points there is no doubt suggested in any quarter, and they must all be answered affirmatively.

The next point in the case presents the only difficulty; that is to say:

Fifth, is the late Secretary of War, having resigned, now impeachable?

There is no misdescription of the person charged, no imputed or fatal blunder as to the forms of procedure by the prosecutors, and no doubt that the case is before the proper tribunal; but the narrow question still remains unanswered: Is the late Secretary of War entitled to escape all the perils of impeachment by his swift resignation? Can he solely by his own act defeat our jurisdiction? Or, if convicted, will his voluntary removal from office necessarily relieve him from any further penalty? The penalty, if convicted, could not be less than removal from office and might be much more. Disqualification for all future time might follow conviction, if a judgment so severe should be held to be merited; but there can be no conviction whatever if the guilty party can, as soon as he quits office by resignation or otherwise, escape jurisdiction. If the Constitution is to be interpreted so as to give meaning and scope to all its parts, if we are not by our decision of this case to virtually wipe out forever the whole power of impeachment or to transform it into a barking power that is never to bite, it must be held, as it appears to me, that the words "all civil officers of the United States," even if held to be jurisdictional, which is at least doubtful, cover those who have as such committed impeachable offenses whether in office or not at the moment of impeachment, and, if in office, they must be removed. This interpretation would certainly appear to be entirely just, entraps no innocent man, shields no guilty man, and is, so far as I know, in harmony with all the ideas of impeachment current at the date of the adoption of the Constitution and exactly correspondent with the language of our earliest as well as of the latest penal statutes, including the revised code, which are held to make officers accountable for their misdeeds though they may have ceased to hold any office. If by resigning a guilty civil officer may escape impeachment, the same door is open for escape from a criminal indictment.

It is not now contended anywhere that a private citizen, however guilty of high crimes, while holding no office under the United States, is liable to impeachment; and now if an officer guilty of high crimes may by resignation of his office escape, as has been contended, then neither private citizens nor officers, except at their own will, can be hereafter subjected to impeachment. The Constitution has no more surely furnished an excuse for the former than the latter will surely furnish for themselves. And thus the great remedy of impeachment "for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors" of all United States civil officers, so industriously planted in so many different places of the Constitution, would be torn out by the roots and thrown like a worthless weed away. All of the carefully adjusted machinery about a conviction by not less than two-thirds of the Senators present and on oath, about a further trial and punishment according to law, about removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office, becomes almost a mockery in the face of the unedited proviso which the counsel for the responent now in effect ask us to affix thereto, namely:

Provided, That the Senate shall not entertain jurisdiction in the case of any civil officer against whom articles of impeachment may be presented if he shall promptly, or at any time, tender a resignation before final judgment.

If the framers of the Constitution had only ingrafted thereon such a proviso, it would have superseded the necessity of all other safeguards against extreme penalties upon the accused, and saved much labored commentary. The pardoning power of the President in all cases of impeachment was taken away; but if resignation snatches away all jurisdiction, then a power, too great to be intrusted to the President, was taken away only to be given to the party impeached, from whom the power to resign was not taken away.

No very substantial reason has been offered why official treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors should be outlawed at the end of an official term or by a resignation. Debts and petty crimes are very properly subjected to some limitation; but a crime of such magnitude as to be worthy of a trial by this court ought not, as it appears to me, to be subject to the plenary indulgence of a statute of limitations, or to a day of jubilee. There is no limitation in the Constitution upon this subject whatever; none has been cited under English precedents; and no attempt at limitation by statute laws to patch the Constitution, even if the power had been given to patch, is likely ever to be proposed; and it would seem to be a matter of too great importance to be interjected into the Constitution at this late day by construction or by a refusal to try a case because it was begun two hours too late.

If it be said that, by assuming jurisdiction in a case like the present, a door will be left ajar by which partisan oppression and abuse will ultimately creep into and pollute our history by great examples of judicial tyranny, it is to be observed that all granted powers are open to the same objection—those conferred upon the President, or upon the judiciary, or upon Congress; and no power granted has been more carefully guarded than the power of impeachment. The risk of abuse through a popular government is no greater when exercising the power of impeachment than in many other directions. To distrust it here is to distrust it everywhere. A jury of twelve men is trusted in any part of the country to try the most momentous issues among men of life and fortune; and can it be imagined that the Senate of the United States, composed of men supposed in some degree to represent the virtues and dignity, the intelligence and discretion, of thirty-eight States, is a tribunal unfit to be trusted to try issues of fact upon which the power ever again to hold office on the part of the convicted party must be the utmost limit of their verdict?

The honor and conscience of the Senate will not permit this trial to degenerate into argumentation merely for victory on the part of any of its members, nor should the Senate be less free than the House of Representatives has been from the imputation of a division on the line of political sentiment in the determination of a vital question of constitutional law. It is to be decided impartially, each Senator for himself alone, whether the decision clashes with that of any others or not, and, if decided rightly, no one need care.

The speculations of learned men upon different sides have been industriously cited, and the weight of such authority to guide us has no such preponderance as to entitle it to control our judgment in this the first case practically arising for our decision. The unanimous opinion of the House of Representatives in favor of jurisdiction cannot be wholly set aside as of no value. The popular branch of the Government has an interest as deep and abiding in the true interpretation of the powers relating to impeachment, whatever may be the present political creed of the majority, as the Senate itself, and it cannot be supposed that it has now or ever can have any motive for a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution on this subject.

We have jurisdiction most assuredly for offenses committed by civil officers. The question as to any other officers is not now before us. To say that a person might be a civil officer for all the purposes of committing the offense and then in a moment after not be for the purposes of trial and conviction would be, if I may be allowed to say so, a stupendous assumption unwarranted by any attribute of common sense. In plain English, and not encumbered by the dust and mold of antiquated authority, nor by the thick embroidery of later impassioned rhetoric, the words "civil officers" must be held to mean civil officers at the time of committing the offense. The remedy reaches these from the highest to the lowest, and upon conviction judgment is not confined to removal from office, that being the very smallest part of the remedy. This is not a strained view of the law and presents no terrors save to those guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. The people have a right to this remedy unabridged.

The alternative presented looks to me far more formidable, and that is, to leave all officers of the United States at liberty to burrow in corruption, to betray the honor and the highest interests of their country, to sell justice, to accept bribes, to embezzle the public funds, and then, after destroying the records of guilt, if that be possible, and suborning the witnesses through their ill-gotten gains, they can resign and defy all the remedies provided through the dead forms of impeachment. That would be "played out," as a red-handed murderer in New York recently said about hanging. I cannot believe in any construction of the Constitution that will leave it in so crippled a condition and so absolutely at the mercy of those against whom its sharpest provisions are pointed and who may be the very chiefest of offenders.

The doctrine of resignation and avoidance, so far as I am able to comprehend it, fritters away all the power there is of real substance in the Constitution relating to impeachments, and, if it shall prevail, the torn shreds of that power will hang dangling in the air as a mere scare-crow, but scaring nobody.

Upon one side of the argument it is claimed that there is great danger in permitting trials by impeachment for offenses committed while in office after the person no longer holds office; but is it not clear that a person out of office will be most unlikely to excite the undeserved animosity and vengeance of, or be pursued by, any great party in the plenitude of its power or when holding the majority required for a successful impeachment in both Houses of Congress. If this is not wholly an imaginary danger it would seem to be set at rest by the fact that no such merely politically-malicious prosecution, even in times of the greatest party heat, has ever occurred. And this fact by no means shows, as has been contended, that the power to prosecute officers after they have laid down their offices does not exist and is not ready on any proper occasion to be called forth in full vigor. A long period has elapsed since any declaration of war has been made by Congress, and yet it will not be said that Congress has not the power to declare war. The non-use of a power does not abrogate it, nor necessarily even make it obsolete, but rather tends to show that it is not liable to abuse.

Upon the other side it is intimated that a person actually in office may be impeached for offenses prior even to his acceptance of office. Would not that be the most dangerous doctrine which could under any circumstances be established? Offenses which the people had forgiven by popular election, offenses of youth fully condoned by years of exemplary life, might be dragged forth by partisan hatred and malignity in order to drive persons from office and give the spoils to the victors. I cannot be mistaken in the belief that this is more than an imaginary danger.

I have thus frankly given my own opinions without attempting to answer those just as sincerely entertained by others. In the present case, those who deny jurisdiction generally appear to occupy the ground that officers may be impeached for offenses committed as private citizens, but that we may not impeach private citizens for offenses committed as officers. To me the logic of the Constitution indicates precisely the reverse. To hold otherwise will place the heavy responsibility upon the present Senate of cutting down the much-dreaded constitutional power of impeachment for corruption in office to the insignificant proportions of merely removal from office, and that to be obtained by the cowardly and conscience-stricken resignations of the offenders. That is a responsibility which, for one, I am not ready to assume. We are responding to a prosecution begun by the House of Representatives in the name of all the people of the United States, and it cannot be evaded as a gusty and unmeaning formula, but must be treated as one of the weightiest matters which can arise under our form of Government, not to be overcome by hair-splitting objections, sometimes resorted to in pleas of abatement, and which have no relation to the merits of procedure or the merits of the case on trial.

I conclude by reiterating my previous statement that the words "all civil officers of the United States" must be construed to cover those who have, as such officers, committed impeachable offenses, whether in office or not at the moment of impeachment. Without such a construction the potent remedy of impeachment under the Constitution for official corruption will hereafter become extinct, and its downfall will bear the date of 1876.

Sincerely entertaining these views, I must vote in the direction to which they point.

Opinion of Mr. Eaton,

Delivered May 24, 1876.

Mr. EATON. I should have contented myself with a silent vote upon the matter now before the Senate, were I not in a position antagonistic in opinion to distinguished Senators whose lead in all general legislative business I am most pleased to follow. But sitting here as a judge, to pass upon a great constitutional question, involving the construction of the organic law, on a point where the rights of a citizen are to be determined, ay sir, the rights of all citizens who may have held or shall hereafter hold civil or military or naval office under the Government of the United States, I should be false to myself, false to those principles which have ever governed my public life, if I hesitated to announce the reasons which control my action. The Constitution of the United States is an instrument of delegated powers, delegated by the people of the several States, and its provisions are to be construed strictly. We are to take the instrument as it is, not as we would have it. We are not constitution-makers, but the servants of the makers, the people of the States. If the instrument is faulty, let it be amended in such particular according to its terms, and not force a construction to meet the requirements of a present contingency.

Senators have gravely said "that the great men, the fathers who framed the Constitution, were wise men, men who would not have so stultified themselves as to have given to their posterity an instrument which could be defeated by the very act of a delinquent officer." Such language can have no power or influence upon my mind; it begs the issue, and to it I attach no importance.

The question is, what did the fathers do? Not whether they were wise or unwise; not whether the convention which formed the Constitution might not in many particulars have performed better work.

Every Senator knows, it is a matter of history, that the Federal Constitution would not have been adopted as it came from the hands of the framers by several of the States; and many amendments were demanded before a people jealous of their rights would submit to its government.

Therefore I say that the question of the wisdom or unwisdom of the framers of the Constitution is unworthy the consideration of this tribunal, and will not be entertained in its deliberations. By the terms of the Constitution has the Senate jurisdiction of the matter now pressed upon its consideration by the House of Representatives?

Can a private citizen be tried by this body under articles of impeachment alleging criminal conduct of said citizen at a time when he was in the enjoyment of a Federal office?

This is the sole question, and into it must not be interjected other and extraneous matter; not the time when the delinquent officer resigned nor the reasons which impelled him to a resignation; with all that we have nothing to do. Have we the power to try a private citizen? It is not to be denied that as the House of Representatives has the power of impeachment, so the Senate is the only body or tribunal possessing the power to try; but if the House exercises its power wrongfully, no jurisdiction is conferred thereby on this body, and the Senate should at once assert its independence and dismiss the articles of impeachment. Can a private citizen, then, be impeached by the House of Representatives and tried by the Senate for criminal acts done and performed during the time that said citizen held an office under the Federal Government?

It may be said there are no precedents to govern, assist, or enlighten us, and that in this case the Senate of the United States will establish a precedent for all the coming years. I pray it may be a wise one, one which will be respected by the future Senates who may be called to pass upon questions of a like character. There are, however, two precedents which have great weight with me, and to which I shall hereafter direct the attention of Senators, to wit, the Blount case and the action of the convention which formed the present constitution of the State of New Jersey.

But, sir, Senators have succeeded in finding English precedents by the score. I desire to say that in the consideration of this grave and important constitutional question English precedents will have no controlling power over my mind, and I thank God for what I believe to be true, that English precedents in this particular had no governing weight in the minds of the men who framed the Constitution, men who for years had suffered under the tyranny of that very House of Lords whose judgments are now invoked as precedents to govern a Senate of the United States in the decision of a question resting solely upon the provisions of the Constitution!

I am amazed, sir, absolutely amazed, that Senators for whose opinions I confess to have entertained entire confidence should seek the parliamentary law of Great Britain to solve a question arising under that written instrument which itself is the supreme law of the land! And, sir, we are gravely told by distinguished Senators, that the modes of procedure adopted by the Parliament of Great Britain in cases of impeachment must have governing power in the deliberations of this Senate upon a grave and important question. Sir, for one, perhaps the least in consequence of the members of this Senate, I deny it; as a citizen of the United States, I deny it; as a humble member of that great and patriotic party—and, sir, I beg pardon for using the word party—the cardinal legend of which is, "strict construction of the Constitution," I deny it. Sir, I have been taught in a school which forbids the exercise of power by any branch of the Federal Government unless that power has been either expressly delegated or is fairly inferable from express delegation.

The best blood of England followed the ax when the Russells and Sidneys suffered under the parliamentary precedents which have ever been, and are now, the crying shame of English legislation. It is said that we must look to the common law of England to properly understand the meaning of the words impeachment and pardon! The absurdity of such a claim approaches sublimity. The school-boy knows the meaning of the word pardon when he escapes the deserved birch through the clemency of his instructor; we know, without any reference to the common law of England, the full force and meaning of the Norman-French word impeachment. We do not know without reference to that common law and its impeachment procedure the damnable atrocities which have been again and again a thousand times perpetrated by invoking its capricious power against the Englishman. The framers of the Constitution of the United States were well aware of the atrocities which had been perpetrated in England under the name and forms of law; and in my judgment they framed an instrument which, under the proper and legitimate exercise of the powers therein contained, will preserve alike the purity of the Government and the sacred rights of the citizen. It may be pleasant for the historic student, indeed it may be useful, to trace the right of trial by jury back to the times of the heptarchy, and he may fancy a resemblance between the representative assemblies of our days and the Witans or Wittenagemotes of the Saxon Alfred and his kingly line.

But, sir, we go not into the regions of the musty past to ascertain the constitutional rights of the citizen of the United States, nor the powers of the Senate conferred by an instrument which is our supreme law. And, sir, I beg to say right here that, had the procedure of impeachment never obtained in England, the framers of the Constitution would have found a way to get rid of corrupt and thieving officials, as they had found a way to rid themselves and their descendants from the tyrannous exercise of the parliamentary law of Great Britain. And now, sir, to the question: Under the Constitution of the United States, regardless alike of English precedents or the legal atrocities practiced under them, can the Senate proceed to assume jurisdiction in the matter of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, now a private citizen of the State of Iowa and of the United States? It is confessed that he was Secretary of War when the alleged crimes were perpetrated; it is admitted he was a private citizen when the House of Representatives preferred its articles of impeachment.

The meaning of the word impeachment, the full power thereof, the mode of procedure thereunder, in Great Britain, were perfectly and thoroughly understood by the men who composed the convention of 1787. They deemed it wise and proper to place the power of impeachment, to a certain, well-defined, and limited extent, within the provisions of the organic law, and I will now address myself briefly to the consideration thereof, fully satisfied in my own mind that a conclusion can be arrived at which will conform to the necessities of the age in which we live, without reflecting upon the wisdom of the fathers.

I call the attention of the Senate to the constitutional provisions relating to the subject-matter, and, though other Senators have so done before me, it is necessary that I should again do so, in order that my views may be properly presented; therefore I proceed by saying that section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution refers to the construction and powers of the House of Representatives. Therein I find the following:

> The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

In my judgment there is no grant of power contained in this language. It is, so to speak, functional; in other words, descriptive of one of the functions of the House; merely descriptive of where a power is to be located, to be elsewhere in the instrument defined.

I think I cannot be mistaken when I assert that here is no definitive power granted, and, unless I greatly err in judgment, I shall elsewhere find in the instrument full, definite, and perfect power.

I next direct the attention of the Senate to section 3, article 1. I find this:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

This section is also, in my judgment, simply functional and descriptive. It is fully and thoroughly descriptive of the mode of procedure in the Senate, to which body is given the power, the sole power, to try all impeachments. As a descriptive, functional section it is well defined:

First. The Senate is to be on oath or affirmation.
Second. In a particular case the Chief Justice to preside.
Third. Necessary number to convict.
Fourth. Extent of judgment.
Fifth. Party convicted subject to trial according to law.

Thus the descriptive and functional power of the Senate is in this section, as I previously suggested, perfect and well defined.

By implication, and by implication merely, I gather from this section that a President of the United States may be subject to impeachment and trial by the Senate, and possibly other persons. I say possibly because the language is too indefinite to permit me to say that, by implication even, any other person than he who holds the presidential office could under this section be impeached and brought to trial.

And right here I desire to say a word as, to my understanding, to the singular reasoning deduced from this section by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] And in this connection I beg to remark that I am possessed with a high estimation of his abilities as a constitutional lawyer, and therefore my surprise at the course of his reasoning. Dwelling with peculiar emphasis upon the word "person" contained in this section, he argues that in that word "person" he finds authority for the Senate to try persons other than official delinquents, persons in office; and again and again he charged upon the word "person" and rung the changes thereon.

And this little word seemed to operate in like manner upon the mind of the distinguished Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] And the effect of the word "person" upon the mind of my distinguished friend from Maryland is absolutely appalling. Under it, by its wonderful potency, he finds authority for the Senate to try all the civil, military, and naval officers of the United States, and possibly, if the parliamentary law of England is to obtain here, every person in the United States; all the subjects of the realm, as the cherished English authorities would express it.

I confess that I am surprised that three distinguished Senators should rest their main argument upon so slight a foundation; but I am in error; I ought not to say that I am surprised, for take this prop away and the entire superstructure falls to the ground. This is the base, the foundation, and without this claim, to use a somewhat vulgar yet nervous expression, they are nowhere.

Let us examine this point again:

And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Is it possible that there can be in this little word any hidden meaning, hidden to my mind, the common mind, sufficiently powerful to change the plain and evident sense of the language?

Suppose I alter the sentence slightly, thus: "And no conviction shall be had without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present." To my mind, and I think to most minds, the meaning of the sentence would not be changed in the slightest degree. It would remain the same, and be much improved in euphony, by the alteration in the text.

I do not deem it necessary to elaborate this point. A mere statement, in my judgment, concludes the matter.

I next call the attention of the Senate to a part of section 2, article 2, and will read all that relates to the matter in hand:

He—

The President—

shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

This is only important in this view, and in my opinion is entirely conclusive against the claim of certain honorable Senators. The claim is that the parliamentary law of Great Britain, its precedents for the last five hundred years, running through the bloodiest period of English history is and are to be used in construing the meaning of our Constitution, the framers of which are said to have acted with a full knowledge and intent that it would be so construed; and yet, the power to pardon a person wrongfully convicted in the heat of party passion was denied to the executive in all cases; a power belonging to and exercised by the Crown of England for a thousand years! In my judgment such a claim does not run on all-fours with either common humanity or common sense, and deserves the reprobation of us all.

I beg now to direct the attention of the Senate to the last remaining provision of the Constitution relating to this subject-matter—section 4 article 2:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Here I find the full, perfect, and absolute grant of power explicitly announcing the persons who are subject to impeachment.

First. The person clothed with the office and exercising the powers of President of the United States.

Second. The person exercising the powers of Vice-President of the United States.

Third. Each, every, and all of the civil officers of the United States.

Here I find the full, complete, and perfect list; as Mr. Owen would say, the "sum total." The persons who, not by the law and precedents of Great Britain, but by the Constitution of the United States, may be subjected to the ordeal of impeachment are here definitively named and classified: Persons in office, not out of office. The person holding and enjoying the office of President or Vice-President, and any other person in the enjoyment of any civil office. Is there the slightest doubt about the true meaning? Can there be two opinions about it? Certainly not. And why? Because each and all are to be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of any offense of the character named in the Constitution against the United States. A person must be in office to be removed therefrom.

But, says a distinguished Senator, "the Constitution does not in terms say that an official who resigns his office for the very purpose of avoiding impeachment shall not be subjected to trial." That is quite true; and a sufficient answer to that may be found in this remark: What the Constitution does not say, either expressly or by fair and honest inference, we may do, that the Senate cannot do. The power is denied when ungranted.

Let us view this question for one moment only. I promise to be brief, and therefore ask the attention of the Senators who do me the honor to be present, from another stand-point. I insist that section 4, article 2, contains not only the grant of power to impeach, but the classes of persons subject thereto:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers.

Abandon this construction and the Senate is at once at sea, on the wide ocean of mental conjecture, and will be logically forced to the conclusion of the honorable Senators from Maryland and Oregon, as I understand them, to wit: Every man, woman, and child in the United States, capable mentally of committing crimes against the United States, is liable to impeachment. In office or out of office, ex-officials and those who have never been in office are all equally liable.

If the law of the English Parliament is to be injected by this force-pump process into the Constitution of the United States, the base use which may be made of this high court of impeachment is evident to the most ordinary minds. I say may be made. I do not say that such will be even a probable result; but I do insist that such a construction as is sought to be given to the great charter of our liberties would make the Senate "the hewers of wood and the drawers of water," and extremely dirty water, for a venal and corrupt House of Representatives, excited by party passion and heat beyond the bounds of reason and justice. But, say other Senators, "such a state of things can never exist, because this common-law doctrine of impeachment can only be brought to bear against persons holding civil office or such as have held civil office under the United States." Is it so? Ah, Senators, you are at sea, in a leaky ship, destitute of rudder or masts or sails, a mere hulk, where you are unballasted by the material of the Constitution! One class of senatorial pilots endeavoring to force your frail craft to one port and another class seeking a different haven.

Again, by this, and I now mean the most moderate, construction every man in this broad land who ever held office under the United States prior to the late terrible civil conflict, and did so at the time of the commencement of hostilities and deemed it his duty to side with his section, would be liable to the pains and penalties of impeachment. But says some Senator, "Do you believe that there will ever be a House of Representatives a majority of which could be found to pursue a course so suicidal to the best interests of the country?" I hope, trust, and pray not; God only knows the hearts of men and the history of the future of our country. I know that a construction of the organic law such as is sought to be given would place this dangerous power in a House of Representatives. What such House would do when in the possession of it is quite another question. At all events, sir, refuse to-day to so construe the Constitution, and all the Houses of Representatives who come after us will understand that the Senate of the United States will stand as a breakwater against all such stormy action.

Again, sir, adopt the construction which is claimed by certain Senators, and every person who held a military or naval office during the late, or any other war, or no war, who ever held such an office, is liable to impeachment. My good friends, the honorable and gallant Senators from Rhode Island and Illinois, must look well to their records, for they were once military officers under the United States, and are therefore liable to impeachment on a trumped-up charge of maladministration during their commands. Sir, the English law seized in its iron grasp all of her people: queens, princes, peers, commoners, priests, counselors, women, military men, naval men, cut the heads from some bodies, disemboweled others, strangled some throats, put the rope round other throats. Thank God, sir, none of these barbarous acts perpetrated under the sanction of English precedents and by the authority of English law can occur under the Government of the United States, no matter what construction is given to the Constitution.

But, Mr. President, in times of high political excitement strange, most strange judgments have been pronounced even in the United States. We have seen in our own days an eminent citizen, a resident of a State where the courts of the United States and of his own State were open for the trial of all persons charged with crime under the Constitution—we have seen a citizen, who should have been either protected by the law or convicted by the law, haled from his house in the dark hours of the night, tried by a self-constituted tribunal utterly without legal authority, and visited with a punishment in violation of his rights as a citizen, in violation of law, in violation of the Constitution!

So far as possible, let the Senate of the United States protect the citizen in his rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

The beautiful and accomplished Frenchwoman, Madame Rolande, standing under the ax of the accursed guillotine during the bloody carnival of the revolution in France, exclaimed:

O, Liberty, Liberty, what crimes are perpetrated in thy holy name!

Beware how you strain your constitutional authority under the specious, false, and dangerous plea of necessity.

Mr. President, the point was well taken, and forcibly and eloquently put by my distinguished friend, the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] the other day, that for nearly a century, for nearly a hundred years, for a space of time during which our planet has thrice lost its population and thrice by the inevitable laws of nature regained it, no articles of impeachment have ever been preferred by the House of Representatives except against persons in the present enjoyment of civil office under the Government of the United States. No claim by that branch of the Federal Legislature having the power to impeach, since our existence as a people, has ever been made until the year of our Lord 1876 that any person could be impeached unless in the enjoyment of office.

I desire also to say that the decision of the Senate in the Blount case fully sustains the position that no person can be impeached unless in the enjoyment of a civil office under the United States. That case has been so fully and thoroughly discussed that I will not take the time of the Senate further thereon.

Many Senators seem to entertain the opinion that disqualification from holding Federal office is the great constitutional penalty; not removal from office; and that the evident purpose of the Constitution will be defeated if that instrument should be construed in the manner indicated by those Senators with whom I class myself.

Here I think is the fatal error of the reasoning. In my judgment the great penalty to a public man consists in this:

First. To be charged by the grand inquest of the people, the House of Representatives, with maladministration in office, with the commission of grave crimes against the public weal; to be impeached therefor before the Senate of the United States in the gaze of the intelligence of the world.

Second. To be stripped of the official robes; cast from office a dishonored man, to be forever thereafter the mark for scorn's unmoving finger.

And should the accused official, in hot haste to avoid the procedure of impeachment, voluntarily in the face of the terrible and damning charges against him resign the office which he has disgraced, the result is the same to him and to the country. He stands forever dishonored before his countrymen, a moral leper, and the criminal law seizes him in its iron grasp to inflict condign punishment.

But, say objecting Senators, he is not disqualified from holding office, and therefore the people are not protected to the full extent demanded by the Constitution. Ah, Mr. President, is it so? That presupposes that the people will elect as their Chief Executive a man so destitute of correct principles and official honor as to permit him to nominate to the Senate for Federal position a thief, a dishonored and disgraced felon; and, further, that a majority of the Senate are so degraded and debased that they will approve and confirm the nomination of a corrupt and venal Executive.

Sir, however this may strike the minds of Senators, of course I will not undertake to say or predict; but a mere glance at the point convinces my mind that disqualification from holding office in fact is no penalty, because either the removal from office by impeachment, or the resignation of office to avoid impeachment, is in itself an eternal barrier to the person who has violated his official obligation and prostituted his personal honor.

I have alluded to the action of the convention of the State of New Jersey as affording a precedent which should be entitled to great weight in the consideration of this important question.

In 1849, the people of New Jersey, in convention, formed a new constitution. A list of its members, which I hold in my hand, indicates that several of the ablest citizens of that State were engaged in the work. The various committees had performed their labors, and the result was before the convention.

The article on impeachment was identically the same as and was a copy of the one in the old constitution of that State. I read from the journal of the convention, page 245, section 11:

> The governor and all other civil officers under this State shall be liable to impeachment for misdemeanor in office.

Upon the consideration of this article Chief Justice Hornblower, a man who enjoyed a national reputation as a lawyer and judge of great ability, moved to amend. I now read from an authorized report of the proceedings of the convention, placed in my hands by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

> Mr. Hornblower moved to amend so as to provide that public officers might be impeached after the expiration of their term of office.

The amendment offered by Judge Hornblower was in these words:

> During their continuance in office and for two years thereafter.

The amendment was unanimously adopted, and, as amended, the article was unanimously adopted and now stands as the organic law of New Jersey on this point.

I now read the article, section 11, article 5:

> The governor and all other civil officers under this State, shall be liable to impeachment for misdemeanor in office during their continuance in office and for two years thereafter.

While I admit, for the purpose of the argument, that the report of the proceedings is meager and incomplete, I unhesitatingly assert that but one meaning can be attached to the language used by the chief justice in his amendment, that is, to extend the time of impeachment two years after the termination of the office.

Then, sir, we have upon this great and important question the opinion of many of the ablest jurists of New Jersey that previous to the adoption of her constitution in 1849 a person must have been in office in order to have been subjected, in that State, to the procedure of impeachment.

For one, I value this precedent as of more importance than all those which England can furnish.

A question was put to the honorable Senator from Indiana I think six times, and my honorable friend answered it as many times as it was put. The honorable Senator is quite able to answer all questions and to meet all antagonists, but he will pardon me if I add to his answer. The question was: "Would not the power of impeachment be full and perfect if section 4 of article 2 had not been placed in the Constitution?" I think the question an exceedingly improper one, because no Senator has a right to suppose that any of the sections relating to impeachment could or would have been adopted by the convention, except in the very shape in which they now are. The Constitution is a work of compromises, and men gave their adhesion to matters to which they were opposed upon the condition that checks in the shape of additional sections were accepted by other men.

The opinion of Judge Story, who is regarded by many distinguished Senators as one of the ablest of our constitutional lawyers, was clearly in favor of the opinion that no person could be impeached unless actually in office.

In this opinion of Judge Story I have the more confidence from a fact which will be conceded by all Senators, to wit: the bent of his mind was favorable to a broad, not to say unlimited, construction of the powers granted in the Constitution.

I have in my mind a notable case to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, apprehending that it will have great weight in showing the opinions of gentlemen eminent for their ability upon the point now under discussion. I allude to the impeachment of President Johnson. I believe, and have satisfactory reasons for my belief, that for days, ay weeks, the procedure against him halted because the gentlemen having the matter in charge knew that a misdescription would be fatal and were uncertain whether to allege that he was President or acting President of the United States. The idea was scouted that he could be proceeded against for acts perpetrated when he was in the enjoyment of the office of Vice-President, and there were such acts which need not here be more particularly alluded to. The astute and versatile Stevens of Pennsylvania was called into the troubled council, and even he, renowned among all the men of these latter days as the man who had driven this damnable doctrine of necessity over and through the Constitution, even he, this man of Danton-like nerve and audacity, dared not place before the Senate articles of impeachment against a person and describe him as late Vice-President of the United States.

No, sir; no, not until the year 1876, the centennial year, was the discovery made in our history that a person could be proceeded against who was the late holder of an official position. For nearly a hundred years have this people, on this question, traveled the old, plain political pathway marked down by the fathers. For one, answering for myself alone, I shall pursue the same course, and follow not after the new doctrines of strange gods.

As a sincere and honest believer in the doctrine of State-rights, knowing that the true interest of forty millions of people who inhabit now this broad land, and of the hundred millions whose coming footsteps we can almost hear, can only be maintained and conserved by a strict adherence to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and believing, as I sincerely do, that the great danger to be apprehended to our system of government is the centralization of power in the various branches of the Federal head, I cannot, will not, and, before God and the people, dare not consent to this departure from the well-known principle which has heretofore universally obtained.

Therefore I say—

First. That the Constitution of the United States is the law which should govern in this case, untrammeled by English precedents or English procedures.

Second. That no other persons than those who are in the enjoyment of civil office under the Government of the United States at the time when articles of impeachment are presented by the House of Representatives are proper subjects of trial.

Third. That William W. Belknap, at the time of the presentment of these articles of impeachment by the House of Representatives, was not in the enjoyment of any civil office under the United States, but was a private citizen of the State of Iowa.

Fourth. Therefore these articles of impeachment should be dismissed by the Senate.

Opinion of Mr. Allison,

Delivered May 24, 1876.

Mr. ALLISON. The question now before the Senate for consideration is whether or not the Senate has jurisdiction to try W. W. Belknap for the offenses alleged in the articles of impeachment, which offenses were committed by him while he was Secretary of War, he having resigned his position as Secretary, and having vacated the office before the proceedings for impeachment were begun in the House of Representatives, and being at the time of such impeachment, a private citizen, holding no office under the Government of the United States. I have given this question such examination and study as I could within the time allowed, and I have listened with interest to all the arguments that have been presented for and against jurisdiction in this case, and have endeavored in my own mind to settle the question without reference to what may be involved in the case.

The question presented to us for decision is whether or not, under the Constitution of the United States, a person not a civil officer can be impeached, although at the time the alleged offense was committed he held such office. In the present case it is admitted that the alleged offense is an impeachable one, under the Constitution, if committed by a person subject to our jurisdiction at the time the impeachment was presented.

The fact that Mr. Belknap was in office so recently before the impeachment, and that he resigned having in view his impeachment, is, upon the facts alleged and admitted, the most extreme illustration which could be presented to mark the line or boundary which excludes our jurisdiction, if it can be excluded at all.

To take jurisdiction in this case it must be shown that, without reference to the point of time, all persons may be impeached for public offenses committed in office, although when impeached they are private citizens. To exclude jurisdiction, on the other hand, it must be shown that civil officers may be impeached while in office only, and for crimes specified and declared in the Constitution, and for none other.

There are four clauses in the Constitution that directly affect this question: First, the last clause of section 2, article 1:

> The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Second, clause 6, section 3, article 1:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

Third, clause 7, same section and article:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

Fourth, section 4, article 2:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It is claimed by those who favor jurisdiction in this case that the first-quoted clause not only describes the body that shall originate impeachments, and that it not only confers the power to impeach or prosecute, but that it is the jurisdictional clause in the Constitution conferring in terms whatsoever was at the time understood in England to be the scope or boundary or extent of the jurisdiction to impeach under the parliamentary law of impeachment in England, and that here is found not only jurisdiction, but all jurisdiction; that under this clause and the following, granting to the Senate the power to try, is conferred all the authority to present and try all cases of impeachment known at the time to the common law of Parliament, save only that the judgment is limited and the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate is required to convict, and that this grant of power is not limited or circumscribed in any manner by the fourth section of the second article either as to persons who may be impeached or as to offenses for which impeachments may be instituted and tried; that this latter section was inserted for no other or different purpose than to prescribe the punishment which must be inflicted in cases where the person impeached is still in the enjoyment of a public office; or, in other words, for the purpose of pointing out a class of persons who shall be removed from office when impeached; that this section is not jurisdictional in its character; that it confers no jurisdiction and limits no jurisdiction, but only prescribes a particular punishment in specified cases, and is not used to designate the persons who may be impeached or to define or declare what are impeachable offenses.

If this claim be true, we are compelled to resort to the parliamentary law of England to discover who may be impeached, and for what offenses, and admit that the framers of the Constitution intended to resort to parliamentary law for purposes of jurisdiction, and did not intend to define jurisdiction in cases of impeachment except by reference to parliamentary law.

It thus becomes material to ascertain who could be impeached under the parliamentary law of England. Under this law the House of Commons could proceed against the delinquent, of whatsoever degree, and whatsoever might be the nature of the offense. There was no limit as to persons or offenses, except that the Lords could not by the law try a commoner for a capital offense on the information of the king or a private person, but with this exception, under the parliamentary law of England there was no limit as to the persons who might be tried or as to the offenses (See Selden's Judicature in Parliament, 1263; also 84; 4 Blackstone, 257; Hatsell's Precedents, volume 4, page 120; and McDonald's Manual, page 284; also May's Parliamentary Law; also Story on the Constitution, volume 1, § 79.

That impeachment has this extent in England is clearly stated by all the writers on parliamentary law. It has been claimed in debate, and with much force, that this power has only been applied in cases of official misconduct or violation of public trusts. Assuming this narrower view of jurisdiction to be the true one, it nevertheless leaves open to the Senate to try all persons in the United States who at any time may have committed any offense in office or violated any public trust confided to them, and there is no limit of time during their lives, as to such persons, when they may be impeached by the House or tried by the Senate. This statement of the claim of those who invoke jurisdiction in this case shows the importance of the decision we are about to make as affecting all the people who have held official position or administered public trusts, or who may do so in the future.

It seems to me that such construction should not be given to our Constitution unless it is clearly inferable from the words employed or from the intent of the framers as drawn from the history of the time or from the debates in the convention.

It seems to me, from the letter of the Constitution itself, and from the history of the time, and from the debates in the convention, that the Constitution itself intended to include impeachment as a remedy, and also intended to definitely prescribe its limits and boundaries, prescribing a body to accuse, a tribunal to try, the extent of the punishment, the persons who may be tried, and the offenses for which they are triable, leaving nothing, either jurisdictional or remedial, to be drawn from the parliamentary law.

All writers agree that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to provide a government in all its parts of limited and specified powers. Story says:

> The Constitution was from its very origin contemplated to be the frame work of national Government of special and enumerated powers, and not of general and a unlimited powers.

In order that there might be no mistake upon this subject, contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, among the early amendments proposed and agreed to was the tenth article of amendments, which declares that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

If we are to resort, therefore, to the common law of Parliament for jurisdiction in cases of impeachment, it is the only instance that can be suggested where the Constitution has such resource. It does not seem probable that, with the history of impeachments in England fresh in the memories of those who framed our Constitution, they would have selected this as the special and particular good that should be transplanted into our frame-work of government without limitation, save only as to judgments. Section 1 of article 2 declares that "the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States of America;" yet it has never been claimed that any other or different power was here invested than that prescribed in the second article. So the judicial power under article 3 was vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress might from time to time ordain and establish. Under article 3 the Supreme Court decided at an early day that the United States courts had no jurisdiction over offenses at common law and that they could only take cognizance of such offenses as were created by statute, and it is now settled beyond dispute that the Federal courts will not take jurisdiction over any crimes which have not been placed directly under their control by act of Congress. It would seem that here, if anywhere, the common law should apply.

Looking first to the letter of the Constitution, and applying to it the ordinary modes of interpretation, it would seem that the framers of the Constitution meant to provide that impeachment as a remedy should be resorted to with the same distinctness and brevity with which they provided for other essential powers of government; that, in order to make this provision, they provided that the proceeding should be initiated only in the House of Representatives, that body nearest to and directly responsible to the people. They had observed that in England the king or a private person could initiate these proceedings. They also observed that in the States several modes of inaugurating impeachments were resorted to, as, for example, in Pennsylvania the General Assembly could impeach and the council of censors could inaugurate the proceedings; and in North Carolina the General Assembly or any grand jury could impeach. They therefore resolved that only one body, and that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment."

They next sought to provide a tribunal to try impeachments. Here also they found great diversity in the constitutions of the several States. In some of them, as in Massachusetts, the senate had the power. In others, as in New York, the senators, chancellors, and judges of the Supreme Court; in Pennsylvania, the president and the council of twelve, taking to their assistance, for advice only, the justices of the supreme court; and in Virginia the general court. And after considerable debate, and after first providing that the Senate should only try justices of the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court all other officers, they finally adopted the provision that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." Thus having provided the body to prosecute, and the tribunal to try, they proceeded to the consideration of the judgment, and having the record of punishments in England fresh in their memories, which record disclosed that there was no limit to punishments in England except in the discretion of the House of Lords, they proceeded to limit the judgment, and provided that a concurrence of two-thirds should be required to convict, and provided that—

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

This clause is the first intimation as to the extent of the contemplated jurisdiction, and the purpose to be reached by the remedy. It is here shown that the purpose was to get rid of an officer by removal, and in extreme cases to disqualify him, as if he had committed treason or other high crimes the safety of the state might require absolute disqualification. It also appears from this clause that whatever of punishment there was in the judgment was only incidental, as they were careful to provide in the same clause for punishment in the courts according to law. Reading this clause alone, without connecting it with the fourth section of the second article, it would seem that the remedy was only intended to reach officers, and I cannot see how a less judgment than removal under this clause alone could be effectively pronounced. It has been said an officer might be suspended, but that is removal for a time, and a disqualification as to the particular officer for that time. The judgment could go further, and disqualify as to every office. As before stated, this is the first intimation as to the real purpose of the proceeding.

This brings us to the fourth section of the second article. Until this section is reached no persons have been designated nor offenses described. The fourth section of article 2 provides that—

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This is a potential section, prescribing who may be impeached and for what offenses, and when the judgment shall take effect and the minimum penalty that shall be prescribed in all cases.

This section means to provide for all these, or it is absolutely meaningless and was wholly unnecessary, because if all jurisdiction was conferred by the last clause of the second section of the first article, it was not necessary to include the fourth section of the second article at all, because this clause had already provided by reference to the parliamentary law for everything save the extent of the punishment. It was not necessary to include these persons here, because they were already included. It was not necessary to prescribe the offenses, because all the offenses here described and many more were impeachable in England. The persons subject to impeachment and the offenses impeachable must be found in this section or not at all, as neither are mentioned in any other place. It is claimed that this section was inserted solely and only for the purpose of compelling removal from office in case the party held office. It would hardly seem that the framers of the Constitution would have given such prominence to a provision having only this object in view, especially when they had already provided that removal from office must be a part of the judgment. I therefore conclude that in order to give any effect whatever to this fourth section of the second article it is absolutely necessary to give it the full effect above stated, namely, to provide the persons to be impeached, the offenses impeachable, the minimum judgment, and the time of its application, that is, upon conviction. If this construction be the true one, it follows that removal from office must in all cases be a part of the judgment, and this judgment cannot be imposed unless the party holds an office at the time of impeachment.

HISTORY OF THE CLAUSES FOUND IN THE CONSTITUTION.

Admitting that the language employed in the Constitution is not explicit, and that we are left in doubt as to its true construction, we are at liberty to examine the history of the several clauses bearing upon the subject, and to trace their progress in the Constitution, with a view to ascertain the aim and purpose in view. In doing this we must bear in mind the prime object of the Constitution as stated by Story, namely, that "it was from its very origin contemplated to be the frame work of a national government of special and enumerated powers, and not of general and unlimited powers." On the 29th of May Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, opened the main business of the convention by presenting a plan for a national government by stating the defects in the Articles of Confederation, and proposing a remedy, which was denominated Mr. Randolph's plan, the ninth section of which provided for the establishment of a national judiciary, which should have among other things jurisdiction to try "impeachments of any national officers," thus showing that in the very beginning it was contemplated that impeachments should apply only to national officers.

Mr. Pinckney, on the same day, presented a plan which provided that "the House of Delegates shall exclusively possess the power of impeachment," that the Supreme Court should have jurisdiction to try the impeachment of officers of the United States, and that the President "should be removed from his office upon impeachment by the House of Delegates and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or corruption;" and that in cases of impeachment affecting embassadors and other public ministers the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court should be original.

It will thus be seen that in both the plans proposed at this early day in the convention impeachment was confined to national officers. In Mr. Pinckney's plan a special provision was inserted with reference to the President of the United States; and on the 2d of June Mr. Dickinson moved "that the Executive be made removable by the national Legislature on the request of a majority of the Legislatures of individual States." "It was necessary," he said, "to place the power of removing somewhere. He did not like the plan of impeaching the great officers of state. He did not know that provision could be made for the removal of them in a better mode than that which he had proposed." Mr. Sherman contended that the national Legislature should have power to remove the Executive at pleasure. Mr. Mason thought "some mode of displacing an unfit magistrate is rendered indispensable by the fallibility of those who choose, as well as corruptibility of the man chosen." He opposed decidedly "the making of the Executive the mere creature of the Legislature as a violation of the fundamental principles of good government." A vote being taken, Mr. Dickinson's proposition was rejected; when Mr. Williamson moved to add to the last clause the words, "and be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty."

On the 13th of June Mr. Randolph and Mr. Madison moved the following resolution respecting the national judiciary:

That the jurisdiction of national judiciary shall extend to cases which respect the collection of the national revenue, impeachments of national officers, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony.

Which was agreed to without debate. (Madison Papers, volume 2, page 85.)

Up to this time these various propositions had been considered in committee of the whole, and on that day Mr. Gorham, chairman of the committee of the whole, reported from the committee a series of nineteen resolutions, and the resolution in relation to the national judiciary just adopted became the thirteenth of that series. The ninth of this series provided that "the President should be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty." It will be seen that the national judiciary were here authorized to try all impeachments of national officers, and that "the President should be removable on conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty," but that no provision was made as to who or what body should prefer the accusation or initiate impeachments. This report from the committee of the whole then became the plan of the convention, and Mr. Paterson, of New Jersey, asked time to prepare and present another plan, which he said several of the deputations wished should be substituted in place of that under consideration; and on the 15th of June Mr. Paterson proposed this plan, the fifth section of which provided for the establishment of a national judiciary, and "that the judiciary so established shall have authority to hear and determine in the first instance on all impeachments of Federal officers," and the fourth section of which provided "that the President should be removable by Congress on application by a majority of the executives of the several States."

On the 16th of June the convention again went into the committee of the whole for the discussion of the plans of Mr. Paterson and Mr. Randolph, and Mr. Wilson contrasted the two plans by saying, "The executive is to be removable on impeachment and conviction in one plan; in the other to be removable at the instance of a majority of the executives of the States." On the 18th of June Mr. Hamilton discussed at length the various propositions then in committee, and presented a plan of his own, which provided in the fourth section "that the supreme authority of the United States should be vested in a governor, to be elected to serve during good behavior," and the ninth clause, of which provided that—

The governor, Senators, and all officers of the United States to be liable to impeachment for mal and corrupt conduct, and upon conviction to be removed from office and disqualified for holding any place of trust or profit; all impeachments to be tried by a court to consist of the chief or judge of the superior court of law of each State, provided such judge shall hold his office during good behavior, and have a permanent salary.

It will be seen that this ninth clause provides for the impeachment of all officers, and that they shall be removed from office on conviction, showing that he contemplated that they would be in office at the time of trial.

On the 19th of June, after a lengthy discussion of Mr. Paterson's plan, Mr. Randolph's propositions, as reported from the committee on the 13th of June, were reported back without alteration. On the 18th of July Mr. Madison proposed to modify the thirteenth resolution relating to the jurisdiction of the national judiciary, so as to read:

That the jurisdiction shall extend to all cases arising under the national laws and to such other questions as may involve the national peace and harmony.

This was agreed to; and it would seem that Mr. Madison intended to confer the authority to try impeachments upon some other body, as the thirteenth resolution, before modified, conferred upon the judiciary the power to try. On the same day the whole clause relating to the Executive was reconsidered, and a lengthy debate followed relating to the length of term of the Chief Executive; and on the 19th, the same question being under consideration, Mr. Gouverneur Morris observed that he was for a short term, in order to avoid impeachments, which would be otherwise necessary. And again, on the 20th, the Executive clause still being under consideration, Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out the clause "to be removable on impeachment and conviction for malpractice or neglect of duty." Mr. Pinckney here observed that the President ought not to be impeachable while in office, and in the discussion of the case before us great stress has been laid upon these words of Mr. Pinckney and similar words used by Colonel Mason in the same debate. But a careful examination of this debate will show that Mr. Pinckney was opposed to the impeachment of the Executive at any time, and I quote his language as found on page 1156 of the Madison Papers:

Mr. Pinckney did not see the necessity of impeachments. He was sure they ought not to issue from the legislature, who would in that case hold them as a rod over the Executive, and by that means effectually destroy his independence. His revisionary power in particular would be rendered altogether insignificant.

And Mr. King, in the same debate, objected strongly to the impeachment of the President at all, unless they should make the tenure of his office during good behavior. And it will be observed that the tenure of the office of the Chief Executive had not been fixed at the time of this debate, and Mr. Randolph in this debate said that appropriate impeachment was a favorite principle with him. "The Executive will have great opportunities of abusing his power, particularly in time of war," &c. He suggested for consideration an idea, which had fallen from Colonel Hamilton, of composing the quorum out of the judges belonging to the States, and even requiring some preliminary inquest whether just ground of impeachment existed.

I call particular attention to this latter language, as it probably was the origin of the suggestion that the House of Representatives should become the inquest here alluded to, because up to that time nobody had been provided to make the accusation. Gouverneur Morris, who had originally joined Mr. Pinckney in moving to strike out this clause with reference to the President, after this debate said that his opinion had been changed by the arguments used in the discussion, and added, "he was now sensible of the necessity of impeachments," thus showing that the object he had in view in moving to strike out the clause was not to prevent the President from being impeached while in office, but to prohibit his impeachment at all. He goes on to say:

The Executive ought therefore to be impeachable for treachery, corrupting his electors, and incapacity, where they are causes of impeachment. If the latter, he should be punished, not as a man, but as an officer, and punished only by degradation from his office.

And this whole debate shows that, so far from Mr. Pinckney or Gouverneur Morris intimating that they were in favor of impeachment of the President after he was out of office, they both objected to his impeachment at any time, and wished to exclude him absolutely from the power of impeachment. Those who opposed impeachments were in favor of a short term for the President, and wished to make his power absolute and independent of either the legislative or judicial departments. After this debate a vote was taken and the clause retained in the Constitution.

On the 24th of July the resolutions reported from the committee of the whole on the 13th of June as amended, were referred to a committee of detail, consisting of Mr. Rutledge, Mr. Randolph, Mr. Gorham, Mr. Ellsworth, and Mr. Wilson, and at the same time the original proposition of Mr. Pinckney and also the propositions of Mr. Paterson were referred to the committee.

On the 6th of August Mr. Rutledge reported from the committee of detail reported a constitution, which provided:

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 4, section 6.)

The President shall be removable on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction by the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, and corruption. (Article 10, section 2.)

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend to the trial of impeachments of officers of the United States. (Article 11, section 3.)

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law. (Article 11, section —.)

It will be seen that this report is the first intimation as to where should be lodged the power to accuse in cases of impeachment. Before this report all propositions had been considered in the form of resolutions, but now the House of Representatives for the first time was given the sole power to make the accusation. Here all trials were to be had before the Supreme Court of the United States, and were limited to officers of the United States. The President could be removable only on conviction of treason, bribery, or corruption. The offenses of other officers of the United States were not described.

On the 20th of August Gouverneur Morris, seconded by Mr. Pinckney, submitted several propositions, which were referred to the committee of detail. The substance of these propositions was that there should be a council of state, composed of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and six Secretaries, and at the end it was provided that each of the officers above mentioned should be liable to impeachment and removal from office for neglect of duty, malversation, or corruption. Mr. Gerry moved that the committee be instructed to report proper qualifications for President and the mode of trying the supreme judges in cases of impeachment.

On the 22d of August the committee of detail made further report with reference to several clauses, and provided that at the end of the second section of the eleventh article should be added, "the judges of the Supreme Court shall be triable by the Senate on impeachment by the House of Representatives;" thus leaving the impeachments of all other officers, including the President, to be tried before the judges of the Supreme Court. On the 25th of August, in considering the pardon clause, the President's power to pardon in cases of impeachment was excepted. This was agreed to nem. con.

On the 27th of August, Gouverneur Morris moved to postpone the clause relating to removal of the President on impeachment because he thought the Supreme Court was an improper tribunal to try him. On the 31st of August all the postponed clauses, and such parts of reports as had not been acted on, were referred to a committee of one from each State. On the 4th of September this committee reported recommending the insertion of the words:

The Senate of the United States shall have power to try all impeachments, but no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members present.

The same committee reported the latter part of section 2, article 10, which read as follows:

He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction by the Senate for treason or bribery, and in case of his removal as aforesaid, death, absence, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers or duties of his office, the Vice-President shall exercise those powers and duties until another President be chosen or until the inability of the President be removed.

Here it was proposed to provide for the removal of the President on impeachment by the House and conviction by the Senate. Would it be claimed by any one that under this clause, which is substantially the clause in the Constitution now, the President could be tried after he had vacated his office by resignation or after his term of office had expired?

Mr. Wilson afterward in debating this clause and other clauses connected with it relating to the Executive said "he was obliged to consider the whole plan as having a dangerous tendency to aristocracy, and as throwing a dangerous power into the hands of the Senate. They will have, in fact, the appointment of the President, and through his dependence on them, the virtual appointment of officers, and among others, the appointment of officers to the judiciary department. They are to make treaties and they are to try all impeachments. In allowing them thus to make executive and judiciary appointments, be the court of impeachment, and to make treaties which are to be laws of the land, the legislative, executive, and judiciary powers are all blended in one branch of the Government."

This committee further reported the clause postponed on the 27th of August, making the President removable from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason and bribery, thus omitting the word "corruption." As this clause had been postponed on motion of Gouverneur Morris because he thought the Supreme Court an improper tribunal to try the President, it gave rise to considerable discussion as to which was the fitter tribunal to try, the Senate or the Supreme Court, and the committee having struck out the word "corruption," there was a debate as to whether the President should be removed for any other misconduct than treason or bribery.

On the 8th of September the clause referring to the Senate the trial of impeachments against the President for treason and bribery was taken up. Colonel Mason said:

Why is the provision restrained to treason and bribery only? Treason as defined in the Constitution will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above described. As bills of attainder, which have saved the British constitution, are forbidden, it is the more necessary to extend the power of impeachments.

If he had for a moment supposed that the power was already conferred by the first article, why should he have used these words? He then moved to add after "bribery" the words "or maladministration." Mr. Madison said:

So vague a term would be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate.

Gouverneur Morris said:

It will not be put in force and can do no harm. An election every four years will prevent maladministration.

Colonel Mason then withdrew "maladministration" and substituted "other high crimes and misdemeanors against the state;" which amendment was agreed to. Mr. Madison then objected to the trial of the President by the Senate, and a considerable debate followed as to whether a President should be tried by the Senate or by the Supreme Court; but on motion to strike out the words "the Senate," made by Mr. Madison, these words were retained—9 in the affirmative, and 2 in the negative. Then Colonel Mason's amendment, wherein the word "state" was used, was struck out, and the words "United States" unanimously inserted, in order to remove ambiguity. The whole clause then relating to the President, as amended, was agreed to.

