[6] Second session Thirty-sixth Congress, House Report No. 89; 1 Bartlett, p. 346; Rowell's Digest, p. 169.

The objection of the contestant that certain judges of the election were not qualified the committee dismissed as not sustained by the evidence.

Upon the objection that a condition of riot, lawlessness, and intimidation prevailed in the seven city wards that gave heavy majorities for the sitting Member, the committee found that there was no such disorder as to bring the case within the recognized ruling of the law of election as to riots. The committee say:

> The only cases in which elections have been set wide for this cause are where there was riot at the polls, or such tumult as interfered with the election, and prevented an ascertainment of the result.
> This rule is laid down in 2 Hayward on County Elections (pp. 580, 581, 582, 584). This was a case where a riot occurred at the polls that led to the assault of the high sheriff in the execution of his duty, and was of such a character as led to the closing of the poll, and the election was set aside upon this ground and the illegal conduct of the high sheriff.
> Another case will be found in 1 Rowe on Elections (p. 334), where there was such riot and tumult as to interrupt the election.
> And another case, in Sheppard on Elections (pp. 105, 106), where it was held that if riots are carried to a great extent, accompanied with personal intimidation, so as to exclude the possibility of a fair exercise of the franchise, they will avoid the election; as where, in this case, the returning officer, being alarmed by the mob, offered to return whoever the sitting Member chose to name; and he indicating himself, the sheriff returned him.
> And it is further laid down in 4 Selden (pp. 93 and 94) that, "should a gang of rowdies gain possession of the ballot box before or after the canvass of the votes, and destroy the whole or a portion of the ballots, or introduce others into the box surreptitiously, so as to render it impossible to ascertain the number of genuine ballots, the whole should be rejected."
> Also, in 1 Peckwell (p. 77), which was a case of "the most enormous and unexampled riots;" and it was proved that the mayor was applied to to bring in the military to quell them, and the poll was stopped, and not resumed until quiet was restored. The same law is laid down in Haywood on Elections (pp. 580, 581, 582, 584); also in Rowe on Elections (p. 334); also in Sheppard on Elections (pp. 105 and 106); also in the celebrated Westminster cases and the Pontefract case.
> Now, it is very clear, from the evidence, that no such condition of things existed in the case under consideration. At every one of the polling places in the district of the sitting Member the election was uninterrupted; the votes were all quietly canvassed; the judges signed the returns; they were transmitted, as the law requires, to the governor of the State; the governor made proclamation of the result, and transmitted to the sitting Member a certificate of his due election. He is, therefore, in his seat under all the observed solemnities of the laws of Maryland.

846. The Oregon election case of Shiel v. Thayer in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House held valid an election called on a date fixed by a State constitution, although the legislature had had an opportunity to fix the times, etc.

May a State constitution fix the times, etc., beyond control of the legislature?

On July 26, 1861,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Elections, made a report in the Oregon contested case of Shiel v. Thayer.

In this case the sitting Member based his claim to the seat on the undisputed fact that he had a majority of all the votes cast for Congressman on the 6th of November, 1860, the day of the Presidential election. The legislature of Oregon had fixed no time for the election of Congressman, but on the first Monday of June,

[1] First session Thirty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 4; 1 Bartlett, p. 349; Rowell's Digest, p. 171.

1860, an election had been held at which Mr. Shiel undisputably had a majority of the votes cast for Congressman.

It is evident, therefore, that the question on which the case turned was the legality of the June election.

The committee unanimously concluded that the June election was legal. Oregon, on February 14, 1859, was admitted to the Union on a constitution adopted on November 9, 1857. That constitution provided in the body of it that "general elections shall be held on the first Monday of June, biennially," and in a schedule adopted as part of the constitution:

> If this constitution shall be ratified, an election shall be held on the first Monday in June, 1858, for the election of members of the legislative assembly, a Representative in Congress, and State and county officers; and the legislative assembly shall convene at the capital on the first Monday in July, 1858, and proceed to elect two Senators in Congress, and make such further provisions as may be necessary to the complete organization of a State government.

The committee discuss the case as follows:

> The constitution having been, as before stated, adopted by the people in November, 1857, in pursuance of the foregoing provision, an election was held on the first Monday of June, 1858, at which a Representative in Congress, the honorable Mr. Grover, was elected, and a legislative assembly, which met at the capital on the first Monday in July, 1858, and chose two United States Senators, Messrs. Lane and Smith. On the admission of the State into the Union, February 14, 1859, Mr. Grover took his seat in the House of Representatives, and Messrs. Lane and Smith theirs in the Senate, by virtue of these elections. Mr. Grover's term of office expired on the 4th of March following.
> By another provision of the same schedule, section 7, it is provided that "all laws in force in the Territory of Oregon when the constitution takes effect, and consistent therewith, shall continue in force until altered or repealed." It was enacted by the territorial legislature in 1845 that "a general election shall be held in the several election precincts in this Territory on the first Monday of June in each year, at which there shall be chosen so many of the following officers as are by law to be elected in each year—that is to say, a Delegate to Congress, members of the Territorial council and house of representatives, judges of probate, district attorneys," etc.
> The committee are of opinion that the "general election" provided for in the constitution, to be held once in two years, on the first Monday in June, was designed to embrace at least all such officers as were to be voted for by the people of the whole State, including a Representative in Congress; and that, inasmuch as the same constitution provided for the first of those elections, including by name a Representative in Congress, on the first Monday in June, 1858, an election should be held at the next general election in 1860 for a Representative to the Congress next to be held after said election—that is, to the present Congress—and that the contestant, having at that time received a majority of the votes cast, is duly elected.
> The committee would have bad no difficulty in coming to this conclusion had it not been for the action of the legislature of Oregon upon this subject. Notwithstanding this constitutional provision that general elections shall be held on the first Monday of June biennially, the legislature of Oregon seems to have believed that it had power to fix another time for the election of Representative in Congress. On the 1st day of June, 1859, a law was enacted providing for the election of a Representative in Congress on the 27th day of June, 1859. By virtue of an election on that day the honorable Mr. Stout received a certificate of election to the Thirty-sixth Congress, and served during the term as such. At the session of the legislature in September last both branches acted upon the idea that, notwithstanding this provision in the constitution of Oregon, the legislature had the power to fix another day for the election of a Representative in Congress. A bill passed each branch fixing the day of the Presidential election, for an election of a Representative in Congress once in four years, and for such election at the general election in the alternate years. But the two branches of the legislature differed upon the question whether it should apply to the election of a Representative to the present Congress, and so the bill never became a law. Various reasons have been given for this action of the legislature, about which the contestant and sitting Member widely differ. The committee have not deemed it necessary to determine what those reasons are, for, with all due respect to the opinions of the gentlemen composing that legislature, they are of opinion that this House must nevertheless be the final judge of the meaning of this clause of the constitution of Oregon, so far as it touches the question under consideration. And for the reasons stated, the committee have no doubt that the constitution of the State has fixed, beyond the control of the legislature, the time for holding an election of Representative in Congress at the general election to be held biennially, and that at such election so held in pursuance of the constitution the contestant was duly elected to the Thirty-seventh Congress. They therefore report the following resolutions:

Although the report of the committee was unanimous, opposition developed when the question was discussed in the House on July 30.[1]

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, offered as a substitute for the proposition of the Committee on Elections an amendment declaring that neither Mr. Shiel nor Mr. Thayer was entitled to the seat. He admitted that the constitution of a State might fix the time for the first election, but contended that after the first election the time should "be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof," in the words of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Dawes replied that if there were a conflict between the legislature and the constitution of Oregon there might be ground for the amendment proposed. But the legislature, by passing no law, had acquiesced in the provision of the State constitution. In the opinion of Mr. Dawes, the provision of the United States Constitution which used the word "legislature" meant that the time should be fixed by the constituted authorities of the State. Most of the Members from new States had come to the House by virtue of elections fixed by their constitutions.

On the question of adopting Mr. Stevens's amendment there appeared, yeas 37, nays 77;[2] so the amendment was rejected.

The resolutions of the committee declaring Mr. Shiel, the contestant, entitled to the seat and declaring sitting Member not entitled to it, were then agreed to without division.

847. The Pennsylvania election case of Butler v. Lehman in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

The House having passed on the prima facie title to the seat, the Elections Committee declined to reopen that question.

The House being of opinion that votes were cast as returned, declined to reject the return because not signed by the election judge as required by law.

The House, overruling the committee, declined to find the return of the election officers fraudulent on the strength of an impeached recount of the votes.

In order for a recount of votes to rebut the presumption in favor of the election officers it must be shown that the boxes have been kept inviolate.

On January 7, 1862,[3] the Committee on Elections reported in the Pennsylvania case of Butler v. Lehman.

[3] Second session Thirty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 6; 1 Bartlett, p. 353; Rowell's Digest, p. 172.

The prima facie title to the seat had by the House been given to Mr. Lehman, and while this portion of the case presented unusual features, the committee did not consider it proper to reopen the question of prima facie right after the House had decided it.

The sitting Member, on the face of the corrected returns on which the certificate had been issued, had a plurality of 132 votes.

The contestant denied the correctness of these returns, and attacked them on two grounds.

The committee dismiss the first ground, saying:

> It is shown that the return from the eleventh division of the Second Ward, which gave Mr. Lehman 210 votes and Mr. Butler 31 votes, was never signed by the judge, as required by law. (See Brightly's Annual Digest, sec. 33, p. 1096.) If this return should be rejected on account of said informality it would make a difference in favor of the contestant of 179 votes, and would elect him. But the committee are of opinion that the votes as returned were really cast for the parties named, and that the objection is a mere technical one that ought not to prevail.

The second objection urged by the contestant is the one on which the issue was joined and on which the decision of the case turned.

The objection was that in certain wards and divisions of wards in the district, by reason of fraudulent action of the election officers, the returns did not give a true statement of the actual votes cast; and the contestant asked a recount of the ballots. The law of Pennsylvania provided for such a recount, as follows:

> As soon as the election shall be finished the tickets, list of taxables, one of the lists of voters, the tally papers, and one of the certificates of the oath or affirmation taken and subscribed by the inspectors, judges, and clerks shall all be carefully collected and deposited in one or more of the ballot boxes, and such box or boxes being closely bound round with tape, shall be sealed by the inspectors and the judge of the election, and, together with the remaining ballot boxes, shall, within one day thereafter, be delivered, by one of the inspectors, to the nearest justice of the peace, who shall keep such boxes containing the tickets and other documents to answer the call of any person or tribunal authorized to try the merits of such election.

The recount took place in the presence of both parties to the contest, and showed a gain of 167 votes for the contestant, thus giving him a plurality of 35 votes. This gain was found in the boxes of three divisions—one in the Third Ward, another in the Second Ward, and the third in the Fourth Ward. The changes in no two of these three divisions were large enough to destroy the plurality of the sitting Member. It was therefore necessary to establish the verity of the recount in all three divisions.

The sitting Member objected to the validity of the recount on two grounds:

> First. That the ballot boxes were not sufficiently identified as belonging to the divisions alleged.
> Second. That the boxes had been opened and contents changed before the recount took place.

The minority of the committee urged in behalf of this contention of the sitting Member that the primary returns of votes made under State authority were prima facie evidence of their legality, of the number of votes cast, and the rights of the respective candidates. It was necessary to inquire whether the testimony presented by the contestant was sufficient to overcome the legal effect of the returns. The rule as to presumptive evidence was that no person in the absence of criminative proof should be supposed to have committed any violation of the criminal law. The minority say:

It seems, then, as we understand the law, that the contestant might be justly and properly held to prove the truth of his charges against the election officers, not merely by the weight of evidence, as in civil cases, but beyond a reasonable doubt. The only testimony, as we have seen, that tends to establish their guilt is the recount of the ballots. Taking into view the difficulty of identifying the boxes, the manner in which they were kept, the time that had elapsed before they were opened, had those officers been on trial under an indictment for the offense, with no other testimony against them, it is a matter of grave doubt if this evidence, standing unsupported as it does, would have been sufficient to have put them upon their defense. The testimony is circumstantial, and only one circumstance, unsupported in any way. It may be well questioned whether this circumstance, standing as it does alone, can justly be regarded as affording evidence of higher nature than what is technically known as "a slight presumption of guilt," which, it is said, "may excite suspicion, but is not proof; nor does it change the burden of proof." In order to a successful prosecution of those persons in the case supposed, the testimony against them should not only be such as to countervail the presumption of innocence, which the law itself makes evidence for the accused in all prosecutions for crime, but also the still stronger presumption with which it fortifies and guards the official doings of its own officers. It is not enough, in such cases, that the testimony tends even strongly to establish the guilt of the accused, but that guilt must be shown to be inconsistent with any reasonable supposition of innocence.

The minority of the committee also dwelt upon the abuses and evil consequences which must result from the reopening of ballot boxes, except under stringent and well-understood rules.

As to the first objection of the sitting Member, the majority of the committee admitted that, so far as identification was concerned, there was much difficulty in identifying to what division a ballot box belonged until it had been opened. Then the papers directed by law to be placed in the ballot box would identify it as to the division to which it belonged, while the ballots themselves would show at what election they had been cast. But such tests, as well as a process of excluding the rem.g.remaining boxes in each ward, which were identified, convinced the majority of the committee as to the identity of the boxes containing the ballots which were recounted.

The minority of the committee made the point that the election officers, whose testimony as to the question of identity would have been the best in the case, were not called at all by the contestant and afterwards when called by sitting Member were unable to identify them, and further testified that if the boxes were the same the votes taken from them on the recount were not those put in them by the officers on the night of the election. The minority strongly contended that the facts did not show a sufficient identification of the boxes.

As to the second objection, that the boxes had been opened and the contents changed before the recount, the majority of the committee say:

The contestant produced these boxes from their legal and rightful custodians, sealed up, and in the same apparent condition they were in when left with the alderman. Under these circumstances the burden of proving them to have been tampered with properly rests on the respondent; but no proof upon this point was submitted, except some testimony showing that some of the boxes were left in such a situation that it was possible for some unauthorized person to have meddled with them.

But there is no proof to render it probable that such was the case.

The respondent attempts to rebut the evidence afforded by the recount of the ballots, by calling the election officers who made the division returns to testify that those returns were correct; but in the opinion of the committee this testimony neither impairs the case of the contestant nor strengthens that of the respondent.

Officers who had declared upon their official oaths that returns made by them were true would not be likely to come into court afterwards and swear that they were false.

The committee have not deemed it necessary to determine whether the errors in the division returns, before mentioned, were the result of deliberate fraud or mistake on the part of the election officers, for the motive which actuated them is immaterial. It is enough that the returns in the divisions specified were false in fact, and that the contestant was thereby deprived of votes fairly and legally cast for him, enough to have elected him; of this the committee are fully convinced.

The minority, in accordance with the principle announced by them as to the character of evidence required to prove fraudulent acts on the part of the election officers, urged that the contestant had by no means shown, as they thought he should show, that the boxes had been so kept as to rebut any reasonable presumption that they had been tampered with. The minority quote, testimony to show that the boxes were not by any means kept with the care essential to preclude opportunity for fraud.

On January 16,[1] the report was debated at length, and on January 17,[2] the House, by a vote of yeas 77, nays 67, amended the resolutions proposed by the majority of the committee so as to declare the contestant not entitled to the seat and declaring the sitting Member elected and entitled to the seat.

The resolutions as amended were then agreed to without division. So the report of the majority of the committee was overruled.

848. The Pennsylvania election case of Kline v. Verre in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

Example of a general specification in a notice of contest which does not meet the requirements of the law.

Instance wherein the Elections Committee, after ruling a notice of contest insufficient, permitted contestant to specify orally.

The custody of the ballot boxes being suspicious, the House declined to set aside the returns on the strength of a recount.

On February 27, 1862,[3] the Committee on Elections reported on the Pennsylvania case of Kline v. Verre.

This case involved two questions: A preliminary one as to the sufficiency of the notice given by the contestant, and a question relating to the truthful ascertainment of the number of votes cast.

As to the preliminary question, the law of 1851 required of the contestant that he should "specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." The committee say:

Did this notice specify particularly the grounds of this contest? It is proper to state that the contestant waived before the committee all grounds of contest, except such as may be found in the last clause of the tenth specification. The attention of the House is therefore called to this specification, and to the particularity of the grounds of contest which that clause in it contains. It is in the following words:

"10. The examination of the tally papers relating to said Congressional election, and deposited in the office of the prothonotary of the court of common pleas, and deposited in the several ballot boxes in said Congressional district, together with a recount of all the ballot boxes in said district at said election, will show that you were not elected, and that I was elected."

[3] Second session Thirty-ninth Congress, House Report No. 40; 1 Bartlett, p. 381: Rowell's Digest., p. 175.

Without subjecting this specification to the criticism that the last clause is inseparably connected with the first, so that the whole must be taken together and constitute but one allegation quite different in its meaning from any just interpretation of the last clause, if standing alone, suppose it were a simple allegation, standing alone, that "a recount of all the ballot boxes in said district will show that you were not elected, and that I was elected," in what just sense could it be said that such an allegation is a compliance with that provision of law which requires of the contestant to "specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest?"

The committee concluded unanimously that the notice was "in no just sense a conformity with the requirement of the statute." They say:

The question was thereupon presented to the committee, Shall parties contesting seats in the House of Representatives be held to conduct that contest according to the requirements of the statutes of the United States, or be permitted, without expense, to depart from and disregard the plainest provisions of those statutes in this regard, founded in the plainest principles of justice and fair dealing? Long before the statute was enacted parties to contested elections, both in England and this country, were held to a compliance with the same rule.—(Leib's case, Clark & Hall, 165; Luttrell v. Hume, 4 Doug. Elect. Cases, 25; Skerret's, 2 Pars., 509; Carpenter's case, 2 Pars., 537; Kneass's case, 2 Pars., 553.) Several of the cases here cited are from the State of Pennsylvania, and, so far as the local law of the State where this contest has arisen forms a rule for the guidance of the parties, are clear and decisive against the sufficiency of this notice of contest.

Therefore the committee unanimously came to the conclusion that the notice was in "no just sense a conformity with the requirements of the statute, or the well-settled rules which should govern in all contests of this kind."

To avoid all injustice, however, the committee allowed the contestant to specify and particularize orally. This was done by specifying precincts wherein mistakes were alleged to have been made and particularizing the effects of such mistakes in numbers of votes.

As to the second branch of the case, there was a question as to the recount of votes. The returned majority of the sitting Member was 22 votes. Contestant's allegations were that in certain precincts there was sufficient wrong counting of votes actually cast to overcome the majority returned. The law of Pennsylvania provided as follows:

As soon as the election shall be finished the tickets, list of taxables, one of the lists of voters, the tally papers, and one of the certificates of the oath or affirmation taken and subscribed by the inspectors, judges, and clerks, shall all be carefully collected and deposited in one or more of the ballot boxes, and such box or boxes, being closely bound round with tape, shall be sealed by the inspectors and the judge of the election, and, together with the remaining ballot boxes shall, within one day thereafter, be delivered by one of the inspectors to the nearest justice of the peace, who shall keep such boxes containing the tickets and other documents to answer the call of any person or tribunal authorized to try the merits of such elections.

The committee found the case dependent on two considerations:

Were the ballot boxes produced the ones actually used at these precincts at the election contested? And did they contain untouched the ballots so cast? Indeed, it must be apparent to everyone that unless the committee could be satisfied of both identity and security they could not control and correct the sworn return by any subsequent count.

Upon the question of identity the committee have had little or no difficulty. It was testified in respect to each of the boxes under consideration by the alderman of the ward who resided nearest the precinct that he received the box from the election officers of that precinct on the night of the election as and for the ballot box used at that precinct, and each was so labeled when received. There was other evidence tending to strengthen this. And the committee were left without doubt that the boxes produced were those actually used at these precincts.

Upon the question of security, whether these ballot boxes, when opened and recounted before the magistrates, were in the same condition as when sealed up by the election officers and delivered to the alderman on the night of the election, there was much conflicting testimony and much doubt.

An example of the doubt is shown by the following conditions developed in the testimony. The ballot box of one precinct had been at times in the custody of a man of bad reputation, a constable who had been convicted of extortion, and had been pardoned by the governor. This constable had let the box go into the possession of a person whom he did not know, the pretext being that it was to be taken to the magistrate. The committee therefore thought that ballots kept in such custody were not trustworthy evidence after three months, especially when the number of votes did not agree with the sworn return. In another precinct the box had been left in an unfastened closet, with no one to care for it, for three days and showed exterior and interior signs of having been tampered with, the condition of the tickets being especially suspicious. In a third precinct the box had never been sealed according to law or had been subsequently tampered with, and the ballots were in a suspicious condition.

The contestant claimed the benefit of 54 votes gained for him by the recount of the ballots in these three suspicious boxes, these votes being necessary to show his election.

The committee were unanimously of the opinion that he was not entitled to these votes, and reported resolutions to that effect and declaring the sitting Member entitled to the seat.

On March 4,[1] after some debate, the resolution declaring contestant not elected was agreed to, yeas 105, nays 13. The resolution declaring the sitting Member entitled to the seat was agreed to without division.

849. The Massachusetts election case of Sleeper v. Rice in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

Discussion as to the validity of an amended return under the law of Massachusetts in 1864.

A recount by the election officers at their own instance, and unimpeached by anything showing fraud, was sustained by the House.

A declaration of result in open ward meeting, under a State law, was held prima facie evidence of the result, but controllable by evidence.

On February 17, 1864,[2] the Committee on Elections reported on the Massachusetts case of Sleeper v. Rice. The title to the seat depended on the true number of votes cast in Ward 12 of Boston, there having been two counts, one of which showed 85 plurality for Mr. Sleeper and the other a plurality of 28 for Mr. Sleeper, a change sufficient to change the result in the district. The committee, whose report seems to have been unanimous, say:

It is necessary to a correct understanding of the merits of this controversy that the method of conducting elections in Massachusetts be known. Polls are opened in cities in each ward, and the election is there conducted by a board of ward officers, consisting of a warden, clerk, and five inspectors. The voting is by ballot, and every voter's name is found upon a check list. A part of these ward officers has charge of the ballot boxes and others the check list. When a voter approaches to vote, his name is fast found and checked on the check list, and he then casts his ballot in the box. At the close of the poll the result, after having been ascertained by the ward officers mentioned, is certified in blanks prepared for the purpose by a majority of those officers, publicly declared there before the adjournment in open meeting, entered upon the records of the board, and certified copies thereof delivered by him forthwith to the city clerk, who shall immediately enter them upon the city records. Certified copies of this record, after examination and other proceedings, which will be hereafter alluded to, and transmitted in the case of Representative in Congress within ten days to the secretary of the Commonwealth, and by him laid before the governor and council, who, as a board of canvassers, canvass the returns from the entire district, declare the result, and give a certificate of election to the person appearing to them to be elected.

In the present case the ward officers on the night of election, November 4, 1862, sent to the city clerk a certificate showing a plurality of 85 votes for Mr. Sleeper. And the mayor and aldermen certified the result in the wards of the district.

On November 11, seven days after, the ward officers of Ward 12 sent to the city clerk an amended certificate showing a plurality of only 28 for Mr. Sleeper. Thereupon the mayor and aldermen transmitted an amended certificate to the secretary of the Commonwealth. The committee say:

The governor and council received the amended return and gave the certificate as required by it to Mr. Rice. Upon the legality and truth of this amended return hangs this contest. In respect to it Mr. Sleeper claims, first, that it is illegal, because there is no law authorizing the ward officers to make an amended or additional return of this nature.

The law requires the result to be declared in open ward meeting, and this result never has been so declared, and can not therefore be accepted as the result; and because the mayor and aldermen have never, as required by law, passed upon this amended or additional return, or determined anything one way or the other based upon it, but only transmitted the same to the governor and council, with a hypothetical certificate of their own, of no force in law, and, secondly, that the amended return is not true.

Although the last proposition of Mr. Sleeper is the most important of all, lying at the foundation of all investigations of the committee, who entertain no doubt that the seat should be awarded to that candidate for whom the greatest number of legal votes were cut, however officers may have conformed to or disregarded the requirements of law in Massachusetts in declaring, certifying, or canvassing the votes after they have been so cast, yet the committee, before proceeding to a discussion of the evidence bearing upon the question of how many votes were actually cast at that poll, embraced in the second proposition of Mr. Sleeper, stop for a moment to consider the soundness of his first proposition. Is there any law authorizing the ward officers to make an amended or additional return of the nature of the one here made? The duty of the ward officers, as well as of the mayor and aldermen, in the premises is prescribed in chapter 7, section 16, of the general statutes of Massachusetts in these words:

"The mayor and aldermen and the clerk of each city shall forthwith, after an election, examine the returns made by the returning officers of each ward in such city, and if any error appears therein they shall forthwith notify said ward officers thereof, who shall forthwith make a new and additional return, under oath, in conformity to truth, which additional return, whether made upon notice or by such officers without notice, shall be received by the mayor and aldermen or city clerk at any time before the expiration of the day preceding that on which by law they are required to make their returns, or to declare the result of the election in said city; and all original and additional returns so made shall be examined by the mayor and aldermen and made part of their returns of the results of such election. In counting the votes in an election no returns shall be rejected when the votes given for each candidate can be ascertained."

