INTRODUCTION.

The value of precedents in guiding the action of a legislative body has been demonstrated by the experience of the House of Representatives for too many years to justify any arguments in their favor now. "We have no other means of building up parliamentary law, either in the Mother Country or here," said a great lawyer, who was also an experienced legislator,[1] "except by instances as they arise and treatment of them and disposition of the law and of the good reasons that should govern these considerations." And a great legislator, who had served a lifetime in the House of Representatives and the Senate[2] concluded that "the great body of the rules of all parliamentary bodies are unwritten law; they spring up by precedent and custom; these precedents and customs are this day the chief law of both Houses of Congress."

In the House of Representatives, as in other legislative bodies, the memories of the older Members, as they might be corroborated by the journals, have been the favorite and most readily accessible repository of the precedents; but as the generations of statesmen come and go much is lost, and many useful precedents cease to be available except as from time to time the voluminous pages of the journals may be searched hastily under the stress of some pressing question.

It is manifestly desirable, on a floor where high interests and great passions strive daily, that the rules of action should be known definitely, not only by the older members, but by all. Not only will the Speaker be enabled to make his decisions with more confidence and less fear that he may be swayed by the interests of the moment, but the Members, understanding the rules of his action, will sustain with commendation what they might have criticised with asperity. Thus, good order and dignity will be preserved to the body.

Mr. Jefferson, quoting with approval the famous English Speaker Onslow, has dwelt on the necessity of an adherence to the rules of procedure in order that the minority, as the weaker party, may be protected from the abuses "which the wantonness of power is but too apt often to suggest to large and successful majorities." The protection of the minority in its proper functions of examining, amending, and sometimes persuading the House to reject the propositions of the majority is an essential requirement of any sound system of procedure. Edmund Burke, when commiserated on his toilsome and apparently fruitless years as an opposition statesman in the House of Commons, explained that he found his reward in the fact that the minority which he led had caused many wise modifications of ministerial measures, and had also caused others to be abandoned in view of the honest and intelligent criticism which they would meet. When Mr. Jefferson wrote no one had seriously conceived that a minority might go further than this lofty and useful duty. But as the House of Representatives grew in size the rules and practice put into the hands of the minority the power of obstruction. This power grew to such proportions during the portentous legislative struggles preceding and following the civil war that at last it amounted to the absolute power to stop legislation entirely. Not only was the power justified because it was established, but it attained a certain degree of respectability as it enwrapped itself in the theory that on great questions the wisdom of the few should be permitted to thwart the rashness of the many. The abundant checks and balances devised by the framers of the Constitution to save the Government from popular passions were considered by a large school of statesmen inadequate without the added check of obstruction. Mr. Speaker Reed, in 1890, destroyed this system by the enunciation of the principle that the processes of a legislative body might not be used to destroy its powers; and since that day the minority has been remitted to its historic functions. The rulings then made constitute the only important reversal in the lines of precedent which as a whole have built up for the minority a safeguard for its legitimate duties, and for the majority a flexible and effective instrumentality for its necessary achievements.

In another respect the value of precedent to the House of Representatives should not be overlooked. The framers of the Constitution experienced little uncertainty as to the functions and powers of the House. In the Colonial Assemblies there was existing a political institution, indigenous to America, and proven by the long conflict arising from the attempts of the English Kings to establish arbitrary power. The people of America had fought the first battle of liberty in the Colonial Assemblies. Nowhere else, among the great nations of the earth, did the people possess such a perfect means of expressing their will. It was natural, therefore, that the framers of the Constitution should at once have conceived of a National House of Representatives, framed on the model of the Colonial Houses, and should have guaranteed to it the powers and privileges necessary for its preservation as the organ of the will of the whole people. It is a duty and a national necessity that those powers and privileges be preserved in their pristine vigor; and there is no surer way to this end than perfect information on the part of every Member of the House as to what they are. One of the chief ends proposed by this work has been the collection and classification of the precedents relating to this subject in such a way that they may always be clearly before the membership of the House. If the prerogatives of the House are wen understood, other branches of the Government are less likely to encroach on them; and if there be encroachment, it is more likely to be met with promptness, intelligence, and firmness.

It has been the habit of a certain school of statesmen to picture a fancied decay of the importance of the House as a branch of the Government. A critical examination of the present and past condition of its powers and privileges affords no foundation for this theory, which derives dignity only from the fact that it has been advanced from time to time for nearly a century. Perhaps it is to be explained by a confusion of ideas, resulting from the undoubted fact that with the great increase of membership the individual Representative has lost much of freedom and opportunity. This is a condition of all large bodies, well understood as long ago as when Thackeray, in writing the pages of Pendennis, caused his chief character to be informed that as a young member of Parliament his only duty would be to do as he might be directed by the leaders. From the ruling by which Mr. Speaker Clay repressed the superabounding individuality of John Randolph to the latest rulings by Mr. Speaker Cannon, the pages of these volumes show a constant subordination of the individual to the necessities of the whole House as the voice of the national will.

A hall of business, not always orderly and usually noisy, appeals to the imagination less favorably than a quiet and dignified school of debate. But if beneath the apparent confusion there can exist a system of procedure, just to all the members and at the same time conducive to an efficient performance of the duties of the body, the great objects of the House will be attained, and its place in the confidence and respect of the people will be unassailable. If the precedents which are gathered in these volumes can contribute to the perfection and maintenance of such a system, and cause it to be understood and appreciated within the House and without, the labor of their preparation will not have been in vain.

It can not, of course, be claimed that the system of the House's procedure is perfect, or that changes will not result in the future as in the past from the multiplied experiences of successive Congresses. And it is of the highest importance that those changes proceed on a basis of sound principles, having in view the maintenance of efficiency as a legislative body, integrity in methods of determination, freedom and fairness in deliberation, and as great privileges to the individual as are consistent with the rights of all. This happy development WM be promoted if from these precedents it shall be possible to understand readily and accurately the fundamental theories of the House's law.

Abundant references have been made to precedents of the United States Senate where they are of such a nature as to throw light on principles related to the procedure of the House, but no attempt has been made to make a complete collection of them. Some of those that are given are of the highest value, representing conclusions formed after careful examination.

In references to dates and volumes of debates and journals many thousands of footnotes are given. It is not reasonable to hope that no errors have crept in, but the system of double reference to dates and paging is such that the text of the work may be corroborated without difficulty from the pages of the journals and debates.

THE MEETING OF CONGRESS.

1. The Constitution provides for the annual meeting of Congress.—Section 4, Article I of the Constitution, provides:

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Also, in section 3 of Article II, the further provision is made that the President of the United States "may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them."[2]

2. In certain exigencies the President may convene Congress at a place other than the seat of government.

The District of Columbia is the seat of government.

Section 34 of the Revised Statutes, reenacting the law of April 3, 1794 (1 Stat. L., p. 353), provides:

Whenever Congress is about to convene and from the prevalence of contagious sickness or the existence of other circumstances, it would, in the opinion of the President, be hazardous to the lives or health of the Members to meet at the seat of government, the President is authorized, by proclamation, to convene Congress at such other place as he may judge proper.[3]

[1] The term of the Member must be coincident with the term of the Congress (see sec. 388 of this volume); but in the earlier practice this was not necessarily so as to a Delegate from a Territory (see sec. 403 of this volume).

[2] Congress has frequently met on a day other than the first Monday in December, being convened sometimes by a law and sometimes by the President. (See Journals of the House for the First, Second, Fifth, Eighth, Tenth, Eleventh, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Twenty-fifth, Twenty-seventh, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-seventh, Fortieth, Forty-first, Fortysecond, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Fifty-third, and Fifty-fifth Congresses.) Sometimes Congress, having been convened before the first Monday in December, has continued its session to and beyond that day, and having adjourned sine die has not, if it was a first session, convened again until the first Monday of the next December. (See Journals of the House for the Second, Eighth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Congresses.) A Congress expires on March 3 of the odd year, and its successor may be convened on the next day, March 4 (See Journal of House for Fortieth Congress), although by the Constitution it would naturally not meet until the first Monday of the succeeding December.

[3] The act of July 16, 1790 (1 Stat. L., p. 130) had provided that the seat of government should be transferred to the District of Columbia by the first Monday of December, 1800.

3. By resolution of the Continental Congress the First Congress under the Constitution met on March 4, 1789.

The term of a Congress begins on the fourth of March of the odd-numbered years, and extends through two years.

A Member elected to fill a vacanty serves no longer time than the remainder of the term of the Member whose place he takes.

The House sometimes appoints a committee to act with a similar committee from the Senate in relation to some question of moment.

On April 30, 1790,[1] the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That a committee of this House be appointed, to join with a committee to be appointed by the Senate, to consider and report their opinion on the question when, according to the Constitution, the terms for which the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives have been respectively chosen, shall be deemed to have commenced.

Messrs. Egbert Benson, of New York; George Clymer, of Pennsylvania; Benjamin Huntingdon, of Connecticut; Andrew Moore, of Virginia, and Daniel Carroll, of Maryland, were appointed a committee.

To these the Senate joined[2] Messrs. Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut; Rufus King, of New York; and Robert Morris, of Pennsylvania.

On May 18[3] the House agreed to report as follows:

That the terms for which the President, Vice-President, Senate, and House of Representatives of the United States were respectively chosen, did, according to the Constitution, commence on the fourth of March, 1789. And so the Senators of the first class, and the Representatives, will not, according to the Constitution, be entitled, by virtue of the same election by which they hold seats in the present Congress, to seats in the next Congress, which will be assembled after the third of March, 1791. And further, that whenever a vacancy shall happen in the Senate or House of Representatives, and on election to fill such vacancy, the person elected will not, according to the Constitution, be entitled, by virtue of such election, to hold a seat beyond the time for which the Senator or Representative in whose stead such person shall have been elected, would, if the vacancy had not happened, have been entitled to hold a seat.

The committee recommended the passage of a law regulating the choice of electors, etc.

This report had been previously agreed to in the Senate.[4]

The first session of the First Congress assembled, as shown by the Journal of the House—on Wednesday, the fourth of March, 1789, pursuant to a resolution of the late Congress, made in conformity to the resolutions of the Federal Convention of the 17th of September, 1787.

The late Congress, which was the Continental Congress, it being ascertained that the required number of States had ratified the Constitution, had on September 13, 1788—[5]

Resolved, That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several States, which, before the said day, shall have ratified the said Constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States and vote for a President, and that the first Wednesday in March next be the time and the present seat of Congress the place for commencing proceedings under the said Constitution.

4. It being desirable that the hour of the first meeting of a Congress should be later than 12 m., the purpose was effected by a joint resolution.— In 1869 a law provided that the next Congress should, as had the current Congress, meet on the 4th day of March. As the 4th day of March, 1869, would be the day of the inauguration, Congress passed a joint resolution providing that the time for the regular meeting of the House of Representatives should be postponed from 12 o'clock meridian on March 4, 1869, to the hour of 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day.[1]

5. The First Congress by law appointed for its second meeting a day later than the day fixed by the Constitution.

The First Congress having met once in each of its two years of existence, a doubt existed as to whether or not it would legally meet again on the day appointed by the Constitution.

Instance wherein Congress in adjourning fixed by resolution the time of meeting of the next session on the constitutional day.

Instances of laws fixing the time of annual meeting of Congress.

The First Congress met on March 4, 1789,[2] in accordance with the terms of a resolution of the Continental Congress.[3] This session continued until September 29, 1789. Before adjourning the following law was enacted, being approved September 29, 1789:

> That after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday in January next.[4]

Thus it will be observed that the law fixed a date later than the first Monday in December specified by the Constitution. The second session extended from January 4, 1790, until August 12, 1790.[5] The third session began on the constitutional day, the first Monday of December, 1790, but apparently some doubt existed as to whether the Constitution would require a meeting on that day, for, on August 10,[6] near the close of the second session, the House Journal has this entry:

> A message from the Senate by Mr. Otis, their Secretary:
> Mr. Speaker: The Senate have come to a resolution that the resolution of the 6th instant, authorizing the Speaker of the House of Representatives and President of the Senate to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on this day be repealed, and that instead thereof they be authorized to adjourn their respective Houses on the 12th instant, to meet again on the first Monday in December next; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.
> And then he withdrew.
> The House proceeded to consider the said resolution, and, the same being read, was agreed to.

The journal of December 6, 1790,[7] the first day of the third session, has these introductory words in reference to the date: "On which day, being the day appointed by adjournment of the two Houses for the meeting of the present session."

6. Early Congresses, having by law met on a day earlier than the constitutional day, remained in continuous session to a time beyond that day.

In 1797 the Congress assembled on the day constitutionally provided by law, although it had already held a session that year.

The early laws fixing the time for the meeting of Congress specified the day but not, the hour.

At the last session of the First Congress the following law was enacted, being approved March 2, 1791: [1]

> That after the third day of March next, the first annual meeting of Congress shall be on the fourth Monday of October next.

Accordingly the first session of the Second Congress met October 24, 1791,[2] and it continued in session until May 8, 1792. No attention was paid to Monday, December 5, 1791 (the day appointed for the assembling of Congress ordinarily), the sessions of the House proceeding uninterruptedly over that period.

At this first session of the Second Congress this law [3] was enacted, being approved May 5, 1792:

> That after the adjournment of the present session, the next annual meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday in November next.

Accordingly the second session met on November 5, 1792,[4] and continued in session through Monday, December 3, 1792, the day prescribed by the Constitution.

7. The first session of the Third Congress met on the constitutional day, December 2, 1793,[5] but it was provided by law that the second session should meet on the first Monday in November.[6] So accordingly it met on November 3, 1794[7] and continued in session without interruption through Monday, December 1, the constitutional day.

Both sessions of the Fourth Congress met on the days appointed by the Constitution.[8]

The act of March 3, 1797,[9] provided that the next meeting of Congress should be on "the [first?] Monday of November in the present year;" but the President convened the Fifth Congress in extraordinary session on May 15, 1797.[10] This session lasted until July 10. Then, on Monday, November 13, 1797,[11] the "day appointed by law," as the Journal says, the regular session began. This continued through Monday, December 4, the constitutional day, without interruption.

The third session of the Fifth Congress met on the day appointed by the Constitution.

[11] The statute says first Monday, but the House met November 13, which was the second Monday.

8. The first session of the Sixth Congress met on the day appointed by law; but the act of May 13, 1800,[1] convened the second session on the third Monday of November, 1800. It met on that day and continued in session through Monday, December 1, 1800,[2] the day appointed by the Constitution.

The second sessions of both the Tenth and Eleventh Congresses were convened by law; but in neither of these laws nor in any of the previous laws convening Congress was the hour of meeting specified in the law.

9. On May 22, 1809,[3] the day appointed by law [4] for the meeting of the session, the first session of the Eleventh Congress convened, and remained in session until June 28, 1809. At this session the following law [5] was passed:

> That after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the fourth Monday of November next.

On November 27, 1809,[6] in accordance with the law, the Congress met in its second session, and continued in session until May 1, 1810. When the first Monday in December, 1809, arrived (the day prescribed by the Constitution for the meeting of Congress ordinarily) the House continued its session without any recognition of the day.[7]

The second sessions of both the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Congresses were convened by law on a day earlier than the constitutional day, and remained in sessions through that day. Neither of these laws specified the hour of meeting.

10. Early Congresses, convened either by proclamation or law on a day earlier than the constitutional day, remained in continuous session to a time beyond that day.

In the later but not the earlier practice the fact that Congress has met once within the year does not make uncertain the constitutional mandate to meet on the first Monday of December.

Instances wherein Congress has been convened by proclamation or by law.

Instance wherein a law convening Congress specified the hour as well as the day.

At the second session of the Seventh Congress, by the act approved March 3, 1803,[8] it was provided:

> That after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday of November next.

But by proclamation of the President the Eighth Congress was convened on October 17, 1803,[9] and remained in session until March 27, 1804. The session continued without break through Monday, November 7,[1] the day appointed by law, and through Monday, December 5,[2] the day appointed by the Constitution.

The second session of the Eighth Congress met November 5, 1804,[3] in accordance with a law approved March 26, 1804,[4] and continued in session through and beyond Monday, December 3, 1804, the day appointed by the Constitution.

No law changed the constitutional date for the first meeting of the Tenth Congress, but it was convened by proclamation of the President on October 26, 1807,[5] and remained in session until April 2, 1808, without any break for the constitutional day of meeting, Monday, December 7.[6]

A law approved April 22, 1808,[7] provided that the second session of the Tenth Congress should meet November 7, 1808, and it did so meet and continued in session through Monday, December 5,[8] the day appointed by the Constitution.

The first session of the Twelfth Congress was convened by proclamation of the President on November 4, 1811,[9] and continued in session until July 6, 1812, no change in the ordinary proceedings occurring on Monday, December 2, 1811,[10] the day appointed by the Constitution for the assembling of Congress ordinarily.

By act approved July 6, 1812,[11] the time for the meeting of the next session was fixed on "as the first Monday of November next," and on that day the House assembled and continued in session through Monday, December 7, 1812, the day appointed by the Constitution.[11]

The first and second sessions of the Thirteenth Congress were called by law, the second session adjourning on April 18, 1814. At this second session a law was passed and approved April 18, 1814,[12] fixing "the last Monday in October next" for the next meeting of Congress. But the President, by proclamation, convened the session before that day, on September 19, 1814,[13] and it continued in session through Monday, October 21, the day appointed by law, and Monday, December 5, the day appointed by the Constitution.[14]

11. The first session of the Thirteenth Congress met, in accordance with law,[15] on May 24, 1813, and ended August 2, 1813. At this session the following law was passed, being approved on July 27, 1813: [16]

That after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday of December next.

When the second session assembled on Monday, December 6, 1813, the Journal records that it was "the day appointed by law," rather than the day appointed by the Constitution.[1]

In the Twenty-fifth, Twenty-seventh, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-seventh, Forty-sixth, Fifty-third, and Fifty-fifth Congresses special sessions were called by the President; but in no case was it thought necessary by law to fix the next meeting after the special session, but the provision of the Constitution was left to operate.[2]

The Fortieth, Forty-first, and Forty-second Congresses were convened in accordance with the terms of the following law, approved January 22, 1867:[3]

That in addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress, there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, at twelve o'clock meridian,[4] on the fourth day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, except that when the fourth day of March occurs on Sunday, then the meeting shall take place at the same hour on the next succeeding day.[5]

At no one of the special sessions called by this law was it thought necessary to provide by law for the next session to begin on the constitutional day (the first Monday of December), but the Congress convened that day in obedience to the Constitution.

12. One Congress having by law provided a time for the meeting of the next Congress, that Congress nevertheless met at an earlier day on call of the President.

Early sessions of Congress convened by law.

An early instance wherein the proclamation of the President convening Congress was not printed in the Journal.

On March 3, 1797,[6] the President approved the following law:

That after the end of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday of November, in the present year.

But on the 25th of March, 1797, the President (John Adams) by proclamation convened Congress to meet on May 15, 1797, to consider "divers weighty matters."[7]

Some question arose in the House as to the effect this extra session would have on the session provided for by law, and a conference with the Senate on the subject was proposed by the House, but declined by the Senate.[8]

On the first Monday of November the regular session met as provided by law.[1]

13. The statutes provide that in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability of both President and Vice President during a recess of

[1] On January 29, 1904 (second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 1401, 1402), the urgent deficiency appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the committee were considering the question of the mileage of Members and the constitutional question involved therein.

In the course of the debate Mr. Allan L. McDermott, of New Jersey, raised an incidental question:

"My understanding of the Constitution is that there are two kinds of sessions of Congress. One what might be called the President's session, the other the constitutional session. The constitutional session has this provision in the Constitution, that neither House shall adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other. Now, the session of Congress which I may designate as the Presidential session is under the control of the Executive. I call the gentleman's attention to page 23, section 3, of the book that he has in his hand.

"On extraordinary occasion on which the President may convene both Houses in case of disagreement between them in respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper. Now, if there has not been in its relation to the Executive any change in the session—in other words, if it is not another sitting as contemplated by the Constitution—then the President can adjourn Congress to-day to such time as he think fit, if there be a disagreement.

"* * * The President has no power to intervene unless the session is an extraordinary one. In other words, the President's session is to be held until they agree to adjourn, or until he tells them to adjourn. The question can not arise at a regular session. The President of the United States can not adjourn Congress as it is now constituted. We can remain in session for two years, from one session to another, and he can not adjourn it. Therefore the session which is called by the President of the United States has a constitutional distinction from that session which is called by the Constitution Itself." (Mr. McDermott later elaborated his discussion of this question. See Appendix of Record, p. 72.)

On January 30 (Record, pp. 1411, 1412), the debate continuing, Mr. Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine, said:

"I wish to say just a word with reference to the suggestion very pertinently and forcefully made last evening by the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McDermott], and that is with reference to the question as to whether the clause providing that the President may adjourn Congress from time to time is limited in its operations to a special or extraordinary or Presidential session, so called. If so limited, beyond any question it would create a constitutional distinction between the two sessions, which undoubtedly would settle the question pending.

"Since the adjournment last evening I have taken occasion to examine Madison's Journal of the Constitutional Convention, and the Federalist, upon that precise point, for the purpose of ascertaining what light, if any, might be derived from that source, and I should be glad to give the committee the benefit of the investigation.

"I find in the report of the committee on detail, made on August 6, 1787, that the clause in question appears in Article X, section 2, which reads as follows:

"'Sec. 2. He shall from time to time give information to the Legislature of the state of the Union. He may recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He may convene them on extraordinary occasions. In cases of disagreement between the two Houses with regard to the time of adjournment he may adjourn them to such time as he thinks proper. He shall take care that the laws of the United States be duly and faithfully executed. He shall commission all the officers of the United States, and shall appoint officers in all cases not otherwise provided for by this Constitution. He shall receive ambassadors, and may correspond with the supreme executive of the several States. He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons, but his pardons shall not be pleadable in bar of an impeachment. He shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States.

"'He shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during his continuance in office. Before he shall enter on the duties of his Department he shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I, ———, solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States of America." He shall be removed from his office on impeachment by the House of Representatives, and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or corruption. In case of his removal, as aforesaid, death, resignation, or disability to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the President of the Senate shall exercise those powers and duties until another President of the United States be chosen, or until the disability of the President be removed (Journal of Constitutional Convention (Madison). Scott, Forseman & Co., editors, vol. 11, p. 457.)'

"This is the first time the clause appears in the proceedings of the convention. It appears in a section defining the powers and duties of the President with the clause authorizing the convening of Congress in an extraordinary session, where they would naturally be expected to appear. It will be observed that the two propositions are found in separate and distinct sentences. One sentence reads:

"'He may convene them on extraordinary occasions.'

"And the other—

"'In case of disagreement between the two Houses with regard to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he thinks proper.'

"In this section the argument of juxtaposition as a reason why the clause in question is a limitation upon the so-called 'Presidential session' clearly fails.

"In the report on the committee on style, which had no power to change any substantive provision of the Constitution and only had the power to perfect the language and arrangement, made on September 12, 1787, these two independent sentences are grouped together, making two clauses of one sentence in Article II, section 3 (ibid., 709), reading as follows:

"'He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, etc.'—

"transposing the first sentence and slightly varying the second. Article X, section 2, down to and including the clause 'He shall commission all officers of the United States,' in the report of the committee on detail, appears in the report of the committee on style, in Article II, as section 3. The substance of the remainder of section 2, considerably transposed and with considerable change of verbiage, is found in sections 1 and 2 of Article II, in the report of the committee on style.

"Under these conditions the argument of juxtaposition seems entitled to but little weight. There is nothing said, so far as I can find in the debates in the convention, upon the construction of this clause—simply the report of the committee on detail, and later on the report of the committee on style.

"In the Federalist, in No. 68, written by Mr. Alexander Hamilton, who was also a member of the committee on style, reporting the Constitution in the language in which it now stands, this clause is referred to and construed. This is the great paper in which Mr. Hamilton is defining the powers and the limitations upon the power of the President of the United States, and with reference to this specific point he says:

"'Fourthly. The President can only adjourn the National Legislature in the single case of disagreement about the time of the adjournment,'

"I ask the Chair to note this. If this clause is limited to a special session, it is a very important and significant limitation. Mr. Hamilton is undertaking to define in this paper the limitations upon the Presidential power, and he fails to cite this important and significant limitation. Therefore it is a fair inference that in his judgment—he having made the report or taken a part in the report of the committee on style, and responsible for the language as it now stands—it was not limited in its operation to a special session, but applied generally. His first illustration of an analogous power is that 'the British monarch may prorogue or even dissolve Parliament.' This illustration, of course, can not be confined to special sessions, but applies to all sessions. Further, by way of illustration, he says:

"'The governor of New York may also prorogue the legislature of this State for a limited time; a power which, in certain situations, may be employed to very important purposes,—

"Applicable, apparently, to every session.

"Of course it is not conclusive, but it is significant, and if the Chair please, I point to the fact that while Hamilton elaborates the proposition, he in no sense intimates that it is confined in its application to a special session of Congress. If it is true that this clause is confined to special sessions, it is a most important limitation, and should have been emphasized rather than omitted by Hamilton. To hold that Hamilton omitted it is to impeach either his intelligence or candor, neither of which can be done successfully."

The act of January 19, 1886,[1] provides that "in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President of the United States," then the Secretary of State, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Treasury, and so on to the Secretary of War, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, the Secretaries of the Navy and Interior, shall act as President if they be eligible and not under impeachment; and it is further provided—

That whenever the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States shall devolve upon any of the persons named herein, if Congress be not then in session, or if it would not meet in accordance with law within twenty days thereafter, it shall be the duty of the person upon whom said powers and duties shall devolve to issue a proclamation convening Congress in extraordinary session, giving twenty days' notice of the time of meeting.

CHAPTER II.

THE CLERK'S ROLL OF THE MEMBERS-ELECT.

14. The law of 1863 makes it the duty of the Clerk of the preceding House to make a roll of the Representatives-elect whose credentials show them regularly elected.—Section 31 of the Revised Statutes, reenacting legislations of March 3, 1863,[3] and February 21, 1867, provides:

> Before the first meeting of each Congress the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of those persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials[4] show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States, respectively, or the laws of the United States.

15. The duty of making up the roll of Members-elect, in event the Clerk can not act, devolves on the Sergeant-at-Arms, and next on the Doorkeeper.—Section 32 of the Revised Statutes, reenacting the law of February 21, 1867 (14 Stat. L., p. 397) provides:

> In the case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk of the House of Representatives, or of the absence of inability of the Clerk to discharge the duties imposed on him by law or custom relative to the preparation of the roll of Representatives or the organization of the House, those duties shall devolve on the Sergeant-at-Arms of the next preceding House of Representatives.

[2] See sections 328, 366, and 376 of this volume for other cases of informal credentials, and sections 317, 388, 522, and 523 of this volume for cases wherein the Clerk declined to enroll because of election in excess of apportionment or doubts as to legal time of election.

[3] The act of 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 804) was in substantially the present form. The act of 1867 (14 Stat. L., p. 397) made temporary provisions relating to the States lately in secession.

[4] In 1877 a bill was introduced to prescribe the form of credentials and directing the manner in which the roll should be made up. But it was not reported from the committee to which it was referred. (First session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 253; Journal, p. 165.)

SEC. 33. In case of vacancies in the offices of both the Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms, or the absence or inability of both to act, the duties of the Clark relative to the preparation of the roll of the House of Representatives or the organization of the House shall be performed by the Doorkeeper of the next preceding House of Representatives.

16. In the early years of the House the credentials were examined by the Committee on Elections; but this practice fell into disuse.—On April 18, 1789,[1] a report was submitted from the Committee on Elections that the committee had, according to order, examined the certificates and other credentials of the Members returned to serve in this House, and had agreed to a report thereupon; which was twice read and agreed to by the House.

The report stated:

It appears to your committee that the credentials of the following Members are sufficient to entitle them to take their seats in this House. [The names follow.]

On October 28, 1791,[2] at the opening of the Second Congress, the procedure was the same.

17. On February 19, 1838,[3] Mr. John Quincy Adams of Massachusetts, proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That at the commencement of the first session of every Congress of the United States, every person claiming a seat in the House of Representatives shall, before taking his seat, furnish the. Clerk of the House the credentials authenticating his election as a Member of the House; and, in calling over the roll of Members appearing to take their seats, the Clerk of the preceding House shall not include in the call any person who appears without producing his credential.

Debate arising over this resolution, its consideration was deferred, and it was not acted on.

18. On January 28, 1839, Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, presented a resolution that every Member of the House ought, before taking his seat, to produce at the Clerk's table or deposit in the Clerk's office, the credentials by virtue of which he claims his seat. Mr. Adams, in presenting his resolution, explained that he had offered it in consequence of the disuse of a practice which formerly existed, and which he believed to be the practice of every other deliberative body. This practice had been adopted at the beginning of the Government, and had been continued until the last eight or ten years. Since then every gentleman had come and taken his seat without presenting any evidence of his right to do so. Mr. Adams's resolution was not acted on.[4]

About this period the journals show a discontinuance of the old practice of the Committee on Elections reporting on the Members who have presented proper credentials.

19. The House reserves to itself the right to correct the Clerk's roll of Members-elect by striking off or adding to.

On July 4, 1861,[5] at the time of the organization of the House, and while the oath was being administered to Members-elect, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to insert the name of John M. Butler upon the roll of Members, as the Representative from the First Congressional district of Pennsylvania, and that William E. Lehman shall be entitled to contest the seat of the said John M. Butler by giving him the required notice at any time within three months.

Mr. Lehman had been placed on the roll by the Clerk and had voted for Speaker. The Clerk explained to the House that he had placed his name on the roll because the governor of Pennsylvania had included him with the other Members from Pennsylvania in the proclamation which the law of the State required him to make of the persons returned as elected. This proclamation had been presented by Mr. Lehman as his credentials, and the Clerk had considered it his duty to be governed by this proclamation, rather than by returns of election judges which showed the election of Mr. Butler.

Mr. Stevens contended that the proclamation of the governor was of no binding force, since the law of the State required the governor to proclaim the result of the returns, and transmit the returns to the House. The proclamation was not in accordance with the returns filed, and no returns showing the election of Mr. Lehman had been sent to the House, nor had the proclamation. Returns showing Mr. Butler elected were presented.

On the other hand, it was urged the returns had been fraudulently made up, and that the governor in his proclamation had taken cognizance of this.

After debate the resolution was laid on the table, yeas 91, nays 48, and the oath was administered to Mr. Lehman.

20. On July 4, 1861,[1] during the organization of the House, and after the oath had been administered to the Members, the name of Samuel G. Daily, as Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska, was called.

On motion the question of administering the oath to Mr. Daily was postponed until after the completion of the organization of the House.

On July 5 Mr. William A. Richardson, of Illinois, moved that the name of Mr. Daily be stricken from the roll, and that the name of J. Sterling Morton be inserted in lieu thereof, and that said Morton be sworn in as such delegate.

It appeared from the debate that on November 2, 1860, the governor of Nebraska issued a certificate to Mr. Morton, the votes having been canvassed according to law by the governor, chief justice, and district attorney. Later, on April 29,1860, the governor issued another certificate to Mr. Daily, wherein it was declared that the first certificate was revoked, because of the discovery of fraud which had credited to Mr. Morton more votes in one county than he, in fact, received, and the results of which being eliminated showed Mr. Daily to have been elected. It was urged by Mr. Richardson that the governor issued the second certificate without action of the board of canvassers provided by law, and therefore had usurped the authority of the House of Representatives in passing on the election and returns. On the other hand, it was urged that Mr. Daily had received the highest number of votes and had the certificate of the governor.

The House, by a vote of yeas 57, nays 75, disagreed to the motion of Mr. Richardson.

The House then voted that the oath be administered to Mr. Daily.

21. On December 7, 1863,[1] the Clerk of the preceding House called the assembled Members-elect to order, and called the roll of Members by States, as made out by him under the act of March 3, 1863, which provided that he should place on the roll the names of "all persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States, respectively, or the laws of the United States."

After the roll had been called, the Clerk announced that other gentlemen had filed credentials which, in his opinion, did not meet the requirements of the law of 1863. The Clerk then read the credentials of five Members from Maryland, and the same having been read, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, offered the following:

Resolved, That the names of John A. J. Creswell, Edwin H. Webster, Henry Winter Davis, Francis Thomas, and Benjamin G. Harris be placed on the roll of the House of Representatives from Maryland.

A motion that this resolution be laid on the table having been decided in the negative, yeas 74, nays 94, the resolution was then agreed to.

Similarly the credentials of certain Missouri Members whose names had not been put on the roll by the Clerk were read, and a resolution that their names be put on the roll was offered.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that it was not in order thus to instruct the Clerk, but the Clerk overruled the point.

Then credentials were read of the Members from Oregon, Kansas, and West Virginia, and resolutions were offered and agreed to directing that their names, respectively, be placed on the roll.

The credentials of certain Members-elect from Virginia not being satisfactory to the House, a resolution directing their names to be placed on the roll was laid on the table, yeas 100, nays 73.

22. A motion to proceed to the election of Speaker has been held to be of higher privilege than a motion to correct the Clerk's roll.

In one or two cases it has been held that the Clerk may not entertain a motion to correct the roll which he makes up under the law.

Instance wherein, during the organization, the Clerk of the preceding House declined to entertain an appeal from his decision.

On October 15, 1877,[2] after the Clerk had called the roll of Members, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, as soon as the Clerk had announced that a quorum was present, moved to proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce and demanded the previous question thereon.

Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas James B. Belford presents the only certificate of election as a Representative in the Fortyfifth Congress given by the duly constituted authorities of the State of Colorado; and

Whereas the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress has set aside said legal certificate presented by said James B. Belford, thereby without law assuming rights and authority which only belong to the House: Therefore,

Resolved, That the name of Thomas M. Patterson be stricken from the roll of this House as Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress from the State of Colorado, and that the name of James B. Belford be placed upon said roll as a Representative in said Congress.

Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order, the Clerk having absolute control over the roll of the House.

The Clerk[1] sustained the point of order, and stated the question to be on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. Hale appealed from the decision of the Clerk.

The Clerk declined to entertain the appeal, on the ground that it was not competent for the Representatives-elect to instruct the Clerk in the performance of a duty imposed upon him by law, and for the further reason that a higher question of privilege was pending on which the previous question had been demanded.[2]

Mr. Wood's motion was then agreed to.

23. On March 4,1869,[3] at the time of the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called and the Clerk had announced that a quorum was present, Mr. George W. Woodward, of Pennsylvania offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the roll of Members of the Forty-first Congress be amended by the addition of the name of Henry D. Foster, as the Representative of the Twenty-first Congressional district of Pennsylvania, and that said Foster be called and admitted as the sitting Member prima facie entitled to represent said district.

Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, claiming the floor on a question of privilege, moved that the House do now proceed to the election of a Speaker.

The Clerk [4] said that the gentleman from Illinois had risen to a question of privilege which had precedence of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and therefore the question before the House was on the motion to proceed to the election of a Speaker.

24. On December 2, 1873, at the time of the organization of the House after the roll of Members-elect had been called and the presence of a quorum had been announced, Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, announced his wish to make the motion that the name of John E. Neff be placed on the roll as Representative-elect from the Ninth Congressional district of Indiana.

The Clerk said:

The Clerk thinks it would not be in order. He has always declined to receive such a motion at this stage * * *. The Clerk must decline to entertain the motion.

25. The Clerk's roll may be corrected during organization by reference to the credentials.—On December 5, 1881, at the time of the organization of the House, while the roll of Members-elect was being called, an error appeared in the Clerk's roll, whereby, instead of the name of Mr. William W. Grout, Member-elect of Vermont, the name of the governor of that State was called, an error having been made in making up the roll from the credentials, whereby the name of the signer of the credentials was substituted for that of the bearer. This error, being corrected by reference to the credential, Mr. Grout's name was called, and the organization of the House proceeded.[1]

26. The Clerk takes notice of the deaths or resignations of Members-elect and informs the House thereof at the time of organization.—At the beginning of each Congress, at the time of the organization, the Clerk submits to the House a table of the changes in membership since the election-that is, he presents the names of those who were placed on his roll but have been stricken off because of death or resignation. This seems to show that the Clerk may take cognizance of death and resignation in making up his roll.[2]

27. On December 3, 1883,[3] the time of the organization of the House, the Clerk,[4] when he had called the roll as far as the Seventh district of Virginia, announced that John Paul, who had been elected to represent that district, had resigned his office, the resignation to take effect September 5, 1883. Therefore the name of Mr. Paul was not called.

28. On December 3, 1883,[5] at the time of the organization of the House, after the Clerk [4] had completed the calling of the roll by States as far as North Carolina, he announced that he had information that Mr. Walter R. Pool, who was elected at the November election in 1882 to represent the First district of North Carolina, died on August 25, 1883. No certificate of the election of a successor had been filed with the Clerk. Therefore the name of Mr. Pool was not called.

29. An instance wherein the Clerk omitted from the roll the name of a disqualified Member-elect.—On March 4, 1871,[6] at the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called, the Clerk said:

> Mr. Sion H. Rogers, one of the Representatives from North Carolina, requested the Clerk this morning that when his name was reached on the call it should be omitted.

Mr. Rogers's name had been omitted, not being called with the other North Carolina Members-elect. No explanation was given at this time for this action.

Mr. Rogers's name remained off the roll until May 23, 1872,[7] when he was sworn in. It then appeared that he had deferred qualification until the passage of the law removing political disabilities.

30. Where it is not specifically stated that the bearer is elected in accordance with the law of the State and the United States, the credentials may be honored by the House, if not by the Clerk.—On December 7, 1869,[8] Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, from the Committee of Elections, made an oral report on the credentials of the Members from the State of Alabama. He said that the credentials were not in form sufficient to justify the Clerk of the House in putting their names on the roll had they appeared at the beginning of the Congress, because the credentials did not say that they were elected in pursuance of either the laws of Alabama or of the United States. Yet the credentials were in form sufficient to satisfy the Committee, and he thought the House also. Accordingly he moved that the gentlemen be sworn. The motion was agreed to and the oath was administered.

31. In 1871 a certificate from Arkansas, which bore on its face evidence that it was not issued within the time required by law, and concerning the proper execution of which there was doubt, was rejected.—On March 4, 1871,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, after the calling of the roll of Members-elect, the Clerk [2] said:

The certificate from the Third district of Arkansas bears upon its face evidence that it was not issued within the time required by law, nor within two months thereafter; besides, there is serious doubt whether the officer who executed it had at that time the right to do so. The circumstances surrounding the issue of this certificate are so suspicious that the Clerk feels compelled to reject it.

32. In 1871 the Clerk accepted the credentials from Mississippi which, though irregular in form, met all the substantial requirements of the military reconstruction acts.—On March 4, 1871,[3] at the time of the organization of the House, the Clerk after he had called the roll of Members-elect, said:

A question has been raised before the Clerk upon the credentials from Mississippi. While being peculiar in form, owing to the fact that the reorganization of the State was effected under the military reconstruction acts, they appear to him to meet all the substantial requirements of the law, and are therefore accepted by him.

33. In 1871 the Clerk enrolled the Tennessee delegation, although the credentials were at marked variance with the usual form and there appeared a question as to the time of holding the election.—On March 4, 1871 [4] at the time of the organization of the House, the Clerk [2] after he had called the roll of Members-elect, said:

Regarding the certificates from Tennessee, the Clerk desires to state that they differ essentially from the credentials issued to the Representatives from that State elected to the Forty-first Congress; that, strictly judged, they are both vague and evasive and that the changes made are so marked and special as to create a belief that they were purposely made to produce uncertainty. The Clerk has been in doubt as to his duty concerning them, but has finally concluded to give them this time the benefit of the doubt and accept them. The point which has been argued, that the election was not held on the day fixed by the laws of Tennessee, involves a construction of the constitution and of several of the laws of that State; and the Clerk has, under the circumstances, concluded not to rule upon it.

The Tennessee Members had been called on the roll.

34. A credential from Indiana not meeting the requirements of the law in 1873, neither claimant to the seat was enrolled.—On December 2, 1873,[1] at the organization of the House, after the calling of the roll of Members-elect, the Clerk [2] said:

In Indiana the paper issued by the governor respecting the Ninth district can not be accepted as a credential within the meaning of the law, and neither of the claimants is enrolled.

35. Conflicting credentials, signed by different persons as governor, being presented from Louisiana in 1873, the Clerk declined to enroll the bearers of either credentials.—On December 1, 1873,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called, the Clerk [2] said:

In Louisiana there are two unchallenged certificates from the Third and Fifth districts only. In the remaining three districts and the Representatives at large two conflicting sets of papers have been presented, each certifying the election of a different person and each purporting to have been issued by a proper State officer. There is no substantial difference in form. The one set of papers purports to have been executed on the 4th of December, 1872, and to have been signed by Governor Warmouth, though not transmitted by him to the Clerk's office. They were received, one of them early in March last, another later in that month, and two of them in the latter part of April, 1873. The other set of papers purports to have been executed on the 30th of December, 1872, and to have been signed by Acting Governor Pinchback, and transmitted by him to the Clerk's office by mail, and received early in January last. The Clerk accordingly enrolls the two unchallenged Members.

36. The credentials from West Virginia in 1873 showed a doubt as to the true day of election, so the Clerk enrolled only one Member-elect, who was indisputably elected on each day.—On December 1, 1873,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called, the Clerk [2] said:

In West Virginia there is a peculiar complication. There were two elections in 1872 at which Representatives in the Forty-third Congress were voted for—one of them in August, at the time of the adoption of the new State constitution, and the other on the fourth Thursday of October. In the First and Second districts different persons were chosen at these elections; in the Third district the same person was chosen at both. The proclamation and certificates of the governor reciting these various facts have been filed in the Clerk's office. The certificates of election are issued in the alternative, setting forth the due election of these respective parties, provided the time at which they were chosen was the time prescribed by law for holding the election. The Clerk considers these certificates inadmissible for enrolling either of the claimants in the First and Second districts. Assuming that the one or the other of those days was the legal day of election, Mr. Hereford, who was chosen at both, would appear to be entitled to be enrolled, notwithstanding the technical defect in each of his certificates separately considered. He has accordingly been enrolled.

A fresh series of certificates, dated November 22, 1873, and issued under an act of the legislature of that State dated November 15, 1873, by a new canvassing board specially created for that purpose and intended to supersede the papers issued by the governor under the then existing law, and which certify in form the due election of the persons who received a majority of the votes at the October election of 1872, have been presented, but appear to the Clerk to be of doubtful validity, and have not been accepted by him as credentials within the meaning of the law.

37. The Arkansas election case of Gunter v. Wilshire in the Fortythird Congress.

The Clerk declined to enroll a person bearing as credentials a mere abstract of returns, although certified by the governor under seal of the State.

The House very reluctantly gave prima facie effect to a certified abstract of returns not in the form of credentials as required by law and issued after the time prescribed by law.

An instance wherein the claimant seated on prima facie showing was unseated after examination of final right.

On December 1, 1873,[1] at the organization of the House, the Clerk announced that but two valid certificates had been presented from the State of Arkansas. The certificates of the Members-elect from the First and Third districts were in question, and their names were not on the roll. On December 2[2] the House—

Resolved, That the credentials and papers in the possession of the Clerk of the House in the cases of the contested elections from the First and Third districts of Arkansas be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report on the earliest day practicable who of the contesting parties are entitled to be sworn in as sitting Members of the House.

On February 9, 1874,[3] Mr. C. R. Thomas, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report on the prima facie right. The report first describes the papers presented as evidence—

1. An "abstract and certificate of the secretary of state" showing 12,522 votes cast for W. W. Wilshire, 11,961 cast for Thos. M. Gunter, 407 for Thos. M. Gunther, and 1,127 scattering. This abstract is accompanied by a certificate of the secretary of state of Arkansas, dated January 13, 1873, that "the above abstract is a true copy of the original now in my office, and exhibits a true statement of the votes cast for Congressman, etc., * * * according to the returns in my office; and I also certify that the same was cast up and arranged by me in the presence of Acting Governor O. A. Hadley within the time and in the manner prescribed by statute." Also, on November 20, 1873, the secretary of state certified to the returns of an additional county received after the first certificate was made. The belated returns increased the plurality for Mr. Wilshire.

2. A proclamation, dated February 18, 1873, signed by Elisha Baxter, governor, and duly countersigned by the secretary of state, under seal, proclaiming the result.

3. A certificate of election issued by Governor Baxter, giving the same abstract of votes as given in the proclamation, with footnotes, and in form as follows:

[1] Boone County has not been made a part of the Third Congressional district by any act of the legislature.

[2] The votes given to "Gunther" from Montgomery and Newton counties were probably intended for Thomas M. Gunter.

[3] The scattering vote in Pulaski County given to "Wilshire," "Guntee," "S. M. Gunter," "T. M. Guntee," "Thos. M. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and "Thos. M. Crenter" is a literal copy of the clerk's returns.

[4] A certificate of the clerk is appended to the returns from Washington County, questioning the validity of the election in Richland Township. If this objection is allowed the vote will stand: For Wilshire, 686, and Gunter, 1,125.

[5] Saber County has not been made a part of the Third Congressional district by any act of the legislature.

Scattered votes polled for Guntee, S. M. Gunter, T. M. Guntee, Thos. M. Guntee, T. Ros Gunter, and Thomas M. Crenter in Pulaslki County, 1,456.

There are no returns from the clerk of Scott County.

"STATE OF ARKANSAS, Executive Office:

"Whereas the acting governor failed to issue a certificate of election to the person who received the highest number of votes for Representative in Congress from the Third Congressional district of Arkansas at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872; and whereas on the 14th day of February, A. D. 1873, the secretary of state, in my presence, did cast up the votes polled for said Representative at said election from the returns on file in his office: Now, therefore, I, Elisha Baxter, governor of the State of Arkansas, do certify that the foregoing statement, with the explanatory notes, is a full, true, and correct exhibit of the votes polled for Representative from the Third Congressional district of Arkansas at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872, as appears from the returns of said election on file and certificates of clerks deposited in the office of secretary of state.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State to be affixed, at Little Rock, on this 18th day of February, A. D. 1873.

"ELISHA BAXTER, Governor.

"By the governor:

"J. M. JOHNSON, Secretary of State."

The law of Arkansas provided:

"Sec. 50. It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, within thirty days after the time herein allowed to make returns of elections to the clerks of the county courts, or sooner, if all the returns shall have been received, to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, or such of them as have made returns, for such persons voted for as Members of Congress; and the governor shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation, declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be duly elected to represent the State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and shall grant a certificate thereof, under the seal of the State, to the person so elected. "

The law of Congress provided:

"That before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives elect and place thereon the names of persons claiming seats as Representatives elect from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress, and of such persons only, and whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States, respectively, or the laws of the United States."

The most usual kind of credential is a certificate of the governor of a State, and such kind is required by the law of Arkansas. No particular form of one has heretofore been considered necessary by the House; and while such certificate, when it showed that the person named therein was regularly elected, etc., has always been admitted and held to be competent and satisfactory evidence of prima facie right to a seat, the House has frequently decided that the want of it from any reason would not impair or prejudice such prima facie right of a Member elect, but only remit him to other evidence to establish it.

Do the credentials and papers referred to the committee by the House resolution, any one or all of them, show that either Mr. Wilshire or Mr. Gunter was regularly elected in accordance with the laws of Arkansas, or do they establish the prima facie right of either to a seat?

In the opinion of the committee they furnish satisfactory evidence to establish the prima facie right of W. W. Wilshire to his seat. In their opinion the certificate of Governor Baxter is in itself sufficient in form and substance and legal intendment to establish such right of Mr. Wilshire. It indicates, or shows, that W. W. Wilshire received 12,644 votes, being a majority of 1,145 votes for Mr. Wilshire by the "abstract of the returns of the election held in the Third Congressional district of the State of Arkansas on the 5th day of November, 1872, for Representative in Congress;" and assuming that, as matter of law, the votes of the counties of Boone and Sarber should not have been counted or "arranged and cast up," because these counties had "not been made parts of the Third Congressional district by any act of the legislature," then the said certificate shows that Mr. Wilshire received a majority of 1,195 votes. And the certificate of Governor Baxter is to the effect that W. W. Wilshire was "duly elected," and is in accordance with the laws of Arkansas before cited and mentioned.

The failure, from whatever cause it arose, of the acting governor, O. A. Hadley, in whose presence the secretary of state did cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, etc., to issue the proclamation and grant the certificate—a duty which the laws of the State devolved upon him, and the act of Congress of May 31, 1870, as well (and said act made it a criminal offense in that he neglected or refused to do so)—could not prejudice the right of the people of the Third Congressional district, or of the person who had been chosen by them as Representative to the Forty-third Congress in pursuance of their obligation under the national Constitution. Such a failure, in any instance, ought not to be allowed by the House to hinder, impede, or delay the right of representation of the people of a district, or the right of the person chosen by them to a seat pending a contest upon the merits, when "that amount of proof which ordinarily satisfies an unprejudiced mind, beyond reasonable doubt," is produced in a case before it.

The report goes on to say that section 50 of the Arkansas laws above quoted is directory and that Governor Baxter was required to issue the certificate upon the omission of his predecessor to do so.

The majority did not conceive that the omission of the words "duly elected" or "other words declaratory of the fact or result would be nonessential, if not surplusage." The report continues:

A strict adherence to any prescribed or particular form of credential, or to legal rules of evidence on a prima facie case of election, would tend to prejudice the rights of the party claiming to have been elected, and of the people as well, and to prevent the organization of the House.

The case of Giddings v. Clark was referred to.

The majority of the committee, therefore, reported a resolution giving Mr. Wilshire the prima facie right to the seat, without prejudice to the right of Mr. Gunter to contest.

Mr. Lucius Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, submitted minority views, which say, after citing the law:

The question then arises, Does W. W. Wilshire present to the committee, and, through the committee, to this House, a certificate in due form from the governor of the State, declaring W. W. Wilshire "to be duly elected to represent the State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States?"

There can be but one answer to this inquiry. He does not and can not present such a certificate.

There is a certificate filed by him, issued by the governor of the State of Arkansas, which does not declare or show him to be duly elected, but simply gives a statement of the votes cast, from which statement it can not be ascertained who was elected; and a certificate is on file, in every respect identical in substance and letter, which was issued at the same time to his competitor, Thomas M. Gunter.

It can not, therefore, be said that the governor has issued a certificate of election to Mr. Wilshire.

After commenting on the action of the Clerk in not putting any name on the roll, the minority say:

Now, if the construction which a majority of the committee have put upon this resolution of the House is the true one, and it necessarily confines the investigation of the committee to the instrument by which the prima facie right is established, it follows that they should not have extended their inquiries beyond the face of this certificate, nor thrown before this House any information derived from evidence and proofs of a secondary character. Upon their construction of the resolution the proper course, in the opinion of the undersigned, would have been to have reported a resolution to the House that no prima facie right to a seat on this floor existed in this case.

Let us now examine this certificate and see if, from the facts therein stated, the committee had before them data sufficient to determine who, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, was the person duly elected. We have seen that no person was therein declared to have been duly elected.

The certificate shows that 12,644 votes were cast for W. W. Wilshire; that 11,499 votes were cast for Thomas M. Gunter, eo nomine, and that 1,456 votes were returned in unspecified proportions for Thomas M. Gunter and Thomas M. Crenter, those for Thomas M. Gunter being returned under different designations, each, however, clearly indicating Thomas M. Gunter as the person voted for. Now, can it be said that there is here any evidence that W. W. Wilshire received a larger number of votes than Thomas M. Gunter? It is clear that if Thomas M. Crenter received only 30 or 40 of these 1,456 votes, Thomas M. Gunter is the person duly elected. It is also equally clear that if Thomas M. Crenter received a larger proportion of the 1,456 votes than Thomas M. Gunter, then W. W. Wilshire is elected. But it is impossible to determine from anything on the face of this certificate what was the actual vote cast for Thomas M. Crenter, and therefore equally impossible to determine which candidate received the most votes, W. W. Wilshire or Thomas M. Gunter. This is fatal to the certificate as the credentials of Mr. Wilshire. To ascertain who was elected, it becomes necessary to refer to other proofs, which opens an inquiry into the merits of the case, and involves an abandonment of the prima facie consideration. The only alternative, therefore, as it seemed to the undersigned, was to enter at once upon the question of the fact of the election, and if the committee deemed it had not power to do so under the resolution of the House, to ask of the House an enlargement of its powers.

While the undersigned believe that if the governor's certificate shows no prima facie title to the seat on account of the doubt as to the identity of Thomas M. Crenter, it is the duty of the committee to inquire at once into the merits of the case, and to consider all the proofs bearing upon the merits, including the depositions as well as the documentary proofs; they are at the same time clearly of the opinion that the documentary proofs, outside of the certificates, show a large majority in favor of Mr. Gunter.

The minority thereupon proceed to argue that the tabulation of the secretary of state was under suspicion, and to show its defective nature proposed to introduce the returns of Pulaski County, saying:

> If it is said that this return from Pulaski County and these proofs just cited can not be considered in a prima facie case, we reply that we have referred to them, not for the purpose of showing any prima facie case for Mr. Gunter, but simply to show that, so far from remedying the defects of Mr. Wilshire's claim, based on the certificate either of the governor or the secretary, they show Mr. Gunter to have been elected.
> We have shown that neither the governor's certificate nor the secretary's casting up, standing by itself, establishes any prima facie right to the contested seat in W. W. Wilshire. If it is said that the two supplement each other, each supplying the deficiency of the other, in answer we reply that discrepancies and direct contradictions in these documents are so glaring and numerous as to neutralize the effect and destroy the validity of both as instruments of evidence.

In accordance with this line of argument the minority proposed a resolution that the case be recommitted with instructions that the committee report on the merits of the case.

The report was debated at length on February 17.[1] In this debate it was pointed out that the acting governor had in another Arkansas district certified that "O. P. Snyder was duly elected a Member of Congress," but that in this case the governor did not certify that either of the gentlemen was elected. It was also urged by Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, that the footnotes made it a moral certainty that all the scattering votes were intended for Mr. Gunter.

In reply it was denied that the table made it certain that the scattering votes were intended for Mr. Gunter. The governor had not expressly declared in his certificate who was elected, but by incorporating the table be made it a part of the certificate, and thus showed who was elected. The fact that the words "duly elected" did not appear in the certificate was not fatal. There was no form of certificate prescribed by the House, and the State of Arkansas had not fixed the form. The footings of the table showed who was prima facie entitled to the seat.

The question being taken on the motion to substitute the minority proposition for the majority, there appeared, yeas 116, nays 117.[2]

The question then recurring on the passage of the resolution recommended by the majority of the committee, there appeared, yeas 118, nays 96. So the resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was made and disposed of on the next day.

Thereupon Mr. Wilshire appeared and took the oath.

38. The Arkansas election case of Gunter v. Wilshire—Continued.

A notice of contest served within thirty days of the issuance of the governor's proclamation was held sufficient, although the proclamation was not issued within the time prescribed by law.

Original returns of the precincts being lost, the House by testimony proved that certain votes returned as "scattering" because of misnomer were actually cast for contestant.

An instance wherein the House seated a contestant belonging to the minority party.

On June 3[1] Mr. J. W. Robinson, of Ohio, presented the report on the question of final right to the seat.

At the outset a preliminary question arose, which was disposed of as follows:

The contestee claims that the contest should be dismissed because the notice of contest was not served on him within thirty days from the day fixed by law for canvassing the returns and determining the result of the election.

The returns were first canvassed by the secretary of state, in the presence of Governor Hadley, on the 14th of December, 1872, but no proclamation of the result was made, nor any certificate of election issued to anyone, both of which the statute of the State required the governor to do immediately. (See sec. 50.) Afterward Elisha Baxter, being inaugurated governor, having, on the 18th day of February, 1873, caused the votes to be again canvassed by the secretary of state in his presence, made proclamation of the result, and issued his certificate.

This proclamation and certificate constitute the only announcement of the determination of the result of the election in that district, and the committee are of the opinion that, in view of all the circumstances, the service of notice of contest on the 13th of March is sufficient, and overruled the motion to dismiss the contest.

As to the merits of the case, the committee were unanimous in their conclusions:

By some strange mishap the original returns of the precincts where these scattering votes were cast have been lost or destroyed.

The testimony submitted satisfies the committee that the contestee and the contestant were the only candidates for Congress in that district; that 1,433 of the "scattering" votes referred to in the governor's certificate as being given for "Guntee," "T. M. Guntee," "Thomas M. Guntee," and "T. Ross Gunter," were, in fact, given for Thomas M. Gunter, and should be counted for him; and that 1 vote, referred to as given for "S. M. Guntee," and the 32 given for "Thomas M. Crenter," about which no evidence was offered, are not proven to have been cast for Thomas M. Gunter. The testimony on this point is voluminous, but entirely satisfactory, and the 1,433 votes are added by the committee to the credit of contestant Thomas M. Gunter. So, also, the 407 votes in Montgomery County, and the 184 votes in Newton County, returned for "Gunther," were cast for Thomas M. Gunter; also, the 12 votes in Pulaski County, returned for "Wilshire," were cast for the contestee, and should be credited to them, respectively.

Correcting the canvass of the returns, as above indicated, the committee find the whole vote returned, and to be counted for contestant, Thomas M. Gunter, to be 13,513, and for the contestee 12,656, giving the contestant a majority of 857 votes.

In the foregoing schedule no votes are canvassed from Scott County, and but 194 from Johnson County. In both of these counties returns were made which, if counted, would increase the majority of the contestant 1,003.

In accordance with their conclusions, the committee reported resolutions declaring Mr. Wilshire not entitled to the seat, and declaring Mr. Gunter, the contestant, elected.

On June 16,[2] the House without debate or division agreed to the resolutions, and Mr. Gunter was sworn in.[3]

39. In 1875 a paper of unusual form was submitted to the House at the time of organization by the Clerk, who had declined to make an enrollment on the strength thereof.—On December 6, 1875,[1] at the organization of the House, after the calling of the roll of Members-elect, the Clerk[2] said:

For the Thirty-third district of New York the vacancy on the roll caused by the death of the gentleman originally returned has not been filled. The action of the State board of canvassers upon the returns of the late election has been received at the Clerk's office, but, being of unusual form, is submitted for action of the House.

40. In 1875 the Clerk enrolled the names of those bearing credentials signed by the recognized de facto governor of Louisiana, although there were other conflicting credentials.—On December 6, 1875,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, after calling the roll of Members-elect, the Clerk[2] said:

Respecting Louisiana, the Clerk begs to say that he has received two sets of certificates as to the first five districts—one signed by William Pitt Kellogg, as governor of Louisiana; the other signed by John McEnery, as governor of Louisiana. The Kellogg certificates were all received by the Clerk prior to the adjournment of the Forty-third Congress. One of the McEnery certificates was also received during that session; the others at different dates during the last summer and fall. The two sets of certificates agree in declaring the same persons elected in the First, Second, Third, and Fourth districts. In the Fifth the Kellogg certificate declares Mr. Frank Morey elected; the McEnery certificate declares Mr. William B. Spencer elected. As to the Sixth district, no McEnery certificate has been presented. The Kellogg certificate declares Mr. Charles E. Nash elected. The Clerk has enrolled all the gentlemen bearing the Kellogg certificates as coming from the de facto governor recognized by the last House.

41. Of three sets of credentials presented from Louisiana in 1877 the Clerk honored those which conformed to the requirements of State law.—On October 15, 1877,[3] at the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called, the Clerk[4] said:

In reference to the State of Louisiana, the Clerk, if there be no objection, will take occasion here to remark that there were received from the State of Louisiana three different sets of credentials, one set signed by John McEnery, as governor of Louisiana, bearing date December 20, 1876, and declaring certain persons elected from the First, Fourth, and Sixth districts, but silent as to the persons elected from the other districts of said State. Inasmuch, however, as said McEnery was never de facto governor of Louisiana, and never, in point of fact, exercised or performed the functions of that office, it is not deemed necessary to make here any statement concerning the regularity or irregularity of the credentials coming from that source.

Another set of credentials is signed by William Pitt Kellogg, as governor of Louisiana, with the seal of the State attached, all of which not only bear different dates, but also reached the hands of the Clerk at different times and through different channels, and simply declare the persons elected from each of the districts of said State, respectively, except the Second district, as to which no certificate seems to have been issued by said Kellogg in favor of anyone. The law of Louisiana prescribing the character of the credentials by which the elections of its Representatives in Congress shall be authenticated and known provides as follows:

"That as soon as possible after the expiration of the time of making the returns of the election of Representative in Congress, a certificate of the returns of the election for such Representatives shall be entered upon record by the secretary of state, signed by the governor, and a copy thereof, subscribed by said officers, shall be delivered to the persons so elected and another copy transmitted to the House of Representatives of the United States, directed to the Clerk thereof."

[4] George M. Adams, of Kentucky, Clerk.

These credentials signed by Governor Kellogg are in no sense a compliance with the requirement of the laws of Louisiana. They do not even purport to be entered on the record by the secretary of state and there signed by the governor, but are, on the contrary, a simple declaration by him that certain persons are elected, without even stating the sources of his information, and do more constitute credentials within the meaning of the laws of Louisiana than a simple statement from the treasurer or other State official would be. They are not such papers as the law of Louisiana has prescribed as the credentials by which the election of its Representatives in Congress shall be authenticated and known, and could not therefore be recognized by the Clerk as such, whose duty it is, under the law, to place on the roll the names of those, and only those, whose credentials show that they are elected in accordance with the laws of their respective States or the laws of the United States.

The other set of credentials is signed by Francis P. Nichols, as governor of Louisiana, and Oscar Arroyo, as assistant secretary of state, with the seal of the State attached. All of them bear date February 27, 1877, and all of them reached the hands of the Clerk at the same time, and through the channels prescribed by law. They declare the persons elected in each of the districts of Louisiana, respectively, and conflict with the certificate signed by Governor Kellogg in reference to two districts only. These credentials comply, it is thought, with the laws of Louisiana in every respect, and the Clerk has accordingly placed on the roll the names of the persons contained in these credentials.

42. In 1877 the Clerk disregarded credentials issued by the governor of Colorado in due form, holding that they showed the election to have been held on a day unauthorized by law.—On October 15, 1877,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, during the call of the roll of Members-elect the Clerk[2] said:

The Clerk will make a Statement with reference to the reasons by which he was controlled in not placing on the roll the names of anyone from the State of Colorado. There has been received by the Clerk a credential, signed by Governor J. L. Routt as governor of that State, with the seal of the State attached, declaring the election of James B. Belford on the 3d day of October, 1876. The law of Congress, in term, declares that the Clerk shall place upon the roll the names of those Representatives, and of those only, whose credentials show that they are elected in accordance with the laws of their States, respectively, or the laws of the United States. The Clerk does not think that there is any law inexistence, either in the State of Colorado, or any law of the United States, which authorizes the election of a Representative of the Forty-fifth Congress on the 3d day of October, 1876. That being the case, and the certificate which Mr. Belford brings showing on its very face that he was elected at a time unauthorized by either the laws of the United States or of his State, the Clerk could see no way in which he could possibly place the name of Mr. Belford on the roll.

The Clerk read the certificate, as follows:

"Certificate of election.

"STATE OF COLORADO, State Department, ss:

"I, John L. Routt, governor of the State of Colorado, hereby certify that at an election held on the 3d day of October, A. D. 1876, James B. Belford received 13,249 votes, being a majority of all the votes cast for Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States.

"He is therefore hereby declared duly elected Representative in said Congress.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed at the city of Denver this 6th day of November, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.]

"By the governor:

"WILLIAM M. CLARK, Secretary Colorado."

[2] George M. Adams of Kentucky, Clerk.

There was also received by the Clerk a protest, signed by John M. Patterson, claiming to be Representative-elect from the State of Colorado, and accompanying that protest a certified copy of an abstract of the votes cast in each county on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November for Representative to the Forty-fifth Congress from the State of Colorado. This certified copy of the abstract of the votes cast at said election shows, however, that those votes were never canvassed by any board of canvassers and that no certificate was ever issued to anyone declaring the result of said election.

While the Clerk is of the opinion that the laws of the United States and of the State of Colorado required an election to be held in November, at which time Mr. Patterson claims to have been elected, still, inasmuch as Mr. Patterson does not present credentials regular in form, such as the Clerk feels would justify him in placing his name upon the roll, he will submit the credentials of Mr. Belford and Mr. Patterson, such as they are, to the consideration of the House after it shall have organized.

43. Of two conflicting credentials from Florida in 1877 the Clerk honored the one issued in accordance with a decision of the supreme court of the State.

A second credential being issued by a governor because of a decision of the State court, but not showing the result called for by the rule of that court, the Clerk honored the first credential.—On October 15, 1877,[1] at the time of the organization of the House while the roll of Members-elect was being called, the Clerk[2] said:

From the State of Florida certificates were received, signed by Marcellus L. Steams as governor of Florida, with the seal of the State attached, certifying that William J. Purman was elected in the First and that Horatio Bisbee was elected in the Second district of said State. These certificates bear date, respectively, December 9 and December 14, 1876, and seem to be regular in form.

But in reference to the First district two certificates were subsequently received, signed by George F. Drew, governor of Florida, with the seal of the State attached and bearing date, respectively, January 12 and February 26, 1877. These certificates recite the fact that the canvass of the vote upon which the certificate in favor of Mr. Purman was based had been declared by the supreme court of the State of Florida illegal and that another canvass had been made, in obedience to the order of the supreme court of Florida, which canvass resulted in the election of Robert H. M. Davidson as Representative from said district.

Under such circumstances the Clerk felt bound to place on the roll from the First district of Florida the name of Robert H. M. Davidson, whose credentials show that he was elected in accordance with the laws of the State of Florida as interpreted by the supreme court of that State.

In reference to the Second district of Florida, a certificate was also subsequently received, signed by George F. Drew, governor of Florida, with the seal of the State attached, which certificate does not, however, like the subsequent certificate signed by George F. Drew in reference to the First district, show that the second canvass, made in pursuance of the order of the supreme court, resulted in the election of any other person than Mr. Bisbee, to whom Governor Stearns had previously issued a certificate; but, on the contrary, it simply declares that by counting the votes in a certain precinct in Clay County, which the board of State canvassers rejected, and which the supreme court in their opinion say could not be legally counted, then in that event J. J. Finley would be elected. Under such circumstances the Clerk could not see how the subsequent certificate declaring the election of Mr. Finley by doing what the supreme court declared could not be legally done could in any way invalidate the certificate which had previously been issued by Governor Stearns to Mr. Bisbee; and hence, whatever may be the merits of this case in a contest before the House, it seems clear to the Clerk that the prima facie right, with which alone the Clerk can deal, is with Mr. Bisbee, whose name was therefore placed on the roll.

44. The Mississippi election case of Chalmers v. Manning in the Forty-eighth Congress.

[2] George M. Adams, of Kentucky, Clerk.

No credentials being received, the Clerk declined to enroll either claimant, although one of them filed documents tending to show his election.

The House declined to order that the oath be taken by a person who had credentials perfect in form, but who had not presented them to the Clerk and did not desire to assert prima facie right.

In ordering an investigation as to prima facie right, the House referred, with the credentials, documents showing the state of the returns.

On December 3, 1883,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, the Clerk[2] after he had called the names of the Members-elect, made a statement respecting the Second district of Mississippi. He stated that James R. Chalmers, who claimed to have been elected there, had filed with him four exhibits in support of his claim to be enrolled as a Member-elect. These exhibits, which the Clerk gave at length, tended to show that the secretary of the state of Mississippi, in making on the 18th of November, 1882, the canvass of the vote of the district, had credited to J. R. Chambless enough votes to make, with those credited to J. R. Chalmers, enough to elect the latter over his leading competitor, Mr. Van H. Manning. After the canvass had been made papers had been filed with the secretary of state showing that the votes credited to J. R. Chambless were really cast for Mr. Chalmers, the error in the name being the error of a clerk of the commissioners in one county. The affidavit of this clerk was one of the papers filed by Mr. Chalmers as part of his exhibits.

The Clerk further stated that he had received no certificate from the governor based on the canvass of the secretary of state. Therefore, as the exhibits were not, in his opinion, sufficient ground for the enrollment of Mr. Chalmers, he had enrolled no one.

Later, after the organization of the House, Mr. George L. Converse, of Ohio, stated that Mr. Manning had not desired to present his credentials until there had been action by the House. But believing that the vacancy should be filled Mr. Converse would present them, and offered the following resolution:

> Whereas Van H. Manning holds the certificate of the governor of the State of Mississippi in due form, giving him the prima facie right to a seat on this floor as a Representative of the Second district of Mississippi in the Forty-eighth Congress: Therefore,
> Resolved, That the said Van H. Manning immediately quality as a Member of this House as a Representative of said district without prejudice to the final right to the seat.

Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, questioned whether the House had the right to order a man to be sworn in who did not claim a seat, but Mr. Converse denied that Mr. Manning did not claim a seat.

The previous question was then ordered on the resolution, by a vote of 163, nays 128.

Pending a motion to recommit with instructions, the House adjourned.

On the next day the request was made on behalf of Mr. Manning that the question of his prima facie right to a seat be referred. Therefore the proceedings of the previous day were rescinded, and the House agreed to this resolution:

[2] Edward McPherson, of Pennsylvania, Clerk.

Resolved, That the certificate and all other papers in the contested election case of Chalmers v. Manning, from the Second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections, when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a Member, pending the contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat.

45. The Mississippi election case of Chalmers v. Manning continued.

In determining prima facie right the House went behind a certificate in due form, the bearer of which waived his prima facie right, and consulted the returns.

The House declined to give prima facie title to a contestant on the strength of the returns, although the bearer of the credentials waived his prima facie right.

An instance wherein the House seated neither of two claimants on prima facie showing, deferring the administration of the oath until the ascertainment of final right.

A contention that the admissions of a claimant might not waive a prima facie title in which the people of the district were interested.

An affidavit intended to explain a clerical error in returns was given little weight by the Elections Committee because of its ex parte character.

On February 8, 1884,[1] Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, presented the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the question arising as to the prima facie right to the seat preliminary to decision as to the final right in the Mississippi case of Chalmers v. Manning. The report of the majority thus states the preliminary facts:

In the Second Congressional district of Mississippi, composed of the counties of Benton, De Soto, Lafayette, Marshall, Panola, Tallahatchie, Tippah, Tate, and Union, an election for Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress was held on the 7th day of November, 1882, at which election Van H. Manning and James R. Chalmers were opposing candidates. When the Forty-eighth Congress assembled, on the 3d day of December last, before the organization of the House, the Clerk informed the House that—

"The Clerk has not enrolled the name of anyone as a Representative for the Second district of Mississippi, for the reason that no paper which can be considered a certificate of election in the sense of the law has been presented to him."

After the organization of the House, on the same day, Mr. Converse, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution:

"Whereas, Van H. Manning holds the certificate of the governor of the State of Mississippi in due form, giving him the prima facie right to a seat on this floor as a Representative of the Second district of Mississippi in the Forty-eighth Congress: Therefore, Resolved, That the said Van H. Manning immediately qualify as a Member of this House as a Representative of said district without prejudice to the final right to the seat."

Pending the consideration of this resolution the House adjourned, and on the next day Mr. Converse stated that at the request of Mr. Manning he submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

"Resolved, That the certificate and all other papers in the contested election case of J. R. Chalmers v. Van H. Manning, from the Second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a Member pending the contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat."

At the outset a question arose as to the effect of this action of the House. The majority say:

[1] First session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 283; Mobley, p. 7.

This action of the House was either a refusal of the seat to Mr. Manning by the House, on the usual evidence of the governor's certificate, or it was a renunciation by him of his right to demand such seat upon the governor's certificate alone; perhaps it was both.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. John C. Cook, of Iowa, took issue with this construction of the resolution:

We conclude, therefore, in the light of all the surrounding facts, and upon a fair reading of the resolution, that the House, in adopting it, did not deny Mr. Manning's seat upon regular credentials, but required us to ascertain and report whether he or Mr. Chalmers held such credentials. Any other conclusion would place this House in the singular attitude of denying to Mr. Manning, without reason, a well-defined and established legal light. If the chairman is right in his construction of the resolution, certainly it would be better if the House would repeal it than that it should permit its error to ripen into wrong. We submit, however, that neither by his own action nor by the action of this House has Mr. Manning been placed beyond the pale of law, reason, and precedent, but that he is clearly entitled to a seat on this floor pending a contest on the merits, the same as any other Member duly returned.

The majority assume that by the terms of the resolution they are expected to examine and give weight to other papers besides the certificate of the governor. Their report says:

Among the papers referred to us we find a commission issued by the governor of Mississippi to Mr. Manning based on the certificate of the secretary of state, who by law is charged with the duty of canvassing the returns of elections and certifying the result to the governor. This commission bears the great seal of the State, and is otherwise unexceptionable in form; and could we have confined our inquiry as to the prima facie right to the disputed seat to this paper alone we would unhesitatingly have affirmed Mr. Manning's right to occupy the seat pending the contest. Except in extraordinary cases and in rare instances we find that the commission or certificate concludes all inquiry as to which of the claimants of a seat shall occupy it until the contest on the merits is determined. And every consideration of prudence and safety admonishes us to adhere to this practice.

The minority views hold—

In determining their report upon the question, our associates are pleased to speak of the facts in this case which relate to the merits. In doing so they say, "Mr. Manning's admission and his failure to file his certificate with the Clerk and take his seat in the usual way make this case without a parallel in the annals of Congress," and, ergo, justify them in going behind the certificate.

The committee could not have known anything about the alleged admissions until they had violated the law which forbade us from going behind the credentials, and can not justify their violation by subsequent developments. If the law is that you can look behind every certificate to see what the facts are, and then may or may not consider such facts in determining the prima facie right, as the committee may or may not consider them without parallel, the law that the certificate is conclusive of the prima facie right, so explicitly and uniformly laid down in the books, is but a delusion and a snare.

But we are advised that Mr. Manning's delay in filing his certificate is not unparalleled, and that heretofore such delay has not even excited comment. He offered his certificate the day on which Congress met, and certainly his failure to file it with the Clerk in vacation infringed no law and affected only his individual convenience.

But if we must be surprised by this delay, surely no one will seriously contend that it amounted to a waiver or a resignation of his right, or in any other way known to the law and practice of legislative assemblies defeated or impaired it.

This proposition, as to whether the House might at this stage go behind a certificate which was regular and not impeached by anything on its own face, was debated at length. The chairman of the committee, in his opening speech,[1] reviewed the older usage of the House in effecting, organization, showing, that in the early days the Members-elect appeared on the first day and presented their credentials, which were read. Whenever a Member's credentials were assailed the question was determined at once from an inspection of the credentials alone. The phrase "prima facie case" was used to define the effect of the usual credentials prior to organization, and to distinguish that case from a trial on the merits. But when a case was taken out of the House and sent to a committee for determination without an investigation of the entire case on all the merits it was the usual practice to define the limits of the inquiry by the committee in the resolution of reference. In the case of Hunt v. Sheldon it was settled that the prima facie right might depend on something besides the certificate alone. The case of Gunter v. Wilshire was also cited. And in concluding the debate [1] the chairman reaffirmed the principle that in determining the prima facie right after the organization had been effected the House was not restricted to examination of the governor's certificate.

In opposition it was argued [2] that the question of prima facie right was really the question, "Who has the return?" In this case Mr. Manning had the return, and the committee might not consider in this connection the other question as to who was actually elected.

The minority report also says:

> We maintain the constitutional right of the Second Congressional district of Mississippi to representation on this floor.
> It is admitted that her citizens voted at the proper time and places, that her officers did all the law required them to do, from the beginning to the issuance of the proper certificate of election; indeed, that all was done there that was done in any district in the United States.
> It is further admitted that Mr. Manning is here her duly accredited Representative. His credentials are from the proper authority, perfect in form, and verified under the great seal of the sovereign State of Mississippi; indeed, that his credentials are as valid as the credentials of any Member occupying a seat upon the floor of this House. Yet, while every other district is represented, as they have a right to be, without reference to whether there is or is not a contest over the seat, the majority of the committee maintain that the right of said district to representation must be denied, and Mr. Manning kept out of a seat upon this floor until they can decide this contest upon its merits.
> We must protest against this conclusion, which is at war with reason, with all precedents, and with the fundamental right of representation.
> We assert that Mr. Manning's credentials are absolutely conclusive of his right to be sworn in as a Member of this House, and represent the Second Congressional district of Mississippi on this floor until the House shall, in the exercise of its constitutional right, determine that he was not elected.
> This principle is elementary, sanctioned by the wisdom of centuries, clearly announced by every text writer on the subject, supported by innumerable precedents, and unassailed at any time, by anybody, in any quarters, except in this case, at this time by the majority of this committee.

The majority report proceeds to an enumeration of the papers other than the credentials which were referred to the committee.

> Pursuing the instructions of the House, we find from the papers referred to us that the secretary of state certified to the governor in due form that Van H. Manning received 8,749 votes, J. R. Chalmers 8,257, H. C. Carter 129, and J. R. Chambless 1,472. It appears from this certificate that 1,472 votes counted for J. R. Chambless were cast in Tate County, and that J. R. Chalmers received no votes in that county. On looking to the return of the election in Tate County, certified by the commissioners of election for that county, duly authenticated, and referred to us, we find that these commissioners certify that at the election in that county J. R. Chalmers received 1,472 votes, and add these words to the certificate: "All of which fully appears by the tally sheet on the opposite side of this page, which we certify to be a true and correct tally sheet of the votes cast in said Tate County." On the back of this certificate we find not a "tally sheet" but a tabular statement, which seems to count 1,472 votes for J. R. Chambless, and omits altogether the name of Chalmers. This tabular statement is without any caption; but if it is intended by the words "tally sheet," we think, that the secretary of state should have been guided by the face of the certificate, which was complete in itself, and counted these 1,472 votes for J. R. Chalmers. This course would have resulted in the election of Chalmers, according to the face of the returns, by a plurality over Manning of 980 votes. On the other hand, if this tabular statement on the back of the returns from Tate County is to be taken as a part of the return, this construction would render that return so absurd as to void it altogether, and in that view it should have been excluded altogether from the canvass by the secretary of state. This course would have resulted in the election of Chalmers by a plurality of 674 votes.

We also find among the papers referred to us another return of the election in Tate County, certified by the commissioners of election for that county, dated seven days after their first return, and giving 1,472 votes to J. R. Chalmers. But we think their functions had ceased with their first return; and this subsequent statement, being unofficial, can not be regarded as evidence.

We also find among the papers referred to us an affidavit made by one J. M. Williams, relating to the returns of the election in Tate County, to the effect that he was one of the clerks of the commissioners of election who canvassed the returns of the votes in said county, that he made out the "tally sheet," etc., that there was no vote returned for J. R. Chambless, and that if that name appeared in said tally sheet it was a clerical error, etc., but this affidavit being ex parte, and not having the character of official evidence, we have not in this inquiry given it much weight. The official returns of the votes cast at the various voting places in Tate County, or copies thereof properly authenticated, would have been better evidence than either the second return made by the commissioners of election for that county or this affidavit of Williams.

We also find among the papers referred to us certified copies of a verdict and judgment on a mandamus instituted by Mr. Chalmers in the circuit court in and for the first district of Hinds County, Miss., against Henry C. Myers, secretary of state, in which proceeding the issues involved in this contest over the prima facie right to the seat seem to have been determined by the court in favor of Mr. Chalmers on the 24th day of January, 1883, the commission having been awarded to Mr. Manning by the governor on the 18th day of November, 1882. It does not appear that the governor was advised of this proceeding, although it does appear from a recital in said verdict and judgment that the secretary of state certified the canvass of the vote after service of a prohibitory order upon him from the court. But it seems that the supreme court of Mississippi afterwards, on the 11th day of June, 1883, reversed the judgment of the circuit court, as appears from a certified copy of the judgment of the supreme court, among the papers referred. The ground of the reversal of the judgment of the lower court is not shown in the record. Mr. Manning was no party to this proceeding in either court.

On examining the issues between the parties to this contest, as stated in the notice of contest, and the answer thereto, we find that Mr. Chalmers denies Mr. Manning's prima facie right to the seat as well as his ultimate title; and Mr. Manning in his answer, after denying various charges in the notice of contest, and stating the circumstances under which the prohibitory order before mentioned in this report was obtained, and averring that it was properly disregarded by the secretary of state, makes this statement:

"I deny that any frauds were attempted or practiced by my friends, or that they were guilty of fraudulent or illegal practices, or that you received a majority of 1,332 votes as a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress from said Congressional district, though I admit that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election in their respective counties that you received a majority of the votes cast; and I further admit that the 1,472 votes which the commissioners of Tate County returned as cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, and that the name Chambless was inserted in the return by clerical error instead of your name. And in this connection, I state that because of said error to your prejudice, I will not take a seat in said Congresor ask the clerk to enroll my name as a Member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto."

Mr. Manning, in his answer, also charges against the contestant a resort to bribery, corrupt use of official patronage, and intimidation. All the papers referred to us, and hereinbefore specified, are exhibited in an appendix in this report.

This case is without precedent. The admissions of Mr. Manning his refusal to present his commission and take his seat in the usual way, and the instructions of the House, are without a parallel in the annals of Congress.

Guided by the instructions of the House, and having considered carefully the documentary evidence referred to us, we are unable to agree that Mr. Manning should be seated upon his prima facie title. Mr. Chalmers having no such credentials as the law contemplates, we do not think that he ought to be seated pending the contest.

The minority views declare that they can not agree—that the admissions of Mr. Manning shall be held to affect the title to a seat in Congress, in which the citizens of the Second district of Mississippi are more deeply concerned than Mr. Manning.

The minority views go on to argue:

Now this question is not a new one; there is nothing startling nor unparalleled about it.

It is just as well settled that the returned Member has the right to hold the seat pending a contest on the merits with the person who would have been returned had not the clerical error of a returning officer intervened as that you can not go behind the certificate in determining who should hold the seat pending a contest on the merits. Indeed, the last stated rule, which all admit, grows out of and is founded upon the first.

If the person who ought to have been returned was entitled to the seat pending a contest with the Member who is returned no rule would ever have been made excluding the evidence by which the party who ought to have been returned could establish his right. Because the evidence, if admitted, does not establish any right, is the reason for excluding it. (See Cushing, sec. 144, 140, and authorities before cited.) The admission of a fact by Mr. Manning in his answer can not give any right which proof of the fact would not give.

Rights are dependent upon facts, and a defendant can neither give rights by admitting them nor abridge rights by denying them. If you should hold that the man who ought to have been returned is entitled to occupy the seat pending a contest on the merits, then it makes no difference whether the fact that the person ought to have been returned lies on the surface of the investigation in the shape of an admission or is buried under volumes of proof.

Such a precedent would double the labor in every contest. We would first have to examine the pleading and proof to ascertain who was elected on the face of the returns. After seating such person we would have to institute a second investigation to ascertain who was elected in very truth. Now, as it is apparent that the person who has the majority on the face of the returns has no more right to a seat than the person who is returned, since the right to the seat is vested all the time in the person really elected, legislative bodies have wisely determined, in the interest of economy, of their time and the public treasury, to have no intermediate investigation which does not reach the merits of the contest. As the man elected ought to be returned, and as fraud at the ballot box should be as promptly corrected as any errors committed by returning officers, you can not say who ought to have been returned until you have fully investigated the merits of the case.

The committee are not prepared to report that Mr. Manning ought not to have been returned, because they have not investigated his allegations that Mr. Chalmers was not only not elected but that the precinct officers would have returned a large aggregate majority for him but for the bribery and corruption of the voters by Mr. Chalmers. A little thought will make it apparent that you must hold either that a contest vacates a seat until a decision on the merits or that the returned Member shall bold the seat pending such contest, no matter what facts lie behind the certificate. Any effort to ingraft exceptions upon the settled rule leads inevitably to confusion, disorder, injustice, and a denial of the right to representation.

The great right here for your adjudication is the right of one hundred and fifty thousand citizens to representation on this floor while the individual contest between Messrs. Manning and Chalmers is being determined.

Consideration for that right and a deep sense of necessity of having fixed rules for the exercise of that right led to the adoption and has secured the maintenance up to this time of the rule that the returned Member shall hold the seat pending the contest on the merits.

The attempt of the majority of the committee to evade that rule leads to a denial of that constitutional right of representation which the rule was framed to protect.

And we call your attention now to a startling fact in this case.

The committee have reported unparalleled action on the part of this House and on the part of Mr. Manning, but they have not found anything to criticise upon the part of the people of the Second district of Mississippi, whose dearest right they assail and ask you to disallow.

In any and every aspect of this case this district is entitled to representation. Reason, analogy, precedent, and established rules unerringly point to Mr. Manning as the one person entitled to represent it.

Instead of being able to defend their conclusion behind the resolution of this House, some of the committee have confessedly gone outside of and beyond any authority you gave them. They say, "We are unable to agree that Mr. Manning should be seated upon his prima facie title." Your instructions were to find out whether he had a prima facie title. They have found that he has such prima facie title, and then proceed without warrant and without direction or solicitation from you to advise that he should not be allowed the right his prima facie title insures.

We respectfully submit that you never questioned his right to the seat if it appeared in our investigation that he had a prima facie title to it.

In view of the great interests and important principles involved, and of our clear convictions as to the right, we are impelled to submit this report and the following resolutions for your adoption:

Resolved, That the Hon. Van R. Manning holds perfect credentials, issued in due form and by lawful authority, as Member-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That being the duly returned Member he is entitled to be sworn in and occupy the seat on this floor pending a contest on the merits over it.

The majority recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the prima facie right to the seat in the contested election case of J. R. Chalmers v. Van H. Manning.

The report was very fully debated on February 13, 14, and 16, 1884,[1] and on the last day the question was taken on the proposition included in the first resolution of the minority. This was disagreed to, yeas 106, nays 139.

The second resolution of the minority was then disagreed to, yeas 91, nays 157.

The resolution proposed by the majority was then agreed to, ayes 113, noes 55.

46. The Mississippi election case of Chalmers v. Manning, continued.

The majority of the Elections Committee, in a sustained case, concluded that the House was not concerned about undue influence used in the nomination of a candidate.

A contestant, employed after the election as assistant to a United States district attorney, was held qualified to be seated, especially as his employment ceased before Congress met.

Instance wherein a contestant belonging to the party in the minority in the House was seated.

On June 20, 1884,[2] Mr. John C. Cook,. of Iowa, presented the report of the majority of the committee on the question of final right to the seat. At the outset it admits that Mr. Chalmers received a majority of the votes.

A subordinate question was presented by charges and testimony relating to use of money and Federal patronage in the district, and the report says:

[2] Report H. of R. No. 1599; Mobly, p. 34.

Believing that it is the duty of the House, whenever it is shown that the election of a Member is the result of this influence, to declare the election void; and believing. further, that the testimony in a case is to be taken in connection with contemporaneous historical facts, your committee has given careful attention to the record and evidence in this case. We conclude that it can not fairly be said that the election of Mr. Chalmers was secured by such undue influence; that is to say, that without it be would not have been elected, especially in view of the large majority he received. It was perhaps more instrumental in making him the candidate of the Republican party and suppressing other aspirants for party support. But with this we think the House has no concern.

A large part of the evidence is calculated[1] to show that the contestant was deceitful in his politics, treacherous to his political friends, and unworthy of so high an office. This, however, must address itself to the voters of his district, and the House has no right to render an unjust decision because a man lawfully elected may be subject to this criticism more or less.

The minority views presented by Mr. Ambrose A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, in behalf of himself and five others of the committee, dissented from any conclusions that would imply credence in the charges.

The main issue in the case is thus stated and decided in the majority report:

It is next claimed that Mr. Chalmers, if legally elected, has since his election disqualified himself from holding this office by accepting another office from the United States and performing its duties within the term of office of a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress, under the following provision of the Constitution:

"And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

Because on the 9th day of December, 1882, Mr. Chalmers was by the Attorney-General of the United States employed or appointed "special assistant to the district attorneys for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi," and that by retaining this position he had vacated his office as Representative.

Your committee, however, passing the question of whether this is an office within the meaning of the Constitution, find that Mr. Chalmers was retained for a special purpose, and that prior to the time for the convening of Congress the matter for which he was appointed or employed had been disposed of. His account had been rendered to and closed by the Department. No resignation had been made—none was necessary. Practically his connection with the office of district attorney had ceased.

We recommend to the House for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was duly elected as a Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the Second district of Mississippi, and is entitled to be sworn in as a Member of this House.

The minority views presented by Mr. Ranney practically concurred in this decision:

It has been contended that contestant was not eligible, or rather that he had lost his right to a seat, because employed December 9, 1882, by the Attorney-General, to act as counsel and aid the district attorneys in the prosecution of some criminal cases in Mississippi. His employment was a special one in the line of his profession, and it was in no sense an office which was incompatible with his holding the position of Representative to Congress. He was not awarded a certificate of election as the chosen Representative, but the same was awarded to and was held by another person, to wit, the contestee. He was only a contestant claiming the seat. He was employed and retained after the day of election for a special purpose, to assist the district attorneys for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi in the prosecution of certain criminal cases. The employment was authorized under the statutes of the United States. It was a special contract employment for special pay according to what he did, and not an appointment to fill any office created by law, with duties prescribed and a salary attached. There is no good reason for a claim that it was the holding of an office under the United States which was incompatible with his being a Member of this House under the provisions of the Constitution, even if he had been a Member of that body. But whether it was or not, inasmuch as he was not then accredited as a Member and another person was, and especially inasmuch as his employment had ceased, his services

[1] It was explained in debate that "intended" was the word which should have been used.

having been fully performed and ended before the Forty-eighth Congress met, he could not in any event properly be held to come within the provision of the Constitution referred to either in its letter or spirit. (Contested Elections in Congress, 1779–1837, p. 122; Hammond v. Herrick, in same, p. 287; Earle's case, p. 314; Mumford's case, p. 316; Schenck's case; McCrary, secs. 238, 244.)

But Mr. L. H. Davis, of Missouri, presented views wherein it was argued at length that an assistant district attorney was an officer within the meaning of the Constitution. Mr. Davis discussed the law and the precedents at length.

The report was debated on June 25,[1] the main issue being on the question as to whether or not the office of assistant district attorney was incompatible with that of Member of Congress. Several Members who thought that the offices might be incompatible, nevertheless considered that the contestant had the power of electing which office he would accept as soon as it should be determined that he was entitled to the seat in the House.

The question was first taken on the following resolution proposed by Mr. Davis in his minority views:

Resolved further, That said Chalmers having accepted the office of special assistant United States district attorney for the northern and southern districts of the State of Mississippi, since the said election, and holding said office up to and beyond the Ist day of February, 1884, is ineligible to a seat in this Congress, and a vacancy exists in the Second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

This resolution was disagreed to—ayes, 36; noes, 98.

Then the question was taken on a second resolution proposed by Mr. Davis:

Resolved, That the means and methods employed by the Federal Administration in securing the election of James R. Chalmers as a Member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress are, as appears by the majority report and the evidence on file, repugnant to and subversive of true representative government, and the said election is therefore declared void.

This resolution was disagreed to—yeas, 56; nays, 163.

Then the resolution of the majority declaring contestant elected was agreed to without division, and Mr. Chalmers appeared and took the oath.

It should be noted that Mr. Chalmers belonged to the minority party in the House, and Mr. Manning to the majority party.

47. No credentials being received from a district prior to the meeting of Congress, the Clerk placed no name on the roll for that district.

The Clerk, while presiding at the organization, declined to open a paper addressed to the Speaker, although it was supposed to inclose a missing credential.

On October 15, 1877,[2] at the organization of the House, while the roll of Members-elect was being called, the Clerk[3] said:

From the State of Missouri there is one district, the third in number, from which no credential of any kind has been received in favor of any person, and consequently no name has been placed upon the roll from said district. There has been handed to me at this instant a paper from the State of Missouri, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is suggested that, as there is no Speaker, the Clerk should open it.

Several Members having objected, the Clerk said:

The Clerk prefers, inasmuch as it might raise a question about which, at this late hour, he is not prepared to determine what he should or should not do in reference to the roll, to leave it for the House to determine when it shall have organized.

48. A Member-elect having been enrolled on the strength of credentials in due form, the Clerk declined to strike him from the roll on the strength of later papers.—On March 18, 1879,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called, the Clerk[2] said in reference to one of the seats from the State of Florida:

He (the Clerk) received a certificate of election signed by the governor and authenticated by the seal of Florida, as prescribed by the following provision in the statutes of that State: "Whenever any person shall be elected to the office of elector of President or Vice-President, or Representative in Congress, the governor shall make out and sign and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State and transmit to such person a certificate of his election," duly accrediting Mr. Hull as a Representative-elect to the Forty-sixth Congress. He subsequently received a number of papers, among which was a certified copy of a canvass of the votes in the Second district of Florida, made by the board of State canvassers in pursuance of an order of the supreme court of that State, from which canvass it appears that Mr. Horatio Bisbee, Jr., was elected; but those papers were not accompanied by the certificate of the governor, authenticated by the seal of the State, as required by the statute just cited. The Clerk did not feel at liberty to regard anything as a credential within the meaning of the law governing him in making up the roll except a certificate made out and signed by the governor and sealed with the seal of the State, as prescribed by this provision of the statutes of Florida; and as Mr. Bisbee, who claims to have been elected, presented no such certificate, the Clerk could not regard him as possessing the prima facie evidence of an election which the laws of Florida requires that he should have, and consequently omitted his name from the roll.

49. On August 7, 1893,[3] at the time of the organization of the House, the Clerk,[4] after the State of Michigan had been called, made the following statement:

The Clerk begs leave to state, in reference to the certificate of election from the Fifth Congressional district of Michigan, that on December 22, 1892, there was filed in his office a certificate of election to the House of Representatives from that district in due and authorized form, showing the election of Hon. George F. Richardson as a Representative to the Fifty-third Congress of the United States, and the name of said George F. Richardson was, by the Clerk of the House, then duly placed upon the roll of Representatives-elect. Exactly similar certificates in every respect, certified to by the same State officers, were filed at other dates, as late as April 3, 1893, showing the election of Representatives to Congress from all the other districts of Michigan, and similar action was taken in each case.

On February 20, 1893, there was delivered to the Clerk an alleged certificate of election, signed by other persons (the State officers required by law to certify the election of Members of Congress having been changed in the interim), which said certificate, accompanied by sundry papers, claimed to show the election of Hon. Charles E. Belknap from the Fifth Congressional district of Michigan as a Representative to the Fifty-third Congress. The Clerk refused to strike off the roll the name of George F. Richardson as a Member-elect from this district, having already exercised the authority given to him by the law. The matter is therefore submitted to the House, which, when organized, is, under the Constitution and the law, judge of the elections, returns, and qualification of its own Members.

50. In 1879 the Clerk honored the regular credentials from the governor of Iowa, although papers presented in opposition thereto raised a doubt as to the lawful day of election.—On March 18, 1879,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called by the Clerk,[2] he said:

There were presented to the Clerk certificates duly signed by the governor of the State of Iowa, under the seal of the State, accrediting the nine gentlemen whose names have been announced as Representatives duly elected on the 8th day of October, 1878. Sundry papers were also presented to the Clerk in reference to an election claimed to have been held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1878. These papers, however, do not conform to the requirements of the laws of Iowa. They are not signed by the governor; they are not under the seal of the State; they are simply papers which came unauthenticated and in no sense constitute credentials within the meaning of the laws of Iowa. Whatever may be the fact, therefore, in reference to the time at which the election should have been held in the State of Iowa, even though it were definitely and clearly settled that the election should have been held in November instead of October, the Clerk could not in any event place on the rolls the names of those persons in whose behalf papers have been filed in reference to the November election for the reason that these papers do not comply with the laws of the State of Iowa and do not constitute credentials.

As to whether the election should have been held in October or in November there are grave doubts in the minds of those learned in the law. It is a question about which he confesses he has not been able to arrive at so clear and satisfactory conclusion as he himself could have desired. But in the discharge of the duty imposed upon him, unless he could arrive at a clear and satisfactory conclusion that those gentlemen were not elected on the proper day, he did not feel at liberty to withhold their names from the roll of Members-elect, but thought it proper to give the benefit of the doubt in favor of representation and to remand that question for the consideration of the House when it shall have organized.

51. In 1879 the Clerk declined to honor a regular credential for a Representative at large to which the State was not entitled by law.—On March 18, 1879,[1] at the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called, the Clerk [2] said:

He (the Clerk) has received a certificate accrediting an additional Representative from the State of Kansas as elected from the State at large; but as he is not aware of any law authorizing that State to have more than three Representatives, he has not placed the name of the person who is claimed to have been elected for the State at large upon the roll.

52. In 1885 the Clerk honored the Nebraska credentials which, although they did not fully comply with the law, were identical in form with certificates sent from that State to former Congresses.—On December 7, 1885,[3] at the time of the organization of the House, when the State of Nebraska was reached in the calling of the roll, the Clerk [4] said:

The Clerk desires to state that he has some doubt as to whether the certificates from the State of Nebraska fully comply with the law, but as they are identical with the certificates filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, and as there is no protest or contest, he has placed the names upon the roll.

53. The Kentucky election case of Letcher v. Moore in the Twenty-third Congress.

In 1833 the House declined to sustain the action of the Clerk in enrolling a person whose credentials on their face failed to comply with the requirements of the State law.

An instance wherein, at the organization of the House, before the enactment of the law as to the Clerk's roll, two claimants to a seat were present and participated in the proceedings.

In 1833 the House decided that a person bearing defective credentials should not be called on the roll call until after the election of Speaker and other officers.

In 1833 the House declined to seat either claimant until the final right should be determined.

Form of resolution used in 1833 to authorize the institution of a contest.

On December 2, 1833,[1] at the organization of the House, while the Clerk of the last House was calling the names of the Members-elect, and had called as far as the State of Kentucky, Mr. Chilton Allan, of that State, arose and objected to the calling of Thomas P. Moore, returned to serve as the Member for the Fifth Congressional district of said State, on the ground that the said Thomas P. Moore had not been duly elected and that the return of the said Thomas P. Moore was not in the form prescribed by the laws of the State of Kentucky.

Debate at once arose. Some question was made as to the competency of the body of unqualified Members to make a decision; a proposition was made that a chairman be chosen to preside, etc.

It appeared from the debate that the Clerk had put the name of Mr. Moore on his roll of Members-elect, and the Members called for the reading of the papers on which the Clerk had acted. He therefore produced Mr. Moore's certificate, which was signed by the sheriffs of three of the five counties composing the Congressional district, although the law required it to be signed by the sheriffs of all the counties. This certificate, on the face of it, stated that the votes of one county were not taken into account. Both Mr. Moore and his opponent, Mr. Robert P. Letcher, were present. Mr. Moore spoke on the question, and the report of debates indicates that Mr. Letcher was also heard to the extent of making a proposition that both withdraw until after the election of Speaker.

By general consent it was agreed that Mr. Moore should not be called until the House should have become organized by the election of Speaker and other officers.

On December 4 the subject was resumed and gave rise to an extended debate, during which the insufficiency of the credentials of Mr. Moore was urged. Finally, on December 5, the House agreed to these resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections, when appointed, inquire, and report to this House, who is the Member elected from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Kentucky and, until the committee shall report as herein required,

Resolved, That neither Thomas P. Moore nor Robert P. Letcher shall be qualified as the Member from said district.

Resolved further, That the Committee of Elections shall be required to receive as evidence all the affidavits and depositions which may have been heretofore, or which may hereafter be, taken by either of the parties, on due notice having been given to the adverse party, or his agent, and report the same to this House.

54. The Kentucky election case of Letcher v. Moore, continued.

The House considered the constitution and laws of the State in which the election was held as affording the rule by which irregularities should be tested.

Although the State constitution required that every vote be given viva voce, the Elections Committee in a report which failed, evidently for other reasons, to be sustained decided that the votes of certain mutes might be counted.

In an inconclusive case the House reversed the decision of its committee, that residence while attending a school was not such residence as entitled one to the suffrage.

In 1834 in an inconclusive case the Elections Committee gave the word "residence" the same meaning as "home" or "domicile."

In an inconclusive case in 1834 the Elections Committee held that right of suffrage was not lost by removal from the State unless there was an intention to remain away or proof of permanent location elsewhere.

The law requiring the presence of the sheriff at the voting, the committee rejected votes cast in his absence, but the House reversed this ruling.

In 1834 the Elections Committee adopted the rule that depositions must be signed by the witness, unless State law made the certificate of a magistrate sufficient.

On May 6, 1834,[1] the Committee on Elections reported in the case of Letcher v. Moore, from Kentucky, the first paragraph of the report explaining the situation:

> The subject presented itself as one entirely new and unprecedented. Thomas P. Moore, esq., had a certificate from three only of the five sheriffs, and Robert P. Letcher, esq., a majority of the votes upon the poll books of the five counties composing that district. As Mr. Letcher had no certificate, and that of Mr. Moore was not signed by all the sheriffs, as required by the law of Kentucky, neither could produce a satisfactory testimonial of his election, and consequently neither was permitted to take his seat.

The partial certificate was the result of the action of the sheriff of one county, who withheld the poll book and thus prevented the issuing of a certificate to Mr. Letcher, who, with that county poll, would have been elected so far as the face of the returns went. The minority of the committee, united with the majority in condemning the conduct of the sheriff, and in the opinion that the certificate of three of the five sheriffs was insufficient to entitle Mr. Moore to a seat. But the minority did contend that certified copies of the poll books constituted sufficient evidence of the election to entitle the person in whose favor they showed a majority to take the seat, subject of course to future contest and final decision of the House.

This view did not prevail, however, the House not considering this aspect further, and neither party took the seat on prima facie right.

The committee gave to the contestants a certain time in which to take testimony, and then allowed the contestants an opportunity to examine the testimony and make briefs. Both contestants also presented arguments.

The committee found in their examination nearly 400 votes objected to, these objections arising principally as to the qualifications of voters, but some as to the conduct of officers of the election. The constitution and laws of Kentucky were the rule of the election, and the committee examined the objections with reference to that constitution and system of laws.

First, in relation to the qualification of voters. The constitution of Kentucky provided that "in all elections by the people" the "votes shall be personally and publicly given viva voce." Three deaf-mutes, able to read and write, voted, but objection was made that it was physically impossible for them to comply with the requirements of the constitution. The committee finally concluded that under a liberal construction of the constitution the votes might be received.

The State constitution also allowed every male over the age of 21 to vote in the county where he was actually residing, provided he had resided in the State two years. The commttee gave to the term "residence" the same meaning as "home," or "domicile;" and three men who had been in another State five years were still considered entitled to vote. Also all men living in the county for the time being, unless the business bringing them there was merely temporary, were allowed to vote unless they had actual home or domicile in another part of the State. This principle determined the votes of laborers residing where they could get work. But the students of a theological seminary were rejected in accordance with the following principle laid down by the committee: "That the residence of young men from other States and counties, at schools, academies, or colleges, as scholars or students, is not such a residence as entitles them to the right of suffrage in the county where they are for the time being." The committee also laid down the following principle in reference to removal from the State: "An individual having the right of suffrage in Kentucky does not lose it by removal from the State merely, but there must be an evidence of his intention at the time he departs to leave the State permanently or proof of his permanent location elsewhere to forfeit his rights as a voter."

In their investigation the committee also laid down the following rules in regard to voters:

That no name be stricken from the polls as unknown, upon the testimony of one witness only that no such person is known in the county; and that where a man of like name is known, residing in another county, some proof, direct or circumstantial, other than finding such a name on the poll book, will be required of his having voted in the county or precinct where the vote is assailed.

That all depositions not subscribed by the witness be excluded, unless the certificate of a magistrate be sufficient according to the law of Kentucky.

That votes recorded upon the poll books as given to one candidate can not be changed and transferred to the other by oral testimony.

That all declarations or statements made by voters after the election, relative to their right of suffrage, be rejected.

That when a man is found on the poll book, proof that an individual of that name resides in the county, who is a minor, is not sufficient to strike the name off the poll book, and that some proof, direct or circumstantial other than finding the name on the poll book, will be required of the vote having been given by such minor in the county or precinct where the vote is assailed.

In that branch of the case relating to the conduct of election officers the law of Kentucky provided for the appointment of two judges and a clerk for the county by the county court, and that in case of failure to appoint, or failure of any or all of the appointees to attend, the sheriff should, immediately preceding the election, appoint proper persons to act in their stead; that the sheriff or other presiding officer should "open the polls by 10 o'clock in the morning" of the day of election; that the judges and clerk should be sworn and attend to receiving the votes until the completion of the election and the return; that voting should be done publicly and viva voce "in presence of said judges and sheriff."

In Garrard County one judge declined serving, and the other not having appeared at 9 a.m. when the sheriff opened the election (the law requiring him to do it "by l0") the sheriff appointed the second judge. About 10 o'clock, when the originally appointed judge appeared, the second appointee of the sheriff resigned the duties. On the second day of the election the sheriff was absent for three hours, the two judges continuing to receive votes in his absence.

The committee held that the sheriff was not authorized to appoint the second judge until 10 o'clock, as the law intended to allow until that time for the arrival of the judges. Not until that time could a judge be said to have failed to attend. Therefore the committee rejected the votes taken before 10, during the officiating of the second appointee, who resigned as soon as the regular judge arrived and did not "attend to receiving the votes" until the election and return were completed.

The committee also rejected the votes taken in the absence of the sheriff, since, under the letter of the law, the voting must be in his presence. The State had prescribed the "manner" of holding the election, and the votes were not taken in the prescribed manner. In support of this action the committee cited the cases of Jackson and Wayne (1791), Patton (1793), Morris (1795), Lyon and Smith (1795), McFarland and Purviance (1804), Spaulding and Mead (1805), McFarland and Culpepper (1807), Bassett and Bayley (1813), Scott and Easton (1816).

As a result of the corrections made in accordance with the above principles, the committee found Thomas P. Moore entitled to the seat and so reported.

55. The Kentucky election case of Letcher v. Moore, continued.

The House in 1834 reversed the decision of its committee that recorded votes on the poll book could not be changed by oral testimony.

The House reversed the rule of its committee that a vote might be rejected from the poll on the testimony of more than one witness that the voter was unknown in the county.

There being doubt as to the regularity of the appointment of an election judge, the committee rejected the votes cast while he officiated; but the House reversed the ruling.

It being impracticable for the House to determine with any certainty who was elected, the seat was declared vacant.

The case was considered in the House during the period from May 13 to June 12, the House disregarding the report and going into the case itself. On June 4 the House decided that the votes cast in Garrard County while the second judge appointed by the sheriff was officiating should be counted; also that the votes cast during the absence of the sheriff should be counted.

The House also reversed the action of the committee in the case of the theological students and decided that their votes should be counted.

Also the House reversed the principle laid down by the committee that recorded votes, on the poll book could not be changed by oral testimony; also votes which the committee rejected on the testimony of more than one witness, that the voters were unknown in the county, were restored by the House.

On June 12 a proposition that Mr. Letcher was entitled to the seat was decided in the negative, yeas 112, nays 114. And then, after unavailing efforts to amend, the House agreed, by a vote of 114 yeas to 103 nays, to a resolution that there be a new election, "it being impracticable for the House to determine with any certainty who is the rightful representative."

56. The prima facie election case of Belknap v. Richardson, from Michigan, in the Fifty-third Congress.

An instance wherein the Clerk and the House honored credentials, regular in form and issued legally by the proper officer, but annulled by the State supreme court.

There being conflicting credentials, the House honored those first issued, although by reason of a revision of returns the court had annulled the said prior credentials.

On August 7, 1893,[1] during the organization of the House, and while the Speaker was administering the oath to Members, the State of Michigan was called and Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of that State, objected to the oath being administered to Mr. George F. Richardson.

The Speaker directed Mr. Richardson to stand aside.

The other Members and Delegates having been sworn in, Mr. Charles T. O'Ferrall, of Virginia, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That George F. Richardson be now sworn in as a Representative for this Congress from the Fifth district of the State of Michigan.

Mr. Burrows offered the following substitute for this:

Whereas the credentials upon which George F. Richardson claims a seat in the Fifty-third Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Michigan have been annulled and made void by reason of the judgment of the supreme court of that State; and

Whereas in pursuance and compliance with such judgment and with the laws of said State, the State board of canvassers of Michigan have determined, declared, and certified that Charles E. Belknap is duly elected a Representative to the Fifty-third Congress of the United States of America from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Michigan; Therefore,

Resolved, That Charles E. Belknap is entitled to be sworn in as a Member of this House on his prima facie case.

By unanimous consent the consideration of these resolutions was deferred until the organization of the House should be perfected.

On August 8, after debate and after a motion to commit had been negatived, by a vote of yeas 128, nays 193, the substitute was negatived, yeas 114, nays 199, and Mr. O'Ferrall's resolution was agreed to. Then the oath was administered to Mr. Richardson.

On this case, as stated in the Clerk's explaination, both parties presented regular credentials, those presented by Mr. Richardson being exactly similar to those on which the other Michigan Members were seated. But in the case of Mr. Richardson there had been in one of the counties of his district—the county of Ionia—a recount which the supreme court of the State had declared illegal, and as a result of the action of the court there appeared a plurality of votes for Mr. Belknap. So a new certificate was issued, signed by the same officials who signed the Richardson certificate (although not by the same individuals, there having been a change in the State government), and certifying the election of Mr. Belknap. The certificate furthermore stated that Mr. Belknap had the largest number of votes and was elected "in accordance with the laws of said State and the decision of the supreme court of Michigan annulling the certificate heretofore illegally issued to George F. Richardson and is issued in lieu thereof."

In the course of the debate the action of Clerk George M. Adams in the Florida case was cited.

A resolution was adopted to allow Mr. Belknap to contest.[1]

57. The Florida prima facie election case of Bisbee v. Hull in the Forty-sixth Congress.

The Clerk and the House honored credentials, regular in form and issued by a competent officer, although the fact was notorious that the State courts had found a different result.

On March 18, 1879,[2] while the Speaker was administering the oaths to Members at the time of the organization of the House, the State of Florida was called and Mr. Noble A. Hull presented himself to be sworn. Mr. William P. Frye, of Maine, requested that he stand aside, objecting to the administration of the oath to him.

When the oath had been administered to the other Members, Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That Noble A. Hull be now sworn in as a Representative in this Congress from the Second district of the State of Florida.

Mr. Frye offered the following as a substitute:

Whereas the credentials upon which Noble A. Hull claims a seat * * * have been annulled and made void by the judgment of the supreme court of that State; and

Whereas, in pursuance and in compliance with such judgment and with the laws of said State, the State board of canvassers of Florida have determined, declared, and certified that Horatio Bisbee, jr., is duly elected a Representative, etc.; Therefore,

Resolved, That Horatio Bisbee, jr., is entitled to be sworn in as a Member of this House on his prima facie case.

On March 19 Mr. Frye withdrew the preamble and resolution and offered the following:

Resolved, That the question of the prima facie as well as the final right of Horatio Bisbee, jr., and Noble A. Hull, contestants, respectively, claiming a seat in this House from the Second district of Florida, be referred to the Committee of Elections, hereafter to be appointed; and until such committee shall have reported in the premises and the House have decided such question neither of said contestants shall be admitted to a seat.

Mr. Frye stated in support of his resolution that because of irregularities in the count in two of the counties of the district, the majority which should have been for Mr. Bisbee had been changed so as to show the election of Mr. Hull. The supreme court of the State ordered a review by the State canvassing board, which resulted in the demonstration that Mr. Bisbee had been elected. But the governor, who had already issued a certificate to Mr. Hull, on the first return of the canvassing board, declined to revise his action and issue a certificate to Mr. Bisbee. Mr. Bisbee applied to the supreme court of the State for a mandamus to compel the governor to issue the certificate. The court held that the governor ought to issue the certificate, but that the court could not compel him to. A dissenting judge held that the court might compel the governor. Mr. Frye cited the case of Davidson and Purman in the preceding Congress, where there were two certificates from two governors, and where the Clerk placed on the roll the name of the claimant whose certificate was in accordance with the law of the State as interpreted by the supreme court. In behalf of Mr. Bisbee, Mr. Frye and others claimed that the action of the supreme court, and the second canvass had shown the certificate issued to Mr. Hull to be void, and therefore that the prima facie right to the seat did not belong to Mr. Hull.

On the other hand, it was contended that Mr. Hull had the certificate of the governor, issued according to law and regular in form. Therefore he should be seated. The facts brought forward on the other side might be reason for an inquiry as to the final right to the seat, but not as to the prima facie right.

The question being taken on the resolution proposed by Mr. Frye it was disagreed to—yeas 137, nays 140.

The resolution proposed by Mr. Harris was then agreed to—yeas 140, nays 136.

Thereupon Mr. Hull appeared and the oath was administered to him.

58. A certificate regular in form and legally issued by a competent officer was honored by both Clerk and House, although the successor of that officer had issued conflicting credentials.—On October 15, 1877,[1] at the organization of the House, while the Members-elect, whose names had been placed on the roll by the Clerk, were being sworn, Mr. Richard H. Cain, of South Carolina, was challenged and stood aside. On the succeeding day, after the disposal of the case of Mr. Joseph H. Rainey, of the same State, Mr. John B. Clarke, of Kentucky, offered the following:

Resolved, That the question of the prima facie, as well as the right of M. P. O'Connor against Richard H. Cain, contestants, respectively, claiming a seat in this House from the Second district of South Carolina be referred to the Committee of Elections, hereafter to be appointed. And until such committee shall have reported in the premises and the House has decided such question neither of said contestants shall be admitted to a seat.

In this case Mr. Cain had the regular certificate, as did Mr. Rainey, and the secretary of state (successor to the one who had issued the certificate) had issued an impeaching certificate.

In the debate it was urged that the law of elections laid down the principle that a certificate did not constitute a prima facie title to a seat in cases where there was a second impeaching certificate. In this case the same officer issued the first certificate, and also the certificate that impeached the first. It did not matter that the officer was not, in the two cases, the same person. Both certificates were from the secretary of state of South Carolina. It was not sufficient to say that one came from one political partisan and the other from another political partisan. Against this it was urged again, as in the case of Rainey, that the certificate was regular in form, in conformity with law, and must be followed.

The House, by a vote of yeas 181, nays 89, adopted the following substitute:

Resolved, That Richard H. Cain be now sworn in as a Representative, etc.

The oath was accordingly administered to Mr. Cain.

59. Neither the Clerk nor the House honored credentials issued by a lieutenant-governor in the temporary absence of the governor, revoking regular credentials.—On October 15, 1877,[1] at the organization of the House while the oath was being administered to the Members-elect, whose names had been placed on the roll by the Clerk, objection was made to Mr. C. B. Darrall, of Louisiana, and he stood aside. On the succeeding day Mr. Randall L. Gibson, of Louisiana, by whom he had been challenged, stated that he had objected because the lieutenant-governor of Louisiana, acting in the temporary absence of the governor, had issued a certificate in effect revoking the certificate originally issued to Mr. Darrall, and certifying J. H. Acklen as the Representative. Mr. Gibson proposed the following resolution, which was agreed to without opposition:

Resolved, That Mr. Darrall, of the Third district of Louisiana, be sworn in, and that the credentials of Mr. J. H. Acklen, of said district, with the papers thereunto attached, be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, with instructions to report upon his right to a seat in this House from said district.

Mr. Darrall then appeared and took the oath.

60. The House confirmed the action of its Clerk who had enrolled the bearers of credentials which conformed strictly to the law, although less formal credentials had been issued at an earlier date by a recognized governor.

In making up the roll the Clerk disregarded entirely credentials issued by a person claiming to be governor, but who never exercised the functions of that office.

On October 15, 1877,[2] at the organization of the House, after the roll had been called by the Clerk,[3] that official explained as follows:

There were received from the State of Louisiana three different sets of credentials, one set signed by John McEnery as governor of Louisiana, bearing date December 20, 1876, and declaring certain persons elected from the First, Fourth, and Sixth districts, but silent as to the persons elected from the other districts of said State. Inasmuch, however, as said McEnery was never de facto governor of Louisiana, and never in point of fact exercised or performed the functions of that office, it is not deemed necessary to make here any statement concerning the regularity or irregularity of the credentials coming from that source.

Another set of credentials is signed by William Pitt Kellogg as governor of Louisiana, with the seal of the State attached, all of which not only bear different dates, but also reached the hands of the Clerk at different times and through different channels, and simply declare the persons elected from each of the districts of said State, respectively, except the Second district, as to which no certificate seems to have been issued by said Kellogg in favor of any one. The law of Louisiana prescribing the character of the credentials by which the elections of its Representatives in Congress shall be authenticated and known provides as follows:

"That as soon as possible after the expiration of the time of making the returns of the election for Representatives in Congress, a certificate of the returns of the election for such Representatives shall be entered upon record by the secretary of state, signed by the governor, and a copy thereof, subscribed by said officers, shall be delivered to the persons so elected, and another copy transmitted to the House of Representatives of the United States, directed to the Clerk thereof."

These credentials signed by Governor Kellogg are in no sense a compliance with the requirements of the laws of Louisiana. They do not even purport to be entered on the record by the secretary of state and there signed by the governor, but are, on the contrary, a simple declaration by him that certain persons are elected without even stating the sources of his information, and no more constitute credentials within the meaning of the laws of Louisiana than a simple statement from the treasurer or other State official would be.

The other set of credentials is signed by Francis P. Nichols as governor of Louisiana, and Oscar Arroyo as assistant secretary of state, with the seal of the state attached. All of them bear date February 27, 1877, and all of them reached the hands of the Clerk at the same time, and through the channels prescribed by law. They declare the persons elected in each of the districts of Louisiana, respectively, and conflict with the certificates signed by Governor Kellogg in reference to two districts only. These credentials comply, it is thought, with the laws of Louisiana in every respect, and the Clerk has accordingly placed on the roll the names of persons contained in these credentials.

Accordingly, the Clerk had placed on the roll the names of Messrs. J. B. Elam and E. W. Robertson, bearing the credentials of Governor Nichols. These names were challenged, at the time of administering the oath, and Messrs. Elam and Robertson stood aside. On October 16 and 17 their cases were considered on motions that their cases, with those of Messrs. George L. Smith and Charles E. Nash, holding certificates from Governor Kellogg,, should be referred to the Committee of Elections with instructions to determine the prima facie right.

It was urged in behalf of the Kellogg certificates that Governor Kellogg was indisputably governor de facto, that the returning board under the law having jurisdiction made returns of the election of November, 1876, and that the governor on those returns on December 27, 1876, issued certificates in form the same as used in years previous and recognized by the House as sufficient in the Forty-third Congress and on other occasions. Furthermore, it was urged that the certificates of Governor Nichols, issued after the Kellogg government expired, were based on the canvass of a new returning board provided for by a law passed after Governor Nichols came in and after the election, and that that returning board did not in fact have the returns before it.

On behalf of the Nichols certificates it was urged that the House, in determining prima facie right, had no right to travel outside of the record presented on the face of the certificates. And on the face of the certificates the credentials of Governor Nichols were exactly according to the requirements of law, and the credentials of Governor Kellogg were not. The full language of the two forms of certificates were presented to show that the Nichols certificate corresponded exactly to the technical requirements of the law, while the Kellogg certificate did not.

The House in the case of Mr. Elam adopted a substitute providing that he should be sworn in by a vote of 144 yeas to 119 nays.

Mr. Elam accordingly appeared and took the oath.

In the case of Mr. Robertson similar action was taken without any roll call, and the oath was administered.

61. It has been held that there is no roll of Delegates which the Speaker is obliged to recognize at the time of swearing in Members-elect at the organization of the House.—On December 5, 1881,[1] during the organization of the House, the Speaker announced that all the Members had been sworn in and that the next business would be the election of a Clerk.

Mr. Martin Maginnis, Delegate from Montana, rising to a question of privilege, asked if the next business in order was not the swearing in of the Delegates from the Territories.

The Speaker[2] said:

The next business in order to complete, under the law, the organization of the House is the election of a Clerk. The matter of swearing in the Delegates will follow.

On December 6 all the Delegates were sworn in except the Delegate from Utah. It seems that the name of Mr. George Q. Cannon had been placed on the roll by the Clerk of the preceding House.[3] The governor of the Territory, however, had given a certificate of election to Mr. Allen G. Campbell.

The Speaker stated that there were two certificates held, respectively, by two different gentlemen, and this involved a question which could not be determined in advance by either the old or the new Clerk. The Clerk of the preceding House was required to make up the roll of Members by States. But that obligation did not extend to a roll of Delegates from the Territories. There was no roll of the Delegates from the Territories which the Chair was bound to recognize.

Mr. Dudley C. Haskell, of Kansas, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That Allen G. Campbell, Delegate-elect from Utah Territory, is entitled to be sworn in as a Delegate to this House on his prima facie case.

Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, made the point of order that the roll was in existence and that under the law the names of Members and Delegates whose names were on the roll should be sworn in unless objection should be made. He quoted the Revised Statutes as follows:

SEC. 31. Before the first meeting of each Congress the Clerk of the next preceding House of Represenatatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of those persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States, respectively, or the laws of the United States.

SEC. 38. Representatives and Delegates-elect to Congress, whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section thirty-one, may receive their compensation monthly, etc.

After debate the Speaker said:

The Chair regards this question as one of importance, because in some view its decision may be regarded as a guide to the action of the Clerk hereafter. Should the Chair decide with reference to these Delegates that the Clerk had the right to put their names on the roll and in that way control to some extent the matter of their being sworn in, such decision might affect future cases.

As the Chair understands it, there is a difference between the swearing in of a Member and the swearing in of a Delegate, because at all stages, even though the Clerk may place upon the roll the name of a Member of Congress from a State, the House might decide not to swear him in, notwithstanding his name is on that roll. We are therefore dealing here with a question that stands exactly as though there was before the House a Member from a State in regard to whose certificate there was a contest.

[3] See House Report No. 557, p. 12, first session Forty-seventh Congress.

The Chair reads section 31 of the Revised Statutes in the light of the object of that section, which was to repose power somewhere, to confer some authority, to make up a roll of Members to be called at the beginning of Congress, so that the House might be enabled to take the first step in its organization; that is, the election of a Speaker, and following that, perhaps, after the Members are sworn in, the election of a Clerk. There was no object in putting upon such a roll the names of Delegates, who have no right to vote, unless the Congress of the United States proposed to vest in the outgoing Clerk the sole power of determining who was entitled to seats in the incoming Congress. As the Chair understands it, that power has been vested nowhere, by law at least; not in the Speaker, and certainly not in the Clerk, but is left where it belongs, to be determined under the Constitution and laws by the House of Representatives.

The language of section 31, which has been so often read, clearly indicates that it was intended to direct that there should be placed upon the roll the names of Members of Congress elected under the "laws of their States, respectively," not under the laws relating to Territories. It is true the section refers to their being elected under "the laws of the United States;" and section 4, of Article 1, of the Constitution of the United States provides that laws may be passed by Congress directing the mode of electing Members of Congress from States. In the opinion of the Chair, that power also rests in Congress, if it chooses to exercise it.

Section 38 of the Revised Statutes, so much relied upon by some Members, refers, to use the language of the section, to "credentials in due form of law of Representatives and credentials filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives." These words are used also, "in accordance with the provisions of section 31." A careful reading of section 31 of the Revised Statutes will show nothing at all in that section on the subject of filing credentials. It is a singular fact that section 38 refers to a section that contains nothing upon the matter of filing credentials. It furnishes us no guide, no reason, by implication or otherwise, for the inference that Delegates, as well as Members, were included in the words of section 31. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

62. It was held that under the law of 1867 the Clerk had no authority to make up the roll of Delegates.—On March 5, 1867,[1] on the second day of the session and after the Members had been sworn in, a question arose as to the swearing in of Delegates, and after debate the Speaker[2] said:

Until the enactment of the law under which this Congress has assembled and organized, the Clerk placed upon the roll the names of such as he saw proper to place there * * *. The law states that the Clerk shall place on the roll only the names of Representatives from those States represented in the preceding Congress[3] * * *. The Chair has conferred with the Clerk upon the subject, and the Clerk says that he does not think he has the right under the law to decide upon the prima facie credentials of Delegates or place their names upon the rolls without further direction of the House.

Later the House ordered the names of such delegates as had not contests for their seats pending to be placed on the roll, and they took the oath.

63. The Senate, after debate, permitted a claimant to a seat to withdraw his credentials.—On December 14, 1875,[4] the Senate debated at length the propriety of allowing a claimant for a seat to withdraw his credentials. The vote was finally in favor of allowing the withdrawal.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER AT ORGANIZATION.

64. A rule—which, however, is not operative at the time the House is organized—provides that the Clerk shall call the new House to order and preside until the election of a Speaker.

At the organization of the House the Clerk calls the roll of Members by States in alphabetical order.

Pending the election of a Speaker or a Speaker pro tempore the Clerk preserves order and decorum and decides questions of order, subject to appeal.

Present form and history of section I of Rule III.

Section 1 of Rule III provides:

The Clerk shall, at the commencement of the first session of each Congress, call the Members to order, proceed to call the roll of Members by States in alphabetical order, and, pending the election of a Speaker or a Speaker pro tempore, call the House to order, preserve order and decorum, and decide all questions of order subject to appeal by any Member.

This rule was adopted on January 27, 1880,[3] in Committee of the Whole, while the revised code was under consideration. The committee had at first recommended a section providing only that the Clerk should, pending the election of a Speaker, preserve order and decorum and decide all questions of order subject to appeal to the House, taking, in fact the latter half of the old rule, 146, which dated from March 19, 1860,[4] and provided:

* * * and pending the election of Speaker, the Clerk shall preserve order and decorum, and he shall decide all questions of order that may arise, subject to an appeal to the House.

As the rules are not adopted until after the Speaker is chosen, this rule is evidently of persuasive effect only at the time of organization.

65. In 1820 there arose a question as to the right of the Clerk, presiding during organization, to rule a motion out of order.—On November 15, 1820,[1] after twenty-one ineffectual ballotings for Speaker, under the rule which provided that "a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election; and, when there shall not be such a majority on the first ballot, the ballot shall be repeated until a majority be obtained," Mr. Peter Little, of Maryland, moved a resolution that the lowest on each ballot should be dropped at the succeeding ballot, and that any votes given for such lowest person should not be taken into account.

The Clerk of the House[2] declared that, under the rules of the House which prescribed the mode of election by ballot, he could not receive this motion.

Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, protested against what he pronounced an assumption of power on the part of the Clerk, and asserted the right of any Member to propound any question to the House through the Clerk, or from himself if he thought proper. Mr. Little asserted his right to make the motion, but waived the right to save time.

66. In 1837 a proposition was made that the Members-elect choose one of their number to preside during organization; but it was laid on the table and the Clerk of the last House continued to act.—On September 4, 1837,[3] at the organization of the House, the Clerk of the last House was calling the roll of Members-elect by States, when, in the State of Massachusetts, the name of Mr. Caleb Cushing was called. Mr. Cushing arose in his place and said that before responding he wished to say a few words in explanation. He saw before him many Members who were said to be elected, but there was no authentic knowledge on the subject. They were not, in his opinion, Members of the House until a Speaker had been elected and they had qualified. He was aware that it had been the usage of the House that the Clerk should prepare a roll as he had done, should call the Members individually, and should also officiate at the organization of the House. The standing rule of the House provided that he should be Clerk until a successor should be appointed. But the arrangement which should be adopted would be for the gentlemen present to be organized under the presidency of one of their own number.

The roll call having been completed and a question as to the election of two Members from Mississippi having been raised, Mr. R. Barnwell Rhett, of South Carolina, submitted this motion:

> That Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, being the oldest Member of the House of Representatives, be appointed chairman of this House, to serve until the House be organized by the election of a Speaker.

Mr. Williams opposed this motion, and urged that the Clerk be allowed to preside over the organization as he had from the beginning of the Government. To this Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, replied that there was no Clerk of this House, and that the rule of the last House continuing the Clerk until his successor should be elected had no force in this House.

On motion of Mr. Isaac Toucey, of Connecticut, the motion of Mr. Rhett was laid on the table without a division.

67. The Clerk of the last House having declined to put any motions except the motion to adjourn during organization of the new House, the Members-elect chose one of their number chairman.

The Clerk presiding during organization declined to put a question, whereupon a Member-elect put the question from the floor.

A clerk, presiding at the organization, having proposed to read a paper explaining his reasons for certain acts, the Members-elect declined to permit him to do so.

Discussion of the functions of the Clerk of the former House presiding at the organization of a new House.

On December 2, 1839,[1] the day fixed by the Constitution for the meeting of Congress, at 12 o'clock meridian, Hugh A. Garland, Clerk to the late House of Representatives, called the Members to order; and suggested that, if not objected to, he would proceed to call over a list of Members of the Twenty-sixth Congress for the purpose of ascertaining who were present and whether a quorum was in attendance.

No objection being made, the Clerk commenced the call of the roll by States, beginning with the State of Maine; and, having called as far as the State of New Jersey, and having called the name of Joseph F. Randolph from that State, he rose and stated that five seats from New Jersey were contested; that it was not for him to undertake to decide who were entitled to them; and that, if it was the pleasure of the House, he would pass by the further call from New Jersey, and complete the call of the roll, when he would submit the documents and evidence in his possession to the House, who alone were capable of deciding upon them.

This course was objected to by Mr. William Cost Johnson, of Maryland.

The reading of the credentials of John B. Aycrigg, William Halstead, John P. B. Maxwell, Charles C. Stratton, and Thomas Jones Yorke, was then called for; and being read, Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, asked that the law of New Jersey relative to elections of Members of the House of Representatives of the United States be read; when Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, asked that the credentials of Philemon Dickerson, William R. Cooper, Joseph Kille, Daniel B. Ryall, and Peter D. Vroom, claiming to be Members of the House of Representatives of the United States from the State of New Jersey in place of John B. Aycrigg and his associates, be also read.

Before either the law or credentials were read, debate arose. It was urged that as Messrs. Aycrigg and his associates held credentials from the governor of New Jersey, under the broad seal of the State, and precisely similar to the credentials by virtue of which Mr. Randolph of that State had already been called, they had a prima facie right to be called and participate in the organization of the House. There was objection to this, and a proposition that the subject of the New Jersey contest be laid aside until the roll of the residue of the Members should have been called.

[1] First session Twenty-sixth Congress, Journal, pp. 1–6; Globe, pp. 1–20.

The Clerk, in the course of the day's proceedings, declared that, under the present imperfect state of the organization of the House—no quorum having answered to their names, and there being no rules in existence for the government of the body—he did not feel authorized, under these circumstances, to put any question to the House except by general consent.

A motion being made to adjourn, the Clerk decided that he could not submit that motion to the House, and so the House, by general consent, adjourned until the next day, without a question put to that effect. On the succeeding day, also, the House adjourned without motion put by the Clerk; but on December 4, after a motion to adjourn had been made, the Clerk stated that, on the two preceding days, he had not adverted to that clause of the Constitution of the United States which provides that less than a quorum may adjourn from day to day. Having now adverted to that clause, he had changed the opinion heretofore given, that he could not, in the present state of the organization of the House, put the question on an adjournment; that he would now put a question on a motion to adjourn, but on no other motion.

On December 3 the Clerk stated that he had reduced his reasons for the course he had taken to writing, and asked permission of the House to read them. This was refused.

In the discussion which arose as to the functions of the Clerk, Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, speaking of the present Clerk, said it was true that he was not technically an officer of the House. But by the law of usage and necessity he was always permitted to hold the office which he now held. He was the quondam Clerk of the last Congress, and presented himself here, firstly to render to his successor the records of the office; and, secondly, he was here by the law of usage. The ordinance of 1785 imposed upon the Clerk (Secretary) of the preceding Congress the duty of keeping a roll of Members of Congress, and of calling over that roll at their meeting. There was also a resolution of 1791 relating to this duty of the Clerk. Thus the Clerk was bound by the law of usage.

Mr. John White, of Kentucky, contended that the ordinance of 1785 and the resolution of 1791 were of no more binding effect than the rules of the last House.

Mr. Daniel B. Barnard, of New York, contended that the Clerk was not only the Clerk of the last House of Representatives, but also the Clerk of this House. And he would so continue until his successor should be appointed. It was a cardinal principle of the common law that the public interests should never be permitted to suffer for want of an incumbent to fill important offices, and by the common as well as by the parliamentary law the functionary holds over until his successor is appointed. It was in analogy to the common law that the parliamentary rule was adopted that the clerk of the House of Commons should hold over until his successor should be appointed. This was the settled parliamentary rule in this country as well as in England. The Clerk, in assuming his seat and calling the House to order, was doing nothing more than he was fully warranted in doing. More than that, he undoubtedly had the authority to put questions—any question which the House in its partially disorganized condition might entertain.

The Clerk still persisted in declining to put any question except the motion to adjourn. Various propositions were submitted: To call the uncontested names, and, a quorum of such having been ascertained, to let them decide the contested cases before proceeding to the election of a Speaker; to choose a temporary Speaker and a committee of elections, for the consideration of the contests, and after the settlement to choose a permanent Speaker; to proceed and call the New Jersey claimants having the certificates from the governor; to allow those to whose election there was no objection to pass upon the right of challenged gentlemen to participate in the organization.

The Clerk putting the question on none of these propositions, Mr. John Quincy Adams renewed the proposition to call the names of the gentlemen having the certificates from the governor of New Jersey, and on this proposed to put the question himself.

At this point Mr. R. Barnwell Rhett, of South Carolina, asked the Clerk if he would put questions to the House. To this the Clerk replied that he would put no question except to adjourn; but said that, with the consent of the House, he would put questions as chairman of a meeting of the gentlemen present, if instructed to do so by the Members present, but he would not do so as Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. William Cost Johnson objected to his putting questions as chairman.

Mr. Rhett then moved that Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, the oldest Member of the House, be appointed Chairman of the House, to serve until the election of a Speaker. Mr. Williams declining to serve, Mr. Rhett read in his place the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. John Quincy Adams be appointed Chairman of this House, to serve until the election of a Speaker.

Mr. Rhett then put the question on the said resolution to the Members, and it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. Adams was then conducted to the chair by two Members of the House, and proceeded to discharge the duties of the position.

Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, then moved that the rules of the late House of Representatives, so far as applicable to this body in its present state of organization, be the rules for the government of its proceedings.

And the question on this motion being put by the Chairman, it passed in the affirmative unanimously.

68. In the earlier days the Clerk of the last House presiding at the organization declined to decide questions of order and referred them to the House.—On December 4, 1843,[1] at the time of the organization of the House and after the presence of a quorum had been announced, but before the election of a Speaker, Mr. Daniel D. Barnard, of New York, arose and proposed to read in his place a paper in the nature of a protest of himself and other Members of the House against the participation of the Representatives of certain States in the election of Speaker.

Objection was made that it was not in order to read the paper pending the election of Speaker.

The Clerk [1] begged respectfully to state to the House that, in its present state, he should feel it to be his duty to put the question on granting leave, to the House, and not, in his humble capacity, undertake to decide a question of that magnitude.

A motion being submitted, the Clerk put the question that Mr. Barnard have leave to read the paper, and the motion was decided in the negative, 59 ayes and 124 noes.

69. On December 21, 1849 [2] before the election of a Speaker, Mr. Samuel W. Inge, of Alabama, moved that the resolution adopted on the 14th instant, prohibiting debate until the election of a Speaker, be rescinded.

Mr. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, having taken the floor, proceeded to debate the motion.

Mr. Joseph M. Root, of Ohio, called Mr. Toombs to order for debating.

Mr. Toombs declined to surrender the floor, but proceeded in spite of the protests of Members.

The Clerk [3] requested Mr. Toombs to allow the motion to be put.

Mr. Toombs declined to yield, and proceeded amidst much confusion, declaring that the Clerk could not put the question while he held the floor.

Mr. John Van Dyke, of New Jersey, called Mr. Toombs to order.

The Clerk (Mr. Toombs continuing to speak) put the question whether the gentleman from Georgia, being called to order, should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Toombs continued to speak, but the Clerk, having put the question, declared that the point of order was sustained by the House, and that the gentleman from Georgia was decided out of order.

Mr. Toombs continued to speak, but the Clerk proceeded to put the question on the motion of Mr. Inge, and the question being put, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

The Clerk thereupon began to call the roll, and Mr. Toombs continued his speech, concluding during the roll call.

70. In the Thirty-first Congress the House did not choose a Speaker until December 22, 1849, nineteen days after the assembling of the Congress. The Clerk [3] of the preceding House presided during this time. He did not decide questions of order, but submitted them to the House for decision. Thus, on December 5 [4], a motion was made to lay a pending resolution on the table, and the question was asked whether the motion to lay on the table was debatable, no rules having been adopted. The Clerk referred the question to the House, which decided that the motion was not debatable.

Again, on December 6 [5], the question arose again, and Mr. William Duer, of New York, made the point of order that the motion to lay on the table was not debatable. The Clerk said that it was a point for the House to decide. The Clerk could not call any gentleman to order.

Again on December 11[1], a motion for a call of the House was pending and a motion to amend it was made. Mr. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, asked if the motion was in order. The Clerk declared that it was for the House and not the Clerk to decide the question of order.

71. On December 5, 1859,[2] before the election of a Speaker, Mr. John B. Clark, of Missouri, rose and proposed to submit some remarks.

Mr. Henry C. Burnett, of Kentucky, raised the question of order that debate was not in order since no question was before the House.

The Clerk[3] said:

> The Clerk having no power to decide the point of order which has been raised, will submit it to the House. * * * The Clerk will state that he has carefully examined this subject, and can find no authority conferred upon him as Clerk of the former House, except to put questions, when raised, to the House for its decision. He will not, therefore, take upon himself the power to decide this question.

Mr. Clark having been permitted to proceed, Mr. Israel Washburn, Jr., of Maine, made the point of order that the gentleman from Missouri must confine himself to the question.

The Clerk said:

> The Clerk can not undertake to decide whether the gentleman from Missouri is confining himself to the question of order or not. If the point of order be insisted on, he must submit the question to the House.

72. On December 6. 1859,[4] before the election of a Speaker, Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, asked of the Clerk whether he would make decisions of questions of order, or refer them to the House to be settled by majorities.

The Clerk[3] said:

> The Clerk, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee, begs leave to read from the Manual, in order that the House may understand the power which the Clerk has in deciding questions which may arise. This is the only authority the Clerk has been able to find upon the subject.
> "When but one person is proposed and no objection made, it has not been usual in Parliament to put any question to the House; but without a question the Members proposing to conduct him to the Chair. But if there be objection, or another proposed, a question is put by the Clerk. As are also questions of adjournment."
> "That being all that the Clerk can find, he does not feel authorized to decide questions of order as they arise."

73. Discussion of the functions and authority of the Clerk of the former House presiding at the organization of the new House.—On December 8, 1859[5] before the election of a Speaker, a question arose as to the power of the Clerk of the preceding House, who was presiding, to decide questions of order. The Clerk[6] had repeatedly declined to decide such questions, and when the precedent of December 26, 1835, was quoted, explained that the Clerk in the Thirty-fourth Congress, while suggesting his opinions on points of order, in no instance claimed the right to make a final decision.

[6] James C. Allen, of Illinois, Clerk.

Mr. John S. Millson, of Virginia, in the discussion of this question, said:

The Clerk is not the presiding officer of this House in any sense of the word. When the Clerk puts a question to the House, it is the House putting a question to itself, selecting its own officer as its organ. When the Clerk propounds a question to this House, he has no more control over the House and exercises no other function than the reading clerk when he calls the yeas and nays. It is the House calling the roll through its own appointed agent. No man can preside over the House of Representatives who is not a Member of the House of Representatives. It is in this respect that we differ from the Senate of the United States, over which, by the Constitution, the Vice-President of the United States is appointed to preside. The mistake has originated altogether from the convenient usage of permitting, by the sufferance of the House, the Clerk of the former House to propound questions, for in the absence of any other constituted agent there must be some one to address the House; but the person so speaking is not a part of the House, but simply the mouthpiece of the House. And I submit to gentlemen, if they would protect the dignity of this body, that they would never consent to regard the Clerk in any other light than as one who for convenience sake is permitted to propound questions to the House, just as the reading clerk is permitted for convenience sake to call the names of Members when the yeas and nays are ordered.

On the other hand, Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, voiced the opposite opinion:

It is not Mr. Allen, as I understand, who is temporarily the presiding officer of the House; it is the Clerk of the last House, who by law is placed for the time being as the presiding officer over this unorganized body; who is placed there for the very purpose of giving it organization; who is placed there with the power of general parliamentary law in his hands to exercise, and who is, to all intents and purposes, the presiding officer of the House as long as it remains in its present inorganic condition. When that organization shall be effected by a selection of a gentleman of our own body as the Speaker and presiding officer, the Clerk then becomes for that purpose functus officio, but till that time he is, ex vi termini, compelled to be the presiding officer of the House; and, like any other presiding officer, he must, under the parliamentary law, exercise the power which that law confers upon him and clothes him with. One of these powers is to decide questions of order as they arise; and unless practically be decides these questions— although he may not formally do it—the wheels of business will be blocked, and we could not go forward a single step. He is, unconsciously perhaps, deciding questions of order continually. He does so in giving the floor to this or the other Member, in asking a Member's permission to allow an interruption, and in many other ways which I need not instance.

74. Before the election of a Speaker the Clerk recognizes Members.— Before the election of a Speaker in 1859 the Clerk, Mr. James C. Allen, of Illinois, recognized Members who were to address the House, and when complaint was made by a Member, on December 21, explained that he was governing the recognitions so as to give an opportunity to all Members who applied for time.[1]

75. In 1855, while the Clerk was presiding at the organization of the House, a question of order was decided by him, and the decision sustained.—On December 26, 1855.[2] before the election of a Speaker or the adoption of rules, the House was considering a proposition that the Hon. James L. Orr, of South Carolina, be invited to preside over the House until the election of Speaker, and on this Mr. Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio, had demanded the previous question.

Pending this, Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, moved that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock and 59 minutes to-morrow.

Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, submitted as a question of order that it was not competent to take a recess pending the demand for the previous question.

The Clerk [1] decided that the motion to take a recess was in order.

Mr. Giddings having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

76. In 1863, at the organization of the House, the hold-over Clerk disclaimed authority to enforce the rules, but decided points of order as authorized by a rule of the last House.—At the organization of the House on December 7, 1863,[2] Clerk Emerson Etheridge held that he had no power to preserve order, having no power to enforce the rules. No rules had been adopted, but the rules Nos. 146, 147, dated March 19, 1860, provided that "these rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses, unless otherwise ordered," and that "pending the election of a Speaker, the Clerk shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide all questions of order that may arise, subject to appeal to the House." [3]

77. On December 7, 1863,[4] the Clerk [5] of the last House presided at the organization of the House, and ruled on points of order on two several cases. No objection was made, and in the first case no appeal was taken. In the second case Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, appealed from the decision of the Clerk, but withdrew his proposition before a vote on the appeal.

78. Before the completion of the organization of the House, in 1869, the Clerk refused to entertain a motion referring to a committee a subject relating to the election of a Member.—On March 4, 1869,[6] at the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called and the presence of a quorum had been announced, Mr. George W. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, offered this resolution as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That the returns of the election from the Twenty-first district of Pennsylvania be referred to the committee of elections to be appointed, with instructions to report at as early a day as practicable which of the claimants to a seat in this House has the prima facie right thereto.

Mr. Glenni W. Scofield, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the Clerk could not, at the organization, entertain a motion for reference to a committee.

The Clerk [7] sustained the point of order.[8]

79. In 1869 the hold-over Clerk, basing his authority on the law of 1863, declined to entertain a question of order or an appeal pending the motion to proceed to election of Speaker.—On March 4, 1869,[9] at the time of the organization of the House, the previous question had been ordered on the motion to proceed to the election of a Speaker, when Mr. James Brooks, of New York, announced that he rose to a question of order, and proceeded to call attention to the alleged fact that the Clerk had omitted, in calling the roll of States, to call the names of the Members from Georgia and Louisiana.

The Clerk [1] said:

The gentleman is out of order. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution that the House now proceed to the election of Speaker.

Mr. Brooks having proposed to appeal, the Clerk declined to entertain the appeal, and when Mr. Brooks persisted, directed him to take his seat, saying:

The Clerk by law is Clerk of the House until his successor is elected and qualified * * *. The Clerk will take pleasure in saying to the gentleman that he (the Clerk) is governed by the law of the land and the rules of the House. * * * The Clerk has no desire whatever to make any decision doing violence to the feeling of any gentleman of the House. He has no desire to do an act officially calculated to bring the body into confusion, but at the same time he is compelled, under the obligations which are resting upon him, so to administer the law and the rules as to effect, as a prime duty, the organization of the House. He regrets very much if any decision which he felt called upon to make has been held by any of the gentlemen affected as an invasion of their personal rights, for it was not so intended; and the Clerk begs, inasmuch as the question has proceeded thus far, that the persons indicated as tellers may take their places and the organization be effected.

80. In 1867 the Clerk, acting under the law of 1863, declined to entertain any proposition not consistent with the organization of the House.

The Clerk, presiding at the organization, has declined to entertain a protest, although it related to the organization.

On March 4, 1867,[2] at the organization of the House, the Congress having assembled in accordance with the act of January 22, 1867, the Clerk had called the roll of Members-elect, and had announced the presence of a quorum.

Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, moved that the House proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce.

Mr. James Brooks, of New York, being recognized in debate, proceeded to present the protest of Members of the minority party of the House against proceedings for its organization until certain States should be represented. Mr. Brooks asked that this protest be entered on the Journal.

The Clerk [1] said:

The Clerk declines to entertain any paper of the character of that indicated by the gentleman from New York, or any other matter pending the action of the House. The Clerk is now acting under the law; his duties are clearly prescribed, and it is impossible for him to entertain any motion or any business not consistent with the organization of the House.

Chapter IV.

PROCEDURE AND POWERS OF THE MEMBERS-ELECT IN ORGANIZATION.

81. Proceedings and forms at the organization of the House in a new Congress.

Election of Speaker and other officers, administration of the oath to Members and officers, notification of the President and Senate, and drawing of seats at the beginning of a Congress.

Forms of procedure at the opening of the second or subsequent sessions of a Congress.

When a new Congress assembles on the first Monday in December, the Members-elect are called to order at 12 m. by the Clerk of the preceding House,[6] standing at his desk. After prayer by the Chaplain of the last House, the Clerk announces:

Representatives-elect: Under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States this is the hour fixed by law for the meeting of the House of Representatives of the———Congress of the United States of America. The Clerk of the House of Representatives of the———Congress will read the names of those whose credentials show that they were regularly elected to this body in pursuance of the laws of their respective States and of the United States.[7] As the roll is called, following the alpha-

[6] In accordance with section 1 of House Rule III. (See sec. 64 of this work.) In case the Clerk can not for any reason officiate, the duties devolve on the Sergeant-at-Arms, and next upon the Doorkeeper. (See Revised Statutes, secs. 32 and 33.)

betical order of the States, those present will please answer to their names, that we may discover if there is a quorum present.[1]

When the roll call has been completed, the Delegates being called last, the Clerk presents a tabulated statement of the changes in the membership that have occurred since the regular election.

Then, if a quorum be present, the Clerk announces the fact, and declares that the next business in order is the election of a Speaker.[2] Nominations are made from the floor, simply by naming the candidates.[3]

The House has for many years elected its Speaker by viva voce vote.[4] The Clerk appoints four tellers, from the Members-elect, representing the parties making nominations,[5] who, seated at the Clerk's desk, make the record as each Member-elect, when the roll is called, alphabetically, announces the name of his choice. The roll call being completed, one of the tellers, usually the one first named, announces the result of the vote, the Clerk having previously read over the names of those voting for each candidate.

The Clerk, having restated the vote as reported by the tellers, announces that—

Mr.———, a Representative from the State of———, having received a majority of all the votes cast, is duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives of the———Congress.

The Clerk then designates certain Members, usually the other candidates who have been voted for, to conduct the Speaker-elect to the chair.

The Speaker-elect having taken the chair and addressed the House, the Clerk designates the Member-elect present who has served longest continuously[6] as a Representative to administer the oath of office to the Speaker-elect.[7]

[2] See sections 6747–6750 of Volume V of this work for controversies as to transaction of business before organization. Also see Congressional Record, first session Fifty-first Congress, p. 80, and first session Fifty-fifth Congress, p. 15.

[3] Sometimes a resolution to proceed to election of Speaker is adopted; but very early as well as very late precedents exist for proceeding without the resolution. See case December 8, 1829, when, without resolution or motion, the House proceeded to ballot for Speaker. (First session Twenty-first Congress, Journal, p. 7.)

[4] See section 187 of this work for rule relating to viva voce election and its origin. The rules, however, are not adopted until the House is organized.

[6] This does not always seem to have been the custom. Thus, in 1815, the oath was administered to Speaker Clay by Mr. Robert Wright, of Maryland, who was much younger as a Member than either Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, who had served since 1793, or Richard Stanford, of the same State, who had served since 1797, and both of whom were present. (First session Fourteenth Congress, Annals, p. 374.)

But on December 5, 1825, we find Speaker Taylor conducted to the chair by Mr. Thomas Newton, of Virginia, "the father of the House," who also administered to him the oath. (First session Nineteenth Congress, Journal, p. 8; Debates, p. 795.) Again, in 1829, Mr. Newton is spoken of as the father of the House when he administered the oath to Speaker Stevenson. (First session Twenty-first Congress, Debates, p. 471.) Again, in 1835, Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, "the oldest Member in the House," administers the oath to Speaker Polk. (First session Twenty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 8; Debates, p. 1946.) Again, on December 16, 1839, Mr. Williams, "the oldest Member," administers the oath to Speaker Hunter. (Journal, first session Twenty-sixth Congress, p. 80.)

[7] This oath is the same as that administered to Members-elect. (See sec. 128 of this work.) It does not seem to have been the invariable custom for the Speaker to address the House first. Thus, in 1815, Mr. Clay took the oath first. (First session Fourteenth Congress, Journal, p. 7.)

After the administration of the oath the Speaker administers the oath to the Members-elect and Delegates,[1] who are usually called to the area in front of the Speaker's desk several at a time, by States. The Delegates are sworn last. Members of whose election there is no question, but whose certificates have not arrived, may be sworn in by unanimous consent.

The election of the remaining officers of the House is next in order. The rule prescribes that these elections shall be viva voce.[2] It is usually accomplished, however, by the adoption of a resolution of five paragraphs, each in this form:

That——— ———, of the State of———, be, and he is hereby, chosen———of the House of Representatives, and relating to the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Postmaster, and Chaplain, in the order named.

The minority party usually present their candidates in a similar resolution, which they move as a substitute.

The Speaker having administered the oath of office to the officers elected, the organization of the House is completed, whereupon the following resolutions are presented and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to inform the President of the United States that the House of Representatives has elected——— ———, a Representative from the State of———, Speaker, and——— ———, a citizen of the State of———, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the——— Congress.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that——— ———, a Representative from the State of———, has been elected Speaker, and——— ———, a citizen of the State of———, Clerk; and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.[3]

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered the rules of the House of Representatives of the———Congress be adopted as the rules of the House of Representatives of the———Congress.[4]

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered the daily hour of meeting of the House of Representatives shall be 12 o'clock meridian.

Resolved, That the House do now proceed to draw seats for Members and Delegates of the present Congress in pursuance of Rule XXXII of the———House, and when names of Members absent from the city or on account of sickness are called, that seats be selected for them by their colleagues.[5]

[2] See section 187 of this work. The rules, however, are not usually adopted until after the officers are elected, the old rule that the rules should continue in force from Congress to Congress having been dropped in the Fifty-first Congress. See debate of May 15, 1797, where the point was raised and discussed that the rules of the former House were not binding in the election of a Clerk. (First session Fifth Congress, Annals, p. 51.)

[3] Such a resolution is in accordance with the most ancient precedents of the House. (First session First Congress, Journal, p. 134.)

[4] While this resolution is usually adopted, the House sometimes, as in the Fifty-first Congress, proceeds under general parliamentary law until rules are adopted permanently.

[5] These resolutions are the forms used in organization of Fifty-fourth Congress. (Congressional Record, first session, Fifty-fourth Congress, pp. 5 and 6.)

Before the drawing begins the Members usually permit by unanimous consent one or two Members of long service to select their seats.[1] Also, if the political parties are disproportionate in size an understanding is usually arrived at as to the portions of the Hall which they are to occupy.[2]

When the Congress assembles by proclamation of the President, before the first Monday of December, the formalities are the same, excepting that the Clerk reads the proclamation of the President instead of the usual announcement.[3]

At the opening of sessions other than the first the Speaker calls the House to order, and, after prayer by the Chaplain, directs the Clerk to call the roll of Members by States. This roll having been called and the number of Members present having been ascertained, the Speaker announces that a quorum is present, if such be the fact, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

Resolutions are then adopted providing for notifying the President and the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed on the part of the House to join the committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may have to make.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has appeared, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.[4]

82. A discussion as to whether or not the House is a House before its organization.

Congress may not by law interfere with the constitutional right of a future House to make its own rules.

A proposition to regulate the organization of the House by law.

On March 2, 1861,[5] Mr. Albert G. Porter, of Indiana, made a report from the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill (H. R. 867) "to provide for and facilitate [1] These favors are generally divided between the two large parties, and ex-Speakers are usually the recipients, but the favor may be granted to any distinguished Member.

On February 13, 1847 (second session Twenty-ninth Congress, Globe, p. 418), while the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and while Mr. W. Hunt was speaking, Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, for the first time since his attack of paralysis, entered the Hall. The committee rose in a body to receive him. Mr. Hunt suspended his remarks, and Mr. Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, arose and said: "In compliance with the understanding with which I selected a seat at the commencement of the present session, I now tender to the venerable Member from Massachusetts the seat which I then selected for him, and will furthermore congratulate him on being spared to return to this House." Mr. Adams having briefly acknowledged the courtesy, the business proceeded.

In the organization of the Fifty-fourth Congress, ex-Speaker Charles F. Crisp (Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses) and ex-Speaker Galusha A. Grow (Thirty-seventh Congress were accorded this favor. (Record, first session Fifty-fourth Congress, p. 8.) Also, in the Fifty-second Congress, ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed and the two oldest Members on the two sides, Messrs. Holman, of Indiana, and O'Neill, of Pennsylvania, were designated by resolution for the favor.

[3] See Congressional Record, first session Fifty-fifth Congress, p. 13, when Clerk Alexander McDowell called the House to order.

the organization of the House of Representatives of the United States on the assembling of each Congress." This bill undertook to prescribe the evidence which should authorize one who claimed to be a Representative to vote; the mode by which that evidence should be presented; the manner of voting for a temporary presiding officer, for the Speaker, and other officers; the order of business previous to the organization, and the number of votes requisite to elect the several officers.

The committee came to the conclusion that these provisions prescribed "rules of proceedings" for the popular branch of future Congresses, and to be, therefore, in contravention of Article I, section 5, clause 2 of the Constitution: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings," etc. The report continues:

> It seems to have been thought by some persons that the term "House" in the clause just quoted applies to the House after it has been organized by the election of a Speaker and other officers; in other words, that it is not a House until thus organized. But a reference to the clause in the same article which provides that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers" shows this interpretation to be erroneous. That clause recognizes the body of Representatives assembled as being a "House" before the Speaker has been elected.4

The bill was suggested by the troubles at the organization of the Thirty-fourth Congress. It seems never to have been acted on by the House.[1]

83. With a single exception the call of the roll of Members at the beginning of a session has been by States and not alphabetically.—On December 4, 1893,[2] at the beginning of the second session of the Congress, the roll was called alphabetically, and not by States.

Mr. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama, made the point of order that the roll should be called by States.

The Speaker (Mr. Crisp) said:

> No rule of the House requires the roll to be called or recorded in the manner which the gentleman suggests; on the contrary, the rules require that the roll be called alphabetically, except that upon the organization of the House and when in the absence of the Speaker the Clerk discharges the duty of calling the House to order, the rules require him to have the roll called by States. In other cases the rule is that the roll be called alphabetically.

In the Journal, however, the roll call appears as if called by States.

On December 5 Mr. Wheeler presented to the House the precedents from the foundation of the Government to show that at the beginning of a second session the roll had always, with the exception of this instance, been called by States.

84. The call of the roll of Members-elect may not be interrupted, especially by one not on that roll.—On December 4, 1865,[3] at the time of the organization of the House, while the roll of Members-elect was being called by States, Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee (whose name was not on the roll), rose and was proceeding to address the Chair, when the Clerk[4] declined to allow any interruption of the roll call.

85. The House declined before organization to add to the roll the name of a Member-elect whose credential had been lost; but after organization permitted him to take the oath.—On December 4, 1905,[1] at the organization of the House, and immediately after the roll had been called by States to ascertain the presence of a quorum, Mr. Asle J. Gronna, of North Dakota, stated that the certificate of his colleague, Mr. Thomas F. Marshall, had been lost, and asked that his name be added to the roll.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, said:

That would not be in order until after the organization of the House.

The Clerk[2] said:

It would be a matter of unanimous consent. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the name of his colleague [Mr. Marshall] be added to the roll. Is there any objection?

Mr. John S. Williams, of Mississippi, said:

At this stage of the proceedings I shall object. At the proper time that will be in order.

But after organization Mr. Marshall was permitted by the House to take the oath, on the assurance given by his colleague that the election was in no way disputed.

86. At the organization of the House a person whose name is not on the Clerk's roll may not be recognized.—On December 4, 1865,[3] at the organization of the House, and after the roll of Members-elect had been called by the Clerk, after the presence of a quorum had been announced, and after a motion had been made to proceed to the election of a Speaker, Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, whose name was not on the Clerk's roll, sought recognition.

Objection being made by Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, the Clerk[4] held:

The Clerk rules, as a matter of order, that he can not recognize any gentleman whose name is not on the roll.

87. It has been held that the House is technically in session during the period of organization.—On January 4, 1850,[5] Mr. Speaker Cobb decided that the House was in session during the twenty days while unsuccessful votes were being taken for a Speaker. Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, had suggested that the thirty days allowed for the introduction of petitions should not be counted from the meeting of Congress, but from the date of the organization of the House.

88. On March 11, 1875,[6] the point was raised in the Senate that at a called special session it was not in order to take any action looking to the transaction of legislative business, the House not being in session. The point was debated at some length, but no determination was reached.

89. The House may adjourn for more than one day before the election of a Speaker.—On January 13, 1860,[1] before the election of a Speaker it was ordered that when the House adjourns it adjourn until Monday next.

90. At the organization of the House in 1855 the Clerk ordered tellers.—On December 7, 1855,[2] during the protracted struggle over the election of a Speaker, Mr. Benjamin F. Leiter, of Ohio, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. Edwin B. Morgan, of New York, asked for tellers.

The Clerk[3] ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. Morgan and Mr. John Letcher, of Virginia.

91. The yeas and nays may be ordered before the organization of the House.

In 1855 the Clerk decided questions of order at the organization.

On December 7, 1855,[2] before rules had been adopted or a Speaker elected, Mr. Benjamin F. Leiter, of Ohio, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. Benjamin Stanton, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. John Letcher, of Virginia, made the point of order that the yeas and nays might not be demanded until after the organization of the House.

The Clerk[3] said:

> It is in order to call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

But on many other occasions during the protracted period before a Speaker was elected, the yeas and Days were ordered and taken without question.

92. In 1839 the difficulties at organization prevented the daily approval of the Journal until finally, on one day, the Journals of several days were approved.—From December 2 to 6, 1839,[4] the House was prevented from settling difficulties as to its organization by the refusal of the Clerk of the preceding House to put any question, except the motion to adjourn, because the call of the roll by States had not been completed, and the presence of a quorum ascertained. On December 5 Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, was chosen chairman of the meeting of Members-elect. On December 6, as soon as the meeting assembled, the Journals of the proceedings of Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th, were read and approved.

93. Instance wherein the rules were adopted immediately after the election of Speaker.—On December 21, 1839,[5] the House adopted rules before proceeding to the election of any officers except the Speaker.[6]

94. Before the election of a Speaker the House has adopted a rule regulating debate.—On December 22, 1855,[7] during the organization of the House, and before the election of a Speaker or the adoption of rules, Mr. John A. Quitman, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That, until the organization of this House by the election of a Speaker, no Member shall occupy more than ten minutes in debate on any question before the House, nor shall any Member speak more than once on any question before the House, until every Member desiring to speak thereon shall have spoken; and, upon a motion to lay on the table, there shall be no debate.

95. On January 19, 1856,[1] before the election of Speaker or the adoption of rules, Mr. Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That for one week, unless a Speaker is sooner elected, no debate on any subject, or under the form of personal explanation, shall be in order; but any Member attempting to speak shall be held out of order, unless the unanimous consent of the House shall have been first had, upon the question being submitted by the Clerk.

96. The House has adopted a rule relating to the privilege of the floor before the election of a Speaker.—On December 4, 1855,[2] at the time of the organization of the House, and before a Speaker had been elected or rules adopted, it was, on motion of Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee—

Ordered, That the Doorkeeper be directed to enforce so much of the rules of the last Congress as relates to the admission of persons within the Hall of the House.

97. On January 30, 1860,[3] before the election of the Speaker, the House adopted the following:

Ordered, That the Doorkeeper be directed to execute the seventeenth rule of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-fifth Congress, in regard to the privileges of the Hall.

98. On December 27, 1855,[4] before the election of Speaker or the adoption of rules, a proposition for the drawing of seats by Members was offered and entertained without any point of order raised, but after debate was laid on the table.

99. Before the election of officers the House has provided for opening its sessions with prayer.—On January 23, 1856,[5] before the election of a Speaker or the adoption of rules, Mr. James F. Dowdell, of Alabama, offered a preamble and resolution reciting the propriety of the House showing their reverence for God, and resolving that the daily sessions be opened with prayer, and providing that the ministers of the gospel in the city be requested to attend and perform the duty alternately.

This motion was agreed to. Later in the session, after the organization of the House, a Chaplain was elected.

100. On December 7, 1859,[6] before the election of a Speaker, Mr. Alfred Wells, of New York, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That until this House shall be organized by the election of a Speaker, the clergy of this city, of the various religious denominations, be respectfully requested to open the daily session of this House with prayer; and that such of the clergy as shall accept of this invitation officiate, one each day, in alphabetical order.

Mr. William Smith, of Virginia, questioned the power of the House to transact any business until after its organization, but withdrew his objection, and the House agreed to the resolution.

101. Before the election of a Speaker the House has empowered the Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms of the last House to preserve order.—On December 16, 1859,[1] before the election of a Speaker, Mr. William E. Niblack, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolutions, which were agreed to:

Resolved, That until the organization of this House by the election of a Speaker, the Clerk of the last House shall be authorized and empowered to preserve order on the floor of the House and in the galleries, and as far as possible for that purpose he may exercise the powers devolved on the Speaker, for the time being, under the rules of the last House of Representatives.

Resolved, further, That until the organization of this House as aforesaid, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the last House of Representatives is hereby authorized to exercise the ordinary powers of his office for the preservation of order, under the direction of the Clerk of the last House of Representatives as aforesaid.

A question was raised as to whether or not these resolutions were intended to allow the Clerk to decide questions of order, and Mr. Niblack responded that they were not.

102. Before the election of officers or the adoption of rules, the House has made a rule for enforcing order in the galleries.—On December 15, 1849,[2] before the House had been able to elect a Speaker and before rules had been adopted, Mr. James Thompson, of Pennsylvania, offered, and the House agreed to, the following rule:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are hereby authorized and directed to enforce the seventeenth rule of the last House of Representatives, and that no person be admitted to the ladies' gallery unless accompanied by ladies or introduced in person by a Member of Congress.

This resolution was agreed to without question as to the authority of the unorganized House to adopt the rule.

103. Proceedings at organization of the House in the New Jersey, or "Broad Seal," contest of 1839.

In 1839, at the organization of the House, the Members-elect did not permit five persons bearing regular credentials to participate in the organization.

In 1839 certain persons whose titles as Members-elect were contested assumed to participate in the organization; but the meeting passed on the vote of each after it had been given.

On December 5, 1839,[3] the Members-elect of the House, having been prevented from organizing the House by complications arising over a contest as to the occupants of five of the six seats of the State of New Jersey, Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, was chosen chairman of the body and the rules of the last House were adopted so far as they might be applicable.

Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, then offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the acting Clerk of this House shall proceed with the call of the Members from the different States of the Union in the usual way, calling the names of such Members from New Jersey as hold the regular and legal commissions from the executive of that State.[1]

On the succeeding day Mr. R. Barnwell Rhett, of South Carolina, moved that the resolution lie on the table.

On this question tellers were called for, and the Chair appointed Messrs. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, and Edward Davies, of Pennsylvania, tellers to count the House.

Mr. Dromgoole inquired of the Chair who were to be counted as Members from New Jersey, and stated that he should, unless otherwise directed by the House, count every person who presented himself.

The Chairman answered, and so decided, that those must be counted who had been commissioned as Members of the House of Representatives of the United States for the Twenty-sixth Congress from the State of New Jersey by the governor of that State. The Chairman further stated that he had expressed this as his opinion before he was placed in the Chair.

From this decision Mr. Aaron Vanderpoel, of New York, took an appeal to the Members on the ground that the Chair had usurped to himself the decision of the very question that the Members were trying to decide.

Pending the appeal the House adjourned. The session of the next day, December 7, was occupied largely with proceedings for the correction of the Journal, in the course of which a vote by tellers was had, and the Chairman was asked who were to be counted as Members of the House. He replied that "the tellers will count whoever passes through; and if any pass whose title to a seat is contested, they will report the fact to the meeting, and the meeting will decide the question." But the tellers, in reporting their vote, reported no votes by gentlemen whose titles were contested.

Monday, December 9, was occupied largely with the reading of documents relating to the case, and with questions relating to the reading. It was not until December 10 that the question recurred on the appeal of Mr. Vanderpoel.

Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, moved the previous question, and on the question there were 110 ayes and 48 noes. Mr. John T. H. Worthington, of Maryland, one of the tellers, reported that three of the persons claiming to be Members from New Jersey, under the commission of the governor, voted on the previous question.

The main question was then put: "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the meeting?" and passed in the negative, ayes 108, noes 114.

And so the decision of the Chair was reversed.

Mr. Worthington, one of the tellers, stated that four of the Members from New Jersey, commissioned by the governor, voted on that question.

[1] For these five seats there were ten claimants, five with credentials from the governor and five with certificates from State officials stating the vote.

The Chairman here stated that it was now for the meeting to decide who should be called as Members from New Jersey.

The question on the motion of Mr. Rhett, that the resolution of Mr. Wise do lie on the table, was called for.