It will thus be seen that up to this point they were fixing in this clause who should try the President, and for what offenses he should be tried, and also providing that he should be removed from office on conviction. When the clause reached this point, it was voted without debate, and apparently without division, to add to the clause making the President the subject of removal the further words, "the Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction as aforesaid," thus showing that the offenses for which the President could be tried were applied to all civil officers, and also applying to all civil officers the provision already applied to the President, namely, "shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction," thus drawing together in a single clause the provisions relating to the offenses for which persons could be tried, and what persons could be tried. The clause relating to judgment still remained at this stage in the article relating to the judiciary, and at this time the whole Constitution was referred to a select committee on style and arrangement. The purpose of this committee was to bring the several provisions agreed to under their proper heads, so that when this committee on style reported the Constitution as it now stands all the provisions relating to jurisdiction of persons and offenses were drawn into the fourth section of article 2, and that relating to judgment, except so much of the judgment as provided for absolute removal, was drawn into the last clause of section 3, article 1, or rather that clause was transferred from the eleventh article, where it stood among judicial powers, to the first article, and transferred without change or amendment, so that this clause was brought back in its final arrangement to stand in the Constitution before the article relating to the Executive, instead of standing after that article among the powers granted to the judiciary; and in construing these several provisions we must construe them together as a whole frame-work relating to impeachments, and give no prominence to the fact that any one clause stands before the other and should have a construction because of its relative position in the Constitution.

It will be observed that at every stage of the proceedings it was in contemplation to invoke impeachment only for the purpose of trying national officers, and this clause relating to the President became separated from that relating to other national officers because there was a doubt in the minds of many in the convention whether the President should be impeached at all, and up to the time of the appointment of the committee of detail, on the 6th of August, the tenure of the presidential office had not been fixed, and this committee of detail reported that he should hold his office for seven years, and that he should not be elected a second time, and this subject relating to the tenure of the Executive was not concluded until near the close of the convention. It will be remembered that at this stage of the proceedings the judgment in cases of impeachment was provided for by section 5, article 11, the article relating to judicial powers; and there also stood at this time in article 11 the provision extending to the judiciary the trial of impeachments of officers of the United States, so that it became necessary to modify this eleventh article. Otherwise there would be a provision for the impeachment of the President, Vice-President, and civil officers only, and the provision still left in the eleventh article for the impeachment of officers of the United States not civil, making these two provisions apparently repugnant. Therefore the committee on style must have removed the judgment clause from section 5, article 11, to section 3, article 1, the power of trying having been transferred from the Supreme Court to the Senate.

Now, the history of this clause as to persons shows that from the beginning it was intended to make full provision in appropriate phrase for all that could be done under the proceeding of impeachment; and so of offenses, because the same clause constituting what persons should be impeached contains the clause prescribing the offenses. If, as is claimed, the last clause of the second section of the first article had already provided a full remedy, why were these several amendments proposed to the clause relating to the President, and why were they inserted in that connection? Surely, as to all other officers, the words "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors" were already implied, as they were impeachable offenses in England and were wholly unnecessary here. If they were words of limitation and originally intended to apply to the President alone, then by their insertion here they were finally so applied to all civil officers, because in this section the President and all civil officers are placed upon an equal footing.

This summary of the various motions, amendments, shifting of clauses, adding of provisions, transposing of provisions, and the debates thereon shows that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to gather into this fourth section of the second article all of the persons liable to trial and the offenses for which impeachment could be tried. They did not alter or change the substantive clause relating to judgment, except to make it clear that removal from office should be the least punishment, and that in the discretion of the Senate the further judgment of disqualification might be inflicted. From this it is clear that the last clause of section 2, article 1, was only jurisdictional so far as to describe the body that should have the sole power to inaugurate proceedings, and the sixth clause of section 3, article 1, is only jurisdictional so far as to prescribe the tribunal that should try impeachments, and that the fourth section of article 2 was meant to be the jurisdictional section as to persons, as to offenses, as to time of judgments, and as to the minimum punishment that could be inflicted; and, if removal from office must be a part of the judgment, it follows that the person upon whom the judgment is to operate shall be in the possession of an office at the time of the proceedings are instituted, and it follows, of course, that this provision relating to judgment aids us in the interpretation of the term "President, Vice-President and all other civil officers," showing that they meant the jurisdiction to be confined to such officers, and not to extend to persons out of office, who may at some time in their lives have held civil office, because under the construction sought to be given to the words "civil officers" it matters not whether a person liable to impeachment has vacated his office a day before impeachment or forty years before, if he still be living.

The whole tenor of the debate upon all these provisions confirms the view I maintain; and there seems to have been good reason for this limitation. They had invoked this jurisdiction for the safety of the state, and not to inflict a punishment. They only intended it for great criminals, who should commit specified crimes, and persist in holding office notwithstanding their offenses. Therefore they provided that removal must follow for the protection of the state. They had agreed at an early day in their deliberations that such offenders should be turned over to the courts for punishment, and provided that persons impeached should nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. This careful provision shows that they had full faith and confidence in the Federal courts to be thereafter created, and the people from the body of whom juries were to be made up. It will not do to say that if Belknap is guilty as charged, he will escape punishment if we do not inflict upon him by our judgment the disqualification clause. Congress has carefully provided a statute for the class of crimes which it is alleged Belknap has committed, and has also provided a severe judgment which shall be pronounced against him if he be guilty, which judgment must embrace the only possible judgment we can pronounce and much more in addition. (See sections 5500, 5501, and 5502, Revised Statutes.)

But it is said that according to this view he can by his resignation escape the one penalty we are authorized to impose—disqualification. Not so, because the statutes above referred to compel the rendition of this judgment.

But it may be said that under the statutes the President can pardon. Admitting this to be true, he must still be elected to office by the people, or be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It can hardly be supposed that a President and Senate would unite in restoring to office a man against whom such a judgment has been pronounced. Besides, our judgment of disqualification does not prevent the accused, as was shown by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] from holding the most important offices of honor or trust. The Senator from Kansas said truly that he could still be elected governor of the State of Iowa; he could still be elected a Senator of the United States and hold his office, because in the Blount case it was decided that a Senator is not an officer within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

I think I have shown, from the debates in the convention, the real intent and purpose of the framers of our Constitution, and that that purpose thus shown is in accord with the construction I give to the letter of the instrument, construing it as a whole.

But we are not left alone to the debates in the convention at the time for the true interpretation of their purpose. This purpose can also be gathered from the action of the various States, contemporaneous with the meeting of the convention and the adoption of the Constitution finally by the several States.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS IN THE SEVERAL STATES AT THE TIME OF THE ADOPTION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

This brings us to the consideration of the several provisions relating to impeachment in the different State constitutions at the time the Federal Constitution was under consideration by the convention and before its final adoption by the several States. And here it must be borne in mind that the Articles of Confederation contained no provision whatever relating to impeachment, and it must also be remembered that in the discussion that preceded the meeting of the convention at Philadelphia the failure to provide for impeachment in the Articles of Confederation did not constitute a reason for a new frame-work of government or for a revision of those articles. The chief objects sought to be secured by the convention were to provide more fully for the national defense and for the promotion of commerce.

Very soon after the Declaration of Independence, in 1776, which was in fact a formal separation of the colonies from the mother-country, the several colonies, then denominated States, began the work of framing for themselves constitutions or organic laws. I have examined with care the several provisions relating to impeachment as found in the constitutions of these new States, led thereto by the extraordinary pretense that it was the intention of our fathers to import bodily into the Constitution of the United States the parliamentary law of impeachment, vague and indefinite as it was, to adopt it without limit and without restraint except as to judgment. It would be natural to suppose that, if the States in the aggregate had such purpose in view, the several States in their local constitutions, or at least many of them, would also have resorted to the parliamentary law for the remedy of impeachment. But on examination of these several constitutions it will be seen that in no one of them was this power left vague and indefinite. On the contrary, it was specifically defined in all the State constitutions as to the body that could inaugurate the proceeding, as to the body or tribunal that could try, as to the persons who could be impeached, and as to the offenses for which impeachment would lie. And a further examination will show that the framers of our Federal Constitution practically adopted the remedy of impeachment as it stood at the time in the States of New York, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. The New York provisions are as follows:

That the power of impeaching all officers of the State for mal or corrupt conduct in their respective offices be vested in the representatives of the people in assembly, but that it shall always be necessary that the two-thirds part of the members present shall consent to and agree in such impeachment; * * * that a court shall be instituted for the trial of impeachments and the correction of errors under the regulations which shall be established by the Legislature and to consist of the president of the senate for the time being, and the senators, chancellor, and judges of the supreme court, or the major part of them. * * * No judgment of the said court shall be valid unless it be assented to by two-thirds part of the members then present; nor shall it extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any place of honor, trust, or profit under this State; but the party so convicted shall be nevertheless liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to the laws of the land.

This constitution was adopted April 20, 1777. The constitution of Massachusetts, adopted March 2, 1780, provided that—

The house of representatives shall be the grand inquest of this Commonwealth, and all impeachments made by them shall be heard and tried by the senate. * * * The senate shall be the court with full authority to hear and determine all impeachments made by the house of representatives against any officer or officers of the Commonwealth for misconduct or maladministration in their offices. * * * Their judgment, however, shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any place of honor, trust, or profit under this Commonwealth; but the party so convicted shall be nevertheless liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to the laws of the land.

The State of New Hampshire in 1784 adopted the exact words of the provisions of the Massachusetts constitution.

Pennsylvania adopted a constitution or frame of government on the 15th of July, 1776, and provided for impeachment as follows:

Every officer of state, whether judicial or executive, shall be liable to be impeached by the General Assembly, either when in office or after his resignation or removal, for maladministration. All impeachments shall be before the president, or vice-president and council, who shall sit as judges to hear and determine on impeachments, taking, for their assistance and advice only, the justices of the supreme court.

The board of censors was also authorized to impeach any State officer. Delaware adopted a constitution in 1776, with provisions relating to impeachment, as follows:

The President, when he is out of office and within eighteen months after, and all others offending against the State, either by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the Commonwealth may be endangered, within eighteen months after the offense committed shall be impeachable by the house of assembly before the legislative council. If found guilty, he or they shall be either forever disabled to hold any office under the government, or removed from office pro tempore, or subjected to such pains and penalties as the law shall direct.

The State of Virginia adopted a constitution on the 5th day of July, 1776, and provided for impeachment as follows:

The governor when he is out of office, and others offending against the State, either by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered, shall be impeachable by the house of delegates in the general court according to the laws of the land. If found guilty he or they shall be either forever disabled to hold any office under government or be removed from such office pro tempore, or subjected to such pains or penalties as the law shall direct.

The State of North Carolina adopted a constitution December 18, 1776, and provided that—

The governor and other officers offending against the State by violating any part of this constitution, by maladministration or corruption, may be prosecuted on impeachment of the General Assembly or presentment of the grand jury in the court of supreme jurisdiction in this State.

Georgia adopted a constitution in 1777 making no provision for impeachment, but in 1789 revised her constitution and provided that—

The house of delegates shall have the sole power to impeach all persons who have been or may be in office, and the senate shall have the sole power to try.

There was no limitation as to judgment. In 1798 Georgia again revised her constitution and limited the punishment, as limited in the constitutions of New York and Massachusetts, and as in the Federal Constitution; and then in section 8 provided that—

All persons convicted on impeachment are hereby released, and persons lying under such convictions are restored to citizenship.

I have selected from the various State constitutions these provisions, to show that although the States had generally adopted the common law in their several courts of judicature, in no instance did they rely upon parliamentary law with reference to impeachments, but placed in their several constitutions specific provisions relating thereto, the intent and purpose of which provisions were to limit and restrain the power of impeachment as practiced in Parliament with reference to the persons to be impeached, and the offenses impeachable, and the judgment to be inflicted.

I also call attention to these constitutions for the purpose of showing that at the time the Federal Constitution was under consideration the constitutions of the States of New York, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire provided only for the impeachment of State officers, while the constitutions of the States of Delaware, Virginia, and Pennsylvania provided for the impeachment of officers whether in or out of office, except the State of Delaware, which provided that the president should not be impeached in office; and Virginia, that the governor should not be impeached when in office. In these latter two States all other officers were impeached in or out of office; and in these two States also impeachments were not confined to officers, but extended to all persons offending against the State.

I call attention to these provisions also to show that the impeaching power in several of the States was divided, as in Pennsylvania, it was given to the board of censors and the Legislative Assembly; as in North Carolina, to the General Assembly and any grand jury of any court of supreme jurisdiction.

It will further be observed that in the different States different tribunals were resorted to to try impeachments, so that the framers of the Constitution, finding in the several States these diverse and conflicting provisions relating to impeachments, must have intended to provide clearly for all the various steps in the proceeding, and also the persons subject to this power, as also the offenses and the time when the remedy could be applied. And I think it can hardly be supposed that having present before them the fact that no one of the States had adopted the parliamentary law of impeachments, but that in all of them specific provisions were made, they would resort in the aggregate to Great Britain for the measure or boundary of jurisdiction in such cases. It would be strange indeed if, in framing a constitution granting "special and enumerated powers," they should resort without debate, without dissent, and without restraint for jurisdiction to the musty records of Parliament, running over a period of nearly five hundred years, from the Edwards to the Georges, marking, as it did both the glory and shame of England. If they had so intended, they utterly failed to carry out the general purpose for which they met at Philadelphia.

I find, therefore, from the letter of the Constitution, from the debates in the convention, and from the current history of the time that there was no intention to resort to the common law or parliamentary law of England to ascertain the proper jurisdiction in cases of impeachment.

But passing from this review of the period contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution, let us examine briefly what has been said of these various clauses by the commentators and publicists who have undertaken to construe them. So far as I have been able to examine, the construction now placed upon the Constitution is entirely new with the single exception of the claim put forth by the managers on the part of the House, on the trial of the case of William Blount in 1798, and I wish to call attention to what was then said by the managers. It will be remembered that William Blount, being a Senator from the State of Tennessee, had during his senatorial term engaged in criminal correspondence with persons in the interest of Great Britain, with a view to incite the Creeks and Cherokees to take up arms against Spain, with whom the United States had a treaty of friendship. This correspondence was discovered and sent to the House of Representatives by John Adams, then President. Blount was also charged with an attempt to seduce a United States Indian interpreter from his duty and to alienate the affections and confidence of the Indians from the public officers residing among them.

On the 7th day of July, 1797, Blount was impeached at the bar of the Senate for high crimes and misdemeanors. On the day following he was expelled from the Senate, making no defense whatever against the charges presented, so that when he was impeached at the bar of the Senate he was a Senator of the United States. Afterward he employed able counsel, Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Dallas, and the case came up for consideration in 1798. His counsel set up in his defense that a Senator was not a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the fourth section of the second article, and therefore was not liable to impeachment.

Mr. Bayard, who opened the case on the part of the managers, in answer to this endeavored to maintain that all persons without the supposed limitation are liable to impeachment and claimed that none of the positive provisions of the Constitution declared in what cases an impeachment should be sustained or to what persons it should be confined, and said:

Therefore I shall insist that the impeachment remains as at common law, with variance only as to positive provisions in the Constitution.

He proceeded to show that the question is, What persons, for what offenses, are liable to be impeached at common law? and added that he "is confident that the learning and liberality of the counsel will save him the trouble of argument or citation of authorities to establish the position that the question of impeachability is a question of discretion only with the Commons and Lords, and that all the king's subjects are liable to be impeached by the Commons and tried by the Lords upon charges of high crimes and misdemeanors, and that this jurisdiction goes to the extent of the articles exhibited against Blount." Although the managers argued at some length that a Senator of the United States is a civil officer, yet they laid chief stress upon the argument that the jurisdiction in cases of impeachment was limited only by the common law, and that therefore it was not necessary to establish that William Blount was a civil officer.

Mr. Dallas and Mr. Ingersoll, counsel for Mr. Blount, argued at length to establish that—

Only civil officers of the United States are impeachable, and that offenses for which an impeachment lies must be committed in the execution of a public office.

After the arguments of the managers and counsel, the following resolutions were proposed:

That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives; that as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled.

These resolutions were debated on the 7th, 8th, and 9th of January, 1798, and on the 10th a vote was reached, and they were rejected—yeas 11, nays 14; and on the following day on motion it was determined—

That the court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and the said impeachment is dismissed.

Upon this the vote was reversed, 14 voting for this resolution and 11 voting against it.

The plea is as follows:

That proceedings by impeachment are provided and permitted by the Constitution of the United States only on charges of bribery, treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors alleged to have been committed by the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States in the execution of their offices held under the United States, as appears by the fourth section of the second article and by the seventh clause of the third section of the first article, and other articles and clauses contained in the Constitution of the United States.

That, although true it is that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to, yet that he, the said William, is not now a Senator and is not, nor was at the several periods so as aforesaid referred to, an officer of the United States; nor is he, the said William, in and by the said articles charged with having committed any crime or misdemeanor in the execution of any civil office held under the United States or with any malconduct in civil office, or abuse of any public trust in the execution thereof.

It will thus be seen that it was maintained on the part of the counsel for Blount that it was necessary that the party impeached should be a civil officer of the United States under the fourth section of the second article, and it was maintained on the part of the managers that the jurisdiction to impeach embraced every case and every person known to the parliamentary law of England. Therefore it seems clear to me that the Senate decided in the Blount case that only civil officers could be impeached, and, so deciding, they must have held that the jurisdiction of persons and offenses was described in the fourth section of the second article, and that impeachments were limited to the cases therein defined. So that, to my mind, the Blount case has practically settled the question in this case.

Judge Story, in commenting upon what are impeachable offenses, says:

It seems, then, to be the settled doctrine of the high court of impeachment that, though the common law cannot be the foundation of a jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or law, that jurisdiction when given attaches and is to be exercised according to the rules of the common law.

Thus showing that in his opinion the common law could not be resorted to for jurisdiction. It is claimed by those who favor jurisdiction in this case that the common law measures the jurisdiction. Judge Story, in commenting upon the fourth section of the second article, after quoting the section, says:

From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice-President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that kingdom all the king's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament, though it is asserted that commoners cannot now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. * * * There seems a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeachment power to persons holding office. In such government all the citizens are equal, and ought to have the same security of a trial by jury for all crimes and offenses laid to their charge when not holding any official character. To subject them to impeachment would not only be extremely oppressive and expensive, but would endanger their lives and liberties by exposing them against their wills to persecution for their conduct in exercising their political rights and privileges. Dear as the trial by jury justly is in civil cases, its value as a protection against the resentment and violence of rulers and factions in criminal prosecutions makes it inestimable. It is there, and there only, that a citizen in the sympathy and impartiality, the intelligence and incorruptible integrity of his fellows impaneled to try the accusation, may indulge a well-founded confidence to sustain and cheer him. * * * Indeed the moment it was decided that judgment upon impeachments should be limited to removal and disqualifications from office, it follows as a natural result that it ought not to reach any but officers of the United States. It seems to have been the original object of the friends of the national Government to confine it to these limits, for in the original resolutions proposed to the convention and in all the subsequent proceedings the power was expressly limited to national officers. (Story on the Constitution, volume 1, § 790.)

This learned commentator upon the Constitution seems also to have considered carefully whether one out of office could be impeached for crimes alleged to have been committed in office, and expresses his view upon this point as follows:

As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and a disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, and in another clause that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors, it would seem to follow that the Senate, on the conviction, were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If then there must be the judgment of removal from office it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice, and it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish the offender as to secure the State against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity. (See Story on the Constitution, § 803.)

It will thus be seen that Mr. Justice Story, in his exhaustive chapter on the subject of impeachment, after an examination of all the authorities upon the subject and after an examination of the letter of the Constitution and the debates in the convention, arrives at the conclusion that section 4, article 2, does describe the offenses and the persons liable to impeachment, and that it was his opinion that the remedy was intended to apply only to civil officers of the United States; and that, inasmuch as judgment of removal was necessary in all cases, only persons in office could be impeached. For myself I prefer to rely upon this high authority rather than to give a strained and enlarged construction to the Constitution, especially so when I find that Chancellor Kent and Mr. Rawle both resort to the fourth section of the second article for jurisdiction in cases of impeachment as to persons and offenses. Curtis, in his History of the Constitution, volume 2, pages 261 and 262, in commenting upon the impeaching power, declares that the object of impeachment was to remove the President, the judges, and all other civil officers of the United States from office on impeachment. All these authorities seem to concur in the view that the object of impeachment was not to provide a punishment, but only to secure removal from office and protect the state from the machinations of great offenders who might be guilty of high crimes in office.

I agree with my colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] that we cannot consider the motives which actuated the accused in presenting his resignation. I further agree with him that the time of the resignation is not material, provided that it was made before the impeachment proceedings began.

Should jurisdiction be taken in this case, the principle established subjects to the impeaching power all persons who are now living who may at any time heretofore have held civil office or place of public trust under the United States; and, under the arguments of those who claim jurisdiction, it will also subject to the impeaching power all the military and national officers of the United States now living or who may come hereafter. It does not seem to me that it could have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution to thus enlarge the power.

It has been said that limiting the impeaching power to the removal of dangerous persons from office is to practically destroy the remedy, as all of those who ought to be impeached will resign and escape impeachment, while only those who in the end will perhaps not be convicted will continue in office so as to place them within the power of the House and Senate. This does not follow, because if it be true that the object of impeachment, or its principal object, was removal from office, then by resignation or expiration of the term of service the remedy intended is reached. At best, impeachment is a cumbrous remedy. In the case at bar we have exhausted three months of the most valuable time of Congress on preliminary questions. The trial of Hastings lasted ten years in Great Britain, and they have had but one case of impeachment since and no case within seventy years. Since the formation of our Government we have had but six cases in all and only two convictions. In my own State, Iowa, our constitution has provided for impeachment for thirty years, and not a single case has occurred, and we all know how difficult it is to find precedents in the various States with reference to this remedy, showing that in the States and under the Federal Government offenses are punished under the regular and certain processes of the law in the Federal and State courts, and that the trial of causes by a political body is not a favorite method of punishing offenders in this country.

Therefore I conclude that it is unnecessary, for the purpose of conserving the public interests, to give a strained construction to the Constitution for the purpose of invoking this power when all substantial remedies are reached by giving it the limited construction originally intended by those who framed it.

I have attempted to give a reasonable construction to the letter of the Constitution as derived from the words used in the instrument, construing the several provisions together. I have examined in detail the progress of the several provisions through the convention, and the debates thereon. I have shown from the contemporaneous history of the several States that specific provisions for impeachment were made in all of them, and that in none of them did the common or parliamentary law prevail as to jurisdiction of persons or offenses. I have endeavored to show that the construction I give to the Constitution has been uniformly acquiesced in for nearly a hundred years without being in any way challenged except in the single case of the argument of the managers in the prosecution of Blount. I have also endeavored to show that the construction I give to the Constitution provides the substantial remedy originally intended, and I therefore conclude that upon principle, upon the letter of the instrument, and from all the precedents cited, the Senate has not jurisdiction to try the case now at bar, and that the proceedings should be dismissed.

Opinion of Mr. McMillan,

Delivered May 25, 1876.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is quite manifest from various provisions of the Constitution that it was the intention of the framers of that instrument to vest in the General Government a power of impeachment.

It is claimed in the case at bar that the fifth paragraph of section 2, article 1, of the Constitution is the only provision thereof which affects the jurisdiction of the persons impeachable and the subject-matter of impeachment, and that it vests in the House of Representatives all the power of impeachment at common law, and that we are to refer to the common law to ascertain the nature and extent of that jurisdiction. It is further claimed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that, conceding jurisdiction to be conferred only by the fourth section of article 2, persons once officers are impeachable after they are out of office for offenses embraced in this section committed while in office.

The fifth paragraph of section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution is as follows:

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Does this vest in the House of Representatives all the power of impeachment at common law? If so, it must be because the operative word "impeachment," ex vi termini, imports the jurisdiction of the persons impeachable and the subject-matter of impeachment. The word impeachment is used in the fourth section of article 2 of the same instrument, and as there used cannot embrace the jurisdiction of the persons, for the persons subject to the jurisdiction are expressly designated. It cannot embrace the subject-matter of impeachment, for the offenses are therein enumerated. It clearly, in that connection, refers to the remedy and embraces only the accusation and prosecution in the proceeding. The same meaning may be given to the word as used in the fifth paragraph of section 2, article 1, and still leave that provision fully operative. The word does not, therefore, per se, import jurisdiction of the persons impeached or the subject-matter of impeachment. The meaning of the clause is, therefore, open to construction.

May it reasonably be limited to embrace only the accusation and prosecution of the remedy?

The framers of the Constitution were familiar with the fact that in Great Britain the power of impeachment was not confined to the House of Commons, but extended alike to the king and the citizen. They knew also that, in some of the constitutions of the States about to be formed into a Federal Government under the Constitution they were framing, both houses of the Legislature joined in the accusation and the trial in cases of impeachment. They were about to institute an extraordinary remedy, the object of which was to protect the Government against corrupt officers who might be called to administer its affairs, which would involve the most sacred rights they were about to secure to the citizens of the Republic. The House of Representatives, for the organization of which they were to provide, were to be the immediate representatives of the people. It was therefore fit that with that body, and it alone, should be deposited so grave a power. Jealous of the rights of the citizen, that justice might not be violated by the accuser becoming the judge, it was the great wisdom of our fathers which limited the power of the House of Representatives to that of accusation. (Story on the Constitution, §§ 686–687, 741.)

But although the clause under consideration does not necessarily import jurisdiction of the persons impeachable or the subject-matter of impeachment, but only the power of accusation and prosecution, was it the intent of the framers of the Constitution by this language to confer upon the House of Representatives all the power of impeachment at common law possessed by the House of Commons of Great Britain at the adoption of the Constitution?

It is laid down by English commentators, and the doctrine is recognized by Judge Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, that by the common law the power of the House of Commons to impeach embraced private individuals, and it is not disputed that the punishment upon impeachment and conviction was at the discretion of the lords, extending to property, person, and life. If the exercise of this jurisdiction upon individuals was so shocking to the public sense as to prevent its exercise in more modern times, the omission to use it did not divest the power. The comparatively recent case in the English courts in which a party demanded his right of trial by battle, which, although so long disused that it was known only in the history of the law, was found to be a legal right, is familiar, at least to the profession. The non user of a right does not abrogate the law. If, therefore, this jurisdiction to impeach the individual existed at common law, the express grant of the common-law power claimed to exist in the Constitution preserves it here in all its vigor. It must at least be said that, if the construction claimed for this paragraph of the Constitution is correct, the exercise of a power the most dangerous and odious which could be invoked by the National Government is left to doubtful construction.

But, however this may be, the power of impeachment at common law indisputably excluded the king and embraced all officers of every character and grade in the realm, and all persons holding or exercising a franchise of the Crown, and extended to all crimes and abuses of the vested franchises affecting the public interests. If this be the jurisdiction conferred by our Constitution, the power to impeach extends to all civil, military, and naval officers, and to all persons holding any franchise from the General Government. Embraced within the latter class are all bank officials of national banks, all railroad officials of railroads under the laws of the United States, and officials of any corporation which may be organized under the laws of the United States.

On the other hand, resting the jurisdiction solely upon this clause and referring to the common law to ascertain its extent, the President of the United States could not be impeached, for he derives or may derive his office from a source paramount to the National Government. (Story on the Constitution, § 791.) If such power and such want of power be now found to exist in the Constitution, the people of the country wil suddenly awake from the dream of security of almost a century's duration, in the midst of darkness, filled with terror and fearful forebodings.

Therefore, considering the circumstances under which the Constitution was framed, the character of its officers, the purposes they desired to accomplish by their work, and referring to the nature and extent of the common-law jurisdiction in impeachment, it would seem to be unreasonable that our fathers would embody in the fundamental law of the nation a power and jurisdiction so unlimited, so liable to abuse, and so obnoxious to a liberty-loving people as the common-law jurisdiction of impeachment.

But it is a familiar rule of construction that in arriving at the meaning of a written instrument all its provisions must be construed together and in the light of each other. Section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution is as follows:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This, it is claimed, is not a grant of jurisdictional power.

The President, under the common-law power of impeachment, would not be impeachable; therefore he is not impeachable at all unless this section makes him so. This language, "The President * * * shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason," &c., necessarily implies that he may be impeached for and convicted of the offenses designated. (Story on the Constitution, § 791.) It is, then, a jurisdictional section so far as he is concerned. As the same words apply to the "Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States," it must have the same effect as to them. The section is, therefore, a jurisdictional one, both as to the persons and the subject-matter of impeachment.

In considering the fifth paragraph of section 2, article 1, we have already seen that full effect may be given to it by construing it to be a grant of power to accuse and prosecute only, and that such construction is reasonable. If it had been the intention of the framers of the Constitution in that paragraph to embrace the jurisdiction of the persons impeachable and the subject-matter of impeachment, they would certainly have disposed of the whole subject and embraced the President and Vice-President. The reasonable conclusion, therefore, is that the fourth section of article 2 is the only section which confers jurisdiction of the persons impeachable and the offenses for which impeachment will lie.

Again, conceding for this point that some difference of opinion may have existed heretofore as to whether under this section a person could be impeached after he left office for offenses committed while in office, yet I have been unable to learn from my own investigation or from the investigation of other Senators upon this trial—and the latter seems to have been exhaustive—that it was ever claimed, except by the managers in the Blount case, that the fifth paragraph of section 2, article 1, conferred on the House of Representatives all the common-law power of impeachment; on the other hand, whatever construction as to the extent of the jurisdiction conferred may be given to section 4 of article 2, Kent, Rawle, Story, Bouvier, and all the public men of the country refer the jurisdiction to that section, and the decision in the Blount case clearly, to my mind, settles the question that it is the source of jurisdiction in impeachment.

This brings me to consider whether under this section a person who is out of office may be impeached for crimes committed while in office.

If this section, as I believe and have endeavored to show, is the only source of jurisdiction, it is exclusive, and those only are subject to impeachment who are embraced within it; that is, the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States. This enumeration of these persons excludes all others.

Paragraph 7 of section 3, article 1, provides that—

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

The impeachment and conviction are for crimes, but the proceeding is not for the punishment of the offense nor the offender, for that is expressly left to the criminal proceeding by indictment, and if any element of punishment as such entered into the impeachment, it would plainly subject the citizen to a double punishment for the same offense.

The only purpose of the proceeding by impeachment, therefore, must be the preservation of the purity and the protection of the Government. Official station, in the contemplation of the Constitution, is the only thing which affords the opportunity of effecting the injury to the Government against which it was intended by this proceeding to protect. Therefore the judgment in cases of impeachment relates only to the incumbency of official position by the accused.

Paragraph 7 of section 3, article 1, above quoted, provides that—

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

The judgment must be based upon the conviction of a person impeachable of an impeachable offense. What might be the construction of this provision if it stood alone, it is not necessary now to determine. If I am right in the view I have taken of the Constitution, section 4 of article 2 prescribes the only persons and offenses which are impeachable, and that section provides that all of the officers therein designated shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of any of the offenses therein mentioned. The removal from office is based upon the conviction. It must therefore be by the judgment upon the conviction. The language of section 4 is unambiguous and mandatory—"shall be removed from office."

Paragraph 7 of section 3, article 1, must be construed in connection with section 4 of article 2, and thus construed the judgment must, in all cases, be removal from office, and must not in any case extend further than "removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office * * * under the United States." The power to disqualify cannot be exercised except in connection with removal from office; but it need not be exercised in all cases of removal.

Removal from office, then, must be the judgment in all cases of impeachment; but removal from office cannot take place where the person impeached and convicted is not in office; therefore a person not in office cannot be impeached.

The terms used in section 4 of article 2 to designate who are impeachable likewise imply persons in office.

Whether after jurisdiction in impeachment is taken a resignation can be effectual to oust the jurisdiction, and whether an officer can be impeached for offenses committed prior to his entrance into office, are questions not necessary to be determined in this case, and upon which I express no opinion.

For the reasons given, I am of opinion:

1. That paragraph 5 of section 2, article 1 of the Constitution confers upon the House of Representatives the exclusive power to accuse and prosecute in cases of impeachment, nothing more.

2. That section 4, article 2, prescribes the officers impeachable and the offenses for which they may be impeached, and that power extends only to the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States while in office.

3. That the defendant, William W. Belknap, being out of office and a private citizen at the time and before the proceeding for his impeachment took place, the House of Representatives had no authority to impeach him and the Senate has no jurisdiction to try the impeachment.

Opinion of Mr. Ingalls,

Delivered May 25, 1876.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the American people have exhibited so many convincing proofs of their capacity for self-government, and have falsified so many prophecies of disaster, that I hesitate to agree with those who affirm that either decision of the question now before the Senate is fraught in the alternative with fatal consequences to the Constitution of our country or to the liberties of its citizens.

Should it be determined that the respondent, having resigned, continues liable to impeachment for misconduct while in office, it would hardly be considered a usurpation of general criminal jurisdiction or a return to the judicial atrocities of the most hateful epoch of English history, and presenting thus a novel menace to the guarantees of citizenship.

Should it be decided on the other hand that liability to impeachment terminates when the accused ceases to be a civil officer, the great safeguards of the Constitution would still remain. When the Constitution ceases to express the convictions, the purposes, the conscience of the people, it will cease to be operative. They will either amend it or they will abrogate it, or they will evoke from its recesses some latent energy to become the potent minister of their will.

Nor do the securities and covenants of liberty and citizenship rest upon any such brittle and shifting foundation as the decisions of courts or senates on the construction of words, and clauses, and sentences of the Constitution. When the conclusions of these tribunals fail to register the decrees or to reach the full measure of the intelligence of the people, they will be reversed by a judgment in that assize from which there is no appeal.

I therefore approach the subject relieved of all apprehensions of practical dangers, whether the determination may be upon the one side or upon the other. Our political history for ninety years refutes the idea that the subject is of very grave or paramount importance. Impeachment, even in cases where the power was undoubted, has been resorted to infrequently. States have been saved without it. Official delinquency has not been uncommon, but impeachments have been rare. The process is dilatory, unwieldy, and expensive. The machinery is complicated. The possibilities of partisan unfairness and malignity are too great. The disproportion of resources between the prosecutor and the offender are so marked as to shock the love of equity and justice which characterizes the Anglo-Saxon. The idea upon which it is founded is repugnant to the principles of popular government and to the temper and instincts of a free people.

The application of the doctrine now sought, whether it be regarded as a limitation or an expansion of the power of impeachment, is novel, but its assertion is not. The question whether the liability to impeachment terminated with official existence has often been mooted, but it now for the first time arises for practical determination. I do not think it will ever rise again. If the jurisdiction is denied, it is not likely that it will be re-asserted. If the late Secretary of War is tried, the spectacle will be such as to prevent the case from being cited as a precedent.

Fortunately the discussion is not political, and this source of our congratulation is increased by the reflection that the question is divested of a partisan aspect by the disjunction of one party only. One great political division of the Senate is practically unanimous upon a doubtful question of constitutional law, and is re-enforced by allies from that party with which the respondent has heretofore been associated. Political organizations founded upon ideas rather than upon policies are tolerant of differences of opinion and concede the right of individual judgment; but they always embrace among their adherents large numbers of that invaluable class of supporters who invariably study how they can differ with their associates, and never believe they are truly independent unless they act with their adversaries.

That this jurisdictional question in a practical sense now for the first time arises is evidence that it is not an integral part of the Constitution nor essential to national safety. That when it is thus for the first time presented it appears in such dubious and uncertain guise that the most eminent jurists of one political faith are spontaneously agreed, while those of the other differ toto cœlo in their interpretation of six simple sentences in the Constitution, is further evidence that the framers of that instrument either considered it a matter of small moment or were unfortunately negligent in the expression of their designs.

For it must be observed that the grant of power is explicit, and cannot be classed among those latent, obscure, and ambiguous powers, the result of compromise, and the fatal cause of party dissension and national peril.

The constitutional provisions concerning impeachment have been so often stated that reiteration seems superfluous; but they must be repeated here. They are as follows:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Article 2, section 4.)

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 1, section 2, clause 5.)

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. (Article 1, section 3, clause 6.)

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law. (Article 1, section 3, clause 7.)

Stated in their natural order, and assembled in their proper sequence, they would read thus:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be subject to impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; and on conviction shall be removed from office. The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachments, and the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

Leaving particulars and descending to mere description, they designate—

First. The persons who may be impeached.
Second. The offenses for which impeachment will lie.
Third. The penalty on conviction.
Fourth. The method of procedure.
Fifth. The limitation of the judgment.

The student of English history will not fail to note that each of these particulars, with the possible exception of the fourth, is a direct departure from the law of Parliament upon impeachment. Under that all the king's subjects could be impeached, but the king could not. They could be impeached for any offense. Any punishment could be inflicted, and the power of judgment was absolute.

I am compelled, therefore, to dissent from the doctrine that the clauses giving the House the power of impeachment and the Senate the power of trial are in any sense jurisdictional, but must regard them as functional merely; directory of the methods of practice and procedure under the Constitution, and not as a grafting upon our system of the process of impeachment as recognized by the parliamentary law of England. For it must be remembered that in a free popular government like that which our fathers instituted impeachment as known and practiced in Great Britain would be illogical, anomalous, and unnecessary.

Where monarchs were absolute and the right to rule descended through successive generations of avaricious and sensual tyrants; where corrupt favorites administered the offices and plundered the revenues of the kingdom at the pleasure of the king; where the property of the realm accumulated in families, and all the prerogatives of wealth and power were hereditary, there was no relief from oppression but by extraordinary methods—the dagger, revolution, and the scaffold.

Hence in the great struggle between kings and subjects, when law at last succeeded force, the right to impeach corrupt and incompetent rulers was asserted in Germany and transferred to England as early as the fourteenth century. Though it was an advance upon the redress of force, yet its methods were violent and its penalties cruel, inhuman, and atrocious. Its victims were put to death, and their mutilated remains refused burial; their blood was corrupted; they were outlawed, banished, and exiled; they were stripped of their estates and dignities, and pursued with dishonor beyond the grave. And thus impeachment was associated with that odious group of remedies, among which were ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and pains and penalties.

But in a country where the people are the rulers the necessity and the occasion for impeachment are greatly diminished. Where neither wealth nor power is hereditary, there need be no corruption of blood; and where the tenure of office is brief and depends upon the will of the people, impeachment is generally conducted at the ballot-box.

It must therefore be apparent that when the founders of the Republic conferred upon the House the power of impeachment, they did not mean impeachment as understood by the laws of England. There was not only no necessity for it, but the idea would be repugnant to their experience and without foundation in reason.

We must then inspect the other provisions of the Constitution to discern their purposes and ascertain the limitations they intended to prescribe.

These relate to the subjects, the objects, and the penalties of impeachment; and, when considered in connection with the uniform practice of Congress, seem to indicate conclusively that the subjects of impeachment are the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, and that the sole objects of the process are to divest the offender of certain political attributes and functions, not for the punishment of the individual, but for the protection of the State.

Articles 5 and 6 of the amendments to the Constitution are explicit, and by irresistible inference exclude any other conclusion. They are in the following language:

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.

ARTICLE VI.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law.

For the sake of illustration, let us suppose that the late Secretary of War had deliberately and with malice aforethought murdered a post-trader, a capital offense, the punishment for which would be death by hanging. This would also be an impeachable offense, for which he might be removed and disqualified; but if such proceedings should be had, would it be considered as punishment for the crime of murder? Or let it be supposed that, having been tried and convicted for murder in the courts of the District and lying in prison waiting execution, he should refuse to resign and should be impeached. Would his removal be regarded as punishment for his offense? No one would seriously make such pretense. The application of the provisions of articles 5 and 6 is too obvious to need further comment. Impeachment cannot be a criminal prosecution.

The determination of the scope and purpose of impeachment is materially aided by a consideration of the nature of the penalty affixed to conviction. The punishment is in one sense always the measure of the offense. The penalty defines the grade to which the crime belongs.

The judgment in impeachment is confined to the political relations of the respondent to the state. It does not affect his citizenship. The right to hold office, either actual or potential, is not one of the rights of citizenship. Like suffrage, it is a privilege or franchise granted by society to the citizen.

The rights of citizenship are three: the right to live, the right of personal security or liberty, and the right to hold property. The judgment upon conviction on impeachment does not affect either of these. In England it was otherwise. If the accused were found guilty he could be deprived not alone of his political rights but of the rights of citizenship. His life could be taken at the block, his liberty could be destroyed by exile or incarceration, his property could be appropriated by fine or sequestration.

But under the Constitution the character of the proceeding is radically changed. It is no longer aimed at the citizen as such. The punishment for crime, which abrogates citizenship by execution, by imprisonment, by fine, is remitted exclusively to the courts, and impeachment is restricted to the political relations of the accused, and these are only partially rescinded in case of guilt. He may be impeached for murder, arson, robbery, or any crime whose penalty is defined by law, and, if convicted, he can only be removed from office and disqualified.

His citizenship is unimpaired and many of his political rights remain. He can still vote. He can serve in the militia and upon juries. His relations to the state are changed, but he is still entitled to the protection of its laws and to the full benefit of all the guarantees and immunities of the Constitution.

This vast modification could not have been accidental. It must have had a purpose, and it serves still further to accentuate and emphasize the position that, as the penalty is political purely, so the proceeding was intended to be political purely, and was devised for protection, and not for punishment. Unless it be so, then many inferences of the Constitution are controverted and several of its plain declarations are rendered ineffectual and abortive.

While upon the subject of punishment I pause to consider an argument which has been strenuously put forward by the managers and their associates in the prosecution. It is their strong fortification and tower of defense. After inspecting the Constitution with the telescope and the microscope; after distilling it in the alembic of verbal criticism; after analyzing it as a chemist resolves the waters of a mineral spring till his agents cease to testify and he reports of this or that constituent a trace only, the combined efforts of all these doctors have adduced the convincing argument that unless the right of impeachment for official misconduct continues after official existence has terminated the jurisdiction depends not upon the court but upon the criminal. It is insisted that, if by resignation he can defeat the judgment of disqualification, he renders nugatory the great design of the process, which is not only to put a man out but to keep him out; that, unless he is disqualified, a perverse or corrupt Executive can re-appoint him after his resignation and thus defy and thwart and trifle with the moral sense and will of the nation. They contend that he must not only be banished from the Eden of office, but that the angel of vengeance with the flaming sword of disqualification must be stationed at the gate to prevent his return, and that unless this is done the public service may be stained, corrupted, and polluted by the invasion of dissolute and unseemly reprobates who will thus be superior to law. The necessary corollary is that if they are so disqualified the nation is safe, and that they can then endanger the councils of the nation no more. Aside from the fact that such conduct would be impeachable in the Executive and that he could not resign and re-appoint himself, there is the further consideration that the security of the people from corrupt officials lies in public virtue and intelligence, and not in statutory prohibitions.

But let us for a moment examine this pretext and see how far the protection would extend were the sentence of disqualification in all cases pronounced. What additional guarantee, not based in the morality of the people, would be derived from the strictest application of this part of the penalty?

Should the respondent in the case at bar be convicted and disqualified, how could the country be safe from his machinations were he an ambitious, intriguing schemer with a following sufficiently numerous to make his pretensions formidable? The disqualification is only partial. He could not be President, nor Vice-President, nor Cabinet minister, nor postmaster, nor an officer in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States; but after going forth from this chamber of doom with the indelible stigma and brand upon his brow, should he return to Iowa, whence he came, what but the will of the people could prevent him from being mayor of his adopted city or alderman of his native village? What but this could hinder him from becoming sheriff or treasurer of his county? What but this could interfere with his election to the Legislature and his participation in the enactment of laws and the election of Senators? What but this could stand in the path of his entry into the executive office as governor of the State? Should his ambition take a higher flight and assume a wider range, what but this could forbid his admission to the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol as a Representative in Congress, and, in a not impossible contingency, of electing a President of the United States? What but this could bar his taking the oath as a Senator of the United States and standing as the peer of any who had pronounced sentence upon him, the representative in this body of a sovereign State in the American Union? One Senator at least who hears me thought the position of Senator preferable to that of Secretary of War. The Senate makes and unmakes civil officers of the United States, and none of the positions I have named fall within the category from which your most unrelenting vengeance could exclude him.

No, Mr. President, removal is not punishment; disqualification is not punishment. In the nature of things they cannot be punishment; and the proceeding in which they are incidents is a political process designed to relieve the public service of an official delinquent.

I pass, then, to a review of section 4, article 2, and inquire if the language here employed sustains the view that the proceeding is political exclusively, and if the words "President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States" is designed as an affirmative designation of the persons to whom impeachment can apply. The terminology of the section is peculiar. It authorizes the removal of the persons named upon conviction. It does not declare that no other officers than those named. or that those only, shall be removed. And yet unless the words used are held to be descriptive, then the power conferred in the Constitution must be regarded as to official acts and official persons at least, as broad and comprehensive as that known to the parliamentary law of England. There is no language which forbids the impeachment of the admiral who neglects the safeguard of the sea; the commodore who sinks his squadron; the general who surrenders his army to an inferior foe; the commander who corruptly capitulates his post. And yet it is safe to say that the exercise of such a power by Congress has never for an instant been considered. The words "civil officers" have always been held to exclude naval and military officers, and therefore culprits in those arms of the public service are relegated to courts-martial and other modes of punishment. The state can be as much harmed by their delinquency; in time of war perhaps to a much higher degree than by the misconduct of a civil officer, but they have never been considered subjects of impeachment, because the language of the fourth section has been regarded as an exclusion, as if the word "only" had been inserted after the words "United States."

Why? The occasion has not been absent in our history, but the reason for the abstinence is clear. It has been the application of the old legal maxim: Expressio unius, exclusio alterius. The specification of particulars is the exclusion of generals. Lord Bacon says, and his observation is quoted in this connection by Judge Story with approval, "As exception strengthens the force of a law in cases not excepted, so enumeration weakens it in cases not enumerated." It is true that this rule is not absolute, and that it may be susceptible of wrong application; but it is one of those maxims which are founded in reason and have found their way as well into the affairs of daily life as into the decision of judicial questions. To ascertain how far an affirmative provision excludes others we must look to the nature of the provision, the subject, the objects, and the scope of the instrument. There can be no doubt that in most cases an affirmative declaration excludes everything or person not specified; and the reason is obvious. An affirmative grant or specification would be superfluous and absurd if general authority were intended. (See Story on the Constitution, section 448.) In the case before us if the broad, unrestricted power of impeachment was conferred by article 1, section 2, clause 5, it would include "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States," and thus article 2, section 4, would be superfluous and illogical, considered either in relation to the persons, the offenses, or the penalty. The greater always includes the less; and if the fourth article of section 1 be not a limitation, a restrictive, affirmative declaration, then the words of which it is composed are ineffectual. They are as idle and empty as the wandering air.

The man who resigns his office becomes at once a citizen. That he has held office makes him no less and no more than a citizen. When the President resigns he is a citizen. When the Vice-President resigns he is a citizen. When all civil officers resign they are citizens. And if they are no longer "civil officers" they are no more liable to impeachment than military or naval officers. Unless this construction is correct, then there is no limitation and the law of impeachment in America is as unrestricted as in England.

In the case at bar, therefore, the respondent, having resigned his office before the proceedings were commenced, was not liable to impeachment. He was a citizen. He was not a civil officer. The motive with which he resigned is not material. It is the fact alone with which we are to deal. Nor do I regard the legal fiction in relation to fractions of a day as having any significance in the case. Were the hour of the resignation and of the impeachment both uncertain, and impossible to be ascertained, it might be just to apply such a rule as would sustain the jurisdiction; but it has no application here.

Should a resignation occur after the respondent was legally before the Senate and on trial, I should have no doubt that the proceedings could continue and judgment of disqualification be properly pronounced.

The conclusions which I have thus reached appear to me to be not only consonant with the plain intent of the framers of the Constitution, but also in accordance with the spirit of popular institutions and the temper of the age in which we live. When the offender can no longer endanger the state he should be consigned to the courts for punishment; and in all cases of doubtful interpretation in the organic law of a popular government it is always safe to construe the power in favor of the liberty of the citizen, rather than in favor of the prerogatives of the State.

Opinion of Mr. Cameron, of Wisconsin,

Delivered May 25, 1876.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, without entering upon a general discussion of the questions involved in this case, I will state the conclusions at which I have arrived, and very briefly the reasons which have influenced me in reaching these conclusions.

For a number of years prior to March 2, 1876, William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States.

At the hour of ten o'clock and twenty minutes in the forenoon of March 2 he resigned his said office, by written resignation under his hand, addressed to the President of the United States, which resignation was then and there duly accepted by the President.

After the acceptance of Belknap's resignation, but on the same day, the House of Representatives impeached him for high crimes and misdemeanors alleged to have been committed by him prior to his resignation and while he was Secretary of War. These are the leading facts of the case; and the main question raised by the pleadings and now submitted to the Senate for decision is this, namely: Had the House of Representatives constitutional authority to impeach Belknap after his resignation, and, having impeached him, has the Senate jurisdiction to try him upon such impeachment?

This is a question of the highest importance; not important on account of the accused, but on account of the principle involved and the results likely to flow from its decision.

Two theories of the Constitution in regard to impeachment are maintained.

First. That the provisions which give the House of Representatives the sole power to impeach and the Senate the sole power to try impeachments confer a power co-extensive with that possessed by the British Parliament. That the provision which declares that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, &c., is nothing more than a limitation upon the power to punish; and that when section 4 of article 2 declares that "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment of, and conviction for, treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors," it only declares what the punishment shall be when the person impeached happens to be the President, Vice-President, or a civil officer of the United States.

Second. The other theory is that impeachment, as established and regulated by the Constitution, is intended solely to protect the state against incompetent or corrupt civil officers by their removal from office, and to make such removal effectual, disqualification from holding or enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States thereafter.

No other theory has been advanced by any one in this case, and I therefore assume that there is no other theory, and consequently that one or the other of these is the true theory and must be accepted as such.

My colleague [Mr. HOWE] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] each shows in his well-considered opinion that every English subject at the time of the adoption of our Constitution could be proceeded against by process of impeachment.

It follows, therefore, that if impeachment under our Constitution is as broad as impeachment under the English law, every citizen of the United States, whether he be a civil officer or a private person, can be impeached for any conduct which in the opinion of the two Houses of Congress is a high crime and misdemeanor.

The constitutional provisions in regard to impeachment are in substance as follows:

First. The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 1, section 2.)

Second. The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. Judgment in such cases shall extend no further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold office: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law. (Article 1, section 3.)

Third. The President shall have no power to pardon a person convicted upon impeachment. (Article 2, section 2.)

It will be seen that section 2 of article 1 declares in simple but apt words—

That the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

It is claimed on the one hand that this is a grant of power and on the other that it is merely functional and descriptive. I incline to the latter opinion; but if it be a grant of power, it can be exercised only in the manner and to the extent provided and limited by subsequent provisions of the Constitution.

The other provisions quoted regulate the trial and judgment in cases of impeachment, and this is all they do, all they assume to do. Section 4 of article 2 points out who may be impeached. This section reads as follows:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

I adopt the theory in regard to impeachment that in this country it is a proceeding established and limited by the Constitution; that it is not borrowed from the parliamentary law of England, but is a creation of the Constitution, and consequently is strictly confined to the cases expressly enumerated in section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution. The President, the Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, and none other, are named as liable to impeachment. It is the officer and not the man who is impeachable.

The term "civil officer" cannot properly be applied to any person except while such person is actually holding a civil office. This is the popular, common-sense construction of the term "civil officer," and it has been the accepted construction in this country for more than three-quarters of a century.

In the Blount case, a person not a civil officer was impeached, and the impeachment was dismissed by the Senate expressly upon the ground that he was not a "civil officer;" he was a citizen of the United States and a Senator in Congress. If it be true that impeachment in this country is as broad as impeachment in England, then the proceeding ought to have been sustained against Blount, because in England, as has been shown over and over again during the discussion, he might have been impeached as a subject of the king or as a peer of the realm.

I am of the opinion, after carefully considering the Blount case, that it is an authority directly in point in this case, and that it is binding upon us so far as an adjudged case is binding upon the same court in subsequent cases.

No person not actually a "civil officer" at the time of impeachment has been impeached from the time of Blount's impeachment until Belknap was impeached.

Investigations into the conduct of judges and of other civil officers with a view to impeachment have frequently been commenced, but upon the resignation of the supposed offender all proceedings were, in every case, at once dropped.

It seems, then, that for nearly a century it has been the understanding of statesmen, judges, lawyers, laymen, that no person in this country except a "civil officer," while actually in an office, was subject to impeachment. We cannot, I think in this case, hold otherwise without overruling the Blount case and overruling the almost universal opinion held by the American people for three generations. I, for one, am not prepared to do this.

The primary purpose, if not the sole purpose, of impeachment in this country is to protect the Government against incompetent or corrupt civil officers by their removal from office, and, as already remarked, to make such removal effectual, disqualification from holding office thereafter.

Judge Story's Commentaries upon the Constitution have frequently been referred to during this discussion. I think the language used by this learned commentator clearly shows that he was of the opinion that impeachment in this country is limited by the Constitution, and that it is not as broad, as comprehensive, as in England.

At section 803 he uses the following language:

It would seem to follow that the Senate on the conviction were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice, and it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the State against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity.

At section 790 he says:

From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice-President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that kingdom all the king's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament, though it is asserted that commoners cannot now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution in Parliament. There seems a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeaching power to persons holding office. In such a government all the citizens are equal and ought to have the same security of a trial by jury for all crimes and offenses laid to their charge when not holding any official character.

It has been conclusively shown during this discusssion, and is not now denied by any one, that a civil officer has a legal right to resign, to lay down his office at any time. Belknap possessed this right and he exercised it at twenty minutes after ten o'clock, on the second day of March last. From that moment he ceased to be a civil officer and has since been a private citizen, with all the rights, privileges, and immunities of a private citizen. He was impeached about five hours after his resignation had been duly accepted by the President. When impeached he was a private citizen, and, if it be true that under our Constitution a private citizen is not impeachable, it follows that the House of Representatives had no constitutional power to impeach and the Senate has no authority to try Belknap upon such impeachment.

But it is said that if the Senate do not take jurisdiction of the case Belknap will "go unwhipt of justice." This does not by any means follow. If he has violated any of the criminal statutes of the United States, the courts are open for his indictment, trial, and punishment. The criminal court does what impeachment cannot do; it inflicts punishment by fine, imprisonment, and disqualification.

The precedent which will be established by the decision of this case is of infinitely greater importance to the country than Belknap or his crimes. If the Senate has jurisdiction to try one private citizen upon impeachment, it has a right to try any private citizen by the same process.

In a case of the magnitude and importance of this, if there be a well-founded doubt of jurisdiction, then jurisdiction ought not to be entertained; the doubt ought to be resolved in favor of the liberty of the citizen. This is the only safe course for the Senate to pursue. The country is in no danger from Belknap. He can do it no injury now or hereafter; but it is in danger if the Senate assumes powers not granted to it by the Constitution.