In this clear and comprehensive section is comprised the whole law of Massachusetts upon the subject. By it a new or amended return is not only authorized, but required in certain cases—its language being: "Who shall forthwith make a new and additional return." Of course the new return is to be different from the one already made, or it would be useless. It must, therefore, be different from the original declared result, for that is what the law requires, and is in the first return, excepting always the possible case of a clerical mistake in transcribing a declared result into a certificate, which can not embrace the whole scope of the section. This disposes of the objection that the result included in the second return has never been declared in open ward meeting, for if it had been so declared there would have been no occasion, except in the one improbable case stated, for a new return. The last clause in the statute renders immaterial also any defects of form in the first return, holding it sufficient when the true number of votes can be ascertained from it, and consequently requiring a new return only when the true number of votes had not been declared and certified already.

The committee therefore concluded that a "result declared in open town meeting" might be amended, and that the statutes of Massachusetts contained ample provision for the proceedings of the ward officers and mayor and aldermen of Boston in respect to this new and amended return.

The committee considered, however, that the most important branch of the case yet remained, viz: Did the new return "conform to the truth?" The committee therefore proceeded to go back to the return, and examine what was the actual vote cast in Ward 12 for Representative in Congress. It appeared that the count on election day showed a difference of 60 votes between the aggregate of votes for Representative to Congress and for governor and other officers. Inquiry as to this discrepancy induced the ward clerk to examine and compare the memoranda of the count. Finding certain discrepancies—the ward clerk conferred with the former clerk of the ward and other friends, and then returned and examined by himself alone, and unbeknown to anyone else, the bundle of votes in his attic. Taking off the paper wrapper, but without untying the string around the middle of the bundle of packages, or removing the packages, he examined the votes in each package, took off the number of votes for Representative in Congress on each of the packages, and then restored them to their former place in the closet. In consequence of the conviction that an error bad been committed in counting, which this examination produced on his mind, he then procured a meeting of all the ward officers at his house on the following evening, when the votes were by them there recounted with great care, and the result as thus ascertained was embodied in the new or amended return, signed by all the ward officers, seven in number, four of them voting themselves for Mr. Rice, and three of them for Mr. Sleeper, sworn to by them all, forwarded to the mayor and aldermen, and by them transmitted to the governor and counsel within the time prescribed by law. In counting the votes at this time the ward officers took each of the small packages upon which the number of votes was marked, recounted it carefully, and checked the corresponding numbers upon paper K.

The committee say of this second count:

That this was the correct count of the ballots on the second count the Monday night after the election, no one disputes, and an examination of the evidence, with a sworn return of the seven ward officers, does not leave room for doubt. If, therefore, the ballots had not in the meantime been tampered with, the proof could not be made stronger that the true result had been reached. Upon this point there is not the slightest evidence calculated to awaken suspicion. The clerk of the ward, whose testimony is uncontradicted, and whose character appeared to be above reproach, testifies positively that the bundle recounted on Monday night contained all the votes cast on the day of election, and none others, in precisely the same condition as when tied up at the close of the polls; that he took them that night home with him, and put them in a trunk in a closet in his attic; that the trunk shut with a spring lock, the key remaining in the lock; that no person, to his knowledge, knew they were there but himself; that his own family consisted of a wife, confined all this time to her bed with sickness, an infant child, a nurse, an aunt visiting the family, and himself.

The committee present as part of their report facsimiles of two of the memoranda of the count, and show that, unless they are forged, they sustain the result of the recount. The committee conclude that not only the corroborative testimony, but "the very sight of the original papers" shows how preposterous is the claim that they have been changed to produce the result.

The committee therefore concluded that "in the absence of a particle of testimony calculated to cast suspicion upon the fairness and truth of this recount," Mr. Sleeper was not entitled to the seat, and that Mr. Rice was entitled to it.

When the case was debated in the House on March 4,[1] the contestant, who was heard at length, impugned the integrity of the ward clerk and charged that he had prepared the memoranda and ballots to produce the results.

As to the doctrine that the result declared in open town meeting was res adjudicata, and past any examination by the House, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Elections, said:

> The Committee on Elections were of the opinion that no such rule exists in Massachusetts, or should govern us in the House of Representatives; that while they would put great reliance on that open declaration and regard it as prima facie evidence of the actual result, not to be controlled by any slight or suspicious evidence, nevertheless it is controllable, and to be controlled by evidence that will not admit of any reasonable doubt, so that the truth may be arrived at satisfactorily to fair and candid minds as to the actual result of the legal vote.

The House, without division, agreed to the resolutions reported by the committee.[2]

850. The Missouri election case of Knox v. Blair in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The pleadings in both the notice and answer being bad, the committee condemned them but examined the case.

The judges of an election having joined in partisan and irregular conduct and testimony showing evidence of extensive fraud, the entire return was rejected.

The committee considered an issue covered by testimony admitted without objection, although not specified in the pleadings.

On May 5, 1864,[3] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the case of Knox v. Blair, of Missouri.

The report, at the outset, after noting the specifications of the contestant and the answer of the sitting Member, says:

> The House will not fail to notice the extraordinary character of many of the allegations of both contestant and sitting Member, as well in the matter as in the manner of their presentation. For vagueness, uncertainty, and generality they are, in the opinion of the committee, without example, and seem to have been drawn in studious disregard both of the act of Congress and of all precedent. But as neither contestant nor sitting Member was in a situation to take exception to the substance or mode of the other's pleading, the committee were not called upon for a decision upon this point, but present the case as they find it upon the record. They do not feel at liberty, however, to permit these pleadings to pass into a precedent without recording the opinion that many of the allegations on both sides are bad both in substance and form.

The minority, calling attention to the above criticism, used it as an argument against the conclusion of the majority, as to the Abbey precinct, saying:

The first section of the act of 1851 (9th Statutes, p. 568) requires that the grounds of contest shall be specified particularly in the notice of contest.

This is but the reenactment of the parliamentary rule; and the practice has been uniform under this to restrict the contest to the points presented in the notice; and the ninth section of the act declares all evidence illegal which does not bear on the specifications of the notice, by restricting the evidence to be taken to the specifications made in the notice. The only ground presented by the contestant, in connection with this precinct, is contained in his first specification, which is in the following words:

"First. That at least 400 illegal votes were cast for you at a precinct known as the Abbey precinct, in said district. That the persons voting had not been citizens or inhabitants of the State of Missouri for one year previous to said election; nor had they been residents of said district for three months previous to said election. Many of said voters were minors under the age of 21 years. A list of the voters whose votes are contested is annexed to and made a part of the notice."

It will not be pretended that this notice declaring the intention of the contestant to contend meant merely that the individuals named were not qualified voters, for one or the other of the reasons mentioned contains, either in form or substance, notice that it would be "contended by the contestant that the voting at this precinct was of such a grossly fraudulent character as to involve all concerned in it either in participation or passive permission, and to render it impossible to sift and purge the poll"—which the committee report to be the present ground taken by the contestant.

But in debate Mr. Dawes expressly stated [1] that the specification in regard to the Abbey precinct was more particular than usual. It actually set forth the names of the voters objected to, thus setting out the facts more precisely than any case occurring to his recollection under the law of 1851.

As to the merits of the contest, the most important issue arose as to this precinct of Abbey. The return from this precinct gave Mr. Blair 424 votes, Mr. Knox 41, and Mr. Bogy 11 votes. In the two Congressional elections before the one in question and in a judicial election since, the total vote had not in any case exceeded 140 votes.

There had been little if any change in the population of the precinct. Furthermore, of the 480 who voted at this election in 1862, 19 only voted in 1858, only 13 in 1860, and only 36 in 1863. Persons acquainted with the voters belonging in the precinct visited the polls during the day, but saw scarcely a person known to them among the hundreds crowding the place. By the law voters were allowed to vote in precincts where they did not live, the requirement of an oath being provided to prevent repeating. It was in evidence that soldiers, including paroled prisoners, voted in large numbers illegally. The committee say of this precinct:

The judges of the election at this precinct were (p. 69) Mr. Price, B. Hamerler, and Mr. Carpenter. Yet Carpenter, without authority of law, substituted in his place (p. 70) one Jerry Millspaugh during a portion of the day, who acted as judge while he electioneered for the sitting Member, and vice versa. The other two judges also forgot their duty as judges in their zeal for the sitting Member (p. 70). The polls at this precinct seemed to have been under the control of one Charles Elleard, an active partisan of the sitting Member, the owner of a race course near by, who destroyed the tickets for the other candidates (p. 70), put one man out of the room because he would not vote for the sitting Member, declaring "We have it our own way here to-day, "and, as he tore up the tickets, "Damn it, we don't want any such tickets around here" (p. 70).

Upon this proof of the manner of voting at the Abbey—the conduct of the judges in admitting illegal voters to cast their ballots in a body, without any evidence that they even administered to a single one the oath required by law of nonresidents of the district, themselves acting as partisans of the sitting Member, and, against law, exchanging places with other partisans not authorized to act as judges; surrendering the control of the voting place to a violent partisan of the sitting Member, and at last achieving the astonishing result of polling nearly four times as many votes as were ever before or since polled at that precinct, from voters all strangers to long residents of the district—the contestant claims that the poll itself should be rejected.

When the result in any precinct has been shown to be "so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deducible thereform," then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents, as well as the evident requirements of truth, not only sanction but call for the rejection of the entire poll when stamped with the characteristics here shown.

The majority, in support of this action, cite the case of Blair v. Barrett.

The minority of the committee, as already indicated, raised the point that the action of the judges was outside of the pleadings, and that therefore the committee were going outside the specifications for the benefit of the contestant, although on a question of the admissibility of testimony the sitting Member had been held to the strict rule. In reply, it was argued during debate that the question of the conduct of the judges was properly considered, since it had been covered by testimony regularly presented and admitted without objection as a part of the case. The minority further denied the conclusions of fact by the majority, and the application of the precedent of Blair v. Barrett.

The Elections Committee held copies of muster rolls of a regiment prima facie evidence of the age of soldier voters.

Persons intending to vote fraudulently must be shown to have done so at some poll to justify corrections on their account.

The House revised the action of certain canvassers who had rejected polls for want of an abstract of votes.

The second question considered by the committee in their report related to two companies of the Thirty-second Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, who under the law voted in their camps. To prove illegal votes of minors and others the contestant offered copies of the muster rolls of the two companies for comparison with the poll booths to prove that minors and persons not qualified had voted for sitting Member.

The disposition of the votes affected by this comparison depended on a question as to the admissibility of the muster rolls as evidence. On this point the committee say:

The contestant offered what he alleged were copies of the muster rolls of these companies (pp. 200–203). The sitting Member objected to these muster-rolls and to all others offered by contestant, 37 in all, found between pages 199 and 297, for the following reasons: Because, first, they "are neither certified copies nor sworn copies, in any true sense of the word;" that the papers from which those copies purport to have been taken were not in the proper place of deposit, nor in the hands of the legal custodian, and that they are, in many instances, copies of copies. The testimony shows (p. 90) that the papers are copies of muster rolls found in the adjutant-general's office of the State of Missouri, made by the witness, and sworn to as true copies by him. The committee are of opinion that, inasmuch as these are muster rolls of regiments raised by the State of Missouri, and afterwards mustered into the service of the United States, the rule of the military service requiring one copy of these rolls to be deposited with the Adjutant General of the United States at Washington does not make either the copy deposited with the adjutant general of Missouri or that kept with the regiment copies of the one so deposited in Washington any more than that is a copy of either of them, but that either and each of them may be treated as an original, and the muster roll of the regiment for all purposes for which it is to be consulted as such, and the adjutant-general of Missouri a proper custodian thereof. "Sworn copies" of papers are expressly recognized in the act of Congress providing for taking testimony in contested election cases. (Brightley's Dig., p. 255.) The committee, therefore, deemed these papers as properly authenticated. It was claimed by the contestant that these muster rolls were evidence of the following facts, viz, who were members of the regiment to which the rolls belonged, and what was the age and residence of the soldier enlisting. While, on the other hand, it was objected by the sitting Member that, if properly authenticated, still the rolls would be evidence of nothing except the facts required by law to be recorded in them, and that neither the age nor the residence of the soldier was required to be inserted upon the muster roll, and could not therefore be proved by it. The committee were of opinion that the law requires that the age of a soldier must be made known at the time of his enlistment; that by act of Congress (Stat. 12, p. 502) the oath of enlistment is conclusive against the soldier as to his age; and that the record of age made from the oath of enlistment upon the muster roll by the proper officer at the mustering in should be taken as prima facie evidence of the age of a recruit by third persons, especially by those who seek to avail themselves of the vote of such soldier. But the committee are of opinion that the muster roll is not evidence of the residence before enlistment of the soldiers whose names it bears. It is not of the slightest consequence to the recruiting service to know the residence of the recruit. The law does not require it to be ascertained, nor does the muster roll purport to give it, but only the place where the recruit "joined for duty and was enrolled." But it is known that recruits are constantly going from all parts of a State and from different States to favorite places of rendezvous, and there enlisting, so that the place where a recruit enlisted is no evidence of his residence.

While, therefore, the committee admit the muster rolls as evidence of what men compose a regiment, and of their age, they are still only evidence of those facts at the time the muster roll is made out.

But the committee are of opinion that a muster roll made out a long time before the day of election (November 4, 1862) is not evidence of the "true state" of a regiment at that time. Regiments are constantly changing. With many of them recruiting is all the time going on, and men are every day discharged. It can not, therefore, be safe to say that because a name is not found on a muster roll made out in 1861, that that person was not a member of the regiment November 4, 1862, when the election took place. They therefore rejected all the muster rolls offered as evidence of who did and who did not belong to the respective regiments on the day of election, excepting the following, viz, Company B, Thirty-second Regiment (p. 200), dated December 8, 1862; Company K, same regiment (p. 203); same date; Naughton's company, Twenty-eighth Regiment (p. 206), dated September 12, 1862; Company L, Tenth Cavalry (p. 209), dated October 28, 1862; Company B, Thirty-first Regiment (p. 212), dated August 28, 1862; and Captain Cain's company, Tenth Cavalry (p. 292), dated October 31, 1862. All these muster rolls, made so near the time of the election, were held by the committee to be prima facie evidence of what persons belonged to the respective regiments enumerated. So that if the name of a voter was not found upon these muster rolls it was incumbent upon the party claiming the vote of such a person as a member of one of these regiments to show that fact. But all the other muster rolls, bearing date from one year to a year and a half prior to the day of the election, were not deemed by the committee safe evidence of membership sufficient to be taken as prima facie. But all these muster rolls show the age of the soldier when he enlisted and the time of enlistment, and therefore of age one is as good evidence as another, and all are admitted as evidence to that extent, leaving each party at liberty to controvert them by other evidence.

In accordance with the principles enunciated above the majority purged the polls of various other regiments.

Another principle was involved in testimony offered by contestant to show that crews of men working on gunboats at Carondelet, a place 10 miles below St. Louis, had by direction of Mr. Eads, their employer, been led to vote illegally for Mr. Blair. The committee say:

But although these men set out for the avowed purpose of casting fraudulent votes, and were furnished with tickets by the foreman of their employer, and were carried from the poll in one district where the judge had become too particular for dishonest voters into this district under the guidance of the employer of Mr. Eads, who distributed among them votes for Mr. Blair as they went, yet these men are traced to no poll in St. Louis. Their names are not given, so that no examination of the poll list will enable the committee to detect them. However strong the tendency of this testimony, it lacks this link, and the committee can not say how many of them voted, nor at what poll they voted, nor for whom. The committee have, therefore, rejected no votes from any poll on account of gunboat men from Carondelet.

Another principle was discussed in connection with certain poll books rejected by the official canvassers. The committee held as follows:

In the opinion of the committee, all of the polls which were rejected for want of "an abstract of votes" were erroneously rejected. The abstract is simply a computation or casting up of the votes, not required by law, and, if erroneously done, to be corrected. The name of each voter and the person for whom he voted is given in each case, and the computation left to be made is not only perfectly easy, but is what is being done all the way through this investigation. The committee have therefore taken into the count all polls rejected for this reason.

The majority of the committee, acting in accordance with the above principles, purged the polls, finding a plurality of 49 votes for the contestant. Therefore they reported resolutions that Mr. Blair was not elected, and that Mr. Knox was elected.

The minority dissented from the conclusions of the majority, contending that the evidence failed to overcome the title of the sitting Member.

On June 10, 1864,[1] the report was debated, though not at great length, the debate developing inaccuracies in the minority views.

The resolution declaring Mr. Blair not entitled to the seat was agreed to, yeas 82, nays 32. The resolution seating the contestant was then agreed to without division.[2]

852. The election case of Todd v. Jayne, from the Territory of Dakota, in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

By answering a notice of contest served before the declaration of the result the sitting Member was held to have waived the informality.

Testimony taken before justices of the peace was admitted, although the sitting Delegate had protested that they were not legally authorized and had declined to attend.

The House declined to receive a deposition taken in violation of the law of 1851, although bearing vitally on the turning point of the contest.

On May 24, 1864,[3] the Committee on Elections reported on the question as to the final right to the seat in the case of Todd v. Jayne, of Dakota Territory. The question of prima facie right had been disposed of in a preceding report.

In the question as to final right certain preliminary questions were passed on by the committee, of such importance that the final decision may be said to rest on one of them to a large extent.

The result turned on the vote of Kitson County. An affidavit tending strongly to impeach that vote was presented by sitting Member. The committee say in regard to that affidavit:

Technical objections were raised at the outset, on both sides, that the proceedings had not conformed to the statute of 1851 concerning contested elections. The contestant insisted upon the exclusion of the deposition of Joseph L. Buckman (p. 154), because taken after the time prescribed by the statute for closing testimony. By the statute, sixty days from December 15, 1862, the time of the answer, is allowed for taking depositions, which in this case would be February 15, 1863, and they are to be taken in the Territory by some magistrate named in the statute and resident of the Territory. This deposition was taken March 11, 1863, in the District of Columbia, before one of the judges of the orphans' court of this District. The law is explicit, that, while the House can authorize the taking of depositions after the expiration of the time fixed by statute, yet without such authority the evidence must be excluded. The House has heretofore, in another case, that of Knox v. Blair, instructed the committee to exclude deposition—that of N. S. Constable, taken in this city under similar circumstances—and this deposition was therefore excluded.

The minority of the committee call attention to the fact that technical requirements had been waived in respect to other features of the case, and say:

Can it be that the House, adhering to the letter of the law as to the time and officer before whom testimony shall be taken, when the act itself is only declaratory and does not forbid the taking of testimony at another time and before another officer, will exclude testimony which exposes this fraudulent and fictitious Pembina vote, and then admit the contestant to take his seat under it? Has not every Member at all acquainted with the Red River country a general knowledge that there could be no such vote there as has been certified to? Without this fraudulent vote the contestant has no claim to the seat, as the report of the majority admits, and not only admits this but shows by the computation of the majority, as given therein, that the sitting Member is entitled to retain his seat.

As to the second preliminary question the majority say:

While the statute requires the contestant to serve his notice of contest upon the sitting Delegate within thirty days after the result of the election has been declared by the board of canvassers, the notice in this case was served upon him before the result was declared. The notice was served November 17, 1862, and the result proclaimed November 29, 1862. The answer of the sitting Delegate, which was upon the merits, and without notice of this objection, was served upon the contestant December 15, 1862. And the committee are of opinion that this was a defect which the sitting Delegate could waive, and that by answering after the result had been proclaimed, and within the time when a new notice of contest could have been served, without availing himself of the objection and proceeding to take the testimony, he had waived the right to object to it at the hearing.

The minority objected to this:

At the outset the question arises, Is there any law prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in the case of contested elections of Delegates from Territories? Manifestly not, if the act of February 19, 1851, is to receive a strict construction, for it applies only in terms to the "contest of an election of any Member of the House of Representatives." That a Territorial Delegate has no vote, and is not, strictly speaking, a Member of the House of Representatives, is known to all. If, however, the act of February 19, 1851, is by analogy to be held as governing in the contest of a seat by a Territorial Delegate, the provisions must be complied with. That they were not complied with by the contestant in this case is admitted by the majority report, which states, "that while the statute requires the contestant to serve his notice of contest upon the sitting Delegate within thirty days after the result of the election has been declared by the board of canvassers, the notice in this case was served before the result was declared." The report, however, proceeds to state that "the committee are of opinion that this was a defect which the sitting Delegate could waive, and that by answering after the result had been proclaimed," etc., "he had waived the right," etc. Without controverting this position it is difficult to perceive why, if the contestant is to be permitted to avail himself of a notice not strictly in accordance with the statute, the sitting Delegate should not have the like liberality extended to him in relation to a deposition taken on notice to the contestant, when the contestant was present listening to the examination and consenting to an adjournment for the purpose of completing it.

The third preliminary question is thus disposed of by the majority of the committee:

The sitting Delegate further objected that the testimony of contestant was not taken before magistrates authorized by the statute to take testimony. The depositions appear to have been taken before two justices of the peace, residents of the Territory, who are only authorized to take them when there are none of the other officers mentioned in the statute in the Territory. The statute requires that whoever takes the depositions shall be a resident of the Territory, and the only persons before whom the sitting Delegate claims the depositions should have been taken were the Chief justice of the Territory, P. Bliss, and associate justice, J. L. Williams. Of their residence in the Territory, the evidence is (pp. 15, 19, 21, 27, 37, 82), that their families have never been domiciled in the Territory, but, since their appointment at Sioux City, in Iowa, their post-office matter is sent to that city, where they reside, only coming into the Territory to hold their courts, and then returning to their families in Sioux City. Judge Bliss, who was in the Territory when the notice to take the first deposition was given, which was given to take them before him, "or before some other person duly qualified to take said testimony," on Friday, the 6th day of January, 1863, writes to the attorney a note (p. 10), in which he says, "I will open the examination and remain as long as I can—at least till Friday evening." The committee were of opinion that the two justices of the peace, residents of the Territory, were competent to take the depositions.

Against the above the minority urged:

There is, however, a more serious objection to all the contestant's testimony. It is all ex parte, and taken before justices of the peace. By the third section of the act of Congress, the party wishing to take testimony may apply to "any judge of any court of the United States, or to any chancellor, judge, or justice of a court of record of any State, or to any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city in which said officers shall reside, within the Congressional district; "and by a subsequent section, the twenty-third, it is provided that in case no such magistrate as is by the third section authorized to take depositions shall reside in the Congressional district, it shall be lawful to apply to two justices of the peace. In this instance the contestant gave notice of his intention to take testimony before the chief justice of the Territory, but subsequently went before two justices of the peace. The sitting Delegate protested against the right of the justices of the peace to take the testimony, and never appeared before them. The contestant seeks to show, by testimony, that Judge Bliss, the chief justice of the Territory, resided at Sioux City, Iowa, and not within the Territory of Dakota; but the notice which he gave to take the testimony states: "It is my intention to examine witnesses before Hon. P. Bliss, chief justice of Dakota Territory, the said chief justice being a resident within and for the Congressional district, Territory of Dakota, thereby admitting his presence and competency to act. A copy of said notice is hereto annexed. Besides, the papers show that Judge Bliss, at the instance of contestant, issued subpoenas for witnesses, was present at the time the testimony was about to be taken, and proposed in writing to the contestant to enter upon the examination. The contestant, however, preferred, contrary to law, to proceed before two justices of the peace. That Judge Bliss was, in contemplation of law, a resident of the Territory is manifest from the fact that he had been in the Territory holding the courts, and was then present.

853. The case of Todd v. Jayne, continued.

Professional men within the precinct because of work on contract and not having homes therein were held not to be residents.

It being impossible to ascertain the true vote because of fraud on the part of the officers, the returns were rejected.

These preliminary questions being determined by the committee, the questions as to the election itself caused a division of the committee only as to the vote of Kitson County, which determined the result.

In Yankton County the committee rejected 9 votes, indisputably cast for the sitting Member, because cast by nonresidents, principally surveyors employed under contract and leaving the State when the contract expired, their return depending on new contracts and not on homes in the Territory. The committee did not deem such residents within the meaning of the law.

In Bon Homme County the vote had been rejected by the Territorial canvassers, and the committee approved this rejection. The United States marshal had arbitrarily excluded from the polls a man who had been appointed judge; the board of election officers had manifestly been constituted to favor fraud, and when watchers at the polls confronted them with evidence of fraud they rushed from the poll room, abandoning the election papers to the crowd, who proceeded to hold a new election.

In Charles Mix County the returns were rejected by the Territorial canvassers. The committee decided that of the rejected votes 62 should be allowed to the sitting Delegate and 7 to the contestant. The rejected votes were cast by Iowa soldiers and half-breeds not entitled to vote.

At Brule Creek precinct, as admitted by one of the election judges in his testimony, the judges met on the night preceding the election at a place not the legal place of election, and received the votes of persons not qualified voters. They took this box, with the fraudulent votes in it, to the regular place of election, and there received the legal votes. A clerk of election who refused to add the fraudulent votes with the legal ones, resigned and another was put in his place. The committee say of these returns:

> The committee are of opinion that it would be a disgrace to receive a return of votes from persons assuming to act as judges and guilty of such practices in office as the testimony and the foregoing unblushing confessions disclose, and submit whether such "judges" have or not added to their other crimes that of perjury in taking the following oath, which they have certified that they have taken:
> "We do solemnly swear that we will perform the duties of judges according to law and the best of our ability; that we will studiously endeavor to prevent fraud and deceit in conducting the same."
> The committee, therefore, reject the entire vote thus returned from this precinct.