The Chairman decided that that question could not be put until the preliminary question was settled as to who should vote as Members from New Jersey.

Several propositions were made, among them a motion that neither set of Members claiming seats from New Jersey should vote, until the question "Who shall vote from New Jersey?" should be decided by the House.

The Chairman decided that he was not competent to put the question on this motion, nor was it within the competency of the meeting to pass upon the motion, since in effect the motion was to decide that the people of New Jersey should not be represented on the floor.

After incidental questions had been considered, the Chairman suggested a course of procedure in the form of a ruling, but an appeal being taken, he withdrew it. Thereupon Mr. George N. Briggs, of Massachusetts, renewed the proposition in this resolution:

Resolved, That on the motion of Mr. Rhett to lay Mr. Wise's resolution on the table, or on Mr. Wise's resolution itself, the tellers shall count all the persons who may pass between them, and if any pass whose right to vote is disputed, the tellers shall report their names to the Chair, after the number of votes on both sides are reported, for the decision of the House.

This resolution was agreed to without question as to those voting.

The question then recurred on Mr. Rhett's motion, and the tellers reported that 115 had voted in the affirmative, and 114 had voted in the negative, among which latter number was one disputed vote, that of Mr. Charles Naylor, of Pennsylvania whose seat was contested by Mr. Ingersoll.

The Chairman announced to the House that he voted with the nays, whereby an equal division was produced, and the question on Mr. Rhett's motion was lost.

Mr. Francis O. J. Smith, of Maine, challenged the right of Mr. Naylor to vote, whereupon Mr. Naylor challenged Mr. Smith's right. Mr. Wise moved that Mr. Naylor's vote be counted. The question was about to be put on this motion under the operation of the previous question, when the Chairman ruled that Mr. Naylor's right to vote could not be questioned, since all controversy and proceedings had reference to the New Jersey cases and none other. Therefore the resolution moved by Mr. Briggs and adopted by the House had no relation to Mr. Naylor's right to vote.

From this decision Mr. Hopkins L. Turney, of Tennessee, appealed to the meeting.

Pending this appeal the House voted on a motion to adjourn, the tellers reporting 116 in the affirmative and 113 in the negative and that three disputed votes had been given on each side. The disputed votes being equal on each side, and therefore not affecting the result, the Chairman decided that the question was carried in the affirmative, and the meeting accordingly adjourned.

On December 11 the question was taken on the appeal by Mr. Turney, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and the tellers reported 112 votes in the affirmative, including in that number the votes of Mr. Naylor, of Pennsylvania, and Messrs. Aycrigg, Yorke, Maxwell, and Stratton, of New Jersey, commissioned by the governor of that State, 118 votes in the negative, including in that number the vote of Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, claiming to be a Member in place of Mr. Naylor, also the votes of Messrs. Kille, Cooper, and Ryall, of New Jersey, claiming to be Members, in the room of Members commissioned by the governor of that State.

The Chairman then stated that it was for the meeting now to decide, name by name, upon the right to vote of each disputed voter whose name had been reported by the tellers.

Mr. F. O. J. Smith, of Maine, objected that the determination of the rights of the disputed voters would not affect the result; that the Chairman's decision was overruled, no matter what decisions should be given as to the challenged votes.

The Chairman held, however, that more Members were voting from Pennsylvania and New Jersey than could be permitted to vote under the Constitution and the laws; therefore the meeting must decide upon these disputed rights.

The question was first taken on Mr. Naylor's right to vote, and the tellers reported 119 votes in the affirmative, 112 votes in the negative, and no disputed votes. So it was decided that Mr. Naylor's vote should be counted.

The question was next taken on the vote of Mr. Aycrigg, of New Jersey, and on the motion that it be counted the tellers reported 117 votes in the affirmative, including in that number the votes of Messrs. Halstead, Maxwell, Stratton, and Yorke, of New Jersey, commissioned by the governor of that State; 122 votes in the negative, including in that number the votes of Messrs. Cooper, Kille, and Ryall, of New Jersey, claiming to be Members, in the room of Members commissioned by the governor of that State.

It was therefore decided that the vote of Mr. Aycrigg should not be counted.

The question was next put, "Shall the vote of Mr. Maxwell be counted?"

And the tellers reported 116 votes in the affirmative, including in that number the votes of Messrs. Halstead, Stratton, and Yorke, of New Jersey, commissioned by the governor of that State; 122 votes in the negative, including in that number the votes of Messrs. Cooper, Kille, and Ryall, of New Jersey, claiming to be Members in the room of Members commissioned by the governor of that State.

And so it was decided that the vote of Mr. Maxwell should not be counted.

It was then agreed that the question be taken by one vote on Messrs. Halstead, Stratton, and Yorke; and on the question the tellers reported 110 votes in the affirmative, 117 votes in the negative, and there was no disputed vote on either side. And so it was decided that the votes of Messrs. Halstead, Stratton, and Yorke should not be counted.

The next vote decided that the vote of Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, should not be counted, and then it was decided that the votes of Messrs. Cooper, Kille, and Ryall, of New Jersey, should not be counted.

The Chairman then announced that from the votes thus taken and the decision thereby made the House had determined that the decision of the Chair that Mr. Naylor's vote could not be questioned, should be reversed, that Mr. Naylor's vote alstead, Stratton, and Yorke should not be counted.

The next vote decided that the vote of Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, should not be counted, and then it was decided that the votes of Messrs. Cooper, Kille, and Ryall, of New Jersey, should not be counted.

The Chairman then announced that from the votes thus taken and the decision thereby made the House had determined that the decision of the Chair that Mr. Naylor's vote could not be questioned, should be reversed, that Mr. Naylor's vote on the motion made by Mr. Rhett, that the resolution of Mr. Wise do lie on the table, should be counted, and that therefore the motion of Mr. Rhett had been determined in the negative.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the resolution offered by Mr. Wise.

The previous question being moved, there were in favor of it 113 votes, against it 113 votes. The Chairman thereupon voted in favor of the previous question and it was ordered.

On agreeing to the resolution there were 115 yeas and 118 nays; and so the resolution moved by Mr. Wise was rejected.

Mr. Rhett then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested; and, after the names of such Members are called, and before the Speaker is elected, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, then hear and adjudge upon the elections, returns, or qualifications of all claimants, Mr. Naylor and Mr. Ingersoll excepted, to the seats contested on this floor.

This resolution being divided, the portion to and including the word "contested" was agreed to without a call of the roll. The second portion was then agreed to, yeas 138, nays 92.

On December 12 the roll was called in pursuance of this order, and at the conclusion of the roll call Mr. Randolph, of New Jersey, read in his place a paper purporting to be a protest, signed by the five gentlemen commissioned by the governor of New Jersey, against the course adopted by the House in relation to their claim to be Members of the House. This paper set forth—

That the determination of the State authorities, authenticated in the manner prescribed by the State laws, is the only evidence of the election of Members of the House of Representatives which can be received prior to the organization of the House, and is final and conclusive until reversed by the House itself, duly organized.

That no one who can not produce the evidence of his election, prescribed by the laws of his State, is entitled to take a seat in the House of Representatives; and no one who does produce such evidence can be excluded before an investigation by the House, without a gross violation of the Constitution of the United States and the rights of the States themselves.

That the House of Representatives can not be constitutionally organized, nor a quorum. formed, until all the States of the Union have had an opportunity to appear by all their representatives; and that a constitutional quorum is not merely a majority of the Representatives elect after the arbitrary exclusion of other Members, on any pretext whatever, but a majority of all the Members from all the States, after each State has had an opportunity to appear by her Representatives, and to constitute a part of that quorum.

That the body here assembled, having no judicial powers, possessing no means for sending for persons and papers, not legally authorized to examine witnesses under oath, and expressly forbidden by law to go into the consideration of any business before the House is organized, and the oath to support the Constitution administered to its Members, can not exercise the highest judicial function belonging to the House of Representatives, that of reviewing and reversing the decisions of the State authorities in relation to their own elections; and that its only power is to require the persons appearing here as Members to produce the credentials prescribed by the laws of their respective States.

That, by the Constitution of the United States, each State has the power to prescribe by law the time, place, and manner of holding elections for its own Representatives in Congress, which power includes the right of prescribing the time, place, and manner of ascertaining and making known the result to Congress and the world.

Therefore the protestants held that the failure of the House to recognize their credentials was an outrage on the rights of their State and a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Randolph moved that the protest be spread on the Journal, and on this question there appeared yeas 114, nays 117.

Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of nine, be appointed, viva voce, by the Members of the House, to whom shall be referred all the papers in the possession of the Clerk relating to contests for seats on this floor from the State of New Jersey, and that they report thereon.

This resolution was agreed to, yeas 123, nays 104.

Mr. George W. Crabb, of Alabama, then moved to reconsider the vote, the point having been made that the first question was as to the returns and not as to the election. By general consent, then, the House reconsidered the vote.

Thereupon, Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, offered the following:

Resolved, That the credentials of the following Members: John B. Aycrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, William Halstead, Charles C. Stratton, and Thomas Jones Yorke, are sufficient to entitle them to take their seats in the House, leaving the question of contested election to be afterwards decided by the House.

The vote on this resolution was taken by yeas and nays, and there were yeas (the Chairman voting with the yeas) 117, nays 117. The House being equally divided, the question was lost.

A motion was then made by Mr. Smith, of Maine, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House proceed at this time to the election of a Speaker.

Mr. Wise raised the question of order that it was not in order to proceed to the election of a Speaker, since by the terms of the resolution moved by Mr. Rhett the House had decided to proceed with the contested cases before the election of a Speaker.

The Chairman decided that, while the resolution moved by Mr. Rhett was in full force, the resolution proposed by Mr. Smith was still in order.

After an appeal, which was subsequently withdrawn, and several roll calls on incidental questions, the question was taken on Mr. Smith's resolution, and it was agreed to, yeas 118, nays 110.

Then followed several ineffectual attempts to settle the status of the five gentlemen having certificates from the governor of New Jersey as to the vote for Speaker. A resolution presented by Mr. John White, of Kentucky, that they were entitled to vote in the organization until excluded by a majority of uncontested votes was laid on the table, yeas 119, nays 115.

Finally, on December 14, the House proceeded viva voce to the election of a Speaker, and while the first vote was being taken Thomas Jones Yorke, John B. Aycrigg, William Halstead, John P. B. Maxwell, and Charles C. Stratton, commissioned by the governor of New Jersey as Members from that State, severally and respectively, rose in their places, exhibited their commissions, and demanded that their votes for Speaker be received; and each of them announced his vote for John Bell.

The vote was then reported by the tellers, but before the result was announced Mr. Wise inquired of the tellers if the votes of the New Jersey Members who had claimed to vote had been received.

The tellers answered the inquiry in the negative.

There was no choice on this vote, and the voting was continued until December 16, when, on the eleventh vote, Robert M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, had 119 votes, a majority, and was elected Speaker.

104. At the beginning of each session the House fixes by resolution the daily hour of meeting.—On December 6, 1859,[1] before the election of a Speaker, Mr. Sherrard Clemens, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the daily session of this House shall be at 12 o'clock meridian.

105. On December 4, 1855,[2] on the first day of the session, and when the House was about to adjourn after several unsuccessful trials to elect a Speaker, Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, offered the following, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the daily hour of meeting be fixed at 12 o'clock m. until otherwise ordered.

106. On December 3 1860,[3] at the beginning of a second session, the House adopted an order fixing the hour of daily meeting, as was done at the first session.

107. On December 6, 1886,[4] at the opening of the second session of the Congress, Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, offered and the House agreed to the resolution establishing the hour of meeting of the House at 12 o'clock noon.

108. On December 5, 1892,[5] at the beginning of the second session, the House adopted the resolution fixing the hour of daily meeting until otherwise ordered.

109. On December 1, 1902,[6] at the opening of the second session of the Congress, Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered the hour of daily meeting of the House of Representatives shall be 12 o'clock meridian.[7]

110. In the early practice a motion to change the hour of daily meeting was made at any time, but as the order of business grew more rigid the motion lost its privilege.—It was the custom in the early days to agree to a resolution or order on the first day of a Congress fixing the "hour to which the House shall stand adjourned," and then on motion during the session as circumstances required the hour would be changed.[8] In those days the necessity of making certain motions privileged had not been felt, and this motion, like most other motions, was offered when a gentleman got the floor.

Resolved, That 11 o'clock a. m. shall be the hour to which this House shall stand adjourned until otherwise ordered.

112. On January 14, 1835,[2] Mr. Patrick H. Pope, of Kentucky, apparently by unanimous consent, submitted and the House agreed to a resolution changing the hour of daily meeting of the House from 12 to 11 o'clock a.m.

113. On March 15, 1836,[3] Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution changing the hour of the daily meeting of the House. Objection being made, he moved the suspension of the rules,[4] and the rules being suspended for the purpose, the resolution was considered.

114. On June 9, l846,[5] Mr. Seaborn Jones, of Georgia, moved that when the House adjourns this day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, raised the question of order that, as the hour for the meeting of the House was fixed by a standing order of the House, it was not in order to entertain a motion to change the same at any time except when resolutions were in order.[6]

The Speaker[7] stated that, although the forty-seventh rule of the House provided that "a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn shall always be in order," it did not follow that a motion to change the hour already fixed by the House was always in order; and he therefore sustained the question of order raised by Mr. Ingersoll and decided that the motion of Mr. Jones was not in order.

Mr. Jones having appealed, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

115. On January 8. I845,[8] Mr. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after this day the regular hour for the meeting of this House shall be 11 o'clock a.m.

While a motion to amend this resolution was pending, Mr. Isaac E. Holmes, of South Carolina, moved that the House adjourn.

[4] The resolution fixing the daily hour to which the House shall stand adjourned does not seem to have been considered in the light of one of the rules of the House. Thus, on May 3,1828, a resolution to change the hour to 10 a.m. was moved and at once considered. But a motion to amend it by inserting a provision that it should not be in order to move an adjournment before 5 p.m. was ruled out, on the ground that it would be a change of rule, which could not be made except after one day's notice, the rules so providing. (First session Twentieth Congress, Journal, pp. 673, 674.) The House quite often changed the hour of its daily meeting. Thus on March 5, 1828. (First session Twentieth Congress, Journal, p. 379.)

[6] The rule providing for the introduction of resolutions has been changed since then.

Mr. William J. Brown, of Indiana, moved that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. John White, of Kentucky, raised the question of order that, although under the forty-eighth rule a motion to fix a different day from that to which the House would adjourn took precedence of a motion to adjourn, a motion to fix a different hour was not contemplated by the rule and did not take such precedence.

The Speaker[1] decided in favor of the question raised by Mr. White, and the House acquiesced in the decision.

116. The resolution of the House fixing the hour of daily meeting is a standing order rather than a rule.—On April 21,1880,[2] Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, raised a question of order as to the following resolution, which he had offered as privileged:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday next, until otherwise ordered, the hour of daily meeting of the House be 11 o'clock a.m.

Debate arising as to the nature of the resolution, the then existing rule was quoted as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the Members present, etc.

The Speaker[3] said, in relation to the resolution to change the hour of meeting:

The Chair thinks that this is an order of the House and not a rule. The latter part of the rule applies to a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote, but that part of the rule is not applicable as against an order in manner as provided for in first clause of the rule as read.

The Speaker therefore held that the resolution was included under the first classification, being an order of the House requiring one day's notice, and that the resolution was not before the House.

117. On April 21, 1884,[4] Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, claiming the floor for a privileged report, presented the following from the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved, That on and after April 22, 1884, the hour of daily meeting of the House for this session be 11 o'clock a.m.

Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, asked if this was privileged.

The Speaker[5] said:

The Chair will state that this is not a rule of the House which it is now proposed to change. The rules of the House do not fix the time of meeting, but the House by resolution at the beginning of the session provided that the daily session should begin at 12 o'clock until otherwise ordered.

118. The Senate having assembled and there being no presiding officer, by mutual consent one of the older Members took the chair.

[5] John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Speaker.

The Senate, following the act of 1789, declined to administer the oath to Members-elect until it had chosen a President pro tempore, although a precedent for the proposed action was cited.

Argument that the law of 1789 as to organization of House and Senate by administration of the oath to Members-elect is directory merely.

On Monday, October 10, 1881,[1] the Senate assembled in special session, convened by proclamation of the President, who as vice-President had succeeded to the Presidency on the death of President Garfield, on September 19. When the Senate had met on March 4, 1881, it had been evenly divided politically, its committees having been organized by the casting vote of the Vice-President. No President pro tempore had been chosen; therefore when the Senate met this day there was no presiding officer.

Mr. Isham. G. Harris, of Tennessee, rising after the prayer of the Chaplain, stated that he had been requested by a number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to call the Senate to order. He stated that if there was no objection he would do so, in order that they might proceed with business. There being no objection, Mr. Harris took the chair.

The proclamation of the President was then read.

Thereupon Mr. George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, offered a resolution that Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, be chosen President pro tempore.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, here presented the credentials of Messrs. Warner Miller and E. G. Lapham as Senators-elect from the State of New York, vice Messrs. Roscoe Conkling and Thomas C. Platt, resigned; and Mr. Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, vice Ambrose E. Burnside, deceased. Mr. Edmunds declared that under the seventh rule of the Senate the presentation of credentials was always in order except during certain business such as reading of the Journal, etc.

The credentials having been presented, Mr. Edmunds moved that the oath be administered to them by Mr. Henry B. Anthony, the oldest member of the Senate in continuous service.

On motion of Mr. Pendleton, this motion was laid on the table—yeas, 36 nays 34.

Thereupon Mr. Edmunds moved as a substitute for the resolution of Mr. Pendleton a proposition that the credentials be placed on file, and that the oath be administered to the Senators-elect by Hon. Henry B. Anthony.

Mr. Edmunds said he had heard it stated that—> the law of Congress requires that the oath of office of a Senator-elect should be administered by the President of the Senate, either the Vice-President, the Constitutional President of the Senate, or the President pro tempera acting in his absence, and that this law is an exclusive law, by implication forbidding any other administration of such an oath, and hence that it is impossible legally to admit these gentlemen until there shall be a President pro tempera who can fulfill the statute and administer the oath.

Mr. Edmunds thereupon called attention to the fact that the act of 1789 was passed by a Senate and signed by a President pro temporal not one of whom had taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution.

Therefore Mr. Edmunds argued that this body as well as every other parliamentary body is entitled, when the just exigency of the case arises, to receive members who otherwise are a part of it, and to act, if there be no means of acting otherwise, on the very first question as well as the last one that may be presented to the body, without taking an oath at all.

Mr. Edmunds then referred to the Senate precedent of March 4, 1853, in a similar case, when it was ordered that "the oath required by the Constitution be administered" by Hon. Lewis Cass, the oldest member of the Senate. After that had been done, a President pro tempore was elected. Mr. Edmunds argued that the Senators of 1853 viewed the act of 1789 as a directory provision for the convenient and orderly administration of the Government, which the two Houses of Congress were expected to follow, unless the absence of the convenient means of following it would put them back upon their own inherent powers. I need not tell my honorable friend from Ohio, and I need not read to him the authority to show it, that by the ancient constitution of 211 parliamentary bodies the power to administer oaths respecting their own proceedings (I limit it to that, of course) is inherent, and part of their power and existence as a body.

Mr. Augustus H. Garland, of Arkansas, admitted that by unanimous consent the course urged by Mr. Edmunds might be followed; but the law of 1789 and Rule 63 of the Senate that the oath "required by the Constitution and prescribed by the act of June 1, 1789, shall be taken in open Senate," etc., constituted a rule which the Senate should follow, and the act of 1789 required that the "President of the Senate for the time being" should administer the oath.

Mr. Edmunds's amendment was rejected—yeas 33 nays 34—and a President pro tempore was elected before the oath was administered.[1]

119. Form and history of the rule for the drawing of seats by Members (Rule XXXII, secs. 1 and 2).—The drawing of seats by the Members is provided for by the rule of the House No. 32:

1. At the commencement of each Congress, immediately after the Members and Delegates are sworn in, the Clerk shall place in a box, prepared for that purpose, a number of small balls, of marble or other material, equal to the number of Members and Delegates, which balls shall be consecutively numbered and thoroughly intermingled, and at such hour as shall be fixed by the House for that purpose, by the hands of a page, draw said balls one by one from the box and announce the number as it is drawn, upon which announcement the Member or Delegate whose name on a numbered alphabetical list shall correspond with the number on the ball shall advance and choose his seat for the term for which he is elected.

2. Before said drawing shall commence each seat shall be vacated and so remain until selected under this rule, and any seat having been selected shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll is finished, and whenever the seats of Members and Delegates shall have been drawn no proposition for a second drawing shall be in order during that Congress.

In the early years of the House seats were evidently selected by Members in accordance with a system of mutual agreement. On February 16, 1826,[2] Mr. Robert Taylor, of Virginia, proposed a rule that the seats be numbered, and that on the first or second day of each session Members should select their seats by drawing pieces of paper bearing those numbers. This proposition was laid on the table. On July 2, 1838,[1] the House agreed to a resolution that in the new arrangement of the Hall which was to be made the Members should be entitled, as nearly as possible, to the same relative positions which they then held. A proposition by Mr. Horace Everett, of Vermont, that seats be drawn by lot was not considered seriously. On June 1, 1841,[2] an effort was made to establish a permanent rule providing for drawing of seats by lot. It was urged that Members living near the seat of Government obtained an undue advantage of others by making early choices. The rule was not adopted. On December 8, 1841,[3] the House was called on to decide which of two Members was entitled to a certain seat, one Member having attempted to transfer it to another. Finally, on December 1, 1845,[4] Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, proposed to remedy the unfairness of the old method of selection by having a drawing by lot. This was agreed to, and on December 4, seats were drawn for the first time.

From 1845 until 1880 seats were drawn in accordance with a resolution adopted on each occasion. At the time of the revision of 1880 the Committee on Rules reported a plan for having the names of Members written on slips of paper, which were to be drawn from a box by the Clerk. But Mr. Walter L. Steele, of North Carolina, having recited an instance in the House where such a plan had not proved satisfactory, offered as an amendment the present form of section 1.[5] The amendment was adopted.

Section 2 is in the form reported in the revision of the Forty-sixth Congress.[6] It was in form a new rule, although a portion of it comes from Rule 163 of the old rules of the House, which provided:

> Whenever the seats of Members shall have been drawn, no proposition shall be in order for a second drawing during the same Congress.

This restriction dates from February 8, 1872,[7] when it was proposed by Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, to prevent obstruction of the public business by the presentation of resolutions for new drawings of seats.[8]

120. At the time of the organization of the House the motion relating to the drawing of seats is privileged.—On December 5, 1856,[9] a resolution for the drawing of seats at the beginning of a session was offered and admitted as a question of privilege.

Stephens, of Georgia, indicated that the Members of the Whig party used to select seats in the portion of the Hall to the left of the Speaker, where members of the Republican party now sit, while Members of the Democratic party then as now selected seats on the side to the right of the Speaker. Members of third parties usually sit with the minority.

121. Precedents as to drawing of seats where a large portion of the majority is to be accommodated on the minority side of the main aisle.— On December 4, 1905,[1] at the organization of the House, a question arose as to the selection of seats, and Mr. James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, asked and received unanimous consent for agreement to the following:

> That in selecting seats the precedents of the Fifty-second and Fifty-fourth Congresses be followed whereby the section of seats next to the main aisle on the minority side were given to the majority side, leaving any further excess of majority Members to be accommodated in the seats on the extreme left of the minority side.

Mr. Tawney in debate referred to the precedents in the Fifty-second[2] and Fifty-fourth[3] Congresses.

122. Before an organization of the House has been effected the Senate has not usually proceeded to general legislation.

In the earlier practice of the House the Senate was notified of the election of Speaker, but not of that of other officers.

In 1839[4] the House met in the first session on December 2, but the organization was not completed until December 21. On that day, the Speaker having been elected, the rules adopted, and the Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms elected—which steps occurred in the order enumerated—a message was sent to the Senate informing that body that a quorum of the House had assembled, that Robert M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, had been elected Speaker, and that it was now ready to proceed to business.[5] The Doorkeeper and Postmaster were not elected until the day after this message was sent.

On December 23 a message was received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate, on December 2, formed a quorum, and was ready to proceed to business. The message also communicated a resolution adopted by the Senate for appointing the customary joint committee to await upon the President and inform him that the two Houses were ready to receive any communication from him. The House at once concurred in this.

The Senate had adopted these resolutions on December 2. On the 4th Mr. Thomas H. Benton said that he understood that, as the other branch was not organized, it would not be proper to transact legislative business, yet he thought some resolutions of inquiry might be adopted in order to obtain a basis for future action. But, on the succeeding day, doubts as to the propriety of this being raised, Mr. Benton decided not to proceed.

On December 9 a resolution was adopted to inform the President that a quorum of the Senate had assembled, and that they were ready to receive any communication of an executive character which he might make.

Thereafter, until the organization of the House and the receipt of the President's message, the Senate transacted no business but executive business, not even bills being introduced. Of course the election of its officers and appointment of its committees occurred.

123. In the Thirty-first Congress the organization of the House was delayed for twenty days by the failure to elect a Speaker. During this time the Senate did no general legislative business. On December 11, 1849,[1] while the House was still unorganized, Senator Joseph R. Underwood, of Kentucky, gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill.

A question being raised, and the opinion of the Vice-President[2] being asked, he said that the impression of the Chair was that no proceeding connected with legislative business could be had until both Houses were organized. As notice of the introduction of a bill was a necessary antecedent step to the introduction of a bill, and one which related to the business of legislation, in the opinion of the Chair it was not now in order to give such notice.

On December 15 the Senate adopted a resolution appointing a committee to wait on the President and inform him that the Senate was organized and ready to receive any communication he might think proper "in relation to matters which are within the sphere of their separate constitutional action." Mr. Henry Clay approved this, saying that it was in accordance to precedent, and did not seem wanting in courtesy to the other body.

124. In the session of 1855–56,[3] while the House was unable to organize because the election of a speaker was not effected until February, the Senate did not proceed to legislation, but on December 4 notified the President that it was ready for communications of an executive character; on December 31[4] received the annual message of the President of the United States; organized its committees, etc.

125. On January 18 and 19, 1860,[5] while the House was endeavoring to elect a Speaker, the Senate debated at length whether or not it might proceed to general legislative business, it being contended on the one hand that the Congress consisted of an organized Senate and an organized House, and that while one remained unorganized there was no Congress. On the other hand, it was contended that the Senate might proceed with business. A proposition declaring that the Senate might not proceed to legislative business until the House should be organized was laid on the table, and then, by a vote of 45 yeas to 7 nays, the Senate voted to allow a bill to be referred to a committee. During the discussion the constitutional questions and the precedents were examined carefully.

126. At the beginning of a second session of a Congress the House proceeded to business, although a quorum had not appeared in the Senate.

A message from one House that a quorum has appeared is not delivered in the other until a quorum has appeared there also.

On November 4, 1794,[6] at the second day's session of the second session of the Third Congress, a quorum appeared, and a message announcing that fact was sent to the Senate.

On November 5 Mr. Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, said he saw no reason for awaiting the attendance of a quorum in the Senate, and submitted a motion for the appointment of a committee to examine unfinished business.

Mr. Benjamin Goodhue, of Massachusetts, objected to the motion as improper, but the Speaker [1] put the question on Mr. Dayton's motion.

The House thereafter proceeded to business, no quorum of the Senate appearing until November 18,[1] when the joint committee was authorized and appointed to notify the President that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled.

The Journal indicates that no message was sent to the Senate until the quorum had appeared, excepting the message of November 4. That message was not delivered in the Senate until the quorum had appeared, on November 18.[2]

The oath is also prescribed by the statutes,[2] in the following form:

I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

129. At the organization of the first House an order prescribed the oath to be taken by Members until a law should be enacted.

On April 6, 1789,[3] it was, on motion—

Resolved, That the form of oath to be taken by the Members of this House, as required by the third clause of the sixth article of the Constitution of Government of the United States, be as followeth, to wit: "I, A B, a Representative of the United States in the Congress thereof, do solemly swear (or affirm, as the case may be), in the presence of Almighty God, that I will support the Constitution of the United States. So help me God."

On April 8, in accordance with an order adopted on the previous day, the chief justice of New York attended and administered the oath, first to Mr. Speaker in his place, and then to the Members.[4]

On April 6, previous to adopting the form of oath, leave had been granted to bring in a bill to regulate the taking the oath. This was the first bill to become a law, the President affixing his signature June 1, 1789.[5]

On June 2 the Speaker administered the oath required by the act to Members who had not taken a similar oath, and to the Clerk.[6]

130. The act of 1789 provides that at the organization of the House and previous to entering on any other business the oath shall be administered by any Member to the Speaker and by the Speaker to the other Members and the Clerk.—Section 30 of the Revised Statutes, reenacting the act of June 1, 1789, provides:

At the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives, the oath of office shall be administered by any Member of the Home of Representatives to the Speaker; and by the Speaker

The requirements of section 1759 of Revised Statutes in regard to the preservations of the oaths are not observed in regard to Members or Delegates or the elected officers of the House. to all the Members and Delegates present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business; and to the Members and Delegates who afterward appear, previous to their taking their seats.[1]

131. It has long been the practice for the Member of longest continuous service to administer the oath to the Speaker.—On December 22, 1849,[2] the oath was administered to Speaker Howell Cobb by Mr. Linn Boyd, of Kentucky, the oldest Member. The Speaker descended from his seat to take the oath.[3]

132. On December 5, 1853,[4] the oath of office was administered to Mr. Speaker Boyd by Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, "the oldest consecutive Member of the House."

133. On February 1, 1860,[5] Mr. John S. Phelps, of Missouri, "the oldest consecutive Member of the House," administered the oath to Mr. Speaker Pennington.

134. The Speaker possesses no arbitrary power in the administration of the oath, and if there be objection the majority of the House must decide.—On January 24, 1871,[6] Mr. P. M. B. Young, of Georgia, presented the credentials of Stephen A. Corker, of the Fifth Congressional district of Georgia, and asked that the oath be administered to him.

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, objected to the administration of the oath.

Mr. James Brooks, of New York, made the point of order that, when credentials in regular form were presented, they did not form a subject of discussion.

The Speaker[7] said:

In the organization of the House Members who have credentials from the governors of their respective States are entered upon the Clerk's list, and no man is prejudiced, of course. The House is organized upon the list so made up. But gentlemen coming subsequently are sworn in by the Chair, if there is no objection. The Chair administers the oath in cases where there is no objection; but if there be objection, of course it is a matter which must be determined by the majority of the House. The Chair possesses no arbitrary power in the matter whatever. It is a matter which must be determined by a majority of the House. If it were previous to the organization of the House, of course the gentleman's credentials would be entered on the Clerk's list and he would be sworn in with the other Members.

[1] 1 Statutes at Large, p. 23, gives the form of oath at that time as follows: "I, A B, do solemnly swear or affirm (as the case may be), that I will support the Constitution of the United States."

On January 21, 1884, the House passed the bill (H.R. 3926) repealing the act of July 2, 1862, and such sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States as perpetuated the oath prescribed in that act. This was the repeal of the "test oath," so called. The bill became a law. (First session Forty-eighth Congress, Journal, pp. 375, 1233; Record, pp. 551, 1420.) On July 27, 1867 (first session Thirty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 1168; Globe, pp. 4267–4273), the House laid on the table by a vote of 87 to 31 a joint resolution of the Senate for the purpose of allowing David T. Patterson, of Tennessee, to take his seat in the Senate without taking the whole of the test oath required by law.

The subject of subscribing to the oath by Senators and Representatives was discussed somewhat in the Senate on December 19, 1883, when a rule was adopted to enforce the provisions of the Statute. It was stated in the debate that Senators had not until recently subscribed to the oaths. (First session Forty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 171.)

135. If a Member object the Speaker does not administer the oath to a Member-elect without the direction of the House, even though the credentials be regular in form.—On September 10, 1850,[1] Mr. Linn Boyd, of Kentucky, presented the credentials of Edward Gilbert and George W. Wright, Member-elect from the State of California. Mr. Boyd stated that the Members-elect were present and were ready to take the usual oath.

Mr. Abraham W. Venable, of North Carolina, objected to the administration of the oath, and moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. James Thompson, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that it was the duty of the Speaker to administer the usual oath upon the presentation of their credentials.

The Speaker[2] decided that, inasmuch as the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution constituted "each House the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members," whenever objection was made it was the duty of the House, and not of the Speaker, to determine whether or not the oath should be administered. He therefore overruled the point of order.

Mr. Thompson having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

136. On July 3, 1867,[3] after the organization of the House, the credentials of eight Members from Kentucky were presented and the gentlemen presented themselves to be sworn.

Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, at this point presented a protest against the administration of the oath to one of the gentlemen, Mr. John D. Young, on the ground that he had been disloyal to the Government during the war.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, having raised a question of order, the Speaker[4] said:

> The Chair rules, in accordance with the uniform usage of the present occupant of the chair and of every occupant of the chair, that it is for the House to determine what action it win take when a gentleman, claiming to have been elected a Representative, presents himself to be sworn. It is for the House to determine.

Later the Speaker referred, in support of his ruling, to the precedent of July 24, 1866, when Mr. William B. Stokes, of Tennessee, was challenged when he appeared to take the oath, and his credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections.

137. On March 7, 1867,[5] Mr. William E. Niblack, of Indiana, presented the credentials of A. B. Greenwood, claiming a seat as a Member from Arkansas, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, moved that the credentials be laid on the table, and the motion was agreed to.

A question being made as to whether or not Mr. Greenwood might not be sworn in on the presentation of the credentials, the Speaker§[4] said that the oath would not be administered if there was objection, and that objection had been indicated by the motion to lay on the table.

138. On December 6, 1869,[1] at the beginning of the second session of the Congress, a question being raised as to the administration of the oath to certain Members, Mr. Speaker Blaine said:

The Chair did not propose to administer the oath to any gentleman to whose admission a single Member on the floor might make objection. The usage has always been, when there was no objection, to allow a Member to be sworn in without any further ceremony.

139. In 1866 the Speaker declined to administer the oath to persons whose credentials were regular, but who came from States declared by the two Houses not entitled to representation at the time.—On July 23, 1866,[2] Mr. Lawrence S. Trimble, of Kentucky, proposed, as a question of privilege, that the oath be administered to Messrs. N. G. Taylor, J. W. Leftwich, and Edward Cooper, Members-elect from the State of Tennessee.

The Speaker[3] said:

The Constitution does declare that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; but the House of Representatives has decided, with the concurrence of the Senate, that certain States, not represented during the last four years in the Congress of the United States, shall not be entitled to representation again until by concurrent action of both branches they shall be declared to be entitled to representation. The House therefore declared it had no constitutional right so to judge. The Chair overrules the demand that the gentlemen claiming seats from Tennessee shall be sworn in.

Mr. Trimble having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table—yeas 119, nays 30.

140. The Members-elect having denied to certain of their number a right to participate in the organization, the Speaker declined, without instruction of the House, to administer the oath to those thus debarred, although they presented certificates in proper form.

In 1839 the House refused to direct the Speaker to administer the oath to certain persons having regular credentials as Members-elect, and as organ of the House he declined to administer the oath.

In 1839 the House declined to adopt rules until the Members had been sworn in according to the Constitution and law of 1789.

On December 9, 1839, at the organization of the House,[4] when the clerk, in calling the roll, had reached the State of New Jersey and had called the name of Mr. Joseph F. Randolph, he paused and explained that as to the other five members from that State there was conflicting evidence as to who were entitled to the seats. Messrs. John B. Aycrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, William Halstead, Charles C. Stratton, and Thomas J. Yorke had certificates from the governor of the State. On the other hand, the Clerk had in his possession certificates from the secretary of state of New Jersey showing that Messrs. Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryal, William R. Cooper, and Joseph Kille had received the greatest number of votes.[5] The controversy over these New Jersey seats was prolonged until December 16 before a Speaker was elected. In the election of Speaker the contestants on neither side voted, the other Members present having formally voted that the five holding the governor's certificate should not vote. The Speaker having delivered his address and the Journal of the previous session having been read, Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, moved that the rules of the last House be adopted as the rules of the present House. Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, moved that this motion lie on the table until the "Members of the House shall have been sworn into office, as required by the Constitution, and by the act of June 1, 1789."[1] This motion was carried by a vote of 117 yeas to 116 nays, the Speaker voting aye. In the debate the point was made that under the law of 1789 the oaths should be administered to Members before business could begin.

The oaths having been administered to all the Members and Delegates, the Speaker[2] informed the House[3] that the five gentlemen from New Jersey holding the governor's certificate had presented themselves at the desk and demanded to be sworn into office. The Speaker further stated that, in consequence of the proceedings which had already taken place in relation to the rights of these gentlemen to seats in this House and which were to be found in the Journals, he had declined to administer to them the oath of office, although his own opinion, heretofore expressed in another situation that they were entitled to qualify, was unchanged. He therefore submitted their demand to be sworn to the House.

Various motions having been submitted and withdrawn during several days of debate, on December 20 Mr. George Evans, of Maine, finally offered the following:

Resolved, That the Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States now present do advise and request the Speaker to administer the oath required by law to the five gentlemen from the State of New Jersey who have presented their credentials to the Speaker and demanded to be sworn.

This resolution was defeated, yeas 112, nays 116.[4] In the course of the debate[5] the case of Mr. Landon (Lanman), in the Senate of 1825,[6] was referred to; also the case of Claiborne and Gholson in 1837,[7] in the House. The Speaker, in the course of the debate,[8] said that in regard to the duty of the Chair in swearing in the New Jersey Members he would say that he was merely the organ of the House, and whether it was a House de facto or de jure was not a question for him to decide; but being its organ, he was bound to carry out the decisions that it had made and which were staring him in the face.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, during the debate, contended[8] that it was not competent for the House to entertain the previous question or any other motion while the question of the right of the New Jersey Members to be sworn was pending.

Mr. Evans's resolution having been defeated, a resolution adopting rules was agreed to,[1] and then the organization of the House was completed by the election of a Clerk and other officers. The cases of the New Jersey Members were referred to the Committee on Elections, and ultimately the delegation, headed by Mr. Dickerson, was seated.[2]

141. The fact that a Member-elect has not taken the oath does not debar him from challenging the right of another Member-elect to be sworn.—On March 4, 1871,[3] while the Speaker was administering the oath to the Members-elect at the organization of the House the name of Mr. Alfred M. Waddell, of North Carolina, was called.

Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, upon his authority as a Member of the House, charged that Mr. Waddell was disqualified, and objected to the administration of the oath to him.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, raised the question of order that Mr. Maynard had not been sworn, and therefore might not make the objection.

The Speaker[4] said:

> He is a Member of the House. If he were not, the Chair would of course not recognize him. * * * The gentleman from Tennessee clearly has the right to raise this question.

142. On a question raised while the oath is being administered to Members the right to vote is not confined to those already sworn in.—On March 4, 1869,[5] at the organization of the House, after a Speaker had been elected and while the Members-elect were taking the oath, a question was raised as to the qualifications of Messrs. Boyd Winchester and John M. Rice, of Kentucky, and a motion was made to refer their credentials to the Committee on Elections with instructions. On this motion the previous question was ordered and the vote was about to be taken when Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, raised the question of order that none but those sworn in had the right to vote.

The Speaker[4] said:

> The Chair overrules the point of order. The uniform usage of the House is otherwise.

143. It has been held, although not uniformly, that in cases where the right of a Member-elect to take the oath is challenged the Speaker may direct the Member to stand aside temporarily.—On March 4, 1869,[6] at the organization of the House and while the Speaker was administering the oath to Members-elect, objection was made to the swearing in of Mr. Patrick Hamill, of Maryland. Mr. Hamill was asked to step aside until other Members, about whom there was no question, should be sworn.

Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the duty devolved upon the Speaker by law to swear in each Member as he presented himself for that purpose; it was not for the Speaker to decide whether he could properly take the oath or not. Moreover, the House could not discharge any of its functions, either legislative or quasi judicial, which were conferred on it by the Constitution, until it was organized. Therefore there was no power, either in the Speaker or the House, at present to exclude a Member-elect from taking the oath.

The Speaker [1] replied that the Chair had not assumed to exclude any Member-elect from taking the oath. But the gentleman from Maryland, in order to relieve the embarrassment of the House, voluntarily withdrew, as he had a right to do, from those who had presented themselves to take the oath.

144. On March 4, 1869,[2] at the organization of the House objection was made to the taking of the oath by Messrs. Boyd Winchester and John M. Rice, of Kentucky. When the Speaker [1] requested them to step aside until the remaining Members had taken the oath, objection was made. The Speaker thereupon stated that the question must be met at once, and a resolution, reciting the allegations against the two gentlemen and providing that they should not be sworn in until after an investigation had been made, was presented.

145. On December 5, 1881,[3] at the organization of the House the Speaker was administering the oath to Members, and the State of Alabama had been called. As Mr. Joseph Wheeler presented himself to be sworn Mr. George W. Jones, of Texas, objected, and asked that Mr. Wheeler stand aside.

The Speaker having directed Mr. Wheeler to stand aside, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, raised the point of order that the stepping aside of a gentleman who had been thus challenged was a voluntary act, and in support of this point he cited the proceedings in the Forty-first Congress.

After debate the Speaker [4] said:

> The Chair is inclined to hold that he has the power to designate the order in which Members may be called and sworn in. Unquestionably the Chair has no right to decide upon the title of any Member. * * * If any gentleman is objected to, for mere convenience of proceeding the Chair will ask the gentleman objected to to stand aside. He having stood aside, and all others not objected to having been sworn in, the Chair will at once require the roll to be called for those persons who have been objected to and will swear them in, unless there shall be some good reason given upon which the House may act and direct the Chair otherwise. * * * This is a matter of order, wholly within the control of the Chair for the convenience of procedure.

A resolution relating to Mr. Wheeler's case having been presented and laid on the table, the Speaker said:

> The Chair will state, there being no motion before the House, in the absence of instructions he will regard it his duty to proceed to swear in the Member.

Accordingly the oath was administered to Mr. Wheeler.

146. At the organization of the House on March 4, 1871,[5] after the Speaker had been elected and while he was administering the oath to the Members, the name of Mr. Alfred M. Waddell, of North Carolina, was called. Mr. Waddell's name was on the roll and he had participated in the election of Speaker. Mr. Horace

Maynard, of Tennessee, challenged his right to be sworn, on the ground that he was ineligible under section 3 of article 14 of the Constitution, since after taking an oath as a civil officer of North Carolina to support the Constitution of the United States he had subsequently participated in the war of secession, thereby becoming disqualified for a seat in Congress.

When this objection was made the Speaker said that he would first swear in those Members against whom there was no objection.

This was done, and later on the same day the House voted to allow Mr. Waddell to take the oath, and referred his credentials to the Committee on Elections.[1]

147. When, at the organization of the House, several Members-elect are challenged and stand aside, the question is first taken on the Member-elect first required to stand aside.—On October 15, 1877,[2] at the time of the organization of the House, objection was made to the swearing in of several Members, and they stood aside. On October 16 their cases were considered, and Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, called up, as a question of privilege, the case of James B. Belford, of Colorado.

Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, made the point of order that the question must first be taken on the case of the Member first required to stand aside.

148. On December 6, 1875,[4] at the time of the organization of the House, objection was made to the swearing in of several Members. During the proceedings Mr. James A. Garfield made the point of order that in the consideration of these cases the question should be first taken on the one who was first called on to stand aside.

The Speaker[3] sustained the point of order.

149. When Members-elect are challenged at the time of taking the oath motions and debate are in order on the questions involved in the challenge; and in a few cases other business has intervened by unanimous consent.—On July 4, 1861,[6] the Speaker had been elected and was about to proceed to administer the oath to Members when Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, moved that such names upon the roll as should be objected to, when called, be passed over until other Members should be sworn in. Mr. Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, proposed an amendment by inserting the words "as may be contested" in place of "as should be objected to." Mr. Colfax explained that he did this because there was a question as to one or more of the Virginia delegation, although their seats were not contested.

Mr. Samuel R. Curtis, of Iowa, made the point of order that both the motion and the amendment were out of order, as the House was still in an unorganized condition. The first business was to perfect the organization, and until that was done such motions were not in order.

The Speaker [1] overruled the point of order.

Mr. Stevens's motion was then amended, and as amended was agreed to.

The names of all those whose seats were not contested having been sworn in, Mr. Ellihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, moved that the rules of the last House of Representatives be adopted as the rules of this House.

The Speaker said:

> The first business to be done is the qualification of Members, and until that business is disposed of the Chair thinks it is not proper to do any other business.

150. On March 4, 1869,[2] at the organization of the House, the Speaker was administering the oath to the Members-elect, when the right of Mr. Patrick Hamill, of Maryland, to take the oath was challenged. Debate having begun upon Mr. Hamill's case, Mr. Ebon C. Ingersoll, of Illinois, made the point of order that debate was not in order on the question.

The Speaker [3] held that debate was entirely in order, as the House was considering a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, made the point of order that as the Members had not all been sworn in there was no House to vote on the question.

The Speaker overruled the point, saying that the present mode of procedure was that warranted by all the precedents. He also said in connection with a similar point of order raised later that he considered the House in its present state competent to enforce the previous question. Such was the case even in the preliminary stage of the proceedings for organization on that day before the Clerk had called the roll for the election of Speaker. The House had certainly lost none of its powers by the election of Speaker and by its proceeding so far in the business of organization.

151. By unanimous consent the House has proceeded to legislative business pending decision as to the right of a Member to be sworn in.— On October 15, 1877,[4] at the time of the organization of the House, objection was made to the swearing in of several Members, and they stood aside. Before the determination of the right of these challenged Members-elect to be sworn the organization of the House was completed and seats were drawn. On October 16 the House considered the cases of two of those challenged, and then the reading and reference of the President's message intervened before the disposal of the remaining cases. It does not appear that unanimous consent was formally asked for these interruptions.

152. On March 18, 1879,[5] at the time of the organization of the House, objection was made to the swearing in of Mr. Noble A. Hull, of Florida. The consideration of Mr. Hull's case was about to begin when Mr. William P. Frye, of Maine, requested that it be postponed until the next day.

Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, objected.

The consideration of the case thereupon proceeded, but later, by unanimous consent, the matter was postponed until the next day.[1]

153. Questions as to the credentials and qualifications of Members-elect may, by general consent, be deferred until after the election of Speaker and swearing in of Members.—On July 4, 1861,[2] at the time of the organization of the House, while the Clerk was calling the names of the Members-elect by States, several questions were raised as to the credentials and qualifications of Members-elect, but by general consent the determination of these matters was waived until after the election of a Speaker and the administration of the oath to Members.

154. In 1861 it was held that the House might direct contested names on the roll to be passed over until the other Members-elect were sworn in.—On July 4, 1861,[3] at the organization of the House, after the Speaker had taken the chair, and before administering the oath to such of the Members as were present, it was voted, on motion made by Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, as amended on motion of Mr. Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, that such names on the roll as might be contested should, when called, be passed over until the other Members were sworn in.

The Speaker[4] overruled a question of order that the motion was not in order prior to the completion of the organization.

155. A Member-elect challenged as he is about to take the oath is not thereby deprived of any right, and the determination of his case has priority of those of persons claiming seats but not on the Clerk's roll.—On October 15, 1877,[5] at the time of the organization of the House, while the oath was being administered to the Members-elect, several Members-elect were challenged and required to step aside.

On October 16, after the organization of the House had been perfected, the cases of these challenged Members were taken up.

Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, proposed to call up the case of the Representative from Colorado, from which State no name had been placed on the roll.

Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, raised the question of order that those first challenged should be first considered.

After debate, the Speaker[6] said:

> In the opinion of the Chair, the proposition that before taking up the case of any gentleman whose name was not upon the roll at all the House shall consider the qualifications of Members upon the roll who were asked to step aside is reasonable and right and in accord with the practice. Any other ruling would work great hardship. These gentlemen were placed upon the roll by the Clerk under the law, and upon the objection of an individual Member, which in its nature is arbitrary and might be factious, they were prevented from being sworn in. The Chair stated yesterday that such a single objection did not deprive those gentlemen of any right which they possessed, and if the occasion had presented itself these gentlemen, in the opinion of the Chair, would have had the right to vote, as they did in fact vote, upon the election of Speaker, in the same manner as though they had been sworn in. For these reasons the Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from New York.

156. Members-elect challenged for alleged disqualifications have in several cases been sworn in at once, the question of their qualifications in some cases being referred to a committee for examination.—On July 4, 1861,[1] at the organization of the House, the Speaker[2] was administering the oath to the Members-elect. When the State of Virginia was called, Mr. Henry C. Burnett, of Kentucky, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the question of the right of Charles H. Upton, William G. Brown, R. V. Whaley, John S. Carlile, and E. H. Pendleton, to seats upon this floor, be referred to the Committee on Elections, when formed, and that they report to this House thereon.

It appears from the debate that there was a question as to whether or not Mr. Upton was a citizen of Virginia, it being alleged that he was a citizen of Ohio and that he had voted there at the last election.

Both Mr. Upton and his associates were among those whose names were on the roll as made up by the Clerk and they had voted in the election of Speaker.

On motion of Mr. John A. McClernand, of Illinois, the resolution was laid on the table, and the Virginia Members took the oath.

157. On March 4, 1869,[3] the Speaker having been elected and having addressed the House, the swearing in of the Members was proceeding, and the name of Mr. Patrick Hamill, of Maryland, had been called, when Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, objected to Mr. Hamill on the ground that he had been disloyal during the war. Mr. Butler proposed a resolution that Mr. Hamill be not allowed to take the oath until his case should be investigated by the Committee on Elections.[4]

On March 5, when the case was again taken up, Mr. Butler stated that he had examined the case carefully and was of the opinion that the prima facie case, as made out by the certificate of the governor, ought at the present time to prevail, and that Mr. Hamill ought to be admitted to his seat.

A resolution was therefore presented and agreed to that Mr. Hamill be now sworn in and that the papers submitted in this case be sent to the Committee on Elections when appointed. Mr. Hamill therefore took the oath. Mr. Hamill had previously participated in the proceedings of organization, having answered to his name on the vote for Speaker.

158. On March 4, 1869,[5] at the organization of the House, objection was made to administering the oath to Messrs. Boyd Winchester and John M. Rice, of Kentucky, who were on the roll and had voted for Speaker. It was alleged that they were disloyal during the war. A resolution was presented reciting the allegations against them and providing that the oath should not be administered to them.

Explanations of the charges being made, the resolution was withdrawn, and on March 5 the oath was administered to them by order of the House.[1]

159. On December 3, 1889,[2] during the organization of the House, as the Speaker was administering the oath to the Members, and as the State of Kansas was called, Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, asked that Mr. S.R. Peters, of Kansas, stand aside.

The Speaker[3] directed Mr. Peters to stand aside. Mr. Springer then presented a memorial from the governor and State officers of Kansas reciting that Mr. Peters, who had been elected judge for the four years ending January, 1884, was disqualified by the terms of the constitution of that State from holding any other office under the State or United States, and proposed a resolution referring the case to the Committee on Elections for examination as to whether Mr. Peters was entitled to the seat, and also to examine the claims of Mr. S. N. Wood, who contested the seat.

The Speaker suggested that the swearing in of a Member being a matter of the very highest privilege, the oath should be first administered, and then the resolution might be offered.

This was accordingly done. Mr. Peters's qualifications were afterwards examined and he was declared entitled to the seat.

160. Under exceptional circumstances the House admitted to a seat a Member-elect who failed to present himself until near the expiration of the Congress.—On February 25, 1868[4] the House voted to admit to his seat Mr. George W. Bridges, of Tennessee, who had been elected at the regular Congressional election in his State in 1861, but who had been unable to appear in his place when Congress met in December of that year because he had been captured by the Confederates and detained a prisoner. As soon as he could escape he made his way, arriving at Washington so as to appear in the House February 25, a few days before final adjournment.

161. Instance wherein a Member-elect appeared and took the oath several months after the organization of the House.—On April 19, 1906,[5] Mr. Malcolm R. Patterson, of Tennessee, appeared and took the oath. He had been regularly elected in November, 1904, as a Member of this Congress, but had not appeared at the organization of the House on the first Monday of December, 1905, nor thereafter until this date. No question was raised as to his right to qualify.

162. Although the House has emphasized the impropriety of swearing in a Member without a certificate, it has sometimes been done by unanimous consent.—On April 20, 1871,[6] Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, proposed a resolution providing that Wilder D. Foster, Member-elect from the Fourth Congressional district of Michigan, be sworn in. Mr. Conger explained that the official certificate of Mr. Foster had not been received, but it was apparent from telegraphic reports of the canvass that he had been elected by a majority of several thousand.

A question arose, and while it was generally assumed that by unanimous consent Mr. Foster might properly be admitted to take the oath, yet it was objected that admission should be as a matter of right, and that it was improper to admit without a certificate of some kind. Because of the objection Mr. Conger withdrew the resolution.

163. On December 1, 1879,[1] Mr. Waldo Hutchins, of New York, was sworn in without the presentation of the regular certificate required by law, which had not been issued because the State canvassers would not meet under the law for several days. But the county canvassers had shown his election unmistakably, and there was no contest or question. Therefore, by unanimous consent, the House allowed Mr. Hutchins to be sworn in, although distrust of the precedent was expressed.

164. On December 6, 1886[2] at the beginning of the second session Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, as a question of privilege, presented a letter from the secretary of state of New York stating that the returns officially received showed the election of Mr. Samuel S. Cox to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, of the Ninth Congressional district of New York, and that the proper certificate of election would be issued as soon as the board of canvassers should meet.

There being no objection, the Speaker administered the oath to Mr. Cox.

On the same day and under similar circumstances the oath was administered to Mr. Henry Bacon, of New York.

165. On December 1, 1890,[3] after several Members presenting regular certificates of election had been sworn in, the request was made that Mr. John S. Pindar, of the Twenty-fourth district of New York, be sworn in. The official certificate from the secretary of state of New York had not arrived, but the certificate of the county canvassers showing the result of the election was presented at the Clerk's desk. By unanimous consent the oath was administered to Mr. Pindar.

The request was then made that Mr. E. R. Hayes, of Iowa, be sworn in. It was stated by a Member of the Iowa delegation, Mr. David B. Henderson, that there was no question of Mr. Hayes's election, but by some error the certificate had not been transmitted. He presented the letter in which the certificate was supposed to have been transmitted, but in which by mistake another paper had been inclosed.

Pending the request for unanimous consent, it was suggested by Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, "that the House sometimes accepts, in lieu of a formal certificate (as in the case of the gentleman from New York, Mr. Pindar, to which consent has just been given), the certificate of the local boards of county canvassers. But so far as I know a Member presenting himself to be sworn in must have some kind of a certificate or some authority from some source having charge of the election to warrant the granting of the request." No objection was made, however, and Mr. Hayes was sworn in.

In a similar manner the oath was administered to Mr. Robert H. Whitelaw, of the Fourteenth district of Missouri, whose certificate had not arrived. In this case a semiofficial statement from the secretary of state of Missouri, giving the figures of the election, was presented by a colleague.

On May 5, 1896,[1] at the request of Mr. Charles Daniels, of New York, and by unanimous consent, the oath was administered to Mr. Rudolph Kleberg, of Texas, who presented an informal statement to the Speaker, signed by the governor, secretary of state, and attorney-general of Texas, who stated "upon general and reliable unofficial information" that Mr. Kleberg had been elected.

On December 19, 1896,[2] on motion of Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, and by unanimous consent, the oath was administered to Mr. Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia, who presented an informal letter from the governor of Georgia to the Speaker, informing him that there was only one candidate at the election and that the commission would be forwarded as soon as the returns were received.[3]

166. On March 2, 1894,[4] Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, announced that Mr. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, had been elected a Member of the House from Pennsylvania, but that his credentials had not yet arrived. After remarks on the public career of Mr. Grow in earlier years in the House, Mr. Holman asked unanimous consent that the oath be administered to him. There being no objection, it was so ordered, and Mr. Grow took the oath.

167. On January 15, 1902,[5] the House, by unanimous consent, authorized the Speaker to administer the oath to Mr. Montague Lessler, of New York, on the following statement of fact made by Mr. Lucius N. Littauer, of New York:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Montague Lessler, elected to this House at a special election held in the Seventh district of New York to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Muller, be sworn in. The certificate of the secretary of state of New York is not yet at hand, but there is no contest over the result of this election. The vote has been canvassed by the board of county canvassers, and Mr. Lessler is now here ready to be sworn in.

168. On December 3. 1906,[6] at the beginning of the second session of the Congress, after the roll of the Members had been called by States, and when several Members elected to fill vacancies had presented credentials and taken the oath, Mr. James Hay, of Virginia, said:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. E. W. Saunders, a Member elect from the Fifth Virginia district, be sworn in. His credentials have not arrived, but there is no question of his election, and I have been in communication with the secretary of state of Virginia, who tells me that the canvass of the votes has been made and that Mr. Saunders has been declared duly elected.

[3] It is a safe usage to permit the oath to be administered under such circumstances only by unanimous consent; but manifestly in a case of such high privilege the House might act by majority vote.

On this statement the House gave consent, and the oath was administered to Mr. Saunders. Under similar conditions the oath was administered to Mr. Daniel J. Riordan, of New York.

169. Instance wherein the House authorized the Speaker to administer the oath to Members away from the House.—On January 6, 1890,[1] Mr. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, having announced that there were three Members of the House who by reason of illness had been unable to attend and take the oath of office, offered the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Whereas Samuel J. Randall, a Representative for the State of Pennsylvania from the Third district thereof, David Wilber, a representative for the State of New York from the Twenty-fourth district thereof, and W. C. Whitthorne, a Representative for the State of Tennessee from the Seventh district thereof, have been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as Members of the House, and there being no contest or question as to their election: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to administer the oath of office to said Samuel J. Randall at his residence in Washington, D. C.; and that the said David Wilber and W. C. Whitthorne be authorized to take the oath of office before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths; and that said oaths, when administered as herein authorized, shall be accepted and received by the House as the oaths of office, respectively, of Samuel J. Randall, David Wilber, and W. C. Whitthorne.

Resolved, That the oaths of office administered to the said David Wilber and W. C. Whitthorne shall be certified to the House of Representatives by the officers administering the same, authenticated by their official signatures and seals.

On the following day the Speaker announced:

The Chair desires to announce that in compliance with the resolution yesterday adopted the Speaker administered the oath of office at his residence to Hon. Samuel J. Randall, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and the Clerk will make a record in the Journal.

On January 15[2] the Speaker laid before the House the oaths of Messrs. Wilber and Whitthorne, and they were ordered to be filed in the office of the Clerk.

170. By authority of the House the oath may be administered to a Member away from the House and by another than the Speaker.

As to the competency of a Speaker pro tempore to administer the oath to Members.

On January 22, 1887, Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report[3] on the case of Representative D. Wyatt Aiken, of South Carolina, who, by reason of illness, seemed likely not to be able to appear in the House during the Congress, and to whom it was proposed to administer the oath away from the House by a judicial officer of his State. The committee quoted the third section of Article VI of the Constitution, which requires that the Representatives "shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution," and section 30, Revised Statutes.[4]

The committee considered two questions arising under this statute: (1) Whether any officer but the Speaker can administer that oath, and (2) whether it can be administered until the Member is "present" or "appears" in the House, or elsewhere than in the House.

The committee say that a construction which might require that none but the Speaker can swear in a Member might prove seriously inconvenient in case of his absence. It is a rule of the House only which authorizes him temporarily to appoint a Speaker pro tempore to the chair. Such a construction would give to the Speaker the dangerous power to refuse to administer the oath and thereby exclude Members from the House. No such construction should be allowed. The committee here quote an English precedent where, out of abundant caution, such act by a deputy speaker was ratified by action of Parliament subsequently.

In regard to the second inquiry the committee cite the case of William Rufus King, elected Vice-President in 1855, and who, being detained in Habana, was allowed by special act to take the oath there. This was a precedent merely for swearing in a Member away from the House. The statute was needed to authorize the officer abroad to administer the oath.

The committee say that no provision has been made by statute for administering this oath by any but the Speaker, nor elsewhere than in the House. As to absent Members it is casus omissus. It does not require the oath to make one a Representative. Mr. Aiken was already on committees and had been granted leave of absence. The statutes [1] require that the Speaker certify the salaries and amounts of Members and approve the employment of the reporters. Yet these things may be done by a "Deputy Speaker" named by him, with the approval of the House. That Deputy Speaker [2] swears in Members also, not by statute, but only by our rule, which authorizes him to "perform the duties of the Chair."

The Constitution provides that when sitting to try impeachments Senators "shall be under oath or affirmation." No statute prescribing the form and method of taking the oath, the Senate has determined it itself. The question of how the oath of office in each House shall be taken is so near akin to the "election returns and qualifications of its own Members" and so like one of the "rules of its own proceeding," which constitutionally belong to "each House " to "judge" and "determine" for itself, that in the opinion of the committee no statute was necessary. The committee concluded by recommending the adoption of a resolution as follows:

Whereas D. Wyatt Aiken, Representative for the State of South Carolina from the Third district thereof, has been and in all probability will remain until the end of this Congress unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed the oath of office before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House,[3] and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said D. Wyatt Aiken as a Member of this House.

This resolution, after debate, was adopted by the House January 29, 1887.[4]

[2] On June 15, 1898 (second session Fifty-fifth Congress), Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, by designation of the Speaker, in writing, acting as Speaker pro tempore, administered the oath to Mr. Greene, of Massachusetts.

[3] The oath had been presented in the House on January 10 as a question of privilege (Journal, p. 200; Record, p. 493), the case of Mr. Haskell, of Kansas, being cited as a precedent.

171. An adjournment taking place after the election of a Speaker, but before the Members had taken the oath, the Journal was read on the next day, but was not approved until the oath had been administered.

It has been held that the administration of the oath to a Member takes precedence of a motion to amend the Journal.

On December 22, 1849,[1] after many ballotings, Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, was elected Speaker. After the oath had been administered to him the House adjourned.

On the next legislative day, December 24, the Speaker called the House to order, and the Journal of the preceding legislative day was read.

Mr. David S. Kaufman, of Texas, claimed the floor on a privileged question—a motion to amend the Journal.

The Speaker held that no question was in order until the Members of the House had been sworn in. A motion to amend the Journal or any other privileged question would then be in order.

The Speaker then proceeded to administer the oath to the Members.

172. Members have been sworn in before the reading of the Journal.— From the Journal of December 14, 1840,[2] it seems to have been the usage at that time to swear in new Members before the reading of the Journal.

173. Instance wherein, at the organization of the House, the oath was administered to a Member-elect during the call of the roll on a motion to agree to rules.—On December 4, 1905,[3] at the organization of the House, the yeas and nays were ordered on a motion for the previous question on a resolution agreeing to rules. After the roll had been called once, Mr. Albert S. Burleson, of Texas, presented himself and took the oath. The roll call was then completed, Mr. Burleson voting.

174. Members have been sworn in when a roll call had just disclosed the absence of a quorum.—On March 29, 1897[4] on a motion that the Journal be approved, the Speaker§[5] announced the result of the roll call—yeas 164, nays 2, present 2, a total of 168; not a quorum. The Speaker then announced that under the rule[6] the doors of the House would be closed preparatory to the can of the House.

At this point Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, announced that Messrs. Rudolph Kleberg, of Texas, and William A. Jones, of Virginia, were present, ready to take the oath, and asked that it be administered to them.

The Speaker said that a question arose as to whether or not, the body not being constituted to do business and the roll call having been ordered by the rule of the House, the proceedings might be interrupted. Therefore he advised that unanimous consent should be obtained.

This having been done, the oath was administered to the two Members.

175. At the beginning of a second session of Congress unsworn Members-elect were taken into account in ascertaining the presence of a quorum, but in the absence of the Speaker they were not sworn until the next day.—On December 6, 1830,[1] at the beginning of the second session of the Congress, there appeared, besides those who answered the roll, several new Members. These Members-elect, as appears in the Journal, were taken into account in ascertaining the presence of a quorum, but the Speaker being absent, the oath was not administered to them.

On December 7, the Speaker being in attendance, the oath was administered to these and other new Members immediately after the reading of the Journal.

176. Instance at the beginning of a second session wherein the oath was administered to a Member-elect before the ascertainment of a quorum.

By unanimous consent the oath may be administered to Members-elect whose regular certificates have not arrived.

On December 7, 1903,[2] at the beginning of the second session of the Congress, the Speaker called the House to order, and the Chaplain offered prayer.

Thereupon Mr. John H. Stephens, of Texas, announced that Mr. J. M. Pinckney, of Texas, a Member-elect, was present and desired to be sworn. The Speaker thereupon laid before the House the following telegram:

AUSTIN TEX., December 6, 1903.

HON. JOSEPH G. CANNON,

Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.:

I am reliably informed that at a special election held in the Eighth Congressional district of Texas on the 17th of November last Hon. J. M. Pinckney was elected as Member of Congress to succeed Ron. Thomas Ball, resigned. I am also advised that Pinckney's election is conceded by his opponents. Under our laws, the official returns can not be opened and counted until forty days after the election.

S. W. T. LANHAM, Governor of. Texas.

Thereupon, by the unanimous consent of the House, the oath was administered to Mr. Pinckney.

Then the Speaker directed the call of the roll by States to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

177. On December 31, 1834,[3] as soon as the roll of Members had been called by States, several new Members appeared and were qualified and took their seats. Then the Journal announces the presence of a quorum.

178. On December 7, 1840,[4] the first day of the second session of the Congress, the Speaker called the House to order, and the Clerk called the roll by States. Then six new Members appeared and took the oath and their seats; but even with these there was no quorum present, and so the House adjourned.

179. In the absence of the Speaker a Member-elect has produced his credentials and taken his seat, but was not sworn until the oath could be administered by the Speaker.

In the earlier years of the House the absence of the Speaker caused adjournment and the postponement of the orders of the day.

On December 1, 1797,[1] the Speaker being absent, a new Member, Joseph Heister, returned to serve in the House as a Member from the State of Pennsylvania, in the room of George Egge, who had resigned his seat, "appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House."

The Speaker being indisposed (the Clerk so informed the House), the orders of the day were postponed and the House adjourned.

On the next legislative day, December 4, the oath was administered to Mr. Heister by the Speaker.

On February 22, 1798,[2] the Speaker being absent, the orders of the day were postponed and the House adjourned.

180. It was held in 1881 that the administration of the oath to Delegates was of higher privilege than the adoption of rules.—On December 5, 1881,[3] after the Members-elect had been sworn in, and after the officers of the House had been elected, but before the oath had been administered to the Delegates, Mr. Dudley C. Haskell, of Kansas, presented resolutions providing for the adoption of rules.

The House having adjourned pending action on these resolutions, Mr. Haskell, on December 6, called them up for consideration.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that under the law other business of higher privilege, viz, the swearing in of the Delegates, as provided by section 30 of the Revised Statutes, which provided for the administration of the oath, as follows:

> At the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives, the oath of office shall be administered by any Member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker, and by the Speaker to all the Members and Delegates present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business, and to the Members and Delegates who afterward appear, previous to their taking their seats.

The Speaker[4] sustained the point of order, and directed the Clerk to call the Delegates to be sworn.

181. The presiding officer of the Senate being present, the oath of office was administered to Senators-elect, although no quorum was present.—On December 6, 1804,[5] the second day of the second session of the Congress, a quorum did not appear, but the President of the Senate administered the oath to Messrs. William B. Giles and Andrew Moore, of Virginia, who appeared with credentials showing their appointment by the governor of the State to fill vacancies.

182. On December 6, 1802,[6] in the absence of the Vice-President, a Member-elect appearing in the Senate with credentials, but there being no quorum, took his seat, but was not sworn until December 14, after a quorum had appeared and a President pro tempore had been elected.

183. Discussion of the status of a Member-elect who has not taken the oath, with a conclusion that it is distinguished from that of a Member who has qualified.—On June 13, 1864, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, made a report [1] relating to the rights of Messrs. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, and Frank P. Blair, Jr., of Missouri, to seats in the House. In the course of this report the following discussion was given of the status of a Member-elect:

No one can be a "Member" against his will. He may be elected without his consent or knowledge, for he may be in a foreign land; but to become a "Member" he must not only be elected but he must take the oath of office. The Constitution says: "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members"—that is, of those who have qualified and taken their seats. Again: "A majority of each shall constitute a quorum, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members." But the attendance of a Representative-elect was never yet compelled. And, again: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member." The committee are not aware of any attempt to punish a Representative-elect, and of but one instance of an attempt to expel one. A resolution was adopted by the last House, under the previous question, to expel a person who was a Representative-elect, but had never signified his acceptance of the office or qualified, or even appeared in Washington for the purpose of taking his seat. But when the Constitution uses the word "Representative," it is in this connection: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections of Senators and Representatives shall be," etc. "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years." In the clause now under consideration the language is: "No person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office." No one doubts that the object of the Constitutional inhibition was to guard the House against Executive influence. This object is attained so far as it can be by this provision, if the inhibition attaches the moment the Member enters upon the discharge of his duties as such, and nothing is gained by an earlier application of it.

184. Discussion of the status of a Member-elect in relation to the law prohibiting the holding of two offices of certain salaries, with the conclusion that it is distinguished from the status of the Member who has qualified.—On July 19, 1866 [2] Mr. Samuel Shellabarger, of Ohio, made a report from the select committee appointed April 30, 1866, to investigate certain statements and charges relating to Hon. Roscoe Conkling and Provost-Marshal-General Fry. In April, 1865, Mr. Conkling had accepted an appointment from the War Department to investigate frauds in the office of the provost-marshal for the western district of New York. He was at the same time a Member-elect of the House of Representatives. The special committee consisted of Messrs. Shellabarger, of, Ohio, William Windom, of Minnesota, B. M. Boyer, of Pennsylvania, Burton C. Cook, of Illinois, and Samuel L. Warner, of Connecticut, and they made an unanimous report, in which they found, among other things, that Mr. Conkling had not violated the law or the Constitution by accepting the appointment.

The act of 1852 [3] had provided against the holding of two offices of certain salaries under the United States; and in the course of their inquiry the committee considered the status of the Member-elect, as follows:

[3] Now section 1763, Revised Statutes.

The first of these inquiries is, in the judgment of the committee, answered, so far as is necessary in deciding upon the effect of the act of 1852, by the cases of Hammond, of Earl, of Mumford, of Schenck,[1] and others, which we have already cited. These cases, as we have seen, all determine that, prior to the time when the Constitution requires the Member-elect to commence the duties of his legislative office, and before he has assumed these duties and taken the oath of office, he may receive compensation for discharging the duties of another office. As we have already said, these cases do not determine that he may also be compensated as a Member of Congress for the same time for which he was compensated in the other office. But they do determine that being a Member-elect of Congress does not make him an "officer" in such sense as to bring him within the prohibition of the act of 1852. This question, in substance, received the careful attention of the House in the Thirty-eighth Congress upon an able report of one of its committees.[2] The committee and House came to what your committee deem a just conclusion when it determined that one merely elected to Congress, but who had not entered upon his duties nor been qualified, was not a Member of this House—that is, did not hold an office so as to prevent him from continuing to hold another office and receive compensation therefor. The committee, in concluding their argument showing that one merely elected to Congress was not a Member of the House and not, as such, amenable to its jurisdiction, says: "The committee are not aware of any attempt to punish a Representative-elect, and of but one instance of an attempt to expel one. A resolution was adopted by the last House, under the previous question, to expel a person who was a Representative-elect, but had never signified his acceptance of the office, nor qualified, nor even appeared in Washington for the purpose of taking his seat."

In that case[2] the House determined, in effect, that the act of 1852 did not prohibit General Schenck while a member-elect of Congress from receiving the pay of another office—to wit, that of Major-general of volunteers.

This is the last case in which the question came before the House. But the same question received in the Fifteenth Congress, in the case of Hammond v. Herrick (Clark and Hall, Contested Elections, pp. 293, 294), a still more elaborate and exhaustive consideration. In the report in that case (which also received the sanction of the House) this doctrine was explicitly stated, and was affirmed after a thorough review of the English and American cases touching it. The case held the rule which was stated by the committee in these words: "Neither do election and return constitute membership. * * * Our rule in this particular is different from that of the House of Commons. It is also better, for it makes our theory conform to what is fact in both countries—that the act of becoming in reality a Member of the House depends wholly upon the person elected and returned. Election does not of itself constitute membership, although the period may have arrived at which the Congressional term commences."

This House has again and again determined that men elected to it who do not appear in the body and assume the constitutional oath of office are not to be reckoned as Members of the House in determining the number required to make a majority or quorum of the body.

The committee in coming to this conclusion have not overlooked the fact that Members-elect, but not qualified, are by the laws accorded certain privileges and salary. The effect of this right to enjoy these privileges before becoming qualified as a member of the legislative body has received the fullest attention both in this House and in the English Parliament. The result attained is that these special privileges are not necessarily indicia of actual official authority or station, and may by law as well be attached to one's person before and after he is an officer as during his official tenure. The Representatives after the expiration of their terms, the President of the United States after such expiration, and the widows of certain ex-Presidents, all have the franking privilege, and these are not then officers of the Government in any sense. The assumption of office in this country, as well as its relinquishment, is voluntary, and one elected to Congress is at perfect liberty to refuse to assume the office. His exercise of the franking privilege with the knowledge that he never would enter upon the duties of the office would be an act of bad faith toward his Government; but that would not render him a Member of Congress, nor would the exercise prevent him, should failure of health or other cause render it improper to enter upon his office, from rightly refusing ever to take the office.

Other and perhaps more conclusive considerations bearing upon this important inquiry might be given, but it is not deemed best to pursue it further. The committee are entirely satisfied that the law of this House is fully and rightly settled as to this point, and that he is not a Member of Congress, nor one who "holds any office under the Government of the United States" who has only been elected to this House, but who has never taken any oath of office nor entered upon the duties of that position.

[2] House Report, No. 110, first session Thirty-eighth Congress.

185. In 1901, in a divided report, the Judiciary Committee discussed the status of the Member-elect, the major opinion being that he was as much an officer of the Government before taking the oath as afterwards.— On February 4, 1901,[1] Mr. George W. Ray, of New York, from the Judiciary Committee, submitted a report on a question relating to the salary of Hon. William Richardson, who had been elected to represent the district formerly represented by Hon. Joseph Wheeler. The discussion of this question involved an examination of the status of a Member-elect.

Does a person duly elected Representative in Congress hold an office prior to the meeting of Congress at the time fixed by the Constitution, or pursuant to a special call by the President and before taking the oath required by the Constitution?

It has been strenuously urged that a person so duly elected does not hold any office until Congress assembles and the oath is taken. With this contention we can not agree. Article I of the Constitution provides:

"Section 1. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

"Sec. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, etc. * * * The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, etc.

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned, etc.

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained, etc.

"Sec. 4. The time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, etc.

"Sec. 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services to be ascertained bylaw, etc. * * *

"No Senator or Representative shall during the time for which he was elected be appointed, etc. * * * And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

The Constitution frequently speaks of "each House." Article VI provides:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution, etc."

The Constitution does not prescribe the time when or the officer before whom such oath is to be taken. Taking the oath is not made a condition precedent to holding the office.

But section 1, chapter 1, of the first act or statute of the First Congress, which assembled at the city of New York March 4, 1789, prescribed the form of the oath to be taken pursuant to the Constitution, and section 2 of such act provided as follows:

"That at the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall be administered by any one Member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker, and by him to all the Members present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business, and to the Members who shall afterwards appear previous to taking their seats, etc."

Section 2 of Article I says:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, etc."

If we note carefully the language of this act of the First Congress, it is apparent that it was not considered that the oath was a prerequisite to becoming "a Member," for it says the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall be administered by any one Member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker, and by him to all the Members present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business, and to the Members who shall afterwards appear previous to taking their seats."

[1] Second session Fifty-sixth Congress, House Report No. 2656, pp. 10-13, 17, 27-29, 42-50.

All duly elected are "Members" before taking the oath,[2] but they can not take their seats until the required oath is taken.

Then is it not true that all Representatives elected become "Members" from the very hour and minute of the commencement of the term for which elected?

The commencement of the term for which Representatives are elected was fixed and determined as follows:

After the adoption of the Constitution by the requisite number of States the Continental Congress adopted the following resolution on the 13th day of September, 1788: [1]

"Resolved, That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several States which before the said day shall have ratified the said Constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States and vote for President, and that the first Wednesday in March next be the time and the present seat of Congress the place for commencing proceedings under the said Constitution."

The several States elected Representatives in Congress for the First Congress, and it assembled March 4, 1789, the first Wednesday of that month, pursuant to the above resolution. By the Constitution Representatives are chosen every second year, thus fixing the terms of office.

In the various acts, or some of them, providing for the apportionment and election of Representatives in Congress future Congresses have been referred to as commencing on the 4th day of March.[2]

It seems clear that taking the oath is not a condition precedent to becoming a Member, although the Member can not take his seat in the House until the oath is taken. This is a rule of action prescribed by the House.

"Members" organize the House; "Members" elect the Speaker, and this is a most important function. Any Representative before taking the oath may administer the oath to the Speaker, and the Speaker administers the oath to whom? Representatives-elect? No; but to "Members." "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker." The House exists before a Speaker is chosen or the oath taken.

After quoting Blackstone to the effect that an office is "a right to exercise a public or private employment and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging," and other authorities,[3] in the same line, the report cites authority [4] in support of the statement that there is nothing in the Constitution or in the statutes that makes the taking of the oath a condition precedent to taking and holding the office of Representative in Congress when elected by the people for a definite term fixed by law. Even when a statute fixes the time and it is not complied with, the person elected or appointed is in and vested with the office when the term commences unless it is declined.

The report further contends:

The word "Member-elect" was never used in any of the statutes until 1873 (as we can find) and was not intended to overthrow the Constitution, which provides that Members are elected by the people, not made such by taking an oath, but was used simply to distinguish between Members who had become entitled to a seat by taking the oath and those not entitled to sit in the House after its organization. * * *

We should also call attention to the fact that we always have a Congress—always have a Senate; always have a House of Representatives and Members of the House of Representatives.

The House may not be organized, but it exists, nevertheless. Section 2, Constitution United States, says: "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker." The Representatives in Congress or Members of the House may not have taken the oath of office, but they are elected, and each comes into office, if eligible, the very moment the term of his predecessor ceases.

Mr. D. H. Smith, who filed individual views, held the same opinion, saying:

When it is remembered that the Clerk of the House usually makes up the roll of the House between the election and the 4th of March following, the word "Representative-elect" used in section 31 of the Revised Statutes is perhaps as aptly used as any that could have been selected and not necessarily in conflict with the above definition. Likewise when attention is called to the fact the credentials of those elected at the regular time for electing Representatives are almost universally filed before the term begins, while they are really and truly Members-elect, it is not astonishing that this language is found in section 38, though other words less liable to confuse might have been used. But whatever influence such citations might have, it is entirely safe to say the instances in which persons elected to Congress are referred to after their terms have begun as Members are much more numerous than those where the other expression is employed.

There are many statutes prohibiting Members of Congress from doing things that might be detrimental to the best interests of the Government—such as those that forbid a Member from practicing before the Court of Claims, from taking compensation for procuring public contracts or offices, from being interested in public contracts, and a great number of similar statutes. If it be true that prior to the convening of a Congress in its first session those chosen thereto are not Members, then it is a matter of serious and urgent importance that Congress address itself to the work of amending a multitude of statutes heretofore supposed and believed to apply to a Member of Congress before he is sworn, as well as afterwards. * * * But it is said that the oath of office is not taken until Congress meets, and that one can not therefore be a Member before that. Without the Constitution or the statute makes the taking of the oath a prerequisite to becoming a Member it may be taken at a subsequent time, and in the absence of such requirement one may become a Member without it.

The First Congress of the United States met on the 4th of March, 1789, and no Member of the House took the oath until April 8, and no Senator took the oath until the 3d of June, although prior to either date much business was transacted, including the count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States. In that Congress was many of those who had been in the convention and assisted in forming the Constitution, and while all were familiar with its provisions these no doubt possessed that thorough knowledge of the instrument in detail that could only be acquired by having participated in constructing it. By their official course they gave us an interpretation of that part requiring an oath which was in effect that the oath could be taken after the session had begun, but the statute has so far modified this as to require it to be taken at the beginning of the first session. * * * Congress can not commence without Members, hence all such persons chosen to compose the Congress who have not died, resigned, or declined, and who are eligible on the 4th of March succeeding their election, if it be at the regular time, become Members of the Congress to which they have been elected. From the commencement of the Congress to which they have been elected they are Members until they in some manner vacate their positions.

Messrs. Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine, and Julius Kahn, of California, dissented from the view taken in the report of the committee, and in the views which they jointly submitted contend that until a "Member-elect" or "Representative-elect" has taken the oath of office as a "Member" he is not a "Member" of the House. A "Member-elect" is simply a person who, by reason of possessing the requisite qualifications, having been elected therefor, is capable when the constitutional time arrives of becoming a "Member." The first mention of "Member-elect" or "Representative-elect" in the statutes was in section 31, Revised Statutes, and then in section 38. The statutes relating to salary provided that the Member-elect should draw salary without the oath; the Member only after the oath. For at least seventy-seven years the laws in relation to compensation were such that the Member-elect received no salary, payments being made only to Members who had taken the oath. Furthermore, the "Member-elect" had none of the attributes or privileges of a "Member" except as they are specially conferred by statute. Thus the Member-elect has the franking privilege; but so also does the ex-Member for a certain time after the expiration of his term. The views of the two Members are given further:

A "Member-elect" is in no sense within the constitutional inhibition, for as a "Member-elect" he has neither power nor opportunity to do any act inconsistent with the duties of any other office. He can not vote, except for Speaker. He can not discharge any of the duties or exercise any of the powers of a "Member." He can only enjoy certain privileges specifically annexed to his status as a "Member-elect" by statute. However much the elements that inhere in an inconsistent office might control for good or ill the manner in which a "Member" might discharge his duties as such, these elements can have no effect upon the action of a "Member-elect," who can not act at all. The inhibition is based upon the idea that the inconsistent office involves considerations whose probable tendencies would be to improperly affect the discharge of public duties by a Member. When considered in connection with a "Member-elect," who has no power to discharge such duties, the reason fails.

As to the contention that the provision of section 30, Revised Statutes, shows that Members are Members before they are sworn, it is urged that—

That does not follow. The election of a Speaker is but one of the steps in the organization of the House. It is clear that Members-elect necessarily have the inherent power to take this step in order that the House may be organized of which they may become Members. You can only predicate the idea of Members upon an existing body, and to hold that you can not have an organized body unless you first have members is to beg the question. The organization of a corporation created by special act illustrates the idea. The act creates certain persons, called associates or corporators, a body corporate, but this does not organize the corporation or make the corporators stockholders or members thereof. It does confer upon the corporators power to organize a corporation of which they may afterwards become members by becoming stockholders, but the fact that they can and do exercise the indispensable power of organizing does not of itself make or tend to make them "members" of the body they organize. The same result follows as to "Members-elect."

If the right of voting for Speaker demonstrates that a person is a Member, then the objection to Roberts, of Utah, was not interposed early enough. No one thought of questioning his right to vote for Speaker. The question in his case was solely one of exclusion or expulsion. Exclude him, and prevent him from becoming a Member. Therefore he was halted at the oath. But it is now contended that the oath is not an essential prerequisite to membership for the purpose of establishing the proposition that a Representative-elect becomes a "Member" on the 4th of March of a House not in existence and so continues, and the formality of an oath, though required by the Constitution, is thus dispensed with, as under such a construction it is not essential. Still, although they have thus reasoned the oath out, they must concede that this "Member" can not draw compensation without taking the oath, while a "Member-elect" can. Such an inconsistency demonstrates the fallacy of the reasoning. Roberts, of Utah, drew salary as Member-elect until November 3, 1899, exercised the franking privilege, and voted for Speaker. Was he a "Member" from March 4, 1899? If so, his exclusion from the office nearly a year later was hardly effective. Notwithstanding this new construction it was never suggested before that he was even a Member de facto.

Moreover, on the 26th day of January, 1900, by a large majority, the House held that he was not entitled to membership therein, and excluded him therefrom. It was expressly understood that majority was necessary to exclude, while it was conceded that two-thirds were necessary to expel a "Member." Did Roberts, under this new theory of the committee, become in any legal sense, de facto, de jure, or otherwise, a "Member" March 4, 1899? If so, the proceedings were had under a curious misconception of the situation. If he did not then become a "Member," could he, on the theory of the committee, be the "predecessor," within the meaning of section 51, of his successor? Yet his successor was elected in March, 1900, and upon the proper certificate drew compensation back to January 26, 1900, which he could hardly have done had Roberts not been his "predecessor" within the meaning of that section.

In further support of this contention the two Members quote a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury [1] in the case of Mr. Boatner, and of Attorney-General Devens [2] in the case of Delegate Romero, in both of which the Member-elect was not regarded as a Member.

There was no action by the House on the report.

Chapter VI.

THE OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE AND THEIR ELECTION.

186. The Speaker and other officers are chosen by the House.—The Constitution of the United States, in Article I, section 2, provides that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers."

187. The elective officers of the House, in addition to the Speaker, are the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Postmaster, and Chaplain.

A rule, which, however, is not in force at the time of organization, provides that all the elective officers except the Speaker shall be chosen by viva voce vote.

The Speaker, who was at first chosen by ballot, has been chosen by viva voce vote since 1839.

The elective officers other than the Speaker continue in office until their successors are chosen and qualified.

The elective officers of the House are sworn to support the Constitution and discharge their duties faithfully.

Origin of an obsolete requirement that the officers of the House shall be sworn to keep its secrets.

Each of the elected officers of the House appoints the employees of his department provided by law.

The attempt to establish the theory that one House might prescribe rules for its successor, and the end thereof.

The House formerly provided by special rule that the Clerk should continue in office until another should be appointed.

Rule II provides:

> There shall be elected by a viva voce vote, at the commencement of each Congress, to continue in office until their successors are chosen and qualified, a Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper,[1] Postmaster, and Chaplain, each of whom shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office to the best of his knowledge and ability, and to keep the secrets of the House; and each shall appoint all of the employees of his department provided for by law.

This rule is the result of many changes in the relations of the House and its elected officers. It is, of course, of advisory force only, as it has not been the custom of the House to adopt rules until it has organized by the choice of some, at least, of its officers; but at the time this rule was framed into its present form—in 1880—there existed and was continued another rule which provided: "These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses unless otherwise ordered." This attempt to enable one House to dictate rules to its successor was often challenged and was finally brought to an end in 1890, after having continued from 1860.[2] It is evident, then, that this rule as to the election of officers is never in existence at the time at which a large portion of it would be expected to apply.

The portion of the rule providing for election by viva voce vote is the embodiment in the form of rule of the result of a long contest in the House. The first Speaker was elected by ballot, and such continued to be the practice both as to the Speaker and other officers for many years. As early as March 1, 1826,[3] Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, proposed a rule that the Speaker be elected by viva voce vote, but no action was taken. On January 16 and 17, 1829,[4] a proposition that the officers of the House be elected by viva voce vote was debated at length, and finally laid on the table by a vote of 97 to 92. And election by ballot continued up to and including the election of James K. Polk as Speaker in 1837, although in 1835[5] the proposition for viva voce election had been advanced again. In 1839[6] there was a long contest over the choice of Speaker, and by determination of the House all the votes were taken viva voce, although there was much opposition to the method.

[1] An Assistant Doorkeeper was, in 1821, an elective officer of the House (first session Seventeenth Congress, Journal, p. 49); but the office was abolished many years ago.

The contest of 1839[1] left the House with this rule: "In all cases of election by the House of its officers, the vote shall be taken viva voce." And this rule was continued until 1880,[2] when the Committee on Rules, in framing the present form of rule, omitted the Speaker from the list of officers who should be elected viva voce. At that time Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, proposed that the Speaker should be included among the officers elected viva voce, as had been the practice for forty years by the old rule; but it seems to have been the intention that the House on each occasion should determine how it would elect its Speaker. The Speakers are always elected viva voce, and in recent years sometimes without even the preliminary vote to proceed to the election of a Speaker.[3] In fact, as stated above, the rule is not in existence when the Speaker and other officers are usually elected, and the House may determine for itself at the time what method shall be used. It elects the Speaker viva voce and the other officers usually by resolution.

The portion of the rule specifying the officers who shall be elected is, like the portion relating to viva voce voting, a summary of the practice of the House in the past.

On April 1, 1789,[4] a quorum appeared for the first time in the first House of Representatives, and at once the House proceeded to elect the only officer of the House specifically mentioned in the Constitution—the Speaker. And next it proceeded "to the appointment of a Clerk."

On April 2, 1789,[4] the House—

Resolved, That a Doorkeeper and Assistant Doorkeeper be appointed for the service of this House.

On April 13, 1789,[5] among the supplemental rules adopted was this:

The Clerk of the House shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and abilities.

And on March 1, 1791,[6] just at the close of the First Congress, this rule was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be deemed to continue in office until another be appointed.

This rule was in existence in 1859,[7] but seems to have dropped out in the revision of 1860.[8] But the Clerk continues, by ancient usage, and by the implied authority from the Statutes, to act until his successor is chosen.[9] The first rule of the House specifying the Clerk as an officer of the House dates from March 16, 1860,[10] and before that it was commented on as a curious fact that there was no rule, resolution, order, or law directing the appointment of a Clerk.[11]

On December 23, 1811,[1] at the time when the war with Great Britain was coming on and secret sessions were frequent, a rule was adopted providing that the Doorkeeper and Sergeant-at-Arms should keep the secrets of the House. On December 25, 1825,[2] in a Congress where there was one secret session, the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper took that oath. In the combinations of old rules made in the revisions of 1860[3] and 1880,[4] the provision requiring the oath of secrecy was placed in such position as to apply to all the officers of the House; but inasmuch as no secret session has been held for about seventy years, the observance of this portion of the rule is naturally neglected. The portion of the rule requiring an oath to support the Constitution of the United States dates from the revision of 1880.

On March 15, 1860, a rule was adopted that the appointees of the Doorkeeper and Postmaster should be approved by the Speaker,[5] but this did not continue beyond the revision of 1880, having become obsolete.[6]

After the election of the Speaker the other elective officers are usually chosen by the adoption of resolutions.[7]

The Speaker is always a Member of the House; the other elective officers never are.

188. The House formerly proceeded to the election of an officer on a motion so to do.

Discussion as to whether or not the Clerk of the former House continues until his successor is elected.

On December 7, 1829,[8] after the Speaker had administered the oath to the Members and Delegates, Mr. William Ramsey, of Pennsylvania, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That this House do now proceed to the election of a Clerk.

Mr. Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, moved to amend by striking out the words "do now" and inserting "will, on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock meridian."

A question at once arose as to whether or not the Clerk of the former House would continue in service until the election of his successor. There was a divergence of opinion, the Speaker[9] informally expressing the opinion that the Clerk of the preceding House would continue to act.

The House by a large majority decided the amendment in the negative, and the resolution was then agreed to.

[9] Andrew Stevenson, of Virginia, Speaker.

189. A resolution that the House proceed to the election of an officer presents a question of privilege.—On April 5, 1878,[1] there being a vacancy in the office of Doorkeeper, which the House had provided for temporarily by ordering the Sergeant-at-Arms to perform the duties, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, submitted as a question of privilege the following:

Resolved, That the House proceed to the election of a Doorkeeper, and that the true Union maimed soldier, Brigadier James Shields, of Missouri, be chosen to that place.

Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair finds himself without an example to follow in the past. In this case, therefore, the House will establish a precedent for the future. In the judgment of the Chair, under the resolution adopted yesterday, an officer was appointed to discharge temporarily the duties of Doorkeeper. It is stated in the Manual that when a proposition is submitted which related to the privileges of the House, it is the duty of the Speaker to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege. The Chair now proposes, in this instance, to allow the question to be determined by the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

After debate, on April 8, the House, by a vote of yeas 220, nays 4, decided that the resolution presented a question of privilege.[3]

190. The House often proceeds to the election of its officers as a matter of course, without motion to that effect.—On December 8, 1863,[4] after the election of a Speaker, and after the Senate and President had been informed of the organization of the House, we find the Speaker announcing that the business next in order was the election of Clerk, without waiting for the order of the House to proceed to the election of Clerk. The House also proceeded to the election of other officers as a matter of course, and without order.

An exception is found in the vote for Chaplain, which was taken on motion made and carried.[5]

191. An election by resolution is not a compliance with the rule requiring election of officers viva voce.—On January 9, 1850,[6] while the House was voting viva voce for Clerk in accordance with the rules of the House, Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, offered the following resolution, contending that the resolution came within the rule:

Resolved, That———be, and he is hereby, elected Clerk of this House for the present session.

Mr. Schenck proposed to move to insert in the blank the name of Solomon Foot, holding that thus, when the yeas and nays were called on filling the blank, a viva voce vote would be obtained.

[2] Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, Speaker.

[3] The point that the resolution involved besides the order to proceed to the election, also the choice of a particular candidate, does not seem to have occurred to those considering the matter. The rules required the election of officers viva voce, and therefore this resolution contained a change of rule. It is now a principle that the presence of a nonprivileged provision destroys the privilege of a proposition. In this case the House declined to elect in this way, and proceeded to a choice viva voce.

The Speaker [1] decided the resolution out of order.

Mr. Schenck having appealed, the decision of the Speaker was affirmed.

Again, on January 16, the Speaker affirmed this decision, saying [2] that election by resolution was not a compliance with the rule requiring the election of the officers of the House viva voce. It was true that they had sometimes been elected by resolution, but he had no recollection of such an election where objection had been made.

Mr. Alexander Evans, of Maryland, having appealed, the decision of the Chair was sustained, yeas 133, nays 64.[3]

192. On December 6, 1856,[4] rules having been adopted and the organization of the House having been perfected as far as the election of the Public Printer,[5] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Oram Follett, of Columbus, Ohio, be, and he is hereby, elected Public Printer for the House of Representatives of the Thirty-fourth Congress.

Mr. Thomas L. Clingman, of North Carolina, submitted as a question of order that it was not competent, under the rules, to elect a Printer, except after a previous nomination and upon a viva voce vote, and that the resolution was out of order.

The Speaker [6] sustained the point of order.

This decision was acquiesced in by the House.

193. A resolution declaring certain persons elected officers of the House is at variance with the standing rule of the House.

Instance wherein the House failed to elect a Doorkeeper and Postmaster, the officers of the preceding House continuing to serve.

On January 19, 1850,[7] the House had not elected a Doorkeeper or Postmaster, and postponed the election of those officers until the first day of March, 1851. The Doorkeeper and Postmaster of the former House continued to discharge the duties of their positions.

On April 18, 1850,[8] Mr. Nathaniel S. Littlefield, of Maine, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Robert E. Horner, of New Jersey, be, and he hereby is, declared elected Doorkeeper of this House; and John M. Johnson, of Virginia, be, and he hereby is, declared duly elected Postmaster of this House; to hold their respective offices until others are chosen in their stead.

Mr. Horner was Doorkeeper of the preceding House and Mr. Johnson the Postmaster. They were acting in those offices at this session, by the acquiescence of the House.

The Speaker[1] declared that the resolution, as a question of privilege, was out of order, on the ground that the House, on a former occasion, had so decided against the opinion of the Chair when a similar proposition was submitted, and also for the reason that it proposed a mode of election at variance with a standing rule of the House.[2]

Mr. Littlefield having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table on motion of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania.

194. The election of officers by resolution is subject to objection, but is often permitted by unanimous consent.

In recent years all the officers have been elected before the President and Senate have been informed of the organization.

At the organization of the House on December 4, 1865, after the election of Speaker, but before the adoption of rules, Mr. James F. Wilson; of Iowa, offered a resolution for the election of the other officers of the House.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, objected on the ground that some Members wanted to vote for candidates not named in the resolution.

Thereupon a motion was made to suspend the rules so as to offer the resolution, and this being done the resolution was agreed to.

At that time Rule 147 provided that the rules of the preceding House should govern this until superseded.[3] But whether this could actually be so was a disputed question, and so it is doubtful whether the motion to suspend the rules applied to the rules of the last House or to the long custom of the House as to its elections.[4]

195. On December 4, 1865,[5] the subordinate officers of the House were elected by one resolution, and not by separate roll calls. So the resolution notifying the Senate and the one notifying the President were not offered and agreed to until all the officers had been elected.

196. On December 2, 1873,[6] the officers of the House, except the Speaker, were elected by resolution, the minority offering a substitute containing the names of their nominees. The officers having been elected, a message was sent to the Senate informing that body that the House had organized, and that James G. Blaine had been chosen Speaker. But no reference was made to any other of the officers.

197. Although a former rule of the House required a nomination before voting for certain officers, yet the Speaker refrained from ruling that votes might not be cast for persons not nominated.—It was a former rule of the House that where others than Members of the House were eligible to election as officers of the House, there should be a nomination. Mr. Speaker Cobb refrained, however, from deciding that under this rule Members were prohibited from voting for anyone not nominated.[7]

198. The Senate and President are informed of the presence of a quorum and the organization of the House.

In the earlier practice the messages announcing the organization were sent immediately after the election of Speaker, and did not refer to the election of Clerk.

On December 7, 1790,[1] after the House had appointed its committee to join with a Senate committee to wait on the President and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, a message was received from the Senate stating that they had agreed to a resolution for the appointment of a committee, jointly with the committee to be appointed by the House, to wait on the President, etc. The House disagreed to the resolution of the Senate. Later a message from the Senate announced that they had appointed a committee to act jointly with the House committee.

199. On December 1, 1845,[2] the House informed the Senate that a quorum had assembled, and that John W. Davis had been elected Speaker, while the Clerk was not elected until the following day.

200. At the organization of the Twenty-seventh Congress, in 1841,[3] the Speaker and Clerk were elected on May 31, the first day of the session, and the usual messages were sent to the Senate and to the President, informing them that the House was organized and ready for business. But the election of Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Assistant Doorkeeper (not now an elective officer), Postmaster, and Chaplain were not ordered by the House until June 8, after rules had been adopted and the committees appointed. The message to the Senate announcing the presence of a quorum announced that John White had been elected Speaker, but did not mention the election of the Clerk.

201. On December 5, 1853,[4] at the organization of the House, as soon as the Speaker was elected the usual messages were sent to the Senate and President, notifying them of the organization of the House. This was in accordance with the practice of the early years of the House's existence. Then rules were adopted, and after that a motion was made and carried to proceed to the election of a Clerk. This was done viva voce. Then the Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster were elected together by a resolution.

202. On December 8, 1863,[5] the Senate and President were informed of the organization of the House before the election of a Clerk and other subordinate officers of the House.

203. On December 6, 1875,[6] the usual resolution notifying the Senate that a quorum of the House was present and had elected Hon. Michael C. Kerr, Speaker, was presented by Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana. Thereupon Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, proposed an amendment to include also the name of the Clerk. Mr. Holman stated that such was not the usual form, but made no objection to the amendment, which was agreed to.

204. Although always at liberty to choose its manner of electing a Speaker, the House has declined in later years to substitute balloting for viva voce choice.—On May 31, 1841,[1] at the first day of the first session of the Congress the roll of Members-elect was called by the Clerk of the last House, and the presence of a quorum ascertained.

Thereupon, Mr. Hiram P. Hunt, of New York, moved this resolution:

Resolved, That the Members will now proceed to the organization of the House by the election of a Speaker, viva voce.

A motion was made by Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, that the words "viva voce" be stricken out and that the words "by ballot" be inserted.

The question on the amendment being taken by yeas and nays, there were 66 yeas and 154 nays. So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, then moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

And after the Speaker shall have sworn the Members they will proceed to the election of a Clerk in like manner.

This motion was disagreed to, and then the original resolution was agreed to.[2]

205. On December 4, 1843,[3] at the organization of the House, the Clerk (Matthew St. Clair Clarke) called the roll and announced the presence of a quorum. Thereupon he reminded the House that, as no rules had been adopted, there was no form prescribed for the election of the Speaker.

Thereupon, a motion was made and carried that the House do proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce.

The rule at that time (i.e., the code of rules adopted by the House in this and several preceding Congresses), provided that all elections of officers of the House should be viva voce. The rule at present does not include the Speaker among those to be elected viva voce.

206. The Thirty-first Congress assembled on December 3, 1849,[4] but the House was unable to elect a Speaker until December 23. While this voting was going on a motion was generally made at the beginning of each legislative day that the House proceed viva voce to elect a Speaker. Then the votings would proceed as a matter of course through the day. As time went on motions were offered and entertained proposing election by ballot, by lot, and by resolution. These were not adopted, and the House would resume the viva voce voting by motion made and carried, or as a matter of course. Rules had not been adopted at this time, and consequently the rule providing for viva voce election was not in operation.

[2] The rules had before this been amended to provide for the election of the Speaker by viva voce vote; but as rules had not been adopted yet in this Congress there was no rule applying. The usage of voting viva voce has become so strong in later years that the method has not been questioned for a long time.

207. On December 3, 1855,[1] at the organization of the House, after the Clerk of the preceding House had called the roll and announced the presence of a quorum, Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, moved that the House proceed to the election, viva voce, of a Speaker for the Thirty-fourth Congress.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to.

Thereafter, on each day, the House proceeded to the voting without special vote, unless propositions in regard to the organization intervened. And as soon as they were disposed of the voting was resumed as a matter of course.

208. On December 19, 1855,[2] after sixty-five ineffectual attempts to elect a Speaker viva voce, a motion was made that the House proceed to election by ballot. This motion was disagreed to—yeas 214, nays 7.

209. As late as 1837 the House maintained the old usage of electing the Speaker by ballot.—On September 4, 1837,[3] the roll of Members by States having been called, and the presence of a quorum having been announced, it was, on motion of Mr. David Petrikin, of Pennsylvania,

Resolved, That the Members present now proceed to the organization of the House by the choice of a Speaker.

The House then proceeded by ballot to the election of a Speaker; and upon an examination of the first ballot it appeared that James K. Polk, one of the Representatives from the State of Tennessee, was duly elected, having received a majority of all the votes given in.

210. The House and not the hold-over Clerk decides by what method it shall proceed to elect a Speaker.

Why the House in a new Congress meets at 12 m.

Discussion as to whether or not the rules of one House remain the rules of the next House until changed.[4]

On December 7, 1835,[5] at the beginning of the first session of the Congress, the Members-elect were called to order by the Clerk of the last House, and the roll having been called, and the presence of a quorum having been ascertained and announced, the Members were about to proceed by ballot to the election of a Speaker, the Clerk having announced that the next business in order was the election of a Speaker by ballot.

At this point Mr. John M. Patton, of Virginia, raised a question as to the authority by which the Clerk announced that the House would proceed by ballot to the election of a Speaker. The House, if it was competent to elect, was also competent to prescribe the method of election. He preferred the method of election by viva voce voting They were not bound by the rules of the last House and might proceed as they pleased. Mr. Samuel Beardsley, of New York, argued that the House might proceed to the election by ballot or viva voce, as it might please. Custom alone had sanctioned the practice that the Clerk of the House should, on the first day of the session, at 12 o'clock, call over the names of the Members; and custom also had sanctioned the practice of the Clerk calling for the Members to vote and putting the question for Speaker. Mr. James Parker, of New Jersey, urged that the House should not depart from the old usage of fifty years and more, which had come to have the force of common law, and in accordance with which the Clerk called the House to order at 12 o'clock, and at no other hour, ascertained the presence of a quorum by a call of the roll; and then the House, in accordance with the same custom, proceeded to choice of a Speaker by ballot.

The Clerk read the rule of the last House providing the method of electing the Speaker by ballot,[1] and Mr. Abijah Mann, jr., of New York, contended that the rules of the last House were the laws of the present until changed, and that the Clerk did not hold his position and perform the functions at this time by mere custom.

Mr. Patton moved that the Speaker be elected viva voce.

On motion of Mr. George Evans, of Maine, this motion was laid on the table.

Then, on motion of Mr. Beardsley, it was Resolved, That the House do now proceed to the election of a Speaker by ballot.

211. Procedure for electing the Speaker by viva voce vote.—On December 7, 1857,[2] 226 Members having answered to their names, the Clerk announced that a quorum was present. Then, on motion of Mr. John Smith Phelps, of Missouri, it was ordered that the House do now proceed viva voce to the election of a Speaker for the Thirty-fifth Congress.

The Clerk having appointed tellers, and nominations having been made, the Members then proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker.[3]

212. At the organization of the House the motion to proceed to the election of a Speaker is of the highest privilege.—On March 4, 1869,[4] at the organization of the House, after the Clerk had called the roll of Members-elect and announced the presence of a quorum, Mr. George W. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the roll of Members of the Forty-first Congress be amended by the addition of the name of Henry D. Foster, as the Representative of the Twenty-first Congressional district of Pennsylvania, and that said Foster be called and admitted as the sitting Member prima facie entitled to represent said district.

Mr. Ellihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, moved that the House proceed to the election of a Speaker, claiming precedence for the motion as involving a question of privilege.

Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, made the point of order that the law gave to the Clerk the making of the roll of members to be called prior to the organization.

[1] See section 187 of this work for rule for election by ballot as it existed at that time. The rule was then classified among those rules relating to the Speaker.

[2] First session Thirty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 8.

[3] In recent years the House has often proceeded at once to election viva voce without the formality of a motion.

[4] First session Forty-first Congress, Globe, p. 3.

The Clerk [1] said:

The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Washburne, rose to a question of privilege which has precedence of that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and therefore the question before the House is on the motion to proceed to the election of a Speaker. * * * The duty of the House to organize itself is a duty devolved upon it by law, and any matter looking to the performance of that duty takes precedence in all parliamentary bodies of all minor questions.

213. The motion that the House proceed to elect a Speaker is debatable unless the previous question is ordered.—On March 4, 1867,[2] at the organization of the House, the Congress having assembled in accordance with the act of January 22, 1867, the Clerk had called the names of the Members-elect and bad announced that a quorum was present.

Thereupon Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, moved that the House proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce.

Mr. James Brooks, of New York, having the floor, was proceeding to debate, when Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, made the point of order that no debate was in order until after the House had proceeded to the election of its officers.

The Clerk [1] said:

The Chair overrules the point of order, the previous question not having been called.

After further debate the previous question was moved and ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. Wilson was agreed to.

214. A resolution to proceed to the election of a Speaker presents a question of privilege, and pending the decision another question of privilege may not be presented.—On December 4, 1876,[3] at the opening of the session, 250 Members having answered to their names, the Clerk announced that a quorum was present.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the House being informed that since its last adjournment Hon. Michael C. Kerr, who at the commencement of the present Congress was elected Speaker of the House, has departed this life, creating a vacancy in the office of Speaker: Therefore,

Resolved, That the House do now proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce.

Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, as a question of privilege, presented the credentials of James B. Belford as Representative from the State of Colorado, and moved that the oath of office be administered to the said Belford.

Mr. Holman demanded the previous question on the adoption of the said resolution, when Mr. Banks made the point of order that the right of a Member to participate in the election of a Speaker was a question of higher privilege than the election of a Speaker.

This question of order was debated at considerable length, it being urged that the election of Speaker was secondary to the determination of what Members should be on the roll to participate in that election. The distinction was also drawn between this election and one at the beginning of a Congress when, under the law, the Clerk judges what names are to go onto the roll. Not only Mr. Belford was waiting to be sworn in, but also Mr. Edwin Flye, of Maine, successor of Mr. James G. Blaine.

The Clerk [1] overruled the point of order, on the ground that the resolution submitted by Mr. Holman presented a question of privilege, and that pending the decision of such question another question of privilege could not be submitted.

From this decision of the Clerk Mr. Banks appealed. Mr. Cox moved that the appeal be laid on the table, which was done by a vote of 165 yeas to 84 nays.

215. In 1809 the House held that a Speaker should be elected by a majority of all present.—On May 27, 1809,[2] at the organization of the House, the ballot for Speaker showed the following result:

For Joseph B. Varnum	60
For Nathaniel Macon	36
For Timothy Pitkin, jr	20
For Roger Nelson	1
For C. W. Goldsborough	1
Blank ballots	2
Total	120

The tellers submitting the question as to whether Mr. Varnum was elected or not, Mr. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, the rival candidate, expressed the opinion that Mr. Varnum was elected; but Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, opposed this view strenuously, insisting that the House should elect its Speaker more majorum, after the manner of their ancestors. And on motion of Mr. Randolph the House proceeded to ballot again, which motion was carried-ayes 67, noes 43. On the next ballot Mr. Varnum was elected by 65 votes out of 119.

On the succeeding day the Journal was found to state that a majority of the votes were for Mr. Varnum, whereupon, on motion of Mr. Randolph, it was amended to read: "Sixty-five votes, being a majority of the whole number of Members present, were found in favor of Joseph B. Varnum." The call of the roll by States just preceding Mr. Varnum's election showed 126 responding. The 65 voting for Mr. Varnum were a majority of this number.

216. In 1879 it was held that a Speaker might be elected by a majority of those present, a quorum voting, a majority of all the members not being required.

Discussion as to the size of a valid vote when a quorum is present.

On March 18, 1879,[3] at the organization of the House, on the viva voce vote for Speaker, the following result was announced by the tellers:

For Samuel J. Randall	144
For James A. Garfield	125
For Hendrick B. Wright	13
For William D. Kelley	1
Total	283

[2] First session Eleventh Congress, Journal, p. 5; Annals, pp. 54–56.

[3] First session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 5.

The total membership of the House, however, under the existing apportionment, was 293, and the vote for Mr. Randall fell short of a majority of that number.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, asked if it did not require a majority of all the Members elected to the House to elect a Speaker.

The Clerk [1] replied:

It requires a majority of those voting to elect a Speaker, as it does to pass a bill. The rule requires that a quorum shall vote.[2] That is the opinion of the Clerk.

Thereupon Mr. Randall was declared elected Speaker.

217. Tellers of the vote on the election of a Speaker are appointed by the Clerk.—On December 5, 1859,[3] the House having voted to proceed viva voce to elect a Speaker, the Clerk appointed Mr. George S. Houston, of Alabama, Thomas Corwin, of Ohio, Garnett B. Adrian, of New Jersey, and George Briggs, of New York, tellers. The Clerk made the appointment of these tellers without suggestion or vote from the floor, and the Journal records the appointment.

218. The House has in one instance asked the candidates for Speaker to state their-views before proceeding to election.—On January 11, 1856,[4] before the election of a Speaker or the adoption of rules, Mr. Felix K. Zollicoffer, of Tennessee, offered the following:

Resolved, That in conformity with the principles of a great popular Government, such as that of the United States, it is the duty of all candidates for political position frankly and fully to state their opinions upon important political questions involved in their election, and especially when they are interrogated by the body of electors whose votes they are seeking.

[1] George M. Adams, of Kentucky, Clerk.

[2] Since 1890 the requirement has been the quorum present, rather than the quorum voting. See section 2895 of Vol. IV of this work. In the decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the ruling of Mr. Speaker Reed, the court had used this language: "And here the general rule of all parliamentary bodies is that when a quorum is present, the act of a majority of the quorum is the act of the body itself." On January 10, 1896 (First session Fifty-fourth Congress, Record, pp. 579–581) a question arose on this feature of the subject, Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, contending that for lawful action there must be the vote of a majority of a quorum. In other words, the quorum of the existing House was 179. Granted that this number should be present, yet by reason of some not voting, there might be on the passage of a bill yeas 76, nays 74. So a majority of those present would not vote affirmatively, and Mr. Bailey contended that the bill would not be lawfully passed.

The Speaker (Mr. Reed) intervened to ask: "Does the gentleman from Texas hold that it is necessary that 89 persons at least [the Speaker must have meant 90 instead of 89, since 90 is a majority of 179] should vote for every proposition that passes the House?"

Mr. Bailey contended that on a recorded vote it would be necessary.

The Speaker replied, with the concurrence of Mr. Bailey, that many bills had been passed without fulfilling the requirement, and continued:

"The Chair * * * having examined the matter somewhat carefully at various times, he finds that the court in making that decision perhaps decided that it was within the most extreme contention of the opponents, some people having contended that it is necessary to have a majority of a quorum voting. The court pointed it out in this case; but it was not necessary to discuss that question. They might have decided, had they come to the plain question of the body being constituted of the persons who participated in the presence of the rest of the body, they were controlled by their votes, because the rest of the body, being present, could have intervened and overruled them if they had so chosen; but not having chosen to do so it [they] allowed 88 [90] or any less number to pass a measure practically by their assent, because declining to participate was assent."

Although objection was made that this resolution constituted business which the House in its disorganized condition was not competent to transact, it passed in the affirmative. Later, on January 12, the candidates for Speaker answered interrogatories in accordance with the requirements of the resolution.

219. After the election of a Speaker and before he has been conducted to the chair no debate or business is in order.—On February 1, 1860,[1] the Clerk had announced the election of William Pennington, of New Jersey, as Speaker, when Mr. Thomas C. Hindman, of Arkansas, sought recognition and began to speak.

Mr. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that a Speaker had just been elected by the House, and that nothing could be in order until he had been conducted to the chair.

Clerk[2] said:

> The Clerk begs leave respectfully to suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that this House has just declared a Speaker-elect, and that the first thing in order is to conduct that Speaker to the chair. The Clerk has no power further to preserve order. Until the Speaker has been conducted to the chair, the House is without an organ or any person having authority to entertain motions or questions of order.

The Clerk then appointed a committee of two to conduct the Speaker-elect to the chair.

220. The Clerk appoints the committee to escort the newly elected Speaker to the chair.

It has long been the usage that the oldest Member in continuous service shall administer the oath to the Speaker.

After a Speaker has been elected the Clerk appoints the committee to escort him to the chair. On February 2, 1856,[3] after Mr. Speaker Banks had finally been elected after a long struggle, Mr. John Wheeler, of New York, proposed to designate the committee by resolution, but desisted because of the remonstrances of Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, who as "the oldest consecutive Member" was about to administer the oath to the Speaker. Mr. Giddings said that the Clerk always appointed the committee, and to arrange it otherwise would be an "innovation on the whole past practice of the House."

221. The contest over the organization of the House in 1849.[4]

The House declined to determine the choice of a Speaker by lot.

The House by special rule chose a Speaker by a plurality of votes, but confirmed the choice by a majority vote.

The question as to whether or not the House, before its organization, may adjourn over for more than one day.

On December 22, 1849,[5] the House had been in session nineteen days[5] without being able to elect a Speaker, no candidate having received a majority of the votes cast. The voting was viva voce, each Member when called naming the candidate for whom he voted. After the thirteenth ballot Mr. Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, offered a resolution providing that if, on the next ballot, no individual should receive a majority of the votes cast, the individual receiving a plurality of votes should be the Speaker for the present session. An amendment was proposed, to provide that the vote be taken by ballot. Both the resolution and amendment were laid on the table by a vote of 210 to 11.[1] A resolution proposed by Mr. Frederick P. Stanton, of Tennessee, to restrict the voting to the four highest candidates, and in the event of no choice to the two highest, was also laid on the table.[2]

[4] There had also been a prolonged contest over the organization of the House in 1840 (see sec. 103 of this work), but it was not occasioned by a difficulty over the election of Speaker.

On December 6, after the fourteenth ballot, Mr. John A. McClernand, of Illinois, offered a resolution to adopt the rules of the last House and appoint Mr. Linn Boyd, of Kentucky, chairman until a Speaker should be elected. After an amendment had been proposed to alternate Mr. Samuel F. Vinton, of Ohio, with Mr. Boyd, and after Mr. McClernand had modified his proposition so as to permit the proposed chairman merely to keep order during the proceedings on the election of Speaker, the whole proposition was laid on the table by a vote of 116 to 105.

After the thirtieth ballot Mr. Lewis C. Levin, of South Carolina, offered a resolution that each of the five parties, or factions, in the House should put the name of its candidate in a box and that the Clerk should draw one therefrom, thus determining the Speakership by lottery. This resolution was promptly laid upon the table. After the thirty-first ballot it was proposed that lots be drawn between Mr. Howell Cobb and Mr. Robert C. Winthrop to determine who should be Speaker. This was not approved. A motion that the vote be taken by ballot was also defeated by a vote of 162 to 62.

After the forty-first ballot Mr. George Ashmun, of Massachusetts, proposed a plan for electing by plurality of votes, but it did not meet with favor.

On motion of Mr. Milo M. Dimimick, of Pennsylvania, it was ordered that the House should proceed with the election of a Speaker and that there should be no debate until such an election should be effected.

Various solutions of the difficulty were offered as the balloting proceeded, such as modifications of the plurality plan, proposals to raise a committee to devise a plan for organization, to elect a Speaker pro tempore, etc.

Finally, after the fifty-ninth ballot, Mr. Frederick P. Stanton offered and the House adopted, after attempts to amend and protests from the minority at the prohibition of debate, the following resolution by a vote of 113 yeas to 106 nays:

Resolved, That the House will proceed immediately to the election of a Speaker, viva voce; and if, after the roll shall have been called three times, no Member shall have received a majority of the whole number of votes, the roll shall again be called, and the Member who shall then receive the largest number of votes, provided it be a majority of a quorum, shall be declared to be chosen Speaker.

A strong protest[3] was made against the plurality resolution and against the resolution prohibiting debate. Mr. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, insisted on making his protest, although the Clerk began a roll call while he was on the floor, and there was great disorder and confusion. He denied the right of the unorganized House to limit debate or adopt the plurality rule, basing his opposition on the second section of the act of 1789—

That at the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives, the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall be administered by any one Member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker, and by him to all the Members present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business.[1]

A motion having been made to adjourn over to a day beyond the next day, Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, arose and suggested the constitutional point that the House could not, until it was organized, do otherwise than adjourn from day to day. The House decided the motion to adjourn over in the negative.[2]

Under the operation of the plurality, resolution, the sixty-third vote resulted as follows:

For Howell Cobb	102
For Robert C. Winthrop	100
For David Wilmot	8
For Charles S. Morehead	4
For William Strong	3
For Alexander H. Stephens	1
For William F. Colcock	1
For Charles Durkee	1
For Emery D. Potter	1
For Linn Boyd	1
Whole number of votes given	222

Of which number, Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, having received 102 votes, being the largest number cast for any one Member, under the resolution adopted by the House, and being a majority of a quorum of the House, Mr. Stanly thereupon offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Howell Cobb, a Representative from the State of Georgia, be declared duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-first Congress.

This resolution having been adopted, Mr. Cobb was conducted to the chair by Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, and Mr. James McDowell, of Virginia.

222. The contest over the organization of the House in 1855 and 1856.

The House by special rule chose a Speaker by plurality of votes, but confirmed the choice by a majority vote on a resolution declarative of the result.

[2] See also Section 89 of this volume. During the prolonged contest in the first session Thirty-fourth Congress, which resulted in the election of Speaker Banks, the House voted, on December 24, 1855, to adjourn over. (Journal, p. 172; Globe, pp. 78, 79.) Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, suggested that they had no power to adjourn over, and that a majority of the Members might come the next day and elect a Speaker, notwithstanding the adjournment over; but the point was not further insisted on. Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, who had suggested it in the Thirty-first Congress, participated in the debate, but said nothing on this point. Previous to this (Journal, p. 18) the Doorkeeper had been directed to enforce so much of the rules of the last Congress as related to the admission of persons within the hall of the House.

The House declined to permit any announcement but its own declaration in a case wherein a Speaker was chosen by plurality of votes.

Use of the motion to rescind in proceedings for organization of the House.

Instance of thanks to the Clerk for presiding during a prolonged contest over the organization.

On February 2, 1856,[1] the House was in the midst of a struggle over the election of a Speaker. One hundred and twenty-nine ballots had been taken without any candidate receiving the majority of the votes cast. Various devices, including attempts to elect Members by means of adopting resolutions declaring such a one to be Speaker, had been tried without success. On this day the proposition to elect by a plurality of votes was revived, and Mr. Samuel A. Smith, of Tennessee, submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the House will proceed immediately to the election of a Speaker viva voce. If, after the roll shall have been called three times, no Member shall have received a majority of all the votes cast, the roll shall again be called, and the Member who shall then receive the largest number of votes, provided it be a majority of a quorum, shall be declared duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-fourth Congress.

This resolution was adopted by a vote of 113 yeas and 104 nays. After its adoption a motion was made[2] to rescind it, and was laid on the table by a vote of 117 to 110. After a motion to adjourn had been voted on, the motion to rescind was again made, but, the question being submitted to the House, the House decided that the motion to rescind was not again in order.

After the one hundred and thirty-third vote the following result was reached:

For Nathaniel P. Banks, jr	103
For William Aiken	100
For Henry M. Fuller	6
For Lewis D. Campbell	4
For Daniel Wells, jr	1
Whole number of votes	214

Of which number Nathaniel P. Banks, jr., of Massachusetts, having received 103 votes, being the largest number cast for any one Member, and a majority of a quorum of the House, was declared by the tellers to have been duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-fourth Congress.

Mr. Samuel P. Benson, of Maine, taking the roll, announced the vote, concluding with the declaration that Mr. Banks "is declared Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-fourth Congress."[3] Immediately there was a question of the right of the gentleman from Maine to make such a declaration. It was declared that only the House could make such a declaration, and the precedent of 1849 was recalled, when a resolution was adopted declaring Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, duly elected Speaker. Mr. Cobb, in reply, said that he had not believed the declaratory resolution necessary in 1849 and he did not believe it necessary now. If a majority of the House adopted the plurality rule, when a plurality vote was cast for a Member he was elected by virtue of the resolution originally adopted by a majority of the House. On the other hand, it was urged by Mr. William W. Boyd, of South Carolina, that the majority could not empower a minority to designate a Speaker, because delegated power could not be delegated.

Mr. Thomas L. Clingman, of North Carolina, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That, by reason of the adoption of the proposition known as the plurality resolution, and the votes taken under it, the Hon. N. P. Banks, of Massachusetts, has been duly chosen Speaker, and is hereby so declared.

This resolution having been agreed to by a vote of 156 yeas to 40 nays, Mr. Banks was conducted to the chair by Mr. William Aiken, of South Carolina, Mr. Henry M. Fuller, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio, and addressed the House.

Mr. Stanton submitted the following resolution; which was unanimously agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are eminently due, and are hereby tendered, to John W. Forney, esq., for the distinguished ability, fidelity, and impartiality with which he has presided over the deliberations of the House of Representatives during the arduous and protracted contest for Speaker which has just closed.

223. In 1860 the election of a Speaker proceeded slowly, the voting being interspersed with debate which the Clerk did not prevent.—At the first session of the Thirty-sixth Congress, which began on December 5, 1859, there was a prolonged delay over the election of Speaker, a result being reached on February 1, 1860, after fifty-four ballots. On the first day of the session it was ordered that the House proceed viva voce to the election of a Speaker.

Thereupon a ballot was taken without result. Debate then began; and as the Clerk declined to decide any questions of order, the voting for Speaker proceeded very slowly. All questions of order were submitted to the House and were debated, so it became practically impossible to hasten proceedings. Sometimes only one vote would be taken during a day, the remainder of the time being consumed in debate. It was urged by Mr. Israel Washburn, jr., of Maine, and by others that the order to proceed to the election of a Speaker was a standing order and that debate and other matters were not in order.[1] He also contended that the House should each day proceed to vote without a special order so to do each time. But it was impossible to arrive at a determination of the question raised, and we find the House, at the last of the proceedings, adopting, under operation of the previous question, an order to proceed to the election of Speaker before each vote. Questions of personal privilege were raised by Members, and a resolution relating to the qualifications of the candidates for Speaker[2] was presented and debated, but no decision was reached on the point of order that it was not in order or on the resolution itself, the Clerk declining to decide and the House being unable to reach a decision. A resolution for a plurality rule was proposed, but was not acted on. Finally a Speaker was elected by majority vote.[1]

[1] Thus, on January 18 (Journal, p. 130; Globe, p. 499), the Clerk declined to carry out the order, as he did not feel at liberty to arrest the remarks of a Member.

[2] On January 5, 1860, during the contest over the election of a Speaker, a proposition to elect a Speaker pro tempore was presented and discussed somewhat, but not adopted. (First session Thirty-sixth Congress, Globe, pp. 341–343.)

224. A new Speaker being elected at the beginning of a second session of Congress, Members-elect present and unsworn participated in that election.—On November 13, 1820,[2] at the beginning of the second session of the Congress, the Clerk called the House to order, and the roll of Members was called by States to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

At the conclusion of the roll call several new Members appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats.

Then, a quorum being present (the new Members were not, however, necessary to produce this quorum, and there is no evidence as to whether or not they were counted as part of it) the Clerk laid before the House the resignation of the Speaker, and the House proceeded to elect a Speaker, a choice being effected on November 15. The new Speaker, Mr. John W. Taylor, of New York, having taken his seat and addressed the House, and a message announcing his election having been sent to the Senate, he proceeded to administer the oath to the new Members who appeared on the 13th instant.

It seems evident, from a comparison of the Journal and Annals, that the new unsworn Members voted for Speaker. They were 7 in number, and the Journal records only 131 old members as appearing on the first day. Yet the total votes in the first day's ballotings range from 132 to 138. On the second day the Journal records the appearance of enough more old Members to bring the total of old Members up to 142, yet during this day the total of votes reached as high as 148; and on the third day, with 147 old Members recorded, the totals of ballots ranged from 141 to 148. If the appearance of Members was recorded with care, as it seems to have been, it is evident that the unsworn new Members voted for Speaker.[3]

225. A Speaker elected after the organization of the House takes the oath, although he may have taken it already as a Member.

Mr. Speaker Colfax, having been elected Vice-President, resigned his Speakership on the last day of the Congress.

The Speaker called a Member to the chair and, taking the floor, tendered his resignation verbally.

On March 3, 1869,[4] the Speaker[5] called Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, to the chair and, having been recognized on the floor, offered his resignation as Speaker, to take effect upon the election of his successor.

The Clerk (Alexander McDowell, of Pennsylvania) declined to permit them to do so. Had they presented credentials in due form, the situation would evidently have been different.

[5] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker. He had been elected Vice-President, and this resignation was tendered at the beginning of the last legislative day of the Congress.

A resolution expressing regret at his retirement and a high appreciation of his services having been adopted by the House, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, moved that Hon. Theodore M. Pomeroy, of New York, "be declared duly elected Speaker in place of Hon. Schuyler Colfax, resigned, for the remaining term of this Congress."

This resolution was agreed to unanimously.

A committee was appointed to escort the Speaker-elect to the chair, and the Speaker pro tempore designated Mr. Dawes to administer the oath to the Speaker-elect.

The Speaker-elect having addressed the House briefly, the oath was administered to him.

Resolutions were then adopted directing that the Senate be informed of the election and that a committee of three be appointed to inform the President.

226. On December 4, 1876,[1] at the second session of the Congress, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, was elected Speaker in place of Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana. The oath was administered to Mr. Randall after his election, no question being raised on the point. Of course he had already taken the oath as Member at the first session.

227. When the Speaker is absent at the beginning of a session the House may adjourn or elect a Speaker pro tempore.—On December 6, 1830, at the opening of the second session,[2] the Clerk[3] called the House to order, and the presence of a quorum having been ascertained, Mr. William S. Archer, of Virginia, arose and announced that the Speaker[4] was prevented by indisposition from attending. He had looked into the records and found that in such cases the practice had been twofold. In some cases the House adjourned from day to day; and in two other cases, occurring in 1798, the House had elected a Speaker pro tempore. Then, on motion of Mr. James K. Polk, of Tennessee, the House adjourned.

228. The Speaker pro tempore, whom the House had just elected, not being present, the Clerk held that the motion to adjourn was not business, and under the circumstances was the only motion in order.—On June 24, 1876[5] the Clerk, in the absence of the Speaker[6] and the Speaker pro tempore, called the House to order, when Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., moved that the House adjourn.

This motion being disagreed to, Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Hon. Milton Sayler, a Representative from the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present absence of the Speaker.

The Speaker pro tempore elect not being present, Mr. Holman, at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, made the point of order that the House having elected a Speaker pro tempore, the functions of the Clerk as a presiding officer thereupon ceased, and that it was not competent for him to entertain or submit any motion to the House in the nature of business.

The Clerk [1] overruled the point of order, holding that a motion to adjourn was not business, and in the absence of the Speaker or Speaker pro tempore was the only motion in order.

In this decision of the Clerk the House acquiesced. And then the motion of Mr. Holman was agreed to, and the House accordingly adjourned.

229. A Speaker pro tempore elected by the House is not sworn.

Discussion of the nature and functions of the office of Speaker pro tempore.

On February 17, 1876,[2] Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Hon. Samuel S. Cox, a Representative from the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, moved that the oath of office prescribed by the act of July, 1862, be administered to the Speaker pro tempore before he should enter upon the duties of the office to which he had just been appointed.

After debate the motion of Mr. Garfield was decided in the negative, yeas 73, nays 171.

A resolution informing the Senate of the election of Mr. Cox as Speaker pro tempore was then agreed to.

The motion of Mr. Garfield was debated at length. He urged it on the ground that the act of 1862 made it incumbent on all officers except the President to take the oath before entering on the duties of the office, and contended that the precedents cited of Speakers pro tempore who had taken no additional oath were all before 1862, while the case of Mr. Pomeroy, who took the additional oath, was after the enactment of the test oath. On the other hand, it was stated that Mr. Pomeroy, although chosen only for a day, was in fact a Speaker, since Speaker Colfax had resigned. The discussion also embraced a consideration of the relations of the offices of Speaker, Speaker pro tempore by election of the House, and Speaker pro tempore by designation of the Chair under the rules. The idea was advanced that the latter was merely a presiding officer, without the power to sign bills or do other things devolving on a Speaker. As to the distinction between an elected Speaker and an elected Speaker pro tempore there was a diversity of opinion. It was contended that the Speaker pro tempore was as different from the Speaker as a President pro tempore of the Senate from Vice-President, and the idea was opposed on the ground that the House might at any time remove its Speaker and choose one pro tempore, who would have all the attributes of his predecessor. It was also contended that when the Speaker was sworn at the organization of the House he, in fact, took two oaths at the same time, one as Member and the other as Speaker. Hence it was argued that a Speaker elected after the organization, to fill a vacancy, would take an additional oath.

230. A Member being elected Speaker after the organization of the House, it is assumed that his committee places are thereby vacated.—On December 11, 1876,[1] Mr. Speaker Randall announced the appointment of Mr. Hiester Clymer, of Pennsylvania, on the Committee on Appropriations in place of himself, who had retired by reason of being elected Speaker. It does not appear that any request was made of the House to relieve Mr. Randall of this committee service.

231. Rising in his place, Mr. Speaker Clay addressed the House, announcing his resignation.

The Speaker having resigned, the chair remained vacant, and the Clerk presided until a successor was elected.

The Speaker having resigned in 1814, his successor, when elected, took the oath.

A Speaker being elected to fill a vacancy caused by resignation, the Senate, but not the President, was notified of the fact.

A resolution of thanks to a Speaker who had resigned was agreed to before the election of a successor.

On January 19, 1814,[2] after the business of the House had proceeded some time, the Speaker, rising in his place, addressed the House briefly, announcing his resignation as Speaker.

He then left the chair, which remained vacant.

Then, on motion of Mr. William Findley, of Pennsylvania, the Clerk putting the motion:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to Henry Clay, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the arduous and important duties assigned to him as Speaker of this House.

A motion to adjourn having been decided in the negative, the House proceeded by ballot to the choice of a Speaker, in place of Henry Clay, resigned; and, upon the examination of the ballots, it appeared that Langdon Cheves, one of the Representatives from the State of South Carolina, was duly elected.

Mr. Cheves, having been conducted to the chair, addressed the House. Then the oath was administered to him by Mr. Findley.

On the next day:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House inform the Senate that, Henry Clay having yesterday resigned his seat as Speaker, the House of Representatives have made choice of Langdon Cheves, one of the Representatives from the State of South Carolina, as their Speaker.

No message seems to have been sent to the President.

232. In 1820, at the beginning of a second session, the Clerk called the House to order, and after ascertaining the presence of a quorum presented a letter of resignation from the Speaker.

The Speaker having resigned, no action of the House excusing him from service is taken.

The Speaker having resigned in 1820, it does not appear that his successor took the oath.

A Speaker being elected to fill a vacancy caused by resignation, the Senate, but not the President, was notified of the fact.

In the earlier practice when a series of ballots were taken, the Journal recorded only the bare result of the decisive ballot.

On November 13, 1820,[1] the House was called together at the opening of the second session of the Congress by the Clerk, and the roll of Members was called by States. A quorum appearing, the Clerk stated that fact, and then announced to the House a letter[2] addressed to him by Henry Clay, Speaker of the House, in which Mr. Clay requested the Clerk to communicate to the House the fact of his inability to attend—and to respectfully ask it to allow me to resign the office of its Speaker, which I have the honor to hold, and to consider this as the act of my resignation.

This letter being read, no motion was made to permit the Speaker to be excused from serving, but the House proceeded at once to ballot[3] to elect a Speaker. Messrs. Thomas Newton, of Virginia, and Jonathan O. Moseley, of Connecticut, were appointed a committee to count the ballots. After 7 ballots, in which no one had a majority of the votes given, as required by the rule[4] the House adjourned. On the succeeding day, also, the balloting was fruitless, but on November 15, on the twenty-second ballot, the result was announced as follows: The whole number of votes were 148, 75 necessary to a choice. The votes were: For Mr. Taylor, 76; for Mr. Lowndes, 44; for Mr. Smith, 27; scattering, 1.[5]

So John W. Taylor, a Representative from the State of New York, was elected Speaker.

Mr. Taylor addressed the House, but the Journal does not indicate that the oath was administered.

On motion of Mr. Nelson, of Virginia:

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that a quorum of this House is assembled; that they have elected John W. Taylor, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, their Speaker, in the room of Henry Clay, resigned, and are now ready to proceed to business; and that the Clerk go with the said message.

There is nothing to indicate that a notice of the election of the new Speaker was sent to the President.

233. In 1834 the Speaker, intending to resign, arose in his place and informed the House, setting a future day for the act.

The Speaker having announced his resignation, made a farewell address and left the chair.

The farewell address of the Speaker appears in full in the Journal.

The Speaker having resigned in 1834, his successor took the oath.

[2] This letter appears in full in the Journal.

[3] The Journal makes no mention of a motion to proceed to the election of a Speaker; but the Annals states that such a motion was made by Mr. Thomas Newton, of Virginia.

[4] See section 6003, Volume V, of this work for the rule at that time.

[5] The Journal does not record these ballotings in detail, but announces merely that "upon an examination of the twenty-second ballot, it appeared that John W. Taylor, etc., was duly elected."

On May 30, 1834,[1] the Journal has this entry:

Mr. Speaker Stevenson rose, and informed the House that he had taken the chair this morning, though still laboring under severe and continued indisposition, for the purpose of opening the House, and preventing any delay in its business, and likewise for the purpose of announcing his determination of resigning the Speaker's chair and his seat in Congress. This he proposed doing on Monday next at 11 o'clock. He had formed this resolution under a deep sense of duty, and because his state of health rendered it impossible for him (as must be apparent to the House) to discharge, in person, the laborious duties of the Chair, and he had therefore deemed it respectful and proper to give this early notice of his intention to retire.

On Monday, June 2,[2] immediately after the reading of the Journal, the Speaker arose and addressed the House. He said he had attended for the purpose of resigning the office of Speaker, and of announcing the fact that he had communicated to the executive of Virginia his resignation as one of the Representatives of that State. Mr. Speaker then addressed farewell remarks to the House. These appear in full in the Journal.

Having completed his remarks, Mr. Stevenson then descended from the chair and withdrew.

Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, then moved that the House proceed to the election of a Speaker.

The Clerk put this motion, which was agreed to; and then nominated 6 tellers to collect and count the ballots. Of this proceeding, however, the Journal has only this entry.

The House, on motion, proceeded by ballot to the choice of a Speaker in the place of Andrew Stevenson, resigned, and, upon an examination of the tenth ballot, it appeared that John Bell, one of the Representatives from the State of Tennessee, was duly elected; upon which, Mr. Bell was conducted to the Speaker's chair by Mr. John Quincy Adams and Mr. Richard M. Johnson, from whence he addressed the House as follows: [Address follows in full.]

The oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States was then administered to the Speaker-elect by Mr. Williams, one of the Representatives from the State of North Carolina.

234. The Speaker having died during the recess of Congress, the Clerk called the House to order, ascertained the presence of a quorum, and entertained a motion to proceed to election of a Speaker.—On December 4, 1876,[3] on the first day of the session, the Clerk of the House, having called the House to order at 12 m., announced the death of Hon. Michael C. Kerr, late Speaker; and then proceeded to call the roll of Members by States.

A quorum having been disclosed, and its presence announced by the Clerk, Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, presented this resolution:

Whereas the House being informed that since its last adjournment Hon. Michael C. Kerr, who at the commencement of the present Congress was elected Speaker of the House, has departed this life, creating a vacancy in the office of Speaker; therefore

Resolved, That the House do now proceed to the election of a Speaker viva voce.

This resolution, which was held to be of high privilege, was agreed to.

235. The House, in a rule continuing the Clerk in office until the election of his successor, assumed to perpetuate its authority beyond its own existence.—On March 1, 1791,[1] at the close of the first Congress, it was

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States shall be deemed to continue in office until another be appointed.

Again, on March 2, 1793,[2] at the close of the Second Congress, a similar resolution was agreed to.

236. The Clerk having died in the recess of Congress, the House was informed as soon as a quorum had been ascertained and new Members sworn in.

The Clerk having died, the House at once elected a successor, declining to have the chief clerk fill the vacancy temporarily.

On December 3, 1838,[3] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication:

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 3, 1838.

SIR: The painful duty is devolved upon me of informing you, and, through you, the House of Representatives of the United States, of the death of Walter S. Franklin, esq., Clerk of the House. He died on the 20th of September last, at Lancaster, in Pennsylvania.

In making this communication, I can not omit to embrace the opportunity publicly to express the deep regret of every officer of the House at the loss the public and themselves have sustained in the death of Mr. Franklin.

With much respect, Sir, your obedient servant,

S. BURCH,
Chief Clerk of the Office, and Acting Clerk House of Representatives.

HON. J. K. POLK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The House disagreed to a proposition that the principal assistant clerk act as Clerk until the House should fill the vacancy, and entertained and agreed to a motion that—the House do forthwith proceed to the election of a Clerk.

Accordingly the House proceeded to the election of a Clerk.

These proceedings took place after the roll had been called by States to ascertain the presence of a quorum, and after the new Members had been sworn in, but before the Senate or the President had been informed that a quorum of the House was in attendance.

It does not appear that any message was sent to the Senate informing them that the House had elected a Clerk.

237. The election of the Clerk of the House presents a question of privilege.

The office of Clerk becoming vacant it was held that the House would not be organized for business until a Clerk should be elected.

The preparation and reading of the Journal is not prevented by the death of the officer having it in charge.

On April 16, 1850,[1] Mr. Thomas L. Harris, of Illinois, moved that the House proceed to the election of a Clerk, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Thomas J. Campbell.

Pending the consideration of this motion, Mr. Albert G. Brown, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the order heretofore passed by the House postponing the election of a Doorkeeper be, and the same is hereby, rescinded; and that the House of Representatives will proceed at once to the election of a Clerk and Doorkeeper for the Thirty-first Congress.

The Speaker[2] decided that the resolution was out of order, on the ground that the House could take no action upon or transact other business than the election of Clerk until such election is effected. Until a Clerk should be elected the House would not be organized.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. A. G. Brown appealed, and the question being put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The record of the debate[3] shows that the Speaker expressed the opinion that the House was not organized until a Clerk was elected.[4] In this case the Clerk had died, and the Journal on this morning was read by one of the subordinate officers of the late Clerk. Question as to this proceeding having been raised by Mr. Willard P. Hall, of Virginia, the Speaker said that the Journal had been prepared as usual under the direction of the Speaker. The Chair did not think that the death of the Clerk should prevent the reading or preparation of the Journal.[5]

238. The Clerk having resigned, the House elected his successor.

In the early days of the House two oaths were administered to the Clerk.

On December 9, 1800,[6] the Clerk having resigned, the House elected John Holt Oswald his successor. The oath to support the Constitution of the United States, together with the oath of office as prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths," were then administered by Mr. Speaker to the Clerk.[7]

239. The Clerk having resigned, the House, after some intervening business, elected his successor.—On Saturday, January 28, 1815,[8] the Speaker laid before the House a letter, addressed to the Speaker by the Clerk of the House, resigning the office of Clerk.

The letter was ordered to lie on the table.

On Monday, January 30, after business had proceeded for a time, it was

Resolved, That this House will proceed, on this day at 2 o'clock, to the appointment of a Clerk, in the room of Patrick Magruder, who has resigned that office.

Accordingly at 2 o'clock a ballot was taken, and it appears that Thomas Dougherty was duly elected.

On January 31 he gave his attendance and took the oath of office.

240. In 1860 the House decided that it might inform the Senate and President of its organization and election of a Speaker before it had elected a Clerk.—On February 1, 1860,[1] a Speaker had been elected, the oath had been administered to the Members and Delegates, and rules had been adopted. Thereupon Mr. Reuben E. Fenton, of New York, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that William Pennington, one of the Representatives from the State of New Jersey, has been chosen Speaker, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

Mr. William Smith, of Virginia, questioned the propriety of the resolution before the election of a Clerk.

After debate, in which it was stated that it had been the custom of the House to agree to similar resolutions before the election of Clerk, the Speaker[2] held that the practice of the House had been in accordance with the proposed action, and that there was no necessity that the notice should be delayed until the election of a Clerk. The present Clerk could communicate the message.

The resolution was accordingly agreed to. Then, also, a resolution of notification to the President was agreed to before the election of Clerk. After that the House proceeded to the election of Clerk.

241. By unanimous consent, in 1867, the House elected its Clerk by resolution.

In 1867 the law of 1789 was considered as binding the House to elect a Clerk before proceeding to business.

On March 4, 1867,[3] at the organization of the House, after the Speaker had been elected, and the oath had been administered to him and by him to the Members, resolutions were adopted for notifying the President and the Senate of the organization of the House. Then rules were adopted.

After this Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, presented a resolution that Edward McPherson, of Pennsylvania, be, and hereby is, elected Clerk.

The Speaker asked unanimous consent to the procedure of electing a Clerk by resolution, when Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, objected to the election of a Clerk at this time, on the ground that it had been understood that no other officers than the Speaker were to be elected this day.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, said that such had been the understanding, but a reference had shown that under the law no business could be transacted until the election of both a Speaker and Clerk.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Chair has ascertained that there are precedents on this subject. In the thirty-first Congress, when the Clerk died, the Speaker said that no business could be transacted until another Clerk was elected, because there was no officer to carry messages to the Senate.

Accordingly, there being no objection, the resolution was acted on and Mr. McPherson was elected.

On the succeeding day, and after business had intervened, the remaining officers were elected.

242. It has been decided that notwithstanding the requirements of the act of 1789, the House may proceed to business before the election of a Clerk.—On December 31, 1849,[2] after the election of Speaker, the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to the election of a Clerk and other officers on Thursday, the 3d day of January, 1850.

No choice of Clerk being effected on January 3, the Speaker held the order unfinished business on the 4th. On that day the further execution of the order was postponed until the 7th.

Then the House proceeded to the regular order of business provided in the rules, when Mr. Samuel W. Inge, of Alabama, rose to a question of privilege. The provisions of the act of 1789 required the Clerk of the House to be sworn before it was competent for the House to proceed to other business. He therefore moved that the House proceed to the election of a Clerk in compliance with the provisions of the said act.

The Speaker[3] decided that the House having by resolution fixed a day for the election of Clerk and other officers, the motion of Mr. Inge was out of order. The House had put its own construction on the point raised.

Mr. John L. Robinson, of Indiana, appealed, but Mr. Inge withdrew his motion, and the matter fell.

243. A question has arisen as to whether or not the House, in the face of the provision of law, may proceed to business before the election of a Clerk.—On February 1, 1860,[4] the House had elected a Speaker and adopted rules, but had not chosen a Clerk, when Mr. John S. Phelps, of Missouri, proposed to introduce a bill making appropriations to defray certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the bill could not be introduced at this time.

The Speaker[5] said:

The opinion of the Chair is that such business can not be transacted until after the election of a Clerk.[6]

[5] William Pennington, of New Jersey, Speaker.

[6] Mr. Phelps, who was the oldest Member of the House in the years of consecutive service, said, after the decision of the Speaker, that as the House had elected a Speaker, and under the provisions of the Constitution allowing it to make rules had adopted rules, and as among those rules was one continuing the present Clerk until another should be elected, it seemed clear to him that the House might proceed to business. He cared not what the law might be. The House might make rules overriding the law. (Globe, p. 656.)

244. A Speaker having been elected, the House has proceeded to legislative and other business before the election of a Clerk.

The Clerk of the former House continues to act as Clerk of the new House until his successor is elected.

An instance wherein certain officers of the former House continued to act through the new Congress, no successor being elected.

On December 22, 1849, the House, after a long contest, elected Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, Speaker.

On the next legislative day, December 24, the oath was administered to the Members of the House. Then, before any suggestion was made as to the election of other officers, a message was sent to the Senate informing that body that a quorum of the House had assembled, that Howell Cobb had been chosen Speaker, and that the House was ready to proceed to business. Then the appointment of the usual committee to join the Senate committee in notifying the President of the United States that a quorum had assembled and that Congress was ready to receive any communication was authorized.

A proposition was then made to adopt rules, but postponed. Seats were drawn and the hour of daily meeting was fixed. Then the message of the President was received and ordered printed.

On December 27 the rules of the preceding House were adopted temporarily, the President's message was read, and the committees were appointed.

Before the appointment of committees George W. Jones, of Tennessee, urged that under the act of 1789 the committees should not be appointed until a Clerk had been elected and sworn. And soon after Mr. James Thompson, of Pennsylvania, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to the election of Clerk and other officers on Thursday, the 3d of January, 1850.

On December 31 this resolution was agreed to. On this day, also, the House passed House bill No. 1, and ordered the Clerk (the Clerk of the last House, of course) to request the concurrence of the Senate.

Voting for Clerk began on January 3, and on January 4 was postponed until January 7, although a point of order was made that it was not competent for the House to proceed to other business until the Clerk had been elected. Then, on January 7, the House proceeded to vote for Clerk, and continued to do so until January 11, when Thomas J. Campbell was elected.

The House then proceeded to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms, but on January 14 suspended the voting by postponing the further execution of the order until the next day. Thereupon the House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

On January 15 a Sergeant-at-Arms was elected and the House next proceeded to the election of Doorkeeper. No choice resulting, after many trials, the House voted to postpone the further execution of the order for the election of officers until March 1, 1851, or until within two days of the end of the Congress. This motion was agreed to, and the Doorkeeper and Postmaster of the previous House continued in their positions by the acquiescence of the House.[1]

On March 3, 1851,[1] the last day of the session, the election of Doorkeeper was postponed indefinitely.

245. The House has held, notwithstanding the law of 1789, that it may adopt rules before electing a Clerk.—On February 1, 1860,[2] the Speaker was elected, and after he had taken the oath and had in turn administered the oath to the Members and Delegates, Mr. Israel Washburn, jr., of Maine, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-fifth Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered.

Mr. William G. Whiteley, of Delaware, made the point of order that after the election of Speaker nothing was in order but the election of Clerk. He quoted that passage of the law of 1789 which provides that the oath shall be administered "to the Clerk previous to entering on any other business."

The Speaker[3] overruled the point of order, stating that it had been the custom of the House to adopt its rules previous to the election of a Clerk.

246. The Clerk desiring to be away, the House gave him leave of absence.—On April 28, 1834,[4] a Member stated that the Clerk of the House had received news of the death of a member of his family, whereupon Ordered, That the Clerk have leave to be absent from the service of this House for four or five days.

247. On November 20, 1800,[5]

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House have leave to be absent from the service of the House for three weeks.

248. In the temporary absence of the Clerk the House has chosen a Clerk pro tempore.—On December 9, 1813,[6] Patrick Magruder, the Clerk to the House, being absent from indisposition, the House proceeded to the choice of a Clerk pro tempore, and George Magruder was unanimously chosen.

249. The House declined to interfere with the Clerk's power of removing his subordinates.—On December 31, 1833,[7] Mr. John Davis, of Massachusetts, called attention of the House to the removal from office by the Clerk of the House of Noah Fletcher, who had been an employee of the office since 1819. He presented a memorial from Fletcher, in which the latter said that he had been removed without cause, and appealed to the House to rectify the injustice. Mr. Davis offered this resolution:

Resolved, That Noah Fletcher was removed from his office of Assistant Clerk in this House without any sufficient cause, and ought to be immediately reinstated.

After debate, in the course of which it was urged that the Clerk, being responsible to the House, had the right to select his own assistants, the House, on January 13, 1834, laid the resolution on the table—yeas, 120; nays, 83.

250. There being a conflict of authority between the Clerk and another officer, the House investigated.—In 1841[1] a controversy occurred between the Clerk of the House and the Printer as to the power of the Clerk to control the binding of certain documents. The letter of the Clerk was presented to the House by the Speaker, and referred to a select committee, who investigated the subject.

251. The Clerk is required to note all questions of order and the decisions thereon, and print the record thereof as an appendix to the Journal.

It is the duty of the Clerk to print and distribute the Journal.

The Clerk attests and affixes the seal of the House to all writs, warrants, and subpoenas issued by order of the House.

The Clerk is required to certify to the passage of all bills and joint resolutions.

The Clerk makes or approves all contracts, etc., for labor, materials, etc., for the House.

The Clerk keeps account of disbursement of the contingent fund and the stationery accounts of Members.

The Clerk is required to pay the officers and employees of the House on the last secular day of each month.

Present form and history of section 3 of Rule III.

Section 3 of Rule III provides:

> He [the Clerk] shall note all questions of order, with the decisions thereon the record of which shall be printed as an appendix to the Journal of each session; and complete, as soon after the close of the session as possible, the printing and distribution to Members and Delegates of the Journal of the House, together with an accurate and complete index; retain in the library at his office, for the use of the Members and officers of the House, and not to be withdrawn therefrom, two copies of all the books and printed documents deposited there; send, at the end of each session, a printed copy of the Journal thereof to the executive and to each branch of the legislature of every State and Territory; preserve for and deliver or mail to each Member and Delegate an extra copy, in good binding, of all documents printed by order of either House of the Congress to which he belonged; attest and affix the seal[2] of the House to all writs, warrants, and subpoenas issued by order of the House; certify to the passage of all bills and joint resolutions; make or approve all contracts, bargains, or agreements relative to furnishing any matter or thing, or for the performance of any labor for the House of Representatives, in pursuance of law or order of the House; keep full and accurate accounts of the disbursements out of the contingent fund of the House; keep the stationery account of Members and Delegates, and pay them as provided by law. He shall pay to the officers and employees of the House of Representatives, the last day of each month, the amount of their salaries that shall be due them; and when the last day of the month falls on Sunday he shall pay them on the day next preceding.

This rule, except the last sentence, is as agreed on by the House at the time of the revision of 1880.[3] It was composed of seven of the former rules: Rule 14,

[2] This provision relating to the seal is from former Rule 8, providing that "all writs, warrants, and subpoenas issued by order of the House shall be under his [the Speaker's] hand and seal," and which dated from November 13, 1794 (Journal Third and Fourth Congresses, p. 229), and existed until the adoption of the present form in 1880.

dating from November 13, 1794,[1] and providing for distributing the Journals to the States; Rule 15, dating from December 23, 1811,[2] providing for noting decisions of order; Rule 16, dating from June 18, 1832,[3] and providing for sending the Journal to Members and Delegates; Rule 17, dating from December 22, 1826,[4] and providing for retaining books and documents in the Library; Rule 18, dating from February 9, 1831,[5] providing for sending bound volumes of documents to Members; Rule 20, dated June 18, 1832 [3] providing for an index to the acts of Congress; and Rule 21, dated January 30, 1846,[6] providing for the making and approval of contracts. The last sentence, relating to payment of officers and employees, dates from January 28, 1892.[7]

252. It is the duty of the Clerk to have printed and delivered to each Member a list of the reports required to be made to Congress.

Present form and history of section 2 of Rule III.

Section 2 of Rule III provides:

> He [the Clerk] shall make and cause to be printed and delivered to each Member, or mailed to his address at the commencement of every regular session of Congress, a list of the reports which it is the duty of any officer or Department to make to Congress, referring to the act or resolution and page of the volume of the laws or Journal in which it may be contained, and placing under the name of each officer the list of reports required of him to be made.

This rule dates from March 13, 1822.[8] On April 21, 1836,[9] a provision was added requiring the Clerk to make a weekly statement of business on the Speaker's table; but this was stricken out in the revision of 1890, when the change in the order of business had prevented an accumulation of business on the Speaker's table.

253. The statutes prescribe certain duties for the Clerk as to the organization of the House and the administration of its affairs.—Before the meeting of each Congress the Clerk makes up a roll of such Members as are shown by their credentials to be regularly elected.[10] If circumstances are such that the Clerk may not perform this duty, it devolves in succession upon the Sergeant-at-Arms, and then upon the Doorkeeper.[11]

Except when Congress is in session the Clerk certifies the pay certificates of Members.[12]

Reports of committees are preserved, bound, and indexed, and distributed under direction of the Clerk.[13] The Clerk is entitled to 10 cents for each 100 words of certified extracts from the Journal, except where such transcripts are required in connection with the duties of a Government office.[1] Printing and binding and the furnishing of blank books for the House are subject to the written order of the Clerk.[2] The distribution of certain documents to various homes for soldiers and sailors is made by the Clerk.[3]

On the first day of each session of Congress the Clerk submits to the House certain statements and reports the names, compensations, etc., of clerks and messengers of the House, and whether any of them may be dispensed with; an itemized statement of the expenditure of the contingent fund;[4] an exhibit of the sums drawn from the Treasury, and the balance remaining;[5] all the expenditures of the House at the end of each fiscal year;[6] a full and complete statement of his receipts and expenditures as Clerk[7] and an account of all property of the United States in his possession.[8]

The Clerk requires of the disbursing officers acting under him precise and analytical returns of the moneys expended, as a basis for an annual return to Congress.[9]

The Clerk, after advertisement for bids, contracts for the stationery for supplying the House, giving preference to domestic articles over foreign, providing such can be had on as satisfactory terms as imported articles.[10]

The Clerk may, with permission of the Joint Committee on the Library, have the use of the Library under the regulations that apply to Members.[11]

The Clerk disburses the pay of half of the Capitol Police.[12]

The Clerk is required to make contracts with the lowest bidder for packing boxes for use of the House.[13]

The Clerk gives a bond of $20,000.[14]

254. The custody and use of the seal is with the Clerk, under direction of the House.—On July 18, 1892,[15] Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, presented the following order, which was agreed to by the House:

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to affix the seal of the House of Representatives to the document entitled "The administration of the United States Government at the beginning of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America."

At the same time the House passed a joint resolution allowing the Secretary of State to affix the seal of the United States to the document, and also a concurrent resolution authorizing the President to accept the document for preservation among the archives.

255. On January 19, 1886,[1] the Committee on Rules of the Senate reported on the subject of the seal of the Senate. They found nothing in the Journals or archives of the Senate to throw any light on the history of the seal, although from private letters recently published it had been learned when and by whom it was made. The committee found that there was no authority on the subject of its use, and recommended the adoption of the following rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary shall have the custody of the great seal, and shall use the same for the authentication of process, transcripts, copies, and certificates whenever directed by the Senate.

256. The seal of the House is in the control of the House rather than of the Speaker.—On January IT, 1901,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of State requesting that an impression of the seal of the House of Representatives be furnished for the files of the State Department for purposes of reference for authentication.

The letter having been read, the Speaker[3] said:

The Chair thinks that this is a matter which should properly be done by order of the House, and therefore submits the draft of an order to be adopted by the House, in pursuance of the request of the State Department.

The order was then submitted by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to furnish to the Department of State, in accordance with the request transmitted to the House from that Department, an impression of the seal of the House of Representatives.

257. The Sergeant-at-Arms attends the sittings and under direction of the Speaker or Chairman of the Committee of the Whole maintains order.

By a rule, which is not adopted usually until a Speaker is elected, the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to preserve order under the direction of the Clerk pending the election of a Speaker or Speaker pro tempore.

The Sergeant-at-Arms executes the commands of the House and all of its processes directed to him by the Speaker.

The Sergeant-at-Arms disburses the pay and mileage of Members and Delegates.

Present form and history of section 1 of Rule IV.

Section I of Rule IV provides:

It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to attend the House and the Committee of the Whole, during their sittings, to maintain order under the direction of the Speaker or Chairman, and, pending the election of a Speaker or Speaker pro tempore, under the direction of the Clerk, execute the commands of the House, and all processes issued by authority thereof, directed to him by the Speaker, keep the accounts for the pay and mileage of Members and Delegates, and pay them as provided by law.

In the First Congress, on April 14, 1789,[4] this rule was adopted:

A Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed to hold office during the pleasure of the House, whose duty it shall be to attend the House during its sitting, to execute the commands of the House from time to time, and all such process, issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the Speaker. A proper symbol of office shall be provided for the Sergeant-at-Arms, of such form and device as the Speaker shall direct, which shall be borne by the Sergeant when in the execution of his office.

On April 4, 1838,[1] a rule was adopted providing that the Sergeant-at-Arms should keep the accounts of the pay and mileage and pay over the same to Members.

On March 3, 1877,[2] in order to meet difficulties that might occur at the organization of the House, a rule was adopted providing that the Sergeant-at-Arms should maintain order under direction of the Clerk when the latter should be presiding. There was much debate over this rule, Mr. James A. Garfield urging that the existing House might not make a rule binding on the next House; but at that time the House, by continuing an old rule of 1860, was perpetuating the theory that the rules of one House might bind the next.[3] At the time of the organization of a House this rule has not been adopted, and therefore its effect at that time is extremely doubtful.[4]

In the revision of 1880[5] the substance of the rule was retained, in somewhat different form. Only one change has' been made since 1880. In the revision of 1890[6] the new provision was added that the Sergeant-at-Arms should attend the Committee of the Whole also, and maintain order under direction of the Chairman. This was stricken out in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, but restored in the Fifty-fourth and has continued since as part of the rule.

258. The statutes as well as the rule define the duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms, especially with reference to the disbursements made by him.

The statutes place on the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses the duty of preserving the peace and security of the Capitol and the appointment and control of the Capitol police.

The act of October 1, 1890,[7] after enacting the provisions of House Rule IV in relation to the Sergeant-at-Arms, provides that the pay and mileage of Members and Delegates shall be paid at the Treasury on requisitions drawn by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and shall be disbursed by him; that he shall give bond to the United States in the sum of $50,000, no Member of Congress to be a surety on this bond; that he shall continue in office until his successor is elected and qualified; that at the commencement of each regular session he shall submit a statement of the sums drawn and disbursed by him; that there shall be employed by him in his office a deputy, a cashier, a paying teller, a bookkeeper, a messenger, a page, and a laborer, at certain fixed salaries; and that in the adjustment of his accounts the fiscal year shall extend to and include July 3.

On the first day of each regular session, and at the expiration of his term, he makes out a full and complete account of the Government property in his possession.[1]

In addition to his regular salary he receives no fees[2] or other emolument.

In case of a vacancy in the office of the Clerk, or absence or disability of the Clerk, the duties of that official in connection with the organization of a new House devolve on the Sergeant-at-Arms.[3]

In conjunction with the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate he makes regulations to preserve the peace and security of the Capitol from defacement and to protect the public property therein, and in connection with this authority is vested the power of arrest.[4]

With the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate he attends to the uniforming and equipping of the Capitol police.[5]

The captain and lieutenants of the Capitol police are selected jointly by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, and privates and watchmen are selected one-half by each of the two officials. The Clerk of the House disburses pay of one-half.[6]

259. The Sergeant-at-Arms receives no fees; and the Clerk receives them only for certified extracts of the Journal.—The statutes provide that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall receive no fees or other emoluments in addition to his regular salary.[7] The Clerk receives for certified extracts from the Journal 10 cents for each sheet containing 100 words.[8]

260. The Doorkeeper is required to enforce strictly the rules relating to the privileges of the Hall, and is responsible for the official conduct of his employees.

Present form and history of section 1 of Rule V.

Section 1 of Rule V provides:

> The Doorkeeper shall enforce strictly the rules relating to the privileges of the Hall, and be responsible to the House for the official conduct of his employees.

This is the exact form of the revision of 1880.[9] It was adopted from a portion of old rule No. 27, which was adopted at the suggestion of Mr. Abraham Rencher, of North Carolina, on March 1, 1838.[10]

261. The Doorkeeper has the custody of all the furniture, books, and public property in the committee and other rooms under his charge.

At the commencement and close of each session of Congress the Doorkeeper is required to make and submit to the House for examination by the Committee on Accounts an inventory of furniture, books, etc.

This is the form of rule adopted on January 27, 1880,[1] on the suggestion of Mr. Joseph R. Hawley, of Connecticut. The Committee on Rules had presented a slightly different form, derived from former Rule 27, which dated from March 2, 1865.[2]

On December 13, 1841,[3] Mr. George N. Briggs, of Massachusetts, offered this resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the office of Assistant Doorkeeper is not necessary for the service of this House, and that the same is hereby abolished.

262. The statutes impose on the Doorkeeper various duties in addition to those prescribed by the rules.

The Doorkeeper is required at stated times to return inventories of the Government property in his possession.

The Doorkeeper appoints superintendents to have charge of the folding and document rooms.

The Doorkeeper has general charge during the recess of the apartments occupied by the House.

The Doorkeeper has control of the messengers on the soldiers' roll.

On the first day of each regular session of Congress, and at the expiration of his term of service, the Doorkeeper makes out and returns to Congress a full account of all Government property in his possession.[4] During the recess he takes care, under the direction of the Clerk, of the apartments occupied by the House, and provides fuel and other accommodations for the coming session.[5] He also prevents the occupation of the rooms by unauthorized persons during the recess.[6] He sells waste paper, useless documents, and condemned furniture, covering the proceeds into the Treasury.[7]

In case of a vacancy in the offices of Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms, or disability or absence of both of those officials,[8] the Doorkeeper performs the duties of the Clerk in relation to making up the roll of Members.[9]

[9] The Doorkeeper (with the aid of his appointees, viz, the superintendents of the "folding room" and "document room," messengers, pages, folders, and laborers) discharges various duties which are not enumerated in the rules or laws, viz, he announces at the door of the House all messages from the President, etc.; keeps the doors of the House; folds and distributes extra documents; furnishes Members with printed copies of bills, reports, and other documents; conveys messages from Members; keeps the Hall, galleries, and committee rooms in order, etc.

There is a folding room of the House under charge of a superintendent appointed by the Doorkeeper, and each Member is notified once in every sixty days of the number and character of publications on hand assigned to him.[1]

The Doorkeeper may assign one folder to do clerical work under the direction of the foreman of the folding room.[2]

The House document room is in charge of a superintendent appointed by the Doorkeeper, who also appoints the assistant.[3]

Janitors of committees are under direction of the Doorkeeper.[4]

The statutes provide for fourteen messengers on the soldiers' roll,[5] under the control of the Doorkeeper, at $1,200 salary each, and such soldiers are not subject to removal except for cause, with the approval of the House.[6]

On March 2, 1872, after a discussion as to disabled soldiers on the roll of the House, a resolution was adopted, on motion of Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, advising the officers of the House to retain disabled soldiers in preference to civilians.[7]

On June 29, 1870, the House instructed the Doorkeeper to retain in service during recess the crippled soldiers carried on the roll.[8]

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, related the history of the soldiers' roll, it having been organized by resolution in 1867 and made permanent by law in the Forty-fourth Congress.[9]

263. The House having decided to postpone the election of a Doorkeeper, the Doorkeeper of the former House was held to continue in the office until his successor should be elected.

The House having postponed the election of an officer until a day certain, a resolution to proceed to the election was held not in order before that date.

A question as to whether or not a resolution placing the duties of one officer of the House on another involves a question of privilege.—Speaker overruled.

On January 19, 1850,[10] before a Doorkeeper had been elected, the House postponed until the 1st day of March, 1851, the further execution of the order of the House providing for the election of officers.

Thereupon Mr. John H. Savage, of Tennessee, rising to a question of privilege, made the point that Robert E. Horner, Doorkeeper of the last House, who continued to act in that capacity, was not Doorkeeper, and objected to his continuing in that capacity.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair has hitherto declined to give any opinion in relation to the effect of the motion to postpone the election of officers, and has referred the House to its own previous practice. During preceding sessions of Congress, when the elections have not been postponed to so late a day as at the present, and during the present session, the duties of Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, have been performed by the old officers and the House has acquiesced. It is not for the Chair peremptorily to decide that these individuals are not officers of the House; it is a question for the decision of the House itself.

On the succeeding legislative day, January 21, Mr. Armistead Burt, of South Carolina, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That this House, having postponed until the 1st day of March, 1851, the election of Doorkeeper, the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House shall perform the duties of Doorkeeper until the Doorkeeper shall be elected.

Mr. George Ashmun, of Massachusetts, objected to this resolution, on the ground that the gentleman from South Carolina was not entitled to the floor to offer the resolution, and also that it contemplated a change in the rules of the House relating to the duties of the officers.

The Speaker said:

The House, by a vote on Saturday last, postponed the further execution of the order of the House in relation to the election of officers until the 1st of March, 1851. Until that time has arrived, in the opinion of the Chair, as expressed several times, it will not be in order to proceed to the election of officers; but it will be in order for the House to appoint temporary officers or persons who shall discharge the duties of those officers. The position occupied by the Doorkeeper and Postmaster is, in the opinion of the Chair, this: They were elected by the House of Representatives of the last Congress. Under the practice of former Congresses, from the First Congress down to the present time, the old officers of the previous Congress have continued to discharge the duties of the respective offices until their successors should have been elected. And the Chair thinks that the officers of the last House can continue to discharge the duties of these offices in the present House until their successors shall have been elected, holding their offices in the interval by the sufferance of the House.[2] But the House can at any time provide other persons to discharge these duties. They are not the regularly elected officers of this House and they hold their offices at the sufferance and by the will of the House. This being the state of the case, and the question being one affecting the organization of the House, the Chair decides that it is a question of privilege.

Mr. Ashmun having appealed, the appeal was debated at length, and the decision of the Chair was finally reversed, yeas 101, nays 102. So the resolution proposed by Mr. Burt was not received.

Mr. Horner continued to act as Doorkeeper.

264. An officer of the House having resigned, the House voted to proceed to the election of his successor.—On December 7, 1868,[3] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from C. E. Lippincott, resigning his position as Doorkeeper of the House, said resignation to take effect this day.