Belknap has been indicted by the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Let him there be tried, and, if found guilty by a jury of his peers, let him be punished as the statute provides by fine, imprisonment, and disqualification. The ends of justice will thus be fully subserved without any strained, doubtful, and consequently dangerous construction of the Constitution.

Opinion of Mr. Bayard,

Delivered May 25, 1876.

Mr. BAYARD. The elaborate and able opinions which have been already delivered by many Senators would make any expression on my part save my recorded vote seem a work of supererogation. Yet, in view of the grave and far-reaching consequences which are embraced in the decision which this Senate sitting as a court shall reach in the case before us, I feel constrained to state in as succinct a form as possible some of the reasons which have led my mind to the conclusion that the Senate has jurisdiction under the Constitution to try William W. Belknap, lately the Secretary of War, for the high crimes alleged in the articles of impeachment to have been committed by him while holding that office, by abuse of the powers of said office, notwithstanding his resignation a few hours before the resolution to impeach him had been actually adopted by the House of Representatives. I do not hold it at all necessary to decide any other case than the one brought before us by the articles of impeachment and the issues of law raised by the pleadings on behalf of the accused party, and therefore avoiding the domain of speculation shall discard from consideration any supposititious case, and address myself to the law as I think it is, and as it is applicable to the precise case disclosed by the record before us.

The Constitution of the United States is the charter of powers which may be lawfully exercised by us in this proceeding. Its provisions are not couched in obscure language, but are expressed in words of ascertained meaning carefully sifted and well weighed by a body of men exceptionally and well qualified to state in the English language what they meant to express and exclude all else. By this Constitution it was provided, in section 2 of article 1:

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

In section 3, of the same article:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

In section 2 of article 2:

The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

Section 2, article 3:

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.

In section 4, article 2:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

These are all and singular the provisions of the Constitution which relate to the subject, to which may be added section 5 of article 1: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." And under rules of this body made and provided for cases of impeachment we have thus far duly proceeded.

The Constitution, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall, is an instrument of grants and inhibitions of power, not of definitions, of which last it contains but one—that of treason, in section 3 of article 4.

It was framed by men of well matured experience acquired in adversity, learned in the science of government, especially in the usages and laws of Great Britain, whose subjects they had so lately been.

The meaning and objects of impeachment as a remedy for crimes against the Government were well known and defined in the books of the common law, with all its properties and incidents.

To the Supreme Court of the United States has frequently been referred the duty of giving interpretation and definition to the words employed in the Constitution, and the language of that tribunal in the case of Murray's Lessee vs. The Hoboken Land Company may serve to illustrate the methods of reasoning and sources of information resorted to by them in cases like the present, where a general grant of power touching any subject occurs in the Constitution. The decision related to the true meaning of the words "due process of law," as used in the fifth article of the amendments. And I here cite it as a single, but sufficient illustration, to show to what fountains we should trace these verbal rivulets, in order properly to define and adjust the powers to be exercised under their authority.

The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Curtis, who says:

The words "due process of law" were undoubtedly intended to convey the same meaning as the words "by the law of the land" in Magna Charta. Lord Coke, in his commentary on those words, (2 Institutes 50,) says they mean due process of law. The constitutions which had been adopted by the several States before the formation of the Federal Constitution, following the language of the great charter more closely, generally contained the words "but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." The ordinance of Congress of July 13, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio used the same words.

The Constitution of the United States, as adopted, contained the provision that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." When the fifth article of amendment, containing the words now in question, was made, the trial by jury in criminal cases had thus already been provided for. By the sixth and seventh articles of amendment further special provisions were separately made for that mode of trial in civil and criminal cases. To have followed, as in the State constitutions and in the ordinance of 1787, the words of Magna Charta, and declared that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land, would have been in part superfluous and inappropriate. To have taken the clause "law of the land," without its immediate context, might possibly have given rise to doubts which would be effectually dispelled by using those words which the great commentator on Magna Charta had declared to be the true meaning of the phrase "law of the land" in that instrument, and which were undoubtedly then received as their true meaning.

That the warrant now in question is legal process is not denied. It was issued in conformity with an act of Congress. But is it "due process of law?" The Constitution contains no description of those processes which it was intended to allow or forbid. It does not even declare what principles are to be applied to ascer tain whether it be due process. It is manifest that it was not left to the legislative power to enact any process which might be devised. The article is a restraint on the legislative as well as on the executive and judicial powers of the Government, and cannot be so construed as to leave Congress free to make any process, 'due process of law" by its mere will. To what principles, then, are we to resort to ascertain whether this process enacted by Congress is due process? To this the answer must be twofold. We must examine the Constitution itself to see whether this process be in conflict with any of its provisions. If not found to be so, we must look to those settled usages and modes of proceeding existing in the common and statute law of England before the emigration of our ancestors, and which are shown not to have been unsuited to their civil and political condition by having been acted on by them after the settlement of this country.

Tested by the common and statute law of England prior to the emigration of our ancestors, and by the laws of many of the States at the time of the adoption of this amendment, the proceedings authorized by the act of 1820 cannot be denied to be due process of law, when applied to the ascertainment and recovery of balances due to the Government from a collector of customs, unless there exists in the Constitution some other provision which restrains Congress from authorizing such proceedings. For, though "due process of law" generally implies and includes actor, reus, judex, regular allegations, opportunity to answer, and a trial according to some settled course of judicial proceedings, (2 Institutes, 47, 50; Hoke vs. Henderson, 4 Devereux's North Carolina, 15; Taylor vs. Porter, 4 Hill, 146; Van Zandt vs. Waddell, 2 Yerger, 260; State Bank vs. Cooper, ibid., 599; Jones's Heirs vs. Perry, 10 ibid., 59; Greene vs. Briggs, 1 Curtis, 311,) yet this is not universally true. There may be, and we have seen that there are, cases under the law of England after Magna Charta, and as it was brought to this country and acted on here, in which process, in its nature final, issues against the body, lands, and goods of certain public debtors without any such trial; and this brings us to the question whether those provisions of the Constitution which relate to the judicial power are incompatible with these proceedings. (Murray's Lessee et al. vs. Hoboken Land and Improvement Company, 18 Howard, page 280.)

Mr. Justice Blackstone's renowned Commentaries on English law—and which our own great jurist, Chancellor Kent, has said "filled him with admiration and despair"—were in 1787, as now, the text-book of all students of law in England and the United States. Blackstone described impeachment as "a prosecution of the already known and established law frequently put in practice." And the most prolonged and celebrated trial by impeachment, that of Warren Hastings, ex-governor-general of India, in the course of which everything that the profound study of able and learned men could bring to enlighten the subject had been collected and applied, was pending during the time the subject was under discussion in the constitutional convention which met at Philadelphia in May, 1787.

The institution of impeachment, thus well known, was imported into the Government of the United States, and was perfectly understood in its principles, history, and methods of procedure by the Federal convention, who adopted it as they found it then existing in Great Britain, with such modifications as the republican constitution of government for the "more perfect union" of the States required "to secure the blessings of liberty" to the people of the United States and their posterity.

In No. 65 of the Federalist, Hamilton—than whom no abler expositor of the instrument under consideration ever lived, and who had been a leading member of the convention—said:

A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained in a government wholly elective.

The subjects of its jurisdiction are these offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may with peculiar propriety be denominated (Page 491.) What, it may be asked, is the true spirit of the institution itself? political, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to society itself. * * * Is it not designed as a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men? The model from which the idea of this institution has been borrowed pointed out that course to the convention. In Great Britain it is the province of the House of Commons to prefer the impeachment, and of the House of Lords to decide upon it. Several of the State constitutions have followed the example. As well the latter as the former seem to have regarded the practice of impeachments as a bridle in the hands of the legislative body upon the executive servants of the government. Is not this the true light in which it ought to be regarded?

And in No. 66, the same great authority, treating of the same subject, says:

An absolute or qualified negative in the Executive upon the acts of the legislative body is admitted by the ablest adepts in political science to be an indispensable barrier against the encroachments of the latter upon the former. And it may, perhaps, with not less reason, be contended that the powers relating to impeachments are, as before intimated, an essential check in the hands of that body upon the encroachments of the Executive.

Mr. Jefferson, although not a member of the constitutional convention, was a contemporaneous expositor of the Constitution, and his Manual of Parliamentary Practice, which to-day is one of our leading authorities, in its title "Impeachment," contains abundant evidence in its citations that he accepted the English precedents as authority on this subject. (Vide section 53, passim.)

These references to contemporaneous authority will, I think, be accepted as proof, if proof were necessary, to show how fully acquainted with the subject, were the framers of the Federal Constitution. It would be an idle parade to repeat the history of precedents and practice in impeachments in England up to the time of the importation of this institution into the Government of the United States.

Said Chief Justice Marshall, in United States vs. Wilson, 7 Peters, South Carolina:

The language used IS OUR LANGUAGE, and of a nation to whose judicial institutions ours bears so close a resemblance.

The grants of this power to each House of Congress respectively, are general grants, as explicit, clear, and emphatic as words can create: "sole power" to the House to accuse; "sole power" in the Senate to try "all impeachments." For the sake of justice the accusers and the judges are never the same persons, and the concurrence required of two-thirds of the judges gives additional security to innocence. It is a great check upon misconduct in the executive branch, and therefore the power of impeachment and conviction is placed as far as possible beyond the influence of or interference by the executive branch or any member thereof. The presidential power of veto, therefore, does not extend over the resolution of the House to impeach or the judgment or resolution of the Senate to convict or acquit.

The trial shall not be by jury, so that none of the official machinery—for the prosecution of crime in the courts—controlled by the executive, can be called into operation; and finally, the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, expressly excepts cases of impeachment. Any construction of the constitutional provisions relating to the subject which would have the result of bringing any impeachable offense under the control of the Executive Department of the Government, would violate the very evident object for which this great and "essential check" was confided to the two Houses composing the legislative branch, and imperil if not destroy its efficiency. Thus, if the President can by removal of an official deprive the House of Representatives of its power to impeach and the Senate of its power "to try all impeachments," he may not only shelter a dangerous enemy and treacherous public servant from the penalty of disqualification ever to hold office, but, having control over the officials whose duty it is to prosecute offenders before the judicial branch, he can practically prevent the trial of the criminal in the courts or, if in his discretion he permits the prosecution to proceed, he can by a pardon totally relieve the criminal from all legal punishment for his guilt.

It is therefore essential, in order to maintain that independence which by the Constitution it was designed should be secured to the two Houses of the Congress in their exercise of this great and "sole" power of impeachment, that under no construction should their jurisdiction or method of proceeding be subjected, directly or indirectly, in any degree to the action or influence of the executive branch.

It is the national self-protection against executive encroachments or malfeasance, and in its initiation and enforcement must carefully be kept out of the domain of executive power or control, for the correction of whose wrong it was especially designed. If then the power of the two Houses of the Congress is to be maintained without interference or influence on the part of any officer of the executive branch, what shall be said of that construction of the Constitution which gives to the guilty official himself the power at will to keep himself within or place himself without the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress, and submit to be impeached only with his own consent?

It is difficult with a grave face to state the proposition that a culprit shall not only raise the question as to the jurisdiction of the tribunal assuming to try him, but decide the question himself at his own will and pleasure, carrying his discharge in his own pocket, to be produced at will, as in the present case was sought to be done by a resignation, on the very stroke of the hour when the resolution to impeach him was about to be adopted by the House of Representatives; in other words, that a plea to the jurisdiction of a court is to be settled, not by the law and facts as they existed at the time of the commission of the offense, but is to be decided by the accused party, and not by the court—is to be always subject to the willingness of the accused to be tried at all.

To admit such a proposition in a case like the present would lead to this result: that any guilty official being, as almost invariably is the case, the sole custodian of the proofs of his own misconduct, and having by virtue of the powers of the office he was betraying the very means and the only means of concealment, should keep concealed not only his guilt but all means of its detection, until the expiration of his term or his resignation at any time convenient to himself, and should then leave the office vacant and for the first time open to inspection; that he should in violation of every principle of law and justice be suffered to take advantage of his own deliberate wrong; be enabled to change an unpardonable offense to one within the power to pardon given to the President.

The high crime and misdemeanor of which W. W. Belknap has been impeached is an offense against the whole people of the United States; it is a "public offense" in the strongest, fullest sense of the word.

It is not doubted that the crimes alleged in the articles of impeachment are "high crimes" and impeachable under the Constitution—it is admitted under the pleadings as they now stand, and for the purpose of deciding the question before us, that Belknap, while Secretary of War, and by the corrupt use of his power as Secretary of War, did commit high crimes—the offense being nothing less than the sale for money, of post-traderships, criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War, and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, to the great damage and injury of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service.

But it is argued in his defense that, having removed himself from the office by his own act of resignation, which act, although promptly assented to by the President of the United States, is not thereby enforced or weakened in its legal results as to him, (Belknap,) he is ipso facto beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate, and that the judgment expressly authorized by the Constitution of "removal and disqualification from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit" under the United States cannot be entered and enforced against him.

Can it be that a person charged with crime can thus at will place himself within or without the range of judicial authority?

The judgment of disqualification to hold and enjoy any office under the United States would seem to contain in itself the removal of an incumbent, because it forbids the party convicted to hold or enjoy any office, therefore, in presenti as well as in futuro. The final consummation of long-contemplated crime could be postponed until the last hour of his official term, until just enough of official power remained to make guilt successful, yet not enough to compel it to respond to the demands of justice.

The train could be laid and the slow-match lighted with close calculation, and the incendiary retire to the place of safety outside the jurisdiction charged with his punishment.

"Removal" from the particular office then held, on the contrary, does not include disqualification thereafter to hold some other office or offices, or the same office for another term. If, as has been argued, removal was the sole object of impeachment, then, that once accomplished, the more serious and enduring part of the judgment authorized by the Constitution could never be executed, because no officer, i. e. person holding office, existed upon whom this portion of the sentence could operate.

As reasonably could it be said, that because in the verbal arrangement of the Constitution the word "removal" precedes "disqualification," the rendition of removal, being the first part of the judgment, would make it impossible to proceed any further.

But the Constitution in the clauses conferring jurisdiction in cases of impeachment (article 1) does not require "an officer" or person in office to be the subject of the judgment of the Senate. The individual under impeachment is termed in one clause "a person," in another "a party," and in the enumeration of the classes whose removal from offices upon conviction for certain offenses is made imperative we find "the President of the United States, the Vice-President, and all civil officers." So that nothing in the Constitution expressly or impliedly requires the party against whom judgment of the Senate of disqualification is rendered to be in office at the time of trial or conviction.

Upon what principle of reasonable construction, may it be asked, shall the judgment of the Senate not extend so as to embrace disqualification of the guilty party to hold office?

The Constitution gives the power in plain words: "The judgment shall not extend further." That is, it may extend so far as to remove and disqualify—omne majus in se continet minus; if the judgment may include both removal and disqualification, it may exclude either or both, except as provided in section 4, article 3.

It is clearly in the power of the Senate in passing judgment to proceed to the outer boundaries of the power so granted, or stop short at any point within it.

In the historical view of the usage and practice of impeachmentsin the country from which we have derived the institution, no case has appeared of which I have knowledge wherein the power to impeach and try an ex official for an offense impeachable when it was committed, was ever denied or questioned. Such was the admitted and frequently-exercised power of the British House of Commons up to and at the time of the importation of the institution of impeachment into the Government of the United States, and when the corresponding branch of the Legislature under our system—the House of Representatives—was invested with the general jurisdiction of the subject by the grant to them of the "sole power of impeachment," while to the Senate was confided the "sole power to try all impeachments."

Taking the law and usages of impeachment as they found it in the mother-country, the founders of our Government proceeded to mould it into harmony with the new and more liberal system they were seeking to establish. They made certain important changes in the way of restriction and also by enlargement of the relative powers of the legislative bodies, respectively accusatory and judicial.

And it is safe for us to assume as a canon of criticism upon this part of their work that, wherever they did not expressly or by the most necessary implication change the law and practice of impeachment as it then existed in Great Britain, they intended to maintain it as it then was, unimpaired in all its features.

Let us notice the changes expressly made.

In Great Britain the monarch could not be impeached.

In the United States the chief of the executive branch, the President of the United States, was made liable to be impeached.

In Great Britain the royal pardon, although not pleadable to abate impeachment, could relieve against all penalties of impeachment, and thus absolve the offender at the will of the king.

In the United States the power of the President to pardon was not permitted to extend to cases of impeachment.

In Great Britain the judgment of the House of Lords was limited in its nature and, extent, only by their discretion.

In the United States the judgment of the Senate was forbidden to extend further than removal from office and disqualification to hold office.

In Great Britain a trial and conviction on impeachment could be pleaded in bar of a second trial for the same offense.

In the United States it was expressly provided that judgment of conviction on impeacnment should not operate as a bar to trial and punishment at law.

In Great Britain a bare majority of the peers was sufficient to convict.

In the United States two-thirds of the Senators present were required to concur in a judgment of conviction.

Bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, species of public remedy of great antiquity and frequent recourse, well known in parliamentary prosecutions in Great Britain, were expressly forbidden by section 9 of the first article of the Federal Constitution.

Thus we find the founders of our constitution of government did carefully consider and weigh all the features of the English institution of impeachment as it then existed, with careful reference to the scope of powers and their adaptation to the new Government they were arranging; and it seems to my mind a necessary consequence for our acceptance that, except as they expressly altered and amended it, it now remains and must duly be exercised by the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States.

Upon what presumption of reason or justice, by what allowable construction can we decide that the House of Representatives or the Senate of the United States are to be deprived of their respective powers to impeach and to hear and determine impeachments in cases where the guilty party who committed high crimes when in office has gone out of office by resignation before the resolution to impeach him has been adopted by the tribunal possessing the "sole power?" Such power did confessedly belong to the impeaching power of the government from which we imported the institution and was there frequently exercised and never in any case questioned. By what authority can we subtract this important feature of that power which our fathers left untouched within the jurisdiction they delegated to the two Houses of Congress?

When the first case of impeachment under the Federal Constitution occured—that of Blount, a Senator from the State of Tennessee who had been expelled from this body—the question of jurisdiction arose, and was in substance confined to the issue whether a Senator of the United States was a civil officer of the United States or the officer of a State, and the decision was that he was not a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore not liable to impeachment by the House of Representatives. But in the course of that ably-argued case it was stated by the prosecution and admitted by the counsel for the defendant that a party could not escape impeachment for crimes committed while in office by resigning his office.

Mr. Bayard said:

It is also alleged in the plea that the party impeached is not now a Senator. It is enough that he was a Senator at the time the articles were preferred. If the impeachment were regular and maintainable when preferred, I apprehend no subsequent event grounded on the willful act, or caused by the delinquency of the party, can vitiate or obstruct the proceeding. Otherwise the party, by resignation or the commission of some offense which merited and occasioned his expulsion, might secure his impunity. This is against one of the sagest maxims of the law, which does not allow a man to derive a benefit from his own wrong.

Mr. Dallas, for the defendant, said:

There was room for argument whether an officer could be impeached after he was out of office; not by a voluntary resignation to evade prosecution, but by an adversary expulsion.

Mr. Ingersoll, for the defendant, said:

It is among the less objections of the cause that the defendant is now out of office not by resignation. I certainly shall never contend that an officer may first commit an offense and afterward avoid punishment by resigning his office; but the defendant has been expelled. Can he be removed at one trial and disqualified at another for the same offense? Is it not the form rather than the substance of a trial? Do the Senate come, as Lord Mansfield says a jury ought, like blank paper, without a previous impression on their minds? Would not error in the first sentence naturally be productive of error in the second instance? Is there not reason to apprehend the strong bias of a former decision would be apt to prevent the influence of any new lights brought forward upon a second trial.

In the light, then, of history, the record of decisions, and examination of the plain provisions of the Federal Constitution, how can we doubt that the power to impeach a man, when out of office by his own resignation for high crimes committed by him when in office, was not subtracted from the general grant of power over the subject which our fathers so deliberately placed in the Constitution?

I do not consider it necessary to repeat the cumulative evidence in support of the views I have stated, which is contained in the report by Mr. Madison of the debates in the convention which framed the Constitution. They have been too often referred to by the managers on the part of the House and in the opinions delivered in this body to make further citation needful. Nor do I reproduce the illustrations or restate the arguments already drawn so well and elaborately from the constitutional provisions of the States of Delaware, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and others, expressly giving the power to impeach men when out of office for crimes committed by them when in office.

Does it not seem a most unusual construction to give to an express limitation upon a power the effect of an enlargement, and to hold that when a State constitution has expressly limited impeachment to two years after the party accused has ceased to hold the office in which he was guilty of misconduct, it therefore implies that no power so to impeach would have existed but for the limitation?

Jurisdiction on the subject is not conferrd by the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, which is a mere cautionary addition to the provisions of article 1 by making removal from office imperative in certain enumerated cases and for certain offenses, but in no degree and not even by remote implication impairing or restricting or qualifying the general grant of jurisdiction before contained to the House of Representatives of the "sole power of impeachment," and to the Senate of the "sole power to try all impeachments." And in Blount's case such was the view stated on the part of the House of Representatives, and not dissented from by counsel for the defendant.

Mr. Bayard said:

The use of the law of impeachment is to punish and thereby prevent offenses which are of such a nature as to endanger the safety or injure the interest of the United States; and the object of the Federal Constitution was to provide for that safety and to protect those interests. Such offenses may be committed as well by persons out of office as by persons in office; and although the punishment can go no further than removal and disqualification, which restriction was perhaps wisely introduced in order to prevent those abuses of the power of impeachment which had taken place in another country, yet it may often be extremely important to prevent such offenders from getting into office as well as to remove them when they are in; and it is therefore as consistent with the policy of impeachments and the principles of the Federal compact to punish them in the one case as in the other.

The learned counsel for the defendant have adduced many of the State constitutions to show that the States have in their own constitutions restricted the power of impeachment to official persons and official offenses; from whence, according to them, it ought to be inferred that the States, in ratifying the Federal Constitution, intended that the power of impeachment which it contains should be restricted in the same manner. But, Mr. President, I cannot discern how this inference is warranted. The very contrary I should suppose ought to be inferred. It must be remembered that in the State constitutions the power is expressly limited; and that terms are employed very different from those to be found in the Federal Constitution. This proves that where the States intended to limit the power, as in their own constitutions, they employed express words for that purpose; from whence it may surely be inferred that when they took the Federal Constitution, without any such express words, they intended to take the power of impeachment alone with it, without any such limitation. It must also be remarked, that the convention which framed the Federal Constitution was composed of members from each State, who must have understood their own State constitutions, and the limitations on this subject which they contain. Had they intended to limit the power of impeachment in a similar manner, they would no doubt have done it by express words, as in their respective State constitutions.—Annals of Congress, Fifth Congress, vol. 2, pages 2299, 2300.

The Constitution has said who shall have the power to impeach and who of trying impeachments. It has also limited the extent of the punishment. But it has not described the persons who shall be the objects of impeachment, nor defined the cases to which the remedy shall be confined. We cannot do otherwise, therefore, than presume that upon these points we are designedly left to the regulations of the common law. Sir, in the very threshold has not this law given us the foundation upon which we stand? Where have we looked for the form of the pleadings which has brought the present question before the court? And if, sir, a question of evidence should arise, as happened upon a former occasion, should we hesitate as to the law which ought to determine its competency? If we were asked whether a greater looseness in pleadings on impeachment were not allowed than in suits at law, we should answer in the affirmative; and if it were inquired whether the rules of evidence were more lax, we should answer in the negative; and in such opinions I trust we should not be contradicted by the learned counsel of the party impeached; and yet, sir, the opinions could alone be collected from the rules of the common law.

It is perhaps worthy of observation that even as it regards those persons who are clearly liable to impeachment, there is no direct provision which subjects them to it. Thus, in the fourth section of the second article, which has the closest connection with the point. It has not said President, Vice-President, and civil officers, shall be liable to impeachment; but, taking it for granted that they were liable at common law, has introduced an imperative provision as to their removal upon conviction of certain crimes.—Annals of Congress, Fifth Congress, volume 2, page 2253.

Indeed, it would seem necessary to sustain the proposition that the jurisdiction of the Senate to try an impeachment depended upon the resignation or retention of his office by the alleged offender, at his own will, that clauses giving sole power to the House to impeach should be supplemented by the words "provided the party accused is willing to be impeached."

Such would be the effect of sustaining the defendant's plea in the case before us. The pleadings before us disclose an impeachable offense to have been committed, which I have heretofore described, using the language of the articles of impeachment:

That, having thus committed an impeachable offense, the said Belknap resigned his office, and on the same day, and after the lapse of a few hours, the House of Representatives, upon report of one of its standi g committees, who for several days previous had taken cognizance of the offense, and been engaged in taking testimony, adopted a resolution to impeach him. This impeachment has been duly and formally presented by the House to the Senate, who, sitting as a court duly organized under oath, now consider the same, after full argument by the managers on the part of the House and counsel on behalf of the defendant.

Any argument of the danger of this proceeding to the safety and rights of individuals is just as applicable to persons in office as to persons out of office. Oppression and injustice are just as probable and as much to be dreaded by office-holders as ex officials. The incentives and motives to such action would be the same in the case of one as the other. Indeed the desire to remove an opponent from his office might well constitute the sole incentive.

Shall the crime be punished; and who shall be subjected to the penalty? Of the identity of the guilty person there is no question. The offense remains "unwhipt of justice;" and must it remain so forever? And must the American people be deprived of the protection against the possibility of repetition of this crime against them and their Government by this same party because he has resigned the office since his commission of the offense and immediately upon its detection? This would be to deny justice; and yet "to establish justice" was one of the declared objects for which the Constitution we have sworn to support was ordained and established.

The proceedings by way of impeachment are not adapted for ordinary offenses or ordinary officials. It is an extraordinary proceeding to meet extraordinary offenses, especially dangerous to public welfare and safety.

The best and most justifiable object of public punishment is to prevent repetition of offenses by making public examples. The end sought is justice, not vengeance; to protect society, and not merely inflict suffering on the criminal.

The proceeding is too cumbersome, dilatory, and expensive to be lightly undertaken.

Mr. Justice Blackstone styles it "the trial of great and enormous offenders, whether Lords or Commons, * * * by the most solemn grand inquest of the whole kingdom."

The two great bodies of the Federal Legislature could not in the nature of things find time for frequent trials of this nature to the necessary exclusion of their legislative business. It is only in such cases as the present, when a great public example in the trial and punishment of a great public offense is believed by the body having the "sole power" of impeachment, to be needed for the public safety, for the protection of the integrity of the Government, then, when this high discretion has been exercised by the department of the Government having the sole power, in a case like the present, presenting an impeachable offense committed by a person clearly impeachable when he committed it, I cannot doubt the power and duty of the Senate to take jurisdiction and proceed regularly and duly to the hearing and determination.

It is my judgment that the plea of the accused to the jurisdiction of the Senate be overruled.

Opinion of Mr. Boutwell,

Delivered May 25, 1876.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Before proceeding to a statement of the case I venture to submit to the Senate some general considerations upon three topics connected not remotely with the question before us. It is worthy of observation that for nearly a century all classes of persons, the learned and the unlearned, commentators and students, rested in the belief that there was no authority in the Constitution of the United States for the impeachment of a private person.

It is also true that nothing has come to us of the sayings or the doings of the men who framed the Constitution, either in the report of the debates in the convention or in the words of the authors of the Federalist, which justifies the concluion that the eminent men concerned were of opinion that the instrument which they had formed and were advocating before the people contained the power which is now claimed for it by friends of jurisdiction in the case before the Senate.

I think it is also true that when the question was first raised in the the Senate and brought authoritatively to the notice of the public not a third of the Senate nor a third of the jurists in the country entertained the belief that there was any substantial argument or valid authority for the claim put forth; and it is only by ingenious discussion that support has been found for the position thus unexpectedly taken.

Much stress has been placed upon the circumstance that under the Constitution, if jurisdiction be denied, the President, the Vice-President, or any civil officer charged with crime or misdemeanor justifying impeachment, may escape the jurisdiction and judgment of the Senate by merely laying down his office; and the question is put with significance, and in the estimation of many I doubt not with force, Can it be possible that the Constitution has left it for the accused to decide for himself whether he shall submit to jurisdiction and trial or not? This question assumes in a large degree that the proceeding before the Senate is for the punishment of the accused, and the force of the inquiry is due entirely to this suggestion; but its value diminishes when we accept the doctrine that the sole object is the removal of an unworthy official from office. If the Senate will consider another feature of the Constitution, surprise at the alleged want of power to try a civil officer who has been accused of an impeachable offense after his resignation will wholly disappear.

The members of the Senate and House occupy a more important relation to the people of the country than that occupied by any mere civil officer. In this statement I exclude the President and Vice-President, for according to the Constitution, as well as upon the judgment of eminent commentators, the President and Vice-President are not civil officers. The statement I make in regard to the relation of Senators and Representatives to the people of the country is warranted by the opinion of the Supreme Court, and it is in accordance manifestly with the theory and reading of the Constitution. Senators and members of the House are a part of the Government itself, and not its mere agents. As a whole, they constitute the Government for all legislative purposes. The President has only the constitutional faculty to concur or to refuse to concur in the action of Congress; and his refusal even can be overcome by a two-thirds vote. It may therefore be said with a large degree of truth that the two Houses of Congress constitute the Government of the country. We can imagine that the chairman of an important committee, as the Ways and Means in the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate, might be corrupted, and through his influence and his capacity to control the legislation of the country he might so shape its policy that its revenues would be greatly diminished, not for a single year, but for a long period of time. An offense of this sort, if you can draw a line between heinous crimes that closely resemble each other, is of a darker hue than the mere acceptance of a bribe by a civil officer. It is the corruption of the Government at its source, and in such a manner that the means of raising public revenue and maintaining the public credit would be seriously diminished. The only remedy in a legislative sense is the power of each House to expel a member by a two-thirds vote, the party accused being subject afterward to trial in the criminal courts of the country. But it is perfectly well known, and we have had examples and illustrations of the fact, that a Senator or Representative so accused, even after the calling of the roll commences upon the question of expulsion, may lay upon the table the evidence of his resignation, and the power of the House or Senate to proceed further is at an end. This is precisely analogous to the power of a civil officer to lay down his office after articles of impeachment have been preferred, he being then subject, as would be a Senator or Representative accused of a similar crime, to trial and punishment in the courts of the country.

I have next to say that the question of convenience deduced from results, whether only apprehended or clearly foreseen, likely to flow from the rule established by the Senate in this case should have no bearing upon our judgment. We are not engaged in making a constitution, but in interpreting one. If we were engaged in making a constitution the arguments and statements would be entitled to weight; but, as we are construing a Constitution already prepared and obligatory upon us, our power is limited to an honest examination and interpretation of what it contains.

It is claimed by the advocates of jurisdiction that under the clauses of the Constitution so often quoted, "the House shall have the sole power of impeachment" and "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," the power of impeachment vested in the two Houses of Congress is precisely that possessed by the Commons and Lords of England at the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted except so far as that power may have been limited in the Constitution itself. It is further alleged that as to jurisdiction of persons there is no limitation in the Constitution of the United States, the fourth section, second article, being merely a specification of the particular penalty which shall be applied to the President and Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, but working no limitation of jurisdiction as to other classes of persons.

If this doctrine be true, the people of the United States are necessarily divided into three classes with reference to their liability to impeachment: First, all private persons—that is, persons who have never held any office or place of trust under the Government of the United States; secondly, the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers, being the parties mentioned in section 4, article 2; and, thirdly, all other officers of the United States and all persons who have held any office under the Government of the United States, whether military, naval, or civil.

As regards the first class, it is contended by those who now favor jurisdiction that they were never liable to impeachment in Great Britain under what is called the common law of Parliament. I think it must, however, be admitted that this position is not supported by the facts within our reach.

Mr. Wooddeson in his lecture upon impeachment asserts that "all the king's subjects are impeachable in Parliament." We know that many private persons were impeached, but what is more conclusive is the fact that the Commons and Peers asserted uniformly for five centuries their unlimited power in cases of impeachment. They recognized no law but their own will, allowed no restraint but their own judgment, and in more than one case refused utterly to receive the opinion of the law lords as binding upon the Commons or the Peers in their judicial capacity.

Mr. Burke in his exhaustive report of 1794 establishes two features in the practice of the British Parliament in cases of impeachment: First, although there were many precedents, that a system of practice could not be deduced from them, and, secondly, that Parliament did not recognize the binding force of precedents, but claimed that in every case they could proceed upon their judgment as to what was lawful, whether as to persons, offenses, or penalties. At most it can only be claimed by those who maintain that the House and Senate have a jurisdiction under the Constitution of the United States corresponding to that exercised by the Parliament of Great Britain, that the question is unsettled whether or not all the citizens of the United States are subject to impeachment by the House and trial by the Senate.

As regards the second class, all are agreed that they are liable to impeachment, there being some difference of opinion however as to the true construction to be given to the phrase, "And all civil officers of the United States."

The third class are clearly liable to impeachment, if what is called the common law of Parliament has been imported bodily by the Constitution of the United States and incorporated into our system.

Nothing is better established in the history of Great Britain than the fact that officers of the Army and of the Navy were the most common subjects of impeachment. It is, then, the claim of the friends of jurisdiction that the common law of Parliament in regard to impeachment has been imported into this country, and that under that law all military and naval officers and all persons who have held any civil office or any trust under the Government of the United States are subject to impeachment.

In addition to this, if the rule be established, the possibility remains that, upon the authority of the British precedents and the opinions of British writers upon the subject, all private persons will be held as subjects of impeachment in the United States. In England impeachment was a proceeding for the punishment of crimes, and a trial, conviction, and judgment by the House of Peers could be pleaded in bar in the criminal courts; and much of the argument, especially that of convenience, turns upon the question whether in this country the proceeding is for punishment or only for the safety of the state. That it is not for the purpose of punishment is shown by two articles of the Constitution. Article 1, section 3, part 7, declares that the party convicted "shall be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law." If judgment in case of conviction on articles of impeachment be a punishment, then it follows that by the Constitution a person may be punished twice for the same offense, which is so inconsistent with the theory of our Government and the practice under it that there is no ground for the maintenance of such a doctrine.

Further, if impeachment be a punishment, then the process itself disappears absolutely in the presence of the sixth amendment to the Constitution, which declares that "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed."

These provisions justify the most explicit statement that impeachment is for the safety of the state, and not for the punishment of the criminal; and the inference from this is that it cannot have been the intention of the framers of our Government to import by construction the British system, which was rather for the punishment of crime than for the protection of the state against official corruption or maladministration in office. In trial by impeachment in the United States, crime is alleged, not for the purpose of convicting and judging the accused for the crime, but the crime is alleged and proofs are offered for the purpose of showing that the party accused is not worthy to hold office.

It has been held by the Supreme Court and accepted by jurists and students that the common law of Great Britain, by which the rights of the people generally in civil and criminal affairs were ascertained, was not imported into this country. That system which our fathers rejected as inapplicable in America as a national system was the growth of centuries and the work of a long line of able lawyers and jurists until it reached that condition when it was entitled justly to the encomium of being "the perfection of human reason." But it is now gravely asserted on the other hand that the parliamentary law in regard to impeachment, which was not even a system, but a succession of precedents from which no rules of action had ever been deduced, the product of political hostilities and personal animosities, was transported bodily into and made a part of the supreme law of the United States. Is it probable that, having rejected the system of common law applicable to the affairs of the people generally, a system so perfect that but few modifications or improvements have since been made, they would have accepted a law in regard to impeachment which did not deserve even the name of a system?

But it is said in effect by those who maintain jurisdiction that although the law of Parliament has been imported into the United States and governs in all cases of impeachment by the House, the system itself, as it existed in England, is so bad that the Representatives of the people of the United States will not act upon it except in a few cases of supreme importance. No one can be responsible for this; and so long as the passions of men shall be the chief agents in political affairs, it may be assumed that, the law being given, cases will be found.

Until now the suggestion has never been made that it was in the power of the House to impeach or in the power of the Senate to try either military or naval officers. By the Constitution the President is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and by virtue of that authority it is his exclusive province to select commanders in the field; but if the doctrine now advocated be established it will be in the power of the House of Representatives and the Senate by impeachment to remove an officer from his command, thus violating, as it seems to me, one of the chief prerogatives of the President under the Constitution.

Those who deny the broad jurisdiction claimed under the British law do so upon one of two grounds, either of which, as it seems to me, is entirely tenable. If it be assumed that the clauses before quoted, "the House shall have the sole power of impeachment," and "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," are jurisdictional clauses, they give to the two branches that power, and that power only, which can be found in the Constitution.

The other theory is that they are functional clauses merely specifying the branch of the Government in which the charge of impeachment is to originate and the branch of the Government in which the charge is to be heard and decided, and that the jurisdictional power is contained in the fourth section of the second article. In either case the result as to the measure of power is precisely the same. If the fourth section of the second article is the jurisdictional one, then the House and Senate can take just that power and that only which is granted by the section. If, further, as is manifestly true, the section does specify particular persons and a class of persons to whom the power of impeachment is applicable, unless other persons or classes of persons are named or specified in the Constitution to whom the general power claimed is also applicable, then the power itself is limited to those specified in the section referred to. This is manifest upon many grounds. In the Constitution words of inclusion, whether the words relate to a grant of power, to a liability, to a penalty, or to the imposition of a duty, are words of exclusion also. The power is granted or the liability or duty is imposed upon the persons named, and nothing is to be assumed by or for any one else. The words of the fourth section, second article, are specific in this particular. They provide that the President, the Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be liable to impeachment; therefore sufficient is found to which the endowing clauses or the functional clauses of the Constitution can be applied, and we need not seek by implication or construction, or by the importation of powers from the law of Parliament to find other subjects for the application of the same clauses.

The executive and judicial branches of the Government under the Constitution are distinct from the legislative in one important particular. The executive and judicial branches can take and exercise that power only for which specific authority is given in the Constitution or the laws. Nothing can be taken or assumed by implication or construction. This view recognizes a check upon every branch of the Government. The executive and judicial branches can take nothing by implication or construction; and in case the legislature shall exceed its constitutional power the judicial branch can annul its acts. Hence, it follows that the Government in all its parts is practically as well as in theory a Government of limited powers. The legislative branch of the Government is endowed with power, by article 1, section 8, and paragraph 18—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any Department or officer thereof.

The Senate is not now acting in its legislative capacity, but its functions are entirely judicial, and, being judicial, we are obedient in this respect to the law which applies to the judicial department of the Government in its other branches. It is, therefore, incumbent upon those who claim that the Senate has jurisdiction over a private person, whether he has held office or not, to find in the Constitution specific authority for the power which they propose to exercise. Article 10 of the amendments to the Constitution enforces this doctrine with great clearness:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The Senate in the matter of jurisdiction represents the United States, and we cannot exercise jurisdiction if we observe the tenth amendment, unless we can find the power delegated to the United States by the Constitution. It is not assumed by any one that that power is an expressed power. If exercised at all it is to be exercised only upon the theory that indirectly and by implication the whole of the law of Great Britain on the subject of impeachment has been imported into the Constitution by the general terms "The House shall have the sole power of impeachment" and "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments."

In concluding this part of my argument I submit, with great confidence, that inasmuch as persons and a class of persons are mentioned and specified in section 4 of article 2 as subject to impeachment, and as no other persons are specified or mentioned in any other part of the Constitution, and as these persons and classes are adequate subject-matter to which the endowing clause of the Constitution can be applied, the attempt to extend those clauses and to include thereunder the law of the British Parliament is a construction of a written constitution so broad in its character and so dangerous in its consequences that it ought not to be accepted either by the Senate or by the country.

It has been said in the course of the debate that section 4, article 2, is mislocated, and that if it had the meaning which the opponents of jurisdiction give to it, it should have been placed under section 3 of article 1; and this view is in some degree sanctioned by a remark made by Mr. Justice Story. An examination of section 3, article 1, shows that the chief object of that section was to furnish rules for the government of the Senate, and that it does not anywhere contain a grant of power:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State. * * * They are to be divided into three classes. * * * No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years. * * * The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

* * * The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President.

These are rules of conduct rather than grants of power. Following these provisions in the same section and connected with them, it is declared that—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

These provisions in regard to impeachment seem to me to be also rules of conduct rather than grants of power, and if nowhere else in the Constitution were there to be found operative words or grants of power these provisions would be wholly without force or value.

The fourth section of article 2 declares that—

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This section is either declaratory that the officers named are subject to impeachment, and of necessity all other persons are excluded, or it is a grant of power in the sense of being a jurisdictional clause, and in that case as well it works the exclusion of every other officer or person from the liability therein imposed upon the officers specified and enumerated. In either view it is to be construed strictly. It includes the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States as subjects of impeachment, and upon the construction for which I have contended no person can be impeached except he come within the enumerations of this section. The section speaks of the President in office, of the Vice-President in office, and of all civil officers of the United States as those who are in office, and it does not speak of others. It has been contended that any person who has held the office of President, or of Vice-President, or who has been a civil officer of the United States, can be proceeded against by impeachment under this section upon the ground that he was President or was Vice-President or was a civil officer at the time the offense was committed.

It has been said by Chief Justice Marshall and quoted by several Senators in this debate that there is but one definition, that of the word "treason," to be found in the Constitution. From this statement I dissent. There are two modes of defining words: one is by a description of a word by the use of other words, as in the case of the definition of "treason" in the Constitution; but a more accurate definition of a word can be reached by the use and the repetition of the use of it in the same paper or document and in relation to the same subject-matter. In article 2 of the Constitution the words "the President" are used several times and in relation to different duties and powers imposed or conferred on the President and always with reference to the person in office, to the person holding the office of President.

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

No person except a natural-born citizen or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President. * * *

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President. * * *

The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation. * * *

Before he enterd on the execution of his office he shall take an oath or affirmation. * * *

The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. * * *

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate.

And in the same article the phrase—

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It is a great latitude in construction to assume that in the same article of the Constitution the words "the President" are used four or five times as having reference to the person in the office of President, and to no one else, and yet, in another case in the same article, to assume that the words "the President" include not only the person holding the office of President but every other person living who at any previous time has held the office of President. This is the result to which the supporters of jurisdiction in this case are driven, upon the theory that the fourth section of the second article includes not only the persons in office but all other persons living who at any time have held either of the offices enumerated or described in that section. The substantive members of this section, "the President," "the Vice-President," and "all civil officers of the United States," are so connected with each other grammatically, logically, and by a similarity of responsibility that the law of impeachment must be the same for all. Inasmuch as section 4, article 2, whatever construction may be put upon it, relates to the President and Vice-President and all civil officers of the Government who for the most part are the appointees of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or of the heads of the several Departments, it would seem that no more proper place could be found in the Constitution in which to set forth their liability to impeachment in cases of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors than in the article assigned to the duties, prerogatives, and liabilities of the President of the United States. Upon the view which I have been presenting, that the provisions of section 3, article 1, in regard to impeachment, are rules merely to be applied to those cases of impeachment for which provision is specifically made in the fourth section of the second article, there is no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the phrase "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States" is limited to these persons specified in section 4, article 2, who may be impeached and brought to trial at the bar of the Senate. It follows, also, and necessarily, that the proceedings are limited to persons in office. Inasmuch as the judgment is mandatory that they shall be removed, although a discretion is vested in the Senate to disqualify the convicted party in the manner provided in the third section of the first article, it is clear that the impeaching power is limited to the persons specified and classified in the fourth section of the second article.

I submit in conclusion a statement of the case upon the argument that I have presented.

The power claimed by the friends of jurisdiction is an uncertain power, and no writer, either English or American, has ever fixed a limit to the authority of the British Parliament within that laid down by Wooddeson, who asserted that all British subjects are liable to impeachment. In this debate, however, it has been contended that private persons were never so liable in England. This argument is not sustained by the precedents, is not in harmony with the authorities, and it is wholly inconsistent with the claim of the Parliament repeated in many cases and distinctly set forth in the report of Mr. Burke of 1794. From that report it appears that the authority was unlimited and that precedents of former Parliaments even were not binding. But whatever may be the liability of private persons, it is quite clear that all naval and military officers were not only subject to impeachment in Great Britain, but that such persons were the favorite objects of the proceeding. Jurisdiction in this country brings these officers, whether in commission or out of commission, alike within the power of the House to impeach and the power of the Senate to convict and remove from office, thus annihilating one of the high constitutional prerogatives of the President. In time of war the exercise of the power would injure the rights or even endanger the existence of the Government.

It is not claimed by any one that there is a specific grant of this power in the Constitution of the United States, and it must be admitted that for nearly one hundred years no assertion of such power has been made except by managers or counsel in two of the early trials. This claim was neither recognized directly by the Senate nor involved in the judgments finally rendered. On the other hand, it is to be said that those who deny jurisdiction in the case at bar so construe the Constitution that civil officers are subject to a jurisdiction and judgment corresponding exactly to that to which members of the House of Representatives and Senate are amenable. Expulsion is the only penalty that can be imposed upon the latter, and that penalty may be avoided by resignation even at the last moment before the final one in the proceedings. Civil officers, by the process of impeachment, are also liable to removal by the judgment of the Senate, which also, it is to be admitted, may be avoided by resignation. In both cases the parties accused are alike liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment in the criminal courts, according to the laws of the land.

While the penalties imposed upon members of Congress and upon civil officers are thus shown to be equal, it is to be said that the obligations resting upon Representatives and Senators are even higher in their character, and their opportunities for doing the public an injury by the commission of the crimes enumerated are even greater than the obligations imposed upon or opportunities open to civil officers. It is to be said further that the construction given to the Constitution by those who deny jurisdiction furnishes appropriate use for every word employed in the Constitution, while, by the construction claimed by the friends of jurisdiction, there is no certainty as to the subjects of impeachment or the judgment that may be rendered in case of conviction.

Opinion of Mr. Cooper,

Delivered May 26, 1876.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the only question before us for decision arises under the plea of the defendant denying the jurisdiction of this court to try him upon the articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives charging him with high crimes and misdemeanors committed while in office as Secretary of War. The crimes charged, it is conceded, are such as may be the subject of impeachment. They are of the class expressly named in the Constitution as the subjects of this proceeding. Nor is it denied that if committed at all by the defendant it was while he held a civil office under the Government of the United States. But the defense rests alone upon the assumption that the defendant not now being in office cannot be tried in this mode of proceeding. The issue being thus narrowed relieves us from the necessity of examining and determining the various questions which have been suggested and discussed as to what character of offenses were the subject of impeachment at common law, or under the English government, and the persons who might there be tried for such offenses. It is certainly true, as has been argued, that we possess no power to try this case unless it is conferred upon us by the Constitution of the United States. This is a Government of delegated and enumerated powers, and possesses such only as are clearly granted by the organic law.

That law is our chart. Its mandate we must obey. Where it is silent we should not act.

The magnitude of the power sought to be exercised, together with the results for good or evil which must follow its use to the citizens of the Republic, affecting as it will the rights and privileges of all who have held office under the Government, demands for its exercise a clear and explicit grant of authority. Impeachment calls into use the highest powers of Government. It exceeds in importance, because of the grave nature of the offenses cognizable under it and the exalted position of the culprits arraigned at its bar, all other investigations of alleged criminal misconduct known to civilized communities. Hence the importance and necessity for the grant of explicit authority before it shall be used. But if such authority is found in the organic law then the duty to act is made the more imperative from the same weighty considerations. The public weal is for the time being committed to our care and guardianship, and we should be careful that we are not unfaithful stewards or unmindful of the great interests confided to us. The decision we may make in this case will not only affect the defendant in character and position, but will embrace within its scope every person who has held, or may hereafter hold, office under the United States Government. Proceedings by impeachment in this country are for the remedy, if not punishment, of offenses "which are of such a nature as to endanger the safety or injure the interests of the United States, and the object of the Federal Constitution was to provide for that safety and to protect those interests."

It cannot be denied that the power to impeach for such offenses is conferred upon the House of Representatives by the Constitution. The same instrument also vests in the Senate the right to try all such impeachments. Are these rights conferred in express terms under one article of the Constitution, or are they to be implied under another?

If those who find the power under the first article of the Constitution are correct, then it is broad and ample, unless qualified and limited by some other provision found in the same instrument. It is admitted that the Constitution must be construed as a whole; that its several provisions must be made to harmonize; and no construction given to it is correct which does not reach such result. Force and effect must be given to each provision contained in it. Nothing was inserted which is meaningless or foolish. It is methodically divided under appropriate titles significant of the subjects intended to be embraced under each. The right conferred upon the House of Representatives of the sole power of impeachment is given by the first article of the Constitution, which provides for the legislative power, in whom vested, and of what to consist. It is placed in the same sentence with the power of the House to choose their Speaker and other officers. The right of the House to choose a Speaker is given nowhere else in the Constitution.

Ever since the organization of the first House of Representatives under the Constitution, this power has been exercised without objection from any one. It has always been acted upon, and thus acknowledged to be substantive in character. This being so, why is not the power to impeach, included as it is in the same sentence, also a substantive grant of power? What difference is there between them? Why not act upon the one as is done on the other? The words used to confer the one are as comprehensive and significant as those which confer the other. The power of the Senate to try all impeachments is as broad and comprehensive as the power given to the House to institute them. I confess my inability to fully comprehend the distinction taken by several of my brother judges in this case, between a substantive and functional grant of power under the Constitution.

If I comprehend the distinction at all, it is that the former is a vital, active power by virtue of the grant, whether express or implied, the other is merely enumerative, to be afterward defined and vitalized, and if not so defined and energized remains dormant and useless. The one is a living body ready to carry out the object of its creation. The other possesses the form of a body, but is without life or active principle unless breathed upon through some subsequent provision. I do not think the distinction exists. Those who do insist that the provisions of the first article of the Constitution, giving to the House the sole power of impeachment and to the Senate the sole power to try all impeachments, are functional and draw their vitality from the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution. Others who concede the substantive grant of power in the first article yet insist that it is limited and defined by this fourth section of the second article. How different the effect given by the two to this last-mentioned section. The one makes it expansive and life-giving, the other restraining and limiting. The words used in this fourth section of article 2, are not the most apt which our language affords to confer jurisdiction, if such was the intent of those who used them. If they were the only words used in the Constitution upon the subject of impeachment, no express grant of power to impeach or try impeachments would be conferred by that instrument. Such power could only be implied. The implication, however, under such a state of facts, that they were intended to confer jurisdiction only, or to the crimes specified and against the persons named, would be greatly strengthened.

But the very necessity which would exist in the case supposed to give them a jurisdictional meaning, from the absence of a more explicit and definite grant, cannot and does not exist now, because the grant in such cases is elsewhere in the same instrument expressly and definitely made. Again, no reference is found in this fourth section of article 2 to the preceding articles of the Constitution in which the same subject is mentioned, nor is it necessary in order to give full meaning and effect to this fourth section, article 2, to call to our aid any other provision of the Constitution. Full force and effect may be given to every word used in its construction, and a substantive and important object, separate and distinct from any before provided for, be deduced and made effective. The clause is mandatory, and commands the court vested with the important duty of trying the offenders therein named, on the charges specified, upon conviction to enter judgment as there directed. If the framers of the Constitution intended to make this a jurisdictional clause, how much more apposite would have been the word "may" where "shall" is now used?

But why should we leave an express grant of power to seek the same power in the uncertain process of speculation and construction? Why reject that which is given in unambiguous words and accept that which is to be found only by implication? I am satisfied this fourth section of article 2 is not jurisdictional at all. Then is it a limitation upon the jurisdiction conferred under the first article?

A proper construction of section 4 of article 2 makes it imperative upon the court to pronounce judgment upon conviction as therein provided whenever the power to impeach before granted shall be invoked against the class of persons therein specifically named. Not that the power to impeach the persons named is thereby given, and consequently denied as to all others, but the power having been already provided as to such persons, as well as others, when called into exercise against the persons named, shall be proceeded with in the manner and to the extent described. A different construction would render the provisions of article 1 on the same subject superfluous and unmeaning. The same power in cases of impeachment would exist without as with it. The former construction gives to each provision a use in furtherance of the general object, an appropriate and useful place in the mighty machinery of government then being constructed. I therefore conclude that the power of the House of Representatives to impeach and of the Senate to try all impeachments is given in the first article of the Constitution, and is ample and broad enough to embrace the case before us, and the power so given is not limited so as to divest such jurisdiction so vested in the present case by any subsequent provision of that instrument.

The framers of the Constitution incorporated in it a power which existed in most if not all of the States from which they came, and whose delegates they were, limited in many respects from what it was in the nation from which those States had so recently separated. It was no new and untried power, but one known and recognized and provided for by the organic law of the several States.

The Federal Constitution, like the constitutions of most of the States, prescribed the extent of the judgment to be rendered and the number of concurring votes in the court necessary to convict, but left the persons subject to this mode of procedure and the offenses for which it may be invoked as they existed at the time of the formation of the Government. The exercise of the power in England as well as in the original thirteen States which formed the national Union extended to and embraced all persons holding office under their respective governments who should commit crimes detrimental to the public weal or corrupting to the purity of governmental administration, whether in or out of office at the date of prosecution. The moment an officer committed an impeachable offense he became liable to prosecution by impeachment, and no lapse of time removed this liability. The jurisdiction to try attaches upon the commission of the offense, and so remains, unless divested by some equally positive law. My conclusion is that this court is vested with jurisdiction to try the defendant upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives, therefore the plea of the defendant should be overruled.

Opinion of Mr. Saulsbury,

Delivered May 26, 1876.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The House of Representatives has exhibited articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, charging him with high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and demands that he be compelled to answer the charges thus preferred against him before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment. The defendant denies by proper pleas the jurisdiction of the Senate to try him upon those charges, alleging that he is and was at the time the said articles were exhibited a private citizen, and not liable to impeachment for anything alleged to have been done by him while in office. The question, therefore, upon which we are now to pass is not whether the charges preferred are true, but whether the Senate can rightfully enter into any inquiry in reference to them.