The return of Kitson County was received at the office of the Territorial secretary, after the canvass had been completed, and was sufficient to change the result proclaimed after that canvass. The committee say:

> The committee were of opinion that the arrival of these returns in the secretary's office a few days after the canvass was completed was not of itself sufficient ground for their rejection. The sitting Delegate objects to the counting of this return for two reasons. First, that the vote is fraudulent and fictitious. Second, that the territory included in the precinct at which this vote was cast "is situated wholly in the Indian country; and though within the geographical, it is, by the act of Congress organizing the Territory of Dakota, without the political limits of said Territory."

The objection that the precinct was in the Indian country the committee find not sustained by law. As to the charge that the vote was fraudulent and fictitious the committee found it sustained by only one witness, whose testimony had not been admitted for reasons already stated. Therefore the committee counted the vote of this county, 125 for contestant and 19 for sitting Member, and thereby found a majority of 99 votes for the contestant. Accordingly they reported resolutions that sitting Member was not elected, and that contestant was entitled to the seat.

On June 10 and 11[1] the report was debated at length in the House. There was a strong feeling that the Kitson County vote would have been impeached had the excluded testimony been admitted, and the following substitute amendment was offered to the resolutions of the committee:

> That the election in the Territory of Dakota for Delegate was attended with so much illegality and fraud that neither William Jayne nor J. B. S. Todd is entitled to a seat in this House as such Delegate, and the seat of the Delegate from that Territory is declared vacant.

This amendment was disagreed to,[1] yeas 57, nays 66. Then, after dilatory proceedings, the resolution declaring Mr. Jayne, the sitting Member, not entitled to the seat was agreed to, yeas 92, nays 1; and then the resolution seating Mr.Todd, the contestant, was agreed to, yeas 64, nays 31.

854. The Missouri election case of Lindsay v. Scott in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The law of the State requiring a voter, on pain of disqualification, to take an oath of loyalty, votes cast by unsworn voters were rejected.

Where a State law declared that "no ballot not numbered shall be counted," the House sustained the rejection of ballots not numbered.

Ballots being regularly numbered and counted and the vote entered on the poll book the return stood, although the ballots were afterwards destroyed.

On June 20, 1864,[2] the Committee on Elections reported in the case of Lindsay v. Scott, of Missouri. In this case, the committee being unanimous, the poll was purged by the committee in accordance with the following conclusions:

The State of Missouri having been torn by civil dissensions incident to the war, on June 10, 1862, the State convention had adopted an ordinance prescribing an oath of loyalty as a qualification for voters and the judges and clerks of all elections. The contestant alleged that in numerous precincts the oath was not administered. The committee say:

> A neglect or refusal to take the oath disqualified the voter by the express language of the ordinance; and hence wherever it appears that the election was conducted by the judges without having the oath administered to the voters, or wherever the voters were permitted to vote without having first taken the oath, the committee have felt bound, by the express provisions of the ordinance, to reject all such votes as illegal and void, no matter for whom they were cast.

The committee state thus a second rule by which they proceeded:

> By an act of the general assembly of the State of Missouri, approved March 23, 1863 (Laws of Missouri, 1863, p. 17), certain amendments were made to the laws of that State in regard to elections, and among other things ordering the elections to be by ballot and to continue for one day only. It also provided that the judges of election should "cause to be placed on each ballot the number corresponding with the number of the voter offering the same" and that "no ballot not numbered shall be counted." The contestant in his notice alleges that in several of the townships and election precincts this provision of the law was wholly disregarded, and therefore that the votes so cast should be rejected.

The committee comment on the fact that the statute in this respect is clear and explicit, expressly prohibiting the counting of such votes by the judges of elections.

In Cape Girardeau County the county clerk omitted from his abstract which he certified to the secretary of state the votes of certain soldiers which had been given viva voce. The clerk certified that he omitted the votes because he was uncertain as to their legality. The committee found that the votes were legally cast and counted them.

Contestant objected that the votes of Iron Township, in Iron County, were illegal because the ballots were destroyed; but as they were regularly numbered and counted, and the vote indorsed on the poll books before the destruction of the ballots, the committee declined to reject the votes.

The committee also say:

> The sitting Member has raised numerous objections to the sufficiency of the allegations in contestant's notice, both as to matters of form and substance and to the admission of testimony under the specifications, some of which are obviously informal and frivolous; but the committee have not deemed it important to examine or decide the points thus made, or to consider the objections raised by the sitting Member to some of the votes cast for contestant, as the conclusion to which the committee have come on the case made by the contestant renders it unnecessary.

Purging the polls in accordance with the principles set forth the committee found that there still remained to Mr. Scott, the sitting Member, a plurality of 61 votes. Therefore the committee recommended a resolution declaring Mr. Scott entitled to the seat.

On June 24,[1] without debate or division, the House agreed to the report.

855. The Missouri election case of Boyd v. Kelso in the Thirty-ninth Congress.

In 1865, in a case wherein sitting Member had, by reason of absence on military duty, failed to receive notice of contest, the House gave further time for taking testimony.

A contestee by answering without taking exceptions waives objections to the sufficiency of the notice of contest.

A second notice of contest served after the expiration of the time fixed by law was disregarded.

Objection having been made by contestee to evidence on points not put in issue by contestant's notice, the evidence was rejected.

The contestant must overcome contestee's prima facie right, invalidate the latter's title, and show himself entitled to the seat.

On December 19, 1865,[2] Mr. John R. Kelso, of Missouri, rising to a question of privilege, asked for an extension of time in taking testimony in the contest for his seat instituted by Mr. S. H. Boyd. Mr. Kelso explained that in his absence on military duty he had not received notices of contest, and had failed to take testimony within the time limit prescribed by the law. On motion of Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, the subject was referred to the Committee on Elections.

On December 20[3] the committee reported that they had not examined the question particularly because there had been an agreement between the parties. Therefore the committee reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

> Resolved, That in the matter of the contested-election case of Hon. Sempronius H. Boyd against Hon. John R. Kelso, it is hereby ordered that the sitting Member be allowed fifty days from and after the passage of this resolution for the purpose of taking testimony, and the contestant, if he choose, thirty days thereafter for the purpose of taking testimony in reply thereto; and that in all things, except the extension of time herein prescribed, both parties be required to conform to the provisions of the statute of February 19, 1851, in relation to contested elections in this House.

On June 25, 1866,[1] the Committee on Elections reported on the final right to the seat.

The most definite principles presented in this case arise in relation to preliminary questions. These are set forth in the statement of the case in the report:

The election here contested was held on the 8th day of November, A. D. 1864. It appears that the said Fourth district is composed of some 21 counties. The contestant, on the 9th day of January, A. D. 1865, served on the sitting Member a notice of intention to contest his right to the seat as a Representative of the said Fourth Congressional district, and setting forth the grounds of contest.

The said specifications are very general, vague, and indefinite, but, so far as can be gathered from them, they raise some objections to the regularity of the election, and the legality of some of the votes at some of the election precincts in the counties of Barry, McDonald, Newton, Jasper, Dade, and Polk, which are included in said district, but state no objections to the election or the votes cast at the election precincts in any of the other counties of the district. The vote, however, of Capt. Stephen Julian's company, of the Second Regiment Missouri Artillery, stationed at St. Louis, was also objected to or questioned in said notice.

The sitting Member filed his answer to said notice of contest, denying the several specifications and allegations of contestant, and alleging certain objections to the election, and to the legality of the votes cast for contestant at various precincts in different counties of the district.

A further formal notice of contest appears * * * purporting to have been given by the contestant, and accompanied by a certificate of a deputy sheriff setting forth that he served it on the wife of the contestee on the 21st day of March, 1865, of which notice, however, no other proof of service appears, and no notice seems to have been taken of it by the contestee, and he, on the hearing, objected to its consideration in the case, it not having been given within the time prescribed by the act of February, 1851; and also objected to the first, second, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth specifications in the original notice of contest for insufficiency in not specifying with particularity the grounds of contest, as required by said act. But as no objection to the sufficiency of the first notice appears to have been taken in the answer of the contestee, it is probable that, according to the precedents in such cases, the objection to the sufficiency of the fast notice, so far as the contestee is concerned, may be considered to have been waived.

The second notice not having been given in time, and not appearing by any proof to have been served as required by law had it been given in time, and no application having been made or leave granted to the contestant to amend his notice after the expiration of the time fixed by the law for serving the same on the contestee, it is not properly in the case, and can not therefore be considered in this investigation; though, from a casual examination of its contents, the committee think that if it had been admitted and considered it would not probably have materially affected the result.

The contestant not having raised any objection in his notice to the election at any of the precincts in the several counties of the district, other than in the counties of Barry, McDonald, Newton, Jasper, Dade, and Polk, any evidence he may have submitted as to the votes cast at the several election precincts in such other counties is manifestly irrelevant and inadmissible; and the contestee having also objected to such evidence on that account, it is not considered in the case. The evidence, however, is in itself very defective, so that its rejection can not work any serious prejudice.

As to the merits of the case, the report says:

The sitting Member having the certificate of election, prima facie has been legally elected, and it is for the contestant to overcome this prima facie right, invalidate the contestee's right to the seat, and show himself entitled thereto.

The report thereupon proceeds to analyze the testimony, showing it to be inadequate to the requirements of the above-mentioned principle. There was, for instance, no evidence before the committee to show what votes or returns were included in the final canvass in the office of the secretary of state of the votes for [1] House Report No. 88; 2 Bartlett, p. 121; Rowell's Digest, p. 206.

Representative to Congress in this district. The committee go on to examine in detail various specifications of the contestant, finding so much insufficiency in testimony that they came to the conclusion without dissent, that Mr. Kelso, the sitting Member, was entitled to his seat.

On June 28,[1] without debate or division, the resolution reported by the committee was agreed to.

856. The Michigan election case of Baldwin v. Trowbridge in the Thirty-ninth Congress.

May a State legislature, in fixing times, etc., for elections, disregard the requirements of the State constitution?

Extent to which the House, in an election case, should defer to decision of a State court that a State law is void.

The State legislature, in fixing the place of election, may condition the place on the movements of soldier voters.

Discussion of the meaning of the word "legislature" in the clause of the Constitution relating to fixing the place, etc., of elections.

On February 5, 1866,[2] Mr. Glenni W. Scofield, of Pennsylvania, from the committee on Elections, reported in the case of Baldwin v. Trowbridge, from Michigan. This case arose out of the following facts:

> The constitution of Michigan contained the following provision: "No citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector, or entitled to vote at any election, unless he shall be above the age of 21 years, and has resided in the State three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days, next preceding such election."

A law passed by the Michigan legislature February 5, 1864, provided:

> That every white male citizen or inhabitant of this State, of the age of 21 years, possessing the qualifications named in article 7, section 1, of the constitution of the State of Michigan, in the military service of the United States or of this State, in the Michigan regiments, companies, or batteries, shall be entitled to vote at all the elections authorized by law, as provided in this act, and every such citizen or inhabitant shall thus be entitled, in the manner herein prescribed, whether at the time of voting he shall be within the limits of this State or not.

Under this act many votes were cast by soldiers outside the State. If these votes were legally counted Mr. Trowbridge was elected and entitled to his seat. If they were not legally cast and counted, Mr. Baldwin, who had a majority of the home vote, was entitled to the seat.

The power of the legislature, to act in conflict with the organic law of the State was derived, if at all, from Article I, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, etc.

Mr. Scofield, in the report, argues that the word "legislature" as here used does not mean the legislative power, but "the legislature eo nomine, as known in the political history of the country," since if the framers of the Constitution had meant

[2] First session Thirty-ninth Congress, Globe, p. 814; 2 Bartlett, p. 46; Rowell's Digest, p. 200; House Reports Nos. 13 and 14.

State organic conventions, they would have chosen a word less liable to misconstruction. The report goes on—

> It is also apparent, from the manner in which this word is used in other parts of the instrument, that its framers recognized a wide difference between a continuing legislature and a convention temporarily clothed with power to prescribe fundamental law. Article V provides that Congress "shall call a convention for proposing amendments * * * on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States." Also, that amendments shall be valid when "ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions of three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress." Article VII provides that "the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

The report calls attention to the fact that the convention closed its labors with a resolution which still further bears out this idea, as also is seen by other instances cited in the report:

> In Article I, section 2, the words of the Constitution are "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the State legislature." Did anybody ever hear of a constitutional convention, in the history of this country, composed of two houses? Article I, section 3, provides that "the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof." In Article II, section 1, it is said "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, etc. In section 8 of Article I, "the consent of the legislature of a State" is required before the United States can purchase places for forts, etc. Again, in Article IV, section 4, is said that, "on application of the legislature, or the executive (when the legislature can not be convened), Congress shall protect each State against domestic violence." It will hardly be claimed that a constitutional convention could perform the duties thus conferred upon the legislature; much less that it could forbid the legislature eo nomine from discharging them after its own dissolution.
> But the legislation of Michigan may be sustained as against the constitution of that State, even if the word legislature is to be taken in its most enlarged sense. Whatever power the convention of that State possessed to prescribe the places of holding elections for Representatives in Congress was derived, not like its other powers, from the people, but from the Constitution of the United States, and that, too, because it was a constructive legislature. The power conferred is a continuing power. It is not used up when once exercised, but survives the dissolution of the convention. The words of the Constitution are as potent then as before, and if there is any legislative body in the State that can be properly called a legislature, they appertain to it as strongly as to any prior legislative body. They do not authorize any convention or legislature to tie the hands of its successors. The people authorize a convention to do that where they (the people) have power; but certainly the people of Michigan had no power to enlarge or restrict the language of the Constitution of the United States. This view of the case entirely harmonizes what was at first supposed to be a partially adverse precedent in the case of Shiel v. Thayer, from the State of Oregon.

The report further controverted the position that a question of the qualification of voters was involved, since the place of holding elections was not one of the electoral qualifications.

In the course of the debate [1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, stated that he agreed in the conclusion that Mr. Trowbridge was entitled to the seat, to which the committee had arrived, but did not wish to indorse the reasoning of the report. It seemed to him that the legislature, in fixing the place, must act in accordance with its organic restrictions. But it did not seem to him that the law of Michigan was antagonistic to the Constitution, since the latter instrument nowhere provided that the voter must be personally present in the township or ward of which he was a resident. The mode and manner of his depositing his vote might be prescribed by the legislature without violation of the Constitution.

Mr. S. S. Marshall, of Illinois, submitted minority views, in which Mr. William Radford, of New York, concurred. The minority views, after stating the case, say:

> The supreme court of Michigan, in a case arising out of the identical election out of which this contest has arisen (the case of The People ex rel. Daniel S. Twitchel v. Amos C. Blodgett) have construed this provision of their constitution to mean that the elector shall be personally present, in the township in which he resides, on the day of election, and there in person present his ballot at the place of voting, and that the act of the legislature of February 5, 1864, "is in direct conflict with the constitution, and for this reason void." This cue was very thoroughly discussed and considered by the court, the judges all giving separate opinions, and it seems to me impossible to read the case without arriving at the same conclusion. This is the highest and most authoritative exposition of that provision of the State constitution that can be given. The supreme court of Michigan is the most authoritative expounder of the constitution and laws of the State, and all other tribunals, including even the Supreme Court of the United States itself, are bound to follow and abide by the construction which the State court has placed upon their own constitution.

In the debate it was contended that this decision of the supreme court was rendered in the case of a State officer, and had no reference to the election of members of Congress.

The minority further argue against the definition of "legislature" contained in the report:

> The "legislature" of a State, in its fullest and broadest sense, signifies that body in which all the legislative powers of a State reside, and that body is the people themselves, who exercise the elective franchise, and upon their power of legislation there is no limitation or restriction, except such as may be found in the Federal Constitution, or such as they may themselves provide by the organic law of the State. When they assemble in convention, which in large communities is from necessity done by the agency of delegates or representatives of the people, the whole legislative power of the State is then vested in such convention. It can abolish, or in whole or in part abrogate, the proceedings of "the general assembly" or "legislative council" or "general court," or whatever may be the designation of that subordinate body in which is usually lodged a portion or residuum of the legislative power of a State. Indeed, the people of a State might provide for the periodical assembling of their convention, which would exercise and perform all legislative powers and duties without the intervention of that body of limited and restricted powers, popularly called a "legislature," but which in the constitutions of most of the States is called by some other name. It is variously designated a "general assembly," a "legislative council," a "general court," and the like, and is nowhere understood to hold in its grasp all the legislative powers of a State. * * * This secondary or subordinate body is the creature of the organic law of the State, owes its existence to it, and can rightly do nothing in contravention of its provisions. * * * Indeed, from the adoption of the Federal Constitution until this time, it was never before contended, as far as I am informed, that the clause in question conferred upon that body in a State in which wan reposed that residuum of legislative power, not exercised by the State convention, power to act utterly independent of, and in utter disregard of, the State constitution, by virtue of which alone it has any existence. The people have everywhere supposed that they had the power to fix a limitation upon the action of their legislature, in determining the times, places, and manner of holding elections for all offices.

The minority views further cite the cases of Shiel v. Thayer and Farlee v. Runk, in support of the contention.

The minority views further assail the law of Michigan in its relations to the Federal Constitution:

But the act of the Michigan legislature (by virtue of which the votes were cast outside of the State that it is proposed to count for the sitting member) does not prescribe the place or places of voting, and consequently the votes were not cast in pursuance of any competent authority. The provision of said statute is as follows:

"SEC. 7. At the elections herein provided for a poll shall be opened at every place, whether within or without the State, where a regiment, battalion, battery, or company of Michigan soldiers may be found or stationed, and at such election all persons may vote who are thereto entitled by law and by the provisions of this act."

Now, will anyone pretend that that prescribes a place or places of election? What place or places? Would a law which provided that any elector of Michigan should vote at any place, within or without the State, where he might happen to be on the day of the election, prescribe a place of voting? This is too clear, I submit with all deference, to admit of argument. If Congress or the legislature can prescribe places of election outside of the State, I insist that the places must be named in the act, and that it is no compliance with the Constitution to provide that a man, or company of men, may vote at any place where they may happen to be on the day of election, and that such a law does not prescribe a place of election at all.

Therefore the minority concluded that Mr. Baldwin had been duly elected and was entitled to the seat.

The question was debated at length and decided on February 13 and 14.[1] The motion to substitute the resolutions of the minority for that of the majority declaring Mr. Trowbridge entitled to the seat, was decided in the negative, yeas 30, nays 108. Then the majority resolution was agreed to without division.

857. The Indiana election case of Washburn v. Voorhees, in the Thirty-ninth Congress.

As to the authority of a mayor to administer oaths in taking testimony under the law of 1851.

A discrepancy between the votes cast and the returns and evidence of tampering with the ballot box justified rejection of the poll.

Returns being rejected, the vote may be proved aliunde.

On February 19, 1866,[2] the Committee of Elections reported in the case of Washburn v. Voorhees, of Indiana.

At the outset in this case a preliminary question was raised by the sitting Member, who alleged that contestant's testimony had not been taken before a person authorized to take the same. The report says:

It was taken before Albert Lange, mayor of the city of Terre Haute, in the county of Vigo, in said district, but was not taken in the city of Terre Haute, but in the towns of Sullivan, Sullivan County, Cloverdale, Putnam County, Carlisle, Sullivan County, and Lockport, Riley Township, Vigo County. The statute of the United States under which these proceedings are conducted contains (Stat. L., vol. 9, p. 568) the following provision:

"That when any such contestant or returned Member shall be desirous of obtaining testimony respecting such election, it shall be lawful for him to make application to any judge of any court of the United States, or to any chancellor, judge, or justice of a court of record of any State, or to any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city in which said officer shall reside, within the Congressional district in which such contested election was held, who shall thereupon issue his writ of subpoena. * * *"

[2] First session Thirty-ninth Congress, House Report No. 18; 2 Bartlett, p. 54.

But the statutes of Indiana confer authority to administer oaths upon a mayor of a city only within the city of which he is mayor; and it is contended by the sitting Member that the oath administered by the magistrate in taking these depositions was administered by virtue of his office of mayor, and therefore when administered outside of the city of Terre Haute was administered without authority. But the committee were of opinion that the authority to take these depositions was derived, not from the statutes of Indiana, but from the statute of the United States already cited, the mayor of a city being one of the persons designated in that statute to take such depositions, and that he would have been authorized as such designated person to take these depositions had the statutes of Indiana conferred upon him no power to administer oaths. Indeed, the power to administer oaths within their respective cities was not conferred by the statutes of Indiana at all upon mayors till the year 1861. Yet during all the time since the passage of the United States act of 1851, before cited, the mayor of any city within the district has been a person designated to take depositions in a case of contested election. The committee, therefore, denied the motion to reject the testimony.

The minority in their views dissented briefly from this ruling. Later in the debate [1] Mr. S. S. Marshall, of Illinois, who presented the minority views, insisted that the law of 1851, by giving authority to a mayor in the "city in which said officer shall reside" to administer oaths, circumscribed the authority of the mayor of Terre Haute as effectually as did the statutes of Indiana.

As to the merits of the case, it appeared that in the eight counties of the district the official majority for Mr. Voorhees, the sitting Member, was 534.

The issue was joined on the polls of four precincts, in three counties, where contestant alleged that the ballots were tampered with after they were cast and before they were counted. The precincts were:

Hamilton: In this township the official return gave Mr. Voorhees, the sitting Member, 498 votes and Mr. Washburn 143. The contestant asked that the return be set aside as "so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deduced therefrom," alleging that the ballot box had been tampered with so that the return did not state the true poll. Two kinds of evidence were offered in support:

First, to show how many voters actually cast their votes at this precinct for the contestant; and, secondly, evidence tending to show an actual tampering with the ballot box after the close of the polls and before the count was completed. The evidence satisfies the committee that 170 men at least voted for the contestant at this precinct. One hundred and sixty-four witnesses testified to their own votes for him, and as to the remaining 6 not present, the testimony of witnesses that they knew the vote of each to be also for the contestant left the committee entirely satisfied that this number at least had so voted. There was testimony tending to the same result as to several others, but not sufficiently positive to satisfy the committee. Here is thus shown a discrepancy between the official return for the contestant and the proof of the vote actually cast for him at this precinct alone of 27 votes. There was no attempt to show the discrepancy between the vote actually cast for the sitting Member and the vote returned for him, nor was any attempt on the part of the sitting Member made to explain this discrepancy in the vote for the contestant.

As to the tampering with the ballot box, the contestant showed that his friends had been denied representation on the board of election officers; that the board had adjourned for supper, leaving the partly counted ballots in the box, those counted being strung on a string and laid on top of the uncounted ballots; that the contents of the box, which was left without a custodian, was found disarranged when they returned, the counted ballots being beneath the others, and finally, that the election officers, in a published card, admitted that the box must have been opened and the ballots handled in their absence. The report says that these facts:

All compel to the conviction that "the truth can not be deduced from this return," and it is accordingly rejected.

But the rejection of a return does not necessarily leave the votes actually cast at a precinct uncounted. It only declares that the return having been shown to be false shall not be taken as true, and the parties are thrown back upon such other evidence as is in their power to show how many voted and for whom, so that the entire vote, if sufficient pains be taken and the means are at hand, may be shown, and not a single one be lost, notwithstanding the falsity of the return. (See Blair v. Barrett, Bartlett's Contested Election Cases, pp. 313, 321; Clark v. Hall, ibid., 215.) It was proved, as has already been stated, that 170 votes were cast at this precinct for Mr. Washburn. There was also the testimony of four persons that they voted for Mr. Voorhees.

In the course of the debate [1] this principle that a return having been set aside, it was allowable to show aliunde the real state of the vote was contested, and Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Elections Committee, reenforced the position of the report by citing the case of Knox v. Blair in the House and the cases of Reed v. Kneass and Mann v. Cassidy in the courts.

The minority views assailed the conclusion as to Hamilton Township by assailing the testimony as to the number of votes received by contestant. Twenty men who swore they voted for contestant could not themselves write their own names. One man's vote was not sworn to himself, but by another person. The voting was by ballot, and ignorant men might be mistaken as to the vote they actually cast, and a person who testified as to another's vote was especially liable to be deceived.

858. The case of Washburn v. Voorhees, continued.

Discussion of the kind of evidence required to prove aliunde a vote at a precinct whereof the returns are rejected.

As to the competency of a voter as a witness to prove for whom he cast his ballot.

In a simple case of discrepancy between the vote returned and the vote proven by testimony of voters, the return was corrected, not rejected.

The election officers being shown to be unreliable so that the truth is not deducible from their returns, the returns are rejected.