The letter having been read, Mr. William H. Kelsey, of New York, offered as a question of privilege the following:

Resolved, That this House now proceed to the election of a Doorkeeper in place of Charles E. Lippincott, resigned.

[2] Again, on January 24, 1850, the Speaker reaffirmed this ruling. (See Globe, p. 224.)

[3] Third session Fortieth Congress, Journal, p. 14; Globe, p. 12.

The resolution was agreed to, and the House proceeded to vote viva voce.

265. On December 4, 1832,[1] the House—

Resolved, That this House will, on Thursday next, at 12.30 o'clock, proceed to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John O. Dunn.

On the appointed day four ballots were taken without an election and the House adjourned to December 10. On that day the balloting was resumed without a vote so to do, and after five ballotings Thomas B. Randolph, of Virginia, was elected.

The oath was administered to him by the Speaker and he assumed the duties of the office.

266. The death of the Doorkeeper being announced, the House voted to proceed to the election of his successor at a future day.

In 1838 the House adjourned to attend the funeral of its Doorkeeper.

On March 22, 1838,[2] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication:

MARCH 22, 1838.

SIR: It becomes my duty to communicate to you, and through you to the House of Representatives, that a vacancy has occurred in the office of Doorkeeper of the House by the decease of Overton Carr, esq., which took place on Tuesday night, the 20th of March, 1838.

Your obedient servant,

J. W. HUNTER,
Assistant Doorkeeper.

Hon. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The communication having been read, on motion of Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, it was—

Resolved, That the House will adjourn at 4 o'clock this afternoon to attend the funeral of their deceased Doorkeeper, Overton Carr; that the expenses thereof be defrayed out of the contingent fund and that his widow be paid the salary of the deceased for the present session of Congress.

On March 23, Mr. Thomas M. T. McKennan, of Pennsylvania, by leave, submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That this House will proceed, on Monday next, at 2 o'clock, to the election of a principal Doorkeeper to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Overton Carr.

After debate, this resolution was postponed until April 1, in order that the Committee on Accounts might have time to make a report on a subject already committed to them relating to the Doorkeeper's office.

On April 5 the resolution came up for consideration, and the House proceeded to the election of a Doorkeeper.

267. The vacancy caused by the death of the Doorkeeper was, after several days, filled by the House by election.—On March 18, 1902,[3] Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That Frank B. Lyon, of the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Hon. W. J. Glenn.

The death of Mr. Glenn had been announced to the House on March 12.[1] No temporary appointment was made, nor was any provision made for temporary discharge of the duties in the interim.

268. The Sergeant-at-Arms having resigned, the House instructed the Doorkeeper to perform the duties of the office until the beginning of the next session of Congress.—On June 26, 1832,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from J. O. Dunn, Sergeant-at-Arms, resigning the office, and surrendering his books and papers.

The letter, which appears in full in the Journal, was read and referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The House then voted that the Doorkeeper perform the duties of Sergeant-at-Arms until the beginning of the next session of Congress.

269. Creation of the office of Postmaster.—On April 5, 1838,[3] it was—

Resolved, That William J. McCormick be appointed Postmaster to this House.

270. The Postmaster superintends the post-office in the Capitol and is responsible for the prompt and safe delivery of mail.

Present form and history of Rule VI.

Rule VI provides:

The Postmaster shall superintend the post-office kept in the Capitol for the accommodation of Representatives, Delegates, and officers of the House, and be held responsible for the prompt and safe delivery of their mail.

This is the form adopted in the revision of 1880.[4] It is similar to the old rule No. 28, which dated from April 4, 1838. [5] Immediately after the organization of the Government a room was set apart in the Capitol for the reception and distribution of letters and packets, without an order for that purpose, and was called a post-office.[6] It was superintended by the Doorkeeper and his assistants. On April 9, 1814, the Doorkeeper was authorized to appoint a Postmaster, and an allowance was made to meet the expenses of the office.[7] This arrangement continued until the rule of 1838.[8]

"10. Resolved, That the Doorkeeper shall hire, at the lowest price for which it can be had, a suitable number of horses for the transportation and distribution of the mail of the House to and from the postoffice, and to the lodgings of the Members, and for such other necessary business as may be from time to time required; and he shall superintend the faithful performance of the duties of the messengers employed in this service, and shall report to the Clerk of the House a statement of the persons employed, and the terms of the contract, which shall be reported to the Committee of Accounts; and the Doorkeeper, or other officer of the House, shall not be directly or indirectly interested in any such contract or undertaking."

271. The Postmaster accounts for the Government property in his possession.—The statutes make it the duty of the Postmaster to make out a full and complete account of all the property of the Government in his possession on the first day of each regular session and at the expiration of his term of service.[1]

272. The Chaplain opens each day's sitting with prayer.

Present form and history of Rule VII.

Rule VII provides:

The Chaplain shall attend at the commencement of each day's sitting of the House and open the same with prayer.[2]

This rule dates from the revision of 1880,[3] although there had been a Chaplain from the very first years of Congress, and before in the Continental Congress also.[4]

273. Although in earlier years the Chaplain was not strictly an officer of the House, his election was held to constitute a question of privilege.— On March 5, 1860.[5] Mr. John S. Millson, of Virginia, having proposed to submit, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to-morrow, at 1 o'clock p.m., to elect a Chaplain, who shall officiate, during the present Congress, alternately with the Chaplain already elected by the Senate.

Mr. George S. Houston, of Alabama, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege, as the Chaplain was not an officer of the House, the Thirty-fifth Congress having been organized without one, and that neither the law nor the Constitution required the election of such an officer.

The Speaker,[6] in rendering his decision, said that he had looked into the precedents, and found that they were in favor of the question being considered privileged. Therefore he overruled the point of order.

Mr. Houston having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.[7]

274. The practice of electing a Chaplain was suspended during the Thirty-fifth Congress.—On December 10, 1857,[8] after a parliamentary struggle of considerable intensity, the following preamble and resolutions, submitted by Mr. James F. Dowdell, of Alabama, were agreed to:

Whereas the people of these United States, from their earliest history to the present time, have been led by the hand of a kind Providence and are indebted for the countless blessings of the past and the present and dependent for continued prosperity in the future upon Almighty God; and whereas the great vital and conservative element in our system is the belief of our people in the pure doctrines and divine truths of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, it eminently becomes the representatives of a people so highly favored to acknowledge in the most public manner their reverence for God: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the daily sessions of this body be opened with prayer.

Resolved, That the ministers of the Gospel in this city are hereby requested to attend and alternately perform this solemn duty.[1]

275. The Chaplain was not originally an officer of the House; but has been such for many years.—December 4, 1817, the House concurred in Senate resolution for appointing two chaplains of Congress, one by each House, who should interchange weekly. This was in accordance with the old custom.[2]

276. On December 10, 1845,[3] a question was raised as to the practice which had prevailed for many years of the House and Senate by concurrent action providing for the election of two different chaplains of two different denominations to officiate, one over the Senate and the other over the House. The usual resolution was agreed to, however.

277. On December 6, 1853,[4] a change was made in the practice of electing chaplains for a single session, and the House sent to the Senate a concurrent resolution providing for their election for the Congress. The nature of the office was not changed otherwise, the practice of authorizing two chaplains, of different denominations, one to be elected by the House and the other by the Senate, continuing. This authorization was by a concurrent resolution.

Resolved (the Senate concurring), That two chaplains be elected, one by the Senate and the other by the House of Representatives; and that they officiate alternately during the present Congress.

278. On February 5, 1856,[5] in accordance with the custom of Congress from very early times, the Senate passed the usual concurrent resolution providing for two chaplains of different denominations, one to be elected by each House. The House, which had not completed its organization, did not act on this resolution at this time; but on February 21 it elected a Chaplain of its own for the session. On April 24 the concurrent resolution of the Senate was laid on the table.

279. On December 22. 1856,[6] the House proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on its own account without reference to the usual concurrent resolution from the Senate.

280. At first the Chaplain did not take the oath prescribed for the officers of the House.—On July 5, 1861,[7] the House elected its Chaplain without reference to the Senate, but the Chaplain evidently did not take the oath taken by the regularly constituted officers of the House.

[1] In this Congress a considerable number of remonstrances had been received from citizens who objected to the employment of chaplains by the Government, either in the Army, the Navy, or Congress, on the ground that such employment conflicted with the spirit of the Constitution and tended to promote a union of church and state. The debate indicates that this method, while a departure from the usage of the House from the First Congress, had probably been suggested by the way in which the Washington clergy had officiated during the prolonged struggle over the organization of the previous House. In 1854 (Report No. 124, first session, Thirty-third Congress), a committee of the House examined generally the standing of chaplains in Government positions.

282. On December 15, 1863,[2] the Chaplain appears to have been sworn for the first time. He then took the new "test oath," so called, provided for by the act of July 2, 1862.

283. The statutes provide for the defense of any person against whom an action is brought for acts done while an officer of either House in the discharge of his duty.—In cases of action brought against any person for acts done by him while an officer of either House in the discharge of his official duty the district attorney for the district within which the action is brought shall enter appearance, and the defense shall be conducted under the direction of the Attorney-General.[3]

Chapter VII

REMOVAL OF OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

284. A proposition to remove an officer of the House for misconduct is a question of privilege.—On August 3, 1854,[2] Mr. Theodore G. Hunt, of Louisiana, submitted, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That John W. Forney, the Clerk of this House, by directing and causing to be made the alteration of the House bill No. 342, entitled "An act to aid the construction of a railroad to the Territory of Minnesota," and mentioned in the report of the special committee of this House, has falsified a record of this House in violation of the parliamentary law and of his sworn duty, and that the said J. W. Forney, Clerk of the House of Representatives, should be, and is hereby, removed from the office of Clerk of this House.

Mr. David T. Disney, of Ohio, made the point of order that this resolution was not privileged.

The Speaker[3] said:

The Chair overrules the question of order which has been raised by the gentleman from Ohio. In the opinion of the Chair the question of the gentleman from Louisiana is a question of privilege.

The question being taken on the resolution, it was disagreed to—yeas, 18; nays, 154.

285. On April 18, 1850,[4] Mr. Albert G. Brown, of Mississippi, presented this resolution:

Resolved, That Robert E. Homer, acting Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, be, and he is hereby, discharged.

The Speaker[5] decided that this resolution presented the precise question which was decided by the House on a former occasion not to be a privileged question, or a question of privilege; and, in conformity with that decision, he ruled it out of order.

[5] Howell Cobb, of Georgia, Speaker.

Mr. Brown having appealed, Mr. Orin Fowler, of Massachusetts, moved to lay the appeal on the table.

On this motion there were yeas 80, nays 85. So the House declined to lay the appeal on the table.

The appeal being open to debate, Mr. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, commented on the fact that the House, by declining to lay the appeal on the table, had indicated a purpose to overrule the Chair. But at the conclusion of Mr. Toombs's remarks Mr. Brown withdrew the appeal and the resolution in order to present the subject to the House in a different form.

286. It being alleged that the Clerk was guilty of official misconduct, a resolution removing him from office was presented and entertained. On January 21, 1815,[1] Mr. James Clarke, of Kentucky, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That Patrick Magruder, Clerk to the House of Representatives, be removed from office; that this House will, on Monday next, proceed to the election of a Clerk.

On January 23 the resolution was considered, the objections to the Clerk relating to his alleged neglect of proper administration of the contingent fund at the time of the destruction of the Capitol.

On a motion to postpone the further consideration of the resolution one week there were ayes 71, noes 71, whereupon the Speaker voted with the ayes.

On January 28, the Clerk resigned.

287. The House by resolution dismissed its Clerk, who had been found guilty of misappropriation of public funds.

The House has requested the executive authority to prosecute one of the officers of the House.

For misappropriation of funds the House arrested its Clerk and arraigned him at the bar.

The Clerk being arraigned to answer charges, leave was given him to address the House.

The Clerk being arraigned, and addressing the House in his defense, the Journal merely records the fact.

Pending examination of the Clerk on a charge of misappropriation of funds, he was suspended from the exercise of his functions.

The Clerk being incapacitated, the House authorized the Chief Assistant Clerk to attest a warrant and exercise the other functions of the Clerk.

The Speaker has authority to issue a warrant of arrest only by order of the House.

On January 17, 1845.[2] Mr. William Taylor, of Virginia, from the Committee on Accounts, made a report, showing a misappropriation of the funds of the House by the Clerk, and recommending the following:

Resolved, That Caleb J. McNulty be, and he is hereby, dismissed from the office of Clerk of this House.

[1] Third session Thirteenth Congress, Journal, pp. 682, 684 (Gales and Seaton ed.); annals, pp. 1085, 1100.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to institute forthwith the necessary legal proceedings to ascertain and secure the balance of the public moneys due from Caleb J. McNulty, as Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause criminal prosecutions to be commenced against Caleb J. McNulty, late Clerk of this House, for an embezzlement of the public money, and all persons advising or knowingly and willingly participating in such embezzlement, according to the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 13, 1841.

It was objected that the action proposed by the committee was too summary, and Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed forthwith to arrest Caleb J. McNulty, Clerk of this House, and bring him before the House.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, expressing doubts as to the power of the House to arrest for a criminal offense, proposed an amendment to provide for summoning the Clerk before the House.

After debate this amendment was disagreed to, and the resolution was agreed to as offered by Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Adams then made the point that a warrant was necessary, and the Speaker [1] said he considered that the Chair had no authority to issue the warrant except by the order of the House. The point was also made that the rules required a warrant to be attested by the Clerk. Accordingly, by suspension of the rules, the following was adopted:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue his warrant for the arrest of Caleb J. McNulty, in accordance with the resolution of this day; and that the Chief Assistant Clerk attest the warrant under the seal of this House.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was then furnished with the Speaker's warrant in accordance with the foregoing resolution and proceeded to execute the order of the House.

On the same day the Sergeant-at-Arms came in with Caleb J. McNulty, Clerk of the House of Representatives, in his custody, when the House proceeded to the consideration of the report and resolutions from the Committee on Accounts.

On motion of Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, leave was given Caleb J. McNulty to address the House in his own defense.

The Speaker addressed Mr. McNulty as follows:

By the order of the House I am directed to state to you that you are required to appear before the House on sundry charges contained in a report made by the Committee on Accounts this morning, and the House will now hear what you have to say in defense against these charges. In order that you may be correctly informed of the charges reported by the committee, they will now be read to you.

The report and resolutions were read accordingly.

Mr. McNulty then addressed the House.[2] denying that he had misappropriated any funds of the House as charged in the report.

Mr. Cave Johnson then proposed the following:

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Accounts, in regard to Caleb J. McNulty, Clerk of the House, be postponed until to-morrow, at 2 o'clock p. m.; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms hold said C. J. McNulty in custody until the further order of this House.

---

[1] John W. Jones, of Virginia, Speaker.

[2] The Journal gives only the statement 6f this fact and does not give his defense.

Mr. David L. Seymour, of New York, moved that the resolution be amended by striking out all thereof which directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to hold Mr. McNulty in custody.

This amendment was agreed to, yeas 99, nays 76.

Mr. Armistead Burt, of South Carolina, then moved the following amendment:

And that in the meantime the exercise of his functions as Clerk of this House be, and they hereby are, suspended, and that they be performed by B. B. French, the Chief Clerk.

This amendment having been acquiesced in by the House, the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On January 18 the consideration of the report of the Committee on Accounts was considered, and the three resolutions were severally agreed to, by the following votes: 196 to 0; affirmatively without call of the roll; 173 to 4.

Then, the rules requiring viva voce election being suspended, the following resolution was agreed to:

Resolved, That Benjamin B. French be, and he is hereby, appointed Clerk of this House.

Mr. French thereupon appeared, and the Speaker administered to him the oaths of his office.

288. Because of the misconduct of the incumbent, the office of Doorkeeper has been declared vacant, and the duties have devolved upon the Sergeant-at-Arms.

A matter affecting the character of an officer of the House involves a question of privilege.

On May 22, 1876,[1] Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolutions of the House of the 13th and 16th instant, in relation to the Doorkeeper and the consolidation of the offices of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, submitted a report thereon in writing, accompanied by the following resolutions:

1. That the office of Doorkeeper be vacated by its present incumbent.
2. That the duties of Doorkeeper be, and the same are hereby, devolved upon the Sergeant-atArms until otherwise ordered.

The resolutions were severally agreed to.[2]

289. On February 1, 1878,[3] Mr. John H. Baker, of Indiana, rising to a question of privilege, made certain charges against J. W. Polk, the Doorkeeper of the House, and moved a preamble reciting the charges, which were of corruption in office, and the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into the several matters and things so as aforesaid alleged against said Doorkeeper, and to report at any time to this House whether said Doorkeeper is guilty of any of said alleged acts; and the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers.

[2] This action was the result of a resolution presented to the House on May 13, as a question of privilege, charges against the Doorkeeper having appeared in a newspaper. The Speaker pro tempore [Mr. Cox] held that the resolution, affecting the character of an officer of the House, was a question of privilege. (Journal, p. 948; Record, p. 3066.)

[3] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal, pp. 339, 358, 783, 792–796; Record, pp. 707, 744, 2209, 2285–2287.

On February 4 Mr. Charles C. Ellsworth, of Michigan, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, which seems to have been admitted as such, presented the statement of the Doorkeeper in reference to the charges, and the same was referred to the committee having the matter in charge.

On April 2 the House proceeded to consider the report of the committee, which recommended the following:

Resolved, That the position of Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and hereby is, declared vacant; and Further resolved, That until the appointment of a new Doorkeeper, the duties of the office be, and hereby are, devolved upon the Sergeant-at-Arms.

On April 4 the first resolution was agreed to—-yeas 139, nays 80. Then the second resolution was agreed to—yeas 122, nays 114.

290. A report from the Committee on Accounts having impeached the integrity of the Doorkeeper, the House removed him.

A motion to proceed to the election of an officer is privileged; but it is not so with a resolution naming a certain person to fill the office.

On May 17, 1858,[1] the House considered a report from the Committee on Accounts, charging the Doorkeeper of the House with irregularities in his office, and offering to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That R. B. Hackney, the Doorkeeper of the present House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, dismissed forthwith from that office.

After debate, this resolution was agreed to—yeas 141, nays 34.

Mr. John B. Haskins, of New York, then proposed, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That Darius Truesdell, of New York, be, and he is hereby, appointed Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, for the Thirty-fifth Congress.

Mr. Thomas S. Babcock, of Virginia, made the point of order that it was not a question of privilege to move to appoint a particular person Doorkeeper, but that it would be in order to move to proceed to the election of Doorkeeper.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order.

The House thereupon voted that on the succeeding day it would proceed to the election of a Doorkeeper, and that until an election should be effected the Sergeant at-Arms should take charge of the property in the office of the Doorkeeper.

291. For permitting a Member under arrest to escape, the Doorkeeper was arraigned at the bar of the House.

An officer of the House being arraigned for neglect of duty, it was voted that he might answer orally.

The Journal recorded the substance of the oral answer of an officer of the House arraigned at the bar for neglect of duty.

On June 6, 1860,[3] during proceedings to obtain the attendance of absent Members, under a call of the House, the arrest of absent Members was ordered, and the doors were closed.

Pending these proceedings, Mr. John Hickman, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be called before the bar of the House to answer for the escape of Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, from the floor of the House after he was brought before the House under its warrant.

Mr. Hickman having stated that Mr. Stanton had escaped, the resolution was agreed to.

The Doorkeeper thereupon appeared at the bar of the House, when a question was raised by Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, as to the mode of response. He held that under immemorial custom the Doorkeeper had no right to address the House, but must present his answer in writing. He was brought before the House in contempt of the House, like a witness.

The question was put to the House, and the House voted that the Doorkeeper should answer orally. The Journal has this entry:

The Doorkeeper appeared at the bar of the House, and the question having been submitted to the House, "Will the House receive a verbal answer?" and decided in the affirmative, he stated "that Mr. Stanton had passed out at one of the side doors, which was in charge of one of the messengers, in company with certain Members who had temporary leave of absence, and that he had censured the messenger for permitting Mr. Stanton to pass without leave."

292. Charges against the Postmaster being sustained, his office was declared vacant and his assistant was directed to perform the duties temporarily.

The resignation of the Postmaster was laid before the House while a resolution of dismissal was pending, and was disregarded.

On September 25, 1890,[1] the House agreed to a resolution directing the Committee on Accounts to investigate the conduct of the Postmaster of the House.

On October 1 that committee reported at length, recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the office of Postmaster of the House of Representatives be, and the same is hereby, declared vacant; and that the Assistant Postmaster of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to perform the duties of Postmaster until a Postmaster shall be elected and duly qualified.

This resolution was agreed to.[2]

The report of the committee, but not the testimony, appears in full in the Journal, apparently without any special order.

293. The late Sergeant-at-Arms having announced a deficit in his office, the House authorized investigation by a select committee.—On December 9, 1889,[3] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from J. P. Leedom, late Sergeant-at-Arms, announcing that the late cashier of the office had departed without settling his accounts, and that there was a deficit in the cash.

[2] Shortly before the action of the House on this resolution te resignation of the Postmaster was laid before the House and read. No action was taken on it. (Record, p. 10785.) A Postmaster was elected December 10, 1890 (second session Fifty-first Congress, Journal, p. 42), the election being effected by the adoption of a resolution, which was presented as privileged.

Thereupon the House by resolution directed the appointment of a select committee to examine the accounts of the office.

294. Certain charges being made against an officer of the House, he petitioned for an investigation.—On August 26, 1789,[1] a petition was presented from Joseph Wheaton, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, praying that an inquiry might be made into certain charges exhibited against him in an anonymous letter addressed to the Speaker.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.[2]

295. A newspaper charge against the Clerk was, at the request of that officer, investigated by the House.

The report of an investigating committee exonerating the Clerk was printed in full in the Journal.

On May 18, 1876,[3] the Clerk of the House asked the House by a letter laid before the House by the Speaker to order an investigation into a charge made by a newspaper that he had corruptly used his power in appointing subordinates in his department. The House ordered the investigation. The report[4] exonerating the Clerk was submitted on June 27 and was printed in full in the Journal, apparently without special order of the House.

296. A candidate for the office of Secretary of the Senate was allowed to address the Senate in explanation of certain charges.

On December 19, 1831,[5] as the Senate was about to reelect its Secretary, Walter Lowrie, a charge was made that Mr. Lowrie had betrayed executive secrets of the Senate. Thereupon, by unanimous consent, Mr. Lowrie was permitted to address the Senate in his own defense.

Chapter VIII.

THE ELECTORS AND APPORTIONMENT.

297. The electors choosing Members of the House must have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

The House is composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

Section 2 of Article I of the Constitution provides:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

298. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.—Section 1 of Article XIV of the Constitution provides:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

[1] Rare instances of rejection of votes of persons qualified under the suffrage laws of the State. (Sec. 451 of this volume and 865 of Vol. II.) Refusal of the House to follow this precedent. (Sec. 879 of Vol. II.)

299. The rights of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.—The fifteenth amendment to the Constitution provides:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.[1]

300. The right of soldiers, sailors, and marines to exercise the privilege of suffrage is not abridged by Federal law.—Section 5532 of the Revised Statutes, dating from February 25, 1865, provides:

Every person convicted of any of the offenses specified in the five preceding sections [of the Revised Statutes] shall, in addition to the punishments therein severally prescribed, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the United States; but nothing in those sections shall be construed to prevent any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to the laws of the State in which he offers to vote.

301. The Constitution provides that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, excluding Indians not taxed.

The reduction of its representation is the penalty for a denial of the right to vote by a State.

No penalty is fixed for a denial of the right of suffrage because of rebellion or other crimes.

The enumeration to fix the basis of representation is to be made once in every ten years.

The number of Representatives may not exceed one for every thirty thousand inhabitants, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

[1] On February 24, 1881 (third session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, pp. 2020–2023), in the House Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, discussed suffrage with reference to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, and with references to the decisions in the cases of Minor v. Happersett (21 Wallace, R.) and United States v. Reese (92 U. S., 214) and Cole's case.

The subjects of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution were discussed elaborately in the Senate in 1879 on a resolution introduced by Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont. (Third session Forty-fifth Congress.)

On January 30, 1879, Mr. Morgan, of Alabama, discussed with Mr. Edmunds the question of citizenship under the Constitution. (Record, p. 847.) Also question of suffrage (Record, pp. 847–957) and the power of Congress over voting at State elections (p. 848) and to punish in cases where right to vote is denied on account of race, color, etc. (p. 885); on Federal election laws to protect suffrage and the respect in which they had failed (pp. 958, 959) through rulings of the Supreme Court; as to qualifications of voters and fixing the times, places, and manner (pp. 960, 961, 997); times, places, and manner (pp. 997, 998, 999); Messrs. Edmunds and Whyte discussed the power of Congress to provide penalties for violation of laws as to time, place, and manner (p. 999). Mr. Whyte's history of Congress's interference as to time, place, and manner, beginning with 1842 (p. 999). Discussion by Messrs. Edmunds and Whyte as to the constitutionality of the act of July 14, 1870, by which supervisors of election were appointed (p. 1000). Resolutions of Messrs. Edmunds and Morgan as to voters of the States and voters of the United States (pp. 342, 567).

The Supreme Court has also discussed the fifteenth amendment in several decisions.

The first apportionment was fixed by the Constitution.

Section 2 of Article XIV of the Constitution provides—

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers,[1] counting the whole number of persons[2] in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.[3] But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

[2] The Constitution also provides for ascertaining this number of persons by a census every ten years. The last census was taken in 1900.

302. The apportionment of Representatives to the several States under the act of 1901.

From March 3, 1903, the membership of the House was fixed at 386.

The representation of a newly admitted State is in addition to the total number of Representatives fixed by the act of 1901.

The act of January 16, 1901,[1] made the following provisions as to apportionment:

That after the third day of March, nineteen hundred and three, the House of Representatives shall be composed of three hundred and eighty-six members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, nine; Arkansas, seven; California, eight; Colorado, three; Connecticut, five; Delaware, one; Florida, three; Georgia, eleven; Idaho, one; Illinois, twenty-five; Indiana, thirteen; Iowa, eleven; Kansas, eight; Kentucky, eleven; Louisiana, seven; Maine, four; Maryland, six; Massachusetts, fourteen; Michigan, twelve; Minnesota, nine; Mississippi, eight; Missouri, sixteen; Montana, one; Nebraska, six; Nevada, one; New Hampshire, two; New Jersey, ten; New York, thirty-seven; North Carolina, ten; North Dakota, two; Ohio, twenty-one; Oregon, two; Pennsylvania, thirty-two; Rhode Island, two; South Carolina, seven; South Dakota, two; Tennessee, ten; Texas, sixteen; Utah, one; Vermont, two; Virginia, ten; Washington, three; West Virginia, five; Wisconsin, eleven; and Wyoming, one.

SEC. 2. That whenever a new State is admitted to the Union the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be in addition to the number three hundred and eighty-six.[2]

303. The apportionment act provides that Representatives shall be elected in districts composed of contiguous and compact territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants.

The districts in a State shall be equal to the number of its Representatives, no one district electing more than one Representative.

The act of January 16, 1901,[1] in providing for the apportionment, has the following:

SEC. 3. That in each State entitled under this apportionment, the number to which such State may be entitled in the Fifty-eighth and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed

[3] Section 2 of Article I of the Constitution provided originally for the apportionment, but a portion of it has been superseded by section 2 of Article XIV. Section 2 of Article I is as follows, with the portion which has been superseded indicated by brackets:

[Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.] The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

On May 3, 1832 (first session Twenty-second Congress, Report No. 463), the conferees made a report of disagreement between the House and Senate as to an apportionment bill, which reviewed at length the proceedings as to prior apportionments. Later reports have also made reviews of this nature, notably House Report No. 2130, second session Fifty-sixth Congress.

[2] Thus, Oklahoma has been admitted by act of June 16, 1906, with five Members additional to the number provided in this act.

of contiguous and compact territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants. The said districts shall be equal to the number of the Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

Provisions similar, but not identical, are found in previous apportionment acts.

304. The apportionment of 1901 provided for the election of Representatives in old districts and at large until the respective States should have rearranged the districts.—The act of January 16, 1901,[1] in providing for the apportionment, has the following:

SEC. 4. That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives which may be given to any State under this apportionment such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large, and the other Representatives by the districts now prescribed by law until the legislature of such State, in the manner herein prescribed, shall redistrict such State; and if there be no increase in the number of Representatives from a State the Representatives thereof shall be elected from the districts now prescribed by law until such State be redistricted as herein prescribed by the legislature of said State; and if the number hereby provided for shall in any State be less than it was before the change hereby made, then the whole number to such State hereby provided for shall be elected at large, unless the legislatures of said States have provided or shall otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the next election of Representatives therein.

Provisions similar, but not identical, are found in previous apportionment acts.

305. A legislative proposition, presented in obedience to a mandatory provision of the Constitution, was held to involve a question of privilege.—On January 3, 1901,[2] Mr. Marlin E. Olmstead, of Pennsylvania, presented, as involving a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Whereas the continued enjoyment of full representation in this House by any State which has, for reasons other than participation in rebellion or other crime, denied to any of the male inhabitants thereof being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, Presidential electors, and other specified officers is in direct violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that in such case "the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which such male citizens bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State," and is an invasion of the rights and dignity of this House and of its Members and an infringement upon the rights and privileges in this House of other States and their Representatives; and

Whereas since the last apportionment the States of Mississippi, South Carolina, and Louisiana have, by changes in the constitutions and statutes of said States, and for reasons other than participation in rebellion or other crime, denied the right of suffrage to male inhabitants 21 years of age, citizens of the United States, and such denial in each of said States extends to more than one-half of those who, prior thereto, were entitled to vote, as appears from the following statistics, published in the Congressional Directories of the Fifty-second and Fifty-sixth Congresses, viz:

In the seven districts of Mississippi the total vote cast for all Congressional candidates in 1890 was 62,652; in 1898, 27,045. In the seven districts of South Carolina the total vote in 1890 was 73,522, and 28,831 in 1898. In the six districts of Louisiana 74,542 in 1890, and 33,161 in 1898.

One Member of the present House, representing ten counties in Mississippi, with a population in 1890 of 184,297, received only 2,068 votes. One Member of the present House, representing six counties in South Carolina, with a population in 1890 of 158,851, received only 1,765 votes, and one Member representing thirteen counties in Louisiana, with a population of 208,802, received only 2,494 votes; and

Whereas it is a matter of common rumor that other States have, for reasons other than those specified in the Constitution of the United States, denied to some of their male inhabitants 21 years old and citizens of the United States the right to vote for Members of Congress and Presidential electors, as well as executive and judicial officers of said States and members of the legislature thereof, and no reduction has been made in the representation of any State in this House because of such denial; and

Whereas the President of the United States has, by message, recommended "that the Congress, at its present session, apportion the representation among the several States as provided by the Constitution:" Therefore,

Resolved, Section 1. That the Committee on Census shall be, and is, authorized and directed, either by full committee or such subcommittee or subcommittees as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, to inquire, examine, and report in what States the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislatures thereof is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such States 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crimes, and the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in each such State.

Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged.

After debate the Speaker[1] held as follows:

The matter seems to the Chair clearly settled by Article XIV, section 2, of the Constitution.

The Clerk having read the section referred to, the Speaker continued:

This is a most important section, and gravely touches the very vitals of the Republic as such, and makes mandatory upon Congress certain things that shall be done by Congress if certain conditions exist. This resolution alleges that certain things exist, expressly provided for by the section just read by the Clerk. The resolution and the preamble must be considered together. What is the object of the resolution providing for the investigation to be made by the Committee on the Census? It is to ascertain the truth of these facts and lay them before Congress so that proper action may be taken by this body.

"That the Committee on Census shall be, and is, authorized and directed, either by full committee or such subcommittee or subcommittees as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, to inquire, examine, and report in what States the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislatures thereof is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such States 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crimes, and the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in each such State."

Can any wiser course be suggested for carrying out the clear mandates of the Constitution than by the provision of this preamble and the resolution? The grave charges are made, and the resolution to carry out the proper investigation and treatment is before us. The whole matter, waiving all discussion of the rules of this House, comes under the higher rule than our rule, the constitutional rule which is here absolutely mandatory, and the Chair is unable to see why we should wander even among the precedents, which the Chair has looked over to some extent and which are all one way, when we have the plain language of the Constitution before us. The resolution is evidently carefully drawn in pursuance of the language of the Constitution. The Chair only hopes that he will never have occasion to settle a more difficult question than this, which seems to him so simple. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

306. A bill relating to the taking of the census was held to be privileged because of the Constitutional requirement.—On January 16. 1900,[2] Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, from the Select Committee on the Twelfth Census, reported as privileged the bill (S. 2179) "relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes."

Mr. Charles A. Russell, of Connecticut, made the point of order that the report was not privileged.

After debate the Speaker [1] held—

The question arises by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hopkins], chairman of the Special Committee on the Twelfth Census, bringing in his report.

Were this an original question that had not been passed upon, the Chair might rule differently than he feels constrained to rule at this time.

The Constitution of the United States makes it mandatory upon Congress to take a census of the people every ten years. It also requires the Congress to make an apportionment of the Members of Congress for each State. The Constitution also authorizes the Congress to adopt rules for its procedure.

If this were an original question, the Chair would be inclined to hold that if the House adopts rules of procedure and leaves out any committee from the list of committees whose reports are privileged that that committee would be remitted to those rules of procedure adopted by the House for its guidance. But the Chair finds that a question which the Chair thinks is identical in every particular was ruled upon in the Fifty-first Congress. I quote:

"A bill making an apportionment of Representatives presents a privileged question. On December 16, 1890, Mr. Mark H. Dunnell, of Minnesota, as a privileged question, moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill of the House (H. R. 8500) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Eleventh Census. The bill having been read at length, Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, made the point of order that under the rule the Committee on the Eleventh Census was not included among those having the right to report at any time such business as would properly come before said committee, and that, therefore, the consideration of the bill at this time was not a privileged question."

The House will see that it could not be more fairly and squarely stated than Mr. Blount stated it:

"The Speaker, Mr. Reed, being in the Chair, overruled the point of order, on the ground that a bill making an apportionment is a, privileged question, and it being a constitutional duty imposed on Congress, the consideration of the bill was clearly a privileged question."

At that time the Fifty-first Congress had its Committee on Rules, and probably there never was one more active than the Committee on Rules of that Congress. It was equipped with all the rules of procedure, and yet the Committee on the Eleventh Census was not clothed with the power to report at any time. Now, the Chair is unable to see any distinction in principle between an apportionment bill and a bill for taking the Twelfth Census. The Chair has examined this bill. It is amendatory of the act which we passed in the last Congress for taking the Twelfth Census. It is supplemental to that act. It contains simply provisions for taking the Twelfth Census, all in the same line, and all required by the Constitution.

If the decision made in regard to the consideration of the apportionment bill was sound law, it seems to the Chair clear that it ought to be a sound ruling that this is privileged. The Chair thinks gentlemen of the House will all agree that when decisions are made it is well, unless they are clearly in abuse of the rules of the House, that these precedents should be followed. It is a guide to all Members and will aid them in their work.

Now, when the bill for the Twelfth Census was first brought up the gentleman in charge of the bill, the same gentleman as now presents this, offered it as a privileged report. The Speaker did not rule upon it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bailey] reserved all rights against the bill, saying that he was not clear that it was a privileged bill at all, and with that reservation the bill was considered as introduced in the House, to be printed for the information of the House, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, gave notice that he would call it up the following Monday.

That being suspension day, it was passed under suspension of the rules, and the suggested questions of the week before, or some days before, were not passed on. But the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the decision made in the Fifty-first Congress is sufficient warrant for holding this to be a privileged question.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, appealed from this decision of the Chair, and during the debate the Speaker said:

The Chair desires to say * * * that the point made is clearly well made; but there is not an element in this bill but that might have properly been in the original bill. What the judgment of the House may be as to the elements of this bill is another question, but it is all germane and pertinent to the enumeration of the Twelfth Census. The Members of the House may differ as to the propriety of some of these provisions, but whether they do or not, they are all in line with the demands of the Constitution which require this body to take the census every ten years and to provide the manner for doing the same. * * *

The language of the Constitution is this:

"The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct."

Now, taking the census is the basis of apportionment, and the apportionment follows. Both are absolutely and explicitly commanded by the Constitution. If the decision about the apportionment was a correct decision, there can be no escape from the Chair's holding that the provision of law for taking the census is also within the constitutional provision.

On the succeeding day, January 17, the decision of the Chair was sustained, the appeal being laid on the table by a vote of yeas 165, nays 138.

307. A bill making an apportionment of Representatives presents a question of constitutional privilege.—On December 16, 1890,[1] Mr. Mark H. Dunnell, of Minnesota, as a privileged question, moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill of the House (H. R. 12500) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Eleventh Census.

The bill having been read at length, Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, made the point of order that under the rules the Committee on the Eleventh Census was not included among those having the right to report at any time on such business as would properly come before said committee, and that therefore the consideration of the bill at this time was not a privileged question.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order on the ground that a bill making an apportionment is a privileged question, and it being a constitutional duty imposed upon Congress, the consideration of the bill was clearly a privileged question.

308. On February 7, 1882,[3] Mr. Cyrus D. Prescott, of New York, as a privileged question, moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3550) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Tenth Census.

Mr. John A. Anderson, of Kansas, made the point of order that the motion was not one of privilege.

After debate the Speaker[4] said:

The Chair will state briefly that it is of opinion that the rules of the House are always subject to any constitutional provision that may be found. It may be true that under the rules, strictly speaking, this bill may not be in order. The Chair is, however, of opinion that the consideration of an apportionment bill by this Congress, fixing the representation in the next Congress under the last census, is one of high constitutional privilege. The duty of Congress to make an apportionment after each census is made imperative by the first clause of the second section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

"Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed."

It is a fact of which we must take notice, that this Congress must pass an apportionment bill, fixing the number of Representatives in the next Congress, or serious consequences must follow. The consideration of this question is analogous, perhaps, to no other question that is made imperative by the Constitution upon Congress. The state of the census; the fact that this Congress alone must act, and that apportionment under the last census can not go over to the next Congress; the necessary legislation that must take place in the different States at an early time, must all be taken into account.

In view, therefore, of the character and scope of this measure, and its constitutional character, the Chair feels bound to hold that it is a question of high constitutional privilege. The Chair desires also to state in this connection that it is informed that this has been treated as a question of privilege at various times in the past history of Congressional legislation.

309. The election cases of the New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri Members in the Twenty-eighth Congress.

The House gave prima facie effect to the credentials of certain Members, although the legality of the manner of their elections was questioned.

On December 4, 1843,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, Mr. D. D. Barnard, of New York, objected that the gentlemen presenting themselves with credentials from the States of New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri had been elected on general tickets and not by districts, as prescribed by the law of Congress. The Clerk, having declined to entertain a motion, the gentlemen in question were sworn in and participated in the election of Speaker.

On December 13[2] Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, brought the subject to the attention of the House, and on December 20,[3] by a vote of yeas 148, nays 32, it was—

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be directed to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or the credentials of the Members returned to serve in this House; and that they inquire and report whether the several Members of this House have been elected in conformity with the Constitution and law.

310. The election cases of the New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri Members continued.

The House, in 1842, declared entitled to seats Members elected at large in several States, although the law of Congress required election by districts.

Discussion of the respective powers of Congress and the States in establishing Congressional districts.

Is the establishing of districts an exercise of the power of regulating the times, places, and manner of elections?

On March 15, 1844,[1] Mr. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, from the Committee of Elections, submitted the report, recommending the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the second section of "An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the Sixth Census," approved June 25, 1842, is not a law made in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, and valid, operative, and binding upon the States.

Resolved, That all the Members of this House (excepting the two contested cases from Virginia, upon which no opinion is hereby expressed) have been elected in conformity with the Constitution and laws and are entitled to their seats in this House.

The second section of the apportionment act provided as follows:

That, in each case where a State is entitled to more than one Representative, the number to which each State shall be entitled, under this apportionment, shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which said State shall be entitled, no one district electing more than one Representative.[2]

The four States whose delegations were questioned had long had laws providing for election by general ticket, and had not changed them to conform to the law of Congress. Indeed, some of these States could not have done so without calling a special session of the legislature. There was therefore a conflict of law and sovereignty between those States and the United States, and it was important to know whether or not the law of the United States was in accordance with the provision of the Constitution—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

The report, after examining the text and history of this clause, concludes—that the convention which formed and the people who ratified that great charter of our liberties intended that the regulation of the times, places, and manner of holding the elections should be left exclusively to the legislatures of the several States, subject to the condition, only, that Congress might alter the State regulations, or make new ones, in the event that the States should refuse to act in the premises, or should legislate in such a manner as would subvert the rights of the people to a free and fair representation.

The report goes on to say that even if the power of Congress under the paragraph should be considered plenary and supreme as to prescription of time, place, and manner, yet the section of law in question did not constitute an exercise of the power in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. The law was inoperative and nugatory without State legislation. It merely presumed to dictate to the State legislatures how they should perform their duties under this clause of the Constitution. But there was no authority in the Constitution permitting Congress to compel State legislatures to change laws or make new ones. The laws of Congress might supersede or alter those of the States, but Congress might not direct the form of State legislation, or require enactments to be made in obedience to certain prescribed forms. The attempt to exercise such impracticable power was the evil of the old Confederation. Hence followed the conclusion that Congress should either designate the time, specify the places, and prescribe the manner by law, or leave it to the wisdom and discretion of the several State legislatures.

[2] For debates at the enactment of this law see second session Twenty-seventh Congress, Globe, pp. 445, 446, 463, 469, 496, 555, 561, 571, 576, 583, 588, 595, 601, 608.

In debating the question, on February 14,[1] Mr. Douglas took the further position that Congress had no power to district the States, for that would be to prescribe the qualification of voters as to residence—a power expressly reserved to the States. The ward "manner" in the Constitution did not include so broad exercise of power.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, and concurred in by Messrs. Willoughby Newton, of Virginia, and Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, contended that the Members whose seats were in question were not elected in pursuance of the Constitution and law, and that the seats should be declared vacant.

The minority quote that clause of the Constitution providing that "this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof" shall be "the supreme law of the land," anything in the "laws of any State to the contrary," and declare that the elections in the four States must be void unless the law in question should be found unconstitutional or inoperative. The State legislatures, in providing the times, places, and manner of holding elections, acted as Federal agencies, and in testing the validity of their laws the Federal Constitution was the only guide. And the Constitution evidently, from its text and history, sanctioned the adoption of the district system by the States. The idea that the general ticket was the only constitutional method was newborn and fallacious. The States had been using the district system since the beginning of the Government.

If the clause relating to prescribing the times, places, and manner of elections did not give the power to Congress to determine whether Representatives should be chosen by general ticket in districts, then the State legislatures had not that power which they had been exercising so long. The States certainly had no implied power to conduct this or any other operation of the General Government. If the constitutional clause did not give, both to the legislatures and the Congress, the power to direct that Members of the House should be elected by districts or general ticket, then the regulation belonged to Congress exclusively as an implied power.

The minority proceeded to discuss the power of Congress to "alter" the regulations of States on this subject, holding that it gives to Congress plenary power to alter any regulations that the State may make on the subject.

Congress being able to exercise the undoubted power to provide for the whole manner of holding such elections, it could hardly be held that a partial exercise of that power was not constitutional. The objection, therefore, was not that Congress had exercised an unconstitutional power, but that it had defectively exercised a constitutional power. The question, therefore, was not whether the law was unconstitutional, but whether it could be considered a nullity. But because the regulation, standing alone, could not be executed did not prove it a nullity. The Constitution itself required legislation to make operative its provisions in respect to this subject. But the law of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution was the supreme law of the land, and State legislatures were therefore bound to conform to it.

The minority views conclude with a paragraph deprecating an assault by the House of Representatives on a law of Congress.

[1] Globe, p. 277.

From February 6 to February 14[1] the report was debated in the House. On February 13 in the House Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, offered an amendment to the resolutions of the majority of the committee. This amendment, in the nature of a substitute, omitted all reference to the apportionment law, but declared all the Members of the House (except the two Virginia contested cases) from the unchallenged States elected and entitled to their seats. The amendment further declared the Members from New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri individually entitled to their seats, having been "duly elected."

On February 14 Mr. Dromgoole's amendment was agreed to—yeas 126, nays 57.

Then the question being on agreeing to the resolution as amended by the substitute, a division of the question was allowed, so that a separate vote was taken on each individual, and they were severally declared duly elected and entitled to their seats by votes not varying greatly from that by which the substitute was agreed to.

311. The New Hampshire election case of Perkins v. Morrison in the Thirty-first Congress.

The New Hampshire districts being changed after Representatives to the Thirty-first Congress were elected, an election to fill a vacancy was called in the new district, and the election was sustained.

Discussion of the powers of Congress and the States as to fixing the times, places, and manner of elections.

On December 16, 1850,[2] the Committee on Elections reported on the contested election of Perkins v. Morrison, from New Hampshire. The whole case turned on the apportionment act of the State legislature of July 11, 1850. This act, in establishing the Third district, included in it four towns which were in the Second district under the former apportionment, enacted by the law of July 2, 1846. The act of July 11, 1850, repealed all acts inconsistent with it and contained a provision that it should go into effect from its passage.

On September 9, 1850, Mr. James Wilson, who had been elected for the old Third district, resigned, and by precept of the governor a special election was held in the new Third district on October 8, 1850. At this election George W. Morrison received a majority of 63 votes over Jared Perkins. But Mr. Perkins showed that if the election had been held within the limits of the old district only he would have been elected, since Mr. Morrison's majority came entirely from the four towns included by the law of July 11, 1850.

The majority of the committee found:

> By the Constitution of the United States, the right to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in each State is declared to be in the legislature thereof, subject to the superior power of Congress to make or alter such regulations by law. That, power, however, Congress has never exercised, unless it was partially exerted by the second section of the act of June 25, 1842, to which reference has already been made. Limited only, therefore, by the provisions of that section, the legislature of New Hampshire had plenary power to prescribe by what districts the elections should be made, and to change the boundaries of those districts at its pleasure and at any time. No constitutional provision, no law of Congress, restrains this right originally to form, or subsequently to alter, the limits of [2] Second session Thirty-first Congress, 1 Bartlett, p. 142; Rowell's Digest, p. 135; House Report No. 3.

Congressional districts, at the discretion of the State legislature. It is conceded that Congress could by law have exclusively determined the extent of each district, and enacted that it should remain unchanged under the apportionment during the entire period of ten years. But this has not been done. The act of June 25, 1842, only enacted that the elections (alike general and special) should be by districts of contiguous territory; and, under the law, the limits of each district must be as they were before its passage—such as the legislature of the State may from time to time prescribe. The act of Congress is merely commendatory. It was not possible to delegate to the State legislature the legislative power vested by the Constitution in Congress. It follows, of course, that the districting acts are the untrammeled action of the legislative assembly of New Hampshire, and consequently that the power to change the boundaries of a district remains unlimited in the same legislature. Your committee are not informed that this position has hitherto ever been seriously controverted. Such appears to have been the common understanding. The legislatures of several of the States, after having formed Congressional districts in conformity with the recommendation of the act of Congress of June 25, 1842, have subsequently redistricted the States, or made changes in the boundaries of the districts previously formed. North Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, and Pennsylvania are among the number. Representatives elected from the districts thus reorganized have been admitted to seats in the House without objection. More than twenty Representatives elected by these remodeled districts sit unchallenged in the present Congress.

But it is urged, on behalf of the contestant, that if the power be conceded to the legislature of New Hampshire to redistrict the State, the distracting act of July 11, 1850, does not extend to an election to fill vacancies in the Thirty-first Congress. In terms, however, it unquestionably does. It took effect from its passage. It repealed so much of the former act as was inconsistent with its provisions. Immediately on its passage, therefore, there were no Congressional districts in New Hampshire other than those limited by this later act. An election to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Wilson could therefore have been held in no other manner than that in which the sitting Member was elected. The Third district, by which Mr. Wilson was elected, was a creature of the act of July 2, 1846; it was sustained by it and ceased with it. When, therefore, an election was ordered to be held on the 8th of October, 1850, no political division, no Congressional district, embracing exclusively the counties of Hillsborough and Cheshire, had any legal existence. It had given place to the Third district, as limited by the Second districting act. The governor of the State could issue his precept to none other than an existing district.

The committee also found no difficulty in the fact that the legislature had extended the provisions of the act to vacancies occurring in the Thirty-first Congress. While it might be bad policy to change districts once made, yet the legislature undoubtedly had that power. Nor were the committee impressed with the argument that the voters of the four towns, having voted both in the Second and Third districts, enjoyed double representation. This they conceived to be founded on an erroneous view of the theory of constitutional representation. The division of a State into districts was a regulation of the manner of elections, not of the extent of representation. The argument that a legislature might so change districts that the governor could not tell in which to call an election in case of vacancy did not weigh with the committee, since it did not seem reasonable to argue that a power did not exist simply because it might be abused.

Therefore the majority of the committee reported a resolution declaring Mr. Morrison entitled to the seat.

The minority took the ground that the act of 1850 was not intended to apply to elections to this Congress, and that if it were so intended it was a law that the legislature had no authority to make. Therefore the minority reported a resolution declaring Mr. Perkins entitled to the seat.

The case was debated fully in the House on January 7, 8, 9, and 10, 1851.[1]

On a motion to substitute the minority for the majority proposition, the yeas were 84, nays 103.

On agreeing to the resolution of the committee that Mr. Morrison was entitled to the seat, there were 98 yeas and 90 nays. So the sitting Member was confirmed in his seat, Mr. Morrison having taken his seat on his credentials at the beginning of the session.

312. The North Carolina election case of Pool v. Skinner in the Fortyeighth Congress.

The North Carolina districts being changed after Representatives to the Forty-eighth Congress were elected, the House did not disturb the Member chosen in a new district to fill a vacancy in an old district.

Discussion as to the functions of a governor in calling an election to fill a vacancy in the Congressional representation.

On March 8, 1884,[1] Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the North Carolina case of Charles C. Pool v. Thomas G. Skinner.

On November 7, 1882, at the regular election for Members of the Forty-eighth Congress, Walter F. Pool was chosen a Representative from the First district of the State.

On March 6, 1883, the State was redistricted by the legislature, and the First Congressional district was changed by taking away from it Bertie County and adding Carteret County. This act, by its terms, was in force "from and after its ratification."

On August 23, 1883, Mr. Walter F. Pool died.

The majority thus treats the question arising:

> Subsequently the executive authority of the State issued a writ of election directing an election to be held on the 20th day of November, 1883, in the counties of the First district, as defined by the act of March, 1883, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Pool. At this latter election Thomas G. Skinner and Charles C. Pool were opposing candidates, and Mr. Skinner was, by the proper authority, declared to have been elected.
> It is proper here to add that Mr. Charles C. Pool has served upon Mr. Skinner notice of contest, to which Mr. Skinner has filed his answer, and from the attorneys for the parties we have obtained the facts on which the foregoing statement is founded:
> The Constitution, article 1, section 4, clause 1, provides that—
> "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators."
> Section 2, clause 4, of the same article of the Constitution provides that—
> "When vacancies occur in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies."
> The question is whether, after a Representative is elected by the people of a district before a change of its boundaries, a vacancy caused by his death can be filled by the people of the district after its boundaries are changed.
> The Constitution seems to treat Members of the House as Representatives of the States, and not of districts merely; and the States have the right to determine what portion of their people shall choose these Representatives, subject only to the last apportionment act Of Congress. The State of North Carolina, by the act ratified on the 6th of last March, has provided "that for the purpose of selecting Representatives to the Congress of the United States, the State shall be divided into nine districts." This language might well be said to cover and include all elections, general as well as special; nor does it exclude any Congress. But this view is greatly reenforced by the second section of the act, which provides that it "shall take effect from and after its ratification." The old arrangement of the counties into eight districts was therefore abolished. The governor disregarded the old law, which had been superseded without any reservation, and followed as well as he could the law which was of force at the time of Mr. Walter F. Pool's death, and at the date of the writ of election.

[1] First session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 727; Mobley, p. 66.

There is no provision in the statutes of North Carolina which prescribes the place of the election made necessary under the special circumstances of this case, and the effort seems to have been made to approximate in the location of the election, as nearly as possible under the existing distribution of the counties into districts, to the territory the people of which chose Mr. Pool as their Representative.

The practice in the States in cases similar has been variant, the election in some cases having been ordered in the new district, in others in the old district. The practice in the House has been uniformly to acquiesce in the action of the State authority; and, following this line of consistency, if the governor of North Carolina had ordered the election to fill this vacancy in the old district, we would not have felt it our duty to recommend that the election should be vacated. By the Constitution of the United States, before cited, the governor is constituted the tribunal to determine when and where to order an election to fill a vacancy, and where the laws by which he is to be guided are doubtful his decision ought to be followed by Congress. This course is founded upon precedent, upon the respect due to State authority, and upon that public policy which requires full representation of the States.

It has been contended that the code of North Carolina (section 2722) in reference to vacancies furnishes the rule for a case like this, but, in our opinion, that section only requires that the governor shall issue his writ of election, and by proclamation require the voters in the different townships in their respective counties, at such time as he may appoint, and at the places established by law, then and there to vote for a Representative in Congress to fill the vacancy. Such is the language of the section, and it does not militate against the course which the governor pursued in this case.

Some stress has been laid upon section 3868 of the code of North Carolina, which is as follows:

"The repeal of the statutes mentioned in the preceding section shall not affect any act done, or right accruing or accrued, or established, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any case before the time when such appeal shall take effect; but the proceedings in every such case shall be conformed when necessary to the provisions of this code."

The previous section repeals all public and general statutes of the State with the exceptions and limitations just enumerated. But it must be borne in mind that this code containing this provision did not take effect until the 1st day of November, 1883, while the new districting act, which was also included in this code, took effect from and after March 6, 1883, and contained no such provision. Besides, we think that this section of the North Carolina code relates only to private vested rights, such as could be asserted in the courts.

Much has been said about absurd consequences which may follow under the view taken in this report; but we think that such an argument would be more fitly addressed to the legislatures of the States. And we do not hesitate to say that we would be glad to see such a regulation provided by the States as would obviate these absurd consequences. Perhaps Congress might effectuate this end in the apportionment act made necessary after every census.

As the result of this report, we submit the following resolution, and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That Thomas G. Skinner retain his seat without prejudice to the ultimate right to the seat involved in the contested-election case of Charles C. Pool v. Thomas G. Skinner.

Mr. J. C. Cook, of Iowa, while concurring in the conclusions of the majority, dissented from the doctrine therein set forth:

Representation of the States in Congress by districts has so long been the universal rule that any doubt of the power of Congress to require the subdividing of States must be regarded as set aside. When a State has been divided and Representatives elected for a certain Congress, each district must be regarded as an existing fact for and through that entire Congress, and as the person elected from a particular district has the right to hold the office during the legal term of that Congress, so his office must be held to exist in law and in fact for the entire term of the Congress of which he is a Member. As the State legislature can not legislate him out of office, so it can not destroy the office which he fills; no more can it destroy the district upon which the office rests.

I am clearly of the opinion that the only people who had a right to participate in the election to fill the vacancy were those of the old district, and that all votes cast outside of this district were void. The governor's duty was ministerial. He could do no more than fix the day for the election. The fact that he invited the people of Carteret County to participate in the election did not authorize them to vote, neither do I think that his failure to invite the people of Bertie deprived them of their fixed right to vote. The only material thing he was authorized to do was to fix the time for the election. Suppose he simply called the election with sufficient definiteness to indicate the officer to be voted for or the vacancy to be filled and set the time, but had not mentioned the counties in which the election should be held, would there be any question as to the validity of an election held in the old district? As he had no power to determine or change the district, what he attempted in that direction was mere surplusage in his proclamation. From this it seems to me the people of Bertie County had a right to participate in the election; certainly if they had, their votes would here be counted.

It is universally held when notice of an election is required by law and is not given that this is not fatal. This being a special election can not change the rule. The only difference is that in the one the time is fixed by law, while in the other this is fixed by the proclamation of the governor. Mr. Skinner received a majority of the votes cast in the old district. The fact that the people of Bertie County did not vote can not invalidate the act of those who did vote. It will not do to say no opportunity was given them. They could have asserted their rights given them by law. If no officers appeared to open the polls they could organize and hold the election at the places fixed by law. When we concede, as we must, that had they done this their votes would be made effective here at least, it must follow that having failed to do so they can not complain.

But if there is doubt on the foregoing proposition, there can be none on the following:

Mr. Skinner is here duly returned as a Representative from his State. No fraud is charged in his election, no misconduct on the part of any one; nothing more than a mistake on the part of the governor in calling the election. Neither the people of Bertie County nor any one of them complains. The State acquiesces, the district is satisfied, and no complaint is made by any one in Bertie County.

In view of all this, bearing in mind the fact that there was no intentional wrong, no fraud upon the ballot, or affirmative interference with the right of the citizens, considerations of "respect due to State authority, and that public policy which requires full representation of the States" would dictate that the House should not, of its own motion, declare a vacancy and require another election.

The minority views, filed by Mr. A. A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, hold—that the right of representation for the full term of the Forty-eighth Congress inhered in the people of the old district as an accrued or an established right, and that they alone had the right to fill the existing vacancy.

The minority continue:

This right was secured to them on a fundamental principle of our representative Government and by positive law, both Federal and State. We hold these principles and these propositions to be radical and fundamental in our Government: (1) No portion of the people or territory of a State can be rightfully deprived of a representation in Congress; (2) no portion of the people or territory are rightfully entitled to a double district representation in Congress.

If the present election is sustained, both of these propositions are violated. The people and territory of Bertie County, with a population of 16,392 and 2,588 voters, are deprived entirely of all district representation in the Forty-eighth Congress, and Carteret County, with a population of 9,756 and 1,600 voters, is allowed a double representation.

It also appears that by means of calling and holding the election in the new district instead of the old the political complexion of the representation has been reversed. Bertie County casts a Republican majority of about 800, Carteret County a Democratic majority of about 400, and contestee was returned as elected by a majority of about 700.

The election was called by the lieutenant-governor in the absence of the chief executive. The essential facts are not in dispute.

A construction of the law which works such an infraction of important political rights and results in a wrong so palpable and gross will not be readily accepted as designed by the enactors thereof. We believe the true rule to be as enunciated by Judge McCrary (sec. 179), "That a district once created, and having elected a Representative in Congress, should be allowed to continue intact for the purpose of filling any vacancy which may occur until the end of the Congress in which it is represented." It will be seen, we think, that the existing legislation not only admits of the application of this rule in this case but allows of no other reasonable construction.

Having, examined the question of fact as to what the laws of Congress and the State actually provided, and having become satisfied that the state of the law was such as to require the election to have been held in the old district, the minority continue:

The majority report cites that clause of the Constitution which reads as follows (Art. I, sec. 4, clause 1):

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators."

But we can not see how this gives any support to the action of the executive.

The governor had no right, and was not empowered by law, to determine in what district the election should be held to fill a vacancy. The power is given to the legislature of the State to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections, with a power reserved to Congress to alter the regulations made or to make them itself. It does not rest with the governor to do it. The general assembly has made regulations in North Carolina, giving the governor power to fix the time for holding special elections, and making his duty to issue a writ of election, and by proclamation to require the voters of the townships in the counties composing a district to fill a vacancy in case it occurs. In general elections the time is fixed by statute (Code, sec. 2721). Except as to the time everything is fixed and regulated by legislative action, and when the governor has fixed the time and issued the writ, the election is to be held in every respect as established by law (sec. 2722 of Code). An attempt seems to be made in the majority report to prove that the governor has legislative power, so he may determine what district the election shall be held in. If this were so he might have ordered an election at large, or in anyone of the old eight, or either of the nine new, districts, which would be absurd. Districts are established by law, and that law binds the governor as much as any other citizen. The governor has no authority beyond what is conferred upon him by law, and when he assumes any other he usurps it.

If it is meant to be claimed that the governor's interpretation of the law is binding, we have only to call the attention of the House to the well-recognized law that the governor is not a judicial officer, but his functions are purely executive in their character. Decisions of State courts in interpreting local statutes are heeded in the Federal courts. It is not so with the interpretations put upon the law by an executive officer.

The minority then cite the Tennessee cases of 1871, and the Iowa case in the Forty-sixth Congress, and after commenting thereon, says:

It is vain and a mistake to treat a Congressional district as a corporation, with officers and election machinery, for as such it has none. They exist in the townships and the counties exclusively. No powers were needed, therefore, to be reserved to the districts in analogy to dissolved corporations. A Congressional district has no corporate existence whatever. Defining its boundaries is only naming the counties, the voters in which are to vote for a Representative to Congress. Numbering them is purely arbitrary, and correspondence in numbers does not determine the identity of the district as to counties composing the same. In the new nine, number one may not have contained a single foot of territory which was embraced in the old number one.

We have treated the case thus far under the particular legislation of North Carolina. The distinguishing elements existing take this case out of the operation of the rule and doctrine followed in Perkins v. Morrison (1 Bart., 142), and which gave rise to the conflict of precedents in this House, considered by McCrary in his work (secs. 179, 180). The doctrine of that case was reversed by case of Hunt v. Menard (2 Bart., 477), although the latter was complicated somewhat by another question of fraud. In both of those cases, and in the case of Mr. Taylor, of Ohio, in the Forty-sixth Congress, and of Doctor McLean, in the Forty-seventh Congress, the original election was not held under an act of Congress. The old districting acts had been absolutely repealed, and there was no State law providing for filling vacancies. Hence all the trouble in those cases. No such state of law exists in the present case.

The importance of these distinctions in two respects will be appreciated and shown by referring to the report of the committee in Hunt v. Menard, section 180 of the work of Judge McCrary. We quote a portion of the same:

"The act of the legislature of Louisiana of August 22, 1868, making a new division of the State into its five Congressional districts, by its terms purports to repeal all laws and parts of laws in conflict with said act, but is silent on the subject of vacancies that might occur in the districts as then existing.

"The language of the minority report in the case of Perkins, on the New Hampshire statute, is appropriate on this point as well as on this case generally, and we quote from it as follows:

"'It does not purport to provide for any method of filling vacancies that might occur in the future, and beyond all question it was understood as providing only for the election of Members to future Congresses. Such are the terms of the act, and such must also be its spirit. A vacancy in the House of Representatives is the occurrence of an event by which a portion of the people are left unrepresented and the filling of that vacancy is directed by the Constitution in such explicit language as requires no aid from State enactments to perfect the right.'

"The second section of the first article of the Constitution reads: 'When vacancies occur in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.' This is the only provision of law on the subject of vacancies, and it is ample and sufficient."

Concluding, the minority say:

We are of opinion that the election should be declared invalid. It is not a case of mere irregularity in nonessential particulars or one where no substantial injury has been done. The whole foundation of the election is illegal and the infirmity is deep and fatal. Over 16,000 people have been deprived of all district representation and some 10,000 have got a double representation, and the political complexion of the representation has been reversed. That end may have been the guiding consideration which led to the action of the executive. If not so in this case, such may be the case hereafter under like circumstances, and the other party suffer at that time. Other cases are likely to arise this term of Congress. One has already arisen, and the vacancy has been filled in the old district, and the question may come up again soon.

Assuming that the executive could have called the election either in the old or the new district, and had it legal, as found by the majority report, the conduct of the lieutenaut-governor, acting as chief in the temporary absence of the governor, in disregarding the three last precedents of this House and the doctrine approved in the standard authority in Congress, cannot easily be reconciled with the assumption of good faith.

The contention that there has been something done by which the rights of the aggrieved parties have been lost does not seem to us to be entitled to much consideration. They are before the House by the contestant, who is authorized by an act of Congress to represent them in conducting the contest. No memorial was necessary. There has been no such thing as what is called in law acquiescence. Enforced submission to executive authority is not acquiescence as known to the law. No appeal to the courts would have been of any avail, as they had no jurisdiction. An appeal here was the only means of redress allowed by law. This is a public inquiry, and not altogether personal, and the House has a duty to perform under the Constitution, which requires it to determine the validity of the election, and does not allow it to elect Representatives nor to admit to seats persons not duly elected.

The people of Bertie County had no official notice of the election, and if they had heard of it otherwise any effort to vote would have been in vain, as, presumably, no polls were opened and no election machinery set in motion in that county. It was a special election, and the law did not fix the time.

Besides this, the question of acquiescence is a question of fact, and the committee had no authority to hear or take evidence upon it, and have not done so. We do not know but that voters in Bertie County did try to vote. Acquiescence is not nonaction alone. There must be failure to act where action would have availed.

We recommend the passage of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the old First Congressional district of North Carolina, in which Walter F. Pool was chosen as Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress, was the only proper district in which to call and hold an election to fill the vacancy caused by his death.

Resolved, That Thomas G. Skinner is not entitled to retain longer his seat in this House as Representative from the First Congressional district of North Carolina to the Forty-eighth Congress.

This report was called up in the House both on June 12 and 27, 1884,[1] but on each occasion the House voted not to consider it. On July 5, 1884,[2] it was postponed to the second Monday of December.

Again on February 27, 1885,[3] it was again called up, but the House declined a third time to consider it. And Mr. Skinner retained the seat until the end of the Congress.

313. The Kentucky election case of Davidson v. Gilbert in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The House declined to interfere with the act of a State in changing the boundaries of a Congressional district.

Discussion of the respective powers of Congress and the States in fixing the times, places, and manner of elections.

On March 1, 1901,[4] Mr. R. W. Tayler, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a report in the case of Davidson v. Gilbert, from Kentucky. This contest arose chiefly from the fact that on March 11, 1898, an act was passed by the legislature changing the boundaries of the Eighth and Eleventh Congressional districts of Kentucky, whereby the county of Jackson was taken from the Eighth district and added to the Eleventh. Jackson County having a large Republican majority, the effect of its transfer to the Eleventh was to change the Eighth from a district which had immediately previously been Republican into a Democratic district.

The claims of the contestant that the act was contrary to the State constitution, and that it had never properly passed the legislature, are dismissed by the committee without discussion as having no foundation.

The third objection was that this act contravened an act of Congress, and this the committee considered at length in the light of Article I, section 4, of the Constitution—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

[4] Second session Fifty-sixth Congress, House report No. 3000; Rowell's Digest, p. 603.

The report goes on to say that this is the first time that Congress has been asked to undo the work of a State which had divided itself into a proper number of Congressional districts. Reviewing the history of apportionments, the report says:

For nearly forty years the States proceeded to elect Representatives, some at large and some by districts. In 1840 the policy of electing by districts was generally approved and adopted, but several of the States continued to elect their Representatives by the vote of the entire State. The first legislation on the subject going beyond the mere apportionment of the States was enacted in 1842. In the apportionment act of that year an amendment was added in the House providing for the division of the several States into districts, composed of contiguous territory, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which the State was entitled, and each district to elect one Representative, and no more.

The amendment provoked considerable discussion, but was finally adopted.

The apportionment act, based upon the census of 1850, made no provision for the division of States into districts, nor did the act of 1862. The act of February 2, 1872, provided that Representatives should be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, and added the provision "containing, as nearly as practicable, an equal number of inhabitants." The same provision appears in the apportionment acts of 1882 and 1891.

So far as legislative declaration is concerned, it is apparent that Congress has expressed an opinion in favor of its power to require that the States shall be divided into districts composed of contiguous territory and of as nearly equal population as practicable. Whether it has the constitutional right to enact such legislation is a very serious question, and the uniform current of opinion is that if it has such power under the Constitution that power ought never to be exercised to the extent of declaring a right to divide the State into Congressional districts or to supervise or change any districting which the State may provide.

The best opinion seems to be that the Constitution does not mean that under all circumstances Congress shall have power to divide the States into districts, but only that the constitutional provision was inserted for the purpose of giving Congress the power to provide the means whereby a State should be represented in Congress when the State itself, for some reason, has failed or refused to make such provision itself.

In support of this view the report goes on to quote the views of Justice Story, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, Chancellor Kent, Daniel Webster (as presented in a report made in the Twenty-second Congress), and Nathan Clifford (presented in a speech in the Twenty-seventh Congress), and concludes with this opinion:

Your committee are therefore of opinion that a proper construction of the Constitution does not warrant the conclusion that by that instrument Congress is clothed with power to determine the boundaries of Congressional districts or to revise the acts of a State legislature in fixing such boundaries and your committee is further of opinion that even if such power is to be implied from the language of the Constitution it would be in the last degree unwise and intolerable that it should exercise it. To do so, would be to put into the hands of Congress the ability to disfranchise, in effect, a large body of the electors. It would give Congress the power to apply to all the States, in favor of one party, a general system of gerrymandering. It is true that the same method is to a large degree resorted to by the several States, but the division of political power is so general and diverse that, notwithstanding the inherent vice of the system of gerrymandering, some kind of equality of distribution results.

Therefore the committee reported a resolution confirming Mr. Gilbert's title to his seat.

The report was not acted on by the House, Mr. Gilbert of course retaining the seat.

314. The California election case of F. F. Lowe in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

A State having elected on a general ticket three Representatives when it was entitled to but two, the House denied a seat to the one receiving the fewest votes.

A State sending three Representatives when it was entitled to but two, the House gave prima facie effect to only two credentials.

Discussion of the census and apportionment law of 1850, which applied to succeeding censuses and apportionments.

California having in good faith elected one Member in excess of her apportionment, Congress by law provided for his admission.

On December 2, 1861,[1] at the beginning of the second or regular long session of the Congress, two Members from California, Messrs. Aaron A. Sargent and T. G. Phelps, appeared, presented their credentials, and were sworn in without objection.

On the same day Mr. Phelps presented the credentials of Mr. F. F. Lowe as a third Member from California;[2] but no motion or request was made that he be sworn in, and without debate his credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections.

On April 14, 1862,[3] the committee reported, setting forth the following state of facts:

> By the apportionment under the Eighth Census [of 1860] California is entitled to three Representatives, and it is claimed by the memorialist that that apportionment applies to the present or Thirty-seventh Congress. By special provision of statute, enacted July 30, 1852, it was provided that California should have two Representatives till a new apportionment should take effect. But that State, believing that the apportionment based on the Eighth Census had already taken effect, did, at its general election held on the first Wednesday of September last, elect by general ticket three persons to represent her in the present Congress.
> The Constitution provides that Representatives "shall be apportioned among the several States which shall be included within this Union according to their respective numbers;" and that "the actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of Congress, and within every subsequent ten years in such manner as they shall by law direct." The census and apportionment thus connected together in the Constitution have been connected together in all subsequent legislation by Congress. It has been the course of legislation, up to the year 1850 and the taking of the Seventh Census, to provide for the taking of each census by special act, and, immediately upon its completion by a like special act to determine the number of Representatives, and apportion the same among the several States according to such census. But in providing for the taking of the Seventh Census in 1850 Congress undertook to establish a permanent system both for the taking of all future censuses and for all future apportionments. (Stat. L., vol. 9 p. 428.) That statute requires that the census shall be taken and returned to the Secretary of the Interior on or before the 1st day of November next ensuing the 23d day of May, 1850, the date of the act. The statute then provides, section 23, "If no other law shall be passed providing for the taking of the Eighth or any subsequent census of the United States on or before the 1st day of January of any year, when, by the Constitution of the United States, any future enumeration of the inhabitants thereof is required to be taken, such census shall in all things be taken and completed according to the provisions of this act." No other provision for the Eighth Census has been made.

[2] The three were elected on a general ticket, and it appears that Mr. Lowe received the smallest vote of the three.

[3] House report No. 79.

The statute then proceeds to provide, before the census is taken, for the then next apportionment to be based upon the census not yet taken, and for all further apportionments, as follows:

"SEC. 25. From and after the 3d day of March, 1853, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 233 Members, to be apportioned among the several States in the manner directed in the next section of this act.

"SEC. 26. So soon as the next and each subsequent enumeration of the inhabitants of the several States, directed by the Constitution of the United States to be taken, shall be completed and returned to the office of the Department of the Interior, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the aggregate representative population of the United States, by adding to the whole number of free persons in all the States, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons; which aggregate population he shall divide by the aggregate number 233, and the product of such division, rejecting any fraction of a unit, if any such happen to remain, shall be the ratio or rule of apportionment of Representatives among the several States under such enumeration; and the said Secretary of the Department of the Interior shall then proceed in the same manner to ascertain the representative population of each State, and to divide the whole number of the representative population of each State by the ratio already determined by him as above directed; and the product of this last division shall be the number of Representatives apportioned to such State under the then last enumeration."

The law further directed the Secretary of the Interior, "without delay" to make out and transmit to the executive of each State a certificate of the number of Representatives the State would be entitled to. And the Secretary of the Interior notified the governor of California that he had apportioned three Representatives to the State for the Thirty-eighth Congress. The State, however, concluded that they were entitled to them for the Thirty-seventh Congress under the law.

The majority of the committee held that the claim was based upon too strict and narrow a construction of the law of 1850. That law, as a whole, was intended to provide "that each subsequent census and apportionment should be made precisely as was provided in that statute for those then about to be made." And the law of 1850, therefore, should be held to mean that the time of future apportionments should correspond to that therein provided, the apportionment taking effect March 3, 1853. So the next apportionment should take effect March 3, 1863. The committee felt that every reasonable rule of construction suggested this conclusion. The committee say:

So far as the committee have been able to ascertain from the contemporaneous history, or the discussions in either House on its passage, or any subsequent criticism of it, till the present case has arisen, the idea never occurred to anyone that it provided, in this regard, one rule for the census of 1850 and consequent apportionment and a different one for any subsequent census and apportionment. On the other hand, there is much reason, if not constitutional obligation, that the rule should be the same for all, and that the last apportionment having been fixed to take effect "from and after the 3d day of March, 1853," the next should not take effect till ten years thereafter, or from and after the 3d day of March, 1863. The apportionment must follow and be based upon the census. The Constitution says Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States "according to their respective numbers;" and to ascertain these numbers the same section provides that "the actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct." The Constitution evidently contemplated a Census only once in ten years, and consequently a new apportionment based upon such census only once in ten years. The time when the First Census should be taken was not fixed, only it must be "within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States." Now, Congress did provide for taking the First Census in 1790, the next in 1800, and in 1810, and in 1820, 1830, 1840, and 1850. So Congress has also provided by legislation, once in every ten years, that the apportionment, based upon each one of these enumerations, respectively, shall take effect "from and after the 3d day of March, 1793," "from and after the 3d day of March, 1803," and from and after the same day in 1813, 1823, 1833, 1843, and 1853. In the absence of express enactment to the contrary, the committee can not doubt that it was likewise the intention of Congress, in providing for the Eighth Census, to provide that it shall be taken in 1860, and that the apportionment based upon it, like all that had preceded it, should take effect in the corresponding year, viz from and after the 3d of March, 1863. If it be held that apportionments of Representatives can not be made oftener than a Federal census is taken, and that the Constitution requires that that shall be taken only once in ten years, then it follows that the apportionment based upon the census of 1860 can not take effect till the 4th of March, 1863; else the period between the last two apportionments would be eight instead of ten years, while the period between all the rest would be ten years.

All construction of the constitutional obligation upon Congress to provide by law for the several "enumerations," and the apportionments based upon them, is uniform, and the course of legislation is without any conflict, all uniting in forcing upon the committee the construction they put upon this statute, that its intendment is that the apportionment based upon the census of 1860 shall take effect from and after the 3d of March, 1863.

The committee then discussed the inconveniences of any other construction were the same rule contended for by California applied to other States.

The committee say further:

But this Congress has, by positive enactment, declared when, in its opinion, the apportionment based upon the census of 1860 shall take effect, In an act passed only the last month, to modify that apportionment and give to several States therein named a greater number of Representatives than the apportionment under the statute of 1850 had given them, Congress has expressly enacted that the act shall take effect from and after the 3d day of March, 1863.

The minority of the committee, laying stress on the mandate that the Secretary of the Interior transmit "without delay" to the States certificates of the numbers of Representatives they were entitled to, and upon their inability to find any provision of the statute to prevent the apportionment taking effect immediately, contended that the apportionment applied to the Thirty-seventh Congress. Moreover, an act of July 30, 1852, provided that California should retain the number of Representatives provided by the act of admission to the Union "until a new apportionment." Congress also had apportioned a direct tax to California on the basis of the census of 1860. Could she, under the Constitution, be deprived of the Representatives allowed by that census?

Either California was entitled to three Representatives or none by virtue of the last election. All were elected on a general ticket, and the minority could not see how Messrs. Phelps or Sargent could retain their seats if Mr. Low be excluded. It was a well-settled rule of the House "that if any State return more Members than she is entitled [to], the election is void, and all must be excluded."

As to another argument of the majority, the minority urged that States, like individuals, could not be deprived of their legal rights because others failed to ask for theirs.

The report was debated on May 6,[1] and on the same day the question was taken on a substitute proposition declaring Mr. Low entitled to the seat. This was disagreed to—yeas 49, nays 69.

Then the resolution of the committee declaring Mr. Low not entitled to the seat was agreed to without division.[1]

On June 2, 1862, an act of Congress[2] was approved, reciting the fact that California had population sufficient for three Representatives, that three had been duly elected, as appeared by the governor's certificate, and that direct taxes had been apportioned on a basis to justify three Representatives; and therefore increasing the representation of the State to three Members for the Thirty-seventh Congress.

On June 3, in accordance with this act, Mr. Low appeared and took the oath.[3]

315. The Tennessee election case of Thomas A. Hamilton in the Fortieth Congress.

The House did not give prima facie effect to credentials regular in form but borne by a person in addition to the number of Representatives allowed the State.

Instance wherein the House denied the privileges of the floor to a claimant for a seat.

On December 7, 1868[4] Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, presented the credentials of Thomas A. Hamilton as a Member-elect from the State of Tennessee at large. It was explained that Tennessee thought herself entitled to this additional Representative because of the large number of colored people she had voluntarily admitted to citizenship. It was admitted that this Representative would be in addition to the number allowed Tennessee by the law of Congress.

No proposition was made to administer the oath to Mr. Hamilton, although his credentials were regular in form; and they were referred to the Committee of Elections without division.

Mr. Maynard moved, however, that he be allowed the privileges of the floor pending the decision of his claim. After debate as to the precedents, this motion was decided in the negative—ayes 45, noes 85.

316. The Tennessee election case of Thomas A. Hamilton, continued.

The House denied the claim of a State to representation greater than the apportionment had given to her when the reasons for such claim applied to many other States.

Discussion of the constitutional questions relating to apportionment.

Review of the acts of Congress giving increased representation in special cases.

On February 18, 1869,[5] Mr. Samuel Shellabarger, of Ohio, submitted the report of the committee, who were unanimously of the opinion that in the absence of an act of Congress increasing the representation of the State the claimant could not be admitted.

As to the advisability of passing an act the committee divided. The majority held that such a law should not be passed. They said:

Mr. Hamilton rests his claim to a seat, and his demand that a law shall be passed, upon substantially the following facts and considerations:

That in 1865 the people of Tennessee voluntarily emancipated their slaves, and thereby added two-fifths of these, being by the census of 1860 110,287, to the representative population of that State and making the entire representative population of the State now 1,009,801, assuming that it is the same as shown by that census; that this entitles the State to 9 Representatives, retaining the same ratio of representation (127,000) as that upon which the apportionment was made in 1861.

It is urged that this being done when it was, and voluntarily by act of the people, and being accompanied by enfranchisement of the colored race, distinguishes the claim of Tennessee for the representation of her freed people from the States where the enfranchisement was subsequent and the result of Federal coercion. It is also claimed that the second article of the fourteenth amendment, making the rights of representation to be in proportion to the numbers of the voting races, sustains this claim. It is further urged that the refusal of it would dishearten the freedmen of Tennessee, who are alleged to regard the claimant as especially their representative, and would be disastrous to their interests as a race, now in especial need of the recognition and protection of their Government.

Upon substantially these considerations, as is alleged, the general assembly of Tennessee, on the 12th of March, 1868, adopted a joint resolution requiring the governor "to issue a writ of election, to the State at large, for the purpose of electing one additional Member to the Congress;" and the claimant presents the certificate of the governor showing that on the first Tuesday of November, 1868, the claimant was elected by the people of the State at large a Representative of the State of Tennessee in the Fortieth Congress.

After citing the clause of the Constitution relating to apportionment the report says:

What, then, is the legislation of the Constitution upon this subject, and what the rule by which it has bound the powers and discretions of this House and of the Congress? These are plain, unambiguous, and complete. Those requirements of this rule which are material to be here considered are—

First. That the apportionment must be made to each of the several States. The Congress, by other provisions of the Constitution, has the power to determine when a Territory or people are such in numbers or in organization or in attachment to the Government of the United States as to be fit or entitled to be admitted as one of "the several States included in the Union." But being so admitted and recognized by Congress as such State, the Congress has no discretion as to the apportionment to such State of representation, but must accord representation to each State so admitted and recognized by Congress.

Second. This apportionment must be based on the "numbers" of the Federal populations. Whether it should be based on numbers only, and if so, who should be counted in the enumeration, was a matter of the most profound concern in the convention which framed the Constitution, and one which came near defeating its formation. It was only after such a struggle as this that "numbers" was adopted as the basis of representation, and its importance and the duty of having strict regard to it is indicated by the history of its adoption.

Third. In making the apportionment on this basis of "numbers," there must be apportioned to each one of the several States that proportion or part of the aggregate membership of the House of Representatives which that State has of the aggregate representative population of the United States.

Fourth. The enumeration upon which the apportionment is based must be the one required to be taken within every term of ten years in such manner as the Congress shall by law direct.

The committee proceed:

Having regard, then, to these controlling requirements of the Constitution, the majority of your committee finds it difficult to discover any authority by which Congress shall assign to one of the several States an increase of representation on account of its increased numbers of representative population, and yet withhold it from other States shown to the same Congress, at the same time, and by the same known and historic events, to have had a similar or greater increase of Federal numbers. Indeed, this would be so plainly a disregard of the evident requirements of the Constitution and of the rules of equality of representation secured by it to the several States, that it need not be considered by the committee; and so plain that this was not, in terms, demanded by the claimant or by the Representative from Tennessee before the committee. And hence it is that the claim of Tennessee in this case is vindicated and pressed upon the favor of the House upon the ground, mainly, that the claim of Tennessee is distinguishable from what could be demanded by the other late slave States. This distinction is rested, as we have already stated, upon the alleged fact that in 1865, during the recent rebellion, and in aid of its suppression, the slaves of that State were, by the voluntary act of the people, emancipated, enfranchised, and added to the representative numbers within such State, while in all the other States the emancipation and enfranchisement and addition to Federal population was, on the part of the people, involuntary and by the coercions of the war. Something is also claimed by Tennessee in virtue of the fourteenth constitutional amendment, as we have above stated.

In regard to this last claim, based upon the second section of the fourteenth amendment, it is sufficient for the purposes of the present inquiry to say that it can have no possible effect upon the conclusions reached in this case unless it be the effect of leading to a reapportionment of Representatives to each of the several States in the Union.

Neither in the fourteenth amendment nor in the voluntary emancipation of the slaves does the committee find justification for special action in the case of Tennessee.

As to the precedents, the majority say:

It is, of course, not only impossible to find a precedent in former legislation for a case like this, but it is equally impossible to resist the conclusion that if this addition to the representative population of the States is to be recognized as entitling one State to increased representation now, then the magnitude of the accession to the Federal population is so great as to compel a reapportionment of the entire representation in the House if any respect is to be paid to the rule that Representatives are to be apportioned to each State according to "numbers." In dealing with this addition to representative population the Congress is not dealing with mere fractions of a representative population, but with a population entitled to elect more than one-twentieth part of the entire membership of this House. In dealing with such a large and often controlling proportion of the vote of this House, it can not be that the Constitution permits Congress to exercise any discretions such as must be by necessity exercised in disposing of a mere fraction of a representative population in a State. And this is in accordance with all legislative precedents upon this subject. These precedents involve and sustain the following propositions, namely:

1. That "the Constitution evidently contemplated a census only once in ten years, and consequently a new apportionment, based upon such census, only once in ten years." (See Low's case, 1862, Contested Elections, 421, approved by the House without division.)

2. "The census and apportionment thus connected together in the Constitution, have been connected together in all subsequent legislation of Congress."

3. "There can be no such thing as one State represented according to one apportionment and under one census, and another State according to some other apportionment based on another census. The whole number of Representatives and the number for each State are both fixed by law, and by the same law. There cannot be one law for one State and another law for another." (See same case, p. 423.)

4. All former special acts of apportionment have been passed, at least professedly, to supplement the acts of general apportionment and to complete the equality of that apportionment to and among each and every one of the several States; and no act was ever passed which contemplated or recognized any other State as being left without its just proportion of representation as contrasted with what was accorded, by the special and the general law, to every other State. On the other hand, the proposed act in favor of Tennessee does propose to accord to Tennessee alone increase of representation upon a principle and on behalf of a population which would equally entitle other States to a like or greater increase, and yet it denies the increase to the other States.

After reviewing the precedents, especially the California case, the majority conclude:

It will be seen that each of them, instead of being a precedent for allowing a State increased representation upon a claim which applied with equal force in favor of other States, and which other States the special act left unprovided for, are cases where the act assumed that all the other States were already more fully represented than the States provided for in the special act, and that such act was required to complete the equality of representation as between each one and all of the several States.

Of course, the numerous acts admitting new States, and giving them the representation their "numbers" entitle them to, are in no sense analogous to this proposed bill, because these acts did not leave any other States not equally represented with the new State. What is deemed by the committee the fatal objection to the proposed bill is that it gives Tennessee an additional Member on the ground of the addition of 110,287 to her representative numbers by the abolition of slavery, while it passes by, neglects, and refuses to give, and thereby denies, additional Members to the other States now represented in this House, who have added nearly ten times that number to their numbers by the very same event and fact which added them in Tennessee. It can not be successfully claimed that acts admitting new States and giving them their due representation, when every other State was fully represented, and represented equally with the newly admitted State, can furnish the slightest authority or a precedent for such a wrong as this one done by the proposed bill.

The committee also refer to the fact that the applicant was elected from the State at large, and criticise it as in violation of a law of Congress.

The minority of the committee[1] contended that the law asked for might with propriety be passed. After discussing the general laws on the subject of apportionment, they enumerate the special acts:

The act of February 25, 1791, chapter 9, gave 2 Representatives each to Kentucky and Vermont, until there should be "an actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States." By the act of June 1, 1796, chapter 47, Tennessee was admitted to the Union, with 1 Representative "until the next general census." The act of April 30, 1802, chapter 40, enabled Ohio to form a State, and gives her 1 Representative "until the next general census."

The act of April 8, 1812, chapter 50, admitting Louisiana, gives her 1 Representative "until the next general census." The act of April 19, 1816, chapter 57, enables Indiana to form a State government, and until the next general census entitles her to 1 Representative. She was admitted to the Union by joint resolution December 11, 1816. A similar act was passed for Mississippi March 1, 1817, chapter 33, and a similar joint resolution December 10, 1817; also for Illinois, April 18, 1818, chapter 67, and December 3, 1818; and for Alabama, March 2, 1819, chapter 47, and December 14, 1819.

The act of April 7, 1820, chapter 39, reduced the number of Representatives in the Seventeenth Congress from the State of Massachusetts to 13, and gave the remaining 7 to the recently formed State of Maine.

The general apportionment act of March 7, 1822, gave to Alabama 2 Representatives. The following year a special act, January 14, 1823, chapter 2, gave her an additional Member upon fuller information as to the number of her inhabitants. The act of March 6, 1820, chapter 22, enables Missouri to form a State government, with 1 Representative until the "next general census." She was admitted to the Union by joint resolution March 2, 1821.

The act of June 15, 1836, chapter 100, admitted Arkansas to the Union, with 1 Representative "until the next general census."

The legislation by which Michigan was admitted to the Union was attended with much difficulty. It will be found in the acts of June 15, 1836, chapter 99, of June 23, 1836, chapter 121, and of January 26, 1837, chapter 6, and its difficulties are illustrated by the debates of the two Houses. In the present purpose it is deemed sufficient to refer to section 3 of the act of June 15, 1836, which provides that as soon as the people of Michigan should have complied with certain fundamental conditions the President should announce the same by proclamation; and thereupon, without further action of Congress, "the Senators and Representatives who have been elected by said State" should be entitled to take their seats without further delay, nothing appearing in the statutes to indicate the number of Representatives.

The act of March 3, 1845, chapter 48, for the admission to the Union of Iowa and Florida, provides that "until the next census and apportionment" each State be entitled to 1 Representative. Iowa was not, in fact, admitted under this act and not until near the close of the following year, act of December 28, 1846, chapter 1; but no further provision was made for her representation.

The joint resolution of December 29, 1845, chapter 1, admits Texas to the Union, with 2 Representatives until the next apportionment.

The act of August 6, 1846, chapter 89, enables the people of Wisconsin to form a State government, with 2 Representatives "until another census" and apportionment.

The act of September 9, 1850, chapter 50, admits California to the Union, with 2 Representatives until the next apportionment. Before that time the Seventh census was taken pursuant to the act of May 23, 1850, and California declares, by virtue of her ascertained numbers, to be still entitled to 2 and only 2 Representatives; and yet Congress thought proper, by act of June 2, 1862, chapter 91, for reasons appearing in the body of the act, to accord to her I additional Representative in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The act of February 26, 1857, chapter 60, enables the people of Minnesota to form a State government, and provides for the taking of a census in the Territory with a view to ascertain the number of Representatives to which, as a State, she would be entitled. The act of May 11, 1858, chapter 31, admits her to the Union, with 2 Representatives "until the next apportionment."

The act of February 14, 1859, chapter 33, admits Oregon to the Union, with 1 Representative "until the next census and apportionment."

The act of May 4, 1858, chapter 26, providing for the admission to the Union of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, and that of January 29, 1861, chapter 20, admitting her under the Wyandotte constitution, both declare her entitled to 1 Representative "until the next general apportionment."

The act of December 31, 1862, chapter 6, erects a portion of the State of Virginia into the new State of West Virginia, with 3 Representatives, leaving unchanged the number to which Virginia is entitled.

The act of March 21, 1864, chapter 36, enables the people of Nevada to form a State government, with 1 Representative "until the next general census;" and, on the 19th of April, 1864, an act similar in all respects was passed by the people of Nebraska, under which acts both States have been admitted to the Union, completing the present number, 37.

These various acts have been collated at some pains, to show how completely the number of Representatives in the House has been contested, at the discretion of Congress, a discretion scarcely less absolute than that of each House over "the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members."

This is illustrated by the arbitrary, nay, artificial numbers, at which the ratio was successively fixed, by allowing Representatives for the fractions of the ratio, by the admission of new States with 1, 2, 3, or more Representatives according to their estimated populations, by reducing the representation of a State whose population had been reduced by the excision of part of her territory, by increasing the representation of States, as in the case of Alabama and California, when it was manifested that their population had been under estimated, and by determining the aggregate number of the House and requiring our executive officer to make the apportionment among the several States.

It is illustrated even more forcibly, if possible, by the act of March 4, 1862, chapter 36, which increases the number of Representatives from 233, the number established by the general law of May 23, 1850, to 241, giving to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Vermont, and Rhode Island, each I additional Member, to which they were not entitled under the general law.

In a word, these acts establish the general proposition that Congress has complete jurisdiction to adjust the representative numbers of the House, and has repeatedly and constantly exercised it at discretion, according to the varied equity of each particular case.

In conclusion the minority say:

The precedents cited as bearing upon the case are as weighty and significant as they are singularly numerous. It is believed they have not been or cannot be successfully met or explained away. These pointed examples of the unreserved exercise of legislative authority are in themselves a powerful warrant for the course which has been pursued by Tennessee. The vital point in the matter, however, is that Tennessee has not only followed "the line of safe precedent," but has conformed strictly to the true intent and meaning of the fourteenth article of the Constitution.

The fact that Tennessee happens to be the first State to claim the practical application of the inestimable rights conferred in said article should not be regarded as anomalous or involving a precedent of doubtful or "dangerous policy."

Objections founded upon any such reasoning are altogether likely to be speculative and fallacious, and lead to great injustice and wrong.

To admit the correctness of the somewhat sweeping statement that the admission of the claimant would be "a most dangerous precedent," would certainly be a most severe commentary upon many of the deliberate acts of the Congresses preceding the present.

In the present instance Tennessee claims no right or privilege she would not willingly concede to any other State having a similar record.

If, upon a fair investigation of the grounds upon which she bases her right to an additional Representative, it is found her cause rests upon merit and justice, and is sustained by unquestionable authority, her demand should receive a prompt and favorable response. To deny to her a manifest constitutional right upon the questionable and untenable objection that some other State may set up a similar claim, would surely afford abundant grounds for criticism, and come in direct antagonism with the policy heretofore maintained and pursued by Congress.

The report was not acted on by the House.

317. The Tennessee election case of John B. Rodgers in the Forty-first Congress.

The House denied the claim of a State to representation greater than the apportionment had given to her when the reasons for such claims applied to many other States.

The Clerk declined to enroll a person bearing regular credentials, but claiming to be a Representative in addition to the number apportioned to his State.

The House did not give prima facie effect to regular credentials borne by a person claiming a seat in addition to those assigned to a State by law.

On the organization of the House on March 4, 1869,[1] Mr. John B. Rodgers, of Tennessee, appeared with credentials showing him to have been elected as Representative-at-large in Tennessee. The Clerk did not put him on the roll of Members-elect, nor did the House subsequently order the oath to be administered to him, the law apportioning Members not allowing a place for him in the Tennessee delegation. His credentials, however, were referred to the Committee on Elections, and on April 7[2] Mr. David Heaton, of North Carolina, presented the report of the majority of the committee. After citing the precedents in relation to apportionment, the report says:

The case of Tennessee is this: Accord ing to the census of 1860, the inhabitants of the United States, reckoning all free persons and three-fifths of all others, numbered 29,553,273. Divide by 241, the number of Members now composing the House, it gives 122,627 as the present representative ratio. Tennessee had 834,082 free inhabitants, white and colored, and 275,719 slaves, a total of 1,109,801. Three-fifths of her slaves, however, added to her free population, on the principle of the representative enumeration, made 999,514, by virtue whereof she has now 8 Representatives.

In February, 1865, she, by voluntary act, a popular vote, manumitted and emancipated her 275,719 slaves, nearly one-fourth of her population. Two-fifths of this number, 110,288, are thereby added to those already entitled to representation. This, with a previous representative fraction, leaves 128,785 for which the State has no Representative, counting only the population as it was in 1860. This excess of popular numbers over the number of her present Representatives is not the result of growth or natural increase, in which the several parts of the country are presumed to keep pace, at least until the contrary is demonstrated by the census, but of a great political act as conspicuous and distinctive as would be the annexation of a foreign territory containing so many people. For the purpose of this inquiry it is as if the boundaries of Maine were by treaty extended to embrace Nova Scotia, with 110,288 inhabitants. Is it equitable and just that they should be denied a Representative? The undersigned think not.

[2] House Report No. 12; 2 Bartlett, p. 941;

Since the voluntary action of Tennessee in emancipating her slaves Congress has taken not only an important step toward settling the status of American citizenship, but also indicating a further proper basis of representation. On the 16th of June, 1866, what is known as Article XIV was submitted to the legislatures of the different States. On July 20, 1868, this article was formally proclaimed as a part of the Constitution of the United States by the Secretary of State. The second section of said article, to which particular attention is invited, reads as follows:

"SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

This section, though general in its terms, was adopted with particular reference to the recently emancipated colored population, and is a declaration to the several States in which this population is found that if they are enfranchised the State shall be represented accordingly if not, representation shall be diminished. It either means this or is a mockery and means nothing.

As soon as possible after the promulgation of the proposed amendment—on the 16th of June 1866—Tennessee convened her legislature and ratified it. She then changed her franchise laws to conform to the spirit of this amendment by removing from all colored people within her boundaries all civil and political disabilities and conferring upon them the right to elect and to be elected to every office from the highest to the lowest. Having done this, and the fourteenth article having become valid as a part of the Constitution, what was before a claim for full and complete representation, resting in the discretion of Congress, became now an absolute constitutional right. For it must be borne in mind always that this action of Tennessee has been her own, independent and in advance of executive proclamations, constitutional amendments, and reconstruction acts. She has met all the conditions of the Constitution in a spirit of the most cheerful loyalty, and has created in her favor an obligation which can not be canceled by being denied.

Her legislature, viewing the matter in this obvious light, has by appropriate action provided for the election of an additional Representative. On the 3d day of November, 1868—the day of the late Presidential election, and the day designated by law for the election of Members of Congress in Tennessee—the people of that State, fully impressed that they were fairly entitled to an additional Representative, proceeded to elect, and did elect, the Hon. John B. Rodgers to the Forty-first Congress.

It was a matter of general notoriety in Tennessee, some time before it occurred, that such an election would be held. The people of the State were duly advertised of the fact by the act of the legislature and executive proclamations. The friends of the present applicant for a seat brought him forward as a candidate at a popular convention, unusually largely attended, at the capital of the State. The popular will was fully reflected at the polls in the fact that the applicant received nearly as many votes as were cast in that State on the same day for the prevailing Presidential electoral ticket. The places for voting in this case were the same as those at which votes were given by persons of different political proclivities for different candidates for Congress and candidates for electors for President and Vice-President. Returns of the result in different counties were made in due form to the secretary of state, as appears in official documents duly certified to. On these returns credentials in due form were issued.

The report urges that Tennessee has conformed to the requirements of the fourteenth amendment, and because she was the first State so to do should not count against her.

Therefore, the majority recommended the enactment of a law to increase the representation of Tennessee by one.

The minority of the committee call attention to the fact that the additional seat may be claimed on the authority of no existing law, and deny that the facts and precedents justify the passing of such a law:

The provision of the Constitution of the United States which regulates representation is as follows:

"Representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative."

The second section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution relates to the same subject, and modifies, to some extent, so much of the above as relates to representation, and is as follows:

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

While these provisions differ as to the manner in which the representative numbers in the States shall be ascertained, they agree in providing that Representatives shall be apportioned among the States according to these numbers, and we have thus a definite and absolute rule established, according to which apportionment shall be made, and which forbids any assignment of Representatives to any State for any other reason, and which requires that if representation be given to one State equal proportionate representation shall be given to any other State similarly situated in respect of its representative numbers or population.

The provision of the Constitution first above quoted also provides the means for making the apportionment so required, by requiring that once in ten years an actual enumeration shall be made; and it would follow, by fair implication, that a reapportionment should only be made after such enumeration had shown its necessity. The practice of the Government has been uniformly in accordance with this view since the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

After each decennial census, and at no other time, a new apportionment of Representatives has been made among the States, and to each State according to its Representative population as fixed by the Constitution and ascertained by the census.

The legislation of Congress admitting new States forms no exception to this rule, since under the Constitution they may be admitted at any time, and by the provision above quoted each must have at least 1 Representative; but, subject to this last provision, the number of Representatives allowed to each new State has always been the number to which it was supposed to be entitled by its representative population, upon the ratio of the last preceding apportionment. The act of March 4, 1862, by which the aggregate membership of the House was increased from 233 to 241, and 1 additional member was given to each of the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Vermont, and Rhode Island, and also the acts of January 14, 1823, and of June 2, 1862, by which Alabama and California were each allowed a member in addition to the number previously apportioned to them also, are not exceptions, since the first was passed to give representation to large fractions of representative population which would otherwise be unrepresented, and the last two were intended to correct errors arising from insufficient census returns in the apportionment previously made to those States.

We have no right, therefore, under the Constitution and the uniform practice of our legislative history, to give representation to the 110,287 slaves in Tennessee, as shown by the census of 1860, who were excluded from making a part of the representative population of that State under the Constitution as it stood in 1860, but who, as freemen, if now living in that State, would, under the same Constitution, be a part of such representative number, without at the same time providing for equal representation to the 1,469,925 persons in other States, who, slaves then, have since become free. The fact that the slaves of Tennessee became freemen by the voluntary act of the people of the State, while those of other States were made such without the assent and against the will of the people of those States, can not affect the question, since it is the fact of their freedom, and not the manner in which they became free, which alone has any legal significance in the case.

It is no answer to this objection that no other State than Tennessee asks for this additional representation. It is the duty of Congress to apportion Representatives among the States according to their respective numbers, and this whether the States ask for it or not; and to give additional representation to Tennessee, while withholding it from States equally entitled to it, and upon facts equally within our knowledge, would be a violation of this duty.

The passage of such a general law at this time would not be proper, since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment has given a new rule for ascertaining representative numbers, and Representatives are required to be apportioned among the several States according to those numbers. No enumeration heretofore made of the people of the United States would enable us to ascertain the present representative numbers of the several States. Such an enumeration, however, must be made under the Constitution before the close of the next year. Then, and not till then, can an apportionment be made such as the Constitution now requires.

There is another consideration to which the minority deem it proper to call attention, and which seems to answer fully the equitable ground for this claim, urged on the part of the State of Tennessee.

The next census will undoubtedly show a very large increase of the population of the United States. This increase has been added, almost entirely, to the population of the States which were loyal during the war, and were not slave-holding States at its commencement. During the war the immigration to this country was excluded from the Southern States by the blockade, and by the presence of our armies, and since has been almost equally excluded by the distracted condition of those States.

The loss of life and the check to the increase of population from other causes is also believed to have been much greater in the States which were the immediate seat of hostile operations. We do not believe that anyone will seriously question that the apportionment of 1862, based upon the census of 1860, gives to each of the lately slave-holding States a larger proportionate representation than they would be entitled to upon an enumeration made at the present time, and according to the rule by which such representation must now be made. To yield the claim of Tennessee would increase this disproportion, and would be unjust to the States which were faithful to the Union through all its trials and who by their fidelity saved the Republic.

Therefore the minority recommend that the question be deferred until after the next census.

The report in this case was never acted on, but on March 1, 1871,[1] the House discharged the committee from further consideration of the subject and agreed to a resolution compensating Mr. Rodgers for his expenditures in presenting his case.

318. The Virginia election case of Joseph Segar in the Forty-first Congress.

After the division of Virginia the House recognized a division of the old representation between the two States, without specific provisions of law.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to credentials regular in form, relating to a seat, in addition to those to which the State was entitled.

After reconstruction the credentials of all the Virginia delegation were referred before the bearers were admitted.

At the second session of the Forty-first Congress the Members-elect of the Virginia delegation were not permitted to take the oath until their credentials were examined by the Committee on Elections. Then all were sworn in except Mr.

Joseph Segar, who had been elected for the State at large, as was made plain by his credentials:

To all whom it may concern:

This is to certify that at an election held in and for the State of Virginia by the voters registered under the act of Congress of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the act supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, upon the question of ratifying or rejecting the constitution framed by the convention called under the authority of said laws, and at which election it was provided by the 2d section of the law of April 10, 1869, that the voters of said State may vote for and elect members of the general assembly of said State, and all the officers of said State provided for by the said constitution, and Members of Congress, Joseph Segar was duly elected at large as a Representative to the Congress of the United States.

Given under my hand, at Richmond, Virginia, this 9th day of September, 1869.

ED. R. S. CANBY,
Brevet Major-General, U. S. A., Commanding First Military District.

On March 29, 1870,[1] Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, to whom Mr. Segar's credentials had been referred, submitted their report.

Mr. Segar, as one of his claims, had insisted that the certificate ought to be conclusive as to his right to the seat "unless in case of contest or of the allegation of fraud or of palpable clerical mistake." The report says:

This assumes, of course, that the seat itself is provided for by law. But that is the very question, and the only question in this case, and to that question the committee are constrained to give a negative answer.

Eight Representatives from Virginia had already been seated, and Mr. Segar would, if seated, make the ninth. The report of the majority of the committee thus sets forth the case:

The census act of May 23, 1850, contains the following provision:

"SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That from and after the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, the House of Representatives shall be composed of two hundred and thirty-three members, to be apportioned among the several States in the manner directed in the next section of this act."

And by the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth sections of the same act it is provided that, upon the completion of each enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, after ascertaining from the census returns the representative population of the United States, and of the several States, shall apportion the Representatives among the several States, and "shall, as soon as practicable, make out and transmit, under the seal of his office, to the House of Representatives, a certificate of the number of Members apportioned to each State under the then last enumeration." Under this act the census of 1860 was taken, and the Secretary of the Interior transmitted his certificate to the House.

Under this apportionment the Secretary of the Interior allotted to Virginia 11 Representatives.

The report continues:

On the 31st day of December, 1862, an act was passed providing for the admission of the new State of West Virginia, to consist of 48 counties of Virginia, and to have, until the next general census, 3 Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States, which act was, by its own terms, to take effect at the expiration of sixty days from the date of a proclamation of the President therein provided for.

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 51; 2 Bartlett, p. 810; Rowell's Digest p. 253.

Subsequently the following joint resolution was adopted:

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress hereby recognizes the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson from the State of Virginia to West Virginia, and consents thereto.

"Approved March 10, 1866."

The returns of the census of 1860 show that the representative population of the present State of Virginia was a little less than eight-elevenths of the entire representative population of the old State, including the counties now constituting West Virginia. While, however, the representative population of the counties constituting the present State of Virginia was not quite sufficient to entitle the State to 8 of the 11 Representatives apportioned to the old State, it was considerably more than sufficient to entitle it to 7 of them, so that the assignment of 8 to Virginia and 3 to West Virginia was the nearest practicable approach to an absolutely just distribution of the representation.

In no case have the acts providing for the readmission of the rebel States to the Union embraced any legislation changing or fixing the number of Representatives of the readmitted State. In every case the State has been readmitted with the number of Representatives fixed by the certificate of the Secretary of the Interior transmitted to the House under date of July 5, 1861.

The number of Representatives assigned to the old State of Virginia by the apportionment of 1861 was, as has been already stated, 11. The number assigned to West Virginia by the act of admission was 3. In the opinion of the committee, the present State of Virginia is by law entitled to only 8 Representatives, and the law requires that those shall be chosen by single districts.

The minority views were presented by Mr. Job E. Stevenson, of Ohio, the committee having been nearly evenly divided. The minority say—

Under the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, on the census of 1860, the State of Virginia was entitled to 11 Members. No law has been enacted affecting this apportionment, unless the reconstruction acts relative to that State can be so constructed

The acts and proceedings creating and admitting the new State of West Virginia are silent on this question. They fix the number of Representatives from the new State, but do not touch the topic of representation from Virginia.

It seems to be assumed that because the new State was formed from the side of the old, therefore the act of Congress giving West Virginia the right to 3 Representatives reduced the quota of Virginia from 11 to 8; but we respectfully submit that no such important conclusion can be properly or safely implied from laws containing neither syllable nor letter to support it; and that such latitude of construction would overthrow all rights founded upon statutes.

If the apportionment on the census of 1860 applies at all, it must be accepted in its term, and entitles the State of Virginia to her full quota of 11 Representatives, instead of 9 elected or 8 admitted.

A technical objection may be based upon the provision of the act of June 25, 1842, reenacted in subsequent acts:

"That in each State entitled in the next and any succeeding Congress to more than one Representative, the number to which such State is or may be hereafter entitled shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled in the Congress for which said election is held, no one district electing more than one Representative."

If this provision were deemed applicable, we might answer the objection by showing that it has never been observed, and is not now observed by this House.

In the Twenty-eighth Congress, the first after this provision was enacted, the House admitted 20 Members at large from the States of New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri, respectively, and voted that they had a right to their seats. (See Con. Elect. Cases, 2, p. 47.)

In the Thirty-fifth Congress, in 1858, the House decided "That the election of members by general ticket instead of by district is not a bar to admission to seats in the House." (See case of Phelps and Cavanaugh, Con. Elect. Cases, 2, p. 248.)

That case was from a newly admitted State, and therefore analogous to this of the readmission of a reconstructed State with changed boundaries. But the most striking case is that of the State of Illinois, which has been, ever since the Thirty-eighth Congress, and is now, represented in this House by Member at large notwithstanding this provision, the proviso allowing her a Representative at large having expired with the Thirty-eighth Congress. See act of July 14, 1862, which contains the following:

"And provided further, That in the election of Representatives to the Thirty-eighth Congress from the State of Illinois, the additional Representative allowed to said State by an act entitled 'An act fixing the number of the House of Representatives from and after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-three,' approved March fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, may be elected by the State at large, and the other thirteen Representatives to which the State is entitled by the districts, as now prescribed by law in said State, unless the legislature of said State should otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the election of Representatives therein."

But it is not deemed necessary to dwell upon this point, because it seems obvious that the general act is not applicable to a reconstructed State when a change of circumstances calls for special action.

The claimant further urged that he was entitled to admission because of provisions of the law of Congress taken in connection with certain ordinances of the constitutional convention of Virginia. These ordinances districted the State and provided for a ninth Representative at large. Unlike the constitution itself the ordinances were not ratified by the people.

Claimant urged that the Congress by approving generally the proceedings of reconstruction in Virginia, of which the ordinances were a part, had approved the Representative at large. The majority of the committee denied this, holding that the chain of law was not perfect.

Another point was answered as follows:

3. The claimant cites the following provision of the act which took effect on the 11th day of March, 1868:

"SEC. 2. And be further enacted, That the constitutional convention of any of the States mentioned in the acts to which this is amendatory may provide that, at the time of voting upon the ratification of the constitution, the registered voters may vote also for Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and for all elective officers provided for by the said constitution; and the same election officers who shall make the return of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall enumerate and certify the votes cast for Members of Congress.

And he insists that the authority conferred by this act carries with it the power, first, to district the State, and, secondly, to fix the number of its Representatives; and that these two powers stand on the same footing. But the power to district a State, in accordance with the Federal apportionment, is, by section 4 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, conferred upon the State, subject to the control of Congress, whereas the power to fix or alter the number of Members of the House of Representatives of the United States is vested exclusively in the Federal Government, and even if there is doubt whether a State can exercise the power to district its territory for the election of Representatives otherwise than through its ordinary legislature, there is no doubt that a State can not exercise the power to fix the size of the Federal House of Representatives, whether through its ordinary legislature, or its constitutional convention, or in any other way.

As to the argument that Virginia was entitled to additional representation because she had many thousands of newly enfranchised citizens, the majority of the committee denied that this fact entitled Virginia to representation at once, since the same theory would give immediately increased representation to the other reconstructed States.

The majority reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That Joseph Segar is not entitled to a seat as a Representative of the State of Virginia at large in the Forty-first Congress of the United States.

On July 11[1] the report was considered in the House. After debate a proposition was offered by the minority declaring Mr. Segar entitled to the seat. This was disagreed to—ayes 31, noes 85.

The resolution of the majority declaring Mr. Segar not entitled to the seat was then agreed to without division.

319. Reference to the claim of Nebraska for additional representation.—On February 24, 1883,[2] the House finally disposed of the claim of Nebraska for additional representation on account of alleged defects in the census on which the apportionment was based. The House found that its committee had been imposed on and took action to bring the authors of the imposition to the attention of the authorities.

Chapter IX.

ELECTORATES INCAPACITATED GENERALLY.

320. The North Carolina election case of McFarland v. Purviance, in the Eighth Congress.

The invalidity of an election in one county out of three did not justify declaring the seat vacant.

On February 29, 1804,[3] the Committee on Elections reported on the North Carolina contested election case of McFarland v. Purviance. The committee found that in one county of the district the inspectors and clerks refused to take the oath prescribed by the State law that they should act with justice and impartiality. Therefore the committee conceived that for this reason the election in the county should be set aside.

The committee did not find the result in the remainder of the district successfully attacked, and therefore concluded that there was not sufficient legal testimony to vacate the seat of Samuel D. Purviance, although the result in one county had been set aside.

The House did not act on this report.

321. The North Carolina election case of McFarland v. Culpepper, in the Tenth Congress.

An election being found invalid in three out of five counties in the district, the House declared the seat vacant, declining to seat the contestant.

Early instance of rejection of the returns because election officers did not take the required oath.

The Committee on Elections rejects testimony taken ex parte.

In the North Carolina election case of McFarland v. Culpepper, in 1808,[1] the Committee of Elections, after setting forth the law of the State and the testimony, give in their report the following statement, which covers very well the principles on which the case was decided:

No full official lists of the polls, or number of votes given to the parties contesting, were laid before the committee, but both parties agree that the sitting Member had 2,750, and that Duncan McFarland had 2,701; that consequently John Culpepper had a majority of 49 votes.

From the above recited testimony, admitted by the committee, it appears that the inspectors and clerks officially employed in conducting the elections in Richmond, Anson, and Montgomery counties do not appear to have been sworn as the law of North Carolina expressly directs, and that the votes given in some of these counties, and at some elections in other counties, not being received by officers legally qualified, ought to be rejected.[2] On rejecting the returns of Richmond, Anson, and Montgomery counties, in which it appears, by the list of voters and testimony admitted, that John Culpepper had a majority of 1,578 votes, gives to Duncan McFarland a large majority of votes in these counties. Some depositions were taken before the committee respecting the elections in Moore County, taken at the instance of a friend of John Culpepper, in his absence; but though they go to prove that the elections in Moore County were not conducted agreeably to law, yet, being taken ex parte, they were not admitted.

From the testimony admitted it appears that John Culpepper is not entitled to a seat in the House, he not having a majority of votes legally taken; but though Duncan McFarland appears to have a large majority of votes taken agreeably to law, yet the committee are of opinion that the truth of this is doubtful; they are the more confirmed in this opinion from the sitting Member having expressed his opinion that if he had time allowed him to make a scrutiny he would prove the elections held in the other counties were also conducted contrary to law.

The committee, however, believing that the great object for which the power of judging the elections of Members was vested in Congress, was to secure to the people a representation of the majority of the citizens, the elections of Richmond, Anson, and Montgomery being rejected, give a majority of the votes given in Moore and Cumberland counties to Duncan McFarland, viz, a majority of two counties out of five, which comprise the Congressional district, and the votes of three counties are lost.

The committee are of opinion that, even presuming the votes in Moore and Cumberland to have been legally taken, it would be improper to deprive the other three counties of a representation for the fault of their election officers, etc., therefore think it most proper to give the citizens of that district an opportunity to have another election, and for this purpose submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That from the testimony laid before and admitted by the committee it appears that John Culpepper is not entitled to a seat in this House."

The House having concurred in this resolution, the governor of North Carolina was notified of a vacancy in the House from that district.

322. The Kentucky election case of Blakey v. Golladay, in the Fortieth Congress.

Although the claimant for a seat presented unimpeachable credentials, the House declined to seat him until it had determined that the seat was actually vacant.

Instance of an election case initiated by memorial from the person claiming the seat.

In an election case not provided for by statute the House by resolution determined the conditions of its prosecution.

The House by resolution made certified transcripts of records evidence in an election case.

[2] See also Section 320 for another early instance of rejection of the returns in a case wherein the election officers did not take the required oath.

A resolution providing for the prosecution of an election case is presented as a question of privilege.

On July 5, 1867,[1] Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, presented the memorial of George D. Blakey, praying to be admitted as a Member from Kentucky. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Elections.

On July 11, 1867,[2] Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, offered, as a question of privilege, the following:

> Whereas George D. Blakey asks for admission to this House as a Representative from the Third district of Kentucky, and his competitor, Elijah Hiss, having died before the votes were canvassed, and no other person claiming a seat in this House as a Representative of said district, this case is not provided for by any statute of the United States, but is subject to the provisions of the Constitution: Therefore,
> Resolved, That in this case transcripts of official records and files, and of extracts therefrom and abstracts thereof, duly certified under seal by the clerks of the several county courts in said district, shall be competent evidence before the Committee of Elections and before this House of the facts therein shown.

The question of order being raised that this resolution did not involve a question of privilege, the Speaker[3] said:

> Everything affecting the right of a Member to a seat is a question of privilege.

Thereupon the resolution was agreed to; yeas 92, nays 34.

On November 21, 1867,[4] papers in the case of Mr. Blakey, as contestant, were presented in the House and referred.

On November 25, 1867,[5] the Speaker laid before the House a certificate in regular form from the governor of Kentucky, setting forth that at an election held in the Third Congressional district of that State on August 5, 1867, J. S. Golladay received a majority of the votes cast and was duly elected Representative in the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that the said Golladay be not sworn in pending the investigation of the same.

It was explained that the Committee of Elections were not considering the claim of Mr. Blakey that he should be seated on the ground that he had received a majority of the legal votes, although a majority of the votes actually cast were found to be for the late Mr. Hise. The governor of Kentucky had assumed that there was a vacancy and had ordered an election; but the House was now investigating whether or not there was a vacancy. If Mr. Golladay should now be sworn in, and the House should later find that Mr. Blakey had been elected, the House would have two men in the same seat or Mr. Golladay would be unseated without having had the opportunity to present his case. On the other hand, it was urged that Mr. Golladay had the only prima facie evidence, and that he was entitled to take the seat pending the examination of final right; but the House agreed to the motion of Mr. Dawes; yeas 105, nays 38.

323. The Kentucky election case of Blakey v. Golladay, continued.

An election invalid in 11 out of 12 counties, leaving only 737 valid votes out of 8,941, should cause the seat to be declared vacant.

The exclusion of a disloyal Member-elect would not allow a minority candidate to take the seat.

The death of the person elected creates a vacancy, although no certificate may have been awarded.

The person elected dying before credentials are issued, the minority candidate may not receive the credentials.

On December 2, 1867,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections submitted a report, which stated the case as follows:

The right of these two claimants to the same seat depends upon the validity of elections held at different times, and it therefore becomes necessary to determine in the first instance upon the legality of the election first held, for if the one which is first in point of time be valid the other can not be.

The claim of Mr. Blakey that he was duly elected such Representative rests upon the following facts:

An election for Representatives to the present Congress was ordered by the governor of Kentucky to be held on said 4th day of May last. The claimant, Mr. Blakey, and the Hon. Elijah Hise were candidates for Representatives in the Third district, and were voted for at that election. On the 27th of the same month the governor, attorney-general, and State auditor, who constitute by law a board of canvassers for counting the votes, met in pursuance of law for that purpose and certified the result of the vote on the 4th to be, in this district: For Elijah Hise, 7,740; for G. D. Blakey, 1,201.

After the election and before this canvass, to wit, on the 8th day of said May, the said Elijah Hise died, and Mr. Blakey claimed before the board of canvassers, and renews his claim before the House, that he was entitled to the certificate of election and to retain the seat as such Representative.

First, because at the time of said canvass, he, the said Blakey, was the only person then alive for whom votes had been cast for such Representative. In this the claimant has, in the opinion of the committee, wholly mistaken the function of the board of canvassers. The sole duty of the board is to ascertain the result when the polls closed on the day of election. They can in no way or particular Change or alter that result, but only ascertain and make it known. If the claimant had not, when the polls closed, a majority of the votes legally cast, nothing transpiring subsequently could give him that majority. If Elijah Hise had that majority when the polls closed, that fact is unalterably fixed. it is sometimes quite difficult to ascertain who actually had such majority at the close of the polls, but the determining of that fact determines all else pertaining to the election. A vacancy occasioned by the death of one who has received a majority of the legal votes can not depend upon whether he had or had not received a certificate of his election before his decease. The certificate is not his title to his seat, but simply one form of evidence thereof.

Second, he further claims the seat because, "by the laws of Kentucky governing elections, the judges and other officers of the county courts in said State, in the appointment of officers to hold and conduct elections in said State, are required to appoint officers representing the two political parties in the State, and that each political party should be represented in the officers of every election precinct." This provision of law, he claims, was almost totally disregarded in 11 out of the 12 counties composing this district, thereby rendering illegal the election in those counties, and that in the other county, where this provision was complied with, he received a majority of the votes cast.

After quoting the provisions of law relating to the appointment of election officers, the report considers the evidence adduced to sustain this second objection. Contestant showed by the poll books that but 23 of the election officers voted for him, while 210 voted for Mr. Hise, and 57 did not vote at all. The committee say that obviously the poll books of this election could not have been consulted by the county courts, for the appointments were made long before this election. No evidence was offered to show how these officers voted at the election next preceding their appointment. In fact, there was no evidence sufficient to show that the provisions of the law were disregarded. But it was really not necessary for the committee to determine this, for assuming that contestant's contention was right as to the 11 counties, yet—

In the remaining county, where it is claimed the law was complied with, and the election therefore valid, there were cast only 737 out of 8,941 votes; and of these 737, Mr. Blakey received 378, to 359 for Mr. Hise, leaving only a majority in this county for Mr. Blakey of 19. Of the whole vote in the district, as has been already stated, he received only 1,201. If, therefore, the election was invalid in 11 out of the 12 counties, rendering it impossible to count but 737 votes out of 8,941, no other alternative would be left but to set aside altogether such an election, and remand the case back again to the people, that they might have an opportunity to give expression to their choice in conformity to law. There is no precedent for fixing upon the district representation determined by 378 votes out of 8,941, and the committee see no reason for making one.

The third ground of contestant, that Mr. Hise was disloyal, was not sustained by evidence; and furthermore, the committee were not called on to consider the legal effect of the proposition had it been sustained, since the exclusion of a disloyal person did not allow a minority candidate to take the seat.

The committee therefore arrived unanimously at the following conclusion:

The only objection to the administering the oath of office and admission to the seat of Mr. Golladay, known to the committee, being the claim of the memorialist to be entitled to the seat by virtue of a prior election, this disposition of that claim removes all obstacle, and, in the opinion of the committee, Mr. Golladay should be admitted to the oath of office and to the seat.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That George D. Blakey is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the Third Congressional district in Kentucky.

Resolved, That the oath of office be now administered to J. L. Golladay, and that he be admitted to a seat in this House as a Representative from the Third Congressional district in Kentucky.

The report was debated on December 5, and on that day the resolutions of the committee were agreed to without division, a demand for the yeas and nays having been refused. A proposition to recommit with instructions to examine as to the loyalty of both Messrs. Hise and Golladay had been prevented by the previous question, which was ordered by 102 ayes to 22 noes.

324. The Maryland election case of Whyte v. Harris in the Thirty-fifth Congress.

In a report not approved by the House the Elections Committee recommended that a seat be vacated because of intimidation in five-sixths of the district.

In a case not sustained by the House a question of the degree of intimidation sufficient to justify rejection of the poll was discussed.

An early discussion as to what constituted a distinguishing mark on a ballot.

The Elections Committee having recommended a declaration that the seat be declared vacant, a question arose as to contestant's position.

On June 1, 1858,[1] the Committee on Elections reported in the case of Whyte v.

[1] First session Thirty-fifth Congress, H. Report No. 538; 1 Bartlett, p. 257; Rowell's Digest, p. 156.

Harris, of Maryland. The contestant had alleged frauds, intimidations, and irregularity. The majority of the committee based its conclusions chiefly on two features of the case, alleged widespread intimidation in Baltimore City, and distinguishing marks on the ballots cast for sitting Member, whereby intimidation of his opponents was rendered feasible.

The majority of the committee give in their report copious extracts of testimony showing this intimidation. The minority showed that Mr. Harris had a majority of 3,243 votes in the city wards and of 75 in the districts outside the city. They contended that the evidence in relation to intimidation was too vague. Names of persons alleged to have been intimidated were given, but it was nowhere shown that they would have voted for the sitting Member. Moreover, much of the evidence as to persons intimidated was inadmissible because hearsay in its nature.

The majority of the committee, after stating that a case of riot and intimidation was new in election cases before Congress, quotes English precedents to show that violence and tumult were sufficient reasons for declaring an election void. In the American cases of Trigg v. Precsott and Biddle and Richard v. Wing nothing like a riot or obstruction was shown at the polls. The majority of the committee say:

> Having, then, no case heretofore presented to this House involving a decision as to what extent violence, intimidation, and riot may prevail at elections to warrant a vacation of a seat, we can only refer to the numerous precedents which we find settled by other elective bodies, and to the plain teachings which we derive from our Constitution and theory of government.
> In the judgment of the Committee of Elections, these require the return in this case to be set aside and the seat vacated. It can not be considered the return of an election made by the legal voters of the Third Congressional district of Maryland. An election is the free choice by those who have the right to make it, and who desire and seek to make it, uncompelled, unawed, and unintimidated. The return here was based upon votes alleged to have been cast in that Congressional district. The proofs show that at the first eight wards in the city of Baltimore, and at the twelfth election district of Baltimore County (comprising about five-sixths of the returned votes), in some to a much greater extent than others, but in all to a most culpable extent, violence, tumult, riot, and general lawlessness prevailed. That, as a consequence, the reception of illegal votes and the rejection of legal votes, the acts of disturbance and assault committed on peaceable citizens, and the intimidation of voters so predominated as to destroy all confidence in the election as being the expression of the free voice of the people of that Congressional district.
> The committee are not unmindful of the magnitude of the question they present to the consideration of the House. On the one hand it involves the vacation, temporarily, of a seat in the House of Representatives; on the other, it requires an acquiescence in, if not approval of, a wanton and unjustifiable interference with the most sacred of all political rights to a free people.

The minority did not admit that there had been serious riot or intimidation, and contended that it would be a dangerous precedent to overrule the expressed will of the people because of violence at the polls.

The majority of the committee further state that the tickets used by the party of the sitting Member (the American) were distinguished by a number of red perpendicular stripes across them. The majority conceived that this was a violation of the spirit of the law providing for a ballot system, one of the great objects of which was to allow the elector to make his choice by a secret vote. Such was the intent of the Maryland law. While it might be going too far to reject such ballots, unless so provided by law, yet their use was neither creditable nor just, since it permitted intimidation.

The minority say on this point:

The constitution of the State of Maryland, article 1, section 2, provides that "the vote shall be by ballot;" and the act of assembly regulating elections, 1805, chapter 97, section 12, provides "that upon the ballot shall be written or printed the name or names of the persons voted for, and the purpose for which the vote is given, plainly designated." It is not pretended that this was not done, and we can not for a moment admit that the marks on the ticket, or the color of the paper on which the name and office are thus plainly designated, have anything to do with the legality of the vote cast, or are to be held as infringing the law of the State.

The majority of the committee, in view of the considerations given above, recommended the following:

Resolved, That it appears to this House that there was such tumult, disorder, riot, intimidation, and injustice, in the election of a Representative to Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Maryland, on the 3d day of November last, in contempt of law and in violation of the freedom of elections, that the said election is void, the seat from the said district is hereby declared vacant, and the Speaker of this House be and is directed to notify the governor of said State thereof.

The minority arrived at the conclusion that the sitting member was entitled to the seat.

The case was not debated in the House on its merits. On July 11,[1] near the close of the session, the case was postponed until the next session, by a vote of 96 yeas to 80 nays,

At the next session, on December 15 and 16,[2] the report was called up.

A question arose over the request of Mr. Whyte that he have leave to occupy a seat on the floor and speak on the merits of the contest.

It was objected that he was no longer a contestant and not entitled to the privilege under the precedents; and it appeared, in fact, that he did not consider himself a contestant.

The House, by a vote of yeas 108, nays 90, laid on the table a resolution giving to Mr. Whyte the privilege asked.

Then the report of the committee was, without debate on its merits, laid on the table by a vote of 106 yeas and 97 nays.

So the sitting member retained his seat.

325. The Maryland election case of Harrison v. Davis in the Thirty-sixth Congress.

Discussion of the extent of intimidation sufficient to invalidate an election and justify declaring the seat vacant.

On January 31, 1861,[3] the Committee on Elections reported in the case of Harrison v. Davis, of Maryland. This case was examined, and there were reports from the majority and minority of the committee; but no action was taken by the House on the recommendation of the majority, which was in favor of the sitting Member.

The principal objection of the contestant was that there had been sufficient riot and intimidation to invalidate the whole election.

The majority of the committee found by a comparison with previous national and State elections that the aggregate vote of the district at this election of 1859 was 12,932, while in 1857 it was 14,494, and in 1855 it was 15,481. The committee did not consider the decrease sufficient to be significant; and as the majority of the sitting Member was returned as 7,272, it seemed evident that whatever voters might have been intimidated would not have been sufficient to change the result. As to the law applicable, the majority say:

> We have now to consider the question whether the election is void by reason of riot and intimidation. The specification is, that in all the wards bands of men conspired to exclude and obstruct legal voters who intended to vote for the contestant, and did, in fact, assemble at and near the voting places armed, and by threats intimidated and by violence obstructed and drove away thousands of legal voters, and deterred many from approaching the polls.
> That statement, considered as an allegation of facts which, if proved, avoid the election in point of law, is wholly insufficient.
> It nowhere makes the formal allegation that the law requires: Either that the election was arrested and broken up in every ward, or that so many individuals were excluded by violence and intimidation as would, if allowed to vote, have given the contestant the majority.
> Either of those grounds, if stated and proved, would have been, in law, decisive of the case; but neither is stated in the specification, and neither is proved by the evidence.
> The case attempted to be made is one wholly different from either, and wholly unknown in the annals of election law.
> It assumes that an election is necessarily void at which 2,000 voters are prevented by violence or threats of violence from voting—though the election was never arrested, and though 20,000 may have been cast, and all for one candidate, which is absurd.

The minority of the committee opposed this view. From their analysis of the testimony they concluded that riot and intimidation were general throughout the district, and say:

> But the law obviates the necessity of inquiring as to the number of votes affected by riot, violence, and intimidation, holding the whole election dead when robbed of that freedom which is its soul and life. If there was "actual force or violence, or a display of numerical strength, accompanied with threats, and the conduct of the parties was such as to strike terror into the mind of a man of ordinary firmness, and to deter him from proceeding to the poll" (Cushing, sec. 183), the election must be declared a nullity. And such it unquestionably was at all the polls. * * * The election must, therefore, be declared a nullity.

Other questions relating to disqualified voters and the conduct of election officers were discussed, but they were subordinate to the main issue.

326. The Louisiana election cases of Jones v. Mann and Hunt v. Menard in the Fortieth Congress.

A Member whose seat was contested dying, the House did not admit a claimant with credentials until contestant's claim was settled.

The disqualification of a Member-elect does not entitle a minority candidate to the seat.

Instance of returns of an election made by military officers under authority of reconstruction acts.

Testimony taken before a notary public in disregard of the provisions of law was criticised by the Elections Committee, but given weight.

A contestant neglecting to prove the vote of the district, the Elections Committee had recourse to such official records as it deemed satisfactory.

On July 18, 1868,[1] Mr. James Mann, with other Members-elect from Louisiana, was sworn in and took his seat. He died about the 12th day of August. Mr. Simon Jones had served notice of contest on Mr. Mann, alleging frauds, irregularities, and intimidation in the wards of New Orleans lying within the district. While the Committee on Elections was considering this contest, on December 18, 1868, and January 5, 1869,[2] the credentials of J. Willis Menard, showing him to have been elected in place of Mr. Mann, were presented to the House and referred to the Committee on Elections. No effort was made to have Mr. Menard sworn in, Mr. Jones's title to fill the vacancy not being settled.

On February 17, 1869,[3] the committee reported both on the contest of Mr. Jones, and on the claim of Mr. Menard, whose title was contested by Caleb S. Hunt.

1. As to the contest of Mr. Jones several questions arose for the decision of the committee:

(a) The contestant objected that all the testimony taken in behalf of Mr. Mann was inadmissible because taken before a notary public, an officer not authorized by the act of Congress to take testimony in such cases. This objection was taken in the first instance and returned with the testimony, and the committee find that it is good under a strict construction of the law. The committee say, however, that the view the committee have taken of the case does not render it very material whether the testimony be admitted or not, and as Mr. Mann was dead and some of the testimony related to his eligibility, they had not deemed it proper to exclude it, but would submit it to the House.

(b) A question as to the qualifications of Mr. Mann is thus disposed of:

> But the contestant and his counsel further insist that Mr. Mann was constitutionally ineligible for the reason that he was not "when elected" an inhabitant of the State of Louisiana (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 2, cl. 2), and that the contestant, if he only received the next highest number of votes, should be declared elected, and the votes cast for Mr. Mann should be disregarded. In support of this position it is suggested on his part that, in the absence of any American precedent for this course, the faithful execution of the fourteenth amendment requires the establishment of such a precedent, and that, if voters may choose disqualified members, representation may be defeated in many States.
> The committee does not consider the evidence adduced by the contestant in regard to Mr. Mann's residence or domicile (Mis. Doc. No. 13, pp. 20, 29, 30) sufficiently clear and conclusive to justify it in declaring Mr. Mann constitutionally ineligible at the time of his election, even if the evidence on the part of Mr. Mann were rejected; but it is not necessary to decide upon this question of ineligibility, since, if Mr. Mann were admitted to have been ineligible at the time of holding the election, and the evidence of this held to be satisfactory and conclusive, it would not aid the contestant nor entitle him to the seat, but would only show that there was a vacancy. This is fully shown by the report of the committee in the case of Smith v. Brown (Report No. 11, second session Fortieth Congress) sustained by the House, which, after declaring Mr. Brown not entitled to his seat by reason of disloyalty at the time of his election, at the same time refused to Mr. Smith the seat on the ground that he had not received a majority of the votes cast for Representative at said election in said Congressional district, and directed the Speaker to notify the governor of Kentucky that a vacancy existed in the representation in this House from the said Congressional district of said State.

After quoting from the report in the case referred to, the committee go on to say that as it was made prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment they would, in quoting the report, intimate no opinion concerning any additional powers that might have been conferred upon Congress by the amendment. The committee also state that no statute of Louisiana provided for a minority candidate to succeed a disqualified majority candidate.

(c) The contestant had not proven the vote of the district, either in the aggregate or by precincts, so the committee had recourse to the certified returns of the military officers in command in the district, which showed a plurality of 1,150 votes for Mr. Mann. The contestant thereupon raised a question which went to the validity of the returns and credentials. The committee thus set forth this question:

> The ex parte and unauthorized testimony of Mr. F. Leon, taken before a justice of the peace in this district January 11, 1869, since the death of Mr. Mann, is the only other evidence as to the votes cast at this election in this Congressional district, and it is insisted by the counsel for the contestant that such sworn statement of this witness is better evidence than the return of General Buchanan, who, as contestant claims, "had no jurisdiction over Congressional elections," and that "the sworn proof therefore stands upon higher ground than the voluntary statements of General Buchanan about a matter not within his jurisdiction."
> He concedes, however, that by the reconstruction laws it is made the duty of the commanding general to receive and return the votes upon the ratification of the Constitution. The contestant and his counsel, in assuming this position above stated, seem to have overlooked the provisions of the supplementary reconstruction act of March 11, 1868, subsequent to which this election was held, which act makes provision for the election of Members of Congress at the same time that the vote is taken on the adoption of the Constitution, and declares that "the same election officers who shall make the return of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the Constitution shall enumerate and certify the votes cast for Members of Congress." It is considered, therefore, that the commanding general, in making and certifying the returns of the votes cast at this election for Members of Congress was acting under the authority conferred by the reconstruction laws aforesaid, and that his return is higher evidence than, or at least not inferior to, the brief, general, and somewhat vague and indefinite statement of Mr. Leon, sworn to as aforesaid.
> The House of Representatives, also, in admitting Mr. Mann and his colleagues from Louisiana to their seats on the certificate of said commanding general, as also in admitting Members from Georgia and South Carolina on similar certificates, seems to have recognized this construction of the law and the jurisdiction of said officers in the matter of said election returns.

(d) Inasmuch as there was no evidence before the committee showing the returns of the various precincts, they could not proceed to apply the testimony as to frauds and intimidation—which was, moreover, not very definite—in any way to destroy Mr. Mann's plurality. They conclude:

> The most favorable construction of the evidence for the contestant that could be given would not identify and count up additional votes enough in his favor to equal one-half of the majority returned for Mr. Mann, much less to give him the majority, even if all the votes assumed by witnesses to have been changed in the ballot boxes or fraudulently put in were charged to the Democratic vote, deducted from Mr. Mann's majority, and counted for the contestant. The only remedy for or correction of the evils complained of, under the state of the case as presented, would be to set aside the returns, declare a vacancy, and order a new election, as it is impossible from the evidence to purge the poll; but this the contestant does not desire or insist should be done, nor do the committee consider the evidence sufficient to justify such a course.

Therefore the committee reported a resolution declaring that Mr. Jones, the contestant, not having received a majority of the votes, was not entitled to the seat in question.

On February 27,[1] after debate, an amendment declaring Mr. Jones entitled to the seat was rejected without division, a demand for the yeas and nays being refused. Then the resolution of the committee was agreed to.

327. The Louisiana election cases of Jones v. Mann and Hunt v. Menard, continued.

The House declined to admit a claimant on the vote of three out of seven parishes, 19,078 out of 27,019 votes having been rejected.

An election to fill a vacancy being held in a newly apportioned district, the larger portion of which was new, both as to territory and people, the elections committee considered the election invalid.

A question as to whether or not the House, from historic knowledge merely, may decide that the result of an election has been invalidated by intimidation.

A seat having been adjudged vacant, the House yet declined to admit a claimant whose final right was then under examination.

Reference to historical facts in determining prima facie effect of regular credentials.

The law governing the serving of notice of contest may be departed from in a case where its observance is impracticable.

2. The examination of the contest of Hunt v. Menard involved several questions:

(a) In the first place, immediately after the decision of the House that Mr. Jones was not entitled to the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Mann, a demand was made that, as Mr. Menard had presented credentials in due form, he should be sworn in pending the decision of the final right. The Committee on Elections, who had reported that neither Mr. Menard nor Mr. Hunt was entitled to the seat, resisted this proposition, it being stated that accompanying Mr. Menard's credentials was a certified statement of the governor and secretary of state giving reasons which induced them to throw out certain votes, which reasons were not good, tending to show that Mr. Menard was not really elected. It was also stated that in all cases from the reconstructed States the bearers of certificates had not been sworn in until the credentials had been examined by the committee. The question was brought to a vote in the shape of an amendment directing that Mr. Menard be sworn in pending the decision of his case. This amendment was disagreed to, yeas 57, nays 130.[2] In the argument it was admitted[3] that the usual rule was that a person having a certificate in proper form was entitled to be sworn in in the absence of objection; but the House had at this session in the reconstructed States taken notice of historical facts, and had not sworn in Members-elect until their certificates had been examined.

(b) The majority of the committee in their report discuss a preliminary question relating to notice of contest:

> It is objected, however, by Mr. Menard, that no notice of contest has been served on him as required by law, and that therefore Mr. Hunt is not properly here to contest his right to the seat. In reply to this it is urged by Mr. Hunt and his counsel that the certificate of Mr. Menard bears date November 25, 1868, and about the time when the final decision of the canvassers was made, and that as the session of Congress was to commence on the first Monday in December next succeeding, and to close on the 4th of March following, to wait the time allowed by law for giving notice and answer, and then for taking testimony, would be to permit Mr. Menard to take and hold the seat during the whole of the remaining official term, and to prevent the contest from ever being heard by this Congress, which only has jurisdiction of it. He also suggests that as no other evidence was needed by him to support his claim than the certified copy of the returns and the reasons given for their rejection, he has, by filing his protest with the House, addressed to the Speaker, stating his objections to Mr. Menard's claim to the seat, and the grounds on which he claims the same, with the evidence by which it is supported, given Mr. Menard sufficient notice, under the circumstances, and that a literal compliance with the terms of the acts of Congress was impossible without defeating him in the contest by putting off taking the evidence and the hearing of the case beyond the lifetime of the Congress to which it relates.

He also urges that the statute is directory, and has been so treated in some cases arising under it in the House, and that under the Constitution the power exists in this Congress, independent of the statute, to hear and determine this case as presented.

Were it necessary to decide this question, it is proper to say that Mr. Hunt presents some very good reasons in justification of the course he has pursued under all the circumstances of the case, but the view the committee has taken of the election itself does not, in its judgment, require that it should pass upon this objection raised by Mr. Menard, and also since it is the right of any of the legal voters of the district to petition Congress and to call in question the right of any person claiming the seat.

The minority in their views [1] thus discuss Mr. Menard's objection:

To this objection Mr. Hunt answers, that the notice of contest which he laid before the House on the 18th December, 1868 (within the thirty days required by law), was, at the time, known to him (Menard), he being present in the House at the time to present his credentials; that the grounds of contest were particularly set forth in said notice; that the contest was so limited in its range of inquiry and investigation as to require only testimony of record and construction of law; that such testimony was furnished along with the notice, and therefore Mr. Hunt submits that Mr. Menard had notice sufficient in all respects of time and particularity to put him upon his defense.

Since the passage of the act of 1851 regarding contested elections, the rulings and decisions of the Committee of Elections, sustained by the House, in respect to the construction and application of its provisions and the practice thereunder, have been most liberal in regard to the personal rights of contestants and the constitutional rights of constituencies, and the rights and powers of the House as involved more or less in every case of contested election.

After citing the cases of Wright v. Fuller, Daily v. Eastabrook, Williamson v. Sickles, Vallandigham v. Campbell, and Chapman v. Ferguson, the minority conclude:

In the judgment of the undersigned, in view of the facts in the premises and in the spirit of such rulings of the Committee of Elections, the notice given by Mr. Hunt as aforesaid was, for all the purposes of this contest and protection of the rights of Mr. Menard, legally and substantially sufficient.

(c) The committee found that Mr. Menard [2] was not elected:

From the said certified statement it will be seen that the whole number of votes cast at said election to fill such vacancy in said district was 27,019, of which votes so returned to the secretary of state 19,078 were rejected by the committee of canvassers and the returns thrown out, being a large majority of the entire vote of the district as returned, and the certificate was given to Mr. Menard on the vote of but three of the seven parishes of the district, and casting in the aggregate only a vote of 7,941. The vote of the single parish of Orleans, one of those rejected, was 11,628, being nearly four-ninths of the entire vote of the district, and 3,687 votes more than the entire vote on which the certificate was given to Mr. Menard.

The reason given in the certified statement for the rejection of the vote of the parish of Orleans, viz, "that the returns were made by the boards of supervisors of registration," shows that in this respect the returns were made as required by law, and that the objection is invalid.

[1] Signed by Messrs. M. C. Kerr, of Indiana, and J. W. Chanler, of New York.

[2] Mr. Menard was the first colored man to present himself for a seat in the House.

By the provisions of section 25 of act No. 164, Laws of Louisiana, 1868, page 223, it is expressly made the duty of said supervisors of registration in each parish to make out and forward said returns to the secretary of state. It is unnecessary to notice further the objections stated to the returns from the other parishes rejected (although those urged against Jefferson and Terrebonne would seem to be frivolous), since, if any valid election was held there, the parish of Orleans, being properly returned, should be counted, which would give Mr. Hunt a majority over Mr. Menard so great that it would not be overcome by the vote of all or any of the other parishes, if they were counted, and in no event can Mr. Menard be shown by the returns to have received a majority vote in the district.

(d) Another reason for denying a seat to Mr. Menard and also to Mr. Hunt appeared in the fact that after the election of Mr. Mann, who was originally chosen to represent the district in question (the Second district), the State had been redistricted by the act of August 22, 1868, which so changed the boundaries of districts that the old Second district could not be recognized in the new Second. The largest portion of the new Second, both in territory and numbers, was made up of what was the old Third district, a district represented on the floor by a Member chosen at the time Mr. Mann was originally chosen to represent the old Second, The election at which Mr. Menard and Mr. Hunt were rival candidates was held after the apportionment, and in the new Second district. The committee say of this situation:

So far as the numbering of this new district is concerned it might with as much propriety have been called the Third district as the Second, and it would be difficult to say in which of the new districts as created and arranged by the act of August 22, 1868, the vacancy had occurred, or to which of the new districts the governor of the State should have issued his writ of election to fill the vacancy which the death of Mr. Mann had caused if the election to fill the vacancy was compelled to be holden under the law of 1868 creating the new districts. The only case to which the attention of the committee has been called as a precedent is that of Perkins v. Morrison (Bartlett's Election Case, p. 142), which is against this objection raised by Mr. Hunt, but in that case there was a minority report signed by four of the Committee of Elections, and the report of the majority was sustained in the House by the close vote of only 98 to 90, and, in the opinion of your committee, the soundest reasoning is contained in the report of the minority in that case, and sustains the objection raised here against the validity of this election.

The very objection which was urged in that case and which the majority in the concluding part of their report were compelled to admit, as a consequence of their position, is exemplified in the case now under consideration, and it is thus stated in their report:

"It was, that if the legislature of New Hampshire could change the boundaries of the district, they might have so divided it as to render it impossible to determine to which district the governor's precept should have been sent."

The act of the legislature of Louisiana of August 22, 1868, making a new division of the State into its five Congressional districts, by its terms, purports to repeal all laws and parts of laws in conflict with said act, but is silent on the subject of vacancies that might occur in the districts as then existing.

The committee then quotes the minority views in the case of Perkins v. Morrison, which dwells upon the impropriety of a decision which would allow a portion of the people to have two Representatives, while another should have none in whose choice they had participated. They then conclude:

This reasoning, which your committee consider as sound and pertinent, applied to the case under consideration seems to be conclusive against this election; and it may also be added that, whatever power a State legislature may have in the matter, it is absurd to say that a district when once established and a Representative chosen therein is not to continue for the whole Congress for which the election has once been operative. No election to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Mann appears to have been notified or held in the whole of said district as represented by him.

The returns on which Mr. Menard predicates his claim to the seat are from parishes wholly outside of said district, and comprised in the district which Hon. J. P. Newsham was chosen to represent and is now representing in this House (act No. 54, Laws of Louisiana, 1864–65, p. 144), and which parishes, in the judgment of your committee, had no lawful right to participate in the election to fill the vacancy in another district, caused by the death of Mr. Mann.

But while the objection is thus fatal to Mr. Menard's claim to the seat, it is equally fatal to the claim of Mr. Hunt.

The minority [1] quote the New Hampshire case and says:

The reasoning of the majority of the committee in that case seems clear, forcible, and conclusive. The regulation of the districts is under the exclusive control of the States until, by act of Congress, it is taken from them. This jurisdiction has never yet been asserted by Congress. The State, therefore, had full power to create the new district. It did so, and then repealed all preexisting laws on the subject. The vacancy could not have been filled by an election held otherwise than under the provisions of the last law. It was therefore so held, in fact, and by order of the governor of the State.

But as we proceed to make it clear that if the entire vote cast in the election precincts now included in the Second district which were not in the old district be rejected, it will not materially change the result, or in any just sense sustain the decision of the majority in this case. The decision of the majority amounts to a denial of representation. This ought never to be done where it is possible to avoid it.

It is argued by the majority of the committee that the electors of the Second district who originally voted at the election of Mr. Mann, to serve during the Fortieth Congress, could alone legally elect a successor to fill his vacancy for the same Congress, and therefore that the recent election, November 3, 1868, to fill such vacancy, was invalid by reason of the participation therein of the electors of the several parishes and the ward which had been added to the district since Mann's election. If this argument be sound, it can fairly and legally apply only in such cases where the legitimate vote can not be separated nor sufficiently ascertainable from the illegitimate.

(e) The majority of the committee state these facts in support of a contention that there had been intimidation:

When Mr. Mann was elected, the Second district, as then constituted by the act of April 4, 1865, was wholly within the parish of Orleans, though not comprising the whole of said parish, and his aggregate vote was in April, 1868, 6,874, and the vote for Mr. Jones, as returned, was 5,634, besides 349 scattering votes given for other Republican candidates, making the aggregate vote opposed to Mr. Mann 5,983. At the late election in November, only a little over six months after, when under the act of August 22, 1868, other parishes were included in this district and a portion of the parish of Orleans, this portion of the parish of Orleans now in the district returns 11,535 votes for Mr. Hunt for both the Fortieth and Forty-first Congresses, and but 93 votes for Mr. Menard for the Fortieth Congress and 115 for Mr. Sheldon for the Forty-first Congress. The smallness and wonderful decrease of the Republican vote, the vastness and wonderful increase of the Democratic vote, and its exact coincidence for both Congresses, are all somewhat strange and not easily susceptible of satisfactory explanation on the theory of a fair and honest election.

The committee then go on to cite other things of which the House might take notice, the fact that "for some weeks immediately preceding this election civil disturbance, disorder, and crime prevailed to such extent by reason of the lawlessness of the disloyal element prevalent there that the civil authorities were unable to put it down." The committee cite the fact that the State legislature called ineffectually on the National Executive for troops, and quotes from letters of the governor. It was unsafe for loyal citizens to speak their sentiments freely, to participate in political meetings, or vote at the election. The majority therefore conclude:

Sufficient of these matters exist of which notice may be taken in connection with the facts in evidence in the case to justify the conclusion, in the opinion of your committee, that no valid election has been held to fill the vacancy in the said Second Congressional district.

The minority assailed vigorously this position of the committee in regard to intimidation. They denied the facts by implication, if not directly, and questioned the law. It was urged [1] in the debate that there was no allegation as to intimidation before the committee and that there was no proof of it. An election case, like a suit at law, should be decided on things asserted and proven. The letter of the governor did not amount even to ex parte evidence. Further in the debate the fact that the committee had proved nothing definite as to votes prevented by the alleged intimidation was urged.

The report was debated at length on February 27,[2] the question presented being this resolution presented by the majority of the committee:

Resolved, That neither J. Willis Menard nor Caleb S. Hunt is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the Second Congressional district of Louisiana, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of James Mann.

Mr. Luke P. Poland moved to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting a provision that the report be recommitted, with instructions to take testimony in reference to "any improper or unlawful means used to prevent a free and fair election."

Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, moved to amend the amendment by adding a provision that Mr. Menard be admitted on his prima facie right pending consideration of the case.

Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted a substitute declaring Mr. Hunt, the contestant, entitled to the seat.

The question being first taken on the amendment of Mr. Kerr, it was decided in the negative, yeas 41, nays 137.

On the amendment of Mr. Paine there were yeas 57, nays 130, and it was rejected.

Then, on motion of Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, the whole subject was laid on the table.[3]

328. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, Kennedy and Morey v. McCranie, Newsham. v. Ryan, and Darrall v. Bailey in the Forty-first Congress.

While the Clerk may not give prima facie effect to credentials not explicitly showing the bearers to be duly elected, the House has done so after examining the returns.

The House assigned prima facie title to a claimant, although papers accompanying the credentials raised a question as to the final right.

The House declined to consider, in the assignment of prima facie title, a question of law as to rejection of votes by canvassing officers.

[3] Journal, pp. 473–475.

The House has examined validity of elections and qualifications of a claimant when determining prima facie title, leaving final right for later inquiry.

The House adjudged valid for prima facie title an election wherein parishes casting 14,346 out of 27,055 votes in the district were rejected.

A resolution for the investigation of the right of a claimant to a seat presents a question of privilege.

On March 4, 1869,[1] at the organization of the House, the names of the Members-elect from the State of Louisiana were not found on the Clerk's roll, particularly the name of Lionel A. Sheldon. These Members-elect bore certificates as follows in form:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, November 25, 1868.

To all to whom these presents may come:

Know ye that, in accordance with the laws of the State of Louisiana, an election was held by the qualified electors of this State on the 3d day of November, A. D. 1868, for five Members of Congress, to represent the First, Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Congressional districts of the State of Louisiana in the Forty-first Congress of the United States, and for one Member of Congress from the Second Congressional district to the Fortieth Congress, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. James Mann.

And whereas the returns of said election made to the secretary of state, as required by law, have been carefully examined, compared, and attested by the proper officers whose duty it was to examine the same;

And whereas it has been ascertained from said returns that Lionel Allen Sheldon received 5,108 votes, and Caleb S. Hunt 2,833 votes, cast at said election:

Now, therefore, I, Henry C. Warmoth, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that Lionel Allen Sheldon received a majority of the votes cast for Representative to the Forty-first Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Louisiana.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State to be affixed this 5th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1868, and of the independence of the United States the ninety third.

[SEAL.]

H. C. WARMOTH,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

GEO. E. BOVEE, Secretary of State.

The Clerk had declined to put the names of the Members-elect on the roll because the words "duly elected" did not appear in the credentials.[2] The law of Louisiana had provided that the proper officials "shall proceed to ascertain from the said returns the person duly elected, a certificate of which shall be * * * signed by the governor," etc. In 1865 the credentials given by the governor, in the ancient form of the State, had certified that the bearer "was duly elected a Member of the Thirty-ninth Congress."

The Clerk having declined to place the names on the roll, the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That, inasmuch as the names of Louis St. Martin, Lionel A. Sheldon, and George W. McCranie, claiming severally to be elected Representatives from the State of Louisiana in the Forty-first Congress, have been omitted by the Clerk from the roll of Members because, as is alleged, their several credentials or certificates of election do not show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of said State or of the United States, the credentials of the said severally named persons be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, for inquiry and examination into the right of said persons, respectively, to be admitted on their said certificates to take the seats which they claim, with the instructions to said committee to report at as early a day as practicable.

On March 9[1] Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, as a question of privilege, presented a preamble and resolution, the former referring to an official declaration of the governor of Louisiana and a legislative report of that State as authority for statements that riot and intimidation had prevailed, and the latter providing that the committee on elections, in addition to examining the credentials, shall inquire into the validity of the election * * * and ascertain in which of said districts, if any, a valid election was held, and shall also inquire whether the persons claiming to have been elected in such districts are qualified under the Constitution and laws to take seats as Members of this House.

A question of order being raised that this resolution did not involve a question of privilege, the Speaker[2] said:

Anything which goes to vindicate the right of a Member to a seat, whether an investigation or anything else, is within the privilege of the House.

This resolution was agreed to, yeas 117, nays 46.

On March 31,[3] Mr. Job E. Stevenson, of Ohio, submitted the report of the majority of the committee. This report, after citing the facts as to the certificates, says:

If the case rested upon the certificate alone, the right of the holder to a seat might be questioned; but upon this point, which is involved in other cases not yet considered, the committee do not deem it necessary now to pass. By the official returns, as examined and certified according to law, it appears that Lionel Allen Sheldon received 5,108 votes and Caleb S. Hunt 2,833 votes. This official statement, which was before the committee, also showed that the following votes were rejected: For Lionel A. Sheldon 3,606, for Caleb S. Hunt 15,508. The statement gave the reasons for the rejection of these votes.

The committee proceed to say:

Whatever might be the result of a contest involving the validity of these returns, and the sufficiency of the reasons assigned for rejecting the parishes which were rejected, the returns are to be received as prima facie evidence of the result of the election, and upon them Mr. Sheldon is entitled to take the seat, subject to any contest which may be lawfully made, unless he is disqualified or the election was void.

The report then states that Mr. Sheldon was not disqualified.

In the debate it was asserted[4] that the credentials were sufficient prima facie evidence for the House to seat Mr. Sheldon. The statute required that the Clerk in making up the roll should not put on the names of those not explicitly shown to be duly elected. The House was not governed by such strictness.

The minority[5] also contended that the certificate was sufficient in this respect, although not in another:

A prima facie right must be founded upon and established by prima facie evidence, and prima facie evidence is that evidence which is sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted. Now apply this definition to the case under consideration. Unless rebutted, the certificate which Mr. Sheldon holds is prima facie evidence: (1) That an election was held at the time, place, and for the purpose therein expressed; and (2) that he received the highest number of votes cast at the election, which necessarily constitutes his election, and thereby establishes prima facie his right, or, in other phrase, his prima facie right to be admitted to the seat. But his certificate of prima facie evidence is rebutted by a like official and authenticated statement of equal force, and showing also (1) that the election was held at the time, place, and for the purpose therein expressed; and (2) that Mr. Hunt received the highest number of votes cast at the election, and which necessarily constitutes his election, and thereby establishes prima facie his right to be admitted to the seat. Now, what becomes of Mr. Sheldon's prima facie right? It falls, of course, unsustained by prima facie evidence; and thus his claim is of no higher validity than Mr. Hunt's in a prima facie sense, and upon the form of the papers, and in substantial merits, as made manifest on the face of the certificates, it becomes utterly worthless and proves nothing to the advantage of Mr. Sheldon. The papers, taken together, establish the vital fact that Sheldon is not elected, and that Hunt is elected by a triumphant majority of 9,627 votes. Or, rejecting the parishes of Terrebonne, St. John the Baptist, and Jefferson, he is then elected by a majority of 9,135. This conclusive result is shown by the papers and the law alone, without any resort whatever to other evidence or sources of information.

The point made by the minority is elaborated more clearly in the debate.[1] The certificate of facts, which was signed by the governor and secretary of state under seal, gave the returned vote and the reasons in law for the rejection of the returns from certain parishes. The minority contended that the reference to the law brought that law within the view of the committee, and that the question whether or not the returns were properly rejected should be settled as part of the prima facie case. Comparing this certified paper with the credentials, the minority say:

This paper springs from the same fountain; is based upon and authorized by the same law; is executed by the same officers; relates to the same subject-matter, and declares certain facts in reference thereto, from which arise, by inevitable and logical implication, different legal results and conclusions from those promulgated in the certificate to Mr. Sheldon.

In all matters pertaining to the settlement or adjudication of contested elections, the House acts judicially, and not otherwise. Whenever any legal or official papers, executed in connection with such contests, and properly brought to the knowledge of the House, are based upon, or refer to, any general laws, State or Federal, for the regulation of elections, it is the imperative duty of the House to take notice of all such laws. It is the conclusive presumption of law that the House is acquainted with them. If any action in connection with an election is based upon provisions or constructions of law, and not upon facts, the law needs not to be set out in the official paper based upon it, but the House must take judicial notice of it, and must be its own exclusive judge as to its interpretation. These rules are elementary and important, and apply with great propriety and force to this case.

To this the majority replied that the tribunal in Louisiana having jurisdiction passed on the question of law, and while the House might review the decision in determining the final right, it should not do so on the prima facie question.[2]

329. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, etc., continued.

The House, going outside the allegations of the parties and ascertaining by historic knowledge disturbances causing 232 deaths, declared an election invalid.

[2] Remarks of Mr. Cessna, Globe, p. 642.

The committee having also been instructed to inquire into the validity of the election, the majority of the committee arrived at the following conclusions of fact:

In the city of New Orleans and in Jefferson Parish, which adjoins and is practically part of the city, there was for about one week prior to and at the date of the election a reign of terror unsurpassed in the history of this country. The disloyal inhabitants, stimulated by the hope of reviving rebellion and regaining the lost cause, organized and armed, overcame the feeble resistance of the civil authorities, overawed the military commanders, and ran riot through the city, shooting down on sight and murdering in cold blood loyal citizens, white and colored, without offense or provocation, save those of loyalty and color.

By the official reports of the committee of the legislature of Louisiana appointed to investigate the facts, it appears that in these two parishes 232 Republicans were killed, shot, or otherwise maltreated-69 in Jefferson and 173 in Orleans.

This violence prevented nearly one-half the registered electors from voting.

Assuming that nearly all the electors thus prevented would have voted under peaceable conditions, the majority conclude that the election should be invalidated in part. They say:

It is evident, from the testimony referred to the committee, that in the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson there was no valid election, and the question arises whether this should invalidate the election in the other parishes of the district and set aside the entire returns.

In all the other parishes the election was quiet and the vote was as full as that usually cast in loyal States; and it would seem unreasonable and unjust that the peaceable electors of the district should be denied the right of representation because their violent neighbors attempted and failed to deprive them of that right.

The better rule would seem to be that indicated by the legislature of Louisiana, in the resolution referred to the committee, to exclude the disorderly and count the peaceable parishes, thereby defeating the violent and protecting the peaceable and law-abiding citizens in the right of representation.

The minority condemn the conclusion of the majority and the reasoning on which it is based, saying:

The parties to this contest do not allege invalidity in the election by reason of the existence of violence, intimidation, terror, or anarchy. They specifically and emphatically deny all such charges. But the majority of the committee assume the existence of such a state of disorder as should invalidate the election in this parish. The certificates afford no support or countenance to this assumption. There is no legal evidence before the committee to establish it. But the majority seem to have borrowed their faith on this subject from a report made to the legislature of Louisiana by a committee of that body. That report is not properly or legally before the committee; and if it were, it does not contain legal evidence to be used in this contest, and in every respect it is intrinsically and notoriously unfit to be received. It is wholly ex parte and transparently and meanly partisan, and, judged by itself, it is unworthy of respect or belief.

But the majority, by a singular disregard of the appropriate limits of an inquiry into alleged prima facie titles, attempts, by a process of argument and comparison of party votes and strength at a preceding election, to deduce the legal conclusion that if all the legal votes in the parish of Orleans that were not cast had been cast at the Congressional election in question, they would in fact have been cast for Mr. Sheldon, and that therefore he would have been elected, and ought now to be allowed to be sworm in as a Member. They appear to have no doubt but that every man who did not vote wanted to vote for Mr. Sheldon and that the House should now declare the result to be the same as if they had in fact all voted for Mr. Sheldon.

The majority reported a resolution giving the seat to Mr. Sheldon on his prima facie showing.

The report was debated in the House on April 8,[1] and a proposition of the minority that Mr. Hunt be seated was decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 101. Then the resolution of the majority seating Mr. Sheldon was agreed to—yeas 85, nays 37.

Mr. Sheldon accordingly took the oath.

330. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, etc., continued.

Instance wherein the House, by resolution, removed the contested cases of a State from operation of the law and prescribed a different procedure.

On the day preceding the decision to seat Mr. Sheldon, on April 7, 1869,[2] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That each of the persons claiming seats in the Forty-first Congress as Representatives of the several Congressional districts of the State of Louisiana, excepting such as have been, or before the close of the present session shall be, reported by the Committee of Elections to this House as unable to take the oath prescribed in the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, shall, on or before the 15th day of April, 1869, file with the Clerk of the House a statement of the grounds upon which he claims such seat, and a subcommittee shall be appointed by the Committee of Elections with power to administer oaths, take testimony, and send for persons and papers to investigate the facts connected with the late elections for Representatives in said several districts during the recess of Congress, at such time and places in the State of Louisiana as they may determine; and upon such investigation and upon the evidence heretofore lawfully taken in said respective cases the Committee of Elections shall at the next session of Congress report to the House whether the elections in the said several districts were lawful, regular, and valid, and which of said persons, if any, were lawfully elected to represent said districts, respectively, in the Forty-first Congress, and whether said claimants are able to take the oath of office prescribed in the act of July, 1862, with a full statement of facts in each case.

Under this resolution a question arose which was thus described and discussed when the committee reported on the final right to Mr. Sheldon's seat in the next session:

The sitting Member claims that as the resolution admitting him to the seat was subsequent to that of April 7, 1869, under which we are now proceeding, the latter does not apply to his case, and he insists that his case is to be further considered, if at all, solely under the act regulating contested elections, by which it is provided that notice of contest shall be given within thirty days after the result of the election shall have been declared. Under this act the notice should have been given within thirty days from November 25, 1868, but no notice was given until January 30, 1869; consequently the notice was not sufficient to sustain a contest "according to law," unless the objection was waived, which does not appear, the contestee having made and maintained the objection at every stage of the case. The committee thought proper, notwithstanding this objection, and subject to protest, to proceed in the examination of witnesses in this case; and while upon a rigid construction of the resolutions of the House under the technical rules of law it might be difficult to escape the conclusion claimed by the contestee, we submit the question without recommendation, and assume that the House in its discretion may enter into the consideration of the case upon its merits.

The minority took a more positive view:

In respect to the legal technicality urged by Mr. Sheldon and presented by the majority of the committee as one of the grounds of his right to the seat, viz, that as he was admitted to the seat subject only to a contest according to law, no person has a right to contest the seat, because he has never received any notice of contest within the time required by the law of 1851. The answer to such special pleading is, that Mr. Hunt's right to contest the seat does not now depend upon technical conformity to the law of 1851. The House resolution of 7th April not only authorizes it, but from the moment of its passage became the law and the rule under which the contest should be tried, and Mr. Hunt has complied with its requirements, and therefore is contesting according to law. The House has fallen back upon its constitutional prerogative of judging of the election and qualification of its own Members, and has taken the contest out of the hands of the parties, and commenced the case de novo. Mr. Sheldon has admitted the new status of the contest by filing his statement of the grounds of his claim, in obedience to the requirements of the resolution. Under that resolution he was admitted on prima facie right to take his seat, subject to any contest against him according to law; and Mr. Hunt, having conformed to the requirements of the House resolution, is now contesting his right to the seat in accordance with law.

331. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, etc., continued.

The House has decided that widespread and organized intimidation might invalidate the polls, although the disorder ceased before the actual day of election, when the polls were quiet.

The poll of a district in a prior year has been referred to in deciding upon the effect of a widespread system of intimidation.

The report as to the final right was submitted on March 16, 1870,[1] by Mr. Stevenson. As this case was typical of the other Louisiana cases the report considers first the general principle underlying the contests in the five districts from the State. The majority of the committee found it established by official records as follows in regard to certain disturbed parishes distributed among the five districts:

The number of electors registered in those parishes under the reconstruction acts in 1867 was 74,106; 31,413 white and 42,693 colored; being a majority of 11,280 of colored electors.

The Republican vote, at the election in 1867 for the constitutional convention, was 38,335, being a majority of all the registered electors.

The Democratic vote was 2,482, the mass of that party not voting because, under the reconstruction acts, a majority of registered electors was requisite to the calling of a convention.

At the next election, held in April, 1868, there were 30,895 votes cast in favor of the Republican State, parish, legislative, and Congressional ticket, against 26,553, cast for independent candidates, adopted by the Democracy.

The next election was that in question, being the Presidential and Congressional election of 1868, when the number of Republican votes cast in these parishes was 3,359, of which number eight parishes cast 3,339. Three parishes cast two Republican votes each. Five parishes cast one Republican vote each. Seven parishes cast no Republican votes.

The majority find it established by testimony that previous to the election a condition of terrorism was inaugurated in the parishes in question. Oath-bound bands of armed men, organized in a secret fraternity, set on foot organized intimidation and riot, and the report says "it is estimated by those best informed that not less than 2,000 Republicans were killed, wounded by gunshots, or otherwise seriously injured." This caused the Republicans generally to avoid the polls on election day. The majority of the committee therefore propose the following rule:

If it be said that there might Dot have been any violence, the answer is that recent events had raised a reasonable apprehension of danger, sufficient in law to cause a man of ordinary prudence to so act as to avoid the probable danger.

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 38; 2 Bartlett, p. 703; Rowell's Digest, p. 241.

It may be said that because the statutes of Louisiana provide that actual violence at the polls should void the election, therefore no election can be set aside for violence at any other time or place, however it may affect the minds or conduct of electors; and this may have been the view of the Democratic leaders in causing or permitting cessation of violence immediately, before the day of election, and in keeping the peace among themselves at the polls. They may have supposed that they could violate the spirit of the State statute without incurring the penalty of its letter. It is submitted that no such views of law should be allowed to prevail. Such a ruling would overturn established principles, and give license to lawlessness. The rule applicable is well expressed in the act of Congress known as the first reconstruction act, passed March 2, 1867, section 5, where it is provided as one of the essentials of valid election that it shall appear "that all the registered and qualified electors had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud."