The question presented involves to some extent an inquiry not only into the power of the Senate, but also of the House of Representatives, in connection with impeachments. Whatever authority upon this subject, as upon all others possessed by either House of Congress, is derived from the Constitution, and it is therefore important to ascertain the meaning of the provisions of that instrument which relate to impeachments, the inquiry is attended with some embarrassment; nevertheless, I have been able to arrive at a conclusion at least satisfactory to my own mind. In briefly submitting the reasons for the opinion I entertain, I may be allowed to say that I have no expectation of being able, and no desire, to influence the judgment of others. My only object in the enunciation of my own views is to justify the vote which I shall give upon the question now before the Senate.

By section 2, article 1, of the Constitution "the sole power of impeachment" is conferred upon the House of Representatives, and by the next section of the same article the "sole power to try all impeachments" is granted to the Senate. These provisions, in my opinion, contain the only warrant of authority to either House to proceed by impeachment against any person whomsoever. All other provisions of the Constitution relating to the subject are such as regulate the proceedings, determine and limit the judgment to be pronounced in case of conviction, enumerate the persons impeachable, and deprive the President of the power of pardoning in cases of impeachment. In order to determine, therefore, the question now before us, namely, whether the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has jurisdiction to try the defendant on the charges preferred against him notwithstanding his resignation, it is necessary to ascertain what was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be granted to the House of Representatives by conferring upon it "the sole power of impeachment" and what authority and jurisdiction was conferred upon the Senate by granting to that body "the sole power to try all impeachments." Upon the right interpretation of these clauses and the ascertainment of their true meaning and import depend, in my opinion, the whole question which we are now to decide. It will be observed that impeachment is nowhere defined in the Constitution, nor the extent of its application either to persons or to crimes definitely settled and determined. We must therefore look to other sources for the measure of the authority conferred upon the two Houses of Congress by the provisions of the Constitution already referred to.

Prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution impeachment was a recognized mode of procedure in this country against public offenders, and had been incorporated into the constitutions of all the States which were represented in the convention that formed the Federal Union, or at least in all the States that at that time had adopted constitutions. In none of the State constitutions had it been defined, though prescribed as the appropriate remedy for the prevention of official crimes. In the first fundamental law of my own State, adopted on the 20th day of September, A. D. 1776, a provision was inserted for the impeachment of persons holding official relations to the State guilty of high crimes while in office, and in most, if not all, the other States were constitutions formed about the same time with similar provisions. In none of these early State constitutions is the power of impeachment or the extent of jurisdiction thereunder defined. Nor had there been any practical application of the power of impeachment in any of the States then forming the Union. We must therefore look to other sources to ascertain the nature and extent of the powers and jurisdiction which may be exercised under the provisions of the Federal Constitution to which reference has been made as the source of congressional authority.

To ascertain their meaning I apprehend recourse must be had to the history of impeachments in England, from which we have borrowed not only the remedy itself but the mode of proceeding therein. I shall not attempt a recital of the cases of impeachment that have occurred in that country, but content myself by saying that with few exceptions, if indeed there are any exception, it was a proceeding intended to reach and punish high official crimes, and was applied to persons indiscriminately in and out of office or public station who had been guilty of offenses at any time while charged with public trust or while holding some official relation to the government. Hallam, in his Constitutional History of England, says that—

> The earliest instance of parliamentary impeachment or of a solemn accusation of any individual by the Commons at the bar of the Lords was that of Lord Latimer in the year 1376.

Impeachments occurred at various periods in Parliament subsequent to that time, but in very few, if any, instances has it been applied to any but persons who were or who had been in some way charged with official duty. Indeed at one time the House of Lords refused to try an impeached commoner, on the ground that they were not compelled to give judgment against any but peers of the realm. This refusal on the part of the House of Lords shows conclusively that at that time no person other than those high in rank and station could be proceeded against by impeachment for any offense.

The Lords subsequently modified their views on this point and entertained complaints against persons inferior in station to themselves, but I am not aware of any instance in which the attempt was made to impeach a private individual. If such instances occurred at any time it must have been before the powers of Parliament were well understood. We all know that in the early days of English history the rights and powers of Parliament were not clearly defined; and it may be that excessive authority was at times claimed and exercised by both Houses of Parliament, and private persons subjected to their control. The constitution of England and the powers of Parliament did not reach their present well-defined limits in a day, but became settled and marked by centuries of time. To whatever extent, therefore, the remedy or process of impeachment may at any time have been carried, whatever may have been the character of the crimes or the persons to which it was applied, certain it is that at the time our Constitution was adopted it was understood, both in England and in this country, to extend only to such persons as were or had been in civil office, and who were or had been guilty of some high official crime or breach of public duty. No instance can be found of its application otherwise for a long time prior to the date of our Constitution.

Nor was any such unlimited power claimed by the British Parliament. It was asserted by the learned counsel for the defendant in this case, and has been repeated in argument by Senators, that private persons who had never held any public trust were liable to impeachment in England, and that, if the jurisdiction of Parliament over persons was held applicable to impeachments in this country, every American citizen is liable to impeachment. No greater mistake could be made. Trial by jury is the birthright of Englishmen, and is as well secured by Magna Charta as it is by our own Constitution. There may have been a few instances when this right has been denied, but no instance of its denial can be found in that country more flagrant or inexcusable than recently occurred in this country, when a woman, believed by many to be innocent of the crime with which she was charged, was tried by a military commission and condemned and executed. The mistake arises from a very erroneous idea of the power of the British Parliament. There are limitations on the power of Parliament which are as well defined as are the powers of Congress, and equally as well observed. In the exercise of legislative functions Parliament may be omnipotent, but in the exercise of judicial authority no such omnipotence is claimed. Its jurisdiction as the highest court of the realm is as clearly settled as the juridisction of the court of King's Bench. It takes no cognizance of the crimes of private persons, but leaves them to be tried by the course of the common law, dealing in the exercise of its criminal jurisdiction only with public offenders. This view of the jurisdiction of Parliament in impeachments is fully sustained, in my opinion, by the remarks of Blackstone in the fourth book of his Commentaries, page 259.

Nor does impeachment by the practice of Parliament now extend, nor has it for a long time extended, to offenses committed by military and naval officers holding no other relation to the Government. It may be that peers of the realm and others connected by rank and station with the management of public affairs, holding high commissions in the army or navy, are subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament, and liable to be tried by impeachment; but such liability arises from their relations to the public, independent of their connection with the military or naval service of the country. Military men holding no other relation to the government are subject to military law, and are tried by courts-martial in Great Britain, as in this country, for offenses cognizable and punishable by such laws, and this was the case long prior to the formation of the Federal Constitution. A noticeable instance might be cited in the case of Admiral Byng, who was tried by court-martial in 1757, just thirty years before the Constitution was formed, and unjustly condemned and executed. He had been placed in command of a squadron of ten ships-of-the-line, and ordered to the Mediterranean to re-enforce and strengthen the forces in Minorca. He was advised of the inefficiency of his outfit and of the superior strength of the French fleet, which had already landed a heavy force and reduced nearly the whole island; but, nevertheless, he endeavored to obey his instructions, and encountered the French vessels superior in number, and, after a vigorous engagement, ending without decisive result, both squadrons withdrew. Complaints were made by the people of Great Britain against both the admiral and the ministry for the failure of the undertaking, and the ministry, to protect itself from censure, caused the admiral to be tried as stated, and, in obedience to its wishes, he was condemned, and suffered death. This instance of the trial of a distinguished naval officer by court-martial, so recent and so unjust, was known to the members of the convention that framed our Constitution. They knew that impeachment did not extend to such officers, but was applied solely by the practice in Parliament to offenses committed by persons holding civil offices under the government. They were as familiar with the application of impeachment as we are. They knew as well the extent of its application to persons and to crimes as we know to-day, and they intended by the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of article 1 of the Constitution to confer precisely the same power and jurisdiction upon Congress that was exercised in England by Parliament, save only as it was limited by express provisions in the Constitution itself.

The investiture of Congress with this power of impeachment is made in apt and fitting terms. The words employed are "the sole power of impeachment" and "the sole power to try all impeachments." It is difficult to imagine how clearer, stronger, or broader expressions could have been used to convey authority or jurisdiction, or how they could have been so employed without an intention to confer upon Congress not only the exclusive, but the most ample, power of impeachment; upon the House of Representatives the full and unrestricted authority to impeach by formal accusation, and upon the Senate full and complete jurisdiction to try and determine the truth of the accusation. The word "power" is perhaps the most comprehensive and appropriate word that could be employed to confer authority, and was used by the convention in the same sense and with the same effect in the sections under consideration that it was intended should be given to it in any other part of the Constitution where it was employed to express a delegation of authority to Congress. It is true that other clauses of the Constitution which I shall hereafter notice in certain respects limit and regulate the power thus clearly and broadly given; but without such restrictions and regulations the authority of Congress would be as absolute and unlimited in impeachments as it is in the Parliament of Great Britain.

I now proceed to notice the limitations found in the Constitution upon the power of impeachment granted to Congress in the first article. It will be observed that whatever restrictions exist upon the power apply exclusively to the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment and do not touch the power conferred upon the House of Representatives to impeach. It will also be further observed that they principally affect the judgment to be rendered upon conviction, and in no sense restrict the jurisdiction of the Senate to try the party accused. The provisions of the Constitution requiring the Chief Justice to preside when the President of the United States shall be on trial and that the Senate when sitting for the trial of an impeachment shall be on oath or affirmation can in no sense be regarded as restrictions or limitations upon the power of the Senate or as in any way affecting its jurisdiction to try an accusation; they simply regulate the proceedings upon the trial, nothing more.

Two limitations upon the power granted to the Senate are found in section 3 of article 1 of the Constitution, and in my opinion these are the only limitations upon the power found in that instrument.

The first of these, if indeed it can be properly considered a limitation of the power at all, is a restriction on the power to convict. It is in these words:

> And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

This provision was doubtless inserted for the greater protection of persons accused, and was intended to exclude the possibility of a conviction without the clearest proof of guilt. Without this provision a bare majority of the members present would have been sufficient to convict, and it may therefore be regarded as in some sense restrictive of the power of the Senate, but as in no manner affecting its jurisdiction to try a person accused in due form by the House of Representatives.

The only remaining restriction upon the power conferred upon the Senate is that which refers to the judgment to be rendered:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

This is clearly a limitation upon the judgment to be rendered, and was inserted for that purpose. The House of Lords in England were not thus restricted in the judgment which it could render in cases of impeachment, but it pronounced the judgment prescribed by the law of the land as the punishment for the offense of which the party was found guilty; and the judgment thus rendered was a complete bar to further prosecution in the criminal courts. The idea seems to prevail with some persons, and has been more than intimated in the discussion of this question, that the House of Lords could impose whatever punishment it might see proper upon the person convicted on impeachment. This is a very erroneous idea. It could inflict no other punishment than such as had been previously prescribed by law or which the common-law courts could and would have been bound to inflict for similar offenses. The judgment, however, of the House of Lords might go the extent of the law; and I apprehend that but for the provision of the Constitution under consideration, and the limitation it prescribes, the judgment of the Senate upon conviction on impeachment could have gone to the same extent and could have been pleaded with effect in any further prosecution in the courts for the same offense.

The framers of our Constitution saw proper to limit the judgment of the Senate so that it could not go beyond removal and disqualification, and then remit the person convicted to the criminal courts to be dealt with according to law. It will be observed that in the clause under consideration removal and disqualification are not made mandatory upon the Senate, but are left within its discretion. The judgment shall not extend further than removal and disqualification, but need not go so far. It might have been a judgment of censure, or of suspension, or of removal without disqualification. The clause was intended to limit the judgment, not to prescribe what it should be.

Neither of the limitations to which I have referred affect in any way the jurisdiction of the Senate to try a party impeached, and do not therefore touch the question now before the Senate. These are all the restrictions contained in the Constitution upon the power of the Senate in the trial of impeachments, unless there is some limitation or restriction found in section 4 of article 2, which it is claimed by some contains both an affirmative grant of power and a limitation upon its exercise.

We have already seen that the power of impeachment in its amplitude is conferred by the second and third sections of article 1 of the Constitution. Does the fourth section of article 2 in any way enlarge that power or confer jurisdiction upon the Senate not already possessed? That it contains no express grant of power is admitted; and it is difficult to see how an express grant conferred in the clearest and most ample manner can be enlarged by implication. The language of the section is:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors.

What authority is given by this language either to the House of Representatives or to the Senate to proceed by impeachment against any one? Certainly it will not be contended that standing alone, unconnected with other provisions of the Constitution, it authorizes the Senate to take cognizance of official misconduct or summon to its bar the most guilty official offender. If the section confers jurisdiction, may I not inquire upon what department of the Government is it conferred? It is not conferred in terms upon the Senate; and from the language employed, if this was the only provision relating to impeachment, jurisdiction might be exercised with as much propriety by any other department of the Government as by this body.

Congress nor neither branch of Congress can rightfully claim or exercise any power which is not expressly granted to it, or which is not essential and necessary to carry out an expressly-granted power. It would therefore be a dangerous doctrine to maintain that Congress, in the absence of any express grant of power upon any given subject, could assume to exercise such power from an implication only. So that, if this fourth section of article 2 were the only provision in the Constitution referring to impeachment, I should deny that Congress had any authority upon the subject at all. The defendant might in such case interpose very properly a plea to the jurisdiction of the Senate and defy its power either to try or give judgment against him.

This section confers no jurisdiction over persons not impeachable under other provisions of the Constitution. We have already seen that by the practice of Parliament civil officers and persons holding positions of public trust were impeachable and that the same authority of impeachments was conferred by the first article of the Constitution upon Congress that was possessed by Parliament, except as it was expressly limited in the instrument itself. Neither the enumeration of the persons impeachable nor the offenses for which they could be impeached in the section can be construed as conferring or enlarging the jurisdiction of the Senate, for without such enumeration the persons therein named would have been impeachable for any of the crimes mentioned in the section. If the provisions of the fourth section of the second article had been intended to confer or enlarge the jurisdiction of the Senate, they would have been inserted among the grants of power to Congress, and not in another part of the instrument relating exclusively to the executive branch of the Goverment. The men who made the Constitution were not novices, but understood fully the importance of discriminating clearly between the powers of the different departments of the Government. Hence when power was given to Congress it was so declared in express terms and so in regard to the executive and judicial branches of the Government, to make the line of demarkation if possible still more clear the powers conferred upon each department were placed in separate articles of the Constitution.

The Constitution must be construed by the same rules of construction that are applied to other instruments and its meaning ascertained by giving to each provision the effect it was designed to have. The object proposed by this section (section 4, article 2) is no less obvious from the language employed than from the debates in the convention. The purpose intended was to insure the removal and disqualification of the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers if convicted on impeachment while in office. By the provisions of section 3 of article 1, as I have already stated, it was left to the discretion of the Senate to remove and disqualify the guilty incumbent or not, and this fourth section was inserted to take away that discretion and render the removal and disqualification certain. It was not intended to confer jurisdiction or in any way enlarge the jurisdiction already conferred upon the Senate. It was inserted for no such purpose and can have no such effect.

It has been insisted and urged as an argument in favor of the jurisdictional character of this section that without its provisions the President of the United States could not have been impeached for any official misconduct. This is a great mistake, arising doubtless from the fact that in England the king was not impeachable by Parliament. The kingly office is a very different office from that of the President of the United States. The latter holds his office only for a limited time and derives his authority from the people, to whom he is always responsible; whereas the king reigns independently of his subjects and by right of inheritance, responsible neither to the people nor to Parliament.

By turning to section 3, article 1, it will be seen that the Constitution had already, if not expressly at least by implication, provided for the impeachment of the President specially by requiring the Chief Justice to preside when he was on trial. Without, however, any special provision he would have been liable to be impeached for official crimes under the general power of impeachment conferred upon the House of Representatives, and could have been tried by the Senate as any other civil officer.

Nor in my opinion does this fourth section operate as a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the Senate in any respect. It has been insisted in argument that the words "civil officers" used in this section apply only to persons actually in office, and that therefore the jurisdiction of the Senate in the trial of impeachment is limited to officials incumbent at the time of the trial. If the premises were admitted, the conclusion does not necessarily follow. If it were admitted that the term "civil officers" as used in this section applies exclusively to the incumbents of office, and their removal and disqualification made mandatory upon conviction, it does not follow that persons who have held civil offices under the Government and been guilty of the offenses named in the section are exempt from liability to impeachment and to disqualification if convicted.

But I am not prepared to admit that these words are used in a sense so restricted and narrow as is claimed. In their broader signification they embrace all persons who have held office and been guilty of the commission of official crime therein. It is in this broader sense that the same words are used in several statutes which provide for the punishment of official misconduct. No question has been made in the courts that the appellation of civil officers used in these statutes does not apply as well to persons who have been removed from office after their offenses have been discovered as to incumbents. Indeed, to confine these words, when used in the statutes, to persons actually in office would render it difficult, if not impossible, to convict for the most flagrant official crime; for immediate removal follows the detection of guilt in a public officer. A more reasonable construction, therefore, is to consider the term "civil officer," as used in section 4, as applicable alike to persons actually in office and to such persons as have held official relation to the Government, and while in office have been guilty of the offenses specified in the section. By such an interpretation the guilty incumbent upon impeachment may be removed and disqualified, and no guilty official by resigning allowed to escape.

Looking then alone to the language of the Constitution relating to impeachment and giving to each clause that construction which harmonizes with the various provisions on the subject and best effectuates the object proposed by their insertion in the instrument, I am led to the conclusion that the Senate possesses the jurisdiction to try the defendant on the charges contained in the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, notwithstanding his resignation and retirement from office before his formal impeachment by the House of Representatives.

It seems to me that this conclusion is sustained not only by a fair and reasonable construction of the language of the constitutional provisions on the subject, but is fully warranted by what must be supposed to have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution by incorporating those provisions in that instrument. The nature and object of impeachment and the extent of its application to persons and to crimes, as already stated, were fully understood at the time our Constitution was framed, and if the convention had not intended that it should reach offenders who had ceased to hold office after having been guilty of crimes therein, the men who sat in the convention would have so declared in plain and unequivocal terms. At the very time when they were framing the Constitution and deliberating on this very subject proceedings had been commenced in England for the impeachment of Warren Hastings, notwithstanding he had been out of office for more than a year before the proceedings were commenced. His case had attracted universal attention, not only in England but in this country, and the members of the convention were not ignorant or indifferent spectators of an event so marked in the history of the country with which they had so long been connected and from which they had so lately separated. They knew full well that Hastings was to be tried for crimes while in office, though at the time he had returned from India and surrendered the power he had used with such oppression. Yet with this knowledge, not inadvertently, but upon deliberation, they incorporated into our Constitution impeachment, with all its incidents, save only as it has been curtailed by express limitation, as a protection and remedy against official crime and misdemeanors. If they intended that impeachment should lie only against offenders while in office, is it not strange that they omitted so to declare in plain and unmistakable language.

Is it not more reasonable to suppose that the framers of the Constitution intended to protect the people of this country as fully as the people of Great Britain were protected against official corruption and crime by holding their public servants accountable even after their retirement from place? To suppose that they intended otherwise is to impute to them a degree of folly I am unwilling to charge. They intended, in my opinion, impeachment as a visitation, at the discretion of Congress, upon official misconduct, and did not intend that the guilty should escape by resigning his position. If this is not true, impeachment is a nullity; for it would always be in the power of the guilty to evade it. No man who was conscious of his guilt would attempt to retain his office and incur the risk, nay the certainty, of removal and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit, when by resigning his position he could escape the consequences of his crime.

In the consideration I have given to this question I have not been unmindful of the fact that an unwise exercise of the power conferred upon Congress may sometimes occur. This consideration, however, ought to have more weight in conferring a power than in interpreting one already given. It may some imes happen, that from party zeal or some temporary excitement, the House of Representatives may be induced to proceed by impeachment against a person long after he has ceased to hold any official relation to the Government for offenses committed while in office. But such a contingency is remote, and not likely to happen. Such a power is admitted to exist in the British Parliament, and yet no case of impeachment has occurred in that kingdom for more than seventy years. In some of the States of this Union where the power now claimed for Congress is undoubted, no case of impeachment has ever taken place, and it is at least fair to presume that no hasty or ill-advised action will be taken by the other branch of Congress, but that the power of impeachment will be exercised with deliberation, and only when demanded by the public good, especially when the party impeached is out of office at the time.

If it were fair to presume that party spirit at any time could so far influence the action of the House of Representatives as to induce it to proceed unadvisably by impeachment against any person whether, at the time, in or out of office, there would be more reason to apprehend that such proceedings would be instituted against an obnoxious incumbent whose removal might be desired, than against a political opponent who had by resignation or the expiration of his term of office retired to the shades of private life. I confess, however, that I share but little in the apprehensions expressed by others. We have passed through a century of our national existence in which party spirit has been fully as unrelenting as it is likely to be in the future, and with the single exception of the impeachment of President Johnson I am not aware that any large number of the American people ever charged or suspected that either House of Congress, or any member thereof, was actuated by any other purpose than a desire to subserve the public welfare.

Speculations, however, about the possible consequences that might result from an unwise exercise of a power can render little aid in determining its existence. If, however, speculation was admissible, if apprehended or possible consequences should have any weight in determining the judgment we are to give upon the question of jurisdiction presented to the Senate, or the opinions we express thereon, then I submit it would be proper to consider the results that might follow a declaration by this body that it has no jurisdiction to try a high public officer who has resigned and retired from place, although his whole official life may have been stained and polluted by corruption and crime.

If we have not the jurisdiction to try the late Secretary of War upon the charges contained in the articles of impeachment simply because he retired from the Cabinet on the morning of the day he was accused, with the avowed purpose of escaping impeachment and evading the jurisdiction of the Senate, then there is in this Government no assured and certain means for the adequate protection of the people by the disqualification of the guilty offender, high or low. The most guilty may escape and will be likely, nay, certain, to escape the disqualification threatened against official crime. He may have stained his hands with bribes and brought reproach upon the country that has honored and trusted him, and when his guilt has been detected and impeachment is impending, with a view to evade the disqualification provided by the Constitution for his offense and leave the road open for his return hereafter to public life, he may throw up his commission and plead the immunity that belongs to a private citizen.

A Secretary of State may have bartered the honor of his Government for gold and defy its power to disqualify him from holding its highest positions of honor, trust, and profit thereafter. Or a Secretary of the Treasury may rob the country of its revenues and appropriate them to his own use; or, like the unjust steward, for selfish purposes may divide them among his friends, and, after his guilt had been discovered and before articles of impeachment could be prepared, he could retire from the Cabinet, avoid your jurisdiction, and escape the judgment of disqualification you are authorized to pronounce. If it shall be suggested that he would still be amenable to the jurisdiction of the criminal courts and could be punished by indictment and conviction under the laws of the land, it is a sufficient answer that such liability is only a part of the protection against official crime provided by the Constitution of the country. I might meet such suggestion with the further reply that escape from criminal prosecution and conviction is neither impossible nor improbable where the offender has the advantages of wealth and the friendship of those in high social and official positions. Besides, in case of conviction in the courts, the President, if so disposed, could exercise the pardoning power and relieve the culprit from the penalties of the law. Whereas, in case of impeachment, the Executive could not, if so disposed, interfere with the judgment upon conviction by the interposition of executive clemency.

In the conclusions at which I have arrived upon this question I have not considered as important or material the time at which the resignation of the defendant took place. However proper on the part of the managers of the House to present for consideration the technicalities of the law in reference to the doctrine of relation and the fraction of a day, I could not consent to decide a grave question like the one before the Senate, involving consequences so serious to the defendant, on any such grounds. If the jurisdiction of the Senate cannot be maintained by a fair interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution referring to impeachment, it ought not to be claimed or exercised. On the other hand, if a careful examination of the constitutional provisions on the subject, aided by the lights which contemporaneous and subsequent events afford, leaves no doubt upon the question, then the duty is plain and the jurisdiction must be asserted.

I have not deemed it necessary to review the authorities referred to in argument by the managers on the part of the House and by the counsel for the defendant. They render in my opinion but very little aid in arriving at a correct conclusion upon the question now before the Senate, for the reason that the precise question has never heretofore arisen in any court of impeachment in this country.

Whatever light the authorities referred to throw upon the subject has been so repeatedly presented in discussion by others that further review is useless. I may say, however, that in none of the cases of impeachments cited, whether occurring in this body or in the States of the Union, nor in the opinions of commentators or other eminent men who have written upon the subject do I find anything, when properly understood, at variance with the conclusions at which I have arrived.

Neither Story nor Rawle in their Commentaries upon the Constitution, though evidently differing in the views which they individually entertained upon the question now for the first time before the Senate, has attempted to maintain the opinions which they hesitatingly express either by authorities or precedents. The former concludes his reference to the subject by declaring that it is an open question to be settled only authoritatively when it shall arise; and the latter, while clearly indicating his own opinion, makes no attempt to sustain it by reference to the opinions of others, but dismisses the subject by remarks embraced in a single paragraph.

The case of Blount, so often referred to, has no relevancy to the present case, and the opinions expressed by the learned counsel who appeared for Blount or the managers on the part of the House of Representatives were submitted upon a question totally distinct from that now before the Senate, and consequently throw but little light upon it.

The case of Bernard recently tried in the State of New York upon charges involving in part his official conduct during a previous term in the same office which he held at the time of his impeachment raised more nearly the question presented by the pleadings in this case than any that has been cited. Yet the question as presented in that case was involved in others not in this, and, although the jurisdiction was maintained by a majority of the court, the complication of questions involved not less than the divided opinion of the court renders the decision in that case unreliable as authority in the determination of the question before us. This case stands alone and cannot be determined by precedents, for none can be found. Fortunately for the character of our Government this is the first instance in our history where a high Cabinet officer, charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of one of the most important Departments of the Government and intrusted with the dispensation of immense patronage has been formally charged at the bar of the Senate with bribery and corruption in office.

I am glad that no precedent exists to guide our action and control our deliberations in the case before us, but that it must be settled from an honest conviction of the constitutional powers and duty of the Senate and with a just regard to the rights of the defendant and the welfare and protection of the people of the land.

Entertaining the opinion that the Senate has jurisdiction to try the defendant on the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, notwithstanding his resignation prior to his impeachment, I must vote accordingly. In my opinion the demurrer should be overruled.

Opinion of Mr. Jones, of Florida,

Delivered May 26, 1876.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The importance of the case in which we are now called to render judgment is all the apology that need be offered for a statement of the reasons which I am about to give for my vote. Since we have been engaged in the investigation of the intricate and novel question presented by the record before us, we have all felt the want of explicit authority to guide us to a safe conclusion. The decision of the Senate in the case of Blount, so often referred to in the arguments of counsel, has come down to us unaccompanied by any reasons whatever, and we are left to conjecture to ascertain the opinions of the Senators who sat in that case upon the great issues of law which were before them. It is true that a majority of them decided that the Senate had no jurisdiction over the defendant in that case because he was not a civil officer of the United States. Had the Senate in 1798, composed as it was of men who were familiar with the history of the Constitution, and who witnessed its formation and adoption, given us a clear statement of the law which then governed it in the trial referred to, it might have dissipated the doubts and difficulties which now surround us.

Let us not imitate the example they have set us in withholding the reasons of their judgment, but let us leave to those who shall succeed us the full benefit of every argument which has contributed to the conclusion at which we have arrived. The plea of the respondent, the replication of the House of Representatives, and the demurrer thereto, in my opinion present to the Senate an issue of law which it is our duty to meet and decide without reference to the matters of fact which are stated in the subsequent pleadings.

The plea alleges in substance that at the time the House of Representatives ordered the impeachment of the respondent, and at the time the articles of impeachment were exhibited against him at the bar of the Senate, he was not then, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States.

The replication alleges the insufficiency of the plea, and then states that at the time the several acts charged against the respondent were done and committed, and thence continuously until the 2d day of March, 1876, the respondent was Secretary of War of the United States.

To this replication a general demurrer was filed.

It is very clear that this replication does not meet the issue tendered by the plea in the usual way. The House of Representatives had three courses open to it: First, demur; second, traverse or deny the allegations of the plea; or third, confess and avoid them. It has done neither of these things. The replication confesses the truth of the facts stated in the plea, but it sets up no new matter in avoidance of them. It re-affirms the facts stated in the articles, for it must be borne in mind that the articles state that the several acts charged against the respondent were all committed while he held the office of Secretary of War, and this allegation is admitted to be true by the respondent's plea. The additional statement that he continued to hold the office until the 2d of March, 1876, adds no legal force to the replication, for it nowhere alleges that he was impeached on that day or previous to it. The joiner in demurrer by the House precludes the managers from connecting in any way the issue of law thus created with the issues of fact tendered and accepted in the subsequent pleadings. If we are going to pay any regard to the established rules of pleading, we cannot upon this demurrer give any judgment except upon facts the truth of which is not disputed.

Let us see, then, what facts are admitted by the pleadings. It is an elementary rule of pleading that all allegations not traversed or confessed and avoided must be taken as admitted. The respondent, therefore, has admitted that the acts charged against him were committed while he was Secretary of War. But he says we have no jurisdiction to try him, because at the time of his impeachment he was not, and is not now, Secretary of War. The replication by not denying the facts set up in the plea admits that the respondent was not at the time of his impeachment Secretary of War and does not now hold said office. So that we have clearly before us the following facts, the truth of which is conceded:

First. That the offenses and acts charged in the articles of impeachment were done and committed by the respondent while he was Secretary of War.

Second. That since that time and before his impeachment the respondent relinquished that office.

Third. That the respondent since the 2d day of March, 1876, has not been an officer of the United States.

These facts present to our minds a most perplexing legal question; that is, whether or not the respondent is subject to trial and punishment under the provisions of the Constitution relating to impeachment.

This is a question which rises far above all party considerations. We have been told from the bar that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer. But it might have been said with more aptness that it is better that five hundred guilty men should escape than that the Constitution should be violated. We all know how hard it is to divest the human mind and heart of those impressions and feelings which in times of party excitement insensibly creep upon us.

History does not furnish a single example of oppression or of tyranny, of violated right or party persecution, which the sanctity of law and the plea of good intention were not put forth to support. Man in all ages, both civilized and barbarous, has never been willing to admit that his excesses of power and authority were anything more than impartial and honest judgments demanded by the public good. Even Socrates when commanded to drink the fatal hemlock was not considered a victim but a subject of just and merited punishment. The most successful efforts that have ever been made to break down the liberties and destroy the rights of the people were those insidious and plausible judgments and opinions of courts and lawyers which in cases of doubt and uncertainty have usurped the functions of the law-maker, and in place of interpreting existing laws have established new rules and principles.

I am not of those who imagine that the greatest security for our liberties is to be found in the wisdom and impartiality of courts of justice. Still I entertain the very highest respect for the courts and judges of the land. I am willing to go as far as any one in my submission to judicial construction in all cases of a civil nature in which property only is involved. But I shall never yield my consent to the conviction of any man for crime where the law of the case is so very doubtful as to render it necessary to find authority for the conviction in elaborate and subtle arguments and refined distinctions drawn by logicians of great skill.

Enough has been said during the discussion of this case to satisfy me that if a person may be impeached for what are called official crimes after he has given up official station, it must be done in pursuance of a power arising from construction and not from the direct language of the Constitution.

The proposition is broadly asserted by the managers that when an impeachable offense is committed in office the person who commits it remains liable to impeachment, whether in office or out of office, during the whole period of his life; that when the crime is committed the jurisdiction attaches and cannot afterward be divested by any act of the offending party. If this is the meaning of the Constitution, it is full time the people were apprised of it, for in my opinion a more dangerous or unwarranted power was never claimed to belong to the General Government.

We have been told that the sole power of impeachment is vested in the House of Representatives, and the sole power to try impeachments conferred upon the Senate. This is true. It is further insisted that our jurisdiction over impeachable offenses is to be looked for in these clauses, and that we should go to the wide domain of the common law to ascertain the meaning and limitations of our powers; that the same rule of construction must be adopted with respect to impeachment which prevails in all cases when a common-law power or crime is presented for consideration; that there are no limitations in the Constitution upon our power of impeachment but what are to be found in that system of laws from which this term has been imported, except as to the punishment which we may impose after conviction; that as the common law at the time of the adoption of our Constitution extended the power of impeachment to all official offenders, whether in or out of office, the same authority now exists in this and the other House of Congress. The doctrine contended for by the learned managers is in my opinion utterly inconsistent with the theory of our government. Our Constitution is an instrument of enumerated powers. These powers may be classified under two heads, first, express powers; and second, implied powers.

In some instances a general authority is given in express words to do particular things, but the means best adapted to the ends in view are left to the judgment of Congress. It is a fundamental principle of our system that all implied powers conferred by the Constitution must be exercised by Congress, and, before assuming the forms of laws, subjected to the checks of each of the departments which constitute the law-making authority. There is no single department or officer of the Government that is invested with authority to exercise any implied powers.

There is no officer or tribunal under our Constitution whose duties and jurisdiction are not fixed by express law. The executive power which is vested in the President is not the loose and indefinite authority which appertained to the Crown of Great Britain when our Constitution was adopted. The powers of the Executive are limited and restricted by the Constitution and the laws, and he is not permitted in any case to resort to construction to ascertain how far he may go in discharging his official duties. The same may be said of the judicial department. Judicial and executive powers were as well know and defined in England as the power of impeachment. Still, we find these powers limited and restricted in accordance with our republican system, and nothing left to implication.

The monarch had power to regulate weights and measures, grant franchises, appoint all officers, and authorize the coining of money. But did any one ever pretend that these prerogatives attached to the office of President because we borrowed our ideas of executive duties from the English system? The grant in our Constitution which vests all executive power in the President is fully as broad as that which vests the sole power of impeachment in the other House and the sole power to try impeachments in the Senate; still there is not a Senator on this floor who will say that a single attribute of the king which existed in 1787 was vested in the President by the grant of all executive power to that officer. The same is true of our courts of law and both Houses of Congress. While in some cases we are referred to the common law for definitions of legal phrases and terms to aid in the exercise of vested jurisdictions, no case can be shown under our Federal system where jurisdiction itself is made to depend upon legal usages or practices in England or Germany.

The Senator from Indiana referred to the jurisdiction of our courts in cases of admiralty and equity; but if he reads the Constitution closely he will find the grant refers to cases in equity arising under the laws and Constitution of the United States, and that the admiralty jurisdiction conferred was that only which was exercised in the colonies at the time of their separation from Great Britain, and did not carry with it any power to try crimes which belonged to the same jurisdiction in England. The fourth section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States declares—

> The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, bribery, treason, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It is contended that this section is not the source of our jurisdiction in cases of impeachment, but that it was only intended to make the removal of the officers designated compulsory upon the Senate when they were convicted. Some meaning had to be given to the language of this section, and it seems to me that the one assigned to it is so unreasonable and inconsistent with sound argument that it never could have entered into the minds of the framers of the Constitution. It is further contended that this section is not a limitation at all upon the power of impeachment; that that power is without limit, except in respect to the punishment to be imposed. The English parliamentary law does not give us any definition of the offenses which are impeachable. It has left it to Parliament to say for what offenses officers and subjects may be impeached.

Judgment in cases of impeachment under our Constitution shall not extend further than removal from office and disqualification to hold office. One of these two alternatives must follow every conviction in impeachment. Now, whether you disqualify or remove, the same consequence must result to the person in office; he forfeits his position as an officer. Why should the Constitution therefore have devoted a whole section to make it obligatory upon the Senate to do that which must be the result of every conviction without it? Does not every one know that a judgment of disqualification takes effect from the time it is rendered?

Now, inasmuch as English precedents are relied upon, it may be safely said that no example of conviction in a case of impeachment can be found which was not followed by a loss of office when the offender held one. If the framers of the Constitution were aware that only official offenses gave rise to impeachments in England, they could not have been ignorant that all convictions in such cases were followed by a deprivation of office. Some other reason must be found for the incorporation of the fourth section of the second article into the Constitution besides the necessity of a provision to compel the Senate to remove the officer. The proceedings of the convention throw some light on this subject. It is well known that all the resolutions looking to a frame of Government brought before the convention were submitted to a select committee whose duty it was to report a constitution. This they did on the 6th of August, 1787. In pursuance of a resolution adopted by the convention and looking to the impeachment of the President, the committee on detail, in the tenth article of the Constitution reported, put this provision:

He—

shall be removed from office on impeachment by the House of Representatives and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason and bribery.

Afterward the Senate was substituted for the Supreme Court. This part of the Constitution elicited some debate. Colonel Mason objected to confining the power of impeachment to treason and bribery. He moved to add after bribery maladministration. Mr. Madison said this term would be too general. Mr. Morris said it would do no harm, as an election every four years would prevent maladministration. Colonel Mason withdrew maladministration and substituted "other high crimes and misdemeanors," and these words were adopted. In the adoption of this substitute there was a compromise between those who advocated an almost unlimited power of impeachment with respect to offenses and those who favored a more restricted power.

Is it not obvious that the convention never dreamed of the idea of compulsory removal. They looked only to jurisdiction. They spoke only of the power of impeachment. The meaning of the section, as understood by the framers of the Constitution, was that the officers designated in it should not be removed from office for any less offenses than treason, bribery, or high crime and misdemeanor. The purpose was to fix and limit as well as they could the powers of the Senate and House. Colonel Mason succeeded in extending the power beyond treason and bribery. Mr. Madison's reasons prevailed, and maladministration was stricken out because it would give too great a power to the Senate.

But suppose the fourth section of the second article is not the source of our jurisdiction, can any reason be assigned for limiting this compulsory duty of removal to civil officers of the United States? The learned managers were forced, I think, to admit—indeed their arguments led irresistibly to the conclusion—that military and naval officers were within the power of impeachment. If so, why was not their removal provided for the same as that of civil officers? Is an admiral or a general of less consequence or more dangerous when they abuse their powers than a custom-house officer or a district judge? It is said that jurisdiction attaches whenever an official offense is committed, but is there no limitation to our jurisdiction in such cases? There is certainly not if the English doctrine is to prevail; for an admiral who neglects the safeguards of the sea or he who commands an army in the field are liable to impeachment according to even the modern law of England. Where do you find the limitation which restricts your power to civil officers? Do you not find it in the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution? Have we not the authority of the Senate sitting as a high court for saying that none but civil officers of the United States can be impeached, or at least removed from office on impeachment?

Whatever may be the doubts in regard to the judgment of the Senate in Blount's case in 1798, there was one question decided in it which shows what was thought of the unlimited power of impeachment insisted upon then as now. The principal question in that case was not whether a person who holds the office of Senator is an officer of the United States, for no one ever denied that a Senator is such an officer; but it was whether or not Senator Blount was a civil officer of the United States, so as to give the court jurisdiction over him. Does not everybody see that if the jurisdiction of the Senate and House were not affected by the limitations contained in the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, which confines the power of impeachment to civil officers, that the judgment against jurisdiction in the Blount case could never have been rendered? We have been instructed with long and interesting accounts of the jurisdiction of the English Parliament in cases of impeachment, and it has been said with much force that the history of that body shows that no case of impeachment has been tried there in modern times except for official crime.

But no one has undertaken to show that the English law of impeachment as practiced there at all times did not extend to the Lords and Commons of Parliament. The Senate then had before it in Blount's case an opportunity to exercise the power of impeachment which all must admit belonged to the English Lords. Had Blount been a lord of England and a member of the House of Peers, instead of an American Senator, could he have pleaded the want of jurisdiction in Parliament to try him because he was not a civil officer of the realm? He escaped impeachment before the Senate in 1798, not because he was not an officer of the United States, but because this body, looking to the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution as the source of its power and jurisdiction, decided that he was not a civil officer of the United States. I am at a loss to understand how any man can read the arguments and proceedings in that case without seeing that the whole question at issue was whether or not the article and section of the Constitution just referred to created any limitations on the power of impeachment. The court then decided and had to decide that question. It was in the era when broad claims of power were put forth in behalf of the new Government. It was the era of the alien and sedition laws, on the decline of federalism and the dawn of the pure and wholesome doctrines which Jefferson made immortal by his genius and his name.

Let it be remembered that the very same arguments which are put forth to-day to uphold the unlimited power of impeachment were successfully employed to fasten upon the country the hated maxims of 1798, which culminated in the alien and sedition laws. That broad and fruitful source of power, the common law, was the dark and portentous fountain from which the streams of arbitrary authority emanated, and which for a time threatened to inundate and break down every rampart and barrier of the Constitution. Look to Mr. Madison's report of 1799 and see to what parts of the huge federal structure he directed his magnificent argument. He saw at a glance the foundations of the new and dangerous heresy. He saw that he must demolish the monstrous doctrine that the common law—the barbarous, far-reaching, and unfathomable common law—had been adopted by and incorporated into that Constitution which he had labored so much to create.

At the conclusion of his great argument he said:

Such being the ground of our Revolution, no support or color can be drawn from it for the doctrine that the common law is binding on these States as one society; the doctrine, on the contrary, is evidently repugnant to the fundamental principle of the Revolution. (See Madison's report, page 507.)

Our system of impeachment, as was aptly said by Garrett Davis in Johnson's trial, is sui generis; it borrows nothing from the common law. Civil officers of the United States are alone liable to impeachment. The Senate is made the court of impeachment. The Chief Justice must preside when the President is on trial. Two-thirds of the Senators present must concur in a conviction. No impeachment can take place, except for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. The judgment may extend to removal from office and disqualification to hold office. If it was the purpose of the Constitution to give to the Senate and the House the same power of impeachment which was exercised by the British Parliament, where was the necessity of all these express provisions? It is said that the Constitution intended only to limit the punishment, and has left the English law in full force.

But why designate the officers and the offenses for which they may be impeached? Did not the English law of impeachment extend to all public officers and according to the admissions of the managers authorize the prosecution of all official offenses? Is there a case to be found in all English history of a conviction upon impeachment that was not followed by a loss of office? If there is, I challenge its production. Why, then, should the framers of the Constitution have made removal from office a compulsory duty on the Senate when, under the general power given to it in the Constitution and the interpretation that had ever been put upon it in England and which is claimed to have followed it here, that result was sure to follow every conviction. Mr. Hamilton, who favored a stronger constitution than that adopted, submitted to the convention a plan of government in which he put a provision on the subject of impeachment. That provision contains every element of power which is to be found in our present Constitution on this subject, leaving out the governors of States and Senators, whom he included among the officers subject to impeachment. It is as follows:

Governors, Senators, and all officers of the United States to be liable to impeachment for mal and corrupt conduct, and, upon conviction, to be removed from office and disqualified from holding any place of trust and profit; all impeachments to be tried by a court.

Look now at the language of the fourth section of the second article of our Constitution, and read it in the light of Hamilton's provision:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, to be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors.

I have here substituted the words "to be" for "shall be;" but can any one say that the evident sense and meaning of the Constitution is thereby changed? But it is said the President cannot pardon, and that an officer may escape judgment of disqualification by giving up his office. It is well known that impeachment was intended to extend only to officers who derive their appointments from the executive authority, and if the President could pardon in such cases, the power to remove from office and thus rid the public service of bad men, which is the object of impeachment, might be rendered useless. It was to render the power of removal effectual that the power of pardon was taken away.

But it is said again that disqualification is necessary in order to prevent the return of men to office who have proved themselves unfit for public station. The Constitution does not say that disqualification to hold office shall follow in all cases of impeachment. A discretionary power is given to extend judgment to that extent where jurisdiction exists and a proper case is made for the exercise of the power. The arguments made upon this point are founded in the fallacy that disqualification must attend every conviction. It is said that the right to impose this judgment attaches at the time the offense is committed and cannot by any act of the offender be avoided. Impeachable offenses, unlike those in your crimininal code, are not defined with accuracy. Murder, larceny, arson, and other well-known crimes are so well understood, that proof of certain facts comprising their elements must always lead to the judgment of guilt by every tribunal which is vested with power to try them. Not so with impeachable offenses. The quality and character of these must often depend upon variable circumstances and the temper of the body to which is confided the right of judgment.

Up to this time there is not to be found in English or American law any fixed definition of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors." Mr. Martin, on the trial of Chase, tried hard to limit them to indictable offenses, but his argument met with little favor. Mr. Evarts, on the trial of President Johnson, undertook a like task, with but little better success. Let it be borne in mind that we must test the argument I am combating, not by its application to sporadic or particular cases, but by taking into consideration the whole acknowledged doctrine of impeachment.

One of the most important, and at the same time the most dangerous, features of this power is that it leaves to the two Houses of Congress an arbitrary discretion respecting the acts or conduct which shall subject officers to impeachment. No man knows, no man can know, what is an impeachable offense. To-day it may be one thing, to-morrow another. Judge Humphreys was impeached and expelled from office because he used seditious language. Still he had before him the Constitution, which guarantees to every citizen freedom of speech. My democratic brethren of this body, from whom it has given me no little pain to differ on this great question, tell me that it was not in the power of that indiscreet though it may be honest man to escape judgment of disqualification under the law of impeachment by throwing off the robes of office and standing upon his privileges as a citizen. The language attributed to him, if uttered under ordinary circumstances, would not have been noticed. But the circumstances of the country, the political excitement of the time made his utterances a high crime.

Judge Peck, of Missouri, at a less turbulent period, was impeached by Congress for exercising a like power to that which is claimed for this body as the foundation of its jurisdiction in this case. He was a judicial officer; and he was foolish enough to imagine that, sitting as a district judge, he had a right to exercise the same broad power of punishing contempts that was conferred by the common law, and which had been so long an appendage of the judicial system in England. He made an attorney of his court purge himself of a contempt by answering on oath written interrogatories under pain of imprisonment. I commend the speech of Mr. Buchanan in that case to all who are in need of light on the subject of indefinite powers. Judge Peck was made to feel that there was a provision in our Constitution which did not permit him to compel even an attorney to give evidence against himself. Under the law of impeachment as now understood how can any officer protect himself against those heats and passions of party which are inseparable from popular government if the doctrine of the managers shall prevail?

When it is conceded that an act indifferent in itself, and which the circumstances of the times or the temper of the tribunal may make a high crime, how can it be claimed that jurisdiction to punish attaches in such a case when the act is committed and follows the person through life? In the great majority of offenses called impeachable the quality of the act does not depend, as in ordinary criminal cases, upon definite provisions of law, which leave nothing to discretion. It cannot be said that any offense exists until the body which has the power of impeachment expresses its judgment upon the act arraigned. The criminality of officers' conduct in cases of impeachment is not fixed at the time it takes place, but when the impeaching power applies to it the touch-stone of its variable justice. In the very nature of things different considerations must enter into the idea of impeachable offenses from those which belong to ordinary crimes.

Questions of expediency and policy, which have no place in the criminal law, very often fix the character of an impeachable offense; and expediency and policy admit of no standard of permanency whatever. Still, we have been pointed to an act of Congress making criminal certain specific acts of corruption when done by public officers, and asked to explain the difference between the legal consequences resulting from its violation and those that follow an impeachable offense. Were I before a tribunal less exalted or discriminating than that which now hears me, I might feel some embarrassment in attempting to put aside an analogy which exists only in the similarity of names. The House of Commons in the case of Lord Danby laid down the principle that a minister could not shelter himself behind the throne by pleading obedience to the orders of his sovereign. He is answerable for the justice, the honesty, the utility, and legality of all measures emanating from the Crown.

And thus it is said by Hallam the executive administration is made subordinate in all great matters of policy to the superintendence of Parliament. Mr. Christian, in a note to Blackstone's Commentaries, says:

> When the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" are used in prosecutions by impeachment, the words "high crimes" have no definite signification, but are used merely to give greater solemnity to the charge.

It will not be denied, I suppose, by those who seek to fasten upon us the common-law doctrine of impeachment, that whatever interpretation has been given in England to the words high crimes and misdemeanors, should be adopted here. The law of that country, as we have shown, for purposes of state policy has left in the breast of Parliament the august power of determining what is and what is not an impeachable offense. This power cannot be compared to the cold and measured authority of courts of law, which in all countries is confined to the more simple business of applying pre-existing and well-defined principles of jurisprudence to established facts. The judge who exercises this authority is not the fountain, but the organ of the law. His duty is not to create, but to apply the rule. If the case before him be murder, he is bound to see that the facts established bring it within every part of the definition which the law has given to that high crime. Nothing is left to his own will or discretion. No questions of state policy, no moralizing upon the effects and consequence of the acts of the prisoner can be raised or permitted; and cannot all see the great distinction between that case and the case of an impeachable offense, which is at once ascertained and fixed by the judgment of a political tribunal. Jurisdiction, therefore, in my opinion, cannot be made to depend under our Constitution upon the time when the act is committed, but upon the status of the person, which can alone confer authority on the impeaching tribunal to give to that act by the exercise of parliamentary discretion either the quality of guilt or innocence.

We have been referred to the debates in the convention for light on this subject. The distinguished manager, Mr. HOAR, mentioned an expression used by Mr. Pinckney that the President ought not to be impeached while in office; but he did not tell us all Mr. Pinckney said in the debate. After using the above language, he said:

> I do not see the necessity of impeachments. I am sure they ought not to issue from the Legislature, who would in that case hold them as a rod over the Executive.

Mr. Morris said:

> He was sensible of the necessity of impeachments if the Executive was to continue for any length of time in office. He may be bribed by a greater interest to betray his trust; and no one would say that we ought to expose ourselves to the danger of seeing the First Majestrate in foreign pay without being able to guard against it by displacing him.—Madison Papers, volume 2, page 1159.

Much has been said in regard to the common-law power of impeachments to show the limitations attending it in England. I put the authority of Mr. Jefferson against that of the managers. In his Manual, on page 284, he says:

> The Lords may not try a Commoner for a capital offense on the information of the king or a private person, because the accused is entitled to a trial by his peers generally; but on accusation by the House of Commons, they may proceed against the delinquent, of whatsoever degree and whatsoever be the nature of the offense.

The managers have argued in support of their theory that according to the English law none but official offenders are impeachable. This they had to do in order to avoid a conclusion which would be fatal to their argument. But let us not forget that we are now endeavoring to ascertain the views of the men who framed the Constitution respecting the power of impeachment in England. No safer authority can be looked to than Mr. Jefferson. He was a representative man of his age and country, and we may confidently affirm that his opinion in regard to the nature of the English power of impeachment was not different from those of the great men who framed the Constitution. He has left us a manual of the parliamentary law of Great Britain which is a text-book in both Houses of Congress. It is referred to as a standard authority in cases of doubt arising under that law. Why should we refuse to accept his clear statement of the English power of impeachment while we yield implicit faith to all the rest of his opinions upon the subject of parliamentary law? Impeachment in England has always been governed by the law of Parliament, and we can no more disregard the authority of this great man upon the question now under consideration than we can his equally correct explanation of the "previous question" and its uses in the House of Commons.

Mr. Jefferson tells us plainly that on accusation by the House of Commons by impeachment they may proceed against the delinquent of whatsoever degree and whatsoever be the nature of his offense. This authority refutes the doctrine of the managers that none but official offenders are impeachable in England. True it may be that this despotic power has not in modern times been put in force against individuals, but we are not interested so much in ascertaining what Parliament has done as what it may do in exercising the power of impeachment.

The Senator from Delaware alluded to the fact that Mr. Justice Blackstone's Commentaries were familiar to the framers of our Constitution and that the law of England, as laid down by that great writer, was well understood in this country at the time of our revolution. All this is true, and yet no argument can be drawn from it in support of the jurisdiction claimed in this case. If the men of the revolution had followed the teaching of Blackstone they never would have resisted the august authority of Parliament which that great lawyer had taught them was competent to legislate for the colonies without their consent. Have we any more reason to think that the framers of the Constitution accepted Blackstone's doctrines of impeachment than for believing that his opinions respecting the power of Parliament to make laws for Virginia and Massachusetts were regarded as sound, pure, and correct?

Blackstone is excellent authority upon nearly all questions which he has discussed; but there are some matters which he has presented to us which can only excite our abhorrence. His personal example as a guardian of the rights of the people cannot certainly command admiration. He wrote a great book which will live forever as a monument of his genius, learning, and industry; but during his short career as a statesman in Parliament he showed by a base desertion of his own principles that the most enlightened understanding ever given to man was not capable of resisting the influence of party and power when called upon to decide between the rights of the subject and the unwarranted pretensions of the Crown. Well might Junius have said to him, when speaking of his action in the case of Mr. Wilkes:

> Your learning ought to teach you, my lord, that laws are intended to guard against what men may do, and not what they will do.

It is evident from the course of the argument in support of jurisdiction in this case that the power claimed for the Senate must be derived from the second section of the first article of the Constitution, or it cannot be found at all. I have endeavored to show that this provision of the Constitution is not the source of jurisdiction in cases of impeachment, and that all our power in such cases must be derived from the fourth section of the second article, which confines our jurisdiction to the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States. The construction for which I contend, while consistent with the true theory of the Federal Government, gives effect to every provision of the Constitution on the subject of impeachment.

It leaves to the House of Representatives the sole power of originating and prosecuting the charges or accusation. It gives to the Senate the sole power of trial and judgment, but it limits the power of impeachment, like the judicial and every other power in the Constitution, to the expressly enumerated cases prescribed in the fourth section of the second article. This section confines our power to the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, and provides for their removal from office on conviction of the offenses designated in it.

But it is contended that this is not the true construction of the fourth section; that the object of this provision was to make removal from office imperative on the Senate, as before stated in my argument. In other words, this is the judgment clause, so far as removal from office is concerned.

But we have been told that there is another judgment clause in the Constitution relating to the same subject. I refer to the seventh clause of section 3, article I, of the Constitution, which is as follows:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

This clause has had great weight in the argument in favor of jurisdiction because it permits the Senate to disqualify the offender. The Constitution first provides what body should prefer the charge; then it provides the tribunal which shall try it, the persons who shall be subject to impeachment, and the judgment which shall be rendered in case of conviction. By construing the fourth section of the second article as a judgment instead of a jurisdictional clause, you destroy the harmony and logic of this arrangement.

But if this provision was only intended as a judgment clause why did not the framers of the Constitution incorporate into it all that they intended to say upon the subject of judgments in cases of impeachment? They put into the Constitution a distinct clause relating to judgments in such cases, and in it they provided for the same removal from office which it is contended the fourth section of the second article was intended only to secure. A statement of this proposition is enough to show that the construction contended for by the managers cannot be correct.

The people, we are told, will not allow this power to be employed for oppressions. Sir, my limited reading has taught me to look for securities for our liberties to a very different quarter. "Put not your trust in princes" is a maxim which will apply to all men in power. If this argument is good at all, it only proves that there is no necessity for any restrictions on public authority. But have we not examples enough to show us that the weakest and most unreliable security against oppression is the supposed justice and moderation of public men.