Cloverdale: The proceedings were similar to those in the case of Hamilton. The votes were not counted until the day after election. The ballot box was kept on the night preceding the count in the house of a friend of the inspector. That house was visited during the night by a man named Scott, a friend of the sitting Member. The report says as to Scott's visit:

The owner of the house testified that he did not know at what time he came, what he came for, and what he did. And his purpose and business, as well as the success which attended it, only appear from the testimony of a witness who overheard him afterwards relate it. But this was hearsay evidence, which the committee rejected. The case against this ballot box therefore rests upon the great discrepancy between the return (58) and the number (91) proved to have voted for Mr. Washburn, the temptation in the close vote in the county, the opportunity for tampering with the ballot box during the night, and the suspicious visitation of Scott from the county seat during the night, together with such inferences as it is fair to draw from the fact that no witness is contradicted, no testimony is controverted, no suspicious circumstance explained, so easy of explanation by the calling of Scott or the inspector, if the truth permitted it. But as the result to which the committee arrived upon the whole case, as hereafter stated, would not in any aspect be changed, whether this return be rejected or corrected, they did not determine to reject it entirely, however much confidence in it must be shaken in every fair mind by the evidence here adduced. They, instead, gave the contestant the benefit of the discrepancy proved—viz, 33 votes.

The minority attack the testimony as to this township, showing that 10 persons who swore to their votes for contestant could not write their own names, and that the votes of 12 others were testified to by other persons, the voters themselves not being produced and sworn. The minority condemn this secondary evidence as weak and unsatisfactory.

Jefferson: The report says:

The official return from this township was for Mr. Voorhees, 236 votes; for Mr. Washburn, 24 votes. The evidence relied on to show fraud in this return consists wholly in a discrepancy proved between the vote actually cast and that returned for the contestant. It is shown in this record, by the testimony of the voters themselves and those who knew how others absent voted, that 36 instead of 24, the returned number, voted for Mr. Washburn. There was no other testimony to show fraud in this ballot box as the testimony was left by the parties. The committee had the evidence furnished them of correcting all the errors shown, however that might have arisen. They therefore did not reject but corrected this return, giving to the contestant the benefit of the 12 votes here proved and not counted.

The minority make the same criticism of the testimony as in the two preceding cases.

Riley: In this township the testimony showed 108 persons who voted for contestant, while the official return gave him only 88. In addition it was shown that on the day of the voting, during the noon adjournment, the ballot box was taken to the inspector's home and placed in a room adjoining the dining room. The inspector went into this room alone after dinner, remaining there about fifteen minutes. The next morning the servant found "a quantity of republican votes" under the carpet. When the votes in the ballot box were counted a discrepancy between the total and the tally paper was rectified by counting loose votes off the table, to the number of four or five. The sitting Member neither explained nor counteracted the above testimony. Therefore the committee were "compelled to the conclusion that this box also had been opened and votes, no one could tell how many, abstracted therefrom, and that other votes never in the box had been counted, no one could tell for whom, and consequently there existed fraud in this return to such a degree that the truth could not be deduced therefrom. They therefore rejected it. One hundred and eight persons, as before stated, were proved to have voted at this precinct for the contestant, and were counted for him by the committee."

The minority attack the evidence in this case, as in the other precincts.

The majority report, made by the chairman of the committee, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, gives this argument as to the principle of law which should govern the disposition of the case:

There was little dispute before the committee as to the law which should govern this case. It is laid down as a general principle by Cushing, in his treatise on "The law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies," page 72, that "if returning officers act in so illegal or arbitrary manner as to injure the freedom of election, the whole proceedings will be void." In a late case in the courts of law—that of Mann v. Cassidy, for the office of district attorney in the city of Philadelphia—the court, in giving its opinion, says: "As the case now stands before us, we should be derelict in our duty did we not unhesitatingly express our conviction that the officers in the election divisions to which we have referred, in the receipt and recording of votes, are so utterly and entirely unreliable that the truth can not be deduced from any records or returns made by them in relation thereto." * * * "The entire proceedings were so tarnished by the fraudulent conduct of the officers charged with the performance of the most solemn and responsible duties that it would have been not only abundantly justified, but it would have been our plain duty to throw out the returns of every division to which we have referred."

The same doctrine has been repeatedly laid down by Committees on Elections in the House of Representatives. (See Blair v. Barrett, Bartlett Contested Elections, p. 308; Knox v. Blair, ibid, p. 520, and cases there cited. See also Kneass's case, Parsons's Select Cases, p. 553, and Howard v. Cooper, Bartlett, p. 275.) Indeed, the rule laid down in the latter case at page 526 was accepted by both parties as the law which should govern this case, and they took issue upon the facts. The rule is in these words:

"When the result in any precinct has been shown to be 'so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deducible therefrom,' then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents, as well as the evident requirements of truth, not only sanction but call for the rejection of the entire poll when stamped with the characteristics here shown."

Indeed, the proposition is too plain to admit of dispute. To hold as true that which is so false and fraudulent that the truth can not be deduced therefrom is to hold to an absurdity. The rule here laid down is none other than the postulate that that which is false can not be true. In adopting this rule the committee do not lose sight, however, of the danger which may attend its application. Wholesome and salutary, not less than necessary, in its proper use, it is extremely liable to abuse. Heated partisanship and blind prejudice, as well as indifferent investigation, may under its cover work great injustice. It is not to be adopted if it can be avoided. No investigation should be spared that would reach the truth without a resort to it. But it is not to be forgotten or omitted if the case calls for its application. If the fraud be clearly shown to exist to such an extent as to satisfy the mind that the return does not show the truth, and no evidence is furnished by either party to a contest, and no investigation of the committee enable them to deduce the truth therefrom, then no alternative is left but to reject such a return. To use it under such a state of facts is to use as true what is shown to be false.

The report also comments on the loose provisions of the Indiana law, which permitted the ballot box to be taken about without careful custody before the count.

The minority generally criticised the evidence of the contestant as unreliable or "hearsay," and urged that fraud should be actually proved, and not be presumed from mere suspicious circumstances.

The majority of the committee, in conclusion, found a majority of at least 52 for the contestant on the least favorable construction of law.

The report was debated in the House on February 21 and 23,[1] when the House, by a vote of yeas 30, nays 96, disagreed to an amendment declaring Mr. Voorhees, the sitting Member, elected and entitled to his seat. The resolution of the majority declaring him not elected and not entitled to the seat was then agreed to without division.

The resolution declaring Mr. Washburn entitled to the seat was agreed to—yeas 87, nays 36.

859. The New York election case of Dodge v. Brooks in the Thirty-ninth Congress.

The Elections Committee may consider a case, although the pleadings do not all meet the requirements of the law as to specifications.

The allegation that "sundry" disqualified persons in the district voted for contestee was permitted in a notice of contest, although criticised.

Omission to specify definitely in the notice of contest a district alleged to be illegally constituted was not held fatal.

On March 26, 1866,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, reported in the case of Dodge v. Brooks, from New York.

At the outset the report raises a question of pleading—

The allegations of contest are long, and some of them very vague and uncertain, conforming in no sense to the provisions of the statute requiring a contestant to "specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." The answer of the sitting Member, pages 1 to 5, is quite as vague and uncertain.

The committee, however, find four precincts as to which they conclude—

In the opinion of the committee, there is contained in the several allegations of the contestant respecting these four precincts a distinct allegation of fraud in the election and error in the return sufficiently specific to require an answer from the sitting Member and to form the basis of a fair trial of the facts involved in the issues thus made up.

[The allegations for these four precincts are given below in connection with the examination of the precincts.]

The minority criticised in their views the specifications as to one of the four precincts—the seventh of the Twenty-first Ward—saying:

The allegation here is—

"That sundry persons voted for Mr. Brooks who were not legal voters or residents in the district, viz, one hundred and upward."

The act of Congress (first section, statute of 1851) regulating notice as to the contest of election, reads, in conclusion, thus:

"And in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he, the contestant, relies in the contest."

The sitting Member at the start protested against the illegality of such a notice and argued throughout that its generality was not only in violation of the statute, but of such a nature that it could not be traversed, save by a denial as "sundry" broad as the sundries alleged; thus substituting in lieu of a plea "a stump speech on both sides." The object of the act of Congress forbidding such sundry generalities, and prescribing therefor a particularity, was to prevent a surprise upon the sitting Member (Leib's case, C. T. E., p. 165) and not to give uneasiness to a sitting Member upon slight grounds (Varnum's case, C. T. E., p. 272). Courts acting upon contested elections require the parties complaining to specify, because otherwise they would be converted into a mere election board (Littell v. Robbins, C. T. E., Bartlett, 138). It is obvious that in a contested case like this, where the contestant is a man of immense wealth, who it is proven has lavished large sums illegally upon the election, a sitting Member, unless equally wealthy, has no chance of meeting him in a contest, if, after the election, the election can be gone over again under some of the forms and protection of the State law, under the pretense of such a "sundry" notice as to sundry persons, "one hundred and upward." The Committee of Elections, and through their chairman, Mr. Dawes (Kline v. Verre, Bartlett, p. 383), is emphatically committed not only against these generalities, but against this particular word "sundries" in the notice.

As to the fifteenth district of the Eighteenth Ward the minority say:

The twelfth allegation of the contestant is—

"That the fifteenth district was not legally created and established (with a general averment of frauds)."

But not specifying the fifteenth district of the Eighteenth Ward, and thus leaving the sitting Member to guess that was the district meant. In all the other allegations of the contestant the ward where the district is contested is specified. Objection was taken to this at the start (B., 3) and persisted in throughout, and the sitting Member did not know what district was meant till contestant, a very few days before the closing of the testimony, disclosed what he meant.

860. The case of Dodge v. Brooks, continued.

Testimony taken without the notice required by the law of 1851 was excluded.

Hearsay testimony is not admitted in the determination of an election case.

Where an election return is so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deduced therefrom, the same must be set aside.

As to the merits of the case, it appeared that the official return gave the sitting Member 8,583 votes, the contestant 8,435, and a third candidate, Thomas J. Barr, 4,544 votes. Thus Mr. Brooks was on the face of the returns elected by a plurality of 148 votes.

As this election turned very largely on the question as to how far violations of a registry law should be allowed to have weight in nullifying an election, the committee explain at length the registry law of New York:

The law of New York under which this election was held required a previous register of all the votes in each precinct, and, with one exception, based on particular and specific proof, no one could lawfully vote whose name was not found when he came to the polls upon the register, together with his street and number, if he had any. To effect this register the statute required the appointment annually, in each election district, by the board of supervisors, of "three inspectors, to be known as the board of registry for the election districts in which they are appointed; such inspectors to hold their offices for one year, and to be residents and voters in the district in which they are so appointed." These inspectors are required to meet annually, "at the place designated for holding the poll of said election," on Tuesday, three weeks preceding the general election, and organize themselves as a board for the purpose of registering the names of the legal voters of such district; choose one of their number as chairman; swear each other into office; appoint a clerk, if necessary, who shall take the oath required by law of clerks of the polls or of elections; and shall have power to continue in session, for the purposes of this meeting, viz, the making of said list, for two days if at the annual election next prior to said meeting the number of voters in the district of which they are inspectors exceed four hundred. This board is at this meeting to make a list of all persons qualified and entitled to vote at the ensuing election in the election district of which they are inspectors, which, when completed, shall constitute and be known as the registry of electors in said district. The list is to contain the names, alphabetically arranged in one column; "the residence by number of the dwelling, if there be any number; and the name of the street or other location of the dwelling place of each person." It is made out, in the first place, by putting upon it the names of all persons residing in their election districts whose names appear on the poll list kept in said district at the last preceding general election, taken from the copy of that list required by law to be deposited after such election with the county clerk. In case of the formation of a new election district since the last election, the list is to be made up by taking from the said poll list of the old district of which the new one formed a part the names of those on the same entitled to vote in the new district. The list is to be completed, as far as practicable, on the day of meeting; four copies are to be made and certified to be, as far as known to them, a true list of the voters in said district. Within two days the original from which the four copies are taken, together with the old list taken from the county clerk's office, shall be placed by said inspectors in said office. One of the certified copies shall be, immediately after its completion, posted in some conspicuous place in the room in which said meeting shall be held; that is, in the room designated for holding the election, accessible to any elector who may desire to examine or copy the same. The other three copies are to be kept for future use by the three inspectors. This closes the first duty of the board of registers. A further duty is also required of them by law, and that is to meet again on the Tuesday week preceding the day of general election in their respective election districts, "at the place designated for holding the polls of election, for the purpose of revising, correcting, and completing said list," at 8 o'clock in the morning, and remain in session till 9 o'clock in the evening of that day and the day following, in open session, where every legal voter in said district shall be entitled to be heard by said inspectors in relation to corrections or additions to said register. One of said copies is to be used by the registers in making the corrections and additions.

The law further provides for copies of the registry list for use at the polls, and then contains a provision explained as follows in the report:

No person can vote at the election if his name is not upon the register thus prepared, unless he shall furnish to the board of inspectors his affidavit giving his reasons for not appearing on the day for correcting the alphabetical list, and also proves by the oath of a householder of the district that he knows such person to be an inhabitant of the district, giving his residence within the district. Any person whose name is on the register may be challenged, and an examination into his qualifications shall then and there be had, such examination being conducted in a manner prescribed by law, which need not here be set out.

This provision was considered as having an essential bearing on the case and in the House during the debate [1] the position was taken that the result of the election might not be set aside because of the informality in the preliminary registration, which, by its own terms, was not conclusive on the rights of the voter. It was admitted on behalf of the committee that a fraudulent registry was not conclusive of itself, but was one of the steps in the proof that the poll was fatally defective.

Passing to the attacked precincts:

Fifteenth district of the Eighteenth Ward: The direct allegations of the contestant touching this district are as follows:

That the fifteenth district was not legally created and established; that it was not known to bona fide residents of the district; that the inspectors of election themselves ascertained the same only by persistent inquiry on the morning of election day; that the register was fraudulently and irregularly filled with the names of your partisans, most of whom do not reside in the district; that the majority of the names therein were copied from lists handed in by a barkeeper on the premises, an ardent Democrat; that the clerk who acted for the board of registry was neither sworn nor appointed; that the district, only a portion of the original twelfth district from which it was separated, gave more votes than the whole of the twelfth district at the election last year; that the population of the district had not during the twelve-month increased materially; that of these votes then cast for you one-third and upward were given by parties not qualified to vote.

And the general allegation is in these words:

That other irregularities, defects, and illegalities were permitted or occurred in conducting said election, whereby my rights as a candidate were prejudiced.

The majority of the committee were satisfied from the testimony that the allegations were sustained, although they found it necessary to exclude the testimony of contestant's principal witness, named Dean, because the sitting Member objected that the ten days' notice required by law for the taking of this deposition had not been given.

It appeared that the witness's name was omitted from the notice by a clerical error; but the committee declined to admit the testimony.

The contestant then sought to prove the same thing by another witness who had obtained his knowledge of the fact from Dean himself. This was objected to by the sitting Member as hearsay testimony, and the objection was sustained by the committee.

The committee reached this conclusion:

The committee are of the opinion that there was no registry at this district; that neither of the persons appointed as registers was competent to hold the office; that the man acting as clerk acted without authority; that the mode of making up the registry itself was a fraud upon the registry law, and in no manner a compliance with its provisions; that the use of such registry at the polls as a guide to the inspectors of election contributed directly to the polling of fraudulent votes, and that the large and unaccounted for increase of votes at this poll is directly attributed to these departures from and violations of plain provisions of law, and that to accept the result of such poll so taken and so counted as the true account of legal votes only, is to sanction most inexcusable violations of important provisions of law, essential to the purity of the ballot box. The committee are therefore of the opinion that this return falls within the principle found in cases heretofore adjudicated and which was laid down in the case of Washburn v. Voorhees, lately sanctioned by this House, namely: "Where an election return is so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deduced therefrom, the same must be set aside."

The committee are, however, of the opinion that it was competent for either contestant or sitting Member to prove the casting of legal votes at this poll, even without a register; but, in such cases, the voter must make special proof of his qualification to vote in a manner particularly pointed out in the statute; and that it would have been the duty of the committee to have counted all votes so proven, but that no presumption of the legality of any vote would arise from any of the proceedings or returns founded upon so illegal and fraudulent transactions as have been here shown to exist. No proof of any such votes was offered by either contestant or sitting Member; nor was it claimed by either that this provision of law was complied with; but, on the other hand, it was totally disregarded. The statute of New York is express, that no vote shall be received except after a compliance with these provisions. For the committee to count votes thus cast would be for them to set up a poll in defiance of the statute provisions of the State, as well as in disregard of well-established precedents in this House. On the other hand, in conformity with those statutes and precedents, they have set aside this return altogether as fraudulent and false, as well as in conflict with express provisions of law.

The minority in their views contend that the committee erred in throwing out the whole precinct when only a portion of it was impeached by contestant's testimony; that the registration officers were officers de facto; that a majority of the registrars and inspectors of election belonged to the party of the contestant; and that there had been bribery in behalf of the contestant.

As the throwing out of this precinct was of itself sufficient to change the official result and give a plurality to contestant, the principles and facts in this connection were examined at length in the debate. Whether the action of the registry officials was in law part of the election, whether votes legally cast should be thrown out in the rejection of the whole poll, were questions considered at length, and were made the subject of a vote in the final decision.

Seventh district of the Twenty-first Ward: In this ward the registry seemed to the committee to be proven to be fraudulent, and the vote itself showed a suspicious increase over the vote of former years, although the places of residence had rather diminished than increased. The registry list was shown to contain large numbers of fraudulent names, on which persons not residents of the precinct were allowed to vote. The principal witness for the contestant was one of those who committed the fraud, and as particeps criminis was admitted by the committee to be a poor witness; but his testimony was corroborated by others to the satisfaction of the majority, who concluded as to the precinct:

It will be observed that the whole poll for Member of Congress in this district was only 389, and of this number the committee are of opinion that 116, at least, are fraudulent. There are no means of determining for whom these fraudulent votes were cast, beyond the 30 which is the number one of the witnesses testified that he was certain he succeeded himself in getting to vote for the sitting Member, and beyond the further fact that one at least of the parties most actively engaged in the affair, at whose shop the election was held, and who had the greatest facility for carrying it out, testified that he was laboring in the interest of the sitting Member; still, 86 of these fraudulent voters can not by any safe evidence be charged to the count for either of the three candidates. They are, however, in the count, as well as 30 traced to the sitting Member, and must have been counted for one of the three. What is the duty of the committee and the House with such a return? It must stand as it is, or be set aside altogether, for the means are not at hand by which the return can be purged of the fraud. Thirty might be taken from the account for the sitting Member, but 86 as fraudulent would still be left, and the return thus corrected would contain in it one vote in every four a fraudulent one.

The committee see no alternative but to accept the return and thus sanction the fraud, or set it aside altogether. They can not doubt that the latter course comes within the precedents of former Congresses and of this committee and of the present House, and they therefore reject the return altogether.

The minority attack the testimony offered by the contestant as unreliable; and that he had failed to call the registrars, a majority of whom belonged to the contestant's party.

In the debate, Mr. Dawes discussed[1] the disposition of a poll where one in four votes was shown to be fraudulent, but where it was impossible to show for whom the fraudulent votes were cast. The committee were not strenuous for casting out the whole poll, since it did not change the result.

861. The case of Dodge v. Brooks, continued.

While conduct of election officers may justify their punishment for misdemeanor, it may not justify rejection of the returns made by them.

Testimony as to statement of a voter a considerable time after the act of voting was not admitted to prove how he voted.

An invalid registry, election officers improperly appointed, large and unexplained increase of the returned vote, and inexcusable violations of law justified rejection of the return.

Thirteenth district of the Eighteenth Ward: In respect to this district the contestant alleged:

That in the thirteenth district of the Eighteenth Ward the voting was of such a grossly fraudulent character as to involve all concerned in it, either in participation or passive permission, and to render it impossible to sift and purge the poll; that one of the inspectors, already a partisan of yours, was bribed to break every law intended to preserve the purity of the ballot box to accomplish your election; that this said inspector exchanged places with another partisan of yours who, unsworn, acted as inspector; that another partisan of yours, unsworn and unappointed, acted as poll clerk; that one of the inspectors snatched Republican ballots from the hands of his associates and changed them to Democratic amid the applause of disorderly sympathizers in the polling room; that he refused to receive divers votes intended for me, and all soldier votes, menacing with oaths and imprecations those who offered them, so that his threats and those of his sympathizers prevented, after a certain hour of the day, any citizens from offering soldiers' votes; that during the day persistent attempts were made to bribe to infidelity to his trust one of the Republican inspectors; that the same inspector was, on the evening at the close of the election day, for his fidelity, assaulted, struck down, and grievously injured; that in canvassing the votes the greatest frauds were perpetrated, partisans of yours unsworn acted as canvassers, double votes were counted as two each for you, incorrect ballots were counted as correct, and when neither poll list, tally, nor ballots agreed, two or more of your partisans rushed within the inclosure, and with the pen and pencil labored successfully to conceal and correct the same after the Republican canvassers had, under their threats, withdrawn; then in this same district sundry persons were permitted to vote once for you, and others were permitted to vote twice, who were not qualified voters, to wit, 200 and upward.

The committee, after examining the testimony, concluded that it did not show, beyond a reasonable doubt, that any actual fraud was committed, and that the conduct of the election officers, while it might justify their punishment for misdemeanor, did not justify the rejection of the poll.

Third district of the Twenty-first Ward: The contestant alleged:

> That in the third district of the Twenty-first Ward 188 votes were cast for me, 137 for you, and 206 for Thomas J. Barr; but that, through the fraud or negligence of the canvassers, the votes correctly counted were incorrectly credited and entered upon one of the returns; that the other correct return was lost from the office of the county clerk; that under threats and intimidations on the part of your agents, and a writ of mandamus issued on motion of your attorney, after the board of county canvassers had been already a week in session, the board of canvassers for the district was forced to sign, and file a return with the county clerk, the duplicate copy of that in the hands of the supervisors of the county.

The committee were of opinion that this allegation permitted only of proof that there was error in the returns. Suspicious circumstances attended the making of the returns, and the contestant attempted to show the fraud by proving individual votes. The report says:

> From a careful examination of the testimony offered, to prove for whom voters cast their votes, it appears that several of the 159 claimed by the contestant to be proved to have cast their votes for him, 13 at least are so proved only by proving the statements of the voter made to third persons, not at the time he cast his vote, but about the time the deposition was taken, which was four months after the election. The committee are of opinion that no precedent can be found for receiving such testimony, and they decline to recommend one. This reduces the discrepancy between the return and the number proved to 9 votes, admitting that there can be no doubt as to the proof in relation to the vote of each one of the remaining 146.

Therefore the committee, considering the liability to mistakes after so long a time, did not feel justified in disturbing the returns by adding the nine votes.

The majority of the committee therefore found that the contestant had been elected, and was entitled to the seat.

The report was debated at length from the 3d to the 6th of April,[1] and on the latter day the question was taken first on an amendment proposed by Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, but later modified and presented by Mr. S. S. Marshall, of Illinois:

> That the invalidity of the register of the Fifteenth election district of the Eighteenth Ward of the city of New York would not of itself justify the rejection of the official returns of the canvassers of that district.
> Resolved, That this case be recommitted to the Committee on Elections to report upon supplementary proof, to be made as provided in the next resolution.
> Resolved, That either party be authorized to take supplementary testimony respecting the election in the fifteenth district of the Eighteenth Ward only, before the 10th day of May next, complying with the statutory regulations applicable to the case: Provided, That five days' notice of any proposed examination of witnesses shall be sufficient.

The House disagreed to this amendment, yeas 53, nays 80.

The House then, by a vote of yeas 54, nays 78, disagreed to an amendment declaring William E. Dodge, the contestant, not entitled to a seat.

Then, by a vote of yeas 85, nays 45, the resolution of the majority declaring contestee not entitled to the seat was agreed to; and, finally, by a vote of yeas 72, nays 53, the contestant was declared elected.[2]

862. The Ohio election case of Follett v. Delano in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

It was held in 1866 that proof of notice of service of contest might not be by affidavit of the o1ficer serving the notice.

It was held in 1866 that under the law of 1851 notice of contest must be served upon the returned Member personally.

Decision as to what is a determination of result within the meaning of the law providing for serving notice of contest.