This act was passed with special reference to the circumstances surrounding the freedmen of the late rebellious States, and it is well adapted to test the fairness and validity of such elections. It is declaratory of an established rule of contested election law, and is at present our only available means of securing fair and peaceable elections in the reconstructed States. It should be strictly and impartially enforced until we shall be prepared to protect the voter in the exercise of his rights, or to punish those who violate them; and it may be that experience will demonstrate that the best permanent practicable means of securing fair and free elections in the reconstructed States will be such an application of this great principle as will teach all parties that they have nothing to gain by intimidation and violence. It is proposed to apply this rule to the several disputed parishes of the districts of the State of Louisiana, and under its operation to reject the returns from those parishes, if any, in which it shall clearly appear from the testimony that the electors generally had not an opportunity to vote "freely and without restraint, fear, or influence of fraud."

As to the remaining parishes in which it shall appear that the election was valid, it is proposed that the returns therefrom, when properly authenticated or proved, shall be counted, and the result in each district determined from such returns.

The minority [1] do not admit either the facts alleged to be shown by the testimony or the principle of law.

The anarchy, violence, and public disturbance in the city of New Orleans, set up by contestee and the majority of the committee as a proper ground for rejecting the returns of the election in the said five wards thereof, appears, by the testimony of the witnesses testifying on that point, to have occurred sometime prior to the election, and therefore could not necessarily in any manner interrupt the proceedings at the election, nor prevent the ascertainment of the result.

The rule of law is well settled upon the question of riot and disturbance of the public peace at elections, and has governed the decisions in all analogous cases in courts and legislative bodies, both in England and this country. It is laid down in all the leading authorities on the law of elections, under appropriate titles, viz, Hayward on County Elections; Wordsworth's Law and Practice of Elections; Curtis's Law and Practice of Elections; Rowe on Elections; Sheppard on Elections; 4 Selden; Cooley on Const. Limit.; I Peckwell, etc., and is in substance, that to invalidate or make void an election on the ground of riot and intimidation, it must appear that the proceedings at the election were interrupted and the ascertainment of the result prevented thereby. This rule furnishes the ground of the decisions by the Committee of Elections in the several cases of Harrison v. Davis, Contested Cases, vol. 2, p. 341; Preston v. Harris, vol. 2, p. 346; Clements, of Tennessee, vol. 2, p. 369; Bruce v. Loan, vol. 2, p. 519; Minority Report adopted by the House.

After quoting from some of these authorities, the minority continue—

It will be observed that these several cases were founded on allegations of riot, violence, public disorder, intimidation, and interference with voters on the day of election and at the polls; and it was sought in each case to avoid the election in whole or in part; but the committee and the House, finding that the proceedings at the election were not interrupted, and the result had been duly ascertained, declared the election in each case valid, thus sustaining the rule aforesaid; and yet, with these former decisions by the committee and the House before them, and directly in point of the case now under consideration, the majority of the committee reports that, because of riot and disturbance of the public peace, not on the day of election and at the polls, but several days before the election, during the political campaign in the city of New Orleans, the election in the five wards aforesaid should be considered void, and that, too, not because the proceedings at the election were interrupted, or the result not ascertainable, but because a large number of Republican electors pretended that they could not vote with personal safety, notwithstanding on the day of the election no violence, threats, nor intimidation operated to give even color to such pretense.

Another rule, equally well established, is that whenever it is sought to set aside an election, in part, on the ground of illegal votes or riot and intimidation, it must be made to appear that if such illegal votes had not been received or if such riot and intimidation had not prevailed the result of the election would have been different in the whole district; for otherwise it would be wholly immaterial whether the election was void or not, in part. On this point reference is again made to the authorities before cited. This rule is self-evident, and has always heretofore been the guide of the Committee of Elections to its conclusions, and governed the House in its decisions, and is directly in point of the contest now under consideration.

The House has assigned final right to a seat from a district wherein 14,346 out of 27,055 returned votes were rejected because of intimidation.

The majority of the committee, having considered the general issue, proceed to the consideration of the case of Hunt v. Sheldon. It appeared that in the entire district there were cast for Mr. Sheldon 8,714 votes and for Mr. Hunt 18,341, a majority of 9,627 for the latter. But the majority of the committee found that violence and intimidation had prevailed in the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson to such an extent as to bring them within the general principles set forth at the outset. The votes cast in these two parishes were for Sheldon 787 and for Hunt 13,559, a majority of 12,772 for the latter. The rejection of these two parishes would cast out 14,346 out of the 27,055 votes cast in the district, and would change the result from a majority for Mr. Hunt to a majority for Mr. Sheldon.

After reviewing the lawlessness, intimidation, and riot in these two parishes prior to election day, the majority of the committee conclude:

The number of registered electors in the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson in 1867 was 34,766, of whom 18,697, a majority, were colored. The Republican vote cast at that election in 1867, in those parishes, was 16,083—a large majority of votes cast. The regular Republican vote of those parishes in April, 1868, was 17,106. The entire Republican vote cast in those two parishes, in November, 1868, was 1,814, being a falling off, in about six months, of over 15,000 votes, upon a largely increased registration.

The comparison is equally striking if confined to the vote in Jefferson parish alone or in that part of Orleans comprised within this Congressional district. The Republican vote in Jefferson in 1867 was 3,284; in April, 1868, 3,133; in November, 1868, 672—a decrease of nearly four-fifths. The testimony relative to the elections of 1867 and April, 1868, does not show the vote of the wards of Orleans separately, but it is understood that the population of the parish was about equally divided between the First and Second Congressional districts. The registered vote of the part of the parish within the Second district in November, 1868, was 21,314, more than half the registered vote of the parish. The Republican vote cast at the November election, 1868, was 124—probably not 2 per cent of the Republican vote.

It seems clear that there was no valid election in either of these two parishes, and that the returns from each of them should be rejected, and that the result should be determined from the returns of the other parishes of the district.

The minority opposed this view, also raising a question of fact as to the actual result even were the principles of the majority to be followed.

The report was debated on April 12,[1] and on April 13[2] a vote was taken on the proposition of the minority that Mr. Sheldon was not elected and that Mr. Hunt was elected. This was defeated, yeas 49, nays 123.

Then the resolution of the majority, declaring Mr. Hunt not entitled to the seat, was agreed to, yeas 119, nays 47. The second resolution, declaring Mr. Sheldon entitled to his seat, was agreed to, yeas 114, nays 51.

333. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, etc., continued.

The House concluded that when two-thirds of the returned vote of a district had been rejected for intimidation the remainder did not constitute a valid constituency.

Instance of exclusion of a Member-elect found unable to take the test oath of loyalty.

Another contested case from Louisiana was that of Sypher v. St. Martin. Louis St. Martin had presented credentials in the same form as those of Mr. Sheldon and had been temporarily excluded with the other Members of the delegation. Under the resolution of April 7, 1869, the Committee on Elections examined the qualifications of Mr. St. Martin, reporting[3] as follows:

> It was alleged, in writing, before the committee, by said Sypher, that said St. Martin could not take the oath prescribed in the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862. The committee thereupon, in obedience to said resolution, inquired into said charge, and have found and do report to the House that Louis St. Martin, claiming the right to represent the First Congressional district of the State of Louisiana in this House, is unable to take the oath of office prescribed in the said act of July 2, 1862.

Although the House did not act on this report, the Committee on Elections considered that it disposed of the claim of Mr. St. Martin to the seat, and did not consider him as a party except in so far as his action negatived the claim of Mr. Sypher.

The report in the case of Mr. Sypher was submitted on April 18, 1870,[4] by Mr. Stevenson. This report did not give the official returns of the district, but after reviewing the acts of violence and intimidation before the election, wherein "over 300 leading and active Republicans, white and colored, were killed, wounded, or otherwise cruelly maltreated," and after reaffirming the principles set forth in the case of Hunt v. Sheldon, proceeded to give the vote in the peaceable parish as 2,983 for Sypher and 2,627 for St. Martin. Therefore they proposed a resolution declaring J. H. Sypher entitled to the seat.

The minority filed no views, but in the debate[5] Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, after taking issue with the facts and law relied on by the majority on the question of intimidation, presented returns, alleged to be official, showing that the vote of the whole district was for Sypher 2,948 and for St. Martin 12,514. Mr. Kerr also claimed that the investigation had shown the actual vote cast in the entire district to have been 3,150 for Sypher and 16,059 for St. Martin. He further alleged that the registration made under the auspices of the State administration, which was of the same party as Mr. Sypher, reached a total of 29,992. Thus he claimed that Mr. St. Martin received an actual majority of the total registered vote. Citing the case of Smith v. Brown and the Louisiana State case of Fish v. Collins, he claimed that the vote from the so-called peaceable parishes did not show a proper constituency to be represented.

In the progress of the debate Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, said that in the case of Hunt v. Sheldon he had concluded that a very large proportion of the territory and a majority of the population had been represented in these so-called peaceable parishes. He then asked how far this principle would apply in the pending case.

There was no agreement as to the actual vote, but it was admitted that St. Martin had received as high as 12,504 of the registered vote of 29,922 and that Sypher had not received over 3,150. Mr. Kerr denied that either this case or the Sheldon case conformed to the rule stated by Mr. Garfield.

On April 20[1] the resolution declaring Mr. Sypher entitled to the seat was agreed to—yeas 78, nays 73; but very soon, after a motion to adjourn had been disagreed to, a motion was made to reconsider. A proposition to table the motion to reconsider failed—yeas 79, nays 83. Then the House decided to reconsider—yeas 86, nays 79. Thereupon the question recurred on the resolution declaring Mr. Sypher entitled to the seat, when Mr. Thomas Fitch, of Nevada, proposed the following substitute:

> That there was no valid election held in the First Congressional district of the State of Louisiana on the 3d day of November, 1868, and that neither J. H. Sypher nor L. St. Martin is entitled to a seat in the Forty-first Congress as Representative from the First Congressional district of the State of Louisiana.

The substitute was agreed to—yeas 99, nays 70. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to—yeas 96, nays 68.

334. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, etc., continued.

The House declared vacant a seat in a case wherein over half of the total vote of a district had been rejected for intimidation.

Mr. George W. McCranie, of the Fifth district of Louisiana, had also presented himself with a certificate from the governor of the State of Louisiana, but had not been sworn in. Under the general rule adopted the Committee on Elections reported[2] that he was unable to take the oath, having been engaged in rebellion.

The seat being claimed by Mr. Frank Morey, the Committee on Elections reported as to the final right on April 27, 1870.[3] It appeared that the actual vote cast in the district was—for McCranie, 13,716; for Morey, 3,424, and for P. J. Kennedy, 3,076. The official returns, however, had rejected two parishes, leaving the corrected vote—for McCranie, 11,107; for Morey, 3,423, and for Kennedy, 3,076.

The grounds of contest were thus stated in the report:

[2] House Report No. 10, first session Forty-first Congress.

[3] House Report No. 62, second session Forty-first Congress; 2 Bartlett, p. 719; Rowell's Digest, p. 243.

Mr. Morey claims the seat, and alleges that "a system of intimidation, threats, violence, and lawlessness prevailed in the parishes of Jackson, Franklin, Claiborne, Bienville, Union, Morehouse, Caldwell, and Catahoula prior to the election in November last; that Republicans were deterred and prevented by fear from voting at all, or were compelled by threats and intimidation to vote the Democratic ticket against their wishes, and that the election in the above-named parishes was a farce, a nullity, and an outrage of the rights of the law-abiding citizens of the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana."

In the parishes thus impeached the vote was—for McCranie, 11,145; for Morey, 179; for Kennedy, 26. The committee show that this was a large falling off as compared with previous years, and explain it by the testimony showing intimidation, which prevented some from voting and compelled others to vote against their inclinations. The peaceful parishes showed a vote of 2,571 for McCranie, 3,438 for Morey, and 3,050 for Kennedy.

The committee, Mr. Stevenson submitting the report, conclude:

The House has heretofore, in the case of Hunt v. Sheldon, adopted the rule that where it appears that certain precincts and parishes (or counties) of a district have been carried by violence or intimidation the returns therefrom shall be rejected, and the result derived from the returns from the peaceable precincts and parishes (or counties).

In the subsequent case of Sypher the House refused to apply this rule to that case; and your committee, submitting to the judgment of the House, considers it a duty to reconcile these two cases if possible.

We can not advise the House to abandon the principle adopted in Hunt v. Sheldon, which seems of inestimable value in preventing lawless attempts upon the ballot box in the late rebellious States, where a new voting population is peculiarly exposed to violence and intimidation by the former master class, prone by habit and inclination to domineer over their former slaves; and therefore we accept the decision of the House in Sypher's case, not as a reversal but as a limitation of the rule adopted in Sheldon's case, and interpret the action of the House in Sypher's case to mean that the rule should not be so far extended as to apply to such a case where less than one-fourth of the legal electors of the district resided, and one-fifth of the registered vote was cast, within the peaceable parishes and precincts, and the claimant received but a small majority of that vote.

In the present case the five peaceable parishes comprise about one-third of the territory of the district and contain less than one-half the population and registered vote and return a minority of the vote actually polled.

The contestant received in these parishes 3,428. The registered vote of the district was 23,103. The registered vote of the five peaceable parishes was 10,400. The contestant received about one-seventh of the registered vote of the district and about one-third of the vote cast in the peaceable parishes.

Another objection to the claim of contestee is that if there had been a peaceable election in every parish and precinct of the district the contestant could not have received a majority or even a plurality of the votes cast, because the rejected parishes were Democratic at best. They gave a small Democratic majority at the spring election in 1868, and would have increased it considerably at a peaceable election in the fall. There were two Republican candidates, who divided their party vote about equally, and it seems probable that they would have divided it in every parish had the canvass and election been peaceable, so that the contestant must have been defeated. We therefore conclude that the claim of the contestant can not be sustained.

The committee also find that if they should consider the claim of Messrs. McCranie and Kennedy they would fall under the same rule. Therefore the following resolution was recommended:

Resolved, That there was no lawful election in the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Louisiana for Representative in the Forty-first Congress, and neither G. W. McCranie nor Frank Morey nor P. J. Kennedy is entitled to a seat as Representative in the Forty-first Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Louisiana.

The report was considered by the House on April 28.[1] Although there had been no minority views, Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, opposed the report and proposed to the resolution an amendment declaring Mr. McCranie elected. This amendment was disagreed to—yeas 53, nays 104. Then the resolution recommended by the committee was agreed to without division.

335. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, etc., continued.

The House considered an election valid although in five of ten parishes the vote, which was less than half the vote of the district, was rejected.

An examination of the acts necessary to justify a finding of disloyalty against a Member-elect.

A Member-elect may not take the oath until a motion to reconsider the vote determining his title is disposed of.

From the Fourth district of Louisiana the credentials were presented by Mr. Michael Ryan. He was not admitted on the prima facie showing, and on April 25, 1870,[2] Mr. Samuel S. Burdett, of Missouri, from the Subcommittee on Elections, presented a report dealing both with the qualifications of Mr. Ryan and with the claims of the contestant, J. P. Newsham.

1. As to the loyalty of Mr. Ryan, the report says:

The question of the ineligibility of Mr. Ryan put in issue by the contestant is first to be determined. It is admitted that contestee comes within the description of persons set out in the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution by having previously taken an oath as a member of the legislature of the State of Louisiana to support the Constitution of the United States. That he did give aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States is confidently asserted by contestant, and much evidence has been produced pro and con to meet that issue.

The substantive proofs adduced to sustain the charge of ineligibility are, that Mr. Ryan, in the early part of the year 1862, made a speech to a company of Confederate soldiers, encouraging them in their fight for secession. (See testimony of Harry Lott, vol. 1, p. 421; of Calhoun, p. 424, q. 8572; of Barlow, p. 587, q. 11539.) That after the inauguration of the rebellion he wore in public on several occasions the uniform of the Confederate military service and was an officer in a local or home company of troops.

These substantive charges are not seriously disputed, but the motive and circumstances of them are put in issue by Mr. Ryan. For him it is contended that he was, notwithstanding appearances, at heart a Union man. The proof of his allegiance, however, is only to be found in political associations and sentiments formed and uttered before actual war began, and, after the beginning of hostilities, of declarations against the policy of the secessionists, conversationally made in the hearing of known Union men and personal friends. It does appear generally from the evidence that Mr. Ryan from the first seriously doubted the ability of the rebel leaders to carry their designs to a successful issue, and that he comprehended and deprecated the inevitable waste and destruction that must follow such a failure; but it does not appear that he ever, after the beginning of actual strife, called in question the right of secession or the desirableness of success to the Southern arms, provided only they should succeed; much less is there anywhere to be found evidence of any hearty word spoken or deed performed favorable to the Union and for the Union's sake.

That the rebel military authorities were impressed with full confidence in his fealty to their cause is evidenced by the fact that he remained undisturbed at his home and unquestioned by them, while the few of his neighbors who were Union men in sentiment, on the bare announcement of that fact or on the merest suspicion of its existence, were compelled to seek safety by flight, or, remaining, to endure insult, imprisonment, or death; and this, too, notwithstanding that by birth, social standing, long residence, and large wealth of lands and slaves they were as fully entitled to the regard and consideration of the rebel authorities as it was possible for Mr. Ryan to be.

The minority filed no views; but in debate Mr. Kerr denied the charges of disloyalty, contending that the evidence did not prove them.

2. As to the final right—and in the debate the majority declared that the decision as to final right left little effect to the disqualification—the majority found Mr. Newsham. entitled to the seat. The district comprised ten parishes, and the official returns showed a vote for Ryan of 10,385, and for Newsham of 5,606. In five of these parishes, where fraud and intimidation were charged, the returned vote was, for Ryan, 7,342; for Newsham, 46. The committee showed that in former elections in these five parishes there had been no such disparity of parties, and explained it by fraud and intimidation, which they considered proven. They conclude:

> We assert the truth to be that in the contested parishes the result obtained was accompanied and secured by the use of unlawful means, and by the practice of oppressions and barbarities seldom equaled in any age or country, and that the several polls in all of said parishes ought to be excluded from the count.

Going back of the official returns, the report finds the whole number of votes cast in the district 20,500, the registration being 25,027. In the peaceful parishes they found a total vote of 13,112, of which Newsham had 7,210 and Ryan 5,902. The report concludes:

> The committee does not cite the vote cast in the peaceable parishes as truly representing the popular will in those parishes. On the contrary, there were disorders, to the detriment of the contestant, in several of these parishes. Many of his supporters were by unlawful means kept from the polls and others compelled against their will to support his competitor.
> The committee, therefore, recommends that the returns from such of the parishes of the Fourth district as are shown to have been controlled by the appliances of fraud and violence be excluded from the count.
> A due regard for the rights of the faithful men of Louisiana, whose will was defeated, demands it, while every consideration of future peace for them and of safety to the State imperatively requires it.
> We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:
> Resolved, That Michael Ryan is not entitled to a seat as a Representative in the Forty-first Congress from the Fourth district of Louisiana.
> Resolved, That J. P. Newsham is entitled to a seat as a Representative in the Forty-first Congress from the Fourth district of Louisiana.

The report was debated on May 20 and 21,[1] and on the latter day a resolution proposed by the minority and declaring Mr. Ryan entitled to the seat was disagreed to—ayes 54, noes 79. Then the resolution of the majority declaring Mr. Newsham entitled to the seat was agreed to—yeas 79, nays 71.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote.

Mr. Stevenson submitted that nothing was in order but the swearing in of Mr. Newsham.

---

[1] Globe, pp. 3640, 3694–3700; Journal, p. 818.

The Speaker [1] overruled the point of order, saying—

No legislation is complete until the power to reconsider is exhausted.

On May 23 [2] the motion to reconsider was laid on the table—yeas 94, nays 80.

Mr. Newsham then took the oath.

336. The Louisiana election cases of Hunt v. Sheldon, Sypher v. St. Martin, etc., continued.

Returns of five of twelve parishes being rejected for intimidation, the House seated a contestant on the vote of the seven peaceful parishes.

On April 28, 1870,[3] Mr. Stevenson presented the report in the last Louisiana case, that of Darrall v. Bailey. The committee say that—

The bloodiest rioting and the darkest deeds which were done in the State were committed in these contested parishes of this district.

Fraud and violence were alleged as in the other districts. The report states the case as to the vote as follows:

Both parties affirm the validity of the election in seven parishes, while the contestee affirms and the contestant denies the validity of the election in five parishes, including St. Martin, from which there is no valid return, and which must, in any event, be rejected.

THE REGISTRY—WHITE AND COLORED.

The number of registered electors in the district was	28,486
Of colored electors	18,881
Majority of colored voters	9,276

The colored nearly double the white voters.

PEACEABLE AND VIOLENT.

The entire registry	28,486
That of the seven uncontested parishes was	15,294
That of the contested parishes	13,192
A majority in the peaceable parishes of	2,102

THE VOTE.

The vote cast (including the alleged vote of St. Martin, of which there is no return) was	26,106
The vote in the uncontested parishes was	14,627
The vote in the contested parishes (including alleged vote of St. Martin) was	11,479
Majority in the peaceable parishes	3,148

There can be no question, therefore, whether there was a valid election in the part of the district which is uncontested. It contained nearly two-thirds of the territory and a large majority of registered electors and of actual voters.

The report finds that the report from the violent parishes should be rejected, and that in the peaceable parishes Darrall had 7,436 and Bailey 7,191. The report concludes:

It may be added that the general condition of the State affected the Republican vote in these parishes, and that if peace and quiet had prevailed through the State the Republican majority would have been much heavier, and in the whole district the contestant would have received a large majority. The colored registered vote of the district was nearly double the white, and many white men would, if permitted, in peace, have sustained the Republican party. We therefore feel that the result reached is not only legally correct, but that it carries out the will of a very large majority of the people of the district, while it vindicates the rights of the people we are bound to protect.

We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Adolphe Bailey is not entitled to a seat as Representative in the Forty-first Congress from the Third district of Louisiana.

Resolved, That C. B. Darrall is entitled to his seat as Representative in the Forty-first Congress from the Third district of Louisiana.

The case was debated on July 2,[1] and on that day Mr. Kerr submitted a minority proposition declaring that Mr. Bailey was entitled to the seat and should be admitted thereto. This was negatived—yeas 37, nays 97.

The question recurring on the resolution declaring Mr. Bailey not entitled to the seat, it was agreed to without division.

Then the resolution declaring Mr. Darrall entitled to the seat was agreed to—yeas 67, nays 64.

A motion to reconsider was made, and on July 6[2] was laid on the table—yeas 96, nays 77.

Mr. Darrall then took the oath.

337. The first Louisiana election case of Benoit v. Boatner in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

A notice of contest, drawn in general terms, was held to cover sufficiently the various claims made upon the testimony and in the arguments.

The service of notice of contest at the residence is sufficient compliance with the law.

On March 19, 1896,[3] the Committee on Elections No. 2, through Mr. R. W. Tayler, of Ohio, reported in the first case of Benoit v. Boatner, of Louisiana.

This case involved, besides the merits, the following preliminary question, thus stated by the committee:

The contestant, on the 16th day of January, 1895, caused to be served, at the place of residence of the contestee, a copy of his notice of contest. The contestee at that time was absent from the State of Louisiana, and it is admitted that under the law of that State it is sufficient notice of any suit to make service of the same at the place of residence of the defendant. The contestee moved to dismiss this proceeding on the ground that no proper notice of contest was served upon him as required by the Revised Statutes. The committee was of the opinion and held that the service of the notice in the manner stated was sufficient under the United States Statutes and was precisely the kind of notice which was held to be sufficient in the case of Manzanares v. Luna, in the Forty-eighth Congress. The contestee duly served upon the contestant his answer, and the parties proceeded to take testimony in all respects as if no question had been raised as to validity of contestant's service of notice. The contestant's notice of contest, while in general terms, was not seriously questioned as to form, and sufficiently covered the various claims made upon the testimony and in the arguments.

338. The first Louisiana election case of Benoit v. Boatner, continued.

Intimidation and fraud having destroyed the integrity of an election in 10 of 15 parishes, the House declared the seat vacant.

Discussion of the extent and degree of intimidation and fraud justifying rejection rather than purging of the poll.

A case in which the committee considered historic facts in judging validity of an election wherein appeared many irregularities on the part of election officers.

As to the merits of the case, it appeared on the face of the official returns that sitting member had a majority of 9,526. The district consisted of 15 parishes. In 5 of these the fairness of the election was not questioned. The controversy was confined to the 10 parishes where the colored males over 21 years of age numbered 21,459 and the white males over 21 years numbered 7,543. These facts the committee present from the census of 1890.

After sketching the provisions of the election law of Louisiana, the majority of the committee proceed to an analysis of the testimony in regard to the 10 parishes.

First are examined the 4 "river parishes" of East Carroll, Madison, Tensas, and Concordia, where the returns gave the sitting member 7,124 votes and 81 to the contestant. The majority call attention to the fact that in these parishes the white males over 21 years of age numbered only 1,765, while the colored males of age numbered 12,454. Therefore the colored voters must have voted in large numbers for sitting member, who was a Democrat, if the returns were true. Yet the majority feel convinced that the colored voters were all Republicans. The testimony showed that it had been a custom to count the colored voters for contestant's party; that the registration list was enormously padded; that the poll books and tally sheets had disappeared in almost every precinct of the river parishes; that no election officers could be discovered who knew anything about them; that many election officers refused to obey subpoenas, and others, on examination, refused on technical grounds to answer as to the records; that very few of the returns were sworn to, although the law requiring it was mandatory; that in some precincts the election officers signed the returns in blank; that the right of suffrage in these parishes was a farce; and that the sitting member admitted in his written statement filed with the committee that of the 7,124 votes counted for him in these 4 parishes over 6,000 ought to be excluded.

In Catahoula Parish the same character of frauds prevailed, with the addition that the alphabetical mode of voting people who were dead or not at the polls was to some extent resorted to.

The committee reviewed the remaining 5 parishes, quoting testimony which satisfied the majority that intimidation was general and that the planters very generally considered themselves as having the right to determine how their colored employees should vote.

In conclusion, the majority of the committee conclude that the right of suffrage, as recognized by the Constitution and the laws, did not exist in at least 10 of the 15 parishes. After noting the remarkable state of the vote in the river parishes, the majority say:

> If no question were raised as to the validity of the election outside of the river parishes, the House in justice to itself and in the interest of fair and honest elections, giving full weight to the facts apparent in this testimony, would be compelled to declare the election void. It could not declare the contestant elected because it can not say, and the contestant did not have it in his power to determine, how many votes the contestant would have received in those 4 parishes if a free and honest election had been conducted. It would have been physically impossible to take the testimony of 6,000 or 8,000 witnesses as to the person for whom they voted or would have voted if permitted to cast their ballots, and in addition to that the very circumstances that prevented their voting would have prevented their testifying.

This case discloses as well the difficulty in obtaining testimony and inducing men to testify as it does the intimidation practiced to prevent their voting. To invoke the rule which demands that returns from the tainted precincts be thrown out would still leave the contestee elected. It seems to us that in such a case the only thing that can be done is to declare the election void. To do otherwise would be to furnish an easy, safe, and certain mode of perpetrating a stupendous fraud, and the more stupendous the more effective.

We therefore conclude as matters of fact:

First, that fraud, violence, and intimidation so permeated the election of November 6, 1894, except in the parishes of Claiborne, Franklin, Jackson, Lincoln, and West Carroll, that there was no free expression of the popular will; that fraud, violence, and intimidation were so extensive and general as to render it certain that there was no fair and free expression by the great body of the electors, more than two-thirds of the electors of the district residing in the remaining 10 parishes.

Second, that in view of the fact that the majority for the contestee in the 11 parishes outside of the river parishes was 2,483, and that in the river parishes, where there is a majority of over 10,000 negroes of voting age, fraud was universal; that while it is impossible to determine how many votes the contestant would have received if a fair and honest election had been held, justice and good morals revolt against the proposition that any valid election was held.

We therefore hold as a proposition of law, growing out of the principle laid down in Sypher v. St. Martin, as follows:

"If fraud, violence, and intimidation have been so extensive and general as to render it certain that there has been no free and fair expression by the great body of the electors, then the election must be set aside, notwithstanding the fact that in some of the precincts or parishes there was a peaceable and fair election."

The views of the minority, submitted by Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, review the testimony, reaching a conclusion different from that reached by the majority, although admitting that certain precincts should be rejected, energetically protests against the conclusion of the majority, and says:

If permissible at all to declare an election void, it could, in our judgment, be legally clone only in extreme cases where, by violence, widespread and concerted intimidation and fraud, it would become impossible to eliminate the lawful and voluntary vote from the unlawful and fraudulent and that which had been cast under the influence of fear.

In this case not only do such conditions not exist, but if every poll attacked by contestant, and against which he has adduced any evidence, be excluded from the count, contestee still has a majority of 327; but giving the evidence fair consideration, and excluding only the vote which is shown to have been fraudulent and intimidated, contestee's majority is 5,188.

Therefore the minority recommended a resolution declaring sitting member entitled to the seat.

On March 20, 1896,[1] the report was debated in the House, and then a decision was obtained on the motion to substitute the minority resolution for that of the majority. That motion was disagreed to—yeas 59, nays 132. Then without division the resolution of the majority was agreed to, declaring—

That there was no valid election held in the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and that neither Alexis Benoit nor Charles J. Boatner is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress as Representative from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana.

339. The second Louisiana election case of Benoit v. Boatner in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Where the provisions of law are insufficient to secure a decision in an election case the House prescribes by resolution the course of procedure.

On February 5, 1897,[1] Mr. Henry U. Johnson, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the second case of Benoit v. Boatner, of Louisiana. At the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, as the result of a contest between the same parties,[2] the seat had been declared vacant. Thereupon, on June 10, 1896, a special election was held in the district, and Mr. Boatner was returned by 10,557 votes, against 5,989 returned for Mr. Benoit.

On December 10, 1896,[3] Mr. Boatner appeared with the credentials and was sworn in. Mr. Benoit meanwhile had contested the election, charging wholesale frauds and intimidation.

On January 14, 1897,[4] a letter from the Clerk was laid before the House announcing that if this case should take the usual course prescribed by law, allowing the full time of sixty days to be used in the preparation of briefs, it could not reach the House before final adjournment. This letter was referred, with the testimony, to the Committee on Elections No. 2, and the testimony was ordered to be printed.

On January 15[5] the committee reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 2, to which the contested-election case of Alexis Benoit against Charles J. Boatner, from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, has been referred, be, and is hereby, instructed and authorized to proceed to the consideration of said case, and, having first afforded to said parties a fair opportunity to be heard as to the merits of the same, to report to the House their conclusions with respect to such case in time to afford to the House an opportunity to determine the same during the present session of Congress.

340. The second Louisiana election case of Benoit v. Boatner, continued.

An election in a district was not declared void on account of invalidity in one-fifth of the parishes, affecting less than a third of the vote.

Discussion of the degree of duress which may be considered intimidation justifying rejection of a poll.

Intimidation justifying rejection of a poll may fall short of physical violence against the person and need not fall within the actual time of the election.

Although a parish, in a region wherein intimidation might be expected, showed a marvelous unanimity in the vote, the committee declined to reject the poll.

An election being held without the required poll list, and there being other suspicious circumstances, the poll was rejected.

The conduct of the election officers of a parish being thoroughly permeated by fraud, the returns were rejected.

The report of the majority of the committee, after reviewing the conditions of population, the law of the State as to elections, and noting the fact that the contestant carried the parishes where white population predominated, while the sitting Member was strongest in the so-called "colored" parishes, proceeds to examine the testimony in detail, and to make the corrections shown to be just.

1. The votes of two parishes were rejected entirely: (a) In Tensas Parish, where the commissioners of election were all supporters of the sitting member, the returns many gave him 2,067 votes, and contestant 141. In several precincts no votes at all were returned for contestant, of itself a very suspicious circumstance, but the poll lists showed that not only were dead and absent persons recorded as voting, but in many precincts the election officers returned the registered list of voters instead of the vote as actually cast. The law required the election commissioners to write down the names of the voters in exact order as they voted, but in many cases the names are recorded alphabetically. In one precinct this peculiarity permeated the entire list of 621 names. The contestant was able to examine only one witness in the parish, the officers of the law on whom he depended for the serving of subpoenas refusing or neglecting to do their duty. Although the evidence impeached the fairness and integrity of the commissioners of election in the parish, the sitting Member produced not one of them to testify. The majority of the committee were "of the opinion that the election in this parish was a sham and a fraud and that the returns therefrom ought to be wholly rejected." The minority of the committee, whose views were presented by Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, agree that this parish should be excluded.

(b) From Ouachita Parish the returned vote was 1,777 for Boatner and 631 for Benoit. The majority of the committee concluded that the evidence "taken as a whole, establishes the fact that there was such intimidation practiced upon the colored voters as to prevent a free and fair election there, and that for this reason the vote of Ouachita Parish should be rejected from the count." The committee continue:

> It appears that for many years, commencing in the year 1876, personal violence had been openly inflicted upon the colored electors by the white Democrats of the parish with a view of depriving them of their right of suffrage. This measure had worked the desired effect and had very largely deterred them from voting.
> The evidence shows that this open personal injury was not deemed by these whites to be necessary in very recent years, and therefore was only occasionally inflicted. Milder, but nevertheless lawless and coercive expedients were accordingly substituted for it by them. The colored voter, with a vivid recollection of the great wrongs to which he had been subjected, needed only to be threatened with a recurrence of there wrongs in order to deprive him of his free will, and either keep him from the polls altogether, or else compel him to vote the Democratic ticket.
> Accordingly, the latter-day plan and the one employed at this election by the friends and supporters of Boatner consisted in "visiting" him before the election and in threatening him with the consequences in the event he dared to vote his own sentiments.
> The Democratic planters claimed and exercised the right to vote their "black hands" for Boatner. These "hands" were too timid and defenseless to make any resistance and hence became the victims of this unlawful practice.

The majority of the committee also say:

In passing upon this question of intimidation the committee have had in mind certain propositions which seemed to them to be sound, and in the light of which they have reached the conclusion above announced.

They recognized the fact that coercive measures do not operate alike upon all voters. That which would have no effect whatever upon one class might, nevertheless, exert an irresistible influence upon another class.

It is therefore believed that in determining whether or not intimidation exists in any case, due regard should always be had to the mental and physical organization of the particular electors upon whom the wrong is charged to have been inflicted, their relation to the alleged wrongdoers, their condition of dependence or independence, and, indeed, to their whole environment as well as to the character and disposition of the wrongdoers themselves. Nor is it, in the opinion of the committee, either a logical or a just doctrine that the oppressive acts which will avoid an election must necessarily be of such a character as to overpower the will of voters of reasonable courage and intelligence. Such a principle as this would, in its practical operations, result in the disfranchisement of the weak and the ignorant electors, who should ever be the object of the law's solicitude, and in the arrogation of political power into the hands of the electors who are strong and well informed.

It is evident, too, that physical violence against the person of the elector is not the sole criterion by which the existence or nonexistence of intimidation is to be determined, since some electors might be beaten without being at all terrorized, while other electors might be put in great fear without the striking of a single blow. Nor do the committee believe that in passing upon the question as to whether intimidation prevailed the examination should be limited to the unlawful acts committed against the voters at the very time of the election in contest. It is often the case that preceding occurrences, although somewhat remote in point of time, give great significance and momentum to recent acts of oppression, and thus become very proper subjects for examination and consideration.

The minority of the committee do not consider that the evidence supports the conclusions of the majority as to intimidation, and do not assent to the exclusion of the vote.

2. In other parishes the majority of the committee corrected, but did not reject, the entire returns.

(a) In Concordia the returns gave sitting Member 1,675 votes and contestant 46. In several precincts no votes at all were returned for contestant. The testimony showed some informalities and irregularities, but there was other testimony that the election was fairly and honestly conducted. The committee, therefore, except for a slight correction in one precinct, did not interfere with the vote as returned, "although they regard the practical unanimity of the electors upon one candidate as one of the most remarkable occurrences in modern politics."

(b) At Madison Parish one witness testified as to intimidation and one as to bribery, but the committee determined that the returned vote should stand.

(c) In Catahoula Parish the majority of the committee reject the entire vote of the Jonesville precinct, which returned 497 for Boatner and none for Benoit. In this precinct the election officers were all of sitting Member's party, the registrar of the parish failed to furnish the poll list, as required to do by law, and there was evidence to show not only that the returned vote was greater than the number of voters in the precinct, but also that it was far larger than the number who actually voted. The committee say:

In the absence of the poll list it was of course impossible to hold a fair and honest election, for the reason that it could not be definitely known who was entitled to vote.

In Glade precinct, where 115 votes were returned for sitting Member and none for contestant, uncontradicted testimony showed that only 30 honest votes were polled, all for Boatner. Therefore the committee credited him only with that number.

A similar correction was made at Robertson precinct, where the election officers swore that the tally sheets had been tampered with and their names thereto forged. The testimony of these officers, who were partisans of sitting Member, indicated that 23 honest votes were probably cast for sitting Member and 2 for contestant. The committee adopt these figures instead of 135 for sitting Member and 2 for contestant as returned.

The majority of the committee, in conclusion, find that with all the deductions and rejections there still remains a majority of 802 for sitting Member. Therefore they conclude:

> While the evidence establishes the fact that flagrant frauds were perpetrated in all of Tensas Parish, and in a portion of Catahoula Parish, and that intimidation prevailed generally throughout the parish of Ouachita, still the committee do not feel justified in recommending that the election be held void and the seat declared vacant, for the reason that these three parishes constitute only one-fifth of the total parishes of the district, and their entire rejected vote does not amount to one-third of the vote cast therein at the election.
> The committee are not sure that the fraud and intimidation were so extensive and general throughout the district as to render it certain that there was not a free and fair expression by the great body of the electors, however strongly they may suspect this to have been the case.

The resolutions confirming sitting Member in his seat were agreed to without division on February 15.[1]

341. The Louisiana election case of Beattie v. Price, in the Fiftyfourth Congress.

An election having been peaceable in three-fourths of a district, it was not declared invalid because of violence and intimidation in the remainder.

On February 5, 1897,[2] Mr. Robert W. Tayler, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of a majority of the committee in the case of Beattie v. Price, of Louisiana. The official returns gave the sitting Member a plurality of 5,766 votes over the contestant, which the contestant sought to overcome, alleging fraud, violence, and intimidation.

As to a preliminary question the committee say:

> An important preliminary question arose on the motion made by the contestee to suppress a portion of the contestant's evidence on the ground that it had not been taken in compliance with the law. This objection in the main was to the effect that no proper notice had been given that the testimony of the witnesses would be taken and that there was no evidence of the official character of the persons before whom the testimony was taken.
> Your committee has examined all of the testimony in the case, but, in view of the conclusion at which it has arrived, it is not necessary to decide upon this preliminary motion. We have considered the testimony as if it had been regularly taken, but are not to be understood as approving or justifying the taking of testimony without serving notice on the opposite side of the names of witnesses to be examined.

[2] House Report No. 2812, second session Fifty-fourth Congress; Rowell's Digest, p. 527.

The majority of the committee note the fact that the population of the district consisted of 115,533 whites and 98,916 colored people; and quote documents to show that contestant was the nominee of an organization of white Republicans who discouraged the cooperation of colored Republicans. The minority, in their views (subscribed to by Messrs. Henry U. Johnson, of Indiana, Chester I. Long, of Kansas, and Jesse B. Strode, of Nebraska), deny this proposition, and claim that in many districts the organization invited the cooperation of colored voters.

Both majority and minority of the committee agreed that contestant had not made out a title to the seat; but join issue on the question as to whether or not there was a valid election. The majority of the committee say:

There is nothing in this case to justify the claim that there was "no free and fair expression by the great body of the electors."

So far as the testimony shows there was a "peaceable and fair election" in not only "some of the precincts and parishes," but in most of them.

There are 166 polling places in the district, and as to more than three-fourths of them there is not a syllable of testimony showing fraud, violence, or intimidation. If we were to admit all that the contestant claims as to the force and effect of the testimony respecting certain precincts, and then infer that like conditions existed in the 125 precincts concerning which there was no such testimony, we might be led to take a drastic course. If we did, we should be compelled to seat the contestant. No matter which way we look, or what construction we put on the testimony, we must hold that either the contestant or the contestee is entitled to a seat in this House.

There is evidence showing that in several of the parishes of this Congressional district there was some violence. This existed probably by reason of the momentum of earlier resorts to violence and intimidation. In the parish of Lafourche two colored men lost their lives and one disappeared. The supporters of the contestant insists that these deaths, which were violent, and the disappearance were due to the fact that the three colored men were supporters of the contestant. The testimony, while inconclusive, points in that direction as to Talley Whitehurst.

After describing the murder of Whitehurst, the majority say:

Atrocious as this crime was, whatever may have been its cause, it had but little if any effect on the election, and, coupled with every other circumtance of fraud, violence, or intimidation, testified about in the district, is very far from seriously affecting the plurality the contestee received.

The minority say, however:

In our opinion the record discloses widespread intimidation of the colored voters by the supporters of Price—intimidation practiced in a majority of the parishes of the district, the effect of which was to deter great numbers of them from attending the election and casting their ballots for Beattie.

For instance, the killing of Tally Whitehurst, a prominent colored Republican, and a supporter of Beattie, who resided in the parish of Lafourche, is clearly shown by the evidence to have been a cold-blooded and premeditated murder, perpetrated by some of the white friends and supporters of Price, a few days before the election, solely for political purposes, and to intimidate the colored voters.

It appears that this murder had the desired effect not only in Lafourche but also in one or two of the adjoining parishes.

We concur in the opinion of the committee that Beattie is not entitled to be seated, but disagree with their conclusion that Price is entitled to the seat.

We are convinced that fraud and intimidation prevailed so extensively and generally throughout the district as to prevent a free and fair expression by the great body of the electors, and we believe, therefore, that the election should be declared void and the seat left vacant.

The majority report and minority views were ordered printed when presented in the House on February 5,[1] but there is no record of further action.

342. The Senate election case of Sykes v. Spencer, from Alabama, in the Forty-third Congress.

The Senate gave immediate prima facie effect to credentials regular in form, but impeached by a memorial and historical facts relating to rival legislatures.

The question of the competency of the electing legislature as an inherent part of a prima facie showing discussed by the Senate.

On December 13, 1872,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, presented the credentials of George E. Spencer, elected a Senator by the legislature of Alabama for the six years commencing March 4, 1873.

On February 28, 1873,[2] Mr. George Goldthwaite, of Alabama, presented a memorial of Francis W. Sykes, claiming the seat for which Mr. Spencer had credentials. This memorial impeached at length the title of Mr. Spencer.

On March 6, 1873,[3] during the swearing in of the new Senators, Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, objected to the administration of the oath to Mr. Spencer, on the ground that another claimant bore credentials for the seat.

It appeared that Mr. Spencer bore credentials in regular form—or at least in form as regular as most credentials presented—and signed by a governor whose position, both de jure and de facto was unquestioned. But the Senate had knowledge, both from the memorial of Mr. Sykes and historically, that Mr. Spencer was elected by one of two legislative bodies, each claiming to be the legislature of Alabama.

It appeared that there was presented on behalf of Mr. Sykes as credentials certificates signed by the officers of the other of the two rival bodies setting forth his election.

In the debate the cases of Goldthwaite and Ransom were referred to as recent precedents.

The prima facie affect of credentials was discussed at length, and it was urged on the one side that the competency of the legislature electing was an essential question inhering in the prima facie case.

On the other hand it was urged that Mr. Spencer was certified as elected in accordance with the law of Congress (act of 1866), and the effect of that title should not be overthrown by a mere memorialist.

On March 7[4] a motion to postpone the administration of the oath to Mr. Spencer until the next day was disagreed to—yeas 24, nays 32.

Then, after further debate, the question was taken: "Shall the oath be now administered to Mr. Spencer?" and it was decided in the affirmative without division.[5]

Thereupon Mr. Spencer appeared and took the oath.

On December 8, 1873,[1] Mr. John B. Gordon, of Georgia, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the memorial of Francis W. Sykes, claiming to be a Senator-elect from the State of Alabama, with accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with power to send for persons and papers.

343. The Senate election case of Sykes v. Spencer, continued.

A legislative body recognized by the State executive and having an elected but not certified quorum, was once preferred to a rival body having a certified but not elected quorum.

On April 20[2] Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, submitted the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.[3] The report began with a statement of the history of the case:

Mr. Sykes claims the seat now held by Hon. George E. Spencer as Senator from the State of Alabama; and his claim is based upon the assertion that the body claiming to be the legislature of the State of Alabama which elected the said Spencer was not the rightful legislature of that State, but that another body of men was such legislature; and that the latter body, on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1872, duly elected the said Sykes to be the Senator of the United States for that State for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1873.

It is a fact that for some time after the day fixed by law for the organization of the legislature of that State, in 1872, there were two bodies, each claiming to be the legislature of that State—one known as the statehouse legislature, which pretended to elect Mr. Sykes, and the other known as the courthouse legislature, which pretended to elect Mr. Spencer; and the question is, which of these two bodies ought to be considered the rightful legislature at that time? On the 3d day of December, 1872, the court-house legislature, so called, pretended to elect Mr. Spencer. The governor of the State certified that Mr. Spencer had been duly elected on that day by the legislature of the State; and the Senate, upon that certificate, seated Mr. Spencer as a Senator for the term in question. The first question is, therefore, whether the body of men which pretended to elect Mr. Spencer can properly be regarded as the legislature of the State at the time of such pretended election. If so, Mr. Spencer's election was valid, and, of course, if that be so, Mr. Sykes can have no right to the same seat during the same term.

After further reviewing the law of Alabama and the details of the case, the report continues:

The contest between these two legislatures depends upon this: In the statehouse legislature were eight or nine members who had received regular certificates of election, but who are conceded not to have been elected. There were of this class a sufficient number, together with unquestioned members, to make a quorum in both houses of the statehouse legislature. In the court-house legislature persons claiming the seats of this class of members of the statehouse legislature assembled with others who were undoubtedly members-elect to the senate and house of representatives, and thereby constituted in numbers a quorum of the two houses at the court-house. And the question is, whether at the time the election of Spencer took place by the court-house legislature that legislature, composed of a quorum of the persons actually elected, should be regarded as the legislature of the State; or whether the statehouse legislature, a quorum in both houses being made by this class of persons who in fact were not elected but had the regular certificates of election, should be regarded as the legal legislature. And this again depends upon another question: Whether for the time being, and until some decision by the two houses could be arrived at, the eight or nine persons holding certificates without the election or the eight or nine persons elected but having no certificates are to be considered as entitled to act and form part of the legislature of the State.

[2] Record, p. 3186; Senate Report No. 291.

[3] This committee consisted of Messrs. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana; Matt. H. Carpenter; John A. Logan, of Illinois; J. L. Alcorn, of Mississippi; Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island; John H. Mitchell, of Oregon; Bainbridge Wadleigh, of New Hampshire; Wm. T. Hamilton, of Maryland, and Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware.

The report then quotes the law as to contesting elections, and concludes:

It is not pretended that the persons who were elected, but had not received certificates of election, took the steps required by this statute to contest the seats of the persons who held the certificates, but had not been elected. It is claimed, and with great force, that, until a contest, in the manner provided by law, the members who had received the certificates of election, although those certificates had been erroneously delivered and they were not in fact elected, were entitled to sit as members of the legislature. It is undoubtedly true that had all the persons claiming to be members of the legislature met in the statehouse, and the two houses had proceeded there to organize, the persons holding the certificates, without the election, would have been entitled to their seats until the persons who had been elected, but had received no certificates, should make contests for their seats and their claim should be determined by the houses themselves.

The matter, then, comes to this: The statehouse legislature was the legislature in form, and the court-house legislature was the legislature in fact. While these two pretended legislatures were in existence, each claiming to possess the legislative power of the State, Spencer was elected to the Senate by the court-house legislature, and Sykes was elected by the statehouse legislature. Spencer was first elected, and on the day of his election the court-house legislature was recognized by the governor as the legal legislature of the State. Therefore, in determining as to the right of Spencer or Sykes to this seat, the Senate is compelled to choose between the body in fact elected, organized, acting, and recognized by the executive department as the legislature, and another body, organized in form, but without the election and without a recognition on the part of the executive of the State at the time they pretended to elect Sykes. When we consider that all the forms prescribed by law for canvassing and certifying an election, and for the organization of the two houses, are designed to secure to the persons actually elected the right to act in the offices to which in fact they have been elected, it would be sacrificing the end to the means were the Senate to adhere to the mere form, and thus defeat the end which the forms were intended to secure.

The persons in the two bodies claiming to be the senate and house of representatives who voted for Spencer constituted a quorum of both houses of the members actually elected; the persons in the statehouse legislature who voted for Sykes did not constitute a quorum of the two houses duly elected, but a quorum of persons certified to have been elected to the two houses. Were the Senate to hold Sykes's election to be valid, it would follow that erroneous certificates, delivered to men conceded not to be elected, had enabled persons who in fact ought not to vote for a Senator to elect a Senator to misrepresent the State for six years. On the other hand, if we treat the court-house legislature as the legal legislature of the State, it is conceded that we give effect to the will of the people as evidenced by the election. So that, to state the proposition in other words, we are called upon to choose between the form and the substance, the fiction and the fact; and, considering the importance of the election of a Senator, in the opinion of your committee the Senate would not be justified in overriding the will of the people, as expressed at the ballot box, out of deference to certificates issued erroneously to persons who were not elected.

In the opinion of your committee it is not competent for the Senate to inquire as to the right of individual members to sit in a legislature which is conceded to have a quorum in both houses of legally elected members. But undoubtedly the Senate must always inquire whether the body which pretended to elect a Senator was the legislature of the State or not; because a Senator can only be elected by the legislature of a State. In this case, Spencer having been seated by the Senate, and being prima facie entitled to hold the seat, the Senate can not oust him without going into an inquiry in regard to the right of the individual persons who claim to constitute the quorum in these respective bodies at the courthouse and at the statehouse. We can not oust Spencer from his seat without inquiring and determining that the eight or nine individuals who were elected were not entitled to sit in the legislature of the State because they lacked the certificates. But if the Senate can inquire into this question at all, it must certainly inquire for the fact rather than the evidence of the fact. It can not be maintained that when the Senate has been compelled to enter upon such an examination it is estopped by mere prima facie evidence of the fact, and the certificate is conceded to be nothing more than prima facie evidence. But the Senate must go back of that to the fact itself, and determine whether the persons claiming to hold seats were in fact elected. When we do this we come to the conceded fact that these persons lacking the certificate had in fact been elected, and that the persons who claimed to be the quorum of the two houses were in fact the persons who, in virtue of the election, were entitled to constitute the quorum of both houses.

So that, in any view of the matter which your committee can take, we are of opinion that Mr. Sykes makes no case entitling him to the seat now occupied by Mr. Spencer, and your committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Mr. Sykes.

The minority views were subscribed by Messrs. Saulsbury and Hamilton, took issue with the majority, and argued elaborately that the statehouse legislature was the real legislature, and that it alone might decide as to the elections of its own members.

The report was debated at length on May 27 and 28,[1] and at the conclusion of the debate the question recurred on the resolution of the committee:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Francis W. Sykes.

On motion by Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland, to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting—

That the Hon. George E. Spencer, not having been elected a Senator from the State of Alabama by the lawful legislature of that State, is not entitled to a seat in this body.

After debate, it was determined in the negative-yeas 11, nays 33.

On motion by Mr. Hamilton, of Maryland, to amend the resolution by striking out all after "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting—

That Francis W. Sykes, having been duly and legally elected a Senator from the State of Alabama for the constitutional term commencing March 4, 1873, is entitled to the seat in this body now held by the Hon. George E. Spencer.

It was determined in the negative.

The question recurring on the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Francis W. Sykes.

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative.

344. The Senate election case of Sykes v. Spencer, continued.

Decision of a committee, acquiesced in by the Senate, that an election case once definitely settled might not be reopened.

On Thursday, December 16, 1875,[2] Mr. Spencer, rising to a question of privilege, referred to certain charges made in the legislature of Alabama, and proposed a resolution for an investigation of the subject so far as he was concerned personally. But on suggestion from Mr. Saulsbury, he modified it by broadening its scope, and in that form it was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections are hereby instructed to investigate into and inquire whether in the election of George E. Spencer as a Senator in Congress from the State of Alabama there were used, or caused to be used and employed, corrupt means or corrupt practices to secure his election to the seat he now holds; and that said committee be empowered to administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, to employ stenographers and such clerical assistance as they may deem necessary, and to sit during the recess of Congress, if considered advisable, and to report the result of their investigations as soon as practicable.

Later, especially on January 24, 1876,[1] Mr. Goldthwaite presented the report of a joint committee of the general assembly of Alabama with evidence thereto relating to Mr. Spencer's election, and a memorial of the general assembly praying that the seat held by Mr. Spencer might be declared vacant.

On May 20,[2] Mr. Morton, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted a report as follows:

This testimony was ex parte in its character, very much of it hearsay, and could not be received by the committee as evidence.

The question whether Mr. Spencer was elected by the lawful legislature of Alabama, raised in the memorial referred to, and in the specifications filed before the committee by the counsel, Mr. Morgan, who represented the State of Alabama, was considered by a majority of the committee to have been fully settled in the contest for the seat occupied by Mr. Spencer, before made, in the Senate by Mr. Sykes.

The question in that contest was whether what was known as the court-house legislature, by which Mr. Spencer was elected, or the capitol legislature, by which Mr. Sykes was elected, was the lawful legislature of Alabama. After full consideration and argument of counsel, it was determined by the committee and afterwards by the Senate that the court-house legislature was the lawful one, and that Mr. Spencer and not Mr. Sykes was entitled to the seat.

The question having been definitely settled, it was considered by the committee that it was not competent for the committee or the Senate to reopen it, and that it must be treated as res adjudicata.

Upon the other branch of the inquiry, as to whether Mr. Spencer, or his friends, had been guilty of bribery, corruption, or other unlawful practices in procuring his election, the committee made faithful and diligent inquiry. Mr. Morgan, counsel for the accusers, subpoenaed and examined many witnesses, and, after the testimony was over, supported the charge against Mr. Spencer by a lengthy argument.

Those charges were not proven in any respect. No witness testified that Mr. Spencer had given, directly or indirectly, or offered to give money, or anything of value, in consideration of votes or support, in the Alabama legislature; nor was it shown that any of his friends had done so. Some hearsay testimony was offered to the effect that certain persons had said that they had received money in consideration for voting for Mr. Spencer for the Senate; but this testimony was ruled out by the committee. The persons alleged to have made these statements were competent witnesses, but were not produced, nor was it proven that any money had been paid to them for such a purpose by anybody, whether a known friend of Mr. Spencer or not.

The counsel for the accusers complain strongly of the rejection of such testimony; but its illegality and worthless character were too plain to require argument, and had it been admitted it might have contributed to make some scandal, but would have proved nothing. Attempts were made to offer the hearsay statements against Mr. Spencer of persons who were not shown to have been engaged with him in any conspiracy to procure his election by corruption or undue means, and by whose statements made in his absence he could not be bound by any known principle of law, which were also rejected by the committee.

While hearsay evidence was thus excluded, the door was thrown open widely to prove the payment of money by any person to any member of the legislature, or to be used with the legislature, to procure Mr. Spencer's election, by any person, whether such person was shown to be a friend of Mr. Spencer or not.

The committee deem it unnecessary to go into the full details of the case, and having thus given the general result, beg leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and memorial, and herewith submit copies of the testimony taken before the committee.

Mr. Saulsbury did not concur in all portions of the report, holding that the evidence relating to the invalidity of Mr. Spencer's election should have been presented, the case not being res adjudicata to the extent of preventing this.

345. The Senate election case of Ray and McMillen, of Louisiana, in the Forty-second Congress.

There being rival claimants bearing credentials from rival executives and chosen by rival legislatures, the Senate did not give prima facie effect to either credentials.

On January 22, 1873,[1] in the Senate, Mr. J. R. West, of Louisiana, presented the credentials of William L. McMillen, elected to the Senate to fill the unexpired term of William P. Kellogg.

State of Louisiana.

The following resolution was adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana, in joint session, on Wednesday, the 15th day of January, 1873:

Whereas it appears by the journals of each house of the general assembly of the State of Louisiana that Hon. W. L. McMillen was, on the 14th day of January, 1873, elected United States Senator to fill the unexpired term of Hon. W. P. Kellogg:

Be it resolved by the senate and house in joint session, That the said election of Hon. W. L. McMillen be testified in accordance with the law.

D. B. PENN,
Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate.
J. C. MONCURE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

We certify the above to be a true copy of the minutes of the senate and house of representatives, adopted in joint session, January 15, 1873.

GEORGE B. SHEPHARD,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.
E. A. BURKE,
Secretary of the Senate.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
New Orleans, January 15, 1873.

I, John McEnery, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that Davidson B. Penn, lieutenant-governor and president of the senate; J. C. Moncure, speaker of the house of representatives; E. A. Burke, secretary of the senate, and Geo. B. Shephard, chief clerk of the house of representatives, are the officers herein designated and described, and the foregoing signatures are genuine and entitled to credence as officers aforesaid.

Given under my hand and seal of the State, this 15th day of January A. D. 1873, and of the independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

Mr. West further announced that there was a contest in the case, and he presented thereupon the credentials of John Ray, as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, January 15, 1878.

I, William Pitt Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that on the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1873, John Ray was duly elected by the general assembly of this State to represent this State in the Senate of the United States, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. William Pitt Kellogg.

Given under my hand and the seal of this State, this 15th day of January, A. D. 1873, and of the independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG.

By the governor.
P. G. DESLONDE,
Secretary of State.

No proposition was made to administer the oath to either claimant, and the credentials of both were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

To this committee had also been directed, on January 16, a resolution instructing it to inquire whether there was any State government in Louisiana, and to report a bill ordering an election there for the purpose of establishing a government, Republican in form.

346. The Senate election case of Ray and McMillen, continued.

Discussion of the authority of a decision of a State court over the determinations of the Senate in judging of the elections of its members.

Reference to inquiry as to existence of a Republican form of government in a State.

On February 20, 1873,[1] Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, presented the report of the committee, Messrs. John A. Logan, of Illinois; J. L. Alcorn, of Mississippi, and H. B. Anthony, of Rhode Island, concurring therewith. He also reported a bill (S. 1621) in accordance with the instructions, and the following resolutions:

Resolved, That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That neither John Ray nor W. L. McMillen is entitled to a seat in the Senate, neither having been elected by the legislature of the State of Louisiana.

The report describes at length and in detail the political complications existing in Louisiana, involving the disputes of rival returning boards for control of the election returns; of the election of November 4, 1872; the interposition of the Federal courts and Executive; the existence of two rival legislatures and the two rival executives represented by the credentials before the Senate. The questions were largely as to facts; but the report discusses one feature which was an essential point of difference in the committee. It was claimed for the State government, represented by Governor Kellogg, that it was recognized as legal by the State supreme court, the highest judicial authority in Louisiana.

The report of the committee says on this point:

The only question to be settled by this suit was whether Morgan, the relator, or Kennard, the defendant, was entitled to hold the office of associate justice of the supreme court in place of Howe, resigned; and the idea that in disposing of this single question the court had any authority or jurisdiction to determine as between Warmoth and Pinchback, neither of whom was a party to the cause, which of them was entitled to exercise the office of governor, and between 200 or 300 persons, the Kellogg legislature, and as many more, the McEnery legislature, not one of whom was a party to the suit, which of the rival bodies was authorized to exercise the legislative power of that State, is too preposterous a proposition to require serious refutation.

The utmost that can be claimed for this decision is that the court recognizes the Kellogg government as a government de facto, which may be conceded without touching the question whether it has been established by a regular election or set up and established by the usurpation of the individuals composing it, sustained by the military forces of the United States.

The question we are considering is not a judicial question and no judicial court can determine it. The question is political in its character, and, so far as the United States have to deal with it, must be determined by the political department of this Government. We must therefore investigate the facts, and no decision of any branch of a pretended State government can estop us in this inquiry.

The people of the State are about equally divided in sentiment in regard to these two pretended governments. The people of New Orleans, which is the seat of government, support the McEnery government, two to one; and it is believed that if Federal support were withdrawn from the Kellogg government it would be immediately supplanted by the McEnery government. The people of the State, as a body, neither support nor submit to either government. Neither government can collect taxes, for the people have no assurance that payment to one will prevent collection by the other government. Business is interrupted and public confidence destroyed; and should Congress adjourn without making provision for the case, one of two things must result: Either collision and bloodshed between the adherents of the two governments, or the President must continue the support of Federal authority to the Kellogg government. The alternative of civil war or the maintenance by military power of a State government not elected is exceedingly embarrassing; and in the opinion of your committee the best solution of this difficulty is for Congress to order a reelection, and provide for holding it under authority of the United States, to the end that a government may be elected by the people, to which they will submit, or which, in case of disturbance, the United States can honestly maintain.

Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, in individual views filed by him, said on this point:

This pretended legislature, installed in power by the aid of the United States Army, in pursuance of a void order of a United States district judge, proceeded to elect John Ray to represent the State of Louisiana in the Senate of the United States; and it is said the Senate must receive him because the supreme court of Louisiana has decided the Pinchback legislature to be the rightful legislature of the State, and that the Senate is bound to follow the decision of the State court as to what constitutes its legislature.

It is true, as a rule, that the Federal courts follow the decisions of the State courts in regard to the construction of their own constitution and laws; but it is not true that the legislative department of the Government follows the decisions of the courts upon political questions. The inquiry, what is the established government in a State, belongs to the political and not the judicial power. The Senate, by the Constitution, is made the sole and only judge of the election of its members, who can only be chosen by the legislatures of the respective States. Ordinarily the body recognized in a State as its legislature would be held by the Senate to be the body authorized to elect a Senator; but when, as in the case of Louisiana, there are two bodies in a State, each claiming to be its legislature, and each of which has chosen a person to represent the State in the Senate, in deciding between the claimants the Senate must necessarily determine which body was the rightful legislature and had authority to make the election.

In view of the facts as shown to exist in Louisiana, the decisions of its courts in favor of the validity of the Pinchback legislature are entitled to no respect whatever. As has been already shown, that legislature was not elected nor brought into being by the people of the State, but owes its existence to the void proceedings of the United States court supported by military force.

Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, in views filed by him, said:

The Constitution says that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years." The manner of constituting the legislature is left absolutely to each State, and the question of its organization must be left to be decided by such tribunals or regulations as are provided by the constitution and laws of the State; and the only question about which the Senate may inquire in determining the admission of Senators is whether they have been chosen by the legislature of the State—that legislature recognized by the State or whose organization has been accepted by other departments of the State government. Under our complex system of government, all questions of the organization of State governments, under their own laws, must be left to the decision of the tribunals in such States created for that purpose; and when such decisions have been made they must be accepted by the Government of the United States in their dealings with such States. It is no answer to this to say that in a particular case such tribunals will or have decided wrongfully. The Government of the United States has no right to review their decisions so long as the State possesses a government republican in its form.

The doctrine that all questions of election arising exclusively under the constitution and laws of a State must be left to the settlement and determination of the proper tribunals created by the State for the adjustment of such matters was distinctly recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated case of Luther v. Borden, growing out of the attempt in the State of Rhode Island to overturn the old charter government and establish a new one in its stead. In that case the Supreme Court said:

"The point, then, raised here has been already decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of the State; and the well-settled rule in this court is that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitution and laws of a State. Upon what ground could the circuit court of the United States, which tried this case, have departed from this rule and disregarded and overruled the decision of the courts of Rhode Island? Undoubtedly the courts of the United States have certain powers under the Constitution and laws of the United States which do not belong to the State courts. But the power of determining that a State government has been lawfully established, which the courts of the State disown and repudiate, is not one of them. Upon such a question the courts of the United States are bound to follow the decisions of the State tribunals."

But the reason for the rule in Luther v. Borden is much stronger in this case than in that. In that case there was an attempt to set up a new constitution over the old charter, under which it was claimed that a new government had been organized throughout, involving a new supreme court, as well as legislature and State officers. But in Louisiana there is but one constitution and but one supreme court, which is recognized by all parties, and no attempt made to set up another in its stead, and the only question is as to who were elected State officers and members of the legislature under the recognized constitution and laws of the State, of which the supreme court must necessarily be the final arbiter.

There is no impeachment of the supreme court of Louisiana presented to the committee or to the country. All its members but one were placed upon the bench in 1868, before the present troubles arose, and hold their office for four years longer; and although imputations have been cast upon its action, I know of no foundation for them, and it is not legitimate for Congress to make an inquiry into its motives. The power and duty conferred upon the United States by the fourth article to guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government is political in its character and not subject to revision by the judiciary; but when, upon inquiry, it is ascertained that a State has an existing government in active operation, which is not obstructed by violence, in which each department is mutually recognized by the other, and which is republican in its form, there is no foundation for the interference of Congress, and no condition to which its power can attach; and although its officers may have been elected by fraud or installed without election, yet all questions in relation to them must necessarily arise under the constitution and laws of the State, and, under the decision in Luther v. Borden, be referred for determination to the tribunal of the State.

The bill reported by the committee was debated at great length on February 27, 1873,[1] and the bill was rejected, yeas 18, nays 20.

The resolutions reported by the committee were not acted on, and the time for which the claimants to the seat had been chosen expired without action on their claims and without either of them taking the seat.

347. The Senate election case of Pinchback, McMillen, Marr, and Eustis from Louisiana, in the Forty-third, Forty-fourth, and Forty-fifth Congresses.

There being conflicting credentials from rival claimants to the office of governor, the Senate referred the papers before considering the question of swearing in either claimant to the seat.

Instance wherein a committee, being equally divided, reported to the Senate its inability to present a proposition for action.

The Senate tabled a motion to receive a telegram relating to credentials of a claimant to a seat.

On January 21, 1873,[1] in the Senate, Mr. J. R. West, of Louisiana, presented credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana for the term commencing March 4, 1873. These credentials were laid on the table.

On March 3, 1873,[2] the Vice-President laid before the Senate a telegraphic dispatch from John McEnery, "governor of Louisiana," as follows:

> I have the honor to inform you that Hon. William L. McMillen was, on the 28th instant, duly elected Senator in the Congress of the United States by the legislature of the State of Louisiana for the term commencing March 4, 1873. His credentials were mailed to him yesterday.

Mr. West having objected to the reception of the telegram, a debate arose as to its nature. It was pointed out that the credentials were often presented in the Senate in advance, but there was no validity in them until the time arrived for the person to whom they related to claim the seat. The credentials themselves from Louisiana raised no question at this time, and the dispatch was simply a notification as to them.

The question being put on the reception of the telegram, the question of reception was laid on the table.

On the same day[3] Mr. Carl Schurz, of Missouri, presented a memorial from W. L. McMillen, respectfully asking the Senate to take notice of the fact of his election. This memorial was laid on the table.

On March 7, 1873,[4] at the special session of the Senate, Mr. West presented the credentials of W. L. McMillen, which were laid on the table.

On December 4, 1873,[5] on motion of Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, these credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, no proposition being made to administer the oath to either claimant.

On December 15,[6] Mr. Morton, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback and W. L. McMillen, claiming seats in the Senate as Senators from Louisiana, reported that the committee were evenly divided upon the question as to whether Mr. Pinchback was, upon his credentials, entitled to be sworn in as a member, and asked to be discharged from further consideration of the subject, and to refer the whole matter to the determination of the Senate.

Mr. Morton submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback for a seat in the Senate of the United States for six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1873, being in regular form, he is entitled under the law, and in conformity with the usages of the Senate, to be sworn in as a member; and that whatever grounds of contest there may be as to his right to a seat should be made thereafter.

Mr. Morton submitted the above resolution individually as a Senator, the committee having authorized no proposition.

348. The Senate election case of Pinchback and others, continued.

In an election case the Senate considered so far as applicable testimony taken by its committee in a former Congress, in a matter to which neither contestant was a party.

Discussion in the Senate as to whether or not the competency of the electing body is a question of determining importance in considering the prima facie effect of credentials.

The credentials of Mr. Pinchback were issued by William Pitt Kellogg, as governor, and those of Mr. McMillen by John McEnery, as governor. It appeared from the debate that Mr. Pinchback's election took place on the same day and by the same legislature that had elected John Ray, whose claim to a seat for an unexpired portion of a term as Senator had not reached a decision in the preceding Congress.[1]

At the outset of the discussion, on December 15,[2] Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, moved to take from the files of the Senate for consideration in connection with this case the reports and evidence taken in the last Congress in the Louisiana case by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

At once there arose objection to this course, it being pointed out by Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, that the document in question recorded the result of an investigation in another case.

Speaking, on December 16,[3] Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, said:

This question has never been before the committee, nor has it ever been before the Senate; and so far as that volume of testimony is concerned, while I have no sort of objection to anybody referring to it for any purpose, it is no part of the res gestae. It is not a part of this case. It was taken before a different committee. The committee has been twice reorganized since that time. It was taken at a former session of Congress in a proceeding to which Mr. Pinchback was not a party and for which he is nowise responsible; and while it is here for reference, as every document in the document room is, and every book in the Library is, it is no part of this case.

Replying on January 30,[1] Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, said on this point, speaking as to Mr. Pinchback's status:

His prima facie case is overturned. The presumption that might spring from reading these papers is rebutted by the full proof of the fact that a committee of this body unanimously, except one of its members, has reported to you, and that report lies upon your table today, or in your document rooms, that there was no State legislature and there was no State government in Louisiana on the 15th day of January last, when it is pretended Pinchback was elected. Again, the Senator says this testimony was not taken in Mr. Pinchback's case; it was taken in Mr. Ray's case, and therefore Mr. Pinchback is not to be affected by it. Why, sir, in a judicial court, for reasons that pertain to such tribunals alone, the testimony taken in a case between Smith and Jones can not be used in a case between Brown and Gray, for the reason that each is entitled to cross-examine witnesses whose testimony is to affect him.

At this point Mr. Morton interposed to say that the resolution instructing the committee to inquire whether there was any State government in Louisiana was offered on the 16th of January, 1873, and the credentials were not presented to the Senate until some time afterwards. That investigation was already ordered before the credentials were presented to the Senate.[2]

To this Mr. Carpenter replied:

If the investigation had no reference to Mr. Ray's case; if it was an independent proceeding ordered by the Senate to ascertain an important fact upon which we might be called to legislate, then it binds all the world; all mankind were parties to that investigation. * * * It was not a proceeding in Ray's case, and Mr. Pinchback was as much a party to the proceeding as any other citizen of the United States.[3]

Mr. Carpenter then proceeded to read from Lewis's Reasonings and Methods in Politics to show that the process of ascertaining facts for legislative purposes was not so formal or subject to such strict rules of evidence as in judicial departments.

So I say [he continued] that the information which is furnished to the Senate by the report and testimony of this committee not only comes within the rules of evidence upon which legislative bodies must act, but that it was obtained in a proceeding instituted by its own authority, conducted by its own members, exercising its own powers to send for persons and papers, and conducted, too, under the supervision of the Senator from Indiana himself; and I say that it is before us, as evidence in this case, and in all cases, and for all purposes. The Senator says it is before us like any other volume in the document room, or any book in the library. I am willing to accept that expression, because every book in the library which gives us a fact of history applicable to this case, every law book which discusses the questions involved in this case, and every document in any room of this Capitol which furnishes information bearing upon this subject is legitimately and properly before us this morning.

Thereafter during the debate the report in question was referred to and quoted from freely.[4]

[2] The record of the case of Ray and McMillen in the Forty-second Congress shows that this statement is accurate; but the credentials were referred to the committee in season to be taken into consideration in its report.

[3] This is not wholly accurate. On January 16, 1873, the committee were directed to require and report as to the existence of a legal State government. On January 22, the credentials of Ray and McMillen were presented and referred to the committee. On February 20 the committee reported both as to the existence of a legal State government and as to the rights of Ray and McMillen.

[4] On March 3, 1876, while this question was still pending, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, took the same view as Mr. Carpenter took. First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record, p. 1437.

Proceeding to the merits of the case, Mr. Morton asserted[1] the proposition that if William Pitt Kellogg, who as governor issued the credentials of Mr. Pinchback, was the lawful governor, then Mr. Pinchback was entitled to take the seat without delay, and any contest to be made must be made thereafter. While he would discuss in this connection the status of the legislature, he did not consider it necessarily involved in the argument. He referred in support of this view to the precedents in the cases of Senator Goldthwaite, of Alabama, and of Potter v. Robbins, from Rhode Island.[2]

Mr. Carpenter did not admit that these precedents sustained Mr. Morton's argument,[3] and said:

> When a gentleman comes to this body with credentials in due form, showing that he has been elected by a body authorized to elect a Senator, then he has a prima facie case. The case then before the Senate (Goldthwaite case), * * * was such a case. There was a question made here as to individuals sitting in the legislature of Alabama, but there was no question that the body itself was the legislature of the State; and the better opinion is that the Senate has no authority to inquire into the right of individual members of a State legislature to sit therein, that being a question to be settled by the legislature, if there be a legislature to settle it; but the Senate has authority to inquire whether the body which has pretended to elect a Senator was the legislature of the State. The legislature alone can elect a Senator, and therefore to make a prima facie case it must be shown that the legislature has made an election.

Mr. Morton called attention to the fact that a certificate by the governor was a proper form of making known the election by the legislature, to which Mr. Carpenter replied:

> A prima facie case is that which appears before an examination of the merits; but when there has been a full investigation and trial, and it is ascertained that what appeared prima facie to be the case is not the true case then the prima facie case is gone. In Robbins's case there had been no investigation, and therefore the Senate properly acted upon the prima facie case. But here a full investigation had been made before Pinchback presented his prima facie case. Whenever the Senate acts, it must act upon all the facts before it; and, in this instance, we have not only the prima facie case made by the credentials, but also the full investigation showing that Pinchback's prima facie case is false.

349. The Senate election case of Pinchback and others, continued.

Reference to principles governing recognition of a State government by the President of the United States.

The discussion, from the above points of departure, naturally divides itself into two main branches:

(1) Was Governor Kellogg the governor of the State of Louisiana when the credentials were issued?

Mr. Morton contended[4] that he was. He had been in complete possession of the office for nearly twelve months, acting as governor in every respect; he had been recognized as such by the other State officers, by the legislature in various ways, by the State courts from the lowest to the highest; he had been recognized by the United States House of Representatives, which had seated a Member-elect bearing credentials signed by him; and, finally, he had been recognized by the President of the United States. On this last point Mr. Morton quoted at length the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Rhode Island case arising out of the so-called "Dorr rebellion," the case of Luther v. Borden (7 Howard).

Mr. Carpenter dissented [1] from this claim that Kellogg was the lawful governor. As to the point that he had held the office for a period of time and was still holding it, it was sufficient to say that he was holding it not by the voluntary consent and assent of the people of Louisiana; but by reason of support from the strong arm of the military power of the Federal Government. Under such circumstances the duration of his power was not material. If it was not rightful in the beginning, it was not rightful now. As to its recognition by the President and by the courts of Louisiana, Mr. Carpenter denied the effectiveness of both these arguments.

(a) As to the force of the decisions of the State courts in limiting the inquiry of the Senate, Mr. Morton contended [2] that it was obligatory to accept the decisions of State tribunals on all questions arising upon State laws. He quoted the cases of Luther v. Borden, and also Webster v. Cooper (14 Howard). Mr. Morton contended that the Senate, in accordance with this principle, should take a legislature as the State gave it. But it was objected in this connection, notably by Messrs. Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware, and John P. Stockton, of New Jersey, that the question of the existence of a legislature was directly before the Senate, and that it alone was the judge.

Mr. Carpenter discussed [3] more fully the effect of the decisions of the Louisiana court, taking the ground that the courts had acted in cases not properly within their jurisdiction, and that their decisions were conflicting and therefore not within the rule making them the highest evidence of what the local law was. He cited on this point the cases of the Ohio Life and Trust Company v. De Bolt (16 Howard, 432), Gelpecke v. Dubuque (1 Wallace, 175), and Havemeyer v. Iowa County (3 Wallace, 294). Mr. Thomas C. McCreery, of Kentucky, also argued in the same line.[4]

(b) As to the alleged recognition of the Kellogg government by the President, the facts and law were discussed at length [5] on December 16 and January 26 and 30, and February 2.

(2) As to the question of the legality of the legislature there was elaborate discussion and exploration of fact, the report already discussed being the basis of consideration, it being contended on the one side that the legislature was the legal body, and on the other that it was not.

On January 26 [6] Mr. Morton modified his resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of the Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to inquire into the conduct of said Pinchback in connection with said election.

In making this change Mr. Morton announced that he had learned that there were charges of improper conduct made against Mr. Pinchback in connection with the election, and this was the reason for the modification. Mr. Carpenter commented[1] on this as a virtual abandonment of the prima facie claim, but Mr. Morton declined to admit that this was the significance of his action.

On January 27[2] the credentials of Mr. McMillen were recommitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

But it does not appear that any action was taken at this session on the modified resolution presented by Mr. Morton.[3]

350. The Senate election case of Pinchback and others, continued.

Discussion of the form of credentials and the competency of the electing and certifying authorities behind them as elements in their efficacy.

Discussion of the status of a governor de facto as distinguished from an usurper.

On December 16, 1874[4] the Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter of W. L. McMillen requesting the speedy action of the Senate upon his credentials as Senator elect from the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On December 23[5] Mr. Morton submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Senate recognize the validity of the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback as certified to by Governor William P. Kellogg, of Louisiana, under the seal of said State; and the Committee on Privileges and Elections are instructed to examine and report if said Pinchback is entitled to be admitted on the prima facie case thus made, or if such admission should be postponed until investigation is made as to the charges of corruption in his election alleged against him.

On January 22,[6] 1875 Mr. West presented new credentials, in due form but in somewhat different form from the preceding credentials, dated January 13, 1875, and signed by "Wm. P. Kellogg" as governor, certifying that on January 12, 1875, Pinckney B. S. Pinchback had been elected to the United States Senate for the term expiring March 4, 1879—i. e., the term beginning March 4, 1873, as expressed in the credentials issued to Mr. Pinchback by William P. Kellogg on January 15, 1873.

These credentials, together with the former credentials and other papers relating to the case, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On February 8, 1875,[7] Mr. Morton submitted the report of the committee, as follows:

That the certificate of William Pitt Kellogg, then and now the governor of the State of Louisiana, which certificate is verified by the great seal of the State, shows that on the 17th day of January, 1873, the Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback was elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th of March, 1873, by the legislature of Louisiana, in manner and form as prescribed by the act of Congress regulating the elections of Senators of the United States. Upon this certificate the committee are of opinion that Mr. Pinchback has a prima facie title to admission as a member of the Senate, and that whatever objections may exist, if any, as to the manner of his election or as to the legal character of the body by which he was elected, should be inquired into afterwards.

The committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th of March, 1873."

In support of this report, on February 15[1] Mr. Morton cited the cases of Robbins, Shields, and Goldthwaite. At a later date he also cited the case of Spencer.

Minority views[2] were filed by Messrs. William T. Hamilton, of Maryland, and Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware. The minority begin with a discussion of the force and effect of the Kellogg credentials:

The power of the Senate, under section 5, article 1, of the Constitution, to "judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members" is absolute and unlimited.

The object in this case is to seat P. B. S. Pinchback upon this certificate alone, irrespective of his election, and which in effect for the present excludes any consideration of the election itself.

It may be admitted that the general practice has been to admit the person chosen as a Senator to his seat upon credentials sufficiently authenticated either by the legislature or the governor of the State, subject, of course, to any contest that might be thereafter prosecuted in respect to his right to the seat. The credentials in themselves, it will be conceded, have no substantial value. It is the election, and the election alone, that gives to the person chosen the right to be a Senator.

The certificate of the governor of a State directed to be given by the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, upon the election of a Senator, is but the certificate of a fact upon which the official existence of the person chosen depends. It gives to it no force whatever, and without it the election is just as good. It is merely one of the evidences of the election in a solemn form, and to which due respect should always be paid. In the act referred to there is nothing said as to what effect should be given to such a certificate. It has, however, been generally regarded as sufficient in itself to presume a lawful election of the person represented by it to be chosen. It is most certainly appropriate that this act did not define the force of such a certificate. It prescribes a duty that the governor might or might not observe. The Constitution of the United States provides for the election of Senators by the legislatures of the States. This is their absolute right. Congress may regulate the time and manner of choosing Senators, and the power of Congress over the subject is limited to this only. The right of choosing Senators belongs to the legislatures alone, and such election is alone in all cases of inquiry to be determined by its records. The governor is not known in the election; no duty is imposed upon him by the Constitution in respect to it, or in respect to its authentication. The legislature, to which is alone confided the high trust of choosing Senators, can speak through its own organization, its own officers, and its own acts, as its official record will show.

The right of election is sacred; the right of having this election determined by its own record is equally sacred; for it might be that if other independent departments of the Government, as the executive, for example, possessed the right or power of authentication in the election of a Senator, you might impinge upon the full enjoyment of the power of the legislature in the due choosing of Senators. This absolute right to choose we hold should not and does not depend for its efficiency upon the action of the executive or any other officer of the State or Federal Government.

It will be observed that the certificate such as we now have under consideration necessarily involves these elements of belief before it can have the force which is now attempted to be given to it by the report of the committee in this case: First, that the facts stated in regard to the election are true; and second, that the person certifying as governor is in fact what he represents himself to be. The efficacy sought to be impressed upon this certificate, in at once admitting the person represented to be chosen to a seat, alone depends upon the latter fact. With this in dispute the efficient power is gone. Investigation is at once inaugurated to settle the disputed point. Inquiry leads to inquiry, and the real life of the certificate is lost in the strife, for it can be readily seen that in a contest as to whether the certificate has any validity, either by reason of the allegation that the person certifying was not in fact the governor, or from any other reason, the State might be left without a Senator, when by reference to the acts of the legislature the records would show a lawful election by a lawful body, and who could deny that a person so chosen and with such a record could not be admitted without regarding at all the contest about the certificate of the governor, or whether he was in fact governor?

We advert to this to show that a contest upon the subject of certificates at all for any legitimate cause destroys their force. It was intended that by their force alone there should be immediate unobstructed admission to a seat. It must be conceded, in order to give this effect to the certificate before us, that William Pitt Kellogg was at the time the governor of Louisiana. If he were not the governor, then it is no more than waste paper. All will admit, we presume, that this has been a subject of dispute at least since the State election which took place on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872. A constant, earnest, and at times an aggressive protest has been made against Kellogg, as not only not entitled to be the constitutional and rightful governor of Louisiana, but as a notorious usurper, held in the position he has seized without color of right by means of the armed forces of the United States. Events occurring at the time, and continually since, and some of the most painful character, prove that he does not hold this place practically by any other tenure or power. Whatever else may be said of this notable prominent fact, all are well advised that the right of Kellogg to be governor of Louisiana is in good faith denied and resisted in every way possible to a peaceful resistance.

This at once, most naturally, opens up the inquiry as to the certificate itself, and no efficacy is to be ascribed to it until this is satisfactorily settled, for without this it is worthless for any purpose. We apprehend there is no diversity in the committee on this point. The report of the committee insists that Kellogg is the governor of Louisiana, and would proceed to show it by a course of argument and a system of evidence satisfactory to gentlemen uniting in that report. On the contrary, another course of argument, and other evidence equally satisfactory, have brought the undersigned to a very different conclusion. The broad field of inquiry and investigation is therefore opened up, for it must be manifest to an unprejudiced mind that an examination into the fact whether Kellogg was the rightful governor of Louisiana at the time he signed this certificate must bring us to his pretended election, and, with it, to the election of the body which chose Pinchback. The whole subject relating to the affairs of this State, in connection with the election held on the 4th of November, 1872, for the election of governor and other State officers and members of the legislature, becomes involved in the very first branch of the inquiry which it is conceded by all must be made and settled before any force can be imparted to the certificate.

Before entering upon this inquiry we submit most respectfully, putting it in the mildest form, whether this is not an exceptional case from the ordinary one, where it is conceded that there was a rightful governor to sign certificates and where there was a legislature to elect. It must be admitted that no such case was ever before presented to the consideration of the Senate. Notwithstanding it has been the usual practice to admit, in the first instance, persons to a seat upon such certificates, leaving the contest, if any, to be proceeded with thereafter in the usual way, yet the very first question as to the official character of the person pretending to be governor impairs, as we have before said, the wonted efficacy of such certificate; so that when in the examination of this primary question is involved the body that chose Pinchback, and in fact the whole State government of Louisiana, would it be fair, rational, and just to stop short of the substantial merits of the case when all can be settled at once?

It will be admitted, we think, that in such a controversy, opening up both the official character of the governor and the legal validity of the legislature choosing the Senator, we could determine against the validity of the certificate and at the same time determine the validity of the election upon the record of the legislature and upon its official power of election. Suppose that such certificates should be attacked for fraud, as they could be, could anyone say that such attack would involve alone the fraudulent character of the certificate, and not the rightful issue—the election itself? The attack would involve both, and, involving both, common reason would dictate that we should decide the substantial question. While we could, in such an inquiry, set aside the certificate, we would give to the person rightfully chosen his seat, and all done in the same proceeding. For if our inquiry should be alone confined to the certificate, for whatever cause, we would be exposed to the fallacy of setting it aside and then remitting the case to the governor for other or further certificate of a fact simply, when we could, and it would be our duty, ascertain the fact ourselves to end the matter.

Therefore we conceive that even in a technical sense, upon a question submitted as this is, an examination of the whole subject is necessary to come to right conclusions; but when we view it in its broad sense, and as we have it in the light of history and events daily transpiring, many of which we must or are presumed to know, as legislators and members of this body, we would consider it a gross dereliction of public duty did we confine ourselves to a technical consideration of matter not substantial when in it are involved questions of the greatest moment, and which in their proper solution demand our earnest efforts and soundest judgment.

The facts present the broadest grounds for interposition in the broadest sense to ascertain the real right and settle a question that has already given, and, until rightly settled, will give to the country the greatest concern. The facts can not be denied that imperatively call for such an interposition; mere parchment titles, mere certificates, sink into insignificance before the patent and undeniable facts which environ this case. Never before has such a case been made, and it is to be hoped that no such one will ever be made again.

A brief reference to the prominent facts will show how entirely and neecessarily the whole case is before us.

The views then go on to review the facts of the State election of November 4, 1872, in Louisiana, to discuss the rival returning boards, the fraudulent returns, the rival governors and rival legislatures, and then proceed to discuss the status of Kellogg as governor:

But to recur to the question. If, in the course of the investigation, from all the facts drawn from all the sources to which we have referred, we conclude that the pretended governor is a mere usurper, then his acts are void and avail nothing. Persons hold office or place under three different tenures—first, de jure; second, de facto; and, third, as a usurper—the only three modes, we believe, known to the law; and by one or the other of these tenures does the person exercise the office or place that he holds.

The first is clothed with all the powers that right, combined with possession, can give, The second is only clothed with the powers possession can give, that possession being obtained under a color of right; and these powers are limited to certain well-defined acts. The third refers to a person undertaking to hold office without any color of right; he is a mere usurper, whose acts are void.

The distinguishing differences between officers de jure and de facto and a mere usurper are well laid down in the books in the earlier days, and the same are observed to this day. In a leading case, decided so far back as 1738, the general principles relating to officers de jure and de facto were well defined. In this case one Goldwire, "under pretense and color of being elected mayor of Christ Church, in the county of Southampton," was presented unto William Willis, steward of the court leet, and was there sworn into the office of mayor, and, in fact, exercised the office till —— day of ——, 1736, and that being in the exercise of said office, and under "pretense of being elected, and sworn into the same, he issued a summons to the several burgesses of the corporation to meet," etc., and at such meeting he nominated the defendant Lisle as one of the burgesses, and the question was whether, when he made such nomination, he was mayor de facto, for it was found that he had never been elected, and, if mayor de facto, whether he had the power to make the appointment. It was held by the court that Goldwire was not so much as a mayor de facto; for in order to constitute a mayor de facto it is necessary that there be some form or color of an election; but without this, the taking the title and regalia of the office, and the acting and being sworn in as mayor are not sufficient. Now, here it appears that Goldwire was never elected in fact; and though it be stated that he was sworn at the leet, it does not appear (as it ought) that this was agreeable to the constitution of the borough. And it is not material that he acted as mayor, as it is found that a quo warranto was recently prosecuted against him, pending which the present election was made, and that he was thereupon adjudged to be a usurper." (Andrews's Reports, Henry v. Lisle, 173.) The distinctions then made are continued to this day, and are as clearly defined:

"An officer de facto is one who exercises the duties of an office under color of an appointment or election to that office. He differs, on the one hand, from a mere usurper of an office, who undertakes to act as an officer without any color of right, and on the other from an officer de jure, who is in all respects legally appointed and qualified to exercise the office. These distinctions are very obvious, and have always been recognized."—(17 Connecticut, Plymouth v. Painter, 588; 7 Johnson, People v. Collins, 549; 2 Kent.)

It is claimed by some that though it be a question whether Kellogg be a governor de jure, yet he is a governor de facto, and as such his certificate of the election of Pinchback is to be recognized as equally binding upon us as if he were governor de jure.

Holding, as we do, that he is neither the governor de jure nor de facto, but a mere usurper, and a usurper not keeping himself in position by his own unaided local power, but by the aid of armed forces of a foreign power—in its true relations to this case as much a foreign power as that of Great Britain could be—we desire, briefly, to examine this phase of the subject.

Keeping in view the rulings we have cited, is Kellogg so much as a governor de facto? In disposing of this we dispose of his character as governor de jure.

As we have already noticed, the constitution of Louisiana provides that the governor shall be elected by the people. To be such de facto he must be in by color of an election. If he has no color of an election, he is nothing but a usurper, "who is one undertaking to act without a color of right." Two propositions are to be here considered in order to arrive at correct conclusions—

1. Was Kellogg elected by a majority of the votes of the people at the election held on the 4th day of November, 1872?

2. If he was not, then had he such a color of an election as to constitute him governor de facto?

This brings us to the wider domain of fact which at every step has marked this controversy from its inception, in 1872, to the present period. In the direct examination of the matter all the facts that may tend to a correct result should be considered. We have a great variety of facts and circumstances, some historical in their character, some which we are obliged to know or are assumed to know from our constitutional relations to the State, her people, her government, her officials, whether judicial, ministerial, executive, or political, and those which we have gathered ourselves through committees of this body in the investigation had by resolution of this body passed on 16th January, 1873, and which is as follows: "Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is any existing State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it is constituted;" and to which committee were also referred the certificates of John Ray and W. L. McMillen, both claiming the seat in this body supposed to have been made vacant by the resignation of William Pitt Kellogg.

This committee, composed of Messrs. Morton, Carpenter, Logan, Anthony, Trumbull, Alcorn, and Hill, made a diligent and laborious investigation of all the matters connected with both questions, and made an elaborate report to the Senate, accompanied by a large amount of testimony. It is Senate Report No. 457, Forty-second Congress, third session. From all the evidence, then, and which covers and exhausts the whole subject, was Kellogg in fact elected by the people of Louisiana the governor of that State?

After examining the facts the minority conclude—

Then, so far as Kellogg is concerned, there is nothing to show that he had the slightest right, either by an election or the color of an election, to hold this office. He must therefore be regarded as a usurper; for in no other character could he hold the place, if not in that of governor de jure or de facto.

The principles are well and plainly defined in the case of Plymouth v. Painter, 17 Conn., already quoted, in respect to the acts of persons holding place under one or the other of these modes. The following is from page 593:

"The acts of a mere usurper of an office, without any color of title, are undoubtedly wholly void, both as to individuals and the public. But where there is a color of a lawful title, the doings of an officer, as it respects third persons and the public, must be respected until he is ousted on a quo warranto, which is the appropriate proceeding to try the validity of a title to an office, and in which it would be necessary for him to show a complete title in all respects; although in a suit against a person for acts which he would have an authority to do only as an officer, he must, in order to make out a justification, show that he is an officer de jure; because the title to the office being directly drawn in question, in a suit to which he is a party, may be regularly decided. So where he sues for fees, or sets up a title to property by virtue of his office, he must show himself to be an officer de jure."

It is here laid down—

First. That the acts of a usurper are void.

Secondly. That the acts of an officer in by a color of title—that is, an officer de facto, where the rights of third persons or the public are concerned—are to be respected.

Thirdly. That where he is directly concerned he must show himself to be an officer de jure whenever the direct issue is made, either as to title, or fees, or as a trespasser, or otherwise.

If Kellogg, then, be a usurper, the certificate relied upon in this case has no value for any purpose. But let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that Kellogg was governor de facto; that he was in by color of an election, and by color of an election only, and not by an election itself; with such knowledge upon our part, with the known fact, besides, that his right to the place is denied and contested, that there is a rival governor, in fact a rival government, we should proceed with great caution in giving such efficacy to his simple certificate. True, the third section of the act of Congress of 1866, making provision for the election of Senators, makes it the duty of the governor to certify the election to the President of the Senate; it still stops short of prescribing the force of such a certificate. No doubt Congress intended that ordinarily it should be regarded as sufficient for admission to a seat, but it must be manifest that this certificate is not the real credentials of a Senator-elect, but intended originally, we may presume, as a substitute for it. The real credentials of the election is a copy of the record of the election itself, properly certified by the officers of the body electing; for Congress has no right to impose this duty upon the governor, and that neither it nor the person elected can compel the governor to issue any such certificate.

There must be design in not presenting a certified copy of the record of election by the legislature instead of depending alone upon this certificate of the governor, when it was well known that every step in the progress of this case would be contested. The declaration in the report submitted by the committee, that Kellogg was then and now the governor of Louisiana, defines the spirit of the whole proceeding; and that is that it is more of an object to get Kellogg recognized in some way as governor by this body than the admission of Pinchback to a seat in it.

Therefore should we be more careful still how we undertake, in giving ostensible credence alone to a certificate, to pass upon a higher matter—the legal character of the person giving it. Why not, in such an acknowledged condition of things, recur to his credentials, which the record of the election or a copy of it can make? But, that produced, it is too apparent that the contest would be transferred from the governor to the legislature; the legislature is out of being, and therefore the fact of an election by it can only be inquired into; but the governor is still living in the place in which he was put, and still kept by an armed force, and to be kept there if his acts are to be respected or sanctioned by us. How shall we close our eyes to the facts staring us in the face? We again beg leave to repeat that with the assumption that Kellogg is at best but a governor de facto, with a rival governor claiming the right, and with the acknowledged power to exercise it in the absence of the troops of the United States, should we not be careful, if we can in any way abstain from determining questions of the present, which concern alone the present, and which should be determined in a different way and by all branches of the Government, if to be determined at all by it? The election of Pinchback does not concern the present; the body electing him is functus officio. He must stand or fall by the action of that body. Let us go back to that, and upon the acts and legal validity of that body determine the right to a seat. We say again that the passage of the resolution decides only one thing, the right of membership, and binds no one to anything besides; but the fact that in doing this we have acknowledged the legal validity of Kellogg's official character may influence others or justify others in doing things to the infinite injustice of the people of Louisiana, and to the persons there claiming to be officers by virtue of a rightful election.

Again, we well understand the principles which limit and qualify the powers of an officer de facto. His acts are scanned and judged; he can do only those that are to be considered as necessary to be done; indeed, so confined in this respect that it was held, in the case of King v. Lisle, that the proper question in a case would be "whether the person be an officer de facto as to the particular purpose under consideration;" he can do nothing for himself; he can not set up title by virtue of his office; he can not sue for his fees or salary; he can not justify in a trespass; he can do nothing that may bring in issue his right to hold the office without showing that de jure right for the exercise of it. As a judge de facto his judgment in a litigation between third parties would be good; a sale of property under such a judgment would be good to pass title; and for the reason that third parties are not supposed to be able to inquire into the rights of one holding and exercising the duties of the office, and must therefore act upon what appears to be the right. But a sheriff de facto seizing and selling the property under that or any other judgment in a suit against him for the seizure by the owner or possessor of the property, he must for his defense show that he held his office de jure, for this concerns himself only, and he should know whether he was in right an officer.

Shorn of the general and enlarged powers of an officer de jure by the plainest principles of law, limited and circumscribed by rules founded in reason and having the sanction of ages, shall we be disposed to give to the act of such an officer—governor de facto, if even he be such—that full and unqualified effect in this case, with the extraordinary circumstances surrounding it, as if he were an officer de jure, when that act, too, bears directly upon the constitution of this body, which we are bound to guard, and upon the right of a State to have its true representatives upon this floor? In regard to the constitution of this body the direct issue is made; this pretended governor represents himself to be the governor of Louisiana, and upon this alone does the committee rest the case. It is admitted that he must be the governor to give the certificate any power whatever. In raising the question it is shown that he is only governor de facto, if governor at all, and not de jure—that is, governor for a purpose only, and that purpose to be judged of, whether proper or not, when the exigency arises. It is upon us, and it is whether we shall constitute members of this body upon the certificates of such a governor, or shall we not rather recur, as we have before inquired, into the election itself or the record of it?

Upon this body rests the duty of preserving its own organization, and of admitting its own members. Here its power is supreme, and for its independence it must depend upon this power, and its proper and legal and rational exercise; and it is to judge of the fact whether a certificate (not of a governor, as contemplated by the law, a rightful governor in all respects—but of such a governor) shall have the efficacy now asked for it.

Indeed, in this very case, in the complications in Louisiana, the troubles and disorders there, the very soul of the objection that we now urge against the recognition of this certificate is made to appear. There is trouble about the State government in that State. There is trouble as to who is the constitutionally elected governor, both claiming it, and as to which body of the two claiming to be the legislature is the real one. In this contest, where so much right is involved, and where right should be done, might it not be that, if we should admit Pinchback upon the certificate of Kellogg, we would to that extent recognize him as the rightful governor of Louisiana, and possibly direct additional power against the other side? Would this be wise, and just, and expedient; and when we know, too, that so far as the certificate in itself is concerned it adds nothing to title, but that the election constitutes this? If it is the policy to settle these disturbances in Louisiana, to recognize either governor or none, do it in the usual manner known to the laws, and that is by legislation upon the part of Congress, when the whole subject can be considered, and the remedy, if any, be applied.

The Senate in election cases investigates the legality of the legislature as organized, but refrains from questioning the titles of the component parts of an undoubted legislature.

Having thus disposed of the question of the competency of Kellogg as governor, the minority continue:

Having come to the conclusion that Kellogg was a mere usurper and the certificate not entitled to respect, or if it should be considered by some that he was the governor de facto, that even in this view no force ought to be given to his certificate, we are brought to the consideration of the main fact itself—the election of Pinchback by a legislature. While this is not technically before us, it is substantially. While the report of the committee bases its action entirely upon the force of the certificate, the resolution submits the question of admission generally. It can not be denied that the inquiry upon one branch opens up the whole subject, and one can not be well considered without considering both.

This brings us to the examination of the body organized under the returns made by the Lynch board, to which we have referred in the other branch of the case. In looking into the organization that elected Pinchback, the surreptitious inauguration of Kellogg into the gubernatorial office pales into insignificance before the fraudulent creation of this body into a legislature and of its shameless pretension to power.

Even admit that Kellogg was the rightful governor of Louisiana and that his certificate should have all the force which could properly under ordinary circumstances attach to it, still all the facts are before us, and they are of the gravest character. The question is not who are members of the legislature of Louisiana—for that body is the judge of this, and of their elections and qualifications; with these we have nothing to do; but the question is as to the legislature as organized, whether there is one in being to elect, and whether such an one elected Pinchback. The existence of a legislature competent to elect a Senator is not only a historical fact to be known to us as any other patent fact, but it is one which is susceptible of proof.

It will be necessary again to give a brief résumé of the facts known to exist in Louisiana respecting the organization of the body claiming to be the legislature of that State, and which elected Pinchback.

After reviewing the facts, especially the mandate of Judge Durell, of the Federal court, and its enforcement by Federal troops, the minority say:

The whole proceeding from its inception down to its final consummation was a gross usurpation, accompanied with every species of fraud and tyranny. The body that was organized under this mandate and its military enforcement is not entitled to any legal existence that any American should acknowledge. The whole is a product of fraud, conspiracy, and of armed force, and is entitled to no consideration.

We wish it to be remembered that we are not inquiring into the component parts of a legislative body. Each house of the legislature must do that for itself. We are inquiring into the aggregate character of the body as organized and as it represents itself to be—a legislature; how it was brought into being; how supported; and under what authority. We find no single element in it to constitute it a legislature representing the free people of Louisiana under their constitution and laws; but, on the contrary, simply a body organized under the mandate of a Federal judge supported by the armed force of the United States, based upon a pretended election found by a returning board without a single official return, and not having a title of authority, and acting in violation and in defiance of all law. We find that body, pretending to be the legislature of Louisiana, the mere creature of a conspiracy as bold, as reckless, and as wicked as any that has ever disgraced the annals of history. We speak thus strongly because our instincts as American citizens prompt us to the reprobation it so signally deserves. This body thus organized chose P. B. S. Pinchback a Senator in Congress for the period he claims.

The large mass of the members of it were never elected in fact; the returning board declaring them to be elected had not a single power to do so; it never had an official return before it.

After reviewing the histories of the rival legislatures, the minority continue:

Can the Senate hesitate to determine between such governments? The interposition of mere force without cause and without right, by which one for the present may be put up and the other down, should not deter us in determining which is the rightful one. The soldiers of the United States should not be allowed to step in between our judgment and our duty. The day is not yet upon us, we trust, when the sword is to settle questions alone for us to determine. Taking all the facts as they appear in the case before us, from the inception of each rival body to the final consummation in their respective organizations, we can determine between them. It is our duty to do so; and we have facts sufficiently numerous and authentic to determine fairly and intelligently between them. Each has chosen Senators, and both are here with certificates.

There can be no doubt that where there are rival bodies, each claiming to be the rightful legislature of a State, and each presenting a Senator for admission upon this floor, we must judge between them, for the reason that we are to judge of the elections, the qualifications, and returns of our own members; and in this we are to know whether the body choosing a Senator is the legislature having the constitutional right to do so, and that such an one did choose a Senator.

This was clearly submitted in the case of Robbins and Potter, contesting Senators from Rhode Island. Mr. Poindexter, who submitted the majority report in that case, says:

"There was but one governor and but one senate in the State claiming to be a part of the general assembly. If there had existed another body of men, however chosen, contending for the offices of the governor and senators in the State, it will not be denied that their respective rights might be the subject of inquiry in deciding a contested election in the Senate of the United States."

The right of the Senate is undoubted to judge in this respect. Its power is not limited, for the sound reason that its independence can only be absolutely preserved in possessing such a right. In exercising it here we should not be capricious, but governed in our conduct by rules that good sense, honest intention, and a desire for truth and justice should naturally inspire. No other department of the Government ought to control it; no other department of the Government should be allowed, under any pretext or in the exercise of any power, to trench upon it. It is a primary right, for in its free and absolute exercise the very life, existence, and organization of free legislative bodies depend.

Coming to the main point again, should the Senate hesitate between the rival governments? How can the Senate recognize the Kellogg government, stamped, as it is, all over with fraud, conspiracy, and force? There is not an element of free constitutional government in it. Mere intruders and usurpers in all departments of it, how shall the Senate, in respect for constitutional government, admit that such a body as that organized under the order of Durell shall impose upon us a Senator? We might receive with just as much plausibility and complacency a Senator from the soldiery who guarded that body when it went through the forms of choosing one. The bayonet organized it, kept it in being, protected it by day and by night, and without it no one would be here pressing a claim to a seat by virtue of any authority from it.

Speaking for ourselves, we can not in any manner acknowledge any such election. We can not give any respect or efficacy to the certificate under consideration as that of a rightful governor, and must therefore declare that in our opinion P. B. S. Pinchback is not entitled to a seat as a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

In conclusion the minority say:

It is said that the Senate is bound, or ought to be bound, by decisions of the judicial tribunals of the State when inquiring into the existence of a government or of its officers; also by the action of other departments of the State government; also by the late act of the President and by reason of the possession of the office for a length of time. We shall only briefly remark that this body is bound by nothing in the exercise of its undoubted power. But admitting that any or all of these combined should have more or less influence upon the judgment of the Senate in coming to conclusions, we may be permitted to say that, in regard to the judicial action of the courts of Louisiana in relation to this subject, the question in issue never was fairly presented, and with the further remark that it is painfully evident that a majority of the court deciding cases having relevancy at all to the subject was in complicity with the Kellogg government to maintain its power; and so with the other departments of the State government, for all depended for their very existence upon the official being of Kellogg. As to the action of the President having any binding force upon the Senate, we say that his power to act relates alone to one thing, and that is the suppression of violence when legally called upon for aid in suppressing such violence. His action can not bind beyond the simple fact and its real dependents; it decides no right for us or for Congress. One word as to the continuous possession of Kellogg and which it is claimed gives him some standing to be considered in this body. His possession is that of fraud and force, and this possession is to-day only held by this force. It is the possession of might against right, and the weakness of the title will at once be witnessed upon the withdrawal of the force which keeps him in place. In our opinion, there is nothing in the matters that would be set up to secure a recognition of the Kellogg government. The whole is a crime against our civilization and a blot upon our free institutions.

The resolution proposed by the majority of the committee was debated on February 15, 16, and 17, 1875,[1] and on the latter day, by a vote of yeas 39, nays 22, it was laid on the table. Mr. Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, who made the motion to lay on the table, explained that he did so from no spirit of hostility to the resolution, but simply because the Senate needed to proceed to other business.[2] And thereafter during the Forty-third Congress the resolution remained on the table.

On March 5, 1875,[3] when the Senate met in special session, at the beginning of the Forty-fourth Congress, Mr. Morton offered this resolution:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning on the 4th of March, 1873.

This resolution was debated at length on March 8, 9, 10, 12, and 13,[1] and on the latter day a motion was submitted by Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, to amend the resolution by inserting the word "not" before the word "admitted."

This amendment was debated on March 15 and 16,[2] and on the latter day further consideration was postponed until the second Monday in December next, the vote being yeas 33, nays 30.

352. The Senate election case of Pinchback and others, continued.

The Senate declined to seat the bearer of credentials signed by a person exercising the authority of a governor, it being objected that the signer was an usurper and that there was no election by a valid legislature.

Discussion as to how far the Senate, in considering an election case, should follow a decision of a State court as to the competency of the legislature.

Discussion of the powers of the Senate under the constitutional authority to judge the elections and returns of its members.

Instance wherein an unsuccessful contestant for a seat in the Senate was permitted to withdraw his credentials.

Discussion as to the required form for Senate credentials under the law.

Discussion of the judicial knowledge which must exist to justify giving prima facie effect to credentials.

On Thursday, December 9, 1875,[3] at the first or regular session of the Forty-fourth Congress, Mr. West presented the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D.C., December 8, 1875.

To the Honorable the President and members of the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned would respectfully ask permission to withdraw his credentials as Senator-elect by the McEnery legislature from the State of Louisiana.

Respectfully,

W. L. MCMILLEN.

At the same time Mr. West presented and had read an open letter from Mr. McMillen to John McEnery, claimant to the governorship of Louisiana. In this letter he explained how he had contested with John Ray for the remainder of the term ending March 4, 1873, and with Pinckney B. S. Pinchback for the full term beginning at that date, and how a question as to the respective bodies represented by himself and his opponents had prevented an award of the seat. He then continues—

In November, 1874, the successors to the general assembly electing me were chosen, and after continued effort the difficulties in the way of organization of the assembly were composed.

Under the auspices of a committee of Congressmen, a plan of adjustment was agreed upon, the parties thereto embracing many of the gentlemen who honored me with their support in 1872–3, and the settlement resulted in the formation of a general assembly largely Democratic and conservative in the lower house, and generally accepted as legitimate by both of the political parties of the State; and said assembly so constituted, at their extra session in April last, did formally recognize W. P.

Kellogg as the executive of Louisiana. Further, the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, with a large Democratic majority, following the action of the preceding Republican House, did, on the 6th instant, recognize the final and determining action of the present legislature of the State of Louisiana relative to the State government thereof by seating, prima facie, the six members of Congress-elect from said State bearing the credentials of W. P. Kellogg, and refusing at the same time to recognize your competency to exercise executive functions for Louisiana.

The letter then goes on to state that as the issues are determined a further contest by him could have no beneficial effect. and he considers it his duty to withdraw his credentials.

The letter having been read, Mr. West offered the following—

Ordered, That the request of William L. McMillen, heretofore claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, for the return of his credentials be granted.

On December 14 [1] the order was debated at length, it being objected that the credentials were transmitted to the Senate in pursuance of law, and that they belonged to its archives and should not be withdrawn. But by a vote of yeas 30, nays 28, the order was agreed to.

On December 20 [2] Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, by consent of the Senate, presented and had laid on the table a paper purporting to be the credentials issued by John McEnery as governor, showing the appointment of Robert H. Marr as Senator from Louisiana to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of William L. McMillen.

On January 18, 1876,[3] Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, presented the credentials of James B. Eustis, of Louisiana, for the term beginning March 4, 1873. These credentials were not from the governor of the State, but consisted simply of duly certified transcripts of the proceedings of the legislature of Louisiana resulting in the election of Mr. Eustis. At once a question was raised by Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, who called attention to the fact that the laws of the United States required that the credentials of a Senator should be certified by the governor of the State.[4] Mr. Thurman replied that there was no method of coercing a governor who should refuse to sign the certificate, and the requisition of the statutes could not be understood as constituting the certificate of the governor the only evidence of the election of a Senator by a State legislature. In return Mr. Conkling called attention to the fact that the papers nowhere alleged that the governor had refused to give the ordinary credentials, and the papers themselves were not those on which the Senate should rely as prima facie evidence.

Mr. Thurman cited the case of Mr. Sykes, of Alabama wherein, the governor having refused to sign credentials, a transcript of proceedings had been accepted as title papers of the party.

[4] Sections 18 and 19 of the Revised Statutes provide:

"It shall be the duty of the executive of the State from which any Senator has been chosen to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States.

"The certificate mentioned in the preceding section shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State."

On January 24,[1] on motion of Mr. Morton, the papers purporting to be the credentials of Mr. Eustis were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On January 26[2] Mr. West presented a memorial of certain State senators of Louisiana in relation to the election of Mr. Eustis, and was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On January 28[3] Mr. Morton, from that committee, presented the following report:

That in their opinion there is no vacancy in the office of Senator from the State of Louisiana, P. B. S. Pinchback having been elected in January, 1873, to the term beginning on the 4th of March, 1873. They therefore recommend that the papers relating to Mr. Eustis be laid upon the table.

Three members of the committee announced their dissent from the report.

On February 3,[4] on motion of Mr. Morton, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on March 5, 1875, the pending question being the motion of Mr. Edmunds to insert "not" before the word "admitted."

The debate on this proposition went on during February 4, 7, March 1, 3, 7, and 8.[5]

Mr. James L. Alcorn, of Mississippi, who had originally concurred in the report which found that there was no legal State government in Louisiana in 1873, sketched briefly the developments in the situation.[6]

McEnery's legislature was finally dispersed, and he was driven from the field, and Kellogg was left in possession. Congress refused to do anything. Kellogg, in spite of all local opposition, maintained his government. His official position was recognized in the State of Louisiana. It became an accepted authority throughout the United States, so far as it could be emanating from the governor of a State. Finally the House of Representatives, at the last session of Congress, passed a formal resolution recognizing the Kellogg government. The Senate of the United States, subsequent to that time, passed a resolution to the same effect.

Therefore Mr. Alcorn urged that the certificate of Governor Kellogg should be good, and should be honored.

While it was denied,[7] especially by Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, that the Senate had in express terms recognized Kellogg as governor, and while a reference to the resolution showed that it was merely an approval of the action of the President "in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive," yet Mr. Edmunds admitted that Kellogg was the executive.

But Mr. Edmunds denied[8] that the question was narrowed merely to the credentials. He showed that the pending resolution covered final as well as prima facie right. But even narrowing the case down to the credentials, he denied the effect of the Kellogg certificate:

What is this paper? It bears the great seal of the State of Louisiana. How do we know that to be the great seal of the State of Louisiana? We know it upon precisely the same ground that we know that there is a legislature of the State of Louisiana, or that there is not a legislature of the State of Louisiana, or that in the year 1863 there was no legislature of the State of North Carolina—I mean no constitutional legislature under the Constitution of the United States. How, then, do we get at the first knowledge, the first step, on the subject of this prima facie? We get it by the judicial knowledge—to borrow a phrase of art which we are supposed to possess, whether, in fact, we do or not—that this seal is the seal of the State of Louisiana. We do not get it by proof; we do not get it by attempting to hear, try, or determine the question; but we get it, as I say, by that judicial knowledge which the laws of the land impute to everybody called upon to administer, as we are here, either legislative or judicial functions. Therefore * * * this paper, on the face of it, is an official paper, emanating from some executive authority or person acting in executive capacity in the State of Louisiana. Does our judicial knowledge stop there? * * * No, sir. That is not the law; it is not common sense. This body, in my opinion—and the law is all one way upon the subject—was in a constitutional and legal sense just as well advised of the state of legality or the want of the state of legality of the legislature that elected this man before the inquiry made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections as afterwards. That inquiry, in the judicial sense, was an inquiry to inform the conscience of the Senate just as we refer to a lexicon or to a law book or to a precedent in our statutes. We are bound to know, in short, what are the legislatures of the various States, which bodies, if there are two, or whether a particular body, if there be only one, is the government of that State or is the chief officer of any department of it. * * * If that be true, then this paper is not a prima facie case, as it is called, unless we also have the judicial knowledge that the body of men who purport to have elected him was the legislature of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Morton, on the other hand, urged that in the recent case of Senator Spencer, of Alabama,[1] the Senate, under conditions the same, had honored the credentials.

Proceeding to discuss the status of the legislature, Mr. Edmunds referred[2] to the fact that the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana was the ground on which the validity of the legislature was affirmed. While denying that the supreme court had actually declared the legislature legal, he would, for purpose of argument, admit the contention. He then said:

The Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, says that not the supreme court of Louisiana, not the supreme court of any State, but we, here, under a personal oath, each one of us to do justice according to the law, shall be the judge for this purpose of what the law of the State of Louisiana is. Sir, I am not ready to abdicate; I have no right to abdicate. This provision of the Constitution making us the judge, first, last, and always, of the election of a Senator, was inserted from the gravest considerations, not only of public convenience, but of public safety. The fathers of the country in their wisdom did not intend that this Government should be broken down as so many of its predecessors had been by the factions and storms of localities in States, but to compose this National Government there should be this perpetual and supreme tribunal, which was itself to be the judge of the election of its members, and nobody else was. It was not a concurrent jurisdiction; it was an exclusive one.

On this question also, Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, who concurred in the view that the competency of the legislature was vital in the case, said:[3]

There is one conclusive answer to all that has been said about the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, and that is that the question before us is to be decided by this Senate, and by this Senate alone, and that the decision of no court, not even if it were the Supreme Court of the United States, has even the force of a precedent on a question like this. The Constitution makes the Senate the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. It can not, therefore, be bound by the decision of any other tribunal or any other body of men.

On March 8, 1876,[1] the amendment proposed by Mr. Edmunds was agreed to, yeas 32, nays 29. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to, yeas 32, nays 29. So it was—

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be not admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning on the 4th of March, 1873.

353. The Senate election case of Pinchback and others, continued.

The Senate has admitted a person elected while the case of another claimant to the seat was yet pending.

In determining an election case the Senate has taken notice of the journals of a State legislature.

In a case wherein a governor declined to sign the credentials of a Senator-elect the Senate admitted the claimant after examination of final right.

On March 8, 1877,[2] at the beginning of the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Thurman called attention to the fact that the decision in the Pinchback case had settled that there was a vacancy, and therefore removed the ground on which the committee had reported against the claim of Mr. Eustis in the preceding Congress. Therefore he proposed, and the Senate on the next day agreed to, a resolution taking the credentials of Mr. Eustis from the files and referring them to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On December 1, 1877,[3] Mr. Bainbridge Wadleigh, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted a report as follows:

Mr. Eustis claims to have been elected on the 12th of January, 1876. The body which elected him was that formed by what is known as the Wheeler compromise, and there is no doubt that it was the lawful legislature of Louisiana.

Two questions arise in this case: First, whether Mr. Eustis was lawfully elected; second, whether at the time of his election a vacancy existed which the legislature of Louisiana had the right to fill.

The legislature of Louisiana on the 12th day of January, 1876, consisted of a house containing 111 members and a senate with 36 senators. On the 11th day of January, 1876, the house voted to go into an election for United States Senator, and the senate on the same day refused to do so. On the 12th day of January, it appearing that there had been no election on the day before, 64 members of the house and 12 members of the senate, being a majority of all entitled to seats in both houses, met in joint convention and elected Mr. Eustis.

Your committee find that although the senate refused to take part as such in said election, and although a minority of the senate only did take part in it, yet there was a substantial compliance with the act of Congress of 1866. Upon the constitutionality of that act your committee express no opinion. The Senate has repeatedly, however, by its action affirmed its constitutionality; and your committee feel bound by the precedents which the Senate has established.

The second question, whether or not a vacancy existed at the time of Mr. Eustis's election which the legislature of Louisiana had the right to fill, is one of some difficulty. At the time of said election Mr. P. B. S. Pinchback was the claimant for the same seat under two elections—one in 1873, the other in 1875. His credentials and claims under said elections had been presented to the Senate and by it referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Said committee, on the 5th day of March, 1875, reported a resolution to the Senate that Mr. Pinchback be admitted thereto. On the 8th day of March, 1876, that resolution was amended so as to change it to a resolution that he be not admitted. The resolution was passed as thus amended on the same day.

[3] First session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 800.

Your committee feel bound to regard that vote of the Senate as a final adjudication of the claims of Mr. Pinchback and a decision that he had no right to a seat. Mr. Eustis's election took place while Mr. Pinchback's case was pending in the Senate, and it may be contended with much force that until the final adjudication by the Senate of Mr. Pinchback's claims there was no vacancy which the legislature was authorized to fill.

This question arose at the first session of the Twenty-third Congress, in the case of Potter v. Robbins, where a majority of the special committee of the Senate held that the legislature of Rhode Island had no authority to proceed to the election of another Senator until the seat of the Senator-elect had been vacated by a solemn decision of the Senate of the United States. Silas Wright, of New York, made a report in behalf of the minority of said committee, in which it was contended that if the election of Mr. Robbins was not made by the lawful legislature of the State it was absolutely void, and that therefore Mr. Potter's election while Mr. Robbins's claim to a seat in the Senate was still pending was valid.

Your committee do not question the soundness of the rule laid down in that case, but are not disposed to apply it to this case, where the circumstances are very different. In the case of Potter v. Robbins Mr. Robbins had been admitted to the Senate, the committee had before it both his credentials and those of Mr. Potter; but here there is no contest. The Senate never admitted Mr. Pinchback to his seat, but decided that he had no right thereto.

This seat has long been vacant. Mr. Eustis is the only person who appears to claim it. The lawful character of the legislature which elected him is admitted. His election was substantially in compliance with the law of Congress. No one appears to contest his right to a seat. Under these circumstances your committee believe that Mr. Eustis should be admitted to the Senate, and report a resolution to that effect and recommend its passage.

Therefore the committee recommended the following:

Resolved, That James B. Eustis is lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Louisiana, from the 12th day of January, 1876, for the term ending March 3, 1879, and that he be admitted thereto upon taking the proper oath.

On December 10,[1] when the report came before the Senate, Mr. John J. Ingalls, of Kansas, announced that, with two of his associates on the committee, he dissented from the report.

Mr. Ingalls urged in the first place that the report did not touch the question of the credentials, which were irregular and not in the form required by law. It had not been made to appear why the executive of Louisiana had declined to issue credentials. In opposition to this it was replied that a witness before the committee had testified to the committee that the governor had declined to issue the certificate on the ground that Mr. Pinchback had been elected to the seat. Moreover, the question before committee was not one as to the prima facie title only, but also referred to the case on its merits.

Taking up the first point touched by the report of the committee, Mr. Ingalls contended that there was nothing before the Senate to show how many senators and how many representatives constituted the legislature of Louisiana under the constitution of Louisiana, since the papers of Mr. Eustis did not show this. It was replied that the journals of the house and senate were before the committee; but Mr. Ingalls insisted that the pamphlets purporting to be such journals were not properly authenticated. To this Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, replied, in effect, that the Senate were bound to take notice of the laws and journals of a legislature. The journals were put in evidence before the committee and were not denied, It was also stated in this connection that the Senate should take official notice of the constitution of the State.

[1] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, pp. 82–87.

Mr. Ingalls also contended that the election of a Senator being by the legislature, a quorum of both houses were necessary to constitute the joint convention referred to in the law of 1866, and that the law might not constitutionally provide that a Senator could be elected in a joint convention wherein less than a quorum of one body was present. To this Mr. Thurman replied that in electing a Senator in joint convention the legislature did not act in its organized capacity as a legislature. Otherwise one branch might veto the election of a Senator. It was in view of a condition of this sort which had arisen in Indiana that the law of 1866 was passed.

As to the second point treated in the report, Mr. Ingalls urged that there was no vacancy. The election was held before the Senate had acted on Mr. Pinchback's claim. When the Senate did act it simply declared that Mr. Pinchback be "not admitted to a seat in the Senate." In the case in the Twenty-third Congress, to which the report of the majority referred, it was held that a vacancy did not occur until it was officially ascertained and declared by the Senate. In reply, it was stated that the case in the Twenty-third Congress was one wherein there was a contestant. But in this case no one appeared to oppose.

The question being taken on the resolution reported by the committee, it was agreed to—yeas, 49; nays, 8.

Thereupon Mr. Eustis appeared and took the oath.

354. The Senate election case relating to Kellogg, Spofford, and Manning, of Louisiana, in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses.

The Senate declined to give immediate prima facie effect to credentials regular in form, but from a State where there were rival claimants to the governorship and rival legislatures.

On January 20, 1877,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, presented the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg, as Senator-elect from Louisiana, for the term of six years commencing March 4, 1877.

On March 5, 1877,[2] at the time of the organization of the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Kellogg advanced to the Secretary's desk to take the oath, when Mr. Lewis V. Bogy, of Missouri, objected to the administration of the oath on the ground that there were two legislatures in Louisiana, and that there would be a contest. On March 6, Mr. James G. Blaine, of Maine, offered the following:

Resolved, That the oaths prescribed by law be now administered by the Vice President to William Pitt Kellogg, whose credentials as a Senator from the State of Louisiana were presented on the 20th of January, 1877.

To this Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, proposed on March 7:

Strike out all after the word "resolved," and in lieu thereof insert "the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg, claiming to be a Senator from the State of Louisiana, do now lie upon the table until the appointment of a Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom they shall be referred."

The resolution was debated on March 6 and 7. It was urged that while ordinarily a certificate in regular form was sufficient for a prima facie case, yet in this case there were two persons claiming to be governor and two bodies claiming to be the legislature. This fact was well known. Mr. Kellogg's credentials were signed by Stephen B. Packard, as governor, but it was alleged by Mr. Bayard that there was no proof that Mr. Packard was either de jure or de facto governor, and in reality he was neither. There was the same uncertainty as to the legislature.

On March 7,[1] Mr. Bayard's amendment was agreed to—yeas 35, nays 29. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to—yeas 43, nays 21.

355. The Senate election case relating to Kellogg and others, continued.

There being two conflicting credentials, the Senate declined to give immediate prima facie effect to either, although the electing and certifying government behind one had been swept away by force.

On October 17, 1877,[2] Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, presented the credentials of Henry M. Spofford, as Senator-elect from Louisiana, for the term of six years commencing March 4, 1877. These credentials were signed by Francis T. Nichols, as governor of Louisiana, bore date of June 20, 1877, and stated that the election of Mr. Spofford had been accomplished on April 24, 1877.

On October 18,[3] the Senate resumed consideration of the resolution presented the day before by Mr. Thurman:

Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford, whose credentials as Senator from the State of Louisiana have this day been read, be now sworn and admitted as such Senator.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, objected that while the Spofford credentials might be prima facie correct, yet there were on the files of the Senate other credentials in favor of Mr. Kellogg. So the records of the Senate antagonized the prima facie standing of the Spofford credentials.

In support of Mr. Thurman's motion it was urged that the Senate might take judicial notice of the history of the country, which showed that the legislature electing Mr. Kellogg had ceased to exist, and that Mr. Packard had ceased to be de facto governor.

Finally, after debate, the resolution proposed by Mr. Thurman was amended and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of Henry M. Spofford, claiming to be a Senator from the State of Louisiana, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and the said committee shall also consider and report upon the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg.

On October 25[4] the Senate gave the Committee on Privileges and Elections authority to take testimony in the case.

356. The Senate election case, relating to Kellogg and others, continued.

A person ascertained by a majority of the committee to be legally elected and certified was seated by the Senate, although both executive and legislature were displaced by force before the Senate acted.

There being rival legislatures, the Senate, in deciding an election case, investigated the titles of the legislators, even to the circumstances of their elections.

In a Senate election case, by consent of the parties, testimony taken by Senate and House committees in proceedings to which neither contestant was a party, was admitted for what it was worth.

An instance wherein the Senate indorsed the principle that a legislator whose presence was forcibly obtained and who refused to vote might be counted as part of the quorum.

On November 26, 1877,[1] Mr. Bainbridge Wadleigh, of New Hampshire, submitted the report of the committee, accompanied by the following resolutions:

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg is, upon the merits of the case, lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877, and that he be admitted thereto upon taking the proper oath.

Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

In their report the committee say:

Mr. Kellogg claims to have been elected on the 10th day of January, 1877. Aft. Spofford claims to have been elected on the 24th of April, 1877. In an inquiry into these cases upon their merits, the first question which arises is, whether the body which elected Mr. Kellogg was the lawful legislature of Louisiana at the time of such election.

There was in said State on the 6th of November, 1876, an election for governor, lieutenant-governor, and members of the general assembly. The statements of the votes cast at such election were required by law to be sent to a board of returning officers for all elections in the State. Said returning officers were by law authorized and required to ascertain, return, and certify the election of members of the general assembly. No other tribunal was clothed with that power or duty. They were required to report their decisions to the secretary of state, and it was by law provided that the secretary of state should transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and secretary of the senate of the last general assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the decisions of the returning officers, were elected to either branch of the general assembly.

It was the duty of the said clerk and secretary to place the names of such persons so furnished upon the roll of the house and senate, respectively, and those representatives and senators whose names were so placed by the clerk and secretary, and none others, were competent to organize the house of representatives or senate.

The secretary of state, in obedience to the statute, transmitted to the clerk of the former house and secretary of the senate a list of the names of persons by the said returning officers decided to have been elected to either branch of the general assembly, and from the list thus furnished the clerk and secretary organized each house of the State legislature on the 1st day of January, 1877.

By the constitution of Louisiana the house of representatives is composed of 120 members and the senate of 36 members. There is no doubt that 61 members of the house constitute a quorum of that body, and that 19 members constitute a quorum of the senate. There were present at the organization, and took part in the proceedings, 8 senators holding over, and 11 newly elected—19 in all—having the certificates of said returning officers, which was a quorum, and 68 representatives, thus declared to have been elected, being 7 over a quorum. After such organization the members of the two houses assembled in joint convention on the 10th day of January, 1877, to elect a Senator of the United States.

Upon reading the journal of each house it was found that no election of Senator had been made the day before. The roll of each house was called, and it was found there were present in the joint convention 17 senators and 66 representatives, they composing a majority of all the members of the general assembly of the State. Nominations were then made for Senator, and a viva voce vote was had, and William Pitt Kellogg received the votes of 17 senators and 66 representatives, and was declared by the president of the senate (the presiding officer of the joint convention) to have received a majority of all the votes of the general assembly, and to have been duly elected a Senator of the United States for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1877.

[1] Senate Report No. 16, first session Forty-fifth Congress.

Your committee find that said election was held strictly in accordance with the act of Congress of 1866 to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators. The credentials of Mr. Kellogg are signed by Stephen B. Packard as governor of the State of Louisiana, and bear date the l1th day of January, 1877.

It appears to your committee that Mr. Packard was on that day the lawful governor of the State of Louisiana.

The report goes on to show that by returns duly transmitted by the returning officers and duly counted by the legislature it was ascertained that Mr. Packard was elected governor. The report then continues:

Upon the facts herein before stated your committee are of the opinion—

First, that the returning officers of Louisiana were a lawful tribunal, solely authorized and required to ascertain, return, and certify to the election of members of the general assembly.

Second, that those, and only those, who held certificates of election from said returning officers were entitled to seats in the general assembly at the organization thereof.

Third, that the body which first organized with a quorum of the members in each branch thereof, having such certificates, and which was duly recognized by the lawful governor of said State, was the lawful legislature.

The proof before your committee seems conclusive that at the time the legislature which elected Kellogg was organized there were present a quorum of each house thereof then lawfully entitled to seats therein; that at the time of his election there were present a quorum of the general assembly then lawfully entitled to seats therein, all of whom voted for said Kellogg, and that said legislature was recognized by the lawful governor of said State. It was, however, contended by Mr. Spofford that it was the duty of your committee to go behind the certificates of the returning officers and investigate the elections of individual members of the general assembly. At his request your committee did investigate such elections and find the following facts:

Of the lawful election of 57 members of the house of representatives which aided in electing Mr. Kellogg there is no dispute whatever, and they now sit in the Nicholls house, which took part in the election of Mr. Spofford. Three more of the members of the Packard house, from the parish of Orleans, were until recently admitted on all hands to have had a majority of the votes cast, and your committee find that they were lawfully elected. Besides these 60 members of the house, there were 11 more whose election is disputed by Mr. Spofford upon the ground that they did not receive a majority of the votes cast. Of the 21 members of the senate which participated in the election of Mr. Kellogg, there were 16 whose right to hold their seats is admitted.

The election of 3 more from the twelfth, eighteenth, and twenty-second senatorial districts is disputed upon the ground that they did not receive a majority of the votes cast. Two more, Baker and Kelso, were not declared elected by the returning board, but were seated by a vote of the senate acting under its constitutional right to judge of the election of its own members.

Complaint is made by Mr. Spofford that one Steven, a lawful senator, was taken against his will into the senate and detained there against his will for the purpose of making a quorum. Your committee believe there is no good reason for such complaint. If the senate had organized with a quorum of members lawfully entitled to seats therein, as was the case, it had the undoubted right to compel the attendance of absent members.

The senators and members whose title to seats is disputed on the ground that they did not receive a majority of the votes cast were those declared elected by the returning board on account of the rejection of the votes cast at certain polls in the parishes of East Baton Rouge, De Soto, West Feliciana, Lafayette, Morehouse, Ouachita, and Webster; in the twelfth senatorial district, composed of the parishes of East Feliciana, West Feliciana, and Pointe Coupée; the eighteenth senatorial district, composed of the parishes of Ouachita and Caldwell; and the twenty-second senatorial district, composed of the parishes of Natchitoches, De Soto, Red River, and Sabine.

There were no votes rejected in the parishes of Sabine, Pointe Coupée, and Red River. A comparatively small number of the votes were rejected on account of the obvious illegalities, informalities, and misconduct of the election officers, and there is little complaint on account of the rejection of such votes. The rest were rejected on account of violence and intimidation which prevented a fair election. The evidence of such intimidation is overwhelming and irrefutable. Many of the Republican leaders were killed, others were tortured, others driven into exile. Companies of armed men paraded the parishes by night, carrying terror wherever they went.

After citing facts as to these intimidations the committee proceed to a complaint of Mr. Spofford that the returning officers were guilty of fraud in rejecting the returns of the parishes before mentioned, and also in having committed forgery in altering the statement of votes from the parish of Vernon. "But the law is clear," says the report, "that, even had the returning officers been guilty of fraud, or had mistakenly exceeded their authority, it was the right and duty of the persons returned by them as elected to take their seats in the general assembly."

The report, after citing section 141 of Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies and a New Hampshire case occurring in 1875 (56 N. H. Reports), continues:

When your committee decided to go behind the certificates of the returning officers and to seek the real merits of the case in the thousands of pages of printed testimony taken for the use of the Senate and House, Mr. Spofford contended that your committee should simply ascertain the number of votes deposited in the ballot boxes at the election. Your committee believe, however, that if their inquiry is to extend beyond the question as to who were the lawful governor of Louisiana and the lawful members of the general assembly, it should go far enough to ascertain how far the freedom of election was impaired by intimidation, violence, and crime. The law on this subject is thus stated by Cushing in his Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, pages 67, 68, section 181:

"The great principle which lies at the foundation of all elective governments and is essential, indeed, to the very idea of election is that the electors shall be free in the giving of their suffrages. This principle was declared by the English Parliament, with regard to elections in general, in a statute of Edward I, and, with regard to elections of members of Parliament, in the Declaration of Rights. The same principle is asserted or implied in the constitutions of all the States of the Union. Freedom of election is violated by external violence, by which the electors are constrained, or by bribery, by which their will is corrupted; and in all cases where the electors are prevented, in either of these ways, from the free exercise of their right, the election will be void without reference to the number of votes thereby affected."

The evidence clearly proves, and your committee believe, that by intimidation, violence, and crime freedom of election was utterly destroyed at those polls in the ten parishes heretofore referred to, whose votes were rejected by the returning officers; that in throwing out such polls and declaring the Republican candidates elected the returning officers did that which they believed to be legal, and which was really equitable and just and what the two houses of the general assembly would have been bound in law to do with the facts before them. They believe, therefore, that the members by whose votes the general assembly was organized, and a sufficient number of the members by whose votes Mr. Kellogg was elected, were not only lawfully but equitably entitled to their seats.

It is contended by Mr. Spofford that the legislature which elected Mr. Kellogg and the governor who signed his credentials have vanished from political existence and ceased to have any authority in the State of Louisiana, and that therefore, if for no other reason, his own election is valid. Your committee find that at and after the organization of the legislature which elected Mr. Kellogg an overwhelming array of armed and organized military force was used to destroy and crush out the lawful State government of Louisiana. By it the courts were overthrown and annihilated, and under its constantly impending menace the lawful legislature gradually melted away and its terrorized members sought safety in the so-called Nicholls legislature or abdicated their rights.

By such and perhaps other equally illegal means the so-called Nicholls legislature at length came to contain an undisputed majority of the members lawfully elected to the general assembly; and on the 24th day of April that legislature chose Mr. Spofford, the contestant, a Senator of the United States. Your committee are of the opinion that his claim is not well founded. Until and after the election of Mr. Kellogg, Governor Packard and what is known as his legislature were de facto and de jure the government of Louisiana. Upon that legislature devolved the duty of electing a Senator of the United States. That duty was performed by them in the election of Mr. Kellogg. No subsequent events, especially successful revolution through treasonable force, could undo what had been lawfully done. The doctrine contended for by Mr. Spofford, if established, would render insecure all political vested rights. It would offer a premium to overthrow by force the result of every sharply contested election, and at no distant day reduce this country to the unhappy condition of those wretched communities which are continually a prey to disorder and civil war.

The minority views, signed by Messrs. Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware, A. S. Merrimon, of North Carolina, and Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, found that the Nicholls legislature had a quorum in both houses, and declared that had it not been for the unlawful action of the returning board there would have been no pretense for the Packard legislature, which assembled under protection of United States troops.

The minority deny that at any time the Packard senate had a quorum, since it had secured the required number by force.

Then Mr. Steven, a "holding over" senator, sitting in "the Nicholls legislature," happened to be in the State house on business, and the sergeant-at-arms of the Packard legislature seized and took him into the senate chamber to try and restore their nominal quorum. He was taken by force, and against his will and protest, and he did not participate in anything done. The seizure of Mr. Steven was a disgraceful proceeding, and the object had in view was to make a nominal quorum in order to admit as senators, upon a feigned contest, Baker and Kelso, two candidates who were defeated at the polls, and who did not even hold certificates of election from the returning board. Steven did not vote, refused to participate, and without him there was no quorum present when Kelso and Baker were admitted.

As to the Packard legislature the minority say:

Treachery and fraud mark every lineament of the so-called "Packard legislature" from its incipiency, and the Senate can not escape seeing this. But apart from fraud, where there are two rival bodies of men in a State, each claiming in good faith to be the lawful legislature, and each contests the right of the other from the beginning of their existence, and such contest is continued without intermission until one prevails and absorbs the other, so that the latter completely disappears, and all the coordinate branches, and all the authorities, and the great mass of the people of the State, and the President and courts of the United States, recognize the prevailing body as the lawful legislature, and all its acts passed from its beginning as laws of the State, and recognize no single act of the body so absorbed and totally disappearing, can the Senate of the United States, many months after it has so completely disappeared, recognize the body thus disappearing as the legislature of the State by admitting to the Senate as a Senator a person who claims to have been elected by such a body of men?

The statement of the proposition irresistibly suggests the answer—it can not. The Senate may have the physical power to do so—it has not the right to do so—it can only do so by the arbitrary exercise of lawless despotic power. Such an act on the part of the Senate could only be regarded as a defiance of the authority, right, and will of the State and an insult to its dignity; it would shock the moral sense of the American people, and afford cause for profound distrust and alarm for the safety of our system of government.

An important question arose as to the evidence admitted in this case. The majority report frequently cites the reports of the Field and Morrison committees of the House of Representatives, and the Howe and Sherman committees of the Senate. The minority views explain this:

The contestants were each requested to indicate what testimony he desired to produce, and after debate they were requested to confer and see what state of facts they could agree upon touching controverted material points at issue. Statements were submitted to Mr. Kellogg touching the result of the election in parishes indicated, and Mr. Kellogg made a statement in that respect in reply. These statements were received as evidence, and it was further agreed to receive the testimony, or so much thereof as may be pertinent, taken by Congressional committees commonly known as the "Howe committee," the "Morrison committee," the "Sherman committee," and the "Field committee," touching Louisiana affairs. Mr. Spofford did not object to the reception of this testimony, but he strenuously insisted on being allowed to take testimony in support of the several allegations specified by him.

In the debate, on November 28,[1] Mr. Hill, who signed the minority views, explained that—

The committee well knew that much testimony had been taken both by the Senate and House on a former occasion involving some, but only some, of the issues between these contestants; but knowing that that testimony was not taken in this case, and therefore was not legal testimony without their admission, the committee called first upon these contestants to make statements before the committee as to what points they desired evidence taken upon.

Mr. Hill went on to say that Mr. Kellogg insisted on the evidence in the Howe and Sherman reports, which had been taken by the Senate, and Mr. Spofford that he would agree to that if the evidence of the Field and Morrison committees of the House of Representatives could be referred to as evidence in precisely the same manner for what they were worth. All the testimony in these reports was taken before the election for Senator was had, and was not taken with reference to the rights of the parties to this contest; but it did bring out many facts concerning the election of the governor and legislature in Louisiana which it was material for the Senate to understand in considering this question.

In addition, Mr. Spofford had asked to be permitted to take certain testimony which he specified in addition. The minority held that he should have this right.

We are of opinion that the testimony so proposed by Mr. Spofford is material, and ought, in justice to him and the Senate, to have been received. Besides, it can not be truly said that the respective claims of the contestants have been decided upon their "substantial merits" when one of them is not allowed to produce material testimony which he offers and is anxious to produce. And it may be that a decision made by the Senate now, without fair opportunity to produce such testimony, may be reviewed and reversed at some future time. It is well to put an end to controversy now by allowing both the contestants the fullest and fairest opportunity to produce all material testimony. We think, therefore, that the whole matter ought to be recommitted to the committee, to the end the proposed testimony may be taken.

The resolutions proposed by the majority were debated on November 28, 29, and 30,[2] the principal question being as to the request of Mr. Spofford. In his request he had specified certain testimony intended to show wrongdoing by Mr. Kellogg in connection with the proceedings of the returning board; but on behalf of the majority it was asserted that in this point the testimony of the reports accepted as evidence was full and conclusive.

On November 30[3] Mr. Saulsbury moved to recommit the subject, with instructions to take the testimony referred to. This motion was disagreed to—yeas 29, nays 29.

Mr. Hill then moved the following substitute amendment to the first resolution proposed by the committee:

That Henry M. Spofford be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana on a prima facie title, and subject to the right of William Pitt Kellogg to contest his seat.

This motion was disagreed to—yeas 27, nays 29.[1]

The resolutions of the committee were then agreed to—yeas 30, nays 28.

And on the same day Mr. Kellogg appeared and took the oath.

357. The Senate election case relating to Kellogg and others, continued.

A Senate election case having been once decided, an attempt to reopen it failed after a favorable report from a committee and elaborate discussion.

Discussion in the Senate of the doctrine of res adjudicata as applied to an election case.

At the beginning of the next Congress, on March 21, 1879,[2] Mr. Benjamin F. Jonas, of Louisiana, presented in the Senate the petition of Henry M. Spofford praying for the reopening of his case. The petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On April 16[3] Mr. Hill of Georgia, reported from that committee the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to have printed for its use the arguments before it in the case of Spofford against Kellogg relative to a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, with such evidence, papers, and documents relative to the case as it may deem proper.

Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, made objection to the resolution if it contemplated the taking of evidence in order to reopen a case which he considered settled; but on a suggestion of Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, the resolution was modified and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to have printed for its use the arguments before it in the case of Spofford against Kellogg relative to a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, with such other proceedings in relation to the case as it may deem proper.

On May 1[4] Mr. Saulsbury, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the memorial of Henry M. Spofford, praying permission to produce evidence relating to the right of Hon. William Pitt Kellogg to the seat in the Senate held by him from the State of Louisiana, and in support of the claim of said petitioner thereto, be, and said committee is hereby, instructed to inquire into the matters alleged in said petition, and for that purpose said committee is authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all such other acts as are necessary and proper for a full and fair investigation in the premises. Said committee may, in its discretion, appoint a subcommittee of its own members to make such investigation in whole or in part, which subcommittee shall have authority to employ a clerk, stenographer, and sergeant-at-arms, and shall have all the powers of the general committee to administer oaths and send for persons and papers, and may make such investigation either in Washington or in the State of Louisiana, and said committee or its subcommittee may sit in vacation.

On May 2[5] the resolution came up for consideration, when Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, proposed the following amendment in the nature of a substitute:

Whereas on the 25th day of October, 1877, the Senate unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the contested cases of William Pitt Kellogg and Henry M. Spofford, claiming seats as Senators from the State of Louisiana, and whose credentials have been referred to such committee, be authorized to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, with a view of enabling said committee to determine and report upon the title, respectively, on the merits of each of said contestants to a seat in the Senate."

And whereas on the 26th day of November, 1877, said committee reported the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg is, upon the merits of the case, entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877, and that he be admitted thereto upon taking the proper oath;

"Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States;"

And on the 30th day of November, 1877, the Senate adopted said resolution, and thereafter on the same day said Kellogg was duly admitted to take the oath and took his seat as a Senator from said State for said term:

Resolved, That said proceedings are final and conclusive upon the right of said Kellogg and the claim of said Spofford to said seat for said term.

As the grounds on which it was proposed to reopen the case became of importance, the text of the petition [1] was often referred to. After the purely formal portions, Mr. Spofford went on as to the claims of himself and Mr. Kellogg:

That a partial or imperfect investigation of their respective claims to the above-mentioned seat in the Senate was had before the said committee, but the case made by your petitioner against the claim of the said Kellogg was not fully heard by the committee, because they came to a sudden determination to close the same without giving him opportunity to adduce proof, which he had constantly offered to adduce if leave were granted, having a material bearing upon the contest for said seat against Kellogg's claim; that the pendency of a controversy in the Senate relative to the disposition to be made of another contest between other parties over another seat led to the hurried closing of the evidence in the case between said Kellogg and petitioner by the committee, a majority of whom speedily made a report in favor of said Kellogg's claim; that this abrupt closing of the case and refusal of petitioner's request for leave to take evidence was against the remonstrance of petitioner, who desired to make a formal protest, but was told that no precedent was known for such a practice; that the report of the committee, made while the other controversy just referred to was under debate in the Senate, led to confusion in considering, discussing, and disposing of the two cases; that for the reasons aforesaid petitioner's case against the said Kellogg never had a full examination and hearing upon its merits, either in the committee or in the Senate, and should therefore, petitioner most respectfully submits, be reexamined, to the end that justice may be done.

Petitioner further represents that the State of Louisiana, through its legislature (as will fully appear by a joint resolution of the two houses of the general assembly, approved February 1, 1878, to which reference is here made), has protested against the admission and retention of said Kellogg in said seat and the exclusion of your petitioner therefrom as leaving unfulfilled that provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares "that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, to be chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years."

Petitioner further represents that he ever has been and still is ready to furnish evidence to establish the five specifications upon which he was not permitted to take proof heretofore, and particularly evidence of the direct and active interference of said Kellogg in the preparation of illegal complaints or protests against polls of which he had no knowledge.

Petitioner further represents that since the contest aforesaid and very recently he has discovered new and material evidence to prove that the election of said Kellogg was null and void, by reason of improper, illegal, and corrupt influences exerted by him in person to bring about his own election as Senator; to prove that he obtained and held the title of governor by corrupt bargain, not by election, and then used the power, patronage, and resources of the governor's office to procure the return and organization of a general assembly for the purpose of electing him Senator, and afterwards employed both menace and bribery among those whom he had assisted to have returned as members to induce them to vote for him as Senator; and that but for such illegal and corrupt interference personally exerted by the said Kellogg he would not have secured the nominal election under which he claims his seat. All of which petitioner now offers to prove upon a review of the case.

[1] Second session Forty-sixth Congress, Senate Report No. 388, p. 5.

The resolution reported from the committee and the amendment proposed by Mr. Hoar formed an issue which was debated at length on May 2, 6, and 7.[1] It was urged in opposition to the resolution of the committee that the case was one falling under the doctrine of res adjudicata. In support of this position Mr. Angus Cameron, of Wisconsin, cited[2] as precedents the Fitch and Bright case, the Spencer case, and the Butler and Corbin case, and also the cases of Bogy and Cameron, all Senate cases.

The doctrine of res adjudicata was debated at great length, both abstractly and in reference to the constitutional functions of the Senate in judging the elections of its own Members.[3]

On behalf of the committee it was urged that the petition set forth a new ground not touched on in the original case, viz, the alleged corruption of the legislature by Mr. Kellogg, and that this justified the reopening of the case.

On May 7,[4] Mr. Edmunds proposed to the resolution of the committee an amendment so that the inquiry as to the matters alleged in the petition should go "so far only as relates to any charge in said petition of personal misconduct on the part of said Kellogg which may render him liable to expulsion or censure."

This amendment was disagreed to—yeas 20, nays 27.

Thereupon Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, moved to amend the committee's resolution by adding:

Providing that the inquiry hereby authorized shall be confined to the matters alleged in the memorial of Mr. Spofford to be new and different from those covered by,the previous inquiry.

This amendment was disagreed to—yeas 20, nays 27.

Mr. Edmunds proposed as an amendment the lines "recognizing the validity and finality of the previous action of the Senate in the premises," which was disagreed to—yeas 20, nays 27.

Mr. Conkling then proposed the following:

Provided, That such questions in said case as were fully considered and adjudged in the former investigation shall not be opened under this resolution.

Which was disagreed to—yeas 20, nays 27.

Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, proposed the following amendment, which was disagreed to—yeas 19, nays 28:

Provided, That said committee be further empowered and directed to make inquiry and take testimony upon the matter as to whether any unlawful or corrupt means were employed to disorganize the body by which William Pitt Kellogg claims to have been elected to the Senate, or to organize that by which the memorialist claims to have been elected or to secure the alleged election of the memorialist.

One amendment proposed by Mr. George F. Hoar to the committee resolution was agreed to without debate. It added thereto the words:

And said committee are further instructed to inquire and report whether bribery or other corrupt or unlawful means were resorted to to secure the alleged election of the memorialist.

The question was then taken on the amendment in the nature of a substitute already pending, and it was disagreed to—yeas 17, nays 26.

The original resolution of the committee, as amended, was then agreed to—yeas 26, nays 17.

On June 21 the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or one of its subcommittees, was authorized to sit during the recess of Congress.

On February 9, 1880,[1] the Vice-President laid before the Senate resolutions of the Louisiana legislature denying the validity of Mr. Kellogg's election and protesting against his continuance as Representative of the State. These resolutions were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Also, on February 12[2] a memorial of certain members of that legislature, affirming the legality of Mr. Kellogg's election, was presented and referred. Also, on February 17, a memorial from certain citizens was presented and referred.

On March 22[3] the report of the committee and the minority views were presented. The report was submitted by Mr. Hill, of Georgia, and was accompanied by the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, according to the evidence now known to the Senate, William P. Kellogg was not chosen by the legislature of Louisiana to the seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, 1877, and is not entitled to sit in the same.

Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford was chosen by the legislature of Louisiana to the seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th of March, 1877, and that he be admitted to the same on taking the oath prescribed by law.

In the report, which was concurred in by Messrs. Saulsbury; Hill; Frances Kernan, of New York; James E. Bailey, of Tennessee; Luke Prior, of Alabama, and Zebulon B. Vance, of North Carolina, the facts as to the election by the legislature were briefly stated, and then the committee go on to state that they have investigated the subject as directed to do by the Senate.

The memorialist and the sitting Member appeared before the committee in person and by counsel. On the 5th of June, 1879, the full committee commenced the examination of witnesses in this city. The examination was continued in November and December by a subcommittee in the city of New Orleans, and was again resumed by the full committee in this city, and was continued until both parties announced they had no further testimony to offer. Nearly 150 witnesses have been examined, and over 1,200 printed pages of testimony have been taken and are herewith reported to the Senate, with the conclusions of law and fact at which the committee have arrived.

In the opinion of your committee, the evidence, now for the first time fully taken, clearly and abundantly establishes the following facts:

I. That said William Pitt Kellogg, then holding the office of governor of the State of Louisiana, and pending the canvass in said election of 1876, did conspire with divers persons, and in aid of such conspiracy did fraudulently use the influence and power of his office of governor, to prevent a fair, free, and legal election in said State, to the end that he might procure from the commisioners of election the return of a legislature a majority of whose members should be of the Republican party and presumed to be favorable to his election to the Senate.

II. That, having failed in this, the said William Pitt Kellogg, still holding the office of governor, did conspire with divers persons, and in aid of such conspiracy did fraudulently use the influence and power of his office of governor, to change the result as returned by the commissioners of election, to the end that he might procure, through false certificates of election, the organization of a pretended legislature a majority of whose members should be of the Republican party, and supposed to be favorable to his election to the Senate.

III. That said William Pitt Kellogg did conspire with divers others to prevent, and by force, through the metropolitan police, aided by the Army of the United States, did prevent the lawfully elected members of the legislature, and especially those of the Democratic party, from assembling in the halls of the senate and house of representatives in the Statehouse of the said State of Louisiana; and did, by threats, by the use of money, by the promise of offices, and by other corrupt practices, compel and induce to assemble in said halls, respectively, a mob of his coconspirators, against the will of the people of Louisiana, many of whom had not been elected, and some of whom had been neither elected or certified, to the end that he might procure a pretended legislature for the inauguration of Stephen B. Packard as governor, who, he well knew, had not been elected, and from which mob he might procure the form of his own election to the Senate, and which pretended election he knew such pretended governor would certify.

IV. That said William Pitt Kellogg having thus corruptly procured the assembling of a body of persons pretending to be a legislature, in which were included persons not elected, and from which had been forcibly excluded persons who had been elected and certified as members, did, by bribery, by the use of money and the promise of offices, and by other corrupt practices, induce said body of persons to go through the form of choosing him to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

V. That said William Pitt Kellogg, well knowing that the facts now proven to exist did exist, did falsely represent that no such facts existed or could be proven, seeking thereby to induce a majority of the committee, without taking the evidence which has now been taken, to make a report declaring his title to the seat, and with intent to induce a majority of the Senate to admit him to the seat so fraudulently claimed.

VI. That, to prevent the discovery of the briberies, frauds, and corruptions now proven to exist, the said William Pitt Kellogg did procure a large number of the persons composing said pretended legislature to be appointed to public offices of profit in the custom-house at New Orleans and elsewhere, as inducement not to disclose the truth. That, after other persons, officers, and members of said pretended legislature had freely and voluntarily admitted, under oath, their knowledge of said briberies and corruptions, and had been summoned to appear as witnesses before your committee, and were under the protection of the Senate, said William Pitt Kellogg did, by bribery and corrupt practices, induce such witnesses to testify falsely that they had not made such admissions, or that, if they had made them, they were not true.

The report then goes on to review the testimony by which they considered their conclusions justified and then go on to discuss the question as to the reopening of the case:

Your committee are unable to see how an impartial legal mind can read the evidence taken and doubt the guilt of the sitting member upon every charge which has been made against him, notwithstanding so many of the witnesses must be admitted to be disreputable.

But the sitting member, through his very able counsel, also insisted, with great earnestness and skill before your committee, that the Senate at a former session having, "after and upon evidence going to the merits of the case," declared that Kellogg was "upon the merits of the case entitled to the seat," this decision is final and conclusive, and cannot now be reexamined and reversed. This was the first and chief position on which the title of the sitting member was made to rest. Your committee have fully considered the question thus presented, and can not doubt the correctness of the conclusions at which they have arrived.

Stated in the light of the facts now known and herewith reported to the Senate, this position would read thus: That though the sitting member was not, in fact, chosen by the legislature of Louisiana, and though the body of men alleged to have elected him was assembled through fraud, was held together by force, and was controlled by bribery and corruption, and all this was accomplished by a conspiracy to defraud the State and people of Louisiana, of which conspiracy the sitting member was himself the chief, yet, the Senate having decided in ignorance and by the suppression of these facts that the sitting member was entitled on the merits to the seat, the Senate is compelled to allow him to retain the seat after full knowledge that every fact which was assumed to exist when be was admitted is and was false and untrue. The reply to such a position is sufficiently furnished in the statement of the position itself. But your committee will not rest the argument here, and will consider it in the light of precedent and law. Counsel for the sitting member says:

"If, therefore, this committee and the Senate shall set aside this judgement on the merits it will present to the country and the world a spectacle not seen before in the century of our national existence just closed."

We might justly reply to this that this case, in the facts now proven, already presents to the country and the world a spectacle not before seen in this century or any previous century of this or any other nation. We trust such a spectacle will never again be presented, and that it may not be it ought to be now condemned by all men, and especially by this Senate. If it shall be understood that seats once procured in this body by any means, however false and fraudulent, which bad men may employ cannot be taken away, this Senate may soon be largely composed of members not chosen by the legislatures of the States. Successful frauds will displace the positive requisition of the Constitution in the elections of Senators. A case without precedent can not be decided by precedent. Fraud has certainly become a powerful agent in our politics, but we are not willing to admit it has yet become the supreme law above review and beyond remedy.

But while no case like this was ever before presented for decision, yet principles have been announced in other cases which will furnish some guide to a proper determination of this question.

In the case of Bright and Fitch, in the Thirty-fifth Congress, the rehearing asked was refused because "all the facts and questions of law involved were as fully known and presented to the Senate on the former hearing as they were then presented in the memorial of the legislature asking a rehearing." It was held that in such a case the judgment first rendered by the Senate "was final, and precluded further inquiry into the subject."

In the Butler and Corbin case, in the Forty-fifth Congress, the report of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections correctly stated that no allegation was made "that testimony was before excluded which ought to have been admitted, or that testimony was admitted which ought to have been excluded; no request by either party to produce testimony had been denied, and no pretense that testimony then offered and excluded can now be produced. The jurisdiction is the same; the parties are the same; the subject-matter of contest is the same, the facts are the same, and the questions of law are the same." The report further said: "If, on the former hearing, Mr. Corbin had been denied the privilege of introducing material facts which he offered to produce; if he presented material facts now which were then unknown; if all the facts and questions of law now known and presented were not then as fully known and presented, the undersigned will not undertake to say his petition for a rehearing ought not, in justice and right, to be gravely heard and considered on the merits." The Senate adopted these views, though it is a significant fact that a large and intelligent minority of the Senate voted to unseat Mr. Butler and to admit Mr. Corbin, when not a single new fact or question of law had been presented or offered.

Your committee freely admit that a decision rendered on the merits ought not to be afterwards reviewed and reversed on light or even doubtful grounds. In the courts the familiar rule is that new evidence to authorize a reversal "ought to be material and such as would probably produce a different result." In this case your committee are willing to apply a much stronger test, though there is no reason why a stronger should be required. Let us adopt and apply the rule so strongly and forcibly expounded by a distinguished member of this Senate in the following language:

"The Senate would do manifest injustice were it hastily and without the most plain and most manifest reason to reverse a decision that had been made seating a Senator on this floor. The case must be extremely strong that would justify such a proceeding. All that I am free to admit, but to say that the technical rule of res adjudicata that applies to courts of justice applies in this Chamber on a question of this kind is to confound all distinctions and to disregard all the laws of this body." (Congressional Record of May 7, p. 24.)

Let us now apply this rigid rule to the present case:

1. On the former hearing not a single witness was examined. Some admissions were made by the parties, and some reports of investigations by Congressional committees not on the issues involved in this contest "were agreed to be considered in evidence as far as they were pertinent." This was done only to narrow the field of investigation.

On this hearing nearly 150 witnesses have been examined, making over 1,200 printed pages of testimony of the most material and controlling character.

2. On the former hearing the memorialist begged and pleaded for the privilege of having witnesses called and examined on five points not covered by the admissions and reports above referred to, and by which witnesses he alleged he could prove, among other things, the direct personal complicity of the sitting member in glaring frauds in the pretended legislature which elected him. All these appeals were refused by the majority of the committee, although an investigation had been previously ordered by the Senate and resolved upon by the committee, and the investigation was suddenly closed against the protest of the memorialist and a minority of the committee.

On the present hearing the witnesses have been examined, and the complicity of the sitting member in the frauds alleged has been most convincingly established.

3. On the former hearing there was no evidence and no opportunity to produce evidence showing conspiracies, briberies, and other corruptions by the sitting member to procure a fraudulent legislature, and to control the members thereof in his own election to the Senate.

On the present hearing such conspiracies, briberies, and corruptions of the most startling, unblushing, and unparalleled character have been positively testified to by numerous witnesses, and these briberies and corruptions have been shown to extend to the witnesses in the case in the very face of the Senate.

Your committee could multiply the features of contrast between the former and the present hearing in this case, but we forbear. Under the most technical rule of res adjudicata there is not a court in civilized Christendom which would hesitate to review and reverse a judgment so utterly unauthorized and unjust; and surely it can not be contended that the Senate can have less power than a court to annul such a decision.

Conceding then, for the argument, that the Senate in passing upon contests for seats in this body acts as a court, and that the technical rule of res adjudicata applies to decisions rendered in such cases, do courts not reexamine, review, and reverse their decisions? Are not appeals, writs of error, motions for new trials, and bills of review familiar to us all? The Senate, in considering such cases in the first instance, is not bound by the forms of proceedings in the courts. We have no declarations, no complaints, no bills in chancery, nor pleas, demurrers, answers, and joinders of issue in the Senate. If the Senate proceeds to original judgment without the pleading known to the courts, may not the Senate also proceed to review, reexamine, and reverse such judgments when good cause is shown, without resorting to the processes which in such cases are known to the courts? If the Senate is a court, then if the facts in a given case are such as would require the vacation of a judgment if rendered by a court, surely the Senate would also be authorized to vacate such judgment. The exclusion by the court of material testimony on the first hearing, the discovery of new and material evidence since the hearing, the existence of frauds, forgeries, briberies, and perjuries in procuring the first judgment are all well-known grounds on either one of which courts, by some of the methods of proceeding, will review and reverse such judgments. All these grounds are shown by the evidence and the records of this Senate to exist in extraordinary clearness, force, and repeated abundance in the case we are now considering. Is the Senate, by being likened to a court, to be bound by decisions which a court would rigorously vacate and annul?

But the attempt to apply to the Senate the technical rule of res adjudicata as it obtains in the courts is a palpable sophistry and not an argument. In the correct and forcible language of Senator Thurman, before quoted, "it confounds all distinctions and disregards all the rules of this body."

In cases where the contestants claim to represent the same State government, and the issue between them is one of informality or irregularity, or noncompliance with statutory provisions, there would be some show of reason for the application of this doctrine. In such cases there ought to be an end of litigation in the Senate as well as in the courts. A wise policy would certainly require in such cases the principle if not the rule of res adjudicata. It is to such cases the authorities cited by the eminent counsel for the sitting member were intended to apply.

But the questions involved in the present case rise immeasurably above such issues. They are not questions of regularity, but of authority. They are not questions of discretion, but of duty. They exist more between the State of Louisiana and this Senate than between the contestants. In their nature these questions are not merely judicial, but political in the highest sense.

The Constitution says:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof."

Can a man sit as a member of this Senate who was not chosen by the legislature of his State? But suppose, in ignorance of the fact that he was not so chosen, the Senate is induced to declare him entitled to the seat "on the merits," after investigation; does such erroneous decision supplant the Constitution and give him a title after the mistake becomes known?

Let us suppose an impossible case: Suppose a majority of this Senate should for any purpose, partisan or otherwise, seat a man in this body who they knew was not chosen by the legislature of his State, would any future Senate be compelled to continue such person in the seat? Would not such continuance be as criminal as the original admission? Will any man pretend that a plain constitutional provision can be superseded by a mistaken decision of this Senate? If the sitting member was not chosen by the legislature of Louisiana, every hour he sits on this floor after that fact is known is a violation of the Constitution. It is a question of obedience to the Constitution. Can any person estop this Senate, can the Senate estop itself, from obeying the Constitution? Can the Senate estop itself from inquiring toties quoties whether he was chosen by the legislature? Can it be so estopped by its own erroneous decision on a former hearing?

In cases like the one now before us your committee do not hesitate to adopt the language employed by those eminent constitutional lawyers—Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, and Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois—in the Fitch and Bright case in 1859. They said:

"The power of the Senate to judge of the election and qualification of its own members is unlimited and abiding. It is not exhausted in any particular case by once adjudicating the same, as the power of reexamination and correction of error and mistake, incident to all judicial tribunals and proceedings, remains with the Senate in this respect, as well to do justice to itself as to the States represented or to the persons claiming or holding seats. Such an abiding power must exist to purge the body from intruders; otherwise anyone might retain his seat who had once wrongly procured a decision of the Senate in his favor by fraud or falsehood, or even by papers forged or fabricated."

In the light of the evidence now before the Senate the sitting member was admitted by a wrongly procured decision of the Senate in his favor by means quite as criminal as those stated in the last paragraph quoted, since the means employed by him to secure his pretended election included conspiracies, briberies, and perjuries often repeated, and the knowledge of which was vigorously suppressed on the former hearing. He was not chosen by the legislature of Louisiana. He was chosen by a body of men who conspired with him to defeat the will of the State, and who excluded by force the members elected by the people in order that the conspirators might be enabled to accomplish their work.

The primary authority to determine what is the legislature of a State is and must be the State herself. When the State determines that question for herself, it is determined for all the world. In case there are two governments, or two bodies each claiming to be the true government or the true legislature of the State, and the State has not determined the controversy, the duty may devolve upon others, and in this case upon this Senate to adjudge that question pro hac vice.

In January, 1877, a portion of the members elected by the people united with others not elected and seized the Statehouse by cooperation with the sitting member, who was then acting as governor, were barricaded in the building, which was surrounded with troops, and refused to permit other elected members to be admitted into the building. The barricaded persons called themselves the legislature, and the excluded members met in St. Patrick's Hall and called themselves the legislature. This was the condition of things when the sitting member presented his credentials to this Senate and asked to be admitted to his seat on this floor. He was not admitted, but his credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Before the committee took any action whatever the issue thus raised between these two rival bodies was settled by the State. It was decided that the body which assembled and organized in St. Patrick's Hall was the true legislature of the State. This decision was accepted by all the people of Louisiana and by all the departments of her government, by the President and House of Representatives, and by the circuit and district courts of the United States, and finally by all the persons who composed the body which seized the Statehouse. The latter, which had been known as the Packard legislature, disbanded, leaving not a resolution, or act, or other thing which has ever been recognized as authoritative, or which has been claimed to be valid, save only the pretended election of the sitting member to this Senate; and this single act has been recognized only by this Senate. The former body, which had been known as the Nicholls legislature, performed all the functions of a legislature from the beginning, passed laws which are obeyed by all the people and enforced by all the courts. All the persons who had been elected left the pretended Packard legislature and took their seats in the Nicholls legislature, and those who had not been elected admitted they were not elected, without even a contest, and went home or into the custom-house or some other Federal office.

The regular legislature thus organized, composed of all the members elected by the people, chose the memorialist to the seat he is now claiming. The election was free, regular, legal, and without taint of corruption of any kind, and his credentials are in due form. Of a legislature which was composed, when full, senate and house, of 156 members, the memorialist received over 140 votes.

Since the former hearing in this case the supreme court of Louisiana has also decided that the officers of the Packard government had, in January, 1877, no official status, and that no acts performed by them at that time, though purporting to be performed virtute officii, could have the force and effect of official acts. (State ex rel. Lipo v. Peck, 30 Annual Reports, 280.)

And in addition to all this, the evidence now taken shows that the Packard legislature, which pretended to elect the sitting member, was, in fact as well as in law, not a legislature, but was a body of men assembled by fraud, held together by force and controlled by bribery, with the aid and in the interest of the sitting member.

Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, submitted the minority views, which were concurred in by Messrs. Angus Cameron, of Wisconsin, and John A. Logan, of Illinois:

The party majority in the Senate has changed since Mr. Kellogg took the oath of office in pursuance of the above resolution. Nothing else has changed. The facts which the Senate considered and determined were in existence then as now. It is sought, by mere superiority of numbers, for the first time to thrust a Senator from the seat which he holds by virtue of the express and deliberate final judgment of the Senate.

The act which is demanded of this party majority would be, in our judgment, a great public crime. It will be, if consummated, one of the great political crimes in American history, to be classed with the rebellion, with the attempt to take possession by fraud of the State government in Maine, and with the overthrow of State governments in the South, of which it is the fitting sequence. Political parties have too often been led by partisan zeal into measures which a sober judgment might disapprove, but they have ever respected the constitution of the Senate.

The men whose professions of returning loyalty to the Constitution have been trusted by the generous confidence of the American people are now to give evidence of the sincerity of their vows. The people will thoroughly understand this matter, and will not be likely to be deceived again.