Some of the greatest and purest men that ever lived in this country were charged with having committed oppression. Judge Chase was an able and a pure man. No charge of corruption was ever brought to his door. Still we are told that he was a judicial tyrant, and that the liberties of the citizens were not safe in his hands. General Jackson was the purest of the pure. His uprightness and honor were never questioned. And yet he did not escape the imputation of having disregarded the laws. Go back to 1798, and look at the policy of oppression which was then inaugurated under the alien and sedition laws, and by the greatest and purest men of that day.

Look to the case of Matthew Lyon, of Vermont, a member of Congress, who for a mild criticism on the policy of the men in power was thrown into prison by a judge of the Supreme Court and subjected to a heavy fine. He thought the liberty of speech and of the press was safe in the hands of those who had undertaken to uphold the Constitution! But he realized his folly in the darkness of his dungeon and by the clinking of his chains. The nefarious law under which that innocent man suffered was advocated in Congress and maintained before the country by the very same arguments which have been used in support of the common-law power of impeachment, and I adopt here as part of my argument the speech of Mr. Otis in 1798, to show that the doctrine I am now combating is the same which he then advocated in order to muzzle the press and gag the mouths of the people. He said emphatically that the common law of England might be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of impeachment, and in almost the same breath contended that the same law relating to libels was part of the jurisprudence of the United States.

Mr. President, the more I reflect upon the character of this common-law jurisdiction the more I am shocked at it. All the caution and guarded language of the managers cannot keep it within limits which are safe or reasonable. Mr. Manager HOAR says, on page 17 of his argument:

> It is well settled that all abuses of official trust are impeachable in Parliament. At common law there is no limit as to person; there is no limit as to time; there is no restriction as to the character of the punishment, save the discretion of the two Houses.

The power is here fairly stated. Will Senators answer me what is official trust within the meaning of the British law? Was it not asserted in Hastings's trial that any dereliction of duty which affected even remotely the honor or the interests of the empire came within the jurisdiction of Parliament? Do you not remember that Hastings claimed that he was not subject to impeachment because he was an officer of a chartered company whose rights and privileges were distinct from those of the Crown? He was a servant of a company of merchants to whose trading privileges were added powers of government. He was not appointed or commissioned by the Crown, and all his actions in India were approved by the company which invested him with power.

I speak of this to show that all persons in any way connected with public interests, whether their power emanate from the government or not, are subject to impeachment in England. Now it is said that the sole power of impeachment delegated by the people of the United States to the Senate and House of Representatives is to be regarded in the same light as all other positive grants of authority to this Government, the same as the power to make war, coin money, &c. The power of impeachment in England is co-extensive with the whole empire, and reaches every officer connected with the public service, whether local or colonial. If this power has, as is claimed, been delegated to the United States, how can the States exercise any part of it? The power to regulate commerce, the power to make war, the power to coin money, and the sole power of impeachment are all vested in this Government. If this power is not to be confined to officers of the United States, as we contend, according to the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, why may it not be made to operate upon the officers of States the same as the English power upon the officers of the East India Company or those of the government of Canada?

Do not the governors and officers of States owe as much to this Government as Hastings did to that of Great Britain? All State officers are obliged to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the violation of such an obligation on the part of a public officer is just as much impeachable as any offense that can be mentioned.

What reasons can be given for making a distinction between the sole power to make war and raise armies and the sole power of impeachment as it exists in England? The States cannot make war, raise armies, or regulate commerce. Why? Because these powers are delegated to Congress. But the sole power of impeachment is given to the same bodies in language equally as broad as in the other cases. Why will not the same rule of construction apply to both? The governors and other officers of States may violate the Constitution of the United States as well as officers of the General Government. The Constitution of the Union makes it the duty of the executive of a State, upon demand of another executive, to deliver up a fugitive from justice. If this duty is violated, why may not the officer be impeached by Congress, according to English precedents?

A governor of a State may commit treason against the United States. Surely that would be an impeachable offense. Why not remove him? But I know it will be said that the power of impeachment in the Constitution of the United States must be confined to officers of the United States. But why restrict the power here more than in England? No reason or argument can be made or assigned for such restriction that is not derived from the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, which confines this power to civil officers of the United States. I have always thought that any power which Judge Story said did not belong to the General Government no one could prove to exist. No man who reads his views upon the subject now under consideration can doubt for one moment how he would have decided the question if it had been before him as a judge. Mr. Curtis, in his Commentaries, speaks out explicitly. He says:

> Impeachment is not necessarily a trial for crime, its purposes lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or customary law; it is a proceeding to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office.

He says that such cause of removal may exist where no offence against public law has been committed, and instances imbecility and maladministration as crimes of removal. (Curtis on the Constitution, page 360.)

That careful writer, Chancellor Kent, speaking of impeachment, says:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States may be impeached by the House of Representatives for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, and, upon conviction by the Senate, removed from office. (1 Kent's Commentaries, page 302.)

Is it not plain that this great discriminating lawyer looked only to the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution as the source of this power?

In the same work he discusses at great length the common-law jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, but it never occurred to him that there was such a thing under our Constitution as common-law jurisdiction in cases of impeachment.

Mr. President, it cannot be forgotten that this Government when first put in operation was regarded as an experiment. It was watched over with great anxiety by its friends and elicited the most gloomy forebodings from its enemies. Some thought it had too much power, others that it had too little. But there was a little band of patriots and statesmen who fondly imagined that it was the most perfect institution of the kind that had ever been created. Those men were not admirers of England or of English government. They thought and felt that the refinements and tyranny of the feudal system were not well adapted to the free spirit of America. They favored strict limitations on all powers which touched the liberty, life, or property of the citizen. They were for freedom regulated by law; but they cherished a fierce enmity against all undefined power. Foremost among these stood Jefferson and Madison. The one had breathed into the Declaration of Independence the spirit of the purest liberty. The other carried it down as Franklin did the lightning of heaven, applied it to practical purposes by making it the foundation of a written constitution. When the fortunes of party had placed the noble work of these great founders of our Constitution in hands which they considered unfriendly to its principles, they watched over its convulsive and irregular operations with the same care and solicitude that the most devoted parent would watch the progress of disease when it seizes the health and vigor of his offspring.

In 1798, when the same claim of power in cases of impeachment which is set up to-day was asserted, the subject attracted the notice of Jefferson and Madison. This common-law doctrine of impeachment put forth at that day, and now resuscitated, was denounced by Madison as the most extravagant folly of the period. The correspondence is here before me, and I will read it for the information of the Senate, and I believe that the conclusion at which I have arrived which denies jurisdiction in this case is in strict accordance with the principles of those distinguished men, and is the true constitutional doctrine on the subject.

This correspondence has reference to the trial of Senator Blount, the first case of impeachment which occurred under our Constitution. I stated that this trial took place in the era of the alien and sedition laws. The Federal party was in power. The managers in that case contended for a like construction of the Constitution to that which the present managers contend for.

It was then insisted, as it is now, that the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution was not the source of jurisdiction, but that the second section of the first article conferred upon the Senate and House the common-law power of impeachment.

There is, however, a great difference in one respect between the arguments of the managers in the Blount case and the arguments here. There it was admitted that the common-law power of impeachment contended for extended to all persons and all officers, State and Federal. Here it is denied that it can be extended to private persons, but properly applies only to official offenses. But is there not in this very difference of opinion respecting this power enough to induce us to disregard both it and its source? This shows the danger of relying upon construction in cases like this.

The managers in 1798 stated, I think, the true common-law doctrine, and they claimed for this Government nothing but what was included in it, as they understood the English law. But the present managers, looking to the very same provision of the Constitution for jurisdiction which the former did, in deference, I suppose, to the advanced spirit of the age, tell us that the common law has always limited impeachments to official crime. The letter of Mr. Madison which I will now read alludes to the claim of power set up by the managers in Blount's case, and I have shown that the very same provision of the Constitution was invoked to sustain it which is relied upon by the managers here. Still Mr. Madison characterizes the claim of power set up in 1798 "as the most extravagant novelty yet broached" by that party which carried through Congress in the same year the alien and sedition laws. Here is his letter to Thomas Jefferson:

MARCH 4, 1798.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Tazewell's speech is really an able one in defense of his proposition to associate juries with the Senate in case of impeachment. His views of the subject are so new to me that I ought not to decide on them without more examination than I have had time for. My impression has always been that impeachments were somewhat sui generis, and exclude the use of juries. The terms of the amendment to the Constitution are indeed strong, and Mr. T. has given them, as the French say, all their lustre. But it is at least questionable whether an application of that amendment to the case of impeachments would not push his doctrine further than he himself would be disposed to follow it.

It would seem also that the reservation of an ordinary trial by a jury must strongly imply that an impeachment was not to be a trial by jury.

As removal and disqualification, the punishments within the impeaching jurisdiction, were chiefly intended for offices in the executive line, would it not also be difficult to exclude executive influence from the choice of juries; or would juries armed with the impeaching power and under the influence of an unimpeachable tribunal be less formidable than the power as hitherto understood to be modified?

The universality of this power is the most extravagant novelty that has been yet broached, especially coming from a quarter that denies the impeachability of a Senator. Hardy as these innovators are, I cannot believe they will venture yet to hold this inconsistent and insulting language to the public. If the conduct and sentiments of the Senate on some occasions were to be regarded as the natural and permanent fruit of the institution, they ought to produce not only disgust, but despair, in all who are really attached to free government. But I cannot help ascribing some part of the evil to personal characters, and a great deal of it to the present spirit of the constituents of the Senate.

Whenever the State legislatures resume the tone natural to them, it will probably be seen that the tone of their representatives will vary also. If it should not, the inference will then be unavoidable that the present constitution of the Senate is at war with the public liberty.

A few of the grave inconsistencies resulting from the arguments of the managers I will now enumerate:

First. We are told that our jurisdiction is derived from the second section of the first article of the Constitution.

Second. That it is to be governed only by the limitations attending the exercise of the impeaching power in England, namely, official offenses.

Third. That the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution is not a limitation upon the power of impeachment, but only a mandatory provision to compel the Senate to remove the officers therein named when convicted.

According to this argument, the broad power of impeachment exists under our Constitution the same as in England. Therefore all officers of every description, high and low, State and municipal, are subject to this power, because they are subject in England.

2. The power of removal given in the fourth section of the second article can only operate on the class of officers named in it, all civil officers of the United States; but every other description, naval and military, &c., State and municipal, do not come under the provisions of this section, and they may be dealt with according to a different rule. If they are convicted of treason or bribery, the Senate is not compelled to remove them, but may censure them and let them go their way and sin no more.

Again, the crimes, treason, bribery, and high crimes and misdemeanors, specified in the fourth section of the second article, cannot, according to the argument, be regarded except for the purpose of furnishing grounds for the simple removal of civil officers of the United States. In all other cases we are not bound to look to the Constitution for the offenses which will justify impeachments, but must be guided by the unlimited theories of the common law. Hence we have two different and distinct rules made applicable to persons subject to impeachment under our Constitution.

In the case of a civil officer, whose removal is imperative when convicted of treason or bribery, the Constitution has placed some limitations upon the power of removal. In the case of a naval or military officer, or Senators or Representatives, all of whom are within the common-law power of impeachment, and beyond the protection of the fourth section of the second article, they are at the absolute mercy of the impeaching power and may be dealt with at the discretion of the Senate and the House. These conclusions are inevitable from the arguments of the managers, and to this doctrine I never will subscribe.

Mr. President, if there was no other argument against the exercise of this dangerous jurisdiction than that which is founded upon the absence of a single precedent to sustain it, that argument would be sufficient for me. Cases have arisen in our history which called for the exercise of this power. Why was it not put in practice? From the origin of the Government until the present hour not a single instance can be shown of an impeachment of an officer after he left office. Does not this amount to a construction of the Constitution? And why should a construction so long acquiesced in be departed from now?

Mr. Manager HOAR says that this Government has no securities to throw away. I say, sir, that the greatest danger to which the Government is exposed is in the gradual usurpation of powers not delegated to it. The people have been made so familiar with excesses of authority until they seem indisposed to question for a moment the power of the Government to do whatever it pleases. Placed here as a judge in a case confessedly criminal, with a special oath resting upon my conscience to obey the Constitution as I understand it, I shall not consider for one moment what the world may think of the judgment I now give. My opinion may be founded in error. I claim no infallibility for my judgment, but after the most patient and anxious consideration of this great question, after looking for light to guide my poor understanding in every quarter where I thought it could be found, and with no feeling of party or of prejudice, I unhesitatingly say that in my opinion the Senate sitting as a high court of impeachment has no jurisdiction under the Constitution of this case.

I am not insensible of the greatness of this occasion or of the importance of having safeguards to secure the interests of the people; neither am I indifferent to the great danger of resorting to the exercise of loose constructive powers, however desirable they may be. I cannot forget that I live under a Government which rests upon the broad foundation of popular rights; that I am in the councils of a country where the people are all powerful as well as all just, and that the surest guarantee for the efficiency and purity of our public administrations is to be found in the virtue and honesty of those whose interests alone are involved in their degradation and elevation. Nor am I able to see that those maxims and principles which were made to curb the power of royalty and hereditary tenures have any application to a government in which all offices are derived from the people, and all but the judicial are subject to the control of law. I am not unmindful of the fact that even in the purer and better days of the Republic the people were conversant with the dangers to be apprehended from corrupt officials. But I cannot banish from my recollection what the history of all past times has engraven upon my mind, that in providing securities against the inroads of official criminals such an end is dearly purchased when it is reached by a sacrifice of the liberties of the people.

Opinion of Mr. Bogy,

Delivered May 27, 1876.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, it was not my intention at the beginning of this discussion to say anything. On the contrary, I had decided to give a silent vote. And I would not now alter this purpose if I had not become satisfied from what has been said by certain Senators during the course of the debate that in this preliminary question of jurisdiction was involved virtually the decision of the greater question whether the party impeached was guilty or not guilty. This being so, and viewing the subject, as one of the most important which can be presented to the decision of the Senate, I feel it to be my duty to give the reasons which control my vote. What we decide—indeed, what we say in this discussion, although only one of jurisdiction—will be looked to as a precedent, and quoted in aftertimes. The question cannot be said to be entirely new, yet it is the first time it has been presented to this body for decision. As it is the first time so it may be, perhaps, the last. We are now to decide whether the impeachment of anybody, whether in office or out of office, whether a civil officer or not, can ever hereafter be tried. We are now called upon to pass on the question whether there is such a remedy provided by the Constitution to check and arrest official corruption. I do not wish to state the question too broadly. I desire to be correct. Although not attaching any particular importance to my opinions as an individual, I am not unmindful of the fact that the opinions of each and all of us will be quoted hereafter. We must not forget that we are Senators, and that the seats we now occupy will be occupied by others when we shall have left them. Upon us the Constitution has devolved the decision of this question, and, as already stated, it will to a great extent be final. At great length, and I may say with great ability, has it been discussed. It will not be my purpose to follow the example set before me by several Senators. My intention is to be brief. I do not attach any importance to the large number of impeachments and political trials which took place some five hundred years ago in England under the reigns of John, Henry III, and Edward I. All men at all acquainted with history know the political condition of that country during that period; an endless contest for mastery between the nobility, headed by the great barons, and the king, both parties being compelled to introduce as much foreign influence as possible as help in the contest. The king was surrounded with foreigners from France, Italy, and Spain; and on their side the barons had their foreign mercenaries and secret foreign auxiliaries. In fine, the result was that internal confusion and disorder were the order of the day. Parliament was gradually assuming form, shape, and power. Elections were yet, however, irregular, and partook largely of the condition of the political disorder. Faction necessarily ruled, and the faction in power did not hesitate to bring to trial its adversaries. Hence history records many bloody trials, the shame and disgrace of this period of English history. Senators have argued that these trials were, however, sanctioned by the common law, and that if we admit that the common law was introduced into the Constitution by the provision in relation to impeachment, that we not only sanction these bloody and shameful trials, but that we thereby authorize the same in this country at this day. I must say, Mr. President, that such arguments took me by surprise. No one contends that the common law is a part and parcel of the law of the Constitution in the sense that it is a part and underlies the system of the States. The States existed before the Constitution, and the English colonists brought with them from their mother country the common law and implanted it into the colonies, and hence this old common law permeates the systems of the States. But the Constitution was an instrument made by the States for a definite purpose and with certain defined powers. The common law is not a part of the Constitution unless it is put there by express provision. And when this is so, it is subject to all the limitations of the Constitution.

The second section of article 1 says the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

The first question which necessarily presents itself to the mind is, what is impeachment? And how can the question be answered without going to the common law for the exposition; it being the fountain, the great head-source from whence all our system flows? The framers of the Constitution were the sons and descendants of Englishmen, the only country up to that day that had made any decided advance toward liberty and a government of regulated powers. For although it is true that there was not and is not now a written constitution in England, yet it had at that day, and had had for centuries before, its great Magna Charta and other well-defined and well-secured privileges, all tending to a well-regulated system of free government. Although it was a monarchy and had its nobility, nevertheless it was in advance of the other countries of Europe in securing to the individual man his personal rights. From the days of Henry III to the time of the adoption of our Constitution the progress made in England toward good government was immense. The common law—the old customs and usages of the primitive inhabitants of the island of Britain—had been molded and shaped by the great judges who at different periods of time graced the bench, and the no less great lawyers who adorned its bar, Holt, Bacon, Coke, Selden, Plowden, and hosts of others, bench, bar, and great publicists had so shaped and crystallized those old customs that at the period of the formation of our Constitution the old lex non scripta had become lex scripta. There was not a principle of the common law but what became written law, and the crimes and bloody trials which had taken place in the Parliaments of England five hundred years before were not possible at the time of the adoption of our Constitution—no more possible then than now. In this respect there has been no progress, and perhaps there was room for none. At the time we adopted the word impeachment in our Constitution we adopted it as it was understood at that day in England. A reference to the debates in the convention will show this. The framers of the Constitution looked to no other country. The word impeachment is said by Webster, in his Dictionary, to be derived from the French, and means to hinder, to check, to prevent; yet its legal meaning was given to it by the common law, as much so as the word indictment.

Indeed, unless we go to the common law for its meaning and interpretation, it has no meaning at all, and the power granted to impeach would amount to nothing. No rule of construction will justify us in saying this. The ability, the character, the well-known reputation of the great men who framed our Constitution forbid this. The object was to confer a power, and a substantial one, to protect the people from corrupt officials. In England at that day an impeachment was a proceeding originating in the House of Commons charging in proper form official malfeasance. Who was thus chargeable is not at this day important, beyond the fact that all civil officers guilty of corruption while in office were impeachable. Whether military and naval men were or were not is of no consequence. It is enough to know that civilians were liable, for offenses committed while in office. Much has been said about military and naval officers not being impeachable. About this, I wish to be distinctly understood as not committing myself. I can see many good reasons why the leaders of our armies and the admirals of our Navy should be subject to trial by impeachment; but desiring to be as brief as possible I will not argue that point, and will leave it an open question. The time may come when it may become most important.

Section 2, first article of the Constitution, says:

> The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

The power, the sole power. No other body. No other tribunal has that power; and why? Because the House is the direct and immediate body in which the people are represented. It is there that they speak their potential voice. It is there that the Constitution gives to the people, through their Representatives, the power to call to account the guilty officer—the officer who has either betrayed his country, has received a bribe, has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, affecting the public welfare; and I would ask where could a power of this kind be better lodged than there?

As the sole power to impeach was given to the people, acting through the House, the sole power to try was given to the Senate. If the House has the power to impeach, it is the duty of the Senate to try. The limit of power in one is the limit in the other. If the House cannot impeach, the Senate cannot try; and if the House has the right to impeach, it is the imperative duty of the Senate to try. For the extent of this power we must necessarily go to the common law as understood at the time. We were certainly introducing an English system—well known there, well understood, and about which the legal minds of that country had already much written.

It is a significant fact that at that very time the most celebrated trial by impeachment known to the world was going on, a trial whose celebrity grew out of the character of the man who was charged—the interesting country over which he was said to have tyrannized, the remarkable men engaged both in its prosecution and its defense—the trial of Warren Hastings, was at that very time pending before the British Parliament. Who was Hastings? A Senator dwelt at some length on the fact that he was not an officer of the Crown, but of a private company. While it is true that the governor-general of India was, under certain conditions and limitations, appointed by the East India Company, he nevertheless was an officer of the British Empire. While the gains and profits might belong to the private company, the sovereignty of the countries subjugated belonged to the Crown. He was or had been a British officer, and it was as such he was brought before the House of Commons. As already stated, it is not important in this discussion to decide who all were or were not liable to impeachment in England; it is sufficient to say that there a civil officer, as was Warren Hastings, was considered liable to be tried. He was a civil officer who had been removed from office—for he did not resign, he was recalled and removed; and was impeached the year after his return to England. This great trial then going on in England to my mind is sufficient to explain what the framers of the Constitution meant. But, in addition to this, we have the words of the Constitution itself.

It is very plain to me that when you examine critically the power given to impeach and to try, that the President as well as any other person holding office is subject to impeachment. I have heard it said during this discussion that as the king in England could not be impeached, so the President in this country was also not impeachable. To my mind this is not correct. While it is true that in England the king could not be impeached, for the reason that his office is hereditary, and as king he can do no wrong and is not responsible; therefore he could not be tried, because he was beyond the reach of the law. But this is not so with regard to the President. Here he can do wrong, and for which he is responsible; elected by the people, and not hereditary. In this country he is, like any other officer, subject to the same laws and equally responsible. Therefore I am satisfied he is impeachable under the first section. Again, as this section provides that when the President is tried the Chief Justice shall preside, it must be that it was intended to include him as one of the officers thus liable. I see no reason why he should not be liable to impeachment, but very good ones why he should be, and as his name of office is mentioned in connection with a trial, I take it that he was subject to this mode of trial the same as any other person holding office. It is said in this first article that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold any office. Leaving it optional with the Senate to impose one or both of those punishments, a party convicted may be removed and not disqualified, he may be removed and disqualified, or he may be disqualified without being removed, and if he is not in office he of course cannot be removed, it being a question of discretion with the Senate sitting as a court. I wish this fact to be well understood, that the Senate has an undoubted discretion as to the judgment. Whether it be considered a punishment or not there is a diversity of opinion, but whether it be from my stând-point makes no difference, the discretion certainly exists. Now if the Constitution had stopped there the power of impeachment would have been complete, the power to try no less so, the power to give judgment in its discretion equally so, complete in every respect. But we must not forget that this remedy by impeachment was a great weapon placed in the hands of the people, to be used for their benefit, and by them to be employed to clean the Augean stables of the filth and manure of the bulls and oxen that might be found occupying the public stables. Hence the further provision was made, fourth section, second article, that in the event the President, Vice-President, or any civil officer be found guilty, he shall be removed; therefore when either of these persons was in office, there was no discretion as far as removal was concerned, evidently showing that there might be a class of persons, if convicted, toward whom no discretion existed, and another class toward whom there was discretion. These two classes are first the persons who, while in office, commit a crime and do not remain in office, and the other who is yet in office. I therefore consider that this fourth section of the second article does not give jurisdiction, nor limit it, and has nothing to do with the question of jurisdiction, but is only mandatory.

This last section, to my mind, is proof positive that persons out of office can be impeached; otherwise there could be no case in which to exercise the discretion evidently given by the first section.

No one can doubt that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to confer the power of impeachment of some character or other. Let the character of the power be what it may, or the class of persons who may be embraced within it be who they may, a power of this nature was evidently conferred. I repeat it, for it cannot be repeated too often, this was intended to be a great power, placed in the hands of the representatives of the people for their protection against corrupt and venal officials. Now, if it is true that this power thus conferred can be defeated by the guilty official resigning, it might as well not have been put in the Constitution. Resignation will follow the detection of guilt in every instance; and thus although it might be that a Secretary of State may have betrayed his country to a foreign power, or the Secretary of the Treasury stolen millions of the public money, or any other officer from the President down shamefully disgraced his office, or a judge publicly sold justice from the bench, it matters not who the officer may be or what he may have done, all he has to do as soon as the fact is found out is to hand in his resignation, and he can go scot-free as far as this remedy is concerned. It is true he may be tried by a court. But I believe that when the day comes that the Senate will decline to try a guilty official, and, as in this case, one who admits his guilt, but to avoid impeachment has resigned the office which he abused, the day will have come when it will not be very difficult to get out of the clutches of a court. We all know how cases are continued and postponed and how juries are formed. Let a guilty man escape the punishment prescribed by the people's remedy of impeachment, and to my mind you will proclaim a saturnalia for all rogues and villains to step forward and help themselves. My hope, my only hope will then be in the people; and it is to them I will feel it my duty to appeal to restore this great popular remedy. We cannot submit to be governed by rogues and villains. The thieves must be driven from power; and, Mr. President, I desire you and the Senators around me to remember that whenever the fact is made known to the people that it has been decided that a guilty man can escape trial by impeachment merely by resigning his office, they will take steps to correct this decision.

Although there may be a majority for the jurisdiction, yet if there is one-third opposed to it, I am satisfied from what has been said that an effort will be made to get the party charged acquitted on the ground that those who are opposed to jurisdiction cannot vote for conviction. Let this be done, and in my opinion a storm will be let loose that will sweep over this land, and as it passes over the valleys and mountains and plains, there will be heard in the distance the majestic voice of the people crying aloud for a restoration of this, the people's remedy, with which alone they can drive from office the villains and thieves who may have fattened at the public crib.

Opinion of Mr. Booth,

Delivered May 27, 1876.

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, two theories of impeachment as applicable to the question before us are submitted, one of which we must adopt, for no other seems to be possible; and yet to my mind neither is entirely consistent with all the provisions of the Constitution and their accepted construction.

After listening to one of the ablest debates it has ever been my privilege to hear, I am compelled to the conclusion that the doubt exists in the Constitution itself, and arises from the fact that the convention did not consider the whole subject of impeachment and determine all its provisions at one time, but agreed upon each with reference to a special object; and the difficulty is insuperable in the attempt to reduce uncertainty to certainty.

The theory in favor of jurisdiction is that the term impeachment in our Constitution does not mean simply form of accusation, but imports the whole of the common law in reference to impeachable persons and impeachable offenses, giving to Congress the exact jurisdiction which was held by Parliament, and vesting in it plenary power of punishment, restricted only by all these by the provisions of the Constitution; that is, that the use of the word impeachment in providing for a method of accusation and trial is a grant to Congress of all the power which could be exercised by the British Parliament on that subject, and that subsequent provisions, when not definitions of the methods of its exercise, are restrictions upon the grant.

In support of this theory as to definition, it might be suggested that the first clause in reference to the subject reads:

> The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

The word "Speaker" in the same clause is purely technical. It is not defined directly or indirectly by its use in any other connection. We are obliged to go to the British Parliament for its meaning. So far as I know, the House of Commons is the only parliamentary body in the world that had ever designated its presiding officer by that name, or a translation of it. Like many other words, it has drifted so far from its origin that the Speaker of the House is the only member who cannot speak. When he speaks he is not the "Speaker." To make the argument drawn from this complete, it must follow that the presiding officer of the House of Representatives, by the use of the word speaker is invested with all the prescriptive rights and functions of the speaker of the House of Commons.

That part of the sixth clause of the third section which provides that "the Senate shall have sole power to try all impeachments" is only important in this connection as indicating that the common-law idea was a controlling one in the mind of the convention as shown in adopting a method of trial similar to that of Parliament. True this was done after other methods were discussed, but its final adoption is evidence of a disposition to keep within the line of precedent.

I pass for the present to the next and immediately following clause in the Constitution:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, &c.

This clause seems to me the strongest corroboration of the common-law theory of jurisdiction to be found in the Constitution. It is restrictive. Restrictive upon what? Certainly not upon any subsequent clause of the Constitution, for the Constitution was to be operative as a whole—all taking effect at one time. It would be absurd for a convention making a constitution to attempt to-day to restrict its own action to-morrow, when its whole work was to be adopted or rejected by the people as one instrument. And if after agreeing upon these words they had adopted a subsequent provision that the President of the United States upon impeachment for and conviction of treason should suffer death, by a well-known rule of construction the latter clause would prevail.

There are no affirmative words in this portion of the clause; it is prohibitory. It is doubtful if under such a clause in a statute a criminal court could pronounce any judgment, unless a general or specific power to pronounce any or some judgment were elsewhere conferred.

It may be argued that it is permissive, but a criminal court takes nothing by implication. The clause, however, is consistent with the theory that the Senate was already clothed with the general power of punishment which attached to the House of Peers, and these words were restrictive of that power. To my mind this sentence must have meant this at the time and in the connection in which it was used, or it was designed as a limitation upon the power of Congress to enact statutory penalties for impeachable offenses.

Being a restriction upon punishment, it must have been a restriction upon a power to punish then in esse, or a restriction upon a power to create penalties.

Section 4 of the third article is susceptible of a construction consistent with this theory. It reads:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The nautral meaning of the words "shall be removed from office on impeachment for," &c., is that these persons were before that subject to impeachment. The grammatical meaning of the sentence, leaving out all question of legal construction, is that removal from office is mandatory in the cases enumerated. To invoke the rule of construction in this view, inclusio unius, exclusio alterius, seems to me to be a petitio principii, for whether this sentence is to be construed as inclusive and exclusive as to parties or mandatory as to punishment is the whole question at issue. If the latter be the true meaning, it certainly includes all persons who can suffer that punishment, and there is no room exclusio alterius.

It is to be borne in mind, also, that the authors of the Constitution were familiar with the common law or lex Parliamenti of impeachment; that it was consciously or unconsciously in their minds as the basis of their proceeding.

Whether they desired to fit a known instrument to their purpose or to invent a new one they would use common-law terms. They lived, so to speak, in the atmosphere of the common law, and thought in its language. If they had said "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be subject to impeachment for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors committed in office, and upon conviction thereof they shall be removed from office and may be disqualified from holding office under the United States," I, at least, should have had less difficulty than I have with this case.

So far this "common law" theory seems consistent with itself; that is, that in the subject of impeachment the whole power and jurisdiction of the British Parliament is vested in Congress; that the methods of their exercise are prescribed; that there is no limitation except that imputed by the word impeachment itself, ex vi termini, as to persons and offenses; that punishment is restricted to removal from office and disqualification to hold; and that removal from office must follow the conviction of one holding office at time of conviction.

I am compelled to the admission that I believe this would have been the interpretation of the provisions upon this subject by the men who in convention assembled gave expression to the Constitution of the United States if they had been called upon to express an opinion, and not to make a judicial determination; and, if the meaning of the Constitution is to be ascertained simply by that kind of "mind-reading," that is the interpretation we must adopt. For myself I do not think this the true rule for interpreting a constitution. The Constitution did not live until adopted by the people of the States. We must consider their ideas as well as the convention's. It lives now by, for, and through the people of to-day. It is for them, not they for it. We must calculate its meaning in the light of events, by judicial decisions, by the meridian of 1876 as well as 1789. The Constitution of the United States is not dead, but living. If it were an incrustation, not a living body, it would long since have stifled this nation or been destroyed by it.

To suppose that its authors could have anticipated the wants and necessities of coming times and provided for the exigencies of human life in this everincreasing volume in fixed and unchanging terms would be to attribute to them omniscient wisdom.

I wish to state the paradox as my belief that the Supreme Court of the United States, that this body to-day understands the Constitution of the United States in its application to affairs as they are better than the convention which framed it, and this generation far better than the generation which adopted it; as much better as the courts now understand the statute of frauds in its application to present transactions than it was understood by the Parliament which adopted it, or as the people do the rights protected by habeas corpus than the generation did when they were first vouchsafed that great writ for their protection.

The difficulty in the common-law theory lies at the foundation. To make it consistent with what is accepted upon all sides as the law governing us, and what has been at least assumed to be the law in every impeachment trial in this country, impeachment at common law must have been restricted to offenses committed in office. The history of impeachment in Great Britain not only fails to sustain this to my mind, but refutes it. In the case of Blount (the first in the United States) it was held that Blount could not be impeached because he did not hold office under the United States when the offense was committed. And the practice of the country with universal acquiescence further limits the rule to civil office. There are very cogent reasons why this should be so. Now, if this limitation cannot be found in the common law it must be sought in the Constitution, and it can only be found there in the fourth section of the second article. Now, whether we construe this section as a limitation upon a jurisdiction already vested or as the creation of jurisdiction, it clearly means that only persons in office can be impeached. That is, if we are driven to this section to find a limitation which is conceded to exist, we are compelled to find the whole limitation contended for.

But this section is not only a limitation; it is also an extension of jurisdiction. As first suggested by the Senator from New York and brought sharply out by the Senator from Minnesota, the President, as the executive head of the Government, was not impeachable by any analogy of the common law. His position does not correspond to that of the king who was not impeachable or to the prime minister who was. Story very ably argues, and refers to this very section of the Constitution in confirmation, that the President is not an officer of the United States. As was tersely said by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] "He is a part of the Government." He was made impeachable by this section, and the President is so closely linked with civil officers that they cannot be separated for purposes of jurisdiction. In this view the rule that including a class excludes others becomes operative.

It is true, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] that section 3 of the first article of the Constitution provides that "when the President of the United States is tried" (on impeachment) "the Chief Justice shall preside," thus raising an implication that the President was impeachable; but the history of the debates in the convention shows that this provision was not agreed upon until after the adoption of the fourth section of the second article, and that its precedence in place was assigned by the "committee on style." In fact it was first reported by this committee, after all other provisions in regard to impeachmeut had been determined by the convention.

Where private rights are in issue, the general opinion of constitutional construction should have little weight, but where public rights and considerations are only involved, public opinion, that public opinion which can alone give the Constitution any vitality as a political instrument, becomes a great factor. I take it then to be accepted American law here and elsewhere, to which there is general acquiescence, though there may be individual exceptions of opinion, that only offenses are impeachable which are committed in civil office, and that these offenses are those enumerated in the fourth section of the second article. This is the law; so generally accepted that it is the one firm and stable thing amid the shifting sands and changing winds of opinion and debate. We have one point fixed. Fixed not, I admit, by the clear intention of the men who wrote the words of the constitutional clauses, but by that far greater intelligence and more infallible rule, a hundred years of experience; by the inertia of acquiescence.

Is it possible to deduce, can you deduce that fixed rule from the vague, shadowy, undefined, and undefinable custom of Parliament which is only a custom in that it is above law—conforms to whatever it desires and borrows or repudiates the example of yesterday in order to sanction the right or establish the wrong of to-day at the whim or caprice of its omnipotent but changing will?

Who here, elsewhere, or anywhere can tell how much of what is called the common law of impeachment is derived from precedents in impeachment trials and how much from the theory of the omnipotence of Parliament?

Sir, for one I will not believe that this undefined law ever became by adoption a portion of American jurisprudence; that this vast power was properly vested by implication in Congress. Any intention to place it there must yield to the spirit of the whole instrument. If grafted there, it did not grow. If planted there, it did not take root.

With the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] I can find in the Constitution enough to create the proceeding of impeachment, without receiving anything from inheritance or taking anything by implication. I find there a class of persons, an enumeration of offenses which are impeachable; only one penalty which is enjoined by affirmative words, one limit which cannot be transcended.

I know that as a matter of verbal criticism or legal construction of language neither theory is perfect, but in the one I stand within secure limits of actual grant, in the other in the vague and shadowy unknown. In the one I stand within the rule of interpretation which has been found to be safest and wisest for the whole instrument, in the other I make this procedure an excrescence upon the body-politic.

If the time should ever come when the power to impeach after office is necessary to secure the proper administration of office, society will be so corrupt and the motives of public morality so low that the Republic cannot be saved with it, and would not be worth saving if it could.

Opinion of Mr. Key,

Delivered May 29, 1876.

Mr. KEY. The provisions of the Constitution material to our consideration on this question are these:

First—

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Second—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

Third—

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Fourth—

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

These are given here in the order in which they stand in the Constitution, and it seems to me that when they are thus collated they are so plain and explicit as to leave little room for construction or doubtful interpretation.

The first gives the House of Representatives the sole power to impeach. I confess that I do not comprehend that rule of strict construction which does not find a power where it is expressly granted, and discovers it, by implication, in a clause in which no such power is given. Strict construction of an instrument finds the power in the language in which it is given. There is as much of latitudinous construction in refusing to find a power in the words by which it is given, as by forcing an implication of the power from language which does not authorize it. A strict construction eliminates and ascertains the powers delegated from the language as expressed, and will assert a power which plainly exists as strongly as it will deny one raised only by forced implication. It appears to me, therefore, strange that although the Constitution says that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment," yet these words do not give it the "sole power of impeachment," and that you must go somewhere to find that power where nothing is said about it, and that a strict construction of the Constitution requires this.

The first provision grants to the House of Representatives the sole power to impeach. The second gives the Senate the sole power to try the impeachment. The third declares that, should the Senate convict the person impeached, the judgment shall extend no further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold office under the United States. The fourth provision says that if the President, Vice-President, or any other civil officer of the United States shall be convicted on impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, he shall be removed from office. The Constitution does not say that the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States only shall be impeached. It bears no such construction, in my opinion, unless it be forced by the widest implication. It does not say that only treason, bribery, and high crimes and misdemeanors shall be impeachable offenses. We can all see how a case might happen which would demand the removal of a public officer who had been guilty of no such offense. Suppose a President, by injury, disease, or other cause, should become imbecile to such an extent as to make him incompetent to discharge the duties of his high office—suppose he should insist on the exercise of the functions of the office to which he had been chosen, believing himself fully qualified to discharge them, how should we get rid of him? He cannot be said to be guilty of treason, of bribery, or of high crimes or misdemeanors, for these are all criminal offenses, and an evil intent is a necessary ingredient of the charge, and there is with him no such intent. It is true the Constitution provides that in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the office, these duties shall devolve upon another; but how are you to ascertain and determine his mental inability when he denies it from honest belief, and asserts with equal confidence his ability to discharge its duties, if not by impeachment?

The Constitution does not undertake to define the nature and form of impeachment, or its scope and boundaries. It treats of the whole subject as of a matter which is already defined, bounded, and understood. I think the House of Representatives may impeach for other offenses, abuses, failures, and wrongs than those included in the terms "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors." I think it may impeach other parties than the "President, Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States." Upon no other hypothesis, it seems to me, can we reconcile and harmonize the provisions of the first and second articles of the Constitution defining the extent of punishment or penalty. The first says that judgment shall extend no further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold office. That provision is general, and, everything else out of the way, allows the Senate to remove and disqualify partially or entirely, or to remove or to disqualify, in its discretion; but as this might not be sufficient in some cases, the second article says that if the President, Vice-President, or other civil officer of the United States shall be convicted on impeachment, he shall be removed. To that extent the Senate shall have no discretion, but it may still disqualify or not. If others are impeached, the Senate may or may not remove; but if the President, Vice-President, or other civil officer is successfully impeached for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, the Senate shall remove. If the second article defines who shall be impeached and the offenses for which they may be impeached, removal from office is the imperative penalty, and the provision in the first unmeaning. It would follow also that the party could only be impeached for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors.

We must interpret the law strictly and as it is written. We are not to make the law. We are not to determine whether the Constitution contains such provisions as we should have made or not, or whether they might be improved. We must not obscure it, or render it inefficient and powerless by latitudinous construction or forced implications. The language of the Constitution in regard to impeachment, when considered in the order in which it stands, the order in which it was placed by its makers—its regular and natural order, so to speak—appears to me easy of interpretation, and so clear and explicit in its terms as to need the application of none of the rules of construction used for ambiguous or doubtful provisions. To my mind, it appears that the difficulties of the question under consideration arise, not out of the Constitution, but from the latitude of opinion which has been taken heretofore in regard to the implications of the language used, and which do not properly belong to it, when that language is defined in its natural order, according to its plain and simple meaning.

In giving expression to the opinion I have upon this question, I wish to be understood as doing so with becoming modesty and diffidence, for I confess that the magnitude of the difficulties in regard to it which arise and which have arisen heretofore in the minds of the most able and distinguished members of this body on this trial, as well as on those like trials which have preceded it, make me doubtful of the justice and propriety of the views which seem to me so clear and inevitable. I have great respect for the opinion of those Senators who have differed with my view of this question, and to differ with them gives me some apprehension as to the correctness of my conclusion; but, notwithstanding the ability, force, and earnestness with which their views have been urged, my mind is convinced in favor of the jurisdiction of the Senate in this case. Nor am I alarmed at the dangers which some Senators see in coming to such a conclusion. Our fathers had confidence in the people. They gave the people the right to choose those who should be the members of the House of Representatives. They did this because they were satisfied the people would elect good and qualified men, to whom the high trusts of that exalted position might be safely delivered. They gave the Legislatures of the States the right and duty to elect those who should compose the Senate of the United States, because they believed these legislatures would choose such as were qualified by experience, ability, learning, and integrity for their high station. To these bodies, the Senate and House of Representatives, it gave the legislative power of the Government. To the body chosen by the people our fathers believed they might safely give the power and discretion of impeachment. They said this body shall have the power to impeach. They did not say it should exercise this power, but it might do so.

Our fathers never supposed that that august body of the people's picked men would deal with any but great offenders, guilty of great offenses in public station, or with great officers disqualified by some unusual cause for the discharge of official duties. They had more confidence in Congress and in our form of government than have many who have spoken in this debate. They never feared that the "awful discretion" of the Senate would be invoked or exercised against small offenders or small offenses, or from motives of hate and party passion. They would never have given to Congress its grand trusts and great powers had they believed it would ever be capable of the infamous conduct and action which in this Chamber have been pictured in horrible outlines before our eyes to terrify us. The fathers were not afraid to trust Congress. They did not presume that the representatives of the people and the States were those who would be the first to pull down the glorious fabric which sustains and protects our liberties. The first century of our existence as a nation has taught many here, it seems, that Congress is to be feared, not trusted. Has Congress grown alarmed at its own temper, powers, and tendencies? Do its members believe that the lives and liberties of the people are in the power and control of custodians so dangerous? Has Congress grown so corrupt, so unfaithful, so weak that it may be driven from its line of duty by passion or party rancor? Has a new light shone out discovering to our startled vision rocks and breakers which never before appeared in our sea, upon which our vessel of state is in imminent peril of being wrecked? I repeat, are Senators afraid of the people's chosen representatives? Are Senators afraid to trust themselves? Do they think that we are better than those who are to come after us? If corruption, party hate, or other evil spirit should so possess and control Congress that the House of Representatives should impeach and two-thirds of the Senate vote to convict a political antagonist, to destroy him on that account and for that reason, our Government will have reached such a state of decline, decay, and rottenness that if destruction shall not come in one shape it will come in another.

More than one Senator—as an argument ad hominem, I suppose—has told us that under the construction which would give this body jurisdiction of this case those of us who were lately in rebellion could be impeached for treason. Sir, on becoming members of this body we took a most solemn oath. If we believe that a just interpretation of the Constitution gives this jurisdiction, and were deterred from saying so and voting so because the construction was unfavorable to us, we should forfeit all claim to honor and manhood, bring disgrace upon ourselves and the people we have the honor to represent, and deserve the execration of mankind everywhere.

But we are told that impeachment in England was in former ages a most barbarous, bloody, and tyrannous proceeding. It is true that in the times past many bloody sacrifices were made in that country under the forms of impeachment; but where one man so fell hundreds under the sentences of other tribunals fell at the stake, on the gibbet, and on the scaffold. Of all the courts of England in which crimes and criminals were tried the court of impeachment was stained with the least blood. It tried noblemen and great officers. The people fell by thousands under the other courts. We are told that a little later in our own country men were persecuted and punished because they were Quakers, and ugly old women were tried and condemned because they were said to be witches; but the descendants of those who did these things were among the very first to light the fires of liberty on this continent, and none did more than they in laying broad and deep the foundations of freedom's glorious temple and erecting thereon the magnificent structure which attracts the world's admiring gaze. These excesses were not the fault of the people. The age was to blame. The people of England are more enlightened, free, and tolerant now than they were in the days of Henry VIII and Mary and Elizabeth, and the people of New England are more liberal and tolerant than in the days of Roger Williams and Miles Standish.

England, with what gentlemen call an omnipotent Parliament, has had but one or two cases of impeachment, I believe, during the existence of our Constitution. Their last was in 1805, I think. Since that period we have had many cases of impeachment. We have this fact, which should quiet the grave apprehensions of Senators in regard to the dangers of the common-law doctrine of impeachment: England, in our age, with what these gentlemen denounce as unlimited power of impeachment, has had no case of impeachment while we, with scarcely any power to impeach, according to their idea, have had several trials of the kind; so that, using our own age and England and the United States for the test of the doctrine, the result appears to be that there is more danger of impeachment under our Constitution than under that of England. What we should have done had our Constitution and people been co-existent with the reigns in England, during which blood flowed so freely, we cannot tell.

I think, Mr. President, our fathers intended to lodge, and did lodge, in the Houses of Congress, in such manner that these bodies should be a check upon each other, a high discretionary power, broad enough and wide enough to be used and exercised for the safety of the state and the security of the liberties of the people in great and unforeseen emergencies, dangerous to the life of the state; a great discretion, to be exercised when something arose and had to be grappled with at once to save the country, which the general law had failed to foresee, define, and provide against. The Constitution was made not only for the age in which it was framed, but for all the ages which are to come. It was impossible to foresee what complications, combinations, or unthought-of dangers might imperil the nation; hence the fathers gave the power of impeachment to the Houses of Congress, the same bodies who give laws to the Government, to be used if need be in unforeseen emergencies, as well as in the cases specifically mentioned in the Constitution. It is a power given for the security of liberty; a power, like all others granted by that instrument, to be used wisely, and not abused; a power, active, efficient, and operative when occasion demands its exercise, and only then.

Mr. President, I will conclude by saying that for the life of me I cannot understand or greatly respect a theory which would impeach and try President Johnson, who had been guilty of no crime, because he was in office, and permit one to escape who is presumed to be guilty, as the record stands, of a great offense against the people of the nation in defrauding its soldiery, whom it was his duty to care for and protect, because he resigned his office to avoid impeachment and trial. I have heard of the uncertainty of the law, and such might be an example of it.

The power of impeachment, Mr. President, is one of the bulwarks of our liberties by which the representatives of the people may insure them against those great offenders whose official misconduct is intended to destroy our Government or overthrow the rights of its citizens, and not as an engine of oppression, by which a faithful officer could be destroyed and the greatest official offender of the age escape; and yet that is what the theory of those who deny jurisdiction in this case might accomplish.

Opinion of Mr. Dawes,

Delivered May 29, 1876.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senate has determined that the discussion of this question shall close with the day. The signal ability and exhaustive character of the debate which has preceded, and the rights of those who are waiting to follow me, both admonish me to be brief. I shall struggle to heed the admonition.

I am of opinion that the Senate has jurisdiction to try William W. Belknap upon the articles of impeachment presented against him by the House, anything in his plea to the contrary notwithstanding. I have thought all along that I should sufficiently discharge my duty by simply thus recording my vote, and that perhaps that vote would vindicate itself quite as well without any attempt upon my part to support it with arguments as in any other way.

I have listened to the opinions delivered on the one side and on the other, and I believe I have listened to them all, as well those from which I have differed as those with which I have agreed. Senators around me, at whose feet I delight to sit, have addressed to me in common with others very able arguments against this jurisdiction. Among them has been my own colleague, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] whose opinions cannot have as great weight with any other Senator as with myself. I have come to feel in the progress of these arguments that it was due to them that I should give them some reason why I find it impossible to yield to their reasoning. For this purpose alone I speak.

The plea is one of confession and avoidance. For the purpose of the argument, it must be treated as confessing all that is alleged; that is, that Mr. Belknap, while Secretary of War and in and about his official duty, has committed high crimes and misdemeanors, but that by a subsequent act of his own, a simple resignation of office, he has avoided all the consequences that would otherwise under the Constitution follow his official crime. I confess, at the outset, that it would not be easy to convince me of the validity of such a plea. I cannot easily come to the conclusion to which the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] seems to have arrived in the beautiful and eloquent opinion delivered by him yesterday: that while the members of the convention, if asked their opinion, would of one accord have said that they had provided for this case, but that nevertheless, without intending it, they had by some unaccountable jumble of arrangement thwarted their own purpose. A few simple rules of construction have guided me to the conclusion that this plea is bad. I take the Constitution as a whole, and insist that effect must be given to all its provisions. Any rule of construction must be bad which brings its different provisions in irreconcilable conflict with each other or which renders any of them nugatory or void. Many Senators starting from different premises have been led in this discussion different ways and to opposite conclusions. With some the power of impeachment placed in the Constitution is the common-law impeachment as it existed when the Constitution was formed, limited, it is true, in its application and its penalty by express provisions found in the instrument itself. With others the impeachment spoken of in the organic law is a new creation of the Constitution itself, having no reference to the common-law understanding of that term, created, defined, and limited by article 2, section 4, in these words:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

By them it is held that all other provisions relating to impeachment in the Constitution are but distributions of the several parts to be performed in carrying out the power granted by this section. The argument between the advocates of these two theories has proceeded upon the ground that they must necessarily lead to different conclusions. It has been generally held by those who believe that the impeachment here spoken of is the common-law power of impeachment, to which, wherever it obtains, it is admitted that all official misconduct is amenable, that it leads to the conclusion that the Senate has jurisdiction. Those holding the other theory, that this is a new power, claim, with equal confidence, that it leads to the opposite conclusion. Hence these two methods of reasoning have been arrayed against each other with great and exhaustive ability and research. But I have been unable to see that this distinction is essential to a correct conclusion. By either mode I arrive at the same result, and, therefore, to my mind, this question, which has so often been made preliminary in the argument, is wholly immaterial. By both processes of reasoning I am led to the same conclusion. Even if the framers of the Constitution, in putting into article 2, section 4, the words I have already quoted, namely, that "the President, Vice-President and other civil officers, shall be removed on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," did create a new power, with its own limitations and its own consequences, to be neither measured nor defined by the history of impeachment in the past, still from these premises I can come to no other conclusion but that this power by every just and fair, as well as strict, construction of the words here used includes the case at bar.

And briefly, for these reasons: Mr. Belknap was a civil officer when the offense was committed. The offense, as alleged, is a high crime and misdemeanor, and the simple question to be decided is whether a civil officer who thus commits an offense described in the Constitution must be a "civil officer" when the offense is committed or when he is tried for it. Those who believe that the Senate has jurisdiction to try the case believe this language to mean that he must be a civil officer when the offense is committed, while those who believe that the Senate has not jurisdiction are of opinion that the language imports that he must be a civil officer when tried. The construction which requires the offense to be committed while in office, without regard to the position of the offender when tried, leads to the conclusion that the person who, while in office, commits high crimes and misdemeanors, may be impeached therefor at any time thereafter. On the other hand, the construction which requires that the person shall be a civil officer when impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, whether in or out of office, leads to the conclusion that the person when in office may be impeached for any such offense committed whether in or out of office, and therefore during any period of his previous private life. While consequences are not always tests of construction, yet no one can well lay aside entirely their consideration, and, therefore, it has been urged upon us with great force by those opposed to jurisdiction in this case that the construction which gives jurisdiction renders liable to impeachment for the remainder of his life any person who has held any civil office under the Government, overlooking in argument that the construction insisted upon instead exposes every person the moment he enters office to impeachment and consequent removal, and it may be perpetual disqualification, for any alleged offense he may have committed at any previous time in his life, thereby attaching to the offense itself, years it may be after its commission, a penalty not attached to it when it was committed, and it may be long after the infliction of every legal penalty for such offense. I cannot, while listening to the dreaded consequences portrayed by those who fear the results that may follow jurisdiction in this case, keep out of mind equally serious consequences which hang upon their own conclusion that it is enough to give jurisdiction that the person be in office when impeached, and has, when in or out of office, committed any of the offenses defined in the Constitution. The construction which I have put upon this section of the Constitution, namely, that a "civil officer" is the description of the person committing the offense, and not of the one impeached, is in strict accordance with the construction placed upon penal statutes of a like character. The very statute under which Mr. Belknap is understood to be now under indictment for this offense is in these words:

Every officer of the United States and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official capacity under or by virtue of the authority of any Department or office of the Government thereof; and every officer or person acting for or on behalf of either House of Congress, or of any committee of either House, or of both Houses thereof, who asks, accepts, or receives any money, or any contract, promise, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, with intent to have his decision or action on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may at any time be pending or which may be by law brought before him in his official capacity or in his place of trust or profit influenced thereby, * * * shall be punished by a fine not more than three times the amount asked, accepted, or received, and by imprisonment not more than three years.

Every member, officer, or person convicted under the provisions of the two preceding sections who holds any place of profit or trust, shall forfeit his office or place and shall thereafter be forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. (Revised Statutes, sections 5500, 5501, and 5502.)

There are other sections of similar import. The following are sufficient to illustrate the argument:

Every officer or other person charged by any act of Congress with the safe-keeping of the public moneys, who fails to safely keep the same, without loaning, using, converting to his own use, depositing in banks, or exchanging for other funds than as specially allowed by law, shall be guilty of embezzlement of the money so loaned, used, converted, deposited, or exchanged, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than ten years, and fined in an amount equal to the amount so embezzled.

Every officer or agent of the United States who, having received public money which he is not authorized to retain as salary, pay, or emolument, fails to render his accounts for the same as provided by law shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement and shall be fined in a sum equal to the amount of the money embezzled and shall be imprisoned not less than six months and not more than ten years. (Revised Statutes, sections 5490 and 5491.)