On May 14, 1866,[1] the Committee on Elections reported in the case of Follett v. Delano, from Ohio. The sitting Member was returned by a majority of 239. Several questions were involved in the inquiry of the committee:

1. As to what is legal evidence that a notice of contest has been served.

The sitting Member having contended that no notice of contest had been served on him, the contestant presented affidavits of James T. Irvine, a notary public, who deposed that he served notice on sitting Member by leaving it at his residence, and later personally saw him and requested him to accept service as of the date of service at the residence. The sitting Member contended that the affidavits, not being depositions taken on notice to the opposite party, were not legal evidence. The committee concluded as follows in relation to this aspect of the case:

> The question raised by the first objection made by the sitting Member is, can service of notice be proved by affidavit, or must the testimony of a witness to the fact of service be obtained, like all other testimony, from witnesses, by deposition taken on notice to the opposite party, in conformity with the statute? The statute does not provide in what manner the fact of service shall be proved, but makes the general provision already cited for taking testimony. It may be noticed that this statute provision does not require the testimony of witnesses to be taken in the manner prescribed—only "it shall be lawful", to take it in the way therein specified. Therefore, in the absence of any statute requirement as to the mode of proof of notice of contest, is the affidavit of a third person sufficient? This is the first case since the enactment of the law of 1851 where the question has been raised, so far as the committee knows, or where it could, in practice, have been well raised; for though affidavits have been resorted to in almost every case as proof of the service of notice of contest, yet in every instance till the present case there has been an answer from the sitting Member admitting the service of notice or waiving proof of it. The sitting Member made no answer in this case, and neither admitted nor denied, but left the contestant to prove that he had served the notice at all, and within the time prescribed by law.
> The committee are of opinion that such proof, to be admissible, must be authorized by statute or some rule established by the tribunal before which the testimony is to be used, and that in the absence of these an affidavit could not be admitted according to the principles which govern in the course of all judicial proceedings. To admit an affidavit of a third person, unknown in character to the sitting Member, taken without his knowledge, at a time and place and under circumstances wholly kept from him, is to open a door through which great fraud might be practiced if occasion required. It is a fact, too, as easy of proof in the manner pointed out in the statute for taking testimony as any other fact in the case, and it is deemed by the committee the safer way to require its proof in that mode, if the answer of the sitting Member does not sufficiently admit the fact or waive the proof of it. This answer, if made, must by law be in possession of the contestant before he can proceed to the taking of testimony under the statute, and therefore he will always have the means of determining the necessity of proof.
> The committee did not, however, close their hearing of the case with their conclusion upon this point, for the reason that they could not know that the House would agree with this conclusion, and in that event it would become ultimately necessary for them to pass upon the merits of the case. The committee were also desirous of reaching the merits of the case, if possible, and therefore, reserving their decision upon all preliminary points, they heard the parties upon the entire proof submitted.

2. As to whether or not the notice must be served on the contestee personally. The report finds:

The second point raised by the sitting Member was, that "if the recitals of the affidavits of notice be taken as proved, still the contestant had failed to 'give' him the notice required by the statute." The sitting Member claimed that the statute required personal notice. By the first affidavit of Mr. Irvine it appears that notice was served upon the sitting Member "by leaving it at his residence in Mount Vernon, Knox County, Ohio, on the 29th of December, A.D. 1864." The statute provision is, that "the contestant shall give notice in writing to the Member whose seat he designs to contest." Is leaving a copy at the residence "giving" the sitting Member such notice as the statute requires? Serving of notice by leaving a copy at the residence is not unusual in judicial proceedings, but it is believed by the committee that such service is never legal unless authorized by statute, and can never be substituted for actual notice unless thus sanctioned. In the law of 1851 there is an express provision for leaving a notice of taking depositions at "the usual place of abode" of the opposite party, but none for such service of notice of contest. A reference to the debate in the House at the passage of this act will show that this omission was designed in order to secure actual notice.

3. As to the time prescribed by the law of 1851 for the service of notice: The committee found that the law of Ohio provided that the result of the election should be determined "within ten days after the first day of December," but the certificate might be given to the successful candidate at any time thereafter. The law of the United States, statute of 1851, required the notice of contest to be served "within thirty days of the time when the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same." As the law of Ohio provided for no proclamation of the determination of the result, and as the statutes provided no way for ascertaining on what day within the specified limit the determination had been made, the committee were of the opinion that the contestant had thirty days from, the last of the "ten days after the first day of December." Therefore the 5th day of January, the date when an effort was made to have Mr. Delano accept service as of previous date, was held to be within the limit.

863. The case of Follett v. Delano, continued.

Failure of returned Member to answer notice of contest may not be taken as a confession of the truth of the allegations.

The electors are interested parties to a contest and may not be precluded by any laches of contestant or returned Member.

It being possible to ascertain the result with certainty from tally lists returned with the ballots, these returns are sufficient, although not strictly in accordance with law.

4. As to whether or not the contestee, by failing to answer the notice, may be considered to confess the truth of the allegations: The law of 1851 requires the sitting Member, "within thirty days after the service, to answer such notice, admitting or denying the facts alleged therein, and stating specifically any other grounds upon which he rests the validity of his election." The contestant claimed that the sitting Member, by failing to answer, must be taken to have confessed the truth of the allegations in the notice. The committee say that this might be so were the contestant and sitting Member the only interested parties, and continue:

The electors of the district, each and every one of them, have a vital interest in that question, and no one of them can be precluded, by any laches not his own, from insisting that the choice of the majority shall be regarded. No confession of the sitting Member, however it might bind him personally, can place the contestant in the seat, unless he is the choice of the majority, nor deprive that majority of its rightful representation. The sitting Member may well be deprived, by his neglect to answer, of reliance upon "any other grounds upon which he rests the validity of his election," for he has never given notice of any such grounds; but the committee are of opinion that the House should require proof that the sitting Member has not, and that the contestant has, a majority of the legal votes before unseating the one and admitting the other, however the sitting Member may have seen fit to conduct his own case in a contest.

5. The question on the merits of the contest: The contestant claimed that enough votes should be deducted to leave a majority of 84 for himself. These deductions were claimed because the canvassers had counted "soldiers' votes" from returns so defective in form and substance as to make them wholly illegal and void, viz, that certain poll books were not certified to by officers of the election, as required by the Ohio law; that there was on certain poll books no certificate of the oath as required by law; that in another case the poll book did not show when, where, or by whom the election was held, the heading being left blank.

After quoting the law of Ohio in relation to soldiers' votes, the report refers to the papers required by law to accompany the poll books, and says:

A reference to the statute cited will show what these papers are which come up with the poll book, and what use they serve. From this reference it appears that there are to be kept two poll books, two sets of tally sheets, the form of which is given in the law, and the ballots themselves counted and strung on a string. The tally sheet gives the time and place of holding the election, the persons by whom it was conducted, the number of votes cast, and for whom; and the ballots show with equal certainty for whom and how many votes were cast. The poll book should show when and by whom the election was held, and the names and number of the voters. The law requires one set of tally sheets to be sent to each county having officers voted for; the other full set of the tally sheets and one set of poll books are to be sent to the State auditor; the other poll books and the ballots are to be sent to the secretary of state. Upon the day specified in the law the board of canvassers are required, in the manner therein specified, to take and canvass these returns and "declare and certify the number of votes shown by the tally sheets to have been cast for each candidate therein named, respectively." From these provisions it appears that the result is to be declared from the tally sheets alone—not from the poll books at all.

If, therefore, the "tally sheets" are complete, the means of ascertaining accurately the result are at hand. Indeed, the result could not be determined at all from the poll books, for they do not disclose for whom a vote was cast. The tally sheet is the only paper which shows that result. By counting the ballots anew that result may be verified; but the poll book would render no such aid. That contains only the number and names of the voters in the aggregate. Now, the law requiring the canvassers to declare and certify the number of votes shown by the tally sheets, and there being no proof or allegation that the tally sheets were not correct in form and substance, the return made from the tally sheets which shows a majority for the sitting Member, must prevail. It is competent to overthrow that return by proof, but not without it. Prima facie in the first instance, it remains sufficient until evidence in conflict with it shall be introduced satisfying the committee and the House that it is not true. Nothing has been introduced at all conflicting with the result declared from these tally sheets. Defective poll books do not conflict with the tally sheet. They may fail from this defect to corroborate, but do not, therefore, tell a different story. But the law does not require that the tally sheets shall be corroborated. They stand alone, unless overthrown by positive, not negative, evidence. This view of the law is entirely sustained in a recent case before the supreme court of Ohio, so nearly like this in the particulars here referred to as to be hardly distinguishable from it. It is the case of Howard v. Shields, decided at the December term of that court, A.D. 1865, and not yet published.

The committee say further that there was no allegation or complaint that the tally sheets were not perfect, and therefore the majority for the sitting Member could not be set aside.

On May 18,[1] the resolution reported from the committee declaring. Mr. Delano, the sitting Member, entitled to his seat, was agreed to without debate or division.

864. The Ohio election case of Delano v. Morgan in the Fortieth Congress.

Sitting Member consenting to contestant's application for further time to take testimony, the House agreed thereto.

Sitting Member waived objection as to the specifications of the notice by not making it when the testimony was taken.

The specifications of the notice of contest should be sufficient merely to put the opposite party on his guard.

On March 8, 1867,[2] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, presented a report on the petition of contestant in the case of Delano v. Morgan, of Ohio. Mr. Delano asked for an extension of the time for taking testimony because sitting Member's notices of contest "consume all the time allowed by law for taking testimony," and "for that the official duties of your memorialist as a Member of the Thirty-ninth Congress have prevented him from taking testimony in his case to the present time." The report of the committee says that for these reasons and for "the further reason that sitting Member consents thereto," the petition should be granted. The House thereupon adopted a resolution that the time be "hereby extended to each party for the period of seventy-five days from and after the passage of this resolution, said testimony to be taken in all other respects in conformity with existing law."

On May 25, 1868,[3] Mr. Glenni W. Scofield, of Pennsylvania, submitted the report of the majority [4] of the committee as to the final right to the seat, with resolutions providing for seating the contestant.

A preliminary question arises in this case as to the sufficiency of the notice of contest. The minority sustain the objection of sitting Member to two specifications, as follows:

2. Six hundred and twenty-five persons not legally entitled to vote were improperly and illegally allowed to vote at said election, and did cast their votes.

18. Illegal votes were cast for you at said election as follows: In Clinton Township, Knox County, 25 votes. [Here follows an enumeration of other townships in a similar way.]

The minority discuss these specifications as follows:

The sufficiency of those specifications was submitted for determination to the committee by the sitting Member, both in his printed brief and his oral argument before the committee. It is therefore the obvious duty of the committee to consider and decide that question. It is exceedingly material to the proper and just determination of the whole case and to the legal and substantial rights of the parties. We inquire, then, do the second and eighteenth specifications comply in terms or spirit with the express requirement of the law? Do they "specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest?"

Substantially the allegation in each specification is that illegal votes were cast for the sitting Member. It can not be said without doing most manifest violence to the intention of the law that such general and vague allegations can put the sitting Member in possession of the grounds of contest. They do not aver in what the illegality of the votes consists. They do not state facts from which the illegality results as a conclusion of law. They only state the conclusion of law itself and entirely omit the recital of the reasons or facts that are indispensable to sustain the conclusion. This is a violation of most obvious principles of correct pleading and ought not to be approved. There is nothing in the nature or circumstances of this case to prevent or even render inconvenient a fair and full compliance with this law in the statement by the contestant of his grounds of contest. The object of all pleading, whether in ordinary actions at law or in contested elections or in any cases required to be subjected to judicial or even quasi judicial determination, is to limit, to restrict, to narrow, as much as practicable, the range and scope of the investigation, to exclude unnecessary latitude of inquiry, to disclose at the outset the difficulties to be overcome by testimony, or the specific conclusions intended to be established by proof, to the end that such litigation may be simplified and cheapened, not made interminable and unnecessarily expensive, and especially that no advantage shall be taken or injustice done, against which it is impossible to guard by reason of the uncertainty and vagueness in the statements of the grounds of controversy. The importance of these principles has been well illustrated in this case. The contestant wholly fails to specify the grounds of contest in his notice and then proceeds in his own order to make his proofs; but in reference to a large number of voters (alleged to have been deserters) takes his testimony at so late a day in the time allowed as to absolutely preclude the taking of counter testimony by the sitting Member. It was the intention of the law of Congress to prevent such results by requiring reasonable definiteness and certainty in the statement of the grounds of contest.

These principles have been repeatedly declared and sustained both in the English Parliament and in Congress.

The minority then cite the cases of Michael Leib, Easton v. Scott, Wright v. Fuller, White v. Harris, and Kline v. Verree, and conclude:

This reasoning seems to us conclusive and unanswerable. We conclude, therefore, that the specifications referred to are too vague and uncertain to satisfy the imperative requirements of the law, and that they did by reason thereof work undue prejudice to the sitting Member in his defense, and that the testimony taken under them ought not to be considered by the committee or House.

The majority of the committee do not discuss this in their report; but during the debate[1] the argument of the minority was answered at length, it being contended (1) that sitting Member had waived the objection by not making it when the testimony was taken, this rule being laid down in the case of Otero v. Gallegos, and (2) that the specifications were in fact sufficient. These specifications were not to be judged according to the law of pleading, but rather according to the law of notice. And under the law of notice only so much is required as is necessary to put the opposite party on his guard. From the very nature of the case notices could not be as specific as the minority contended, since they must be made within a limited time and often related to widely separated localities. The authorities cited by the minority are discussed, and also the cases of Washburn v. Voorhees and Vallandigham v. Campbell.

865. The case of Delano v. Morgan, continued.

When an illegal vote is cast by secret ballot the committee endeavor to ascertain from circumstantial evidence for whom, the vote was cast.

Discussion as to the kind of evidence required to show how the elector votes when he declines to disclose his ballot.

The State constitution making citizenship of the United States a requisite of the elector, persons deprived of citizenship by a Federal law for desertion were held disqualified.

[1] Speech of Mr. William Lawrence, of Ohio, Globe, p. 2784, second session Fortieth Congress. Mr. Kerr also debated this question. See p. 2776.

Discussion of the right of Congress by legislative declaration to deprive citizens of a State of their rights as electors.

Another question general in nature is discussed before proceeding to the points in issue. The majority say:

For whom a vote is given, by the laws of Ohio, is a secret properly known only to the voter himself, and he is never required to disclose it. This fact must therefore be often determined upon circumstantial evidence alone. To what political party a voter belonged, whose partisan he had been, whose friends claimed for him the right to vote at the time, what he said of his intention before and his act after voting, are circumstances which each claimant has endeavored to prove, and which the committee have considered in making up their verdict. In this action they are governed by precedent as well as principle. The same ruling obtained in the celebrated case from New Jersey, decided in 1840, and known as the "broad seal" case; and also in Vallandigham v. Campbell, decided in 1858. (See Bartlett's Contested Elections, pp. 28 and 233.) If it is not to be inferred, from this kind of evidence, for whom an illegal vote was cast, it can not, except in a few instances, be ascertained at all. Any number of illegal votes, once placed in the ballot box, either by the deception or connivance of the board, can never after be excluded unless the whole poll is rejected or the fraudulent voters voluntarily confess their crime. When, therefore, an illegal vote is shown to have been cast, the committee have endeavored to ascertain from circumstantial evidence, when positive proof could not be given, for whom it was cast, and deduct it from his count.

The minority say:

With some diversity in the rulings of the courts and of Congress on the subject, the better opinion seems to us to be, that the highest and best evidence, outside the record, for whom any elector intended to vote, is the testimony of the elector himself; but where the voting is by the secret ballot the elector can not be required to testify for whom he voted, and if he declines so to testify, it is then competent to show by other evidence for whom he voted. But in the latter case the evidence should be in character of the highest order attainable under the circumstances, and, in legal effect, so clear and strong as to preclude any reasonable doubt as to the fact.

Proceeding to the several questions on the issue of which the decision depended—

1. The majority thus state the first and most important question:

The contestant claim that 201 deserters from the Army and Navy of the United States voted for the sitting Member, and that this number of votes should be deducted from his count. Citizenship of the United States is one of the qualifications for an elector by the constitution of Ohio. By the act of Congress passed March 3, 1865, it is provided that "all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service, or report to a provost marshal, within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens." Under this law and the constitution of Ohio a deserter is not a legal voter in that State. In the argument before the committee by the counsel for the sitting Member this inference of the law was not disputed, nor the constitutionality of the law denied, but it was claimed that neither the election boards nor this House could pass upon the charge of desertion. This fact, it was claimed, must be first settled by trial and conviction in a court; in other words, that the disqualification did not consist in desertion, but in conviction of desertion. But the law does not so provide. Conviction is not required nor mentioned. It is the duty of an election board to pass upon the facts that constitute a disqualification, such as nonage, nonresidence, idiocy, insanity, color, race, bribery, etc. Why should they not pass upon the fact of desertion? Because, it is said, that is a crime. So is bribery, and yet the sitting Member asks that a considerable number of votes, alleged to have been cast under corrupt influences, should be thrown out, although there was no conviction or even trial, and the committee have complied with his demand. It makes no difference that the same facts which constitute a disqualification would, if heard before a court, constitute a crime. There are many instances where the law makes conviction in a court the ground of exclusion from the franchise, and then, of course, exclusion can only follow conviction. But when it makes the existence of a fact, as in this case, the ground of exclusion, that fact must be passed upon by the officers of the election in the first instance, and by this House upon a contest. In the further argument of the case by the sitting Member himself it was claimed that the law was unconstitutional and void.

The majority proceed to say that the Supreme Court alone can declare void the law, which was passed by Congress and had the approval of the President. The House might override the law, but the committee did not recommend it.

The minority take issue on this question:

We hold in reference to all of the alleged deserters that they are legal electors, and that there is a signal failure, by legal evidence, to establish disqualification against any of them, because—

There is no proof of the trial and conviction of any of them for desertion by any court or tribunal of competent jurisdiction, civil or military, under the acts of Congress, March 3, 1863, or March 3, 1865, or any other laws. Without such conviction, even admitting the validity of those laws, their right to vote remains entirely unimpaired. It involves a violation of the most obvious rules of law, and principles of justice, and guaranties of liberty, and rights of the States, to deprive a citizen of so precious and sacred a franchise upon a vague charge, without due process of law, or a fair and impartial trial, with opportunity to the voter to make his defense. There is nothing in the acts of Congress that gives any countenance to the assumption that it is the intention of those acts to work any such results. The authors of them were not ignorant of the prohibitions and guaranties contained in the fifth and sixth articles of amendments to the Federal Constitution and other pertinent provisions of that supreme law. It is not competent for Congress to inflict punishment by the deprivation of rights upon the citizens of a State by mere legislative declarations. Neither can Congress, without usurpation, regulate suffrage in the States, by direct legislation to that end, or under the pretext of punishing men for alleged desertion. The regulation of suffrage belongs exclusively to the States, and this doctrine has been repeatedly affirmed by Congress in election cases and otherwise. It is also clearly established that Congress has no rightful authority to confer Federal judicial power in such matters upon the judicial tribunals of a State, and still less upon the quasi judicial tribunals organized under the mere municipal regulations of a State, such as election boards, none of whose duties can scarcely be said to be judicial at all.

The minority then go on to quote the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Huber v. Riley, which arose under the act of Congress of March 3, 1865. The minority then proceed:

But it is claimed that, because under the constitution of Ohio no An can be a legal elector who, in addition to the other qualifications, is not also a citizen of the United States, therefore, Congress having control over citizenship of the United States, may decitizenize or withdraw citizenship of the United States from whom it pleases by mere legislative declarations, without due process of law, and that all persons thus deprived of citizenship of the United States at once cease to be citizens, or legal electors, of the State of Ohio. This doctrine is deemed most dangerous, if not monstrous, and violative of most valuable and fundamental principles in our Government. That provision in the constitution of Ohio was undoubtedly designed to prevent aliens from becoming electors in Ohio until they had first become, by naturalization, citizens of the United States. This was required on grounds of local State policy. But it is a perversion of terms to say that any person acquires the right of suffrage in Ohio by virtue of the laws of Congress. Naturalization does not confer the right of suffrage. That right is only conferred by the constitution and laws of Ohio. Persons are allowed to vote there because they possess all the qualifications thus prescribed. The right of suffrage at a State election is a State right, a franchise conferrable only by the State, which Congress can neither give nor take away. If, therefore, the act now under consideration is in truth an attempt to regulate the right of suffrage in the State, or to prescribe the conditions on which that right may be exercised, it would be held unwarranted by the Federal Constitution. In the exercise of its admitted powers, Congress may doubtless deprive an individual of the opportunity to enjoy a right that belongs to him as a citizen of a State, even the right of suffrage. But this is a different thing from taking away or impairing the right itself. Congress may also impose upon the criminal forfeiture of his citizenship of the United States—that is, of what Justice Story denominates his general citizenship; but that does not legally or necessarily deprive him of his citizenship of the State, which is secured to him by the State constitution and laws, and is to be held on the terms prescribed by them alone. It is an integral part of the State government.

But we claim that the act of March, 1865, is unconstitutional in so far as it may be designed, by its terms, to work the disfranchisement of any of the persons alleged to be deserters in this case, because, to that extent at least, it is an ex. post facto law, and a bill of pains and penalties. In support of these objections, waiving further argument here, we refer to the luminous and conclusive judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Cummings v. The State of Missouri, and exparte Garland, 4 Wallace Reports, pp. 277, 333, which ought to be familiar to every Member of the House.

But it is attempted to evade the effect of these decisions by assuming that the failure to report, in some of these cases, after the President's proclamation, converted the previous desertion into a sort of continuing crime, for which continuance the elector may be disfranchised. It is not, and will not be, denied that the offense of desertion had been committed before the proclamation, if committed at all. It was therefore complete, and punishable in the manner prescribed under the previous laws. But the effect of the act of March 3, 1865, is to enlarge, extend the offense, to increase it by declaring it a continuing crime, which it was not before, which is the very definition of an ex. post facto law:

"An ex. post facto law is one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed; or imposes additional punishment to that then prescribed; or changes the rules of evidence by which less or different, testimony is sufficient to convict than was then required."

During the debate [1] this feature of the case was much discussed, and Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, replying to the arguments of the minority, enunciated the view that the act of the deserter in not returning was a renunciation of citizenship.

866. The case of Delano v. Morgan, continued.

One of the election judges being disqualified by law to act as judge, the returns were rejected.

Although the State law forbade temporary closing of a poll on penalty of vitiating the election, yet the harmless act of suspending voting while the officers dined was overlooked.

Temporary absence of a portion of the election officers for purpose of dining was not considered ground for rejecting the poll.

A neglect of the law prescribing the boundaries of voting districts being sanctioned by eighteen elections, the House refused to reject the returns therefrom.

The parties, in proving fraud, having proved the votes actually cast, the House corrected the poll instead of rejecting it.

2. The majority of the committee thus discuss the second objection:

The contestant asks that the returns from Pike Township, Knox County, should be rejected because Salathiel Parrish, one of the judges of the election, being a deserter from the draft of 1864, was incompetent to act in that capacity. The constitution of Ohio provides, "that no person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this State, unless he possesses the qualifications of an elector;" and the statutes of that State further provide that "three persons to be elected township trustees, to have the qualifications of electors, shall act as judges of the elections." Under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, and the constitution and laws of Ohio, a deserter has not the qualifications of an elector, and is therefore incompetent to act as a judge of election. In the case of Howard v. Cooper (Contested Elections, vol. 2, p. 282) the returns of Van Buren Township were rejected because there were only two judges, when the law required three. If a return is untrustworthy when one of the judges is absent, it is certainly more so if the vacancy is filled by a person disqualified to act. Two competent judges are certainly more reliable when acting by themselves than when advised, directed, and in part overruled by a third, pronounced by the law unfit for the trust. This principle is decided in Jackson v. Wayne (Contested Elections, vol. 1, p. 47). Whether the selection of this judge was intentional or unintentional can make no difference in the enforcement of the rule, but the committee are not authorized to conclude, from any of the surroundings of this case, that it was purely accidental. This law of the United States was very much criticised by those who were opposed either to the war or the mode of conducting it. Many persons insisted that it was unconstitutional and void, and might be safely disregarded by the judges of elections. Indeed, it was disregarded in many parts of this district. In this very precinct, as appears from the evidence, eleven deserters were allowed by the board, thus illegally constituted, to cast their votes. Whatever may be thought of the propriety or constitutionality of this law by individuals, it was certainly binding upon the electors of Pike Township until repealed by Congress or pronounced unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

It is worthy of note in this connection that the required form of certificate to the poll book was essentially changed in this case. The special fact required by law to be given is altogether omitted. It certifies only to the number of votes cast, while the law requires that it should certify that they were cast by electors. The number is not so important, because that is also in the certificate to the tally papers, but that it should appear affirmatively that the persons casting these votes were qualified voters, is pointedly required by the statute of Ohio. There is great propriety in the law, and it ought in all proper cases to be enforced. The committee, mainly for the reason first stated, have rejected these returns.

The minority do not admit either the facts or law of the majority, but declare that even if Parrish was incompetent for the reasons alleged, he was still a de facto officer and the election was valid. In debate it was urged by the majority[1] that the de facto principle did not apply in the case of a man who had not the legal capacity to act.

3. The sitting Member claimed that the returns from certain townships should be rejected, because the voting was suspended for a short time while the officers were dining. The law of Ohio provided that after the polls were once opened in the morning they could not be closed for any purpose without rendering the election void. The majority say that while they can not sanction the custom of temporary adjournment, yet as no one appears to have been deprived of his vote, they say:

They do not feel warranted in depriving so large a number of electors of their votes on account of this unintentional and, in these cases, harmless errors of their officers.

The sitting Member also claims that the returns from the First Ward of the city of Zanesville should be rejected on account of the temporary absence of one of the judges and one of the clerks. The polls opened in this ward a few minutes after 6 o'clock in the morning and closed at 6 o'clock in the evening. The counting out immediately followed, making a continual session of thirteen or fourteen hours. Instead of closing the polls, as was done in the townships before referred to, the officers took turns in going out to their meals. They were absent for this purpose about thirty minutes each. However reprehensible this temporary absence may be, it does not appear to be brought within the case of Howard v. Cooper, cited by the sitting Member. In that case one of the judges was absent all the time, and his place was not supplied, as it might and ought to have been, by the voters present, and the returns are signed by less than the number of judges required by law. In this case the proper number of officers officiate at the election, count the votes, and sign the returns. A few votes may have been taken in the absence of one of the officers, but a list of them was kept, and subject to his inspection and criticism on his return. There being no proof or suspicion of unfairness or illegal voting in the ward, the committee are of the opinion that the votes should be counted.