We do not think proper to enter here upon a discussion of the evidence by which the claimant of Mr. Kellogg's seat seeks to establish charges affecting the integrity of that Senator. Such evidence can be found in abundance in the slum of great cities. It is not fit to be trusted in cases affecting the smallest amount of property, much less the honor of an eminent citizen, or the title to an object of so much desire as a seat in the Senate. This evidence is not only unworthy of respect or credit, but it is in many instances wholly irreconcilable with undisputed facts, and Mr. Kellogg has met and overthrown it at every point.

The report was taken up for consideration on April 22, and thereafter was debated at length on April 23, 26, 27, and 30, May 3, 4, 7, 10, 14, 20, and June 5, 7, and 11.[1] On May 7[2] Mr. George F. Hoar proposed the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "resolved" where it first appears, and insert the following:

"That in the judgment of the Senate the matters reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the present session respecting the right to the seat in this body now held by William Pitt Kellogg and claimed by Henry M. Spofford are not sufficient to justify the reopening of the decision of the Senate, pronounced in its resolution adopted on the 30th day of November, A. D. 1877, that said Kellogg was, upon the merits of the case, lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1877, and that said Spofford was not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States."

The debate was elaborate, but it appeared that a portion of the majority party in the Chamber did not subscribe to the conclusions of the committee.

The minority having set up the doctrine of res adjudicata, the question as to the exact functions of the Senate under the constitutional provision making it the judge of the elections of its Members became one of importance. On behalf of the majority Mr. Bailey declared [1] that the Senate was not a court in the strict sense, but that its duties in judging elections were in the broadest sense political. Mr. Pryor made [2] an elaborate constitutional argument to show that the word "judge" did not convert the Senate into a judicial body. Mr. Hill insisted again that the Senate was a political body, not a court.[3] On the other hand, Mr. Hoar argued,[4] from the history of the Constitution that in cases of this sort the Senate acted as a judicial body. Also Senators Wade Hampton and Marion Butler, of South Carolina, differing from their party associates, held [5] that the Senate in such cases acted as a court.

As to the doctrine of res adjudicata itself, Mr. Hill set forth [3] the doctrine that the Senate could constitutionally judge only as to who were elected its members and could not judge as to what was the rightful legislature of a State. That decision belonged to the courts, the executive, and the people of the State itself. In this case the Senate had presumed to judge what was the legislature. That decision was void, beyond jurisdiction, attackable collaterally. Mr. George G. Vest, of Missouri, considered [6] the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana conclusive that the Nichols legislature was the only lawful one. The Senate, in his opinion, was a "creature of the Constitution and has absolute power, irrespective of all technical rules of proceeding, to determine its own constitutional membership." The theory of Mr. Hill was combated by Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, who declared "Where a court has jurisdiction at all it has jurisdiction to decide every question necessary to the decision of the question that it must settle." Therefore the Senate could decide as to the competency of the legislature, and its conclusion was not void.

On the doctrine of res adjudicata Mr. Carpenter declared [7] that the peace of society required that some things should be presumed even against notorious facts, and cited the Supreme Court case of Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 130). A wise rule for the courts must be a wise one for the Senate acting in its judicial capacity. Mr. Hampton, while believing that Mr. Kellogg was wrongly seated, said: [8] "I believe we have not the power, the rightful power, to rectify the wrong." And his colleague, Mr. Butler, also declared [9] that a Member seated on the merits of his case could be unseated only by expulsion, for he believed that the Senate expended its power when once it judged. The Throckmorton case (98 U. S., 61) was cited by Mr. Carpenter on this point.

Messrs. Kernan, of New York, and Pendleton, of Ohio, held [1] that material or relevant facts ascertained after the decision might justify a review, but the latter considered the new evidence was not such as to justify the reopening.

As to precedents, the Gholson and Claiborne case in the House of Representatives in 1837 was cited [2] and its applicability as a precedent was also denied.[3] The Reeder and Whitfield case in the House of Representatives in 1856 was also cited.[3] It was claimed for each of these cases that the House reviewed a decision, but this was denied.

No decision on the question was reached at this session of Congress.

By the time the Third session of the Congress began, Mr. Spofford had died, and on December 7 [4] Mr. Jonas presented the credentials of Thomas Courtland Manning, appointed a Senator by the governor of Louisiana to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Henry M. Spofford, who claimed to be elected Senator from that State; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

No further action was had, Mr. Kellogg retaining the seat.

358. The Senate election case of Sanders, Power, Clark, and Maginnis, from Montana, in the Fifty-first Congress.

There being conflicting credentials resulting from elections by rival legislative bodies, the Senate declined to give prima facie effect to the papers and examined the final right.

A Senate discussion favoring recognition of a legislative body having a legally certified but not legally elected quorum in preference to one having an elected but not certified quorum.

A legislature in electing a Senator may act under the law as an assemblage of legislators rather than as two organized legislative bodies.

On January 16, 1890,[5] in the Senate, Mr. Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, presented a paper purporting to be the credentials of Wilbur F. Sanders, chosen a Senator by the legislature of Montana, and also a paper purporting to be the credentials of Thomas C. Power, chosen a Senator by the legislature of the same State, which were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

These credentials were alike in form. Each recited that the senate and house of representatives had duly organized and elected as United States Senator, the bearer, whose name was given. Then the credentials [6] proceeded as follows:

> Whereas Hon. Joseph K. Toole, the governor of said State, upon the 10th day of January, A. D. 1890, did refuse to certify such election of said Wilbur F. Sanders for said Senator:
> Now, therefore, I, Louis Rotwitt, secretary of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the said Wilbur F. Sanders has been duly elected by said joint assembly Senator in Congress from said State of Montana.

[SEAL.] L. ROTWITT,

Secretary of State of the State of Montana.

On January 23[1] Mr. George G. Vest, of Missouri, presented a paper purporting to be the credentials of William A. Clark, and also a paper purporting to be the credentials of Martin Maginnis, elected Senators by the legislature of the State of Montana, which were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On motion by Mr. Vest, and by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That, pending the settlement of the contested election cases of Senators from the State of Montana, Messrs. Wilbur F. Sanders, Thomas E. Power, William A. Clark, and Martin Maginnis be admitted to the privileges of the floor of the Senate.

These credentials were dated "The State of Montana, Executive Office," recorded the election of the bearers by the legislature, and concluded:

Now, therefore, I, Joseph K. Toole, governor of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the said William A. Clark has been duly elected by such joint assembly to serve as Senator in Congress from the State of Montana.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Montana to be affixed. Done at my office, in Helena, in the year of our Lord, 1890, and the year of American Independence the one hundred and fourteenth.

JOS. K. TOOLE, Governor of Montana.

In fact, the "great seal of the State" was not affixed to the credentials. The signature of the governor was attested only by a notary public.

The credentials were referred, neither of the claimants being permitted to take the oath.

On March 24[2] Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, submitted a report concurred in by himself and by Messrs. William P. Frye, of Maine; Henry M. Teller, of Colorado; William M. Evarts, of New York; and John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin. Dissenting minority views were presented by Messrs. Z. B. Vance, of North Carolina; J. L. Pugh, of Alabama; George Gray, of Delaware; and David Turpie, of Indiana.

The report first states the facts:

No distinction exists between the cases of Messrs. Sanders and Power, and no distinction exists between the cases of Messrs. Clark and Maginnis. The cases on each side have been presented and argued upon the merits of the title, and not merely upon the question presented by the certificate of the governor or of the secretary of state. The committee, therefore, have considered and report upon the whole case upon its merits.

The claimants on both sides seem to be agreed that a lawful joint convention was held in Montana by the members of the two houses of the legislature, and elected Senators by due proceedings. The dispute is which of two bodies claiming to be the lawfully organized house of representatives of Montana was entitled to that character.

There was no election of Senator by concurrent vote on the Tuesday appointed for that purpose by the statute of the United States (Rev. Stat., secs. 14, 15). On the following day one-half the members of the senate met in joint assembly with a body which had assembled and organized in a room called the Iron Hall, which body was known as the Iron Hall or Republican house, whereupon, a ballot for

[2] Senate Report No. 538.

Senator being had, Mr. Sanders had a majority of all the votes cast, and was declared duly elected. No other person having such majority, the convention was adjourned until the day following, when, a ballot for Senator being held, Mr. Power had a majority of all the votes cast and was declared duly elected. If this body were the lawful house of representatives of Montana, these two gentlemen were duly chosen Senators.

On the same day the other half of the members of the senate met in joint assembly with a body which had assembled and organized in the court-house, which body was known as the Court House or Democratic house, voted for Senators by separate ballotings, adjourned from day to day, and continued balloting until Messrs. Clark and Maginnis had a majority of all the votes cast and were declared duly elected. If this body were the lawful house of representatives of Montana, these two gentlemen were duly chosen Senators.

These two bodies were composed as follows: By the constitution of Montana the house of representatives consists of fifty-five members, of whom twenty-eight are a quorum. Twenty-five persons of whose title to sit in the house of representatives and take part in its proceedings no question is made, together with five persons claiming to be entitled to sit and take part as representatives from the county of Silver Bow, met, as above stated, at the Iron Hall, at the time fixed by the constitution for the meeting of the legislature, and organized there. The auditor, who is required by the constitution to preside at the organization of the house, called them to order and presided till a speaker was chosen. Twenty-four other persons of whose title to sit in the house of representatives and take part in its proceedings no question is made, together with five other persons claiming to be entitled so to sit and take part as representatives from the county of Silver Bow, met, as above stated, at the court-house, at the time fixed by the constitution for the meeting of the legislature, and organized there.

The whole case, therefore, turns upon the question which of these two sets of five persons was entitled to sit in the house of representatives from the county of Silver Bow, take part in the organization and other proceedings down to and including the time of the election of Senators. It is not claimed that there was any adjudication of the house itself affirming or denying such title.

In determining the question as to the rights of the respective claimants to the five contested seats the committee discuss three questions:

First. Which of the two sets or groups of five members claiming to sit for the county of Silver Bow had credentials from the officer or board entitled to canvass the vote and declare the result?

On this question a sharp difference arose between the majority and minority, arising from different constructions of the laws of Montana. The majority held that the credentials issued by the State canvassing boards were the only lawful credentials. The minority sustained the credentials issued by the county clerks. The case largely turned on this issue, which was discussed at length in the reports and in the debate on the floor.

Second. If one group of five had the lawful credentials, but the other group were in fact elected, which was legally entitled to sit in the house at its original organization and remain and take part in all subsequent proceedings until the house itself had adjudicated their title, there being in existence two bodies each claiming to be the true house?

The majority report says:

It will hereafter appear that it is unnecessary to decide this question for the purposes of the present case. We believe, for reasons hereafter stated, that the certificates of the State board declared the true will and choice of the people as expressed by a majority of the votes actually and lawfully cast. But, as the matter has been discussed, it is proper to say that we are unable to see any distinction in principle between the case of a person claiming title to a seat in an assembly whose character is disputed by some other body, and in an assembly whose character is undisputed. The majority of persons having a right to seats in the house of representatives have a right to organize that house and to transact all its lawful business, including the enactment of laws and the election of Senators. Persons who have the certificates of election have such right to seats. Every act of the assembly in which they take part, and to which their consent is necessary, has as absolute validity as if their title had been affirmed by an adjudication of the house itself. Their title is not, as is sometimes carelessly said, a prima facie title. It is an absolute title, continuing until the house itself has adjudicated that some other person be admitted to their place. This adjudication is only operative for the future, and has no retroactive effect whatever. When the house makes the inquiry on the merits, it may treat the credentials as prima facie evidence upon that question. But until the house tries the case, the credential is conclusive as to all the world.

If this be true, how can an attempted usurpation by another body of the functions of the house, to which they belong, in the least affect their right? If four certified members had come over from the court-house to the Iron Hall, according to this argument, these men, who had no title to their seats before, would at once become entitled to them. If the men who went to the court-house had never gone there or made any claim to the seats, in that case, according to this theory, the five certified members from Silver Bow would have been all right. It seems to us impossible to believe that the right of these gentlemen to sit and vote, the validity of any laws they might have helped to enact, or of the choice of any officer they might help to elect, should depend on the acts of other persons.

This question may be raised at the beginning of any session of Congress. If the certificate of the proper officer of the State give no title, surely the act of the clerk in placing the claimant's name on a roll can give none. It would be competent, if the claim we are dealing with be sound, to organize the House of Representatives of the United States with a quorum partly made up of persons having credentials and partly of persons having none, and thereby put upon the Senate, when called upon to determine whether it will recognize such a body, the necessity of going into evidence of what occurred at the popular elections and of trying the right of the Members of the House to their seats. The President must make for himself a like inquiry, and perhaps the courts a third. It might be that these bodies would come to different conclusions upon the voluminous and conflicting evidence in a contested-election case, and thus the whole Government would be thrown into confusion. We suppose that there has been more than one occasion in recent years when a majority of the Senate firmly believed that enough of the Members of the House who held credentials were not duly elected to change the political majority. I this doctrine be accepted, the party in the minority in the House may at any time associate with themselves persons enough claiming to have been chosen to make a quorum, and disregard the certificates of the executives of the States and the Clerk's roll. The Senate may then take evidence of what occurred at the polls, thereby determine who were lawfully elected, recognize the body so organized, and thereby give the persons it finds so elected the seats to which neither credentials nor judgment of the House have ever given a title.

The report in Sykes v. Spencer, decided by the Senate in 1873, is relied upon as supporting an opinion contrary to that which we have stated. If so, we dissent from it. But it is to be remarked that in that case, which was upon an election held less than seven years after the close of the war, the doctrine of the report is not relied upon in the debate. It is further to be observed that that case is to be distinguished from this by the fact that there it was conceded that the persons who had not certificates were duly elected. The distinction from the general rule is expressly put by Mr. Carpenter, in his report, upon this concession. When the fact there conceded is, as in the present case, disputed, and to be proved, we think there are but two ways in which it can be proved to the Senate. One is the possession of lawful credentials. The other is the judgment of the House itself, not only the final, but the sole judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its Members.

Mr. Gray, speaking for the minority, said they did not dissent from the proposition laid down by the majority, and did not found their case on the principles enunciated in the case of Sykes v. Spencer, which he declined to indorse. The ruling was considerably discussed during this debate.[1]

Third. Is there evidence which warrants the Senate in finding that the persons who had the credentials were not, in fact, duly elected?

The majority and minority disagreed sharply as to which set of contestants were actually elected, and this question was discussed at length in the report and on the floor. The majority found that the persons bearing the State canvassing-board credentials had in fact been elected.

On another point the majority concluded:

The suggestion has been made that, to elect a Senator, there must be in existence a legislature exercising, or at least capable of exercising, the law-making function; and that when this function is interrupted or abdicated, or has never been set in motion because either house refuses to recognize and act in concert with the other, or because the governor refuses to treat either as possessed of legislative authority, there is, in fact, no legislature in the constitutional sense, and therefore no body competent to appoint a Senator. In Montana the governor declined to recognize the Iron Hall house, and the senate, which was evenly divided politically, did not recognize either Iron Hall or Court-House.

The suggestion is ingenious, but we do not think it will bear examination. The governor is no part of the law-making power. The legislature may pass laws, if he do not assent to them. He has only the power to require the legislature to reconsider a bill or resolve they have once passed. On such reconsideration a two-thirds vote, instead of a bare majority, is essential to the enactment. (Constitution of Montana, art. 5, sec. 29.)

It would be a strange condition of things if the governor of a State, or the President of the United States, could, by a simple refusal of recognition, suspend all legislative functions, so that bills presented to him should not become laws through his inaction, or be passed over his veto. Such a theory, which rests wholly on implication, would, if adopted, neutralize plain provisions of the Constitution.

Neither house of the legislature, when once lawfully constituted, can abandon its own authority. Much less can it take away the authority of the other. Neither House of Congress can even adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other. A like provision is in the constitution of Montana. This theory enables one house, or the executive, to overthrow at once all the constitutional securities for the preservation of the legislative power. It is utterly opposed to the act of Congress prescribing the manner of the election of Senators (Revised Statutes, secs. 14 to 19.) If no concurrent election be had, "the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly."

This is intended to put it out of the power of a majority of either house to prevent a choice of Senator. This provision we think clearly constitutional. It is in accordance with the legislative usage in the matter of electing officers whose choice may be prevented altogether if two distinct bodies must concur to produce a valid result.

In conclusion, the majority recommended these resolutions:

Resolved, That William A. Clark is not entitled to be admitted to a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana.

Resolved, That Martin Maginnis is not entitled to be admitted to a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana.

Resolved, That Wilbur F. Sanders is entitled, upon the merits of the case, to be admitted to a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana.

Resolved, That Thomas C. Power is entitled, upon the merits of the case, to be admitted to a seat in the Senate from the State of Montana.

The report was debated at length on April 2, 3, 7–11, 15, and 16.[1] On the latter day[2] a motion to recommit was disagreed to—yeas 26, nays 32.

Then the question recurring on agreeing to the first two resolutions reported by the committee, Mr. Gray moved a substitute declaring Messrs. Sanders and Power not elected. This amendment was disagreed to—yeas 26, nays 32.

The two first resolutions of the committee were then agreed to—yeas 38, nays 19.

Then the question recurred on the two last resolutions of the committee, declaring Messrs. Sanders and Power entitled to the seats. A substitute amendment declaring that in the judgment of the Senate there had been no choice was disagreed to—yeas 23, nays 30.

Messrs. Sanders and Power thereupon appeared and were sworn.

359. The Senate election cases of John T. Morgan, of Alabama, and L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, in the Forty-fifth Congress.

The Senate gave immediate prima facie effect to perfect credentials certifying election by a legally organized legislature, although it was objected that popular will had been subverted in electing the legislators.

On March 5, 1877,[1] at the time of swearing in Senators-elect, Mr. George E. Spencer, of Alabama, objected to the administration of the oath to Mr. John T. Morgan, of Alabama.

On March 7[2] Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials of John T. Morgan, Senator-elect from the State of Alabama, be taken from the table and that he be sworn.

On March 8[3] Mr. Spencer proposed an amendment providing that the credentials be referred to a committee before the swearing in of Mr. Morgan.

It did not appear that there was any question as to the credentials, as to the title of the governor who signed them, or as to the fact that the legislature which elected him was the only legislature of the State. But it was urged that in the election of the State government the will of the people had been subverted by violence, and therefore that the action of the legislature was void.

After debate Mr. Spencer's amendment was rejected, the resolution was agreed to, and Mr. Morgan took the oath.

360. On March 3, 1877,[4] in the Senate, the credentials of L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, for the six years commencing March 4, 1877, were presented.

On March 5,[1] at the time of swearing in Senators-elect, Mr. George E. Spencer, of Alabama, objected to the administration of the oath to Mr. Lamar because of conditions set forth in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who had investigated the recent election in Mississippi.

On March 6,[5] Mr. William A. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, offered the following:

Resolved, That the credentials of L. Q. C. Lamar, Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, be taken from the table and that he be sworn.

Mr. Spencer moved to amend the resolution by a substitute referring the credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

In the debate Mr. Spencer urged that the State government of Mississippi, as shown by the report of the Senate's committee, was a fraud and an usurpation. The legislature had been chosen in an election wherein violence and intimidation prevailed. In his view a mob could not organize a State government sufficient to make out a prima facie case.

It appeared that Mr. Lamar's credentials were issued by a governor whose title was not disputed by any other claimant and by a legislature that was unquestioned as the only legislature of the State. It was urged that the objections raised went to the fact of election, and should not prevent the swearing in of Mr. Lamar on his undisputed prima facie showing.

There was little objection to this claim; but Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, called attention to the Pinchback case of Louisiana, and declared that it was inconsistent to seat Mr. Lamar and deny a seat to Mr. Pinchback, who bore credentials from the only recognized governor of Louisiana of an election by the recognized and existing legislature of the State. In opposition to this view it was urged, especially by Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, that a rival claimant also presented credentials from a rival governor of Louisiana, and that Mr. Pinchback's case was thus so complicated that both claimants should wait until their claims could be examined.

Mr. Bainbridge Wadleigh declared that the question which arose was whether the voice which came here was really the voice of Mississippi. An usurpation should not have a voice on the floor of the Senate. He favored an examination before admitting Mr. Lamar.

The question recurring on the amendment proposed by Mr. Spencer, there appeared 1 yea (Mr. Wadleigh) and 58 nays.

Then the resolution proposed by Mr. Wallace was agreed to—yeas 57, nays 1 (Mr. Wadleigh).

Mr. Lamar then appeared and took the oath.

ELECTORATES DISTRACTED BY CIVIL WAR.

1. Joint rule excluding persons elected in insurrectionary States. Section 361.
2. Informal elections in districts under military duress. Sections 362–381.
3. Principles deduced from Senate decisions as to States under military duress. Sections 382–385.

361. Persons bearing credentials regular in form, but coming from communities disorganized by civil war, have been excluded until Congress should determine the status of the constituencies.

In the days of reconstruction the two Houses, by joint rule, excluded Members-elect with credentials in due form, some entirely, others until the States were declared by law entitled to representation.

An instance wherein credentials of persons claiming to be Members-elect were referred to a joint committee of the two Houses.

Credentials regular in form have been presented as a matter of privilege, although the status of the constituency was, by reason of civil war, in doubt.

On December 12, 1865,[1] Mr. Henry J. Raymond, of New York, as a question of privilege, presented the credentials of the Representatives from the State of Tennessee, signed by the governor, sealed with the seal of the State, and otherwise regular in form.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, raised the question that, as the State of Tennessee was not known to the House or to Congress, no question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order, saying that the usages of the House since the rebellion began showed that a claimant to a seat, with papers prima facie indicating his election, was entitled, as a question of privilege, to have them presented.

A question then arose as to the reference of the credentials, it not being proposed that the oath should be administered on the prima facie showing.

Finally, after debate, the credentials were referred to the newly constituted

Joint Committee on Reconstruction, by a vote of yeas 125, nays 42. This committee had been constituted by resolution of the two Houses, which provided that until the committee should have investigated and reported on the condition of the so-called Confederate States, no Member should be received into either House from any of these States, and that all papers relating to such representation should be referred to the joint committee.[1] On December 14[2] the House reenforced the provisions of the concurrent resolution by agreeing to the following, by a vote of yeas 107, nays 56:

Resolved, That all papers which may be offered relative to the representation of the so-called Confederate States of America, or either of them, shall be referred to the joint committee of fifteen without debate, and no Members shall be admitted from either of said so-called States until Congress shall declare such States, or either of them, entitled to representation.

During consideration of the resolution it was objected that under the Constitution and laws the Speaker was required to administer the oath to Representatives of States as they should appear.

Later, on February 20, 1866,[3] the House passed a concurrent resolution declaring that "no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said [insurrectionary] States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation."

This resolution was later agreed to by the Senate.[4]

At various times between the adoption of these resolutions and June 4, 1866,[5] the credentials of various gentlemen from the insurrectionary States were presented and referred under the rule.

The report of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction[6] showed that Tennessee had a republican form of government, and an act of Congress was passed at this session and approved July 24, 1866, "restoring Tennessee to her relations to the Union" and declaring her "again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress."[7] Accordingly, on the day of the approval of the act, and later, the Members-elect from Tennessee appeared and were sworn.[8]

Gentlemen bringing credentials from other insurrectionary States were not admitted during this Congress.

The report of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction,[9] made at this session of Congress, took the ground that Congress could not "be expected to recognize as valid the election of Representatives from disorganized communities" without first providing constitutional or other guarantees.

362. The North Carolina election case of Charles Henry Foster in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House declined to seat a claimant chosen by a few people at an election wholly informal because of civil war.

The House declined to honor credentials regular in form, but referring to a constituency notoriously incapacitated by civil war.

Instance of a claim for a seat brought before the House by petition.

On July 13, 1861,[1] the petition of Charles Henry Foster, claiming to have been elected Representative from the First Congressional district of North Carolina, was presented and referred to the Committee on Elections. Mr. Foster apparently did not seek at this time to establish a prima facie right to the seat.

On December 2, 1861,[2] at the beginning of the next session (the regular long session), credentials in regular form were presented in behalf of Mr. Foster. These credentials referred to another election and had no reference to the petition of the preceding session. It was urged in behalf of Mr. Foster that a provisional government had been formed in North Carolina, that proclamation of the governor had been made calling an election, which had been duly held, and that Mr. Foster now presented the certificate of the governor under the broad seal of the State entitling him to the seat from the Second district.

Objection was made to the admission of Mr. Foster to the seat, and the papers were referred to the Committee on Elections, who had not reported on the memorial presented at the first session.

On December 18[3] the committee reported that Mr. Foster was not entitled to a seat either from the First or Second districts of North Carolina, his claim being founded upon imposition. The House agreed to this report without debate or division.

On March 6, 1862,[4] a memorial of 68 loyal electors of the Second district was presented asking the admission of Mr. Foster to the House. This memorial was referred to the Committee on Elections, who reported on June 16.[5]

In this report the committee say:

> This is the fourth time that Mr. Foster has claimed to have been elected a Representative to the Thirty-seventh Congress from the State of North Carolina—twice from the First and twice from the Second district. On the 18th day of December last the House adopted without division the following resolution:
> "Resolved, That Charles Henry Foster is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-seventh Congress, either from the First or from the Second district of North Carolina."
> The present claim is based entirely upon proceedings which have transpired since that date. Those proceedings consist of what purports to be a poll list of 81 votes cast for Mr. Foster at Chickamacomico precinct on the 16th February last, supported by a copy of a paper purporting to be signed by 30 citizens of Carteret County, "ratifying and approving" said election, and a copy of a resolution of like purport, supposed to have been adopted by some citizens—how many it is not known—of Craven County. The other voting presented to the committee were proceedings upon which a former election was claimed, which claim was unanimously rejected by the House.

[5] House Report, No. 118.

The Second district of North Carolina is composed of the counties of Wayne, Edgecomb, Green, Pitt, Lenoir, Jones, Onslow, Carteret, Craven, Beaufort, and Hyde, and usually casts about 9,000 votes. The regular day of election was the first Thursday in August, 1861. There was no election for Members of Congress held on that day, because the whole State was at that time in the armed occupation of rebels.

The committee further say that since then some portions have been reclaimed and the authority of the Government asserted. But the claimant admitted that voting in any other precinct than that where the election occurred was impossible. The voting that did occur was without the slightest authority of law. No election was called, no writ of election issued. There was no governor of the State, provisional, military, or of any other character, except the Confederate governor.

The committee also found that the memorial of citizens of Carteret County was of an anomalous character, unworthy of effect as a legal document.

Therefore the committee recommended that Mr. Foster be considered not entitled to the seat. The House concurred in this report without division.[1]

363. The Virginia election cases of Joseph Segar, in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House refused to seat a claimant chosen by a mere fraction of the people, at an election informally called and held, in a district under duress of armed enemies.

The House declined to give prima facie title to the bearer of informal credentials referring to a constituency notoriously paralyzed by civil war.

A legislature being in existence, a constitutional convention may not fix the times, etc., of elections of Representatives.

On December 2, 1861,[2] Mr. Joseph Segar appeared with credentials in the form of a certificate of the vote cast, attested by a certificate from the provost marshal of the Federal camp, Hamilton, purporting to give him title to the seat from the First Congressional district of Virginia.

The House had admitted to seats Members elected under authority of the provisional government of Virginia, but in the case of Mr. Segar there arose a question as to what portion of the voters of the district had participated in that election. After debate the House declined to allow Mr. Segar the prima facie title to the seat, and referred his credentials to the Committee on Elections.

On January 20, 1862,[3] the committee made its report, recommending that Mr. Segar be not admitted to the seat. In this case, as in the case of Mr. Beach, the election was held under authority of a proclamation of Governor Pierpont. The committee state the facts as follows:

A convention assembled at Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, on the l1th of June last, in which were represented, it is believed, thirty-nine counties of the State, situate in what is known as Western Virginia. This convention adopted on the 19th of June "an ordinance for the reorganization of the State government," after having declared that, because of the treasonable practices and purposes of the State convention lately held in Richmond, and of the executive of the State in connection therewith, "the offices of all who adhere to the said convention and executive, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are vacated." By the same ordinance a legislature, or general assembly, for the State of Virginia was created, and required to "assemble in the city of Wheeling on the 1st day of July, and proceed to organize themselves as prescribed by existing laws in their respective branches." Said convention subsequently elected a governor for the State of Virginia, who still holds the office thus conferred upon him.

The legislature thus created assembled as required and passed many enactments for the whole State of Virginia, elected two United States Senators, who were admitted to seats in the Senate, and assumed all the functions of the general assembly of Virginia under its preexisting constitution and laws. The convention which created and set in motion this new government did not, however, dissolve itself upon the assumption of the several functions of government by the executive officers and general assembly which, in the exercise of provisional powers, it had itself brought into being, but continued to hold its meeting after the assembling of the legislature and to share with it in ordinary legislation for the whole State. The legislature was in session till the 24th of July, and how much longer the committee are not informed. The convention was in session on the 20th of August, and on that day passed an ordinance providing for the election of Representatives in Congress in each district where from any cause such election was not held on the fourth Thursday in May last, the day provided by law for such election, and also "in the Eleventh district, where a vacancy now exists, an election for such Representative shall be held on the fourth Tuesday in October next, which shall be conducted and the result ascertained, declared and certified in the manner directed in the second edition of the Code of Virginia"

In accordance with the proclamation of Governor Pierpont, an election was held at Hampton, in Elizabeth County, on October 24, 1861, at which 25 votes were cast for Mr. Segar. A certificate of these votes, signed by the election officers and certified by the provost-marshal of Camp Hamilton, were the only credentials presented by Mr. Segar on December 2. On a subsequent day of the session he presented credentials signed by the governor and attested under seal of the Commonwealth.

There was also presented the proceedings of a meeting on Chincoteague Island, at which 136 citizens expressed, on December 10, a preference for Mr. Segar, but Mr. Segar did not rely on this. He based his claim on the 25 votes cast at Hampton, claiming that his claim was strictly legal.

The committee say:

The committee have been led to investigate this claim of legality. The whole authority for this election is the ordinance of the Wheeling convention passed August 20. Assuming that the proceedings of that convention, and of the legislature and executive created by it, have ripened into a State government, legal in all respects, still the question arises, Was it one of the functions of that convention to provide for the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives in Congress, especially after the legislature had assembled? The purpose of that convention was the creation of a new State government. The only basis upon which it rests is necessity.

A new government must begin somewhere, and there must be somebody to make it. As necessity was the foundation, so also it was the limit of the power called into being for the sole purpose of inaugurating a new government. It could do anything necessary to carry out that purpose, and when that was done it could do no more. Its functions ceased the moment the new government took on form and life. The two can not, in the nature of things, exist and move pari passu. Now, long before this ordinance had passed the convention there was in existence a governor and a legislature, having all the powers that a governor and legislature could have in Virginia—that is, all the powers which the constitution of Virginia clothes a governor and legislature with not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Now, this latter instrument provides (art. 1, sec. 4) that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof." It is a legislative act. It is a law. * * * But this time and manner were not fixed in the organic act nor by the legislature, but by the convention assuming legislative functions in the presence of the legislature itself.

Again, the ordinance itself proposes to conform this election to the Code of Virginia. It "shall be conducted and the result ascertained, declared, and certified in the manner directed in the second edition of the Code of Virginia." Has the election under consideration been conducted in all respects according to the requirements of the Virginia Code? Title 3, chapter 7, section 11, of that code provides for elections to fill vacancies in Congress and enacts that they "shall be superintended and held by the same officers, under the same penalties, and subject to the same regulations as are prescribed for the general elections." Section 12 of the same chapter provides that "a writ of election shall be directed to the sheriff or sergeant of the county or corporation for which the election is to be held; or if the election is to be held for an election district, or to fill a vacancy in the Senate or in Congress, to the several sheriffs and sergeants of the counties and corporations which, or any parts of which, are included in the district. It shall prescribe the day of election (to be the same throughout the district), and may fix a day on which the officers conducting the election are to meet to make returns, not later than that fixed by law in the case of a regular election."

The committee further go on to show that in this case there was nothing which answered to a writ of election; but that the governor in his proclamation simply "entreats the loyal voters," and addressed it not to the sheriffs, but "to the people of Virginia."

In this case it was admitted that there was no election in any other place than Hampton, as notice could not pass beyond the enemy's lines to other parts of the district. Moreover, the notice was apparently brought to Hampton through the medium of a newspaper publication and a private letter.

The committee concluded that the claim of Mr. Segar could not be maintained if it rested on the plea of a strict conformity with all the provisions of law.

But the committee do not rest their conclusions on so narrow a basis. They say:

> If the Union voters of the district had had an opportunity to chose a Representative—if there had been no armed occupation of the district by rebels so that polls could have been opened at the various voting places in the district, and all who desired could have deposited their ballots, and had done so in conformity with the provisions of law, so far as the disturbed and abnormal condition of things would permit, the committee would have sought some way to give effect to such election. But enough of the facts surrounding this election have already been stated to show that such is not the case. There was but one single poll in the whole district opened, and but 25 votes cast. The reason why there were no other polls opened or more votes cast can not be better expressed than by the three freeholders themselves who certify to this election. This is their language:
> "And we do further certify that there was no poll opened at any other precinct in said county; and that so far as we can learn and confidently believe there was no poll opened or election held for Member of Congress in any other county or city or town of said First Congressional district, owing to the fact that all the other counties and election precincts of said Congressional district were, on the 24th day of October last, within the lines and under the influence and control of the seceding and rebel States."
> This state of things is no fault of the memorialist or the Union voters of the district, but it did exist on the day of this election. How can it be made to appear, then, that the memorialist is the choice of the district, or that if an opportunity had existed an overwhelming majority of votes would not have been cast against him? In what sense can it be said that those who did not vote are to be presumed to acquiesce, when they neither had the opportunity to vote nor the knowledge that voting was going on? Acquiescence presumes liberty to protest. In this instance that liberty did not exist.

On February 10 and 11,[1] the report was debated at length in the House.

On February 11[2] a motion was made to substitute for the proposition of the committee a declaration that Mr. Segar was entitled to the seat. This was decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 85.

Then the resolution of the committee declaring Mr. Segar not entitled to the seat was agreed to without division.

364. The Virginia election case of Joseph Segar, continued.

An instance wherein the House recognized an election legal in form, but participated in by a small fraction of the voters, the district being disturbed by civil war.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to regular credentials, having historic knowledge that the district was incapacitated by civil war from holding a regular election.

Instance wherein a committee unable to agree reported this fact to the House, and it became a basis for action.

On March 24, 1862,[1] the credentials of Mr. Segar were presented again, he claiming to have been elected at another election held March 15, 1862.

It was claimed and not disputed that the certificate presented was in the form required by law, but it was objected that the House knew from the report of the committee on the state of affairs in Virginia that no election could have been held in that State on March 15, 1862.

Then, without division, the credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections.

On April 14[2] the committee reported the following facts:

That those credentials, a copy of which is annexed, consist of a certificate signed by "William Mears, conductor at the court-house at Northampton," "Michael H. Higgins, conductor at the court-house of Accomac," and "John O. Evans, conductor at the court-house of Elizabeth City," dated the 22d day of March last, certifying that at an election held on the 15th day of said March in the several counties composing said district the claimant was duly elected to represent the same in the Congress of the United States. Mr. Segar also presented to the committee during the hearing a proclamation by Governor Pierpoint to the same effect, of date the 26th day of March last, a copy of which is also annexed. The First Congressional district is composed of seventeen counties, viz, Middlesex, Westmoreland, Richmond, Essex, Northumberland, King and Queen, Lancaster, Gloucester, James City, the City of Williamsburg, New Kent, York, Warwick, Northampton, Accomac, and Elizabeth City. Governor Pierpoint. issued writs of election in due form of law on the 24th day of February, 1862, directed to the sheriffs of the several counties composing this district, requiring them to hold an election for Representative to this Congress on said 15th day of March. The claimant stated to the committee that he himself took these writs of election to the sheriffs of the counties of Accomac, Northampton, and Elizabeth City, and that in one of these counties he saw the sheriff post up notice of the election at the several election precincts more than ten days before the day of the election, and in the others he saw the notices after they were put up, but whether they were up the time required by law he does not know. But no writs of election reached the sheriffs in the other fourteen counties, nor was any notice of election given, or any election held, at any precinct in any of the other fourteen counties in the district, for the reason that all the other counties were at the time of the election, and had been for a long time, in possession of the rebel army, and the rebel authorities had proclaimed martial law over them. For the same reason no election was held in Elizabeth City County, except at one precinct, Hampton. Notice to the sheriffs of these counties, to the people thereof, the opening of a poll or the casting of a vote at any precinct in any one of them, were all impossibilities.

[1] Journal, p. 472; Globe, p. 1339.

[2] House Report, No. 70; 1 Bartlett, p. 415.

There were cast at this election in the several voting precincts of Accomac and Northampton counties, and at Hampton, in Elizabeth City County, as appears by the several annexed certificates from commissioners in said counties, in all 1,018 votes.

The committee further found that Mr. Segar had 559 of the total, Arthur Watson 438, and all others 21.

The vote of the whole district for governor at the May election of 1859 was 7,986, and the population of the whole district in 1860 was 122,017.

In all the counties where the election in question was held there were 32,216 inhabitants. This included the county of Elizabeth City, in which only one poll was opened.

The counties occupied by the hostile army at the time the election was held and under martial law had 89,001 population. The committee say:

The committee have no means of knowing, other than may be inferred from the foregoing figures, what portion of the 7,986 electors, who cast their votes in that district for governor, reside in the three counties where this election was held, or bow many of them resided at the time in the fourteen counties where it was impossible to hold any election.

Upon these facts the committee were unable to agree upon any recommendation to the House. They therefore ask to be discharged from further consideration of the subject, and report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Toseph Segar, claimin a seat in this House as a Representative from the First district in Virginia, be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

On May 6[1] the question came before the House, and Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, in presenting the case, said:

The difficulty which the Committee on Elections encountered was this: They have laid down a principle heretofore, and the House has acted upon it in several cases which have been brought before the House, that if the voters of a district had an opportunity to vote, if there was no restraint upon them so that they could vote, he who had the highest number of votes is entitled to a seat, whether the votes be few or whether they be many; and the question is whether this case came within that rule.

Here were only three counties out of seventeen, and although they are large counties, they contain a little over 30,000 out of the 122,000 of all the inhabitants, and there were polled only one-eighth of all the votes. Whether it could be said that in the other fourteen counties, which were in the occupation of the rebel armies, the voters could not go to the polls and express their opinion at all, or not, or whether it could be said that the voters of these three counties, numbering about 1,000, expressed the wish or desire of the voters in the other counties so nearly and so fairly that, under the present state of things in Virginia, it is right or proper to admit this man to a seat, is a question which the committee felt disposed to bring before the House to let them pass upon it.

* * * All that the committee desire is that the House shall say when that state of things [the restoration of order in Virginia], all things considered, shall have been so nearly approached as that it shall be safe and proper to admit as a Representative upon this floor, from the First district of Virginia, or from any other district situated as that district is, a man who has received but little more than one-half of one-eighth of the votes of the whole district, and that, too, under circumstances such that the committee was not clear to say that the others could be said, in law or in fact, to have been free, or had the opportunity to vote if they had seen fit.

In the course of the debate the point was made, with effect, that all the provisions of law were followed in holding the election, although after the elections it had been impossible wholly to comply with the required forms. And after the subject had been referred to the Committee on Elections Mr. Segar had presented credentials from Governor Pierpont, of Virginia. It was urged that as all the departments of the National Government had recognized the government of Governor Pierpont, that certificate had exactly the same force as that of any other Representative on the floor from any State. It constituted prima facie evidence, and the House was not called on to investigate critically the merits of the case.

The House, by a vote of yeas 71, nays 47, substituted for the resolution of the committee a resolution that Mr. Segar be admitted to a seat as a Representative from the First district of Virginia.[1]

Mr. Segar then appeared and qualified.

365. The Tennessee election case of Andrew J. Clements in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House seated a loyal claimant voted for at an election called on the legal day, but by the governor of a State in secession.

Instance of an election proven by testimony of participants, the returning officers serving a secession government and making no return.

The House seated a claimant who had received a third of the votes of a district, the remainder being cast for candidates for a secessionist Congress.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to informal papers referring to an election in a district known to be under duress of civil war.

On January 13, 1862,[2] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Elections, reported in the case of Andrew J. Clements, who claimed to have been elected in the Fourth district of Tennessee. Mr. Clements had first appeared in the House on December 3, 1861,[3] and a motion had been made to allow him to take a seat on his prima facie right; but the House decided that his papers should be referred to the Committee of Elections before he should be allowed to take his seat.

The report states sufficiently the facts. Previous to the day for the election of Congressmen, the first Thursday of August, 1861, the State of Tennessee had perfected its acts of secession, and the governor of the State had ordered an election for the choice of delegates to the provisional congress of the Confederacy. The day was the same as that fixed by the constitution and laws of the State for the election of Representatives to the Congress of the United States, the first Thursday of August.

In four of the ten districts of the State the Union men disregarded the acts of secession and cast their ballots for Representatives to the Congress of the United States. One of the districts was that which Mr. Clements sought to represent. The report says further of him:

> He brings no certificate from the governor of Tennessee; but the refusal of the governor of Tennessee to grant a certificate of election to one entitled to it can not prejudice his right to it. (Richards's case, Hall & Clark, 95.) It may and has put him to the trouble of substantiating the fact of his election by other evidence before he can take his seat. The memorialist has presented the proper certificate of the sheriff of one county (Macon County) that he received in that county 433 votes. The sheriffs of the other counties in the district failed or refused to make returns of the votes cast for him in their respective counties, being themselves either open rebels or in sympathy with the rebellion. But the statutes of Tennessee themselves, as well as the precedents of Congress, have provided for this emergency by enacting that "if the judges fail to return the poll books or list of votes, or copies of them certified as aforesaid, the same may be proved by other creditable testimony, and received as evidence in any case arising out of said election." (Code of Tenn., sec. 870.) In accordance with this provision the memorialist presented evidence before the committee to satisfy them that he had received, in addition to the 433 returned by the sheriff of Macon County, votes in each of the other counties comprising the district, except Warren, amounting in the aggregate to more than 1,500 votes; making in all about 2,000 votes. The proof of this has been exceedingly difficult, because of the fact that the indignation of the secessionists against the memorialist for permitting himself to be a candidate rose to such a pitch immediately after the election that he was obliged to flee from the State to escape assassination, and has not been able to return to it since. But he has furnished from the volunteers, now in the service of their country in Kentucky, who were his constituents and voted for him in Tennessee before leaving their State for the war, and from other testimony, evidence which has satisfied the committee of the fact. The committee are also satisfied that on the day of election there was an armed rebel force present in the district preventing or restraining the voters from the exercise of the elective franchise, and that though a violent and bitter public sentiment existed, calculated to overawe and intimidate, yet the rebel forces had not up to that time so taken possession of the district as to prevent such voters as chose so to do to deposit their votes for a Representative in this Congress. The ordinary vote of the district is about 6,000; and then there were at the same time two candidates running for the Confederate congress, but no other candidate except the memorialist for the Congress of the United States.

In conclusion, the committee, upon the whole evidence, find that on the day of election no armed force prevented any considerable number of voters in any part of the district from going to the polls, and that on that day, in conformity with the forms of law, 2,000 votes at least were cast for the memorialist as a Representative to this Congress, and none, so far as the committee know, for any other person. They therefore report the following resolution, and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That Andrew J. Clements is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-seventh Congress from the Fourth district in Tennessee.

The House, on the same day the report was presented, agreed to it without division.[1]

Mr. Clements thereupon appeared and took the oath.

366. The Virginia election case of Charles H. Upton, in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House unseated a person chosen by a few votes, at an election wholly informal, in a district almost entirely under duress of civil war.

Instance wherein, by majority vote, the House unseated a person whose title was not contested but whose election was invalid.

The presumption that those who do not go to the polls acquiesce does not apply where a condition of civil war prevents due notice of election.

An exceptional case wherein the Clerk, without sufficient evidence, enrolled a person who participated for a time as a Member.

An examination of qualifications of a Member-elect as to inhabitancy.

On January 30, 1862,[2] the Committee of Elections, in accordance with the direction of the House, reported on the eligibility of and the circumstances attending the election of Charles H. Upton, who at the preceding session had, on his prima facie right, been admitted to a seat as a Representative of the Seventh Congressional district of Virginia.[1] The election at which he claimed to have been elected was held on May 23, 1861. As to whether or not he was eligible the committee say:

It appears from the facts admitted in the case and the testimony submitted to the committee that the incumbent for the last twenty-five years has been a freeholder in the State of Virginia, having himself for the most of that time been a resident and inhabitant of the county of Fairfax, where he and his family were domiciled. For sometime prior to the month of November, 1860, the incumbent himself had lived at Zanesville, in the State of Ohio, where he owned an interest in and had been engaged in conducting a daily newspaper, and it was shown that he voted at that place at the annual State election in October, and again at the Presidential election in November of the same year. Under the law of Ohio in force at that time the legal right to vote at either of those elections would necessarily imply a previous residence in that State of one year at least. But the evidence adduced upon this point satisfied the committee that in the month of November, soon after the Presidential election, he returned to his previous residence in the county of Fairfax, where his family had remained and then was. From that time to the month of June last he continued to be a resident and inhabitant of the State of Virginia, and consequently not ineligible, on account of the objection in question, as a candidate for Congress from that State at the date above referred to.

As to the conditions prevailing in the district the committee show at the outset that on May 14, 1861, the secession of Virginia from the Union had been perfected, so far as it could be perfected, by the formal admission of the State to the Southern Confederacy. On the 24th of the preceding April the State convention which framed the ordinance of secession had passed the following ordinance:

The election for Members of Congress for this State to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, required by law to be held on the fourth Thursday of May next, is hereby suspended and prohibited until otherwise ordained by this convention.

The committee held that although the acts of secession and the above ordinance "were usurpations upon the rights" of the people of Virginia, and in nature revolutionary, yet it appeared "that they were generally acquiesced in by a very large majority of the people in the whole of the eastern part of the State." The memorial of the incumbent showed to the committee that this was the fact throughout his district. The committee then say:

The law of the State providing for the election of Members of Congress on the 23d of May was regarded and treated by the governor, sheriffs, commissioners, and other officers charged with the duty of seeing it carried into effect, with the exception at most of those of a single election precinct, as suspended and for the time being as practically repealed. This course of the election officers appears to have been adopted and pursued without remonstrance or objection from any considerable number of the people of the Seventh Congressional district. The great body of the people in the district seem to have acted upon the belief that on the 23d of May there was no law in force in the State which would enable them, if so disposed, to elect a Member of Congress, nor was there any evidence before the committee that any very considerable number, if they have had the power, would have had the inclination to exercise it. Such being the state of the district, it is a question well worthy of grave consideration whether its political condition was such that any election for a Member of Congress at that time should be held legally valid either under the law of Virginia or of the United States, even were the evidence of such election clothed with all the ordinary forms of law.

[1] On February 26, 1862, in debate Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, said that Mr. Upton came without certificate of any man touching his right to the seat, and by personal influence only induced the Clerk of the last House to put his name on the roll of Members elect, "without the slightest evidence in the world."

Mr. Upton had advertised himself as a candidate, and had called on the Union men to open "side polls" on election day and vote for him for Congress. It was claimed that such "side polls" were opened at five different voting precincts, at which he received 95 votes. Certain documents were presented containing lists of persons who subscribed to statements reciting that they had been deterred by threats or deprived of the opportunity of voting, and "therefore voted" for Mr. Upton. The committee found that "the votes claimed to have been cast at these 'side polls' were not cast in conformity with any law at that time or heretofore in force in Virginia for the election of candidates for Congress; they were not given at the place of voting in the precinct, nor received by any election officer, nor certified or authenticated by any magistrate or commissioner or conductor of an election, nor proved by the oath of any witness." The committee therefore took no account of these votes.

But from a precinct called Ball's Cross Roads a copy of a so-called poll book was certified, and this showed 10 votes cast for Mr. Upton for Congress. The committee found that this poll book was not authenticated "in due form, or in such manner as to make its contents evidence for any purpose" as would appear by reference to the election laws of Virginia. The State being in rebellion, the returns could not be delivered to the county sheriff, and the return officers could not make out the certificate required by law to be transmitted to the Governor. Armed men had been at the polls at the Cross Roads, and had evidently intimidated voters who might have wished to vote for Mr. Upton.

The committee say further—

> In the view the committee have taken of this case, they have not deemed it necessary for them to express any opinion upon the question whether, in a Congressional district containing from 6,000 to 8,000 legal voters, the votes of so few as 10 electors, even if properly authenticated and clothed with all the forms of law, would furnish that evidence of a claim to a seat in this House that ought to be regarded as conclusive of the title. The proper time to determine this question will be when a case shall arise that makes a decision of it more indispensable than the one now submitted to the committee.
> It was very apparent, from the evidence before the committee, that but a very small portion of the voters in this Congressional district could have been in any way apprised that the incumbent was, on the 23d day of May, a candidate for Congress. It is probable, from the testimony, that not one voter in ten, of the whole number, could have known at the time that the incumbent, or any other candidate, was seeking an election to that office.
> What the legal effect of this general ignorance and want of notice to the voters would be in itself, considered independently of all forms of law, is a matter of very great doubt and well worth grave consideration. Election implies choice, and choice a state of mind in reference to the object of it the reverse of ignorance. With what propriety a person may be said to be elected or chosen as a Representative to Congress in a district in which nine-tenths of those interested in the election had no knowledge that he or anyone else was a candidate, we do not readily or clearly see. If it should be suggested that those who do not go to the polls are presumed to acquiesce in the action of those who do, would not that presumption be sufficiently rebutted by the proof that those who did not go were not only ignorant of the election, but acted under the belief that no election at the time could be legally held?

Accordingly, the committee reported a resolution that Mr. Upton was not entitled to the seat.

When the report came up in the House on February 26 and 27,[1] there was a long debate on the question suggested by the committee as to the size of the electorate. It was urged that there was no law of Virginia requiring for the election of a Member of Congress the votes of any specified proportion of the voters, and that any number of voters attempting under form or color of law to give expression to the will of the people might be sufficient to exercise the power.

[1] Globe, pp. 975, 1001.

On the other hand, it was argued that while the forms of law might be put aside when necessary to allow the voices of the voters to be heard, in this case it was proposed to waive all the requirements of law to give effect to the voices of ten men.

On February 27,[1] a motion was made to amend the resolution proposed by the committee so as to declare Mr. Upton entitled to the seat. This amendment was defeated, yeas 50, nays 73. Then the resolutions declaring Mr. Upton not entitled to the seat was agreed to.

In the debate the point was made that the unseating of Mr. Upton, in a case where there was no contestant to be seated, was virtually expulsion; but this point did not figure largely, as there was no serious questioning of the right of the House to investigate the titles of its Members to their seats.

367. The Virginia election case of Samuel F. Beach, in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House decided against the validity of an election informally held and participated in by only a few voters, most of the district being occupied by an armed enemy.

The presumption that those who do not go to the polls acquiesce does not apply where a condition of civil war prevents due notice of election.

A legislature being in existence, a constitutional convention may not fix the times, etc., of elections of Representatives.

On March 3, 1862,[2] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, reported on the memorial of Mr. Samuel Ferguson Beach, who claimed to represent the Seventh district of Virginia. Mr. Beach's certificate showed that on October 24, 1861, at an election held at the court-house at Alexandria, he received 138 votes, and that Charles B. Shirley, his opponent, received 11 votes; that no other polls of election were opened in the district, as all other portions than the vicinity of Alexandria were within the lines of a hostile force. The credentials were signed by the conductor and two commissioners who were officers of the election, and were addressed to "His Excellency Francis H. Pierpont, Governor of the State of Virginia."

The conditions under which the election had been held were thus described by the committee:

> A convention assembled at Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, on the 11th of June last, in which were represented, it is believed, thirty-nine counties of the State, situate in what is known as Western Virginia. This convention adopted on the 19th of June "an ordinance for the reorganization of the State government," after having declared that, because of the treasonable practices and purposes of the State convention lately held in Richmond, and of the executive of the State in connection therewith, "the offices of all who adhere to the said convention and executive, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are vacated." By the same ordinance a legislature, or general assembly, for the State of Virginia was created, and required to "assemble in the city of Wheeling on the 1st day of July, and proceed to organize themselves as prescribed by existing laws in their respective branches." Said convention subsequently elected a governor for the State of Virginia, who still holds the office thus conferred upon him.

[1] Journal, p. 369.

[2] Second session Thirty-seventh Congress, Report No. 42; 1 Bartlett, p. 391; Rowell's Digest, p. 176.

The legislature thus created assembled as required, and passed many enactments for the whole State of Virginia, elected two United States Senators, who were admitted to seats in the Senate, and assumed all the functions of the general assembly of Virginia under its preexisting constitution and laws. The convention which created and set in motion this new government did not, however, dissolve itself upon the assumption of the several functions of government by the executive officers and general assembly which, in the exercise of provisional powers, it had itself brought into being, but continued to hold its meetings after the assembling of the legislature, and to share with it in ordinary legislation for the whole State. The legislature was in session till the 24th of July, and how much longer the committee are not informed. The convention was in session on the 20th of August, and on that day passed an ordinance providing for the election of Representatives in Congress in each district where, from any cause, such election was not held on the fourth Thursday in May last, the day provided by law for such election, and also "in the Eleventh district, where a vacancy now exists, an election for such Representative shall be held on the fourth Tuesday in October next, which shall be conducted, and the result ascertained, declared, and certified in the manner directed in the second edition of the Code of Virginia."

Thereupon, on October 12, Governor Pierpont issued a proclamation, to carry out the ordinance of the convention, and closed with the statement that he did "hereby entreat the loyal voters of this State to hold elections in their several districts," etc.

Such was the authority under which the election was held. Mr. Beach claimed "that the ballot box knows no quorum, and that the number of votes cast is not a legitimate inquiry beyond the necessity of ascertaining for whom a majority was given."

The committee examined two questions on which the determination of the case depended: (a) The legality of the election in a technical sense; and (b) the acquiescence of the constituency.

As to the legality of the election, the committee examined first the authority under which the election was called. They say in their report:

The whole authority for this election is the ordinance of the Wheeling convention passed August 20. Assuming that the proceedings of that convention, and of the legislature and executive created by it, have ripened into a State government, legal in all respects, still the question arises, was it one of the functions of that convention to provide for the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives in Congress, especially after the legislature had assembled? The purpose of that convention was the creation of a new State government. The only basis upon which it rests is necessity.

A new government must begin somewhere, and there must be somebody to make it. As necessity was the foundation, so also it was the limit of the power called into being for the sole purpose of inaugurating a new government. It could do anything necessary to carry out that purpose, and when that was done it could do no more. Its functions ceased the moment the new government took on form and life. The two can not, in the nature of things, exist and move pari passu. Now, long before this ordinance had passed the convention there was in existence a governor and a legislature, having all the powers that a governor and legislature could have in Virginia—that is, all the powers which the constitution of Virginia clothes a governor and legislature with, not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Now, this latter instrument provides (art. 1, sec. 4) that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislatures thereof." It is a legislative act. It is a law. If the time had been fixed in the constitution of the State, recognized and acquiesced in by the legislature, it may be said to be the act of the lawmaking power—a legislative act. But this time and manner were not fixed in the organic act, nor by the legislature, but by the convention assuming legislative functions in the presence of the legislature itself.

Further discussing the legality of the election, the committee point out numerous particulars in which the election failed to be carried out in conformity with the Code of Virginia, which the convention prescribed as the guide. The governor had directed no writ of election to the sheriffs, but had simply entreated the loyal voters, the election had not been advertised over the district, the vote had not been canvassed and proclaimed.

Therefore the committee concluded that if the claim of the memorialist rested exclusively on a strict conformity with all the provisions of law, it could not be maintained.

The committee, however, continue:

> But the committee do not desire to rest their conclusions upon so narrow a basis. If the Union voters of the district had had an opportunity to choose a Representative, if there had been no armed occupation of the district by rebels, so that polls could have been opened at the various voting places in the district, and all who desired could have deposited their ballots, and had done so in conformity with the provisions of law, so far as the disturbed and abnormal condition of things would permit, the committee would have sought some way to give effect to such election. But enough of the facts surrounding this election have already been stated to show that such is not the case. There was but one single poll in the whole district opened, and but 149 votes cast. The reason why there were no other polls opened or more votes cast can not be better expressed than by the three freeholders themselves who certify to this election. This is their language:
> "And we further certify that there were no other polls of election held at any other precinct in said county of Alexandria, nor in any other of the counties of this Congressional district, as far as we can learn and believe; and that all the other counties of this Congressional district are, and were at the time of said election, included within the lines of the rebel army."
> This state of things is no fault of the memorialist or the Union voters of the district; but it did exist on the day of this election. How can it be made to appear, then, that the memorialist is the choice of the district, or that if an opportunity had existed an overwhelming majority of votes would not have been cast against him? In what sense can it be said that those who did not vote are to be presumed to acquiesce, when they neither had the opportunity to vote nor the knowledge that voting was going on? Acquiescence presumes liberty to protest. In this instance that liberty did not exist.

Therefore the committee recommended the adoption of a resolution declaring that Mr. Beach was not entitled to the seat claimed by him.

On March 31, 1862,[1] the report of the committee was agreed to by the House, without debate or division.

368. The Virginia election case of Wing v. McCloud in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House declared invalid an election informally held and participated in by a small fraction only of the voters, the district being largely occupied by an armed enemy.

The House declined to seat on prima facie showing a claimant declared elected by the governor's proclamation, the district referred to being notoriously under duress of civil war.

On January 8, 1863[2] the credentials of Mr. John B. McCloud, as Representative-elect from the Second Congressional district of Virginia, were presented to the House, and a motion was made that he be permitted to take the oath. This certificate was in the form of a proclamation of Governor Pierpont, of Virginia, declaring Mr. McCloud duly elected.

[1] Journal, p. 490; Globe, p. 1452.

[2] Third session Thirty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 165; Globe, p. 237.

Objection being made, the credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections, and the oath was not administered. The House, however, allowed the privilege of the floor to Mr. McCloud, as was customary in the cases of contestants and claimants for seats.

On February 4 [1] the committee reported both on the claim of Mr. McCloud and also the claim of Mr. W. W. Wing, who contested the election on the ground that certain ballots had been improperly counted for Mr. McCloud, thereby violating the Virginia law requiring viva voce voting.

The committee found it unnecessary to go into this controversy, since the validity of the entire proceeding was in doubt.

The Second district of Virginia was composed of ten counties and Norfolk city. The election occurred December 22, 1862, and in all 1,402 votes were cast, 645 for Mr. McCloud, 621 for Mr. Wing, and 136 for other candidates.

The election was called by proclamation of "John A. Dix, Major-General," and was held in precincts in four counties by election officers appointed by "Egbert L. Viele, Brigadier-General and Military Governor." In addition there were writs of Governor Pierpont directed "To the sheriff, or any constable, or to any freeholder" in the county, and requiring them to hold an election. The committee say in regard to the proceeding:

> It is difficult to imagine a proceeding so entirely in disregard of the requirements of the law of this State as this election. Whether authority for it be sought in the proclamation of Major-General Dix, "commanding the department of Virginia," or in that of Brigadier-General Viele, "military governor of Norfolk," or in the writs of election issued by Francis H. Pierpoint, governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, or in all three combined, it is equally in conflict with the plainest provisions of the law of the State. What territory in Virginia the "department of Virginia" embraces the committee are not informed; so that they are unable to say that it did or did not embrace the Second Congressional district. The committee are also ignorant of the source from whence General Dix obtained authority to call an election at all. He does not purport to call it as military governor, who is clothed to some extent with civil as well as military powers. The committee are not aware that General Dix assumes to discharge any other civil functions whatever. But the proclamation itself undertakes to prescribe the qualifications which alone would entitle a man to vote at this election, when the Constitution of the United States and of Virginia have fixed the qualification of voters for Representative to Congress, and these qualifications can not be added to or taken from.
> Article 1, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:
> "The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."
> And the constitution of Virginia provides, article 3, section 1:
> "Every white male citizen of the Commonwealth, of the age of 21 years, who has been a resident of the State for two years, and of the county, city, or town where he offers to vote for twelve months next preceding an election, and no other person, shall be qualified to vote for members of the general assembly."
> And section 4 provides, as already cited, that "in all elections votes shall be given openly, or viva voce, and not by ballot."
> A comparison of these several provisions with the proclamation of General Dix will show the departure and conflict without any comment or inquiry into the authority for issuing it.
> The proclamation of General Viele seems to have been in aid of that of General Dix. It is issued by him as "military governor of Norfolk." The committee have failed to obtain the instructions to General Dix in this matter, and are equally ignorant of the extent of jurisdiction of the military governor of Norfolk. If anything can be learned from his title, it is confined either to the city or county of Norfolk. If that be so, he could hardly interfere in this election with the counties of Princess Ann, Nansemond, or Isle of Wight. But he not only appointed commissioners of election in the county of Norfolk, but also in the other counties already named, and required all from all these counties to make returns to "these headquarters within three days subsequent to the election." The statutes of Virginia require these commissioners to be appointed by the court of each county, and require them to make returns to the clerks of the county courts of their respective counties, and they to the clerk of the county of Isle of Wight, and he declares the result. But it seems that this proclamation, like that of General Dix, was confined to four out of the eleven counties of this district. There is no authority of law for this selection, and it is supposed to have been induced by necessity, the remainder of the district being within the rebel lines. But whatever the reason, the House can at once see the danger if it were permitted. If certain counties may be selected in a district, and others omitted in the issue of writs of elections, then the control of the representation must rest with the power of selection. It should be sufficient, however, that the law does not sanction any such selection, and requires the issue of writs to the proper officers of all the counties.

But the writs of Francis H. Pierpoint, governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, were also issued in this case, as has been already said. There were none of them sent to any county in the district except the four already named, and therefore all that has been said touching the same proceeding under the proclamations of General Dix and General Viele has equal force here. But these writs, although bearing date the 12th of December and calling originally for an election upon Saturday, the 27th day of December, were first brought into the district on Saturday, the 20th, and delivered on Sunday, the 21st, to one of the candidates for distribution, and then by erasions and insertions made at some time—the committee do not know when—they became writs for an election on the next day that is, on Monday, the 22d day of December, and they were so distributed that day. Now, it is expressly enacted by the statutes of Virginia that "every officer to whom a writ of election is directed shall, at least ten days before such election, give notice thereof, and of the time of the election, by advertisement at each place of voting in his county or corporation." With this plain and express provision of law before them the committee are at a loss for any explanation of the reason of delivering these writs on Sunday for an election the next day, except that given to the candidate at the time of their delivery by General Samuels, the messenger who brought them, as stated to the committee by Mr. Wing himself, viz, "to give a semblance of legality to the election," Whatever may have been the reason for this proceeding, the proceeding itself will have a tendency to invoke the closest scrutiny on the part of the House into the regularity of each successive step in all elections held under the circumstances which attend this.

But turning from an examination of the conformity to legal requirements in this election to the question whether the voters of this district, conforming as nearly to law as possible, have, unrestrained and unawed by the presence of any considerable rebel force, had full and fair opportunity to express their choice of a Representative, the committee find that but 1,402 votes in all were cast in a district usually polling about 10,000 votes; that of the eleven counties composing this district polls were opened in only four of them, and not in every precinct in these four, for the reason that they were in the armed occupation of the rebels. No polls could, therefore, be opened, and not a single voter—be the number what it may in this much the greater portion of the district—could cast a vote, or in any way have a voice in the selection of a Representative. According to the uniform rule adopted by the committee and sustained by the House this has failed, in any just sense, to be the election of a Representative from the Second district in Virginia. The committee, therefore, report adversely upon the right of either claimant to the seat.

Therefore the committee concluded that neither Mr. Wing nor Mr. McCloud was entitled to the seat.

On February 14,[1] in the debate, it was stated that the testimony of Governor Pierpont had been taken since the report was written, and it appeared that the alteration in the writs had been made by military officers.

The House, without division, agreed to the report of the committee.[2]

369. The North Carolina election case of Jennings Pigott in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

In time of civil war an election participated in by a small number of loyal voters was held invalid, more than two-thirds of the district being unable to participate.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to irregular credentials referring to a district notoriously under duress of civil war.

A mere sojourner in a State was held not to be qualified as an inhabitant to represent a district in Congress.

On January 15, 1863,[1] the credentials of Jennings Pigott, claiming to have been elected to the House from the Second district of North Carolina, were presented and the suggestion was made that Mr. Pigott be sworn in. But the House referred the credentials to the Committee on Elections, and the oath was not administered.

On February 14,[2] the committee reported, finding that Mr. Pigott claimed to have been elected January 1, 1863, by virtue of a proclamation issued by Edward Stanley, military governor of North Carolina. The committee do not consider the legality of that action, or, in fact, of any of the steps taken in pursuance of that proclamation. They consider only (a) the numbers of loyal voters participating in the election, and (b) the qualifications of the claimant.

As to the election, the committee find that the whole number of votes cast was 864, of which Mr. Pigott received 595. There was voting in only three of the eleven counties composing the district, and in one of the three there was voting in only one precinct. And there were many voting places in the three counties where no polls were opened or notice taken of the election. Generally, the presence of armed enemies prevented the opening of these polls, and the remaining eight counties were almost entirely in the armed occupation of the enemy. Therefore the committee concluded that Mr. Pigott could > in no just sense be deemed the choice of the loyal voters of a district in which more than half of them had no opportunity to express that choice. Voters may voluntarily stay away from the polls, and they are thereby taken and deemed to have acquiesced in what was done by those who are present. But no such presumption rests upon those who are under duress; and it can never be known that they would not have made choice of another if the iron grasp of the rebellion had been unloosed.

As to the second point, whether Mr. Pigott was at the time of the election an "inhabitant" of North Carolina, within the meaning of the Constitution, the committee say:

> Mr. Pigott, although a native of North Carolina, had resided in the city of Washington for the last ten or eleven years, owned real estate here, dwelt with his family in his own house here, and had on more than one occasion voted here for municipal officers. After Mr. Stanly was appointed military governor of North Carolina, Mr. Pigott was appointed his private secretary, and, renting his house in Washington, went to North Carolina in that capacity, and had remained there as such private secretary two or three months when this election took place. He had done nothing since his return to the State to indicate a permanency of abode there beyond what is here stated. The committee are of opinion that to be an inhabitant within the meaning of this section of the Constitution, if it does not mean resident or citizen, certainly means more than sojourner, which is all that can be claimed for Mr. Pigott.

[2] House Report No. 41; 1 Bartlett, p. 463; Rowell's Digest, p. 184.

In the case of John Bailey (Contested election cases, 411), who was elected a Representative from Massachusetts while a clerk in one of the Departments in Washington, where he had been for six years, although a native of Massachusetts, it was decided that he had ceased to be an inhabitant of Massachusetts within the meaning of the Constitution. And the able report of the committee in that case, adopted by the House, defines the word inhabitant in this connection to be "a bona fide member of the State, subject to all the requisitions of its laws and entitled to all the privileges and advantages which they confer." In the opinion of the committee the sojourn of Mr. Pigott in North Carolina, for the temporary and transient purpose of being private secretary to a military governor, was not an inhabitancy within this definition.

Therefore the committee reported that Mr. Pigott was not entitled to the seat.

On February 23[1] the report was considered in the House. A proposition was made to amend by adopting a substitute, reciting that the loyal people of the district, having done their best to secure representation, should not be deprived of their rights because of the act of disloyal persons; that the acts of the disloyal had devolved the responsibilities of citizenship on the loyal; that the Constitution guaranteed to every State a republican form of government and equal representation in Congress; that the payment of taxes was reciprocal with the right of representation; that protection of citizens in their right of voting was the duty of the Government; and therefore that the loss of that right by loyal citizens because of invasion of the disloyal was a misfortune and not a fault; that laws prescribing the time, mode, and manner of holding elections were merely directory; and finally that, in accordance with these principles, Mr. Pigott was entitled to the seat.

This amendment was disagreed to[2] without division; and then the report of the committee was agreed to. So Mr. Pigott was not admitted to the seat.

370. The Tennessee election case of John B. Rodgers in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House declined to seat a claimant voted for in a district established by an insurgent authority and at an election called by that authority.

Instance of a claim for a seat presented by a memorial.

On January 19, 1863,[3] the memorial of John B. Rodgers, claiming a seat in the House from Tennessee, was presented and referred to the Committee of Elections, no suggestion being made that Mr. Rodgers should be sworn in.

On February 9[4] the committee reported as follows:

That Mr. Rodgers claims to have been elected to this House in November, 1861, from a district in Tennessee, made up in part of the counties embraced in the district now represented by Mr. Maynard (the Second) and in part of counties embraced in the district now represented by Mr. Clements (the Fourth). These gentlemen were elected in August, 1861, and subsequently to their election, the committee are informed by Mr. Rodgers that the State was redistricted by the rebel legislature for the so-called Confederate congress, and an election in these new districts was held for the Confederate congress in November following. It is claimed by Mr. Rodgers that at this election votes were cast for him as a Representative to this Congress; and it is by virtue of these votes, that he now claims a seat. All the evidence submitted by Mr. Rodgers in support of his claim accompanies this report. The committee have found no foundation for the claim, and, referring the House to the accompanying papers, do not deem further comment necessary. They accordingly report the following resolution:

Resolved, That John B. Rodgers is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

The House, on February 14,[1] agreed to the resolution without division.

371. The Virginia election case of Christopher L. Grafflin in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House considered invalid an election informally held wherein all but a fraction of the voters were prevented by civil war from participating.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to credentials regular in form but referring to a district notoriously under duress of civil war.

On January 23, 1863,[2] the credentials of Christopher L. Grafflin, claiming to be elected as Representative from the Eighth Congressional district of Virginia, were presented to the House and the motion was made that he be permitted to take the oath. The credentials were signed by Governor Pierpont and under the seal of the State.

The House did not permit Mr. Grafflin to take the oath, but referred the credentials to the Committee of Elections.

On February 23 [3] the committee reported as follows:

Writs of election were issued by the governor of the Commonwealth, bearing date the 13th of December, 1862, ordering an election of Representative in this district on the 31st of said December. These writs were placed in the hands of Mr. O. D. Downey, who was instructed to visit the district and determine, from actual observation, whether the district was in a condition to hold an election at the time fixed in the writ; and if, from the presence of rebels or other causes connected with the war, he should deem an election at that time impracticable or unsafe, to appoint such other day as, in his judgment, would be, under all the circumstances, most suitable and proper. On the arrival of Mr. Downey in the district he found the condition of the people so unsettled (a strong force of the enemy occupying several of the counties, and in the immediate neighborhood of others, threatening those desirous of exercising the elective franchise) that he deemed an election upon the day fixed in the writ wholly impracticable. He accordingly fixed upon the 5th of January, 1863, as the time for holding this election. At that time there were cast in the county of Morgan 158 votes for Mr. Grafflin and 58 for Joseph S. Wheat; in the county of Berkeley 115 votes for Mr. Grafflin; and in the county of Hampshire 69 votes for Mr. Grafflin and 2 votes for Mr. Wheat; 342 votes in all for Mr. Grafflin and 60 votes for Mr. Wheat—total of 402 votes. No votes were cast in any other county, and in but two precincts in Hampshire and one in Berkeley. In the counties of Frederick, Page, Warren, Clarke, Loudoun, and Jefferson, six out of the nine composing the district, there were no votes cast. Of some of these counties the rebels had armed occupation, and into others guerrilla bands were constantly making incursions, filling the people with terror, and threatening with imprisonment all who should participate in this election. To open the polls under such circumstances in these counties would have been worse than a farce; it would have been an invitation to the rebels to visit with violence the peaceful and loyal citizens so situated that our forces could not protect them.

This case comes within the precedent established in the recent case of Lewis McKenzie,[4] claiming a seat as a Representative from the Seventh district in Virginia by virtue of an election precisely similar to this. The laws of Virginia require the governor to fix in his writ the time for holding an election to fill a vacancy, and nowhere authorize him to delegate that power to another.

[4] See Section 372.

The election itself, had the day upon which it was held been authorized by law, like that in the case of McKenzie, already alluded to, was not a general election in the whole district, but only a partial and imperfect one, in which much the largest portion of the voters of the district took no part and had no opportunity to take part. No notices were served and no polls opened; and, if there had been, no voter could, with safety to his property, his liberty, or his life, have voted in much the largest portion of the district. The committee regret that they can not find any ground for pronouncing this an election in any just sense of that term. After a careful revision of the decision to which they arrived in the case of McKenzie, already stated, which was sustained by the House, they see no occasion to question its correctness, and they therefore report the accompanying resolution and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That Christopher L. Grafflin is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the Eighth Congressional district of Virginia.

On March 3 [1] the resolution proposed by the committee was agreed to without division.

372. The Virginia election case of Lewis McKenzie, in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House declined to hold valid an election informally held and, because of civil war, participated in by only a small fraction of the voters of the district.

On January 29, 1863,[2] the credentials of Lewis McKenzie as Representative-elect from the Seventh Congressional district of Virginia, were presented to the House and referred to the Committee of Elections, no motion being made that the oath be administered to Mr. McKenzie. The credentials were in the form of a statement of the votes cast in two counties, no returns, being received from eight counties, and were signed by "Jefferson Tacey, Clerk."

On February 9 [3] the committee reported, showing the following facts and conclusions:

TO THOMAS J. EDLEN,

Special Commissioner for Alexandria County:

Whereas the voters of the Seventh (7th) Congressional district of Virginia, composed of the counties of Alexandria, Spottsylvania, Fairfax, Fauquier, Prince William, Rappahannock, Culpeper, Stafford, Orange, and King George, failed to elect a Representative to the Thirty-seventh (37th) Congress of the United States on the 23d of May, 1861, you are hereby required, having first taken the oath or affirmation prescribed by existing laws, to hold an election to supply the vacancy aforesaid, at the several places of voting in Alexandria County, on Wednesday, the 31st day of December, 1862, or such other day as you may appoint, and of which you shall give due notice; and full authority is hereby conferred on you to do and provide whatever may be necessary for the purpose.

Given under my hand and the less seal of the Commonwealth, at the city of Wheeling, this thirteenth day of December, 1862, and in the eighty-seventh year of the Commonwealth.

F. H. PIERPOINT.

By the Governor:

L. A. HAGANS, Secretary of the Commonwealth.

These writs ordered an election upon the 31st day of December, 1862, "or such other day as you may appoint." They were not delivered in the district till the evening of the 21st of December. The statutes of Virginia (Code, ch. 7, sec. 17) require "each officer to whom a writ of election is directed shall, at least ten days before such election, give notice thereof, and of the time of the election, by advertisement, at each place of voting in his county or corporation." It became an impossibility to give the required notice for the 31st after the receipt of these writs, on the night of the 21st. Accordingly, the person to whom the writ for Alexandria County was directed, and the person to whom that for Fairfax County was directed, met on a subsequent day and fixed upon the 15th of January for the election, and gave the notices in their respective counties accordingly. The only authority for this alteration of the time is in the writ itself, as follows: "or such other day as you may appoint." No authority of law for giving any such power to the commissioners was shown or claimed before the committee; on the contrary, the statutes of Virginia (Code, ch. 7, sec. 16) expressly declares that the writ "shall prescribe the day of election to be the same throughout the district." The committee are of opinion that this power, thus fixed by law in the governor, can not be by him delegated to anyone else, and for this reason the election held on the 15th of January was without any sanction of law. If it were possible that this power could be delegated, still the committee find that the day was agreed upon by the commissioner of Alexandria and of Fairfax counties alone, without regard to those in the seven other counties composing the district. The law is imperative that the day shall be the same throughout the district; yet if the commissioners in any two of the counties can fix upon a day, the same may be done by any other two, and the utmost confusion would be certain to ensue. The committee were unable to sanction any such proceeding.

[1] Journal, p. 580; Globe, p. 1540.

[2] Third session Thirty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 297; Globe, p. 602.

[3] House Report, No. 33; 1 Bartlett, p. 460; Rowell's Digest, p. 183.

The committee further show that eight days after the election the legislature of Virginia passed an act providing:

An Act providing for the return of the special election for a Representative in the Seventh Congressional district, held on the 15th day of January, 1863. Passed January 23, 1863.

Be it enacted by the general assembly, That the clerk of the county court, authorized by law to make returns of the elections held on the 15th day of January, 1863, for a Representative in Congress for the Seventh district, be, and is hereby, authorized and required to ascertain the result and grant certificates therefor at any time within the thirty days allowed therefor.

2. This act shall be in force from its passage.

The claimant contended that this legislation ratified and confirmed the action of the two commissioners in fixing the day of the election. But the committee concluded that the act referred wholly to the making of the return, and that it was beyond the power of the legislature to ratify or confirm an election held without authority of law.

The committee also went further and inquired into the character of the election itself. It appeared that there was no election in seven out of nine counties; that in the seven counties an election would have been impossible because of the presence of the armed belligerents; and that the total vote cast was only 554, as compared with 9,273 cast in the Congressional election of 1857. However loyal the people of the district might be, they had had no opportunity to testify that loyalty.

The committee therefore reported that Mr. McKenzie was not entitled to the seat.

On February 17,[1] when the report was considered, a motion was made to amend the resolution of the committee so it should declare Mr. McKenzie entitled to the seat. This amendment was disagreed to without division.

The report of the committee was then agreed to.

373. The Tennessee election case of Alvin Hawkins, in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House declined to hold valid an election which was entirely broken up by contending armies, so that only fragmentary and informal returns could be obtained.

[1] Journal, pp. 413, 414; Globe, p. 1036.

On February 11, 1863,[1] the credentials of Mr. Alvin Hawkins, claiming a seat from the Ninth Congressional district of Tennessee, were presented to the House and referred. No suggestion was made that Mr. Hawkins should be sworn in on his prima facie showing. The credentials were dated at "Headquarters, District of Jackson, Eighteenth Army Corps, Department of Tennessee," distinguished as "Special Orders, No. 29," and was signed by "Jere C. Sullivan, Brigadier-General Commanding in District of Jackson." The credentials gave the vote cast, and further stated that "forces of the so-called 'Confederate States' were at various places within said district on said day of said election preventing the people from voting."

On February 28,[2] the Committee on Elections reported the following state of facts: The election was held on December 29, 1862, pursuant to writs of election issued by Andrew Johnson, military governor of Tennessee. It appears that a convention of the people of the district had appointed December 13, 1862, as a time for election; but the appearance of the proclamation and writs of Governor Johnson ordering the election on the 29th so interfered with this election that claimant made it no part of his reliance in his claim to the seat. The election on the 29th was almost entirely broken up by the presence of contending armies in the district. Indeed, General Hurlbut, commanding the Government forces, issued a military order postponing the election. One sheriff was seized by the enemy and his writs of election were destroyed. Mr. Hawkins was himself driven from the district. On his return he gathered up such returns as he could, and procured the general order referred to as his credentials to accompany them.

In relation to this condition of affairs, the committee conclude:

> The committee have struggled to find some way to give effect to this effort to secure representation; but they have not been able to bring it within any of the rules adopted by the House in determining the election cases which are analogous to this. How far the election was conducted at the polls in conformity to the law of Tennessee it has been impossible to ascertain. No one would expect to find or should require rigid conformity under the peculiarly trying circumstances under which this attempt was made. But the evidence of any votes at all will be seen, by a reference to the accompanying papers, to be of the most vague, uncertain, and unsatisfactory character. The committee have but to call attention to one or two of these papers. An unofficial person, A. G. Shrewsbury, certifies that he has seen the return of votes in Henderson County, and that "there were over 700 votes polled in that county, over 700 of which were for Alvin Hawkins, and the balance, numbering some 20 or 30, were scattering, and for other persons." This comes, so far as appears, from a private citizen, and has not even the sanction of an affidavit. In no sense can it be taken as evidence. Of a similar character is what purports to be a return from Chestnut Bluff, a precinct in Dyer County, to which the committee call attention. These papers are the bases of the certificate of General Sullivan. The law requires all the returns to be made to the governor, and he is to make the certificate. It was impossible for this to be done, and Governor Johnson has furnished nothing. The committee are of opinion that it would be a very unsafe precedent, sure to be fruitful of mischief, to take, as evidence of an election, the papers here presented. Mr. Hawkins himself was driven from the district and has no personal knowledge of the facts. He has letters from highly respectable citizens corroborating, to some extent, these papers; and while, as a matter of fact, the House may not doubt that these transactions have taken place, yet it would be most dangerous to take, as legal proof of an election, the papers here presented.
> Although the evidence, as far as it goes, tends to show that 1,900 votes were cast, nearly all for Mr. Hawkins, yet it also appears that a very small part of the district participated in this election.

[1] Third session Thirty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 373; Globe, pp. 887, 888.

[2] House report No. 46; 1 Bartlett, p. 466; Rowell's Digest, p. 184.

Some parts had already voted on the 13th; some had postponed still further the day of election, under the military order of General Hurlburt, but more was at the very moment under the control and occupation of contending armies in battle array, in which an election was an impossibility. Under these circumstances, if it be taken as satisfactorily shown that 1,900 votes were polled, that fact must be taken along with the other that they were polled in a very small part of the district, and that much the greater portion of it, for the reasons stated, had no part or lot in the matter. The district at the last election for representative cast 18,000 votes.

The committee are again compelled to come to the same conclusion they have reluctantly arrived at in other cases, adverse to the right of Mr. Hawkins to a seat in this House, upon the state of facts presented to them and which they herewith report. They accordingly recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That Alvin Hawkins is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the Ninth district in Tennessee.

On March 3[1] the House, without division, agreed to the report of the committee, adopting the resolution.

374. The Virginia election case of McKenzie v. Kitchen, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The House declined to hold valid an election participated in by a little less than half the voters of a district divided between contending armies.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to credentials in the form prescribed by a government already suspended and referring to a district distracted by war.

The Clerk declined to enroll persons bearing credentials in form prescribed by a State government already suspended.

On December 7, 1863,[2] at the time of the organization of the House, after the roll of Members-elect had been called by the Clerk, the following resolution was offered:

Resolved, That the names of L. M. Chandler, Joseph Segar, and B. M. Kitchen be placed on the roll as Representatives from the State of Virginia.

These claimants presented credentials made out in form prescribed by an act of "the general assembly of Virginia, held December 2, 1861, at the city of Wheeling." That legislature, it was urged, had been recognized by the National Government; but since that date the State of West Virginia had been formed. The Clerk had not put on the roll the names of the three gentlemen, not deeming the credentials sufficient.

The House, by a vote of yeas 100, nays 73, laid on the table the resolution.

On December 9,[3] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, presented the credentials of Messrs. Segar and Kitchen, which were referred to the Committee on Elections without any motion that the gentlemen be sworn in.

On February 8, 1864,[4] the Committee on Elections reported both on the right of Mr. Kitchen and on a contest which had been made against his claim to the seat by Lewis McKenzie.

As between Mr. Kitchen and Mr. McKenzie the election was determined by the vote of Berkeley County, which the contestant claimed should be included in the State of West Virginia, and therefore formed no part of the district as constituted under the laws of the United States and Virginia. The committee found, as a matter of fact under the law, that, as Congress had never assented to the transfer, Berkeley County belonged to Virginia and that its vote was properly counted.

The contestant further alleged that the commissioners of election in Berkeley County certified the result directly to the clerk of Alexandria County, instead of certifying to the clerk of Berkeley County, who was required by the law to record it in a book and send a certified copy of it to the clerk of Alexandria County. The committee unanimously agreed on the following conclusion:

It was not contended that any fraud was committed or that the true result in Berkeley was not here certified, and therefore the committee were of opinion that the votes should be counted. This determines the result as to Mr. McKenzie. If these votes were counted, he did not receive a plurality and would not, in any event, be entitled to the seat.

On February 26 [1] a resolution declaring Mr. McKenzie, the contestant, not entitled to the seat was, after debate, agreed to without division.

The Committee on Elections did not, however, allow the case to rest with the determination of the rights of the contestant. They go into the consideration of the State of the district and its capability for electing a Representative.

The committee found some difficulty in coming to a decision upon this question; but the conclusion to which they have arrived, after a careful consideration, they now submit to the House.

The case comes so near to what seems to be the dividing line, as established by the precedents of the last House in similar cases, and the judgment of this committee in the case of Joseph Segar, heretofore reported to the House, that the difficulty lies in determining upon which side of that line it falls.

It will be seen that between that part of the district where polls could be and were opened, and the part held by the enemy, there is very nearly an equal division, whether it be divided by territorial limits, by the aggregate of population, the entire free population, or the white male population. In each division the part within the occupation and control of the enemy is a trifle the greatest, but it may be treated practically as about an equal division of the district between the rebels and the Union forces. But it should not be overlooked that, while that portion under rebel control is held so by force of arms and the presence of rebel bayonets, it is equally true that the remainder of the district is, as yet, within our lines and under our sway only by a like force of arms and presence of loyal troops. If the Union forces were withdrawn from any portion of the district, it would be immediately overrun by rebel armies. Practically, the Seventh Congressional district of Virginia, the scene of some of the fiercest and bloodiest conflicts of arms in the whole war, is still a battle ground.

The present condition of that portion of it within the Union lines little fits it for the free exercise of the elective franchise. Martial law and military discipline, if not incompatible with, are certainly, at best, poor instrumentalities for ascertaining the choice of freemen. Off against this portion of the district thus selected, and thus held, must be set quite as large if not a larger portion in territory, in population, or in voters, which all the time has been held bound in the chains of an armed enemy, overrun with a hostile army, and ground into the dust by the heel of a usurped power.

The committee have, in this state of the facts, come to the conclusion that this case comes within the precedents of the last Congress, which have been adopted by the committee in the case from the First district of Virginia, already reported to the House. They cannot satisfy themselves that there has been such a freedom of election in this district as to warrant the conclusion that Mr. Kitchen is the choice of the loyal voters of the whole district. However near to a majority of such voters those came who participated in this election, yet it appears to the committee that a greater portion failed to participate in it for the reason that they were held under the power of the rebel army, and therefore by no method can it be shown that the claimant is the choice of the Union voters of the whole district. It may not be improper to call attention to the fact that while the whole number of votes cast was 2,059, only 962 of these were cast for Mr. Kitchen; and that of those, 730 were cast in the county of Berkeley, where Mr. Kitchen now resides, a county which, on the same day that these votes were cast, voted also unanimously to attach itself to West Virginia, and which has, so far as the legislature of both States can effect it, been made a part of the new State, and separated from this district altogether. Although, for reasons already stated, this can have no legal effect upon the vote to its exclusion, yet it is a circumstance which, if it can have any effect, certainly will not lead to the conclusion that Mr. Kitchen would have been the choice of the other counties whose voters were not permitted to participate at all in the election.

Therefore the committee found that Mr. Kitchen was not entitled to the seat. One of the committee filed minority views.

This report was debated on February 26[1] and on April 16,[2] the length of the debate as well as the nature showing that the case was considered of great importance.

A motion to amend the resolution proposed by the committee so as to declare Mr. Kitchen entitled to the seat was disagreed to without division. Then, also without division, the resolution was agreed to As reported by the committee.

375. The Virginia election cases of Chandler and Segar, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

An election by one-third of the voters of a district was held invalid when the presence of an armed enemy prevented the remainder from expressing their wishes.

The holder of credentials in due form, whose prima facie title is not contested, may not take the seat if a question exists as to the competency of the constituency.

On December 7, 1863,[3] at the organization of the House, after the Clerk had called the roll of Members-elect, the credentials of L. M. Chandler, claiming a seat as a Member from Virginia, were presented, and a resolution was offered to provide for putting the name of Mr. Chandler, with the names of two other gentlemen, B. M. Kitchen and Joseph Segar, also claiming seats from Virginia, on the roll of Members-elect. This resolution was laid on the table—yeas 100, nays 73.[4]

The cases having been referred to the Committee on Elections, that committee reported on Mr. Chandler's case on April 25, 1864,[5] and on Mr. Segar's case on January 25, 1864.[6] The report shows that in the Second district of Virginia, which was composed of eleven counties, polls were opened in nine places in Norfolk County, Portsmouth, and Norfolk, and the whole number of votes cast was 779, of which Mr. Chandler received 778. No polls were opened in any other places in the district, because the other counties except Norfolk were so under control of hostile forces that no man could go to the polls in safety. By the census of 1860 Norfolk County (including Norfolk city and Portsmouth) had 36,227 population out of 156,626 in the whole district. The committee conceived that this case was governed by the same principles as were set forth in the report on

Mr. Segar's claim, and therefore reported a resolution that Mr. Chandler was not entitled to the seat.

Mr. Segar claimed to have been elected in the First district of Virginia, composed of twenty counties, receiving about 1,300 votes out of 1,667 cast in four counties. The remainder of the district was so occupied by hostile forces that polls could not be opened. The committee estimated that while 1,667 votes were cast, there were about 5,100 loyal men in the district who did not vote. The committee therefore conclude:

It is true that the legality of an election does not necessarily depend upon the relative number of loyal voters who attend the polls and of those who stay away. If all are at liberty to vote, those who stay away must always be considered as acquiescing in the action of those who do not. But acquiescence implies liberty to protest. If one stays away because he could not go, it is absurd to say that he stays away because he acquiesces. When a man is forcibly silent because his mouth is stopped, nothing can be taken against him for not speaking. If, then, 5,000 Union men have been kept from the polls by the arms of the rebels, it can not be said that they acquiesce in the choice made by 1,700 who were at liberty to go. It can not be known, therefore, by the proceedings on election day, that Mr. Segar was the choice of the legal voters of the district. He might have been, and he might not have been. The committee have no evidence that, had all been permitted to vote, he would not have been such choice, nor have they that he would. Upon this point it is impossible to know, for less than one-fourth of the voters were permitted to speak.

The question is, upon this state of facts presented, whether, upon any known principle or precedent, Mr. Segar can be admitted to this seat as the legally chosen representative of this district. All principle seems against it. By no process of reasoning can the committee infer from what was done that Mr. Segar is the choice of the district; and it is upon no other base that a right to, a seat here can at any time rest. And precedent is equally against it. In the reported cases during the last Congress the Committee of Elections and the House had occasion frequently to pass upon this very question. And the principles there laid down by the committee, and sustained in every instance by the House, both when reporting in favor of a right to the seat, as in the cases of Clements, from Tennessee, and Flanders and Hahn, from Louisiana, and when reporting adversely, as in the cases of Upton, Segar, and McKenzie, from Virginia, and Hawkins, from Tennessee, govern this case. Each of these cases was determined upon the facts peculiar to the case. But in them all it was recognized as a rule that where the vote actually polled was such a minority of the whole vote that it could not be determined that the person selected by that minority was the choice of the whole district, and the absent majority were not voluntarily staying away from the polls, but were kept away by force, then no such selection thus made could be treated as an election.

Therefore the committee concluded that Mr. Segar was not entitled to the seat.

They also, in their report, settled a preliminary question, which they state as follows:

The election was held on the fourth Thursday of May, 1863, and a certificate of election, in substantial conformity with the laws of Virginia as amended by the act of January 31, 1862 (Session Laws, 1861, chap. 44, p. 40), was furnished Mr. Segar by the officer required by that statute to certify an election of Representative in Congress. This certificate accompanies this report. Mr. Segar claimed that having presented a certificate in conformity to the laws of Virginia, he is now entitled to be sworn in, and to occupy the seat as a Representative till some one else appears showing a better title to it. But the committee were of opinion that they should inquire into and report the facts concerning this election and their conclusion thereon.

In debate Mr. Segar stated [1] that the Clerk originally put his name on the list of Members-elect, but erased it before the Congress assembled.

[1] Globe, p. 2312.

On May 17 the cases of Messrs. Chandler and Segar were, by unanimous consent, debated together,[1] as they involved the same principles.

The question was first taken on the resolution declaring Mr. Segar not entitled to the seat, and the House agreed to it, yeas 94, nays 23. The resolution declaring Mr. Chandler not entitled to the seat was then agreed to without division.[2]

376. The Louisiana election case of A. P. Field, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The House declined to recognize an informal election, participated in by a mere fraction of the voters, in a district entirely under military domination.

The House denied prima facie title to a person enrolled by the Clerk on credentials signed by a mere claimant to the governorship in a State disrupted by civil war.

On December 7, 1863,[3] at the time of the organization of the House, the name of Mr. A. P. Field was called among those on the Clerk's roll of Members-elect, and Mr. Field voted for Speaker. When the Members were sworn, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, objected to the administration of the oath to Mr. Field, and on his motion the credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections, and the administering of the oath was deferred until after the report of the committee.

The credentials of Mr. Field are thus described by the committee in their report [4] on the final right to the seat:

> That no undue weight may be given to the credentials of Mr. Field, purporting to come from the government of the State, being signed "J. L. Riddell, governor of the State of Louisiana," it is proper that the facts elicited before the committee bearing upon the authenticity of this certificate should be laid before the House.
> Mr. Riddell claims to have been elected governor at the same time with the alleged election of Mr. Field. There were but few votes cast for him, 500 or 600, in the parishes about New Orleans which are joined with that city in the First and Second Congressional districts under the old apportionment.
> The whole election, like that of Mr. Field, was under the auspices of a committee, to whom the votes were returned, and he has himself no personal knowledge of the number of votes cast for himself or for Mr. Field. That he received in all the number of votes already stated is only the best opinion he could form upon the subject. All voting for governor, as well as Representative in Congress, in New Orleans, was forbidden by the military governor. The committee express no further opinion here upon the propriety of such conduct on his part, but only state the fact. Mr. Riddell claims to have been elected, and qualified as governor by taking the oath of office before a justice of the peace in New Orleans. The term of office to which Mr. Riddell claims to have been elected did not, according to the laws of the State, commence till the 1st of January, 1864. It is impossible to understand by what process of reasoning this Mr. Riddell has come to the conclusion that he was governor of the State of Louisiana on the 20th day of November, 1863, the day this certificate bears date.
> It was also stated by him that the certificate in question was made out in this city upon information received by him from others, which he believed to be true, but of the truth of which he had no personal knowledge.

On the question as to the final right of Mr. Field to the seat, the Committee on Elections found that the alleged election had been held without authority of law, and that there was, moreover, no constituency.[5]

[4] House Report No. 8.

[5] 1 Barlett, p. 580; Rowell's Digest, p. 197.

Mr. Field claimed to have been elected November 2, 1863, the day prescribed, from the law of the State, in the "First Congressional district" under an apportionment next preceding the then existing one. The existing apportionment required five districts instead of the four required by the preceding apportionment; and the law of Congress of July 14, 1862, required the five Members to be elected from "districts composed of contiguous territory equal in number to the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled in the Congress for which said election is held." Thus it was necessary for the State to be divided into five instead of four districts before an election could be held. But such division of the State had not been made, and therefore the election of Mr. Field from one of the old four districts was not in accordance with law.

As to the constituency on which Mr. Field relied, the committee say:

> The election purports to have been held in the First Congressional district of Louisiana under the old apportionment. That district is composed of the two parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard, containing, in 1860, only 12,566 inhabitants, of whom only 2,563 were male whites, and a large portion of the city of New Orleans, containing, in 1862, when this district was formed, about the balance of the then apportionment of 93,000, and in 1860, of course, a much larger number.
> But no election was held on the 2d day of November in any part of this district but the two parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard.
> The precise number of votes actually cast for Mr. Field in these two parishes the committee have not been able to ascertain. Mr. Field had before the committee returns from two or three precincts in St. Bernard, which were made to a committee appointed to aid in conducting the election, and amounting to 156 votes, and he believed, though he had no personal knowledge of the fact, that as many more votes were cast for him in Plaquemines. But in all that part of the district made up of the city of New Orleans, comprising almost the entire district—certainly more than nineteen-twentieths of the inhabitants—there was no election held and no opportunity given for an elector to express his choice. The election, so far as the city of New Orleans was concerned, was suppressed by orders emanating directly from the military governor of the State, Brigadier-General Shepley. This suppression was effectual, so that not a vote was cast in the city, and the only constituency Mr. Field has was the small number of votes already stated from the very small fraction of the district situated outside the city limits.

Therefore the committee were unanimous in finding no grounds for treating this as an election and reported a resolution declaring Mr. Field not entitled to the seat.

The report was debated in the House on January 29 and February 9,[1] and on the latter date the resolution of the committee was agreed to—ayes 85, noes 48.[2]

377. The Missouri election cases of Bruce v. Loan, Birch v. King, and Price v. McClurg in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The House, overruling its committee, declined to declare invalid an election because of intimidation in certain counties by State troops on duty by order of the governor.

The House declined, on proof of intimidation at 8 precincts out of 150, to find general intimidation sufficient to render invalid an election.

On April 8, 1864,[3] the Committee on Elections reported in the case of Bruce v. Loan, of Missouri.

[2] Journal, p. 242; Globe, p. 547.

[3] First session Thirty-eighth Congress, Report No. 44.

The question involved in this election was whether or not there had been a valid election in the district.

The election in question, held on November 4, 1862, was the first attempted to be held in the State since the commencement of the civil war. From August, 1861, until the summer of 1862 the affairs of the State had been conducted by a provisional government. On June 10, 1862, a convention of the people of the State adopted an ordinance defining the qualification of voters and civil officers in the State and specifying a form of oath of loyalty, which was the new qualification provided, in addition to the old qualifications of the State constitution.

The civil commotion had been so great in the State that there were serious apprehensions of disturbances on the day of election. Therefore the adjutant-general of the State, on October 23, issued a general order stating that the test oath of loyalty was a sufficient safeguard against the participation of disloyal persons in the election, and therefore warning the enrolled militia, who as citizens would generally be at the voting places, that they should keep order at the polls, prevent intimidation of qualified voters, themselves abstain from interference, and, finally, that in case of disturbance beyond the power of the civil authorities to quell any commissioned officer present should, "at the request of any judge, sheriff, or justice of the peace," use the necessary military force to suppress it.

On November I another general order cautioned the enrolled militia against constituting themselves judges of election and warned them to "carefully abstain from all acts calculated to interfere with the freedom of election."

The Seventh Congressional district consisted of fifteen counties. It was admitted that the election was fair in seven counties, but the contestant, in his grounds of contest, asserted the following:

First. For interference by portions of the armed militia of the State of Missouri with the polls, and the tearing up of poll books, and the interference with voters at the polls by your friends, whereby persons desiring to vote for me were prevented and intimidated from voting and rudely driven from the polls; and by thus preventing persons who would have voted for me I lost, in the counties named below, the number of votes set opposite each county:

Buchanan County	800
Andrew County	400
Holt County	400
Atchison County	400
Nodaway County	300
Dekalb County	100
Daviess County	200
Livingston County	600
Making a total of	3,200

which would have elected me over you, and made my entire vote 7,754.

Second. Improper interference and improper conduct of officers of the election in excluding qualified voters from voting for me in the counties named in reason first.

Third. Intimidation on the part of portions of the militia of the State of Missouri and other armed soldiery, by threats intimidating voters from attending the election, who would have voted for me had they attended.

Fourth. Interference of portions of the militia of Missouri by forcibly driving voters from the polls who had tickets in their hands ready to vote for me.

Fifth. Interference of portions of the militia of Missouri, in standing at voting places, with muskets in their hands, and demanding the tickets of voters; and when shown with my name on them, the tickets were torn up by your friends, and the parties told that they could not vote that ticket; and persons who were legal voters were thus prevented from voting for me.

The whole number of votes returned as cast at the election was 13,803, of which Mr. Loan, the sitting Member, was credited with 6,582; Mr. Bruce with 4,554; Mr. H. B. Brand with 2,665, and 2 scattering. Thus the sitting Member's majority over contestant was 2,028 votes.

It appeared that at the time of the election the sitting Member was a brigadier-general, and had shortly before the election ceased to be in command of the enrolled militia in the Seventh Congressional district, although he still held such official position elsewhere. Many of the candidates for State offices associated with him on the ticket were militia officers then in command. Neither the contestant nor any of the persons associated with him on the ticket were connected officially with the militia.

After examining the case the Committee on Elections divided, a bare majority concluding that neither contestant nor sitting Member were entitled to the seat, since military interference had invalidated the election; while the minority concluded that the evidence did not show sufficient effects of whatever disturbance there may have been to overcome the plurality of the sitting Member.

The decision of the case, both in the Committee and the House, turned on the examination of the evidence as to the alleged intimidation and violence in the several counties.

Buchanan County: The only testimony was as to the election in St. Joseph, in the township of Washington. The sheriff of the county, who favored the sitting Member, found the polls guarded by militia at one precinct, and saw the ticket of a citizen torn up by a soldier and the citizen driven away. Those not favoring certain candidates seemed afraid to vote. What he saw at two other precincts convinced him that there could not be a free and fair election because of the actions of the militia. In one of the three precincts, as shown by other witnesses, bands of armed militiamen broke up the election and tore up the poll book. The majority of the Committee became convinced from the testimony and from comparison with the vote of other years that as many as 900 votes were lost to the contestant in the township because of the disturbance and intimidation. The minority, while not denying that there had been violence and intimidation, thought a deduction of 300 votes about what the testimony indicated, and urged that this, with the deductions in other counties, would not destroy the sitting Member's plurality. It appeared also that the military guard at the polls was asked for by contestant.

Andrew County: The testimony related only to the election precinct of Savannah. Here there was no militia guard at the polls, the local commanding officer having declined to furnish a guard unless called on by the civil officers. The witnesses testified to disturbance and intimidation, but had only estimates as to those deterred from voting for contestant. The minority of the committee did not consider that any considerable number of persons were intimidated at Savannah, although one witness had estimated the number as high as 200. The militia were present as citizens only. The majority of the committee considered the decrease in the total vote of the county as compared with the election of 1860 as of significance.

Livingston County: The testimony related only to Chillicothe precinct. There an officer with a squad of soldiers marched to the polls in the morning and arrested several voters against whose loyalty charges were made. Later the troops were ordered away by a telegram from the governor. The majority of the committee presented the comparison with the vote in the precinct and county two years previous, showing a considerable falling off. The minority of the committee found no evidence to show that any voters were kept from the polls by the military, the voting having gone on after the soldiers had been withdrawn. In the whole county the contestant received more than twice the number of votes received by the sitting Member.

Atchison County: In this county the testimony related to the precinct of Rockport only, where it was shown that the polls were guarded by armed militia, and where a witness testified that he heard of people who tried to vote being thrust from the polls. Witness also testified that he heard of interference at most of the other precincts of the county. Witness also testified that attempts to take depositions in this county for the purposes of the contest were prevented by intimidation, and that by such depositions a loss of about 300 votes for contestant was expected to be proved.

The majority of the committee make the comparison, showing a falling off in the vote of the county. The minority of the committee assail this witness for giving merely hearsay testimony, and call attention to the fact that he had been employed as counsel by contestant.

Dekalb County: The testimony related only to the precinct of Stewartsville. Several witnesses, including a constable who was on duty at the polls all day, testified to specific acts of intimidation by the enrolled militia, and certain witnesses testified that they were deterred from voting. The minority assailed this testimony as inadmissible because ex parte, and also from the fact that the testimony showed only estimates and opinions as to the number of votes kept from the poll by intimidation.

Holt and Nodaway counties: Contestant took no testimony in these counties, as sworn testimony was produced to show that it would not have been safe for contestant or his representatives to go into these counties.

Daviess County: Contestant included this county in his notice as one where there had been illegal interference with the freedom of election; but the majority of the committee, in their report, concede that this was one of the eight counties where the election was fair.

From their review of the conditions in the above named counties and from a comparison of the votes for the respective candidates in these counties and those where no interference was alleged, as well as from a comparison with the vote of two years previous, the majority concluded that the enrolled militia had "by threats, violence, and by various modes of intimidation so far interfered with the election as, in the opinion of the committee, to render the election a nullity." Therefore the majority reported resolutions declaring neither contestant nor sitting Member entitled to the seat.

The minority criticise the nature of the testimony as to a large extent hearsay, call attention to the fact that contestant offered testimony as to only eight precincts, while there must have been one hundred and fifty in the whole district. The presumption, in the absence of proof, must be that the election in the precincts not attacked by testimony were fair.

The minority also call attention to the fact that the aggregate vote of the district for Congressman was larger than that of any other Congressional district in the State at this election.

The minority cited the cases of Trigg v. Preston and Clements to show that the acts of "a few loyal State troops, acting under the orders of the State authorities in guarding the polls," should not be considered such acts as to invalidate the election. Therefore it was recommended that the House declare the sitting Member entitled to the seat.

The report was debated in the House at length on May 6, 9, and 10,[1] those sustaining the majority of the committee setting forth the general state of alarm and intimidation which the testimony tended to disclose.

The minority contended that when riotous interference or violence were set up, the law required rigorous proof that the result of the election had been affected by riotous interruption or obstruction; and also when restraint or intimidation were set up, proof was required that an organized system of unlawful restraint or intimidation existed or was acted upon to prevent the freedom of election and to secure the defeat of the contestant. And it was contended that such a state of things was not shown in this case.

On May 10[2] the House took a test vote on the resolution—

Resolved, That Benjamin F. Loan (the sitting Member) is not entitled to a seat in this House, etc.—

And there were yeas 59, nays 71.

The resolution declaring contestant not entitled to the seat was agreed to without division.

So the contention of the minority was sustained.[3]

378. The Kentucky election case of McHenry v. Yeaman in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The House sustained an election generally participated in by the voters, although the district was under martial law and the military power enforced the State requirements as to qualifications of voters.

On May 13, 1864,[4] the Committee on Elections reported on the case of McHenry v. Yeaman of Kentucky. The only question was whether there was a legal election in the Second Congressional district of that State, the contestant asking that the House would vacate the seat "and refer this election back to the people, or take such other action in the matter as may be deemed right and proper."

The main grounds of the contest were the issuance of certain military orders by officers commanding in the district; and the claim that the election was carried by fraud and force, and that test oaths were applied unknown to the laws of Kentucky.

[3] The case of Birch v. King, also from Missouri, involved the same principles, and the committee asked that it be discharged. This was done after debate. (Globe, pp. 2639–2650.) The action was also taken in the Missouri case of Price v. McClurg. (Journal, p. 787.)

[4] First session Thirty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 70; 1 Bartlett, p. 550; Rowell's Digest, p. 193.

By an act of March 11, 1862, the legislature of Kentucky had passed a law providing in its first section that any citizen of the State who had adhered to the cause of the so-called Confederate States "shall be deemed to have expatriated himself, and shall no longer be a citizen of Kentucky, nor shall he again be a citizen, except by permission of the legislature, by a general or special statute." Then the act further provided:

SEC. 2. That whenever a person attempts or is called on to exercise any of the constitutional or legal rights and privileges belonging only to citizens of Kentucky, he may be required to negative on oath the expatriation provided in the first section of this act, and upon his failure or refusal to do so shall not be permitted to exercise any such right or privilege.

On July 20, 1863, in view of the approaching election (in August, 1863, the election in question) the governor of the State issued a proclamation, enjoining "the strict observance and enforcement" of the above act, in order to preserve the purity of the elective franchise.

On July 28, 1863, Col. John W. Foster, commanding at Henderson, Ky., issued the following general order:

In order that the proclamation of the governor and the laws of the State of Kentucky may be observed and enforced, post commandants and officers of this command will see that the following regulations are strictly complied with at the approaching State election:

None but loyal citizens will act as officers of the election.

No one will be allowed to offer himself as a candidate for office, or be voted for at said election, who is not in all things loyal to the State and Federal governments and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

The judges of election will allow no one to vote at said election unless he is known to them to be an undoubtedly loyal citizen, or unless he shall first take the oath required by the laws of the State of Kentucky.

No disloyal man will offer himself as a candidate, or attempt to vote, except for treasonable purposes; and all such efforts will be summarily suppressed by the military authorities.

All necessary protection will be supplied and guaranteed at the polls to Union men by all the military force within this command.

Appended to this order was the following form of oath:

OATH TO BE TAKEN AT THE ELECTION.

I do solemnly swear that I have not been in the service of the so-called Confederate States in either a civil or military capacity, or in the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky; that I have not given any aid, assistance, or comfort to any person in arms against the United States; and that I have, in all things, demeaned myself as a loyal citizen since the beginning of the present rebellion. So help me God.

On July 30 a duplicate of this order was issued by Brigadier-General Shackelford, commanding at Russellville, Ky.

On July 31 Major-General Burnside, commanding the Department of the Ohio, issued a general order reciting that the State of Kentucky was invaded by a hostile force with the avowed purpose of keeping loyal voters from the polls and forcing the election of disloyal candidates on August 3, and declaring the State under martial law. The order disclaimed any intention of interfering with the proper expression of public opinion, and declared that all discretion in the conduct of the election would be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls, who would "be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support."

As part of the record was included a dispatch from General Burnside to General Halleck, dated August 3, 1863 (the day of the election), announcing that a hostile force, which had crossed the Kentucky River to assist the command of Morgan, was in full retreat.

The majority of the committee (which included all but one Member) declined to enter into a consideration of the question whether the military orders were or were not proper; but declared that they "were designed to carry out the law of Kentucky, and in no wise to interfere with the freedom of the elective franchise."

The majority go on to say that the only question was whether there was an election or not, there being no pretense of title on the part of the contestant. As a conclusive answer to the question whether Mr. Yeaman was the choice of the legal voters of the district, the committee give the official votes at preceding elections: In Presidential election of 1860 it was 15,236; in May, 1861, for delegates to border State convention, 13,328; in June, 1861, for Representative in Congress, 14,665; in August, 1863, for governor, 10,652. In August, 1863, Mr. Yeaman received 8,311 votes and Mr. McHenry 3,087. It was evident, therefore, that Mr. Yeaman received a majority of the whole voting population of the district, measured even by the standard of 1860. And it was in evidence that the district had contributed 5,714 men to the Army of the United States alone.

Therefore the majority of the committee recommended a resolution declaring Mr. Yeaman entitled to the seat.

The minority views, filed by Mr. D. W. Voorhees, of Indiana, on May 12, did not deny that the sitting Member received a large majority over the contestant, but denied that the election was "a free and equal election," such as the constitution of Kentucky guaranteed:

> Any election for a civil officer held under martial law, where the qualifications of voters are prescribed by military officers, is not such an election as the founders of this Government intended should be held under the Constitution which they framed, and should be declared void in all cases by the Congress of the Nation.

The minority views further present an analysis of the testimony to show intimidation of voters, the administering of various oaths as tests of loyalty, etc.

On May 27 and 30[1] the report was debated at length in the House. The supporters of the majority report argued that the sitting Member was manifestly the choice of the district. A few, while supporting the sitting Member on these grounds, condemned the act of the military authorities in proclaiming martial law.

On May 30[2] the resolution of the majority was agreed to by the House—yeas 95, nays 26; so Mr. Yeaman was confirmed in his seat.

Discussion of the powers of a military governor, and his status as a de facto executive.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to credentials signed by the military governor of a State lately in secession.

On December 19, 1862,[1] Mr. Benjamin F. Flanders appeared and presented credentials purporting to show his election to fill a vacancy in the office of Representative of the First Congressional district of Louisiana. These credentials were under the seal of the State and signed by "G. F. Shepley, military governor of Louisiana," and countersigned by "James F. Miller, acting secretary of state."

The request was made that the oath be administered to Mr. Flanders at once, but objection being made to the nature of the credentials they were referred to the Committee of Elections.

On December 22[2] Mr. Michael Hahn appeared with similar credentials for the Second district of Louisiana. The same objection being made, the credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections.

On February 3, 1863,[3] the committee reported on the two cases, as they involved the same principles. The regular elections for Members of the Thirty-seventh Congress should have been held in Louisiana, under the State law, on the first Monday of November, 1861. But the State was then in rebellion, and the governor neglected and refused to order the election. The reoccupation by the national armies of the portions of the State comprising the First and Second districts had been followed by the resumption of allegiance on the part of many citizens, the total number being over 60,000 up to October 21, 1862.

On November 14, 1862, the military governor of the State, George F. Shepley, issued a proclamation ordering an election for Members of Congress in the First and Second districts. This proclamation, over which the principal issue in this case forms, was as follows:

A PROCLAMATION.

BY BRIGADIER-GENERAL GEORGE F. SHEPLEY, MILITARY GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.

Whereas the State of Louisiana is now and has been without any Representatives in the Thirty-seventh Congress of the United States of America; and whereas a very large majority of the citizens of the First and Second Congressional districts in this State, by taking the oath of allegiance, have given evidence of their loyalty and obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States:

Now, therefore, I, George F. Shepley, military governor of the State of Louisiana, for the purpose of securing to the loyal electors in the parishes composing these two Congressional districts their appropriate and lawful representation in the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and of enabling them to avail themselves of the benefits secured by the proclamation of the President of the United States to the people of any State, or part of a State, who shall on the first day of February next be in good faith represented in the Congress of the United States by Members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State have participated, have seen fit to issue this my proclamation, appointing an election to be held on Wednesday, the third day of December next, to fill said vacancies in the Thirty-seventh Congress of the United States of America, in the following districts, namely:

The First Congressional district, composed of that part of the city of New Orleans heretofore known as municipality number one and municipality number three, and now designated as districts numbered two and three, and Suburb Treme, that portion of the parish of Orleans lying on the right bank of the Mississippi, and the parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines.

The Second Congressional district in the State of Louisiana, composed of that part of the city of New Orleans above Canal street, known as the First district, and district number four, formerly the city of Lafayette, and of the parishes of Jefferson, St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, St. James, Ascension, Assumption, Lafourche, Terrebonne, St. Mary, and St. Martin.

Writs of election will be issued, as required, and the election held at the places designated by law.

The proceedings will be conducted and returns thereof made in accordance with law.

No person will be considered as an elector qualified to vote who, in addition to the other qualifications of an elector, does not exhibit to the register of voters, if his residence be in the city of New Orleans, or to the commissioners of election, if his residence be in any other place in said districts, the evidence of his having taken the oath of allegiance to the United States.

Given under my hand and the seal of the State of Louisiana, at the city of New Orleans, this fourteenth day of November, A. D. 1862, and of the independence of the United States of America the eighty-seventh.

GEORGE F. SHEPLEY,
Military Governor of Louisiana.

By the Governor:

JAMES F. MILLER, Acting Secretary of State.

In accordance with this proclamation the election was held. It was claimed by the Committee of Elections, and not disputed, that in essential respects the election was conducted according to the forms prescribed by the laws of Louisiana, excepting a law of the disloyal legislature prescribing an oath to support the Confederacy as a qualification of voters. The registration required by law was not wholly completed however, and persons not registered were in some precincts allowed to vote after proving that they had the requisite qualifications. The Committee of Elections held that the spirit of the law was not in this respect violated, and they further say:

And had its provisions been ignored in this particular it would clearly have been only a disregard of a mere directory provision of the law. The principal and only aim of the law is to secure fair elections, and the nonobservance of directory provisions can not annul an election carried on with all the essentials of an election and with perfect fairness.

This principle of law, with regard to directory provisions, has been repeatedly and clearly laid down by the supreme court of Louisiana and the supreme courts of other States, as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States, and is too well understood by every legal mind to need any elucidation here. And it is expressly enacted that no elector shall be deprived of his vote by any omission to give him a certificate of his election.

But this phase of the question was little in issue, and there was in the controversy little insistence that the election had not been conducted in accordance with the requirements of law.

The main issue of the case is thus stated by the committee:

The committee have found little difficulty in coming to a conclusion that the claimants should be admitted to their seats, except in doubts as to the power of the military governor to fix the day of this election. In all things else there has been strict conformity to law. The districts were entirely free from a rebel force to restrain or overawe the loyal votes. The old voting precincts and voting places were all restored, and votes polled at every one of them, except in one inconsiderable parish, and part of another in one district into which guerrillas sometimes made incursions. There was a very full vote given a remarkably full one when compared with the vote at former Congressional elections, if allowance be made for the usual proportion of voters among the soldiers absent in the Union and rebel armies. Two thousand men had been recruited by General Butler into his own regiments, and two full regiments of Louisiana troops had been organized by him from these two Congressional districts, while more had gone into the rebel army, though many of these had returned to the city and their allegiance. Deducting the proper proportion of voters from these, and there can be no doubt of a full vote when the result is compared with that in former years. At the last election for representative in the First District, in 1859, the whole number of votes was 4,970; at the present election, 2,643; difference, 2,327. In the Second district, in 1859, the whole number was 10,367; at the present election the whole number was 5,117; difference 5,250.

It remains to be considered, finally, whether this election, thus conducted, in which all the loyal voters in such numbers participated in conformity with all the provisions of law, shall be set aside by this House and the representation denied, because the time for holding it was fixed by the military governor in the absence of any other governor. The exact powers of a military governor can not be easily defined. They have their origin in, and are probably limited by, necessity. They are to some extent civil as well as military, and the authority for his civil functions is no less clear than for his military. The Supreme Court and Congress have recognized both. The former, in the case of Cross v. Harrison (16 Howard, 164), recognized as valid the imposition and collection of duties by a military governor, even after the port at which they were imposed and collected had been by statute included in a collection district and a collector appointed, but who had not entered upon the duties of his office. And Congress admitted California into the Union, with a State government formed and set in motion, even to the election of Senators and Representatives in Congress, exclusively under the auspices of a military governor. The constitutionally elected governor of Louisiana had turned traitor and refused to discharge his constitutional obligations in this regard. What were the loyal voters to do? Were they to turn traitors also or be disfranchised? The Constitution imposes upon the United States this obligation (Art. IV, sec. 4):

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them from invasion; and on application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence."

Representation is one of the very essentials of a republican form of government, and no one doubts that the United States can not fulfill this obligation without guaranteeing that representation here. It was in fulfillment of this obligation that the Army of the Union entered New Orleans, drove out the rebel usurpation, and restored to the discharge of its appropriate functions the civil authority there. Its work is not ended till there is representation here. It can not secure that representation through the aid of a rebel governor. Hence the necessity for a military governor to discharge such functions, both military and civil, which necessity imposes in the interim between the absolute reign of rebellion and the complete restoration of law. Suppose Governor Moore to be the only traitor in Louisiana. One of two things must take place. The people must remain unrepresented, or some one must assume to fix a time to hold these elections. Which alternative approaches nearest to republicanism-nearest to the fulfillment of our obligations—to guarantee a republican form of government to that people, closing the door of representation, or recognizing as valid the time fixed by the military governor? Are this people to wait for representation here till their rebel governor returns to his loyalty and appoints a day for an election, or is the Government to guarantee that representation as best it may? The committee cannot distinguish between this act of the military governor and the many civil functions he is performing every day, acquiesced in by everybody. To pronounce this illegal, and refuse to recognize it, is to pronounce his whole administration void and a usurpation. But necessity put him there and keeps him there.

Again, this George F. Shepley assumes to act as governor of Louisiana, discharging the civil functions of such governor. This is one of them. All loyal men in the State acquiesce in these acts. There is no other man discharging them or seeking to discharge them. This act of fixing the time of an election comes in conflict with no time fixed by any other man. This is to be governor de facto. This House has no jurisdiction to determine who is rightfully in the office of governor of Louisiana. Thus if this act be taken as the act of a governor de facto it must be recognized as valid.

The committee cited in support of its position the case of Clements, of Tennessee, and concluded by recommending resolutions declaring both Mr. Flanders and Mr. Hahn entitled to seats in the House.

The debate began on February 9 and continued through February 10 and 17,[1] the issue being joined almost entirely on the question of the constitutionality of the proclamation of the military governor. It was objected that the Constitution had fixed the method by which Members should be elected to the House, and that the time, place, and manner were to be determined by the legislative power only. This provision was derived from the English constitution, where it had been needed to curb the authority of the sovereign. So in this country the fixing of the time of election by a military governor, appointed by the President, was an invasion by executive power. "No Representative can be elected to the Congress of the United States," it was argued,[2] "except in pursuance of the legislation of a State, or of the legislation of the Federal Government. * * * A State election law, which by its terms requires State officers duly qualified to execute it, can not be executed by a military governor appointed by the President." No State law and no law of Congress authorized the calling of the election in question. Hence it was contended that the two gentlemen were not entitled to admission.

On February 17 the following substitute was proposed for the resolutions of the committee:

> That the proclamation issued by George F. Shepley, styling himself military governor of Louisiana, at New Orleans, on the 14th day of November, 1862, etc. * * * was null and void, without the authority of law, and imparts no validity to the election of Benjamin F. Flanders and Michael Hahn.
> Resolved, That the election of said Flanders and Hahn appearing to have been free and unrestrained, and in accordance with the laws of Louisiana, except that being on a day other than a day of general election, had not been directed to be held by the governor of Louisiana, the action of the electors in the premises is ratified and confirmed, and said Flanders and Hahn are declared entitled to their seats as Members of this House.

This amendment was disagreed to—yeas 11, nays 115.

Then, by a vote of yeas 92, nays 44, the House agreed to the resolutions declaring Messrs. Flanders and Hahn entitled to their seats.[3]

380. The Arkansas election cases of Johnson, Jacks, and Rogers in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The House as a matter of course declined to give prima facie effect to credentials emanating from the loyal provisional government of a State lately in secession.

In 1864 the Elections Committee favored the seating of claimants coming from districts almost free from armed foes, but elected in an election called by a loyal convention and by a fraction of a normal vote.

On February 10, 1864,[4] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, presented the credentials of James M. Johnson, from the Third Congressional district of Arkansas.

The credentials[5] were in the form of a proclamation issued by the provisional governor of Arkansas, reciting that in accordance with the schedule appended to the constitution adopted by the late convention of the State of Arkansas (held in January, 1864) an election had been held on March 14, 15, and 16, 1864, at which the constitution had been adopted, various State officers elected, and three Congressmen, one of whom was Mr. Johnson, from the Third district.

Mr. Dawes asked that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Elections. No request was made that the oath be administered.

Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, moved that the credentials be laid on the table.

On February 16,[1] the motion to lay on the table being withdrawn to permit debate, Mr. Davis said he had moved to lay the credentials on the table because other action on them might lead to the recognition by the House of the State of Arkansas.

After debate at length, Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, moved to amend the the motion to refer by adding instructions that the committee investigate whether or not there was such government existing in Arkansas as to entitle the State and people to representation in Congress.

On the question of agreeing to the instructions there were yeas 53, nays 104.

A motion by Mr. Davis to lay the whole subject on the table was disagreed to; and then the motion of Mr. Dawes that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Elections was agreed to.[2]

On May 12[3] the credentials of Mr. T. M. Jacks, from the First Congressional district of Arkansas, were presented to the House and referred to the Committee on Elections; and on May 16[4] those of Mr. A. A. C. Rogers were similarly presented and referred.

On February 17, 1865,[5] the committee reported resolutions declaring that Messrs. Johnson and Jacks were entitled to seats as Representatives from Arkansas. The committee say:

> There seems in Arkansas at all times to have been a large number of unconditional Union men. It is evident that the so-called secession ordinance was not passed in accordance with the wishes of the people of the State. The convention elected in 1861 was largely Union, but, without instructions from the people, passed the ordinance of secession.
> After three years of war and desolation, the loyal people of Arkansas assembled in convention at Little Rock in January, 1864. The result of the convention's deliberations was the amending of the State constitution, the appointment of a provisional governor, lieutenant-governor, and secretary of state, and the designation of the 14th, 15th, and 16th days of March as the time for holding a general election throughout the State.
> The acts of this convention, judging from the statements of its members, were rather suggestive than obligatory. Indeed, it did not claim its acts as binding until they were ratified by the people, which was done with a unanimity seldom met with. At the election on the 14th, 15th, and 16th of March, the acts of the convention were approved by 12,177 voters, while they were disapproved by only 226. At that election the people of more than 40 counties elected State and county officers necessary to set to work again the machinery of a loyal State government, which had been overthrown by the rebellion in the month of May, 1861.
> On the 18th of April, 1864, the State government was formally inaugurated, since which time it has been struggling for an existence under difficulties which those who are strangers to its trials can not properly appreciate.

The committee go on to describe the amended constitution, showing that it abolished slavery, and to show that a State government under this constitution was in operation, and the legislature had shown by its legislation that the disloyal elements of the State were not to participate in its government. It was also noted that Arkansas had furnished at least 10,000 Union volunteers.

The First district was composed of twenty counties, which at the Presidential election of 1860 cast 16,841 votes. Fourteen of these counties participated "pretty fully" in the March election in question, casting the aggregate vote of 3,000. These fourteen counties in 1860 cast a total of 14,005 votes. Of the 3,000 votes cast for Member of Congress at the March election Mr. Jacks received all but 15.

In the Third district all but one of the nineteen counties participated pretty fully, the total vote being nearly 5,000, of which Mr. Johnson received over 4,000. These counties gave in 1860 an aggregate vote of 16,932.

The committee then go on to quote the position taken in the case of Mr. Bonzano, of Louisiana, as to the course to be taken when the people had reorganized State governments.

The report of the committee in these Arkansas cases was presented near the end of the Congress, and was not acted on by the House.

381. The Louisiana election cases of Bonzano, Field, Mann, Wells, and Taliaferro, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

In 1864 the Elections Committee were divided as to seating persons chosen under authority of a constitutional convention in a State recently in insurrection.

The House did not permit prima facie effect to credentials coming from a State lately in insurrection and from a government of doubtful standing.

On December 5, 1864,[1] the Speaker laid before the House the credentials of M. F. Bonzano, A. P. Field, W. D. Mann, T. M. Wells, and Robert W. Taliaferro, as Representatives from the State of Louisiana. No motion was made to administer the oath, and the credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections. The claimants were allowed the privileges of the floor.

On February 11, 1865,[2] the Committee reported on the case of Mr. Bonzano, who had been returned by 1,609 votes out of a total of 3,065. The committee say:

> This election derives its authority from the constitutional convention which commenced its session in New Orleans April 6, 1864, which amended essentially and adopted anew the constitution of Louisiana, and, among other things, did, on the 22d of July, 1864, divide the State into five Congressional districts, in accordance with the number of Representatives assigned to that State in the apportionment under the census of 1860, and ordered an election to be held on the first Monday of September, 1864, to fill the vacancies caused by the failure of the State hitherto to elect Representatives to the present Congress.

Previous to this constitutional convention there had been a State government, elected in pursuance of a proclamation of the major-general commanding the department. The State convention, which met April 6, 1864, and adjourned July 25, adopted a provision abolishing slavery as part of the new constitution, and the proceedings were, by proclamation of the governor, submitted to the people on September 5, and were ratified without material opposition. The whole number of votes was over 9,000.

The constitutional convention, by ordinance, divided the State into five Congressional districts, and directed elections to be held on September 5, 1864. In accordance with this ordinance the governor issued his proclamation directing the elections to be held. Mr. Bonzano was elected in accordance with these proceedings, and received his certificate of election from the governor.

The committee say in regard to this election:

> This election depends for its validity upon the effect which the House is disposed to give to the efforts to reorganize a State government in Louisiana, which have here been briefly recited. The districting of the State for Representatives, and the fixing of the time for holding the election, were the acts of the convention. Indeed, the election of governor and other State officers, as well as the existence of the convention itself, as well as its acts, are all parts of the same movements.
> It is objected to their validity that they neither originated in nor followed any preexisting law of the State or Nation. But the answer to this objection lies in the fact that, in the nature of the case, neither a law of the State nor Nation to meet the case was a possibility. The State was attempting to rise out of the ruin caused by an armed overthrow of its laws. They had been trampled in the dust, and there existed no body in the State to make an enabling act. Congress can not pass an enabling act for a State. It is neither one of the powers granted by the several States to the General Government, nor necessary to the carrying out of any of those powers, and all "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." It is preposterous to have expected at the hands of the rebel authorities in Louisiana that, previous to the overthrow of the State government, they should prepare a legal form of proceeding for its restoration. In the absence of any such legal form prepared beforehand in the State, and like absence of power on the part of the General Government, under the delegated powers of the Constitution, it follows that the power to restore a lost State government in Louisiana existed nowhere, or in "the people," the original source of all political power in this country. The people, in the exercise of that power, can not be required to conform to any particular mode, for that presupposes a power to prescribe outside of themselves, which it has been seen does not exist. The result must be republican, for the people and the States have surrendered to the United States, to that extent, the power over their form of government in this, that "the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government."
> It follows, therefore, that if this work of reorganizing and reestablishing a State government was the work of the people, it was the legitimate exercise of an inalienable and inherent right, and, if republican in form, is entitled not only to recognition, but to the "guaranty" of the Constitution.
>
> The attention of the committee has, therefore, been directed to the inquiry how far this effort to restore constitutional government in Louisiana has been the work of the people. Those engaged in the traitorous attempt to destroy the government form no part of that people engaged in the patriotic effort to restore it. The government is to be made, if at all, for and by patriots and not by traitors. In answering another and essential question, whether a government once erected in that State will be able to maintain itself against domestic violence, traitors must be counted, but not for their voice in making the government itself. As well might the inmates of a State prison be enumerated and consulted upon determining the character of a code of laws designed for their government.
> The evidence before the committee, and all the information they could obtain, satisfied them that the movement which resulted in the election of State officers, the calling of a convention to revise and amend the constitution, the ratification of such revisal and amendment by a popular vote, and the subsequent election of Representatives in Congress, was not only participated in by a large majority, almost approaching to unanimity, of the loyal people of the State, but that that loyal people constituted a majority of all the people of the State.

The committee go on to say that they entertain no doubt of the ability of this government to maintain itself against domestic violence if protected from enemies without.

Therefore, the committee recommended a resolution declaring Mr. Bonzano entitled to a seat as Representative from the First district of Louisiana.

A minority of the committee dissented from this conclusion. They say:

> Has evidence been presented which authorizes this House to declare that the people of Louisiana, by any proper mode of expression, have changed the status in which they were placed by their own acts and established a republican government? Such only is the form contemplated by the Constitution; such only has any title to representation on this floor; such only is the United States bound to guarantee or authorized to recognize.
> The indispensable quality of such government is that it shall emanate from the people; and not only must it be derived from the great body, but their agency in its organization must have been voluntary. The idea of restraint is incompatible with volition. The government must not only rest on the consent of the governed but that consent must not be procured by force or intimidation.
> It is not sufficient that the result may show that a government apparently republican has been created, but the creation must be the exercise of a will unaffected by the presence of an overawing power.
>
> The erection of a State government is a purely civil act. It has no affinity or connection with martial law. The civil power is alone capable to distinguish or declare the fact of its establishment or the essential conditions of its existence. The Congress of the United States is the only body having authority, primarily, to recognize the government of a State. Neither the Executive nor any subordinate military commander has capacity to incept or consummate its creation. The undersigned do not insist that an act of Congress is necessary as a prerequisite to enable the people of Louisiana to form a government, but the judgment of Congress must be passed on the result of the action of the people in the recognition of their act before Representatives can be entitled to admission on this floor. This House must be satisfied that their constitution is ordained in accordance with their deliberate and unforced will before it can lend its sanction to the act or recognize its validity. Two questions, therefore, are presented for consideration:
> 1. Did the great body of the loyal people of Louisiana, in fact, participate or clearly concur in the establishment of the government offered for recognition?
> 2. Was their act the result of their deliberate will and voluntary choice, unprocured by military interference?

The minority answer the first question by showing that only nineteen of forty-eight parishes in the State sent delegates to the constitutional convention, and that the votes on the ratification of the constitution were not representative of the vote of the State.

The minority answer the second question by citing testimony and documents tending to show that the military power was all-powerful, and that civil government did not in fact exist except in a weak condition.

The report in this case of Mr. Bonzano was not acted on by the House.

Reports similar in nature were made on the cases of Messrs. Field and Mann, but were not acted on by the House.[1]

382. The Senate election cases of Fishback and Baxter, from Arkansas, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The Senate declined to give prima facie effect to credentials regular in form but from a State known to be kept from the duress of an armed foe only by a partial military protection.

[1] House Reports Nos. 16, 17; 1 Bartlett, pp. 596, 597.

The Senate declined to admit persons elected under the auspices of a State government representing a portion only of the people in a State menaced by hostile armies.

On May 21, 1864,[1] the credentials of Hon. William Fishback, claiming a seat as a Senator from Arkansas, were presented in the Senate, and a motion was made that the oath be administered to Mr. Fishback. The credentials were in regular form, but a question was raised as to the status of the State of Arkansas.

On June 13,[2] after long debate, the Senate referred the credentials of Mr. Fishback, and also of Hon. Elisha Baxter, also claiming a seat from Arkansas, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On June 27, 1864,[3] the report was submitted to the Senate. It begins:

> That the credentials presented are in due form, purporting to be under the seal of the State of Arkansas, and to be signed by Isaac Murphy, governor thereof; and if the right to seats were to be determined by an inspection of the credentials, Messrs. Fishback and Baxter would be entitled to be sworn as members of this body. It is, however, admitted by the persons claiming seats, and known to the country, that, in the spring of 1861, the State of Arkansas, through its constituted authorities, undertook to secede from the Union, set up a government in hostility to the United States, and maintain the same by force of arms.

The report then goes on to recite the history of secession, and then the later reorganization of the State government by loyal citizens, citing the cases of Robbins and Potter in the Senate, and the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Luther v. Borden as to the rule of recognition of State governments. The committee conclude:

> The number of persons in Arkansas who voted for President in 1860 was 54,053, less than one-fourth of whom, as appears from the statement of the claimants, took part in the reorganization of the State government. This, however, would not be fatal to the reorganization, if all who were loyal to the Union had an opportunity to participate, and the State was free from military control. Such, however, is understood not to have been the case. The President had not then, nor has he up to this time, recalled his proclamation, which declared the inhabitants of Arkansas in a state of insurrection against the United States, nor was there any evidence before the committee that said insurrection had ceased or been suppressed. At the time when the body which chose the claimants was elected, when it assembled, and at this time, the State of Arkansas is occupied by hostile armies, which exercises supreme authority within the districts subject to their control. While a portion of Arkansas is at this very time, as the committee are informed, in the actual possession and subject to the control of the enemies of the United States, other parts of the State are only held in subordination to the laws of the Union by the strong arm of military power. While this state of things continues, and the right to exercise armed authority over a large part of the State is claimed and exerted by the military power, it can not be said that a civil government, set up and continued only by the sufferance of the military, is that republican form of government which the Constitution requires the United States to guarantee to every State in the Union.
> When the rebellion in Arkansas shall have been so far suppressed that the loyal inhabitants thereof shall be free to reestablish their State government upon a republican foundation, or to recognize the one already set up, and by the aid and not in subordination to the military to maintain the same, they will then, and not before, in the opinion of your committee, be entitled to a representation in Congress and to participate in the administration of the Federal Government. Believing that such a state of things did not at the time the claimants were elected, and does not now, exist in the State of Arkansas, the committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

"Resolved, That William M. Fishback and Elisha Baxter are not entitled to seats as Senators from the State of Arkansas."

On June 29,[1] after full debate, the resolution was agreed to, yeas 27, nays 8.

383. The Senate election case of Willey and Carlile, from Virginia, in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

From a State distracted by civil war the Senate admitted Senators chosen by a legislature representing no more than a third or fourth of the people.

The withdrawal of a Senator to join the foes of the Government was held to create a vacancy which a legislature could recognize, although the Senate had not expelled him.

Instance wherein the Senate gave immediate prima facie effect to credentials from a de facto government in a State disturbed by civil war.

On July 13, 1861,[2] in the Senate, Mr. Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, presented the following credentials:

VIRGINIA, to wit:

The legislature of this State having, on the 9th day of July, 1861, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, chosen Waitman T. Willey, esq., a Senator of this State, to fill the vacancy which has happened by the withdrawal and abdication of James M. Mason, esq., I, Francis H. Pierpont, being governor of the Commonwealth, do hereby certify the same to the Senate of the United States.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Commonwealth this 11th day of July, 1861.

FRANCIS H. PIERPONT.

Mr. Johnson also presented similar credentials certifying the election of John S. Carlile, esq., as the other Senator from Virginia, to fill the vacancy caused by the "withdrawal and abdication of Robert M. T. Hunter, esq."

Mr. Johnson proposed that Messrs. Willey and Carlile take the oath at once, but Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, objected, and moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for examination before the administration of the oath.

It appeared from the ensuing debate that the Senate had recently, on July 11, expelled Messrs. Mason and Hunter. But the election of Messrs. Willey and Carlile had occurred on July 9, two days before the expulsion. Mr. Bayard made the point that the legislature of Virginia, even if a valid legislature, might not create or assume a vacancy. The Senate itself could expel, but the legislature could not. Neither could the legislature determine that the charge of crime vacated the seats. Mr. Bayard further objected that if, as he believed, Virginia was out of the Union, she certainly should not have representation in the Senate. If she was in the Union then the Senate must take cognizance of her laws and constitution, and under those John Letcher, and not Francis H. Pierpont, was governor. The legislature which had elected Messrs. Willey and Carlile was only a portion of the real legislature of Virginia. Mr. Lazarus W. Powell, Senator from Kentucky, stated that they represented not more than a fourth, or at most a third, of the people of Virginia. Only thirty or forty counties out of over one hundred and fifty were represented in the legislature. This statement was not denied.

In opposition to these objections it was urged by Mr. Johnson that in fact the vacancies did exist on July 9. Both Mason and Hunter had withdrawn from the Senate, had abdicated before July 9. That fact was notorious, and the Senate's resolution of expulsion on July 11 did not change that fact. Messrs. Jacob Collamer, of Vermont, and Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, urged that the resolution of expulsion had relation to the time when Messrs. Mason and Hunter committed the criminal act of withdrawing and joining the foes of the Government. And the legislature of Virginia might take cognizance of that act as well as they might of the death of a Senator or a resignation. In the case of John F. Mercer the House of Representatives had settled that the executive of a State might take cognizance of the resignation of a Representative and order a new election.

As to the second objection it was urged that the loyal portion of the people of Virginia had a government which was at least the de facto government of the State; and Messrs. Willey and Carlile bore uncontested prima facie evidence of election from that government. There was no evidence from any quarter that these gentlemen were not the Senators-elect as their credentials purported to show.

Mr. Bayard's motion was disagreed to—yeas 5, nays 35.

Thereupon Messrs. Willey and Carlile appeared and took the oath.

384. The Senate election cases of Segar and Underwood, from Virginia, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The Senate declined to admit to a seat a person bearing uncontested credentials of election by a legislature representing a small fraction of the people in a seceding State.

On February 17, 1865,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Waitman T. Willey, of West Virginia, presented the credentials of Mr. Joseph Segar, as Senator-elect from the State of Virginia, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Lemuel J. Bowden, who had been admitted to a seat as Senator from Virginia in 1863, at the time that certain counties of old Virginia had been organized and admitted to the Union as the new State of West Virginia. The condition of affairs was briefly set forth at a later day in a Senate report[2] submitted by Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, in relation to a claim by Mr. Segar for compensation:

> On the 23d of February, 1863, Mr. Bowden was elected Senator for Virginia by the legislature assembled at Wheeling, the great portion of Virginia, including Richmond, its former seat of government, being then in rebellion. He was admitted to his seat, the Senate thereby recognizing the legal existence of the State he represented. West Virginia was then erected into a separate State. The legislature of Virginia assembled at Alexandria and continued the functions of a State legislature of Virginia. Mr. Bowden continued to represent Virginia in the Senate until his death, on the 2d of January, 1864. December 8, 1864, the petitioner was elected to succeed Mr. Bowden, and prosecuted his claim with diligence. The Alexandria government was recognized as a valid State organization by President Lincoln in his amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863. It gave its constitutional assent to the adoption of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and its assent is treated by Mr. Seward in his proclamation announcing the adoption of the amendment as necessary thereto.

Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, immediately upon the presentation of the credentials, objected to the immediate administration of the oath and moved that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Sumner urged that the so-called legislature of Virginia was little more than a common council of the city of Alexandria, while the greater part of Virginia was in armed resistance to the Government, and the President of the United States had declared the people of the State generally to be in insurrection. Certain counties, however, had been excepted, as stated in the debate by Mr. Jonathan Doolittle, of Wisconsin:

> The Presidential proclamation declaring the population of certain States to be in insurrection excepted from its operation the counties of Alexandria city and county, Berkeley, Accomac, Northampton, Princess Anne, Norfolk, Norfolk city, Portsmouth city, and Elizabeth city and county, in the State of Virginia, containing a population of over 175,000; and these counties are now represented in the legislature at Alexandria.

In favor of the admission of Mr. Segar it was urged that the credentials were sufficient on their face, and that the right of Virginia to representation had been settled when Mr. Bowden was admitted to a seat.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, pointed out that the term for which Mr. Segar had been elected would expire on March 4 next, and that it was hardly worth while to delay the pressing public business to determine this question. He therefore moved that the credentials lie on the table. This motion was agreed to—yeas 29, nays 13.

On March 9, 1865,[1] on the first day of the special session of the Senate, Mr. Jonathan Doolittle, of Wisconsin, presented the credentials of John C. Underwood as Senator-elect from the State of Virginia for the term beginning March 4 instant.

Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

At this time the question of admission of Senators elected in Louisiana and Arkansas was before the Senate, and in view of the doubt as to the future treatment of the seceding States a motion to postpone the consideration of the credentials to the next session of Congress was agreed to without division.

Neither Mr. Underwood nor Mr. Segar were ever admitted to a seat.

385. The Senate election case of Cutler and Smith, from Louisiana, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The two Houses of Congress having by law declared the State of Louisiana in a state of insurrection, the Senate in 1864 did not admit persons bearing credentials therefrom.

On December 6, 1864,[2] the credentials of R. King Cutler and Charles Smith, as Senators from Louisiana, were presented in the Senate. At the same time memorials were presented containing the protests of citizens of Louisiana against their admission to the Senate. No proposition was made to administer the oath to the claimants, but on December 8 the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On February 18, 1865,[1] the committee reported, reviewing at length the condition of affairs in Louisiana and concluding:

The persons in possession of the local authorities of Louisiana having rebelled against the authority of the United States, and her inhabitants having been declared to be in a state of insurrection in pursuance of a law passed by the two Houses of Congress, your committee deem it improper for this body to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana, till by some joint action of both Houses there shall be some recognition of an existing State government, acting in harmony with the Government of the United States, and recognizing its authority.

Your committee therefore recommend for adoption, before taking definite action upon the right of the claimants to seats, the accompanying joint resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Louisiana, inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1864, at the city of New Orleans, as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to the guarantee and all other rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States."

The report was debated on February 23, 24, and 25,[2] but was not finally acted on.

ELECTORATES IN RECONSTRUCTION.[1]

386. In the Fortieth Congress Members-elect from States lately in secession were not admitted until a committee had examined their credentials, qualifications, and the status of their constituencies.—

In 1868, at the time of the reconstruction of the State governments of a number of the States recently in secession, persons claiming to be elected Members of the House appeared from the States of Arkansas, Florida, North and South Carolina, Alabama, Louisiana, and Georgia.[3] These persons bore credentials signed, some by military authorities in command of the districts comprising the State,[4] others signed by the president of a constitutional convention.[5] The House decided in these cases to refer the credentials to the Committee on Elections before the Members-elect were sworn in,[6] in accordance with the precedent in the preceding Congress.

The Committee on Elections reported in these cases as to whether or not the credentials were "in due form of law" and whether or not the States had conformed to the laws of Congress.[7] Also, they reported as to the qualifications of the Member-elect, especially as to whether or not his disabilities had been removed so that he might take the oath.[8]

387. In 1869 the House provided by resolution that the credentials of persons claiming seats from certain States should be examined by a committee before the oath should be administered.

The credentials of Members-elect who appear after the organization are presented but are not examined by a committee before the oath is administered, unless there be objection.

In 1870 the House declined to exclude a Member-elect for alleged disloyalty in giving utterance to words indicating contempt for the Government.

On December 6, 1869,[1] at the beginning of the second session, after the roll of Members-elect had been called by States and the presence of a quorum had been announced, the Speaker invited Members-elect with credentials, whose right to seats were unchallenged, to come forward and take the oath.

Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, said that, as there was no law authorizing the Speaker, Clerk, or other officer to inspect credentials presented after the House was once organized, it seemed most proper that all credentials be referred to the Committee on Elections for examination before the bearers should be sworn in.

The Speaker[2] said the usage had always been, when there was no objection, to allow a Member to be sworn in without any further ceremony. The Chair did not propose to administer the oath to any to whom objection might be made.

Members-elect to whom there was no objection were then sworn in.

Later in the day Mr. Paine presented the credentials of William Milnes, Jr., claiming a seat as a Member from the Sixth district of Virginia, and at the same time offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That all credentials of persons claiming the right to represent the people of Virginia and Mississippi in this House be referred, when presented, to the Committee of Elections.

In accordance with this resolution credentials were presented and referred, the oath not being administered pending the investigation.

On January 27, 1870,[3] Mr. Paine submitted from the committee a report finding that six of the nine persons who presented certificates from Virginia, were entitled to be sworn in, and submitted a motion that the oath be administered to them. Objection being made to one of the six, Mr. Charles H. Porter, he stepped aside until the oath was administered to the others. The question recurring as to administering the oath to Mr. Porter, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, presented the record of a trial by a military commission whereby Mr. Porter had been punished, after conviction, for declaring that—

This Government is all a———humbug from beginning to end, etc.

After debate the motion to administer the oath to Mr. Porter was agreed to, but immediately Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, moved to reconsider. Thereupon a debate arose, partisan in nature, which reviewed the exclusion of the Kentucky Members on charges of disloyalty. Finally the motion to reconsider was laid on the table-yeas, 167; nays, 4. Thereupon Mr. Porter appeared and took the oath.

The three other claimants to seats presented cases requiring further examination, involving questions as to prima facie and final right that are considered on other pages.

388. The election case of the Georgia Members in the Forty-first Congress.

The House decided in 1869 that a person might not, by virtue of one election, sit as a Member of the House in two Congresses.

The Clerk declined to enroll claimants bearing credentials referring to an election by virtue of which the said claimants had already held seats in the preceding Congress.

Instance wherein a constitutional convention in a State undergoing reconstruction authorized the election of Members of Congress in anticipation of the sanction of Federal law.

Instance wherein, during the reconstruction period, credentials were issued to Members-elect by a military commander.

On March 5, 1869,[1] when the House of Representatives organized the names of no persons as Members-elect from the State of Georgia were included in the roll called by the Clerk.

It appeared that certain persons had appeared bearing credentials of the governor of Georgia, under seal of the State, and in due form setting forth:

Whereas the convention of the people of this State, held under the reconstruction acts of Congress, passed an ordinance dated 10th of March, 1868, which ordained that an election be held, beginning on the 20th day of April, 1868, for Representatives to the Congress of the United States; and whereas the returns made agreeably to said ordinance show that you received the highest number of votes for Representative from the Second Congressional district of this State; and whereas it is my duty under the laws of Georgia to commission the persons legally elected.

These are therefore to commission you, the said Nelson Tift, to take session in the House of Representatives of the United States in accordance with said election under said ordinance, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, and to use and exercise all and every the privileges and powers which by right you may or can do, under and by virtue of the Constitution, in behalf of this State.

This credential was dated November 24, 1868.

The ordinance, which was annexed to the credentials, provided that the persons elected at the election of April 20, 1868 (at which the constitution was voted on, and which was conducted under direction of the commanding general of the military district including Georgia)— shall enter upon the duties of the several offices to which they have been respectively elected when authorized so to do by acts of Congress or by the order of the general commanding, and shall continue in office till the regular session provided for after the year 1868 and until successors are elected and qualified, so that said officers shall each of them hold their offices as though they were elected on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1868, or elected or appointed by the general assembly next thereafter.

In the debate it was stated that while the Clerk was technically right in not putting the names of the persons on the roll, the House was not bound by so strict technical rule. It appeared from the debate that the same persons, by virtue of the election in question, had taken seats in the preceding Congress, the Fortieth.

The House, in the perplexities caused by this state of facts abandoned a resolution providing for the swearing in of the persons named, and agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials and papers of J. W. Clift, Nelson Tift [mentioning others], claiming seats as Members of the House of Representatives from the State of Georgia, be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, with directions to report to the House whether their papers present a prima facie right to their seats.

On January 28, 1870,[1] Mr. John C. Churchill, of New York, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report. The report first states fully the facts in connection with the case:

In November, 1867, under the reconstruction acts of Congress, members of a convention to form a constitution of the State of Georgia were elected. This convention convened on the 9th day of December, 1867, and proceeded with the only duty which, under those acts, they had to perform, and on the 11th of March, 1868, they adopted a constitution to be submitted to the people under the acts above referred to.

On the 11th of March, 1868, Congress passed an act, the second section of which reads as follows:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the constitutional convention of any of the States mentioned in the acts to which this is amendatory may provide that at the time of voting upon the ratification of the constitution, the registered voters may vote also for Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and for all elective officers provided for by the said constitution; and the same election officers who shall make the return of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall enumerate and certify the votes cast for Members of Congress."

Under the authority of this section, although anticipating its passage, the convention on the 10th of March, 1868, adopted an ordinance which provided that an election should be held, beginning on the 20th of April, 1868, "for voting on the ratification of the constitution, and for governor, members of the general assembly, Representatives to the Congress of the United States, and all other officers to be elected as provided in the constitution." It was further provided "that the persons so elected shall enter upon the duties of the several offices to which they have been respectively elected, when authorized so to do by acts of Congress or by the order of the general commanding; and shall continue in office till the regular succession provided for after the year 1868, and until successors are elected and qualified; so that said officers shall each of them hold their offices as though they were elected on the Tuesday after the first Monday of November, 1868, or elected or appointed by the general assembly next thereafter."

General Meade was further requested by the same ordinance to cause due returns to be made, and certificates of election to be issued by the proper officers. Under this ordinance an election was held, beginning on the 20th April, 1868, at which Representatives in Congress were voted for in the several congressional districts, each voter so voting depositing but a single ballot, on which was inscribed "for Representative in Congress," with the name of the person for whom he voted. At this time there was no act of Congress in existence giving representation in Congress to Georgia, and therefore no time when, by the terms of the above ordinance, the terms of the persons so voted for could commence.

On the 25th of June, 1868, Congress passed a law which declared that Georgia should be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress when the legislature of the State should have duly ratified article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, and should also have given the assent of the State to certain fundamental conditions specified in the act; and the President was required, within ten days after the receipt of official intelligence of the fact, to issue a proclamation announcing the ratification by the legislature of the fourteenth amendment.

On the 1st of July, 1868, General Meade issued certificates of election to the several persons who had received a majority of votes for Representative in Congress in their respective districts, which certificate, for the First Congressional district, was in the following form:

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 16; 2 Bartlett, p. 596.

"HEADQUARTERS THIRD MILITARY DISTRICT,
"(GEORGIA, FLORIDA, AND ALABAMA.)

"From the return made to these headquarters by the boards of registration of the election held in the State of Georgia for civil officers of said State, and for Members of Congress, under the provisions of General Order, No. 40, issued from these headquarters, which election commenced on the 20th day of April and continued four days, it is hereby certified that it appears that in said election J. W. Clift received a majority of the votes cast for a Representative to the Congress of the United States from the First Congressional district in said State of Georgia.

"GEORGE G. MEADE,
''MAJOR-GENERAL, U. S. A., COMMANDING.

"ATLANTA, GA., July 1, 1868."

The certificates were similar in form, with changes only of the name of the person certified to be elected.

The convention adjourned on the 11th March, 1868, the constitution providing that the general assembly should meet within ninety days of the adjournment of the convention, and annually thereafter on the second Wednesday in January, or on such other day as the general assembly might provide. This last fact is important, since it has been claimed before the committee that, under the constitution of Georgia, no election for Members of Congress could be held until the year 1870. The clause of the constitution so referred to is as follows—article 2, section 11:

The election of governor, Members of Congress, and the general assembly, after the year 1868, shall commence on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, unless otherwise provided by law.

But this puts no limitation whatever upon the powers of the general assembly to regulate the time and frequency of elections, and, taken in connection with the general grant of power to the general assembly (article 3, section 5, 1) to pass any law consistent with the constitution they might deem necessary to the welfare of the State, gave them full control of the subject; and the convention having required the general assembly to meet within ninety days of their own adjournment, and also on the second Wednesday of the following January, the fullest opportunity was given to the latter to provide by further legislation, if necessary, for the proper representation of the State in Congress.

On the 8th of July, 1868, the general assembly of Georgia organized, and soon after ratified the fourteenth amendment and assented to the fundamental conditions mentioned in the amendatory reconstruction act of June 25, 1868; and the President thereupon, on the 27th day of July, 1868, issued his proclamation of the fact of such ratification. The Members-elect from Georgia thereupon, in July, 1868, presented their certificates of election received from General Meade, and, so far as eligible, were thereon admitted to seats in the Fortieth Congress.

Afterwards, in November, 1868, the governor of the State issued commissions to each of these parties, based upon the same election.

The report goes on to say that the commission of the governor as evidence of the election is unauthorized, General Meade having been the only person authorized by the ordinance to issue certificates of election. The commission issued by the governor of Georgia referred to the same election as did the certificate issued by General Meade and conferred no additional powers. By the election of April 20, 1868, Georgia became entitled to representation immediately upon compliance with certain conditions. Those conditions were complied with in time for the Representatives to be admitted to the Fortieth Congress. It was absurd to say that the right to immediate representation would be satisfied by admission to the Forty-first Congress. The committee concludes:

The action of the persons elected, as well as of the House, was in entire harmony with this view. Immediately upon the compliance of Georgia with the required conditions, their members presented themselves and the House received them as Representatives from that State.

It is too late for these claimants to deny that their election entitles them to sit in the Fortieth Congress. Their own action has estopped them from such denial, and unless they can show themselves entitled by the election of April 20, 1868, to hold for two terms the force of their election is exhausted.

The action of the people in voting for them as Representatives in Congress, and their certificates of election as such Representatives, have been fully answered by admitting them as such Representatives to the Fortieth Congress. Nor was it a matter of choice with these men whether they should present themselves for admission to the Fortieth or to the Forty-first Congress. By the ordinance of the convention under which this election was held, and the law of Congress of June 25, 1868, they were to enter upon the duties of their office whenever the State of Georgia had complied with the conditions mentioned in the last-mentioned act. These conditions were complied with during the following month of July, 1868, and therefore it became the duty of these men to enter upon the duties of the office to which they had been chosen. This they did, and became Members of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress, and acted as such during the closing days of the second session of that Congress and for the remainder of the term of its existence.

Having taken their seats as Members of the Fortieth Congress, it was not in the power of the convention of Georgia to extend their term so as to include the Forty-first Congress. The office of Representative to the Fortieth Congress is entirely distinct from that of Representative in the Forty-first Congress, and made so by the Constitution of the United States.

It is not pretended that there was anything in the conduct of the election of April 20, 1868, or in the action of the voters, which indicated a purpose to choose for more than a single Congress, and the ordinance of the convention can not affect the result. Indeed an examination of the ordinance will show that it was the State officers, and not Members of Congress, the duration of whose offices was attempted to be regulated by that act.

The conclusion of the committee, therefore, is that the force of the election of April 20, 1868, Was exhausted when these gentlemen were admitted Members of the Fortieth Congress, and they therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the claimants to seats in the Forty-first Congress of the United States from the State of Georgia, under the election held in that State on the 20th day of April, 1868, are not entitled to such seats."

On January 28, 1870,[1] the report was explained, but not opposed, and the resolution was agreed to without division.

389. The Senate election case of Jones and Garland v. McDonald and Rice, from Arkansas, in the Fortieth Congress.

A State having been in secession, the Senate admitted as Senator the person chosen after the State had conformed to conditions prescribed by law, and refused to admit one chosen prior to such conformity.

Instance wherein the Senate gave immediate prima facie effect to informal credentials, although other claimants presented credentials technically conforming to law.

Instance wherein the Senate admitted persons chosen before Congress had admitted a reconstructed State to representation.

From the outbreak of the civil war until 1868 the State of Arkansas was without representation in the Senate of the United States. On November 24, 1866, the legislature of Arkansas elected as Senators John T. Jones for the vacancy in the term beginning March 4, 1865, and Augustus H. Garland for the term commencing March 4, 1867. Neither of these Senators-elect were admitted; but by the act of July 19, 1867,[2] Congress declared the governments then existing in several Southern States, including Arkansas, illegal. Previously, by the law of March 2, 1867,[3] Congress had prescribed the conditions on which the States lately in secession might be readmitted to representation, but leaving it for a future law to effect such readmission. Arkansas proceeded, under the law of March 2, 1867, to form a new State government, and the legislature of that new government on April 15, 1868, chose two Senators, Alexander McDonald for the term beginning March 4, 1865 (that for which Mr. Jones had been elected), and Benjamin F. Rice for the term beginning March 4, 1867 (that for which Mr. Garland had been elected). But it was not until June 22, 1868,[1] that Congress by law formally admitted Arkansas "to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union." So Messrs. McDonald and Rice were chosen before Arkansas was actually admitted.

[1] Journal, p. 222; Globe, pp. 853, 854.

On June 23, 1868,[2] the day after the act of admission had become a law, Mr. John M. Thayer, of Nebraska, presented the credentials of Messrs. McDonald and Rice in the Senate. They were in form as follows:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, to wit:

The general assembly of the State, assembled under the provisions of section 2 of Article V of the constitution as adopted by the convention on the 11th day of February, A. D. 1868, a copy of which is hereto annexed, having, on the 15th day of April, A. D. 1868, in pursuance of an act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," approved July 25, 1866, chosen Benjamin F. Rice a Senator of the United States for the term ending on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1873.

Therefore we, John N. Sarber, president pro tempore of the senate, and John G. Price, speaker of the house of representatives, do hereby certify the same to the Senate of the United States.

Given under our hands, this 15th day of April, A. D. 1868.

JOHN N. SARBER,
President Senate pro tempore.
JOHN G. PRICE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

As soon as these credentials had been read, Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, offered the credentials of Messrs. Jones and Garland, which were in regular form, signed by "Isaac Murphy, governor," attested by the seal of the State, and countersigned by the secretary of state.

Mr. Davis claimed that this title was the older and, from the standpoint of prima facie authority, the better. He also contended that constitutionally Messrs. Jones and Garland had the better title; and proposed a reference of all the credentials to the Judiciary Committee for investigation.

Mr. Davis's proposition was not taken seriously by the majority of the Senate, who considered the reconstruction legislation as conclusive on this point.

But Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, suggested two questions on which there was extended debate:

(1) That the credentials of Messrs. Rice and McDonald were signed only by the president pro tempore of the senate and speaker of the house, whereas the law of July 25, 1866[3] provided:

That it shall be the duty of the governor of the State from which any Senator shall have been chosen as aforesaid to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States, which certificate shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

[1] 15 Stat. L., p. 72.

[2] Second session Fortieth Congress, Globe, pp. 3384–3389.

[3] 14 Stat. L., p. 244.

(2) That Messrs. Rice and McDonald had been chosen before Congress had admitted Arkansas to representation.

As to the first point, it was explained that the governor had not given credentials because the legislature did not recognize the old governor and the new governor was not in possession of the office and was simply a governor-elect. While admitting the informality of the credentials, the general opinion of the Senate seemed to concur in the views expressed by Messrs. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, and Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, that the law was merely directory as to the governor and that the authentication of the credentials in this case was sufficient. Mr. Johnson, however, thought it well that the credentials should be referred to a committee, that a general rule might be established for the future.

As to the second point, Mr. Trumbull recalled that it had been an established practice for new States to organize and elect Senators before their admission to the Union. And when Congress subsequently recognized the State government it had been construed to have relation back to the time when the organization took place and the Senators had been admitted to their seats. Mr. Johnson, in support of this view, recalled the case of California.

Mr. Davis, insisting on his view that Messrs. Jones and Garland were the only constitutionally elected Senators, moved that the credentials be referred to the Judiciary Committee; but the motion was negatived without division.

Then the motion that Messrs. Rice and McDonald be sworn was agreed to; and they appeared and took the oath.

390. The Senate election case of Marvin v. Osborn, from Florida, in the Fortieth Congress.

A State having been in secession, the Senate admitted as Senator the person chosen after the State had conformed to conditions prescribed by law and refused to admit one chosen prior to such conformity.

Instance wherein immediate prima facie effect was given to credentials of a Senator-elect from a reconstructed State.

On June 30, 1868,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, presented the credentials of Thomas W. Osborn, as Senator from Florida to fill the term expiring on March 3, 1873. Florida had been without representation since the secession of the State; but Congress, by the act of July 25, 1868, had provided that Florida and certain other secession States should be admitted to representation when they should have complied with certain conditions.

Mr. Howe also presented, as evidence that the State had complied with the conditions, her ordinances ratifying the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The credentials of Mr. Osborn showed his election on June 18, 1866, and that it was in accordance with the act of July 25, 1866. The State had completed the ratification of the amendments on June 11, 1868, seven days prior to Mr. Osborn's election.

While Mr. Osborn's credentials were under consideration Mr. Jonathan Doolittle, of Wisconsin, offered credentials signed by David S. Walker as governor of Florida, dated November 30, 1866, and showing the election of William Marvin as Senator on November 28, 1866, a considerable time before the ratification of the amendments.

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Globe, pp. 3598–3607.

Mr. Doolittle contended that Florida had never been out of the Union; that as soon as the power of the secession armies vanished she became entitled to representation again, and that as Mr. Marvin had always been a loyal man he should be seated. For this reason Mr. Doolittle opposed the pending motion, which was that the oath be administered to Mr. Osborn.

A considerable diversity of opinion arose as to whether the case should not be referred to the Judiciary Committee for examination before the administration of the oath. This appears not to have been because Mr. Marvin's claim was generally treated as serious, but because of doubts as to whether the act of the legislature of Florida in ratifying the amendments had been properly conducted and authenticated.

Finally, by a vote of yeas 34, nays 6, the motion that Mr. Osborn be permitted to take the oath was agreed to.

391. The Senate election case of Whiteley and Farrow v. Hill and Miller, from Georgia, in the Fortieth and Forty-first Congresses.

The Senate declined to give prima facie effect to credentials impeached by charges that a State was not fulfilling in good faith the conditions of reconstruction.

The Senate finally seated persons elected by a legislature in a reconstructed State, although after the intervention of Congress other persons had been elected.

Instance wherein a special law was passed prescribing the form of oath to be taken by a Senator-elect.

On December 7, 1868,[1] in the Senate, Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, presented the credentials of Joshua Hill, Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, to serve the unexpired term ending March 4, 1873.

At this time Georgia was without representation in the Senate. By the act of Congress of June 25, 1868, the provisional governor of Georgia, Rufus B. Bullock, appointed as such on July 4, 1868, by General Meade, military commander of the district, called a provisional legislature, which convened on July 20. Mr. Hill was elected on July 28.

As soon as Mr. Hill's credentials were read to the Senate, Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, objected to the administration of the oath of office, and moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The reason for the objection appeared in two papers presented to the Senate at this time the first, a letter from Governor Bullock, alleged that certain persons lacking the qualifications of loyalty had been permitted to take seats in the legislature, contrary to the letter and spirit of the law of Congress; and second, a memorial of colored citizens of Georgia, reciting that the white members of the legislature had expelled from that body 29 duly elected members because they were persons of color and, as was claimed, ineligible to office under the constitution and laws of Georgia. It appeared that this act of expulsion occurred after Mr. Hill had been elected Senator, and Mr. Sherman urged that it should not be charged against him.

[1] Third session Fortieth Congress, Globe, pp. 1–5.

But Mr. John M. Thayer, of Nebraska, and others urged that the neglect of the legislature to purge itself of disloyal men cast suspicion on the effectiveness of the reconstruction of the State, and that Senators should not be admitted while this doubt existed, in spite of the fact urged by Mr. Sherman that Georgia had been recognized by the Senate and House of Representatives as a State in the Union.

On December 10,[1] on motion of Mr. Sherman, the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, no attempt being made to have the oath administered to Mr. Hill at this time.

On January 11, 1869,[2] Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, presented the credentials of H. V. M. Miller, Senator-elect from Georgia, to fill the unexpired term commencing March 4, 1865. These credentials were referred to the Judiciary Committee without question, no proposition to administer the oath being made.

On January 25[3] Mr. William M. Stewart, of Nevada, presented the report of the committee on the case of Mr. Hill. Apparently Messrs. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, and Benjamin F. Rice, of Arkansas, concurred with Mr. Stewart in the report, while Messrs. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, and Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, concurred in the conclusion of the report, that Mr. Hill should not be seated. Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, submitted minority views favorable to the seating of Mr. Hill, and the remaining member of the committee, Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, dissented from the majority conclusion, but did not present views.

In the report of the majority the condition of affairs in Georgia is thus set forth:

> On the 21st of May, 1868, the President transmitted to Congress a proposed constitution for the State of Georgia, which had been framed by a convention assembled under the reconstruction acts of Congress and ratified by the people. On the 25th June following Congress passed an act which, among other things, provided for the admission of Georgia to representation upon compliance with certain conditions therein named, the most important of which was that the legislature of Georgia should duly ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as the fourteenth amendment. The act further provides that after compliance with the required conditions "the officers of said State duly elected and qualified under the constitution hereof shall be inaugurated without delay; but no person prohibited from holding office under the United States or any State by section 3 of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article 14 shall be deemed eligible to any office in said State unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment."
> The obvious design of this provision was to prevent the new organization from falling under the control of enemies of the United States, so as to defeat the reconstruction of the State.
> The right of Mr. Hill (if regularly elected) to a seat in the Senate depends upon three important considerations:
> First. Did the legislature of Georgia, regularly organized in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, the laws of Congress, and the constitution of Georgia, duly ratify the fourteenth amendment and comply with the various conditions imposed by the act of June 25, 1868?
> Second. Have the legislature and people of Georgia, subsequent to such compliance with said acts of Congress, committed such acts of usurpation and outrage as to place the State in a condition unfit to be represented in Congress?
> Third. Whether, on the whole case, taking the action of Georgia both before and since the pretended ratification of the fourteenth amendment, a civil government has been established in that State which Congress ought to recognize?
> These questions must be answered by the law and the facts.

[3] Globe, p. 568, Senate Report No. 192, third session Fortieth Congress.

After reviewing the failure of the legislature to purge itself of disloyal members, the report continues:

Your committee are of opinion that the act of June 25, 1868, which required that the constitutional amendment should be duly ratified, must be held to mean that it must be ratified by a legislature which has in good faith substantially complied with all the requirements of law providing for its organization. It is true that, after this pretended investigation by the two houses of the eligibility of their members, the district commander recognized the validity of their proceedings and permitted the State officers to be inaugurated and the State government to go into operation. On the 21st day of July the legislature passed a resolution of ratification of the fourteenth amendment and the other resolution required by the act of June 25, 1868.

On the 28th of July, 1868, the legislature went into joint convention for the election of United States Senators. Joshua Hill received 110 votes; Joseph E. Brown, 94 votes, and A. H. Stevens, 3 votes, whereupon Mr. Hill was declared elected United States Senator for the term ending March 3, 1873.