In each of these sections it is the "officer" committing the offense on whom the penalty is to be visited, and the uniform judicial construction of such penal statutes is that the person indicted under them must have been such an officer when the offense was committed, without regard to his position in that respect when indicted. No one would be bold enough, I think, to plead to an indictment under either of these sections that he had resigned his office since committing the offense, and had thereby avoided the penalty. It is admitted in this argument that the construction here contended for is applicable to a penal statute. So I understand the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to admit, while claiming that no such construction can be applied to the section of the Constitution in question. I know of no rule of construction more strict than that applied to penal statutes, nor can I see any reason that in construing this section of the Constitution a rule different from that applied to the statute should be invoked. If the Senate has no jurisdiction to try Mr. Belknap upon the articles of impeachment because he has left office since the offense was committed I cannot see by what rule of construction the courts can try him upon an indictment under the statutes in question, and he must, therefore, if guilty, escape altogether by a device of his own. But it is argued, inasmuch as in the article of the Constitution under consideration the penalty is removal from office, that this, in aid of construction, shows that no man out of office can be impeached, because no man out of office can be removed from office. But this reasoning ignores altogether a more general provision of the Contitution which precedes the one under consideration, namely, the last clause of section 3, article 1, which is in these words:

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

The construction contended for renders it absolutely impossible to impose disqualification for holding office in future upon any one under any circumstances against his consent. There can be no greater mistake than that removal from office is the sole object of impeachment under the Constitution. Yet it is the vice of all the arguments against jurisdiction. The framers of the Constitution were, on the contrary, of the opinion that there might exist cases of malfeasance in office of so heinous a character that simple removal from office would not be an adequate penalty or a sufficient protection of the public. They therefore added to the power of removal from office a further power of disqualification to enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

I will not discuss at this moment the comparative severity of the two penalties. It is enough for the argument to say that the framers of the Constitution deemed this latter a penalty of importance enough to insert in that instrument. Therefore, in my judgment, any construction of the instrument itself which renders that penalty of no value cannot be the true one. The provision of the Constitution last cited is peculiar in form. "Shall not extend further than" are the words. If they had stood alone in the Constitution, I think the conclusion would have been inevitable that the judgment might be of any character whatever touching the tenure of office or disqualification to hold office; that is, might be removal, suspension for a term, disqualification to hold any office or any particular office, or for a limited time. Under a similar provision in the Massachusetts constitution, which has no such restricting clause as in article 2, section 4, a justice of the peace was on impeachment suspended from office one year. (Appendix to Prescott's Trial, page 216.) But taking this provision in connection with the first section cited, namely, that which requires certain officers to be removed on conviction, which is subsequent in point of fact in the Constitution, the Constitution has evidently provided that at least in respect to the officers named in section 4 of article 2 there shall be no stopping short of removal from office. There is, therefore, no alternative in the cases mentioned in this section; but the general section (limiting, as I have said, the punishment in all cases of impeachment with the qualification here stated) still remains in force, and the last clause of it authorizes disqualification to hold office as much as the penalty of removal. This, as I have already stated, can only be imposed upon the offender by his own consent, if he can avoid impeachment by resignation of office. I cannot see that it violates any rule of construction to hold that this particular penalty can be inflicted upon the offender though removal from office becomes inoperative.

But it is further argued that the two penalties are in this section coupled together by a copulative conjunction, and that, therefore, the one cannot be imposed without the other. But this mistakes the purpose of the section itself. It is not the form, but the measure of judgment. "Judgments in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold," &c. But, as before said, they may extend along that line to any point within its limits. Besides, if the two penalties are so coupled together by the copulative conjunction that disqualification to hold office cannot be imposed without also imposing removal from office, then removal from office cannot be imposed without disqualification to hold office; and yet the universal construction of the Constitution has been that the penalty of disqualification is a discretionary one, to be imposed with removal or not at the discretion of the Senate. It was imposed in the case of Humphrey, it was not imposed in the case of Pickering; the only two cases of conviction thus far had.

But it is also argued that the enumeration, in section 4 of article 2, of the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States as the persons who shall be removed from office on impeachment, &c., excludes all other persons, under the rule, expressio unius, exclusio alterius. But the application of this well-known rule brings no aid to the construction, for it begs the very question at issue. The words "civil officer" here enumerated mean a civil officer when the offense was committed or when the offender is tried. For all that there is in this rule it may mean the one or the other. And the rule itself contributes nothing toward a conclusion. But the rule is not a safe one to apply to this case, for the section also enumerates certain officers who shall be removed from office on impeachment, &c. Now the Constitution provides no other mode of removing officers. The application of this rule would exclude every other method, and no one could be removed from office by any other process than impeachment; a conclusion in the face of all construction and all history, and a conclusion which renders the very statute under which Mr. Belknap is indicted unconstitutional, for that proposes removal from office by a court after conviction on indictment.

If, therefore, I do not err, a just and fair construction of the words of the fourth section of the second article, the judicial construction of penal statutes enacted in similar language to meet the same case, and the necessity of giving force and effect to all the general provisions of the Constitution defining and limiting the judgment in impeachment cases, as well as the discretionary power exercised by this Senate in imposing one branch of the penalty without the other, heretofore exercised, all lead to the conclusion that the clause in question clothes the Senate with jurisdiction in this case. The offense was an impeachable one when committed. No subsequent act of the offender can change its character or its consequences. A resignation of office for the avowed purpose, as this record confesses, of escaping these consequences is most certainly such an act and as certainly must fail of its purpose. It is gravely argued here that men do by their own act escape the jurisdiction appointed to try them for offenses when they depart out of that jurisdiction, and this act of Belknap has been likened in argument here to an escape by him from the reach of the district court so that he cannot be tried in it. But when he comes into the district court and successfully pleads in bar that he has run away from its jurisdiction, it will be quite time to see whether there be any analogy or soundness in the argument thus adduced.

I have proceeded thus far in the argument upon the theory advanced by some that the power of impeachment in the Constitution is a new creation, the power found in the fourth section of the second article, and that all other provisions of the Constitution in reference to it are merely functionary or distributory of the parts in the proceeding. I cannot, however, bring myself to the conclusion that the framers of our Constitution, when making it, undertook the creation of a new power differing essentially from any other that had existed up to that time, so potent in its character and upon which evidently there was such great reliance for the protection of the liberties of the people and their institutions against unauthorized exercise of power and corruption in official life. If that had been the case, I cannot conceive the possibility of their placing that power, if a new one, in the Constitution without one single word of debate. All the debate that has come down to us touching impeachment arose after the power itself had been lodged in the Constitution, and had reference solely to limitation and details. There did exist, all admit. at the time the convention met, a well-known and well-defined power of impeachment at common law which would reach all official misconduct in or out of office. It has been described here by more than one Senator, and its early history portrayed in very dark colors. The enormities that in past ages had been committed in its name, the horrors and cruelties that had darkened the early pages of its history have all been told by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] How it originated and its subsequent history have been carefully and accurately delineated by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr HOWE.] The Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] tells us what no one could deny, that it existed in all the colonies under their charters. It did so exist, Mr. President, not because of any express grant by the king in the charter, but in the belief of the public men of that time that it came as an inherent power with the right of the colonists to govern themselves. At the time of the Revolution and when the Constitution itself was framed it not only existed, it not only had a place among the recognized powers under their charters, but was believed by them to be a power most efficient and promotive of the public good. I fail to find any sentiment prevalent among the colonists that the power of impeachment at common law, as they believed they had secured it under their charters, was a dangerous power. I know that in its early history crimes have been committed in its name. I know, too, that crimes have been committed in the name of trial by jury. There is no blacker page in the history of impeachment than that which records the enormities committed in the court of king's bench by Scroggs and Jeffreys through the instrumentality of trial by jury. Crimes have been committed in the very name of liberty herself. The writs of habeas corpus and de homine replegiando came over with impeachment as instruments in the hands of a free people for the assertion of their rights, for the maintenance of their liberties, and for their protection against the encroachments of power and the corruptions of officials. Hallam tells us how it was held in England at that day. Speaking of the impeachment of the Earl of Essex in the time of James I, he says:

> This impeachment was of the highest moment to the Commons, as it restored forever that salutary constitutional right which the single precedent of Lord Bacon might have been insufficient to establish as against the ministers of the Crown. (Hallam's Constitutional History, volume 1, page 401.)

And again—

> The Commons had been engaged for more than twenty years in a struggle to fortify their own and their fellow-subjects' liberties. They had obtained in this period but one legislative measure of importance, the late declaratory act against monopolies; but they had rescued from disuse their ancient right of impeachment, and of these advantages some were evidently incomplete, and it would require the most vigorous exertions of future Parliaments to realize them. But such exertions the increased energy of the nation gave abundant cause to anticipate. A deep and lasting love of freedom had taken hold of every class, except perhaps the clergy.

No better evidence of the real character of impeachment as known at the common law as well as the estimate in which it was held by the colonists at the time the Constitution was framed can be given than is found in Mr. John Adams's history of its assertion in the colony of Massachusetts against the power of the Crown itself only two years before the Declaration of Independence. The judges in that colony were the instruments selected by the Crown to carry out its system of oppression and injustice. They were made independent of the colony by a provision for the payment of their salaries out of the British exchequer. It was in this unequal struggle between the people and these judges that the power of impeachment was invoked. I cannot do better in this attempt to show both where the power was deemed to be lodged and the reasons for holding that same power to be one of the greatest efficacy and security to a free people which must have obtained with the framers of the Constitution when they made that instrument than by quoting somewhat at length from a letter from Mr. Adams, written in 1817, many years after the events described, and addressed to a learned jurist of Massachusetts, giving an account of this remarkable impeachment. Writing to Mr. William Tudor, January 10, 1817, Mr. John Adams says:

> The public had been long alarmed with rumors and predictions that the king, that is the ministry, would take into their own hands the payment of the salaries of the judges of the supreme court. The people would not believe it; the most thinking men dreaded it. They said: "With an executive authority in a governor possessed of an absolute negative on all the acts of the legislature, and with judges dependent only on the Crown for salaries as well as their commissions, what protection have we? We may as well abolish all limitations, and resign our lives and liberties at once to the will of a prime minister at St. James." * * * The dispatches at length arrived, and expectation was raised to its highest pitch of exultation and triumph on one side, and of grief, terror, degradation, and despondency on the other. The legislature assembled, and the governor communicated to the two houses his majesty's commands.
> It happened that I was invited to dine that day with Samuel Winthrop, an excellent character and a predecessor in the respectable office you now hold in the supreme court. Arrived at his house in New Boston, I found it full of counselors and representatives and clergy. * * * All expressed their detestation and horror of the insidious ministerial plot, but all agreed that it was irremediable. There was no means or mode of opposing or resisting it.
>
> Indignation and despair, too, boiled in my breast as ardently as in any of them, though as the company were so much superior to me in age and station I had not said anything; but Dr. Winthrop, the professor then of the council, observing my silence and perhaps my countenance, said, "Mr. Adams, what is your opinion? Can you think of any way of escaping this snare?" My answer was, "No, sir; I am as much at a loss as any of the company. I agree with all the gentlemen, that petitions and remonstrances to King or Parliament will be ineffectual. Nothing but force will succeed, but I would try one project before I had recourse to the last reason and fitness of things." The company cried out almost or quite together, "What project is that? What would you do?" Answer, "I would impeach the judges." "Impeach the judges! How? Where? Who can impeach them? Answer, "The house of representatives." "The house of representatives! Before whom? Before the House of Lords in England?" Answer, "No, surely, you might as well impeach them before Lord North alone." "Where, then?" Answer, "Before the governor and council." "Is there any precedent for that?" Answer, "If there is not, it is now high time that a precedent should be set." "The governor and council will not receive the impeachment." Answer, "I know that very well, but the record of it will stand upon the journals, be published in pamphlets and newspapers, and perhaps make the judges repent of their salaries and decline them; perhaps make it too troublesome to hold them." "What right had we to impeach anybody?" Answer, "Our house of representatives have the same right to impeach as the House of Commons has in England, and our governor and council have the same right and duty to receive and bear impeachment as the king and House of Lords have in Parliament. If the governor and council would not do their duty, that would not be the fault of the people; their representatives ought nevertheless to do theirs." Some of the company said that the idea was so new to them that they wished I would show them some reasons for my opinion that we had the right. I repeated to them the clause of the charter which I relied on, the constant practice in England, and the necessity of such a power and practice in every free government.
> The company dispersed and I went home. Dr. Cooper and others were excellent hands to spread a rumor, and before nine o'clock half of the town and most of the members of the general court had in their heads the idea of an impeachment. The next morning early Major Hawley, of Northampton, came to my house under great concern and said he heard that I yesterday, in a public company, suggested a thought of impeaching the judges; that report had got about and had excited some uneasiness, and he desired to know my meaning. I invited him to my house, opened the charter, and requested him to read the paragraphs that I had marked. I then produced to him that volume of Selden's works which contains his treatise on judicature and Parliament. Other authorities in law were produced to him, and the state trials and a profusion of impeachments with which that work abounds. Major Hawley, who was one of the best men in the province, and one of the ablest lawyers and best speakers in the legislature, was struck with surprise. He said: "I know not what to think. This is, in a manner, all new to me. I must think of it." * * *
> Major Hawley, always conscientious, always deliberate, always cautious, had not slept soundly. What were his dreams about impeachment, I know not. But this I know, he drove away to Cambridge to consult Judge Trowbridge and appealed to his conscience. The charter was called for; Selden and the state trials were quoted. Trowbridge said to him what I had said before, that the power of impeachment was essential to a free government; that the charter had given it to our house of representatives as clearly as the constitution in the common law or immemorial usage had given it to the House of Commons in England. This was all he could say, although he lamented the occasion of it.
> Major Hawley returned full in the faith; an impeachment was voted; a committee was appointed to prepare articles. * * *
>
> The articles were reported to the house, discussed, accepted, the impeachment voted and sent up in form to the governor and council, rejected, of course, as everybody knew beforehand that it would be; but it remained on the journals of the house, was printed in the newspapers, and went abroad into the world. And what were the consequences? Chief Justice Oliver and his superior court, your supreme judicial court, commenced their regular circuit. The chief justice opened his court as usual. Grand jurors and petit jurors refused to take their oaths. They never could, as I believe, prevail on one juror to take the oath. I attended at the bar in two counties, and I heard grand jurors and petit jurors say to Chief Justice Oliver to his face, "The chief justice of this court stands impeached by the representatives of the people of high crimes and misdemeanors and of a conspiracy against the charter privileges of the people; I cannot serve as a juror or take the oath." The cool, calm, sedate intrepidity with which these honest freeholders went through this fiery trial filled my eyes and my heart.
> In one word, the royal government was from that moment laid prostrate in the dust, and has never since revived in substance, though a dark shadow of the hobgoblin haunts me at times to this day.—John Adams, volume 10, page 236.

I have read these long extracts from Mr. Adams for the purpose of showing the spirit of those times and the difference between the colonists and Senators here in the estimate put by them respectively upon the power of impeachment up to the very hour of the Revolution. I have cited it for another purpose. Mr. Adams, who wrote this glowing account of impeachment at common law, embodied in the constitution of Massachusetts, which was the production of his pen, in 1780 the very peculiar phraseology put seven years later in the Constitution of the United States limiting the judgment in all cases of impeachment. "Judgment in all cases of impeachment shall extend no farther than removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit," is a peculiar phrase. It is first found in the constitution of New York, adopted in 1777, in that of Massachusetts drawn by Mr. Adams in 1780, in that of New Hampshire, which was nearly a copy of that of Massachusetts in 1784, and then in the Constitution of the United States framed in 1787. There is no doubt that in these instruments it had a common origin, but whether it originated with Mr. Adams or with the framers of the New York constitution is uncertain. But Massachusetts from 1774, when the impeachment of the judges took place upon his instance, until 1780, was endeavoring to frame and adopt a constitution. Mr. Adams was appointed upon a committee to draft one in 1779. He tells us in another letter in respect to one of the most important provisions of the Massachusetts constitution that it was largely the result of conferences he had with others on his journeys from Massachusetts to Philadelphia in 1774, 1775, 1776, and 1777. I think it is fair to assume that this peculiar phraseology by which judgment in all cases of impeachment was thus limited was the result of conferences between the leading minds of Massachusetts and New York, and perhaps New Hampshire, in whose constitutions it was placed before it was adopted by the framers of the Constitution of the United States. These men, as I have shown, were men most ardently impressed with the efficacy and importance of the power of impeachment at common law, which they believed came over with their charters and which they had proved was powerful enough to wrest their liberties from the hands of their oppressors.

In the trial of Prescott under the Massachusetts constitution in 1821 both Mr. Webster and the late Chief Justice Shaw, though on opposite sides in the trial, traced impeachment under that constitution to the common law. (Prescott's Trial, pages 160, 180.)

Now, with these views prevalent among leading minds, the convention, without debate, so far as I am able to ascertain, first declared that—

> The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. * * * The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

They then proceeded to put limitations upon that power:

> No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. * * * When the President is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. Judgment in all cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification, &c. * * * But the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. * * * The President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for all offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

Nearly all the debate in the convention upon the subject of impeachment which has come down to us arose over another section, namely, the fourth section of the second article, which is in these words:

> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Now, up to this point the power of impeachment in the Constitution seems complete, and yet there is no definition of that power, no rules of procedure prescribed, but the whole is left, like the definition and application of the term trial by jury in the Constitution, to be derived from other sources. Of course the framers of the Constitution used words understandingly. What did they mean when they said "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment?" I cannot resist the conclusion that they meant by the term "impeachment" the known and defined power existing before the creation of the Constitution, so clear in character and in definition that it was not deemed necessary by them to use words other than the term itself to make it perfectly understood. Mr. Rawle says:

> Impeachments are thus introduced as a well-known defined term, and we must have recourse to the common law of England for a definition of them.—Rawle on the Constitution, page 198.

I have said that whatever debate arose upon the subject of impeachment arose upon the subsequent article in reference to the impeachment of the President, Vice-President, and civil officers of the United States so frequently cited. And it is worthy of remark that this debate was in reference to the office of President alone, the other words, "Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States," having been inserted afterward by the committee on style, and without debate. Now, the very debate over the office of President convinces me that the framers of the Constitution had in their minds all along the common-law power of impeachment. Otherwise this very debate would not have arisen, for a new creation applicable to all national officers, as was the phraseology in Mr. Randolph's original draught, would have given rise to no debate about the President any more than any other national officer. But by the common law the king could not be impeached, for there was no power above the king before whom he could be arraigned. In theory he was himself the source of power, and if the common-law impeachment was placed in the Constitution the query would most naturally arise, whether it would apply to the Chief Magistrate of this country or he would be excluded as in England, from which the power itself was derived. It seems natural to believe that lest some such question as that might hereafter arise it was well to remove all doubt and expressly provide for the liability of the Chief Executive to this salutary restraint over his official action as well as all other officers. Hence arose debate over attempting to provide for the impeachment of the President of the United States, and the very debate, meager as it is, tends wholly in my mind to strengthen the conviction that men out of office as well as in office can be impeached for such official misconduct as amounts to any one of the crimes specified in the Constitution. While this debate was going on Mr. Pinckney observed that "he ought not to be impeached while in office."

Mr. ALLISON. Does not the Senator know that Mr. Pinckney was opposed to the impeachment of the President altogether?

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly I do, but the convention was against him and declared that the President should be impeached. Then Mr. Pinckney struggled to provide that he should not be impeached while in office, which shows clearly that in his opinion the provision debated was broad enough to impeach him while out of office. The reply of Mr. Davié to Mr. Pinckney is most clear. Mr. Davié said:

> If he be not impeachable while in office, he will spare no effort or pains whatever to get himself re-elected.

Now upon the construction that the Senator from Iowa claims that he could only be impeached while in office, what meaning is there to this remark of Mr. Davié. One would suppose that the best thing the President could do would be to get out of office instead of sparing no effort or pains whatever to get himself re-elected, because, by the theory of the Senator from Iowa and others who agree with him, getting himself re-elected would be getting himself into the very jaws of impeachment, while getting himself out of office as soon as possible was getting himself beyond its reach. Mr. Wilson stated that he "agreed in the necessity of making the Executive impeachable while in office," and Colonel Mason said "that while great crimes are committed I am in favor of punishing the principals as well as the coadjutors."

I do not find anything in the debates running counter to the idea most manifestly conveyed by this meager account that all understood the phraseology adopted as applicable to the official after he has left office as well as before. Mr. Hamilton, in the forty-sixth number of the Federalist, commending this power to the favorable consideration of the public, conveys to my mind most clearly the same idea. I will not stop to quote, because it is the tenor of the whole article, and no particular part of it, which bears this construction. When the Constitution went before the States in State conventions some of the ablest of its framers, in their respective State conventions presented the same view of the subject: (Mr. Madison in the Virginia convention, (Elliot's Debates, volume 2, page 379;) Mr. Wilson in the Pennsylvania convention, (Elliot's Debates, volume 3, page 270;) Mr. Pinckney in the South Carolina convention, (Elliot's Debates, volume 4, page 265.)

The single remark of Governor Johnston in the constitutional convention of North Carolina, (Elliot's Debates, volume 3, page 145,) cited to the contrary, does not support the position for which it is used.

The single line quoted, "How could a man be removed from office who had no office?" was uttered alio intuitu, and is found in an argument addressed to the convention of North Carolina, to convince them that impeachment under the Federal Constitution would not include State officers, but was confined exclusively to officers under the Federal Government. I do not find a word in the whole argument having the slightest reference to the question now under consideration.

These men took part in framing the provision itself, and were equally active in making it understood by the people of their respective States when urging its adoption. This is all we have of the views of the framers of the Constitution itself beyond the language of that instrument.

My colleague, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] following the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] has said that of one thing the people of the United States have rested in the firm conviction for a century, that no private citizen of this country is liable to impeachment before this tribunal. And the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] came back at last in his beautiful language to repose upon the same idea. Nothing can exceed the beauty of his description of the safety he found in this "inertia of acquiescence." He will permit me to say in passing that, as much as I admire his sleeping beauty, I am compelled in the light of history to differ with him in opinion as to her safety, and to modestly express the doubt that as she sleeps her very danger lies in her "inertia." But if these Senators mean to say merely that for the last century the people of this country have reposed in the belief that no one who has never held office can be arraigned at this bar upon articles of impeachment, there will be no dispute with them. But on the other hand—and it is best to keep as near the case at bar as we can—if they mean to say that the people have ever believed, before this case arose, that any official, high or low, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office could escape all the constitutional consequences of his misconduct by announcing to the House of Representatives, who have the "sole power of impeachment," while that august tribunal is in the very process of presenting articles against him, that "one hour and forty minutes ago I resigned that office and thereby escaped all responsibility to the Constitution and to you to answer before this tribunal for my official misconduct"—if this is what is meant by Senators in their appeal to the century, I venture to say that the whole history of the Government does not afford a single authority for the assertion. On the contrary, there is much in that history and in the opinions of public men which requires an explanation at their hands. I have already cited the framers of the Constitution, both in the Federal and State conventions. The opinion of Mr. Rawle has already been cited. It is brief, it is true, but no words would make it more plain. It was his opinion, in a work of reputation in the profession, that men could be impeached as well out of office as in office. These were his words:

> From the reasons already given, it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office. All executive and judicial officers, from the President downward, from the judges of the Supreme Court to those of the most inferior tribunals, are included in this description. (Rawle on the Constitution, page 203.)

The House of Representatives in 1846 was certainly of opinion that they could impeach a man for high crimes and misdemeanors in office after he had left it, for they undertook deliberately such an impeachment of Daniel Webster several years after he left the office of Secretary of State for what were charged to be such offenses while in that office. The precedent has already been referred to, but its full force and importance have not yet been given. Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, although a man of violent political prejudices, yet of ability as a lawyer, charged Mr. Webster in the House of Representatives with official corruption while in the office of Secretary of State, from which he had retired several years before. The charges were direct and specific with the asserted purpose of initiating proceedings in impeachment against that distinguished statesman. It was so understood by the House; and Mr. Bayley, of Virginia, who believed as Senators do here that impeachment would not lie against an official after he had left office, so understood Mr. Ingersoll and the purpose of his charge, and called his attention to the fact that Mr. Webster was out of office, and as he believed could not be impeached. Mr. Ingersoll's response was "What if he is?" To this objection of Mr. Bayley Mr. Adams made the reply which has already been cited in part, and which I shall take the liberty hereafter to quote in full. At the conclusion of Mr. Ingersoll's speech, on his motion the House called on the President for certain papers and information in the State Department which, as he alleged, would sustain the charges that he had made against Mr. Webster. The President replied in a lengthy message, which stated that the information called for touched the administration of the secret service of the State Department, which had always been held as confidential, and which he declined to disclose, unless the House of Representatives desired their use for the purpose of impeachment. He intimated that if that were the design of the House the papers would be disclosed to a committee appointed for that purpose. The President used this language upon the subject of impeachment, having no other application at the time than to an official after he had left office:

If the House of Representatives, as the grand inquest of the nation, should at at any time have reason to believe that there had been malversation in office by an improper use or application of the public money by a public officer, and should think proper to institute an inquiry into the matter, all the archives or papers of the executive department, public or private, would be subject to the inspection and control of a committee of their body, and every facility in the power of the Executive be afforded to enable them to prosecute the investigation.

Subsequently Mr. Webster, in the Senate, repelled the charges of Mr. Ingersoll with great bitterness, and Mr. Ingersoll renewed his accusations in the House with specific charges of dates, and sums, and individuals, and the manner in which the secret-service fund of the State Department had been, as he alleged, corruptly used by Mr. Webster. He concluded his speech with a remark which shows that it was made with the understanding that it should initiate proceedings looking to impeachment. He remarked:

A resolution or committee which I cannot institute will soon test the truth of my statements.

Whereupon a resolution was first offered by the friends of Mr. Webster calling for a committee to inquire by what means Mr. Ingersoll had become possessed of the secrets of the secret-service fund. Pending that resolution Mr. Pettit, of Indiana, subsequently a member of this body, and an able lawyer, moved as an amendment a resolution evidently alluded to by Mr. Ingersoll, which was in these words:

And that another select committee of five be appointed to inquire into the truth of the charges this day made by Mr. C. J. Ingersoll against Mr. Daniel Webster with a view of founding an impeachment against said Daniel Webster, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, books and vouchers.

Mr. Schenck, the mover of the first resolution said

If the gentleman will offer that as a separate proposition I will vote for it.

The resolution was adopted with the previous one, and a special committee appointed under its authority "with the view of founding an impeachment against said Daniel Webster," which proceeded to its work. That committee made two reports, and in neither of them did they encounter the difficulties suggested by this plea, that the accused had escaped beyond their reach when he left the office in which he was charged with corruption. The only difficulty they seemed to have encountered was that the facts did not sustain the charges. Why should these Senators rely upon the "inertia of acquiescence" for a century, when we find that not only Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, Mr. J. Q. Adams, and Mr. Schenck, but the whole House of Representatives of that day, with the exception, so far as the record shows, of Mr. Bayley, of Virginia, entertained without question the belief that, if an officer was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, no act of his own in form of resignation could relieve him from the constitutional consequences of his offenses? These proceedings may be found in the Congressional Globe, first session Twenty-ninth Congress. The remarks of Mr. Adams upon that question were in part cited by one of the managers, [Mr. HOAR.] I am moved to quote them in full from the remark of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who was a member of the House at the time and who expressed to the Senate a day or two since the impression they made upon him, that they were simply an exultation of conscious rectitude upon the part of Mr. Adams and a boast that so far as any official act of his own was concerned he was ready now and to the remotest period of his life to answer to any impeachment therefor. These remarks were all that the Senator from Maine has stated they were; but they were much more, and when fully quoted the Senate will see that they were the deliberate expressions of that learned statesman, made not merely in the consciousness that he was without fear of their personal application, but an exposition of the Constitution itself. It will not be without profit or bearing upon this question to read them at length. They are follows:

And here I take occasion to say that I differ with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLEY] and I believe other gentlemen who stated that the day of impeachment has passed by the Constitution the moment the public office expires. I hold no such doctrine. I hold myself, so long as I have breath of life in my body, amenable to impeachment by this House for everything I did during the time I held any public office.

Mr. BAYLEY. Is not the judgment in case of impeachment removal from office?

Mr. ADAMS. And disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States forever afterward; a punishment much greater, in my opinion, than removal from office. It clings to a man so long as he lives, and if any public officer ever put himself in a position to be tried by impeachment he would have very little of my good opinion if he did not think disqualification from holding office for life a more severe punishment than mere removal from office. I hold, therefore, that every President of the United States, every Secretary of State, every officer of the United States impeachable by the laws of the country is as liable twenty years after his office has expired as he is while he continues in office. And if such is not the case, if an officer could thus ward off the pains of impeachment, what would be the value of impeachment or when do you suppose that discoveries would be made that would render impeachment effectual? I speak with reference to the provisions of the Constitution and to the great objects contemplated by these provisions; and I now say that, if one-tenth of the charges against the person here attacked are true, impeachment, in my humble judgment, is the course that ought to be pursued by this House, and that in the process of impeachment the usual requisites of justice to every man charged with heinous crimes and misdemeanors should be complied with; that the accused should have notice of the impeachment; that he should have notice of the evidence to be made against him; that he may have the means of defense before the bar of this House; and that he may not be reached by side blows by applications for what may be dragged up out of the Department of State when he was in the office to injure him in the public mind probably for services of the first importance to the country.

There can be not doubt, I think, for whatever it was worth, the opinion of Mr. Adams was here given clearly, explicitly, and deliberately that the Senate has jurisdiction in cases like the one at bar. To break the force of this opinion, one of the counsel for the defense [Mr. Black] has remarked that Mr. Adams was always quarreling and was never happy when he was not in a fight, and that nothing would have delighted him so much as to be brought over into this presence from the House on articles of impeachment, which would give him an opportunity to strike right and left among his enemies. In the opinion of the counsel that was all this opinion of Mr. Adams was worth. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has called our attention to the fact that Mr. Adams was seventy-nine years of age when he uttered this opinion, and intimated that it was that of a man, however great otherwise, much enfeebled by age. It is true that Mr. Adams was antagonistic in his nature, that he struck right and left among his enemies, but it is his good fortune that the judgment of history will be that he thus struck for the right. It is true, too, that he was seventy-nine years of age at this time; but he served his district many years thereafter in Congress with an ability unimpaired and with a vigor of mind which seemed to increase with his years, and there never was an hour that his eye was dim or his mental power enfeebled until his last utterance, as he laid down his life in harness, "This is the last of earth."

I have one other authority. Mr. Charles Francis Adams, in editing the works of John Adams which were published in 1852, had occasion to speak in that work himself of the little restraint upon the President under the Constitution against the exercise of corrupt and despotic power. And in the discussion of that question he assumed all along, as admitted, that the President could be impeached as well after as while in office. These are his words:

Assuming the main check which existed for forty years, the chance of re-election, to be definitely laid aside, it is not easy to put a finger upon any clause of the Constitution which can prevent an evil-disposed President for four years from using the powers vested in him in what way he pleases without regard to the people's wishes at all. Indeed it is possible to go a step further and to venture a doubt whether an adequate restraint can be found against the corrupt as well as despotic use of his patronage as well as the perversion of his policy. The only tangible remedy, that by impeachment, is obviously insufficient from the absence of all motive to wield a ponderous system of investigation after the offender has lost his power and when he is no longer of any consequence to the state. Of the sluggish nature of this process experience in cases of inferior magnitude is of frequent enough proof. The evidence necessary to convict an offender would not be likely to accumulate until a large part of his four years of service had expired and the remainder would probably elapse before it could be obtained. Then would come the election of a successor with a system in no wise responsible for that which preceded it and around which new interests would immediately concentrate. What probability is there of the ultimate infliction upon the guilty man, now become a private individual removed from observation, of any penalty adequate to his crime? But if this reasoning as to the absence of responsibility be only partially true it becomes perfectly plain that at least in the case of the President confining himself to the use of his legitimate powers in office, however unpalatable they may be, there can be of little of sovereignty exercised by the people during his term or of punishment inflicted afterward.—Works of John Adams, volume 6, page 408.

Thus clearly does the younger Adams stand with his father and grandfather, three most illustrious names, in maintaining this broad power of impeachment under the Constitution.

I have thus shown some authority from the framers of the Constitution, in the national convention and in the State conventions and from learned writers and able statesmen since, and I have shown at least one direct precedent strongly sustaining the theory that the framers of the Constitution did not either by design or, as the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] thinks, by mistake of arrangement so thwart the efficiency of their own work as to paralyze this great and efficient power of impeachment.

There is one more precedent bearing more or less upon this subject which has been frequently alluded to and which for a moment I desire to notice. It is the impeachment of Barnard in the State of New York. It was under the constitution of 1846, which I do not understand differs materially in this respect from the Constitution of the United States. He was impeached while in office, but for offenses committed under another term of the same office. He had been judge of the supreme court eight years and had been re-elected, and while holding the office the second time was impeached for offenses committed during his first term. So far as the office was concerned in which the offenses were committed he had left it, but he was nevertheless a civil officer under the constitution of New York, although not holding identically the same office as that for the corruption in which he was impeached. This very much weakens the case as a precedent for either side, but I allude to it now merely to refer to the reason given by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] why it cannot be cited as a precedent for the impeachment of a man for official crime in office after he has left that office. It is said by that Senator that the reason the articles of impeachment were maintained in that case is because no period of time intervened between the expiration of the office in which the offenses were committed and the commencement of the office held by Barnard when proceedings were instituted. I infer from his remarks that had there been any considerable space of time intervening between those two offices the case would, in his opinion, have been otherwise. I cannot understand the force of this reasoning. The two offices were as distinct and separate and held by two as distinct commissions as if the one had been held by A and the other by B, and as if a period had elapsed between the two. Suppose Barnard had stepped from the office of judge of the superior court into that of judge of the supreme court, there would have been no intervening space; they had been both judicial offices, and yet they would have been as distinct and different in character and function as they were in name, and by no process of reasoning can I bring myself to the conclusion that, because the two distinct and separate offices filled under two distinct elections came close together in point of time, in any sense they were merged into one.

If in view of these authorities and of at least one clear precedent thus cited the people of this Republic have reposed in security under this provision of the Constitution for a century, as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and my colleague [Mr. BOUTWELL] remarked, certainly no great danger to the liberties of the people lurks under this power of impeachment so construed and so understood. A century, if we are not in danger of overworking this word, has certainly done this much to quiet the fears of those who have dreaded so much the danger of following men into private life with the terrors and cruelties of this proceeding. The guards of the Constitution have thus proved a sufficient security against abuse.

I must not pass over the allusion of my colleague and others to the opinion of Mr. Justice Story so frequently invoked in the argument in this deliberation. My colleague says that the profession has for thirty-five years rested in the belief that Judge Story at least had declared in a well-considered commentary upon the Constitution his settled conviction that no official could be impeached after he had left office for high crimes and misdemeanors while in office. I will not venture to put my opinion of what has been understood by the profession against the larger experience and greater learning of my distinguished colleague; but he will permit me to say that while no one more than myself delights in the charm, the beauty, and the philosophy of Judge Story's works, I think that I do not differ with the profession in saying that after all no man has succeeded in gathering together the opinions of others without expressing his own so successfully as Judge Story. I cannot understand how the profession could ever come to the conclusion that, contrary to the current of all his other legal writings, Mr. Justice Story had expressed his own clear conviction upon this clause of the Constitution that the Senate had no jurisdiction to try any impeachment of an officer after he had left office, especially when Judge Story himself says that he never intended to express such an opinion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not quite that, I think.

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly that; exactly that. These are his words:

> It is not intended to express any opinion as to which is the true exposition of the Constitution on the points above cited. They are brought before the learned reader as matters still sub judice, the final decision of which may be reasonably left to the high tribunal constituting the court of impeachment when the occasion shall arise.

It is objected to the doctrine, Mr. President, that the common-law power of impeachment has been ingrafted into the Constitution, that it exposes officials, if not private persons, to every impeachment for any manner of delinquency or unfitness in office that the discretion of the House of Representatives may determine upon instituting and the Senate upon entertaining. Certainly there is nothing in the case at bar to render it necessary for us to determine how far the common-law power of impeachment might warrant a prosecution against an official or private citizen. If the limitations of the Constitution, in the fourth section of the second article, to treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors is not a limit to the whole power of impeachment, but, as is claimed by some, is a mandatory clause for the removal from office of the officials therein named when thus convicted, certainly the case at bar comes within the express provision of that section; and it may be wiser and safer for us to wait until the occasion arises before attempting a construction that has no application to pending proceedings. But one can foresee occasions for the exercise of some power which, if it be not this, does not seem to exist anywhere in the Constitution for the necessary removal of officials, broader than the terms used in this section. One cannot read the proceedings in the impeachment of Pickering without being convinced that it was a removal from the office of judge for no other offense than imbecility and incompetency. Occasions of like character may arise hereafter when it will be absolutely necessary for the public safety to find some method for the removal of high officials not provided for in the Constitution if the cramped and narrow construction contended for shall prevail, but ample enough under the broad and healthy common-law power of impeachment. Suppose the Chief Justice of the United States becomes insane, or, by a softening of the brain or some other mysterious mental disease, he or some one of his associates becomes a mere harmless child, the public service would not permit their continuance in office; they could not be charged with treason, bribery, or any other high crime or misdemeanor. I know of no way of forcing them to give way to a public functionary who could discharge the duties devolving upon their office except by the method here suggested. I had, however, rather wait in the hope that no such unfortunate exigency will ever arise than to trouble myself to decide whether the common-law power of impeachment has been limited altogether by this section, or whether it will admit of a broader and more healthy application whenever the exigency may arise.

I cannot share in the alarm of Senators at the increase in power of the House of Representatives.

My colleague will permit me again to allude in all kindness to his remarks. He says that while the power of the House of Representatives has constantly increased in this great Government, that of the executive branch has in a corresponding degree decreased. I have not so understood it. From the necessity of the case—as the Government has enlarged its borders—States have multiplied, revenues have increased, and the institutions become diversified. Federal officers have also increased and multiplied many fold. While in the beginning they were stationed in the thirteen States along the Atlantic coast, they are now far on the borders, many thousand miles from the appointing power and any supervising personal control. Public moneys in passing through their hands have increased many hundredfold in amount. Sudden emergencies arise where nothing but their absolute integrity is security against temptation and corruption and fraud. In the very nature and growth of the Government the executive department has spread its power over the continent and multiplied its agencies and its consequent responsibility and liability and importance as the leaves of autumn. Compared with all this the power of the House of Representatives has hardly kept pace. If it had grown, it is in my opinion the grandest of all the powers in the Government. The people speak through it. By it are exercised the grants of all the great powers of the Government. It makes war; it raises armies; it builds navies; it imposes taxes; it collects the revenue; and, above and beyond all, it is the grand inquest of the nation. Commissioned anew once in two years in its great work, it is nearer the people than any other branch, and therefore speaks more clearly and more potentially their voice. No abuse of its power, in my opinion, can compare with that to which the executive department is daily exposed. Danger does not lie in the encroachment of the House of Representatives upon the executive branch.

Before concluding, Mr. President, I should do injustice to the efforts of the distinguished Senators from Indiana and Kansas [Mr. MORTON and Mr. INGALLS] if I did not allude to certain remarks which fell from both of them in the course of the arguments they addressed to the Senate in support of the plea of Mr. Belknap.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] called our attention, with a significance that could not be misunderstood, to the fact that the discussion in this body upon the question of jurisdiction commenced with three carefully prepared opinions in favor of jurisdiction, delivered first in order by three Senators all belonging to one of the political divisions of the Senate. He added the prediction that, however honestly we might struggle against it, we should ultimately divide on this judicial question much as we do on merely political ones. The Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] a little more explicit in his language, directly asserted that upon a doubtful question of constitutional law the democratic party in the Senate had arrayed itself on one side, aided by a few allies on the republican side. I desire to assure both these Senators that I have given to these admonitions of where my place should be on this question all the consideration which they deserved, but that they have failed to convince me of a duty to go counter to the clear convictions of my judgment in the construction of the Constitution of my country.

Senators in argument, failing to do away by construction with that clear, plain provision of the Constitution which authorizes this body to impose on conviction of official crime future disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, have thought it a proper consideration to urge that the provision itself is of little or no consequence. They have called attention to the fact that the accused in the case at bar, if guilty, has gone forever into private life, and by no possibility could hope for any public trust again. And they have said, "Of what use, then, to impose upon him, even if convicted, future disqualification?" I have already said, what I repeat, that it is not for us to weigh in the scales the comparative importance of the two penalties, removal from office and future disqualification, and decide which preponderates. It is enough for us that the framers of the Constitution thought both necessary, and attached as much importance to the one as to the other. But I cannot concur with Senators that the judgment of future disqualification can possibly be a slight one. Men may not desire to hold office. It may be impossible for them ever to enter upon any public trust, but the brand upon the forehead that they are forever disqualified, beyond the power of pardon or any possible relief, to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States is in my opinion the severest possible penalty. The theory of the Government under which we live is that all men are not only free and equal, equal not only in the enjoyment of all political rights, but also of political privileges, equal in all the opportunities and in seeking the emoluments and honors of office of trust and of confidence. The citizen upon whose forehead rests the ban that he can never enjoy part or lot in this glorious inheritance has upon him, like the curse of Cain, a judgment of condemnation greater than any other it is possible for me to comprehend. Mr. Hale's thrilling story of a man without a country is but the story of him who goes in and out among his fellow-men in all time to come with the judgment of this Senate, from which nothing but death can relieve him, following him to the remotest borders of the land, "Thou art forever disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under that Government whose flag protects all and whose avenues to honor and confidence are open to all against whom for official crime this Senate has not forever closed the door." Like the leper he stands alone, shunned by all clean men. The existence of this power in the Constitution, silent though it has been for a century, is as necessary as it is safe. No construction that I have been able or willing to give to that instrument will strike down this most efficient weapon of protection against the corruption or the despotic exercise of authority by the many officials who swarm the land. I may err in this construction. I had rather die in the error than be convinced with some Senators here that the framers of the Constitution by mistake paralyzed their own work, or with other Senators that by design they failed to provide the most efficient and the broadest restraint upon those placed in positions of honor and trust by a confiding people.

Opinion of Mr. Kernan,

Delivered May 29, 1876.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, at this late stage of the discussion I intend to occupy the attention of the Senate but a short time. I would be content to give my vote without saying anything, except that the question to be now decided does not, in my opinion, require us to pass upon several other interesting questions which have been discussed. It is wise that every court should confine its decision to the point in judgment in the case before it. It is especially proper that a court constituted as this is should do so. The only question presented for decision is whether the respondent, William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, is subject to impeachment by the House of Representatives and trial thereon by the Senate, after his resignation, for alleged misconduct while in office. I shall confine myself to stating briefly my reasons for the conclusion I have come to on this question.

The provisions of the Constitution as to impeachments are as follows, and are found in that instrument in the order in which they are quoted, namely:

> The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Article 1, section 2, subdivision 5.)
>
> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. (Same article, section 3, subdivision 6.)
>
> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law. (Same article, section 3, subdivision 7.)
>
> The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Article 2, section 2, subdivision 1.)
>
> The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." (Article 2, section 4.)
>
> The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. (Article 3, section 2, subdivision 3.)

The decision of the question presented depends upon the meaning of these provisions of the Constitution. They are to be construed together, and force and effect should be given to all and each part of them if this can be done.

It is conceded that the Constitution confers power to impeach and try a person who is a civil officer of the United States and who has been guilty of bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors in reference to his official duties. The respondent was a civil officer of the United States. The offenses alleged in the articles of impeachment are bribery and other high crimes and misdemeanors committed by him while in office and in connection with the discharge of his duties as such officer. He held one of the offices mentioned in section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution, and the crimes charged are of those enumerated in that section. According to the strictest construction of the Constitution which has been contended for by the counsel for the respondent or any Senator, it is conceded that the House of Representatives had power to impeach the respondent for these alleged offenses and the Senate power to try and convict him thereof, so long as he continued to be Secretary of War. It is indisputable that on the morning of the 2d of March, 1876, he was liable to impeachment for the alleged official misconduct. It is contended that by his resignation between ten and eleven o'clock a. m. of that day he ceased to be liable or subject to impeachment. The respondent subjected himself to the power of the House to impeach and to the jurisdiction of the Senate to try and convict him by committing while in office the crimes charged against him. He resigned the office before he was impeached. The only question for our decision is, does he continue liable to this same power of impeachment, trial, and conviction for these same official crimes after his official term is ended?

It has been urged by the counsel for the respondent that if he can be impeached for official misconduct after he ceases to be an officer every private citizen of the United States is liable to impeachment. This does not follow. There is no pretense that a private citizen who has never held an office under the United States is liable to impeachment for any offense he may have committed. Impeachment under our Constitution is clearly limited to persons who have been guilty of misconduct as officers of the United States. The case before us does not present, nor does its decision involve, the question whether a person who is elected or appointed to a civil office under the United States is impeachable while in office for crimes committed by him when he was a private citizen. Nor are we called upon to decide whether military or naval officers are liable to impeachment for misconduct in the discharge of their official duties. There is no question before us as to extending the power and jurisdiction of impeachment to a person who denies that he was ever liable to this procedure. The only question is, does a person who holds a civil office and by official misconduct becomes liable to impeachment and conviction therefor, escape from this liability by resigning the office or by the expiration of his term of office? It is not a question of bringing a party within the scope of this power by construction or implication. The question is, does a party who by official crime has rendered himself liable to be impeached and disqualified from ever holding again any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, cease to be liable the moment he goes out of office?

I have given this question the careful examination which its importance demands and have come to the conclusion that impeachments are not restricted to persons who are officers at the time the proceeding is commenced, and that a party who, while holding a civil office under the United States, is guilty of impeachable crimes is subject to impeachment therefor and conviction thereof after his official term is ended. In my judgment, this is the correct construction of the provisions of the Constitution on the subject of impeachments. By this instrument the "power of impeachment" and the "power to try all impeachments" are granted to the House and Senate, respectively. (Article 1, section 2, subdivision 5, and section 3, subdivision 6.) This power is granted in the same clear and explicit language in which many of the important powers granted by that instrument are conferred upon Congress and other departments of the Government. "The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment," "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," is the language of the Constitution. (Article 1, section 2, subdivision 5; section 3, subdivision 6.) "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to regulate commerce," &c., is the language in which the important powers mentioned in section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution are granted. Power is conferred upon the President in the same language. (Section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution.)

What is the meaning of the terms "power of impeachment," "power to try all impeachments," as used in the Constitution? Mr. Hamilton, in the sixty-fifth number of the Federalist, mentions, what is well known, that the framers of the Constitution derived their notions of impeachments from the law and practice on the subject as they existed in England at that time. Mr. Rawle, in his work on the United States Constitution, page 210, says:

> Impeachments are thus introduced—

That is, into the Constitution—

> as a known, definite term, and we must have recourse to the common law of England for the definition of them.

At the time the Constitution was formed the "power of impeachment" was the authority by which the House of Commons prosecuted before the House of Lords persons who had been guilty of misconduct in the discharge of their official duty; and the "power to try all impeachments" was that which gave the Lords jurisdiction to try, convict, and pronounce judgment upon the persons so accused. By the law and practice in England the power to impeach parties for official misconduct extended and was exercised against them whether they were in or out of office at the time the impeachment was commenced. The terms "power of impeachment," "power to try impeachments," imported in their most restricted and legitimate sense in the English law and practice authority and jurisdiction to impeach and convict parties who had violated their official duty to the detriment of the public, whether they continued in office or had ceased to be officers when the proceeding was commenced.

Many of the most noted cases of impeachment which had occurred in England during a hundred years immediately prior to 1777 were cases in which the parties impeached and tried for official crime had ceased to be officers long before they were impeached. The framers of the Constitution were familiar with the law and practice as to impeachments as the same then existed in England. The judgment on conviction in England might affect the property, the liberty, or the life of the person convicted. The framers of the Constitution by an express provision declare that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not "extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." By the English law and practice a majority was sufficient to convict the party impeached. The framers of the Constitution by an express provision declare that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present." If the framers of the Constitution intended that the "power of impeachment" and "the power to try impeachments" should be limited to persons in office at the time of the procedure, and should under no circumstances be exercised against parties no longer in office but who while in office had been guilty of official crimes, it seems to me they would have so declared in express language.

Impeachment in our Constitution was intended to be something more than a procedure to remove from office a party whose official crimes are discovered while he is still holding the office. It was intended to reach the corrupt official and disqualify him from ever holding office again, notwithstanding he was able to conceal his misconduct until after his term of office had expired. The character of the men who framed and the language they use in the Constitution forbid, in my judgment, a construction which would permit a dishonest officer to enrich himself by corrupt practices highly detrimental to the public welfare and escape conviction and a judgment disqualifying him to hold any office thereafter by resigning. Certainly the power to impeach and to try impeachments, granted in express terms in the first article of the Constitution, should not be construed to have this limited application unless there is language in the subsequent provisions of the instrument which requires this construction.

It has been contended that the provision that "judgments in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," is repugnant to the exercise of the power of impeachment against a person who is no longer in office. The argument is that because he cannot be removed as well as disqualified by the judgment he is not impeachable. The argument might have some weight if the provision in question declared that the judgment should be removal from office and disqualification to hold office. But it does not. It simply provides that the judgment shall not extend further than to removal and disqualification. It may be either. So far from this provision furnishing an argument against the power to impeach a person for official misconduct after he has ceased to hold the office, the argument to be drawn from it is to the contrary. This provision shows that one of the objects of the procedure was to disqualify a person whose misconduct as an officer rendered it just and wise, in the judgment of the Senate, that he should not again be intrusted with the administration of public affairs.

It is contended that section 4 of article 2 of the Constitution limits the power of impeachment to persons in office at the time the procedure is commenced. This, in my judgment, is not correct. The power to impeach and to try impeachments is not conferred by this section. This power is given to the House and Senate, respectively, by the provisions in article 1 above referred to. The most that can be justly claimed is that section 4 restricts impeachments to the persons who shall hold the offices designated in that section, and who shall while in office be guilty of the crimes therein mentioned. Thus construed, it is in harmony with the provisions of article 1. The prior provision, that the judgment shall not extend further than to removal from and disqualification to hold office, construed in connection with section 4, makes it mandatory that if the party convicted is in office he shall be removed, and leaves it in the discretion of the court to disqualify him or not.

It is urged that the language of section 4 is "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States shall," &c., and therefore no one except a person then actually holding one of these offices can be impeached; that when he ceases to be an officer his liability to impeachment for official misconduct while in office terminates. In my judgment, this is not the meaning of this language. This language is used to designate the persons who are impeachable. The person who while acting as one of the officers named is guilty of the crimes mentioned is impeachable, whether he is still in office or has resigned. It is the person, not the officer, who is impeached and convicted. This is the opinion expressed by Mr. Rawle in his treatise on the Constitution, page 213:

> From the reasons already given it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office.

Language similar to that under consideration is employed constantly in penal statutes. Section 1788 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is an example. It declares that "every officer of the United States concerned in the disbursement of the revenues thereof," who does certain acts mentioned, "shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by a fine of $3,000, and shall, upon conviction, be removed from office and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States." In section 1789 it is declared that "every officer concerned in the collection of the revenue," who commits certain acts, shall, on conviction, be punished as therein described. Section 1781 declares that "every member of Congress or officer of the Government who takes a bribe" shall, on conviction, be punished by fine and imprisonment. Can it be successfully claimed that the person who was an officer, and as such violated these statutes, is liable to impeachment and conviction only while he was such officer? Clearly not. He continues liable after he ceases to be an officer.

In my judgment, the respondent continued liable to impeachment for his alleged official misconduct after he ceased to be Secretary of War. The plea to the jurisdiction should, therefore, be overruled.

Opinion of Mr. Cragin,

Delivered May 29, 1876.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, two things in this case are conceded by every Senator, namely: That at the time of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, by the House of Representatives, he was not a civil officer of the United States, having resigned prior to his impeachment, and that he had a full and perfect moral and legal right to resign. The fact appears of record that he resigned his office of Secretary of War at ten o'clock and twenty minutes, in the forenoon of the 2d of March last, and that the House took no proceedings against him till the afternoon of the same day. On the next day the first official notice of the proceedings was brought to the Senate, in the form of the following House resolution:

> Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed and instructed to proceed immediately to the bar of the Senate, and there impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and to inform that body that formal articles of impeachment will in due time be presented, and to request the Senate to take such order in the premises as they may deem appropriate.

It will be observed that the House, in its initiatory proceedings in this case, described William W. Belknap as "late Secretary of War."

If there be any doubt as to his right to resign, or that his resignation was effectual, I quote as follows from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of The United States vs. Wright, 1 McLean's Reports, page 512:

> There can be no doubt that a civil officer has a right to resign his office at pleasure; and it is not in the power of the Executive to compel him to remain in office. It is only necessary that the resignation should be received to take effect; and this does not depend upon the acceptance or rejection of the resignation by the President.

When this discussion commenced, on the 16th of May, I had not made up my mind on the question under consideration; but I strongly inclined to the opinion that the Senate had jurisdiction to try the respondent, notwithstanding his resignation prior to impeachment by the House. I confess that I was provoked at the idea that any person could, by voluntary resignation, just before and in view of presentment, arrest proceedings in a case of impeachment, and especially in the case under consideration. A man who had just held a high position, intimately and confidentially connected with the Chief Executive of the United States, was charged with high crimes in office, crimes most disgraceful to him, dangerous to the public good, abhorrent to the public sense, and humiliating to the party whose trusted representative he was.

Under these circumstances I looked eagerly for the power to try him, and if found guilty, to lay the strong hand of the law upon him with all its weight and consequences. My sense of right was outraged; my pride as an American citizen and friend of the party in power was deeply wounded; and I looked for some way to satisfy justice, vindicate the honor of the nation, and at the same time brand the offender and make an example of him, if found guilty.

I do not suppose any other Senator will make this confession, but I do not believe I am alone in this regard. I do not put this forward as any merit on my part, but mention it simply to show how the human judgment is influenced and embarrassed, when called upon to decide questions of a judicial character, when mixed with strong personal or party considerations, and how difficult it is, even with men who mean to do right, to rise above and look beyond the case which has aroused their feelings and caused their indignation. Under these circumstances I commenced work to find jurisdiction in this case. I read and reread all the constitutional provisions on the subject of impeachment. I read carefully the proceedings on this subject of the convention that framed the Constitution; I read the commentaries of the two leading American authors—Story and Kent—on the subject of impeachment, and studied the American precedents under the Federal and State constitutions.

I have listened attentively to the arguments of learned and able Senators on both sides of the question till, in spite of my inclination and almost determination to the contrary, I am reluctantly forced to the opinion that the Senate has no jurisdiction to try a person not in office at the time of his impeachment. The provisions of the Constitution are as follows:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law. (Article 1, section 3.)

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Article 2, section 4.)