The minority also concur:

The chief violations of the letter of the law consist in closing the polls for short periods during the dinner hour and in the too frequent absence of one or another of the officers from his place at the polls while open. The fact of such unlawful closing of the polls or of such occasional absence of an officer of the election, without proof of bad faith, fraud, corruption, or actual injury, we deem insufficient to call for the rejection of the polls in question.

4. The majority state a fourth question as follows:

The sitting Member further claim that the returns from Clinton Township, Knox County, should be rejected for the reason that the city of Mount Vernon and said township voted at one and the same precinct. The city of Mount Vernon was incorporated by a special act of the legislature in 1845. It lies in the center of Clinton Township, from whose territory it was taken. Under this special charter the township and city were authorized to hold all county, State, and national elections together, and from that time to this all such elections have been so held. In 1852 a general act was passed by the legislature "to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages," which makes each ward of a city an election district, and provides that the election shall be held at such places as the councilmen for such ward shall direct. Under this act no places for holding general elections in the city of Mount Vernon have ever been fixed. The law was not supposed to apply to this city so as to overrule its special charter. The city and township continued to hold their general elections together as before. Up to and including the election of 1866, fifteen State and four national elections had thus been held since the act of 1852. It is claimed now for the first time that the general election in the city of Mount Vernon, under the law of 1852, should be held separate from the township, in its own wards, and that the 1,100 voters of this precinct must be disfranchised as the penalty for so long misconstruing the law. The committee are inclined to think that the sitting Member is right in his construction of the law, considered as an original proposition, but as eighteen different elections preceding that of 1866 have been held since the act of 1852 without question, they do not feel justified in setting aside an election held in pursuance of a construction so long sanctioned by the authorities of the State.

The minority urged reasons of alleged fact why these returns should be rejected, and on the question of law argued:

No elections were held in the wards of the city. Their ballots were confused with those of the citizens of the township outside. It is no answer to say that the proper officers neglected to organize election boards in the city, and that the people therefore might vote at the township poll, because, in such case, it was the right and duty of the citizens at the time to select other officers and proceed to hold the election according to law. The citizens of the city had no right to vote at all out of their respective wards, and to do so was to commit crime under the laws of Ohio. If all these things can be done without vitiating elections, then election laws become useless and inoperative.

5. The majority say in relation to a fifth question:

The contestant also claims that Linton and Monroe townships, in Coshocton County, should be rejected. In each of these townships the ballot box was tampered with, and the number of votes returned for the sitting Member was larger than the number of votes cast for him, while the contestant's vote was proportionally diminished. In Linton the judges refused to allow certain friends of the contestant to be present while the votes were being received, as required by law; and in Monroe the township clerk refused to allow the friends of contestant to examine the retained poll book and ballots as the law requires, and the poll book returned to the clerk of the court was afterwards stolen. It is further objected to the returns from these townships that there is no certified poll book.

The majority further say that either the frauds proven to have been practiced on the ballot boxes or the absence of all certificates to the poll book might be considered a good reason for rejecting the returns altogether, but in proving the fraud the parties had proved the number of votes and for whom they were cast. Therefore the committee corrected the returns and did not reject the poll altogether.

The minority say as to Linton Township:

The law of Ohio requires that the names of the voters shall be entered upon the poll books, and that after the poll books are closed the poll books shall be signed by the judges and attested by the clerks, and the names therein contained shall be counted and the number set down at the foot of the poll book. At the election in question this was done, except the signing. The statute further requires that after the examination of the ballots shall be completed, the number of votes for each person shall be enumerated, under the inspection of the judges, and be set down opposite to their names, and that the judges of the election shall certify to the same, which certificate shall be attested by the clerks, all of which was done. (I Swan & Critch, pp. 533, 534, 535.) The object of the election law is to require the officers to certify the result of the election. That they have explicitly done in this case, and we submit have thus substantially, although not technically, complied with the law.

As to Monroe the minority say:

But the contestant alleges fraud in the officers of this election. The officers, of whom two were Republicans and three were Democrats, were all examined, and all testified that there was no fraud committed by them or with their knowledge. There was other testimony tending to excite suspicion as to the conduct of one of the officers, but it is, in our judgment, entirely insufficient to justify the rejection of the vote of the township, as established by the evidence and the admissions of the parties. It is impossible for us to perceive on what ground of law, or political or moral ethics, votes should be refused to any candidate for whom, by legal evidence, they are shown to have been cast. To reject such votes upon legal technicalities violates every precedent in Congress, and makes Congress assume the odious responsibility of electing Members of Congress.

6. As to Blue Rock Township the majority and minority disagreed as to the facts shown by the testimony.

The returns on their face had shown a majority of 271 for sitting Member. The majority of the committee, as a result of their conclusions, found this obliterated, and that contestant had a majority of 81. They therefore reported resolutions to carry this conclusion into effect. The minority found a legal majority of 742 for sitting Member.

The report was debated at length in the House on June 2 and 3, 1868,[1] and on the latter date a resolution of the minority declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat was disagreed to, yeas 37, nays 39. Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to, yeas 80, nays 38.

Thereupon Mr. Delano appeared and took the oath.

867. The Missouri election case of Switzler v. Anderson in the Fortieth Congress.

A canvassing officer may not reject returns which are regular on their face because the registration law may have been violated in the district in question.

As to the degree of intimidation required to justify a decision that a registration is void.

Entries on a registration list made by an officer not authorized by law to note the qualifications; of voters thereon are not evidence as to qualifications of persons registered.

On March 22, 1867,[2] the House by resolution extended for sixty days from the time prescribed by law the time for taking testimony in the Missouri contest of Switzler v. Anderson.

[2] First session Fortieth Congress, Journal, p. 93.

On March 23, 1868 [1], the report of the majority of the committee was submitted by Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, and on April 2 Mr. Joseph W. McClurg, of Missouri, submitted the minority views.[2] The case turned on the vote of the county of Callaway, which returned for contestant 1,463 votes and for sitting Member 163. The secretary of state of Missouri had declined to open and cast up the votes of Callaway County on the ground that there had not been a proper registration, and the certificate was issued to sitting Member, who had a majority of 178 votes in the remaining counties.

The provisions of the registration law are thus set forth in the report:

The governor of the State is to appoint a supervisor of registration in each county, who is also the president of the board of appeals and revision. The supervisor of registration in each county is to appoint an officer of registration in each election district. The officers of registration in each election district are required to attend on certain days prior to each general election for the purpose of registering the voters of such district. Every person applying to such officer of registration to be registered as a voter must first take and subscribe the test oath prescribed by the constitution of that State. Such officers of registration are also empowered to examine, on oath, every person applying for registration, and it is made their duty to diligently inquire and ascertain that such person has not been guilty of any of the disqualifying acts specified in the constitution. Such officers may also take other evidence as to the qualifications of the applicants, and also act upon their own knowledge. If he is satisfied that the applicant is duly qualified, and can honestly and truthfully take the test oath of the constitution, then he registers such person as a qualified voter. If the officer is not satisfied that the applicant is qualified, he is to enter his name upon a separate list of persons rejected as voters, and he is also to enter the grounds of the rejection, and note an appeal, if one be taken.

The superintendent of registration and the several district officers of registration constitute a board of registration, and are required to meet on certain days prior to the election to hear appeals from the several district registrars and generally to revise the registration in the several election districts in the county, and act upon objections to any who may have been registered as accepted voters.

After this action by the board of revision each distinct registrar is required to make out and certify two copies of the revised registration of his district, and deliver one to the clerk of the county court and one to the election judges of the district. No person is allowed to vote as "a qualified voter" unless his name appears as such upon the certified copy thus furnished the judges of the election.

All these provisions of the law in relation to the duties of registration and election officers are enforced by severe penalties for their violation; and all attempts to impede registration by threats, intimidation, or violence are similarly punishable.

By a supplemental registration act it is provided that the supervisors of registration in the several counties shall "make out and forward to the secretary of state, immediately after the completion of the registration in their respective counties and districts, a certified copy of the registration thereof, which shall contain the names of all registered voters; which certified copy shall be evidence of the facts therein stated, and may be used as such in any contested-election case, or other legal proceedings."

The governor appointed the registering officers in accordance with the above law. It appeared from the debate that the governor, the superintendent of registration for Callaway County, and the district registrars belonged to the party of the sitting Member.[3] The district registers made the registration, and each certified the copies of the registration as required by the law. The copies were duly delivered to the clerk of the county court and the judges of the several election districts as the law required. The election was held November 6, 1866, but not until December 12, 1866, did Thomas, the county superintendent of registration for Callaway County, certify the registration of the county to the secretary of state. The copy which he then returned had attached to the registration of each district or township the certificate of the district registrar. He also attached a certificate of his own, wherein he set forth that the letter and spirit of the law was not carried out in any one of the election districts; that such widespread intimidation existed in the county that the law "was not carried out, as the certificates hereto appended show." The charges herein set forth were substantiated by certificates from three district registrars, who each certified that by reason of intimidation disloyal men not entitled to vote had been registered. Thomas also made entries against the names of 730 registered persons, such entries alleging disloyalty.

As to whether, on the state of facts as presented, the secretary of state had any right to refuse to cast up the votes given in the county of Callaway, the report says:

It does not distinctly appear that the secretary of state knew that these entries on the copy of registration had been placed there by Thomas, but it seems highly probable that he did, as it does appear that before Thomas made any certificate upon the registration, it was a matter of consultation and discussion between him and the secretary whether he could make such a certificate as he did make, and the effect of it, the secretary saying that if Thomas could make such a certificate, he thought it probable the whole thing could be thrown out.

Thomas had no legal right to make any such entries upon the copy; it was not in the performance of any legal duty that the laws of the State devolved upon him; his duty was only to make out and deliver to the secretary of state a copy of the registration of the county, containing the names of all registered voters, and to verify it by his official certificate. He had no right to interpolate other facts or statements into the copy, and he had no power to make his certificate evidence to any greater extent than to verify the copy as a true copy of the official registration. But assuming that the secretary of state did not know that these entries on the registration had been made by Thomas, and that he supposed they were made by the district registrars, or were made by the board of appeals, still, in the judgment of the committee, he had no right to regard them, and upon them set aside the vote of the county. The copy of registration shows that each of the persons against whose name such entry had been made was registered as a qualified voter, and that such registration had been sanctioned and approved by the board of appeals. If he had the right to suppose that they had this evidence before them, or that such charge was made against these persons, he must also see that notwithstanding this, they had been allowed to remain upon the register as qualified voters. The law nowhere authorizes the secretary of state to review the action of the registration officers and overrule their action. But it is not necessary to enlarge upon this view of the case, as the committee is satisfied that the secretary knew that these entries were made by Thomas with a view to support what he stated in his certificate, and that he ought to have treated them as a mere nullity, as much as if Thomas had entered against the same persons that they were minors or nonresidents.

Nor had the secretary any right to regard the facts stated by Thomas in his certificate, except so much as verified the copy. The law is entirely settled that statute-certifying officers can only make their certificates evidence of the facts which the statute requires them to certify; that when they undertake to go beyond this and certify other facts, they are unofficial, and no more evidence than the statement of any unofficial person. The statements or certificates of Turner, Turley, and Yount can not be regarded as having any legal validity whatever. The district registrars had exhausted their legal power of certifying when they had certified the registration of their respective districts; they were not officers to certify the county registration to the secretary of state, so that their statements are of no more force than any private persons. The law is equally clear that the secretary of state had no legal power to go behind the returns that were certified to him by the county clerks of the votes in the respective counties, or behind the returns of the registration officers. He was a mere canvassing officer, to open and count the votes that upon the face of the returns appeared to have been regularly cast.

The committee therefore concluded that the action of the secretary of state in rejecting the vote of the county was wholly illegal and unauthorized.

But the sitting Member further claimed that, even if the secretary of state might not reject the vote of Callaway County, the House might nevertheless do it, on the ground partly that the district officers of registration voluntarily neglected their duty and the requirements of the law, but mainly on the ground that the public and general sentiments of the people were so hostile to the proper enforcement of the registry law, and that such open threats were made against those who should attempt it, that the registrars were intimidated and prevented from doing their duty, and that loyal men were prevented from interposing objections against the registration of their disloyal neighbors. After weighing the evidence the committee conclude:

From the mass of conflicting opinion on this subject, and from the character of the threats proved, the committee comes to this conclusion, that there was no just and reasonable ground to fear personal violence or injury in consequence of appearing to make and support objections to registration; but that it was against the general and public opinion of the county that persons who had not committed disloyal acts should be disfranchised merely on the score of opinions and sympathies, and that probably many persons did refrain from making objections rather than encounter this general sentiment.

The committee does not regard this as any such unlawful interference with or obstruction of the law as furnishes ground to invalidate the registration. Nor does the committee regard any threats to seek redress against refusal of registration, by resort to legal tribunals by suit, as unlawful, so as to produce that effect.

The committee, upon all the evidence, can not find that there was any such misconduct or disregard of the law by the district registrars, or any such fear or intimidation excited, either upon the registrars or upon loyal men generally, as to preclude a fair and legal registration of this county, or to justify a total rejection of its vote for any such cause.

As to another feature the report says:

The committee does not understand that it is claimed for the sitting Member that if the vote of this county is to be counted, except so far as he shows the contestant received illegal votes, that his evidence shows a sufficient number to prevent the election of the contestant. Even striking out all those who had entries made against them by Thomas, more than enough are left to give the contestant a majority.

But those entries are not, in the judgment of the committee, any evidence of the disqualification of the person registered.

As has before been shown, Thomas had no authority to make them, and could give them no additional force by spreading them upon this copy of the registration of the county.

Thomas, upon inquiry as to the evidence upon which he acted in making these entries, says:

"In cases of bonded persons I took it from a list furnished me from the adjutant-general's office; those under the head of remarks, who were designated as enrolling disloyal, were taken from an enrollment made by Colonel Kerkel in 1862; under the head of other remarks, there were very few of them. The remarks made of this last class were made upon my own knowledge."

We have been cited to no law by which these lists of persons, as under bonds, or enrolled disloyal, are made evidence for any purpose beyond the specific one for which the lists were made; and upon what authority or evidence the lists were made is not shown. It is left altogether in doubt whether Thomas had the original enrollment made by the military authorities, or had only an unauthenticated copy. But however much weight the enrollment itself might be entitled to if produced in evidence here, the common principle of requiring the production of written evidence, and not receiving its contents from a witness, is a sufficient answer to bringing them in this manner. The attempt of Thomas to make facts "within his own knowledge," or "facts generally admitted," evidence, by thus entering them upon this copy of registration, is a still wider departure from all proper rules of evidence. The evidence in the case shows that a few persons who had actually been engaged in the rebellion were registered as qualified voters; and giving full credit to the opinions of the witnesses of the sitting Member as to the number of persons in the county entitled to be registered under the law, it would appear that a large number must have been registered who were disqualified by reason of having sympathized with those engaged in rebellion.

The committee has already had occasion to express its judgment (which was sanctioned by the House) of the insufficiency of such general estimates for the purpose of proving either the qualification or disqualification of voters, and when such estimates are founded upon the sentiments and opinions of others, instead of tangible causes, they are still more dangerous as evidence.

Therefore the majority of the committee recommended resolutions declaring contestant elected and unseating sitting Member.

The minority, after reviewing the testimony as to intimidation, conclude:

Sufficient testimony has been quoted to satisfy the House that such a state of fear existed in Callaway County that there was not a proper enforcement of the law, but such a disregard that it is impossible to ascertain what should have been the legal vote in regard to numbers; disloyalty being triumphant, the loyal intimidated, registrars powerless, witnesses awed into silence, "a quiet election," and even "a quiet registration," because the disloyal controlled all as they desired.

Loyalty and justice demand that the election in that county (Callaway) be regarded as a nullity; that treason be thus rebuked, and those who failed in their efforts to destroy their government by the bullet be taught that, if permitted to control it by the ballot, they shall not be permitted to do so in open and flagrant violation of the law.

868. The case of Switzler v. Anderson, continued.

The House recommitted a report in an election case for inquiry as to a newly made charge of disloyalty against both parties.

The House, overruling its committee, held void an election in a county because of the intimidating influence of a preponderating disloyal element.

Instance wherein the House declined to follow its committee in awarding the seat of a Member of the majority to a Member of the minority party. (Footnote.)

The report was debated in the House on July 15 and 16, 1868.[1] On the latter day Mr. John F. Benjamin, of Missouri, in the course of debate, presented charges against the qualifications of the contestant as to loyalty.

It was objected that the pleadings made in accordance with the law had contained nothing affecting the loyalty of contestant, and that branch of the subject had not been investigated by the committee.

But the House voted, yeas 93, nays 46, to recommit the case with instructions to inquire into the charges of disloyalty made against the contestant, and also charges of disloyalty made by contestant against sitting Member.

On January 14, 1868,[2] the committee reported again, stating that files of a newspaper edited by contestant had been presented tending to show disloyalty, especially an editorial justifying the shooting of Colonel Ellsworth at Alexandria. The report cites the conclusions in the Kentucky case, and announces that the committee adheres to the conclusions of the former report. While many of the articles published in contestant's newspaper were mischievous in their tendency, yet there was no such proof of disloyalty as to require his exclusion under the rule laid down in the Kentucky cases. The article relating to Ellsworth was repudiated by contestant, who declared that it was published without his knowledge.

[2] Third session, House Report No. 7.

On January 21[1] the second report was debated at length in the House. The opponents of the majority report urged that the House itself should reject the vote of Calloway County because the testimony abundantly showed that by far the larger part of the registered persons in that county were disloyal and not entitled to vote under the law of Missouri. This testimony was urged to be sufficiently conclusive, although this was vigorously disputed by those supporting the majority report.

A test vote was taken on the resolution unseating sitting Member. This was disagreed to, yeas 55, nays 89. Thereupon the resolution declaring contestant entitled to the seat was laid on the table. So the majority report was disapproved, and sitting Member retained the seat.

869. The Missouri election case of Birch v. Van Horn in the Fortieth Congress.

Extension of time of taking testimony in an election case.

Suffrage is a political right or privilege which, after it is granted, may be restricted or enlarged.

A new State constitution withholding suffrage from persons not able to take an oath of loyalty was held valid and not in the nature of an ex post facto law.

On March 22, 1867[2] by unanimous consent, the House agreed to a resolution presented by Mr. Joseph W. McClurg, of Missouri, providing that the time for taking testimony in the Missouri contested-election case of Birch v. Van Horn be extended for sixty days after the expiration of the time prescribed by law.

On December 18, 1867,[3] Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in this case. The sitting Member had been returned by an official plurality which in corrected form amounted to 525 votes.

(1) The principal contention by which the contestant strove to overcome this plurality related to a large number of rejected votes, of which 2,501 were for contestant and 9 for sitting Member. The constitution of Missouri, which had been in force since July 5, 1865, disqualified as voters all persons who had manifested adherence to or sympathy with the cause of the so-called Confederacy. This constitution also provided for a system of registration, and that as a prerequisite to such registration and to voting the citizen should take an oath proving his loyalty. The taking of this oath did not of itself insure registration, but the registration officers might institute inquiry, and if this inquiry were not satisfactory, might place the name on the rejected list. Persons on this rejected list might cast their ballots, but such ballots were marked and certified as rejected. The examination of this question of rejected voters divided itself into several branches.

[3] Second session Fortieth Congress, House Report No. 4; 2 Bartlett, p. 205; Rowell's Digest, p. 215.

(a) A question as to the constitutionality of the provision, in view of the fact that another portion of the State constitution had been impeached. The report says:

The ninth section of the same article provides that, after sixty days from the time the constitution takes effect, no person shall be "permitted to practice as an attorney or counselor at law, nor after that time shall any person be competent as a bishop, priest, deacon, minister, elder, or other clergyman of any religious persuasion, sect, or denomination, to teach or preach, or solemnize marriages, unless such person shall have first taken, subscribed, and filed said oath."

Under this ninth section of the constitution arose the case of Cummings v. The State of Missouri (4 Wallace, 277), in which it was held by a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States that this provision, having the effect to deprive persons of the right to practice professions and pursue avocations lawful in themselves, in consequence of acts done prior to the adoption of the constitution, could only have been intended as punishment for such acts, and was therefore in essence and substance an ex post facto law, and therefore forbidden by the Constitution of the United States.[1]

The contestant claims that the same application of principles requires the same decision in relation to voters; that the virtual disfranchisement of persons who were voters under the previous constitution and laws of the State, but who are prevented from voting under the new constitution by reason of their inability to take the oath it requires, can only be regarded as a punishment for the act which stands in the way of taking the oath, and that the Constitution of the United States prohibits the infliction of punishment by subsequent legislation.

If such disfranchisement must be regarded as established for the purpose of punishing the persons thus deprived of the right of voting, it must be admitted to come entirely within the reasoning by which the above-cited judgment of the court is supported.

Your committee believe that the provisions of the new constitution of Missouri may be supported, so far as they require this oath of voters, without at all trenching upon the decision of the Supreme Court.

Each of the States of the Union have hitherto regulated suffrage within their own limits for themselves, and in such a manner as the people of the State deemed most conducive to their own interests and welfare. Suffrage is a political right or privilege which every free community grants to such number and class of persons as it deems fittest to represent and advance the wants and interest of the whole. No State grants it to all persons, but with such limitations as the interests of all and the interest of the State require.

When once granted it is not a vested, irrevocable right, but it is held at the pleasure of the power that gave it, and the State may, by a change of its fundamental law, restrict as well as enlarge it. When, therefore, the State of Missouri, in changing its constitution, saw fit to declare that the interests of the State and of the people of the State would be promoted by withholding the right of voting from all persons who could not take the prescribed oath, they exercised no greater or higher power than exists in every State.

870. The case of Birch v. Van Horn, continued.

4. A new State constitution being recognized by State authorities and by Congress in the reception of Representatives, the House will not question it in an election case.

Persons being denied the privilege of voting because of disqualification, their votes may not be counted by the House on general testimony as to their qualifications.

A registration officer who could not properly take the oath he did take as such officer was held a good de facto officer.

[1] Although the whole committee concurred in the conclusions of the report, Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, argued in debate in support of the objection that this provision of the State constitution was in the nature of an ex post facto law. (See Globe, p. 401.)

(b) The committee also conclude:

On the 1st day of July, 1865, the governor of the State issued his proclamation declaring the constitution adopted, and in force from and after the 4th day of the same July. Since that time the new constitution has been regarded by all the departments of the State government as the fundamental law of the State; all the legislation of the State has been conformed to it; all the officers of the State, and of all municipal subdivisions of the State, have been elected and held office according to its requirements, and the State has been represented in both Houses of Congress without question as to the validity and binding obligations of this constitution.

The contestant now claims that this State constitution, so far at least as it affects elections of Members of Congress, should be held a nullity, and as if it had never been adopted by the people of the State.

This is claimed upon the ground that the convention by whom it was framed exceeded their powers given by the legislative act by which the convention was called, and that this was not cured by its subsequent adoption by the people, because, in submitting it to a vote of the people, those only were allowed to vote who could take the oath prescribed in the second article of the constitution, the effect of which was to preclude large numbers from voting who had been previously allowed to vote. The committee have not deemed themselves at liberty to enter upon this inquiry.

It being conceded that by every department of the State government of Missouri this constitution is recognized and acted upon as the fundamental law of the State, and by Congress in the reception of Representatives from the State, it is in our judgment too late for this House to inquire as to the regularity of its formation or adoption by the State.

(c) Contestant also claimed that even if the State constitution were valid, the persons whose ballots were rejected were nevertheless legal voters under all the requirements of the new constitution. In support of this he produced general testimony. Thus, taking the list of rejected voters at a certain place, a witness would be introduced to swear that he did not know any one of them "who was disloyal within the meaning of the terms of the new constitution of Missouri."

The committee say:

The evidence of the contestant tends to show that the restrictions and disqualifications created by the new constitution were very rigidly enforced, and some instances of partisan unfairness are shown, but to what extent this operated to exclude lawful voters from registration, and who such voters were, is left wholly vague and uncertain. The only evidence in the case is that taken by the contestant, and it is probable that much of the appearance of unfairness would have been dispelled if evidence had been taken by the sitting Member.

If the class of evidence introduced by the contestant had been the only means within his reach to establish the right of the persons rejected to be registered and vote as qualified voters, there would be very plausible ground to claim that enough ought to be presumed from it to at least vacate the election, unless what is proved by the contestant was rebutted by evidence from the other side. But the contestant was not confined to this proof or evidence of this general nature at all. The provisions of the constitution and laws of Missouri furnished him peculiar facilities to establish his case, if he relied upon proving that legal voters were excluded from registration and voting as qualified voters, in as much as the rejected list of the registers and the rejected votes furnished the names of the persons and the candidates for whom they voted.