It is quite probable that Mr. Hill received votes of persons who were not qualified to hold seats in the legislature more than sufficient to constitute his majority and secure his election, but your committee do not propose to investigate that question. The election and qualification of members of the legislature, where the existence of any legislature authorized to act as such is not involved, can not be inquired into by the Senate in determining the right of a Senator to his seat. Your committee holds that the question involved in this case is not whether persons not entitled to seats in the legislature were received by that body and allowed to vote upon the election of a Senator, but whether the body assuming to be the legislature violated the conditions upon which it was allowed to organize by permitting disloyal persons to participate in its proceedings. It may be contended that although the matters hereinbefore set forth constitute a failure on the part of the State of Georgia to comply in every respect with the reconstruction acts, yet Congress ought to waive these slight departures and admit their representatives. But an examination into the subsequent proceedings of the legislature of Georgia, and the disorganized condition of society in that State, leads your committee to the conclusion that all these violations of law were in pursuance of a common purpose to evade the law and resist the authority of the United States.

The report next recites the expulsion of the colored members of the legislature, and says:

Your committee are of opinion that under the constitution of Georgia there is no distinction in the right to hold office on account of race or color, and they are quite confident that such was the opinion of Congress at the time it approved that constitution.

This act of injustice and oppression denied the right of representation of a whole race, constituting nearly one-half of the people of Georgia. It will not be contended that there is no power in this Government to restrain in some form an outrage of this character. It certainly furnishes a strong reason why Congress should not at this time overlook the irregularities in the organization of the legislature of Georgia and admit her Senators to representation. And this is not all. Your committee have examined the official reports of the various officers connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in Georgia, and find reported 336 cases of murders and assaults with intent to murder upon colored persons by the whites, from January 1, 1868, to November 15 of same year. For all of which there has been no legal redress and scarcely any effort whatever on the part of the authorities to punish the criminals. And it is stated by these officers that they are unable to report fully as to the number and character of these outrages on account of intimidation of witnesses, which is practiced by the perpetrators of crime. Your committee have no source of official information as to outrages committed upon loyal whites, but it is represented by various and numerously signed petitions and memorials from the loyal people of Georgia that they are constantly exposed to violence, and are without protection of law. It is a matter of public notoriety that loyal white men are persecuted, murdered, and driven from their homes. Several members of the legislature have been compelled to take refuge at the capital of the State where the national troops are stationed to avoid the violence of the enemies of the United States. The unlawful and vindictive conduct of the legislature tend to confirm these statements and reports, and exclude all hope that the new civil government will afford adequate protection to life and property. Since the withdrawal of the military, crime has greatly increased while punishment for crime has diminished.

And the report concludes:

Wherefore your committee feel called upon to recommend that Mr. Hill be not allowed to take a seat in the Senate for the reason that Georgia is not entitled to representation in Congress, and submit the accompanying resolution.

"Resolved, That Joshua Hill, claiming to be Senator-elect from Georgia, ought not now to be permitted to take a seat in this body."

Mr. Trumbull favored the seating of Mr. Hill, saying in minority views:

The undersigned, being unable to agree with the majority of the committee in their report upon the credentials of Joshua Hill, claiming to have been duly elected and entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Georgia, begs leave to present the reasons for his dissent. That Hill possesses all the qualifications for a Member of the Senate of the United States required by the Constitution; that he is one of the few prominent men residing in a rebel State who remained true to the Union during the war; that he is now and has been at all times thoroughly loyal to the Union; that he is in every respect personally unobjectionable; that he was duly elected by the legislature of Georgia, and that his credentials are in due form is not questioned by anyone. If he is not entitled to his seat, it must be either because the State of Georgia was not in a condition to entitle her to representation at the time of his election or because the body which elected him was not the legislature of that State.

The former of these propositions, whether Georgia was or is in a condition to entitle her to representation, is not a question for the Senate to decide. The unfortunate disagreement which has existed for some years between the President and Congress has, in part, been owing to a disagreement upon this very point, the President insisting that it was for each House of Congress to determine for itself in the admission of Members whether a State was entitled to representation, and Congress insisting that it was for Congress to determine in the first instance whether a State was entitled to representation, and that question being affirmatively settled it was then for each House to judge for itself of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own Members. This controverted point was settled by Congress in March, 1866, by the passage through both Houses of the following concurrent resolution:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation."

The reconstruction acts, since indorsed by the people at a popular election, declare that "until the people of said rebel States shall be by law—not by the action of each House—admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, any civil governments which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only;" which is equivalent to a declaration that when admitted to representation by law they shall be no longer provisional.

The supplementary act of March 23, 1867, declares that when the requirements of the reconstruction acts shall have been complied with by any of the rebel States in the formation of a constitution, and "said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom, as therein provided." This action of Congress, indorsed by the people, determined that neither House of Congress was authorized by itself to admit Senators or Representatives from any of the rebel States till Congress should determine by law that such State was entitled to representation. The converse of the proposition was also equally determined—that it would be the duty of each House to admit duly elected and qualified Senators and Representatives from each of said States whenever Congress shall have determined by law that such State was entitled to representation.

After quoting the act of June 25, 1868, and other documents, Mr. Trumbull continues:

The foregoing extract, together with copies of official correspondence between Major-General Meade and General Grant, hereto attached, establish the fact that the legislature of Georgia fully complied with the requisitions of the act of June 25, 1868, and the fact of her ratification of the fourteenth amendment was duly proclaimed by the President, as also appears by a copy of the proclamation, hereto attached.

Congress having decided that Georgia was entitled to representation through the State government organized under the reconstruction acts, on complying with the conditions therein named, it is not competent for either House, now that the conditions have been complied with, to refuse admission to Members on the ground that the State is not entitled to representation. For either House to do so would be for such House to set aside a solemn act of Congress, passed by both Houses, and to repudiate the principle on which it differed with the President and went before the people in the popular elections. The House of Representatives, conforming to the law of Congress, has admitted to seats the Representatives from Georgia against whom no personal objection was made, without any further inquiry than whether Georgia had complied with the conditions of the act of June 25, 1868. No attempt was made in that body to revise the decision of Congress.

The assumption that the constitutional amendment was not adopted in good faith is not sustained by a particle of evidence before the committee, and is contradicted by the official report of Governor Bullock to General Meade, by the orders of General Meade, and those emanating from the General in Chief, by the proclamation of the President, made in pursuance of law, by the action of the House of Representatives in passing upon the admission of Members to that body, and by the acquiescence of all the departments of Government from July until now. If one branch of Congress is at liberty to deny a State representation on the ground that it did not act in good faith in agreeing to the conditions prescribed by Congress, what is to prevent either House of any other Congress, acting on a like assumption, from denying admission to Members from any other of the reconstructed States? It is well known that a large political party in the country believe the reconstruction acts unconstitutional. Should that party hereafter obtain ascendency in either House of Congress, is it to be at liberty to overturn the State governments which have been established in pursuance of law and to quote as a precedent the action of the Senate in this case? When are we to have peace and civil governments established in the late rebel States under such a policy? The question has been asked, If one person disqualified by the fourteenth amendment could be permitted to act as a member of the Georgia legislature, why not all; and if all, would it be pretended that it was a legislature organized in accordance with the reconstruction acts? Probably not; and the same question, with the same force, may be asked in reference to Congress or any other legislative body in the land. If a disqualified person or several such were permitted to act as Members of Congress or a State legislature, does anybody pretend that the action of the body would be vitiated thereby; and yet who would not admit that if a body of men were to assemble and undertake to act as the Congress or the legislature of a State, all of whom were disqualified from acting as such, that their action would have any validity? No such case is to be presumed, and no legislative body is justified or safe in basing its action on supposititious cases which never have and are not likely ever to occur. No such state of facts is presented in the case of Georgia. Not one in ten of the members of the senate, after deducting those from whom the disabilities had been removed by Congress, and not one in fifty of the members of the house were found disqualified by even the minority of the committee who investigated this subject, and each house decided all its members to be qualified. The constitution of Georgia, which was accepted by Congress, like that in all the other States, and like the Constitution of the United States, in regard to Congress, leaves to each house the exclusive right to judge for itself of the election and returns of its own members, and that judgment, when pronounced, is conclusive everywhere. There was not a shadow of anything deserving the name of evidence before the committee to show that either house of the legislature of Georgia acted corruptly or fraudulently in passing upon the right of members to their seats under the fourteenth amendment.

The Senate has no right, in the opinion of the undersigned, to revise the action of Congress, disregard its laws, and refuse Hill his seat, because in its opinion Georgia is not entitled to representation, when Congress has decided otherwise, and the Executive and the General in Chief have acted on that decision. It being admitted that Hill is entitled to his seat if Georgia is entitled to be represented in the Senate, and it being shown that Georgia has been declared by law to be entitled to representation on certain conditions, which are shown to have been complied with, the conclusion would seem to be irresistible that Hill was entitled to take his seat. That it is competent for the Senate, in passing upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members, to inquire whether the body by which a Senator was elected was the legislature of the State is not disputed; but it is not pretended that Georgia had any other legislative assembly than the one which elected Mr. Hill claiming to be a legislature. The legislative body which elected him was the one which was convened by the governor in pursuance of an act of Congress; the one which ratified the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution as proclaimed both by the President and Secretary of State, in accordance with the requirements of law; and the one, and the only one, which has been elected and assembled in said State under the constitution formed in pursuance of the reconstruction acts and approved by Congress. The legislature of Georgia, under its constitution, consists of 44 senators and 175 representatives, and the complaint is, not that the persons properly chosen and qualified would not and did not constitute the legislature, but that "there were a number of persons holding seats in both branches of the legislature that were and are not eligible under the fourteenth constitutional amendment."

Each house appointed committees, who investigated the question of the eligibility of the members of their respective houses under that amendment; and, on their report, each house decided that all its sitting members were entitled to seats. Whether these decisions were correct or not is not material to Hill's right to a seat, as it is not pretended, even by the minority of the committees appointed to investigate, that more than 4 senators out of 44, omitting those whose disabilities had been removed by act of Congress, and 3 representatives out of 175, were disqualified by the fourteenth amendment.

No evidence was taken by the Judiciary Committee to ascertain how many or whether any of the members of either house were ineligible.

The statements of letter writers and memorialists can not surely be treated as evidence upon which to overthrow a State government. The only reliable information the committee had on that subject is contained in the official report of Major-General Meade and the journal of the legislature, as published in a newspaper. From these it appears that only 4 senators and 3 representatives were complained against by any one in the legislature as disqualified by the fourteenth amendment.

If it were admitted that the decision of each house was wrong in regard to the eligibility of the members complained against it would not vitiate the proceedings of the legislature.

As to the expulsion of the colored members, Mr. Trumbull said:

Another objection urged against Mr. Hill's right to a seat is the fact that the legislature of Georgia unjustly denied the right of certain colored members to seats. However unjust this denial may have been, it did not take place till more than a month after Hill's election. He was elected July 28, and the colored members participated in all legislation till September 3.

It is difficult to perceive how an act subsequent to the election could affect its validity. If the legislature was properly organized when it elected Hill, the fact that it subsequently became disorganized ought not to affect his election.

On February 17 Mr. Stewart, from the Judiciary Committee, submitted a report against the admission of Mr. Miller, whose case was similar to that of Mr. Hill.

The Senate did not decide either of these cases at this session.

On March 9, 1869,[1] at the beginning of the next Congress, the credentials of Messrs. Hill and Miller were again referred to the Judiciary Committee, and on March 17, 1869, Mr. Trumbull reported from that committee the credentials, with the recommendation that they lie on the table until action should be taken on a bill to enforce the fourteenth amendment and the laws of the United States in the State of Georgia and to restore to that State the republican government elected under its new constitution.[2] Mr. Trumbull said he was opposed to the recommendation of the committee, and thought the credentials should be acted on at once. But no further action was taken at this session of Congress.

[1] First session Forty-first Congress, Globe, pp. 31, 102.

[2] Such a law was passed and approved December 22, 1869 (16 Stat. L., p. 59), and provided for summoning the legislature and testing their loyalty by oath, and also forbade the exclusion of members because of color.

At the next session, on February 14, 1870,[1] the credentials of Messrs. Miller and Hill were again taken from the files and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On July 15, 1870,[2] Mr. Stewart presented the credentials of Richard H. Whiteley, elected to fill the term for which Mr. Miller was a claimant, and of Henry P. Farrow, elected to fill the term for which Mr. Hill was a claimant. These credentials were laid on the table.

On December 13, 1870, at the next session, the credentials of Messrs. Whiteley and Farrow were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on January 23, 1871,[3] Mr. Trumbull submitted a report from that committee. Five members, Messrs. Trumbull, Edmunds, Conking, Matt H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, and Allan G. Thurman, of Ohio, concurred in the report. Two, Messrs. Stewart and Rice, signed minority views.

Messrs. Farrow and Whiteley had been elected in 1870 by the same legislature that had elected Messrs. Hill and Miller in 1868. But between the two acts the legislature had been purged in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress of December 22, 1869, disloyal members being excluded and the wrongfully excluded colored members being restored. The question before the Judiciary Committee in this instance was whether Messrs. Hill and Miller were to be seated, or Messrs. Farrow and Whiteley. The majority of the committee decided in favor of seating Mr. Hill, and found that Mr. Miller would be entitled to a seat when his disabilities should be removed.

The report of the committee recites the history of reconstruction in Georgia, and gives the details as to the purging of the legislature, quoting from a report of the Senate Judiciary Committee to show that steps unwarranted by law were taken in the course of that process. The history of the elections of the two sets of Senators is also given, with conclusion as follows:

> The general assembly was organized in July, 1868, in prima facie accordance with the constitution of the State, the reconstruction acts of Congress, and the orders of the military department. It complied in form with all the requirements necessary to entitle the State to representation in Congress, and Members were accordingly admitted into the House of Representatives of the United States in 1868. Whether either or both houses of the general assembly of Georgia admitted persons to sit as members in their respective bodies who were disqualified by the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution was at the time a disputed question; but each house appointed a committee to consider that question, after whose report it was voted by each house that all its members were qualified. These reports and the action upon the same appear in the appendix to the report made to the Senate by this committee, by Mr. Stewart, at the third session of the Fortieth Congress, and are hereto annexed, marked "Exhibit G." The general assembly thus organized not only elected Senators of the United States, but it also elected, as required by the State constitution, State officers, to wit, a secretary of state, a comptroller-general, and a State treasurer, all of whom have since been discharging the duties of their respective offices without question. At the same session judges of the various courts throughout the State were appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, who have since been and are now presiding in the various courts of the State. The legislature thus organized passed laws authorizing the borrowing of money and affecting the general interests of the State, none of which have ever been held or supposed to be invalid for the reason that the legislature which enacted them was not properly organized. The reason for the passage of the act of Congress of December 22, 1869, requiring a reorganization of the general assembly is to be found in the wrongful expulsion by the general assembly in September,

[3] Senate Report No. 308, third session Forty-first Congress.

1868, of its colored members, in the seating of the minority candidates in their places, and in continuing in their seats members believed to be disqualified, and in the general disorder and violence which prevailed in the State. That act did not declare the general assembly as organized in July, 1868, to have been illegal, or its acts, other than those referred to in the act itself, invalid; but it provided for correcting the wrongful and revolutionary acts which had been done by it as organized in July, 1868. It is not believed that the act of December 22, 1869, would ever have been passed had the colored members been permitted to retain their seats and the peace of the State been preserved.

The body of the general assembly as organized in July, 1868, and as reorganized in January, 1870, is not essentially different. Of the 44 senators and 173 members declared elected by General Meade, only 5 senators and 19 representatives who participated in the organization of July, 1868, were excluded or failed to participate in the reorganization in January, 1870, and 21 minority candidates were improperly admitted to seats in the general assembly, as reorganized, in their places. The general assembly as organized in July, 1868, and at the time of the election of Hill and Miller, contained in each house a constitutional quorum of legal members. All the contestants maintained the position before the committee that the ineligibility or disqualification of individual members of either house, not sufficiently numerous to affect its constitutional quorum, was an immaterial issue. Your committee have not, therefore, deemed it necessary to discuss that question further than to state the facts in regard to it. Three of the claimants—Joshua Hill, W. P. Farrow, and R. H. Whiteley—have had their political disabilities removed by act of Congress of June 25 and July 20, 1868. H. V. M. Miller never labored under ally of the political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; but it is admitted that he acted as a surgeon in the rebel army under an appointment from a colonel of a rebel regiment, and having thus given aid to persons in hostility to the United States, can not take the oath required by the act of July 2, 1862.

The act of July 11, 1868, prescribes a qualified oath to be taken by persons elected or appointed to office from whom political disabilities have been removed. Your committee are of opinion that Joshua Hill was duly elected by a legislature having authority to elect Senators, and is entitled to take his seat on taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws. Miller, however, is not relieved from taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, and in the opinion of your committee is not entitled to take his seat; and it follows from the conclusion of the committee as to the proceedings in the election of Hill and Miller that neither Farrow nor Whitely is entitled to a seat.

The committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That Joshua Hill has been duly elected Senator of the United States by the legislature of the State of Georgia, and is entitled to take his seat on taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws.

In the minority views, which favored the seating of Messrs. Farrow and Whiteley, Mr. Stewart argued that the act of June 25, 1868, provided that Georgia, with certain other States, should be admitted to representation in Congress, when they had complied with certain conditions. And he held that the conduct of the Georgia legislature had been violative of those conditions. He says in the minority views:

We have been able to find no case in the history of the Government where Senators have been admitted from a State not entitled to representation in Congress at the time of their election.

There are many cases in which this legislative declaration was not made until after the election of Senators. This has occurred in the admission of new States where the organization of the State and the election of Senators had occurred previous to the admission. But in those cases the act of admission was an approval of the organization that had preceded it, and amounted to a legislative declaration that the State at the time of the election of Senators was entitled to representation. In each of these cases the loyal status of the State was unquestioned, and the act of Congress admitting such State was construed to relate back to the election of Senators and to amount to a legislative declaration that the State at the time of the election was entitled to representation. This principle can not help the case of Hill and Miller, for at the time the declaration was made by the act of July 15, 1870, that the State of Georgia was entitled to representation, the status of things had been changed in Georgia by the reorganization of the legislature. This declaration related to the then existing condition of the State.

Congress has already in effect decided that the necessary legislative declaration that Georgia was entitled to representation was not made prior to the election of Hill and Miller. The act of December 22, 1869, "to promote the reconstruction of Georgia," can be justified upon no other theory than that reconstruction in that State was not then an accomplished fact. After a compliance with this act, and not before, we have the declaration in the act of July 15, 1870, that "it is hereby declared that the State of Georgia is entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States." If this act relates back to the date of the election of Hill and Miller, their exclusion from seats in this body from July, 1868, until now is wholly without justification, and the act of December 22, 1869, was an exercise of power over a State entitled to representation for which there is no precedent and which, if exercised in the case of Massachusetts or Ohio, would, to say the least, be open to grave constitutional doubts. It directs the governor to convene the persons originally elected to the legislature, and requires those persons, as a qualification for seats in that body, to take and subscribe to an oath hitherto unknown to the laws of the State of Georgia or of the United States; and it also required them to reorganize the legislature by electing officers, who shall also be required to take the same oath. It requires the legislature to ratify the fifteenth amendment before Senators and Representatives shall be admitted to seats in Congress, and prescribes various other matters, all pertaining to the reconstruction of a rebel State, and never applied to a loyal State whose practical relations to the Union were not disturbed. We venture to affirm that the Senate and House of Representatives in voting for that act did so upon the theory that they were reconstructing a rebel State, and not upon the theory that they were dealing with a State whose practical relations with the United States had never been disturbed, or which, having been disturbed, were then fully restored. It seems clear that the requirement alone that the legislature should ratify the fifteenth amendment before Senators and Representatives should be admitted from Georgia was in itself a declaration that Georgia was not, on the 22d of December, 1869, entitled to representation. But after the reorganization of the legislature under this act, the whole matter was again submitted to Congress, and Congress accepted the State as then organized. The act of July 15, 1870, was a legislative declaration that the State was then entitled to representation under the organization of the legislature as then existing, and related back to the commencement of the then existing state of things, namely, the reorganization of the legislature in January, 1870. This was a declaration that Georgia was entitled to representation at the time of the election of Farrow and Whiteley.

The language of the act of July, 1870, is "that the State of Georgia, having complied with the reconstruction acts, and the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of amendments to the Constitution of the United States having been ratified in good faith by a legal legislature of said State, it is hereby declared that the State of Georgia is entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States."

How can it be claimed that this language refers to the organization in 1868, in view of the facts in this case? Had the State of Georgia complied with the reconstruction acts at that date?

If this be so, Congress stultified itself in passing the act of the 22d of December, 1869, to promote the reconstruction of Georgia, eighteen months after she had fully complied with the reconstruction acts under which the other States were admitted.

It seems clear that this language embraced all the reconstruction laws with which Georgia was required to comply, including the act of December, 1869. It is evident that Congress intended to declare, and did declare, that after the compliance with the last-named act, and not before, Georgia was entitled to representation.

It is too late to question the propriety of these acts by either House, acting separately, upon the credentials of its Members, for it is too well established that Congress must determine when a State is entitled to representation. After that determination has been made, neither House, acting alone, can question its validity, but each House is confined, in passing upon the credentials of its Members, to matters of election and qualification.

We have shown that Hill and Miller were not elected from a State which at the time was entitled to representation by any act of Congress, from which it follows that they are not entitled to seats in the Senate.

We have also shown that Farrow and Whiteley were elected by a legislature of a State which Congress recognized as duly organized by declaring the State entitled to representation.

The election of these gentlemen seems to have been regular and a substantial compliance with law, and we therefore conclude that they are entitled to their seats.

* * * * * * *

It is suggested that there is some doubt about the regularity of the election of Mr. Farrow, for the reason that there was no quorum present in the house of representatives at the time of his election. The records show that the house, when reorganized, and disloyal members excluded, consisted of 154 members, and Mr. Farrow alleges that 1 member, Robert Lumpkin, who had been sworn in, died before the Senatorial election, leaving the number 153. A quorum of this number would be 77. The number of persons present and voting was 82, of which Mr. Farrow received 80. But it is said that minority men were improperly admitted. We might answer this by saying they were admitted by the legislature, and that the Senate will not ordinarily review the action of that body in deciding upon the qualification of its own members.

But if the Senate would enter upon such an investigation under any circumstances (which on mature reflection we now think may be open to some doubt) it can not be called upon to do so in this case. The question of the proper organization of the legislature in January, 1870, was, at the last session, under investigation in both Houses, on the passage of the act of July 15, 1870. The report of the Judiciary Committee of the 2d of March last, printed as a part of the majority report, recommends that no further legislation be had to perfect the organization of the legislature of Georgia as it then existed, and Congress, acting on that report, decided it to be a legal legislature.

But admitting that the minority men were improperly received, the result would be the same.

The number of members declared elected in General Meade's order, who were allowed to qualify and retain their seats, leaving out of the calculation those who are known as "minority men," was 141.

Deducting Mr. Lumpkin, who is alleged to have died before the Senatorial election, and we have 140. Necessary to a quorum, 71. Number of persons present and voting on the election of Mr. Farrow, 71. Of this number Mr. Farrow received 69. Thus it appears in either case a quorum was present, and Mr. Farrow had a majority of that quorum.

All other matters in regard to the election of Messrs. Farrow and Whiteley we believe, are admitted to have been regular.

We therefore recommend for adoption a resolution declaring Henry P. Farrow and Richard H. Whiteley elected, and entitled to seats in the Senate on taking the oaths required by law.

The report was debated at length on January 30 and 31 and February 1.[1] On January 30[2] an amendment offered by Mr. Stewart declaring Messrs. Farrow and Whiteley entitled to take seats upon taking the oath, was disagreed to—yeas 19, nays 36. On February 1[3] an amendment striking out the name of Joshua Hill in the resolution of the majority and inserting the name of Henry P. Farrow was disagreed to—yeas 19, nays 36. Then the resolution seating Mr. Hill was agreed to without division, and he appeared and took the oath.

On February 24,[4] after a bill prescribing the form of oath to be taken by him had been passed by the House and signed by the President[5] Mr. Miller appeared and took the oath.

Instance wherein the Senate admitted a person chosen before Congress had admitted a reconstructed State to representation.

Construction of the law specifying the time when a legislature shall proceed to the election of a Senator.

The Senate has declined to permit a contestant to be heard on the floor of the Senate in his own case.

On April 1, 1870,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Thomas W. Osborn, of Florida, presented the credentials of Ossian B. Hart as Senator-elect from Florida for the term for which Mr. Abijah Gilbert was already occupying a seat. Accompanying the certificate was a memorial of Mr. Hart, setting forth the reasons on which he based his claim to Mr. Gilbert's seat. On motion of Mr. Osborn the papers were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On April 13, 1870,[2] Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, submitted the report of the committee, as follows:

In consequence of the rebellion the State of Florida was without representation in the Senate of the United States from 1861 till 1868. In pursuance of a constitution framed and adopted under what are known as the reconstruction acts, a legislature convened in Florida, Monday, June 8, 1868, the members of the assembly and half of the senate having been elected for two years and the other half of the senate for four years.

This legislature, on the 16th day of June, 1868, being the second Tuesday after its meeting and organization, proceeded, in accordance with the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, "regulating the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," to take action for the election of two United States Senators to fill the then existing vacancies for the terms expiring on the 3d of March, 1869, and the 3d of March, 1873. On Wednesday, the day following that on which each house had separately, but without result, voted for Senators to fill the two existing vacancies, the members of the two houses, convened in joint assembly, elected a Senator to fill the vacancy expiring March 3, 1869, and adjourned till the next day, when they again assembled and elected a Senator for the term expiring March 3, 1873, and adjourned without date.

The next day (Friday) the members of the two houses, each house having previously concurred in a resolution to that effect, assembled again in joint convention for the election of a Senator to succeed the one whose term would expire on the 3d of March, 1869, when Abijah Gilbert, the present sitting Member was elected.

The petitioner was chosen by the same legislature in January, 1870, to represent the State in the Senate for the term commencing March 4, 1869, and now claims the seat occupied by Mr. Gilbert.

The elections of 1868 all took place before the passage of the act of June 25, 1868, which declared Florida entitled to representation in Congress.

Two objections are taken to the election of the sitting Member:

1. That he was chosen by the legislature of a State not at the time recognized as entitled to representation in Congress.

2. That he was not elected in conformity with the act of July 25, 1866.

The first objection is answered by the fact that the subsequent recognition of the State as entitled to representation under the Constitution, in pursuance of which the legislature was elected and organized, related back to and made valid its acts from the time of its organization. Senators and Representatives from several of the reconstructed States have been chosen before the States were declared entitled to representation, and no one has ever questioned their right to seats when Congress subsequently recognized the government under which they were chosen as entitled to representation.

The only ground for the other objection arises from the fact that the legislature failed to take action on the "second Tuesday after its organization" in regard to the third Senator who was to be elected, but it took action on the subject of electing Senators and actually voted, though unsuccessfully, on that day for persons to fill the two existing vacancies.

The object of the act of Congress was to insure the election of Senators by the proper legislature, and to fix a time when proceedings for that purpose should be commenced and continued till the elections were effected.

The legislature by which the sitting Member was elected was the one chosen next preceding the term which would commence on the 4th of March, 1869, and was therefore the proper legislature to elect. "The second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the legislature" was the time prescribed by the act of Congress for initiating the election of Senators, and that was the time when the legislature proceeded to that business. There being three Senators to elect, it took action on that day only in reference to two of them. Did its failure to take action on that day and the two subsequent days (which were occupied in electing the first two Senators) in reference to the third Senator render his election, in all other respects regular, invalid? The committee think not.

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, Globe, pp. 2330, 2331.

[2] Senate Report No. 101, Globe, p. 2639.

The language of the law is: "In case no person shall receive such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature and take at least one vote till a Senator shall be elected." No formal adjournment from day to day by vote of the joint assembly was necessary, but it was the duty of the members of each house to meet in joint assembly at noon of each day and vote at least once till all the Senators whom the legislature had the right to elect were chosen. This is exactly what the legislature did.

In no view which the committee can take would the petitioner be entitled to a seat in the Senate, for if the election of the sitting Senator was irregular, that of the petitioner, by the same legislature at a subsequent session, was equally so.

The committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That Abijah Gilbert was duly elected a Senator from the State of Florida for the term commencing March 4, 1869, and is entitled to hold his seat as such.

On April 15, 1870,[1] Mr. Trumbull presented the memorial of Mr. Hart, who prayed that he might be permitted to address the Senate on the subject of his claim, as he conceived that the report did not take what he considered the correct view of the case. The application was debated briefly, and it was stated that in the other House contestants were frequently heard, and that in a previous case from Florida the Senate itself had set such a precedent. But the general opinion of the Senate concurred in the view expressed by Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, that the merits of the case could not fail to be tried searchingly without the introduction of new talent. Therefore Mr. Hart's petition was laid on the table.

On April 28,[2] the report came up, but was not debated except for the reading of a brief written argument, written by Mr. Hart, but presented by Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, and read in his time.

The resolution confirming Mr. Gilbert's title to the seat was then agreed to without division.

393. The Senate election cases relating to Goldthwaite, Blodgett, and Norwood, from Alabama and Georgia, in the Forty-second Congress.

The Senate declined to give immediate prima facie effect to regular credentials impeached by a memorial alleging irregularities in constitution of the State legislature and suggesting personal disqualifications of the bearer.

On February 8, 1871,[3] in the Senate, Mr. George E. Spencer, of Alabama, presented the credentials of George Goldthwaite, elected a Senator by the legislature of Alabama, for the term of six years commencing March 4, 1871.

On March 4, 1871,[4] at the time of swearing in Senators-elect, Mr. Goldthwaite appeared to take the oath, when Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, presented the following protest, signed by 45 members of the legislature of Alabama:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., January 26, 1871.

To the Senate of the United States:

The subscribers, members of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Alabama, respectfully represent:

That they protest against the admission of Hon. George Goldthwaite to the Senate of the United States as a Senator from Alabama, on the grounds that he was not elected by a majority of the legal votes of the joint meeting of the legislature. He was declared elected by the following vote: For George Goldthwaite, 65 votes; for Willard Warner, 50; for William J. Haralson, 14 votes. It will be seen that 65 votes constitute a majority of the votes cast, and that number of legal votes are necessary to an election.

We represent that Hon. George Goldthwaite did not receive that number of legal votes, as B. M. Henry, claiming to be a representative from Russell County, in said State, who voted for Hon. George Goldthwaite, was not elected by the people of said county, did not have a certificate of his election, as is required by our laws, but was defeated at the polls by several hundred, and was not legally entitled to vote for a United States Senator in said joint meeting of the legislature, which, if said illegal votes had been rejected, would have been sufficient to prevent the announcement of the election of Hon. George Goldthwaite to a seat in your honorable body.

Saul Bradford, of Talladega County, who had been rejected by the people at the ballot box, was permitted to vote for said Hon. George Goldthwaite, when in our opinion his vote should have been rejected, as he had never been legally elected a member of the legislature.

In the counties of Greene, Sumter, Lee, and other counties, the representatives of which all voted for Hon. George Goldthwaite, we have every reason to believe that the elections of said representatives were procured by intimidating the voters, and in several instances fraud added thereto, and that the gentlemen claiming to be representatives of these counties were not legally elected by the people of said counties, are not their legal representatives, and were not entitled to vote for United States Senator at the joint meeting of the general assembly.

We are informed that some of the members of the legislature who voted for Hon. George Goldthwaite are laboring under political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and it is an inquiry worthy the consideration of the Senate of the United States whether Hon. George Goldthwaite is not laboring under the same disabilities for his actions during the recent rebellion of the Southern States.

Believing, therefore, that Hon. George Goldthwaite is not legally elected Senator from Alabama, we respectfully pray that the Senate of the United States may so decide, and declare his seat vacant.

It appeared that Mr. Goldthwaite's credentials were in regular form, signed by the acknowledged governor, under the seal of the State, and that there was no question that the legislature which had elected was the rightful legislature.

In the debate Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, urged that the memorial made no case against the Senator-elect. The Senate had never undertaken to canvass the question of the eligibility of the members of a legislature.

Mr. Sherman replied that the memorial related to much more than an inquiry whether one person or another was elected to the legislature. It showed that an intruder had cast a deciding vote, and also that in several counties of the State the right of the electors had been denied by force and fraud. In large portions of the State a quasi war had existed. There was a question also as to whether or not the claimant was qualified.

The matter was debated at considerable length on this day, and then the credentials and protest were temporarily tabled. During the debate the Rhode Island case of Asher Robbins was frequently referred to.

On the same day, March 4,[1] the Vice-President laid before the Senate the credentials of Foster Blodgett, Senator elect from Georgia. These credentials were in due form, but there had been filed a memorial of certain members of the late general assembly of the State of Georgia protesting against the admission of Mr. Blodgett to a seat for the following reasons:

That the election was not held in accordance with the law of Congress approved July 26, 1866, in that the legislature was not the body chosen "next preceding the expiration of the time for which" said Blodgett was elected to represent said State in Congress. The legislature which elected him was elected in April, 1868, and another legislature was chosen in December last, previous to the occurrence of the vacancy, upon whom, under the law, devolves the duty of electing the Senator.

That at the time said Blodgett was elected the constitution of said State required that the legislature to be elected in the fall of 1870 should assemble on the second Wednesday in January, 1871, prior to the occurrence of the vacancy; but that the day of meeting was wrongfully changed to November, 1871, with a view, as we believe, of creating a pretended necessity for an election of Senator by the old legislature. This change was not made until after the election of said Blodgett, thereby by a mere trick defeating an expression of the voice of the people in accordance with the laws of the United States.

That the election is, furthermore, illegal in this, that at the time said Blodgett was elected a quorum of the house of representatives of said general assembly was not present, as is shown by the journals of that body.

For which reasons we pray that said election be not recognized by your honorable body, and that the legislature elected next preceding the occurrence of said vacancy, which will assemble in November next, be allowed to elect a Senator to represent this State in your honorable body, as provided by the law of Congress, etc.

The credentials and memorial were temporarily laid on the table.

On March 13, 1871,[1] the papers in the cases of Messrs. Goldthwaite and Blodgett were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

394. The Senate election case relating to Goldthwaite and others, continued.

The Senate failed to follow its committee in giving prima facie effect to regular credentials impeached by allegations that the legislature had been elected in violation of the provisions of Federal law.

Senate decision as to the time when a legislature should fill a vacancy in the United States Senate.

An instance wherein a Senate committee reported in a single resolution their conclusions as to the election cases of claimants from different States.

A Senate ruling that the division of a question depends on grammatical structure rather than on the substance involved.

On March 20[2] Mr. William M. Stewart, of Nevada, submitted the following report:

That said credentials are in due form and prima facie entitle said Goldthwaite and Blodgett to their seats upon taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution and laws, neither of them being under any disability.

The grounds on which their right to seats are contested have not been fully considered by the committee for want of time, nor will there be sufficient time at this session to consider them. In the opinion of your committee it would be unjust to those States and gentlemen to keep the latter out of their seats until such investigation can be had.

The committee therefore report the following resolution:

Resolved, That George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett be permitted to take seats in this body upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which their rights to seats, respectively, are contested, and hereafter make reports to the Senate thereon.

B. F. RICE.

We concur in the foregoing as to Goldthwaite, but not as to Blodgett.

JOSHUA HILL.
A. G. THURMAN.

On March 22[1] the resolution was taken up for consideration, and at once Mr. Joshua Hill, of Georgia, raised a question that the cases of the two claimants should be passed on separately, and proposed a division of the question.

The Vice-President[2] held, however, that the resolution was not divisible, as it did not conform to the rule which required that after the division each portion should present a substantive proposition.

Mr. Thurman dissented from this decision, holding that it was the subject and not the grammar which should control. But the Vice-President adhered to his decision, and in the subsequent proceedings the Senate separated the two propositions by amendment.

Mr. Joshua Hill, of Georgia, in order to separate the two propositions, moved to strike out the words "and Foster Blodgett."

The questions involved in the resolution and amendment were debated on March 25 and April 6 and 10.[3] It was objected that the case of Mr. Blodgett differed materially from the case of Mr. Goldthwaite. It does not appear that there was opposition to the swearing in of the latter. But there was opposition to the administration of the oath to Mr. Blodgett on the ground that there was a question as to the competency of the legislature. Mr. Thurman insisted that this question was essentially part of the prima facie case. The Senate sitting in a case like this was bound like every court to take notice of the laws and constitution of a State in regard to its legislature.

On behalf of the majority it was urged that the Senate was accustomed to seat persons bearing credentials regular in form except in cases where there was a question as to the right of a State to representation or as to the qualifications of the person bearing the credentials. The question as to the legislature of Georgia was a law question, and one that might well be examined and decided after the bearer of the credentials had been sworn in on his prima facie title.

On April 11[4] the subject was tabled to make way for other business, by a vote of 19 yeas to 17 nays.

At the next session of the Congress, on December 4, 1871,[5] Mr. Thurman presented the credentials of Thomas M. Norwood as Senator from Georgia for the six years commencing March 4, 1871. On December 11[1] the credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On December 182 Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, submitted a report as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Foster Blodgett and Thomas M. Norwood, each claiming a seat as Senator from the State of Georgia for the term which commenced March 4, 1871, respectfully submit the following report:

The Senate being a branch of the Government of the United States, the right to elect a Senator is conferred and its exercise regulated by the Constitution of the United States, and no law or regulation of a State touching such election has any validity beyond the authority conferred upon the State by the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution, Article 1, section 3, provides that Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the respective States. Section 4 of the same article provides:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The first clause of this section commits to the legislatures of the States primarily the whole subject of electing Senators and Representatives, and authorizes them to make such regulations upon the subject as they may deem 'proper. The phrase "the times, places, and manner of holding such elections for Senators and Representatives "embraces the whole subject of election of Senator except that the election must be made by the legislature of the State, as provided in the third section. The legislature may therefore provide that a Senator shall be elected by the legislature to be chosen next before the expiration of a term or next after its commencement. The second clause, quoted from the fourth section, confers upon Congress the same power and absolute control over the subject, to be exercised in the discretion of Congress, except that Congress can not fix a place for holding the election different from that fixed by the State legislature.

In the exercise of this undoubted constitutional power Congress passed an act regulating the election of Senators, approved July 25, 1866 (14 Stat. L., p. 243), which provides:

"The legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress in place of such Senator so going out of office."

Foster Blodgett claims to have been elected on the 15th day of February, A. D. 1870, by the legislature then existing and in session. He received the requisite number of votes, and his credentials are in due form. The question, therefore, is whether it was competent for that legislature to elect a Senator to serve during the term before mentioned. If this question can be answered in the affirmative, Mr. Blodgett is entitled to the seat; if not, his pretended election was an absolute nullity. The answer to this question depends upon the true construction of the act of Congress before quoted. It is claimed by Mr. Blodgett that chosen and elected mean different thin,"; that legislators are elected by the people, but that legislators are not the legislature, and that the legislature is not chosen until the members elected assemble as provided by law and organize as a legislature by determining what persons elected or claiming to be elected are entitled to seats. That is, the people elect the legislators, and the legislators after their election choose the legislature, and hence the legislature which was in fact organized next preceding the expiration of the term of office is the one authorized to elect a successor without regard to the time when the members of such legislature were elected by the people.

This refinement of reasoning does not meet the approbation of your committee. The question is, What was the intention of Congress in passing this act? The legislature designated by the act is the one "which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time," etc. There is no such thing as choosing a legislature except by choosing its members. The Constitution declares that Senators shall be elected by the legislature of each State. Hence the act of Congress employs the same phrase. But your committee can not doubt that it was the intention of Congress to provide that the legislature whose members should be elected next preceding the expiration of the Senatorial term should elect the successor. The distinction sought to be established between the words elected and chosen derives no support from popular or legal lexicography. Elected is defined chosen and chosen is defined elected, and the words are used as synonymous in the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of every State, in all our statutes, and in all popular literature. It is a universal rule of construction, applicable to constitutions and statutes, that words are to be understood in their popular, commonly received meaning, and to force upon this statute so unnatural a construction would defeat the intention of Congress, manifest in the act itself, and violate the fundamental principle of free government which doubtless inspired the passage of the act.

[2] Globe, p. 171; Senate Report No. 10.

The legislature which was in session on the 15th day of February, 1870, when Mr. Blodgett claims to have been elected, was chosen in April, 1868. By the constitution and laws of Georgia then in force it was provided that another legislature should be elected on Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1870, and that the legislature so to be elected should meet and organize on the second Wednesday in January, 1871. Thus it will be seen that at the time Mr. Blodgett claims to have been elected there was to be another legislature elected and organized prior to the expiration of the term for which Mr. Blodgett claims to have been elected to serve. Therefore, as the case then stood, the action of that legislature in the premises was without authority and directly in contravention of the act of Congress upon that subject. It is not claimed that Mr. Blodgett was elected at any other time or by any other legislature. The validity of his election must depend upon the state of case then existing. If the legislature had no authority to elect him at that time, their pretending to do so conferred upon him no right to claim this seat. If he has any rights they vested by that election, and were perfect as soon as the election was completed. His election was either valid or void; if valid, no subsequent action of the legislature could impair his rights; if void, no subsequent action of the legislature, short of another election, could entitle him to this seat.

Subsequently to Mr. Blodgett's pretended election the legislature provided by law, as it was authorized to do by the constitution of the State, that the legislature which was to be elected in November, 1870, and organized in January, 1871, as required by law at the time of Blodgett's pretended election, should not be elected until December, 1870, and should not convene and organize until November, 1871. But if your committee are right in their construction of the act of Congress, the legislature which convened in November, 1871, was the legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of the Senatorial term, and, consequently, that legislature was the one which was authorized to elect the successor; and this legislature did, in fact, elect Mr. Norwood. The fact that the State for months after the expiration of the former term, March 4, 1871, was without full representation in the Senate is not the fault of the act of Congress. The legislature authorized under the act of Congress to make this election would have been elected in November, 1870, and convened in January, 1871, and might have elected a Senator prior to the expiration of the former term but for the action of the State in postponing the election and organization of the legislature authorized to elect the successor. The State can not complain of its own act, nor ask the Senate to disregard the act of Congress, because the State has intentionally omitted to comply with the act of Congress, and avail itself of its provisions.

Therefore, Mr. Norwood having been duly elected at the first session of the legislature which was chosen prior to the expiration of the former term, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Thomas M. Norwood is entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Georgia for the term commencing March 4, 1871, and that he be admitted to the same.

On December 19[1] the Senate agreed to the resolution and Mr. Norwood appeared and took the oath.

On December 21[2] Mr. Thurman submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That George Goldthwaite be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama, upon taking the oath, and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon.

[1] Globe, p. 211

[2] Second session Forty-second Congress, Globe, p. 261.

Mr. Thurman urged that, as Mr. Goldthwaite had credentials regular in form, he was entitled to the seat by prima facie title. He had examined all the precedents from the beginning of the Government, and had not found a single case where a Member-elect with such a title had been denied the seat. Had it not been for the complication with the case of Mr. Blodgett, Mr. Goldthwaite would have been seated long since.

Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, said that so far as the alleged election of members of the legislature by fraud was concerned, and the alleged participation of an intruder were concerned, those were questions to be determined by the legislature. The question as to whether or not members of the legislature were under disabilities imposed by the Constitution of the United States was one which the Senate had a right to inquire into.

On January 9[1] Mr. Thurman called up the report of the committee on Mr. Goldthwaite's case, and proposed this substitute for the resolution therein presented:

amend the resolution by. striking out all after the word "resolved," and in lieu thereof inserting:

"That George Goldthwaite be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon."

It was determined in the affirmative; and on the question to agree to the resolution as amended, it was determined in the affirmative. So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On January 15 Mr. Goldthwaite appeared and took the oath.

395. The Senate election case of Reynolds v. Hamilton, of Texas, in the Forty-second Congress.

Conflicting credentials being presented, and a question of law appearing, the Senate swore in neither contestant until after examination by a committee.

Decision by the Senate as to authority of a legislature to elect Senators before the date when the State became entitled to representation.

On July 13, 1870,[2] in the Senate, the credentials of Morgan C. Hamilton, as Senator from Texas for the term of six years, commencing on March 4, 1871, were presented.

On March 3, 1871,[3] the credentials of Joseph J. Reynolds, as Senator for the same State and the same term, were also presented.

On March 4, 1871,[4] at the time of swearing in Senators-elect, Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Texas relating to the cases affected by the credentials. Mr. Morton also stated that the credentials of Mr. Reynolds did not bear the signature of the governor, it having been omitted by inadvertence, evidently. The seal of the State had been placed thereon and they were certified in proper form by the secretary of state.

The papers were laid on the table for inquiry.

On March 13, 1871,[1] on motion of Mr. Henry B. Anthony of Rhode Island:

Ordered, That the credentials of Joseph J. Reynolds and the credentials of Morgan C. Hamilton, with the resolution of the legislature of Texas, declaring the election of said Hamilton on the 22d of February, 1870, as Senator from that State for six years from March 4, 1871, illegal, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On March 15,[2] the Vice-President laid before the Senate the credentials of J.J. Reynolds, elected a Senator in Congress by the legislature of the State of Texas for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

The credentials were read.

The letter accompanying the credentials states that inadvertently the governor had not signed the credentials presented March 3.

On March 18[3] Mr. William M. Stewart, of Nevada, submitted the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

That in pursuance of the several acts of Congress for the reconstruction of the State of Texas the legislature convened on the 8th and completed its organization on the 10th of February, 1870. On the 22d of February, 1870, second Tuesday after its organization, the legislature elected the Hon. Morgan C. Hamilton a Senator of the United States for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1871.

The same legislature on the same day elected the Hon. J. W. Flanagan a Senator of the United States for the term ending March 3, 1875, and the Hon. Morgan C. Hamilton for the term ending March 3, 1871. These last two elections were to fill vacancies then existing, and both of these Senators were admitted to their seats.

By the constitution of Texas there was another session of the same legislature held in Texas after the election of Mr. Hamilton and before the expiration of his term. This session commenced on the 10th of January, 1871, and on the second Tuesday after its organization proceeded to the election of a Senator for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1871, the same term for which Mr. Hamilton had been elected at the preceding session.

Gen. J.J. Reynolds is represented to have been elected, although the certificate referred to the committee is not signed by the governor.

The reasons assigned for the election of General Reynolds are that the legislature had no authority to elect Mr. Hamilton at the time of his election, first, because the State had not at that time been recognized as entitled to representation in Congress; and, secondly, because there was another session of the legislature after the election of Mr. Hamilton and before the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

The case of Hon. Abijah Gilbert, Senator from Florida, is precisely in point upon both of these questions.

The act of Congress of July 25, 1866, declares "that the legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress in the place of such Senator so going out of office, in the following manner."

The fact that the State was not admitted to representation until after the election of Mr. Hamilton is immaterial. The act admitting Texas to representation related back to the organization, and ratified the proceedings of the legislature.

The committee therefore recommend that Mr. Hamilton be permitted to take his seat on taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the laws.

Therefore the committee recommended this resolution:

"Resolved, That Morgan C. Hamilton was duly elected a Senator from the State of Texas for the term commencing March 4, 1871, and is entitled to take his seat as such upon taking the required oaths."

This resolution was agreed to without division.[4]

On March 20[5] Mr. Hamilton appeared and took the oath.

Chapter XII.

ELECTORATES IN NEW STATES AND TERRITORIES.

396. The House declined to admit the Member-elect from Illinois until the State had been formally admitted to the "Union.

The Speaker asked the decision of the House when a Member-elect from a State not yet admitted to the Union presented himself to be sworn.

On November 19, 1818,[1] Mr. John McLean, Representative from Illinois, being in attendance, the Speaker stated to the House a difficulty which he felt in deciding whether or not to administer the oath to Mr. McLean, in the absence of action by Congress on the admission of the State.

Objection was made, especially by Mr. Timothy Pitkin, of Connecticut, who thought that before admitting a Representative to a seat, the question whether the people who elected him were a State ought to be decided.

The question being put, it was decided that the Speaker should not administer the oath. Then the House ordered the constitution of Illinois referred to a select committee.

On the following day that committee reported a joint resolution declaring the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States. This was passed by the Senate, and on December 4 a message was received from the President announcing his signature.

Thereupon Mr. McLean produced his credentials, and the oath was administered to him.

397. The House declined to admit the Member-elect from Michigan except as a spectator—until the act admitting Michigan to the Union had become a law.

It is not necessary that a State be admitted to the Union before it may elect a Representative to Congress.

[1] Second session, Fifteenth Congress, Journal, pp. 22, 25, 61, Annals, pp. 296, 297, 306–311, 342.

On December 16, 1835,[1] the Speaker submitted to the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1885.

SIR: Inclosed is a certificate of my election as a Representative of the State of Michigan in the Congress of the United States. It is my desire that the same may be presented to the consideration of the body over which you have the honor to preside.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ISAAC E. CRARY.

Hon. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

As the question of the admission of Michigan into the Union was still pending, a question was raised and the consideration of the subject went over until December 28, when Mr. Samuel Beardsley, of New York, under suspension of the rules, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That Isaac E. Crary, who claims to have been duly elected a member of this House, be admitted as a spectator, within the hall, during the sittings of the House.

Mr. Beardsley stated that this resolution was in accordance with the precedent at the time when the admission of the State of Tennessee was pending.

The resolution was agreed to by the House.

On January 27, 1837,[2] the bill entitled "An act to admit the State of Michigan into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," passed by the two Houses of Congress, having been approved and signed by the President of the United States, and the certificate of the election of Isaac E. Crary as Representative from the State of Michigan in this House having been communicated to the House at the last session of Congress, to wit, on the 17th of December, 1835, and the said Isaac E. Crary being in attendance. A motion was made by Mr. Francis Thomas, of Maryland, that the oath appointed by law to be taken by Members of the House of Representatives be administered to the said Isaac E. Crary; and that he thereupon take his seat as a Representative of the State of Michigan in this House.

A motion was made by Mr. John Robertson, of Virginia, that this motion, together with the whole subject of the legality of the election of a Member of the House from the State of Michigan, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. Robertson said that the election by which Mr. Crary claimed his seat took place in October, 1835. At that time Michigan was a Territory, and she continued to be such until yesterday, when she was admitted into the Union. In this matter subsequent recognition of Michigan as a State could not stand in the place of previous consent, because the boundaries of Michigan were uncertain until fixed by Congress. That was a preliminary act, necessary before Michigan could lawfully frame a State government. Under the ordinance of 1787, Michigan must of necessity remain a Territory until admitted as a State, therefore, remaining a Territory until admission as a State, there was no right to representation at the time of the election of Mr. Crary, and his election could not be valid.

[2] Second session Twenty-fourth Congress, Journal, pp. 290, 291; Debates, pp. 1504–1509.

The previous question being ordered, the amendment of Mr. Robertson fell,[1] and Mr. Thomas's motion was agreed to, yeas 150, nays 32.

Mr. Crary was thereupon sworn, and took his seat.

398. The Senate declined to admit the persons bearing credentials as Senators-elect from Tennessee until that State had been admitted to the Union.—On June 1, 1796[2] the Senate declined to admit William Blount and William Cocke, who produced credentials as Senators from the State of Tennessee. That State had not yet been admitted to the Union.

399. The Senate election case of James Shields, of Minnesota, in the Thirty-fifth Congress.

The Senate declined to admit a Senator-elect from Minnesota until a formal act of admission had been passed by Congress.

On February 25, 1858,[3] in the Senate, Mr. John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, presented the following letter:

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1858.

SIR: I beg leave to offer a few reasons to show that Minnesota is one of the sovereign States of this Union. My first proposition is that there are only two forms of political organization under which a community of American citizens can legitimately exist within the jurisdiction and under the Constitution of the United States. The one is the organization of a Territory of the Union; the other that of a State of the Union. These are the only determinate shapes into which political communities can be molded under our Constitution. Each has its appropriate place in our federal system. A community of American citizens living under a Territorial organization is in direct and legitimate connection with the Federal Government. That same community, transformed into a State, is also in direct legitimate connection with the Federal Government. In the transition from a Territory to a State, there is no point of time at which this connection can by any possibility be broken. The Territorial government continues in full force until it is superseded by a State government; and whenever the people constitute themselves lawfully into a State, it is, Io instanti, a State of the Union. There is no such political anomaly as a State out of the Union, or not yet in the Union. These erroneous terms have been applied so vaguely to communities whose condition is not easily determined that the public begin to think there must be some intermediate provisional, probationary state, in which communities are sometimes kept on their passage from the condition of Territories to that of sovereign States of the Union. California was denominated not many years ago a State out of the Union. Minnesota is, I suppose, at present considered by some a State not yet in the Union, or, perhaps, a provisional State. Certainly the Representatives of Minnesota are at present in a provisional dilemma, not knowing whether they represent a State in the Union or out of the Union.

I now beg leave to refer you to the law of 1857[4] authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a State government. The first section contains the following language: "The inhabitants of Minnesota are hereby authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government by the name of Minnesota, and to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, according to the Federal Constitution." Here the authority is absolute and unconditional, first, to form a constitution and State government; secondly, to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States—authority to make a State and authority to come into the Union. No language could be more positive; no authority could be more plenary; no act could be more determinate. The people have performed their engagements in good faith, and they have a right to expect a like compliance on the part of Congress. These engagements, too, affect the most sacred of all political rights—the constitutional rights of a sovereign State. The third section of the Minnesota enabling act strengthens and corroborates this position. It provides that a convention of delegates shall assemble at the capital of said Territory on the second Monday of July next (1857), and first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State

[1] This was the effect of the previous question on a pending amendment at that time.

[2] First session Fourth Congress, Contested Elections in Congress, from 1789 to 1834, p. 868.

[3] First session Thirty-fifth Congress, Globe, pp. 861–867.

[4] Act approved February 26, 1857, 11 Stat. L., p. 166.

to be admitted into the Union "at that time." Mark the language—not thereafter; not upon the happening of any future contingency, but "at that time," to wit, on the second Monday in July, 1857; "and if so,"—that is, if they shall so determine—"shall proceed to form a constitution and to take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State."

Here two things are to be specially observed: First, the determination to become a State at that time; not the determination at that time to become a State, but a State at that time. Second, the submission to the approval and ratification of the people. When was Minnesota to become a State? At that time. How was her constitution to be ratified? By submission to the people. She has complied with every requirement. She entered the Union at the time prescribed; her constitution is ratified in the manner prescribed; and yet she is now as completely postponed and ignored as if she had disregarded all her obligations. Permit me to cite two precedents, which I hope will prove conclusive in this case. In 1802 an enabling act was passed for Ohio somewhat similar to, but not so decisive as, the Minnesota act. The authority given was to form a constitution and State government, and then follows this language: "The State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union on the same footing with the original States." This was then considered an authorized admission of the State, and the only act of admission that ever took place in the case of Ohio, and that State is now in the Union under and by virtue of the authority of that enabling act.

The enabling act in the case of Indiana contains the following language: "The State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union." Mark the difference in the two acts. In the case of Minnesota authority is given to come in at the present time. In the case of Indiana a promise is given for her admission at some future time; under the law Indiana adopted a constitution and elected Representatives, as Minnesota has done.

On the 2d December, 1816, Mr. Hendricks, Representative from the new State, presented his credentials in the House of Representatives, was sworn in, was appointed on a committee, and was allowed to vote and act as a Member of that body; and yet it was not until ten days afterwards (on the 12th of the same month) that a joint resolution was passed by both branches of Congress formally admitting Indiana. This kind of resolution was then considered form—nothing but mere form—something which Congress has the power to observe or omit at pleasure, but something with which the State has no concern, and which can not affect its right. This was then the opinion of John C. Calhoun, at that time a Member of the other House; and this, we may fairly presume, would be his opinion if he were a Member of the Senate now. When the precedent was established Daniel Webster was also a Member of the House, and gave it the weight of his authority. But Minnesota stands upon far stronger grounds than Ohio or Indiana the ground of Congressional authority. If this authority is good, Minnesota can not fail. This is a great question—a question of constitutional right, of national faith. Congressional faith, I sincerely hope, will be held sacred and inviolate in the case of Minnesota by the prompt admission of her Representatives. My sense of duty to my constituents compels me, through you, to make this appeal to the Senate.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JAMES SHIELDS,
Senator from Minnesota.

HON. JOHN J. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. Crittenden also presented credentials in due form, showing the election of Mr. Shields by the legislature of Minnesota on December 19, 1857.

A discussion arose as to whether or not Minnesota was a State in the Union by virtue of the enabling act, or whether an act of admission would be necessary. Mr. Crittenden, in arguing that there had been no act of admission, cited the case of Louisiana in addition to those of Ohio and Indiana quoted by Mr. Shields.

A motion that the subject lie on the table was disagreed to—yeas 22, nays 26.

Then, after lengthy debate, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the question of the admission of James Shields to a seat in this body, as a Senator from the State of Minnesota, be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to inquire whether or not Minnesota is a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws.

The Judiciary Committee consisted of Messrs. James A. Bayard, of Delaware; Robert Toombs, of Georgia; George E. Pugh, of Ohio; Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana; James S. Green, of Missouri; Jacob Collamer, of Vermont; and Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois. On March 4, 1858,[1] Mr. Bayard submitted the following report:

Having considered the question as to which they were by the the foregoing resolution instructed to inquire, the committee have unanimously adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Minnesota is not a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws.

Minnesota was admitted into the Union by the act approved May 11, 1858,[2] and thereupon her Senators-elect were admitted.

400. The election case of James White, Delegate from the Territory south of the Ohio, in the Third Congress.

In 1794 the House admitted a Delegate on the theory that it might admit to the floor for debate merely anybody whom it might choose.

The office of Delegate was established by an ordinance of the Continental Congress, confirmed by a law of Congress.

The House decided in 1794 that the oath should not be administered to a Delegate.

The legislation as to the privileges of the Delegate was enacted after the House had recognized the office.

In 1794 the Delegate seated by the House was elected by the legislature of the Territory and not by the people.

On November 11, 1794,[3] the credentials of James White as a Representative of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, were laid before the House and referred to a select committee, who, on November 14, made the following report:

That, by the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, section 9, it is provided "that, so soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants of full age in the district, upon giving proof thereof to the governor, they shall receive authority to elect representatives to represent them in a general assembly," and by the twelfth section of the ordinance, "as soon as a legislature shall be formed in the district, the council and house, assembled in one room, shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a Delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress, with a right of debating, but not of voting, during this temporary government." Full effect is given to this ordinance by act of Congress August 7, 1789.

That, by the deed of cession of the Territory south of the river Ohio to the United States, in the fourth article, it is also provided "that the inhabitants of the said Territory shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the Western Territory—that is to say, Congress shall assume the government of the said Territory, which they shall execute in a manner similar to that which they support in the Territory west of the Ohio, and shall never bar or deprive them of any privilege which the people in the Territory west of the Ohio enjoy."

The cession, on these conditions, was accepted by act of Congress on the 2d of April, 1790.

By an act passed the 26th of May, 1790, for the government of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, it is enacted "that the inhabitants shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio. And the government of the said Territory south of the Ohio shall be similar to that which is now exercised in the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, except so far as is otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress of the present session, entitled 'An act to accept a cession of the claim of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of western territory.'"

The committee are of opinion that James White has been duly elected as Delegate from the Territory of the United States south of the Ohio, on the terms of the foregoing acts. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That James White be admitted to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, with a right of debating, but not of voting.

This resolution gave rise to considerable debate, it being urged in opposition that the Constitution provided for no such admission to the House, and that it would be more proper to admit him to the Senate. It was said, also, that he should be admitted only in accordance with a law of Congress. In opposition it was maintained that the House might admit and give the right of debating to whomsoever it might please, as it might admit an advocate to plead in any particular case, and that a law was not necessary, since they need not and ought not to consult the Senate in such a matter.

On November 18 the House agreed to the report of the committee.

A question then arose as to whether or not the oath should be administered to Mr. Smith.

The question being taken, it was decided—yeas 32, noes 42—that the Delegate should not take the oath, the argument that his inability to vote rendered the oath unnecessary.[1]

During this session a bill was passed allowing the Delegate pay and the privilege of franking letters.[2] This legislation was in the form of a bill extending the franking privilege specifically to James White and providing for the same compensation received by a Member.

401. The election case of Narsworthy Hunter, Delegate for Mississippi Territory, in the Seventh Congress.

In 1801 the oath was administered as a matter of course to a Delegate from a Territory.

On December 21, 1801,[3] the House, on report of the Committee on Elections, to whom had been referred the credentials of Narsworthy Hunter as Delegate from Mississippi Territory, decided that the Territory was entitled to a Delegate, with a right to debate, but not to vote, and that Mr. Hunter was elected such Delegate. As in the case of James White, the title of the territory to a Delegate was referred back to the ordinance of 1787, certain provisions of which were by acts of April 7, 1798, and May 10, 1800, applied to Mississippi Territory.

Mr. Hunter had appeared on December 7, at the time of the organization of the House, and had taken the oath with the Members.[4]

402. The election case of Paul Fearing, Delegate from the territory northwest of the river Ohio, in the Seventh Congress.

A Delegate was not dispossessed of his seat because a portion, but not all, of his territory had been erected into a State.

On January 31, 1803,[1] the Committee on Elections reported on the following proposition, which had been referred to them previously:

That inasmuch as the late territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio have, by virtue of an act of Congress passed on the 1st day of May, 1802,[2] formed a constitution and State government, and have thereby and by virtue of an act of Congress aforesaid become a separate and independent State, by the name of "Ohio," that Paul Fearing, a Member of this House, who was elected by the late territorial government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, is no longer entitled to a seat in this House.

The committee reported the following:

Resolved, That Paul Fearing, the Delegate from the territory northwest of the river Ohio, is still entitled to a seat in this House.

The report was laid on the table.

Mr. Fearing has taken his seat on the first day of the Congress.[3] The Member from the State of Ohio did not appear until the next Congress.[4]

403. The election case of Doty v. Jones, from Wisconsin Territory, in the Twenty-fifth Congress.

The term of a Delegate need not necessarily begin and end with the term of Congress.[5]

In 1839 the Committee on Elections held that the office of Delegate ceased when the Territory ceased to exist as a corporation by becoming a State.

At the session of 1838–39[6] the Committee on Elections reported on the case of Doty v. Jones, from Wisconsin Territory. This case involved merely a question as to when Mr. Doty should take the seat.

[2] This act, actually approved April 30, 1802 (2 Stat. L., p. 174), did not include in the new State of Ohio all the territory of the "late territory of the United State northwest of the river Ohio," but provided "that all that part of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio heretofore included in the eastern division of said territory and not included within the boundary herein prescribed for the said State is hereby attached to and made a part of the Indiana Territory from and after the formation of the said State." Indiana had been organized by act of May 7, 1800 (2 Stat. L., p. 58). Indiana was not allowed a Delegate until the act of February 27, 1809 (second session Tenth Congress, 2 Stat. L., p. 525). So it is evident that Mr. Fearing would remain as the Delegate for an increment of population left out by the new boundaries of Ohio. The act of May 1, 1802, provided that "the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever."

[6] Third session Twenty-fifth Congress, 1 Bartlett, p. 6; Rowell's Digest, p. 107; Report No. 7, Journal, p. 191.

In October, 1835, Mr. George W. Jones had been elected Delegate from the Territory of Michigan for a term extending, under the existing law for Michigan, for two years from the date of his certificate. He took his seat in December, 1835, and would naturally have served until about that time in 1837. But by act of June 15, 1836, Michigan was admitted to the Union on condition that she should by convention ratify certain boundaries, which was done December 15, 1836. The committee therefore considered that the Territory of Michigan ceased to be on June 15, 1836, and that Mr. Jones ceased to be her Delegate on that day, which was about a year and a half before his term would naturally have expired.[1]

In October, 1836, Mr. Jones was elected Delegate from the adjacent Territory of Wisconsin, which had just been organized. The act of organization provided that he should serve "for a term of two years." Mr. Jones took his seat December 5, 1836, and the term of two years would, if computed from the time of election or qualification, expire in October or the 1st of December, 1838.

And so, naturally, Mr. James D. Doty, elected on September 10, 1838, would take his seat at the December session of 1838, which was the last and not the first or long session of the Congress, and consequently would finish out the current Congress and sit for the first half of the next Congress.

The natural objection then arose that this should not be, because the term of the Delegate, like the term of the Member from a State, should be for the term of the Congress, and should not comprise a portion of two Congresses. In support of this contention a clause of the act of March 3, 1817, was cited, wherein it was provided that Delegates "shall be elected every second year for the same term of two years for which Members of the House of Representatives of the United States are elected." Furthermore, there was a question as to when Mr. Jones's term as Delegate from Michigan expired, and so that term might work out the time of beginning for the term of Mr. Doty.

The committee did not consider that the law of 1817, even supposing it not to have been modified by the subsequent act organizing Wisconsin and providing simply that the Delegate should "serve for a term of two years," necessarily meant that Delegates should serve the same two years for which Members of the House were elected. The committee would construe it to mean that the duration of service should be the same, but not necessarily contemporaneous. Although not entirely confident of this construction, the committee found it fortified by the fact that previous to that law Delegates were elected annually. The Constitution was silent as to Delegates, which were mere creatures of law, whose terms of service might be long or short and commence and terminate at such periods as Congress might dictate. The law organizing Wisconsin, unlike the Michigan law, did not specify when the term should begin; but in cases where no time is specified for the performance of a duty it is common to construe that it is to be performed forthwith. Any other construction would, when Mr. Jones was elected Delegate from Wisconsin, have left the Territory unrepresented for part of a Congress, while he would have been awaiting the beginning of the term of the new Congress on March 4, 1837. So the committee decided that Mr. Jones's term did not last until March 4, 1839, and therefore reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House—yeas 165, nays 25:

Resolved, That James Duane Doty is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from Wisconsin Territory, and that George W. Jones is not so entitled.

404. The election case of Henry H. Sibley, claiming a seat as Delegate from Wisconsin, in the Thirtieth Congress.

The House admitted a Delegate from a county left under the old Territorial laws after the remainder of Wisconsin Territory had become a State.

By the act of May 29,1848,[1] Wisconsin, which had been a Territory, with a Territorial Delegate, was admitted to the Union as a State. But the boundaries of the new State left out a portion of the old Territory of Wisconsin lying beyond the St. Croix River, comprising a population of about 4,000 and constituting what had been a judicial district of the old Territory, organized as an entire county. The Delegate who had represented Wisconsin Territory had resigned when the State was formed. So the people in the portion left without the State boundaries had no representation in Congress.

The governor of the Territory having become an United States Senator from the new State, the secretary of the Territory, upon whom under the law of the Territory the duties devolved, removed to the region beyond the St. Croix and assumed the duties of governor. He issued his proclamation as acting governor, ordering a special election to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Delegate who had represented the whole Territory of Wisconsin. And in pursuance of that proclamation the people beyond the St. Croix elected Henry H. Sibley, who in due time presented his certificate of election, under the hand of the acting governor and with the seal of the "Territory of Wisconsin" attached.

On December 4, 1848,[2] at the beginning of the second session of the Congress, Mr. Sibley's credentials were presented to the House, but objection was made to swearing him in on his prima facie showing, and the credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections.

The majority of the committee reported a resolution that Mr. Sibley be admitted to a seat as Delegate of the Territory of Wisconsin. They argued that these people as part of the old Territory of Wisconsin had once enjoyed the right of representation and that they were still entitled to it by natural right as well as by the usages of the Government. The act of Congress admitting the State of Wisconsin had left them outside its benefits, but had not abrogated any of the old law organizing the Territory, and they were therefore entitled to all their rights under the terms of the law organizing the original Territory of Wisconsin. Those rights had, moreover, been guaranteed by the ordinance of 1787, which had been reaffirmed by Congress. The omission of Congress to repeal the law organizing the Territory of Wisconsin, as well as the failure to make any other law for the government of the people beyond the St. Croix, were proof conclusive that the old Territorial law was intended to operate in the residuum of the Territory. Moreover, acting on the authority of the State Department, the officers of the present Territory were holding the offices under the original appointments made before the State of Wisconsin was formed. The committee cited the case of Delegate Paul Fearing, from the Territory of Ohio.

The minority of the committee contended that the formation of the State of Wisconsin annulled by implication the whole political organization of the Territory of Wisconsin. A special repealing clause was not necessary and had not been inserted in the laws organizing other States. Neither had it been usual to grant Delegates to Territories in the first stages of their existence. When the people had become numerous enough to entitle them to legislative assemblies it had been usual to allow them Delegates in Congress. The authority of the precedent of Paul Fearing was denied. The fact that the people of the residuum county would be left without laws might be a matter to be remedied by law, but was not such as to require the interposition of the House in the manner proposed.

On January 15, by a vote of 124 to 62, the House agreed to the resolution admitting Mr. Sibley as the Delegate of the Territory of Wisconsin.[1]

405. The election cases of Hugh N. Smith and William S. Meservey, claiming seats as Delegates from New Mexico in the Thirty-first Congress.

The House declined to admit a Delegate from New Mexico before the organization of the Territory had been authorized by law.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to the credentials of a Delegate elected by a convention in an unorganized Territory.

The House held that there should be prior legislation by Congress before the admission of a Delegate.

On February 4, 1850,[2] the credentials of Hugh N. Smith, as Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico, were presented to the House. The credentials were in the following form:

> Be it remembered that in the convention of delegates chosen from the seven different counties of New Mexico to assemble in the city of Santa Fe on the 24th day of September, A.D. 1849, for the purpose of forming and proposing the basis of a government which the people of New Mexico desire should be granted to them by the Congress of the United States, and for the purpose of choosing a Delegate to represent New Mexico in the House of Representatives of the Thirty-first Congress of the United States, Hugh N. Smith was chosen by a majority of all the convention, and declared duly elected said Delegate.
> Given under our hands, at Santa Fe, this twenty-sixth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine.
> ANTONIO JOSÉ MARTINEZ,
> Presidente de la Convensione.
> JAMES H. QUINN, Secretary.

The House did not swear in the Delegate on this prima facie showing, but referred the credentials to the Committee on Elections.

This committee reported on April 4. It was ascertained that New Mexico was acquired by the treaty of GuadaloupeHidalgo; that previously it had been a department of Mexico, governed by its own legislature and having representation in the National Congress. But when acquired by the United States it came as territory only, not retaining its old political organization. An army officer was stationed there as military commander, but there was no political organization known to the laws. The convention which chose Mr. Smith Delegate was summoned by proclamation of the army officer in command.

The further fact appeared that the larger portion of the Territory was claimed by the State of Texas and had been so claimed since 1836. This claim still existed although not admitted by the Executive of the United States. Mr. Smith, the Delegate-elect, was himself a resident of the portion claimed by Texas, as were the larger portion of his constituents.

Without considering the claim of Texas, for the time being, the majority of the committee came to the conclusion that Delegates admitted by the House had in every case been chosen in accordance with laws enacted by Congress. The case of Mr. Sibley, of Wisconsin, was not an exception, since he was admitted on the theory that a Territory of Wisconsin still existed. The admission of Mr. Smith would be construed as a quasi recognition of New Mexico as an organized government, a proceeding not within the constitutional power of the House. To admit Mr. Smith simply as the representative of the inhabitants would be anomalous and unwise.

The minority of the committee contended that the privilege of citizens of a Territory or portion of the Union not organized into a State to have a Delegate depended neither on the Constitution nor law, but on the pleasure of the House alone. The discretion of the House should be exercised in favor of the right of representation. New Mexico was a populous region, whose people had enjoyed an organized political existence under the former sovereignty. While her former condition could not be considered as establishing her claim to representation, yet it showed her capacity for self-government and constituted a strong argument to control the discretion of the House, so that she might not be kept in a worse situation than she was in before.

As to the justness of the claim of Texas the majority passed no opinion. If it was just certainly the people were already represented, and might not be further represented. Whether just or not the claim existed, and it was not the part of the House to express judgment on it by admitting Mr. Smith. The minority held that the claim of Texas might be admitted as just, and yet Mr. Smith might be admitted properly as representing a residuum of people without the boundaries claimed by Texas. Furthermore, Texas had not enforced her claim and exercised no authority over the disputed territory; and New Mexico should not be neglected because of the mere claim of Texas.

The majority of the committee recommended the following:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to admit Hugh N. Smith, esq., to a seat in this House as a Delegate from New Mexico.

The minority proposed the following:

Resolved, That the said Hugh N. Smith be admitted to a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States as a Delegate from New Mexico.

The report was debated at length on May 22 and July 15–18.[1] Besides the merits of the case, there seems to have developed some considerations relating to the question of slavery and a disposition to resort to dilatory tactics. Finally, on July 19, the whole subject was laid on the table, by a vote of 105 yeas, 94 nays.

406. On December 10, 1850,[2] the credentials of William S. Meservey as Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico were presented and referred to the Committee on Territories, no motion being made to swear in Mr. Meservey. Later the reference was changed to the Committee on Elections, which reported on February 6, 1851.[3] On May 25, 1850, before a decision had been reached by the House in the case of Mr. Smith, another convention had assembled at Santa Fe and established a constitution for a State government. On June 20, 1850, the voters of the Territory ratified the constitution and elected officers, including a Representative in Congress. Mr. Meservey was chosen to this office. The State officers issued a credential to Mr. Meservey as a "Representative," but he claimed a seat as a "Delegate." The committee, after commenting on this fact, went on to argue that it would be a dangerous precedent to admit a Delegate not provided for by law of Congress and would overrule the usages of sixty years. Moreover, there was now in force an act of Congress providing for a Territorial Delegate from New Mexico. This act became a law on September 9, 1850, after the decision in Mr. Smith's case. So the committee reported against the admission of Mr. Meservey. The report was not acted on by the House.

407. The election case of Almon W. Babbitt, claiming a seat as a Delegate from the so-called State of Deseret, in the Thirty-first Congress.

The House decided it inexpedient to admit a Delegate chosen by a community not yet made a Territory by law.

On April 4, 1850,[4] the Committee on Elections reported on these credentials:

PROVISIONAL STATE OF DESERET, ss:

I hereby certify that, pursuant to a joint resolution passed by both houses of the general assembly of this State, Almon W. Babbitt, esq., was on the 5th day of July, 1849, elected by both branches of the general assembly a Delegate to the Congress of the United States, to present the memorial of said general assembly and otherwise represent the interests of the inhabitants of this State in Congress.

Given under my hand and the great Seal of the State of Deseret, at the city of the Great Salt Lake, this twenty-fifth day of July, 1849.

[SEAL.]

WILLARD RICHARDS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Babbitt had not attempted to take a seat on these credentials in the first instance, and after examination the committee found that the memorial presented did not ask the admission of the Delegate until "some form of government" had been adopted. Moreover, the so-called State of Deseret had been formed by an irregularly called convention of citizens representing a region not yet organized by law of Congress. To admit Mr. Babbitt would be for the House to give a quasi recognition of the legal existence of the State of Deseret and an implied ratification of its constitution. Such recognition and ratification were within the power of Congress alone.

So the committee recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to admit Almon W. Babbitt, esq., to a seat in this body as a Delegate from the alleged State of Deseret.

On July 18, 19, and 20[1] the resolution was debated in Committee of the Whole. There were arguments in favor of admitting a representative of the people of Deseret and the position of the committee as to the matter of recognition was combatted. The slavery question also had some bearing on the result.

Finally, by a vote of yeas 104, nays 78, the resolution was laid on the table.

408. The election case of Fuller v. Kingsbury, from the Dakota portion of the old Territory of Minnesota, in the Thirty-fifth Congress.

Duty of the Speaker as to recognition of a Delegate after the Territory has been admitted as a State.

On May 27, 1858,[2] several days after the Representatives from the State of Minnesota had been qualified, one of them, Mr. James M. Cavanaugh, rising to a question of privilege, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be authorized to inquire into and report upon the right of W. W. Kingsbury to a seat upon this floor as Delegate from that part of the Territory of Minnesota outside the State limits.

In the debate a question was raised as to recognition of Mr. Kingsbury, and the Speaker[3] said he had continued to recognize him as Delegate in accordance with past precedents.

Thereupon an amendment was adopted providing:

And in the meantime no person shall be entitled to occupy a seat as a Delegate from said Territory.

This amendment was adopted, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On June 3,[4] when the committee had reported in favor of allowing Mr. Kingsbury to retain his seat, a motion was proposed to lay the report on the table, and a question arose as to the effect of agreeing to the motion.

The Speaker said:

The resolution referring the subject to the Committee of Elections provided that the committee be authorized to inquire into and report upon the right of W. W. Kingsbury to his seat upon this floor as Delegate from that portion of the Territory of Minnesota outside of the State limits, and that in the meantime no person should be entitled to occupy a seat as Delegate from the said Territory. The Chair is of opinion that when the committee submitted a report to the House the proviso ceased to operate, and the Chair, following the precedents, without intimating whether the Chair thinks the precedents right or wrong, would recognize the Delegate from Minnesota.

409. The election case of Fuller v. Kingsbury, continued.

After the admission of Minnesota as a State, the House declared portions of the old Territory outside the limits of the State not entitled to a Delegate.

The State of Minnesota being admitted, the House suspended the functions of the Delegate from the old Territory.

On May 29, 1858,[1] the Committee on Elections reported in the case of Fuller v. Kingsbury, of the portion of the former Territory of Minnesota not included within the limits of the new State. The committee, after quoting from the law establishing the Territory, and citing the fact that the Territory of Minnesota had been represented without interruption, by a Delegate elected in conformity with law, say:

It further appears that William W. Kingsbury was regularly elected on the 13th day of October, 1857, as such Delegate, and, in that capacity, was, at the opening of the present session of Congress, admitted to, and has held, a seat in the House of Representatives until the passage of the act of May, 1858, for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union, when his right to retain it was brought in question. Of the legality of the election of Mr. Kingsbury as the Delegate from the Territory of Minnesota there seems to be no doubt. * * * The number of inhabitants in the Territory not included in the bounds of the State is not very clearly settled, but, as far as can be learned, it amounts to several thousands, and is said to be rapidly increasing. There were five counties established by law, and two of them fully organized, with the proper officers for regular municipal government. * * *

Does the admission into the Union of a State formed out of a part of the original Territory of Minnesota annul the election of the Delegate, repeal or set aside the law creating the Territory, and all other laws; deprive the people inhabiting that part of the Territory not included in the limits of the new State of the right or privilege of being heard in the House of Representatives by an agent or Delegate; substitute anarchy for a government of law, and resolve society into its original elements? Such is not the opinion of your committee. There is nothing in the act authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, nor in the act for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union, which repeals in anywise the law creating the Territory, or deprives the people inhabiting that part not included in the new State of any rights or privileges to which they were entitled under any laws existing at the time of the admission of that State. It matters not whether one State or half a dozen have been carved out of an organized Territory; if a portion remains, and, more especially, if inhabited, and counties and towns, with their corporate governments, exist, created by law, it would seem to be a most violent presumption to hold that they became eo instante upon the admission of the State a disfranchised people—a mere mob or rabble. The fact that the admitted State bears the same name as the Territory may lead to some confusion of ideas, but it does not alter the fact. The existence of the State of Minnesota does not destroy the existence of the Territory of Minnesota, nor deprive the inhabitants of such Territory of any of their rights. No such result can be by implication. The Territorial law must be repealed before such consequences could follow, and even then a grave question would arise here how far such repeal could operate upon the rights of the people.

The committee then cite the cases of Delegates Fearing and Sibley in support of their view.

As to the memorial of A. G. Fuller and his certificate of election under the hands of the county officers of Midway County, in the Territory of Dakota, the majority say that there is no Territory of Dakota authorized to elect a Delegate. The region named as Dakota is admitted to be the residue of the Territory of Minnesota, already represented by Mr. Kingsbury.

Therefore the majority of the committee reported resolutions that Mr. Kingsbury be allowed to retain his seat "as a Delegate from the Territory of Minnesota."

The minority of the committee base their argument on a question of fact which is disputed. The majority of the committee had said:

The committee are informed, on what they consider good authority, that * * * at the election for Delegate to Congress, the people of this so-called Territory of Dakota, or a part of them, did vote for Mr. Kingsbury for their Delegate, and they so claim him to be, notwithstanding the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union.

---

[1] First session Thirty-fifth Congress, 1 Bartlett, p. 251; Rowell's Digest, p. 155.

The minority take issue on this point, saying:

On the said 13th day of October, 1857, the people resident in the limits of the State voted entirely to themselves. They elected a Delegate (Mr. Kingsbury), who had opposition; also elected Representatives. On the same day the inhabitants outside said State limits held a separate election for themselves and elected A. G. Fuller their Delegate, said Fuller also having an opponent. The people outside the State limits acted and voted separately and independently; so did the inhabitants within the State.

Section 14 of the act organizing the Territory of Minnesota, approved March 3, 1849, provides that a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the legislative assembly. The election for governor, State officers, members of assembly, and Representatives, as well as Delegates, was confined to the voters within the limits of the proposed State. No polls were opened for these elections to the people outside the limits of the proposed State.

When the reports were debated, on June 2 and 3,[1] there was controversy over the point, and letters were presented from Territorial officers showing that votes were cast for Mr. Kingsbury in the portion of the Territory outside the limits of the proposed State. But this fact was not settled so conclusively that it could be said to be established.

The minority alleged that Mr. Kingsbury was not a resident of the portion of Minnesota or Dakota which he sought to represent, but that he lived within the limits of the new State. In reply to this it was declared that there was no provision of law requiring a Delegate to be a resident of the Territory he represented.

The minority further urged:

We further find and report that the people residing out of the limits of the proposed State, after being separated, in anticipation of a separate Territorial organization for the remaining Territory, under the new name of Dakota, held an election for a Delegate on the 13th of October, A. D. 1857, as stated in the memorial of A. G. Fuller, when the said A. G. Fuller received a large majority of the legal voters resident in the said Territory, and he holds the best evidence thereof which the present imperfect legal provisions in the Territory will admit of; and, according to the precedent in the case of H. H. Sibley, from Wisconsin, would be entitled to his seat as a Delegate representing the resident citizens on the remaining Territory, who voted for him, and who were not by law allowed to vote for or against W. W. Kingsbury

Therefore the minority recommended that Mr. Fuller be admitted in place of Mr. Kingsbury.

On June 2 and 3[2] the question was debated at length, the doubt as to whether Mr. Kingsbury had been voted for by the people outside the limits assigned for the new State figuring prominently.

Finally, by a vote of yeas 120, nays 80, the House amended the proposition of the majority of the committee by substituting the following:[3]

Resolved, That the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union with the boundaries prescribed in the act of admission operates as a dissolution of the Territorial organization of Minnesota; and that so much of the late Territory of Minnesota as lies without the limits of the present State of Minnesota is without any distinct legally organized government, and the people thereof are not entitled to a Delegate in Congress until that right is conferred on them by statute.

The resolution as amended was then agreed to.

410. The election case of J. S. Casement, claiming a seat as Delegate from Wyoming, in the Fortieth Congress.

The House declined to give prima facie effect to credentials from a Territory not yet organized.

After the passage of the act organizing the Territory of Wyoming, but before the actual organization, the House declined to admit a Delegate elected before the passage of the act.

On January 12, 1869,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, presented the credentials of Mr. J. S. Casement, claiming to be Delegate-elect from the Territory of Wyoming, and asked that he be sworn in.

A question being raised, it was admitted that the Territory had not been organized, and that Mr. Casement had not been regularly elected. Thereupon, after debate, the credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections, and Mr. Casement was not sworn in.

On February 23[2] Mr. Burton C. Cook, of Illinois, presented the report of the committee, as follows:

The Territory is not yet organized. Section 17 of the act to provide for the temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming, approved July 25, 1868, is as follows:

"This act shall take effect from and after the time when the executive and judicial officers herein provided for shall have been duly appointed and qualified: Provided, That all general Territorial laws of the Territory of Dakota in force in any portion of said Territory of Wyoming at the time this act shall take effect shall be and continue in force throughout the said Territory until repealed by the legislative authority of said Territory, except such laws as relate to the possession or occupation of mines or mining claims."

Section 13 of the same act provides as follows:

"A Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress of the United States, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the legislative assembly. The first election shall be held at such times and places and be conducted in such manner as the governor shall appoint and direct, and at all subsequent elections the times, place, and manner of holding elections shall be prescribed by law. The person having the greatest number of votes of the qualified voters, as hereinbefore provided, shall be declared by the governor elected, and a certificate thereof shall be accordingly given."

The election at which J. S. Casement claims to have been elected was held on the 8th clay of October, A. D. 1867. The bill above referred to was passed July 25, 1868, and has not yet taken effect, for the reason that the executive and judicial officers provided for in said act have not been duly appointed and qualified. The election laws of Dakota are still in force in that Territory.

The election held on the 8th day of October, A. D. 1867, was not held in pursuance of any law, but was held in pursuance of a call made by a mass meeting, at which certain commissioners were appointed to make arrangements for holding a general election. It is apparent that this election had none of the safeguards provided by law to secure the purity of elections; no one could be punished for illegal voting, or for receiving illegal votes, or for excluding legal votes, or for making false returns; no qualifications of voters had been prescribed by law; not even a residence in the Territory was required; no voting precincts had been established by law. Three persons, who sign their names as commissioners of elections, have made a certificate that the election was held, and that J. S. Casement was elected Delegate to Congress. A copy of this certificate is hereto annexed, marked "A."

The only other evidence adduced before the committee in support of the claim was an affidavit of J. H. Hayfer, a copy of which is hereto annexed, marked "B."

It is not contended that there is any law entitling the claimant to a seat as a Member of this House,

---

[1] Third session Fortieth Congress, Journal, p. 142; Globe, pp. 310, 311.

[2] House Report No. 30; 2 Bartlett, p. 516. Rowell's Digest, p. 229; Globe, p. 1460.

and it is apparent that, according to law, the first election must be holden in a very different manner and the certificate be given by the governor; but it is insisted that it is a matter within the discretion of the House, and that there are precedents which would justify the admission of the claimant to a seat; and the admission of Members of Congress from Arkansas who were elected before the State constitution was approved by Congress or the State admitted as one of the States, is cited.

This precedent is not in point for the reason that Arkansas was a State in the Union at the time when the first Representatives from that State were admitted to seats in Congress, and the committee find no precedent for the admission of a Member from a State or a Delegate from a Territory which was not organized at the time the Member or Delegate was sworn and admitted to his seat. The Territory of Wyoming is not now organized, and no reason can be given for the admission of the claimant in this case which would not be equally good to sustain the claim of a Delegate from Alaska should a mass meeting be convened at Sitka and a Delegate be elected by such meeting.

Therefore the committee recommended the adoption of a resolution declaring that Mr. Casement was not entitled to a seat.

This report was not acted on by the House.

411. The election case of Mottrom D. Ball, claiming a seat as Delegate from Alaska, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

The House declined to admit a Delegate from an unorganized Territory, although by treaty the people were entitled to the rights of citizens.

A proposition relating to the admission of a Delegate from an unorganized Territory was held not to be a question of privilege.

On December 21, 1881,[1] Mr. Horace F. Page, of California, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of certain citizens of Alaska, together with a certificate of the election of Mottrom D. Ball as Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska. These were referred to the Committee on Elections.

On February 28,1882,[2] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, reported[3] from the committee this resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Territories:

Resolved, That M. D. Ball be not admitted to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska until the Committee on Territories shall report thereon, and that the matter be continued until that time for further action.

The minority of the committee proposed with their views this resolution:

Resolved, That M. D. Ball be admitted to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress as a duly elected Delegate from the Territory of Alaska, with all the rights and privileges of Delegates from other Territories of the United States.

The majority did not make an argument, but the minority went at length into reasons for seating Mr. Ball. They recited that under the treaty by which Alaska had been ceded it had been stipulated that the inhabitants, except the uncivilized natives, should be "admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States."

As Congress had passed no act in fulfillment of this obligation, the people of the district had met in election and chosen delegates, who in convention adopted a memorial and elected a Delegate. Reference was made to the case of James White, in 1794, who was seated as a Delegate from the territory south of the Ohio River. The minority summarized as follows the reasons for admitting Mr. Ball: (1) Representation is one of certain rights and advantages to which this people are entitled and were entitled at the time of their action; (2) having the vested title to the present enjoyment of this right, they were debarred from its possession through the failure of the party obligated to its accordance to furnish the means whereby they might attain it; (3) being so wrongfully debarred of an essential, a guaranteed, and an inherent right, by the fault of the authority that should have extended it, they set about its acquisition through the exercise of means recognized as authoritative under similar circumstances; (4) under such a condition of fact it is the duty of this House to ratify their act and make it legal and valid to the end desired; (5) not only is this duty plain, but the honor and good faith of our Government is involved in this recognition. And it is further shown to be advisable on the mere ground of expediency.

On March 28, 1882,[1] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, as a question of privilege, proposed to call up the report of the Committee on Elections in the case of the claim of M. D. Ball to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the said report and subject was not a question of privilege, there being no law authorizing Alaska to send a Delegate to Congress or authorizing an election for that purpose to be held in said Territory.

After debate on the point of order, the Speaker[2] sustained the same, on the ground that said report, with an accompanying resolution, providing that M. D. Ball be not admitted to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska until the Committee on the Territories shall report thereon, was referred to the Committee on the Territories, which committee had not reported thereon.

At the second session of this Congress an attempt was made, on February 19, 1883,[3] to set a time for considering this report and also the bill and reports of the Committee on Territories, but it failed. The matter ended thus.

412. The election case of Owen G. Chase, claiming a seat as Delegate from the Territory of Cimmaron, in the Fiftieth Congress.

The House declined to admit a Delegate from a Territory not organized by law.

On December 12, 1887,[4] Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, presented the petition of Owen G. Chase, claiming to be elected a Delegate from the Territory of Cimmaron, and also a resolution referring the petition and certificate of election to the Committee on Territories and allowing Mr. Chase the privileges of the floor pending the consideration of the organization of a Territorial government.

Mr. Springer urged, in behalf of his resolution, the precedent of California. On the other hand, it was urged that the more recent action of the House in the case of the proposed Delegate from Alaska was the better precedent.

On motion of Mr. S. S. Cox, of New York, the resolution and petition were laid on the table, ayes 157, noes 53.

Chapter XIII.

THE QUALIFICATIONS OF THE MEMBER.

413. The Constitution provides that a Member shall fulfill certain conditions as to age, citizenship, and inhabitancy.—Section 2 of Article I of the Constitution provides:

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

414. The election case of William McCreery, of Maryland, in the Tenth Congress.

A question arising in 1807 as to the right of a State to prescribe qualifications for Representatives, the House, while inclining manifestly to the view that the States did not have the right, avoided an explicit declaration.

Discussion of the three constitutional qualifications as exclusive of others.

On October 30, 1807,[4] Joshua Barney presented a memorial contesting the election of William McCreery, of Maryland. On November 9 the Committee of Elections made a report showing the following facts:

The law of Maryland (act of 1790) required the Member to be an inhabitant of his district at the time of his election, and to have resided therein twelve calendar months immediately before.

The law of Maryland (act of 1802) provided that Baltimore town and county should be a district entitled to send two Representatives in Congress, one to be a resident of Baltimore City and the other a resident of Baltimore County.

At the election the poll resulted, 6,164 votes for Nicholas P. Moore, indisputably a resident of Baltimore County; 3,559 votes for William McCreery, whose claim to the required residence in Baltimore City is questioned; 2,063 votes for Joshua Barney, indisputably a resident in Baltimore City, and who contests the seat of Mr. McCreery; 353 votes for John Seat, a resident of Baltimore City.

The committee reported the conclusion that the law of Maryland prescribing the qualifications of Members was unconstitutional, and therefore reported a resolution that William McCreery, who unquestionably had a majority of votes for the Baltimore City seat, was entitled to the seat. The committee did not attempt to ascertain whether or not Mr. McCreery had the residence requirements of the law of Maryland.

This report was the subject of exhaustive debate in the House, lasting from November 12 to 19.[1]

It was urged, in behalf of the report, that the qualifications of the National Legislature were of a national character and should be uniform throughout the nation and be prescribed exclusively by the national authority. The people had delegated no authority either to the States or to Congress to add to or diminish the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution. In denying the right of the States to add qualifications, the Congress was only protecting the rights of their citizens against encroachments on their liberties by their own State legislatures, which were corporate bodies not acting by natural right, but restrained by both Federal and State constitutions. The reserved power of the States could operate only when, from the nature of the case, there could be no conflict with national power. Congress had the power under the Constitution to collect taxes. From the nature of the case the same power was reserved to the States. Congress had power to "establish post-offices and post-roads." From the nature of the case the States would not reserve this power. In the same way the States could not reserve a power to add to the qualifications of Representatives. If they could do this, any sort of dangerous qualification might be established—of property, color, creed, or political professions. The Constitution prescribed the qualifications of President, as it did of Representatives. Did anyone suppose that a State could add to the qualifications of the President? In the case of Spaulding v. Mead, the House had decided that a State law could not render void returns made after a certain time. Qualifications for Representatives should be firm, steady, and unalterable. The National Legislature must have the power to preserve from encroachment the national sovereignty. A part of the Union could not have power to fix the qualifications for the Members of the Assembly of the Union. It is presumed that written documents say all they mean. Had the makers of the Constitution meant that there might be other qualifications, they would have said so. The people had a natural right to make choice of their Representatives, and that right should be limited only by a convention of the people, not by a legislature. The powers of the House were derived from the people, not from the States. The power to prescribe qualifications had been given neither to Congress nor the States. The States might establish districts, but they might not prescribe that Representatives should be confined to the districts. The Constitution had carefully prescribed in what ways the States might interfere in the elections of Congressmen. They might prescribe the "times, places, and manner" of holding elections, reserving to Congress the right to "make or alter" such regulations. This was all the Constitution gave to the States. It had been urged that the language of the clause prescribing the qualifications was negative, but so also was the language of the clause prescribing the qualifications of the President. The qualifications of Representatives did not come within the range of powers granted, but rather were the means of exercising those powers. The powers reserved to the States were reserved to them as sovereignties, but the qualifications of the Members of the House of Representatives of the nation never belonged to those sovereignties, but flowed from the people of the United States.

It was urged against the report that the positive qualifications assumed by the Constitution did not contain a negative prohibition of the right of the States to impose other qualifications. The State by annexing the provision for a residence in a district did not interfere with the constitutional requirement of residence in the State. Whatever rights were not expressly delegated to the United States were reserved to the States themselves or to the people. A right could not be delegated absolutely which could be exercised conjointly. For the House to declare a long-existing State law unconstitutional would be a dangerous act. In prescribing the qualifications of the voters the Constitution was positive, but in prescribing the qualifications of the Representatives in Congress the language was significantly negative. The Constitution did not fix the qualifications; it simply enumerated some disqualifications within which the States were left to act. The power contended for by Maryland must be included in the common and usual powers of legislation, and not being delegated to the General Government must reside in the States. Because the House was constituted the judge of the qualifications of its Members, it did not follow that it could constitute or enact qualifications. The functions were distinct. No harm could come from the exercise by the States of the power to prescribe qualifications, since the power would be used with discretion.

In the course of the debate a resolution that "William McCreery is duly elected according to the laws of Maryland and is entitled to his seat in this House" was negatived by a large vote.

Then a resolution was offered declaring that neither Congress nor the State legislatures could add to or take away from the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, that the law of Maryland was void, and that William McCreery was entitled to his seat. This resolution did not come to a vote, as the committee rose after it was offered, and on the next day, November 19, the House discharged the Committee of the Whole from the subject and recommitted it to the Committee on Elections.[1]

On December 7[2] the committee reported, presenting evidence at length on the subject of Mr. McCreery's residence, but expressing no opinion on that subject, and recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That William McCreery, having the greatest number of votes, and being duly qualified agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, is entitled to his seat in this House.

On December 23 this resolution was debated in Committee of the Whole, where a disinclination to come to a decision on the rights of the States was manifest. This finally took form in the adoption of the following amendment, offered by Mr. Robert Marion, of South Carolina:

Strike out all the portion relating to votes and qualifications, so that the resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That William McCreery is entitled to his seat in this House.

The Committee of the Whole agreed to this amendment, which, being reported to the House, was agreed to by a vote of yeas 70, nays 37. Both Mr. William Findley, of Pennsylvania, who had supported the original report, and Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, who had made the main argument in opposition, voted against the amendment.[1]

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole having been agreed to, Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, moved a further amendment by inserting after the word McCreery the following:

By having the qualifications prescribed by the laws of Maryland.

Mr. Randolph explained that he wished to bring the constitutionality of the law of Maryland before the House. On December 24 the question was taken on Mr. Randolph's amendment, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 8, nays 92.

The question then being taken on the adoption of the resolution:

Resolved, That William McCreery is entitled to his seat in this House.

And it was agreed to—yeas 89, nays 18.

Mr. Randolph was one of those voting nay.[2]

415. The Illinois cases of Turney v. Marshall and Fouke v. Trumbull in the Thirty-fourth Congress.

In 1856 the House decided that a State might not add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution for a Member.

The governor of a State having declined to issue credentials to rival claimants, the House seated the one shown prima facie by official statement to have a majority of votes. (Footnote.)

An instance wherein a contest was maintained against a Member-elect who had not and did not take the seat.

Discussion of the three constitutional qualifications as exclusive of others.

In 1856 the House considered and decided a question as to the qualifications of a Member who had already been seated on his prima facie showing.

[1] Journal, p. 91; Annals, p. 1231.

[2] Journal, pp. 93–95; Annals, p. 1238.

On June 24, 1856,[1] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, reported in the two Illinois contested election cases of Turney v. Marshall and Fouke v. Trumbull. Each of these cases arose out of the following clause in the constitution of Illinois:

> The judges of the supreme and circuit courts shall not be eligible to any other office or public trust of profit in this State, or the United States, during the term for which they are elected, nor for one year thereafter. All votes for either of them, for any elective office (except that of judge of the supreme or circuit court), given by the general assembly or the people, shall be void.

Both Messrs. Marshall and Trumbull were indisputably under this disqualification, and the contestants claimed the seats on the ground that the votes cast for them "were null and void."

Thus was presented the question whether a State might superadd to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for a Representative in Congress.

After quoting Chancellor Kent's saying "the objections to the existence of any such power appear to me too palpable and weighty to admit of any discussion," the report proceeds:

> And Mr. Justice Story, upon the same question, says that "the States can exercise no powers whatsoever, which exclusively spring out of the existence of the National Government, which the Constitution does not delegate to them. They have just as much right, and no more, to prescribe new qualifications for a Representative as they have for a President. Each is an officer of the Union, deriving his powers and qualifications from the Constitution, and neither created by, dependent upon, nor controllable by the States. It is no original prerogative of State power to appoint a Representative, or Senator, or President for the Union. (Story's Commentaries, vol. ii, page 101.)
> The second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the people of the several States shall choose their Representatives in Congress every second year, and prescribes the qualifications both of the electors and the Representatives.
> The qualification of electors is as follows:
> "The electors in each State" (who shall choose Representatives in Congress) "shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."
> The qualifications of a Representative, under the Constitution, are that he shall have attained the age of 25 years, shall have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and, when elected, an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen. It is a fair presumption that, when the Constitution prescribes these qualifications as necessary to a Representative in Congress, it was meant to exclude all others. And to your committee it is equally clear that a State of the Union has not the power to superadd qualifications to those prescribed by the Constitution for Representatives, to take away from "the people of the several States" the right given them by the Constitution to choose, "every second year," as their Representative in Congress, any person who has the required age, citizenship, and residence. To admit such a power in any State is to admit the power of the States, by a legislative enactment, or a constitutional provision, to prevent altogether the choice of a Representative by the people. The assertion of such a power by a State is inconsistent with the supremacy of the Constitution of the United States, and makes void the provision that that Constitution "shall be the supreme law of the land," anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.
> Your committee submit that the position assumed by those who claim for the States this power, that its exercise in nowise conflicts with the Constitution, or the right of the people under it to choose any person having the qualifications therein prescribed, has no foundation in fact.

---

[1] First session Thirty-fourth Congress, 1 Bartlett, p. 166; Rowell's Digest, p. 141; House Report No. 194.

By the Constitution the people have a right to choose as Representative any person having only the qualifications therein mentioned, without superadding thereto any additional qualifications whatever. A power to add new qualifications is certainly equivalent to a power to vary or change them. An additional qualification imposed by State authority would necessarily disqualify any person who had only the qualifications prescribed by the Federal Constitution.

Your committee can not assent to the averment of the memorialist, Mr. Fouke, that "the question presented is not one of qualification of a Member of Congress arising under the Constitution of the United States, but a question of election arising under the constitution and laws of the State of Illinois."

It is not intimated either by the memorialist, or any one else, that the persons who voted at said election in said several districts were not qualified electors and legally entitled to vote, nor is it intimated that said election was not conducted in all respects as required by law. In short, the only point made by the memorialist is that Mr. Marshall, who received a large majority of all the votes cast in said Ninth district, and Mr. Trumbull, who received a large majority of all the votes cast in the said Eighth district, were each of them ineligible to a seat in Congress, not because either of them lacked any qualification prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, but because each of them was disqualified by operation of the provisions of the constitution of the State of Illinois. If the respective terms for which those two gentlemen had been elected judges of the said State had expired more than one year before the 7th of November, 1854, we would have had no intimation that the votes cast for each of them were in contemplation of law no votes; their election would, under these circumstances, have been conceded, because they would have been acknowledged as not disqualified to hold the office under and by virtue of the constitution of the State of Illinois. If the State of Illinois may thus disqualify any class of persons possessing all the qualifications required by the Federal Constitution for a Representative in Congress for a period of ten years, and another class for a period of five years, what is there to restrain that State from imposing like disabilities upon all citizens of the United States residing within her territory, and thus take away from the people the right to choose Representatives in Congress every second year, declaring, in effect, that only every fifth or tenth year shall the people choose their Representatives? It is no answer to say that these disabilities are self-imposed by the majority of the people of the State. The majority of the people within the several States have not the power to impair the rights of the minority guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and exercised under its authority'

By the plain letter of the Constitution Congress may prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives, and at such time and place, and in the manner thus prescribed—every second year—the people of each State may choose as Representative in Congress any person having the qualifications enumerated in that Constitution. The power attempted to be asserted by the State of Illinois in the cases before us is in direct contravention of the letter, as also of the spirit, true intent, and meaning of these provisions of the Federal Constitution, and absolutely subversive of the rights of the people under that Constitution. Your committee, therefore, conclude that the said tenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of the State of Illinois is inoperative in the premises; that the said Trumbull and Marshall were each eligible to the office of Representative in Congress at the time of said election, it being conceded that on that day they possessed all the qualifications for that office required under the Constitution of the United States; and that the votes given to each of them were not void, as alleged, because they were given by electors having the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and at the time and place and in the manner prescribed by law.

On April 7 and April 10 [1] the report was debated in the House. Mr. Trumbull had never taken his seat in the House, having been elected to the Senate. So in the contest in his case, the committee tested the question before the House with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. P. B. Fouke, who has presented to this House his memorial claiming to represent the Eighth district of Illinois in the Thirty-fourth Congress, was not duly elected as claimed by him, and is not entitled to a seat in this House, and that said seat is vacant.

This resolution was agreed to—yeas 135, nays 5.

[1] Journal, pp. 805–808; Globe, pp. 829, 864.

Then a resolution declaring that Mr. Turney was not elected and that Samuel S. Marshall,[1] the sitting Member, was entitled to the seat, was agreed to without division.

416. In 1856 the Senate decided that a State might not add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution for a Senator.

In the Senate in 1856 a Senator-elect was sworn on his prima facie right, although his qualifications were questioned.

In 1856 the Senate considered and decided a question as to the qualifications of a Member who had already been seated on his prima facie showing.

On February 27, 1856,[2] the Senate Judiciary Committee reported on the right of Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, to a seat in the Senate. A provision of the constitution of Illinois provided that certain judges of that State should not be eligible to any other office of the State or United States during the term for which they were elected nor for one year thereafter. Mr. Trumbull had been a judge and came within the prohibitions of the constitution. Hence a question arose as to the effect of qualifications imposed by a State in addition to the qualifications imposed by the Constitution.

On December 3, 1855,[3] when Mr. Trumbull appeared to take the oath, a protest reciting the facts was filed, but no objection was offered to his taking the oath, which he accordingly did.

On February 20 and 27,[4] and March 3 and 5,[5] 1856, the question was debated at length, and on the latter day, by a vote of yeas 35, nays 8, Mr. Trumbull was declared entitled to the seat.

417. The Kansas election case of Wood v. Peters in the Forty-eighth Congress.

In 1884 the House reaffirmed its position that a State may not add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution for a Member.

Discussion as to whether or not a Member is an officer of the Government.

On March 18, 1884,[6] Mr. Mortimer F. Elliott, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority of the committee in the Kansas case of Wood v. Peters.

The sitting Member had received, on the general ticket, 99,866 votes, and contestant 83,364. The contestant claimed the seat on the sole ground that Mr. Peters was ineligible at the time he was voted for.

---

[1] The Journal and Globe show that Mr. Marshall's name was on the roll when the House first met, and that on February 4, after the Speaker was finally chosen, he was sworn in without objection. (Journal, pp. 7, 448; Globe, pp. 2, 353.) But from the debate (Mr. Orr's speech, Globe, p. 831) it appears that the governor of Illinois had declined to issue credentials to any of the four, but sent them all with a statement of facts. Mr. Marshall was seated on his prima facie showing of a majority of votes. For a copy of governor's statement, which was really a duly authenticated certificate, see Globe, page 865.

[6] First session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 794; Mobley, p. 79.

The constitution of Kansas provided that judges of the supreme and district courts of the State should not "hold any office of profit or trust under the authority of the State or the United States during the term of office for which said justices or judges shall be elected."

It was conceded that Mr. Peters came within this prohibition, and the majority say:

It is clear that Peters falls within the inhibition of the constitution of Kansas, and if a State possesses the power to add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for Representatives in Congress, then he was ineligible at the time he was voted for, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Article I, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen."

The Constitution, by prescribing certain qualifications enumerated in the section just quoted, according to a well-settled rule of construction, excludes all others.

The States have no power to superadd other qualifications, for the reason that such power can not, in the nature of things, be found among the reserved rights of the States, and no such power is delegated to them by the Federal Constitution.

Congress is the creature of the Constitution of the United States, and the right of the people of the several States to representation therein is derived wholly from that instrument, and the States could not have reserved the right to prescribe qualifications of Members of Congress, when the right to elect them at all grew out of the formation of the National Government.

The question involved in this contest is not a new one. It has been too well settled to require further elaboration, and the committee will content themselves with a reference to a few of the authorities on the subject:

"Now, it may properly be asked, where did the State get the power to appoint Representatives in the National Government? Was it a power that existed at all before the Constitution was adopted? If derived from the Constitution, must it not be derived exactly under the qualifications established by the Constitution, and none others? If the Constitution has delegated no power to the States to add new qualifications, how can they claim. any such power by the mere adoption of that instrument, which they did not before possess?

"The truth is that the States can exercise no powers whatsoever, which exclusively spring out of the existence of the National Government, which the Constitution does not delegate to them. They have just as much right, and no more, to prescribe new qualifications for a Representative as they have for a President. Each is an officer of the Union, deriving his powers and qualifications from the Constitution, and neither created by, dependent upon, nor controllable by the States. It is no original prerogative of State power to appoint a Representative, a Senator, or President for the Union. (Story on the Constitution, vol. 1, secs. 626 and 627.)

"The question whether the individual States can superadd to or vary the qualifications prescribed to the Representative by the Constitution of the United States is examined in Mr. Justice Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 1, pages 99 to 103, but the objections to the existence of any such power appears to me to be too palpable and weighty to admit of any discussion. (1 Kent's Commentaries, p. 228, note F.)"

To same effect, Paschal's Annotated Constitution, page 305.

The precise question presented in this case was determined by this House in the cases of Turney v. Marshall, and Fouke v. Trumbull, of Illinois. (Bartlett's Contested Election Cases from 1834 to 1865, p. 167.)

The tenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of the State of Illinois, which was adopted on the 6th day of March, 1848, is in the words following:

"The judges of the supreme and circuit courts shall not be eligible to any other office or public trust of profit in this State or the United States during the term for which they were elected, nor for one year thereafter. All votes for either of them for any elective office (except that of judge of the supreme or circuit courts), given by the general assembly or the people, shall be void."

Marshall and Trumbull had been judges of Illinois, and at the time they were elected Members of Congress were clearly within the prohibitory provisions of the constitution of that State.

The Committee on Elections, in their report to the House on these cases, state the questions to be determined as follows:

"This presents the question whether a State may superadd to the qualifications prescribed to the Representative in Congress by the Constitution of the United States."

The committee reached the conclusion that a State could not add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and reported that Trumbull and Marshall were entitled to their seats. The report of the committee was sustained by the House by a decisive vote.

Trumbull's case, determined by the United States Senate in 1856, is also directly in point. (Election Cases from 1834 to 1865, p. 618.)

The authorities cited place the question involved in this case beyond the realm of doubt. It is very clear that S. R. Peters was duly elected a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress from the State of Kansas at large, and that he possessed all the qualifications requisite to entitle him to take his seat.

The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That S. R. Peters was duly elected a Member of Congress from the State of Kansas, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. R. T. Bennett, of North Carolina, filed minority views in which he argued at length, with an abundant citation of precedents, and an elaborate review of the Constitution, that the State had the right to prescribe the additional qualification. He also argued that Senators and Representatives were not "officers" of the General Government.

Assuming that Mr. Peters was disqualified, he next argued elaborately, with a review of precedents, that the minority candidate was entitled to be seated. This argument was replied to by Mr. Elliott in the course of the debate.[1]

The minority proposed resolutions declaring Mr. Peters ineligible, and seating Mr. Wood.

The report was debated April 23,[2] and on that day the minority proposition declaring Mr. Peters ineligible was disagreed to; ayes 20; noes 106. The next proposition declaring Mr. Wood entitled to the seat was disagreed to.

Then the majority resolution confirming the title of Mr. Peters was agreed to without division.

418. A Member-elect whose credentials were in due form, but whose age was not sufficient to meet the constitutional requirement, was not enrolled by the Clerk.

A Member-elect not being of the required age, the taking of the oath was deferred until he was qualified.

On December 5, 1859,[3] among the Members-elect appearing with credentials was Mr. John Young Brown, of Kentucky. His name appears in the list of Members-elect in the Congressional Globe of that date, but does not appear in the Journal on the roll of Members-elect called by the Clerk.

In this Congress there was a contest for Speaker lasting from December 5, 1859, until February 1, 1860, when, on the forty-fourth vote, a Speaker was elected. Mr. Brown does not appear among those voting in this contest, nor was he sworn in on February 1,[1] when the oath was administered to the Members of the House by the Speaker.

At the beginning of the next session, on December 3, 1860,[2] Mr. Brown was sworn in.

No explanation was given on any of the above dates of the delay of Mr. Brown in taking the oath.

The reason for the delay appears incidentally in a debate on June 18, 1860,[3] when Mr. John W. Stevenson, of Kentucky, explained that Mr. Brown was under the constitutional age, and had not been sworn in, although the State authorities of Kentucky had issued a certificate to him.[4]

419. The Constitution defines what shall constitute citizenship of the United States and of the several States.—Section 1 of Article XIV of the Constitution provides:

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.[5]

420. The South Carolina case of William Smith, the first election case in the First Congress.

A native of South Carolina, who had been abroad during the Revolution and on his return had not resided in the country seven years, was held to be qualified as a citizen.

The House decided a Member-elect entitled to a seat on his prima facie right, although knowing that his qualifications were under examination.

In the first election case the Committee on Elections were directed to take proofs, but not to present any opinion thereon.

A Member whose qualifications were questioned was permitted to be present before the committee, cross-examine, and offer counter proofs.

Instance of an inquiry as to a Member-elect's qualifications instituted by petition.

As to whether or not a disqualified Member who has taken the oath may be excluded by a majority vote.

As to the effect of absence from the country on the question of citizenship.

The First Congress assembled on March 4, 1789, and a quorum not being present the House met and adjourned daily until April 1, when a quorum appeared Claiborne, of Tennessee, said to have been born in 1775, took his seat in the House on November 23, 1797, without question, although if the date of his birth is correct he was only 22 years of age. and a Speaker was elected. On April 13[1] Mr. William Smith, of South Carolina, appeared and took his seat. On April 15[2] a petition of David Ramsay, of the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, setting forth that Mr. Smith was at the time of his election ineligible and came within the disqualification of the third paragraph of the Constitution, which declared that no person should be a Representative who should not have been seven years a citizen of the United States.[3] This petition was referred to the Committee on Elections with instructions to report "a proper mode of investigating and deciding thereupon." This Elections Committee, which had already been chosen, consisted of Messrs. George Clymer, of Pennsylvania; Fisher Ames, of Massachusetts; Egbert Benson, of New York; Daniel Carroll, of Maryland; Alexander White, of Virginia; Benjamin Huntington, of Connecticut; and Nicholas Gilman, of New Hampshire.

On April 18,[4] in accordance with a usage then established and continued in several Congresses, the Committee on Elections reported a list of the Members whose credentials were "sufficient to entitle them to take seats in this House," and the House agreed to the report. The name of William Smith, of South Carolina, was on this list.

On the same day, and very soon thereafter, the Committee on Elections reported as to the case of Mr. Smith, the report, after amendment by the House, being as follows:

> That in this case it will be sufficient, in the first instance, that a committee take such proofs as can be obtained in this city respecting the facts stated in the petition, and report the same to the House; that Mr. Smith be permitted to be present from time to time when such proofs are taken to examine the witnesses, and to offer counter proofs, which shall also be received by the committee and reported to the House; that if the proofs, so to be reported, shall be declared by the House insufficient to verify the material facts stated in the petition, or such other facts as the House shall deem proper to be inquired into, it will then be necessary for the House to direct a further inquiry, especially the procuring whatever additional testimony may be supposed to be in South Carolina, as the case may require; that all questions arising on the proofs be decided by this House, without any previous opinion thereon reported by a committee.

The report having been considered on April 29, and amended by the House to read as above shown,[5] it was—

> Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said report, and that it be an instruction to the Committee of Elections to proceed accordingly.

On May 16[6] a yea-and-nay vote occurred in the House and Mr. Smith is recorded as voting, showing conclusively that he had taken the oath while the question as to his qualifications was pending.

[1] First session First Congress, Journal, p. 12. It is a fair presumption that, Mr. Smith took the oath when he took his seat, as on April 6 the House had agreed on a form of oath which was on April 8 administered to those present. Other Members came in and took seats after that, and undoubtedly took the oath. The record of Mr. Smith's appearance is the same as that of others.

On May 12[1] the committee submitted their report, which was taken up for consideration on May 21. The report[2] stated:

That Mr. Smith appeared before them, and admitted that he had subscribed, and had caused to be printed in the State Gazette of South Carolina, of the 24th of November last, the publication which accompanies this report, and to which the petitioner doth refer as proof of the facts stated in his petition; that Mr. Smith also admitted that his father departed this life in the year 1770, about five months after he sent him to Great Britain; that his mother departed this life about the year 1760, and that he was admitted to the bar of the supreme court in South Carolina in the month of January, 1784.

The committee also submitted certain counter proofs, mostly copies of acts of South Carolina.

On May 21 and 22[3] the House considered the report, and in the debate the following facts were stated and admitted:

That Mr. Smith was born in South Carolina, of parents whose ancestors were the first settlers of the colony, and was sent to England for his education when about 12 years of age. In 1774 he was sent to Geneva to pursue his studies, where he resided until 1778. In the beginning of that year he went to Paris, and resided two months as an American gentleman; was received in that character by Doctor Franklin, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Arthur Lee, the American commissioners to the Court of France. In January, 1779, he left Paris for London, to procure from the guardian appointed by his father the means of his return to America. He was disappointed, however, of the expected aid, and was obliged to remain in England till he could get remittances from Charleston. In the interval the State of South Carolina fell into the hands of the enemy, and this rendered it impossible at that time to return. He remained in England, and embraced the opportunity to acquire a knowledge of the English law, but could not be admitted to the practice of it because he had not taken the oath of allegiance to Great Britain, which is a necessary qualification. Having obtained the necessary funds, he left London in October or November, 1782, with a view of returning to America, but avoided taking passage for Charleston, because it was then in possession of the British, but traveled over to Ostend, and there embarked in a neutral vessel for St. Kitts, with the intention of receiving the first opportunity of reaching the American camp. In January he sailed from Ostend, but was shipwrecked on the coast of England and obliged to return to London in order to procure another passage, and was thus prevented from reaching the United States till 1783. That on his arrival in Charleston he was received by his countrymen as a citizen of the State of South Carolina, and elected by their free suffrages a member of the legislature, and was subsequently elected to several honorable posts, and finally, in 1788, to the seat in Congress, which is the subject of this contest.

The constitution of South Carolina was silent as to citizenship; but certain laws had from time to time been passed, both with regard to those absent from the country for purposes of education and with regard to aliens. The constitution also prescribed certain qualifications of residence for those holding certain offices.

It was shown that in Mr. Smith's public career in his own State it had uniformly been assumed that he was a citizen of the State during the time he resided abroad; and no questions were raised, although he was disqualified for some of those positions under the law, if it was to be assumed that he was not a citizen while abroad.

After debate, the House, on May 22, 1789,[4] agreed to the following resolution by a vote of 36 yeas to 1 nay:

Resolved, That it appears to this House, upon mature consideration, that William Smith had been seven years a citizen of the United States at the time cf his election.

It does not appear that any question was raised in the debate as to the right of the House to decide by majority vote on the title of a Member to his seat should he be found disqualified.

421. The Michigan election case of Biddle v. Richard in the Eighteenth Congress.

An alien naturalized by a State court not expressly empowered by the United States Statutes so to do was yet held to be qualified as a citizen.

A person who had resided in a Territory one year as a person, but not as a citizen, was held to be qualified as a Delegate under the law requiring a residence of one year.

A discussion as to whether or not a Delegate should have the same qualifications as a Member.

The office of Delegate was created by ordinance of the Continental Congress.

On January 13, 1824,[1] the Committee on Elections reported on the contested election case of Biddle v. Richard, from Michigan Territory. Mr. Richard was objected to on the ground that he was an alien, his naturalization before a Michigan court being alleged to be invalid; and on the ground, should the naturalization be held valid, he was still disqualified, as the naturalization had not taken place a year previous to the election.

The committee in this case first noticed the subject of the qualifications of a Delegate, and called attention to the fact that the office was not one provided for by the Constitution, but grew out of the ordinance of Congress for the government of the Northwest Territory, passed before the adoption of the Constitution. Neither by the terms of that ordinance nor by the laws of the United States were qualifications required of a person elected Delegate. Unless a rule could be deduced from the principles of the Constitution there was nothing to prevent an alien from holding a seat in Congress as Delegate from a Territory. But the committee expressly disclaim any intention of pronouncing a decision on this point, since the case did not render it absolutely necessary.

The sitting Member had been naturalized in a county court in Michigan, and while the naturalization law of the United States did not in terms include such court among those authorized to naturalize aliens, yet the committee concluded that by implication the intention to authorize such a court was plainly shown.

As to the second objection, it was shown that the law prescribed a residence of one year "next preceding the election" as a qualification needed to make a person eligible to any office in said Territory. Even admitting the office of Delegate to be included in this prescription, it was to be observed that it was not the citizen but the person who was required to reside in the Territory one year. Therefore the committee overruled the objection that the naturalization had not taken place a year before the election.

The committee concluded that Gabriel Richard was entitled to the seat.

On February 2, 1824, the House practically concurred in this conclusion by ordering that John Biddle have leave to withdraw his petition and documents.

422. The Florida election case of David Levy in the Twenty-seventh Congress.

An instance of citizenship conferred by treaty stipulations.

In determining citizenship a committee ruled that the domicile of the father is considered the domicile of the son during the minority of the son if he be under the control and direction of the father.

In 1841–42,[1] the Committee on Elections twice examined the qualifications of David Levy, sitting as Delegate from Florida.

By the treaty ceding Florida to the United States, it was provided:

> The inhabitants of the territories which his Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

This treaty was signed February 22, 1819, and ratified February 22, 1821. The majority of the Committee of Elections found that the formal transfer began at St. Augustine on July 10, 1821, and was completed at Pensacola July 17, and that on the latter day Governor Jackson issued his proclamation of American sovereignty, in accordance with the directions of the Government at Washington. The minority of the committee found that East Florida (there being two provinces) was transferred July 10, and preferred that date to July 17.

David Levy was not an inhabitant of Florida on either the 10th or 17th of July 1821. He had been born on the island of St. Thomas (then a possession of Denmark) on June 2, 1810, his father being a subject of the King of Denmark. David Levy came to Norfolk, Va., in 1819, and attended school and worked there until 1827. He did not go to Florida to reside until 1827. It is evident, therefore, that he was not an inhabitant of Florida, in his own right, at the time of the transfer of the Territory.

The committee, in the course of the investigation, adopted the principle "that the domicil of the father is the domicil of the son during the minority of the son, if the son be under the control and direction of the father."

Therefore the question turned on whether or not Moses Levy, father of David Levy, was an "inhabitant" of Florida at the time of the transfer of sovereignty. Moses Levy was born in Morocco, but at the time of the birth of his son was a subject of the King of Denmark. In the early part of 1821 he came to Philadelphia and took out his declaration to become an American citizen. He then went to Florida, and the question turns principally on whether he was there at the time of the transfer, although the minority contended that, not being a subject of the King of Spain, the treaty did not operate on him. In their first report the committee found that Moses Levy was not an inhabitant of Florida at the time of the transfer, and that, had he been, the King of Spain might not have transferred his allegiance to the United States, since he was a Danish subject.

423. The Florida election case of David Levy, continued.

A Delegate who, though an alien by birth, had lived in the United States from an early age, and whose father had been a resident for twenty years, was not disturbed on technical objections as to his citizenship.

The House has the same authority to determine the right of a Delegate to his seat that it has in the case of a Member.

A committee held that the strongest reasons of public policy require a Delegate to possess qualifications similar to those required of a Member.

A committee held that under the principles of the common law an alien might not hold a seat as a Delegate.

A committee denied the binding effect of a decision of a Territorial court on a question of fact concerning the qualifications of a Delegate.

An instance of the admission of ex parte testimony in an election case.

Later additional evidence was presented, and, although objected to by the minority of the committee as inadmissible because taken ex parte, was admitted. This testimony shows, among other things, that Moses Levy was recorded as an inhabitant in a registry established by General Jackson. This proceeding appeared undoubtedly to have been ultra vires; but there was other evidence as to the time of the arrival of Moses Levy in Florida, and the majority of the committee finally concluded that as the Delegate had lived in the United States from an early age, as his father had been a resident of the United States for more than twenty years and had twice taken the oaths of abjuration and allegiance, the "spirit of the naturalization policy of the country" had been fully satisfied. This idea seems to have been of considerable weight in determining the committee to reverse its first report, and decide that Mr. Levy was entitled to the seat. This reversal of conclusion was barely made, four of the nine members of the committee dissenting and a fifth giving only a qualified assent.

The House did not act on the report; but Mr. Levy retained the seat without confirmation of the report by the House, since he had originally been admitted to the seat.

In the course of the consideration of this case the committee came to certain conclusions bearing vitally on the case.

1. It was urged that the House of Representatives had no jurisdiction to try or determine the eligibility of a Territorial Delegate. The committee concluded that the House had plenary authority to investigate and decide upon all questions touching the right of a Delegate to hold a seat in that body. Such authority seemed absolutely essential to the existence of a well-regulated legislative body, which must have the power to prevent the intrusion of improper persons, or guard its own rights from violation. And the House had so determined in many cases from 1794 to 1838.

2. That citizenship was not one of the qualifications of a Delegate in the acts of Congress under which he was appointed; and that, therefore, the House of Representatives could not make it a test of eligibility. The committee agreed that while the original ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory was silent in reference to the qualifications of a Delegate, yet must have assumed certain ones. While not strictly or technically a Representative, yet, considering the dignity and importance of the office, the strongest reasons of public policy would require that he should possess qualifications similar to those required by a Representative. Even if the letter and spirit of the Constitution might not give light, yet the well-settled principles of common law would prevent an alien from holding a seat in the House of Representatives. Chancellor Kent had enunciated the proposition that an alien might not hold any civil office, or take any active share in the administration of the Government. The committee therefore were confident that an alien might not exercise the office of a Delegate to Congress.

3. That the rights of David Levy under the treaty had been the subject of recent adjudication by the highest judicial tribunal of Florida, constituted of judges appointed and commissioned by the United States Government, and that such adjudication, if not conclusive, was persuasive evidence, and that the committee ought not to look behind it. The committee denied that the court in question was one of concurrent jurisdiction, or that the decision in question was directly upon the point. Furthermore, it was not between the same parties.

424. The Indiana election case of Lowry v. White in the Fiftieth Congress.

A Member who had long been a resident of the country, but who could produce neither the record of the court nor his final naturalization paper, was nevertheless retained in his seat by the House.

The House, overruling its committee, admitted parol evidence to prove the naturalization of a Member who could produce neither the record of the court nor his certificate of naturalization.

Determination by a divided Elections Committee that the disqualification of a sitting Member does not entitle the contestant, who had received the next highest number of votes, to the seat.[1]

On January 30, 1888,[2] Mr. F. G. Barry, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Indiana case of Lowry v. White. The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 2,484 votes over contestant, and also a clear majority of all the votes polled at the election.

The questions of importance in this case all arose out of the alleged disqualification of the sitting Member, it being alleged that he had not been on the 4th of March, 1887, a citizen of the United States for a period of seven years prior thereto, as required by the Constitution.

(1) The majority state the first question:

(1) Was the contestee a naturalized citizen of the United States, and.had he been for seven years previous to the 4th of March, 1887, and if he was, can he prove that fact by parol?

The majority report thus answers this question:

The second paragraph of section 2, Article I, of the Constitution of.the United States says:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

---

[1] See also Section 417 of this volume for reference to an elaborate discussion of this point.

[2] First session Fiftieth Congress, House Report No. 163; Mobly, p. 623.

In the eighth section of the Constitution of the United States power is conferred on Congress "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." This power is exclusively in Congress. (2 Wheaton, 269.) The existing legislation of Congress on that subject is contained in the thirty-third chapter of the Revised Statutes, 1878.

It is admitted that contestee is a native of Scotland, and that he arrived in the United States on the 8th of August, 1854. Your committee believe that in claiming to be a naturalized citizen of this country he fails to bring himself within the provision of said statute. His original status is presumed to continue until the contrary be shown. (Hauenstein v. Lynhom, 100 U.S., 483.) In the opinion of your committee contestee has failed to remove this presumption.

It is proven and not disputed that contestee went through the final forms of naturalization and admission to citizenship at Warsaw, Kosciusko County, Ind., on Monday, November 1, 1886, in a court of record, on the ground that the doctrine of relation might apply to his declaration of intention which is duly entered of record on the 24th day of July, 1858, in the circuit court of Allen County, Ind.

To say the least of it, this is an unfavorable admission on the part of the contestee. It is not contended by the learned counsel that the doctrine of relation will apply in this case. Contestee, however, claims to have been admitted to citizenship in the court of common pleas of Allen County, Ind., on February 28, 1865, which is the vital point of contention in this case.

It is admitted that there is no record of such proceedings, nor a trace of such a record in any court; but contestee now claims that a certificate of naturalization was then issued to him which he can not now produce, nor does he or any one know what became of it.

If contestee were naturalized in February, 1865, can he prove it by parol? A thorough examination of the authorities convince your committee that he can not. Contestee, in his brief, holds that parol evidence may be received to prove the fact of naturalization; that it is the oath of fidelity to the Government which makes an alien a citizen, and that fact can be proven by parol in the absence of the record of the court.

There are set forth in the printed record of this case contemporaneous entries of naturalization in said Allen County, which are claimed by contestee to be in duplicate of the certificate issued to naturalized persons about the period he claims to have been naturalized, and from this it is assumed by contestee he held such a certificate.

Whatever weight might be given to this alleged missing certificate, even if produced in evidence, it is unnecessary to discuss, and we forbear an opinion on that. It is sufficient to say that such an attempt to prove it or its contents is a species of evidence too speculative and inferential to be entertained, especially when it is sought to establish the solemn proceedings of a court of record. No authority in support of such a rule of evidence has been furnished this committee, and we do not think there is one in existence.

As the able counsel for the contestee tersely stated the proposition in their brief, "Can parol evidence be received to prove the fact of naturalization?" We answer, it can not; certainly not in the absence of any record whatever, or even a certificate of naturalization, as is admitted in this case. The authorities therein cited to the effect that the contents of a lost record may be proven by parol, is a principle too familiar to discuss. But we have not found a single adjudicated case in which oral evidence is admitted to prove a record which never existed.

Not one witness testifies to having read the alleged certificate, and none but contestee says he ever saw it, and he does not attempt to state its contents. There are only two witnesses, Isaac Jenkinson and William T. Pratt, who profess to have been present at the alleged naturalization of contestee in February, 1858, besides the contestee himself. Pratt says nothing of seeing such certificate, and Isaac Jenkinson says:

"I have no recollection of any papers being drawn up or signed or sworn to on that occasion." (Record, p. 190, question 41.)

In Shaeffer v. Kreutzer (6 Binn., 430), which is relied on by contestee, Justice Yates says:

"It [the verdict] is no evidence of the fact having been legally decided, for the judgment may have been arrested and a new trial granted. Here a former action of ejectment was brought for the same land by persons to whom the present parties are privies, and the verdict given therein was offered to introduce the collateral fact of payment of the cost of that suit, and to account for the defendant in this action coming into possession, and of the plaintiff's acquiescence in the adverse title."

Contestee also relies on Campbell v. Gordon. (6 Cranch, 176.) This was a bill to rescind contract for sale of land. There was a memorandum on the minutes of the court as follows:

"At a district court held at Suffolk, William Currie, native of Scotland, migrated into the Commonwealth, took the oath, etc."

There was also a certificate of naturalization of appellee's father. Judge Spears, in discussing that case, said not only the certificate of the clerk but the minutes of the court were produced; besides, the certificate had appended to it these words: "A copy: test, Jno. C. Littlepage," who it appeared in evidence was clerk. (See Green's Son, Federal Reporter, July, 1887, vol. 31, p. 110.)

In Dryden v. Swinburne the court discusses the case of Campbell v. Gordon at length, and says:

"When the court say, 'The oath when taken confers upon him the right of citizenship' it is obvious that they meant when the record showed the oath was taken it would suffice, and it would be presumed that it was not administered, or at least an entry was not made of it, till all the other requisites of the statutes were complied with. It would be an utter distortion of this language and decision to hold that the taking of the oath by parol testimony, when the record was produced, and it failed to show any naturalization or attempt at naturalization." (Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va., 125. See also 18 Ga., 239.)

Any other construction would be in direct violation of the Revised Statutes of the United States upon the subject of naturalization. Section 2165 says:

"An alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States in the following manner, and not otherwise:"

It subsequently says, "which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the court." It distinctly provides that the naturalization proceedings must be in a court of record. Hence Justice Marshall says:

They [the courts of record] are to receive testimony, to compare it with the law, and to judge of both law and fact. The judgment is entered on record as the judgment of the court. It seems to us, if it be in legal form, to close all inquiry; and like every other judgment, to be the complete evidence of its own validity."

In this extract that great jurist was discussing the proceedings in naturalization.

Contestee relies also on Stark v. Insurance Company (7 Cranch, 420). This was an action of covenant upon a policy of insurance. The goods insured were warranted to be American property. The record entries are complete, with a formal judgment of admission to citizenship, but fail to show that Stark, the naturalized alien, had filed a previous declaration of intention. It was held that the judgment was conclusive as to antecedent matters in the cause.

Contestee also cites 91 United States Reports, page 245 (Insurance Co. v. Tesdale). Suit was brought by plaintiff, who was administratrix of her deceased husband, in her individual character, against defendant, upon a policy of insurance on the life of her husband. The sole question was, could letters of administration be admitted to prove the death of a third person where the right of action depends upon the death of such person; and the court held that it could not be done.

The question of naturalization was in no way involved, but the court says, incidentally, that a certificate of naturalization is good against all the world as a judgment of citizenship, from which may follow the right to vote and hold property; but it can not be introduced as evidence of residence, age, or character. (91 U.S.R., 245.)

Mr. Calkins, in his very able and ingenious argument before the committee, relied with great emphasis on the case of Coleman on habeas corpus (15 Blatchford, 406), in which the court says, speaking of the Revised Statutes concerning naturalization proceedings:

"The provisions for recording proceedings at the close of the second condition and the provisions for recording the renunciation mentioned in the fourth condition are introduced in such form that they may very well be regarded as merely directory."

This was a criminal proceeding, highly penal in its nature, the offense with which Coleman was charged being a felony, under Revised Statutes of the United States, section 5426.

Coleman held a certificate of naturalization, and the only question presented was: (1) Had the certificate been unlawfully issued or made; and (2) did Coleman know that when he so issued it?

Coleman was arraigned for having so used said certificate for the purpose of registering himself as a voter, knowing it was unlawfully issued. There were papers on file in the clerk's office, from whence the certificate issued, setting forth the necessary proceedings of Coleman's naturalization. His name was also entered in the naturalization index. The certificate was signed by the clerk of the superior court, attested by the seal of the court, certifying that the copy, before set forth, of the entry in regard to Coleman in such naturalization index, "is a true extract from the record of naturalizations of this court, remaining in my office to date."

Judge Blatchford held that Coleman was duly and legally admitted to citizenship, and that he should be discharged.

It can not be contended that in a matter so highly penal any evidence that would go toward acquittal would be sufficient to establish citizenship and clothe an alien with all the political powers and privileges of a citizen. What would be sufficient in one case might be wholly insufficient in the other.

In such a prosecution the criminal intent or the guilty knowledge of using an unlawful certificate would be the governing question. In such a case even a reasonable doubt would discharge the defendant. A naturalized citizen is a mere creature of the law. He derives his existence as such from the law, and if he fail to follow its essential provisions he can not be clothed with those high privileges such a law confers.

But the court says in the Coleman case that propositions are announced the accuracy of which can not be questioned—such as the admission of an alien to citizenship is a judicial act (15 Blatchford, p. 420)—and at furthest the partial committal of the court in the Coleman case, that the statute requiring the record or proceedings may very well be regarded as directory, can only be considered as a dictum, as it was held in that case there was complete and sufficient record of naturalization.

Contestee also relies on 7 Hill, N. Y., 137–141, but in that case, it will be observed, the court says:

"The proceedings of naturalization are strictly judicial (p. 138). The right of citizenship is finally conferred by the judgment of the court (p. 141)."

He also cites McCarty v. Marsh (5 N. Y., 263) as liberal to the naturalization of foreigners.

In that case Justice Foot says:

"The simple question, then, is whether the record is conclusive evidence of the fact that a prior declaration of intention was made in due form of law. The weight of authority is decidedly in the affirmative. (Citing 6 and 7 Cranch, supra, Spratt v. Spratt, 4 Peters, and a large number of cases.)"

Contestee also relies on the case of The Acorn (2 Abbott, U.S. Reports, p. 434) as liberal concerning the naturalization of foreigners. This was a libel of information and seizure for forfeiture for alleged violation of registry laws. One of the causes alleged is, that when David Muir took the oath he was not a citizen of the United States, as his oath alleged.

Muir introduced in evidence an exemplified copy of the record of his naturalization. So far as the question of naturalization is concerned in that case, Judge Longyear decided that the judgment naturalizing Muir was conclusive as to the preliminary proceedings necessary to give the naturalizing court jurisdiction—a familiar principle that runs through all adjudicated cases on that point. This judge also says in his opinion:

"The proceeding to obtain naturalization is clearly a judicial one. (Ibid., p. 444.)

"A hearing is required to be had in open court, and the right can be conferred only by the judgment of the court, and upon satisfactory proof. (Ibid., p. 444.)"

Contestee relies in his brief on the following extract from Morse on Citizenship, page 84:

"In case of an individual claiming to be a citizen by naturalization, the certificate or letter of naturalization is the usual and orderly proof which is offered, but is not exclusive. If the letter or certificate is lost and the record can not be discovered, secondary evidence to establish citizenship would be admissible. (Citing Field's International Code, p. 136, note, and the opinion of Attorney-General Black, vol. 9, p. 64.)"

The last-named author, under the subject of allegiance, cites Attorney-General Black, who simply says:

"The fact of renunciation is to be established like any other facts for which there is no prescribed form of proof by evidence which will convince the judgment."

This was a case of a Bavarian, once naturalized here, claiming renunciation of his citizenship as a citizen of this country; and how and where the author of the above quotation got his law your committee are at a loss to determine. In international affairs such a principle might apply, when the question of citizenship is a matter of dispute and the liberty or property of a subject are involved. But there are no authorities holding such a doctrine in this country when an alien, claiming to be naturalized, seeks to establish that fact by parol proof.

The case of Dryden v. Swinburne (22 W. Va.) is a remarkable parallel case to this in all of its salient features. Judge Green in that case, in an elaborate opinion, discusses the subject in the most learned manner.

The following extracts from the syllabus in that case is a clear statement of the decision on this point:

"The law requires that an alien should be naturalized in a court of record, and his admission to citizenship must be a judgment of such court; and therefore if it is claimed in any case that an alien has been naturalized in a certain court, and it be shown, that if naturalized at all, he was naturalized in that court, and the records of such court are produced, and an examination of them shows that no entry was made on the records of such court naturalizing such alien, it can not be proven by parol evidence that he was admitted to citizenship in such court, but that by inadvertence, or any other reason, there was no entry made of it; nor can the citizenship of an alien, under such circumstances, be presumed by proof of his having held real estate or of his having voted or held office or by other circumstances."

The same doctrine is announced in the case of Chas. Green's Son and others v. Salas (3 Federal Law Reporter, July 26, 1887); also in Rutherford v. Crawford (53 Ga., 138).

In these last two cases a certificate was presented by the persons claiming to have been naturalized, which was held insufficient in each.

In Andrews v. Inhabitants of Boylston (110 Mass., 214) it is held, if the records of a town meeting fail to show a two-thirds vote to reestablish a school-district system, parol evidence is inadmissible to show it, even though the record shows that the town voted to reestablish the school-district system.

The omission in a record can not be supplied by parol proof. (2 Pickering, 397.)

The court says "it would be dangerous to admit of such.proof." (2 Pickering, 397. See also 125 Mass., 553; 117 Mass. 469; 58 Iowa, 503; Wharton's Evidence, 987; 18 Maine, 344; 3 Blackford, 125; 23 Maine, 123.) '

In Slade v. Minor (2 Cranch, Circuit Court Reports, D. C., 139), the point was distinctly presented, and the case was decided upon it, in which the court held that the naturalization of Charles Slade could not be proved by parol.

Certificates of naturalization issued by the clerk of a court, without any hearing before the judge in open court, are void, and confer no right of citizenship upon the holder. (McCrary on Elections, see. 56.)

Starkie in his work on evidence, page 648, says:

"In the first place, parol evidence is never admissible to supersede the use of written evidence where written proof is required by law. Where the law, for reasons of policy, requires written evidence, to admit oral evidence in its place would be to subvert the rule itself.

"To admit oral evidence as a substitute for instruments to which, by reason of their superior authority and permanent qualities, an exclusive authority is given by the parties, would be to substitute the inferior for the superior degree of evidence; conjecture for fact, and presumption for the highest degree of legal authority; loose recollections and uncertainty of memory for the most sure and faithful memorials which human ingenuity can devise or the law adopt; to introduce a dangerous laxity and uncertainty as to all titles to property, which, instead of depending on certain fixed and unalterable memorials, would thus be made to depend upon the frail memories of witnesses, and be perpetually liable to be impeached by fraudulent and corrupt practices."

And he thus lays down the rule:

"In the first place, written evidence has an exclusive operation in many instances, by virtue of peremptory legislative enactments. So it has in all cases of written contracts. So also in all cases where the acts of a court of justice are the subject of evidence. Courts of record speak by means of their record only, and even where the transactions of courts which are not, technically speaking, of record, are to be proved, if such courts preserve written memorials, are the only authentic means of proof which the law recognizes."

Wharton, in his Law of Evidence, section 1302, says:

"A court of record is required to act exactly and minutely, and to have record proof of all its important acts. If it does not, these acts can not be put in evidence."

The proceedings of a court of record can be shown only by the records, unless they are lost or destroyed. (Rutherford v. Crawford, 53 Ga.)

The minority views, signed by Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Indiana, and five other members of the committee, held:

It is contended by contestant, and held by the majority of the committee, that no matter what the fact is, unless there is a record remaining in the court, or unless there was a record made and retained from which a transcript could be made, parol proof is not admissible to establish the fact of naturalization and of the issue of a certificate thereof.

It is claimed that no naturalization is complete so as to invest the applicant with citizenship until a record of the proceeding is made in the court where the judgment was rendered and the oath administered.

We hold the law to be that parol testimony is admissible to prove naturalization under circumstances such as are shown to exist in this case.

We hold further that the making out of a certificate of naturalization, reciting all the requisite facts, under the seal of the court, is an entry of record of the proceedings, even though that certificate is carried away from the court, instead of being left with the clerk.

We hold that, having done all that the statute requires of him, and having obtained his certificate of naturalization in due form, with all proper recitals from a competent court, the person is, from that time invested with citizenship without reference to any further act to be performed by the clerk of the court.

We hold that the certificate so obtained is original evidence and conclusive of citizenship in all collateral proceedings, without proof of any record remaining in court and whether such a record exists or not.

The minority quote Morse on Citizenship, the case of Acorn (2 Abb. U. S. Reports, 434–437), Wharton's International Law Digests (sec. 174), Campbell v. Gurden (6 Cranch, 179), Stark v. Insurance Co. (7 Cranch, 420), Insurance Co. v. Tesdall (91 U. S. Reports, 245), In re Coleman (15 Black, 406), and after discussing these cases say:

There can be no doubt that parol proof is admissible to establish the contents of lost deeds and papers and records. (Greenleaf on Ev., vol. 1, sec. 509; Whalen's Ev., vol. 1, sec. 136; Wood's Prac. Ev., see. 7 et seq.; Ashly v. Johnson, 74 Ill., 392.)

Had contestee been able to produce this certificate, would anyone venture to question his citizenship? And yet the case stands in proof precisely the game as if he had done so. Everything necessary to admit parol proof of existence and loss of certificate was given in evidence. (Record, p. 256.) The book of blank certificates in use in the court at the time is in evidence. (Record, pp. 214, 272–273, 383.)

Contestee proved that he was in fact naturalized; that no other record of the proceedings was made so far as could be ascertained than the certificate issued to him; that he received his final certificate; that it is lost; that he is the identical person who was naturalized, and the contents of certificates universally in use at that time. By just such proof the courts of the country are constantly ascertaining the contents of lost papers involving the title to property; the contents of most solemn records are so proven.

Life and liberty are put into the scales upon the same kind of proof. If every other right of the citizen may be thus established, we are at a loss to know why this contestee is to be deprived of like rights and like application of unquestioned rules of law.

He was chosen to the Congress by the very emphatic voice of the legal voters of his district. He has for more than thirty years been an inhabitant of the country, deporting himself in such a way as to meet the approval of his fellowmen.

For more than twenty years he has been recognized as a citizen of the United States, and as such was chosen a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana.

If the report of the majority of the committee is to be sustained, an unparalleled injustice will be done to those who elected him and to contestee himself; not because of any fault or neglect on his part, but because of the neglect of a clerk who is proven to have been negligent of duty and careless of the rights of others.

Courts will invoke the aid of technical rules to prevent gross injustice, but it is the boast of all modem courts that mere technical rules of law are not permitted to stand in the way of doing equal and exact justice, unless of such rigid character and so firmly embedded in the law as to compel adhesion to them. Doubts on such questions are always resolved in favor of justice and against wrong.

The majority of the committee have adopted a rule which, while some authority may be found in favor of it, is rejected by other and weightier authority—a rule opposed to sound reason and the best canons of construction.

They have invoked this bare technicality not to prevent wrong, but to enable the House to commit an outrage upon the rights of contestee and the people of his district.

(2) The second question:

(2) If he can prove it by oral evidence, does the testimony disclose sufficient proof to establish that fact?

The majority review the parol proof and give arguments to show its fragile character.

The minority consider it sufficient, and thus review it:

Contestee is a native of Scotland. He came to this country in 1854, and has been a resident of the State of Indiana almost continuously since 1857, most of that time in the city of Fort Wayne, his present home. He was a captain in the Thirtieth Regiment of Indiana Infantry Volunteers and was dangerously wounded at the battle of Shiloh.

In 1858 he declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, as appears of record in the clerk's office of Alien County, Ind., the certificate issued to him having been lost.

In February, 1865, about the 28th of that month, he appeared in the court of common pleas of Allen County, Ind. (a court having common-law jurisdiction, a clerk and a seal), and produced two credible witnesses in open court, viz, John Brown and Isaac Jenkson, who were also sworn in open court as his witnesses to complete his naturalization. He took the oath of allegiance to the United States and of renunciation, which was administered to him by the judge of the court.

The clerk then and there issued to him a final certificate of naturalization, under the seal of the court, the contents of which certificate is shown by the proof of the only form of final certificates used in that court. This certificate with other important papers of contestee has been lost, as conclusively shown by the evidence.

The clerk of the court negligently omitted to receive the oath of allegiance and its recitals, but gave to Mr. White the record of the proceedings then made in the form of a certificate of naturalization, such as is usually issued to foreigners on being naturalized, and almost universally accepted as conclusive evidence of citizenship.

On pages 286, 287, and 288 of the record will be found a list of about one hundred and fifty persons naturalized during the years between 1860 and 1870 in Allen County, of which naturalization the only record remaining is a duplicate of the certificate issued to the person naturalized, from which it appears that the common way of recording naturalization proceedings in those courts was to make duplicate certificates, reciting all the facts necessary to complete naturalization, signed by the clerk and sealed with the seal of the court, retaining one in the clerk's office and giving the other to the person naturalized.

In some cases the clerk neglected to fill up the duplicate blank kept in the office, only filling out one blank and giving that to the person so naturalized, such certificate being the only record made by the clerk.

As showing the negligent manner of keeping the records by the clerk of that court, the evidence discloses several instances of making a record of naturalization years after the fact.

This same clerk was in the habit of writing up judgments in divorce cases when the minutes of the judge did not show that any divorce had been granted, and in four or five cases records were found written up in which the several cases had not been even docketed, in which there was nothing to show that such divorces had ever been granted by the court.

In addition, it is proper to state that many other persons are similarly situated. Persons who claim to have been in fact naturalized in Allen County, who have moved away, have frequently written and in some cases returned to get proof of citizenship and found no trace of a record.

The fact of Mr. White's naturalization in the courts and at the time claimed is established to a moral certainty. See testimony of Isaac Jenkins (R., pp. 187–195), of James B. White (R., p. 229), and of William T. Pratt, Democratic sheriff at the time (R., p. 196). The testimony is positive, specific, uncontradicted, and unimpeached. Its conclusiveness will hardly be questioned by any fair-minded man. The absence of a record remaining in the clerk's office in no way casts a doubt upon it, taken in connection with the evidence of the unreliability of these records as kept by the clerk, or rather by the deputy.

Mr. White has passed all the years of his manhood in this country. He has made the greatest sacrifice that one can make for his country—the offer of his life in its defense. He has held office in the city where he resides, and has established such a character that his fellow-citizens elected him to Congress by nearly 2,500 plurality in a district where the party with which he affiliates is in the minority by some 3,000.

Thousands of foreign-born citizens are in like situation with him, the evidence of their citizenship resting upon duly authenticated certificates issued by competent courts and without complete records thereof remaining.

Many of them hold responsible positions in public life; all of them exercise the right of suffrage at every recurring election. Large property interests depend upon their citizenship.

It may safely be said that the right to seats in the House of many Members depends upon the validity of citizenship Testing upon just such evidence.

In the debate the majority laid stress on the fact that neither the record of the court nor the naturalization papers could be produced.

(3) The conclusion which the majority proposed raised another question:

(3) If contestee is ineligible, is contestant, having received the next highest number of votes, entitled to the seat?

We answer the first in the negative.

The majority say:

Now, with regard to the last proposition, of seating contestant.

The universal weight of authority in the United States and the numerous decisions in both branches of the Congress thereof render an extended discussion on this point quite unnecessary. With the exception of the State of Indiana, where the rule is established by the supreme court, holding that, where a candidate who receives the highest number of votes is ineligible, the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes is entitled to the office, there is perhaps not another State in the Union where such a doctrine prevails.

The authorities cited by contestant which discuss the control of suffrage as residing in the States, subject to the limitation imposed in the fifteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, in our opinion, wholly fail to establish his position, that the issue on this point stands and appends wholly upon Indiana law.

To suffer a Member to be seated from one State in pursuance of this view and forbid the same right on the part of a Member from another State would destroy that equality and harmony in the membership of our National Legislature which the founders of our Government obviously intended to establish.

The Federal Constitution says the Members of the House shall be chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and that the electors of each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors in the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

It is a cardinal idea in our political system that this is a people's government and that the majority rule. In the convention which framed our common Constitution, when it was proposed to strike out people in the clause above referred to, and insert legislatures, thus giving the legislatures the power to elect Representatives, there were only three votes in the affirmative and eight in the negative. On the final vote only one State voted in the affirmative, one was divided, and nine in the negative.

Mr. Jefferson considered that a wholesome provision in our organic law on the ground that the people should be taxed only by Representatives chosen by themselves. It is true that article 4, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States says, "Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State," and that Congress may enact the necessary laws thereunder.

This was chiefly intended to give the same conclusive effect to judgments of all the States and equal verity to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of one State in another, so as to promote uniformity, as well as certainty, among them. (See Story on the Constitution, sec. 1307.)

This author adds:

"It is, therefore [a foreign judgment], put upon the same footing as a domestic judgment; but this does not prevent an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the original judgment was given to pronounce it or the right of the State itself to exercise authority over the persons or the subject matter. We think it can not be assumed under this clause of the Constitution, to hold full faith must be given to the opinion of every State judge on mere matters of law; but to the record the judicial proceedings of a State court, whether made as the result of right rulings or wrong, that, where properly authenticated, such record would be held conclusive as to its own identity."

Judge Cooley announces the law to be in this country, that if the person receiving the highest number of votes is ineligible, the opposing candidate is not elected and the election fails.

The report then cites the Congressional cases supporting this view.

The view taken of the case by Mr. Rowell and his minority associates did not render a decision of the question necessary; but Mr. J. H. O'Neill, of Massachusetts, filed individual views:

That the qualification of a Member of Congress—his eligibility—depends upon the Federal Constitution and the laws of Congress passed in pursuance thereof.

That the election of a Member depends upon the voters of the district he represents, expressing themselves in the way prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State from which he comes. To ascertain whether eligible or not, we look to the Constitution and laws of the United States; to ascertain whether elected or not, we look to the constitution and laws of the State whose electors send him to Congress.

Recognizing the first proposition, the majority of the committee have found and report that the contestee does not possess the qualifications prescribed. Disregarding, however, the second proposition, the committee report adversely to the right of contestant to the place to which, under the laws of Indiana, and by the voice of the electors of the Twelfth Congressional district of said State, legally expressed, he was duly elected. In that State the rule of law, as held by a long and unbroken line of authority, by the courts of last resort and in the halls of the legislature, the principle is well settled that every vote given by an elector to an ineligible candidate counts for naught; that such vote is ineffectual to elect or to defeat. In one of the early cases in that State, the supreme court of the State say:

"While it is true that the votes of the majority should rule, the tenable ground appears to be that if the majority should vote for one wholly incapable of taking the office, having notice of such incapacity, or should perversely refuse or negligently fail to express their choice, those, although in a minority, who should legitimately choose one eligible to the position should be heeded. * * *

"True, by the constitution and laws of the State, the voice of the majority controls our elections, but that voice must be constitutionally and legally expressed. Even a majority should not nullify a provision of the constitution or be permitted at will to disregard the law. In this is the strength and beauty of our institutions. (Gulick v. New, 14 Indiana, p. 93.)"

In the case Gulick v. New, supra, the court places the impotency of the votes upon the question of notice to the voter of the ineligibility of the candidate for whom the voter casts his ballot. Later cases refer to want of force in the vote without referring to the question of notice. But without referring to those cases, it is here asserted that—

"The legal presumption in favor of the nationality of birth, or domicile of origin, continues until proof of change; that in the absence of proof that an alien has become a citizen of the United States his original status is presumed to continue. (Howenstine v. Lynham, 100 U. S. Reports, p. 483.)

"A disqualification patent or notorious at once causes the votes given for the candidate laboring under the disqualification to be thrown away. The same would probably be held to be the case where the electors had the means of knowledge or might have ascertained the facts had they desired. (Grant on Corporations, p. 208.)"

That contestee was of foreign birth, like most foreigners professed of himself, would conclusively show. Then, if alienage is presumed to continue until citizenship is proven, those who voted for him must be presumed to have known. Everyone is bound to know that seven years' citizenship is required of a Member of Congress.

425. The case of Lowry v. White, continued.

In the record of an election case allegations and testimony relating to nominations are out of order.

Personalities and, generally, also digressions on local politics are irrelevant to the record of an election case.

Motions to suppress testimony in an election case already printed under the law were disregarded by the Elections Committee.

An Elections Committee has ruled that the determination of result contemplated by the law governing notice of contest is not reached until returns have been compared or certified as required by law.

The Committee on Elections has apparently acquiesced in the view that a contestant, while bringing into issue no ground that could possibly give him the seat, is yet to be treated as a memorialist, entitled to have the question determined.

Form of resolutions for unseating a Member for disqualifications.

The majority report determines certain preliminary questions, incidental in nature:

(a) All of the allegations and testimony relating to the nomination of contestant are foreign to the merits of the case, and are not considered by the committee.

(b) A large portion of the printed record in the case is needlessly encumbered with such testimony, ramifying and shaping itself into a multitude of phases with reference to State, county, and Congressional politics. The record is also disfigured with acrimonious personalities between contestant and contestee, that were brought into the testimony and were developed by way of objections to evidence in taking the same—all of which your committee dismiss from consideration as irrelevant to the legitimate issues involved.

(c) Motions were filed during the consideration of the case by the committee, by both contestant and contestee, to suppress certain portions of the testimony, but your committee could see no practical purpose in entertaining the same otherwise than is involved in the general consideration of the case, in view of the act of Congress of March 2, 1887, under which the record has been printed and distributed, as required by law, prior to the hearing of the case.

Under the provisions of that statute both parties could have appeared within twenty days, on the notice of the Clerk of the House, and have agreed upon portions of the record to be printed, or should they have failed to agree, it was the duty of the Clerk of the House to decide what portions should be printed.

It is to be hoped this provision of the law will be observed in future, as it will greatly expedite a consideration of contested cases, and relieve both the committee and the House of a great deal of needless labor in investigating the same.

(d) The Revised Statutes of the United States, 1878, section 105, require notice of contest to be given within thirty days after the result of an election shall have been determined.

Service was had on the contestee on the 20th day of December, 1886. The contestant swears that he visited the office of the secretary of state of Indiana as late as the 23d or 24th of November, 1886, and that he was informed by that official that the election returns of the district in question had not then been compared or certified as required by law. (See Lowry's testimony, Record, 409.) This is not denied; consequently, in legal contemplation, the result had not been determined, and the contestant was clearly within the statute requiring him to give thirty days' notice.

The minority views also discuss a question which by implication the majority of the committee may also have approved, since they in fact did not favor dismissing the contest:

(e) It is urged by contestee that inasmuch as contestant abandoned the only ground of contest which could give him any standing as a contestant for the seat occupied by contestee, the whole proceeding ought to be dismissed. That even admitting the ineligibility of contestee as charged, contestant has no standing in the case, because, having been beaten at the polls, he can not under any proper view of the case succeed to the seat from which he seeks to oust the sitting Member.

That this would be the rule in judicial proceedings will not be denied. But inasmuch as all the papers in the case were before the committee for their consideration, we are inclined to treat the contestant as a memorialist, and to examine the questions presented for the purpose of reporting our conclusions to the House.

In accordance with their conclusions, the majority proposed two resolutions:

Resolved, first, That James R. White, not having been a citizen of the United States for seven years previous to the 4th of March, 1887, is not entitled to retain his seat in the Fiftieth Congress of the United States from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana.

Resolved, second, That Robert Lowry, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

The minority proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That James B. White was duly elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Indiana, and is entitled to retain his seat.

The report was debated at length on February 2, 4, and 6,[1] and on the latter day the resolution of the minority was substituted for that of the majority by a vote of yeas 186, nays 105. Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to as amended.[2] So the recommendations of the majority of the committee were reversed, and sitting Member retained his seat.

426. The case relating to the qualifications of Anthony Michalek, of Illinois, in the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The House considered a protest as to the qualifications of a Member after he had taken the oath without objection.

Form of protest as to the qualifications of a Member.

The House referred a question as to the qualifications of a Member to an elections committee instead of to a select committee.

On December 4, 1905,[3] at the time of the organization of the House, the name of Anthony Michalek appeared on the Clerk's roll among the Members-elect from Illinois. He voted for Speaker and was sworn in without objection.

On December 5,[4] Mr. Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, and being recognized, presented the following protest:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the fifty-ninth Congress of the United States of America:

The undersigned citizens and legal voters of the Fifth Congressional district of Illinois respectfully represent unto your honorable body that at the last Congressional election held in said district one Anthony Michalek was elected as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress; that since said election it has come to the notice of the undersigned that said Anthony Michalek was not at the time he was elected nor is he now a citizen of the United States.

Wherefore we protest against being represented in your honorable body by one who has not deemed it worth while to become a citizen of the United States, and respectfully petition your honorable body to cause an investigation to be made, and if it is found that said Michalek is not a citizen of the United States to take such action in the premises as to your honorable body shall seem fit and proper.

And in support of this petition we herewith submit the affidavits of Julius M. Kahn, Enoch P. Morgan, and Joseph Pejsar, which affidavits are made part of this petition, and we offer to produce other and additional testimony on any hearing ordered by your honorable body.

And we will ever pray.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Cook, ss:

Julius M. Kahn, being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says that he is an attorney at law, and resides at 729 East Fiftieth place, in the city of Chicago; that he is a native-born citizen of the United States, and that he is thoroughly familiar with the records of the courts of Cook County, in the State of Illinois, and a competent person to examine the records of the courts; that in said county there are four courts which have the power to naturalize citizens, namely: The circuit court, superior court, county court, and criminal court, and no other court in said Cook County has such power, and that no other court had such power for more than thirty years last past; that he has carefully examined the records of each and every one of said four courts for the purpose of ascertaining whether one Vaclav Michalek ever became a citizen of the United States; that he carefully examined the records beginning with the year 1879 and ending with the year 1890, both inclusive, and that there is no record in any of said courts showing that one Vaclav Michalek became a naturalized citizen during said period of time, and that during all of said period of time no one by the name of Michalek became a citizen in said Cook County, except one Michael Michalek, who became a citizen on March 26, 1888, by naturalization and judgment of the superior court of Cook County; that said Michael Michalek, as appears from said records, was a native of Germany, and not a native of Bohemia, Austria, and that he took the oath renouncing allegiance to the Emperor of Germany.

And this affiant says that after a thorough investigation of the records he finds that Vaclav Michalek was never naturalized in the county of Cook during said period of time.

Affiant further says that under the election laws of the State of Illinois each voter must register and answer under oath certain questions in regard to his qualifications as a voter, and that the record of each voter's answers is kept; that this affiant examined the records so kept in the election commissioners' office in the city of Chicago, County of Cook, and State of Illinois, and finds that Anthony Michalek, Congressman-elect from the Fifth Illinois district, registered in the Eighth precinct of the Eleventh ward in said city in the year 1905, and that his sworn answers to questions propounded were that he, Anthony Michalek, was born in Bohemia, and that he became a citizen of the United States by act of Congress.

And further affiant saith not.

JULIUS M. KAHN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 18th day of November, A. D. 1905.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Cook, ss:

Josef Pejsar, being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says that he is, and for about thirty-five years last past has been, a citizen of the United States; that he has resided in the city of Chicago for about thirty-nine years last past; that he is a householder and resides, and has resided for more than ten years last past, at No. 3437 Lowe avenue, in the city of Chicago; that he is acquainted with Anthony Michalek, Congressman-elect from the Fifth Congressional district; that the name of the father of said Congressman-elect was Vaclav Michalek; that said Vaclav Michalek was by occupation a brewer; that this affiant was also by occupation a brewer; that both of them were natives of Bohemia, Austria, and that both of them were employed by the Seipp Brewing Company, in the city of Chicago, and that this affiant was well acquainted with said Vaclav Michalek, father of said Congressman-elect; that said Vaclav Michalek arrived in this country in 1879 as an immigrant from Bohemia, and brought said Anthony Michalek-, his son, with him; that he came direct to Chicago, and remained here until the time of his death; that he died in the year 1883, and that he had not been fully five years in this country at the time of his death, and that at the time of his death the said Vaclav Michalek was at least 40 years of age; and that the said Vaclav Michalek had never been in the United States prior to the year 1879. That at an election held in the city of Chicago a few months preceeding the death of said Vaclav Michalek this affiant had a conversation with said Vaclav Michalek in the Bohemian language, in which conversation this affiant desired said Michalek to become interested in the coming election, and asked him to become a citizen of the United States and make application for his first papers; but that said Vaclav Michalek answered that elections could get along without him, and that he was not and did not care to become a citizen of the United States for some time to come.

And further affiant saith not.

JULIUS M. KAHN, Notary Public.

The memorial having been read, Mr. Rainey offered the following:

Resolved, That the protest of citizens of the Fifth Congressional district of Illinois against being represented in Congress by Anthony Michalek, declared by them to be an alien, be referred to a special committee of five Members of this House, to be appointed by the Speaker, for immediate investigation.

To this Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, offered an amendment as follows:

Strike out of the resolution the words "a special committee of five Members of this House, to be appointed by the Speaker, for immediate investigation" and insert "be referred by the Speaker to the appropriate committee of this House when appointed."

Debate followed as to the propriety of the consideration of the subject by an elections committee instead of a special committee, during which Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, cited the provisions of Rule XI giving the Elections Committees the right to report at any time on the right of a Member to a seat, and Mr. Mann recalled the fact that in the First Congress a question as to qualifications was passed on by the Elections Committee.

After debate the amendment was agreed to, yeas 178, nays 93. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to.

427. The case of Anthony Michalek, continued.

The House authorized its committee to take testimony in a case wherein the qualifications of a Member were impeached.

As to the degree of testimony required to put the burden of proof on a Member whose status as a citizen was impeached.

On January 29, 1906,[1] Mr. H. Olin Young, of Michigan, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Elections No. 1, to whom was referred the protest of citizens of the Fifth Congressional district of Illinois, against the right of Hon. Anthony Michalek, elected as a Member of the House of Representatives from that district to the Fifty-ninth Congress, to a seat in the House, on the ground that he was not at the time he was elected a citizen of the United States, beg leave to report and recommend the passage of the following resolution:

"Whereas, there is now pending before the House of Representatives a protest alleging that the Hon. Anthony Michalek was not at the time of his election as a Member of this House, and is not now, a citizen of the United States, and therefore is disqualified to be or remain a Member of this House, which protest has been referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1 for investigation: Therefore

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, That said committee be empowered to take such testimony as it deems necessary to a determination of said matter, either before said committee or before a subcommittee thereof or a member of said Committee on Elections No. 1 appointed therefor, or any other person selected by said committee for such purpose, and that the time, place, and manner of taking, certifying, and returning said testimony be determined by said committee, and that the expenses incurred in taking said testimony be paid from the contingent fund of the House upon the order of said Committee on Elections No. 1."

The resolution was agreed to by the House.

On March 6,[2] Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, submitted the unanimous report of the committee, which recited the petition protesting against the seating of Mr. Michalek, and said:

The petition purported to be signed by John F. Joyce, 696 West Taylor Street, Chicago, and 124 other persons.

---

[1] Journal, p. 356; Record, p. 1698.

[2] House Report No. 2117.

The petition having been referred to this committee, the House, on the 29th day of January, A. D. 1906, passed a resolution authorizing this committee to take testimony in order to determine the right of Mr. Michalek to his seat.

The original petition was supported by the affidavits of Julius M. Kahn, Joseph Pejsar, Matous Sedlacek, and Enoch P. Morgan, which were attached to the petition and formed a part thereof, as presented to the House. The affidavit of Julius M. Kahn did not, on its face, make any case against Mr. Michalek, because it showed that while affiant stated he had made search of the records of certain courts in Chicago, Cook County, Ill., to ascertain whether the father of Mr. Michalek had been naturalized, it also showed that he had made no search for such naturalization in either the United States district or circuit court in Chicago, of which courts this committee necessarily takes notice.

The affidavit of Enoch P. Morgan did not make out a prima facie case against Mr. Michalek, because affiant simply stated what, at the best, would be a conclusion as to citizenship.

The two affidavits of Joseph Pejsar and Matous Sedlacek, however, were to the effect that Mr. Anthony Michalek, the sitting Member, came to this country when he was a minor, with his father, and that the father, Vaclav Michalek, died before he had been in this country a period of five years.

The statements in the affidavits of Sedlacek and Pejsar seem to justify the committee in permitting the protestants to offer evidence in support of their protest, and accordingly such evidence was taken by a member of the committee and by direction of the committee in Chicago.

At the taking of this testimony neither Joseph Pejsar nor Matous Sedlacek was called upon to testify, and it was then, and is now, admitted that the affidavits of these two men were false.

At the taking of the testimony in Chicago not one of the protestants appeared and not one of them testified.

NECESSITY FOR CARE WHEN CHARGES ARE MADE AGAINST THE RIGHT OF A MEMBER OF CONGRESS TO HIS SEAT.

The necessity for care in considering and examining a protest of this character is well exemplified by this particular case. Here are 125 names signed to a protest and on the hearing not one of the persons signing the protest appears to give his reasons for making the protest. The two persons who are principally relied upon by their affidavits to sustain the protest do not appear, and it is admitted that their affidavits are falsehoods. By what right do these 125 men make a statement that a Member of this House is not entitled to his seat and then offer no proof in support of it? Were Mr. John F. Joyce and the other signers of the protest simply dummies who were being used by somebody else? Were they the cat's-paw to pull the chestnuts out of the fire in the interest of someone else?