By article 1, section 2, it appears that the House of Representatives has the sole power of impeachment. By this I understand that the House of Representatives, and only the House of Representatives, can institute, present, and prosecute impeachments; that they are the grand inquest to indict and prosecute the indictment, and that no other body has this power.

The word "sole" does not qualify the power, but only locates it. It makes the House of Representatives the sole agent for instituting impeachments. The power is lodged with them, and nowhere else. Impeachment is a peculiar function of the House of Representatives according to the clause in the Constitution before referred to. If the word "exclusive" had been used instead of "sole," its meaning would have been the same. The same word is used in conferring upon the Senate the power to try impeachments. They have the "sole" or exclusive power to try all impeachments. This is one of the functions of the Senate, and is the function of no other body. The Senate acts in the capacity of court and petit jury to try and decide all matters of law and fact arising in all cases of impeachment under the Constitution.

I did not think of looking to the clauses of the first article for the parties who could be impeached and tried, or for impeachable offenses, but able Senators have argued that these are the jurisdictional clauses. It is claim ed that under them the House of Representatives have all the powers of impeachment possessed by the House of Commons in England, by its parliamentary and common law, except as restricted by the Constitution; and that the only restriction is as to the judgment that may be rendered.

As to persons and offenses, the common law of England, or rather the parliamentary law of England, prevails, and is the rule of action under our Constitution. This is the doctrine boldly proclaimed by some of the managers in this case and by many Senators on this floor. I cannot subscribe to this doctrine, for it is well known that, by the parliamentary law of England, every subject of the realm is liable to impeachment, and for any offense, in the discretion of the impeaching power. I do not believe that the bloody code of impeachment in England was incorporated into our Constitution; but I will defer further remarks upon this point to another part of my opinion.

The clause in article 1, section 3, which declares that "judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office," &c., limits the utmost judgment that the Senate can pronounce, namely: "removal from office and disqualification to hold office." The only less judgment specified is that of "removal from office," as found in article 2, section 4. From this I infer that there are only two judgments that the Senate can impose in cases of impeachment, namely, "removal from office" and "removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office," &c.

In both cases there must be removal, and therefore the person tried must be an officer, or otherwise he could not be removed. This fact would seem to define the persons who can be impeached and tried, and to limit the jurisdiction to such persons. Before I had carefully studied article 2, section 4, in connection with the clause about judgment in article 1, section 3, I inferred that there might be a judgment less than "removal from office," and that therefore a person not in office might be impeached and tried. I could think of no such judgments except suspension from office or censure. But suspension would work removal, and either House of Congress can censure a person without invoking the power or machinery of impeachment.

Article 2, section 4, describes the persons who may be impeached, and the offenses for which they may be impeached, and this is the only part of the Constitution that does in any way designate the persons, or the offenses, subject to impeachment. This provision of the Constitution is as follows:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This provision, in my opinion, describes all the persons who can be impeached and convicted under the Constitution of the United States; and it is the fountain of jurisdiction. No person can be impeached or convicted unless he be President, Vice-President, or some civil officer of the United States. To my mind this is conclusive. The fact that under this section the judgment must be "removal from office" is demonstrative that a person not in office and not subject to removal cannot be tried on articles of impeachment.

It is admitted on all sides that all the provisions of the Constitution on the same subject must be taken and construed together. The last section is as binding as the first, and the whole must be made to harmonize and agree. The fourth section of the second article should stand first, for it is the body and substance of impeachment in the Constitution. All else describes the functions of the two Houses of Congress and the mode of proceeding. The House only can impeach, the Senate only can try, &c. When the President is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; it shall require two-thirds of the members present to convict, &c.,

But who can be impeached and tried, and for what they can be impeached and tried, can only be determined by the fourth section of the second article.

I construe and render the Constitution on the subject of impeachment as follows:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment by the House of Representatives for, and conviction by the Senate of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; and judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. The Senate when sitting for the trial of an impeachment shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside, and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

In this arrangement of the constitutional provisions, on the subject of impeachment, I submit that I have in no way changed its meaning. I have arranged its provisions in different order and brought them all together. I place the fourth section of the second article in front, where it belongs. If the Constitution had been arranged in this way, by the convention that framed it, there would not be five Senators in this Chamber who would claim jurisdiction in this case.

It is well known that the convention after it had agreed upon the provisions of the Constitution referred its work to a committee of "detail and arrangement." That committee arranged the provision under different heads. What pertained to the House of Representatives they arranged under article 1, section 2; what pertained to the Senate they placed under section 3 of the same article; and what pertained to the President, under article 2, sections 1, 2, 3, and 4.

No one can give any reason why section 4 of said article was placed in this position, only that the President is the first officer named. I contend it would have been better if the provisions on the subject of impeachment had been arranged together as I have arranged them.

I wrote out this arrangement before I had opened the Commentaries of Story or Kent, and simply from reading and study of the Constitution itself. I previously arranged the clauses of the Constitution in the order as they now stand, with the fourth section of the second article as an exception to the general power of impeachment, as claimed by many Senators, but this I soon rejected. If this clause is an exception, how broad and universal must be the general power? It must embrace every citizen of the United States. This cannot be the American doctrine.

I was gratified to find my opinion "that only civil officers of the United States could be impeached" confirmed by Judge Story, and that my construction and rendering of the Constitution was almost identical with that of Chancellor Kent.

I read from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, § 789. The fourth section of the second article is quoted as follows:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Story then proceeds:

From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice-President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that kingdom all the king's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament, though it is asserted that commoners cannot now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution in Parliament. There seems a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeaching power to persons holding office.

I will read section 803:

As it is declared in one clause of the Constitution "that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," and in another clause that "the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors," it would seem to follow that the Senate, on the conviction, were bound in all cases to enter a judgment of removal from office, though it has a discretion as to inflicting the punishment of disqualification. If, then, there must be a judgment of removal from office, it would seem to follow that the Constitution contemplated that the party was still in office at the time of impeachment. If he was not, his offense was still liable to be tried and punished in the ordinary tribunals of justice. And it might be argued with some force that it would be a vain exercise of authority to try a delinquent for an impeachable offense when the most important object for which the remedy was given was no longer necessary or attainable. And although a judgment of disqualification might still be pronounced, the language of the Constitution may create some doubt whether it can be pronounced without being coupled with a removal from office. There is also much force in the remark that an impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the State against gross official misdemeanors.

Removal from office is the main object of impeachment, and if the person has resigned his office that object is accomplished; and, as Judge Story says, impeachment in such a case "would be a vain exercise of authority." If a crime has been committed the party cannot escape by resignation of his office, but is subject to be tried and punished in the ordinary courts of justice, and that punishment may include perpetual disqualification to hold office.

In volume 1, page 289, of his Commentaries, Chancellor Kent, in construing and rendering the Constitution of the United States on the subject of impeachment, embraces the whole in the following language, putting the fourth section of the second article foremost:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States may be impeached by the House of Representatives for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, and upon conviction by the Senate shall be removed from office.

In the opinion of Kent this embraces all that there is of substance on this subject in the Constitution. I am confident he is right.

I now turn to the proceedings of the convention that framed the Constitution, and if I am not mistaken they will throw light upon the meaning of the provisions on the subject of impeachment. This convention commenced its proceedings on the 25th day of May, 1787. On the 29th of May Mr. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, offered a series of resolutions giving his ideas of the Constitution that should be framed. Under the head of the judiciary, and among the powers to be conferred upon the Supreme Court, he mentions "impeachments of any national officer."

On the same day Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, submitted a draft of a federal government which, in many respects, is identical with our present Constitution. In article 3 he says:

The House of Delegates shall exclusively possess the power of impeachment.

This is the exact meaning of the provision in the Constitution as granted to the House of Representatives, as I have heretofore claimed. In article 10, on the subject of the Supreme Court, he extends its jurisdiction "to the trial of impeachment of officers of the United States."

It will be observed that Mr. Randolph contemplated impeachment of national officers only, and that Mr. Pinckney contemplated impeachments of officers of the United States, both meaning the same thing. On the 13th of June it was moved by Mr. Randolph and seconded by Mr. Madison—

That the jurisdiction of the national judiciary shall extend to impeachments of any national officer.

Bear in mind that only officers are mentioned by these leading members of the convention. On the 15th of June Mr. Patterson offered propositions for a form of government. In his fourth resolution, in relation to the Chief Executive, he provides "that he shall be ineligible a second time, and removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty by Congress, on application by a majority of the executives of the several States." In his fifth resolution, providing for a federal judiciary, he says:

That the judiciary so established shall have authority to hear and determine in the first instance on all impeachments of Federal officers.

On the next day Colonel Hamilton submitted a plan of government, the ninth paragraph of which is as follows:

The governors, Senators, and all officers of the United States to be liable to impeachment for mal and corrupt conduct; and upon conviction to be removed from office.

On the 19th of June Mr. Gorham reported, from the committee to whom was referred the several plans and propositions, a series of resolutions. In the ninth article it is provided that the Executive is to be "removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty."

In the thirteenth "impeachment of national officers" is a power given to the national judiciary.

On the 6th of August Mr. Rutledge reported from the same committee a draft of a constitution. Article 4, section 6, is as follows:

The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. It shall choose its Speaker and other officers.

Article 10, section 2, relates to the Executive, and provides that—

He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or corruption.

Article 11, section 3, provides that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend "to the trial of impeachments of officers of the United States."

This draft of the Constitution, submitted by Mr. Rutledge, was under consideration by the convention for several days. Each article and section was considered separately.

On the 27th day of August the following was adopted by the convention:

He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or corruption.

Up to this time no suggestion had been made in the convention to give the Senate the power to try impeachments. It had been determined to give that power to the Supreme Court.

On the 4th of September Mr. Brearly, from the committee of eleven, reported partially. Paragraph 3 of said report is as follows:

In the place of the ninth article, first section, to be inserted: "The Senate of the United States shall have power to try all impeachments; but no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present."

The same report provides that the latter part of the second section, tenth article, shall read as follows:

He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction by the Senate for treason and bribery.

The convention proceeded to consider this report by paragraphs, and on the 8th of September it was agreed to insert, after the word "bribery," in section 2, article 10, "or other high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States."

On the same day the following clause was added after the words "United States:"

The Vice-President and other civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction as aforesaid.

On the same day the convention voted to substitute the following in place of the first section, ninth article:

The Senate of the United States shall have power to try all impeachments; but no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present, and every member shall be on oath.

After this, and on the same day, a committee of five was appointed "to revise the style of, and arrange, the articles agreed to by the house."

It was not intended that this committee should in any way change the meaning of the provisions of the Constitution as adopted by the convention, but only to "revise the style and arrange the articles" under proper heads. The fourth section of the second article, as it now stands in the Constitution, went to this committee in the following language:

He—

The President—

shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives and conviction by the Senate for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States. * * * The Vice-President and other civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction as aforesaid.

I wish to place the fourth section of the second article, as it came from that committee and now stands, side by side with the article referred to them, that all may see that the meaning was not changed. The following is the fourth section of the second article:

The President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The article is made shorter, repetitions are avoided, and some words are omitted. Nothing is said of the House of Representatives or Senate, for it is provided elsewhere in the Constitution that the House of Representatives have the power to impeach, and the Senate the power to try and convict. The substantial meaning is identically the same, and Chancellor Kent was correct in his rendering of the Constitution on this subject.

The committee on style and arrangement made its report on the 12th of September, and their draught was not changed on the subject of impeachment, except the words "or affirmation" were added to the requirement that Senators should be "on oath" in the trial. No person can fail to see that not a word was uttered by any member of the convention, and nothing appears in the proceedings, in any way implying that impeachment was intended to apply to any person unless he was actually in office at the time of impeachment; and it is manifest that the proceeding was only intended as a means for the removal from office of a dangerous, corrupt, and unworthy official.

"National officers," "Federal officers," "officers of the United States," are the only persons mentioned in the plans submitted by Randolph, Pinckney, Patterson, and others; and finally the convention limited impeachment to the "President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States." How, then, is it possible that a man not a President, Vice-President, or a civil officer of the United States can be impeached under the Constitution? It is manifest to my mind that the person to be impeached must be a civil officer of the United States still in office, and that the object of impeachment "is removal from office," to which may be added, in the discretion of the Senate, disqualification to hold office, &c., under the United States.

The practice for one hundred years, ever since the adoption of the Constitution, has been in accordance with this theory. No person has been impeached and tried, under the Constitution, except he was at the time of impeachment a civil officer. In every case where impeachment has been attempted and the officer has resigned, even after impeachment by the House, the proceedings have instantly stopped, except in this single case. This case stands alone. No precedent under the Constitution of the United States or of any State can be found. The recent case of Governor Ames, of Mississippi, is in point, as also the one of Judge Barnard in New York.

The first case of impeachment under the Constitution of the United States was that of William Blount, and the decision of the Senate in that case, that they had no jurisdiction to try him "because he was not a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution," ought to decide this case in the same way, for the truth is exactly that. Let us refer to the facts in the Blount case. On the 3d of July, 1797, the President, John Adams, sent to the Senate and House of Representatives a message in relation to transactions of William Blount, a Senator from Tennessee. I do not intend to go fully into the history of this case. It appears, however, that his crime, if it was a crime, had no necessary connection with his office of Senator.

On the 7th of July Mr. Sitgreaves, a member of the House, by order of the House came to the Senate and impeached William Blount in the form now usual in such cases. On the next day, July 8, the Senate expelled William Blount from a seat in that body. The articles of impeachment were not presented by the House till the 7th day of February, 1798. After the usual pleas, on the 3d of January, 1799, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment heard arguments from the managers, on the part of the House, and counsel for the respondent, on the question of jurisdiction. The arguments upon this question occupied four days; that of Manager Bayard, in favor of jurisdiction, was very able, and has not been surpassed, if equaled, in the trial of the case now under consideration. He contended that the House of Representatives had the sole power of impeachment, and that the Senate had the sole power to try all impeachments, and that these clauses gave jurisdiction to the House to impeach, and the Senate to try, all persons and for all offenses, that the House of Commons could impeach and the House of Lords try in England. He urged that as there is no description of offenders or the offenses, in the Constitution itself, where the power is vested, every offender and every offense, impeachable according to the common law of England, must be deemed impeachable here; and he alleged that the common-law power of impeachment extends to every crime or misdemeanor that can be committed by any subject in or out of office.

This is his language:

The Constitution has said who shall have the power to impeach, and who of trying impeachments. It has also limited the extent of the punishment. But it has not described the persons who shall be the objects of impeachment, nor defined the cases to which the remedy shall be confined. We cannot do otherwise, therefore, than presume, upon these points, we are designedly left to the regulations of the common law. The question therefore is, what persons, for what offenses, are liable to be impeached at common law? And I am confident, as to this point, the learning and liberality of the counsel will save me the trouble of argument, or the citation of authorities, to establish the position that the question of impeachability is a question of discretion only, with the Commons and Lords. Not that I mean to insist that the Lords have legal cognizance of a charge of a capital crime against the commoner, but simply that all the King's subjects are liable to be impeaced by the Commons and tried by the Lords upon charges of high crimes and misdemeanors.

He then goes on to show how important it would be, under certain circumstances, to impeach a citizen not in office, but possessed of extensive influence arising from popular arts, from wealth or connections, and actuated by strong ambition, if that citizen should by intrigue, corruption, or force seek to place himself in the presidential chair or some other high office. He contended that absolute and perpetual disqualification to hold any office, under the Government, would be a suitable punishment, and that the same is provided for under the Constitution.

Mr. Bayard boldly and frankly accepted the logical consequences of his argument, which, I am sorry to say, some of the Senators, who hold that the Senate has jurisdiction in case of William W. Belknap, shrink from doing. They hold the same construction of the Constitution, but claim that in England only men in office, or who have held office, or who are connected with some official trust, are liable to impeachment; and they seek to limit impeachment to the same classes in this country under our Constitution. There is no authority for such limitation. All authorities agree with Mr. Bayard in saying, "that all the king's subjects are liable to be impeached and tried, except only on a charge of a capital crime."

On the 10th day of January, 1799, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment voted on the following resolution:

That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives.

And the vote stood—yeas 11, nays 14.

The majority therefore decided against the resolution, or, in other words, that a person not a civil officer of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution, and because he is not a civil officer, is not liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives.

On the day following, upon motion, it was determined that—

The court is of the opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed.

Yeas 14, nays 11.

The plea was "that he, the said William Blount, is not now a Senator and is not an officer of the United States," &c.

If the name of William W. Belknap should be substituted for that of William Blount, in the resolution voted upon on the 10th of January, 1799, and a majority of the present court should vote against it, as in that case, we should decide against jurisdiction, and that would end this case. Precisely the same reason exists in this case, for the want of jurisdiction, that existed in the Blount case; namely: that Belknap is not, and was not at the time of his impeachment, a "civil officer of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States," and for this reason the case should be dismissed, for want of jurisdiction. Did any harm come to the Republic because William Blount was not disqualified to hold office under the United States? He was expelled from the Senate and never returned, and never afterward held any office under the United States.

If Belknap had committed suicide at the same time he resigned the office of Secretary of War he would not be more politically dead than he is at this moment.

It will be a vain exercise of power to disqualify him to ever hereafter hold office under the United States. The people have convicted and disqualified him, and from their verdict there is no appeal. I do not know of anything that will scorch and wither a public man more than the condemnation of an aroused and indignant people.

Thomas Jefferson was Vice-President during the trial of William Blount, and on the 8th of February, 1798, the day after the articles of impeachment were presented to the Senate, he wrote a letter to James Madison, from which the following is an extract:

Articles of impeachment were yesterday given in against Blount. But many great preliminary questions will arise. Must not a formal law settle the oath of the Senators, form of pleadings, process against person or goods, &c.? May he not appear by attorney? Must he not be tried by a jury? Is a Senator impeachable? Is an ex-Senator impeachable? You will readily conceive that these questions, to be settled by twenty-nine lawyers, are not likely to come to a speedy issue.

On the 15th of February, the same year, he wrote to Mr. Madison again, and the following is what he says on the subject of impeachment:

This day the question of the jury in cases of impeachment comes on. There is no doubt how it will go. The general division of the Senate is 22 and 10; and under the probable prospect of what it will forever be, I see nothing in the mode of proceeding by impeachment but the most formidable weapon for the purposes of dominant faction that ever was contrived. It would be the most effectual one of getting rid of any man whom they consider as dangerous to their views, and I do not know that we could count on one-third in an emergency. All depends, then, on the House of Representatives, who are the impeachers; and there the majorities are of one, two, or three only, and these sometimes one way and sometimes another. In a question of pure party they have the majority, and we do not know what circumstances may turn up to increase that majority temporarily, if not permanently. I know of no solid purpose of punishment which the courts of law are not equal to, and history shows that in England impeachment has been an engine more of passion than justice.

Again, on the 22d of February, Jefferson writes to Mr. Madison as follows:

You will see in the papers the ground on which the introduction of the jury into the trial by impeachment was advocated by Mr. Tazewell and the fate of the question. Reader's motion, which I inclose you, will probably be amended and established, so as to declare a Senator unimpeachable, absolutely; and yesterday an opinion was declared that not only officers of the State governments, but every private citizen of the United States are impeachable. Whether they will think this the time to make the declaration I know not, but if they bring it on I think there will not be more than two votes north of the Potomac against the universality of the impeaching power.

I would here state that there was not a single vote south of the Potomac in favor of jurisdiction in the Blount case.

Mr. Madison, who is regarded as the father of the Constitution, replies to Mr. Jefferson in a letter dated March 2, 1798. What he says upon the subject of impeachment is as follows:

Mr. Tazewell's speech is really an able one in defense of his proposition to associate juries with the Senate in cases of impeachment. His views of the subject are so new to me that I ought not to decide on them without more examination than I have had time for. My impression has always been that impeachments were somewhat sui generis and excluded the use of juries. The terms of the amendment to the Constitution are indeed strong, and Mr. T. has given them, as the French say, all their luster. But it is at least questionable whether an application of that amendment to the case of impeachments would not push his doctrine farther than he himself would be disposed to follow it.

It would seem also that the reservation of an ordinary trial by jury must strongly imply that an impeachment was not to be a trial by jury. As removal and disqualification, the punishments within the impeaching jurisdiction, were chiefly intended for officers in the executive line, would it not also be difficult to exclude executive influence from the choice of juries? Or would juries armed with the impeaching power, and under the influence of an unimpeachable tribunal, be less formidable than the power as hitherto understood to be modified? The universality of this power is the most extravagant novelty that has been yet broached, especially coming from a quarter that denies the impeachability of a Senator. Hardly as these innovators are, I cannot believe they will venture yet to hold this inconsistent and insulting language to the public.

In this extract Mr. Madison says that impeachments were "intended chiefly for officers in the executive line." There is no doubt it was intended exclusively for executive and judicial "officers" of the United States. It is well known that Mr. Madison was a leading member of the convention that framed the Constitution, and no man knew better than he did, ten years after the work was done, the intended meaning of the Constitution. In commenting upon the power claimed in the Blount case, which was precisely like that claimed in the present one, Mr. Madison says:

The universality of this power is the most extravagant novelty that has yet been broached.

It is here implied that no such idea ever entered into the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and that of all the novelties this is the most extravagant. I place the opinion of James Madison against that of all the Senators who believe in the universal power of impeachment.

Bearing upon this subject, Mr. Jefferson, on the 18th day of August, 1799, wrote to Edward Randolph, a leading member of the constitutional convention, as follows:

Of all the doctrines that have been broached by the Federal Government, the novel one, of the common law being in force and cognizable as an existing law in their courts, is to me the most formidable. All their other assumptions of ungiven powers have been in the detail. The bank law, the treaty doctrine, the sedition act, alien act, the undertaking to change the State laws of evidence in the State courts by certain parts of the stamp act, &c., have been solitary, unconsequential, timid things, in comparison with the audacious, bare-faced, and sweeping pretension to a system of law for the United States without the adoption of their Legislature, and so infinitely beyond their power to adopt. I am happy you have taken up the subject, and I have carefully perused and considered the notes you inclosed to me. * * *

I think it will be of great importance when you come to the proper point to portray at full length the consequences of the new doctrine that the common law is the law of the United States, and that their courts have, of course, jurisdiction coextensive with that law; that is to say, general over all cases and persons. But, great heavens! who could have conceived in 1789 that within ten years we should have to combat such wind-mills?

I have quoted from this letter of Jefferson's to show that the power to pass the alien and sedition laws was claimed under the common law of England, "as the universality of the impeaching power" is now claimed by those who hold that the Senate has jurisdiction in this case, and to show that Jefferson thought there was great danger to the liberties of the people in such unfounded assumptions. Do you say there can be no abuse of this power? I answer that in high party times, when the passions of men are aroused, there is great danger.

Mr. Jefferson says, as before quoted:

I see nothing in the mode of proceeding by impeachment but the most formidable weapon for the purposes of dominant faction that ever was contrived.

If the power is confined to persons in office, the cases will be comparatively few, of a factious or partisan character; but if you take in the leaders of parties, who are seeking office, or laboring for the success of their party, the temptations to disqualify them become dangerous in the extreme.

Let us look at a few cases that might have arisen in our history, if the power of impeachment, as now claimed, had been supposed to exist.

Soon after Mr. Monroe became President hostilities broke out with the Creek and Seminole Indians, occupying a part of Georgia and Florida. As commander of the southern military district, General Jackson was ordered to take the field against the hostile tribes; and as many of the number took refuge in Florida, where they were believed to be countenanced if not aided by the Spaniards, the general deemed it his duty to enter Florida with his Army, and take possession of Saint Mark's and Pensacola. He also seized and had tried by court-martial, two Englishmen, Arbuthnot and Ambrister, who were charged with aiding and inciting the Indians in their depredations upon our people. They were both found guilty and hung.

These proceedings caused the President great anxiety. They were considered in cabinet council and condemned and disavowed by every member except Mr. Adams. A paper was drawn up and made public that in entering Florida General Jackson had acted without authority, and upon his own responsibility; and it was decided that the places taken should be immediately evacuated. This condemnation of General Jackson roused his fiery temper, and his friends took up his cause. The subject was brought before Congress by Mr. Cobb, a personal friend of Mr. Crawford, who introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives condemning General Jackson's proceedings, upon which a very acrimonious, irritating, and prolonged debate arose.

It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, a majority of whom made a report severely censuring General Jackson, while the minority reported that he deserved the thanks of the country. Upon a final vote the general's conduct was approved—100 to 70.

The papers communicated by the President on this subject to the Senate were referred to a committee of five. Three of this committee made a report severely condemning General Jackson's proceedings, while the minority justified them. No vote was taken on the report in the Senate.

The debates in Congress on this subject caused great animosity among members during the whole session. Now, suppose General Jackson had been impeached for his conduct under "the universality of power," as Mr. Madison calls it, what would have been the consequences? Dangerous in the extreme. Civil discord unprecedented would have been the result. Had he been disqualified from holding office, he would never have been President, unless he had reached that position through revolution, which would not have been unlikely.

When John Quincy Adams was elected President, Henry Clay, who favored him, was charged with bargain and corruption, a charge which his enemies persisted in making as long as he lived. He was the great and favorite leader of the whig party. Suppose that he had been impeached, convicted, and disqualified, what would have been the consequences? Discord, and possibly revolution. These were possible cases, if there had been the necessary majorities. Many others of less prominence might be cited.

We have in New Hampshire to-day a flagrant case, an ex-governor, not one year out of his seat, usurped authority and violated the constitution of the State, so as to change the political character of the State senate. He gave certificates to two men not elected, and stifled the votes of the people. His action led almost to revolution. He was censured severely by the house of representatives; but under this new doctrine of "universality of impeachment" he can now be impeached, and deservedly so, as far as his offense is concerned. But I counsel no such procedure. We have the necessary majority in each house to impeach and convict him, but the people have already condemned him, and I would not invoke this doubtful and dangerous power, as it would inflame party passions and disturb the peace of an orderly and law-abiding people.

We have recently had a civil war in this country. The proceeding of impeachment was not invoked to reach any of the leaders of the rebellion. If this "universality of power" had prevailed, some Senators on this floor, and I speak it with no disrespect, might have been disqualified from holding office, and a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress could not have relieved them.

This impeaching power might have been carried to a very great extent. The power as now claimed would have embraced all the officers who deserted from the Army and Navy of the United States, all the citizens who were officers in the confederate army, and all the soldiers who enlisted to fight against their country, for they had all committed treason. By the fourteenth amendment those who had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and aided the rebellion, were disqualified to hold any office; but by a special provision their disabilities might be removed, by a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress.

Let us not seek for dangerous and doubtful powers in the Constitution, for the sole purpose of disqualifying private citizens from holding office; but if they have committed crimes, let us leave them to the courts, which can punish them to the full extent of the magnitude of their offenses, in their persons, property, and also disqualify them from ever holding office under the United States.

The courts can do more in the case of W. W. Belknap than the Senate can do, and therefore there is no danger that he will escape punishment. The statute authorizes the court to disqualify him from holding office, and also to impose fine and imprisonment.

I think there is danger in the exercise of this doubtful power. If the people of this country should ever fall upon turbulent and revolutionary times, and party passions be hammered to whitest heat, I do say, with Mr. Jefferson, that I see nothing in this kind of impeachment "but the most formidable weapon for the purposes of dominant faction that ever was contrived." "It would be the most effectual one for getting rid of any man considered dangerous to their views."

Would it be well to have in this country ten, fifteen, or one hundred powerful men, who have been leaders in their party, disqualified for life to hold office? Would they be good citizens, would their friends acquiesce in such judgment? We did not think so when we removed your disabilities, honored and respected Senators. [Referring to RANSOM, GORDON, and others whose disabilities have been removed.] No! Rather that every citizen should feel that this is his country, his flag; that its interests are his interests, its glory his glory; that its Constitution and laws protect him in his equal rights and privileges; that all together we may honor, love, and defend our country.

[Mr. CONKLING, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. KELLY, and Mr. STEVENSON also delivered opinions, which have not been furnished for publication.]

THURSDAY, June 1, 1876.

At one o'clock p. m. the managers on the part of the House of Representatives (with the exception of Mr. LAPHAM and Mr. HOAR) appeared and were conducted to the seats provided for them.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Carpenter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to order, legislative and executive business will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed in the trial, the managers being present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at one o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting on Monday, May 29, for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to proceed with the trial. On the question of jurisdiction raised by the pleadings in this trial, it is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and, it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught. The Secretary will make the proper entry upon the journal.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I offer the order which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the order proposed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap is hereby ordered to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President and Senators: This court gave us two days to prepare for the argument of the question of jurisdiction, the decision of which occupied the court for about three weeks. I am certain that our argument did not perplex the court more than the decision of the court has perplexed us. And under the circumstances I trust the court will give us some time for reflection. The order offered by the Senator from Maryland is peremptory—

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap is hereby ordered to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

This order assumes that Mr. Belknap is compellable to answer further. Whether this be so or not deserves examination. By the old common law an issue of fact found upon a plain abatement was final in cases of misdemeanors. Whether this was so where the issue joined was one of law merits examination.

One of my associates, Mr. Blair, is necessarily out of town. The other, Judge Black, is confined to his room by illness. And before determining what steps should next be taken on the part of the respondent, I desire a consultation with my associates.

By way of showing the necessity for such consultation let me refer to some of the questions which arise at the present time.

The defendant first pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court. The managers filed a replication, to which the respondent demurred; and the managers joined in the demurrer.

The rule is that each pleading must answer the preceding one. The replication, if sufficient in law, was a valid answer to the plea. The validity of the replication in matter of law was put in issue by our demurrer. And had the court upon the demurrer held the replication bad, then the court would have looked back to the plea itself to see whether or not it was sufficient in law; and if it had found the plea to be bad, then the court would have held in favor of the prosecution; upon the principle that a bad replication is as good as the bad plea to which it is a response. But in this case the court overruled our demurrer to the replication, thus holding the replication a sufficient answer to the plea. Was there therefore any necessity for the court to go back through the record and pass upon the sufficiency of prior pleadings? The plea to the jurisdiction having been answered by a replication which the court held good by overruling our demurrer to it, what was the necessity for the court to go back through the record? The only question raised by the plea was the jurisdiction of this court over the respondent; and whether or not the prosecution was entitled to a final judgment, or whether the judgment should be respondeat ouster, is a question to be examined.

But I submit with great confidence that the question of sufficiency in law of the articles of impeachment was not before the court; and that after judgment upon the question of jurisdiction, of respondeat ouster, the respondent was at liberty to begin his defense, as he might have done without questioning the jurisdiction.

In case on indictment, when the defendant challenges the jurisdiction of the court, and fails to make good his objection, he is remitted to every privilege he would have possessed if he had commenced his defense with questioning the jurisdiction; that is, he may move to quash, or he may plead in bar, or plead the general issue.

If I were compelled alone to take the responsibility in this case I should plead no further, but leave the managers to their own course; and in that case would not the managers be entitled to move for final judgment? This would be so, I think, had the issue been one of fact only. But here there was an issue of law and several issues of fact, all of which the court has disposed of by the order just entered.

We have appeared and pleaded, and if the court have held our defense insufficient, may we not stand upon it, without filing further pleadings? My impression is that the next step to be taken is for the managers to move for judgment, after which we could move for leave to plead further, which I have no doubt the court would grant.

All this, of course, is upon the supposition that the court has overruled the plea to the jurisdiction. The order declaring the jurisdiction was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators present. That is less than two-thirds of the Senate think there is jurisdiction to convict the respondent.

Manifestly a court which has not jurisdiction to convict has no jurisdiction to try the respondent; and such pretended trial would be wholly extrajudicial. No witness could be indicted for false swearing at such trial, nor punished for contempt for not obeying a subpœna.

It therefore becomes a very important question to be settled by the respondent's counsel, whether any, and if any what, further steps should be taken on the part of the respondent. An order has been entered in the record, as an order of the court, overruling the plea to the jurisdiction. But the journal of the proceedings shows that thirty-five Senators concurred in the order, and twenty-two dissented.

Speaking for myself only, (not having consulted with my colleagues,) I maintain that upon the whole record the order is void, for the reason that it was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. Suppose a case in the Supreme Court, where only a majority of the judges need concur in the judgment; and suppose the record to show that only four judges concurred in the judgment while five dissented, but the minority directed the clerk to enter the judgment or order as the act of the court and he should do so and certify it as such under the seal of the court. It is manifest, I think, that such judgment, if the dissent of the majority appeared of record, would be absolutely void; and would be so declared by any court where the judgment should come in question collaterally. I think this judgment is in the same category.

But whether it is better for the respondent to move to vacate the order for this reason, or demur to the articles, and if the demurrer shall be overruled go through the form of a trial and give to the country the evidence on his behalf, is a question so important to the respondent that I do not wish to determine it without consultation with my colleagues. If this was the trial of an ordinary cause, I should have no hesitation. I should stop here. And if I was on trial myself, in this cause, I should stop here, confident that no Senator would vote for my conviction who believed that the court had no jurisdiction.

Now the question whether we shall plead further is one as to which I wish opportunity to consult with my colleagues; and I hope no order will be passed to-day which will preclude us from taking such course as, on consultation, we may deem advisable.

The question of the sufficiency in law of the articles themselves has not been raised by a demurrer thereto, has not been argued by either side, nor submitted to the court. The only question raised, argued, or submitted was the question of jurisdiction of the defendant; that is, whether the court had power to pass upon the sufficiency of the articles, or take any other step whatever in the cause. Had the court affirmed jurisdiction, (as I claim it has not,) then we could have moved to quash the articles, or demurred to them, or joined issue for trial. I do not hesitate to affirm that none of these articles, with possibly one exception, state the necessary facts to constitute a good indictment. Mere rhetoric and denunciation will not do. It is not enough to say that the defendant has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors; but the articles must state every fact which is an element of crime. And although the same strictness of pleading has not been required in cases of impeachment as in ordinary criminal causes, yet every fact relied upon to constitute the crime must be stated; and on the trial the proof cannot go beyond the averments of the articles. In the several impeachment trials in this country defendants have not resorted to formal pleadings. In Blount's case his response was more like an answer to a bill in chancery than a pleading in a criminal cause. It was a plea to the jurisdiction, a demurrer, and answer, all in one.

But I assume that where the respondent chooses to avail himself of formal and particular pleading, which the experience of a thousand years has shown to be essential to the protection of innocence, this court will not deny the right, at least without a hearing.

I, therefore, assume that the court, on its attention being called to the very sweeping terms of this order, will of its own motion vacate so much of it as holds that the articles of impeachment are sufficient in law.

The sufficiency in law of the articles is as material to the conviction of the respondent as is the truth in point of fact of the matters therein charged. Before there can be a conviction several things must be established.

First. That the defendant, in fact, has done, or omitted to do, certain things;

Second. That the things he has done or omitted constitute a crime;

Third. And not merely a crime, but a high crime or misdemeanor, meriting impeachment; and Fourth. That the respondent is subject to impeachment, and this court has jurisdiction over him for the hearing and determination of this cause.

If any one of these elements be wanting, there can be no conviction. And of course, as soon as any one of these propositions is established in favor of the respondent, he is entitled to an acquittal. I think the point as to jurisdiction has been determined in his favor, inasmuch as more than one-third of the Senate has declared against jurisdiction. But what course we ought to take as a matter of expediency; whether we should move to vacate the order altogether and that the respondent be dismissed; or demur to the articles; and if demurrer is overruled, answer to the merits and go to trial, should only be determined after consultation of the respondent's counsel.

I repeat, if acting for myself, I should take no further step, but abide final judgment. Every judgment implies a declaration that the court has jurisdiction to render it. In cases of impeachment, when a Senator rises and votes guilty he thereby affirms the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce final judgment; the commission by the respondent of acts constituting a crime, and a high crime; and the regularity of all prior proceedings in the cause. No Senator can vote guilty, unless he believes there is not only guilt but jurisdiction to try and punish. I have mentioned these propositions not to argue them but to show that they arise fairly at this time, and are of such importance as to justify us in asking a reasonable time to consider them, before we are compelled to act.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, one question which the learned counsel has discussed before you the managers do not feel authorized to discuss while the order of this Senate remains. By its order the demurrer to the replication of the House of Representatives is overruled, the plea of the defendant is overruled and held for naught, and the articles of impeachment are held sufficient. Now, apprehending that this order has been made upon due consideration, that the Senators understood all these pleadings and made this order in that view, we do not feel called upon, I repeat, to discuss the questions pertaining thereto until some motion is made to change the order; and if such a motion should be made, if the Senate, after this deliberation and after this carefully prepared order, takes into consideration the question whether it will change its order, then the managers will desire to be heard.

On the point which the counsel has suggested, practically, that a two-thirds vote is necessary on the question of jurisdiction, that Senators who voted that this court had not jurisdiction must therefore on the final vote, when the question is put, "Did this defendant take $1,500 on a given occasion and for such a purpose?" say "Not guilty," because of their views in regard to jurisdiction—on this point I say we shall be prepared to show that there is nothing whatever in the suggestion; in fact, that the whole practice of courts of impeachment has been in contravention of it; that the Constitution itself prevents any such possibility. Therefore when this question is raised in some proper form we shall desire to be heard upon it.

The counsel makes another suggestion, that if he stops here the managers would be compelled to move, or could move for judgment. This is not according to the rule of the Senate. The rule of the Senate provides exactly the contrary; that this point may be in the minds of Senators who have not recently looked at the rule, I will read a portion of it:

If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor as aforesaid, or, appearing, shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed, nevertheless, as upon a plea of not guilty.

Mr. CARPENTER. Pardon the interruption; but that is where there is no pleading on the part of the defendant.

Mr. Manager LORD. There is now no pleading on the part of the defendant; by the order of the Senate not only is his demurrer to the replication overruled, but his plea that he puts in to the articles is effectually held for naught. It stands therefore precisely as if no plea were in at all. Under the order of the Senate there is nothing before this tribunal now excepting the articles of impeachment; therefore there is no answer, actual or constructive. The defendant appears in person and by counsel; as there is no answer in this case before the Senate, all that the managers can do, at the proper time, is to move to proceed with the trial "as upon the plea of not guilty."

One other suggestion. We apprehend that the true object of all trials, civil or criminal, is to reach the merits at the earliest moment. The defendant here stands accused by impeachment, having been a high officer of the Government, of certain crimes and misdemeanors. He has put in one dilatory plea, and that has occupied all this time. He now proposes, after this Senate has so deliberately entered this order, after it, having examined all the pleadings, has found these articles of impeachment sufficient, to try again in that direction; he proposes to demur to the articles of impeachment; and while I cannot, perhaps, strictly call a demurrer a plea, yet, in a broader sense, it is. The defendant proposes another dilatory proceeding; I may call it properly another dilatory plea. And how many shall he have? It is absolutely in the discretion of the Senate whether to give him this privilege or not. It is in the discretion of any court of civil or criminal jurisdiction, unless controlled by statutory law.

This defendant accused of these high crimes, after having by his dilatory plea occupied weeks of time, seeks further delay; after this court, under rules which are broader and more liberal than in other courts in regard to pleadings, has deliberately overruled his demurrer, deliberately held his plea for naught, and that the only pleading before this tribunal is the pleading called the "articles of impeachment," and after this court has solemnly adjudged that these articles are sufficient, the defendant by his learned counsel asks you to go back into the courts of law, for rules not binding even there; he wants you to adopt the rules which he says are held in criminal courts, and give him the right, under all the circumstances of this case, to put in this further dilatory plea, because he says what? That he could go into a criminal court and take up these articles of impeachment, and one by one satisfy the tribunal that the pleading would not be good as an indictment. What if he could, and what if the technical rule availed here? It nevertheless is in the discretion of this court whether it will allow him again to stand on a technical point instead of proceeding to the merits. I apprehend it is an application which will not be favored by the Senate. I apprehend this Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will hardly take the position, after this deliberate order, that it will open the whole case again, and for what? Not from a sense of justice to the defendant; not for the purpose of ascertaining the truth; but simply that learned counsel skilled in the criminal courts may stand in this august tribunal and urge that these articles of impeachment have not all the words and phraseology which he thinks would be necessary in a court of criminal jurisdiction to maintain an indictment.

I will not now discuss the question whether the articles of impeachment are sufficient. The counsel himself has confessed the rule that pleadings in this court are entirely distinct and separate as to mere technical rules from pleadings in ordinary criminal proceedings. This court has a broader range; it has an easier path in its high jurisdiction to reach the merits, and therefore I may say, with all respect to this tribunal, that it would be a most extraordinary proceeding, in the judgment of the managers, for this court, without claim of any possible injustice to the defendant, to open this case for another dilatory plea instead of requiring him to go to trial upon the merits.

My colleague, Mr. MCMAHON, desires to make a statement.

Mr. Manager MCMAHON. Before the counsel resumes his argument, I desire to call his attention to the fact that he has himself invited the decision of the Senate as it has been made. In his argument, to be found on page 64 of the RECORD, I find the following:

I shall endeavor to maintain the following propositions:
1. That articles of impeachment cannot be entertained against a private citizen in any case whatever;
2. That wherever articles of impeachment are exhibited, they must set forth every fact essential to constitute a high crime or misdemeanor, and every fact necessary to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the court; and
3. That the issues of facts arising upon the plea in abatement are immaterial.

After proceeding to discuss these questions, in finally summing up the case I find on page 71 that the gentleman uses the following language:

And I think it would have been safe for us to demur to the articles; but not wishing to take risks upon a technical construction, we thought it safer to plead affirmatively the fact that the respondent was not holding any office at the time of impeachment. Undoubtedly, to any plea of the respondent in confession and avoidance of the articles, the prosecution might have replied in confession and avoidance; but not so to a plea which in substance is a denial of any fact which should have been stated in the articles to show jurisdiction. If the articles themselves are deficient in not stating any fact necessary to entire jurisdiction, jurisdiction of the offense and the offender, then this court never acquired jurisdiction.

It results from the fact that this court has only a special jurisdiction, that the first pleading must show a case within jurisdiction.

I think that after having invited the court to that particular question and to the discussion not simply of the fact, it is fair to presume that the Senate considered the facts which bear upon the question of jurisdiction, and also the facts which bear upon the character of the crime therein alleged.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to know what is to be the rule of the Senate in regard to the discussion of each matter. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] has offered an order——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator that debate is not in order.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not wish to debate, but I want to know the rule of the Senate on this subject. I want to know whether there is to be an unlimited discussion of counsel and managers on every order that is offered by a Senator. In my judgment it is all irregular.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will——

Mr. CARPENTER. If the court will hear me a moment on that point——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state in reply to the Senator from Ohio that the Chair was holding under the rule that each of the parties is entitled to one hour's debate on any motion or order submitted.

Mr. THURMAN. What! Upon an order offered by a Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The right of discussion is given to the parties.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no order offered by the parties.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, can I proceed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The counsel will proceed.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President and Senators, this is the second time that I have been reproached in this case with being a "criminal lawyer." By this epithet I suppose the managers mean to accuse me of more or less familiarity with the rules and practice which the judicial courts, after centuries of experience, have established for the protection of the innocent, and the separation of truth from falsehood, in the administration of criminal justice. This I accept as a compliment, though probably not so intended. The defending of persons accused of crime (always entitled under our law to the presumption that they are innocent until proved to be guilty) cannot be considered discreditable to any member of the profession, when we know from history that from Socrates down, through all the ages, excellent and upright men have been falsely convicted, because they had not advocates versed in the law and familiar with the principles and rules of evidence, and of the requisite nerve and force to stand up against popular prejudice and clamor, or judicial corruption and tyranny, and establish before the world their innocence. I understand the managers to disclaim being criminal lawyers; and I might retort that no one should be permitted to prosecute a citizen in a criminal court who is not familiar with and obedient to the rules and practice of such courts.

The honorable manager [Mr. LORD] claims that this court is exempt from adherence to rules of pleading and the methods of judicial tribunals; and that, in reaching its conclusions, it may proceed with the freedom of the wind, "which bloweth where it listeth." So is a mob on the Rocky Mountains, administering Lynch law upon a supposed murderer; and the mob could as fairly pretend to be exercising judicial power, as could this august tribunal while denying the principles and overstepping the limits of the law.

The manager who last spoke has referred to my remarks on a former occasion, to show that I intended to submit the sufficiency in law of the articles of impeachment,—a subject which I did not at all discuss. If by saying that the articles must be sufficient in law to sustain a conviction, I submitted the question of their sufficiency to the court at that time, then by saying that not only must the articles be sufficient in law, but must be proved true in fact, I submitted the question of the guilt or innocence of the respondent at the same time. If what I said authorized the court to pass upon the sufficiency of the articles,—a question not argued on either side,—then the court might as well have passed upon the question of guilt or innocence at the same time. I was discussing nothing but the question of jurisdiction. It is true I did say that, inasmuch as the articles described the respondent as late Secretary of War, perhaps we might safely have demurred to them; but, for reasons which I stated, we thought it safer to plead affirmatively the fact that the respondent was not holding any office when he was impeached. The manager says the articles of impeachment were before the court. I deny that the question of their legal sufficiency was before the court on the argument of the single question whether the court had jurisdiction to pass upon their sufficiency. It was claimed by one of the managers on that argument, if I remember aright, that the truth of the articles must be assumed, for the purposes of that argument. In other words, the question was, whether, conceding everything stated in the articles, the court had jurisdiction to try the respondent.

The question raised by our pleadings,—and submitted by our argument,—was, not whether the articles were true, or in point of form and substance, sufficient to show an impeachable crime,—but whether the respondent could be impeached after he was out of office. The truth and sufficiency of our plea was conceded by the managers when they filed a replication. To their replication we demurred. That undoubtedly submitted to the court the sufficiency of the plea as well as the replication. And if the court had held the replication bad, then, going back, they might have held the plea bad. But if the court, as appears by the order entered, held the replication good, by overruling our demurrer to it, then it was wholly immaterial whether the plea was good or bad, because it was disposed of by a good replication. As I understand the rule, it is only in case the party demurring is entitled to judgment on the particular point raised by his demurrer, that the court look back to see whether his former pleadings have been defective.

Suppose an indictment in a criminal court, and the defendant at the trial to plead to the array of the petit jury. This might lead to a succession of pleadings terminating in a demurrer. Would this demurrer raise the question of the sufficiency in law of the indictment, and the pleas in bar by the defendant, which had not been demurred to? Undoubtedly such demurrer would raise the question of the sufficiency of all the pleadings relating to the particular subject—the qualifications of that jury. So, in this case, the demurrer compelled the court to inspect all the pleadings touching the question of the jurisdiction of the court; and nothing else. And this question settled in favor of jurisdiction, the respondent should be permitted to commence his defense as he would have done if the jurisdiction had not been disputed.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to submit a question for counsel to answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

As upon a demurrer the court must go back to the first defect, how could the court overrule the demurrer without deciding that the articles are sufficient?

Mr. CARPENTER. The first defect was the demurrer to a good replication; the court held the replication good by overruling the demurrer to it. If the replication was held good, of course it disposed of the plea, and ended the question of jurisdiction.

Now, if the court please, I do not wish to spend time unnecessarily. I know the Senate is pressed with legislative business. Knowing such would be the case, we moved a continuance to the next session of the Senate. But the court unanimously denied this motion, thus ordering the trial to proceed. We are therefore not responsible for the embarrassment which this trial must necessarily cause to legislative business. And I assume that no Senator will wish to deny us the privileges necessary to a proper defense, and the time necessary for preparation, but will accord us a full and patient hearing upon every question involved in this case; especially as most of the questions are now presented for the first time, and by their determination precedents will be made for all time, binding upon all men.

And now I ask that you will give us until Monday next to determine, as counsel, what step ought next to be taken on behalf of the respondent;—determine whether we will move to vacate the order just entered, upon the ground that it was not passed with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present; or whether we will demur, and if the demurrer shall be overruled, answer, and go to final hearing and raise there all the questions which enter into a final judgment. That we can raise these questions on a final hearing, is clear, because it cannot be maintained that any question upon which conviction depends can be eliminated from such final determination by the action of less than the constitutional majority of two-thirds. Otherwise a mere majority of the Senate might defeat the constitutional provision.

In these cases of impeachment, if a mere majority can settle the question of jurisdiction, so a mere majority, by overruling a demurrer to the articles, can determine that the acts alleged to have been done or omitted by the respondent constitute in law a high crime or misdemeanor within the meaning of the Constitution; leaving the final judgment to rest only upon questions of fact or at the final hearing, none of these questions having been disposed of, some master tactician might first move a resolution declaring that the respondent had done or omitted the acts charged, and if sustained by a mere majority, might claim that the facts were settled, and that the final judgment must rest upon the question of law whether such facts amounted to a high crime or misdemeanor.

In briefer and plainer terms, no conviction can take place under this provision of the Constitution, unless two-thirds of the Senators concur in regard to every element necessary to conviction, and first and conspicuous among these, must be the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether it would be in order now to move to adjourn to a day certain, or whether the order should be properly that when the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourns, it be to a definite time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be in order to move to adjourn to a certain time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move then that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until Monday at one o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Say Tuesday.

Mr. KERNAN. If the Senator will withdraw that motion, I wish to suggest an amendment to the order proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to hearing the order read, so that it may be considered the pending order.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to suggest the proposition I send to the Chair as an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in default of an answer within ten days by the respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as on a plea of not guilty.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now modify my motion so as to make it that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until Tuesday next at one o'clock.

Mr. CARPENTER. To avoid any misunderstanding, I simply ask whether the Senator offering the order just read means by the order to exclude our right to demur to the articles?

Mr. KERNAN. I had not that particularly in my mind.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is very important that we should understand what we are to do.

Mr. KERNAN. It can be amended if the Senate deem this proper. I suppose that where a plea is put in to the articles of impeachment and a replication made to it and a demurrer to the replication, it really does test the sufficiency of the first pleading in the articles. It is quite common in States where there is pleading under the ordinary common-law practice. There a plaintiff may have a bad declaration, and the defendant's attorney not choosing to demur and tell him where it is defective puts in a bad plea, and the plaintiff demurs to the plea. Uniformly the demurrer reaches back to the declaration. If that is bad, the court so adjudges.

I had no particular point in view. The Senate can modify the order so as to say "plead or demur." I merely offered it that we might make some progress. I supposed the present judgment did affirm the sufficiency of the articles of impeachment.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senate to one thing? We have had a large number of witnesses in attendance during this protracted period, and we deem it desirable if possible, in connection with the orders to be made to-day, that some time be fixed for the trial, so that we can let some of these witnesses who live within a reasonable distance go home and return again, and thereby, perhaps, save some considerable expense.

I will say, in addition, that if the trial should not happen to occur on that particular day nevertheless it would be saving a good deal of expense to the Government and be a great convenience to the witnesses if some day could be fixed when the trial should proceed after the answer on the questions of fact. If anything should occur to prevent that, of course that would not alter the propriety of making the order, because, as I understand now, the trial is to go on.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I arise only to express the hope that by unanimous consent these orders that have been offered will be considered in open Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I hope I shall not be interrupted.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I feel called upon to ask the Chair to enforce the rules of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to know why the rule is enforced against me and not enforced against anybody else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hopes that is not a reflection on the Chair. The Chair called the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that debate was not in order. The Senator from Ohio stated that he wished simply to make a statement. The Chair indulged him in that. The Senator from New York, in response to a question of one of the counsel, also made a statment, which the Chair supposed he was making, and allowed him to make, by the same common consent.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise now to ask unanimous consent that this discussion be in open Senate. Is that out of order to ask unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not asked the Senate for unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMAN. No, but I was interrupted by the Senator from Massachusetts, who cut me off short when I was asking that unanimous consent might be given. I ask it because I have heard the decision of this Senate treated to-day with scant respect and the law with less, and I want the discussion in open Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reminds Senators again that debate is not in order. The Senator from Massachusetts insists on the enforcement of the rule. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until Tuesday next at one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to that, which I will reduce to writing.

Mr. CONKLING. I would inquire whether a motion as to adjournment is amendable except as to the time to which the adjournment shall be?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator will not object to the form. I have now my amendment.

The amendment having been reduced to writing was read, as follows:

Ordered, That this court adjourn until Tuesday next, and in the mean time the defendant have leave to plead, answer, or demur herein.

Mr. CARPENTER. I hope the Senate will also give us leave, if we conclude to make the motion, to make a motion to vacate this order on the ground suggested. It is certainly as important a question as the one which was argued and not at all settled by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. It strikes me that this gives ample privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio that debate is not in order. The Chair will also rule that the motion of the Senator from Iowa is a simple proposition for an adjournment, and that the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is not an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KERNAN. I will withdraw the proposition I submitted in favor of the one of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York withdraws his proposition. The question pending is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until next Tuesday at one o'clock p. m

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he has any objection to my substitute?

Mr. WRIGHT. I think I have. I adhere to the proposition I have made, and ask for a vote on that simple proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until Tuesday next at one o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment (at two o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) adjourned to Tuesday next at one o'clock p. m.

TUESDAY, June 6, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, legislative and executive business is suspended and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives (with the exception of Mr. KNOTT) appeared and were conducted to the seats provided for them.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Messrs. Blair and Black.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting on Thursday, June 1, for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to proceed with the trial.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the pending order submitted by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap is hereby ordered to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask leave in the absence of one of the counsel to present a motion drawn up by him which he would have presented if he had been here. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the motion submitted by the counsel.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
vs.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Here in court comes the said William W. Belknap, and moves the court now here, to vacate the order entered of record in this cause setting aside and holding as naught the plea of him, said Belknap, by him first above in this cause pleaded, for the reason that said order was not passed with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting upon the question of adopting and passing said order, as appears by the record in this cause.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.
J. S. BLACK,
MONTGOMERY BLAIR,
MATT. H. CARPENTER,
Of Counsel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the proposition submitted by the Senator from Maryland, that being first in order.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, it occurs to me that our motion ought first to be put. That motion to abate, set aside, vacate the order of the Senate ought to be put as it supersedes, takes precedence—it certainly does so logically—of the other proposition. And while I am up I should like to say to the Senate that our colleague, Mr. Carpenter, by whom this pleading was drawn up, is now unable to attend in consequence of illness. He is not confined actually to his bed; but his physician instructed him this morning that he ought not to and could not safely leave his room; and we would ask, before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of this motion, a short indulgence for the purpose of bringing him here to assist in the argument.