Under these circumstances the committee consider they have no right to rely upon such vague and general evidence as has been furnished, or to draw presumptions and conclusions from it when it was clearly within the power of the contestant to have established the facts; he asks us to presume by dear and exact proof if such facts exist.

The committee consider, also, that in order to unseat a Member of this House who has the regular certificate of election, and who is conceded to have received a majority of several hundred votes of the votes received and counted, they should be able to report whose votes were excluded that ought to have been counted; that it would not do for the committee or for the House to say that out of 2,500 rejected voters, all of whose names are unknown, they are satisfied that enough were legal voters and ought to have been counted to give the contestant a majority.

(2) The committee thus discuss a question relating to an irregularity of certain poll books:

The contestant also claims that all the votes cast in the county of Clinton, except in the township of Concord, should be excluded by reason of the insufficiency of the poll books returned by the judges and clerks of election in the several townships.

The statutes of Missouri require that the judges and clerks of election, before entering upon their duties, take the oath required by the constitution, and also an official oath prescribed by the statute. The statute gives a form for a poll book, in which form it is stated that the judges and clerks were duly sworn previous to entering upon the duties of their offices. The committee regard this as a statute requirement that should appear upon the poll books returned.

Jeremiah V. Bassett was clerk of Clinton County at the time this Congressional election was held. He testifies that the poll books from the townships of Jackson, Shoal, Lafayette, Hardin, and Platte contained no evidence that the judges and clerks of election therein had taken the required oaths. Robert W. Musser, who was deputy clerk during the same time, testifies to the same fact.

These townships gave 375 votes for Van Horn and 189 for Burch. The committee are satisfied that this defect existed in the poll books of these townships, as stated by these witnesses (provided it be admissible to show such fact by paxol evidence), and if for that cause they ought to have been excluded from the count, then the above number of votes should be deducted from the votes of both candidates, respectively, making a difference of 186 votes in favor of the contestant.

(3) As to the competency of an officer of election:

The contestant also introduced two witnesses whose testimony tended to prove that Francis D. Phillips, supervisor of registration for Clinton County, induced men to enlist in the rebel army, and so could not truthfully take the oath required by the constitution of Missouri to entitle him to vote or hold office. As these witnesses are not contradicted, the committee are compelled to find the fact proved, if it be of any legal value.

The supervisors of registration for each county are appointed by the governor, and are to be qualified voters. These county supervisors appoint registers in each election district in the county, who are also to be qualified voters.

There is no evidence but that Phillips was in every way legally competent to hold this office, except his inability to take the oath; nor is any question made but that he had, in fact, taken all the necessary oaths and other legal steps to make him a qualified voter; that he was duly appointed to this office by the governor, and had taken all the oaths required by his official station, and had actually assumed and performed the duties of supervisor. The committee are of opinion that his acts as such supervisor can not be regarded as void, so as to affect the legality of the votes given at the election; that, having come into the office under all the forms and requirements of the law, he is at least a good officer de facto, whose acts are not to be questioned in a collateral proceeding, but only by some proceeding bringing his title to the office directly in question.

The contestant's evidence tends to establish that Anthony Harsel, supervisor of registration in Clay County, in 1861 was a friend and sympathizer with the Southern rebellion; and, uncontradicted, the committee think it sufficient to establish the fact; but, as in the case of Phillips, we regard him as being a good de facto officer, whose acts can not, in a collateral proceeding, be held invalid by reason of any defect in his official title.

During the debate Mr. Poland said[1] it would be going a great way, in consequence of this defect in the supervisors, to vitiate the appointment of the deputy registrars, and thus vitiate the entire election, and stated that the committee were unanimous on this point.

The report was debated on January 8, 1868,[2] both contestant and sitting Member being heard, and the resolution confirming sitting Member's title to the seat was agreed to without division.

871. The Missouri election case of Hogan v. Pile in the Fortieth Congress.

The use of an unofficial compilation of a registration list to aid in reference during the voting was held not to vitiate the poll.

Registration being a condition of voting, the House declined to reject a precinct whereof the registration list was not shown to have been returned as required by law.

On June 18, 1868,[1] Mr. Burton C. Cook, of Illinois, from the Committee on Elections,[2] submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Missouri case of Hogan v. Pile. The questions arising in this case were largely of fact arising from the workings of the registration law of Missouri; but a few questions arose involving principles.

The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 218 votes, which the contestant assailed as produced by frauds and irregularities. The questions involving the determination of principles were:

(1) The law of Missouri required each voter to be registered, and that no voter who had not been registered should vote. The law further provided:

SEC. 12. Immediately after the closing of such register the officer of registration shall make and certify two fair copies, alphabetically arranged, of the names of the qualified voters, as ascertained and determined by said board, one of which he shall deposit with the clerk of the county court on or before the next ensuing Saturday, and the other he shall deliver at or before the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, to some one of the persons who shall have been appointed to act as judges of the next ensuing general election in the election district for which the list was made, and shall take his receipt therefor. * * * The person to whom the said list shall have been delivered shall produce the same at the place of voting, and deliver it into the possession of the judges of the election at the time of opening the polls on the day of the ensuing general election.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 17. When any person shall have voted the judges of election shall, at the time, write opposite his name on the list the word "voted."

In one election precinct the provisions of this law were carried out as described in the report:

The registry lists certified by the officer of registration were alphabetized simply by the first letter of the name. In some instances more than a hundred names were recorded under a single letter. To remedy the inconvenience occasioned by the imperfect manner in which the list was arranged, and the consequent delay finding the name of the voter and receiving the vote, the judges of election of the thirtieth election precinct, on the day and night prior to the election, caused the certified list to be copied, and in the copy made the names were alphabetized by the first two letters, so that the name could be more easily and readily found; the names were numbered on the certified list and the numbers were transcribed on to the copy, so that where the name was found on the copy, by the aid of the number it could be more readily found on the certified list. (Testimony of John Green, Mis. Doc. 37, p. 138.) Both the certified list and the copy made by the judges were present, and were used by the judges and clerks during the election. There is no evidence before the committee showing that the copy made by the judges was used to the exclusion of the certified list; the returns were made on the certified list. (See testimony of G. Sessingham, p. 139, also the testimony of Charles P. Gould, p. 137, and of Milton H. Wash, p. 57.)

[2] Minority views were presented by Messrs. John W. Chanler, of New York, and Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana.

The committee are of opinion that the use of a more perfectly arranged copy of the certified registration lists by the judges, in connection with the original, for the purpose of facilitating the finding of the names of voters on the certified lists, and consequently making it possible to receive a much larger number of votes, did not render void the election, and if done in good faith was no more a violation of the law of Missouri than it would have been to have employed an expert clerk to have found the names of voters upon the certified list without delay, and thus have expedited the voting.

The minority criticise the secondary list as made up by a partisan of sitting Member who was not a sworn officer, and not properly supervised by sworn officers. They say:

This new list got up by Green, etc., is said to have been a "true copy" of the original book or "list" furnished by the registrar, yet no one testifies to any examination and comparison thereof, except, as Mr. Green says, by counting the names on both lists and finding them to agree in number. Can the committee sanction this method of comparison? Would counting the words verify the copy of a bill, a deed, or any legal instrument? Surely the members of the committee will not try to legalize a list of voters compared by merely counting the names. Further, the list used was not authenticated. The law requires the registrar "shall certify to the list of voters;" this is its authentication. Could it be a legal copy, if even every name on the original was on it, without this authentication? Did any court ever admit as evidence a copy of a deed, even though containing every word of the original, when there was no authentication thereof?

More than this, did ever court admit as evidence a paper purporting to be a copy of an original one, made evidence, which not only was not authenticated, but was proven never to have been compared with the original of which it purported to be a copy? Nay, more, when the purported copy has been challenged as fraudulent, but is not then produced for comparison with the original, would any court or jury substitute such copy? Assuredly they would not. But the evidence is clear that this official record was substituted by another, claimed to be a copy, but by no one examined and compared, not even certified by any one as true. To admit such would be to ignore all the practice of the past.

The minority and majority then join issue as to whether or not the facts showed the secondary list to have been made and used for purposes of frauds. There were certain discrepancies, but the majority insisted that they were explained by errors arising innocently from writing foreign names by sound. The minority combated this theory, pointing out that the party friends of sitting Member controlled the registry.

(2) Contestant also assailed the returns from the thirty-seventh election precinct. The report says:

It is claimed by contestant that the return from this precinct should be rejected, because the original registry list was not returned to the office of the county clerk. The law requires that the officers of registration shall, "as soon as may be," deposit with the clerk the original books of registration. The only evidence before the committee that the original registry list was not returned is as follows: "No. 21 registration book not returned to clerk's office. James C. Moody, judge." This certificate is without date, and there is no proof before the committee when it was made.

The next paper is a copy of poll book of the same election precinct, certified by S. W. Eager, clerk of the county court, which certificate is dated January 3, 1867. The election was held on the 6th day of November, 1866. Even if there was any proof before the committee that the original list had not been returned to the county clerk by January 3, 1866, the committee are not prepared to say, in the entire absence of proof of the circumstances of the case, that there was such violation of the law as would render the election void.

In support of this position the report cites the case of Brockenborough v. Cabell.

The minority cite the law:

SEC. 14. The officers of registration shall, as soon as may be, deposit with said clerk the original books of registration, which shall be kept and preserved among the records of the court, except when otherwise disposed of, as hereinafter directed.

After stating the facts, the minority say:

Now, we ask, upon what evidence does the majority of the committee act in receiving as legal votes these 164 from district No. 37? There is none, for there can be no legal vote without registration, and there is absolutely no evidence of registration in that district. This conduct is in most noticeable contrast with the rejection by the majority of the committee of certain precincts in Kentucky, in the case of McKee v. Young, where the grounds of objection in no way touched the merits or fairness of the election.

The sitting Member, in his verbal argument before the committee, admitted that he had no doubt that when Eager, clerk, made the certificate the book had not then been returned; but, when asked by the chairman of the committee if he knew it had been returned since, he said he did not know whether it had or not.

If it had been returned, he could have procured a copy, and thus refuted the allegation. Failing to supply the lack, and especially when his own party friends, the registrar and the county clerk, are the only ones that could supply the list, the case on all principles of justice must be given against him, and this precinct ought to be thrown out.

In the case of Blair v. Barrett the contestant alleged the absence of evidence on the record that the judges had been sworn. It was held by the committee and the House that it was the duty of the contestee to supply this evidence, failing in which this precinct was thrown out and Barrett lost his seat. This ruling has been since affirmed. This has frequently been held a necessary part of the return. The Missouri law makes the evidence of registration essential to the right to vote, and the preservation of this evidence in a given office an imperative requirement. Can the committee set aside this provision?

The majority of the committee have held in the recent case of Delano v. Morgan that while the the law of Ohio specifically required the return should show that all who voted were "electors;" and as this designation was omitted in the certificate of return, the omission was fatal. The Missouri law requires registration, requires the evidence thereof to be filed with the clerk, requires the voter's name to be marked "voted" on the list, and this list to be returned. None of these absolutely mandatory provisions are complied with, and yet the majority of this committee fail to see this fatal omission, which practically shields a party friend.

Presuming the attention of the majority had not been directed to the peculiar reasons of this requirement, we have given to it this examination, and, in accordance with all analogous precedents, reject the poll, and shall therefore, in our summary of result, deduct it from each of the parties. The vote at that precinct was: Pile, 94; Hogan, 69.

872. The case of Hogan v. Pile, continued.

Evidence taken ex parte is not considered in an election case even when given by electors as to their votes.

The State law requiring the polls to be open from "sunrise to sunset," and the polls being closed at sunset and then reopened, the votes cast after sunset were rejected.

(3) As to certain evidence taken ex parte the report concludes:

During his concluding argument before the committee the contestant presented the affidavits of 42 persons showing that they voted for him, and it is insisted that the poll books show that each of these persons were counted for the sitting Member.

The committee can not consider these affidavits as evidence, because it was admitted by contestant that the affidavits were wholly ex parte and taken without any notice whatever having been given to the sitting Member and because the same were taken without any order having been made for that purpose after the time allowed by law for the taking of the proof had expired. * * * If, however, the testimony was admissible, it would be very far from conclusive.

The minority admit that this evidence is not strictly legal, but contend that from its nature it should be admitted.

The clerk, being by law the custodian of election returns, ballots, etc., on the mandate of the circuit judge, in accordance with the law of Congress, examined and certified the numbers on the ballots counted for each candidate as returned by the judges of election, and by comparing these numbers with corresponding numbers on the poll list, it is readily perceived for whom each party voted. Many well known and influential citizens are by this comparison found apparently voting for the sitting Member, their ballots being counted for him. Publication was made in the newspapers of St. Louis of this fact, and these gentlemen, to the number of about 100, sent their affidavits to the contestant to same him of the fact that they did not vote for the sitting Member, but did vote, each and all of them, for contestant.

This is simply a question of fact. The tickets were printed; party lines were very closely drawn; these gentlemen are vouched for as intelligent lawyers, bankers, merchants, doctors, mechanics, of well-known political proclivities. When they swear they knew for whom they voted, and when the official certificate of the clerk of the county court certified to the numbers as counted for the sitting Member, and numbers corresponding to each of these names are found to have been counted for the sitting Member, and hence made fraudulently to increase his apparent vote, cross-examination could not change these facts.

(4) The election law of Missouri required the polls to be opened from "sunrise to sunset." In precinct No. 26 certain votes were taken after sunset. The majority decline to decide whether these should be counted or not, but as to two other precincts they say:

The committee are of the opinion that the votes which were given at precincts Nos. 27 and 28 after sunset ought not to have been returned or counted, because in each of those precincts the polls were regularly closed at sunset. (See testimony of John Conzelman, pp. 132, 133; Henry Gambs, p. 135; George B. Stone, p. 157.) After the polls were once regularly closed at sunset it is obvious that they could not be legally opened again during the evening with only partial notice to the voters; such a course would open the door to any fraud that might be attempted.

The minority contend for the rejection of all these returns:

The majority do not undertake to settle the legality of this vote, nor indeed to express any opinion upon it, yet retain the return for the twenty-sixth precinct, because there only the voting was continued without any formal closing of the polls. We are unwilling to unite in this acquiescence, believing it would make a very bad precedent, and lead to injurious consequences. The election law of Missouri requires the polls to be opened "from sunrise to sunset." The question of the legality of votes taken after sunset, as far as our knowledge goes, has never been adjudicated in that State; indeed we do not find that any after-sunset vote had ever before been counted in the State. When the return was made from the twenty-sixth precinct of a night vote, the clerk and judges, passing on, or rather footing up, the returns from the precincts, heard an argument from one gentleman on the subject; after which the clerk and one county judge agreed to receive this return and certify it up to the secretary of state. The other county judge united in the certificate to the general return, but refused to certify the "after-sunset vote," and entered his protest against its reception. (See testimony of John F. Long, county judge, p. 33.) The other election judges generally refused to count and certify the night vote, but when at last they did send it up to the clerk from the twenty-eighth precinct he refused to receive and include it in returns. The secretary of state, in his official certificate filed with the committee, evidently does not regard the night vote as of equal validity with the day vote, for he enumerates them separately, and specifically presents the former in red ink, in contradistinction with the latter, thus:

William A. Pile received 6,587 votes before sunset; 141 votes after sunset; total vote before and after sunset, 6,728.

John Hogan received 6,417 votes before sunset; 93 votes after sunset; total votes before and after sunset, 6,510.

Assuredly if he deemed after-sunset vote as legal as the day vote, he would have made no such distinction. The undersigned deem the argument in contestant's brief on this subject conclusive; but are unwilling, even tacitly, to admit the legality of such votes.

We state freely, if the night vote is to be counted at all it should all be counted, and the evidence is clear to our minds that the contestant would have a large majority; but, unwilling to open such a door to fraud, we, without any hesitation, reject the whole after-sunset vote, and trust the majority will, on further examination; adopt our conclusion.

(5) There was also a sharp difference between the majority and minority as to certain names on the voters' lists that were not found on the registry list, the majority contending that this was the result of innocent errors and the minority charging an intention to commit fraud.

As a result of the examination the majority found that sitting Member's majority had not been assailed successfully, while the minority contended that contestant had been elected by 469 majority.

The report was debated on July 22 and 23, 1868,[1] and on the latter date the resolution of the minority declaring contestant elected was disagreed to, yeas 32, nays 90. Then the resolution of the majority confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat was agreed to without division.

873. The Missouri election case of Switzler v. Dyer in the Forty-first Congress.

Discussion as to authority of a secretary of state, whose duties are ministerial only, to reject returns because of violations of registration laws.

Returns being tainted by obvious fraud and the custodian of the ballots having refused to show them, the returns were held valueless and rejected.

The returns being rendered untrustworthy by action of acting judges chosen in places of judges kept from the polls by intimidation, the poll was rejected.

The House, overruling the committee, declined to count the vote of a county wherein by fraudulent registration many disqualified persons had been put on the voting lists.

On March 4, 1869,[2] at the organization of the House, the name of David P. Dyer, of Missouri, appeared on the Clerk's roll. As soon as the roll had been called a question was raised as to Mr. Dyer, but on March 5 the House voted, yeas 163, nays 4, that he be sworn in, there being no question as to his prima facie right.

On June 29, 1870,[3] Mr. John C. Churchill, of New York, from the Committee of Elections, submitted a report in the case of Switzler v. Dyer, of Missouri. The official majority of the sitting Member in the district as finally established was 432 votes. But of the votes as actually cast the contestant received a majority of 710 votes. The transactions bringing about this change are thus described:

The secretary of state of Missouri, upon affidavits attacking the registration in the county of Monroe, rejected the returns from that county, and a majority of 432 votes being thereby shown for the sitting Member, he gave the latter a certificate of election, upon which he was admitted to his seat in the Forty-first Congress, pending the contest, notice of which had been served upon him by Mr. Switzler. The duties of the secretary of state, under the laws of Missouri, in respect to certifying the election of Members of Congress, are as follows: The judges of election at each voting precinct are required, within two days after the election, to transmit one of the poll books kept by them (and which is required to contain the names of the voters, of the persons voted for, the office, and the number of votes given to each candidate, duly certified by the judges of election) to the clerk of the county court, who, within eight days thereafter, publicly, in the court-house, and with the assistance of two magistrates of the county, is required to examine and cast up the votes given to each candidate, and in the case of Members of Congress and of the State legislature and other State officers, within two days thereafter, to send by mail, closely sealed, and not to be opened until the day fixed for the counting of the votes, an abstract of the votes given for those officers to the secretary of state.

Thereupon, "within fifty days after such general election, and as much sooner as the returns shall all have been made, the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, shall proceed to open the returns and to cast up the votes given for all candidates for any office, and shall give to the person having the highest number of votes for Member of Congress from each district certificates of election, under his hand, with the seal of the State affixed thereto." (General Statutes of Missouri, 63, secs. 24–32.)

It will be seen from the language of the statutes above quoted that the duties of the secretary of state are ministerial only, and not judicial, and they are so held by the supreme court of Missouri—in accordance with the general current of authority, both in this country and in this House—in the case of the State ex rel. Charles C. Bland v. Francis Rodman, secretary of state.

The majority of the committee further conclude:

It is true that in at least two cases beside the present (Butler v. Lehman and Morton v. Daily, Bartlett's Contested Election Cases, 353, 402), both of which arose in the Thirty-seventh Congress, where municipal officers assumed to act judicially and to reject returns believed by them to be affected by fraud and thereupon issued certificates to persons who would not have been otherwise entitled to them, such certificates were held sufficient, as in this case, to entitle the holder to the seat, prima facie, and pending the contest. But such action being without authority of law has no weight in deciding the contest upon the merits, when, if necessary, we go back of all certificates and inquire into the action and right of the individual voter at the polls; and it has been referred to here only as a part of the history of this case and to explain how the contestant, having a majority of the votes cast, happens to occupy the position he does in this contest.

The minority views, presented by Mr. John Cessna, of Pennsylvania, say:

It is not necessary to discuss the power or authority of the secretary of state to reject the vote, because it is admitted by the majority of the committee that this question does not enter into the case. But it appears from a letter of the secretary of state, filed by the contestant himself as evidence (p. 62 of the record), that the secretary of state awaited the action of the people's representatives in the legislature before he refused to open and cast up the vote of Monroe County (p. 61):

"The letter from Colonel Switzler is received. I have left the whole matter of Monroe and other counties to the legislature for decision. I have not thrown out any county, but simply refuse to cast up until the legislature decides that I shall do so. Not until the legislature has acted upon this matter can I give out copies of documents relating to this subject.

"Respectfully,

"FRANCIS RODMAN, Secretary of State."

It can not well be denied that if the case of Switzler v. Anderson, in the Fortieth Congress, was correctly decided, then the conclusions of the majority of the committee in this case are wrong. The same contestant was here in that case claiming admission on the ground of the rejection of the vote in Calloway County for reasons similar to those now urged for the rejection of Monroe County in 1868.

The case turned, therefore, on the question whether or not the vote of Monroe County should be counted. The majority report says:

The reasons given why it should not be counted are that the superintendent of registration of the senatorial district of which that county is a part corruptly agreed, as is alleged, with the political friends of the contestant that he would appoint registering officers in his district who would register all white male citizens over the age of 21 years without regard to their qualifications, as fixed and prescribed by the constitution and laws of Missouri, on condition and in consideration that he should receive the support of the political friends of the contestant for the office of sheriff * * *; and that, in pursuance of this agreement officers of registration were appointed who would be likely to carry out this agreement; and a large number of persons, disqualified under the law, were permitted to register and to vote in the county of Monroe.

The state of facts in this county was examined at length and carefully to determine whether the registration was fraudulent, the majority contending that it was not, and the minority that it was.

Both the majority and the minority concurred in rejecting the polls at two places:

(a) At Salt River Township in Adrian County:

The place designated by the county court for holding the election in this township was the tobacco factory on the public square. Being unable to get in here, the sheriff made proclamation that the election would be held at Ricketts's office, on the square, to which place the people present went; and the judges of election not being present, the voters present chose judges, to whom the sheriff delivered the ballot box and poll books, and also a list of qualified voters, certified by the clerk of the county court (pp. 50, 63, 77). Thus far the proceedings seem to have been regular, although there is evidence to show that it was the intention to have held such an election by judges other than the legal judges, had the latter been present in time to open the polls at 7 a.m., as required by law (p. 205).

The list of qualified voters for this township will be found on pages 201–203 and contains 217 names; but the poll list kept at this election, which is found on pages 192–194, shows that 519 votes were received. The judges further, in making this return, certify that the contestant received 146 votes, the sitting Member 71, or the precise number of qualified voters. It would be very unusual, although possible, that the entire list of persons registered as qualified should have been present to vote; but it is made the duty of the judges of election (Laws of Missouri, 1868, p. 136, sec. 17) to write the word "voted" after the name of each person on the list who shall vote, and on producing the list used at this poll (pp. 203–205) it is found that 74 names have no entry against them (p. 81), showing that they did not vote on that day. Three of those whose names are on the qualified list are called as witnesses—Alfred Hambleton, p. 72; W. W. Cedon, p. 70, and Miles J. Burns, p. 76—and swear that they were not present and did not vote at this poll on that day. There was still a method by which the real vote of the qualified voters of that township could have been ascertained. The ballots themselves were yet in the hand of the clerk of the county court, and so marked, if the law had been complied with, as that the ballot of each qualified voter who voted could be identified. The clerk of the county court, who was the political friend of the contestant, and of the sheriff, who seems to have manipulated affairs at that poll was summoned as a witness by the sitting Member and produced the ballots, but refused to open them or permit their examination. The returns themselves we think so tainted by obvious fraud and violation of law as to be valueless, and, not being permitted to be corrected by the means which the law of Missouri provides, should be rejected.

(b) In Wilson Township:

On the morning of the day of election in this township word was sent to two of the judges of election appointed by the board of registration that it would be dangerous for them to go to the election. The circumstances attending the receipt of these messages were such that they thought it advisable not to go to the polls until they could gather some of their friends to accompany them armed. They did so, and were thereby so delayed that when they reached the polls the time for opening them was passed, and other judges had been chosen by the voters present. The circumstances are such as seem to show that this result was one object of the messages they had received (pp. 65, 80). The list of qualified voters in this township will be found at pages 204–205, and numbered 78. But the poll list shows that the acting judges of election at this poll received 151 votes, of which they marked 93 as accepted, and they returned 91 votes as cast for Member of Congress, 49 for the contestant and 42 for the sitting Member. But a comparison of the list of qualified voters with that of persons who voted shows that 15 of the former did not vote, so that while only 63 qualified voters in the district have voted, 91 votes are returned as having been cast by qualified voters for Members of Congress.

The clerk of the county court in this county having already, in the case of Salt River Township in the same county, refused to produce and open for inspection the ballots cast at this election, it was not necessary to renew the attempt to get access to the ballots in this case, and the vote of this township, for the same reasons as in the case of Salt River, should be rejected, reducing thereby the vote of the contestant to 6,091, and of the sitting Member to 5,463, and the majority of the former to 628.