These persons have trifled with the dignity of this House. They have not even had the manliness to come before the committee at the hearing and state that they were deceived by the false affidavits of Pejsar and Sedlacek. We do not wish to be understood as criticising counsel who appeared for or in support of the position of the protestants. Counsel in behalf of the protestants were engaged as and appeared as lawyers. They presented their case with the utmost fairness and in a manner to maintain their high position as leaders among the great bar at Chicago.

ANTHONY MICHALEK IS FOREIGN BORN.

It appears from the evidence in the case that Anthony Michalek, the sitting Member, came to this country with his father, Vaclav Michalek, and his mother, Therese Michalek, in 1878, when only a few months old.

There are five ways, in any one of which Anthony Michalek might have become a citizen of the United States.

First. By the naturalization of his father, Vaclav Michalek, during the minority of the son.

Second. By the naturalization of his mother, Therese Michalek, after the death of his father, during the minority of the son.

Third. By the marriage of Therese Michalek after the death of Vaclav Michalek to a citizen of the United States during the minority of the son.

Fourth. By the naturalization of Anthony Michalek himself as a person who came here under the age of 18, he having the right under the statute to receive his final papers without taking out first papers.

Fifth. In case his father, Vaclav Michalek, took out his first papers and then died, by compliance on the part of Anthony Michalek with section 2168 of the Revised Statutes, providing that where a person takes out his first papers and dies his widow and minor children shall be considered as citizens and be entitled to all the rights and privileges as such upon taking the oaths required by law.

It will be seen, therefore, that the sitting Member might have become a citizen by reason of the naturalization of his father or of his mother or of himself. In order to make a prima facie case against him by an examination of the records, it would seem to require an examination as to all three of these persons. There are at least six courts in the city of Chicago, where these persons lived from the time they came into the country, which are authorized by law to issue naturalization papers. These are four State courts and two Federal courts.

To make a prima facie case against the sitting Member it would be necessary to examine the records in each of these six courts for naturalization of Vaclav Michalek, Therese Michalek, and Anthony Michalek. This would make at least eighteen separate examinations of records. As a matter of fact, counsel for protestants offered testimony concerning the naturalization of Vaclav Michalek, the father, in the four State courts. No testimony was offered concerning the naturalization of Vaclav Michalek in the two Federal courts and no testimony was offered as to the naturalization of Therese Michalek or Anthony Michalek in any of the six courts.

The purpose of offering testimony at all concerning records of the courts was to shift the burden of proof from the protestants to the sitting Member. If any testimony be necessary concerning the records in any courts, in order to shift the burden of proof, then it would seem that testimony ought to be offered as to all of the courts, and if it be necessary to offer testimony concerning the naturalization of the father, Vaclav Michalek, it would seem to be also necessary to offer testimony concerning the records as to Anthony Michalek, the sitting Member himself, as well as his mother, Therese Michalek, if it be desired to shift the burden of proof.

While there are six courts in Chicago having the power to naturalize, the law also provides that any person living in Chicago may apply to any court within the State for naturalization.

We think it might be fairly well contended that proof that neither Vaclav Michalek, the father, Therese Michalek, the mother, or Anthony Michalek, the son, was naturalized in any court in Cook County would shift the burden of proof to the sitting Member without requiring the protestants to offer proof as to the many courts in Illinois outside of Cook County, though we do not wish to be considered as expressing any decided opinion upon that question, it being wholly unnecessary for the decision of this case.

It is perfectly manifest in our opinion that if evidence concerning the records of any of the courts as to the naturalization of either the father, the mother, or the son be necessary to effect the shifting of the burden of proof, then it is necessary to offer evidence concerning all of these local courts.

The evidence which was produced relating to the naturalization of Vaclav Michalek in the State courts of Cook County was mainly evidence relating to an examination of the indexes of naturalization and not to an examination of either the actual records or the original applications. Counsel for protestants seemed to admit that an examination of the indexes (not required by law to be kept) might be insufficient to prove the contents of the records, and offered upon the argument of this case in committee, and after the hearing and testimony had been completed, affidavits of various persons connected with the offices of the clerks of the State courts in Chicago concerning the records themselves.

Without expressing any opinion as to the right of the protestants to have these affidavits admitted in evidence without an opportunity on the part of the sitting Member to a cross-examination of the witnesses, we have considered the affidavits as evidence in the case, inasmuch as giving them the weight of testimony has not resulted in detriment to the sitting Member, who was deprived of the opportunity of cross-examination.

The evidence in this case shows that the condition of the naturalization papers and records in Cook County is not very satisfactory; that the indexes have many mistakes in them; that all the original applications for naturalization have not been entered of record as required by the statute, and that the naturalization papers and records have not been kept with that degree of care and accuracy which is presumed to be used in the keeping of ordinary court records and documents. It is not likely that the condition of the naturalization records in Cook County is different from the naturalization records in other large cities. It is well known, and the evidence in this case disclosed the fact, that naturalization of foreign-born persons is often carried on at night, when applicants appear in large numbers and at the suggestion and expense of political committees. The names of the applicants are written in the body of the application blanks by the clerks of the courts either from the signature of the applicants or from the pronunciation of their names by themselves. It is perfectly manifest to everyone that under such circumstances many errors creep into the names as written in the body of the applications and afterwards into the records.

In the affidavits filed with the protest in this case the name of Pejsar is not written, where he signs the affidavit, in the same manner as it is written in the body of the affidavit, nor would it be possible for the writer of this report to definitely state from his signature what his name is. The same is true also of the adaffivit and name of Sedlacek. There are a number of signatures attached to the protest presented to the House which it is not possible for a stranger to accurately read.

The Bohemian, Polish, and Russian names are usually not familiar to the average clerk of the court. He does not quickly read the name correctly when written by the applicant in his foreign handwriting.

NO PRIMA FACIE CASE MADE BY PROTESTANTS.

We are of the opinion that the protestants have not made a prima facie case against Anthony Michalek, the sitting Member, by the evidence offered in reference to the naturalization records in Cook County. We are further of the opinion that the evidence of Enoch P. Morgan does not tend to make a prima facie case against Mr. Michalek. The testimony of Mr. Morgan bears upon its face so many evidences of self-contradiction that it is to be looked at with some careful scrutiny before it is accepted as correct. But, reduced to a few words, the evidence of Mr. Morgan, Mrs. Morgan, and their son is to the effect that Mr. Morgan, prior to the election, believed the sitting Member ought to take out naturalization papers himself, on the theory that he could not take a seat in Congress unless he had received a naturalization paper declaring him to be a citizen. It seems evident to us that, even if the conversations as narrated by the Morgans took place, there was a misunderstanding of the meaning of the words "citizen" and "native born." When, according to Morgan, he asked Mr. Michalek if he was a citizen, and Michalek said he was born in Bohemia, and Morgan told Michalek that he must take out his papers and become a citizen and Michalek "laughed," Morgan thought Michalek must take out citizenship papers in person before he could be elected to Congress, and Michalek thought that Morgan believed a man could not be elected to Congress who was foreign born and not native born, and that was not worth discussing.

MICHALEK IS A CITIZEN AND ELIGIBLE FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE HOUSE.

We find from the evidence in the case, however, that the sitting Member, Anthony Michalek, is and has been for more years than required by the Constitution a citizen of the United States; that the Michalek family came to this country in 1878; that while in this country the father was known as by his Bohemian friends as Waclav or Vaclav Michalek, and by his German friends as Wenzel or Wencl Michalek; that on the 29th day of October, 1884, he applied for and received his first citizenship papers in the county court of Cook County under the name of Wenzl Michalek, as written in the body of the declaration, or Wenel Michalek, as written in the signature; that on August 12, 1885, he made a contract for the purchase of a lot in Chicago, in which contract he was described in the body of the contract as Wenzel Michalek, and which contract he signed as Waclav Michalek; that on March 12, 1887, he made his application for final naturalization in the superior court of Cook County, and by judgment of that court became a naturalized citizen of the United States under the name of Vaclav Michal; that shortly after the issuance of the naturalization papers on March 12, 1887, to Vaclav Michal, the father of the sitting Member, while living on De Koven street in Chicago, voted at the Chicago city election in April, 1887, and that he also voted at the fall election of 1887 while living at 79 Liberty street, to which place he had meanwhile moved with his family.

The mother of the sitting Member, after the death of his father, in February, 1898, was married in Chicago to a man who was presumably then a citizen.

CONCLUSION REACHED FROM PROTESTANTS' TESTIMONY.

The foregoing statements in reference to the naturalization of Anthony Michalek, the sitting Member, by reason of the naturalization of his father and his mother, are based upon the testimony of witnesses called in behalf of protestants.

ADDITIONAL TESTIMONY.

The chief witness for the protestants was Mr. Enoch P. Morgan. Mr. Morgan testified that during the national campaign of 1904 he was in the employ of the Republican national campaign committee as a speaker, and that during the campaign he had several conversations with Hon. James A. Tawney, now chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, who was in charge of the speakers' bureau of the Republican national committee, and that he informed Mr. Tawney that Mr. Michalek was not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. Tawney has stated to the committee that no such statement was made to him by Mr. Morgan and Mr. Tawney contradicts Mr. Morgan as to various other statements which Mr. Morgan claims he made to Mr. Tawney.

Your committee is forced to the conclusion that Mr. Morgan in his testimony is somewhat mistaken in his statement of facts.

TESTIMONY OF ANTHONY MICHALEK, THE SITTING MEMBER.

Mr. Michalek requested that he might appear before the committee and make a brief statement as to his position and his claims. Mr. Michalek stated to your committee, under oath, that he was born in Bohemia; that he came to this country with his parents, Vaclav Michalek and Therese Michalek, while an infant in arms that his father died when he was 9 years of age; that he had been informed by his mother and older brothers that his father had become a naturalized citizen and that he grew up in that belief, and immediately upon attaining the age of 21 he registered as a voter in the city of Chicago and has since then always maintained and exercised his right to register and vote; that he has believed for many years and still believes himself to be a citizen of the United States by reason of the naturalization of his father.

CONCLUSIONS.

There never was any proper justification for the protest and charges filed against Mr. Michalek. The persons making the protest did so without knowledge and without evidence. The charges were recklessly made and untruthfully made. They were based upon false affidavits. Proof in the case offered by the protestants makes out a case for the sitting Member instead of the protestants.

SITTING MEMBER NOT CALLED UPON TO ANSWER THE CHARGES.

While the committee, at the request of Mr. Michalek, permitted him to make a brief statement to the committee, yet the committee has not been of the opinion that any prima facie case was made against Mr. Michalek, and hence has been of the opinion that he should not be put to the trouble or expense of proving by witnesses introduced in his behalf his title to citizenship. Your committee is of the opinion that when charges affecting the eligibility of a Member of Congress to his seat are made, some proof should be offered in their support before putting the sitting Member to the expense and the burden of making a defense.

The committee accordingly reported the following resolution, which was, on March 6,[1] agreed to by the House without division:

Resolved, That Anthony Michalek, at the time of his election as a Member of Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of Illinois had attained the age of 25 years, and had then been for more than seven years a citizen of the United States, and was then an inhabitant of the State of Illinois, in which he was elected, and that he was elected a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Illinois, and is entitled to retain his seat therein.

428. In 1794 the Senate decided that Albert Gallatin was disqualified, not having been a citizen nine years, although he had served in the war of independence and was a resident of the country when the Constitution was formed.

The Senate by majority vote unseated Albert Gallatin for disqualification after he had taken the oath.

[1] Journal, p. 600; Record, p. 3399.

On February 28, 1794,[1] the Senate, by a vote of yeas 14, nays 12, voted that the election of Albert Gallatin (who had already been sworn in and was acting as a Senator)[2] to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years (nine years) required as a qualification.

It appeared that Mr. Gallatin, who was born at Geneva, January 29, 1761, arrived in Boston July 14, 1780. In October, 1780, he settled at Machias, Me., and resided there a year, furnishing funds for and several times acting as a volunteer with the troops there. In the spring of 1782 he was chosen an instructor at Harvard College, remaining there a year. In July, 1783, he removed to Pennsylvania, and in November of the same year proceeded to Virginia, where he purchased considerable land at two different periods. In October, 1785, he took an oath of allegiance to Virginia. In December, 1785, he purchased a plantation in Pennsylvania, where he resided up to the date of these proceedings. In October, 1789, he was elected a member of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention, and in October of the years 1790, 1791, and 1792 was elected member of the State legislature. On February 28, 1793, he was chosen Senator of the United States.

Mr. Gallatin contended that every man who took part in the Revolution was a citizen according to the great law of reason and nature, and when afterwards positive laws were made they were retrospective in regard to persons in this predicament. He was one of the people who formed the Constitution, being of the body of people who were citizens mutually before the Constitution was ratified.

In opposition it was denied that he was one of the mass of citizens at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; and it was argued that the oath taken in Virginia did not make him a citizen of that State because the Virginia law prescribed other formalities and qualifications which Mr. Gallatin had not satisfied. In Massachusetts, also, certain requirements existed which he had not conformed to. These provisions of the laws of Virginia and Massachusetts were cited as insurmountable barriers in the way of Mr. Gallatin's occupation of the seat.

429. The Senate decided in 1849 that James Shields was disqualified to retain his seat, not having been a citizen of the United States for the required time.

Charges that a Senator-elect was disqualified did not avail to prevent his being sworn in by virtue of his prima facie right.

A Senator was unseated for disqualification after he had been seated on his prima facie right.

On March 5, 1849,[3] at the special session of the Senate, Mr. James Shields, of Illinois, appeared for the purpose of being qualified.

Thereupon a resolution was proposed that his credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into the eligibility of Mr. Shields to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, asked that the oath be administered to Mr. Shields, leaving the question as to his qualifications to be decided later. Mr. Douglas contended that Mr. Shields had a prima facie right to the seat, and that in similar cases the oath had been administered, as in the case of Mr. Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Smith of South Carolina, and Mr. Rich of Michigan. In a case where the governor of Connecticut had appointed to a vacancy which he had no authority to fill, this fact appeared on the face of the credentials, and the appointee was not sworn in. But in the pending case the certificate showed the election, and Mr. Shields was entitled to the seat until his qualifications were determined.

Mr. John MacP. Berrien, of Georgia, made the argument that the credentials were prima facie evidence of the election, but not of the qualification.

The Senate, without division, agreed to a motion submitted by Mr. Douglas that Mr. Shields be sworn in, and the oath was administered to him.

The Senate then referred to a select committee the subject of the eligibility of Mr. Shields.

On March 13 [1] the committee reported, and the Senate agreed on March 15, after long debate, to a resolution declaring that the election of Mr. Shields "was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected."

This resolution was adopted without division, it being considered evidently that a majority vote only was required for the passage of the resolution.

430. In 1870 a question was raised as to the citizenship of Senator elect H. R. Revels, but he was seated, the Senate declining to postpone the administration of the oath in order to investigate the case.

In reconstruction days the Senate deemed valid credentials signed by a provisional military governor.

On February 23, 1870,[2] Mr. Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, presented in the Senate the credentials of H. R. Revels, Senator-elect from Mississippi. These credentials were signed by "Adelbert Ames, brevet major-general, United States Army, provisional governor of Mississippi," attested by "James Lynch, secretary of state" and under the great seal of the State. Moreover—

Mr. Wilson presented a certified extract from the proceedings of the house of representatives of the State of Mississippi; also a certified extract from the proceedings of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Mississippi relative to the election of H. R. Revels as a Senator in Congress.

Mr. Willard Saulsbury, of Delaware, objected that the credentials were irregular, that a "provisional governor" was unknown to the Constitution, and that the interference of an officer in the Army showed that a republican form of government was not existing in Mississippi.

It was urged in support of the credential that it was otherwise proper in form under the seal of the State, and that it had been frequent when new States were admitted for Senators to bear certificates technically irregular as to signature, since the certificates were frequently signed by a governor-elect, as was the case with the first Nebraska credentials.

The Senate voted, without division, to receive the certificate.

Thereupon Mr. John P. Stockton, of New Jersey, offered the following:

Resolved, That the credentials of Hiram R. Revels, who is now claiming a seat in this body as a Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who are hereby requested to inquire and report whether he has been a citizen of the United States for the period of nine years, and was an inhabitant of the said State at the time of his alleged election in the sense intended by the third section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and whether Adelbert Ames, brevet major-general and provisional governor of Mississippi, as appears by the credentials, was the governor of the State of Mississippi at the time, and whether he was an inhabitant of the said State."

This resolution was debated long and learnedly on February 23, 24, and 25.[1] It appeared that Mr. Revels was partially of negro descent, but was born free and a native of the United States. It was asserted that he had voted in Ohio twenty years before this date. It was urged, however, that the States might not naturalize, and that under the Dred Scott decision a person of his descent could not have been a citizen nine years before this date. Mr. George Vickers, of Maryland, thus summarized the argument, speaking of the Dred Scott case:

What were some of the propositions of law decided by that tribunal?

1. That when the Constitution was adopted persons of African descent were not regarded in any of the States as members of the community which constituted the States, and were not numbered among its people or citizens; consequently the special rights and immunities guaranteed to citizens did not apply to them.

2. That no State could by any subsequent law make a foreigner or any other description of persons citizens of the United States.

3. That a State might by its laws put a foreigner, or any other description of persons, upon a footing with its own citizens; but that would not make him a citizen of the United States, nor entitle him to sue in its courts, nor to any of the privileges and immunities of a citizen in another State.

The disqualification of the African race was as radical, fundamental, and perfect as language could make it. This is by a coordinate department of the Government, existing by the same Constitution as Congress; in its origin, design, and objects as thoroughly constitutional; in its powers and jurisdiction superior, because State and national legislation is measured and limited by the Constitution according to its judgment. Its decisions and decrees are as binding as the Constitution itself.

In opposition it was urged that Mr. Revels was born in the United States; that he never had been a slave, and did not conform to the description of negro in the Dred Scott case; that that decision was not authoritative. Mr. John Scott, off Pennsylvania, said:[2]

The history of the litigation that had occurred in various States, and that finally got into the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case, is enough to show that a question was made as to whether a colored man was or was not a citizen of the United States. The decisions in Kentucky, the decisions in Connecticut, the decisions in my own State, the discussion which took place upon the admission of Missouri into the Union, the Dred Scott case, the universal discussion of this question at one period in our history—these are enough to show that the public mind was not settled upon the question. But if it was not settled then, could it be more effectively settled than it has been, first by the passage of the civil rights bill, and then, if that was not sufficient as a mere act of Congress to determine the status of citizenship in the face of a decision of the Supreme Court, surely it will not be contended that the fourteenth constitutional amendment, declaring that all persons born within the United States are citizens, is not sufficient to settle it.

The civil rights bill, if its text be turned to, and the fourteenth amendment, if its text be turned to, will be found to be both declaratory. They do not enact that "from henceforth all persons born within the United States shall be citizens," but the present tense is used in both: "all persons" "are citizens of the United States." If that be sufficient to settle the question, if that be enough as a declaratory law to declare that all persons born within the limits of the United States are citizens of the United States, where does this man stand who now presents himself as Senator-elect from Mississippi?

It is urged by gentlemen on the other side that he became a citizen only by virtue of one or the other of these enactments; but if they turn to the history of that clause of the Constitution of the United States on which they rely they will find that it was inserted both in reference to Senators and to Representatives in the other House of Congress, and also in reference to the President, because of the apprehension that was felt of foreign influences in our Government. In the discussion which occurred in the convention—I have it here, but will not take the time of the Senate to read it—on fixing the qualifications of Senators it was especially dwelt upon that the Senate being the body which was to pass upon treaties with foreign governments, it was particularly necessary that the period of citizenship should be extended and made longer for a Senator than for a Member of the House of Representatives. The discussion of Mr. Madison in the Federalist of this clause shows that the purpose, the reason, the intention of this clause in the Constitution of the United States was that persons who had been born abroad should not be permitted to become Senators until after they bad been citizens a certain length of time. That is the reason, that is the spirit of the law; and it is a maxim which I need not quote, that the reason ceasing the law ceases with it.

Here, then, is a man born in the United States, not an alien, not a foreigner, who comes here elected by a State legislature. No question is raised as to his qualification as to age; no question is raised as to his qualification in any other respect than as to whether he has been a citizen of the United States for nine years. Now, even if the doctrine contended for by the gentlemen on the other side were true, that he was not a citizen until the time of the passage of the civil rights bill or until the adoption of the fourteenth constitutional amendment, still he is not within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution which requires a man to be a citizen for nine years. The meaning, the spirit of that was, that no man should occupy this place who had been naturalized as a foreigner until nine years had elapsed after his naturalization.

432. The Maryland case of Philip B. Key in the Tenth Congress.

Philip B. Key, who had inhabited a home in Maryland a brief period before his election, but had never been a citizen of any other State, was held to be qualified.

Instance wherein the question of qualification was passed on after a Member-elect had been sworn in on his prima facie showing.

On October 26, 1807,[1] at the beginning of the Congress, Philip B. Key appeared as a Representative from the State of Maryland and took the oath without question. On November 4 and December 7[2] memorials were presented relating to Mx. Key's qualifications as a resident of his district, and as an inhabitant of Maryland,[3] and on December 7[4] the report found that as to residence in the district there was no law of Maryland requiring such residence. As to his inhabitancy in the State, the committee report facts showing that Mr. Key was a native of Maryland and a citizen and resident of that State at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1787; that he was never a citizen or resident of any other of the United States; that in 1801 he removed from Maryland to his house in Georgetown, about 2 miles without the boundaries of Maryland, where he continued to reside until 1806, when, on September 18, he removed with his family and household to a partially completed summer home (intended for himself and not for an overseer), which he was building on an estate in Maryland bought by him in November, 1805, and which was part of an estate owned many years by Mrs. Key's family. Here he was residing October 6, 1806, the date of his election. On October 20, 1806, he removed with his family and household to his house near Georgetown, which he lived in until July, 1807, when they returned to the Maryland house and lived in and inhabited it until October 23, 1807. On that date they returned to the house near Georgetown, that he might attend to his duties in Congress. It further appeared that he had continued the practice of law in Maryland and had declined practice in the District of Columbia; and that in January, February, and March, 1806, he had declared that he intended to reside in Maryland, and that he bought the land with that intention. It was urged and admitted that the Maryland house was fitted only for a summer residence, and was much inferior to the house near Georgetown; and that the latter was left practically with its furnishings complete whenever the family went to Maryland.

On January 21 and 22, 1808,[5] the report was discussed, but was recommitted because of allegations relating to a matter not referred to in the report and not related to the question of inhabitancy.[6]

On March 17 and 18,[7] the report made by the committee after reexamination, and which was favorable to Mr. Key, was discussed, the form of the question being a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That Philip B. Key, having the greatest number of votes, and being qualified agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, is entitled to his seat in this House.

A motion was made to strike out the words "having the greatest number of votes, and being qualified agreeably to the Constitution of the United States," and a division being demanded, the words "having the greatest number of votes, and" were stricken out.

The question then recurred on striking out "being qualified agreeably to the Constitution of the United States."

It is inferable, although the records of debate are scanty, that the question as to whether or not Mr. Key was a pensioner of the British Government figured largely in this question. The House voted—yeas 79, nays 28—to strike the words out.

• Then, on the question on agreeing to the simple amended resolution that Mr. Key was entitled to his seat, a debate occurred, which, as the Annals state, "appeared to be reduced to the plain fact of residence." The House finally agreed to the resolution7—yeas 57, nays 52.

433. The election case of John Forsyth, of Georgia, in the Eighteenth Congress.

Residence abroad in the service of the Government does not constitute a disqualification of a Member.

On March 3, 1824,[1] the Committee on Elections reported on the case of John Forsyth, of Georgia, that Mr. Forsyth was elected a Member of the present Congress during his residence near the court of Spain, as minister plenipotentiary of the United States. The committee were of the opinion that there was nothing in Mr. Forsyth's case which disqualified him from holding a seat in the House. The capacity in which he acted excluded the idea that, by performing his duty abroad, he ceased to be an inhabitant of the United States. And, if so, inasmuch as he had no inhabitancy in any other part of the Union than Georgia, he must be considered in the same situation as before the acceptance of the appointment.

Therefore the committee asked leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

This report was pending in Committee of the Whole at the time of the consideration of Mr. Bailey's case, and on March 18, after the decision in that case, the House discharged the Committee of the Whole from consideration of the report, and laid it on the table.

Thus Mr. Forsyth was allowed to retain his seat.

434. The election case of John Bailey, elected from Massachusetts to the Eighteenth Congress.

One holding an office and residing with his family for a series of years in the District of Columbia exclusively was held disqualified to sit as a Member from the State of his citizenship.

Discussion of meaning of word "inhabitant" and its relation to citizenship.

In the earlier years of the House contested election cases were presented by petition.

On February 20, 1824,[2] the Committee on Elections reported on the petition of Sundry Electors v. John Bailey, of Massachusetts. This case arose under section 2, Article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides "that no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

[2] Ibid., p. 411.

The facts were ascertained to be as follows: On October 1, 1817, Mr. Bailey, who was then a resident of Massachusetts, was appointed a clerk in the Department of State. He immediately repaired to Washington and entered on the duties of his position, and continued to hold the position and reside in Washington until October 21, 1823, when he resigned the appointment. It did not appear that he exercised any of the rights of citizenship in the District, and there was evidence to show that he considered Massachusetts as his home and his residence in Washington only temporary. It was shown that Mr. Bailey had resided in Washington in a public hotel, with occasional absences on visits to Massachusetts, until his marriage in Washington, at which time he took up his residence with his wife's mother. The election at which Mr. Bailey was chosen a Representative was held September 8, 1823, at which time he was actually residing in Washington in his capacity as clerk in the State Department.

The conclusions of the committee was embodied in the following:

Resolved, That John Bailey is not entitled to a seat in this House.

In support of this conclusion the committee made an elaborate report, centering entirely around the meaning of the word "inhabitant."

After reviewing the circumstances attending the adoption of this clause of the Constitution, the committee comment upon the fact that the word "resident" had first been proposed, but had been put aside for "inhabitant," as being a "stronger term, intended to express more clearly their intention that the persons to be elected should be completely identified with the State in which they were to be chosen."

The word "inhabitant" comprehended a simple fact, locality of existence; that of "citizen" a combination of civil privileges, some of which may be enjoyed in any of the States of the Union. The word "citizen" might properly be construed to mean a member of a political society, and although he might be absent for years, and cease to be an inhabitant of its territory, his rights of citizenship might not be thereby forfeited. The committee quote Vattel and Jacob's Law Dictionary to show that the character of inhabitant is derived from habitation and abode, and not from political privileges. The committee further fortified their position by an examination of the State constitutions and the laws of the United States.

The committee denied that the expressed intention of Mr. Bailey to return to Massachusetts had any bearing on his status as an inhabitant. It was true that ambassadors and other agents did not suffer impairment of their rights as citizens by residing abroad at the government of a foreign country. That which appertained to ministers of the Government residing abroad could not be supposed to attach to those in subordinate employments at home. The relations which the States bore to each other was very different from that which the Union bore to foreign governments. The several States by their own constitutions prescribed the conditions by which citizens of one State should become citizens of another, and over this subject the Government of the Union had no control. It would, therefore, be altogether fallacious to pretend that the bare holding of an appointment under the General Government, and residing for years in one of the States, should preclude the holder from being a citizen and inhabitant of such State when by its constitution and laws he was recognized as such. Therefore, as a formal renunciation of allegiance to the State from which he came was not necessary to being admitted to the rights of citizenship in the State to which he went, so the expression of an intention to return would be of no importance. At the time of his election, and for nearly six years before, Mr. Bailey was an inhabitant of the District of Columbia. It had been urged that as the District belonged to the General Government, each State possessed a part, and therefore a resident of the District was not out of the jurisdiction of his State. But this argument would apply equally to inhabitants of all the Territories of the United States, and was plainly more ingenious than conclusive. Moreover, Mr. Bailey had married a wife and established a family of his own, thereby leaving his natural or original domicile in his father's house.

From March 18 to 26 the report was debated at length in Committee of the Whole. In support of the committee's view the suggestion was made that Mr. Bailey, had held another Government office before and after his election to the House, and therefore was ineligible. But in view of the decision in the Herrick case this point was not pressed. In continuation of the reasoning of the report the point was made that Mr. Bailey had no domestic establishment or estate in Massachusetts, unless exception be made of certain books called a "library." The construction put on the word "inhabitant" by the various States was not particularly pertinent, as it might import a different, sense in different States. The construction in the case under consideration called for common sense merely. Mr. Bailey's residence was in the District. He was eligible for office there. If the District were entitled to a Delegate in the House whose qualifications should be that he should be an inhabitant of the District, he would certainly be eligible for that place. Therefore, he must have lost his inhabitancy in Massachusetts. So far as inhabitancy was concerned the District stood on the same basis as the other Territories of the United States. If in this case the inhabitancy in Massachusetts could be maintained, so could all the emigrants to the Territories retain inhabitancy in the States from which they came. A man in one of the States appointed to an office in one of the Territories would be eligible to be chosen Delegate from that Territory. Would he still retain his inhabitancy in the State from which he came? An inhabitant of one State was deprived of the right of being elected in all the other States. Was there any reason why the inhabitants of the District should be more highly favored than the inhabitants of the States? It was inevitable that in moving from State to State political and even personal rights must suffer modification or extinction with the changed condition of law. So in moving to the District certain rights enjoyed in the States were lost. If the residence of Mr. Bailey here had been transient and not uniform; had he left a dwelling house in Massachusetts in which his family resided a part of the year; had he left there any of the insignia of a household establishment; there would be indication that his domicile in Massachusetts had not been abandoned. It had been urged that the expressed intention to return to Massachusetts should govern. But the law ascertained intention in such a case by deducing from facts. The danger of allowing the Executive to furnish Members of Congress from the public service was discussed at length. The committee did not contend that a Member must be actually residing in a State at the time of his election. Foreign ministers going abroad, but from the nature of the case precluded from becoming citizens of a foreign power or obtaining the rights of inhabitancy, did not lose their inhabitancy at home by absence.

In support of the sitting Member the arguments were urged that the expressed will of the people should be set aside only for conclusive reasons; that a liberal construction had always been given in behalf of the rights of the people in such cases; that the proceedings in the constitutional convention changing the word "resident" for "inhabitant" showed that the framers of the instrument considered that a person might be an inhabitant without actually being a resident. The usages of Massachusetts showed that the word "inhabitant" referred to a person as a member of the political community, and not as a resident. It was probable that the Constitution meant that the meaning of the word "inhabitant" should be settled by the State usage. What decision could be of more force than that of the electors themselves? A person coming from a State to the District, left the direct jurisdiction of his State, but not its participant jurisdiction. An ambassador most certainly became the inhabitant of the foreign country if "local existence" was the test. If "locality of existence" were the test, persons on journeys would be constantly transferring their inhabitancy. The real meaning of "inhabitant" was one who had a "permanent home" or domicile in a place. The intention to return constituted the pivot on which the decision must turn. A man, citizen in one State, going into another to transact business, did not cease to be an inhabitant in the first State. There must be an intention to permanently settle to establish inhabitancy in the second State. No one denied that Mr. Bailey was a citizen of Massachusetts. If a citizen he must be an inhabitant. A citizen was always an inhabitant, but an inhabitant was not always a citizen. No one could be compelled to renounce his native State, yet to deny Mr. Bailey his seat would be in the direction of compelling him to do it against his own will and the will of his constituents. The sitting Member declared himself an inhabitant of Massachusetts, his constituents recognized him as such, and the governor of the State, in effect, had certified him as such. Mr. Bailey had left an extensive and valuable library in Massachusetts, constituting the greater portion of his visible property. Why were they not sold or brought to the District if he intended to settle permanently here? If "locality of existence" were the test, the members of the House might all be ineligible, as they were inhabitants of Washington. Foreign ministers did not lose their inhabitancy because they never intended to settle in the foreign country.

In Committee of the Whole, a motion to strike the word "not" from the resolution was decided in the negative by a vote of 105 to 55.

In the House the resolution of the committee was agreed to, yeas 125, nays 55.

So Mr. Bailey was declared not entitled to the seat.

435. The Virginia election case of Bayley v. Barbour, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

A Member who had resided a portion of the year in the District of Columbia, but who had a home in the State of his citizenship and was actually living there at the time of the election, was held to be qualified.

The Elections Committee held that a contestant could have no claim to a seat declared vacant because of the constitutional disqualifications of the sitting Member.

A suggestion that questions relating solely to qualifications of members should be brought in by memorial rather than by proceedings in contest.

On April 12, 1882,[1] Mr. John T. Wait, of Connecticut, from the Committee of Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Bayley v. Barbour, from Virginia.

As to all of the grounds of contest but one the committee found no evidence to sustain them. The report says:

In disposing of these grounds of contest it is only necessary to state that there was no evidence whatever offered in support of them, and that there was no contention before the committee that they were in point of fact true. Having been abandoned, it appears from the record that of the 27,441 legal votes cast at said election the said Bayley, contestant, received only 9,177. This leaves for the committee's consideration the sole question raised by the first ground set out in the notice of contestant, to wit:

That the said John S. Barbour, at the time of said election for such Representative, was ineligible and disqualified to be the Representative of said district and State.

The said ineligibility and disqualification consists in this, that the said John S. Barbour was not at the time aforesaid either a bona fide resident or inhabitant of said State of Virginia.

When the contestant abandoned the grounds of contest above set forth he at the same time relinquished all right or claim to the seat of the sitting Member, even in the event that the same should be declared vacant on the ground of the constitutional ineligibility and disqualification of its occupant.

In the case as made up and presented to the committee the contestant has only that interest in it that is possessed by every other elector in the district; yet there is no petition or memorial from any body of the electors of the district addressed to Congress setting forth any objection to the right of Mr. Barbour to a seat in the House to which he has been elected on the alleged ground that he is not possessed of those qualifications which, by the Constitution of the United States, are indispensable to the holding of a seat in Congress.

Both upon principle and precedent the committee think that those questions which relate solely to the qualifications of Members of Congress should be more appropriately brought to the attention of Congress by a memorial of the electors who are alone interested in the result. This practice could work no wrong, and would be productive of much good in preventing troublesome and gratuitous contests which might be inspired by motives other than the interests of the electors.

The subject being one of great importance, however, they have considered it on the testimony adduced, which is solely upon the question of the qualification of Barbour under the Constitution of the United States.

In support of the voluntary contest thus made by S. P. Bayley against the eligibility of the sitting Member he proceeded to take the testimony of three witnesses in the city of Alexandria, namely, George Duffey, Augustus F. Idensen, and John S. Barbour, the last named being the returned Member himself, the object being to show that the said Barbour was not a bona fide inhabitant of the State of Virginia, as required by the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Duffey was the commissioner of revenue for the city of Alexandria, and Mr. Idensen was clerk to the State assessor of that city for the year 1880. The contestee, Barbour, on his own behalf, took no testimony, but submitted the case upon the evidence of the contestant.

Duffey testifies that it was his duty to assess all real and personal properties, incomes, licenses, etc., also the annual capitation tax prescribed by law upon all male inhabitants of the State abiding in the city of Alexandria over 21 years of age at the time of the assessment.

That the said Barbour had no real property in the city of Alexandria, but that the property of his wife situated there was assessed to her on the property books as an Alexandrian, the law requiring the residence of the owner to be given. Idensen testifies that this was changed in 1880, when Mrs. Barbour, after the election, was put down as a resident of Washington, D.C., when he, as the assessor's clerk, knew that John S. Barbour was an actual resident in the city, and so stated in his deposition. Mr. Barbour testifies that he was a native of the State of Virginia; had always been a citizen of said State; never claimed to have lived elsewhere in a permanent sense or to have exercised citizenship in any other State or Territory; that his post-office, business headquarters, residence required by statute for the service of legal process upon him, were all in the city of Alexandria, and within the limits of said State, and that while he had a temporary winter residence in the city of Washington, he had taken a house in Alexandria, with his family, in September, 1880, and was so actually residing at the date of the Congressional election in November, 1880, and subsequently.

The Code of Virginia, ch. 166, see. 7, which provides for the manner of serving process against corporations, says:

"It shall be sufficient to serve any process against or notice to a corporation on its mayor, rector, president, or other chief officer, or in his absence from the county or corporation in which he resides, etc., * * * and service on any person under this section shall be in the county or corporation in which he resides; and the return shall show this and state on whom and when the service was, otherwise the service shall not be valid."

Under this statute service of process was habitually made upon John S. Barbour, as president of the Virginia Midland Railway, as a resident of Alexandria.

That in July previous to his nomination for Congress he had declined to be listed by the enumerator of Washington City as an inhabitant of that city, but then stated that he was an inhabitant of Virginia.

That when traveling absent from the State of Virginia he invariably registered himself as from Virginia.

That at the time of the election and before he was actually residing in Alexandria, without any intention of removing therefrom permanently. It was contended on behalf of the contestant that although John S. Barbour was an actual resident of the city of Alexandria, Va., within said district, at and before the time of the election, he was not an inhabitant within the meaning of the constitutional requirements to qualify him as a Member of Congress.

In support of this view the case of John Bailey (Clark and Hall's Contested Election Cases, p. 411) was relied upon. Bailey was chosen a Member of Congress from the State of Massachusetts on the 8th day of September, 1823, at which time he was actually residing in the city of Washington, in the capacity of clerk in the State Department. On the 1st day of October, 1817, Bailey, who was at that time a resident of Massachusetts, was appointed by the Secretary of State a clerk in the Department of State and immediately repaired to Washington and entered on the duties of his appointment. He continued to reside in the city from that time with his family—having in the meantime married—in the capacity of a clerk in the Department of State until the 21st day of October, 1823, subsequent to the date of his election, at which time he resigned his appointment. Upon the petition of certain citizens and electors of the Norfolk district, in the State of Massachusetts, the question of his eligibility and qualification under the Constitution was brought to the attention of Congress, and it was contended on behalf of Bailey that, although he had been from the time of his appointment in 1817 up to and subsequent to his election to Congress a resident of Washington, he had retained his citizenship in the State of Massachusetts, and by virtue of this citizenship it was contended that within the constitutional requirement he was qualified as a Member of Congress from that State. The committee considered at some length the distinction between citizenship and inhabitancy, and their report, which was approved by Congress, against the eligibility of Bailey as a Congressman was based upon these distinctions. It was held that, being a citizen of the State, granting that Bailey was such, but residing permanently elsewhere did not satisfy the constitutional requirements necessary to make him eligible as a Member of Congress. The committee say that "the word 'inhabitant' comprehends a simple fact-locality of existence; that 'citizen' comprehends a combination of civil privileges, some of which may be enjoyed in any of the States of the Union."

The case of Barbour differs materially from that of Bailey in this, that not only had Barbour continued to be a citizen of the State of Virginia, but that he had always held his legal residence in said State as hereinabove recited. Added to that was the fact that previous to his election as a Member of Congress from the Eighth Congressional district of Virginia he had removed to said State and had become an actual inhabitant thereof, residing there without any intention of permanently removing, whereas Bailey was, when elected, an actual inhabitant and resident of the District of Columbia, not claiming a residence or inhabitancy actually in the State of Massachusetts, except constructively through and by virtue of his citizenship, which he contended he had never renounced in said State.

It was contended further by the contestant in this case that the elective-franchise in Virginia was one of the essentials of inhabitancy, and that under the local laws of the State of Virginia a residence of twelve months within the State, and a residence of three months next preceding the election in the county, city, or town where the person offers to vote, was a requisite qualification of an elector, and that with these requisite qualifications a registration was also necessary; that John S. Barbour had never registered as a voter, and therefore he was not an inhabitant within the contemplation of the Constitution.

It was contended that the word "inhabitant" embraces citizenship; that an inhabitant must be entitled to all the privileges and advantages conferred by the laws of Virginia, and that the elective franchise alone confers these; therefore an inhabitant must have a right to vote and, further, that the burdens of inhabitancy were predicated upon the right to vote.

In answer to this position, without deeming it necessary upon the facts of this case to enter into the constitutional signification of inhabitancy, it is only necessary to say that the right to vote is not an essential of inhabitancy within the meaning of the Constitution, which is apparent from an inspection of the Constitution itself. In Article 1, section 2, the electors for Members of Congress "shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature," but in the succeeding section, providing for the qualifications of Members of Congress, it is provided that he shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen. It is reasonable to conclude that if the elective franchise was an essential the word "elector" would have been used in both sections, and that it is not used is conclusive that it was not so intended.

In the case of Philip Barton Key (Clark and Hall's Contested Election Cases, p. 224), who was elected a Member of Congress from Maryland on the 6th day of October, 1806, and who was seated as such, the facts are these: Mr. Key was an inhabitant of the District of Columbia, and in November, 1805, he purchased about 1,000 acres of land in Montgomery County, Md., about 14 miles from Georgetown; that some time in the summer of 1806 he caused a dwelling house to be erected on said lands, into which he removed with his family on the 18th September, 1806; that he was residing in said house, which was only partially completed, from that time up to the 20th of October, 1806, when he removed back with his family to his seat in the District of Columbia, where he remained till about the 28th of July, 1807, when they again removed to his estate in Montgomery County, where they remained till the 20th of October, 1807, when they again returned to his seat in the District of Columbia. He was only living and inhabiting within his said district in Maryland for the period of little upward of a month, during which time, to wit, on the 6th day of October, 1806, the election took place, at which he was returned as a Representative to Congress from said district. Notwithstanding this short residence, and the fact that Mr. Key, before his removal to Maryland, had been confessedly a citizen and inhabitant of the District of Columbia, it was decided by Congress that he was eligible and qualified under the Constitution as a Member of Congress.

In further answer to the position that the elective franchise is necessary to qualify one as a Member of Congress, it will appear from an inspection of the constitution of Maryland of 1776, and in full force in 1806, when Mr. Key was elected a Member of Congress from Maryland, that the qualifications for electors for the most numerous branch of the legislature—

"Shall be freemen above twenty-one years of age, with a freehold of fifty acres of land in the county in which they offer to vote, and residing therein, and all freemen having property in this State above the value of thirty pounds current money, and having resided in the county in which they offer to vote one whole year next preceding the election."

Therefore, Mr. Key, who was deemed qualified as a Member of Congress, was not an elector of the State of Maryland, and could not vote at the election at which he was returned as a Member.

Without resting this case, however, upon these grounds, the committee are satisfied from the facts of the case, as developed in the testimony, that John S. Barbour was, in point of fact, before and at the time of his election as a Member of Congress from the Eighth Congressional district of Virginia, an actual inhabitant of the State, enjoying all the rights and subject to all the burdens as such, and that having been duly elected as a Member of Congress from said district he is entitled to his seat.

Resolved, That John S. Barbour was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Member of the Forty-seventh Congress from the Eighth Congressional district of the State of Virginia.

The resolutions were agreed to by the House on April 12 without debate or division.[1]

436. The Virginia election case of McDonald v. Jones, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

A contestant who had his business and a residence in the District of Columbia and had no business or residence in Virginia was held ineligible for a seat from that State.

The legal time for serving a notice of contest in an election case is extended by the House only for good reason, and where there seems to be reasonable ground for a contest.

On February 28, 1896,[1] the Committee on Elections No. 1 reported on the case of McDonald v. Jones, from Virginia. In this case the contestant applied for leave to serve notice of contest, which he had not served within the time required by the statutes. The committee concluded that with reasonable diligence the notice might have been served within the prescribed time. They did not, however, rest their rejection of the application on this ground entirely, but reported—

(1) That they were convinced from the proofs presented at the hearing that there was no substantial ground for a contest and that the same could not be maintained successfully if the notice should be authorized.

(2) It also appeared that the contestant "at the time of the election in 1894, and prior to and since that time, was engaged in business and resided with his family in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and that he had no place of business and no business or residence of any description in the State of Virginia; and the committee is of opinion that he was not an inhabitant of the State of Virginia at or near the time of the election for Representatives in Congress in the First Congressional district of said State in 1894; and that he was not eligible for said office at or near the time of the said election in the year 1894."

The House, without debate or division, agreed to the resolution of the committee denying the application of the contestant.

437. The Senate considered qualified a Senator who, being a citizen of the United States, had been an inhabitant of the State from which he was appointed for less than a year.—On June 2, 1809,[2] Stanley Griswold, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State of Ohio to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Edward Tiffin, was qualified and took his seat. On June 9 his credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections, and on June 15 Mr. James Hilhouse, of Connecticut, chairman of that committee, submitted this report:

> That Edward Tiffin, a Senator for the State of Ohio, resigned his seat since the last session of the legislature of said State and during their recess; that on the 18th day of May last, and during said recess of said legislature, said Stanley Griswold was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid; that said Stanley Griswold, being a citizen of the United States, removed into the said State of Ohio and has there resided since September last, but the term of residence or other qualifications necessary to entitle a person to become an inhabitant of said State are not, so far as the committee have been able to discover, defined either by the constitution or laws of said State; but the executive who made the appointment having certified that said Stanley Griswold is a citizen of said State, the committee submit the following resolution.

And thereupon the Senate—

Resolved, That Stanley Griswold, appointed by the governor of the State of Ohio as a Senator of the United States, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Edward Tiffin, is entitled to his seat.

438. The Senate overruled its committee and held as qualified Adelbert Ames, who, when elected Senator from Mississippi, was merely stationed there as an army officer, but who had declared his intention of making his home in that State.

Credentials unusual in form and signed by the Member-elect himself as "major-general" and "provisional governor" of Mississippi, were honored by the Senate.

On March 18, 1870,[1] Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, in the Senate submitted the following report from the Committee on the Judiciary:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Adelbert Ames, claiming to be a Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, report the following facts and conclusions:

Mr. Ames was born in Maine in 1835, and resided with his parents in that State until 1856, when he entered the Military Academy at West Point. From 1856 he remained in the military service of the United States until he resigned his commission, which he states was after the passage, but before the approval by the President, of the bill finally declaring Mississippi entitled to representation in Congress.

Until 1862 his parents continued to reside in Maine, and such articles and papers of his as would naturally be kept at his home remained at his father's house. In 1862 his parents removed to Minnesota, carrying with them the effects of their son in their possession, and in subsequent years he occasionally revisited Maine, but owned no land and occupied no habitation there of his own.

In 1868 he was ordered to Mississippi; on the 15th of June in that year he became provisional governor by appointment of General McDowell, then district commander, and in March, 1869, he became himself district commander by assignment of the President of the United States. These relations continued, modified, if modified at all, only as will presently appear.

The election seems to have been regular, and waiving any criticism of the form of the certificate, no question has been made touching the right of Mr. Ames to take his seat, except in regard to the legal character of his residence in Mississippi.

The provision of the Constitution of the United States under which the question arises is this:

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

It will be seen that to be eligible as a Senator of the United States a person, in addition to other qualifications, must be an inhabitant of the State for which he is chosen, and he must be such an inhabitant "when elected."

The election in this instance occurred on the 18th day of January, 1870.

At this time Mr. Ames was a military officer, stationed in Mississippi by order of superior military authority, and acting as provisional governor by appointment from General McDowell, as already stated. His presence in these two characters comprises everything bearing upon the question of his residence in Mississippi down to the time when he became a candidate for the Senate. The precise date can not be fixed, but not long before the election General Ames determined to allow his name to be submitted to the legislature as one of those from which the choice of Senators might be made.

Having reached this determination, and in connection with it, General Ames declared, as far as he did declare it, his intention in regard to his future residence. His language as delivered to the committee touching his declarations and acts is as follows:

"Upon the success of the Republican ticket in Mississippi I was repeatedly approached to become a candidate for the United States Senate. For a long time I declined—I wrote letters declining. A number of persons in Mississippi visited this city to find arguments by which I might be influenced to become a candidate. I hesitated because it would necessitate the abandonment of my whole military life. Finally, for personal and public reasons, I decided to become a candidate and leave the Army. My intentions were publicly declared and sincere. (The intentions thus declared were not only to become a candidate for the Senate, but to remain and reside in Mississippi.) I even made arrangements, almost final and permanent, with a person to manage property I intended to buy. This was before I left Mississippi. My resignation was accepted by the President before he signed the bill to admit the State."

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, Senate Report No. 75; Election Cases, Senate Document No. 11, special session Fifty-eighth Congress, p. 375.

The conclusion of the committee upon these facts is that General Ames was not, when elected, an inhabitant of the State for which he was chosen, and that he is not entitled to take his seat.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Adelbert Ames is not eligible to the seat in the Senate of the United States to which he has been appointed.

In opening the debate in support of the resolution, on March 22,[1] Mr. Conkling cited the definitions of "inhabitant" and the precedents of the House in the cases of John Bailey, Jennings Pigott,[2] the British cases of Brown v. Smith and Cockrell v. Cockrell. Commenting on what might be considered ambiguous language in the report, Mr. Conkling said that General Ames had not been able to affirm that it was his intention to remain in Mississippi in the event that he should not be elected to the Senate. In opposition, however, it was urged[3] by Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, that General Ames had determined irrevocably to make Mississippi his home, and that this was not at all a conditional determination. Mr. Howard also cited the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw as to habitancy (17 Pickering, 234):

> It is often a question of great difficulty, depending upon minute and complicated circumstances, leaving the question in so much doubt that a slight circumstance may turn the balance. In such a circumstance the mere declaration of the party, made in good faith, of his election to make the one place rather than the other his home would be sufficient to turn the scale.

Against this, on March 23, was cited an opinion of Chief Justice Parker in support of the argument that General Ames did not go to Mississippi of his own free will, and, moreover, that he sustained no municipal relations as a citizen there, and therefore that he was not an inhabitant.

The report was debated at great length on March 22, 23, and 31, and April 1,[4] and on the latter day the motion of Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, that the word "not" be stricken out was agreed to—yeas 40, nays 12.[5]

Then the resolution, as amended, was agreed to without division and Mr. Ames took the oath.

A question was also raised in this case as to the credentials. Mr. Ames, as "brevet major-general United States Army and provisional governor," certified to his own election to the Senate.[6] This point was discussed somewhat in the debate,[7] but did not affect the decision.

439. A Senator who, at the time of his election, was actually residing in the District of Columbia as an officeholder, but who voted in his old home and had no intent of making the District his domicile, was held to be qualified.—In 1899,[1] the Senate considered the case of Nathan B. Scott, elected a Senator from the State of West Virginia for the term beginning March 4, 1899. Before Mr. Scott appeared to claim his seat certain memorials were presented to the Senate remonstrating against the seating of Mr. Scott. At the beginning of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress Mr. Scott was duly seated as a Senator from the State of West Virginia, without objection at the time. Afterwards a resolution was introduced in the Senate declaring that Mr. Scott was not entitled to a seat in the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with the memorials referred to.

March 20, 1900, the committee submitted a report with an accompanying resolution that Mr. Scott was entitled to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of West Virginia. A minority of the committee dissented.

The principal element of the case was as to irregularities in the West Virginia legislature at the time of the election of Senator. Another objection is thus treated in the majority report presented by Mr. L. E. McComas, of Maryland:

> The fifth objection assigned by John T. McGraw, memorialist, is that at the time of the election of Mr. Scott he was a citizen but not an inhabitant of the State of West Virginia, but was an inhabitant of the District of Columbia.
> It is admitted that Mr. Scott was born in Ohio; that when a young man he removed to Wheeling, in West Virginia, engaged in business, had resided there until January 1, 1898, when he was appointed by the President Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and upon his confirmation thereafter he came to Washington to discharge the duties of this Federal office, but with the intent to retain his residence, citizenship, inhabitancy, and domicile in Wheeling, W. Va., his home; that in accord with this intent he exercised unchallenged the right to vote and did vote on November 8, 1898, in the precinct in Wheeling where his residence was and had remained unchanged; that he came here with no intent to change his domicile to Washington from Wheeling, and that he claims to be an inhabitant of Wheeling, W. Va., and that he remained in Washington in the discharge of his official functions with intent to return to his home in Wheeling when his duties of office here ended.
> The mere statement of facts should suffice to show that this objection is unfounded. The Federal Constitution requires that the Senator shall bean "inhabitant" of the State. This term is a legal equivalent of the term "resident," and residence is what is required by the law of West Virginia to entitle the male citizens of that State to vote.
> The committee, without extended discussion, were unanimously of the opinion that Mr. Scott was an inhabitant of West Virginia at the time of his election to the Senate of the United States and is entitled to retain his seat.

440. During the discussion of the qualifications of a Senator he presented his resignation; but the Senate disregarded it and proceeded to declare his election void.—On March 14, 1849,[2] the Senate was considering the eligibility of Mr. James Shields, of Illinois, to a seat in the Senate, when Mr. Shields tendered a letter containing his resignation. The reading of this letter was not permitted until the pending question had been postponed. Then the letter was read, and a resolution directing the Vice-President to inform the executive of the State of Illinois of the resignation was offered.

On March 15 the subject was debated at length, it being urged that if the Senate should inform the executive of Illinois of the resignation, that official might assume that such a vacancy existed as he would have the power to fill by appointment; also that the Senate would be precluded from settling the question as to Mr. Shield's qualifications. Finally the resolution directing the executive of Illinois to be informed was laid on the table, yeas 33, nays 14. Then the Senate resumed the subject of qualification and declared Mr. Shield's election void by reason of his not having been a citizen a sufficient time.

Chapter XIV.

THE OATH AS RELATED TO QUALIFICATIONS.

441. The Senate investigated the sanity of a Senator-elect before allowing him to take the oath.—April 30, 1844,[3] in the Senate, Mr. Spencer Jarnagan, of Tennessee, offered this resolution, just after the reading of the credentials to which it refers:

Resolved, That the credentials presented to the Senate of the election of John M. Niles to be Senator of the United States from the State of Connecticut be referred to a select committee, to consist of five, who shall be instructed to inquire into the election, returns, and qualifications of the said John M. Niles, and into his capacity at this time to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

After some discussion of the condition of Mr. Niles, during which it was stated by a Senator that of his own personal knowledge he could assure the Senate of the sanity of Mr. Niles, the resolution was agreed to. Messrs. Jarnagan; Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri; John M. Berrien, of Georgia; Silas Wright, of New York; and George McDuffie, of South Carolina, were appointed the committee.

On May 16 the committee reported, saying that after conversation with Mr. Niles they became satisfied of his capacity to take the oath. The report concludes:

The committee are satisfied that Mr. Niles is at this time laboring under mental and physical debility, but is not of unsound mind in the technical sense of that phrase; and the faculties of his mind are subject to the control of his will; and there is no sufficient reason why he be not qualified and permitted to take his seat as a member of the Senate; and they most cordially unite with Doctor Brigham (whose letter constitutes a part of the report of the committee) in the hope that such a course (that is, taking his rest in the Senate and participating at least two hours a day actively in its business) will be the means of usefulness and a resource against disease: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Hon. John M. Niles be permitted to take the oath of a Senator in the Congress of the United States, and to take his seat as a member of the Senate.

The resolution having been agreed to, Mr. Niles came forward, qualified, and took his seat.

442. The election case of Philip B. Key, of Maryland, in the Tenth Congress.

A Member having been a pensioner of a foreign government, the House considered his case and declared him entitled to his seat, but declined to affirm. that he was qualified.—On December 11, 1807,[1] William Findley, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report on the petition of certain electors in the Third Congressional district of Maryland, who prayed that the seat of Mr. Philip B. Key be vacated, alleging that he had not fulfilled the condition of a law of Maryland. This law, which imposed on Representatives in Congress from that State a qualification in addition to those prescribed by the Constitution, required a residence of twelve calendar months in the district before election, and it was alleged that Mr. Key did not fulfill this condition and that he was not an inhabitant of the State. The Committee on Elections found upon examination that the law had been repealed so far as Mr. Key's district was concerned, and therefore recommended this resolution: [2]

Resolved, That Philip B. Key, having the greatest number of votes and being qualified agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, is entitled to his seat in this House.

On January 21 and 22, 1808, this report was considered in the House, and at that time a statement was made that Mr. Key was, or had been, a pensioner of the British Government. Debate arising on this point, Mr. Barent Gardenier, of New York, contended that every person was eligible to a seat in the House unless expressly disqualified by the Constitution. There being nothing in the Constitution which disqualified a person from receiving a pension from a foreign government, this charge should not be considered in Mr. Key's case.

The House, however, decided that the report should be recommitted for further examination.

On February 24, 1808, the committee reported their findings of fact on the charge that Mr. Key was a British pensioner. In 1778 Mr. Key had accepted a commission in a provincial regiment of the British army. After the general peace of 1783 the corps he served in was disbanded, and he, with the other officers, was placed on half pay. In 1785 he returned to Maryland, being entitled to draw his half pay. In 1794 he sold his half pay to a brother-in-law, and shortly thereafter was elected to the Maryland legislature, where he served several years. Through the bankruptcy and death of the brother-in-law Mr. Key, in 1805, resumed the receipt of his half pay, but after taking six months' pay he ceased to draw it. In January, 1806, Mr. Key directed his agent in London to resign for him all right and claim to the half pay, and on October 28 or 29, 1807, sent a formal resignation of it to the British minister at Washington by the hands of a notary public.[3] The committee did not find that Mr. Key had ever taken the oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain, but he had taken the oath required of the public servants of the State of Maryland. The committee concluded that there was nothing in these facts to cause them to alter the conclusion which they had set forth in the former report.

[2] For question as to inhabitancy, see section 432 of this volume.

[3] It appears from the report that Mr. Key was elected October 6, 1806, and took the oath and his seat in the House on the day of organization of the Tenth Congress, October 26, 1807.

On January 21, in Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. John Rhea, of Tennessee, the words "having the greatest number of votes, and being qualified agreeably to the Constitution of the United States," were stricken from the resolution. A little later question was raised as to Mr. Key's relation to the British Government, and the report was recommitted.

On March 17, after the committee had again reported, the question both of residence and half pay was discussed. Mr. John Rowan thought that, even were it true as to the alleged receipt of half pay by Mr. Key, neither the Constitution nor any law of the United States made it any disqualification. If Mr. Key had continued to receive the half pay after becoming a Member, that might be cause for discussion.

On March 18 the resolution was reported from the Committee of the Whole with the amendment adopted January 21. Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, demanded a division of the amendment, and accordingly the question was taken first upon the words "having the greatest number of votes." The House concurred in striking these out without division. The question then being taken on concurring in striking out the words "and being qualified agreeably to the Constitution of the United States," the yeas were 79 and the nays 28.

The question then recurred on the simple proposition declaring Mr. Key entitled to his seat, and it was agreed to—yeas 57, nays 52. The final debate seems to have been principally on the question of his residence.

443. In 1862, before the enactment of the test oath for loyalty, the Senate, after mature consideration, declined to exclude for alleged disloyalty Benjamin Stark, whose credentials were unimpeached.

In 1862 the Senate decided to administer the oath "without prejudice to any subsequent proceedings in the case" to a Senator-elect charged with disloyalty.

A Senate committee having, on the strength of ex parte affidavits, found Benjamin Stark disloyal, the Senate disagreed to a resolution for his expulsion.

In 1862 a Senator who challenged the right of a Senator-elect to be sworn substantiated his objection with ex parte affidavits.

An argument that a Senator-elect might be excluded for disqualifications other than the three specified by the Constitution.

On January 6, 1862,[1] the Senate, Mr. James W. Nesmith, of Oregon, presented the credentials of Benjamin Stark, appointed a Senator by the governor of Oregon to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death of Edward D. Baker.

Mr. William Pitt Fessenden, of Maine, moved that the oath[2] be not administered and that the credentials, with certain papers which he then offered, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On January 6 and 10 this motion was debated at length. It was admitted by Mr. Fessenden that he considered the motion unprecedented, but he considered it justified by the papers which he presented. These papers consisted of affidavits of persons in Oregon, who swore that they had heard Mr. Stark make disloyal speeches.

[1] Second session Thirty-seventh Congress, Globe, pp. 183, 265–269: Election Cases. Senate Document No. 11, special session Fifty-eighth Congress, p. 294.

[2] The so-called ironclad oath was not then in existence, having been approved July 2, 1862.

In the debate it appeared that persons presenting credentials as Senators had been denied their seats pending investigation; but that in such cases there had been involved questions of law only, raised by the wording of the credentials themselves or by the Senate taking judicial knowledge of a fact as to the session of a legislature. But in this case a fact as to qualification was raised, and loyalty was not one of the three enumerated qualifications. In support of the motion the cases of Kensey Johns, Ambrose H. Sevier, Lannian, and Dixon were cited.

An amendment striking the word "not" from Mr. Fessenden's motion was disagreed to—yeas 10, nays 29. Then Mr. Fessenden's motion was agreed to—yeas 29, nays 11.

On February 7, 1862,[1] Mr. Ira Harris, of New York, submitted the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Benjamin Stark as a Senator from the State of Oregon, with the accompanying papers, have had the same under consideration, and, without expressing any opinion as to the effect of the papers before them upon any subsequent proceedings in the case, they report the following resolution:

Resolved, That Benjamin Stark, of Oregon, appointed a Senator of that State by the governor thereof, is entitled to take the constitutional oath of office.

Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, dissented from the conclusions of the committee, and submitted the following views:

A preliminary question was raised in the Senate when this case was referred to the committee, whether it was competent for the Senate for any cause to refuse to allow a person to be sworn as a Member of the Senate whose credentials were in proper form, and who possessed all the qualifications as to age, citizenship, and inhabitancy prescribed by the Constitution, and whether the only remedy which the Senate had to protect itself against the presence of an infamous person, a convicted felon, or an avowed and open traitor, was not by expulsion by a two-thirds vote after he should have been sworn into office. The Senate decided, after debate, to refer the credentials of Mr. Stark, with the accompanying papers, consisting of written statements and affidavits impeaching his loyalty, to the committee without allowing him to be sworn. A majority of the committee now report the case back, with a resolution that Mr. Stark is entitled to take the constitutional oath, expressly stating that they do so "without expressing any opinion as to the effect of the papers before them upon any subsequent proceedings in the case."

This reservation of opinion on the evidence could only have become necessary on the supposition that some subsequent proceedings might be taken in the case, referring doubtless to a motion to expel the Senator after he should have been admitted a Member, for the reasons assigned in the accompanying papers, in effect establishing the principle that evidence of disloyalty, which might be sufficient to expel a Member when admitted, was not sufficient to prevent his qualifying as a Member. To this principle the undersigned can not agree. He believes it was the duty of the committee to examine and pass upon the evidence before it, and if found insufficient to prevent Mr. Stark from taking the constitutional oath, that it would also be insufficient to warrant his expulsion after he was admitted.

It is admitted that neither the Senate, Congress, nor a State can superadd other qualifications for a Senator to those prescribed by the Constitution, and yet either may prevent a person possessing all those qualifications, and duly elected, from taking his seat in the Senate. Does anyone question the right of a State to arrest for crime a person duly qualified for and appointed a Senator, hold him in confinement, and thereby prevent his appearing in the Senate to qualify? Suppose a Senator, after his appointment, and before qualifying, to commit the crime of murder. Would anyone question the right of the State authorities where the crime was committed to arrest, confine, and, if found guilty, execute the murderer, and thereby forever prevent his taking his seat? Or, if the punishment for the offense was imprisonment, would anyone question the right to hold the Senator in prison, and thereby prevent his appearing in the Senate?

Could the Senate in such a case expel him before he had been admitted to a seat? Or must he [be] brought from the felon's cell, be introduced into the Senate, and sworn as a Member before his seat could be declared vacant? If not, must the State go unrepresented till the time for which he was appointed has expired? Or would it be competent for the Senate in such a case, by a majority vote, to declaire the convict incompetent to hold a seat in the body, and thereby open the way for the appointment of a successor? It is manifest that the prescribing of the qualifications for a Senator in the Constitution was not intended to prevent his being held amenable for his crimes. The fact that the Constitution declares that Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same," is conclusive that for those offenses they may be arrested. As a punishment for crime, then, it is clear that a Senator-elect, possessing all the constitutional qualifications of age, citizenship, and inhabitancy, may be prevented from taking the oath of office. Congress has repeatedly acted upon the presumption that it was entirely competent for it to prescribe, as a punishment for crime, an inability forever afterwards to hold any office of honor, profit, or trust under the United States.

By a statute passed in 1790, any person giving a reward to a United States judge as a bribe to procure from him any opinion or judgment, and the judge receiving such bribe, are both declared to be forever disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. By an act passed in 1853, any Member of Congress after his election, and whether before or after he is qualified, who shall accept any reward given for the purpose of influencing his vote on any question which may come before him in his official capacity is declared incapable forever of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. Similar laws, it is believed, exist in most of the States, prescribing as part of the punishment for particular offenses, such as dueling, bribery, and some others, a disqualification for holding any office under the State, and this notwithstanding the State constitutions may have prescribed the qualifications for members of their legislatures, of which the disqualification arising from the conviction for crime was not one. The power of Congress to prescribe the punishment for treason is expressly given by the Constitution, except that it can not be made to work corruption of blood or forfeiture beyond the life of the person attainted. Does anyone doubt the power of Congress under this clause of the Constitution to declare that a person convicted of treason should forever be incapable of holding any office under the United States? If this were done, would it be pretended that a convicted traitor was entitled to be sworn as a Senator? The clause of the Constitution prescribing the qualifications of Senators and Representatives could never have been intended to limit the power to make disqualification to hold those or any other offices a penalty for the commission of crime, especially treason. Its design, doubtless, was to produce uniformity of qualification in all the States, and to prevent any particular class of persons, such as ministers of the gospel, or others, from being excluded from these positions. If it be competent for Congress to make disqualification to hold office a punishment for an offense against the United States, then it is clearly competent for the Senate, which, by the Constitution, is made "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," to do the same thing, so far as the right to take a seat in that body is concerned. Doubtless a law of Congress declaring that a person convicted of a particular offense should not hold office under the United States, and the decision of the courts sustaining such a law, would not preclude the Senate from admitting such a person to a seat, should it think proper, because the Senate is the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; yet it is hardly conceivable that the Senate ever would admit such a person to be sworn; nor does the fact that Congress has not adopted such a punishment for disloyalty or treason prevent the Senate from refusing to allow to be sworn as a Member a person believed by the body to be guilty of those offenses or other infamous crimes.

That one avowed traitor, a convicted felon, or a person known to be disloyal to the Government has a constitutional right to be admitted into the body would imply that the Senate had no power of protecting itself—a power which, from the nature of things, must be inherent in every legislative body. Suppose a Member sent to the Senate, before being sworn, were to disturb the body and by violence interrupt its proceedings, would the Senate be compelled to allow such a person to be sworn as a Member of the body before it could cast him out? Surely not, unless the Senate is unable to protect itself and preserve its own order. The Constitution declares that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member." The connection of the sentence in which the power of expulsion is given would indicate that it was intended to be exercised for some act done as a Member, and not for some cause existing before the Member was elected or took his seat. For any crime or infamous act done before that time the appropriate remedy would seem to be to refuse to allow him to qualify, which, in the judgment of the undersigned, the Senate may properly do; not by way of adding to the qualifications imposed by the Constitution, but as a punishment due to his crimes or the infamy of his character. Hence the undersigned, conceiving that it was the duty of the committee to have expressed its opinion on the evidence of disloyalty before it and to have reported in favor of or against the swearing in of the Senator as the evidence should warrant, and not allow him to be first sworn, and leave the question of his loyalty to be subsequently determined on a motion to expel, the undersigned forbears to review the evidence of disloyalty before the committee or to express any opinion upon it till the pending question of jurisdiction to consider it is determined.

The report was debated long and learnedly on February 18, 24, 26, and 27.[1]

Mr. Harris, in opening the debate,[2] gave the reasons for the conclusion which he had submitted from the committee.

The question submitted to the committee was, whether or not evidence of this description (certain ex parte affidavits alleging treasonable declarations) could be allowed to prevail against his prima facie right to take his seat as a Senator. The committee were of opinion that they could not. The Constitution declares what shall be the qualifications of a Senator. They are in respect to his age, in respect to his residence, in respect to his citizenship; and the committee were of opinion that the Senate were limited to the question, first, whether or not the person claiming the seat and presenting his credentials produced the requisite evidence of his election or appointment; and second, whether there was any question as to his constitutional qualifications. * * * I do not understand that it is competent for the Senate, and I think they step aside from their only jurisdiction when they attempt to punish a man for his crime or misbehavior antecedent to his election. If this were so, the Constitution ought to be amended so as to read that the legislature of a State or the governor of a State, in a certain contingency, shall elect or appoint a Senator, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. The Senate would then be the ultimate judge whether or not the man ought to have a seat here, and it would be competent for the Senate upon any caprice or any view it might take of the capacity, moral, or intellectual, or political, of a man, to reject him and prevent his taking a seat. Sir, I do not so understand the Constitution. I understand the Senate is the judge of the election of a Senator, of the sufficiency and genuineness of the returns furnished, and the evidence of the election; and also of the constitutional qualifications of the individual to hold a seat in the Senate. Beyond that I apprehend the Senate have no power at all.

On the other hand, it was urged by Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts,[3] that the Constitution required the oath to support the Constitution, and that this was in effect another constitutional qualification as to loyalty.

This contention was combatted, especially by Messrs. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, and John Sherman, of Ohio[4] who contended that the clause of the Constitution requiring the oath did not, in effect, impose a fourth qualification.

It was urged by Mr. James R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin:[5]

The power given to a majority to pass upon his qualifications implies the power to pass upon his disqualifications also, and that they may refuse to admit to a seat one who is disqualified as an avowed traitor. I am more inclined to that opinion because, after the question of his right to a seat upon this ground is distinctly raised and passed upon by the Senate, it may become res adjudicata, which can not be reopened. While I think this power is in a majority, it is in its nature judicial; and in its exercise, whether by a majority or two-thirds, this body should proceed with the same deliberation and the same freedom from all party bias as if sitting as a court.

In opposition Mr. Howe argued,[1] after enumerating the qualifications of the Constitution:

What other qualifications the Senator should have are to be determined first by the constituent body when they elect; and from their decision there is, in my judgment, no appeal, except to two-thirds of the Senate upon a motion to expel.

It was further urged by Mr. Sherman[2] that the power to expel was unlimited, and he cited English cases to show that it might be applied to offenses committed before election.

On February 27[3] the question was taken first on the amendment proposed by Mr. Sumner to the resolution, viz:

Strike out the words "is entitled to take the constitutional oath of office" and in lieu thereof insert "and now charged with disloyalty by the affidavits of many citizens of Oregon, and also by a letter addressed to the Secretary of State and signed jointly by many citizens of Oregon, some of whom hold public trusts under the United States, is not entitled to take the constitutional oath of office without a previous investigation into the truth of the charge."

This amendment was disagreed to—yeas 18, nays 26.

Thereupon Mr. Doolittle moved that the resolution be amended by adding thereto the words—without prejudice to any subsequent proceedings in the case.

It was explained that this was proposed so that the Senate might not be precluded from passing on the question of expulsion. In opposition it was urged that the Senate could not be so precluded, but the amendment was agreed to, there being, on division, ayes 24, noes 16.

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That Benjamin Stark, of Oregon, appointed a Senator of that State by the governor thereof, is entitled to take the constitutional oath of office without prejudice to any subsequent proceedings in the case.

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 19.[4]

Mr. Stark then took the oath.

On February 28[5] Mr. Stark offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the papers relating to the loyalty of Benjamin Stark, a Senator from Oregon, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to investigate the charges preferred against said Stark on all evidence which has been or may be presented, and with power to send for persons and papers.

This resolution was debated at length on February 28 and March the 18,[6] discussion relating largely to the effect of the decision to admit Mr. Stark, and the propriety of further action in view of that vote. Some of those Senators who had voted to exclude argued that it was now rather late to propose to purge the Senate of an alleged unworthy Member, and that he should have been excluded at the outset.

Finally, after amending the resolution by substituting a select committee for the Judiciary Committee, the resolution was agreed to—yeas, 37; nays, 3.

On April 22, Mr. Daniel Clark, of New Hampshire, chairman of the select committee, submitted a report.[1] This report states that it was not thought practicable, because of the remoteness of Oregon, to take any further testimony, and says:

> The committee met on the 24th of March, and the Senator from Oregon attended the meeting in compliance with the invitation of the committee, and desired that the committee should examine the papers before them, and if they should come to the conclusion that grounds were furnished for the charge of disloyalty by the papers and testimony, that the committee should draw up specific charges, to which he would file his answer. This the committee declined to do, for the reason that they did not wish to become his prosecutors, and were charged by the Senate with investigation and not accusation.
> Mr. Stark was informed that the committee did not propose to take any further testimony unless he desired it, but would investigate the charges as presented by the papers then before them. To which the committee understood Mr. Stark to reply that he did not wish to take any further testimony as the matter stood. It was then suggested by the committee to the Senator from Oregon that he should submit to the committee his answer in writing to the allegations and evidence then before the committee, with any further evidence he might wish to present, and that the committee would adjourn to afford him the necessary time for that purpose.

The report next quotes the letter of Mr. Stark, a portion of which is as follows:

> If the committee propose to confine their investigation exclusively to those statements and ex parte affidavits now before them, in connection with what I may submit for their consideration, it may not be inappropriate for me to express my opinions in regard to them, and I shall do so in the same spirit by which the committee appear to have been actuated in making the request.
> As it could not be fairly supposed that I would permit myself to occupy the attitude of self-prosecutor or that I would assume the task of defending myself when no charge on prima facie evidence had been preferred against me, I trust that I may do so without derogating from the true position which my honor and self-respect demand that I should occupy.
> With all due deference, therefore, I submit that as a Senator of the United States for the State of Oregon I am entitled to, and I claim, every presumption of honor, integrity, loyalty, and patriotism that can be claimed by any other Senator until such presumption is overborne by competent testimony. It certainly would be very extraordinary to put an honorable Senator upon trial for expulsion without charges and specifications made with reasonable (if not technical) precision, and supported by testimony subjected to all the tests which human wisdom and human experience have found to be essential for the ascertainment of truth. Should such a case ever arise it is reasonable to suppose that it would not be permitted long to interrupt the order or disturb the decorum of the American Senate. Unless the proceedings of your committee are to be regarded as a preliminary inquiry, whether or not charges for expulsion ought to be preferred against me, in what essential particular does this case differ from the one suggested?
> The papers referred to you I have again examined with that earnest attention which a deep personal interest in the result of an inquiry must ever stimulate, and with the light reflected upon them by the communication which I had the honor to address to the Committee on the Judiciary under date of January 17 ultimo, I am unable to discover anything upon which a sufficient charge for expulsion can be predicated, or anything in the nature of evidence which an impartial tribunal could receive as sufficient to justify expulsion from the Senate. Accepting all the statements contained in the letters, affidavits, etc., to be true, and there is merely attributed to me opinions which in the field of politics might be regarded as heresies, and expressions charged upon me which might be characterized as idle, mischievous, and unwise. This suggestion, I need not remind the committee, is not made as palliative upon an admission by me of the truth of any part of these statements, but purely as argumentative and as properly within the scope of my purpose in addressing to them this communication. Guided by this purpose, I have in these reflections excluded any denial or admission of anything contained in the papers before the committee, my chief design being accomplished if I shall have succeeded in showing the utter impossibility of making, or even entering upon, a defense of any specific charge or of proffering to rebut evidence when none is presented.

[1] Senate Report No. 38, second session Thirty-seventh Congress.

I can not conclude this brief statement without asserting, as in substance I did in my communication to the Judiciary Committee, that the declarations of my assailants are utterly false in many particulars which might be deemed important, especially the statements of Hull and Law; that the expressions attributed to me in others of the affidavits have been wickedly and maliciously perverted, and that in every respect their declarations are unjust to my real sentiments and at variance with the whole tenor of my life.

The committee, after giving Mr. Stark opportunity to present further testimony, and after he had failed to do so, reached conclusions which they state as follows:

The committee then proceeded to consider the allegations and charges contained in the papers which had been submitted to them by the Senate, in connection with his answer and statement, and upon mature deliberation do find the following conclusions from the facts proved, viz:

First. That for many months prior to the 21st of November, 1861, and up to that time, the said Stark was an ardent advocate of the cause of the rebellious States.

Second. That after the formation of the constitution of the Confederate States he openly declared his admiration for it and advocated the absorption of the loyal States of the Union into the Southern Confederacy under that constitution as the only means of peace, warmly avowing his sympathies with the South.

Third. That the Senator from Oregon is disloyal to the Government of the United States.

The report gives extracts from the evidence and argument to show the reasons for these conclusions. In support of the third conclusion they cited utterances of Mr. Stark's—calculated to encourage the rebellion and discourage the efforts to suppress it.

The report was signed by the chairman and by Messrs. J. M. Howard, of Michigan, Joseph A. Wright, of Indiana, and John Sherman, of Ohio.

Mr. W. J. Willey, of Virginia, did not entirely concur:

Concurring in the first two conclusions of the majority of the committee, I am yet constrained, not without hesitation, to differ with them in their third and last conclusion. Distrusting all ex parte testimony, especially in regard to expressions uttered in the heat of high political excitement, seeing that the sentiments and opinions thus attributed to Mr. Stark are virtually denied and repudiated by him in his written statement before the committee; remembering that since it is alleged those conversations took place and those expressions were uttered Mr. Stark, in taking his seat as a Senator, has purged himself of these sinister allegations by taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and especially fearing the danger of making mere difference of opinion, however wide and fundamental, a test of fidelity to the Government, I am not prepared to say that Mr. Stark is now disloyal.

On May 7 [1] Mr. Sumner submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That Benjamin Stark, a Senator from Oregon, who has been found by a committee of this body to be disloyal to the Government of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, expelled from the Senate.

It was stated at this time by Mr. Sherman, who signed the report, that only a small portion of the session remained, and that the people of Oregon would very soon have the opportunity of passing on the question of Mr. Stark's loyalty. Therefore he did not favor the presentation of a resolution of expulsion.

On June 5 and 6,[1] however, Mr. Sumner pressed the question to the attention of the Senate, and on the latter day, almost without debate, the question was taken on agreeing to the resolution, and it was disagreed to—yeas 16, nays 21.

444. A question being raised as to the loyalty of a Member-elect, the House has exercised its discretion about permitting him to take the oath at once.—On November 21, 1867,[2] the Members-elect from the State of Tennessee appeared to take the oath, when Mr. James Brooks, of New York, challenged Mr. William B. Stokes, alleging that he had been disloyal during the war, and presenting in support thereof a letter alleged to have been written by Mr. Stokes in 1861, announcing an intention to resist the Federal Government.

On the same day Mr. James Mullins was challenged on the charge of disloyalty, in support of which a letter written by an army officer, but not verified by oath, was read, charging Mr. Mullins with disloyal utterances in 1861.

In the debate it was argued that in these two cases the charge was not made on the responsibility of a Member, supported by affidavits, as in the Kentucky cases; that the gentlemen in question were known to have acted loyally during the war, and that the evidence shown against them was not sufficient to preclude their taking the test oath with the approval of their own consciences.

Resolution to refer the credentials and deny the oath to the two Members-elect were disagreed to by the House, and they were sworn.

445. On November 21, 1867,[3] the Members-elect from the State of Tennessee appeared to take the oath, the House being already organized. Thereupon Mr. James Brooks, of New York, challenged the right of Mr. R. R. Butler to be sworn on the ground that he had been disloyal to the Government, presenting in support of the charge the journal of the legislature of the State of Tennessee at the time of the secession acts.

After debate the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials of R. R. Butler, from the First district of Tennessee, be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that he be not sworn pending the investigation.

446. On January 31, 1870,[4] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, presented the following:

Resolved, That the Hon. Lewis McKenzie be now sworn in as Member of this House from the Seventh district of Virginia, he having the prima facie right thereto; but without prejudice to the claim of Charles Whittlesey, contestant to such seat, or to his right to prosecute his claim thereto.

It appeared from the debate that the credentials of Mr. McKenzie were in proper form, but that the Committee of Elections felt themselves bound by the resolution of the House directing them, whenever a contestant should allege that his opponent could not take the oath of loyalty to inquire into the prima facie right, and report their finding. Such an inquiry had been begun in this case, but the report would not be made up for some time. Under these circumstances, and because several Members vouched for the loyalty of Mr. McKenzie, the House decided to permit him to take the oath, agreeing to the resolution.

447. The House decided that the oath should be administered to a Member-elect, although a Member charged that he was personally disqualified.—On March 4, 1871,[1] while the Speaker was administering the oath to the Members-elect at the time of the organization of the House, the name of Mr. Alfred M. Waddell, of North Carolina, was called, whereupon Mr. Horace Maynard, upon his authority as a Member of the House, objected to the swearing in of Mr. Waddell, on the ground that he was personally disqualified.

Mr. Waddell stood aside; and after the organization of the House had been completed, Mr. Maynard stated that the disqualification which he charged existed under the third article of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. Before the war Mr. Waddell had held the office of clerk and master of chancery in North Carolina, an office which required him to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. After that he had served as an officer in the Confederate army. The supreme court of North Carolina had determined that the office of clerk and master of chancery was a judicial office.

Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, contended that the office in question was not judicial in character, and that the House was not bound by the decision of the North Carolina court, for they were the judges of the qualifications of their own Members. He then read the law of North Carolina defining the duties of the office to show to the House that they were not judicial in character.

Then, on motion of Mr. Kelley, the oath was administered to Mr. Waddell.

Then, on motion of Mr. Maynard, his credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections.

448. The election case of the Kentucky Members in the Fortieth Congress.

Before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, and in a time of civil disorders, the House denied the oath to Members-elect who presented themselves with credentials in due form but whose loyalty was questioned; and the credentials were referred to a committee.

In 1867 it was held that no man duly elected should be excluded for disloyalty unless it could be clearly proven that he had been guilty of such open acts of disloyalty that he could not honestly and truly take the oath of July 2, 1862.

Before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, and in a time of civil disorders, a committee reported and the House sustained the view that no person who had been disloyal should be sworn.

In 1867 the Elections Committee took the view that charges of the disloyalty of a constituency should not prevent a person holding a regular certificate from taking a seat on his prima facie right.

[1] First session Forty-second Congress, Journal, pp. 9, 13; Globe, pp. 6, 11, 12.

In 1867 Members who challenged the right of a Member-elect to take the oath did so, one on his responsibility as a Member and the other on the strength of affidavits.

On July 3, 1867,[1] the Congress having assembled from a recess caused by a temporary adjournment, the Clerk called the names of 8 gentlemen returned as Members-elect from the State of Kentucky, with credentials in due form.

Thereupon Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, challenged the right of one of them, Mr. John D. Young, to take the oath on the ground that he had given aid and comfort to the enemies of the Government. Mr. Schenck produced affidavits in support of this charge. Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, also presented affidavits charging Mr. L. S. Trimble, another of the Members-elect from Kentucky, with disloyalty. Mr. John F. Benjamin, of Missouri, on his responsibility as a Member, challenged the loyalty of a third, Mr. J. Proctor Knott. In the course of the debate the fact was developed that only one of the 8, Mr. George M. Adams. was free from the objections which were being urged.

After debate the House—yeas 67, noes 50—agreed to the following:

Whereas it is alleged that in the election recently held in the State of Kentucky for Representatives in the Fortieth Congress the legal and loyal voters in the several districts in said State have been overawed and prevented from a true expression of their will and choice at the polls by those who have sympathized with or actually participated in the late rebellion, and that such elections were carried by the votes of such disloyal and returned rebels; and whereas it is alleged that several of the Representatives-elect from that State are disloyal: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the credentials of L. S. Trimble, John Young Brown, J. Proctor Knott, A. P. Grover, Thomas L. Jones, James B. Beck, and John D. Young, Members-elect from the State of Kentucky, shall be referred to the Committee of Elections for report at as early a day as practicable.

On July 5[2] a proposition that the oath be administered to Messrs. Beck and Grover, against whom the charges of disloyalty were less specific, led to a discussion of the grounds for refusing the oath to a person presenting a certificate in due form, Members asserting that such action was justifiable in a case of alleged personal disqualification. The proposition was referred to the Committee of Elections.

On July 8[3] the Committee on Elections reported, through Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, reciting the allegations that had been made, and concluding:

The committee are of opinion that no person who has been engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, or who has given aid and comfort to its enemies during the late rebellion, ought to be permitted to be sworn as a Member of this House, and that any specific and apparently well-grounded charge of personal disloyalty made against a person claiming a seat as a Member of this House ought to be investigated and reported upon before such person is permitted to take the seat; but all charges touching the disloyalty of a constituency in a State in which loyal civil government was not overthrown during the late rebellion, or the illegality of an election, are matters which pertain to a contest in the ordinary way, and should not prevent a person holding a regular certificate from taking his seat.

In view of this report the House agreed to a resolution giving the committee the authority necessary to inquire whether any or either of the seven persons were disqualified from sitting as Members of this House on account of their having been guilty of acts of disloyalty to the Government of the United States, or having given aid or comfort to its enemies.

On December 3, 1867,[1] Mr. Burton C. Cook, of Illinois, submitted the report.[2] After affirming again the principles set forth in the former report the committee say:

It is apparent that there must be power in this House to prevent this [seating of disloyal persons], the House being the judge of the qualifications of its Members, of which fidelity to the Constitution is one, and that this end can only be certainly accomplished by the investigation of any specific and apparently well-grounded charge of personal disloyalty made against a person claiming a seat as a Member of this House, before such person is permitted to take the seat. The House concurred in this view of the committee by adopting the resolution under which the committee is now acting. The principle upon which this preliminary investigation was ordered was adopted by Congress when the oath of office to be taken by Members of this House was prescribed by law, and the preliminary investigation of specific and apparently well-founded charges against a person claiming a seat in this House is only an additional mode of attaining the same result sought to be secured by requiring the oath to be taken by all persons who become Members of the House. * * *

Whether at some future time provisions should be made by law by which those persons who have been at one time guilty of acts of disloyalty, but have by their subsequent conduct given conclusive evidence of loyalty, attachment to the Government, and obedience to the Constitution and laws, should be permitted to take seats in this House, is a matter which addresses itself to the considerate judgment of Congress, but upon which the committee is not now called upon to express an opinion. But while the committee entertained no doubt that it is the right and duty of this House to turn back from its very threshold everyone seeking to enter who has been engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, or has given aid and comfort to its enemies during the late rebellion, yet we believe that in our Government the right of representation is so sacred that no man who has been duly elected by the legal voters of his district should be refused his seat upon the ground of his personal disloyalty, unless it is proved that he has been guilty of such open acts of disloyalty that he can not honestly and truly take the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862; and further, that the commission of such acts of disloyalty to the Government should not be suspected merely, but should be proved by clear and satisfactory testimony, and that while mere want of active support of the Government or a passive sympathy with the rebellion are not sufficient to exclude a person regularly elected from taking his seat in the House, yet whenever it is shown by proof that the claimant has by act or speech given aid or countenance to the rebellion, he should not be permitted to take the oath, and such acts or speech need not be such as to constitute treason technically, but must have been so overt and public, and must have been done or said under such circumstances, as fairly to show that they were actually designed to, and in their nature tended to, forward the cause of the rebellion. In obedience to the resolution of this House of July 8, 1867, acting upon the views herein expressed, your committee sent a subcommittee to the State of Kentucky, and carefully examined all the evidence which they could procure upon the question referred to them, and upon an examination of the evidence they find that it is not proved that either James B. Beck, Thomas L. Jones, A. P. Grover, or J. Proctor Knott have been engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States, or have given aid and comfort to its enemies, during the late rebellion, and they therefore recommend that they be permitted to be sworn as Members of this House. In relation to the case of Lawrence S. Trimble, John D. Young, and John Young Brown, the committee reports that the seat of each of these gentlemen is contested, and that in each case the contestants have made the point that the person holding the certificate of election had been guilty of direct acts of disloyalty to the Government, and evidence has been taken both by the claimants and contestants, in addition to that taken by the committee, upon that question, which evidence the committee has not yet had time to consider, and is not now prepared to report any conclusion in those cases. The committee believes that it will be able to report in those cases within a short time, as the cases are understood to be ready for a final hearing.

The committee recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That James B. Beck, Thomas L. Jones, A. P. Grover, and J. Proctor Knott are entitled to seats as Members of this House from the State of Kentucky.

The resolution was agreed to without division, and the four persons named were sworn in as Members.[1]

449. The Kentucky election case of Smith v. Brown in the Fortieth Congress.

In 1868 the House excluded a Member-elect who, by voluntarily giving aid and comfort to rebellion, had, in the opinion of the House, made it impossible for him to take the oath of office prescribed by law.

In 1868, a question of loyalty arising, the House in effect held that there might be established by law qualifications other than those required by the Constitution.

In 1868 it seems to have been assumed by the Committee on Elections, if not by the House itself, that the House alone might not add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution.

Form of oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, known as the "Ironclad oath."

Discussion as to whether or not the law prescribing the oath of loyalty in 1862 was constitutional.

The House may by resolution modify the legal requirements for taking testimony in an election case.

On July 9, 1867,[2] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, presented this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That in each of the cases of contested election from Kentucky, the time for taking testimony is hereby extended to the 1st day of December next, in all things else conforming to existing law, except that such testimony may be taken before a notary public.

On January 21, 1868,[3] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of a majority of the committee[4] in one of the above-mentioned cases, Smith v. Brown. Mr. Brown had presented credentials in proper form, but had been excluded with other Kentucky Members.[5]

There was no doubt that he had received a large majority of the votes.

[1] On December 18, 1863, in the Senate, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, proposed a rule requiring all Senators to take and subscribe in open Senate to the oath or affirmation provided for by the act of July 2, 1862. This gave rise to a lengthy and learned debate on the subject of the oath required and allowed by the Constitution, and upon the question of establishing qualifications outside of those provided by the Constitution. The debate was continued January 20, 21, and 25, 1864, and on the latter day the resolution was agreed to, yeas 28, nays 11. This election case, the first of its kind since the formation of the Constitution, and recognized by the House as of the highest importance, was divided into two branches, which the House decided to debate and decide separately.

(1) The question as to whether or not John Young Brown was disqualified from sitting as a Member of the House on account of his having been guilty of acts of disloyalty to the Government of the United States or having given aid or comfort to its enemies. The majority of the committee, in their report, cite first the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862: [1]

That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: so help me God.

The report then says:

The committee understands itself to be instructed to inquire whether the said Brown has committed any of the acts which he is required by said statute, before entering upon the duties of a Representative, to make oath that he has not done.

The evidence relied upon to support this charge of disloyalty against Mr. Brown is contained in the following letter, written by him at the time it bears date, to the editors of the Louisville Courier, and published in that paper on the 15th day of May following:

[From the Louisville Courier, May 15,1861.]

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editors Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said, in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South—

"'I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government, and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks.'"

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the Confederate States! What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders, we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them he ought and I believe will be shot down before he leaves the State."

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm, as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered publicly and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully,

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

[1] 12 Stat. L., p. 502.

The majority and minority differed as to the purport and effect of these words. The minority contended that considering the circumstances at the time the letter was written it was not disloyal. The majority concluded that Mr. Brown having "voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States," he is not entitled to take the oath of office or to be admitted to this House as a Representative from the State of Kentucky.

Therefore the majority of the committee recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Young Brown, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the Second Congressional district of Kentucky or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

This portion of the report was debated fully on January 31 and February 1 and 3, 1868[1]. The question of fact as to whether the letter actually constituted such an act as the majority contended was considered, but the conflict was especially vigorous over the legality of the proposed action.

In opposition to the action recommended by the majority of the committee it was urged[2] that in the compact known as the Constitution it was agreed that no State should elect any person who should not have three specified qualifications, of age, citizenship, and inhabitancy. Either House might judge the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members and might expel. Subject to these limitations the right and power of the States over their Representatives was exclusive and complete. The attempt in the act of July 2, 1862, to impose another qualification was in direct conflict with the terms of the original pact. The imposition of additional limitations not being among the powers granted to the Congress, it must be unconstitutional and void. But even supposing the act of 1862 to be constitutional, it was not competent for the House to inquire whether a Member might take the oath. That was a question for him to determine by himself. It was further urged,[3] although not as vital, that even under the terms of the act of 1862 the oath might not be rightfully required, since there was a broad distinction between a Member of Congress and the officer referred to in that act. Further, the law of the oath was unconstitutional in that it was ex post facto and assumed to punish for alleged offenses committed before its enactment, and also to punish without legal trial and conviction. In the case of ex parte Garland the Supreme Court had held this oath unconstitutional when applied to lawyers. The oath was also unconstitutional, because the Constitution prescribed only an oath "to support this Constitution." Under the legal principle "expressio unius exclusio alterius' it was to be presumed that the Constitution meant what was written and nothing more. The same doctrine would indicate that in enumerating the three qualifications the Constitution intended that there should be no more. In support of this contention Justice Story was quoted. It was true that the House was the judge of the qualifications of its own Members, but this did not mean that it might create new qualifications. It must sit in a judicial and not a legislative capacity, and decide only whether the Member had the three enumerated qualifications. This argument as to the inability of the House to add qualifications by itself was admitted to be sound by the chairman of the Elections Committee,[1] who presented the report against Mr. Brown, but he of course held that the Congress might by the law of the oath establish the additional qualification of loyalty.

In support of the resolution of exclusion it was argued that the Government might go behind the qualifications enumerated in the Constitution. It was true that only three qualifications were specified, but did not this mean that no man should serve who had not at least these three qualifications?[2] It had been held that the States might not impose other qualifications, but it did not necessarily follow that the Congress, with the approval of the President, i.e., the Government, might not prescribe other qualifications. It was inherently implied in every constitutional provision under which the House had its existence that no man should be qualified to sit as a Member who had not the indispensable qualification of loyalty to the Government. The laws of human society authorized a government to resort to all means to preserve itself. In McCulloch v. Maryland, Chief Justice Marshall had set forth views sustaining the argument that Congress had full powers of preservation of itself. The Congress of 1862 had full power to adopt the form of oath in question in this case as a consequence. It was further urged[3] that if under the Constitution no qualifications except those enumerated could be required, then the great leaders of the recent rebellion might be elected to the House and seated. Even expulsion might not be a remedy, since if a man had a right to take a seat he had a right to hold it. By laws passed in 1793 and 1853, disqualifying persons guilty of certain acts from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, Congress had asserted its right to prescribe additional qualifications. It could not be said that exclusion from the House in the pending case was an ex post facto punishment, for a disqualification from holding office was not an increase of penalty.

In rebuttal the minority argued that the case of McCulloch v. The State of Maryland had no application to the pending case. Also, the effect of the acts of 1793 and 1853 was denied on the ground that a Member of Congress was not an officer within the meaning of those laws.

On February 13[4] the question was taken on a motion of Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, to substitute for the resolution proposed by the majority the following:

> That John Young Brown, not having voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, and having received a majority of the votes cast in the Second district of Kentucky for Representative in this House, is entitled to admission and to take the oath of office as a Representative from said district.

The resolution of the majority, excluding Mr. Brown, was then agreed to without division.

450. The Kentucky case of Smith v. Brown, continued.

In the Kentucky cases in 1868 a contest was presented and sustained against a person to whom the House had refused the oath on his prima facie showing.

The person receiving the majority of the votes in a district being excluded as disqualified, the House, after careful examination, declined to seat the one receiving the next highest number.

The Elections Committee, in a report sustained on the main issue, held as an incidental question that the English law as to seating a minority candidate, when a vacancy is caused by disqualification is not applicable under the Constitution.

(2) On the second branch of the case, relating to the right of the contestant to the seat, the committee were united. Mr. Young's majority over the contestant was 6,106 votes. The contestant rested his claim to the seat solely on the legal view that where a candidate known to be ineligible receives the highest number of votes, those votes are to be treated as void, and the candidate having the next highest number be seated. The report reviews the English authorities on which contestant mainly relied, showing that the rule rested entirely on the fact that the voters had knowledge of the ineligibility of the candidate before voting for him. The rule laid down by Heywood on County Elections was "that it is a willful obstinacy and misconduct in a voter to give his vote for a person laboring under a known incapacity." Parliament requires the notice of this incapacity to be exceedingly formal, and in almost every instance to be at the polls. The report says:

> Now, if it be admitted that this is the rule of law in this country as well as in Great Britain, the facts do not bring this case within it. No such notice as the British Parliament required was given to the electors at the polls in the twelve counties composing this district. Indeed, it does not appear that any notice at all of any alleged ineligibility was given at a single poll. The most that can be claimed, by way of notice, is the alleged notoriety of certain facts, viz, the publication of the letter, which, it is claimed, was evidence from which ineligibility could be inferred by the voter. But how notorious were even these facts? The letter was published in 1861—six years before the election; it was reproduced on the stump; but in how many of these counties, in the hearing of how many of the very men who afterwards, on election day, cast their votes for Mr. Brown, does not appear. It must also be remembered that what would be the legal result arising from these facts was never made certain before the votes. That result depended upon the purpose for which the letter was written, and its effect—all matters of proof and matters at all times in dispute before the voters, and about which even this committee itself, with a better opportunity than any voter ever had to investigate and examine all the evidence, are now, after a full hearing, as nearly equally divided as possible. How can it be said, then, that any voter, in casting his ballot for Mr. Brown, has been guilty of "willful misconduct and obstinacy" by casting a vote for one known to be ineligible? Mr. Heywood says that in England "it is not so in a doubtful case." (Southwark Elections, p. 259.) If, then, it be admitted that this English rule was a law binding on this House, still it would not avail Mr. Smith in this case, for the facts do not bring the case within the rule.
> But the committee do not find any such law regulating elections in this country, in either branch of Congress, or in any State legislature, as far as they have been able to examine. Their attention has been called to no case, and it was not claimed before the committee that, as yet, this rule, by which one receiving only a minority of the votes actually cast had been adjudged elected, had ever been applied in this country.

On the other hand, there have been many cases of alleged ineligibility in both branches of Congress since the formation of the Government, in some of which seats have been declared vacant on that ground, and in which, had there existed in this country any such rule, it would certainly have been resorted to.

The report cites the cases of Ramsey v. Smith, Gallatin, Bailey, Shields, and the case of Mr. Brown himself (the excluded one), who was not allowed to take his seat in the Thirty-sixth Congress until he had arrived at the constitutional age. Cushing's Law of Legislative Assemblies was also discussed, and shown to be based on English, not American, precedents.

The report goes on to discuss the powers of Parliament, which are often called omnipotent, and which in theory proceed from the Sovereign and not from the people. In the matter of elections it had laid down many arbitrary laws besides the one in question. Comparing the English with the American system, the report says:

There certainly can be no need of argument to show that such law can find no place in our system, or occasion to contrast the limited powers of the House of Representatives with the "omnipotence of Parliament. As Congress, much less the House of Representatives, never conceded, never having the power to concede, to a voter his right to the ballot, neither can it take it away, modify, or limit it. Least of all can this body, the House alone, punish a voter for "obstinacy" or "perversity" in the exercise of his right. It can not touch a voter or prescribe how he shall vote, nor can it impose a penalty on him, much less disfranchise him or say what shall be the effect or the power of his ballot if it be cast in a particular way. The laws of the State determine this. It is unnecessary to discuss how far both Houses by a law can interfere under that clause of the Constitution which says that "the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations." It is enough to say that Congress never has touched those regulations, but has left them as made by the States. Both Houses have always absolutely conformed, in the effect to be given to the ballot, to the law of the State. To such extent has it been carried that the Senate has rejected a claimant to a seat who had 29 votes to 29 blanks, because there was a law of the State defining the power of each ballot by prescribing that, to be elected Senator, one must have not only a majority of all the votes cast, but also a majority of all the members elected to the legislature (2 Contested Elections, 608), and there happened to have been 60 members elected to that legislature; and this House has, in obedience to a law of the State of Delaware, rejected votes and given the seat to a contestant, because 4 votes had only the name of the sitting Member on them, when the law required each voter, though there was but one Representative to be elected, to put two names on his ballot of two persons residing in different counties of the State. (1 Contested Elections, 69.) Some States have required a majority of all votes cast for an election, some a plurality alone, some a plurality after one or more unsuccessful attempts. The statute books of the States are full of provisions touching elections, extending as well to the effect and power of each ballot as to the manner of depositing it, all of which are a rule for this House. Congress has not seen fit to enact any law concerning it if it had the power. It is not necessary to inquire whether Kentucky might not provide by law that votes cast for one known to be ineligible shall be thrown away, and one who has received a majority of the votes only shall be declared elected. It is enough to say that that State has not only never passed such a law, but it has enacted by statute that no one shall be declared elected who has not received a majority of the votes cast. As has been shown, Parliament did enact a law that votes cast for one ineligible shall be treated as if not cast, and one having a minority only of the votes be thus elected. But neither has Congress nor Kentucky enacted any such law; much less can this House alone, by a resolution, set it up, and that, too, after the fact, as a punishment for "willful obstinacy and misconduct." The right of representation is a sacred right, which can not be taken away from the majority. That majority, by perversely persisting in casting its vote for one ineligible, can lose representation, but never the right to representation while the Constitution and the State government shall endure. If it be inquired whether a loyal minority have not rights which are thus extinguished, the answer is obvious. If all are legal voters the right of one is no greater than that of another; nor is it a valid objection that by this rule one district after another might be left without a Representative until representation itself might be destroyed. The Constitution has given into the hands of Congress power by law to make, alter, or amend all regulations as to the times, places, and manner of electing Representatives. If this is power enough to meet the exigency, it will be met when it arises. If there is not power enough then it can not be found in that instrument. When Congress has by law thus regulated elections, this House can, by resolution, conform its actions thereto, but not till then.

The committee are therefore of the opinion that the case does not come within the law of the British Parliament, for want of a sufficient notice to the electors at the polls of an ineligibility, known and fixed by law; that the law of the British Parliament in this particular has never been adopted in this country, and is wholly inapplicable to the system of government under which we live.

The will of the majority expressed in conformity with established law is the very basis on which rest the foundations of our institutions, and any attempt to substitute therefor the will of a minority is an attack upon the fundamental principles of the Government, and if successful will prove their overthrow.

Therefore the committee recommended the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Samuel E. Smith, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the Second Congressional district of Kentucky, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

Resolved, That the Speaker be directed to notify the governor of Kentucky that a vacancy exists in the representation in this House from the Second Congressional district of Kentucky.

This branch of the report was debated at length on February 14 and 15.[1] This debate led to a review of precedents and to the citation of several American precedents which the report of the committee had overlooked and which were in harmony with the English rule. The earliest was an instance wherein about seventy years previous a sheriff had been declared elected in one of the counties of Maryland on the principle of the English precedents.[2] A later case was a decision of the Maine supreme court[3] (7 Maine reports), where certain scattering votes cast for an ineligible person had been disregarded, thus allowing an election which otherwise would have been defeated for lack of the required absolute majority. Another precedent was cited from the Maine legislature of 1865, where a candidate who was ineligible was excluded, although he had a majority of the votes, and the minority candidate was seated. The Indiana case of Gulick v. New was also cited in support of the same theory. Those who opposed the view of the committee also contended that the alleged disloyalty of Mr. Brown was well known in the district and constituted sufficient notice. In reply, it was argued that it had only recently been decided that such disloyalty was a disqualification and that Mr. Brown's status was a matter of controversy in the district.

Those supporting the report also denied the authority of the English rule and cited, in addition to the precedents referred to in the report, a decision by the supreme court of Georgia in 1852, wherein the English rule was denied and the contrary principle upheld.

The question was taken [1] on a motion of Mr. John Coburn, of Indiana, to substitute for the resolution denying to contestant the seat the following:

That Samuel E. Smith, having received a majority of the votes cast in conformity with law, is entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the Second Congressional district of Kentucky.

This motion was decided in the negative, yeas 30, nays 102.

Then the resolutions as reported by the committee were agreed to without division.

451. The Kentucky election case of McKee v. Young in the Fortieth Congress.

John D. Young, having, in the opinion of the House, voluntarily given aid and comfort to the enemy by words, although not by acts, was held incapable of taking the oath of July 2, 1862.

Argument that the act of July 2, 1862, prescribing a test oath, did in effect create an additional qualification.

In an exceptional case the House rejected votes cast by persons lately in armed resistance to the Government, although by the law of the State they were qualified voters.

Certain officers of election being held to be disqualified under State law, the House rejected the returns over which they had presided, declining to treat them as de facto officers.

A question as to whether or not the votes of persons deprived of citizenship by an act of Congress should be rejected in a case where the State law did not require a voter to be a citizen of the United States.

On March 23, 1868,[2] Mr. Joseph W. McClurg, of Missouri, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report of the majority of the committee on the Kentucky election case of McKee v. Young. Mr. Young had presented himself at the preceding session with credentials in regular form, but with other Kentucky Members [3] had not been permitted to take the seat until his qualifications for loyalty had been investigated.

The questions arising in this case naturally divide themselves into two main branches:

1. The majority of the committee concluded, from a discussion of the evidence, that the contestant had sustained the allegation in his notice of contest that said Young "voluntarily gave aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States." The report says:

The committee find the allegations of the contestant so sustained by the proof that it is unnecessary to contend that a rule too liberal in favor of those who sympathized with the late avowed enemies of the Government was adopted when report No. 2 of this session was approved by this House in the cases from Kentucky of Beck, Jones, Grover, and Knott. This case is brought within the rule then laid down, as it is proven, by clear and satisfactory testimony, that the said John D. Young "has been guilty of such acts of disloyalty that he can not honestly and truly take the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862."

The testimony of witnesses both for and against Mr. Young shows that he was not regarded by any as a Union man, and that he was not merely in passive sympathy with those engaged in the rebellion but desired its success and so expressed himself.

Before quoting testimony on this point the committee would express the opinion that "aid and comfort" may be given to an enemy by words of encouragement, or the expression of an opinion, from one occupying an influential position. They said John D. Young occupied the official position of county judge, as shown in the testimony.

The majority of the committee make no argument on the right to exclude such a person, regarding that question as settled by the preceding cases.

The minority of the committee[1] deny that the evidence shows those results claimed by the majority, and argue again that the House may not exclude for such a reason. They say:

Upon the whole evidence, therefore, the undersigned maintain that it has not been made to appear by anything like "clear and satisfactory testimony" that John D. Young has been guilty of any such open acts of disloyalty that he can not truthfully take the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, and that he should be permitted to take his seat as the Representative of the Ninth Congressional district of Kentucky in the present Congress.

The undersigned can not, however, close this paper, lengthy as it has necessarily been made, without entering a most solemn and emphatic dissent from the doctrine assumed by the majority, that a person possessing the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution of the United States for a Member of the House of Representatives can be legally excluded from his seat as such, after having been duly elected thereto, simply because he may not be able truthfully to take the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862. It is more than doubtful, in their opinion, whether the act can, by any proper rule of construction, be made to apply to Members of Congress at all; but, be that as it may, it seems to them to be a violation of the Constitution in more than one particular.

Congress, by an act passed January 24, 1865, extended the provisions of the act of July 2, 1862, so as to require the oath therein prescribed to be taken by lawyers practicing in the courts of the United States. That act was declared by the Supreme Court, upon solemn adjudication, after thorough argument, to be unconstitutional, not only because it was in conflict with the inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, but because it was to all intents and purposes an ex post facto law, besides being in contravention of that clause in the Constitution vesting the pardoning power in the Executive. (Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall., p. 333.) But there is another and far weightier reason for holding the act of 1862 unconstitutional, when sought to be enforced as to Members of Congress, and that is, that it super adds qualifications, or, which amounts to the same thing, prescribes disqualifications for Representatives unknown to the Constitution, which, in the very nature of things, Congress has no power to do.

The Constitution, section 2, Article I, provides that "no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen," the converse of which is that any person who is 25 years of age, has been a citizen of the United States for seven years, and is an inhabitant of the State in which he may be chosen, shall be a Representative if legally elected as such. If the person elected possess the qualifications presented by the Constitution, Congress has no power to inquire any further, or to demand anything more.

This principle was early recognized by Congress in the case of Barney v. McCreery, from Maryland, and reaffirmed in the cases of Fouke v. Trumbull, and Turney v. Marshall, from Illinois. In the latter case the distinguished chairman of the committee at that time, Mr. Bingham, says in his report:

"By the Constitution the people have the right to chose as their Representative any person having only the qualifications therein mentioned, without super adding thereto any additional qualification whatever. A power to add new qualifications is equivalent to a power to vary or change them."

[1] Messrs. M. C. Kerr, of Indiana, and John W. Chanler, of New York.

Yet that this act does in effect prescribe an additional qualification is too plain to admit of an argument. It is self-evident truth. That additional qualification without the possession of which the majority would not permit him to take his seat, is his ability to truthfully take the test oath. If the majority think he can truthfully take it, he gets his seat; if they think otherwise, he is deprived of it. Will any man of ordinary self-respect deny, then, that this act prescribes an additional qualification? If this principle is correct, then there is no limit to the power of Congress in prescribing qualifications for its Members but the will and discretion of the dominant majority, and by prescribing test after test they may exclude everybody but a favored few, and the right of choosing their own Representatives may be taken from the people entirely, or the character of Congress molded to suit the views and interests of one particular section or party forever.

It is no answer to this to say that Congress should have the power to exclude persons who from imbecility or want of integrity might endanger the safety of the Government. The question is, Has it the power? It has only the power to exclude those who do not possess the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution. If the people see proper to elect an imbecile, a person holding opinions distasteful to the majority, or one who may once have held such opinions, to represent them, it is a matter that concerns themselves, and confers no new power on Congress, and suspends no provisions of the Constitution. The only remedy lies in amending the Constitution, in the manner prescribed in the fifth article. Until that is done, Congress can do no more than pass upon the qualifications already prescribed.

It is simply begging the question to claim that Congress has the power to prescribe this test oath to be taken by its Members, because "each House has the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members," for the question instantly recurs, "What are the qualifications of which each House may be the judge?" and the answer is, simply the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution. To admit any other rule would be to make each House entirely independent of the Constitution, as to who may or may not be its own Members.

The majority of the committee proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That John D. Young, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged. in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the Ninth Congressional district of Kentucky, or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

The report was debated on June 20 and 22,[1] and on the latter day Mr. Kerr offered as a substitute a declaration that Mr. Young "was duly elected a Member of this House" and "should now be admitted to his seat herein upon taking the oath prescribed by law."

This substitute was decided in the negative—yeas 30, nays 96.

The resolution reported by the committee was then agreed to without division.

2. On the question as to the election of contestant a greater diversity of opinion arose in the committee. It was not contended that Mr. McKee should be seated simply because Mr. Young had been excluded for disqualification, the question involved in such a proceeding being regarded as settled in a former case. But a serious division of opinion arose on the question as to whether or not the contestant, Mr. McKee, had actually been elected. In the report presented March 23 all the committee, with one exception, agreed that contestant was not elected. But on June 2 the dissenting Member, Mr. Charles Upson, of Michigan, filed views contending that contestant had been elected.[2] On June 3, by unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, and without debate, the subject was recommitted.[3] On June 17 Mr. Burton C. Cook, of Illinois, presented from a majority of the committee [1] a report taking the ground that the contestant was elected, and recommending the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That J. D. Young was not legally elected a Member of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Kentucky.

Resolved, That Samuel McKee was duly elected a Member of the House of Representatives in the Fortieth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. Young had been returned by an official majority of 1,479 votes. In their final report the majority of the committee find that "the 625 votes of rebel soldiers ought not to be counted," that 883 majority should be deducted from Mr. Young, because it was given in precincts where there were "rebel officers of election," and finally that the votes of eight deserters should be deducted. This would leave a majority of 41 for Mr. McKee, the contestant.

(a) As to the 625 votes of "rebel soldiers," the majority in their final report say:

It appears perfectly clear to the committee that persons who had been soldiers in the rebel army had no right to vote or to act as officers of election. They had surrendered to the Government of the United States upon the condition that each company or regimental officer should sign a parole for his men, and each man was allowed to return home, not to be disturbed by United States authority so long as he observed his parole and the laws in force where he resided. These men were especially excepted from the amnesty proclaimed by the President May 29, 1865, under the tenth exception, and there appears to have been no other act of amnesty up to the time of this election which could include them; they were paroled prisoners of war. No reason occurs to the committee why these men should be allowed to vote which would not apply with equal force to them while actually in the field against the Government; the only difference which appears is that they had now been captured; their object, aim, and intent, whether in fighting or voting, was manifestly to destroy the Government. It seems absurd to say that it was a patriotic duty to kill them while they were in arms against the Government to prevent the destruction of the Government by them, and at the same time wholly illegal to refuse to allow them to accomplish the same result by their votes. The whole plan of reconstruction by Congress, as also the plan of reconstruction proposed in the proclamations of the President, has proceeded upon the assumption that those who had renounced their allegiance to the Government and fought against it have forfeited their right to vote.

In debate Mr. Upson [2] elaborated this argument further:

I say that when a rebel throws down the cartridge box he can not take up the ballot box and immediately assume either to come into this House, or to send an agent here to represent him, without the consent of the sovereign power of the nation. * * * No republican government can exist on any such basis. Gentlemen say there is no precedent. Well, of course, in the very nature of things there can be no precedent. There is no precedent for such a rebellion * * * It is necessary for us to distinctly lay down and assert the principles that all political rights do not necessarily revert to all men who engage in rebellion when peace is first restored as they were before the rebellion unless by permission of the sovereign power of the people. * * * It is by virtue of the reconstruction acts of Congress, not by any inherent right of their own, that they have the right to vote in the Southern States.

Kentucky, of course, had not been the subject of reconstruction legislation, never having seceded.

In their first report the majority of the committee had said:

But the committee finding that there is no law of Kentucky disfranchising rebel soldiers, have not been able to see how those votes can be rejected.

[1] House Report No. 59; 2 Bartlett, p. 458. Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, who had agreed to the first majority report, dissented from this (Globe, p. 3371).

[2] Globe, p. 3374.

The minority of the committee, Messrs. Kerr and Chanler, concurred, with this argument:

Each State has the exclusive right to determine who shall and who shall not be electors at her polls, The several States possessed that right before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. They never surrendered it nor delegated to Congress or any other department of the Government the power to alter or interfere with it in any way. The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 2, provides that "the electors for Representatives in Congress in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." The constitution of Kentucky, in force when this election was held, and still in force, prescribes that all white male citizens of the State, 21 years of age, who shall have resided in the State two years, or in the county, town, or city in which they offer to vote one year next preceding the election, shall be electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature of that State. (New constitution of Kentucky, Art, II, sec. 8.) It follows, therefore, that no vote cast for either Young or McKee can lawfully be rejected on account of the voter's participation in the rebellion, no matter to what extent that participation may have gone, and there is still less pretext for this claim of contestant's, because Congress has never assumed to declare who shall or shall not be voters in Kentucky, even granting that there are those who may be willing to go to the extent of admitting that they have that power. It is true that the legislature of Kentucky, by an act approved March 11, 1862, sought to deprive all who had participated in the rebellion of the right of suffrage, but this act was repealed by an act approved December 19, 1865, * * *.

So that long before the 4th of May, 1867, when this election was held, all who had in any way participated in the rebellion were restored to all their political rights and privileges, and had all the qualifications of an elector as fully as if they had never been in the rebellion at all. What difference, then, does it make in this case whether seven hundred or seven thousand of those who voted for Young had been in the rebel army? What difference whether eight or eight thousand of them had deserted from the Federal army? They were still, under the constitution and laws of Kentucky, qualified electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature, and had as much right to vote for a Member of Congress under the Constitution of the United States as either of the candidates themselves.

(b) The law of Kentucky of February 11, 1858, provided that the judges of elections should be so appointed as to represent the two political parties, and a further law enacted March 15, 1862, provided:

SECTION 1. That in construing the act approved February 11, 1858, to which this is an amendment, those who have engaged in the rebellion for the overthrow of the Government, or who have in any way aided, counseled, or advised the separation of Kentucky from the Federal Union by force of arms, or adhered to those engaged in the effort to separate her from the Federal Union by force of arms, shall not be deemed one of the political parties in this Commonwealth within the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment.

In their second report the majority found that in each of ten precincts one or more returned rebels had acted as officers of election, and that in such precincts a total majority of 883 had been returned for Mr. Young. The report contends that this majority should be rejected.

By the law of Kentucky none but electors can be judges or officers of election. The law of Kentucky also provides that those who have engaged in the rebellion for the overthrow of the Government, or who have in any way aided, counseled, or advised the separation of Kentucky from the Federal Union by force of arms, or adhered to those engaged in the effort to separate her from the Federal Union by force of arms, should not be selected as judges of election. * * * It has long been held that if the officers of election are not capable of holding the office, the election has no more validity than would an election where no officers whatever were appointed; it is otherwise where persons capable of holding the office are appointed, although they may not have complied with the forms of the law. (Easton v. Scott, First Contested Election Cases, p. 272; Delano v. Morgan, decided the present session.)

Both in the report and in the debate, a state of intimidation in the district was referred to as a fact which showed the necessity of impartial election officers selected according to the law.

The partisan leanings of the election officers were shown from the poll books. As to this, and as to the law providing for representation of two parties, neither of which should include those who had aided the rebellion, Mr. Upson, in his minority views, had said:

It is submitted that such statutes can not be considered as directory merely, but as imperative, and it is insisted also that the condition of this portion of Kentucky, at the time when this election was held, made the rigid enforcement of this law a matter of vital interest to the loyal Union men of that district.

It is stated by the minority of the committee in their report heretofore referred to (p. 16) that all these election officers must, by the laws of Kentucky, have been appointed in June or July, nearly a year preceding this election, and hence they argue that the vote of these officers cast at this election is no evidence of their political status at the time of their alleged appointment the year previous, and they quote from the reasoning of the chairman of the committee in the case of Blakey v. Golloday (Report No. 1, of this session, p. 3) in support of this position.

Unfortunately, however, for their argument, they overlooked the fact that this Congressional election was held by virtue of an act of the legislature of Kentucky, passed February 18, 1867, which provided that the officers of election to be appointed by the county courts in March or April of that year, for the election of constables and justices of the peace, should be the officers of election for the election of Members of Congress, on the same 4th day of May, 1867, so that the appointment was only made a month or two, at the furthest, prior to the election, and the vote of the election officer would be a pretty sure criterion of his political party status at the time of his appointment, especially as the Representative in Congress was the most important officer to be chosen at said election.

But the case of Blakey v. Golloday was expressly decided on other grounds, and no decision was made as to the political construction to be given to this law of Kentucky.

In their first report the majority of the committee had refrained from taking a position on this feature of the case because from the view they took as to other features a decision on this question would not affect the case.

The minority, composed of Messrs. Kerr and Chanler, held:

It is a sufficient answer to all this to say that there is no law in Kentucky disqualifying a man from acting as am officer of an election, sheriff of a county, or in any other office in the State, on account of his having been in the rebel army; and, besides, if there were, these were, to say the least of it, all officers de facto, duly appointed and acting regularly under color of authority. No complaint is made that either of them acted unfairly, or that either candidate was benefited or injured by their official action, and, therefore, according to the principle above stated, their acts are as valid, so far as the public and the parties to this contest are concerned, as if they had been officers dehjure.

(c) In making the 41 majority for contestant, the majority of the committee in their second report rejected the votes of eight deserters from the Federal Army, which were shown to have been cast for Young. Mr. Upson, in his minority views, which seem to have largely influenced the second report, had said:

The act of Congress of March 3, 1865, decitizenizes, by their own voluntary act, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States who shall not return to said service, or report themselves to a provost-marshal, within sixty days after the issuing of the President's proclamation under the provisions of said act, and makes them forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof, and the act of Congress of July 19, 1867, recognizes expressly this loss of citizenship in consequence of desertion.

The statutes of Kentucky also recognize the right of expatriation on the part of the citizen, and that naturalization can only be effected under the laws of the United States, so as to make the naturalized person a citizen of that State, and no person by her constitution can be a voter who is not a citizen. Citizenship of white persons in that State is derived by birth within that or some other State of the Union, or residence therein, or by naturalization under the laws of the United States and the like residence in said State. The few exceptional cases it is not necessary to notice. That deserters, by reason of this act of Congress, are not legal voters, has also been expressly held by the majority of the said committee in the recent case of Delano v. Morgan, from the Thirteenth Congressional district of Ohio. (Report No. 42 of this session, p. 3.)

In their first report the majority had said:

It is proven that eight deserters from the Federal Army voted for Mr. Young, but no law is found under which Kentucky excludes such a vote.

In the debate Mr. Poland pointed out[1] that in the case of Delano v. Morgan the law of Ohio required a voter to be a citizen of the United States, and it was for that reason that deserters who had lost their citizenship because of the law of Congress were rejected in Ohio. In Kentucky there was no State law like that of Ohio.

On June 20 and 22[2] the report was debated at length, and on the latter day the two resolutions reported by the majority were agreed to. On the second of the two, that declaring contestant elected, there were yeas 62, nays 43.

Mr. McKee then appeared and took the oath.

At the outset of this case a preliminary question had been settled as follows:

Before proceeding to state the grounds on which Mr. McKee bases his claim, the committee remark that the notice of contest is objected to by Mr. Young for the reason that the contestant does not "specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." It is unnecessary to say whether or no this objection would have been sustained if made in time; for no objection appears in the answer of Mr. Young to the sufficiency of the notice. None appears to have been made during the time of taking testimony, and none in the progress of the argument before the committee by Mr. Young or his counsel. The objection first appears in Mr. Young's printed brief, after both parties had been fully heard in the whole case. In the opinion of the committee the objection as to particularity of specifications comes too late to require further attention.

452. The Kentucky election case of Symes v. Trimble, in the Fortieth Congress.

It not being proved by clear and satisfactory testimony that Lawrence S. Trimble had given aid and comfort to rebellion, the House declined to exclude him.

In the Kentucky cases in 1868 a contest was presented and sustained against a person to whom the House had refused the oath on his prima facie showing.

The House sometimes authorizes a contestant to serve an amended or supplemental notice of contest after the expiration of the time fixed by law for the serving of the notice.

Contestants have sometimes served amended or supplemental notices of contest, trusting to the House to authorize the action later.

On July 11, 1867,[1] Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, reported the following:

Resolved, That G. G. Symes, contestant of the claim of L. S. Trimble, to a seat in this House as a Representative of the First district of Kentucky, be permitted to serve an amended or supplementary notice of contest within ten days after the passage of this resolution, and that L. S. Trimble be permitted to serve his answer thereto within thirty days after the service thereof.

Mr. Paine explained that when the House was not in session an amended notice was often served after expiration of the legal time, the contestant trusting to the House to authorize the action when it should meet and consider the case. But it happened that the House was in session at this time, and it seemed better to ask the authority at first. It was objected that as the time allowed by law for filing notice had expired this proceeding was unusual, but the resolution was agreed to, ayes 64, noes 26.

As appears in the case relating to the Kentucky Members generally,[2] Mr. Trimble had received an undoubted majority of the votes cast, and had presented credentials in regular form, but had not been permitted to take the oath because of charges that he was disqualified because of alleged disloyalty.

The Committee on Elections reported on January, 7, 1868,[3] Mr. Charles Upson, of Michigan, presenting the report:

By a resolution of this House, passed July 8, 1867, your committee, was, among other things, instructed to inquire and report whether the said Lawrence S. Trimble was "disqualified from sitting as a Member of this House on account of having been guilty of acts of disloyalty to the Government of the United States, or having given aid and comfort to its enemies;" and in pursuance of said resolution testimony was taken in this case, as well as other cases therein embraced, which evidence, on the 3d of December, 1867, was reported to this House.

The right of the said Trimble to his seat was also contested by G. G. Symes, who likewise claimed to have been elected thereto as the Representative from said district; and one of the points made by the contestant in his allegations was that the said Trimble was "guilty of overt acts of disloyalty and treason to the Government of the United States during the late rebellion, and gave aid and comfort to the rebels by supplying them with medicine, commissary, and quartermasters' stores, to enable them to prosecute the war, and yourself entered their lines and countenanced, aided, and abetted their rebellion." As the whole investigation and contest depends chiefly, if not wholly, on this charge of direct acts of disloyalty as disqualifying Mr. Trimble from sitting as a Member of this House, and as the evidence taken under the aforesaid resolution of the House, and under the notice of contest, relates chiefly to this charge, the committee thought proper to consider the evidence taken under the resolution and under the notice of contest together, and to embody its conclusions in one final report.

Adhering to the rule laid down by the committee in its report made to this House December 3, 1867, in the cases from Kentucky of Beck, Jones, Grover, and Knott (Report No. 2 of this session), which was subsequently approved by the House, the committee, having considered the whole testimony, does not find that it has been "proved by clear and satisfactory testimony" that the said Lawrence S. Trimble "has been guilty of such open acts of disloyalty that he can not honestly and truly take the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862," nor does it find the allegations of contestant sustained by the proof.

The committee found the charge that Mr. Trimble had been concerned in contraband trade with the enemies of the Government too vague and uncertain to be relied on. The report says:

It is also in evidence that subsequent to these alleged illegal transactions, in September, 1861, and after some charges had been made against Mr. Trimble in relation thereto, an investigation was had under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and he was exonerated therefrom, and thereupon he was appointed by the Treasury Department one of the Board of Trade at Paducah, and acted in that capacity, so far as appears, to the satisfaction of the Department.

From the evidence in regard to speeches made by Mr. Trimble, it appears that in 1861 he was the Union candidate for Congress against Burnett, and made Union speeches in that canvass throughout the district. After the emancipation proclamation of President Lincoln was issued, he, in common with many of the originally professed Union men of Kentucky, opposed Mr. Lincoln's Administration and the policy of the war, charging that it was waged as an abolition war, and asserting that he was opposed to voting any more men or money to aid in carrying it on; but it is evident from the whole testimony that his opposition was expressed in language similar to that made use of by the opponents of the Administration about that time on the floor of Congress, the propriety or tendency of which, under the circumstances, it is perhaps unnecessary to discuss here.

Kentucky having had many of her citizens engaged in the rebellion, and others strongly sympathizing with them who remained at home, and having since the surrender of the rebel armies permitted, by law, all returned rebels to vote who are in other respects qualified, it is evident that avowed sympathy with the rebellion does not at present detract from the popularity of a candidate for official position in that State, but rather conduces to his success, and this fact may have somewhat stimulated some candidates in their efforts and intensified their expressions before their constituents. In this case, however, Mr. Trimble having been the outspoken Union candidate for Congress in 1861 against secession, having by authority of the Treasury Department, in September of the same year, served as one of the Board of Trade at Paducah, and having also been elected and having served as a Representative from his district in the Thirty-ninth Congress, his seat uncontested and his loyalty unquestioned, your committee, taking into consideration all the testimony, finds no case made out under the charges against him disqualifying him from taking his seat or disproving his election as a Representative to this Congress from his district.

The committee recommends the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That G. G. Symes is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the First Congressional district in Kentucky.

Resolved, That the oath of office be now administered to Lawrence S. Trimble, and that he be admitted to a seat in this House as a Representative from the First Congressional district in Kentucky.

The resolutions were debated in the House on July 10[1] and were agreed to without division.

The oath was thereupon administered to Mr. Trimble.

453. A Senator-elect whose loyalty satisfactorily withstood inquiry, but who seemed unable truthfully to take the oath of July 2, 1862, was finally permitted to take the oath.

In 1866 a Senator having stated in his place that the loyalty of a Senator-elect was doubtful, the credentials were referred to a committee before the oath was taken.

In 1866[2] a question arose in the Senate as to the qualifications of David T. Patterson, a Senator-elect from Tennessee. Mr. Patterson's credentials were presented on July 26, 1866,[3] and after debate were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into Mr. Patterson's qualifications.

The motion to refer was made by Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, and in support of the motion he cited the case of Senator Stark. It was pointed out that in that case affidavits were presented charging disloyalty. In this case a Senator merely stated in his place that there was reason to suspect the loyalty of Mr. Patterson. The debate proceeded to a discussion of the propriety of refusing the oath to a person presenting prima facie evidence of his election, and a distinction was drawn between the Senate, which was a continuing body, and a body like the House, where it was necessary for purposes of organization to give credit to the credentials at the outset. The fact that the House had declined to give full effect to the credentials of the Tennessee Member and had referred them to the committee, in the meantime refusing to allow the bearer to qualify, was cited. The dangers of excluding persons bearing credentials in due form was dwelt on, but the motion of Mr. Sumner was agreed to—yeas 26, nays 14.

On July 27 [1] Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, presented the report of the committee:

The only question in relation to the qualifications of Mr. Patterson, or his right to hold his seat in the Senate, arises from the fact of his having held the office of circuit judge in the State of Tennessee after that State had passed an ordinance of secession and become a member of the Confederacy.

Circuit judges in Tennessee are elected by the people of the several circuits, and hold their offices for the term of eight years.

Judge Patterson was elected judge in one of the circuits in eastern Tennessee in May, 1854, and his term of office had not expired when the State passed the ordinance of secession. The constitution of the State of Tennessee remained the same after the secession of the State as before, and there was no change made in the form of the State government or in their judicial system. A large majority of the people of East Tennessee were ardently devoted to the Union and deemed it very important for their interest and that of the Union cause that the civil officers in that section of the state should be filled with Union men.

Judge Patterson was a firm, avowed, and influential Union man, and he was urgently pressed by the Union men of that circuit to run as a candidate for reelection as circuit judge, and he finally, though reluctantly, consented to do so. The opposing candidate was an avowed secessionist, and the issue in the election was between Union and secession. The election was held in May, 1862, and Judge Patterson was elected over his rebel competitor by a large majority. At the same election most of the local offices in that section were filled by the election of Union men. At that time it was believed by the Union men of East Tennessee that they would soon be relieved from rebel military rule by the arrival of Union forces; and they desired also to retain the civil power in their own hands. In this expectation they were disappointed, and soon rebel bands were scattered through that region, and the Union people were subjected to great hardships and cruel oppression. When Judge Patterson was thus reelected judge, he did not suppose he would be commissioned by the governor of the State, who was a secessionist; but, after some considerable delay, a commission was sent to him with peremptory orders to take the oath. On the receipt of his commission and order to take the oath, Judge Patterson delayed and hesitated, and consulted other leading Union men as to the proper course for him to take. They advised and urged him to take the oath; that he could thereby afford protection to some extent to Union men against acts of lawless violence on the part of the rebels, and that if he did not accept the office and take the oath the office would be filled by a rebel, and they would then be oppressed by the civil as well as the military power of the rebels. Judge Patterson yielded to their urgency and arguments, and went before a magistrate and took the oath which the Tennessee legislature had prescribed, which, in substance, was that he would support the constitution of Tennessee and the constitution of the Confederate States. Judge Patterson declared at the time to the magistrate that he owed no allegiance to the Confederate government, and that he did not consider that part of the oath as binding him at all. At this time there were rebel troops in the neighborhood, and Judge Patterson had good reason to believe that his refusal to take the oath would subject him to arrest and imprisonment, if not worse treatment; but we do not find that he was actuated at all by personal considerations, but acted solely upon the motive that he could thereby afford some aid and protection to the Union people and also prevent the office from falling into hands that would use it to oppress them.

[1] Senate Report No. 139.

East Tennessee at this time was in a very disturbed and distracted condition. The country was full of bands of armed rebels, and lawless violence held sway. Business was nearly suspended, and no civil business was done in the courts. Judge Patterson held a few terms of court in counties where he could organize grand juries of Union men, and in this way did something toward preserving peace and order in the community. No other business was done by him as judge after his election in 1862.

During all this time Judge Patterson was an open, avowed, and devoted adherent to the Union. He was in constant communication with the officers of the Federal troops nearest that vicinity, and obtained and furnished to them information as to the movements of the rebels. He aided in concealing Union men, and in facilitating their escape to the Union lines, when they generally entered the Union service. He aided the Union people and the Union cause in every way open to him, and too numerous for detail. By these means he became amenable to the hostility of the secessionists, and was subjected to great difficulty and danger. He was several times arrested and held for some time in custody. At times he was obliged to conceal himself for safety, and spent nights in outbuildings and in the woods to avoid their vengeance.

In September, 1863, the Federal troops reached Knoxville, and Judge Patterson succeeded in escaping with his family to that place, and did not return to his home until after the close of the rebellion.

As before stated, the constitution and election laws and judicial system of Tennessee remained the same after the secession of the State as before, and Judge Patterson was elected judge the last time under the same State constitution and laws as existed at his first election, and no laws were enforced by him as judge except such as were in force before the secession of the State.

The committee are all satisfied that during the entire rebellion Judge Patterson was an earnest, firm, and devoted Union man, and suffered severely in support of his principles. In accepting the office of judge, and taking the official oath, he did not intend any hostility to the authority or Government of the United States, nor did he intend to acknowledge any allegiance to, or any friendship for, the confederate government, but acted throughout with a sincere desire to benefit and preserve the Union and the Government of the United States. He always denied the authority of the confederate government over him, and feels an entire willingness and ability to take the oath required upon his admission to a seat in the Senate. The committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. David T. Patterson is duly qualified and entitled to hold a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

On July 27 [1] the resolution was debated and Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, objected that on the state of facts Mr. Patterson could not take the oath, since the oath would cause him to swear that he had never taken or exercised the functions of the office, while he undoubtedly had done both. It was suggested that Congress had already proposed a constitutional amendment providing for the removal of political disabilities, and while this amendment bad not been finally ratified, yet Congress might carry out its spirit by passing a joint resolution applying to his case. So a joint resolution was introduced in the Senate that Mr. Patterson be admitted upon his taking so much of the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, as is not included in the words, "that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise, the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States." This joint resolution passed the Senate, but was laid on the table in the House the same day.

There was considerable debate [2] as to the dilemma resulting from this situation, it being, maintained strenuously that Mr. Patterson could not and should not take the oath, but finally the Senate agreed to this resolution:

Resoved, That the Hon. David T. Patterson, upon taking the oaths required by the Constitution and laws, be admitted to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

On July 28 [3] Mr. Patterson took the oath.

454. By the fourteenth amendment one who, having previously taken an oath as an officer of Government to support the Constitution, has engaged in rebellion, is disqualified as a Member until the disability be removed.—Section 3 of Article XIV [1] of the Constitution provides:

SECTION 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and VicePresident, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a Member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.[2]

455. The Tennessee election case of Roderick R. Butler in the Fortieth Congress.

A Member-elect who was about to be sworn was challenged for disloyalty, whereupon the House denied him the oath and referred the credentials.

A Member-elect who had not been disloyal, but who could not truthfully take the oath of July 2, 1862, was not sworn until he had been relieved of his disabilities by law.

An objection to a Member-elect's qualifications being sustained neither by affidavit nor on the personal responsibility of the Member objecting, the House declined to entertain it.

A bill removing the disabilities of a Member-elect and modifying the test oath for his benefit was passed by a two-thirds vote.

For persons whose disabilities had been removed the oath of July 2, 1862, was modified by the act of July 11, 1868.

On November 21, 1867,[3] at a period after the organization of the House, the Members-elect from the State of Tennessee presented themselves with credentials in regular form.

Thereupon Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, objected to the administration of the oath to one of them, Mr. William B. Stokes, presenting a letter tending to show disloyalty on the part of Mr. Stokes. Mr. Eldridge at the same time presented a resolution that Mr. Stokes's credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections and that he be not sworn pending the investigation.

Mr. James Brooks, of New York, then challenged Messrs. Butler, Mullins, and Arnell, alleging disloyalty in their past records. He also challenged the whole delegation on the ground that a republican form of government did not exist in Tennessee. He thereupon moved to amend the pending resolution by adding resolutions that all the certificates of the gentlemen from Tennessee be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that Messrs. Butler, Mullins, and Arnell's credentials be referred previous to their being sworn.

After debate, which disclosed more serious evidence in the shape of a legislative journal of Tennessee against Mr. Butler than against the remaining Members, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, proposed the following substitute:

That the credentials of R. R. Butler, from the First district of Tennessee, be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that he be not sworn pending the investigation.

Mr. Brooks's amendment having been disagreed to, the substitute proposed by Mr. Dawes was agreed to, and then the resolution as amended was agreed to yeas 117, nays 28.

Thereupon Messrs. Eldridge and Brooks offered separate resolutions that the oath be not administered to Messrs. Stokes and Mullins until their cases had been investigated. Neither Mr. Eldridge nor Mr. Brooks presented affidavits or asserted on their responsibility as Members that the two persons in question had been disloyal, but left it to be inferred from a copy of a letter in the case of one and an extract from a speech in the case of another.

After debate, in the course of which it was recalled that affidavits were produced in the Kentucky cases, while in this case a Member did not even make the charges on his own responsibility, the House decided the resolutions in the negative.

Thereupon the oath was administered to all the Tennessee Members except Mr. Butler.

On February 25, 1868,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the case of Mr. Butler. This report states that the only objection raised against Mr. Butler, who had a large majority of the votes in the district, was disloyalty. It appeared that on December 14, 1861, as a member of the secession legislature of Tennessee, he had voted for resolutions pledging the State to the Southern confederacy. Mr. Butler admitted this, but claimed that nevertheless he then was a Union man and continued to be afterwards. There was also evidence tending to show that he remained in the legislature to be of service to Union men, and that his votes were understood not to express his views. There was no doubt that after returning from the legislature he served actively as a Union man. The committee conclude:

The evidence is very full on these points, and leaves no doubt on the mind of the committee of the sincere loyalty of Mr. Butler, and that the several acts and votes in the legislature laid to his charge as evidence of his disloyalty are capable of the explanation here given.

But the oath of office which the law requires Mr. Butler to take before he can be admitted to a seat as a Representative is in the following words:

"I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise, the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my I knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, House Report No. 18; 2 Bartlett, p. 461; Rowell's Digest, p. 224.

It will be observed that he is required to make oath that he has "neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise, the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the 'United States." In the opinion of the committee be can not truthfully so swear. Whatever may have been his motives, the fact still stares him in the face that he took and accepted the office which he will be compelled to swear that he has not taken and accepted. But, for the reasons heretofore given, the committee recommends that, by a joint resolution, so much of the oath as thus stands in the way of admission to a seat in this House of one truly loyal throughout the war may be omitted in administering the oath of office to Mr. Butler.

It accordingly recommends the passage of the accompanying joint resolution.

This joint resolution came up for debate on March 4, 1868.[1] It provided that Mr. Butler be admitted to his seat upon taking the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and upon taking all of the "test oath" excepting the words: "That I have neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise, the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States."

After this joint resolution was reported it appeared that Mr. Butler had before the war taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and therefore that his case came within the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. There was some question as to whether this amendment was yet in force. After debate[2] on March 5,[3] the House voted to recommit the joint resolution with instructions to the committee to report a bill for the relief of Mr. Butler, and also a general bill for such persons as might have their disabilities removed by a two-thirds vote in accordance with section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. On March 6[4] two bills were introduced in accordance with these instructions. They were debated at length[5] in both House and Senate, the question of Mr. Butler's loyalty and of the desirability of modifying the requirements of the test oath being especially considered. The bill relating to Mr. Butler passed both the House and Senate by two-thirds votes, and it was understood at the time that a two-thirds vote was necessary.[6]

The law as finally perfected in Mr. Butler's case provided:[7]

That all legal and political disabilities imposed by the United States upon Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, in consequence of participation in the recent rebellion, be, and the same are hereby, removed. And the said Butler, on entering upon the discharge of the duties of any office to which he has been or may be elected or appointed, instead of the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, shall take and subscribe the following oath. [Here followed an oath to support the Constitution.]

This act was approved June 19, 1868, and on June 26 Mr. Butler appeared and took the oath."[8]

The general law approved July 11, 1868,[1] provided the same oath for persons generally whose disabilities should be removed by a two-thirds vote of the two Houses.

456. The North Carolina election case of Boyden v. Shober in the Forty-first Congress.

A Member-elect, enrolled by the Clerk on his regular credentials, did not vote until his disqualifications had been removed and he had been permitted by the House to take the oath.

A State law requiring two ballot boxes to be kept at each polling place was construed by the House as directory only; and in the absence of fraud a neglect of the provision did not nullify the election.

On March 4, 1869,[2] at the organization of the House, the name of Mr. Francis E. Shober, of North Carolina, appears on the Clerk's list of Members-elect. On the yeas and nays on a motion to proceed to the election of Speaker his name appears among those not voting. On the vote for Speaker he did not vote. The Journal does not show affirmatively that he was not sworn in, but on a yea-and-nay vote taken on March 5, after the Members had been sworn in, his name does not appear at all, indicating that he had not been sworn in and that his name had been stricken from the roll of Members.

On April 12, 1870,[3] the President approved an act "to remove political disabilities from Francis E. Shober, of North Carolina." This act removed his disabilities and prescribed the form of oath to be taken by him on being sworn into any office.

On April 13, 1870,[4] Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Francis E. Shober be sworn as a Member of this House from the Sixth district of North Carolina and that upon taking the oath prescribed by the act passed at the present session of Congress for his relief he shall be entitled to a seat in this House without prejudice to the right of Nathaniel Boyden to contest the right thereto.

Mr. McCrary stated that Mr. Shober's credentials had been examined by the Committee on Elections and found regular.

On January 16, 1871,[5] Mr. McCrary submitted the report of the Committee on Elections in the contest of Boyden v. Shober. This report states that the sitting Member admitted his inability to take the test oath, and did not offer to qualify until after Congress had passed an act to relieve him from disability. Of course the passage of the relieving act disposed of the contestant's allegations of disability. After disposing of some considerations as to charges not sustained by the evidence, the report says:

We are left, therefore, to the consideration of the first ground of contest, viz, that the election was wholly void by reason of a failure to comply with the statutory provisions concerning the manner of conducting the election.

It is said that the law of North Carolina, rightly construed, required that two ballot boxes should have been kept at each poll, and that all ballots for Member of Congress should have been deposited in one, and all ballots for electors for President and Vice-President in the other.

There seems to be some doubt as to the true construction of the statute of North Carolina, but assuming that the construction contended for by contestant is correct, we are of opinion that the statute is directory only, and that the failure to provide two ballot boxes, and the deposit of all the ballots in one box, did not render the election void in the absence of fraud. If the ballots were freely cast, if they were honestly and fairly counted, and correctly returned, we should be unwilling to hold that a mere mistake of the election officers, as to whether the ballots should go into one box or two, should be allowed to defeat the will of the majority.

It is claimed that the certificate of election was not issued to contestee by competent authority; that, it should have been issued by the sheriffs of the several counties comprising the district and not by the governor. The law upon this subject is not cited in the record, and the point is not pressed. Indeed, it has been rendered immaterial by the action of the House in accepting the credentials of contestee and ordering him to be sworn into office thereon. We may remark, however, that the failure or refusal of the proper officer to issue a certificate of election would only render it necessary for the House to go back to the returns and poll books and ascertain, if possible, from these, or from any competent and sufficient evidence, who was actually elected, and award the seat accordingly.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the contestant has failed to sustain the points made by him in his notice of contest, with the exception of the fifth point, which was sustained by the proof but which was rendered immaterial by the act of Congress relieving contestee from his disability.

Your committee are of opinion that the contestant has prosecuted this contest in good faith and with reasonable cause, and that under the practice of the House in similar cases he is entitled to compensation for the expenses incurred by him.

We therefore recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolutions:

Resolved, That Nathaniel Boyden is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the Sixth district of North Carolina.

Resolved, That Francis E. Shober is entitled to retain his seat in this House as a Representative from said district.

On January 24, 1871,[1] the two resolutions were agreed to without debate or division.

457. In 1867 the Senate, having in view the test oath and the spirit of the fourteenth amendment, excluded Philip F. Thomas for disloyalty.

In 1867 the Senate, upon the statement by a Member that there were rumors affecting the loyalty of a Member-elect, referred the credentials before permitting the oath to be taken.

The right to add other qualifications to the three prescribed by the Constitution was discussed fully in the Senate in 1867.

Discussion of the question as to whether or not the test oath of July 2, 1862, actually prescribed a new qualification for the Member.

On March 18, 1867,[2] the credentials of Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland, were presented in the Senate. Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, objected that there were rumors affecting the loyalty of Mr. Thomas and moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In the debate attention was called to the fact that in the cases of Messrs. Stark and Patterson the allegations were more specific; but finally, on March 19, the credentials were referred without division.

On December 18 Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported:

That they have taken the evidence submitted herewith, and that they find nothing sufficient, in the opinion of the committee, to debar said Thomas from taking his seat, unless it be found in the fact of the son of said Thomas having entered the military service of the confederacy, and in the circumstances connected with that fact or relating to it, and without the expression of an opinion in regard to this point, they report the whole evidence to the Senate.

Mr. Johnson submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Hon. Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland, be admitted to his seat on his taking the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

458. On January 6, 1868,[1] the report was taken up, and the debate began as to whether or not the act of Mr. Thomas in assisting his son was an act giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the Government. The test oath was also discussed and its bearing on the question of qualifications, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, contending[2] that the Constitution did not definitely prescribe all the qualifications, but that there existed the authority to impose other qualifications, citing this passage:

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States.

A question was also raised as to whether or not the amendment to the Constitution specifying the disability on account of treason, and providing for its removal by a two-thirds vote of each House, had been ratified.

The report was debated at length on January 20–22, February 12–14, and 17–19.[3] Speaking on January 22, Mr. William Pitt Fessenden, of Maine, said[4] that it might at times be necessary for the Senate to protect itself by refusing admission, but, he continued:

We are exercising in any such case an extra-constitutional power. I think it exists as other powers which we have asserted during the war exist; but, as I said before, they can only be exercised in very extraordinary cases. As we stand now, it would be, in my judgment, dangerous in the extreme for Congress to assume the power of excluding a man who was sent here with the proper credentials on mere presumptions or mere suppositions or mere ideas of what the man is. The ordinary question presented to the Senate in such a case is with regard to his qualifications as prescribed by the Constitution itself; and it is only within a very recent period that it has become necessary to go further, as we have gone further and as we unquestionably had a right to do, and prescribe another qualification, if you choose so to call it; that is to say, prescribe a rule of admission by designating an oath to be taken which has reference to the qualifications, or rather to the disqualifications, of the individual. I voted for that. I think we had a right to pass it. * * * The question, however, as presented to us now, is beyond that. It is whether we shall assume the responsibility of refusing to permit this gentleman to take the oath. He professes himself willing to take it. We are called upon by many gentlemen who have spoken here to say that he shall not be permitted to do it, because it is one of those cases where we are called upon, outside of any constitutional provision and outside of any legal provision, to exclude this man on the doctrine of self-protection, for no other, I think, can be adduced to support the proposition.

* * * The power which we have under the Constitution to judge of the qualifications of Members of the body is not a mere arbitrary power to be exerted according to the will of the individuals who may vote upon the subject. It ought to be a power subject to certain rules and founded upon certain principles. So it was up to a very late period, until the rebellion. The rule simply was, if a man came here and presented proper credentials from his State, to allow him to take the ordinary oath which we all took, to support the Constitution, and be admitted, and if there was any objection to him to try that question afterwards.

Speaking on February 13, Mr. Charles Sumner said: [1]

I do not stop to argue the question, if that amendment is now a part of the Constitution; for I would not unnecessarily occupy your time, nor direct attention from the case which you are to decide. For the present I content myself with two remarks: First, the amendment ha's already been adopted by three-fourths of the States that took part in proposing it, and this is enough, for the spirit of the Constitution is thus satisfied; and, secondly, it has already been adopted by "the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States" which have legislatures, thus complying with the letter of the Constitution. Therefore by the spirit of the Constitution, and also by its letter, this amendment is now a part of the Constitution, binding on all of us. As such I invoke its application to this case. In face of this positive peremptory requirement it is impossible to see how loyalty can be other than a "qualification." In denying it you practically set aside this amendment.

But even without this amendment, I can not doubt that the original text is sufficiently clear and explicit. It is nowhere said in the Constitution that certain specified requirements and none others shall be "qualifications" of Senators. The word "qualifications," which plays such a part in this case, occurs in another connection, where it is provided that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." What these "qualifications" may be is to be found elsewhere. Searching the Constitution from beginning to end we find three "qualifications," which come under the head of form, being (1) age, (2) citizenship, and (3) inhabitancy in the State. But behind and above these is another "qualification," which is of substance, in contradiction to form only. So supreme is this that it is placed under the safeguard of an oath. This is loyalty. It is easy to see how infinitely more important is this than either of the others—than age, than citizenship, or than inhabitancy in the State. A Senator failing in either of these would be incompetent by the letter of the Constitution; but the Republic might not suffer from his presence. On the other hand, a Senator failing in loyalty is a public enemy, whose presence in this council Chamber would be a certain peril to the Republic.

It is vain to say that loyalty is not declared to be a "qualification." I deny it. Loyalty is made a "qualification" in the amendment to the Constitution; and then again in the original text, when in the most solemn way possible it is distinguished and guarded by an oath. Men are familiarly said to "qualify" when they take the oath of office, and thus the language of common life furnishes an authentic interpretation to the Constitution.

But no man can be allowed to take the oath as Senator when, on the evidence before the Senate, he is not competent. If it appear that he is not of sufficient age, or of the required citizenship or inhabitancy, he can not be allowed to go to that desk. Especially if it appear that he fails in the all-important "qualification" of loyalty, he cannot be allowed to go to that desk. A false oath, taken with our knowledge, would compromise the Senate. We who consent will become parties to the falsehood. We shall be parties in the offense. It is futile to say that the oath is one of purgation only, and that it is for him who takes it to determine on his conscience if he can take it. The Senate can not forget the evidence; nor can its responsibility in the case be swallowed up in any process of individual purgation. On the evidence we must act and judge accordingly. The "open sesame" of this Chamber must be something more than the oath of a suspected applicant.

According to Lord Coke, "an infidel can not be sworn" as a witness. This was an early rule which has since been softened in our courts. But under the Constitution of the United States and existing statutes a "political infidel can not be sworn" as a Senator. Whatever may be his inclination or motive he must not be allowed to approach your desk. The country has a right to expect that all who enter here shall have a sure and well-founded loyalty, above all question or "suspicion." And such I insist is the rule of the Constitution and of Congress.

[1] Globe, p. 1145.

As if to place the question beyond all doubt, Congress by positive enactment requires that every Senator, before admission to his seat, shall swear that he has "voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement, to persons engaged in armed hostility" to the United States. Here is little more than an interpretation of the Constitution. The conclusion is plain. No person who has voluntarily given even "countenance" or "encouragement" to another engaged in the rebellion can be allowed to take that oath.

Speaking on the same day, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, said,[1] after quoting the passage of the Constitution in relation to qualifications:

Senators will observe that there are negative statements. They are exclusive, every one of them. It is not declaring who shall be admitted into the Senate of the United States. It is declaring who shall not be eligible to election to this body; that is all. It is the same as to the House of Representatives and as to other officers, always in the negative, always exclusive, instead of in the affirmative and inclusive. And upon what principle was this Constitution founded? Will lawyers here deny that we have a right to look to the course of constitutional and parliamentary jurisprudence in that country from which we derive our origin and most of our laws to illustrate our own Constitution and to enlighten us in this investigation? By no means. And what was that? The House of Commons in Parliament, using the very language that in another section of the Constitution is used here, were the exclusive judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members. What was their constitutional power under that rule? It was that they were the sole and exclusive judges, not only of the citizenship and of the property qualification of persons who should be elected, but of everything that entered into the personnel of the man who presented himself at the doors of the House of Commons with a certificate of election for admission. And what were those rules? One was that an idiot could not be a representative in the Commons; another was that an insane man could not be, and a variety of other disqualifications, of which the Commons themselves alone were the sole and exclusive judges.

We declared in our Constitution that a certain class of persons should never, under any circumstances, whatever their other qualifications might be, be Senators of the United States; no alien should be a Senator. Did it therefore follow that every citizen, male or female, black or white, rich or poor, sane or insane, innocent or criminal, should be a Senator? Not by any means, I take it. We declared then that no person should be a Senator who was not a citizen, who had not a certain qualification of residence and of age, and there we stopped the rule of disqualification, leaving the common law exactly where it stood before. And that common law, in the very language of its immemorial time, was inserted in another section of the instrument, which declared that this body should be the judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. And that very word "qualifications," by the known history of jurisprudence, had the scope and signification that I have named; and that was, that it was the duty of the body to apply it to the candidate, to keep itself pure from association with criminals and incompetent persons.

Speaking on February 18,[2] Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, said:

The only qualifications required by the Constitution are that the party to be chosen shall be at least 30 years of age, etc. * * * Subject to these limitations, the legislature of the State has the unrestricted right of choice. No department of this Government of the United States has any jurisdiction over it. The Constitution, whether we regard its terms or its evident scope, as manifested by its nature, creates a government of delegated powers, and that government has consequently no authority to interfere. * * *

Mr. Johnson went on to substantiate this argument by reference to the clause relating to expulsion. He also expressed the opinion that Congress had no authority to pass the test oath.

In the course of the debate Mr. Sumner had proposed this as a substitute:

That Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland, can not be admitted to take the oath of office required by the Constitution and laws, inasmuch as he allowed his minor son to leave the paternal house to serve as a rebel soldier, and gave him at the time $100 in money, all of which was "aid,"

[1] Globe, p. 1149.

[2] Globe, p. 1237.

"countenance," or "encouragement" to the rebellion, which he was forbidden to give; and further, inasmuch as in forbearing to disclose and make known the treason of his son to the President, or other proper authorities, according to the requirement of the statute in such cases, he was guilty of misprision of treason as defined by existing law.

Mr. Sumner withdrew this, however, it being urged that Mr. Thomas's conduct as a Cabinet officer in 1860 afforded more certain grounds for action.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, proposed the following substitute:

That, in the judgment of the Senate, Philip F. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland, can not with truth take the oath prescribed by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and that therefore he be not allowed to take said oath, but withdrew it, after commenting on the variance of opinion as to whether the test oath actually prescribed a new qualification or not.[1]

The question being then taken on the resolution originally proposed by Mr. Johnson, it was disagreed to—yeas 21, nays 28.[2]

Then, by a vote of yeas 27, nays 20, the Senate agreed to the following, offered by Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri:

Resolved, That Philip F. Thomas, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland, or to hold a seat in this body as such Senator; and that the President pro tempore of the Senate inform the governor of the State of Maryland of the action of the Senate in the premises.

459. The Georgia case of Wimpy and Christy in the Fortieth Congress.

In 1868 the House denied the oath to two persons who appeared with conflicting credentials which cast doubt on the right of either to the seat.

A question as to whether a State law may give to the minority candidate the seat for which the majority candidate is disqualified.

On December 7, 1868,[3] the Speaker laid before the House credentials from the governor of Georgia, certifying John A. Wimpy as entitled to a seat in the House. These credentials showed that John H. Christy had received the highest number of votes in the Sixth district, but, it appearing to the satisfaction of the governor that said Christy was ineligible under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the said Wimpy having received the next highest number of votes, the governor had commissioned Wimpy, relying on a law of Georgia providing that when the person receiving the highest number of votes for any office should be ineligible the person receiving the next highest number, and being eligible, should be commissioned.

At the same time Mr. James A. Brooks, of New York, presented credentials signed by Major-General Meade, commander of the military district including Georgia,[4] certifying the election of Mr. Christy. Mr. Brooks stated that this certificate was similar to that on which other Members from Georgia had been seated. Mr. Brooks charged that Mr. Wimpy had been a Confederate soldier.

Both certificates were referred to the Committee on Elections, and neither claimant was sworn in.

On January 15[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report. They found that the commission of Mr. Christy was signed by General Meade, under whose order the election had been held. That of Mr. Wimpy was signed by Governor Bullock, who was at the same election chosen governor and assumed the duties of the office on relinquishment of command by General Meade.

The committee found that Mr. Christy, by his own admission, had given "aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the Govermment," and in accordance with the precedent in the case of John Y. Brown was not qualified to hold a seat as Representative from the State of Georgia. This appeared independently of any question as to ineligibility under the fourteenth amendment.

Examining the case of Mr. Wimpy, the committee conclude:

> The committee was of opinion that at the time of this election Mr. Wimpy, like Mr. Christy, could not take the oath of office because he had "voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States." If, therefore, the provision in the statute of Georgia included Members of Congress and also this cause of ineligibility, still Mr. Wimpy could not avail himself of it because of his own ineligibility at the time of the election. Nor would a subsequent removal of disabilities by act of Congress give Mr. Wimpy the benefit of this act, because the act refers to the eligibility at the time of the election; and if such an act could bring Mr. Wimpy within its provisions, such an act could likewise take Mr. Christy out of its provisions, and upon its passage he would, with a majority of the votes, be instantly entitled to the seat.
> This conclusion, arrived at unanimously by the committee, renders it unnecessary to determine other questions raised in this case which would otherwise render it at least very doubtful whether under any circumstances, Mr. Wimpy, with a majority of 100 votes against him, could, by force of the law of Georgia already cited, become entitled to the seat. The committee therefore does not find it necessary to express an opinion whether the statute was intended to affect other than State officers, or could, if intended, include Representatives in Congress, or whether aiding the late rebellion was one of the causes of ineligibility embraced in the "foregoing rules" specified in the one hundred and twenty-sixth section of the act, which was itself enacted long before the rebellion broke out; but, for the reasons already specified, reports adversely on the claim of Mr. Wimpy to the seat. It therefore recommends the adoption of the accompanying resolutions:
> Resolved, That J. H. Christy, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the Sixth Congressional district of Georgia or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.
> Resolved, That John A. Wimpy, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the Sixth Congressional district of Georgia, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.
> Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the question of removing political disabilities from John H. Christy, and that the same be referred to the tommittee on Reconstruction.

On January 28,[2] the report was debated in the House, rather in reference to its relation to the question of reconstruction than on the merits of the respective claimants, and on that day was postponed until the third Tuesday of February. It was not taken up on that day, or again. So neither claimant was admitted.

460. The Kentucky election case of Zeigler v. Rice in the Forty-first Congress.

In 1869 John M. Rice, challenged on account of alleged disloyalty, was permitted by the House to take the oath pending examination of the charges.

In 1869 the Elections Committee proposed to exclude for disloyalty one who had already been sworn in; and although the committee were reversed on the facts, the propriety of the proceeding was not questioned.

In a case somewhat inconclusive it was held that notice of disqualification given seasonably to the electors did not modify the rule against seating a minority candidate.

On March 4, 1869,[1] at the organization of the House, the name of Mr. John M. Rice, of Kentucky, was on the roll presented by the Clerk. When the Members-elect were taking the oath objection on ground of disloyalty was made to Mr. Rice, and he stood aside. On the next day the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That Boyd Winchester and John M. Rice, Representatives-elect from the State of Kentucky, be now sworn in, and the papers filed against their admission be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, with directions to report as soon as practicable.

Accordingly Messrs. Winchester and Rice were sworn in and took their seats.

On June 30, 1870,[2] Mr. R. R. Butler, of Tennessee, from the Committee an Elections, submitted the report of the committee on the case of Zeigler v. Rice. The contestant alleged that sitting Member was ineligible under section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

A question of law and a question of fact were involved:

(a) The question of law arose from the following specification in contestant's notice of contest:

That notice of this disqualification on your part was given publicly to the voters of the district prior to the said election held on the 3d day of November, 1868, and during the time you stood as a candidate before the people; that this disqualification existed at that time; and that by reason thereof all votes cast for you were and are illegal and void; wherefore I was duly elected by the legal vote of said district on said 3d day of November last, and am lawfully entitled to and claim the seat in the Forty-first Congress of the United States as Representative for said Ninth district of Kentucky.

The majority in their report say they are convinced that sitting Member is ineligible, "but do not agree with contestant that as contestee was ineligible the candidate who was eligible is entitled to the seat."

The views of the minority, presented by Mr. Albert G. Burr, of Illinois, say:

The undersigned concurs with the majority of the committee in the opinion that in no possible aspect of this case can it be pretended that the contestant Zeigler is entitled to the seat as the Representative of the Ninth Congressional district of Kentucky. There is no dispute on that point. The contestant himself does not claim that he received a majority of the votes cast, and no just man can dissent from the conclusion of the committee that he has no shadow of title whatever to the seat.

[2] Second session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 107; 2 Bartlett, p. 871.

(b) The question of the qualification of Mr. Rice was a question of fact. The majority of the committee, from the testimony presented, concluded that he had been disloyal and had given aid and comfort to the enemy. Therefore they proposed the following:

Resolved, That the Hon. John M. Rice is disqualified by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States from holding a seat in Congress, and that the seat now occupied by him as a Representative from the Ninth district of Kentucky, in the Forty-first Congress, is hereby declared vacant, and that the Speaker of the House of Representatives notify the governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky that such vacancy exists.

The minority construed the evidence as entirely failing to show Mr. Rice disqualified, and recommended the following:

Resolved, That Hon. John M. Rice is justly entitled to his seat as Representative in the Forty-first Congress from the Ninth district of the State of Kentucky.

The report was debated on July 11,[1] the debate being confined entirely to the question of fact, and the proposition to exclude a Member who had already taken the oath and his seat was not discussed. As to the question of fact, Members who bad known sitting Member at the time of the alleged disloyalty raised a question as to the conclusions which the majority had drawn from the testimony.

Finally the question recurred on the substitute proposed by the minority, and it was agreed to without division. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to.

So the report of the majority of the committee was overruled, and Mr. Rice retained the seat.

461. The Virginia election case of Tucker v. Booker, in the Forty-first Congress.

In 1870 no one of the Members-elect from Virginia was seated until the credentials were reported on by a committee and the House had acted.

A Member-elect whose loyalty was impeached was permitted to take the oath; and after that the House was reluctant to take action in his case.

A question as to whether or not a Member who is disqualified, but has been permitted to take the oath, may be excluded by majority vote.

A question relating to a Member's right to his seat being laid on the table, the Member continues in his functions.

At the beginning of the second session of the Forty-first Congress the credentials of all the Members-elect from the State of Virginia were referred to the Committee on Elections, and the claimants were not sworn in until the committee reported. Against Mr. George W. Booker charges of disloyalty were made, but the committee on February 1, 1870[2] reported a recommendation that the oath be administered to him in accordance with the precedent made by the House in the case of Mr. McKenzie. There was much discussion over this motion. The committee had not examined the question of loyalty, and strong allegations of disloyalty were made against Mr. Booker. Finally, by a vote of yeas 89, nays 72, it was determined that the oath should be administered, and Mr. Booker was accordingly sworn in.

On March 22, 1870,[1] Mr. George M. Brooks, of Massachusetts, from the Special Committee of Elections, presented the report in the case of Tucker v. Booker. The returns showed Mr. Booker elected by a plurality of 3,533 over contestant. The grounds of contest related entirely to the loyalty of sitting Member, it being charged that he was disqualified because of section 3 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and also that he was unable to take the oath of July 2, 1862.

The committee found from the testimony of one witness that Mr. Booker had admitted that he voted for the Virginia ordinance of secession.

The remaining testimony was of a documentary character, setting forth facts such as are included in this portion of the report:

From the evidence it appears that on July 14, 1856, said Booker, having been elected a justice of the peace for the county of Henry and State of Virginia for the term of four years from the 1st day of August then next, took the oaths of office prescribed by law, and the oath to support the Constitution of the United States; that acting under this commission, he performed the duties of justice of the peace, and on July 9, 1860, having been again elected a justice of the peace for the term of four years from the 1st day of August then next, he took the several oaths required by law, and on the 10th day of September, 1860, he was elected presiding justice of the court, and that he continued to exercise the duties of such magistrate during the rebellion.

The particular acts of disloyalty that are relied upon by the contestant, and which appear to be proved and are not denied by the the contestee, are as follows: That at a county court held for Henry County, at the court-house, on May 13, 1861, said Booker met with other justices and voted to accept the provisions of an act of the general assembly passed January 19, 1861, authorizing the county courts to arm the militia of their respective counties, and to provide means therefor, pursuant to a resolution of the convention of Virginia "recommending the county courts to levy or raise, by issuing bonds, a sufficient amount of money to equip and arm such volunteers as may be raised within the limits of their respective counties" it was also at said court "ordered that ten thousand dollars be raised by levy on all the lands and all other subjects liable to tax and levies in said county."

That at a county court held July 8,1861, said Booker being present as presiding justice, William Martin was appointed by said court as an agent on the part of Henry County, "to visit the volunteer companies in the service and report to the next court the wants and general condition of said companies, with a view to making provision by the court for the relief of their necessities." At a court held September 9, 1861, Samuel H. Haviston was appointed an agent for the county to purchase full winter equipments for the four volunteer companies in the service.

At a court held October 15, 1861, said Booker was appointed an agent for the county "to repair to the encampments of the several companies from said county and ascertain the wants of each member in clothing, and report thereof to the next court." And at a court held November 12, 1861, said Booker made a report in writing, which is annexed hereto and marked "A"

The sitting Member did not deny the facts presented against him, but claimed that he was from the outset opposed to secession; that he was always a Union man, and that he held the offices he did in order to protect other Union men and save himself from conscription. The testimony of other witnesses convinced the committee of this, and they say:

Although technically said Booker may have seemed to have "given aid and comfort to the enemies 11 of the United States by performing the duties of his office, yet the committee is convinced that he was during the whole rebellion, and to the present time has been, a sincere Union man, and that the acts by him performed to which objection is taken are in contravention of the letter but not the spirit of the third article of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The committee therefore holds that said Booker is not ineligible under the same.

The committee is, however, of the opinion that if no action had been taken by the House upon the claim of said Booker for a seat, it would have reported that having accepted and exercised the functions of an office under the Confederate government, he could not take so much of the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, as declares that he has "neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States," without being relieved from the disabilities imposed by said act, and that it should have recommended that so much of said oath above recited should be omitted in administering the oath of office to said Booker.

But the House, on the Ist day of February last, upon representation being made that said Booker was loyal, voted that he was entitled to his seat, and he took the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, and is now a sitting Member of this House. The committee is of the opinion that this vote was an indication of the sense of the House that the fact of his loyalty was the question to be settled, and this being determined in his favor, he was entitled to his seat. The committee also believes that said Booker, conscious of his loyalty, did not consider that he was debarred from taking said oath, holding the office under the circumstances and for the purposes he did so hold it; that he did not deem it was the spirit, intent, or meaning of the same to apply to one who was truly loyal and a Union man through the rebellion, and has been so to the present time.

The committee therefore, believing said Booker to have taken said oath honestly, considering that he was right in so doing, and being desirous of carrying out the will of a large plurality of the voters in his district, and the declared wish of the House as expressed by their vote of February 1, hereby recommends the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Ron. George W. Booker is entitled to retain his seat as a Member of this Congress from the Fourth district of the State of Virginia.

The report was offered in the House on March 22,[1] and thereupon Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, proposed a preamble reciting the facts as to sitting Member's acts, and a resolution "That George W. Booker is disqualified from holding a seat as a Member of this House."