I do not know that it would be improper to say that we have no idea of dilatory motions in this matter; nor do we seek to put in these motions for any such purpose. There seems to be an impression, communicated to the public through the newspapers, that we are seeking in some way to delay action. Certainly gentlemen who have the experience that we have in legal proceedings know very well that nothing is to be accomplished by that. We want a fair trial, and a fair trial only, and an opportunity to present the questions arising upon the case which are of the very greatest importance; and, therefore, we feel bound to make this motion and to ask that time be given for the hearing of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The attention of the Chair is called to the fact that the proposition of counsel is not in the form of an amendment. The proposition of the Senator from Maryland is a proposition by itself, and so is that submitted by counsel Therefore in priority of time the proposition of the Senator from Maryland must be submitted first.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the order of the Senator from Maryland by striking out the words "is hereby ordered" and inserting "have leave;" so as to read:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the order submitted by the Senator from Maryland as amended.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Chair have the motion of the counsel read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion submmitted by the counsel will now be read.

The Clerk read the motion submitted by Mr. Blair.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the managers beg leave to submit a resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A resolution is submitted on the part of the managers, which the Secretary will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the order submitted by the Senator from Maryland as amended.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not rise to debate, but merely to make a suggestion. If the proposition made by the counsel——

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is inaudible here.

Mr. WHYTE. I was about to say that if the counsel for the respondent and the managers desire to argue at this time the proposition submitted by the counsel, the order which I have offered can lie on the table for consideration afterward. There is no proposition by the counsel, as I understand, or the managers, to argue the suggestion that they have made for a vacation of the order. If they propose to argue it, I see no reason why the argument cannot go on at this time.

Mr. BLACK. We have made no proposition to argue it now.

Mr. WHYTE. Or at any time. There is no proposition of a time. It is leaving it unsettled.

Mr. BLACK. Any time that the Senate may fix we shall be ready to argue it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the order suggested by the managers is an amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Maryland. I move it as an amendment to the order offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will submit his proposition in writing.

Mr. THURMAN. It is the proposition on the table as submitted by the managers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will have to modify the proposition, changing it so as to be in the form of an amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. It is to add to the order "and that," &c.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to hear both reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The order is in the following words:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

The amendment is to add:

And that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

Mr. Manager LORD. I present this in connection with the other——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on the 11th day of July, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits in the trial of this case.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to call the attention of the managers to the rules of proceeding in trials of impeachment before the Senate in reference to the first order offered by them:

If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor as aforesaid, or, appearing, shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed, nevertheless, as upon a plea of not guilty.

The rule now is just as the manager has presented the order.

Mr. Manager LORD. Except that we fix the time.

Mr. LOGAN. No, the time is first ordered. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that the order is a mere reiteration of the rule of the Senate.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maryland, and also of the Senator from Ohio, if it is the intention by the adoption of these orders to preclude the defense from raising the question whether a simple majority or a majority of two-thirds is required to sustain the jurisdiction of this court; whether it is the intention to cut off the defense from raising that question and arguing it before the Senate?

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, that question can be argued on the motion submitted by the counsel for the respondent. I suppose it can be argued at almost any time or in any way. In my judgment it never can be decided until we come to the final decision, but it can be argued on the motion submitted; although I think it is pretty clear, for reasons that I am not at liberty to state now, that it cannot be decided on any such motion as that submitted by the counsel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as debate is not in order, I refrain from saying anything except merely to remark by unanimous consent that I do not wish to be bound either by the question of the Senator from Michigan or the reply of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio to the order of the Senator from Maryland, which the Secretary will again report.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the order:

And that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the rule referred to by the Senator from Illinois. I have it not before me.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, is it in order for the counsel of the defendant to make a suggestion about these motions as they are going on?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The counsel and managers on each side are entitled to one hour on any proposition for discussion.

Mr. BLACK. Then I do suggest that it is hardly necessary to provide a penalty for the default by anticipation. It will be time enough to determine what ought to be done after we have made the default. It is not necessary to anticipate it. The answer will most probably be in. The chances are a thousand to one that it will not be necessary to say what ought to be the consequences of a failure to put the answer in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the rule referred to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The eighth rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

VIII. Upon the presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate as hereinbefore provided, a writ of summons shall issue to the accused, reciting said articles, and notifying him to appear before the Senate upon a day and at a place to be fixed by the Senate and named in such writ, and file his answer to said articles of impeachment, and to stand to and abide the orders and judgments of the Senate thereon; which writ shall be served by such officer or person as shall be named in the precept thereof, such number of days prior to the day fixed for such appearance as shall be named in such precept, either by the delivery of an attested copy thereof to the person accused, or, if that cannot conveniently be done, by leaving such copy at the last known place of abode of such person, or at his usual place of business in some conspicuous place therein; or if such service shall be, in the judgment of the Senate, impracticable, notice to the accused to appear shall be given in such other manner, by publication or otherwise, as shall be deemed just; and if the writ aforesaid shall fail of service in the manner aforesaid, the proceedings shall not thereby abate, but further service may be made in such manner as the Senate shall direct. If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor as aforesaid, or, appearing, shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed, nevertheless, as upon a plea of not guilty. If a plea of guilty shall be entered, judgment may be entered thereon without further proceedings.

Mr. Manager LYNDE. Mr. President and Senators, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the difference between the rule as it has now been read and the order which the managers have presented to the Senate for their adoption. The order which we propose is that the respondent shall answer on the merits. We have already been occupied for several weeks with dilatory pleadings. We have had a plea to the jurisdiction of the Senate. It has been suggested by the counsel for the respondent that they would yet demur, or ask leave of the Senate to demur, to the articles of impeachment. The managers believe that these dilatory pleadings have been indulged in by this Senate quite too long and without a precedent. I find no precedent either in England or in this country for dilatory pleadings on impeachment. In the first case tried under our Constitution against Senator Blount, it is true, the respondent filed a plea to the jurisdiction which is regarded as a dilatory pleading; but that was without authority and without precedent. There never had been a case in England where a plea of that kind had been allowed to be put into articles of impeachment, and it stands alone in this country.

The time which has already been occupied in this case must satisfy the Senate that it is not right that these dilatory pleadings should be introduced or allowed. In the case of Judge Barnard in New York, where the counsel for the respondent applied to the court for leave to file a demurrer or leave to move to quash certain articles of impeachment, the court refused the request and required the defendant to plead to the merits, stating that in the course of the trial of the case all those questions of law could be availed of by the parties and would be decided by the court.

Now, we think that if a precedent of this kind is established, if this Senate will go on and hear dilatory plea after dilatory plea, first a plea to the jurisdiction, a plea in abatement, then a demurrer to the form, there is no end; and when shall we arrive at a trial of this case upon the merits? If there was an officer of this Government now in office who endangered the liberties of the people, who was engaged in a conspiracy against the Government, and he stood impeached before the Senate, if these dilatory pleas were allowed, the evil to be apprehended from his action might be carried into effect and realized. And yet it is claimed that it is a matter of right by the respondent, on the other side, and the courts of impeachment of this country have by precedent at least, if not by direct vote, decided that when an officer of the Government is impeached he cannot be suspended from the functions of his office while the trial is progressing. No; it has been the aim and intention of the courts in all cases of impeachment that a speedy trial should be had, that the respondent should be required to answer to the merits, and then the court would consider the question, and the whole question, and protect and save the country.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President and Senators, it seems to me that this objection, if a good one at all, is taken too late. The only dilatory plea that has been filed or that is proposed to be filed was one to the jurisdiction; and my colleague says with very good reason that he does not admit that to be a dilatory plea. It is a plea that goes to the jurisdiction, to the fundamental legal capacity of the court to entertain the action, and it is a fundamental question, therefore, to be decided by the court and put in and accepted on all hands as a proper course. We were not given the time properly to argue that question. We had to rush into the discussion of it upon three days of preparation, and the delay that has taken place since has not been at the instance or the desire of the defendant here. We were not permitted to argue the question as it ought to have been argued. We were forced into its discussion without the adequate or proper preparation which counsel on a great case like this ought to have been permitted to make. It is true there has been a decision of this court upon a question that goes to its jurisdiction. If we had made that question under the plea of not guilty, and the court had decided it with the whole case before it, and there had been a difference on that point such as now appears in the decision of the court, no lawyer would claim that a final judgment could be rendered upon the case. All we ask now is to be heard upon that question. The gentlemen on the other side seem to be anxious to save the time of the Senate. We are anxious to save the time of the Senate, and we propose to do it by the discussion of the question to know whether the judgment that is now of record can stand consistently with legal principle.

While I am up I will say that the honorable Senator from Maryland does not propose to cut off a decision by this court upon our proposition to be heard. He stated in the hearing of the Senate that he was willing to let his proposition lie until the Senators could have a vote and ascertain if we would fix a time. We say to-morrow. We should be ready to-day if our colleague were here and able to come. To-morrow or the next day we shall be ready to proceed with the argument upon the question of the validity of the judgment which has been rendered; and I do hope that this court will allow an argument to be presented upon that fundamental question, and will not take snap judgment, because that is the proposition, to take snap judgment and say, "We will not hear you upon this question," on which we have had no exception taken up to this hour, and when we are not in default at all and have not consumed the time of this court by any attempt at dilatory motions.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to learn from the honorable manager who spoke what his proposition is. Does he intend to have the Senate throw out altogether the motion that we made, and refuse to hear it?

Mr. Manager LYNDE. It was not upon your motion, but upon the order introduced by the Senator from Maryland, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, that the respondent be required to answer upon the merits within ten days, and in default of such an answer, that then the case proceed as upon a plea of "not guilty." We have no possible objection to the Senate indulging the counsel in any argument they may see fit upon any question that may properly arise in the case, but we wish to get at an issue in this case so as not to consume the Senate's time and ours.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that there is no objection at all to our arguing this question whenever the Senate see proper to hear it?

Mr. Manager LYNDE. None.

Mr. BLACK. Well, I will say now that, so far as I can see, the statement of the law upon this point as made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is what meets with my view. I have not had time to consult with the other counsel in the case and do not know how they feel about it; but I think, whatever may be done with this motion or whenever it may be argued, it cannot really be directly decided until the final determination of the case, and that we ought to have, therefore, the privilege of arguing the point at any time. It is a question that arises and will arise at every step of this case as we go on. We have, I should think, a perfect right after putting in an answer to the articles of impeachment to object to any evidence that the managers may offer on the ground that it is all coram non judice; that the decision of the Senate on what we have been in the habit of calling the question of jurisdiction is in favor of the defendant, (there being but a bare majority,) and not against him.

At the same time, however, it seems to me that that is a chain of the question, which, for the convenience of the Senate and of all parties, ought to be settled at once; because, if it be the judgment of the Senate that they have no jurisdiction and that is placed upon the record as the judgment of the Senate, then that stops the proceeding, and it is not necessary to go any further. Everything that we do beyond that is labor lost, if it should be finally determined that the jurisdiction does not exist. We say it is determined already; that the question whether he was a public officer, and therefore within the power of the House to impeach him, is settled in his favor; that unless a majority of two-thirds have voted against him on the proposition it is lost; that it requires a vote of two-thirds to express the judgment of the Senate as a collective body; and that a vote of less than two-thirds is like a vote of one-half of a jury. It establishes nothing except the acquittal of the party accused.

Mr. Manager LAPHAM. Mr. President, I desire that this question shall be fully understood by the Senators before the vote is taken. A reference has been made to the rule adopted by the Senate applicable to impeachment trials. That rule is general in its terms. It provides what shall be the result of the defendant's failing to appear and what shall be the consequence if he appear and fail to answer. We have passed that stage in this case. The defendant has been summoned, he has appeared and pleaded; and the Senate have given a judgment upon his plea. Now, all we desire is to have an operative order in this case as to what shall be the future course of pleading; nothing more, nothing less. That is all that is to be attained by the resolution or order proposed by the Senator from Maryland and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

I agree with the learned counsel for the defense that, if it be necessary to retain jurisdiction and necessary that two-thirds of the Senate should vote that they have it, that question is available to them at any stage of this case, after the close of the evidence if you please. It is not necessary that they should present it here by a motion. We have no desire to cut off the consideration of that question. We are prepared to meet that question, to meet it upon principle and upon authority; but we want at this stage of the case an order of this court which will place the defendant in a position where, if he fail to put in an answer upon the merits, this case may, nevertheless, proceed as upon the plea of "not guilty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no more is to be said, the Chair will put the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the proposed order of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

Mr. WHYTE. In order to test the sense of the Senate on the subject of hearing argument, I offer the order which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed order will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until to-morrow at one o'clock p. m., when argument shall be heard upon the motion offered by the counsel for the respondent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As this order pertains to adjournment, the Chair will put the question first upon it.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the question is put, I think the convenience of the managers and of the counsel for the defense ought to be consulted in reference to these motions as to time. I do not know but what it would be perfectly convenient for them should we adopt this order, but I think their convenience ought to be ascertained. If the court is going to have the management of this case as far as time is concerned, I think we had better retire and consult as to what kind of an order we shall make. I would rather that such an order should come from the managers or the counsel upon the other side, so that they may agree as to time and accommodate themselves to the convenience of each other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state before any other Senator rises that it is out of order to debate questions, and the Chair is compelled to enforce the rule lest reflection be made upon the Chair, and he will enforce the rule unless Senators prefer by common consent to indulge in debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit that the question must still be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, inasmuch as the order offered by the Senator from Maryland is something more than a mere adjournment, and is an order for an argument.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that, as the order includes adjournment, he will put the question on the proposition of adjournment submitted by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CONKLING. The rule, I believe, permits a question to be asked. I should like to inquire in some form—I did not hear the statement—what was the statement made touching the illness or absence of one of the counsel for the respondent. I was called from the Chamber for a moment and have heard nothing in respect to it.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state that Mr. Carpenter, by whom this proposition was written, was very ill yesterday and is still ill, and that his physician, in my presence, to-day told him that it would be improper for him to leave the house, but he said that he hoped to be ready by to-morrow. I would rather have it laid over to the next day, but he said he could come, he thought, by to-morrow if the Senate was so urgent about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the order submitted by the Senator from Maryland respecting adjournment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until to-morrow at one o'clock p. m., when argument shall be heard upon the motion offered by the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays upon that.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bruce, Burnside, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry, Hitchcock, Jones of Florida, McCreery, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnston, Kelly, Key, Logan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Withers—23.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Wallace, and West—32.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate denies the order. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] The Secretary will report both in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed order is in the following words:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

It is proposed to amend that by adding thereto:

And that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the order as drafted by the managers is evidently upon the theory that the plea of "not guilty" should be entered if there was no answer. The first part of the order refers to an answer or further plea. I suggest whether the amendent as offered should not include what is included in the first part of the order.

Mr. THURMAN. A plea may be a plea to the merits or it may be a dilatory plea.

Mr. WRIGHT. The language in one case——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind Senators that debate is not in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not debating the question, but merely suggesting whether there should not be an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is difficult for the Chair to define debate.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Secretary be kind enough to read the order again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the order again.

The CHIEF CLERK. The order reads as follows:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

To that it is proposed to add the following words:

And that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment just reported.

Mr. BLACK. Is it now in order for me to make a remark to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to say that, while we do not see any special necessity for the amendment, we have no objection to it, because that is the right thing to be done in case we make the default for which that is provided as a penalty; but the resolution being so amended we can have no objection to it. That is, we think that we are perfectly content that that time should be fixed for putting in the answer.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the amendment offered, as I heard it read the last time, seems to be inconsistent with the original order. The amendment offered by the managers, in its phraseology, implies an answer and necessitates an answer to the merits; whereas the original order offered by the Senator from Maryland admits of a plea, or answer, or further pleading. It seems to me that under the one we might demur to the articles or we might file a plea. The Senator from Ohio adopts or moves the motion of the managers as an amendment to the order of the Senator from Maryland; and the one admits of a further pleading, that is, it would admit of a demurrer, and the other requires an answer to the merits within ten days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] The roll-call will proceed.

The Chief Clerk called the roll on the amendment, and the roll-call having been concluded,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On agreeing to the amendment the yeas are 31 and the nays are 5; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. WITHERS. There is manifestly a quorum present.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that if the President counts the Senate he will find that there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Sergeant at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order.

After a pause,

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire if there is not now a quorum of the Senate present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unaware except as the vote reveals the fact, without counting the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the roll be called.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are now executing our order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that all further proceeding under the order be dispensed with until the roll is called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that all further proceedings under the order be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. Is it in order to say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Further time having elapsed,

Mr. THURMAN said: I move that the names of the Senators who have not voted be called, so that they may vote. Several have come into the Senate since the roll was called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in order. The Chair is informed that there is a quorum present, the count showing fifty-three Senators. The Sergeant-at-Arms is executing the order of the Senate. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN and others. Call the absentees.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe it is in order to move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SARGENT. I submit that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that all further proceedings under the order directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of Senators be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Is my motion in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senators who have not voted on the amendment be called so that they may answer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was not in when the motion was put; I would therefore thank the Chair to state the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio to the proposition submitted by the Senator from Maryland. Does the Senator desire the amendment to be read?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to have both read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The following is the order:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

The amendment is to add:

And that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The names of non-voting Senators will now be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the names of the Senators who had not voted on the previous call; and the roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 35, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Dennis, Edmunds, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Eaton, Ferry, Goldthwaite, and Howe—7.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Spencer, Wallace, and Windom—31.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is agreed to. The question recurs on the order proposed by the Senator from Maryland as amended, which will be read as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date; and that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to strike out "plead further or," so as to leave it simply "answer," in order to correspond with the amendment which has now been attached to the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and the order will be so modified. The question is on the order as so amended, and the roll-call will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—years 33, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Cragin, Ferry, Howe, and Morton—4.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Barnum, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Dorsey, Eaton, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Spencer, Wallace, and Windom—36.

So it was Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date; and that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, may I ask consideration upon the last motion submitted by the managers?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposition.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on the 11th day of July, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits in the trial of this case.

Mr. Manager LORD. Am I in order in saying a word on that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, the reason for fixing this time on the 11th of July next is mainly that the witnesses are now scattered to both sides of the continent. During this long delay we could not keep the witnesses, we thought, in justice to them, and therefore they were allowed to go to their respective homes. Very likely before the 11th of July, possibly before the 1st of July, these witnesses can be gathered in; but we deem it more convenient to fix the 11th of July, and then it will be much more certain that the witnesses will be here on that day than though an earlier day should be fixed.

Then, again, the House which we represent is anxious not to have this trial interfere with the pending legislation. It is important that all be done before the 30th of June that can be done, and in order that the trial need not interfere with the important legislation before Congress, and in order that we may be enabled to get these witnesses from these distant points, the managers propose this day for trial, the 11th of July.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move to amend that order by making it the 6th instead of the 11th of July.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the managers accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers accept the amendment. The Secretary will report the proposititon as now modified by the managers.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on the 6th day of July, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits in the trial of this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, the managers on the part of the House submit this proposition for your decision.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to amend by saying the 19th day of June.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will here rule that a proposition submitted by the counsel or the managers is not amendable by Senators. The Chair will entertain a proposition of the Senators. The managers modified their proposition according to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, and therefore the Chair entertained that. The Senator from California can move a proposition covering the point he wishes to reach, and the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, on a question of this kind, so intimately affecting the business of the Senate, I think there ought to be opportunity for the Senate to be heard on it. Here it is proposed to spread this trial all over the summer. I move that the Senate retire for the consideration of this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that the Senate be cleared.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the rules be suspended and we go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I object to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. Manager McMAHON. Before the motion of the Senator from Indiana is put, I desire to say that the managers can be ready to try this case at any time within ten days from this date. The suggestion made by the chairman was chiefly to accommodate the public business, as I understand it; but if the Senate sees proper, in view of its knowledge of the situation of the public business, to fix this trial for the 19th of June, having had peculiar means of knowing where the witnesses are, how soon they can be procured, and what we want, I think I can safely say, on behalf of the managers, that we shall be ready on that time. Of course, it is only two days, after the answer is to be put in, but that is for the Senate to consider when they retire. We shall be ready at any time within a reasonable period to go on with the trial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the proposition of the Senator from Indiana. Will he state it again?

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate retire to consider this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that we close the doors and stay here.

Mr. MORTON. It is suggested that I change the motion to one that the galleries be cleared and the doors closed, that the Senate may deliberate. I submit that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the doors be closed and the galleries cleared, that the Senate may deliberate.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 15, noes 24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the proposition of the managers as modified, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on the 6th day of July, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits in the trial of this case.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I propose the same order, striking out the time fixed and inserting the 19th of June. If Senators will wait while I go through the manual exercise of writing it, very well. Otherwise I think the Clerk might write it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires all motions to be reduced to writing. The Chair will enforce the rule. The Secretary will reduce this motion to writing.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on the 19th day of June, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits in the trial of this case.

Mr. ANTHONY. Do I understand that the vote refusing to clear the galleries is equivalent to a vote to refuse to retire for consultation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The Chair put the question on clearing the galleries and closing the doors that the Senate might deliberate, and the Senate declined to do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is likely some might be willing to retire who would not wish to clear the galleries. I move that the Senate retire for consultation.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition of the Senator from California, which has been read, being the proposition of a Senator, the Chair will put the question on it as first in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to substitute for the 19th of June the 11th of July.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to amend the proposition of the Senator from California by substituting the 11th of July.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the proposition of the Senator from California before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is; and the Senator from Rhode Island moves to amend it by striking out "the 19th day of June" and inserting "the 11th day of July."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Is that liable to be amended again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move to substitute the 6th for the 11th of July.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend the amendment by inserting the 6th of July instead of the 11th. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understood that the order offered by the managers was the pending order, and that the order offered by the Senator from California was not an amendment to that, and therefore the question would be put on the propositions in the order they were offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that a proposition made by managers or counsel is not amendable by Senators; but any proposition made by a Senator is amendable by a Senator, nor can the proposition made by Senators be amended by the counsel or managers. A motion made by a Senator has priority of one offered by the managers or the counsel.

Mr. WRIGHT. But I understood the Chair to say that the order offered by the managers, being first in time, the vote would first be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair stated that, he was incorrect.

Mr. WRIGHT. I certainly so understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that the proposition of a Senator has priority of a proposition of the parties. The proposition offered by the Senator from California being before the Senate, it is proposed to be amended by the Senator from Rhode Island, to which the Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to inquire whether, if no Senator asks for the yeas and nays on these points of time, it is necessary to call the roll?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires it; but, if no Senator asks for the yeas and days, the Chair will put the question without them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the seventh rule excuses us from calling the roll on these questions unless the yeas and nays are regularly demanded.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the several amendments be read that we may know how the question stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending proposition is to strike out "the 11th" and insert "the 6th;" so as to read:

That on the 6th day of July, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment, proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the proposition of the Senator from California thus amended, which will be read.

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SARGENT. The proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island has been amended by the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania; and, being so amended, the question is whether that shall be substituted for the proposition which I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island was simply as to time, and the Chair took the amendment adopted by the Senate as taking the place of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island. The Senator from Rhode Island moved one day; the Senator from Pennsylvania moved a different day, and that was agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly; and now the question is between that date, being the 6th of July, and the 19th of June, as I moved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair stated, and he directed the question to be reported as it is now proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The original proposition was in these words:

That on the 19th day of June, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits in the trial of this case.

Mr. WHYTE. There must have been some misunderstanding, certainly, on the part of some Senators; certainly there has been upon mine. Do I understand that the Senate has already adopted the 6th of July?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from California moved in his proposition the 19th of June. The Senator from Rhode Island moved to strike out that date and insert the 11th of July. The Senator from Pennsylvania moved to amend the amendment, and instead of the 11th to insert the 6th of July. That has taken the place of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, and the question now stands upon the proposition of the Senator from California as thus amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not as amended, but as proposed to be amended.

Mr. THURMAN. I submit that the question is, Shall the 19th of June be stricken out and the 6th of July inserted?

Mr. WHYTE. That is the way we understood the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, as amended, stands in place of the proposition submitted by the Senator from California. So the Chair understands. All the difference is that the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania has taken the place of that of the Senator from Rhode Island. The question now is, Shall that be substituted for the original proposition of the Senator from California?

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the vote is taken, I should like to put an inquiry to the counsel for the respondent.

Will the 19th of June give the respondent's counsel such time as they deem necessary to prepare for trial on the merits?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will hear the counsel.

Mr. BLAIR. We have had no opportunity to confer on the subject, but, so far as advised, that would not give us the necessary time. We have some witnesses who will not be attainable at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now before the Senate is, Will the Senate strike out the 19th of June and insert the 6th of July? The Chair puts it in a different form so as to make it understood.

The amendment, as amended, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the proposition of the Senator from California.

Mr. BLAIR. Would it be in order for the counsel for the respondent to make a motion in regard to the time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be in order for them to make a proposition, but it would not be in order to amend the proposed order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be in order to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the proposition of the counsel.

Mr. BLAIR. I would beg, after conferring, to state to the Senate that we can only judge of the character of the witnesses needed for our defense by the character of those who are summoned here for the prosecution. There are some witnesses summoned for the prosecution whose testimony has been taken that we do not think bears directly upon the allegations contained in the articles. If those witnesses are to be examined—and I presume they will be, as they have been examined formerly—we shall need a class of witnesses and testimony which will not be at all attainable within the time mentioned by the order proposed to be adopted now.

We think that justice to the defendant will be secured and the public business quite as well advanced by laying this trial over until the next session of the Senate, or until some special adjournment of the Senate for November; and if it be in order for me to submit a proposition of that kind on the part of the defense I will do so. Of course the Senate will vote upon the subject. If it votes down the proposition of the Senator from California it will be permissible, I presume, to then offer a motion in writing to adjourn over this trial until November or the 6th day of December next.

I take the liberty of saying to the Senate that, while of course they know their own business better than I do, it seems to me that there can be no public object in requiring this trial to go on at this time. It seems to me that the convenience of the Senate and the convenience of all parties would be promoted by the adjournment of the trial over, say, to the 6th of December.

Mr. BLACK. Or to the 1st of November.

Mr. BLAIR. Or to the 1st of November, some time after the summer heats shall have passed away, when it would be convenient for all parties to be here. Our original proposition, as the Senate knows, was to adjourn this question over until after the presidential election. I do not think that anything has occurred since that motion was made to derogate from the soundness of the views I expressed in making the motion, and I now give notice to the Senate that, if they shall vote down this proposition of the Senator from California, I shall hope to make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon the original proposition submitted by the Senator from California.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the vote is taken, I desire to suggest that my client says that General Terry, who is commanding an expedition, cannot be brought here in time for the occasion now mentioned. It is necessary for him to be here, provided certain witnesses now on the list of those to be examined by the counsel for the House of Representatives are examined. In that case General Terry would be an indispensable witness for him, and he cannot be here before fall. He is ready to make affidavit of that fact, if the Senate should require it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the original proposition submitted by the Senator from California, which the Secretary will now report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on the 19th of June, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits of the trial in this case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is not open to debate, I understand?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not open to debate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask unanimous consent to make a single observation, not by way of debate at all, but by way of suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears no objection, and he will proceed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The question of fixing the time, in my mind, is very important to the Senate and the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think if the Senator will move that the doors be closed it may succeed; and then we can consider the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say simply in the interests of the exigencies of the public business that we ought to confer on this question before the vote is taken by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel it my duty to object to debate unless we can all participate in the debate. I have no objection to going into private consultation to consider this point.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to my honorable friend that I stated that I did not rise for debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is proceeding by common consent, and is therefore entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to hear the Senator and other Senators upon the question before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My object in making a single remark will justify me in making a motion, which I now propose to do, that the Senate have a private conference either by retiring from the Senate or by closing the doors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator that he move to close the doors.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the doors be closed for deliberation.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to deliberate.

The floor and galleries having been cleared and the doors closed,

The question recurred on the resolution of Mr. SARGENT.

Mr. SARGENT having modified his resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That further proceedings in this case, after the filing of his answer by the defendant, be postponed until the 6th day of December next,

Mr. EDMUNDS moved to amend the resolution by striking out "6th day of December next" and in lieu thereof inserting "6th day of July."

Mr. COCKRELL moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words proposed to be inserted and in lieu thereof inserting "19th day of June instant."

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment, resulted—yeas 19, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Dennis, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnston, Maxey, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Whyte, and Withers—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Booth, Burnside, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, Key, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Paddock, Ransom, Robertson, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Spencer, Wallace, and West—27.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS, he called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Kelly, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Burnside, Clayton, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, and Windom—9.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Spencer, Wallace, and West—28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution of Mr. SARGENT having been further amended, on the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was agreed to; as follows:

Ordered, That on the 6th of July, 1876, at one o'clock p. m., the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits of the trial in this case.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the doors were re-opened, after one hour and thirty-five minutes spent in deliberation.

The managers and the respondent and his counsel having taken their seats,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate continues the trial in open session. It has made an order which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on the 6th of July, 1876, at one o'clock p. m., the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits of the trial in this case.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, we have a motion to submit, which I will read to the Senate, as it is in my writing:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES }
vs.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP. }

William W. Belknap, by his counsel, moves the court that an order be made upon the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to furnish within twenty-four hours to the accused or his counsel a list of the witnesses whom they intend to call, together with the particulars of the facts which they expect to prove by them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the Secretary read the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the motion.

The motion was read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. Manager LORD. We simply say now that we object to the order entirely as without precedent and without reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, you have heard the proposition submitted for your decision on the part of the counsel for the defense.

Mr. Manager McMAHON. Before the question is put, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a large portion of the testimony, and especially the material testimony in this case, is already in possession of the respondent by reason of the investigation of the House which was published. He is fully posted in regard to every point that he may have to meet.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President and Senators, of course in respect to that part of the testimony which has been printed, it is very easy to furnish it to us; but I beg leave to say that there is a large portion of the testimony taken before the Judiciary Committee of which we are not at all informed, which we have applied to the managers for copies of, but they repelled us and refused to give them to us. We do not know what part of it they may rely on at all. We have rumors of its character from the press; but we do not know what part of it they mean to rely upon, or what facts they mean to rely upon; and as we are ordered to prepare, we want to make that preparation to meet such case as they may make. We think it is a perfectly fair proposition, and it is made in perfect good faith.

Mr. THURMAN. I submit an inquiry to be propounded to counsel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Is there any precedent for the order asked for, either in impeachment trials or in ordinary courts of criminal jurisdiction?

Mr. BLACK. No; but certainly there ought to be one made.

Mr. Manager McMAHON. It is rather late in the day.

Mr. BLACK. We do not go upon precedent here; that is, this application is not founded upon anything that has ever happened before. There never was a case like this before. I have never heard whether the managers object to this order or not. If they do, I cannot conceive for what reason. Certainly they do not intend to keep us in ignorance of the kind of case they are going to produce against us and take us by surprise and then proceed and run over us and get a conviction against us on grounds that we have no notice of. They do not think it is unfair, I suppose, to tell us beforehand what sort of facts they intend to produce. We want it soon in order that there may be no delay about this. We are for speeding this cause. None of your dilatory motions, if you please; do not hang back now since you have got the time fixed for trial and put us in such a condition as that we shall have to ask for a continuance again, and be again accused of desiring to delay. But will the gentleman tell us now upon what ground they desire not to let us into this wonderful secret that they have got?

Mr. Manager McMAHON. The specifications are very distinct and clear, are they not?

Mr. BLACK. The specifications of the general charge are clear enough.

Mr. Manager McMAHON. The particular day is given in each one on which your client is charged with receiving the money.

Mr. BLACK. Very well. Now we want you to state the particular facts, the evidence upon which you are going to sustain that, and the names of the witnesses by whom you intend to prove it.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, as has already been suggested by my colleague, the articles of impeachment set forth with great exactness and with great minuteness the precise facts of the case; and what is the proposition which the counsel makes? It is no more and no less than this, that he has the right to invade the room of the managers, that he has the right to ascertain their course of trial, that he has the right to know every possible witness to prove a certain fact.

Sufficient it is to say that the wisdom of all the ages is against it. The learned counsel had better devote himself to answering the question of the Senator, and find whether in all the past ages a single precedent of this kind has been had in any criminal proceeding. It is not enough for him to rise here and say he did not hear the managers object. He may possibly have been out of the room. It is not enough for him to stand here and say, "We need to make a precedent in this case." It is enough for us to answer that he asks for an extraordinary precedent, extraordinary proceeding, against the wisdom of all the past, and in regard to which he cannot find the first authority in rummaging through all the books of the common law and all the books relating to criminal jurisprudence. I am surprised that any such proposition should be seriously made here, that we should be compelled, in advance, to disclose to him the names of witnesses and what each witness is expected to testify to, when we have laid before him in the broadest manner every charge that we make, and one article of these articles of impeachment contains seventeen specifications. Many of us thought so much labor was unnecessary; and yet in order that there need be no complaint whatever, in order that we might treat the other side with the utmost judicial fairness, we have spread upon the record the amount and the time and the place and the purpose. Now for him to ask of us that we should hand him in the names of those witnesses beyond the Rocky Mountains and this side of the Rocky Mountains—I will not say that he asks this for any sinister purpose; of course we are bound to assume that he asks it for an honorable purpose—but sufficient to say that you would convict very few man on the face of the earth, that very few tribunals would ever render the verdict of guilty if such an order as this should be made in a criminal proceeding.

Mr. BLACK. I will tell the honorable manager the reason it is very important for us to have it. They have their witnesses here, or at least within easy reach. Ours are scattered all over the continent; some of them in California, others in the Indian Territory. It becomes absolutely necessary for us, as soon as we can, to get out our subpœnas for witnesses and use all diligence in bringing them here. If the trial is to go on upon the 6th of July or at any other time, even a month later than that, we will be hard pressed for time. We cannot know what particular witness we need or how many of them unless we are informed of theirs and understand what facts they mean to prove or try to prove.

I maintain, as to every public accuser, a manager of the House of Representatives, an attorney-general, or district attorney, if he has a criminal case which he intends to prosecute against a citizen, that he is bound by his duty and as a lover of justice to disclose the whole case to the defendant as fully as possible and at the earliest moment.

The gentlemen say, when we ask them for this list, that it is a secret which they have the right to keep and they will keep it until the moment of the trial and then spring it upon us, so that we shall be unable to meet it by contradiction or explanation. They wish to take us by surprise as much as possible, and convict the defendant, if they can, without giving him a chance to show his innocence. They say there is no precedent for such a call as we make upon them now. Nothing like this is found in the common-law cases. I do not know how far back they want us to go for a precedent old enough to suit them. In modern times it has never been refused. I admit that by the common law, whose authority they invoke, a man on trial in any criminal court had no chance at all for life or liberty. He was not allowed counsel. He was not allowed to call witnesses. He was not confronted with the witnesses against him. None of those privileges which are secured in our Constitution were given to a party charged with a criminal offense by the ancient common law. That common law was a bloody old beast.

Mr. Manager LORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? And that is, what was his practice in this regard as Attorney-General; whether he gave instructions to the district attorneys throughout this country to furnish the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution to the other side or not?

Mr. BLACK. I never gave instructions one way or the other; but I never had a secret in my life which I kept from a defendant in a criminal case. No man should ask me in vain for any fact that he ought to know so that he might be prepared to meet it. I would hold back nothing. I stand utterly amazed that there should be any objection to the demand that we are making now.

But they could not convict men, they say, unless they could come upon them secretly and suddenly, and catch them unawares; and so they lie in wait, concealed in ambush, to take them by surprise. That is what the learned gentleman means that this man cannot be convicted, if he gets a fair trial, if he is notified beforehand what the evidence is, so that he can answer it.

I am sure, just as perfectly sure as I can be of any fact, that not one of the gentlemen who compose this committee of managers has the least intention to do anything wrong or unfair, and when they come to sleep upon it, whether this order is made now or made at another time or not made at all, when they consult their pillows about it, every one of them will say that it is a demand which ought to have been listened to with pleasure and granted without hesitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed order submitted by counsel for the respondent.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

William W. Belknap, by his counsel, moves the court that an order be made upon the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to furnish within twenty-four hours to the accused or his counsel a list of the witnesses whom they intend to call, together with the particulars of the facts which they expect to prove by them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in this proposed order.

The order was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further motion on the part of the counsel or managers, I move that the court adjourn until the 6th of July at one o'clock.

Mr. Manager LORD. I would inquire whether sufficient provision has been made in regard to the answer? I call the attention of the Senator to that. The answer is to be put in in ten days. I ask whether sufficient provision has been made in regard to the answer and replication? I think some provision should be made in that regard.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will modify the motion at the suggestion of Senators around me, who think we ought to meet on the tenth day after this, that the Senate meet on the 16th of June at one o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You had better make it twelve o'clock. We can finish it in five minutes and then have an uninterrupted day for legislative business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I accept the suggestion and say twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate sitting in trial adjourn until Friday, the 16th of June, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that that be withdrawn that I may offer the following:

Resolved, That the managers furnish to the defendant or his counsel within twenty-four hours a list of witnesses that they intend to call in this case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend that order by striking out "twenty-four hours" and inserting "four days."

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to the modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California accepts the modification.

Mr. Manager McMAHON. I should like to understand one matter. We may call a good many witnesses whom we have not now in our minds. We do not want any order that would preclude us from calling any witnesses that we might at any future time deem important in the case. I may state here, so far as that is concerned, that the gentlemen have pretty full knowledge of all we expect to call, or nearly all, for they have been under subpœna for these four weeks.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like consent to say about three words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SARGENT. The practice in every State of the Union is to indorse on the back of the indictment, as required by statutes, the names of the witnesses called before the grand jury. It has never been construed that any subsequent witnesses whom it is found necessary to call should be ruled out; any further witnesses that were necessary in the trial of the case have always been admitted, notwithstanding that statute. That I believe is the universal rule. I do not propose if the managers find it necessary to introduce additional witnesses that they shall be ruled out by the adoption of this order, but that they shall furnish a list of the witnesses that they now intend to call.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I may ask unanimous consent of the Senate, which I do not believe in at all myself, to say one word, I will do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should propose to modify the order of the Senator from California so as to say "as far as at present known to the managers." He is quite right, according to my opinion, in his statement of the law, that if we made a peremptory order, which on its face seemed to exclude everything else, yet, if a witness was produced in good faith who was not known before, he would be received, we at the same time taking care that no injustice by way of surprise should be done to the other party. But to make it entirely safe, so that there shall be no misunderstanding, I move also besides the four days, which my friend accepts, to say "a list of the witnesses so far as at present known to the managers," so that they shall in good faith give to the other side all the names of all the witnesses whom they have at present any intention to call.

Mr. SARGENT. I accept the modification.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio. Debate is not in order.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask leave to be heard as other Senators have been.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THURMAN. I must say that it is news to me that there is any law anywhere which requires the prosecution to give a list of its witnesses to the defendant; but I am bound to admit that there must be, because counsel say so. There is certainly none in my State; I never heard of such a thing before. But, if it is so, it ought to be reciprocal. The State has some rights as well as the defendant; and therefore I move to add:

And that within four days thereafter the respondent shall furnish the managers with a list of the witnesses he proposes to examine, so far as they shall be known.

Mr. BLACK. We have no objection.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to hearing the Senator from Delaware? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot but remark that in the very nature of things the list on either side must be incomplete, and being incomplete it will be absolutely without value to either party. Therefore the request on either side, in my opinion, would be not only lacking entirely in precedent, but lacking in judgment and sound logic.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask unanimous consent merely to say one word to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WHYTE. There is an act of Congress on the subject. In all cases of trial of treason and other capital offenses the party accused shall have a list of the witnesses and the places of their abode.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want that to be read.

Mr. WHYTE. It is as follows:

SEC. 1033 When any person is indicted of treason, a copy of the indictment and a list of the jury and of the witnesses to be produced on the trial for proving the indictment, stating the place of abode of each juror and witness, shall be delivered to him at least three entire days before he is tried for the same.

Mr. GORDON. That is for treason.

Mr. WHYTE. Treason and any other capital offense.

When any person is indicted of any other capital offense, such copy of the indictment and list of the jurors and witnesses shall be delivered to him at least two entire days before the trial.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, I will say that we make no objection to the order after four days to furnish the list of witnesses. It was the other part of the order asked for to which we made particular objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] has moved an amendment, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the order:
And that within four days thereafter the respondent furnish to the managers a list of witnesses, as far as known, that he intends to summon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended, which the Secretary will report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the managers furnish to the defendant, or his counsel, within four days, a list of witnesses, as far as at present known to them, that they intend to call in this case; and that, within four days thereafter, the respondent furnish to the managers a list of witnesses, as far as known, that he intends to summon.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until the 16th instant at twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourned until the 16th instant.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having announced the arrival of the hour fixed, the legislative and executive business was suspended, and the Senate proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives (with the exception of Mr. KNOTT and Mr. HOAR, who were not present) appeared and were conducted to the seats provided for them.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Messrs. Blair and Black.

The Chief Clerk read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting on Tuesday, June 6, for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now ready to proceed with the trial. The Secretary will read the order made by the Senate respecting the trial.

The Secretary read the following order, adopted June 6:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date; and that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please give attention to the answer of the accused.

Mr. BLACK. The paper which I am about to read will require perhaps a little, but a very brief, explanation. The order made by the Senate at the last meeting was that we should plead to the merits, which means of course to the merits of our case in law or in fact; that is, we should answer to the charges or else raise an issue of law. For certain reasons, which you will find stated in the paper which I now lay before you, we decline to put in any plea; not because we do not expect to go to trial upon the legal merits as well as the facts of the case, but because any such answer as that which the Senate expect we should put in under that order would probably be construed as an admission that we are not already acquitted substantially.

But this declination to put in a plea will be followed, as a matter of course, by the course which the Senate expressed its determination to take on a former occasion, namely, that you will order the trial to proceed under a plea of not guilty, which the court itself will put in for us. We expect you to put in the plea of not guilty for us, and we hope very sincerely that you will be able to make it out, and we shall be here aiding and assisting you to the utmost of our power.

But we are in an extremely singular predicament. The sense of the Senate upon the question which was submitted to them could be expressed only against us by a vote of two-thirds. One-third and more than one-third of the Senate have decided in our favor. The others, less than two-thirds, are powerless, of course, to find against us any fact which is an essential element in any legal conviction which you may be able at any time hereafter to pronounce. The fact alleged against us, that General Belknap was a public officer within the meaning of the Constitution, has been found in our favor, but then a majority of the Senate say that judgment shall be pronounced upon that vote as if it had been a vote of two-thirds. The majority can do as they please; they can put whatever they please upon the record. While they are legally incapable of convicting him without the concurrence of two-thirds, the majority can say that we are convicted, although by them. We can do nothing but appeal to your reason and sense of justice and love of the Constitution, which we think will prevail at some time or other. That the question will be raised continually at every step in the progress of this affair, until we are finally acquitted and allowed to go hence without day, is very certain.

I now propose to read this paper, which contains our reasons for declining to plead to the merits, whatever that may mean, to put in any plea at all other than this, which is an allegation that we have been already acquitted; that there can legally be no further proceeding against us; and that we are entitled to a judgment which will allow us to go hence sine die. I proceed to read the paper:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
vs.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

And now, to wit, this 16th day of June, 1876, the said William W. Belknap comes into court, and being called upon to plead further to the said articles of impeachment doth most humbly and with profoundest respect represent and show to this honorable court that on the 17th day of April last past he did plead to the said articles of impeachment, and in his said plea did allege that at the time when the House of Representatives of the United States ordered the said impeachment, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited at the bar of the Senate against him, the said Belknap, he, the said Belknap, was and ever thereafter had been not a public officer of the United States, but a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa; and that the plea aforesaid and all the matters and things therein contained were by him, said Belknap, fully verified by proofs, namely, by admissions of the said House of Representatives before said court; and the said Belknap further represents and shows to the court here that the truth and sufficiency of the plea pleaded by him as aforesaid were thereupon debated by the managers of the said House of Representatives and the counsel of this respondent, and thereupon submitted to this court for its determination and judgment thereon; and that such proceedings were thereupon had in this court on that behalf in this cause; that afterward, to wit, on the 29th day of May last past, the members of this court, to wit, the Senators of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment as aforesaid, did severally deliver their several judgments, opinions, and votes on the truth and sufficiency in law of the said plea, when and whereby it was made duly to appear that only thirty-seven Senators concurred in pronouncing said plea insufficient or untrue; whereas twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court, by their opinions and votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be that said plea was sufficient in law and true in point of fact; so that the said Belknap in fact saith that, on the day and year last aforesaid, twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court declared therein that the said Belknap having ceased to be a public officer of the United States by reason of his resignation of the office of Secretary of War of the United States before proceedings in impeachment were commenced against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, the Senate cannot take jurisdiction of this cause; and that seven Senators did not vote upon said question, and only thirty-seven Senators, by their votes, declared their opinion to be that the Senate could take jurisdiction of said cause. And afterward thirty-seven Senators sitting in said court, and no more, concurred in a resolution declaring that "in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap is amenable to trial on impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office," and that twenty-nine of said Senators sitting in said court, by their votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be to the contrary thereof. And afterward, on the day and year last aforesaid, it was proposed in said court that the President pro tempore of the said Senate should declare the judgment of the said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, to be that said plea of said respondent should be held for naught, and a vote was taken upon said proposition; and, as said vote showed, two-thirds of the said Senators present did not concur therein; but, on the contrary thereof, only thirty-six Senators did concur therein, and twenty-seven Senators then and there present, and voting on said proposition, did by their votes dissent from and vote against said proposition. All of which appears more fully and at large upon the record of this court in this cause, to which record he, said Belknap, prays leave to refer.

Therefore the said Belknap, referring to the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 3, clause 6, which provides that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present," (meaning on trial on impeachment,) avers that his said plea has not been overruled or held for naught by the Senate sitting as aforesaid, no such judgment having been concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators sitting in said court and voting thereon; but, on the contrary thereof, as the vote aforesaid fully shows, the said plea of the said respondent was sustained, and its truth in fact and sufficiency in law duly affirmed by the said Senate sitting as aforesaid, more than one-third of the Senators of said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, having by their votes so declared, to-wit, twenty-seven Senators as aforesaid, and said twenty-seven Senators having by their votes declared and affirmed their opinion to be that said plea of said respondent was true in fact, and was sufficient in law to prevent the Senate sitting as aforesaid from taking further cognizance of said articles of impeachment.

Wherefore the respondent avers that he has already been substantially acquitted by the Senate sitting as aforesaid; and that he, the said respondent, is not bound further to answer said articles of impeachment; the said order requiring this respondent to answer over not having been made with the concurrence of two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid and voting upon the question of the passage of said order; and said order having been passed with the concurrence only of less than two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid and voting on the question of making and passing said order, the said order ought not to have been entered of record as an order of said court of impeachment in this cause; and said order appearing upon the whole record of said cause to be null and void, as an order of said court.

And the said respondent prays the court now here, as he has before formally moved said court, to vacate said order; and the said respondent hereby prays said court that he may be hence dismissed.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.
MATT. H. CARPENTER.
J. S. BLACK.
MONTGOMERY BLAIR.
Of Counsel for said Respondent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The answer will be filed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish that answer filed until there shall be consideration of it. I object to its being filed at present.

Mr. Manager LORD. I rose to make the same objection that the Senator has made, but it is now unnecessary. I ask that the order be made which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order submitted by the managers will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent, W. W. Belknap, shall not be allowed to make any further plea or answer to the articles of impeachment preferred against him on the part of the House of Representatives, but that the future proceedings proceed as upon a general plea of not guilty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I would ask the Chair whether there is an application on the part of the respondent for subpœnas for certain witnesses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand how that is. The Chair has a communication bearing on that subject which he will lay before the Senate. The Secretary will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE SECRETARY SENATE UNITED STATES.

SIR: On the 14th of June a list of witnesses to be summoned on the part of William W. Belknap was transmitted to this office, which I respectfully lay before the Senate for its action.

W. J. McDONALD,
Chief Clerk Senate.

Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the application? I do not care for a list of the names, but the number of names and the application, whatever it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the accompanying paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES
vs.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Witnesses on the part of the respondent:
[Here follow the names.]

Mr. INGALLS. How many of them are there?

The CHIEF CLERK. One hundred and ninety-seven or one hundred and ninety-nine, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the counsel or the managers do not wish to be heard further upon any of the topics that are now before us, I move that the doors be closed for consideration of the matters submitted.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, we offer a paper asserting our legal and constitutional rights, as we understand them. A Senator rises and says he objects; a manager rises and says he objects. Is that a reason for simply throwing it under the table? Is there not to be some reason given for such a thing as that? What is to be done with this? Walk over us I admit you can, if a majority see proper to do so. They can do as they please; they can order it to be thrown under the table; but some little respect ought to be shown a man who is struggling for his liberty and his reputation——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call the counsel to order. I do not think the language that he is addressing to the Chair is fit to be addressed to this court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Counsel will use language which is proper and decorous.

Mr. BLACK. If I am out of order, I am willing to submit. What shall I do to get into order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The counsel will proceed, using proper language. The Chair will call him to order if he does not use proper language.

Mr. BLACK. I desire that this paper shall be filed. After full and careful consultation with my colleagues and my client, we have concluded in good faith that it is our duty to put in this paper or some other paper which will disclose our reasons for declining to plead further. The paper itself is not only respectful to the Senate, but it is humble to the last degree; and either it ought to be received or some reason should be given for rejecting it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If by unanimous consent I can say one word, perhaps I can relieve the counsel. My objection to the paper was not with a view of rejecting it, but merely of holding it in reserve until the Senate could consider what ought to be done about it. That perhaps may relieve the fear of the counsel that he is not going to have it considered.

Mr. BLACK. Our offer to file it is, then, to be put on record?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question at the proper time. The objection the Chair notes; but the question will be subject to the vote of the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. I only wish to have it noted now that we offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has already been stated by the counsel. Do counsel desire to be heard further?

Mr. BLAIR. On what subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the pending proposition of the managers.

Mr. BLAIR. Is that a motion in regard to this paper?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In regard to the trial. The Secretary will report the proposition submitted by Mr. Manager LORD.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent, W. W. Belknap, shall not be allowed to make any further plea or answer to the articles of impeachment preferred against him on the part of the House of Representatives, but that the further proceedings proceed as upon a general plea of not guilty.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand, may it please the court, that any such order as that is necessary under the existing order of the Senate. By the existing order of the Senate we were given until this day to further answer, and we have openly and publicly declared that we do not propose to make any answer, but to stand by the record as the Senate has made it. Of course under these circumstances we expect

Mr. KERNAN. Will counsel allow me a moment? I supposed that the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont was that if the counsel desired to give any reason why when the counsel are refusing to plead further we should receive this paper, they should do so. That is a question we shall doubtless have to decide upon the objection; but if counsel desire to give any reason why the court should permit this paper to be filed, when the counsel refuse to file a pleading, let them give it to us now, as that will be a question that we are to consult upon, as I understand.

Mr. BLAIR. My learned colleague stated, as I understand, sufficiently our reason for declining to file any further answer and why we thought it proper for the Senate to allow us to put the paper which he read on its records. We cannot see any impropriety in asking of the Senate that liberty, to put upon the files of this trial in a formal paper our views of the effect of its previous action. That is all I desire to say on that point.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President and Senators, the objection of the managers to filing this paper is that it is in direct contravention of the order of the Senate, as we view it. The order of the Senate was that on this day the respondent should plead to the merits or that the case should go to trial as upon a plea of not guilty. The Senate have not forgotten that the learned counsel who makes this motion stated distinctly in this tribunal at the last hearing that the question now raised could not be settled until the final determination of the case, for it is utterly impossible to tell at this time what the organization of the Senate will be then. The managers then said, and say now, that on this point we are prepared to argue the question at a proper time, but it seems entirely premature to attempt to argue it now, when it is impossible, as I have already said, to tell what the organization of the Senate will be when the verdict is to be taken. How many it will take to make two-thirds of the members present at that time, it is impossible now to tell; and I repeat the counsel stated emphatically that the question could not be determined until then. He now comes here, declines to plead, and asks that this rather extraordinary paper be filed. And we say there is no precedent for filing it, there is no reason for filing it, and it is a violation of the order of the Senate.

It is suggested by an associate manager—and I was about to state it myself—that if the Senate should decide to allow this paper to be filed, then we desire to be heard on the question; but, deeming it entirely improper at this time to file it, we have no more to say on that subject until the further order of the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to indulge me in one observation. I think my learned friend, the chairman of the managers, is entirely mistaken in supposing that we conceded at any time that this matter could not be disposed of until the final hearing of this cause. We have not taken any such position as that. On the contrary, this paper itself takes the position, which we took in a paper heretofore presented but not noticed, that, the so-called question of jurisdiction having been raised by our special plea in bar—for that is what it was; nothing more, nothing less—it required the same vote to overrule it that it requires to overrule the plea to the merits in form, or not guilty. We wish a formal paper on the records of this body showing to the Senate and to the country the position and attitude we take upon that subject, and we think that now is the proper time. Of course, we do not say that we stand here to prevent the Senate from proceeding to the trial of the facts. We cannot do that, because they have already said—and we take it that what they have said they mean—that, if we do not on this occasion file a plea to the merits of this case, they would proceed and put in a plea of the general issue for us themselves; and we expect that now, as my colleague has said to you. All we ask is that this paper, which states formally the attitude that we hold and shall claim to hold to the end of this trial, shall be noted on the records of this body. I think that any impartial tribunal would grant us that liberty of claiming the right to argue as matter of law that this court has already decided this question in its action upon the special plea heretofore put in. I do not call for any argument from the managers now or at any time hereafter (if they choose to pretermit it) upon this question.

Mr. Manager LORD. The managers ask to substitute the order which I now submit in place of the one handed up before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substituted order will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap having made default to plead or answer to the merits within the time fixed by the order of the Senate, the trial proceed as upon a plea of not guilty, in pursuance of the former order.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, is there any motion pending to rescind or modify the existing order of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not.

Mr. DAWES. Why, then, should not the Senate proceed to execute its own order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two questions pending before the Senate, the Chair would remark to the Senator from Massachusetts. One question is on allowing the paper submitted by the counsel for the accused to be filed; the other is the proposition on the part of the managers.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask that the paper proposed by the counsel for respondent be read by the Secretary. We did not hear it fully in this part of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the paper submitted by the counsel for the accused.