On July 5[2] the report was debated in the House. Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, raised a question as to how Mr. Booker could be excluded, since he had already been admitted to a seat and taken the oath. Mr. Dawes did not see how he could be removed except by expulsion. Mr. Poland seemed to regard the taking of the oath under the circumstances as temporary, and intimated that a majority vote, in his opinion, might exclude the sitting Member.

The remainder of the debate referred largely to the record of Mr. Booker and the question of duress as an excuse for his acts.

Finally Mr. Dawes moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

A question being raised as to the effect of such a motion, if carried, the Speaker pro tempore said:

It is hardly a parliamentary question for the Chair to decide. The Chair is under the impression, however, that it would leave the case just where it was before it was referred to the Committee on Elections.

The motion to lay on the table was then agreed to—ayes 99, noes 24.

On July 6[3] Mr. Booker is recorded as voting, and thereafter to the end of the session.

462. The Virginia election case of Whittlesey v. McKenzie in the Forty-first Congress.

In 1870 the House voted to administer the oath to a Member-elect on his correct prima facie showing, although a question as to his qualifications was pending before the Elections Committee.

In 1870, after a Member-elect had been permitted to take the oath, the House took up and decided a contest based on his alleged disloyalty, deciding that the evidence did not show his disqualification.

An instance wherein the House decided on its own initiative an election case pending before the Committee on Elections.

At the opening of the second session of the Forty-first Congress the credentials of all the claimants to seats from Virginia were referred to the Committee on Elections for examination, pending the administration of the oath. On January 31, 1870,[1] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, not a member of the Elections Committee, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Hon. Lewis McKenzie be now sworn in as a Member of this House from the Seventh district of Virginia, he having the prima facie right thereto; but without prejudice to the claim of Charles Whittlesey, contestant to such seat, or to his right to prosecute his claim thereto.

Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Elections, stated that Mr. McKenzie's credentials were in the same form as those of the other Virginia claimants, who had already been allowed to take the oath. But there was a resolution of the House providing that whenever either contestant should allege that the other claimant was unable to take the oath, the Committee on Elections should inquire into the charge and report before the oath should be administered. The charge had been made in this case, and an investigation had been made. The testimony was now in the hands of the printer, and until it was printed and examined the committee could not arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not Mr. McKenzie was entitled to take the oath. Mr. Paine admitted, however, that the House, having all control over the subject, might permit Mr. McKenzie to take the oath, although the order of the House precluded the Committee on Elections from recommending it at this stage.

After debate as to Mr. McKenzie's loyalty, the resolution was agreed to without division.

Mr. McKenzie was accordingly sworn in.

On May 24, 1870,[2] Mr. John C. Churchill, of New York, from the Subcommittee on Elections, submitted a report in the case of Whittlesey v. McKenzie. Contestant raised no question as to the validity of the election or the correctness of the count, but claimed that sitting Member was guilty of acts in the early part of the year 1861 which made him ineligible under the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution, and also made it impossible that he should truthfully take the oath of July 2, 1862.

The contestant gave facts in support of his contention:

1. On the 21st day of January, 1861, the house of delegates of Virginia, of which the sitting Member was then a member, adopted, by a unanimous vote, 108 delegates voting, the following resolution:

"Resolved by the general assembly of Virginia, That if all efforts to reconcile the unhappy difference existing between the two sections of the country shall prove to be abortive, that, in the opinion of the general assembly, every consideration of honor and interest demand that Virginia shall unite her destiny with the slaveholding States of the South."

The sitting Member, Mr. McKenzie, was present and voted for this resolution.

2. On the 14th day of March, 1861, the senate of Virginia passed, with an amendment, and returned to the house of delegates for their concurrence, "An act to authorize the issue of treasury notes." A motion was made to lay the bill and amendment on the table. For this motion the sitting Member voted, and in support of it made a speech, of which the following is a report which appeared in the Daily Richmond Whig of March 15, 1861, and the substantial correctness of which is not disputed:

"During the debate, Mr. McKenzie said the House had been in session sixty-six days, and, until a few days ago, he had supposed the bill had become the law of the land. He had voted for this bill the time he did because he had believed it was important to the public safety. We had just voted that, so far as Virginia was concerned, we would not permit the coercion on the part of the Federal Government of any of the Southern States. Having come to this conclusion, he, for one, was ready to vote means to arm the State, if need be.

"Does anybody presume that 170,000 voters of Virginia, a commonwealth extending from the Potomac to the Ohio River, a better armed State than any five States in the Union, are acting from any fear of the North? Virginia is not afraid. When the convention comes to a decision, and whatever they do, and it is ratified by the people, she will take her position, and, if necessary, fight. I think the opportunity ought to be given to amend, if necessary; and I shall, therefore, vote to lay it on the table."

The motion to lay on the table was defeated by a large majority, and the amendment of the Senate was then concurred in and the bill passed by a unanimous vote. The sitting Member voting in the affirmative.

3. On the 2d of May, 1861, the sitting Member, being then a member of the common council of the city of Alexandria, voted in favor of an appropriation of $200 each to the Emmet Guards and to the Irish volunteers, to aid in equipping these companies, which soon after entered the Confederate service.

4. On April 30 and May 6, 1861, a quantity of oats belonging to sitting Member were taken by the military authorities of Virginia and were charged to the State.

The committee, examining these charges at length, found that the only government to which Mr. McKenzie yielded support at the times in question was that of the State of Virginia, but that Virginia did not ratify the ordinance of secession until May 23, 1861. Since then Mr. McKenzie had been an outspoken Union man. It could not be pretended that he had yielded support to any government hostile to the United States.

Therefore the only question was as to whether or not he had given "aid or comfort" to the enemies of the United States. The committee found from an examination of the testimony and facts, in relation to all the circumstances, that the charges of the contestant were not sustained. They also found:

A good deal of evidence in this case was taken to show that the sitting Member before, during, and after the occurrence of the acts charged as making him ineligible was known and accepted generally by all, both the loyal and the disloyal people of his acquaintance in Alexandria and vicinity, as a friend of the Union cause. It is well argued by the contestant that this can not be received as a defense for two reasons: First, that the sitting Member has served no answer in this case, as required by the laws, and therefore can not set up in the evidence any matter by way of defense to the charges of the contestant except such as may tend to negative the charges; and, second, that if the acts make him ineligible, neither prior, subsequent, nor contemporaneous loyalty could make him eligible or do more than furnish a ground for him to ask to be relieved from his disabilities. But this evidence, though not receivable as a defense, is properly to be received, as enabling us the better to understand the acts themselves and to determine their true character.

Therefore:

We conclude that nothing shown in the evidence in this case makes the sitting Member ineligible under the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States or debars him from taking the oath prescribed by law, and this makes it unnecessary for us to consider the question very ably presented by the contestant in his argument as to the effect of such ineligibility, if shown, upon votes cast for the sitting Member; and we conclude with recommending to the House the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Charles Whittlesey is not entitled to a seat as a Member of the Forty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of Virginia.

Resolved, That Lewis McKenzie is entitled to a seat as a Member of the Forty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of Virginia.

On June 17 [1] the resolutions were agreed to by the House without debate or division.

463. The Senate election case of Joseph C. Abbott in the Forty-eighth Congress.

A Senator-elect being disqualified, the Senate, after elaborate examination, decided that the person receiving the next highest number of votes was not entitled to the seat.

On March 7, 1871,[2] a memorial was presented in the Senate from Joseph C. Abbott, who claimed to have been legally elected a Senator from North Carolina. This memorial was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and on February 28, 1872, Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, submitted from that committee the following report: [3]

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph C. Abbott, claiming to be entitled to a seat in this body as a Senator from North Carolina, for the term commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1871, respectfully submit the following report:

Article I, section 5, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

The duty which devolves upon the Senate in deciding cases that arise under this clause of the Constitution is in the nature of a judicial proceeding, and the cases must be decided upon the evidence presented and in accordance with legal principles as established by former parliamentary and judicial precedents and decisions.

Examining the facts, the committee found as to the election by the legislature:

That the number of members present at the time and so voting constituted a quorum of each house of the legislature, the constitution of North Carolina providing that "neither house shall proceed upon public business unless a majority of all the members are actually present," the numbers so present amounting to a majority of all the members.

On the following day the two houses, in the usual form, declared that Vance had received a majority of the votes cast in both houses and that he was duly elected as such Senator for said term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871.

It is also further in evidence that said Vance was not on said second Tuesday of November, 1870, and at no time since has been, qualified to serve as such Senator, owing to disability imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution.

It is averred that the members of the legislature of North Carolina so voting for Vance, at the time their votes were cast, had notice of the ineligibility of Vance, but no evidence on this point has been presented to the committee, the memorialist relying upon the assumption that this was a matter of public notoriety.

It appears, therefore, that Abbott rests his claim to the seat solely upon what he assumes to be the legal result of the conceded ineligibility of Vance, who, although receiving a majority of the votes, is not entitled to take the oath of office or hold the seat. He assumes that it is a conclusion of law that if the candidate who has received the highest number of votes is ineligible and that ineligibility was known to those who voted for him before casting their votes, that the votes so cast for him are void, and should be considered as nullities and as though they never had been cast; and consequently the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes is elected.

In support of this view of the case the memorialist has called the attention of the committee to a large number of English authorities bearing on this question. While the committee make no question as to the general tenor of the decisions to which attention has been called, yet it is evident that these are based upon a very different rule from that adopted in our country. To show that this rule is different, the committee would refer to the following authorities, which are cited in the very able report of Mr. Dawes from the Committee on Elections, in the case of Smith v. J. Y. Brown (Report of Committees, No. 11 second session Fortieth Congress.) * * *

After citing the authorities in favor of seating a minority candidate, when an election had been made after due notice of disabilities, the report continues:

But is such a principle applicable in a government based upon the theory that the power emanates from the people? In the British Government the case is exactly the reverse, as there the theory is that the power originates with the monarch, and the privileges allowed the people to select representatives are, under that theory, considered as conceded and not as inherent rights. But this Government rests upon an entirely different basis. Here the power originates with the people, and that which the Government is authorized to exercise is conceded by the people. The right to designate who shall exercise this power has never been delegated. The method by which this choice shall be made known consistent with this theory can never be otherwise than by giving the majority or plurality the right to decide. Any attempt to restrict the right of the voter is an attempt to invade that right; therefore the theory that casting a vote knowingly for an ineligible candidate is in the nature of a crime which may be punished by ignoring the act of the majority and recognizing the act of the minority is in direct conflict with that most sacred right which the people of this Government have always guarded with jealous care. Such a rule is consistent with the theory of the British Government, as it affords one means of preventing the power from passing into the hands of the people; but it is directly at variance with the theory of our Government, as it affords one means by which that right which the people have of selecting their representatives may be abridged.

While, therefore, the general tenor of the English authorities to which he refers us is admitted to be as claimed by the memorialist, yet we do not conceive such a rule to be applicable to and consistent with the political institutions of the United States, where the right of the majority to govern and the Government is based upon the consent of the governed is one of the first political lessons to be learned.

There is also another very strong reason why the English authorities relied upon by the memorialist are not applicable in the present case, even if the spirit and fundamental idea of our institutions were insufficient to show this.

The third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which imposes the disabilities in question, also contemplates and provides for the removal thereof by Congress. There is no such feature in the English law. The English cases are, therefore, based upon a very different state of facts from those that exist in this country, and are not precedents for this case.

It is difficult to conceive how the Constitution could grant authority to Congress to remove the disabilities under which an individual who has been elected is laboring, and allow him to take his seat as a Member, and yet at the same time embrace the idea that such an election is wholly void and the votes cast for him nullities. Yet Congress by its action in numerous instances has given the first construction to this clause of the Constitution, and if the memorialist in this case shall be admitted to his seat the Senate will have to give the second construction.

After citing at length the judicial decisions and legislative cases against the English theory, the report continues:

But suppose that it is admitted that the English rule is applicable here, do the facts in this case bring it within that rule? Were the votes for Vance cast in willful obstinacy for a candidate the voters knew, or had good reason to believe, would not be entitled to take his seat? The memorialist avers that the fact that Vance was known to be ineligible is not controverted. That his ineligibility was a matter of public notoriety in North Carolina is doubtless true, and that it was known to most if not all of the members of the legislature is quite probable; yet no evidence has been presented to the committee proving this fact, or that notice of his disqualification was given at the time the vote was taken.

Let us even go one step further, and suppose that the evidence on this point was clear and explicit; are we not justified in believing that those who voted for Vance did so in good faith, believing that his disabilities would be removed after the election by the action of Congress, basing this presumption on the precedents which had recently been set in similar cases? Nor is this by any means an improbable hypothesis, but accords much better with the facts presented to the committee than the hypothesis that the votes given for Vance were cast in "willful obstinacy" for a candidate they knew would not be admitted to his seat. If they were given under the impression that these disabilities would be removed, then, although unavailing, they can not be rejected from the count. And the committee would again refer to the report of the committee in the case of Yulee v. Mallory, of Florida, 1852.

* * * * * * *

Under the English rule it is the fact that the voters knowingly and purposely throw away their votes that lays the foundation for saying they assent to the election of the minority man. But no such purpose can be predicated of the legislature of North Carolina. They did not know that their votes for Vance would be thrown away. They did not purposely throw them away, because Congress had in numerous cases previously removed disabilities of a similar character from those elected and allowed them to hold their offices. Nearly all of the officers elected in this State in 1868 had their disabilities removed by the act of June, 1868, and were allowed by virtue thereof to enter upon and discharge the functions of their respective offices.

The same act removed the disabilities of a large number of persons elected in Alabama in February, 1868, and at the close of the section contains this sweeping clause:

"And also all officers-elect at the election commenced the 4th day of February, 1868, in said State of Alabama, and who have not publicly declined to accept the offices to which they were elected." (15 Stat. L., 366, 2.)

These were certainly sufficient to raise in the minds of the members of the legislature of North Carolina who voted for Vance the belief that his disabilities would be removed and that he would be allowed to take his seat. In fact, they had good right to believe that this was the rule, and the opposite the exception, especially where the persons so elected were known to favor the restoration of order and obedience to law.

Again, it may be fairly argued that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution did not disqualify Vance to be elected, but only to hold the office of Senator in case his disability should not be removed. Upon this interpretation his election was voidable only, and not void, and, as a consequence, Abbott was not elected. But even if this interpretation is erroneous, it is one the legislature of North Carolina might (and as nothing to the contrary is shown, we are to presume did) honestly entertain (especially in view of the action of Congress above referred to), and if they elected Vance under a mistake in law, his election was not void, but only voidable.

Although the committee have referred to the decisions of the courts and legislative bodies of this country bearing upon this case, the tenor of which is believed to be decidedly adverse to the claim of the memorialist, yet this appears unnecessary, as a careful examination of the act of Congress of July 25, 1866 (which has already been alluded to on one point), when applied to the facts in this case, would seem to be an effectual bar to the claim of the memorialist.

The report then cites this act, which in terms requires the election of a Senator by majority vote, and concludes:

It is, moreover, evident from the very wording of this act that Congress did not even contemplate the possibility of an election by a minority under any circumstances, but by this act imply the opposite.

As to another question the report holds:

It has been suggested that there is a distinction in respect to the operation of the rule insisted on by the memorialist between a popular election, under our liberal system of suffrage, for a Member to the House of Representatives by ballot and an election of a Senator by viva voce vote of the members of a legislature.

Your committee are inclined to think this is correct, but that the distinction bears against the claim of the memorialist instead of in favor of it.

The number of persons entitled to vote at a popular election is not fixed and definite, and hence it is impossible to have a quorum or anything answering thereto. There is no power to compel attendance. This is, and necessarily must be, wholly voluntary; therefore it is necessary that those attending should have the right to elect where the election is free, and are prevented from attending by force, intimidation, or fraud. If a candidate receiving the majority is disqualified, and the votes cut for him are declared nullities (as claimed by the memorialist), the remaining votes are as effectual to elect as if every voter of the district had been present; and if those who voted for the candidate receiving the majority had not been present at all, the election nevertheless would have been valid. But the rule is wholly different in legislative bodies. The number is fixed and definite, a quorum can be and is required to act, and the presence of a less number is not effectual. Had but the 32 who voted for Abbott been present in the house at the time the vote was cut, we do not suppose anyone would contend that he had even a shadow to base his claim upon; yet this number would be sufficient to elect in a district of 1,000 voters if no others voted. We therefore coincide in the view that there is a difference, and that, even if the English rule was applicable in the case of an election of a Member to the House of Representatives, it would by no means follow that it was applicable to the election of a Senator where the number voting, of the votes counted, is less than a quorum.

Your committee, therefore, after a full hearing of the case and examination of the authorities, come to the conclusion that the Hon. Joseph C. Abbott, of North Carolina, is not entitled to a seat in the United States Senate, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, not having received a majority of the votes cast by the North Carolina legislature on the second Tuesday in November, 1870, for the office of Senator of the United States, is not entitled to a seat in said United States Senate as such Senator.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, on behalf of himself and Mr. B.F. Rice, of Arkansas, submitted minority views, in which they say:

Had Vance been qualified to serve, there would be no question as to his right. But he was disqualified by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, for the reason that he had been a Member of the Congress prior to the rebellion, and, as such Member, had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and during the rebellion he had acted as colonel in the rebel army, and taken an oath of allegiance to the so-called Confederate States of America; and he had acted as governor of the rebel State of North Carolina from August, 1862, to April, 1865; and this disqualification was notorious—known to all the members of the legislature at the time of his election, and to all the people of that State. The fact that Vance was known to the members of the legislature who voted for him for Senator to be disqualified is not controverted. On the contrary, General Ransom, who claims to have been subsequently elected, upon the resignation of Vance, was heard before your committee, and frankly admitted that the fact that Vance was disqualified was well known to all the members of both houses of the legislature at the time of his pretended election.

It is admitted on all hands that the election which was held, as before stated, conferred no right upon Vance to a seat in this body; but Abbott, who was qualified, and who received the next highest number of votes cast, and a majority of all the votes cast for qualified candidates in both houses, insists that he was elected at said election, and is now entitled to the seat; and this is the question to be determined.

The minority views then go on to cite the statute governing the election of a Senator by the legislature, and continues:

It will be perceived that this act does not attempt to determine what shall be a quorum of each house, but leaves that question to be determined by the constitution and laws of the State. By the constitution of North Carolina it is provided:

"Neither house shall proceed upon public business unless a majority of all the members are actually present."

It is not necessary that all the members should participate in the transaction of public business by either house, but merely that a majority of all the members should actually be present in each house. But in providing for an election by the joint assembly of the two houses the act of Congress does provide that in such election—

"The person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected."

The difference in these two provisions is not one of phraseology merely, but of substance. In the election by the two houses separately in North Carolina, if a majority of the members elected to each house are actually present, the person who shall receive the highest number of votes cast, though that may be less than half of a constitutional quorum, is to be declared elected; but in the election by the joint assembly it is not enough that a candidate should receive a majority of all the votes cast, but he must receive a majority of "all the votes of the said joint assembly—a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting." These provisions are so materially different that the variation can not be regarded as accidental, and the reason for the distinction is, no doubt, that the act intended to leave the matters of a quorum and the proceedings of the houses acting separately to be regulated by the constitution and laws of the State, but the act intended to provide what should be necessary to constitute a quorum and make an election in the joint assembly—a body created by the act, and whose proceedings might not be regulated by the constitution of the State.

It is only necessary in this case to consider the effect of the proceedings in the two houses on the first day, because it is upon those proceedings Mr. Abbott founds his claim. If he was legally elected on that day the subsequent proceedings by the joint assembly could not affect his right, nor can such claim be affected by any subsequent proceedings of the legislature. His claim depends upon the legal effect of what took place in the two houses on the first day of the election.

It is insisted that the provisions of the act in relation to election by the two houses and by the joint assembly are substantially the same, because it is provided by the act that—

"Each house shall openly, by a viva voice vote of each member present, name one person for Senator, etc., and the name of the person so voted for who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal," etc.

And hence it results that to be elected on the first day the person must have a majority of all the members present. But this construction, which is equivalent to saying that, to make an election, every member must vote, would put it in the power of a single member of the legislature to defeat an election on that day. This could not have been intended, and that clause must be regarded as relating merely to the manner of voting; and if a number of votes are cast for a qualified candidate, and the other members refuse to vote at all, then the person "who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast" must be deemed elected.

The provision concerning the joint assembly is materially different. There it is provided:

"The joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voice vote of each member present, a person for the purpose aforesaid, and a person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected."

The clause "a person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting," undoubtedly requires that to make an election a candidate must receive a number of votes greater than half of the majority of both houses. The difference between the two provisions is this: If a majority or quorum of each house are actually present when each house proceeds to the election on the first day, the person receiving the highest number of votes cast is elected, though receiving less than half of a majority. But in the joint assembly it is necessary to an election that a candidate should receive the votes of more than half of a majority of both houses.

It is a well-established rule for construing statutes that every clause, phrase, and word must be deemed to have been added to the statute for the purpose of accomplishing some end that would not be accomplished without it.

* * * * * * *

Applying this familiar precept to the statute before us, it must be held that the provision in regard to an election by the joint assembly requiring a person to receive "a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly," which is not found in the act in relation to an election by the two houses acting separately, was added for the purpose of requiring in one case what was not necessary in the other. It may be said that the same thing ought to be required in the one case as in the other, and that the act of Congress ought not to be so construed as to permit an election by the minority in one case and to forbid it in the other. But the answer to this is obvious. Before the passage of this act the States elected Senators by various methods; some by a joint assembly of both houses and some by the action of the two houses separately. In those States which elected by the latter method the houses might sometimes disagree, and thus defeat an election. It was the manifest intention of the act of Congress to afford to a legislature the opportunity of electing a Senator by the separate action of the houses, and in doing so to leave the whole detail of the election to be regulated by the parliamentary usage of the State. But in providing for an election by the joint assembly, a method not in use in some of the States, it was necessary to provide what should be a quorum, and what should be necessary to an election.

As the act of Congress does not affect the question under consideration. resort must be had to the precedents and authorities, English and American.

It is admitted that when the electors vote for a disqualified candidate, in ignorance of his disqualification, the election is void, and must be remitted to the elective body. But it is insisted that where, as in this case, the electors (the members of the two houses) had full knowledge of the disqualification, votes cast for such person are considered as thrown away, and the qualified candidate receiving the next highest number of votes, and a majority of all votes cast for qualified candidates, is elected. If this proposition is well grounded, Mr. Abbott is entitled to a seat; and this is the precise question upon which we are to consult the authorities.

Mr. Abbott furnished to your committee a printed brief containing references to and quotations from the decisions upon this question from the earliest times, which quotations are embodied in this report. * * *

After citing many decisions referred to in the brief, especially the case of Yulee, the views of the minority proceed:

It was strongly contended before your committee that the case under consideration falls fairly within this equitable principle, because it was said that all the State officers and judges of North Carolina had been elected while under disability imposed by the fourteenth amendment, and Congress had subsequent to their election removed their disabilities and enabled them to hold their offices; and your committee were referred to the act of June 25, 1868 (15 Stat. L., p. 366), by which "all officers elected at the election commencing the 4th day of February, 1868, in the State of Alabama," and who had not publicly declined to accept the offices to which they were elected, were relieved of their disabilities. From these facts it was contended that the members of the legislature who voted for Vance might well believe, and it was said that in fact they did believe, that Congress would relieve Vance of his disability and that he would be admitted to his seat in the Senate.

This suggestion has some force, but a slight examination will show that it is rather plausible than round. In the first place, the case bears no resemblance to that supposed in the report in Yulee's case, because here there was no misapprehension as to any fact then existing. If the electors had supposed that Vance was not disqualified, though in fact he was, or had they believed that an act had already passed Congress relieving him from his disability, though such was not the case, then the electors would have acted under a misapprehension and honestly entertained the belief that Vance was eligible. But such is not the case. Every elector who voted for Vance knew that he was disqualified by the fourteenth amendment and that his disability had not been removed. Every elector therefore knew when he gave his vote for Vance that, as the case then stood, such vote was thrown away. As well might a man claim exemption from the penalty imposed by a statute upon the ground that although he knew he was violating its provisions he expected the legislature would repeal it. It was the duty of that legislature to elect a Senator who, in virtue of that election and without the aid of any other government, would be authorized to demand his seat as a Senator. To elect a disqualified candidate and then refer it to Congress to remove his disqualifications or not is to transfer the election from the legislature to Congress. In such case the legislature would in effect be nominating a Senator and submitting it to Congress to determine whether or not he should be a Senator. Put the case in the strongest possible light for Vance, still it must be admitted that the electors who voted for him knew that as the case then stood their votes were being thrown away; that without the action of Congress, which might or might not be interposed, the election was in violation of the Constitution; and up to the time when Abbott claimed his seat in this body, and up to the present hour, the votes given for Vance remain wholly inoperative, void, blanks in the law, thrown away for every legal purpose. Mistakes which equity may relieve against are mistakes in regard to existing facts not over sanguine and unfounded hopes looking to the future for realization and accomplishment.

In the second place, the legislation of Congress in regard to the organization of the reconstructed governments of the Southern States furnishes no precedent to bind the Senate in determining the election of its own Members. Those State governments could not be organized without relieving the disabilities of those who had been elected. Congress was therefore compelled to do so or abandon those States to anarchy or remit them to military rule. To quote the language of a great statesman on another subject, "A doubtful precedent should not be followed beyond its necessity." No such necessity exists in regard to the Senate of the United States, and therefore the electors had no right to assume that Congress would do in this case, where there was no necessity for it, what it had been compelled to do in the other cases referred to. And in no case has a Senator elected under disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment been relieved of such disability and permitted to take his seat.

Several decisions of the House of Representatives have been referred to which are supposed to be inconsistent with the principle here asserted. But it is believed that in none of those cases was it established that the electors knew of the disqualification of the candidate voted for; and in the very able report of Mr. Dawes, from the Committee on Elections (Report of Committees, 11, second session Fortieth Congress), which is much relied upon, it is expressly stated that this point was not involved, because it did Dot appear that the electors bad such notice.

But there are many reasons for declining a critical examination of the decisions of the other House in regard to the election of its Members. By the Constitution each House is made the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members. It would therefore be improper for the Senate—certainly indelicate for a committee of the Senate—to criticise the actions or decisions of the House; and it would be subversive of the Constitution, because it would practically make the House of Representatives not only the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, but also of the Members of this House, if the Senate were to follow as precedents the decisions of the House in conflict with its own opinions.

Again, there is much force and reason in the distinction made by the court, in Commonwealth v. Cluley (56 Penn. St., p. 274), between a popular election, under our system of almost universal suffrage, for a Member of the House of Representatives, by ballot, and an election of a Senator by a viva voce vote of the members of a legislature. And it might well be that the House of Representatives should establish one rule appropriate to the election of its Members and the Senate a different rule in regard to the election of its Members. The difference between the two cases would justify different rules.

In a popular election, by ballot, for a Member of the House of Representatives, where the voters are numerous and scattered over a considerable territory, it would be impossible to ascertain whether or not the electors, or enough of them to change the result, had knowledge of the disqualification of the candidate. Besides, voting by ballot includes the right of the elector to conceal the fact for which candidate he voted. This is his secret, which can not be wrested from him even in a court of justice. And they who voted against the successful candidate, yet failed to defeat him at the polls, might attempt to accomplish the same end by pretending to have voted for him with knowledge of his incapacity. Even perjury in such case, should a voter voluntarily swear falsely in regard to it, could never be detected and punished. Such a principle applied to such elections would be unsatisfactory, often incapable of application, and always a temptation to frauds and perjuries, which might be committed with impunity. And it may be conceded that, in determining who has been elected at such popular election by ballot, no candidate not receiving a majority of all votes cast, counting blanks and ballots for disqualified candidates, ought to be declared elected; and that the decisions of the House of Representatives, as applied to the election of its own Members, ought to proceed upon a different principle than the one here contended for.

But the circumstances which may well induce the House of Representatives to depart from the ancient rule and practice in determining the election of its Members do not exist in relation to the election of Senators. Senators are elected by a small number of persons, the number fixed by law, who are compelled to vote viva voice. Their votes are matters of record, and the record discloses who voted for and who voted against the disqualified candidate. Whether these electors had notice or not of the ineligibility of a candidate is easily, and may be definitely and certainly, ascertained. There is no inconvenience, no opportunity for fraud, no temptation to perjury, in the application of the principle here contended for to such an election. Every reason that can be given for excluding the application of this principle to popular elections by ballot sustains its application to the election of a Senator by the viva voice vote of the members of the legislature; and it is worthy of remark that the rule of parliamentary and common law, which is established by an unbroken current of decisions in England, had reference to elections, not by ballot, but viva voice. That method of election gave rise to the rule, and no reason has been given, none suggests itself, for departing from it now in regard to such elections. And it should also be observed that in every case in the American courts of law where the judges have, obiter dictum, declared that the minority candidate was not elected, not only was the element of knowledge of the disqualification wanting, but the election was by ballot and not viva voice. Not a dictum of any American court or American law writer of established reputation has been cited to your committee, and it is believed that none exist, which disapproves of the principle as applicable to elections viva voice.

In the report of the majority it is said that this principle belongs to a government where, as in England, the right to vote has been granted or conceded as a boon or franchise by the monarch to his subject; and hence to vote for a candidate known to be disqualified is a crime. But that in this country voting is the inherent right of every citizen; and Roe on Elections, page 256, is cited as sustaining this assertion in relation to elections in England. The author referred to, so far from sustaining such a distinction, does not allude to it. And it is believed, for many reasons, that no such distinction can be maintained.

1. The great charter in England was not a concession in the sense of a grant of rights. It was an admission that certain rights belonged to Englishmen, and always had belonged to them. The rights there admitted to exist were the inherent rights of Englishmen. Blackstone says:

"The great charter" contained very few new grants, but, as Sir Edward Coke observes, was for the most part declaratory of the principal grounds of the fundamental laws of England."

The great Bill of Rights delivered by the Lords and Commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange February 13, 1688, and afterwards enacted in Parliament, after enumerating the privileges of the people, concludes in the following strain of ancient, manly eloquence:

"And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties."

And the act of Parliament recognizes—

"All and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration to be true, ancient, and indubitable rights of the people of this Kingdom."

2. The right of voting in this country is not an inherent right of the citizen. If it were, women as well as men could vote; because women as well as men are citizens and always have been under our Constitution; and every inherent right of the citizen is possessed as fully and may be exercised as freely by the female as the male citizen. Our popular elections are participated in by those who have a constitutional right to vote. Their right to vote does not spring merely from citizenship; it is a right secured, limited, and regulated by the Constitution and laws. A citizen has no more inherent right to be a voter than to be a Senator. The citizen may vote if the Constitution and laws permit, not otherwise; so every citizen may be a Senator if duly elected and qualified, not otherwise.

3. But if such distinction were conceded to exist, it would strengthen the conclusion here arrived at. To test this let us concede that the Englishman in voting is exercising not an inherent right, but a franchise delegated to him by the Crown; therefore it is a crime for him to vote for a disqualified candidate, and for that reason his vote is considered as thrown away and the next highest qualified candidate is to be considered as elected. And let us also concede that at a popular election in this country the voter exercises an inherent right of citizenship; and hence, if he votes for a candidate known to be disqualified his vote is not thrown away. From these admissions what results? Simply this: That in our popular elections, by ballot, for a Member of the House of Representatives the principle here contended for does not apply. Very well. It does not apply upon this hypothesis, because the voter is exercising an inherent right and not a delegated power when he casts his ballot. Now, if this distinction be well taken does not everyone perceive that the principle here contended for must apply to an election of Senators by the members of a legislature who in that election are exercising a delegated power and not an inherent right? The members of the legislature in electing a Senator are exercising a power that is delegated in a double sense. The power to elect a Senator is delegated by this Government—that is, by the Constitution of the United States—to the legislature of the State; and the people elect members of that legislature who are among other things to exercise this power of electing a Senator. It will not be pretended that a member of the legislature in voting for a Senator is exercising an inherent right of a citizen, and all must admit that he is exercising a delegated power; so that the very argument which exempts the election of Members of the House of Representatives from the operation of the principle under consideration subjects the election of Senators to its full operation.

It has also been urged before your committee that bills passed by Congress to relieve disabilities of Members elected to the House of Representatives rest upon principles inconsistent with the conclusions of this report. To this two answers may be made: (1) The proceedings of Congress in relation to cases of election while reconstruction of the late rebel States was in progress can hardly be relied upon as settling principles by which either House of Congress ought to be bound in times of peace. The circumstances under which such legislation was had were exceptional and the legislation itself ought not to stand as a precedent. (2) The bills which have passed were bills originating in the House of Representatives concerning Members elected to that House, and although the Senate has concurred in the enactment of such laws it ought not to be regarded as settling principles by which the Senate must be bound in determining the election of its own Members. Whenever the House of Representatives manifests its desire to seat a Member, although it may require the enactment of a law by both Houses to accomplish the purpose, still the Senate in concurring in such enactment may be regarded as extending a courtesy to the House of Representatives rather than settling principles which will bind the Senate in relation to the election of its own members. * * *

Therefore it is submitted that upon reason and authority the votes cast for Mr. Vance, with full knowledge on the part of the members of both houses of the legislature that he was disqualified by the Constitution to serve in this body, ought to be considered as thrown away; and that, inasmuch as a majority of all the members elected to each house were "actually present," the election was legal, and that the qualified candidate receiving the highest number of votes, and a majority of all votes cast for qualified candidates, was duly elected. It is conceded that majorities have a constitutional right to govern in this country; but it is not conceded that even the majority of the legislature of a State may morally or constitutionally defeat government by refusing to elect Senators to serve in the Senate of the United States. In this case the majority had a right to elect a qualified person to the Senate; but having waived their right by voting for a person known to be disqualified, as much as though they had refused to vote at all or had voted for a man known to be dead, the minority who complied with the Constitution by voting for a qualified candidate may well be held to have expressed the will of the legislature. If the majority, being. called upon, will not vote they can not complain that the election was decided by those who did vote, though a minority of the elective body. And voting for a person known to be disqualified is not voting. Such votes are void—no votes; and the highest number of votes cast, a quorum being present, must effect an election.

Therefore, in view of the premises, the minority of your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott has been duly elected Senator from the State of North Carolina for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1871, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator."

The reports were debated at length in the Senate on April 11, 12, 15, 22, and 23, 1872,[1] and on the latter day the motion to substitute the minority resolution for that of the majority was disagreed to—yeas 10, nays 42. Then the resolution reported by the majority was agreed to.

Chapter XV.

POLYGAMY AND OTHER CRIMES AS DISQUALIFICATIONS.

464. B. F. Whittemore, being reelected to the same House from which he had resigned to escape expulsion for crime, was excluded from taking the oath and his seat.—On June 18, 1870,[3] the Speaker laid before the House the credentials of Mr. B. F. Whittemore, of South Carolina, who had been chosen at a special election to fill the vacancy caused by expulsion proceedings taken by the House against him at an earlier period in this session.[4] Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, objected to the administration of the oath to Mr. Whittemore on the ground that he had disqualified himself for being a Member of the House.

It was urged that the credentials should be referred to a committee for examination, and the subject was postponed to a day certain. On June 21 Mr. Logan presented this resolution:

Be it resolved, That the House of Representatives decline to allow said B. F. Whittemore to be sworn as a Representative in the Forty-first Congress and direct that his credentials be returned to him.

Accompanying this resolution was a preamble reciting the facts of the proceedings of expulsion against Mr. Whittemore for the sale of appointments at the Military Academy and the fact that he had escaped expulsion by resigning; and that he had received the censure of the House.

Mr. Logan, in advocating the resolution, said he did not presume that the Constitution contemplated expulsion for any mere political reasons, or for anything except a violation of the rules of the House or an infraction of some existing law. He assumed that where the House had the right to expel for violation of its rules or of some existing law it had the same power to exclude a person from its body. Mr. Logan then had read the law against bribery, for violation of which Mr. Whittemore had been censured. It was right to exclude a man from the House for crime. It was this feature of crime which distinguished this case from those of Messrs. Giddings, of Ohio, and Brooks and Keitt, of South Carolina, who, after receiving the censure of the House, had resigned their seats, and after reelection had been admitted to the House. The case of Mr. Matteson, of New York, who had been censured, was also different, because he had returned to a Congress succeeding that in which he had been censured, and which had no jurisdiction of the offense committed against its predecessor.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, urged that grave constitutional questions were involved, and that the matter should be referred to a committee for examination. He quoted the Wilkes case to illustrate the dangers of a precedent of exclusion.

The resolution offered by Mr. Logan was adopted by a vote of 130 yeas to 76 nays.

465. The Texas election case of Grafton v. Connor, in the Forty-first Congress.

In 1870 the House declined to exclude John C. Connor, who possessed the constitutional qualifications, and satisfactory credentials, but whose moral character was impeached.

Statement of the attitude of the House at the close of the civil war as to qualifications other than those prescribed by the Constitution.

A military order has been accepted as credentials of Members from a reconstructed State; but the said credentials were examined by a committee before the House authorized the bearers to take the oath.

On March 30, 1870,[1] a message from the President announced that he had approved the act to admit the State of Texas to representation in the Congress of the United States. On the same day a letter was presented "from the secretary of civil affairs, State of Texas, inclosing General Orders, No. 5, headquarters Fifth Military District, Texas, giving the result of an election held on the 30th of November and lst, 2d, and 3d of December, 1869." This letter, which constituted credentials of election, was referred to the Committee on Elections, the claimants to seats not being sworn in.

On March 31[2] Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the oath of office be now administered to G. W. Whitmore, J. C. Connor, W. T. Clark, and E. Degener, Representatives-elect from * * * the State of Texas: Provided, That the right of any person to contest the seats of either of said Representatives shall not be thereby impaired.

Mr. Joseph P. C. Shanks, of Indiana, proposed an amendment that John C. Connor be not sworn in, but that the contested case of Grafton v. Connor be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to examine and report both as to prima facie and final right.

Thereupon Messrs. Shanks and Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, presented affidavits wherein it was charged that Mr. Connor, while an officer of the Army, about January 5, 1868, had cruelly whipped and otherwise punished certain negro soldiers of his command, and that later, on October 23, 1869, in a public speech in Texas, he had boasted that he used the lash freely on the soldiers, and had also stated that he escaped conviction by a military court by bribing the soldiers with circus tickets, so that they would not testify against him. Therefore, it was urged that because of bad character he should not be admitted to take the oath, although the Committee on Elections had found his credentials regular and sufficient.

The debate which followed was summarized by a brief colloquy, wherein Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, asked:

> Allow me to ask * * * if anything in the Constitution of the United States and the laws thereof * * * forbids that a "moral monster" shall be elected to Congress?

To which Mr. Ebon C. Ingersoll, of Illinois, replied:

> I believe the people may elect a moral monster to Congress if they see fit, but I believe that Congress has a right to exclude that moral monster from a seat if they see fit.

The weight of argument was against the position assumed by Mr. Ingersoll. Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, speaking for the Committee on Elections in the preceding Congress, said:

> When any Member, upon his responsibility as a Member, made any charge against any claimant to a seat that touched his constitutional qualification the House, before swearing him in, would refer the question to the proper committee to report on it. Beyond that the Committee on Elections came to the conclusion, and the House sustained them, it was not proper to go. That question of itself was a very delicate one, and of course might be carried to such an extent as to involve great abuse to the rights of persons claiming seats here. But never did that committee ask the House to go one inch beyond the question of the constitutional qualification of a Member, and never did this House decide that we had the right to go one inch beyond that question. As to the question whether a gentleman claiming a seat has heretofore behaved in a manner unbecoming a Member, I think this is the first time it was ever raised on the floor of the House.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Shanks, the yeas and nays were demanded, but were refused. Tellers also were refused. Then the amendment was disagreed to without division.

Then the resolution proposed by the Committee on Elections was agreed to.

Accordingly the Texas Members-elect, Mr. Connor among them, appeared and were sworn.

On July 15[1] the Committee on Elections reported, and the House agreed to a resolution declaring Mr. Grafton, the contestant, not entitled to the seat.

466. A Member being charged with a crime entirely disconnected from his representative capacity, the House declined to hold that a question of privilege was involved.—On January 7, 1879,[2] Mr. J. H. Acklen, of Louisiana, after a personal explanation, offered the following:

> Whereas J. H. Acklen, a Member of this House, has been charged by affidavit with having seduced Mattie Palfrey Wright, now deceased, in April, 1877, said affidavit having been drawn up by one H. L. Smith, also deceased, and sworn to by said Mattie Wright: Therefore,
> Be it resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a committee of three Members of this House, whose duty it shall be to investigate the truth or falsity of said charges, etc.

Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, raised the question of order that a mere charge of crime, on which no conviction had been obtained, did not justify the House in taking jurisdiction on the question of qualifications.

The Speaker [1] said:

The gentleman from Louisiana rose to a question of personal privilege. The Chair has been reluctant to interrupt him and is reluctant now to decide in a matter affecting the character of a Member of this House. The gentleman from Texas raises the question that this does not embrace a question of personal privilege. Since this discussion has been going on, the Chair, so far as his memory enables him to recollect, fails to remember a single instance during his own term of service in this House wherein charges of this character, which do not directly affect the representative character of a Member of this House, have been made a subject of inquiry by the House. The Chair finds in one instance a decision made by one of his predecessors, Mr. Speaker Linn Boyd, which he desires to have read to the House:

"Mr. Thomas H. Bayly submitted, as a question of privilege, the following resolution, namely:

"Resolved, That the special committee of which Hon. Mr. Letcher is chairman be instructed to communicate to this House any communication made to that committee reflecting upon the representative character of T. H. Bayly, a member of this House, by B. E. Green or others, with a view that the House may take such action as to it may seem proper, the said committee having decided that it was not within their jurisdiction."

The decision in that case by Mr. Speaker Boyd was that it was not a subject of investigation unless it did actually affect the official character of the Representative. In a case like this the Chair is quite willing to submit the question to the House with this preliminary statement on his part.

Thereupon Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, said:

If by "personal privilege "is meant the ordinary rights which the House grants to a man to make a personal explanation, I certainly should vote aye. And therefore I want it understood that my vote, which in this case will be "no," means that I do not conceive that this is a case about which the House has any jurisdiction to investigate, and in that sense I vote against it.

The Speaker said:

The Chair desires to say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio that the distinction he has drawn is a very proper one. The Chair himself has allowed the personal explanation to be made. The question whether it embraces a privilege affecting the character of a Member of the House the Chair prefers to submit to the House.

The Speaker having put the question: "Does the said preamble and resolution involve a question of privilege?" it was decided in the negative without division.

On April 15, 1879,[2] Mr. J. R. Chalmers, of Mississippi, claiming the floor for a question of personal privilege, had read a newspaper article describing him as "one of the notorious and bloody-handed butchers of the forever infamous Fort Pillow massacre,"etc. Then Mr. Chalmers offered a resolution providing for a select committee to investigate the subject of General Chalmer's conduct.

Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, made a point of order.

The Speaker did not rule upon the question, which was after debate postponed.

On May 7,[3] after further debate, the House laid the resolution on the table—ayes 98, noes 70.

467. The Utah election case of McGrorty v. Hooper, in the Fortieth Congress.

In 1868 the House declined to pass on the title to a seat of William H. Hooper, Delegate from Utah, who was alleged to have been elected by undue influence of an alleged disloyal organization.

[3] Record, pp. 1125–1132.

In 1868 the House refused a seat to a contestant who received a small minority of the votes in a Territory, but who alleged that the majority voters were disqualified by treasonable antagonism to the Government.

An instance wherein a Delegate gave notice of a contest by a telegram, which was submitted to the House by the Speaker.

In 1868 the House entertained a contest for the seat of a Delegate, although the first notice of contest was irregular and the supplemental notice was not filed within the time required by law.

A resolution declaring a Delegate entitled to his seat being laid on the table, the Delegate continued to exercise his functions.

On March 5, 1867,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a telegram from William McGrorty, giving notice of contest for the seat of William H. Hooper, Delegate from Utah Territory. On March 6 Mr. Hooper was sworn in without any question being raised.

On July 9, 1868,[2] Mr. John W. Chanler, of New York, submitted the report of the committee.[3] The consideration of the case involved a preliminary question as to the notice of contest. Contestant admitted that he had not proceeded according to the terms of the law, explaining his reasons:

> On the 23d of February, 1867, the contestant deposited in the office of Wells, Fargo & Co., at Great Salt Lake City, a notice directed to the Hon. 'William H. Hooper, and a similar notice to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, notifying them that he should contest the seat of said Hooper, which notices were received in this city and delivered to the parties to whom they were addressed some time in the month of March following.
> The reasons why the grounds were not stated in the notice are fully set forth in the affidavit of contestant, made on the 18th of January, 1868, which has been placed before the committee, with the other papers in the case; and it is confidently submitted that those reasons are sufficient to excuse him from a literal compliance with the law. It is there shown that it would have been impossible to contest the election in the usual manner because of the hostility of the Mormon leaders, endangering the lives of himself and friends, and the destruction of the ballots and lists of voters, at the time when the notice was sent to Mr. Hooper.

The sitting Delegate objected that the notice had not been filed within the time required by law, that it did not comply with the law, although there existed no valid reasons why it should not have done so, and that the testimony taken was ex parte.

Contestant urged[4] that, while his original notice was defective in specifications, his second amended notice of January 18, 1868, supplied all omissions, and considered that the precedents of the House (citing Kline v. Verree) justified its reception. He also urged through his counsel that the law of 1851 concerning contested elections did not apply to the Territories, citing cases of Hunt v. Palao and Benner v.

[3] It was stated in debate that four members of the committee-Messrs. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts; Charles Upson, of Michigan; Joseph W. McClurg, of Missouri, and Glenni W. Scofield, of Pennsylvania—dissented from the views in the report, although agreeing to the resolutions. (Globe, p. 4383.)

Porter, as well as others. Furthermore, it was urged that the law of 1851 was not absolutely binding on the House, being only a wholesome rule which might be departed from for good cause, citing Williams v. Sickles.

The committee in their report did not specifically discuss this preliminary question; but the fact that they proceed to consider the case on its merits is an evident decision.

As to the merits of the case, the contestant presented seven grounds of contest, but the report discusses only three:

1. That the sitting Delegate represents a community separated from and hostile to the other portions of the people of the United States, and organized and acting in disregard and violation of the laws of the United States, and under an anti-republican form of government.
2. That he [the sitting Delegate] is the representative of the institution of polygamy.
3. That his secret oath, taken in the Mormon Church, disqualifies him from sitting as a Delegate in the Congress of the United States.

The contestant, as appears from his address to the House, argued that since the constituency was hostile to the Government of the United States those who voted for the sitting Delegate were incompetent electors and their votes were void. He also urged that there were illegalities connected with the election which rendered it impossible to determine what votes were cast according to law. Contestant also argued that as the sitting Delegate had taken oaths pledging him to hostility to the United States he was disqualified for the office and all votes cast for him were void. This disqualification he attempted to prove by affidavits, ex parte in nature, describing the oaths taken by Mormans in the "endowment" ceremonies. Contestant further argued that, although the majority of the people of the Territory were disloyal and incompetent, the loyal minority should not be deprived of its representation.

The official returns had given 15,068 votes for sitting Delegate and 105 for contestant. Therefore contestant claimed the seat as representative of the loyal minority of 105.

The committee discussed at length the people and institutions of Utah, summarizing their conclusions:

So far, therefore, as it was to the interest of the leaders of Mormonism to oppose this Government, to strengthen and enrich themselves and secure the support of new converts, your committee think the organization has been antagonistic to the United States. But from no malice aforethought have they ever, as far as any proof has come to your committee, organized rebellion or sedition against the supreme authority of this Union, or committed treason by any overt act.

To remedy the evils which now exist in this Territory and to prevent them in the future has been a matter of serious consideration for many years by this Government, and a plan is now before the Committee on Territories in the Senate for radically changing the manner of carrying on the government of Utah.

The duties of your committee do not extend to the subject-matter of reform in the Territory further than to protect the purity of the representative system and secure to every citizen of the United States the full enjoyment of his liberty at the polls.

Your committee believe that it is the imperative duty of Congress to enforce the laws by every means in the power of this Government, to prevent undue influence of the hierarchy of the Mormon society over the people of that Territory.

A strong belief exists in the mind of your committee that to considerable extent such influence has been used in the recent elections for Delegate to Congress from Utah, but sufficient proof of its illegality has not come to their knowledge to warrant, in their opinion, any direct interference by immediate action of Congress.

The vote polled, under whatever control it may have been deposited, is, in the opinion of your committee, in default of full and satisfactory evidence to the contrary, to be deemed and accepted as the legal vote of the people of Utah. Their minds may have been under religious or other prejudice, created or increased by the Mormon leaders in favor of one candidate and against the other, but there is no reason to conclude that the free exercise of the ballot by the citizen was unlawfully prevented by force or fraud. No sufficient proof to that effect has, in the opinion of your committee, been presented by the contestant. The committee therefore unanimously agree to present the following resolutions, to wit:

"Resolved, That William McGrorty is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

"Resolved, That William H. Hooper is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory Of Utah."

The report was debated on July 23, 1868,[1] the principal argument being made by contestant, and the first resolution, declaring contestant not entitled to the seat, was agreed to without division. The second resolution, declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat, was laid on the table.

The practical effect of this action was to leave sitting Delegate in the seat, as is shown by his appearance at the next session of this Congress.[2]

468. The Utah election case of Maxwell v. Cannon, in the Forty-third Congress.

In 1873 the House seated Delegate George Q. Cannon on the strength of his unimpeached credentials, although it was objected that he was disqualified.

On December 2, 1873,[3] the Delegates from the Territories were called to be sworn after the House had been fully organized. To Delegate George Q. Cannon, of Utah, objection was made by Mr. Clinton L. Merriam, of New York, who presented for the action of the House the following resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that George Q. Cannon, of Utah, has taken oaths inconsistent with citizenship of the United States and with his obligations as Delegate in this House, and has been, and continues to be, guilty of practices in violation and defiance of the laws of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the credentials of said Cannon, and his right to a seat in this House as a Delegate from Utah, be referred to the Committee on Elections, and that said Cannon be not admitted to a seat in this House previous to the report of said committee.

In the course of the debate Mr. Stephen W. Kellogg, of Connecticut, asked if there was any other certificate or credential from the governor of Utah than the one which had already been presented in behalf of Mr. Cannon.

The Speaker replied that the Clerk informed him that that was the only credential that had been presented from Utah.

In the course of the debate the Maryland case in the Forty-first Congress was cited in support of the contention that he was entitled by prima facie right to his seat on the certificate. It was argued (by Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts) that to take any other course would be to establish precedents that in times of high party excitement might prevent the organization of the House indefinitely.

Mr. Merriam's resolution was laid on the table without division, and Mr. Cannon then took the oath.

469. The Utah case of Maxwell v. Cannon continued.

In 1873 the Elections Committee concluded that a Delegate who had been sworn could be reached on a question of qualifications only by process of expulsion.

The Elections Committee concluded in 1873 that if the Member-elect be disqualified the minority candidate is not thereby entitled to the seat.

Discussion of the right of the House to fix qualifications other than those specified by the Constitution.

Discussion of the distinction between the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of the Member and the power to expel.

In 1873 the Elections Committee concluded that where a law of Congress extended the Constitution over a Territory, the qualifications of the Delegate should be similar to those of Members.

Discussion as to whether or not the expulsion of a Delegate should be effected by a majority or a two-thirds vote.

On April 30, 1874,[1] Mr. Gerry W. Hazelton, of Wisconsin, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Utah case of Maxwell v. Cannon, which ,had come before the Committee on Elections like ordinary cases of that kind. It was not claimed by the contestant that he had received a majority of the votes actually cast, although it was maintained that gross irregularities existed in the manner of conducting the election and making the returns. While there was testimony to bear this out, yet the sitting Member undoubtedly had a majority of the legal votes.

Therefore two questions were left for the committee:

(1) Contestant raised the following question:

> George Q. Cannon, the sitting Delegate, is not qualified to represent said Territory, or to hold his seat in the Fortythird Congress, and for cause of disqualification we say it is shown by the evidence that he, at and before the day of the election, to wit, on the 5th day of August, 1872, was openly living and cohabiting with four women as his wives in Salt Lake City, in Utah Territory, and he is still so living and cohabiting with them.

The sitting Delegate in his answer had denied the charges of contestant on the subject of polygamous relations.

The committee first proceeded to consider the question of their own jurisdiction to consider a question of qualifications. They say:

> What are the qualifications here mentioned and referred to the Committee on Elections? Clearly, the constitutional qualifications, to wit, that the claimant shall have attained the age of 25 years, been seven years a citizen of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen.
> The practice of the House has been so uniform, and seems so entirely in harmony with the letter of the Constitution, that the committee can but regard the jurisdictional question as a bar to the consideration of qualifications other than those above specified mentioned in the notice of contest and hereinbefore alluded to.

---

[1] Report No. 484; Smith, p. 182; Rowell's Digest, p. 291.

It being conceded that the contestee has these qualifications, one other inquiry only under this head remains, to wit: Does the same rule apply in considering the case of a Delegate as of a Member of the House? This question seems not to have been raised heretofore.

The act organizing the Territory of Utah, approved September 9, 1850, enacts that the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable.

It was said on the argument that the Constitution cannot be extended over the Territories by act of Congress, and the views of Mr. Webster were quoted in support of this position.

We do not deem it necessary to consider that question, because it will not be denied that Congress had the power to make the Constitution a part of the statutory law of the Territory as much as any portion of the organic act thereof. For the purposes of this inquiry, it makes no difference whether the Constitution is to be treated as constitutional or statutory law. If either, it is entitled to be considered in disposing of this case.

Now, while it would be entirely competent for Congress to prescribe qualifications for a Delegate in Congress entirely unlike those prescribed in the Constitution for Members, it seems to us, in the absence of any such legislation, we may fairly and justly assume that by making the Constitution a part of the law of the Territory, Congress intended to indicate that the qualifications of the Delegate to be elected should be similar to those of a Member. It would seem to be to that extent an instruction to the electors of the Territory, growing out of the analogies of the case.

We conclude, therefore, that the question submitted to us, under the order of the House, comes within the same principles of jurisdiction as if the contestee were a Member instead of a Delegate.

This position, it will be observed, does not conflict with the right of the House to refer a preliminary inquiry to this committee as to the disqualification of a Member or Delegate to be sworn in and take his seat prior to the oath being administered. In such case the reference is special, and the jurisdiction of the committee follows the order of the House.

The case of Samuel E. Smith against John Young Brown, in the Fortieth Congress, is in point. That case was referred to the Committee on Elections, before the contestee was sworn in, to ascertain and report whether he had committed any of the acts specified in the law of July 2, 1862, which he was required to swear he had not committed, before entering on the duties of a Representative.

It was a preliminary inquiry, made under a special order of the House, and might have been executed as properly by the Judiciary Committee or bys. special committee. It did not relate in the remotest manner to ihe election, returns, and qualifications of the claimant under the Constitution.

The contestee in this case having been sworn in and admitted to his seat, and his name officially entered upon the roll of Delegates, we think he can be reached only under the exercise of the power of expulsion, which it is competent for the House to set in motion by a special order of reference.

(2) The second question related to the claim of the contestant to a seat as the minority candidate, the majority candidate being disqualified. The committee deny the authority of the case of Wallace v. Simpson in support of this contention, and quote the case of Smith v. Brown as establishing a doctrine contrary to that laid down by the contestant.

Therefore the majority of the committee recommended the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved (1), That George R. Maxwell was not elected, and is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress as Delegate for the Territory of Utah.

Resolved (2), That George Q. Cannon was elected and returned as a Delegate for the Territory of Utah to a seat i.n the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. Horace H. Harrison, of Tennessee, dissented from the conclusions of his associates wherein they stopped short in their second resolution of declaring Mr. Cannon entitled to the seat, and proposed the following:

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was duly elected and returned as Delegate from the Territory of U tab, and is entitled to a seat as a Delegate in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. Harrison considered that a Delegate should not be considered as on any different basis from a Member, and proceeded to make his argument with this proposition understood. Mr. Harrison says:

The qualifications of Representatives in Congress are prescribed by the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States.

They are: First, that they shall have attained the age of 25 years; second, that they shall have been seven years citizens of the United States; and, third, that they shall when elected be inhabitants of those States in which they shall be chosen. No other qualifications are prescribed in the Constitution.

If the Constitution of the United States had vested anywhere the power to prescribe qualifications of Representatives in Congress additional to or different from those prescribed by the Constitution itself, it is obvious that this power would have been conferred either upon Congress, or upon the House alone, or upon the States.

In the history of our Government it has never been claimed that the House of Representatives, acting alone, possessed the power to add to or change the qualifications of its Members. The vain attempt made by Mr. Randolph, in the case of Barney v. McCreery, in the Tenth Congress, to vindicate a claim of that kind in favor of the States, signally failed, and has never been repeated in the House.

Mr. Justice Story, in his discussion of the subject of the qualifications of Representatives in Congress, says that it would seem but fair reasoning, upon the plainest principles of interpretation, that when the Constitution established certain qualifications as necessary for office it meant to exclude all others, as prerequisites, and that from the very nature of such a provision the affirmation of these qualifications would seem to imply a negative of all others. And although it is certain that the letter of those constitutional provisions which relate to Representatives from the States does not apply exactly to the cases of Delegates from the Territories, still it is just as certain that their spirit does.

Mr. Harrison declared that no act could be found fixing the qualifications of a Delegate or providing a disqualification for any cause. The act of July 1, 1862, provided a punishment for bigamy; but disqualification for office was not a part of this punishment.

Mr. Harrison then continued:

The precedents of the House are in accordance with this construction of the Constitution. There has been no precedent since the organization of the Government which would justify, any more than would the Constitution itself justitfy, the House acting as the judges of the election, returns, and qualifications of Mr. Cannon, in a decision to deprive him of his seat on the ground that he has violated the law prohibiting polygamy in the Territories of the United States.

The case of B. F. Whittemore, in the Forty-first Congress, is relied upon as an authority for the refusal to admit a Representative-elect on other grounds than mere constitutional disqualifications. But a critical examination of that case will show that the House only decided that a Representative who had by resignation escaped expulsion for an infamous crime from that House should not be readmitted to the same House.

The case of Mr. Matteson, in the Thirty-fifth Congress, relied upon in argument before the committee, was a cue arising, not under the clause of the Constitution which makes each House the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its Members, but under that clause which confers the power of expulsion.

The line of demarkatiou between these two great powers of the House, the power to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its Members by a mere majority vote, and the power to expel its Members by a two-thirds vote, is clear and well defined. That line is not to be obliterated. It would be necessary to preserve it, even though its obliteration might seem to threaten no disasters, even though its maintenance might promise no benefits to the House, to the people, or to the Constitution. For this barrier is raised by the Constitution itself.

The framers of the Constitution of the United States, in prescribing or fixing the qualifications of Members of Congress, must be presumed to have been dealing with the question with reference to an obvious necessity for uniformity in the matter of the qualifications of Members, and with a jealous desire to prevent, by the action of either House of Congress, the establishment of other or different qualifications of Members.

It was appropriate and proper-in fact, necessary-that the power should be given to each House to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members; that is, to judge of the constitutional qualifications of its Members.

The exercise of this power requires only a majority vote.

But the House possesses another power, to decide who shall and who shall not hold seats in that body. It is altogether distinct, in origin and character, from that to which I have just referred. It is the power of expulsion, which requires a two-thirds vote for its exercise. It is conferred by the following clause of the Constitution:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member."

This power of expulsion conferred by the Constitution on each House of Congress was necessary to enable each House to secure an efficient exercise of its powers and its honor and dignity as a branch of the National legislature.

It was too dangerous a power to confer on either House without restriction, and hence it was expressly provided in the Constitution that there must be a concurrence of two-thirds of the Members to expel.

Under this power, guarded as it has been by the constitutional provision requiring a vote of two-thirds, there have been but a very few instances of expulsion since the organization of the Government, and it would seem that a power so rarely exercised does not require the agency of a standing committee.

The minority views then go on to discuss the cases of Benjamin G. Harris, of Maryland, and of Mr. Herbert, of California, and concluded that the House had always declined to fix qualifications outside of those fixed by the Constitution, and that the failure of the committee in this case, after that committee has found that the sitting Delegate from Utah has been duly elected and returned, to report that he is entitled to his seat, is unauthorized in principle or by precedent and dangerous, in so far as it tends to break down the distinction between the jurisdiction of the House in such a contest as the present one and the jurisdiction of the House by a two-thirds vote to expel a member from the House.

The report was debated at length on May 12.[1] The debate referred to the status of a Delegate, and to the propriety of adding to the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution. In the course of the debate Mr. E. R. Hoar, of Massachusetts, raised the question as to whether or not a two-thirds vote was needed for the expulsion of a Delegate. Delegates were creatures of statutes, and he doubted the power of a preceding Congress to impose on the present Congress, against its will, the presence of any one besides the Members who came by constitutional right.

At the conclusion of the debate the two resolutions recommended by the majority of the committee were agreed to without division.

Then, by a vote of 109 yeas to 76 nays, the resolution contended for by Mr. Harrison was agreed to.

470. The Utah election case of Maxwell v. Cannon, continued.

In 1873 it was proposed by the majority of the Elections Committee to exclude Delegate George Q. Cannon for polygamy; but the resolution was not considered.

---

[1] Journal, pp. 959–962; Record, pp. 3813–3819.

Then, by a vote of 137 yeas to 51 nays, the House agreed to the following resolution proposed by Mr. Hazelton, in connection with the report of the Committee on Elections:

Whereas George R. Maxwell has prosecuted a contest against the sitting Member, George Q. Cannon, now occupying a seat in the Forty-third Congress as Delegate for the Territory of Utah, charging, among other things, that the said Cannon is disqualified from holding, and is unworthy of, a seat on the floor of this House, for the reason that he was at the date of his election, to wit, on the 5th day of August, 1872, and prior thereto had been, and still is, openly living and cohabiting with four women as his wives under the pretended sanction of a system of polygamy, which system he notoriously endorses and upholds, against the statute of the United States approved July 1, 1862, which declares the same to be a felony, to the great scandal and disgrace of the people and the Government of the United States, and in abuse of the privilege of representation accorded to said Territory of Utah, and that he has taken and never renounced an oath which is inconsistent with his duties and allegiance to the said Government of the United States; and whereas the evidence in support of such charge has been brought to the official notice of the Committee on Elections: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be, and is hereby, instructed and authorized to investigate said charge and report the result to the House and recommend such action on the part of the House as shall seem meet and proper in the premises.

On January 21, 1875,[1] Mr. H. Boardman Smith, of New York, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in response to these instructions. The committee give an account of the evidence before them, state that the testimony as to the oath in the Endowment House is conflicting, and say, first quoting the statute:

"That every person having a husband or wife living who shall marry any other person, whether married or single, in a Territory of the United States, or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall, except in the cases specified in the proviso to this section, be adjudged guilty of bigamy, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years: Provided, nevertheless, That this section shall not extend to any person by reason of any former marriage, whose husband or wife by such marriage shall have been absent for five successive years without being known to such person within that time to be living, nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been dissolved by the decree of a competent court, nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been annulled or pronounced void by the sentence or decree of a competent court on the ground of the nullity of the marriage contract."

The second section disapproves and annuls all acts and ordinances of the provisional government of Deserlt and of the Territory of Utah which establish, support, maintain, shield, or countenance polygamy, however disguised by legal or ecclesiastical solemnities, sacraments, ceremonies, consecration, or other contrivances.

This statute was approved on the 1st day of July, 1862, and has since remained the law of the land.

It is proper to add that, after the adoption of the resolution above quoted referring this question to your committee, an act was passed by this House, at the last session, with little or no opposition, which reads as follows:

"[H.R.3679. Forty-third Congress, first session.)

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, JUNE 17, 1874.—READ TWICE AND REFERRED TO THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

"AN ACT defining the qualifications of Territorial Delegates in the House of Representatives.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, No person hereafter shall be a Delegate in the House of Representatives from any of the Territories of the United States who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the Territory in which he shall be chosen; and no such person who is guilty either of bigamy or of polygamy shall be eligible to a seat as such Delegate.

"Passed the House of Representatives June 16, 1874.

"Attest:

EDWARD MCPHERSON, Clerk."

Notwithstanding this fact the said Delegate was a candidate at the recent election, and was actually elected Delegate for the same Territory in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Your committee think the evidence, unchallenged as it is by the Delegate, establishes that, at the date of his election, to wit, on the 5th day of August, 1872, and prior thereto, the said Delegate was, and still is, openly living and cohabiting with four women as his wives, under the pretended sanction of a system of polygamy, which system he notoriously indorses and upholds, in violation of the statute of the United States, approved July 1, 1862, above quoted.

Therefore the majority recommended that the following resolution be agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon, Delegate from Utah, being found, upon due consideration of the evidence submitted, and not controverted by said Cannon, to be an actual polygamist, and to have married his fourth wife, having three other wives then living, in the month of August, 1865, in open and notorious violation of the law of July 1, 1862, forbidding such marriage, and declaring the same to be a crime punishable both by fine and imprisonment, and it appearing that he still maintains his polygamous practices in defiance of law, is deemed unworthy to occupy a seat in the House of Representatives as such Delegate, and that he be excluded therefrom.

The minority of the committee, Messrs. Horace H. Harrison, of Tennessee, C. R. Thomas, of North Carolina, L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, Edward Crossland, of Kentucky, and R. M. Speer, of Kentucky, opposed this proposed action, but Mr. Harrison alone gave his grounds for his opposition, making an elaborate minority report.

This is the first instance [says this report] where it has been sought to expel a Delegate from one of the Territories of the United States, and there is little in the shape of authority to guide us in the examination of the question.

Although there is nothing in the Constitution concerning a Delegate from the Territories of the United States, and no express provision therein for their expulsion as there is in the case of Members, we do not doubt the power of the House to expel. The power results simply from the fact that the Delegate is, in some sense, a Member, or is one of the body. He is entitled, as well by courtesy as by a custom which has obtained in this country upon the organization of Territorial government in the Territories, to certain rights and privileges; he is entitled to introduce and advocate on the floor of the House any measure affecting the people of the Territory, or to oppose in debate any measure he may deem injurious to them. He is amenable to the rules of the House or the regulations concerning its proceedings. He would clearly, as it is assumed, have to possess certain qualifications to entitle him to be a Delegate—at least that of citizenship, as is shown in the contest in regard to the admission of the Delegate from Michigan Territory in 1823, during the Eighteenth Congress.[1]

Everything in relation to the position of a Delegate having the rights and privileges we have mentioned, and every relation he bears to the House or to the Members thereof, in the absence of anything in the Constitution and laws on the subject, would suggest that if a Delegate is expelled it ought to be for the same causes that would justify the House in expelling a Member, and that the power to expel should be exercised as the constitutional power to expel a Member is exercised.

It would seem that all of the reasons that can be urged in favor of the rule which the framers of the Constitution made concerning the expulsion of a Member apply with equal force in the case of a Delegate. The framers of that instrument regarded this power to expel a Member by a mere majority vote as a dangerous one, and guarded its exercise by providing, in substance, that an expulsion of a Member could only be ordered by a two-thirds vote. Of course, we will not be understood as contending that the House has not the power, if it choose to exercise it, to expel a Delegate by a mere majority vote, or that there is any express provision of law operating as an inhibition on this power. But we submit that this power should be regulated in its exercise by a legal discretion, and that no safer rule can be found than the one which is deduced from the analogy we have mentioned.

If it is true that the power to expel a Delegate is drawn from analogy to the power given in the matter of the expulsion of members, it would seem to follow that, looking to this fact and to the nature of the office of a Territorial Delegate as a representative of a portion of the people of this country, and as, in some sense, a Member of this body, he ought not to be expelled except for causes which would justify the House in expelling a Member, and by a two-thirds vote on the question.

He certainly ought not to be expelled for political reasons or causes, or on account of the existence of certain practices in the Territory he represents, or to punish him for an alleged indulgence therein or the people he represents by depriving them of representation.

After discussing the subject of Mormonism in the Territory of Utah, and the fact that the Territory had frequently been represented by Delegates who practiced polygamy, the report continues:

But a graver question than those we have considered is the question whether the House ought, as a matter of policy, or to establish a precedent, expel either a Delegate or Member on account of alleged crimes or immoral practices unconnected with their duties or obligations as Members or Delegates, when the Delegate or Member possesses all the qualifications to entitle him to his seat.

If we are to go into the question of the moral fitness of a Member to occupy a seat in the House, where will the inquiry stop? What standard shall we fix in determining what is and what is not sufficient cause for expulsion?

The report discusses the possibilities of such moral and political disqualifications being made a pretext for depriving constituences of their representation. To illustrate the reluctance of the House to expel for such reasons, two cases were cited: That of Benjamin G. Harris, of Maryland, who had been convicted of aiding the rebellion, but who was allowed to hold a seat in the Thirty-ninth Congress; [1] and Representative Herbert, of California, who was charged with homicide, but who was not disturbed in his seat.[2]

The committee also laid stress upon the fact that at the previous session the House had declared Mr. Cannon entitled to his seat.

On February 9, 1875, Mr. Smith, of New York, called up the resolution reported by the majority of the committee. The consideration of it was antagonized on behalf of an appropriation bill, and the House voted by a large majority not to consider.[3]

471. The Utah election case of Campbell v. Cannon, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

In 1882 the House declined to permit the oath to be administered to either of two contesting Delegates until the papers in relation to the prima facie right had been examined by a committee.

The House has given to a committee the right to decide on either the prima facie or final right to a seat before authorizing the oath to be administered to a Delegate.

On January 10, 1882,[1] the House proceeded to the consideration of this resolution, offered December 6, 1881:

Resolved, That Allen G. Campbell, Delegate elect from Utah Territory, is entitled to be sworn in as Delegate to this House on his prima facie case.

To this Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the papers in relation to the right to a seat as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah be referred to the Committee on Elections,[2] with instructions to report at as early a day as practicable as to the prima facie right, or the final right, of claimants to the seat as the committee shall deem proper.

After debate the substitute was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

The facts of the case appeared as follows: That Mr. Campbell had the governor's certificate of election; that Mr. George Q. Cannon received 18,568 votes, and Mr. Campbell only 1,357; that Mr. Cannon was a naturalized citizen, and also a Mormon and a polygamist, living with plural wives, and a defender of the institution of polygamy.[3]

472. The Utah election case of Campbell v. Cannon, continued.

A committee having power to report on either prima facie or final right, made a single report on final right only.

Records of returns, duly authenticated by seal, are received as evidence in election cases after the time for taking testimony is closed.

The record of a court of naturalization sufficiently establishes citizenship, even though it be alleged that the certificate of the fact has not been issued regularly.

The court record of naturalization may not be questioned collaterally by evidence impeaching the facts on which the certificate was issued.

On February 28, 1882,[4] the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections in the Utah case of Campbell v. Cannon was submitted to the House. The following is a statement[5] of the essential preliminary facts:

The election out of which it arises was held on November 2, 1880, for the choice of a Delegate from the Territory of Utah. The returns, which were duly filed with the secretary of the Territory, were opened and canvassed by him in the presence of the governor of the Territory on December 14, 1880. The canvass of the votes, which was concluded on January 8, 1881, showed that George Q. Cannon received 18,568 votes, and Allen G. Campbell received 1,357 votes. The law provides that the person having the highest number of votes shall be declared by the governor to be elected. The governor, however, in the mistaken belief that he had the right to go behind the returns, heard evidence and arguments to show that Mr. Cannon was an alien and polygamist, and on these grounds finding them, as he believed, sustained, declared Mr. Cannon ineligible and disqualified to serve as a Delegate. The governor further decided, under an erroneous view of the law, that Mr. Cannon being ineligible, the votes cast for him were void, and Mr. Campbell being a citizen and eligible, and having received the next highest number of votes, was elected. The governor accordingly gave Mr. Campbell a certificate of election, and filed among the records of the Territory, in the office of the secretary thereof, an elaborate opinion containing a full statement of the facts. The secretary of the Territory, on January 10, 1881, gave Mr. Cannon a certified copy of the opinion and declaration of the governor, and also, on January 20, 1881, gave him a certified abstract of all the returns.

[3] Although Mr. Campbell had the certificate of the governor, the Clerk of the preceding. House had placed Mr. Cannon's name on the roll at the opening of the Forty-seventh Congress. The Speaker, however, declined to recognize the roll of delegates, and Mr. Cannon was not sworn in.

[5] This statement is from the views of Mr. F.E. Beltzhoover, of Pennsylvania, who concurred generally with the conclusions of the majority of the committee.

Mr. Cannon notified Mr. Campbell, on February 4, 1881, that he would contest his seat on the ground that he (Cannon) had received a large majority of the votes cast. On February 24, 1881, Mr. Campbell replied to Mr. Cannon's notice that he was not elected, and, if elected, was disqualified by reason of his alienage and polygamy. No testimony was taken by Mr. Cannon in support of his notice during the time allowed to him by law, but on May 9, 1881, and subsequently thereto, testimony was taken by Mr. Campbell to show that Mr. Cannon was a polygamist and an unnaturalized alien, and by Mr. Cannon, in reply, to show his citizenship.

The certificates held by Mr. Cannon and Mr. Campbell and all the papers and testimony in the case were placed in the custody of the Clerk of the Forty-sixth Congress, and by him were handed over to his successor at the organization of the Forty-seventh Congress.

When the Forty-seventh Congress was organized and the Delegates from the Territories were called to be sworn, objection was made to both Mr. Campbell and Mr. Cannon, and neither was admitted. After a full discussion of the question as to which of the two gentlemen had the prima facie right to the seat, it was resolved by the House, on January 13, 1882—

"That the papers in relation to the right to a seat, as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah, be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report, at as early a day as practicable, as to the prima facie right or the final right of the claimants to the seat, as the committee shall deem proper."

While the majority of the committee concurred in a conclusion, they quite generally filed individual views instead of joining in a report. But the views filed by Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, chairman of the committee, who submitted the report to the House, were generally referred to in the debate as representing most nearly the position of the majority.

As to the question of prima facie right, Mr. Calkins took this view, seeming, in doing so, to voice the general opinion of the committee:

At the threshold of this case we were met with a certificate held by Mr. Campbell, the contestee, from the governor of Utah Territory. We decline to enter into a discussion of the prima facie right of Mr. Campbell to take his seat as a Delegate on this certificate, because we construe the action of the House on passing on it as a decision adverse to Mr. Campbell, and, being compelled to report on the whole case, we deem it a piece of supererogation to reopen the case of the prima facie right, being satisfied with the action of the House thereon. We dismiss that part of the case from further consideration.

At the outset Mr. Calkins thus discussed a question of practice:

The next question that meets us is a question of practice raised by the contestee; which is, that there is no competent evidence before the committee relative to the number of votes cast for Mr. Cannon at the last election, and it is therefore contended that, on the certificate issued by the governor to Mr. Campbell, he is entitled pro confesso to the seat on the final hearing.

The facts before us are as follows: A certified transcript made by the secretary of the Territory, under the seal thereof, was filed by Mr. Cannon with the Clerk of the House of Representatives on the —— day of November, 1880, and was duly referred to this committee under a resolution of the House adopted on the —— day of December, 1881. It did not reach the committee at the same time that the other papers in the contest came into its possession, but shortly thereafter it was sent by the Clerk of the House to this committee. These certificates purport on their face to be certified transcripts of the returns made by the county canvassing boards to the secretary of the Territory, under the laws of Utah.

We therefore hold that certificates of election made by county canvassing boards to the secretary of the Territory (under the Territorial law relative to the election of other Territorial officers of the Territory—see secs. 22, 23, and 38, et seq.) constitute the proper mode to be pursued in the Territories in respect to the election of Delegates, and that that mode gives effect to the law which makes it the duty of the governor to canvass the votes and to give a certificate to the person receiving the highest number of votes for Delegate in Congress. It has been the practice of this committee to receive all records duly authenticated by a seal without having them first introduced before the magistrate who takes and certifies the depositions. We know of no other practice that has obtained since the foundation of the Government. This class of evidence has never been held to fall within the meaning of the law passed by Congress relative to contested-election cases. The testimony there referred to is the testimony of witnesses or the introduction of such documents as need identification or further proof before their competency is admitted, and we hold that it does not apply to records and evidence which a seal may make perfect without further identification. If the contestee has been or is surprised at the introduction of this testimony, his proper course is to make application for a continuance, so that he may be allowed to take further testimony. Not having made such application, we presume that he does not wish to avail himself of that course in this case. McCrary seems to hold the better practice to be otherwise (sec. 362), but section 353 so modifies the doctrine first laid down that it is not in conflict with the view the committee take.

This seems to have been the generally accepted view in the committee, although Mr. William G. Thompson, of Iowa, in his views, antagonizes it:

The contestee had a right to the notice required by law; he had a right to be present and cross-examine the witness; he had a right to show that this statement was not the best evidence and demand that investigation be made into the legality of every ballot cast, as well as the qualifications of each elector, and especially so when we find in evidence this strange law upon the statute books of Utah, then and now in force (act of Feb. 12, 1870, sec. 43, ch. 2): "That every woman of the age of twenty-one years who has resided in the Territory six months next preceding any general election, born or naturalized in the United States, or who is a wife or daughter of a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to vote at any election in this Territory."

The acceptance of these returns as evidence disposed necessarily of the question as to whether or not Mr. Cannon received the highest number of legally cast votes for the office of Delegate to Congress.

The next question in issue was:

Was he a citizen of the United States at the time of his election and did he possess the other necessary qualifications?

This question involved the determination of certain facts as to the naturalization of Mr. Cannon. It was alleged that his certificate had not been regularly issued, but the majority considered that the records of the court established it sufficiently. On another point, however, Mr. Calkins said:

The other point made, that Mr. Cannon had not been a resident of any State or Territory of the United States for five years next preceding the date of naturalization, involves quite a novel question. We hold, however, on this point, that the record can not be collaterally questioned, and that therefore it is incompetent to show by evidence in this proceeding that the certificate is null. (Prait v. Cummings, 16 Wend., 616; State v. Penny, 10 Ark., 616; McCarthy v. Marsh, 1 Seld., 263; In re Colman, 15 Blatchf., 406; Spratt v. Spratt, 4 Pet., 393.)

473. The Utah election case of Campbell v. Cannon, continued.

In 1882 the House, by majority vote and for the disqualification of polygamy, excluded Delegate George Q. Cannon, who had not been sworn on his prima facie showing.

A Delegate-elect being excluded for disqualification, the House declined to seat the candidate having the next highest number of votes.

An argument that questions affecting qualifications should be instituted in the House alone and not by proceedings under the law of contest.

In 1882, in a sustained case, the major opinion of the Elections Committee inclined to the view that the constitutional qualifications for a Member did not apply to a Delegate.

An elaborate discussion of the status in the House of a Delegate from a Territory.

The question as to whether or not a law of Congress creating Delegates is binding on the House in succeeding Congresses.

Discussion of the effect, in the matter of qualifications of Delegates, of a law extending the Constitution over a Territory.

The third and last question arising is, Was he a polygamist at the time of his election; and if so, is that a disqualification?

On the question of fact there could be no doubt, for he had given the following written admission:

In the matter of George Q. Cannon. Contest of Allen G. Campbell's right to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States as Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

I, George Q. Cannon, contestant, protesting that the matter in this paper contained is not relevant to the issue, do admit that I am a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, commonly called Mormons; that in accordance with the tenets of said church I have taken plural wives, who now live with me, and have so lived with me for a number of years, and borne me children. I also admit that in my public addresses as a teacher of my religion in Utah Territory I have defended said tenet of said church as being, in my belief, a revelation from God.

GEO. Q. CANNON.

Therefore there remains the question, Does the practice of polygamy disqualify a Delegate? This was the really important question at issue, both in the committee and in the debates on the floor. And its discussion involved the question of the status of Territorial Delegates as distinguished from the status of Members.

Mr. Calkins, in his views, said:

We are now brought face to face with the question whether this House will admit to a seat a Delegate who practices and teaches the doctrine of a plurality of wives, in open violation of the statute of the United States and contrary to the judgment of the civilized world. There are several clauses in our Constitution which may have some bearing on this subject.

Section 2, Article I, of the Constitution is as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States," etc.

SECTION 5.

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business. * * * "

CLAUSE 2.

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with a concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

AMENDMENT I, SECTION 1.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

ARTICLE IV, SECTION 3, CLAUSE 2.

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

These are the provisions of the Constitution which may be held to have some bearing on the question of the qualifications of Delegates.

In the first place, Is a Delegate from a Territory a Member of the House of Representatives within the meaning of the Constitution? The second section of the first article says: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors in the most numerous branch in the State legislature." There is no provision in the Constitution for the election of Delegates to the House of Representatives or to the Senate. They are entirely the creature of statute. They are clearly not within the clause of the Constitution last above quoted, for the House is "composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States;" and nothing is said of the Territories. Delegates have never been regarded as Members in any constitutional sense, because their powers, duties, and privileges on the floor of the House, when admitted, are limited. They may speak for their Territories; they may advocate such measures as they think proper; they may introduce bills and serve on committees; but they are deprived of the right to vote. And we doubt whether Congress could clothe them with the right to vote on measures affecting the people of the States or of the Territories, because they do not represent any integral part of the nation, but simply an unorganized territory belonging to the whole people. Hence Delegates are creatures of statute, and it would be competent at any time for the legislative branch of the Government to abolish the office altogether.

The writer of this report goes further than that. He holds that it is incompetent for Congress and the Executive to impose on any future House the right of Delegates to seats with defined qualifications. That is to say, when the several laws were passed giving the Territories the right to this limited representation, those laws were binding only on the lower House, which permitted them to be or made it possible for them to be passed, and were persuasive only to the Houses of future Congresses. For some purposes each House of Congress is a separate, independent branch of the Government. It is made so by the Constitution. For example, each House is the judge of the elections and returns of its own Members, and neither the Executive nor the Senate can interfere with that constitutional prerogative. Each House is independent in its expenditure of its contingent fund, and in the government of its own officers. It is independent in the formation of its own committees, in clothing them with power to take evidence, to send for persons and papers, and to investigate such matters as are within its jurisdiction. Each House is independent in its power to arrest and to imprison, during the session of the body, such contumacious witnesses as refuse to abide its order. In many other instances that may be cited each House acts independently of the other. And with reference to the election of Delegates, who (if they hold any office or franchise at all) can be nothing but agents representing the property and common territory of all the people, it operates only on the lower branch of Congress, for their election extends no right to them to interfere with the business of the Senate or to act as members thereof. This must not be construed into an opinion that the writer holds that the House of Representatives may disregard any law which Congress has the constitutional power to pass. Such laws are as binding upon this House as upon any citizen or court. Nor does the writer of this report mean to be understood that it is not competent for Congress to provide, under the Constitution, for legislative representation for Territories, but it is denied that Congress can bind the House by any law respecting the qualification of a Delegate. It can not affix a qualification by law for a Delegate and bind any House except the one assenting thereto. The qualification of Members is fixed by the Constitution. Hence they may not be added to or taken from by law. But as to Delegates, they are not constitutional officers. Their qualification depends entirely upon such a standard as the body to which they are attached may make. It is urged this means a legal qualification. This is admitted; but that legal qualification is remitted to the body to which the Delegate is attached, because it is the sole judge of that requisite. It is unfettered by constitutional restrictions and can not yield any part of this prerogative to the other branch of Congress or the Executive. If it could, the right to amend would follow, and the House might find itself in the awkward position of having the Senate fixing qualifications to Delegates, or the Executive vetoing laws fixing them, and by this means the power which by the Constitution resides alone in the House would be entirely abrogated.

It is claimed this is an autocratic power. This is admitted. All legislative bodies are autocratic in their powers unless restricted by written constitutions. In this instance there is no restriction.

It is contended that the act of Congress extending the Constitution and laws of the United States over the Territory of Utah, in all cases where they are applicable, extends the constitutional privilege to Delegates and clothes them with membership as constitutional officers of the House. We can not assent to that view. The very language of the act itself only extends the Constitution and laws over the Territory in cases where they are applicable. They can not be applicable to the election of a Delegate; for if they were, then Congress would have no authority to deprive a Delegate of the right to vote. To contend that the applicability of the Constitution in that respect extends to Delegates proves too much. It is clear, therefore, that that clause of the Constitution relative to the expulsion of a Member by a two-thirds vote cannot apply to Delegates, because they hold no constitutional office. It is equally clear that the clause of the Constitution relative to elections, returns, and qualifications of Members has no applicability except by parity of reasoning; and we do not dissent from the view that, so far as the qualification of citizenship and other necessary qualifications (except as to age) are concerned, they extend to Delegates as well as to Members. (Sec. 1906, R. S. U. S.) This is made so, probably, by the statute, expressly so to all the Territories except to Utah Territory, and inferentially to that Territory. It follows, as a logical sequence, that the House may at any time, by a majority vote, exclude from the limited membership which it now extends to Delegates from Territories any person whom it may judge to be unfit for any reason to hold a seat as a Delegate.

It can not be said that polygamy can be protected under that clause of the Constitution protecting everyone in the worship of God according to the dictates of his own conscience and prohibiting the passage of laws preventing the free exercise thereof.

It is true that vagaries may be indulged by persons under this clause of the Constitution when they do not violate law or outrage the considerate judgment of the civilized world. But when such vagaries trench upon good morals, and debauch or threaten to debauch public morals, such practice should be prohibited by law like any other evil not practiced as a matter of pretended conscience.

The views which we have just expressed render it unnecessary for us to discuss further the various propositions involved. In the face of this admission of Mr. Cannon we feel compelled to say that a representative from that Territory should be free from the taint and obloquy of plural wives. Having admitted that he practices, teaches, and advises others to the commission of that offense, we feel it our duty to say to the people of that Territory that we will exclude such persons from representing them in this House. In saying this we desire to cast no imputation on the contestant personally, because of his deportment and conduct in all other respects he is certainly the equal of any other person on this floor.

Mr. F. E. Beltzhoover, in his views, presented the question of qualification in a somewhat different light:

The only portion of the Constitution of the United States which refers to the Territories is Article IV, section 3, clause 2, which provides:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

This clause of the fundamental law has received the most learned and elaborate consideration by the Supreme Court in Scott v. Sanford (19 Howard, 393, etc.), wherein, after going fully into the whole history of the Territories from the time of the first cession to the Government, it is held that this clause—

"Applies only to territory within the chartered limits of some one of the States when they were colonies of Great Britain, and which was surrendered by the British Government to the old confederation of the States in the treaty of peace. It does not apply to territory acquired by the present Federal Government by treaty or conquest from a foreign nation."

To all other territory it is held that the Constitution does not extend, and can not be extended by Congress, except in so far as Congress may enact the provisions of the Constitution into a part of the organic law of such territory. This has been done in regard to Utah, first by the act of Congress which organized that Territory, and which provides that "the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable."

The Revised Statutes, sec. 1891, provides in somewhat different language, but of the same purport, that "the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall," etc.

The Constitution and all the laws of the United States are, therefore, a part of the statute law of the Territory of Utah, so far as they are applicable locally to that Territory.

Now, what was the design of the framers of the Constitution in reference to the territory which they provided for in the clause which we have quoted above? The history of the subject clearly shows that they intended to commit the unorganized territories wholly to the discretion and unlimited power of Congress. This is so decided by the courts in all the cases in which the subject is considered; this was so held in Scott v. Sanford (supra), and Judge Nelson, in Benner v. Porter (9 Howard, 235), says:

"They are not organized under the Constitution nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government or the organic law, but are the creatures exclusively of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control."

It is held by Judge Story that "the power of Congress over the public Territories is clearly exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions, or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled." (Story, Constitution, sec. 1328; Rawle, Constitution, p. 237; 1 Kent's Commentaries, p. 243.)

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a very recent case, says: "The power is subject to no limitations." (Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall.7 99.)

See also Stacey v. Abbott (I Am. Law, T. R., 94), where it is held by the supreme court of one of the Territories that they "are not organized under the Constitution; they are exclusively the creatures of Congress."

But there is something more shown by the history of the clause in the Constitution in reference to Territories and by the decisions of the courts thereon. It is clear from both these that it was never intended that the status of the Territories should in any respect approach so near the character and position of sovereign States as to require that whatever agents these Territories might be entitled to on the floor of Congress, should have the status and qualifications of Members of Congress. The Territories in the minds of the framers of the Constitution had none of the rights and attributes of the States. No other parts of the Constitution were made to apply to them except the clause we have quoted. On the contrary, they were spoken of as property, and power was given to Congress to dispose of them as property, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting them as other property of the United States. They were put in the same category with the other chattels of the Government. There is, therefore, nothing in the Constitution which will justify us in believing in the light of its history that the qualifications of agents who might be appointed to look after the interests of the Territories on the floor of Congress should be the same or even like those of Members of Congress. This is so, we maintain, with regard even to that Territory over which the Constitution extends directly and immediately, because it was within the control of the Government at the time the Constitution was framed. If, therefore, the Constitution did not contemplate the requirement of such qualifications for Delegates as agents of the Territory within its immmediate purview, with much less plausibility can it be contended that it should require them where it is only extended as a part of the statute law. The Constitution clearly puts it in the power of Congress to say at any time and in any way it may see proper what qualifications it will exact of the agents whom as a matter of grace and discretion it permits to come from the Territories into its deliberations, and to sit among its Members. Neither the Senate nor the Executive, nor any other power on earth, has any right to interfere except by permission in fixing the qualifications for admission to the House; and the concurrence and cooperation of the Senate and Executive in the passage of any enactment on the subject can go no further in giving it force and validity than to make it a persuasive rule of action which the House is at liberty to follow or disregard." Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members." No law that was ever passed on this subject, which is under the exclusive and unlimited control of Congress, by any former Congress is binding on any subsequent Congress. Each Congress may wholly repudiate all such acts with entire propriety. It is customary to regard them as rules of conduct. This is well illustrated by the doctrine laid down by McCrary in his Law of Elections, section 349, in reference to the laws made to govern contested elections:

"The Houses of Congress, when exercising their authority and jurisdiction to decide upon the election, returns, and qualifications' of Members, are not bound by the technical rules which govern proceedings in courts of justice. Indeed, the statutes to be found among the acts of Congress regulating the mode of conducting an election contest in the House of Representatives are directory only, and are not and can not be made mandatory under the Constitution. In practice these statutory regulations are often varied, and sometimes wholly departed from. They are convenient as rules of practice, and of course will be adhered to unless the House, in its discretion, shall in a given case determine that the ends of justice require a different course of action. They constitute wholesome rules, not to be departed from without cause. It is not within the constitutional power of Congress, by a legislative enactment or otherwise, to control either House in the exercise of its exclusive right to be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

"The laws that have been enacted on this subject being therefore only directory and not absolutely binding, would have been more appropriately passed as mere rules of the House of Representatives, since by their passage it may be claimed that the House conceded the right of the Senate to share with it in this duty and power conferred by the Constitution. It is presumed, however, that the provisions in question were enacted in the form of a statute rather than a mere rule of the House, in order to give them more general publicity, etc."

It is also important to observe the wide distinction which Congress has always made between the powers and status of a Member of Congress and a Delegate from a Territory.

A Member of Congress is sent by a State by virtue of its irrefragable right to representation under the Constitution of the United States. This right Congress can not abrogate or control or limit or modify in any way.

A Delegate is an agent of a Territory, sent under the authority or permission of an act of Congress. This right or permission is subject to the merest whim and caprice of Congress. It can be utterly wiped out or modified or changed just as Congress may see proper at any time.

A Member of Congress must have certain qualifications under the Constitution.

A Delegate need have none but what Congress sees fit to provide.

A Member of Congress is the representative and custodian of the political power and interests of a sovereign State, which is itself a factor and part of the Government.

A Delegate has no political power, but is only a business agent of the Territory, for the purest business purposes. He has no right to vote or aid in shaping the policy of the Government in war or peace.

A Member of Congress is an officer named in the Constitution of the United States, and contemplated and provided by the framers thereof at the time of the organization of the Government. He is a constitutional officer.

A Delegate is not a constitutional officer in the remotest sense. There were no Delegates mentioned or thought of by the framers of the Constitution.

A Member of Congress is chosen under section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, which provides that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

This specifically and definitely and indubitably fixes how and where and by whom Members of Congress shall be chosen and what qualifications they must imperatively have. "No person shall be a Representative," etc., without these qualifications.

A Delegate is chosen under section 1862 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

"Every Territory shall have the right to send a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress, who shall be elected by the voters of the Territory qualified to elect members of the legislative assembly thereof. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected, and a certificate shall be given accordingly. Every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right of debating, but not of voting."

This fully and very clearly provides how Delegates shall be chosen and what power they shall have, but does not exact or provide any qualifications or hint at any. This is the same provision substantially which has been made for Delegates from 1787 down to this time. The provision in the act of July 13,1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, is that the joint assembly of that Territory "shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a Delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress with the right of debating, but not of voting."

These few marked points of distinction between the two offices not only show that the constitutional qualifications for members do not apply to Delegates, but that none of the legislation which has ever been enacted on the subject seems to have been founded on the belief that they did.

CONGRESS HAS ADDED TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUALIFICATIONS OF MEMBERS; WHY NOT OF DELEGATES.

But admitting for the purposes of this discussion, what can not be maintained, that the same qualifications which entitle a Member of Congress to admission shall also entitle a Delegate to the same right, and I still hold that Congress has the right and power to say that a polygamist shall not be admitted as a Delegate. Under the high power inherent in every organization on earth to preserve its integrity and existence Congress has the indubitable right to keep out of its councils any person whom it believes to be dangerous and hostile to the Government.

During the war almost the whole Congressional delegation from the State of Kentucky were halted at the bar of the House, and, on the objection of a Member, were not permitted to be sworn until it was ascertained whether they or either of them were guilty of disloyal practices. They had each every qualification usually required by the Constitution; they were duly and regularly elected and returned; they were sent by a sovereign State, holding all her relations in perfect accord with the Federal Government; but the House proceeded to inquire into each case, and not until a reasonable investigation was had were any of them admitted. The committee which had the matter in charge reported, and the House adopted and laid down, the following rule on the subject of all such cases:

"Whenever it is shown by proof that the claimant has, by act of speech, given aid or countenance to the rebellion he should not be permitted to take the oath, and such acts or speech need not be such as to constitute treason technically, but must have been so overt and public, and must have been done or said under such circumstances, as fairly to show that they were actually designed to, and in their nature tended to, forward the cause of the rebellion."

In the case of John Young Brown, who was among the number, the committee almost unanimously reported against his right to admission on the ground that he had written an imprudent and disloyal letter; nothing more. He had never committed an act of treason. He was never arrested or tried or convicted. He denied all treasonable intent in the letter and made every effort in his power to explain and extenuate his offense. But seven out of the nine members of the Committee on Elections of the Fortieth Congress reported that he "was not entitled to take the oath of office, or to be admitted to the House as a Representative from the State of Kentucky." This report was adopted by the House by a vote of 108 to 43. The minority report in that case made an argument against the action of the majority in almost the same words and on identically the same grounds that the minority of the Committee on Elections occupy in the case under consideration. It was argued that Mr. Brown had all the constitutional qualifications, and that Congress had no right to exact more; that in any event he had never been tried or convicted of treason, and unless convicted of the crime even treason was no disqualification. But Congress then laid down the rule above given, and never abrogated since, that, in addition to the ordinary constitutional requirements, every man must be well disposed and loyal toward the Government before he can be admitted to Congress to aid in forming its policy and controlling its destinies.

The act of July 2, 1862, providing what is known as the iron-clad oath, added a new and marked qualification to those required of Members of Congress prior to that time, and every Member who has taken that oath since has submitted to the exaction of that additional qualification. The distinguished counsel who argued the case of Mr. Cannon before the Committee on Elections felt the force of this act, and the long-continued practice of Congress under it and explained it as a war measure. He said:

"The grounds upon which this law was vindicated, although not stated with much care or precision, are nevertheless clearly enough disclosed by the debates. It was enacted as a war measure. The iron-clad oath was adopted as the countersign which should, in time of war, exclude domestic enemies from the civil administration of the Government, in the same manner and for the same reason that the military countersign was employed to exclude those enemies from the military lines of the army. It was enacted as a measure of defense against an armed enemy in time of war, and was as necessary and as justifiable as any other war measure not specifically marked out in the text of the Constitution."

If Congress could, almost without challenge, provide and add such a distinct and imperative qualification, not for Delegate but for a Member of Congress, in 1862, why may we not in 1882 ask a reasonable additional qualification for a Delegate from a Territory who does not come within the letter or spirit of the Constitution? The act of 1862 was a bold and radical assertion of the doctrine of self-preservation on the part of Congress to maintain its integrity and the purity and loyalty of its counsels. The resolution recommended by the majority of the Committee on Elections only says to the people of Utah, you shall not abuse the privilege of representation which we allowed you on the floor of Congress, by sending as your Delegate a person who adheres to an organization that is hostile to the interests of free government, and whose doctrines and practices are offensive to the masses of the moral people of the great nation we represent.

CONCLUSION.

The following is a summary of the reasons for my concurrence in the resolutions of the majority of the committee:

1. The history of the cession and organization of the Territory, which belonged to the Federal Government at the time of its formation, the history of the clause in the Constitution which relates to that Territory, and the Constitution itself, all show clearly that it was not contemplated or intended that Delegates which might be sent from said Territory, then immediately under the Constitution, should have the same qualifications as Members of Congress.

2. The Constitution does not extend over Utah, except as a part of the statute law provided for that Territory by Congress, and there is, therefore, more reason for holding that the qualifications required for Members of Congress by the Constitution do not extend to Delegates from that Territory than there is in relation to Delegates from Territory immediately under the Constitution.

3. The Constitution not only does not provide that Delegates shall have the same qualifications as Members of Congress, but no law, in almost a century of legislation on the subject, has so provided.

4. There is no reason why the qualifications of Delegates should be the same as those of Members of Congress. Their status and dudes and powers are widely different, and their qualifications should be made to conform to those powers and duties, which in case of Delegates are purely of a local and business character.

5. The Territories can only be held and governed by Congress with one single purpose in view, which is to adapt and prepare them for admission as States of the Union. It will hardly be contended that Utah will ever be admitted as a State while polygamy dominates it, or that it is preparing it for admission as a State to hold out to its people the delusive doctrine that a polygamist is not disqualified as a Member of Congress, and therefore that polygamy is no bar to the admission of Utah to the Union.

6. No law fixing the qualifications of Delegates passed by any former Congress would be binding on any subsequent Congress. Each House shall be the judge of the qualifications of its own Members, and, for a much stronger reason, it should be the exclusive judge of the qualifications of the Delegates, which are its creatures and which it admits as matter of its own discretion.

7. Congress has held, from 1862 down to this time, that it has the right to prevent the admission of persons as Members who are hostile to the Government by excluding them on that ground, although they possess all the other qualifications required by the Constitution; with much more propriety, and much less stretch of power, Congress has the right to exclude a Delegate who is not well disposed toward the Government, and who openly defies its laws.

Mr. Ambrose A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, took a different view as to the course of procedure desirable:

2. I agree in the main with the report of the chairman, wherein he says, in substance, that it is clear that the clause of the Constitution relative to elections, returns, and qualifications of Members applies and extends to Delegates, and that substantially the same qualifications (unless it be as to age) are prescribed for both Member and Delegate.

I would add to the concession the assertion that the rule of construction which has been established in regard to Constitution relating to Members, to wit, that other qualifications can not be added to those specified, and none taken away, applies for the same reason to Delegates, when the qualifications for them are prescribed and specified by statute; also, what is undoubted law, that judging of the qualifications comprehends only a determination of the question whether the Member or Delegate answers the qualifications prescribed as the conditions of his eligibility.

The manifest intent of the Constitution was to fix certain things as unalterable conditions of eligibility, and leave all else for the electors to judge of and determine for themselves. Congress has shown the same intention in statutes erecting Territorial governments, and giving a right of qualified representation. So firmly has the House adhered to this fundamental principle of a representative government that the uniform rule of Congress has been not to entertain questions of alleged bad personal character in judging of what are called "qualifications." In exercising the right of expulsion even the established rule has been not to expel for bad character or even crimes committed before the election and known to the electors at the time. (McCrary, secs. 521, 522, 523.) A few cases connected with the rebellion, and arising out of known disloyalty, are exceptions, but they stand on different grounds. A Delegate's power was so limited and circumscribed that some of the organic acts did not even prescribe citizenship as a condition of eligibility, and Congress held it to be implied, as in the Michigan case. (White's case, Hall and Clark, p. 85.)

It follows that all this committee has to do on this point is to see whether Mr. Cannon was eligible or had the prescribed qualifications.

3. It is sought to avoid the conclusion to which the doctrine of the last point leads, on what I consider most untenable and dangerous grounds. They contravene fundamental principles of law, and a practice which has existed from the beginning of the Government.

Mr. Strong, in 1850, then on Election Committee of the House, since an illustrious judge upon the bench of the United States Supreme Court, has forcibly illustrated and stated that all admissions of Delegates to a seat are by virtue of established laws, and not by grace or within the discretion of the House. (See Smith's case, Messervy's case, Babbitt's case, 1 Bartlett, pp. 109, 117, 116.) Showing that he has been admitted only by right from the formation of the confederation down to the Constitution, and since to this time.

It is said that a Delegate is not named in the Constitution and is not the creature of the same, while a Member is, and that his admission to a seat is ex gratia. The legal purport of the opposite contention, when expressed in words, is: "It is incompetent for Congress and the Executive to impose on any future House the right of a Delegate to a seat;" "they (the acts) were persuasive only to the Houses of future Congresses;" and, "in short, it may be said that Delegates sit in the lower House by its grace and permission, and that it makes no difference whether that permission is expressed in a statute or in a mere resolution of the House. The House can disregard it and refuse to be bound by it, because it affects (somewhat) the organization and membership of the House alone."

It does not change the legal purport, in my judgment, to say Congress had no power to impose upon the House a Delegate "with defined qualifications." I concede that powers could not be conferred upon a Delegate which would infringe upon the constitutional rights of State representation or those of a full Member.

The gist of this doctrine is that a statute which the Constitution authorizes Congress to make may be set aside and made null and void at the pleasure of one branch of the lawmaking power.

If the Constitution authorizes Congress to enact the statutes relating to the Territories, and give a Delegate, duly elected and returned, with the requisite qualifications, a right to a seat and to debate, without a right to vote, no power under heaven can rightfully deprive him of these rights and privileges except Congress itself, by some other statute passed by both Houses.

The doctrine must lead to this: That the statutes organizing the Territories, with such powers and rights, are not authorized by the Constitution, and are void, unless the House sees fit to observe them. But this clause of the Constitution has been sanctioned and sustained as authorizing such things too often to require any discussion of the subject.

How the sitting of a Delegate can be said to infringe upon any constitutional rights of a Member I fail to see. Nobody pretends that the statute attempts to make him a Member in the full sense of that term, and he is not a creature of the Constitution in the exact sense of that term, but he is a creature of a statute which that instrument authorizes, and can subsist and enjoy his rights and privileges without infringing upon the constitutional rights of a Member, and that is enough to sustain the statute as valid; and, if so, it is not merely "persuasive" on all future Houses, but absolutely binding on their consciences, and must be obeyed. It can be disregarded only in the exercise of a power without the right, as a sort of usurpation of authority.

The right of representation on the part of the Territory and of a Delegate to his seat has always been accorded as such, and not as a grace or favor, save as the grace and favor of Congress, and not of one House alone. The doctrine contended for strikes at the very root of the right of representation conferred, and commits the Delegate to the discretion and caprice of the House, instead of the full law-making power.

"The organic law of a Territory takes the place of a constitution as the fundamental law of the local government. It is obligatory on and binds the Territorial authorities, but Congress is supreme, and for the purposes of this department of its governmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution. * * *

"It may do for the Territories what the people under the Constitution of the United States may do for the States." (Waite, Ch. J., in Bank v. County of Yankton, 101 U. S., 133.)

It follows that Congress, and Congress alone, can give rights by statute law, adopting and applying, if they please, the principles of the Constitution so far as they can be made applicable, and imposing likewise reciprocal obligations upon every other branch of the Government and the people, so the rights conferred may be guaranteed and enforced.

The section 1891 of the Revised Statutes extends over Territories the laws and Constitution of the United States, except so far as locally inapplicable, and this was designed to give a representative form of government and republican institutions to Territories, which were incipient or prospective States, and give the Constitution effect as law, with reciprocal rights and obligations.

A Delegate becomes in one sense a Member, and yet not properly so called. He is enough so to render applicable in spirit the law in regard to contested elections, which in terms applies only to Members, the clause of the Constitution which makes the House judges of the qualifications, returns, etc., of the Members and the other one which relates to the expulsion of Members. (Maxwell v. Cannon, Forty-third Congress.)

The analogy, if justified at all, must be carried and applied all through, and such has been the uniform precedent and practice heretofore. The law should not be changed to meet the strain of a special desire in an individual case.

The discussion in Maxwell v. Cannon covers the whole subject-matter, and I adopt its doctrine in the main.

I feel very clear that the organic act of Utah and the Revised Statutes, including sections 1860, 1862, and 1863, are constitutional and valid and as such binding upon the House as much as on anybody else.

Section 1862 reads: "Every Territory shall have the right to send a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress, who shall be elected by the voters in the Territory qualified to elect members of the legislative assembly thereof. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected, and a certificate shall be given accordingly. Every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right of debating, but not of voting."

It is to be observed that the language is, "shall have a seat," etc., and we may as well reject everything else as that.

4. It follows, in my judgment, that Mr. Cannon, being eligible and duly elected and returned, makes out his legal right to a seat under the statutes, and having found thus much his "final right" is determined, subject only to the right which the House has to expel him by a two-thirds vote.

The resolution of reference is not to determine which claimant has the strongest case of favor or grace, but which has the "right," i. e., the legal right, and we must find this much only. If no legal right whatever, then we can find that and say so only under this resolution.

5. The only objection urged is polygamy.

My position on that point is: It is not a disqualification affecting the legal right, but concerns only the dignity of the House, and an investigation into matters which concern that alone must be instituted in the House, and can not be started in a contest made by a contestant; for the contest embraced and committed to the committee under chapter 8, page 17, Revised Statutes, affects only the legal right. (Maxwell v. Cannon, adopted by McCrary, S. 528.)

The reason for it is apparent and sound, otherwise any outsider, or pretender, or a real contestant, or contestee, may proceed to take evidence of and spread upon the record any amount of scandal or any charge affecting the moral character the private character of any Member of the House.

The House must alone proceed to vindicate its own dignity and character, and does not allow anyone outside of it to start and take evidence for them on that subject unless by special order. Such an investigation is usually referred to a special committee.

The principle involved is of more importance than the seating or unseating of any one Member.

I agree with all that is in the report against polygamy, and in the duty of Congress to obviate by law its evils, so far as is possible, but let it be done by law and not in violation of law.

If Mr. Cannon is eligible under existing law and was duly elected and returned, as we find, we give him his legal right to a seat because the law (sec. 1862) says he shall have it.

We can then exercise our right and expel him under another independent provision of the Constitution upon a proceeding started and conducted in the usual and the legal way. We have his admission, put in under protest, and may act on that if sufficient and if he does not demand a hearing.

Minority views signed by Messrs. S.W. Moulton, of Illinois; Gibson Atherton, of Ohio; L.H. Davis, of Missouri; and G.W. Jones, of Texas, took the view that Mr. Cannon was not disqualified, and was entitled to the seat.

The grave and important question as to whether polygamy is a disqualification for the office of Delegate from the Territories we think is settled by the Constitution, the laws, and the uniform practice of the Government since its formation, now nearly one hundred years.

As to who shall hold seats in Congress, there are two distinct provisions of the Constitution:

Section 5, Article I of the Constitution is as follows:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business. * * *"

This provision in its operation requires only a majority vote.

Such has been the general practice of the House.

The other provision is, "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member." (Second clause, sec. 5, Art. I.)

The qualifications of Representatives are prescribed by the second section of the first article of the Constitution: They shall be 25 years of age, seven years a citizen of the United States, and, when elected, be inhabitants of the State in which they shall be chosen.

This committee is to report upon "the prima facie right or the final right of the claimants to the seat as the committee shall deem proper."

It must be conceded, as we have seen, that Cannon has an overwhelming majority of the votes cast for Delegate to Congress.

We think, also, it must be conceded, from the facts evidenced in the case by the record, that Cannon possesses the constitutional qualifications prescribed by second section of Article I of the Constitution.

Mr. Cannon, at the time of his election, was over 25 years of age, had been seven years a citizen of the United States, and was an inhabitant of the Territory in which he was chosen. These are the only qualifications to be considered.

There is no power, State or Federal, under the Constitution by which these qualifications can be changed, enlarged, or modified in any manner.

The authorities upon this question are all one way.

In the report of the Committee on Elections of the House in the Forty-third Congress, in the case of Maxwell against Cannon, and upon this point, the committee say:

"The practice of the House has been so uniform and seems so entirely in harmony with the letter of the Constitution that the committee can but regard the jurisdictional question as a bar to the consideration of qualifications other than those above specified."

This is the rule we think should be applied to the case before the House.

The following are some of the authorities on this point: Story on the Constitution, sections 625–627; the contested-election cases of Fouk v. Trumbull and Turney v. Marshall from the State of Illinois (1 Bartlett, 168; McCrary, Election Laws, sections 227, 228, 252); Donnelly v. Washburn, Forty-sixth Congress; the case of Wittemore in Forty-first Congress; the case of Matteson in the Thirty-fifth Congress; the case of Benjamin G. Harris, are all in point.

But it is said that it may be conceded that the rule above stated as to the power of the House relating to Members is correct, but that a Delegate from the Territories is not a constitutional officer, and does not as to qualification stand upon the same ground as a Member from a State, and that the constitutional provision does not apply to a Delegate; that he is a nondescript, and has no right and can claim no protection under the Constitution.

So far as our research has extended since the formation of the Government we can find no case reported that makes any distinction between the qualifications of a Member from a State and a Delegate from the Territory.

Whenever that question has arisen the rule as to qualifications has been the constitutional provision, and this has been applied to the Delegates from the Territories. The case of James White, decided in 1794, is not an exception.

It may be that in express terms the Constitution does not apply to Territories; but the spirit and reason of the Constitution does apply and establishes a proper standard.

If the constitutional standard is not adopted as to qualifications, then there is no rule for the government of the House as to Delegates.

The House at this session may establish one rule, and the next session may revoke or establish another and different one, and the right of a Delegate would be wholly uncertain.

There are laws that have been passed by Congress touching this subject that give color to the views we present. These laws show that a Delegate, except as to a vote in the House, is put upon the same footing as a Member from a State.

Besides, there has always been the same practice from the formation of the Government as to Delegates and Members by referring their cases to the Committee on Elections, both being treated alike in this respect.

The time, manner, and places of elections of Members of Congress, including Delegates from the Territories, are prescribed and made the same by 14 United States Statutes, sections 25, 26, and 27.

By section 30, Revised Statutes, the oath of office of Members of Congress and Delegates from the Territories is prescribed, and is the same for a Delegate as a Member.

It is important to remark that this statute was passed June 1, 1789, and has ever since been the law.

Section 35, Revised Statutes, provides that Members and Delegates are to be paid the same salary.

Section 51 provides that vacancies in the case of Delegates are to be filled in the same way as in case of Members.

The organic law for Utah, September, 1850, provides:

"That the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable."

This is a law of Congress passed by virtue of the Constitution, and is binding on Congress until repealed.

Now, why is the provision of the Constitution relating to qualification of Members not applicable to the Territories? What reason can be given why it should not apply? What better standard for qualification can be made?

The adoption of the rule establishes uniformity and certainty, the operation is salutary, and its adoption since the formation of the Government demonstrates its advantages and necessity.

The argument is made that a Delegate is not a constitutional officer, and, therefore, not a Member of the House in the sense of the Constitution, and that the House may seat or unseat a Delegate at will.

We believe this is the first time since the formation of the Government that this argument has been advanced.

If a Delegate from a Territory is not a Member by virtue of the Constitution and laws, then what rule or law do you apply to him? Is it the arbitrary will or caprice of the House at each session?

If, as is said, a Delegate is not a Member, certainly you can not invoke any provision of the Constitution as to qualification or expulsion.

The constitutional rule wholly fails upon this theory.

It would follow from this view that the constitutional right of the House to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its Members does not apply to Delegates, and therefore the House is without constitutional power in the premises, and that whatever power the House possesses as to Delegates it must be derived from some other source.

The extraordinary and dangerous doctrine is advanced by the majority of the committee—

"That the Delegates sit in the lower House by its grace and permission, and it makes no difference whether that permission is expressed in a statute or mere resolution of the House.

"The House can at any time disregard it and refuse to be bound by it.

"It [Congress] can not affix a qualification by law for a Delegate and bind any House except the one assenting thereto. Congress cannot bind the House by any law as to the qualification of a Delegate."

Our opinion is that it is competent for Congress, by a proper statute, to provide for the election in the Territories of Delegates to Congress, under Article IV, section 3, clause 2:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

It has been decided under this article of the Constitution a great many times that it gives Congress the right to legislate for the Territories, and to make such laws and rules as may be for the advantage of the Territories and of the country.

Now, under this clause of the Constitution, if, in the opinion of Congress, in making needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories, it should be necessary to provide for the election of a Delegate from said Territory to this House, and Congress should so provide that said Delegate should have a seat and the right to debate, could the House alone nullify that law and refuse to seat the Delegate?

Why is not the House bound by constitutional laws? What right has the House to nullify and refuse to obey a law it has helped to make?

We have already referred to various laws of Congress making express provisions for the election of Delegates from the Territories, giving them a right to a seat in the House, and generally applying the same rules to Delegates as Members, except Delegates have not the right to vote.

Also, as we have seen, the organic law of Utah adopts the Constitution and laws of the United States, so far as applicable, as a part of that organic law.

Also, section 1891, Revised Statutes, gives the Constitution and laws force and effect in all the Territories, so far as applicable.

The law-making department of the Government has made these various laws in a constitutional way, and until repealed they are binding upon every individual in the land and every department of the Government, including Congress. No one is above the laws in this country.

Certainly one House alone can not repeal a law of Congress nor nullify it by any direct or indirect proceeding. It is absolutely bound by the law.

If Congress has the right to make a law and provide for the election of Delegates to this House, and if the constitutional qualifications do not apply to them, and there is no statute fixing their qualifications, it would seem to follow that the House would be bound to admit as a Delegate under the law such persons as the people of the Territory might elect to represent them, however obnoxious they might be to the House. The people of the Territory being satisfied, no one else can complain.

Suppose Congress should pass a law providing that Cabinet officers should be allowed seats in the House, with the privilege of answering questions put to them relating to the Executive Department, and the other Departments of which they were chief, and with the right to debate.

Then, could the House refuse to permit these officers seats and the privileges accorded to them under the law?

Could the House refuse them a seat on the ground that they were not qualified, and set up some fanciful standard of qualifications not prescribed by the statute?

Could the House exclude them under the law upon the ground that they were heretics, or Mormons, or polygamists—Catholics, Democrats, Republicans, or Greenbackers?

Would not the House be bound to obey the law that had been made by Congress and permit the Cabinet to seats, however offensive they might be personally?

The logic of the majority of the committee is that one House alone could nullify the laws and exclude ad libitum.

In the Forty-third Congress, in the case of Maxwell v. Cannon, precisely the same question was involved in that case as in the one before the committee.

The question was stated this way:

"That George Q. Cannon is not qualified to represent said Territory or to hold his seat in the Forty-third Congress, for the reason, as shown by the evidence, that he, on and before the day of the election, in, August, 1872, was openly living and cohabiting— with four women, as his wives, in Salt Lake City, in Utah Territory, and he is still living and cohabiting with them."

On the question of qualifications, and the effect of making the Constitution a part of the law by act of Congress, the committee say:

"It being conceded that the contestee has these qualifications, one other inquiry only under this head remains, to wit: Does the same rule apply in considering the case of a Delegate as a Member of this House? This question seems not to have been raised heretofore. The act organizing the Territory of Utah, approved September 9, 1850, enacts that the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and declared to be in force in, said Territory of Utah, so far as the same, or any provision thereof, may be applicable. It was said, on the argument, that the Constitution can not be extended over the Territories by act of Congress, and the views of Mr. Webster were quoted in support of this position.

"We do not deem it necessary to consider that question, because it will not be denied that Congress had the power to make the Constitution a part of the statutory law of the Territory as much as any portion of the organic act thereof. For the purposes of this inquiry it makes no difference whether the Constitution is to be treated as constitutional or statutory law. If either, it is entitled to be considered in disposing of this case."

Upon this point there does not seem to have been any difference of opinion in the committee.

The committee, in the same case, referring to the question of polygamy, say:

"The question raised in the specification of contestant's counsel, and above transcribed, is a grave one, and unquestionably demands the consideration of the House. This committee, while having no desire to shrink from its investigation, finds itself confronted with the question of jurisdiction under the order referring the case.

"The Committee on Elections was organized under and pursuant to article 1, section 5, of the Constitution, which declares: 'Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.' The first standing committee appointed by the House of Representatives was the Committee on Elections. It was chosen by ballot, on the 13th day of April, 1789; and from that time to this, in the vast multitude of cases considered by it, with a few unimportant exceptions, in which the point seems to have escaped notice, the range of its inquiry has been limited to the execution of the power conferred by the above provision of the Constitution.

"What are the qualifications here mentioned and referred to the Committee on Elections? Clearly, the constitutional qualifications, to wit, that the claimant shall have attained the age of 25 years, been seven years a citizen of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen. The practice of the House has been so uniform, and seems so entirely in harmony with the letter of the Constitution, that the committee can but regard the jurisdictional question as a bar to the consideration of qualifications other than those above specified, mentioned in the notice of contest, and here in before alluded to.

"We conclude that the question submitted to us, under the order of the House, comes within the same principles of jurisidiction as if the contestee were a Member, instead of a Delegate."

The minority said:

"It is admitted in the report, and the fact has not been and is not denied, that Mr. Cannon possesses the constitutional qualifications, unless the qualifications of a Delegate in Congress from a Territory differ from the qualifications fixed by the Constitution for a Member of the House. There can be no sufficient reason assigned for the position that the qualifications are any different.* * * The line of demarkation between these two great powers of the Home, the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, by a mere majority vote, and the power to expel its Members by two-thirds vote, is clear and well defined."

The "views" of the minority on the point were further expressed in these words:

"But a graver question than those we have considered is the question whether the House ought, as matter of policy, or to establish a precedent, to expel either a Delegate or Member on account of alleged crimes or immoral practices, unconnected with their duties or obligations as Members or Delegates, when the Member or Delegate possesses all the qualifications to entitle him to his seat.

"If we are to go into the question of the moral fitness of a Member to occupy a seat in the House, where will the inquiry stop? What standard shall we fix in determining what is and what is not sufficient cause for expulsion? If a number of Members engage in the practice of gaming for money or other valuable thing, or are accused of violating the marital vow by intimate association with four women, three of whom are not lawful wives, or are charged with any other offense, and a majority of the House, or even two-thirds, expel them, it may be the recognition of a dangerous power and policy. If exercised and adopted by one political party to accomplish partisan ends, it furnishes a precedent which it will be insisted justifies similar action by the opposite party, when they have a majority or a two-thirds majority in the House; and thus the people are deprived of representation, and their Representatives, possessing the necessary qualifications, are expelled for causes outside of the constitutional qualifications of Members, or those which a Delegate must possess, so far as his qualifications are fixed by reason or analogy, or are drawn from the principles of our representative system of government."

It may be stated that the reports, both of the majority and minority, were made by Republicans.

That is a precedent that covers the case before this committee in every particular. It was exhaustively discussed in the committee and in the House, and was adopted by the House by an overwhelming majority, and it stands today as the rule and law of the House, unless it shall be reversed.

The issue in that case was sharply made, and the rule established that Delegates from Territories are entitled to the benefit of the constitutional limitations as to qualifications, and that polygamy was not a disqualification.

Now, if the rule that has been established and practiced since the formation of the Government as to qualification for Members and Delegates to the House is to be reversed and a different rule adopted, what standard shall it be?

This House may exclude a Member on a charge of polygamy. The next House may exclude a person elected because he is a heretic or a Catholic or a Methodist, or because he had been charged by his opponent with adultery or some other offense.

Everyone can see that such a rule or license would be dangerous to the rights and liberties of the citizens and an end to republican government.

The party in power would be governed by arbitrary will and caprice alone.

Mr. Cannon, the contestant here, claims in good faith that polygamy is a religious conviction and principle with him and his people, and in this he is entitled to protection under the Constitution.

The people he represents have elected him and are satisfied with him, and this House should be content.

The sixth article of the Constitution provides that—

"No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office of public trust under the United States."

It seems to us that the contestant is entitled to the above provision of the Constitution as a protection. He has been convicted of no crime and there is no law on the statute book that disqualifies him as a Delegate.

On the majority view that Mr. Cannon was disqualified and should be excluded another question arose as to whether or not Mr. Campbell should be admitted to the seat. The majority of the committee took the view that as he had only a minority of the votes he could not be admitted under the American practice.

The question was debated at length on April 18 and 19, 1882,[1] the main point at issue being the status of a Delegate in reference to qualifications. On the latter day the resolution of the minority declaring Mr. Cannon elected and entitled to the seat was offered as a substitute for the majority resolutions and was disagreed to—yeas 79, nays 123.

Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to without division,[2] as follows:

Resolved, That Allen G. Campbell is not entitled to a seat in this Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon is not entitled to a seat in this Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, That the seat of the Delegate from the Territory of Utah be, and the same hereby is, declared vacant.

474. The case of Brigham H. Roberts, in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The House declined to permit the oath to be administered to Brigham H. Roberts pending an examination of his qualifications by a committee.

In 1899 a Member who challenged the right of a Member-elect to be sworn did so on his responsibility as a Member and on the strength of documentary evidence.

In 1899 a Member-elect, challenged as he was about to take the oath, stood aside on request of the Speaker.

The House, by unanimous consent, deferred until after the completion of the organization the question of Brigham H. Roberts's right to take the oath.

The right of Brigham H. Roberts to take the oath and his seat being under consideration, he was permitted to speak, by unanimous consent.

In 1899 the House referred the case of Brigham H. Roberts to a committee, with directions to report on both the prima facie and final right.

In the case of Brigham H. Roberts the committee reported at one and the same time on both the prima facie and final right.

On December 4, 1899,[1] at the time of the organization of the House, and while the swearing in of the Members was proceeding, the State of Utah was called. Thereupon Mr. Robert W. Tayler, of Ohio, said:

> Mr. Speaker, I object to the swearing in of the Representative-elect from Utah and to his taking a seat in this body. I do so, Mr. Speaker, on my responsibility as a Member of this House, and because specific, serious, and apparently well-grounded charges of ineligibility are made against him. A transcript of the proceedings of court in Utah evidences the fact that the claimant was in 1889 convicted, or that he pleaded guilty, of the crime of unlawful cohabitation. Affidavits and other papers in my possession indicate that ever since then he has been persistently guilty of the same crime, and that ever since then he has been and is now a polygamist. If this transcript and these affidavits and papers tell the truth, the Member-elect from Utah is, in my judgment, ineligible to be a Member of this House of Representatives both because of the statutory disqualification created by the Edmunds law and for higher and graver and quite as sound reasons. I ought also to say, in addition to what I have just said, that I have in my possession a certified copy of the court record under which the claimant to this seat was supposed to be naturalized, and that eminent counsel assert that if that be the record in the case there is grave doubt if the claimant is a citizen of the United States. I offer and express no opinion upon that proposition.
> Mr. Speaker, if it were possible to emphasize the gravity of these charges and of the responsibility that is at this moment imposed upon this House, we will find that emphasis in the memorials, only a small part of which could be physically cared for in this Hall, but all of which I now present to the House, from over 7,000,000 American men and women, protesting against the entrance into this House of the Representative-elect from Utah.

The Speaker requested the Member-elect from Utah to step aside until the remainder of the Members-elect were sworn in.

Then Mr. Tayler offered this resolution:

> Whereas it is charged that Brigham H. Roberts, a Representative-elect to the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah, is ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives; and
> Whereas such charge is made through a Member of this House, on his responsibility as such Member and on the basis, as he asserts, of public records, affidavits, and papers evidencing such ineligibility:
> Resolved, That the question of the prima facie right of Brigham H. Roberts to be sworn in as a Representative from the State of Utah in the Fifty-sixth Congress, as well as of his final right to a seat therein as such Representative, be referred to a special committee of nine Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker; and until such committee shall report upon and the House decide such question and right the said Brigham H. Roberts shall not be sworn in or be permitted to occupy a seat in this House; and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses on oath in relation to the subject-matter of this resolution.

By unanimous consent the consideration of the resolution was postponed until after the organization of the House had been completed and the President's message had been received and read.[1]

On December 5,[2] the resolution being considered, Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, offered the following amendment in the nature of a substitute:

Whereas Brigham H. Roberts, from the State of Utah, has presented a certificate of election in due and proper form as a Representative from said State: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That without expressing any opinion as to the right or propriety of his retaining his seat in advance of any proper investigation thereof, the said Brigham H. Roberts is entitled to be sworn in as a Member of this House upon his prima facie case.

Resolved further, That when sworn in his credentials and all the papers in relation to his right to retain his seat be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report thereon at the earliest practicable moment.

During the debate Mr. Roberts, by unanimous consent, addressed the House.

On a division the amendment was disagreed to—59 ayes, 247 noes. The resolution was then agreed to—304 yeas, 32 nays.

The Speaker appointed the following special committee: Robert W. Tayler, of Ohio; Charles B. Landis, of Indiana; Page Morris, of Minnesota; R. H. Freer, of West Virginia; Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine; Smith McPherson, of Iowa; David A. DeArmond, of Missouri; Samuel W.T. Lanham, of Texas; Robert W. Miers, of Indiana.

The committee reported[3] on January 20, 1900, the majority holding that Mr. Roberts ought not to have a seat in the House and declaring his seat vacant. As to the prima facie right the committee say:

Upon this question little need be said except what is hereafter said in relation to the final right to a seat. The questions are inextricably interwoven, and for convenience the main body of authority against his prima facie right to be sworn in is presented in the argument made against his final right to a seat.

Both Houses of Congress have in innumerable instances exercised the right to stop a Member-elect at the threshold and refuse to permit him to be sworn in until an investigation had been made as to his right to a seat. In some cases the final right was accorded the claimant; in many cases it was denied.

This question, as we view it, is always to be answered from the standpoint of expediency and propriety. The inherent right exists of necessity. The danger of disorder and of blocking the way to an organization vanishes in view of the proper procedure. The most strenuous objection is made by those who imagine, for instance, that if the person whose name was first called should be objected to, he might refuse to stand aside until the remaining Members were sworn in. The claim is made that this must inevitably result in confusion and demoralization, and in furnishing an opportunity for an arbitrary and unjust exercise of power on the part of the House.

[1] Mr. Roberts did not vote on the roll call which occurred after this action took place. His name was stricken from the roll and not again called.

[2] First session Fifty-sixth Congress, Record, pp. 38–53; Journal, p. 34.

[3] House Report No. 85, first session Fifty-sixth Congress.

The answer to this is that every person holding a certificate, whose name is on the Clerk's roll, where it is placed by operation of law, is entitled to participate in the organization of the House, whether sworn in or not. Such is the effect and the only effect of the certificate. If the Members-elect, other than the person objected to, desire so to do they can prevent his being sworn in. This lodges no more power in the majority, however arbitrary it may be, than that majority always has, whether on the day of the organization or a week or a month thereafter.

The fear that injustice maybe done by it in time of great party excitement is not justly grounded in theory, nor has it occurred in practice; while on the other hand injustice has often occurred in the unseating of Members in case of contested elections. It is always, whether at the threshold or after the House is fully organized, a question of the power of the majority. It is no more dangerous or disorganizing in the one instance than in the other. There can be no injustice done when every man holding a certificate, whether sworn in or not, is entitled to vote for a Speaker and upon the right of every other Member-elect to be sworn in.

If, by way of illustration, Mr. Roberts had been the first person whose name was called, and he had objected to standing aside, the House, for the purpose of organization, and for the purpose of voting upon the question as to whether he should then be sworn in, would be completely organized, and every other Member present, although not one of them had been sworn in, would be entitled to vote upon that question. This, it seems to us, dissolves every imagined difficulty and permits the easy organization of the House.

If every individual Member had been objected to, seriatim, the only objectionable result would have been the inconvenience and delay involved in the time necessary to vote upon all the cases.

Judge McCrary's statement (sections 283 and 284 in his work on Elections) is a sound and correct declaration of the law applicable to the right of the House to compel a Member who is objected to to stand aside, and not permit him to be sworn in until his case is investigated. It is as follows:

"If a specific and apparently well-grounded allegation be presented to the House of Representatives of the United States that a person holding a certificate of election is not a citizen of the United States, or is not of the requisite age, or is for any other cause ineligible, the House will defer action upon the question of swearing in such person until there can be an investigation into the truth of such allegations.

"It is necessary, however, that such allegations should be made by a responsible party. It is usually made, or vouched for, at least, by some Member or Member-elect of the House. It is to be presented at the earliest possible moment after the meeting of the House for organization, and generally at the time that the person objected to presents himself to be sworn in. The person objected to upon such grounds as these is not sworn in with the other Members, but stands aside for the time being, and the House, through its committee, will with all possible speed proceed to inquire into the facts.

"The certificate of election does not ordinarily, if ever, cover the grounds of the due qualifications of the person holding it. It may be said that by declaring the person duly elected the certificate by implication avers that he was qualified to be elected and to hold the office. But it is well known that canvassing officers do not in fact inquire as to the qualifications of persons voted for; they certify what appears upon the face of the returns and nothing more."

This is not quoted as being authoritative in itself, but because it is an exact statement of what the precedents and authorities on that subject clearly disclose.

The minority of the committee, Messrs. Littlefield and De Axmond, filed views in opposition, holding that Mr. Roberts had the constitutional right to take the oath of office and be admitted to his seat on his prima facie right.[1]

475. The case of Brigham H. Roberts, continued.

In the investigation of the qualifications of Brigham H. Roberts, the committee permitted his presence and suggestions during discussion of the plan and scope of the inquiry.

Witnesses were examined under oath and in the presence of Brigham H. Roberts during the committee's investigation of his qualifications.

[1] House Report No. 85, Part II, first session Fifty-sixth Congress, p. 53–77.

In considering the qualifications of Brigham H. Roberts the committee tendered to him the opportunity to testify in his own behalf.

The committee also state in regard to the method of procedure:

The committee met shortly after its appointment, and in Mr. Roberts's presence discussed the plan and scope of its inquiry. Mr. Roberts submitted certain motions and supported them by argument, questioning the jurisdiction of the committee and its right to report against his prima facie right to a seat in the House of Representatives. The determination of these questions was postponed by the committee, to be taken up in the general consideration of the case.

Subsequently certain witnesses appeared before the committee and were examined under oath, in the presence of Mr. Roberts and by him cross-examined, relating to the charge that he was a polygamist. This testimony has been printed and is at the disposal of the Members of the House.

The committee fully heard Mr. Roberts and gave him opportunity to testify if he so desired, which he declared he did not wish to do.[1]

476. The case of Brigham H. Roberts, continued.

In a sustained report in 1900 the majority of the committee favored the exclusion and not the expulsion of a Member-elect admitted to be engaged in practice of polygamy.

Discussion of the power of expulsion under the Constitution.

May the House expel a Member-elect before he is sworn in?

Preliminary to the discussion the committee agreed unanimously on the following finding of facts:

We find that Brigham H. Roberts was elected as a Representative to the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah and was at the date of his election above the age of 25 years; that he had been for more than seven years a naturalized citizen of the United States and was an inhabitant of the State of Utah.

We further find that about 1878 he married Louisa Smith, his first and lawful wife, with whom he has ever since lived as such, and who since their mariage has borne him six children.

That about 1885 he married as his plural wife Celia Dibble, with whom he has ever since lived as such, and who since such marriage has home him six children, of whom the last were twins, born August 11, 1897.

That some years after his said marriage to Celia Dibble he contracted another plural marriage with Margaret C. Shipp, with whom he has ever since lived in the habit and repute of marriage. Your committee is unable to fix the exact date of this marriage. It does not appear that he held her out as his wife before January, 1897, or that she before that date held him out as her husband, or that before that date they were reputed to be husband and wife.

That these facts were generally known in Utah, publicly charged against him during his campaign for election, and were not denied by him.

That the testimony bearing on these facts was taken in the presence of Mr. Roberts, and that he fully cross-examined the witnesses, but declined to place himself upon the witness stand.

The examination of the law and the precedents applicable to the facts stated above involved an examination of several subjects:

1. As to whether the proper remedy should be exclusion or expulsion.

The majority of the committee held:

The objection is made to the refusal to admit Mr. Roberts that the Constitution excludes the idea that any objection can be made to his coming in if he is 25 years of age, has been seven years a citizen of the United States, and was an inhabitant of Utah when elected, no matter how odious or treasonable or criminal may have been his life and practices.

---

[1] The meetings of the committee during this examination were open and not secret.

To this we reply:

1. That the language of the constitutional provision, the history of its framing in the Constitutional Convention, and its context clearly show that it can not be construed to prevent disqualification for crime.

2. That the overwhelming authority of text-book writers on the Constitution is to the effect that such disqualification may be imposed by the House, and no commentator on the Constitution specifically denies it. Especial reference is made to the works of Messers. Cushing, Pomeroy, Throop, Burgess, and Miller.

3. The courts of several of the States, in construing analogous provisions, have with practical unanimity declared against such narrow construction of such constitutional provisions.

4. The House of Representatives has never denied that it had the right to exclude a Member-elect, even when he had the three constitutional requirements.

5. In many instances it has distinctly asserted its right so to do in cases of disloyalty and crime.

6. It passed in 1862 the test-oath act, which imposed a real and substantial disqualification for membership in Congress, disqualifying hundreds of thousands of American citizens. This law remained in force for twenty years, and thousands of Members of Congress were compelled to take the oath it required.

7. The House in 1869 adopted a general rule of order, providing that no person should be sworn in as a Member against whom the objection was made that he was not entitled to take the test oath, and if upon investigation such fact appeared, he was to be permanently debarred from entrance.

The interesting proposition is made that the claimant be sworn in and then turned out. Upon the theory that the purpose is to permanently part company with Mr. Roberts, this is a dubious proceeding. Such action requires the vote of two-thirds of the Members. We ask if such a vote is posssible or right, in view of the following observations.

The expulsion clause of the Constitution is as follows:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member."

No lawyer can read that provision without raising in his own mind the question whether the House has any power to expel, except for some cause relating to the context. The ablest lawyers, from the beginning of the Republic, have so insisted and their reasoning has been so cogent that these propositions are established, namely:

1. Neither House of Congress has ever expelled a Member for acts unrelated to him as a Member or inconsistent with his public trust and duty as such.

2. Both Houses have many times refused to expel where the guilt of the Member was apparent; where the refusal to expel was put upon the ground that the House or Senate, as the case might be, had no right to expel for an act unrelated to the Member as such, or because it was committed prior to his election.

The majority then proceed to quote and comment on the cases of Humphrey Marshall, John Smith, and William N. Roach in the Senate; and those of 0. B. Matteson, Oakes Ames, James Brooks, George Q. Cannon, Schumacher King in the House.

After commenting on the bearing of these cases, the majority continue:

If there is any fact apparent in this case it is that the constituents of Mr. Roberts knew all about him before his election.

Can there be room to doubt the proper action of the House? Is it prepared to yield up this salutary power of exclusion? Will it declare itself defenseless and ridiculous?

Nor are those who assert that expulsion is the remedy necessarily barred from voting for the resolution declaring the seat vacant. He must, indeed, be technical and narrow in his construction of the Constitution who will not admit that if a vote to declare the seat vacant is sustained by a two-thirds majority the Constitution is substantially complied with. He may not agree with the committee that a mere majority can exclude, but he can reserve the right to make the point of order that the resolution is not carried if two-thirds do not vote for it.

Recurring again in their report to the right to expel, the majority say:

Upon this alternative proposition that the proper method of procedure is to permit the claimant to be sworn in, and then, if a two-thirds vote can be obtained to expel him, we desire to call attention first of all to what Story says on that subject, section 837:

"The next clause is, 'Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.' No person can doubt the propriety of the provision authorizing each House to determine the rules of its own proceedings. If the power did not exist, it would be utterly impracticable to transact the business of the nation, either at all, or at least with decency, deliberation, and order. The humblest assembly of men is understood to possess this power, and it would be absurd to deprive the councils of the nation of a like authority. But the power to make rules would be nugatory, unless it was coupled with a power to punish for disorderly behavior or disobedience to those rules. And as a Member might be so lost to all sense of dignity and duty as to disgrace the House by the grossness of his conduct, or interrupt its deliberations by perpetual violence of clamor, the power to expel for very aggravated misconduct was also indispensable, not as a common but as an ultimate redress for the grievance."

And again, section 838:

"What must be the disorderly behavior which the House may punish, and what punishment other than expulsion may be inflicted, do not appear to have been settled by any authoritative adjudication of either House of Congress. A learned commentator supposed that Members can only be punished for misbehavior committed during the session of Congress, either within or without the walls of the House, though he is also of opinion that expulsion may be inflicted for criminal conduct committed in any place."

And after a reference to the Blount case Story says:

"It seems, therefore, to be settled by the Senate upon full deliberation that expulsion may be for any misdemeanor which, though not punishable by any statute, is inconsistent with the trust and duty of a Senator."

On the subject of expulsion, Rawle says, second edition, page 48:

"Both the Senate and the House of Representatives possess the usual power to judge of the elections and qualifications of their own Members, to punish them for disorderly behavior, which may be carried to the extent of expulsion, provided two-thirds concur. It had not been yet precisely settled what must be the disorderly behavior to incur the punishment, nor what kind of punishment is to be inflicted. * * *"

Paschal on the Constitution, page 87:

"It seems to be settled that a Member may be expelled for any misdemeanor which, though not punishable by any statute, is inconsistent with the trust and duty of a Member."

We do not need to call particular attention to the phraseology of the constitutional provision, nor do we think it very important to consider the evolution, from the standpoint of punctuation, through which that provision went in the constitutional convention. It now appears as following in the same sentence as the provision for disorderly behavior, with only the rhetorical separation of a comma from it.

It thus appears that the language of the provision for expulsion, in the view of the ablest commentators, furnishes clear and cogent reasons for its construction, and that neither House ought to expel for any cause unrelated to the trust or duty of a Member.

This has been the uniform practice of both Houses of Congress.

The case of Hiss v. Bartlett (3 Gray, 468) is cited as showing the unlimited power of a legislative body to expel.

A casual reading of this case, which a careful reading confirms, will show that it directly sustains the position of the majority.

As there was no constitutional provision in Massachusetts respecting expulsion, the legislature of that State was, of course, clothed with all the powers incident to expulsion which are inherent in a legislative body whose powers are not limited by a constitution.

In addition to that, Hiss was expelled on the ground that his "conduct on a visit to Lowell, as one of a committee of the House, was highly improper and disgraceful, both to himself and to the House of which he was a member."

Everything said by the court had relation to such a state of facts. The case is one of expulsion for gross misconduct as a member and in the performance of his duty as a member.

Neither House has ever expelled a Member for any cause unrelated to the trust or duty of a Member.

Both Houses have refused to expel where the proof of guilt was clear, but where the offense charged was unrelated to the trust or duty of a Member.

Again the majority review the precedents in the House and Senate, including the case of Herbert in the Thirty-fourth Congress.

The minority views, after discussing the cases of Matteson in the House and Smith in the Senate, say:

The Matteson case was in 1858. With the exception of a suggestion that a case had been decided in Massachusetts, the purport of which was not stated, no reference was made to a leading Massachusetts case. The opinion of the court in that case, an authoritative construction of the clause of the constitution under which they were acting, was written by Chief Justice Shaw, conceded to be one of the greatest judges that ever sat in any court in any land at any time. The report containing it was published in 1857. It is the only case which we have been able to find where the court has had occasion, with authority, to determine this precise question. The constitution of Massachusetts contained no provision authorizing the expulsion of a Member of the House of Representatives. Joseph Hiss was expelled by the House upon the ground that his conduct on a committee at Lowell "was highly improper and disgraceful, both to himself and to this body of which he is a member." This was not disorderly conduct in the House, and it is significant that the facts that made it "improper and disgraceful" were not disclosed by the case.

Hiss, after his expulsion, was arrested at the instance of one of his creditors on mesne process and committed to jail. He brought a petition for habeas corpus on the ground that he was a member of the House of Representatives, and as such privileged from arrest. This raised the precise question of the legality of his expulsion, and speaking through Chief Justice Shaw, the court, among other things, said:

"The question is whether the House of Representatives have the power to expel a member."

After adverting to the fact that the constitution did not in terms authorize expulsion, he says:

"There is nothing to show that the framers of the constitution intended to withhold this power. It may have been given expressly in other States, either ex majori cautela, or for the purpose of limiting it, by requiring a vote of more than a majority."

In the Constitution of the United States it was given evidently "for the purpose of limiting it," as a two-thirds vote is required.

Again:

"The power of expulsion is a necessary and incidental power, to enable the House to perform its high functions, and is necessary to the safety of the State. It is a power of protection. A Member may be physically, mentally, or morally, wholly unfit; he may be afflicted with a contagious disease, or insane, or noisy, violent and disorderly, or in the habit of using profane, obscene, and abusive language. It is necessary to put extreme cases to test a principle.

"If the power exists, the House must necessarily be the sole judge of the exigency which may justify and require its exercise."

After having fully examined the law and practice of Parliament, he says:

"But there is another consideration, which seems to render it proper to look into the law and practice of Parliament to some extent. I am strongly inclined to believe, as above intimated, that the power to commit and to expel its Members was not given to the House and Senate, respectively, because it was regarded as inherent, incidental, and necessary, and must exist in every aggregate and deliberative body, in order to the exercise of its functions, and because without it such body would be powerless to accomplish the purposes of its constitution; and therefore any attempt to express or define it would impair rather than strengthen it. This being so, the practice and usage of other legislative bodies exercising the same functions under similar exigencies and the reason and grounds, existing in the nature of things, upon which the inrules and practice have been founded, may serve as an example and as some guide to the adoption of good rules, when the exigencies arise under our Constitution.

"But independently of parliamentary custom and usages, our legislative Houses have the power to protect themselves, by the punishment and expulsion of a Member.

‘‘‘It is urged that this court will inquire whether the petitioner has been tried. But if the House have jurisdiction for any cause to expel, and a court of justice finds that they have in fact expelled—’’’

He then held that their action was conclusive, and dismissed the petition. (Hiss v. Bartlett, 3 Gray, 468.)

It is instructive on this point to note that this paragraph of the Constitution, as originally drawn, read:

“Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings; may punish its Members for disorderly behavior; and may expel a Member;” making three distinct clauses separated by semicolons.

This extract from the records of the debates in the Federal Convention shows clearly why the two-thirds provision was inserted in the expulsion clause:

“Mr. Madison observed that the right of expulsion (art. 6, sec. 6) was too important to be exercised by a bare majority of a quorum; and, in emergencies of faction, might be dangerously abused. He moved that” with the concurrence of two-thirds,” might be inserted between “may” and “expel.”

“Mr. Randolph and Mr. Mason approved the idea.

“Mr. Gouverneur Morris. This power may be safely trusted to a majority. A few men, from factious motives, may keep in a Member who ought to be expelled.

“Mr. Carroll thought that the concurrence of two-thirds, at least, ought to be required.

“On the question requiring two-thirds, in cases of expelling a Member, ten States were in the affirmative; Pennsylvania divided.”

Article 6, sec. 6, as thus amended, was then agreed to, nem con. (Madison Papers, Vol. V, p. 406.)

While we think this Hiss case establishes beyond successful controversy the power of expulsion as discretionary and unlimited, it is proper to note that no decided case or elementary writer militates against it. We give all that we have found on the question.

In discussing this question the court, in State v. Jersey City (25 N. J. L., 539), said:

“The power vested in the two Houses of Congress by the Constitution, article 1, section 5, paragraph 2, is in different phraseology; it is, that “each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a, Member.” Under this power, the Senate in 1797 expelled a Member of that body for an offense not committed in his official character as a Member, nor during a session of Congress, nor while the Member was at the seat of government. (Blount’s case, Story’s Commentaries on the Constitution, ch. 12, sec. 836.) But it is not clear that the power to expel is limited by the Constitution to the cause of disorderly behavior.

Evidently without having in mind the accurate use of the term “qualification” as used in the Constitution, the court, in State ex rel. v. Gilmore (20 Kansas, 554), said:

“The Constitution declares (art. 2, sec. 8) that ‘Each House shall be judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.’ This is a grant of power, and constitutes each House the ultimate tribunal as to the qualifications of its own Members. The two Houses acting conjointly do not decide. Each House acts for itself and by itself, and from its decision there is no appeal, not even to the two Houses. And this power is not exhausted when once it has been exercised and a Member admitted to his seat. It is a continuous power and runs through the entire term. At any time and at all times during the term of office each House is empowered to pass upon the present qualifications of its own Members.”

Story says:

“And as a Member might be so lost to all sense of dignity and duty as to disgrace the House by the grossness of his conduct, or interrupt its deliberations by perpetual violence or clamor, the power to expel for very aggravated misconduct was also indispensable, not as a common, but as an ultimate redress for the grievance. But such a power, so summary and at the [same] time so subversive of the rights of the people, it was foreseen, might be exerted for mere purposes of faction or party, to remove a patriot or to aid a corrupt measure; and it has, therefore, been wisely guarded by the restriction that there shall be a concurrence of two-thirds of the Members to justify an expulsion. * * *

“In July, 1797, ‘William Blount was expelled from the Senate for’ a high misdemeanor, entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator.’ The offense charged against him was an attempt to seduce an American agent among the Indians from his duty, and to alienate the affections and confidence of the Indians from the public authorities of the United States, and a negotiation for services in behalf of the British Government among the Indians. It was not a statutable offense, nor was it committed in his official character; nor was it committed during the session of Congress, nor at the seat of government. Yet, by an almost unanimous vote he was expelled from that body; and he was afterwards impeached (as has been already stated) for this, among other charges. It seems, therefore, to be settled by the Senate, upon full deliberation, that expulsion may be for any misdemeanor which, though not punishable by any statute, is inconsistent with the trust and duty of a Senator." (Story on the Constitution, vol. 1, p. 607.)

Paschal states:

"It seems to be settled that a Member may be expelled for any misdemeanor which, though not punishable by any statute, is inconsistent with the trust and duty of a Member. (Blount's Case, 1 Story Const., sec. 838; Smith's Case, 1 Hall's L. J., 459; Brook's Case, for assaulting Senator Sumner in the Senate Chamber, for words spoken in debate.) It extends to all cases where the offense is such, as in the judgment of the House, unfits him for parliamentary duties. (Paschal's Annotated Constitution, p. 87, par. 49.)

"It has not yet been precisely settled what must be the disorderly behavior to incur punishment, nor what kind of punishment is to be inflicted; but it can not be doubted that misbehavior out of the walls of the House or within them, when it is not in session, would fall within the meaning of the Constitution. Expulsion may, however, be founded on criminal conduct committed in any place, and either before or after conviction in a court of law." (Rawle on the Constitution, 2d ed., 47.)

Cooley is specific:

"Each House has also power to punish Members for disorderly behavior, and other contempts of its authority, as well as to expel a Member for any cause which seems to the body to render it unfit that he continue to occupy one of its seats. This power is generally enumerated in the Constitution among those which the two Houses may exercise, but it need not be specified in that instrument, since it would exist whether expressly conferred or not. It is 'a necessary and incidental power to enable the House to perform its high functions, and it is necessary to the safety of the state. It is a power of protection. A Member may be physically, mentally, or morally wholly unfit; he may be afflicted with a contagious disease, or insane, or noisy, violent, and disorderly, or in the habit of using profane, obscene, and abusive language.' And, 'independently of parliamentary customs and usages, our legislative houses may have the power to protect themselves by the punishment and expulsion of a Member,' and the courts can not inquire into the justice of the decision, or even so much as examine the proceedings to see whether or not the proper opportunity for defense was furnished. (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, pp. 159, 160.)

"Since there has been repeated occasion to take steps against Members of each House under each of these two clauses, and since the majority has never taken this standpoint, it may now be regarded as finally settled that that interpretation is correct which is the broader and at the same time according to ordinary speech, unquestionably the more natural one. Both Houses of Congress must have been granted every power needed to guard themselves and their Members against any impropriety on the part of a Member, and to preserve their dignity and reputation among the people. It is wholly for them to say what conduct they are to regard as dishonorable enough to require expulsion. An appeal from their decision lies only to the court of public opinion, a court which brings in its verdict at the elections. (Von Holst's Constitutional Law of the United States, 102.)

"The power of expulsion is unlimited, and the judgment of a two-thirds majority is final. (Pomeroy on Constitutional Law, p. 139, 1895.)

"It seems necessary also to remark that a Member may be expelled, or discharged from sitting, as such, which is the same thing in milder terms, for many causes, for which the election could not be declared void. (Cushing, Law and Practice Legislative Assemblies, p. 33, sec. 84.)

"The power to expel a Member is naturally and even necessarily incidental to all aggregate and especially all legislative bodies; which, without such power, could not exist honorably, and fulfill the object of their creation. In England this power is sanctioned by continued usage, which, in part, constitutes the law of Parliament. (Ibid., p. 251, sec. 625.)

"Blount was expelled from the Senate for an offense inconsistent with public duty, but it was not for a statutory offense, nor was it in his official character, nor during the session of Congress, nor at the seat of government; the vote of expulsion was 25 to 1.

"The motion to expel a Member may be for disorderly behavior, or disobedience to the rules of the House in such aggravated form as to show his unfitness longer to remain in the House, and the cases above cited, as well as the reason of the provision, would justify the expulsion of a Member from the House where his treasonable and criminal misconduct would show his unfitness for the public trust and duty of a Member of either House. But expulsion, which is an extreme punishment, denying to his constituency the right to be represented by him, can only be inflicted by the concurrence of two-thirds of the House, and not by a bare majority only. (Citing Story on the Constitution, see. 837; Tucker on the Constitution, p. 429.)

"It has since been held by the House of Representatives that a Member duly elected could not be disqualified for a cause not named in the Constitution, such as immorality, and that the remedy in such a case, if any, was expulsion. The distinction between the right to refuse admission and the right of expulsion upon the same ground is important, since the former can be done by a majority of a quorum, whereas expulsion requires the vote of two-thirds. The question can not be said to have been authoritatively decided. (Foster on the Constitution, p. 367.)

Mr. Foster's attention does not appear to have been directed to the case of Hiss v. Bartlett, as it is in point on his doubt if the doubt relates to the power of expulsion; he does not refer to it.

It is proper to observe that the determinations of the court and the opinions of eminent legal authors, unexcelled in reputation and learning, are entitled upon these propositions to great weight, as they are in every instance the result of careful, dispassionate, and disinterested research and sound reasoning, unaffected by considerations that must necessarily have been involved in legislative precedents. The two-thirds limitation upon the right to expel not only demonstrates the wisdom of the fathers, but illustrates the broad distinction between exclusion and expulsion.

A small partisan majority might render the desire to arbitrarily exclude, by a majority vote, in order to more securely intrench itself in power, irresistible. Hence its exercise is controlled by legal rules. In case of expulsion, when the requisite two-thirds can be had, the motive for the exercise of arbitrary power no longer exists, as a two-thirds partisan majority is sufficient for every purpose. Hence expulsion has been wisely left in the discretion of the House, and the safety of the Members does not need the protection of legal rules.

It seems to us settled, upon reason and authority, that the power of the House to expel is unlimited, and that the legal propositions involved may be thus fairly summarized: The power of exclusion is a matter of law, to be exercised by a majority vote, in accordance with legal principles, and exists only where a Member-elect lacks some of the qualifications required by the Constitution. The power of expulsion is made by the Constitution purely a matter of discretion, to be exercised by a two-thirds vote, fairly, intelligently, conscientiously, with a due regard to propriety and the honor and integrity of the House, and the rights of the individual Member. For the abuse of this discretion we are responsible only to our constituents, our consciences, and our God.

We believe that Mr. Roberts has the legal, constitutional right to be sworn in as a Member, but the facts are such that we further believe the House, in the exercise of its discretion, is not only justified, but required by every proper consideration involved, to expel him promptly after he becomes a Member.

In the course of the debate, on January 24, 1900, Mr. John F. Lacey raised and discussed the proposition that the House might expel a Member before he was sworn in.[1]

477. The case of Brigham H. Roberts, continued.

In the case of Brigham H. Roberts, the House assumed its right to impose a qualification not specified by the Constitution; and excluded him.

2. As to the qualifications of a Member under the Constitution.

The majority of the committee held that the clause of the Constitution specifying the qualifications of a Member did not preclude the imposition of other disqualifications by the Congress or by either House, arguing thus:

This question meets us at the threshold: Does the constitutional provision, "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen," preclude the imposition of any disqualification by Congress or by either House?

[1] Record, p. 1135.

Must it be said that the constitutional provision, phrased as it is, really means that every person who is twenty-five years of age, and who has been for seven years a citizen of the United States, and was, when elected, an inhabitant of that State in which he was chosen, is eligible to be a Member of the House of Representatives and must be admitted thereto, even though he be insane, or disloyal, or a leper, or a criminal?

Is it conceivable that the Constitution meant that crime could not disqualify? The whole spirit of government revolts against any such conception.

Not now discussing the question as to whether or not that constitutional provision is exclusive, so far as ordinary qualifications are concerned, is it to be said that there is in it no implied power of disqualification for reasons which appeal to the common judgment of mankind, and which are vital and essential to the very constitution and integrity of the legislative body as such?

We are compelled to answer that that provision, in the sense to which we have just adverted, is not exclusive, and that reasonable disqualifications may attach to certain individuals, which may, for the sake of argument, be assumed to amount in practice to added qualifications.

A marked distinction is to be made between arbitrary disqualifications and those which arise out of the voluntary act of the individual who places himself, by the commission of an offense against the law or civilization, within the prohibited class. We believe, whatever general statements may have been made by public men, that no commentator on the Constitution, no court, or either House of Congress has ever questioned the propriety of that distinction, but that the contrary doctrine has been universally held wherever the question was clearly raised.

In our opinion it is demonstrable that no such exclusive meaning can be given to the provision above quoted as is contended for on the other side of this proposition, and that the sound rule is declared by Burgess in his work on Political Science and Constitutional Law, when on page 52, he says:

"I think it certain that either House [of Congress] might reject an insane person * * * or might exclude a grossly immoral person."

We desire at the very threshold of this discussion to lay down these general propositions, never to be forgotten and always to be kept clearly in mind:

First. That the House has never denied that it had the right to refuse to permit a Member-elect to be sworn in, although he had all of the three constitutional qualifications.

Second. That it has in many instances affirmatively declared that it had the right to thus refuse.

Third. That the right to so refuse is supported on principle and by the overwhelming weight of authority of constitutional writers and judicial opinions on analogous constitutional questions; and

After reviewing the status of Roberts the majority continue:

We assert that it is our duty, as it is our right, to exclude him; to prevent his taking the oath and participating in the councils of the nation.

Three methods present themselves by which to test the soundness of this view:

First. On principle, and this involves—

(1) The nature of the legislative assembly and the power necessarily arising therefrom;

(2) The express language of the constitutional provision;

(3) The reasons for that language;

(4) Its context and its relation to other parts of the instrument;

(5) The obvious construction of other portions of the same instrument necessarily subject to the same rule of construction.

Second. The text-books and the judicial authorities.

Third. Congressional precedents. These are of two classes—

(1) Action respecting the rights of individual Members;

(2) Acts of Congress and general resolutions of either House.

FIRST.—On principle.

As to the first proposition, what is the argument on principle? We think it will be undoubted that every legislative body has unlimited control over its own methods of organization and the qualifications or disqualifications of its members, except as specifically limited by the organic law. We do not think that this proposition needs amplifying; it is axiomatic. It is apparent that every deliberative and legislative body must have supreme control over its own membership, except in so far as it may be specifically limited by a higher law; there is a distinction to be drawn between the legislative power of a legislative body and its organizing power, or those things which relate to its membership and its control over the methods of performing its allotted work. That is to be distinguished from the legislative power to be expressed in its final results.

When our Constitution was framed there was practically no limit to the right and power, in these respects, of the English Parliament. Such power is necessary to the preservation of the body itself and to the dignity of its character. In England it was at one time admissible to permit the admission into the House of Commons of minors, of aliens, and of persons not inhabitants of the political subdivision in which they were elected. To this day it is well known that an inhabitant of London may be elected by a Scotch constituency, and a member has been elected by more than one constituency to the same Parliament.

The framers of the Constitution, familiar with these facts, proposed to prevent their happening in this country. They knew also that a similar latitude of choice had been exercised in the original colonies and in the States of the Federation, and it was proposed to put a stop to it so far as Congress was concerned. A very luminous argument was made on this subject by John Randolph in the House of Representatives in 1807.

We quote as follows from his remarks:

"If the Constitution had meant (as was contended) to have settled the qualifications of Members, its words would have naturally run thus: 'Every person who has attained the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State from which he shall be chosen, shall be eligible to a seat in the House of Representatives.' But so far from fixing the qualifications of Members of that House, the Constitution merely enumerated a few disqualifications within which the States were left to act."

"It is said to the States, 'You have been in the habit of electing young men barely of age. You shall send us none but such as are five and twenty. Some of you have elected persons just naturalized. You shall not elect any to this House who have not been some seven years citizens of the United States. Sometimes mere sojourners and transient persons have been clothed with legislative authority. You shall elect none whom your laws do not consider as inhabitants.'"

In pursuance of the idea in the mind of the framers of the Constitution, we have the peculiar words "no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained, etc." How happy indeed are these words if we give them precisely the force and meaning for which we contend. How unhappy and how misleading, how impossible, in fact, to the masters of the English language who wrote them, if they were intended to exclude all other possible requirements or disqualifications. We might admit such construction if suitable language was difficult to find or frame; but note how easily such a purpose could have been served in fewer words and with unmistakable meaning. Thus: "Any person," or "a person," or "every person, may be a Representative who shall have attained the age of twenty-five years," etc.

The provision seems to be worded designedly in the negative so as to prevent the suspicion that it was intended to be exclusive, and so as to prevent the application of the rule, "the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another." The immediately preceding clause is affirmative, and says: "The electors in each State shall have the qualifications," etc. With some show of propriety it can be claimed that this provision is exclusive. It at least does not have the negative form to condemn such construction

Story says (Constitution, sec. 448):

"The truth is, that in order to ascertain how far an affirmative or negative proposition excludes or implies others, we must look to the nature of the provision, the subject-matter, the objects, and the scope of the instrument. These, and these only, can properly determine the rule of construction. There can be no doubt that an affirmative grant of powers in many cases will imply an exclusion of all others."

It is a notable fact that in the first draft of this constitutional provision which provides for qualifications of Representatives in Congress the language was affirmative and positive and that when it was finally presented for adoption it appeared in the form in which we now find it.

The slight contemporaneous discussion in the constitutional convention was upon the provision in the affirmative form. Why was it changed in the negative? Surely not for the sake of euphony, and certainly not to make it more explicitly exclusive.

In the report of the committee of detail, submitting the first draft of the Constitution, this section read in the affirmative and as follows:

"Every Member of the House of Representatives shall be of the age of 25 years at least; shall have been a citizen of the United States for at least three years before his election, and shall be at the time of his election a resident of the State in which he shall be chosen."

In the discussion Mr. Dickinson opposed the section altogether, expressly because it would be held exclusive, saying he "was against any recitals of qualifications in the Constitution. It was impossible to make a complete one, and a partial one would, by implication, tie up the hands of the legislature from supplying omissions."

Mr. Wilson took the same view, saying:

"Besides, a partial enumeration of cases will disable the legislature from disqualifying odious and dangerous characters."

The next day after this discussion, and when the clause respecting age, etc., had, in its general sense, been informally approved, a proposed section respecting a property qualification was discussed. Mr. Wilson said (Madison Papers, vol. 5, p. 404) that he thought "it would be best, on the whole, to let the section go out; this particular power would constructively exclude every other power of regulating qualifications." What did Mr. Wilson mean if the result of the discussion in which he participated on the preceding day was to "constructively exclude every other power of regulating qualifications?"

In view of the objections urged by Dickinson and Wilson and their opinions as to the construction that would result and the consequences thereof, the conclusion seems reasonable, if not absolutely irresistible, that the change from the affirmative to the negative form was intentionally made and with the very purpose of obviating such objections, and hence that in being negatively stated it was considered by the convention that the particular qualifications mentioned would not be exclusive and would not render impossible the "disqualifying odious and dangerous characters" and would not prevent "supplying omissions."

This section was finally reported and adopted in the negative form in which it now appears. The report of the committee seems to have been elaborately discussed.

Where do we find ourselves in such a case as this? Suppose that Brigham H. Roberts, instead of being charged with polygamy, was charged with treason, not constructive treason, but actual treason, and suppose that a witness appeared before the committee—a credible witness, whose testimony was undisputed—who testified that he had seen Brigham H. Roberts wage war against the United States in the Spanish war, giving aid and comfort to Spain, not constructively, but actively; and suppose that Roberts appeared himself before the committee and said, "All that this man says is true; I did wage war against the United States; I did give aid and comfort to its enemies in time of war against a foreign foe, and I glory in it." Now, in that state of facts the law could not lay its hand upon him for the crime treason, for the Constitution provides that no person shall be convicted of treason except upon the testimony of two witnesses to the same over fact or by confession in open court. So that under the state of facts thus presented he could not be convicted of treason.

Suppose he was here with a certificate of election from a great State and demanded admission. Upon the theory of the other side we must admit him. The minority insist that in such a case he must be sworn in. It will not do to say that practically no wrong would be done on the ground or on the theory that he might be immediately thereafter expelled, for he would have a right to be heard in his own defense, he would have a right to be heard as to whether the House had a right upon those facts to expel, and it might take much time. In any event he would be there fully armed with all of the powers and privileges of a Member of the American House of Representatives. We think that the civilized world would declare that it made itself ridiculous if it confessed its want of power to keep out from the councils of the nation a man who was a confessed traitor.

Another illustration. Suppose that on the 1st day of January, 1899, two months after his election and two months before his term as a Representative should commence, he had been convicted of the crime of bigamy or of adultery, either one of which is a felony under the statutes of Utah, for an offense, we will presume, committed prior to his election, so that it can not be charged that after his election he voluntarily put himself in that position, and he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of two years; and it so occurs that his term of imprisonment should expire on the 3d day of March, 1901, the day before his term as Representative in Congress expires. Suppose he presented himself on the 3d day of March, 1901, no action having been previously taken in his case, would the House have to admit him, or would not the proper proceeding be, while he was still in the penitentiary, for such an offense, for the House to declare his seat vacant; that he ought not to have or retain a seat in the American House of Representatives?

It may be said that that imprisonment would amount to a constructive resignation. There is no precedent for that. The Yell case is entirely different. An election was held for a successor to Yell, and the seat was recognized to be vacant upon the express ground that he had taken another office incompatible with his position as a member of Congress, and that since he was occupying and exercising the functions of that office, of course that vacated ipso facto his position as Representative in Congress.

It is well settled that while the mere appointment or election to an office the duties of which are incompatible with those of one already held will not vacate such an office, the acceptance of the incompatible office ipso facto vacates the first office held. This doctrine is laid down in Willcox, in Angel and Ames on Corporation, section 434; in Whitney against Canique, 2 Hill, 93; Cushing's Law on Practice of Legislative Assemblies, section 479, and many other authorities.

Let us assume, further, that that sentence of imprisonment would not expire until after the 4th of March, 1901, so that during all of that period Roberts would be incapacitated from being present to demand the right to be sworn in; what is the remedy? We think it clear that the seat is not vacated by the mere fact that he does not present himself; by the mere fact that he remains absent. A man might be sick, and he might remain away the entire session, hoping that he might become well enough to attend, and Roberts might indulge the hope that he would be pardoned, and thus get in. Is it to be said that the House on that state of facts can not declare the seat vacant and permit the governor to issue a new writ and call another election? If it can not, then we are face to face with the proposition that the people of the State must remain unrepresented during the entire term of Congress.

Suppose another case. That in the midst of the organization, and before being sworn in, a Member-elect should so indecently and outrageously conduct himself before the eyes of the House and the assembled multitude as to demand and justify expulsion if he had so conducted himself after he had been sworn in. What would the House do? In the midst of his outrageous misconduct must the House, with tender persuasiveness, beg him to honor it by being sworn in so that he may be turned out, or would it refuse to swear him in and proceed to declare his seat vacant? Could the strictest constructionist of the Constitution deny that the Constitution was substantially complied with if he was excluded by a two-thirds vote, even if he did not assent to our view in all respects.

Suppose that the claimant to this seat, while enjoying through the courtesy of the House the privilege of the floor, should declare his contempt for this body and for the Government; that he respected none of its decrees or the laws of the land as having any binding force upon him; that if he became a Member of the House he should become so merely for the purpose of obstructing its business and to tear down the Government. What would the House do? Swear him in that it might have the ineffable privilege of turning him out? Or would it declare him unfit to have a seat in that body and declare his seat vacant?

As Judge Shaw says in Hiss v. Bartlett (3 Gray, 473), "it is necessary to put extreme cases to test a principle."

So much for illustrations upon that question. Look, now, at the last paragraph of Article VI of the Constitution:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution."

Here is an affirmative declaration that a certain oath shall be administered to certain officials. If the theory of exclusion is applied to the qualification clause as to Representatives, it must be applied to this clause, and therefore Congress has no power to demand any other oath, or superadd to this oath any other provisions.

And yet the very oath we took as Members of this House has additional provisions. Congress passed also the test oath act in 1862, making vital additions to the constitutional oath, and, indeed, adding a new ground of disqualification for Members of Congress. This act was passed by a large majority and compelled Members of Congress to submit to that oath for many years. Chief Justice Marshall, the great expounder of the Constitution, in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, declared that "He would be charged with insanity who should contend that the legislature might not superadd to the oath directed by the Constitution such other oath or oaths as its wisdom might suggest," and the whole opinion in that case is addressed in principle to the very doctrine that is here advocated.

If Congress could add to the constitutional oath, the same theory of construction must permit it to at least add reasonable qualifications to the requirements for members of the legislative body, at least to the extent of declaring disqualifications which in their nature ought to bar a man from entrance into a great legislative body,

The same clause to which we have just referred has this provision:

"But no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."