The majority of the committee reported resolutions to unseat sitting Member and seat the contestant.[1]

The report was debated on July 7,[2] the question of fraud on the part of the registration officer entering into the decision largely. On behalf of the minority of the committee resolutions were offered declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat and contestant not elected. The resolutions of the minority were substituted for those of the majority by a vote of yeas 109, nays 55.

So the recommendations of the majority of the committee were overruled, and the sitting Member retained the seat.

874. The Pennsylvania election case of Myers v. Moffet in the Forty-first Congress.

Reference to a discussion as to the validity of certain naturalization papers.

Where election officers receive illegal votes with a guilty knowledge that they are illegal the entire poll is rejected.

Votes taken before the legal hour for opening the polls, by officers having fraudulent intent, are valueless.

Instance wherein the Elections Committee, in passing on the intent of election officers accused of fraud, took into account the conduct of those officers at a subsequent election.

Disturbance at the polls, incident to the removal of a contestant for the office of election judge, does not vitiate the poll.

On April 6, 1869,[3] Mr. Job E. Stevenson, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the case of Myers v. Moffet, from Pennsylvania.

The official returns gave sitting Member a majority of 159. The majority of the committee found frauds and irregularities sufficient to overturn this majority and produce a majority of 647 for the contestant.

A question as to the validity of supreme court naturalization papers was entertained at considerable length in both the report and the minority views, but did not enter into the decision of the contest.

The issues bearing on the result were three:

(1) The majority of the committee decided that the polls of the seventh division of the Seventeenth Ward of Philadelphia should be rejected because the election officers disregarded certain provisions of law claimed to be mandatory. The report says:

Two hundred and forty votes might have been illegally cast for either candidate in a large district without causing the loss of more than that number to either, when proved, but 200 or more votes can not be received by election officers with a guilty knowledge that they were illegal, or in gross violation of the election laws, which they were bound to consult, without entailing a stronger penalty. In such cases not only State courts but legislatures and Congress have not hesitated to declare the whole poll void and of no effect, except as to such votes as either party chooses to save by proof of their legality.

[1] It should be noted that sitting Member belonged to the dominant party in the House and contestant to the minority party.

[2] Journal, p. 1172; Globe, pp. 5305–5313.

[3] First session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 9; 2 Bartlett, p. 564.

It appears in Pennsylvania, and particularly in Philadelphia, where these wrongs are of frequent occurrence, the courts have uniformly declared such to be the law.

The contestant's brief quotes the acts of assembly governing elections.

That of the sitting Member does not pretend to set up a different standard of action.

Here there is and can be no dispute. Under the act of 1839, where a person is not assessed, in order to entitle himself to vote he must answer certain questions under oath, as to tax, age, residence, etc., and in addition prove his residence by the oath of a qualified voter of the division, and in all such cases it is "the duty of the inspectors" to require such proof whether the vote be challenged or not.

Even if assessed, in case of a challenge they must require the proof. Where the vote is taken, the inspectors must add to the list of taxables furnished them by the commissioners, note of the fact, and of the name of the voucher or person making such proof for the voter. The judges have said, in a number of contested election cases, that nothing can dispense with these requirements. The committee has stated that the law is not disputed. Now, contestant proves that in the sixth division of Seventeenth Ward 98 such unassessed persons were permitted to vote, and in the seventh division of same ward 72 without being sworn themselves or producing a voucher. That in the sixth the list of taxables, which is the index and test of the conduct of an election, was missing from the box. In the seventh it was found, and corroborated contestant's witnesses, as it failed to show that any proof had been required of any unassessed voter. If incumbent denied this there might be some dispute to settle; but his only reply is, "This is an unreliable objection. * * * Among nine election officers at the window, one or more would know the voter personally, and in such cases voters are continually recognized."

If "in such cases voters are continually recognized," it must be in just such election districts as the sixth of the Seventeenth Ward, which, it appears, was discarded by the court of common pleas, only last year, for that very cause. Congress can certainly never lend its sanction to such a shameful breach of law.

The act of 1939 fines any election officer who knowingly takes 1 such vote without proof, $200; and the act of April 16, 1866, inflicts a penalty of $1,000 and an imprisonment of two years for knowingly taking 10 such votes or upward without proof.

With these laws before us, your committee can not fail to pronounce these polls violated by such a crime against the rights of the citizens.

Incumbent's counsel reply that in the sixth division of the Seventeenth Ward 5 of these votes were cast for Mr. Myers, and in the seventh that it is not fully proved for whom they were cast. Were this true it would not alter the matter. On the contrary, the very uncertainty of the result caused by the fraud would tend to destroy all the returns. But it is not true. In the sixth division, Seventeenth Ward, 55 votes were returned for Mr. Myers. He was able to prove 51 of them. Except the remaining 4, and the 5 of those unassessed who voted for him, the 87 unassessed, and all others proved to be illegal, must have been cast for Mr. Moffet.

The report went on to show that challenges in these divisions were disregarded, and other circumstances showed a fraudulent intent.

The minority views [1] do not admit that the evidence as to these wards shows a fraudulent intent, and say:

It is a well-settled principle of law that no citizen shall be deprived of his vote or be disfranchised by reason of any neglect on the part of an officer of the election; hence from the evidence we conclude there is neither reason nor justice in throwing out the entire vote of this division, and in the absence of testimony showing that the 87 who were unassessed and voted were fraudulent, should either invalidate the entire poll or be deducted from either candidate.

That same state of facts exists as to the seventh division of the Seventeenth Ward, except that the contestant made effort to prove his entire vote as cast for him in this division. In this he failed, being able to show but 40 out of 85 given in by the election returns. Seventy-two unassessed votes are again impugned in this division; and it is manifest they were as likely to have been given to one as the other of the candidates.

[1] Minority views presented by Messrs. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, and A. G. Burr, of Illinois.

(2) In the sixth division of the Seventeenth Ward at the beginning of the day there appeared several vacancies on the board of election officers. The law of Pennsylvania required a delay of an hour before opening the polls where there were vacancies in the board of officers. In this ward the Democratic inspectors sent out the only Republican officer in search of others, telling him to "stay out the first hour." This he did, but the poll was opened, and that hour resulted in 69 votes for Moffet and 8 for Myers. The committee conclude all the votes cast in that hour are illegal on both sides. "Votes taken after the time of closing the polls are all illegal on both sides (4 Pennsylvania Law Journal, p. 341), and any taken before the proper hour are equally valueless," say the committee. That there may be no doubt of the criminal intent in this case, the committee claim the right to bring in reference to the conduct of these same officers at an election a few weeks later, when they manifestly connived at election frauds.

(3) On behalf of the sitting Member it was objected that the poll of the tenth division of the Nineteenth Ward should be thrown out because of riot. The majority of the committee find the following facts and conclusions:

The misunderstanding arose from the subdivision of the tenth precinct of the Nineteenth Ward, part being still called the tenth and the rest the fourteenth. By this action of councils, Mr. Addis, who had been elected judge of the old tenth division, became a resident of the new one-the fourteenth. In such cases the law is explicit.

By the act of April 28, 1857, section 1, Pamphlet Laws, page 329, it is provided—

"That whenever a new election division or divisions has been or shall be created in any of the wards of the city of Philadelphia by the councils of said city, the officers to conduct the election next thereafter occurring shall be chosen as follows: If such division shall be formed entirely out of an old division, the officers elected to conduct the election in said division shall appoint the officers for the new division, the judge appointing the judge and each of the inspectors appointing an inspector."

Addis, not aware of this law, had given authority to Hooper to act in the old, but on ascertaining that his appointment would have to be for the new division, he and two of the other legally chosen officers of the old division presented themselves at that poll demanding to act. This was refused by Hooper, whereupon Addis read the law to him, stating that he only desired to do what was right, and after a second refusal Simpson also read the law to him. Unless Hooper should leave, the whole poll might really have been invalid. The police were accordingly summoned, and the violence complained of was no more than necessary to remove Hooper. The others left, Brower among them, and after waiting an hour the citizens chose officers to supply the vacancies.

The committee is compelled to decide that Addis was the legal judge, and that the officers who acted with him were all legally chosen.

It is urged with some force in the brief for the sitting Member that he lost many votes in that division by these occurrences.

It is certain that a number of Democratic voters, apparently in the hope that the whole vote would be declared illegal, some of whom were dissuaded from voting (see p. 193), absented themselves from this poll. Two witnesses guess at the number thus lost, and one other (p. 195) states that the Democrats in November polled 82 more votes there. Ignorance of the law on the part of citizens will not operate to throw out a poll. There was no fraud here. No citizens were deprived of the opportunity of voting. On the contrary, Democrats who wished to vote were furnished tickets or told where they could get them. (See p. 189.)

Suppose your committee should undertake to rectify the error of those who failed to vote; by what standard of law shall it be done? Fraud of the officers it has been shown may disfranchise even those who voted honestly; but to reject this poll for the purpose of correcting the error of some of the citizens would disfranchise 173 Republicans, because, at the farthest, 82 Democrats had been dissuaded from voting, who it appears deposited their ballots in November and might or might not have done so in October under other circumstances.

The majority of the committee reported resolutions declaring sitting Member not entitled to the seat and that contestant was elected and entitled to the seat.

The report was debated April 8 and 9, 1869,[1] and, on the latter day, a proposition of the minority declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat was disagreed to, yeas 40, nays 112.

The resolution declaring sitting Member not entitled to the seat was then agreed to, yeas 107, nays 39. And the resolution declaring contestant elected and entitled to the seat was then agreed to, yeas 113, nays 38.

Mr. Myers then appeared and took the oath.

875. The New York election case of Van Wyck v. Greene in the Fortyfirt Congress.

Form of resolution extending the time for taking testimony in an election case.

Votes cast by persons entitled to naturalization, but naturalized by illegal process, were rejected.

Contestant's notice not having specifically demanded the rejection of an entire precinct, the Committee on Elections corrected the poll, although rejection appeared justifiable.

At a poll where votes were cast by disqualified persons, the return was corrected on the testimony of persons who assumed to know how the disqualified persons voted.

The House declined to declare a seat vacant in a case wherein unsatisfactory proof of contestant's election was reenforced by bad conduct of election officers favorable to contestee.

The House being organized, but a quorum having failed, the Speaker declined to administer the oath to a contestant who had been declared elected.

On March 22, 1869,[2] Mr. John Cessna, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That in the matter of the application for an extension of time to take testimony in the contested case of Van Wyck against Greene, twenty days be allowed to the sitting Member to take evidence, to be confined to evidence to rebut that taken by contestant, and that a like period of twenty days be allowed at the expiration of that period to the contestant if desired by them.

On February 3, 1870,[3] Mr. R. R. Butler, of Tennessee, submitted the report on the merits. It appeared that the returned majority of the sitting Member was 323. Fraud and irregularities were charged on both sides. The main points of the case are:

(1) Contestant alleged fraud and illegality in issuing naturalization papers. The report says at the outset:

The law was decided by the supreme court of the State of New York (see Barbour's Reports, vol. xviii, p. 444). In that case the court said the powers upon courts in admitting aliens to the rights of citizenship are judicial and not ministerial or clerical, and consequently can not be delegated to the clerks, and must be examined by the court itself. An examination must be made in each case sufficient to satisfy the court of the facts upon which the application is based, and upon which it must fail if not proven to the satisfaction of the court. The court, in the same case, adds: "The practice of clerks of courts in issuing certificates of citizenship, without any application being made to the court and on proof of residence only, is an abuse which needs be corrected."

After analyzing the testimony, the majority of the committee say:

The proof fully and satisfactorily establishes the fact that the clerks and deputies issued naturalization papers at various places other than in court. Louis Cuddeback swears that at one court he appointed four deputies to make out naturalization papers, and that they operated in a jury-room, and that he (Cuddeback) made it a rule to visit said jury-room and see how they were getting along and to see that they did it right. * * *

The testimony on the subject of naturalization is very full, and clearly establishes the fact that the law was totally disregarded and frauds perpetrated. The clerk and all his deputies, regular and special, were Democrats, and worked in the interest of their political friends. It further appears from the evidence that,'before the said election, public attention was directed to the frauds practiced in obtaining naturalization papers in said county of Orange, and that the district attorney made an effort to have the matter investigated by a grand jury of the county; and that after the subject had been before the grand jury several days the foreman notified the district attorney that he would not act on the cases, and had destroyed a part of the testimony taken before the jury, and would not surrender the same to the district attorney, as the law directs. And the facts and circumstances warrant the assertion that the Democratic judge winked at the same.

The minority[1] minimize the testimony tending to show irregularities in naturalization, and say:

But the fact stands out clear as testimony can make it, that the men so branded wholesale as wrongfully holding papers were, with very few exceptions, entitled to certificates of naturalization. A "conspiracy" to secure certificates for those legally entitled to them would be senseless and is not charged. On the contrary, the theory of the contestant is, that it was a conspiracy to procure certificates for parties not legally entitled; and to show that they were not entitled, contestant commenced the examination of these newly naturalized citizens (pp. 22–30), and after being questioned, 26 of them developed the fact that each one of them was legally entitled to papers. At this point he dismissed the remainder, some of whom were afterwards examined by contestee and all were shown to be legally entitled to naturalization papers.

In the debate it was retorted[2] that it was "not the right to naturalization, but naturalization itself, awarded by the proper judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and this alone" that gave citizenship.

(2) The attempt to trace to the ballot box the votes cast by those illegally naturalized and determine for whom they were cast led to sharp division of opinion.

(a) In the First Ward of Newburgh the majority of the committee find that 140 persons not entitled to vote cast their votes for sitting Member. The majority found that the inspectors of election refused to put an oath to persons challenged, although in so refusing they directly violated the statute. The majority of the election officers were of sitting Member's party. Sitting Member's majority was 131.

(b) The majority of the committee find that at Hamptonburg the inspectors of election acted "unlawfully and corruptly." They improperly registered alleged voters, and on election day they refused to put the oath to persons challenged. Sitting Member's majority was returned at 105. The majority of the committee deduct 28 from sitting Member.

[1] Minority views were signed by Messrs. A. G. Burr, of Illinois, S. J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, and P. M. Dox, of Alabama.

[2] By Mr. Churchill, Globe, 1347.

(c) In Goshen also the election inspectors dispensed with the oath, and persons were allowed to vote on the irregular naturalization papers in spite of the efforts of the inspector belonging to contestant's party. Sitting Member's majority in the district was 129.

The majority conclude as to these precincts:

> The majority for contestee in the three last-mentioned districts, to wit, First Ward, Newburgh, town of Hamptonburg, and first district Goshen, was 365. The committee is of opinion that the irregularities and misconduct of the inspectors of the election at said districts were sufficient to throw out the entire vote of said districts, but does not recommend the same, as the contestant did not specifically demand the same in his notice to contestee. In all of said precincts actual fraudulent voting was proven; misconduct, illegality, and partiality of inspectors, all go to prove that the allegations of contestant were true that a conspiracy was formed to issue naturalization papers, and to prevent a judicial investigation of the frauds and to prevent an investigation of the many wrongs perpetrated by the friends of contestee.

It being decided not to throw out the entire polls of these places, the majority of the committee propose to purge the polls of these and other precincts by the testimony of people who assumed to know how electors voted.

As to the validity of this testimony the minority took issue, and especially in the debate on the floor. Passages from the testimony were quoted to show that no conclusive evidence was given to connect illegal voters with votes found in the box for sitting Member. Near the close of the debate one Member preferred to rest his vote on the propriety of throwing out entirely the vote of the three precincts, rather than on reliance on the process of purging.

The debate occurred on February 15 and 16,[1] and on the latter date a vote was taken on a proposition of the minority declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat, and it was disagreed to—yeas 56, nays 121.

A proposition offered by Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, declaring the seat vacant, was disagreed to without division, the yeas and nays being refused.

The resolution unseating sitting Member was then agreed to without division; and the second resolution of the committee, seating contestant, was agreed to—yeas 56, nays 121.

The usual motion to reconsider being made and laid on the table, a motion to adjourn was made. The vote being taken, the lack of a quorum was developed.

Thereupon, as a question of privilege, a demand was made that Mr. Van Wyck be sworn in.

The Speaker[2] demurred,[3] saying:

> The Chair is in serious doubt whether, in the absence of a quorum, a Member can be sworn in.

The House soon after adjourned without a quorum.

On the next day, February 17,[4] a quorum being present, Mr. Van Wyck appeared and was sworn in.

The Elections Committee declined to revise the returns on the strength of the tally lists, the election officers not being called or a recount of ballots made.

United States soldiers residing at the time of enlistment without the precinct and not having the intention of making a permanent residence therein were held not to be legal voters.

Votes of paupers were rejected, although the attorney-general of the State had given an opinion that they were legal voters therein.

On March 29, 1870,[1] Mr. John Cessna, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority[2] of the subcommittee in the case of Taylor v. Reading, of Pennsylvania. This case involved largely an exploration of questions of fact, but a few general principles were discussed:4

(1) A number of votes depended on whether reliance should be placed on the return from the precinct or on the tally lists, from which the returns were made up. The majority seemed inclined to disregard the tally lists. The sitting member having asked to be credited with certain votes shown by the tally list, which apparently was required to be preserved by the prothonotary, the majority say:

To allow this credit requires us to go behind the returns. The incumbent having asked this at our hands, should have called the officers of the election and shown the list of voters, or, at least, the aggregate thereof, or asked for a recount of the ballots. Nothing of this kind has been requested. On examining the tally list of the seventh division, Twenty-third Ward, we find an error of 6 against the contestant, or rather a difference of 6 between the tally list and the returns from this precinct. We have, therefore, concluded to stand by the returns in each case, especially as the correction of both would make no difference to either party.

The minority do not agree to this, but say:

As a general principle primary evidence is preferable to secondary evidence. The ballots are the primary or highest evidence of an election, and a Pennsylvania statute requires these ballots to be preserved for the purposes of contested elections.

The next best evidence are the tally lists. These are cotemporaneous records made at the very time of voting. The hourly report of the vote and the returns in the prothonotary's office are made up from the tally lists; are mere copies of those lists, and original documents are always better evidence than copies. The tally lists are preferable evidence to reports made from them.

The majority of the committee reject the allowance of these errors in the tally lists, on the ground that the ballot boxes were not examined or asked to be examined. They were not examined in the district where the testimony was taken, because the courts have decided that the Committee of Elections of Congress were the only competent authority to send for them and examine them, and that they were asked to be examined one of the committee making the majority report will cheerfully admit. The sitting Member rested his case, so far as the tally lists were concerned, on the examination of the ballot boxes and a recount of the ballots, but the majority of the committee saw fit to reject these gains without an examination, and the only one that could test their truth or falsity In the absence of the ballot boxes, or a refusal to recount the ballots, the committee must take the highest order of proof presented to them, which are the tally lists certified to them by the seal of the court having charge of them. They are conclusive, and especially so when the committee refuse to avail themselves of the primary evidence—the ballots.

(2) A question arose as to the votes of certain soldiers:

It is in proof that 20 soldiers of the United States Army, stationed at Frankford arsenal, voted for the incumbent in the eighth precinct of the Twenty-third Ward. Had these men a right to vote there? It is entirely immaterial to discuss the question as to whether they could have voted elsewhere or not. The only question before us is as to whether they were entitled to vote at that particular poll, where the vote was actually cast. To entitle a person to vote at any poll in Pennsylvania, under the laws of that State, he must have at the time of the election an actual residence in the precinct. Mere personal presence will not fulfill the requirements of the law. There must be a residence, and it has been well settled that residence is a question of intention. Had any of those men any intention to be at that particular place, or in that particular precinct, on that or any other day? From the necessity of the case they could not. They were in that precinct not by their own volition, but by command of their military superiors. An order issued to transfer them to Fort Lafayette on October 1 would have taken them far away from the precinct. In the case of Bowen v. Given it was expressly decided that an enlisted man did not gain a residence under similar circumstances. So, too, in the case of Howard v. Cooper, thirty-sixth Congress (Contested Election Cases, 1843 to 1865, p. 275), it was held under the law of Michigan that to be entitled to vote a man must have come into the State and township or ward with the intention of making it his permanent residence, and the law of Pennsylvania is quite as strict on this point as that of any other State, for if challenged at the poll the person offering the vote must also himself swear that his bona fide residence in pursuance of his lawful calling is within the district. (See Burden's Digest, Laws of Pennsylvania, edition of 1853, pp. 46 and 286.) How could a man so swear when he is there at the command of a power superior to his own will? As bearing particularly upon this point we add that in 1862 a contest arose in the State of Pennsylvania in regard to the right of soldiers to vote in camp or in quarters. In the trial of this case the constitution of Pennsylvania and the several statutes of the State regulating this subject or question were fully and elaborately considered. The case is entitled Chase against Miller, and reported in 5 Wright, pages 403 et al. The supreme court of the State held—

First. That residence, in the constitution, is the same as domicile—the place where a man establishes his abode, makes the seat of his property, and exercises his civil and political rights.

Second. The right of a soldier to vote under the constitution is confined to the election district where he resided at the time of his entering the military service.

After quoting from the opinion the report proceeds to divide the soldiers into three classes:

The first class consists of persons who resided in this precinct at the time of their first enlistment, and consequently did not change residence. There are three of this class, to wit, James Cleary, Peter Hobin, and James Larkin, and their votes are allowed. The second class consists of those persons who had enlisted but once, who resided at the time of their enlistment outside of this precinct, and who had done nothing to indicate any determination on their part to change their residence, and who had made no election of this particular place as their place of residence since the time of their enlistment. On the contrary, two of this class testified that at the very time they voted their families resided elsewhere, and it is clearly proved that the entire class, seven in number, left the place soon after the election and have not returned. They were all single men except these two before referred to. Their names are Richard O'Leary, Owen Sheridan, Robert Armstrong, John Kennedy, John Laffey, Frederick Kopp, and Lewis Bingham. These 7 votes were rejected, being a part of the 51. The third class consists of those who did not reside in the district at the time of their enlistment, but remained for some years, in some cases reenlisting once, twice, and in one case three times. Most of these men have either purchased or rented property, had families in the district, and had given other evidences of an intention to elect this precinct as the place of their abode. These 10 votes are allowed.

The minority do not agree to the rejection of the 7 votes:

Since the action of the Senate of the United States on the 1st day of April, 1870, on the admission to a seat in the Senate of General Ames, who at the time of his election (in the language of the majority of the committee in this case as touching this soldier vote) was not in Mississippi "by his own volition, but by command of his military superiors," I am compelled, therefore, to say that I can not coincide with the majority of the committee in their rejection of 7 of the votes known as the soldier vote.

I can not agree that any of these votes should be rejected. In admitting any of the 20 votes thus attacked, you must admit all. You can not admit a part and reject a part. The integrity of these voters is nowhere impeached. It is no reason for disfranchisement that these men were soldiers and lived at a United States arsenal. They were what is known as the "permanent party" at a United States station; they had been there for years, enlisting and reenlisting, marrying and raising families. Are such men to be disfranchised?

In Bowen v. Given, Justice Cartter, of the District of Columbia, held "that an officer or enlisted man neither gained nor lost a residence; his residence was where he enlisted." In view of this decision, I insist that when the term of enlistment expired, these soldiers, having the animus manendi, gained a residence eo instanti in this division, and it was their residence at the time of their reenlistment; and being so, they were not disqualified by reason of nonresidence.

(3) The majority rejected certain votes of paupers, regarding the right to do so too clear to demand explanation. The minority object to this, citing the opinion of Attorney-General Benj. H. Brewster, of Pennsylvania, who, in a contested election case in the senate of Pennsylvania, had given an opinion that a pauper who was in other respects qualified to vote could not be deprived of the suffrage:

Such a person is a qualified elector and can vote, and his vote cast is a lawful vote and as good as any man's vote, and it ought to be so. The Constitution establishes this, and it does not disqualify him because he is poor. That does not deprive him of his freedom or his citizenship.

They are amenable to the law, and being so, upon the very fundamental principles of our government have a right to be represented and to say who shall make the laws. It is not property or poverty that rules here. It is the man, responsible to God and responsible to the law. To say otherwise would make poverty worse than a crime. The pauper is bound by every law upon the statute book, and is protected by every provision of the Constitution, as much so as the wealthiest, wisest, or most successful man in the community. Sickness, the calamities and accidents of life, may reduce men to this sad condition. That is bad enough. The law never intended to add to his miseries by making him the only slave that remains in our Republic. All the duties of life bind him; he can make a contract, he can be obliged to testify, he can marry, he can sue and be sued, he is only restrained and bound by rules as every one is who lives in any institution. Persons in hospitals, asylums, factories, homes for disabled soldiers, public works, Government shops, and all kinds of public and eleemosynary institutions, as well as private establishments, are bound by fixed rules that are enacted for the preservation of good order, to maintain discipline, and carry out the purposes of the establishments. This is all that he is subjected to, and these rules and the restraints of the house he can relieve himself from at any moment by asking for his discharge. The poorhouse is his residence; it would be there that process of law, criminal or civil, would be served upon him; and it is from that residence he may vote, provided he has lived there ten days preceding the election and conformed to the requirements of the law. If to receive public support would be legal cause of disqualification, we must not forget that even now a large number of white and black citizens of the southern portion of this nation are still receiving and levying upon the supplied bounty of the Government. What would be their condition? For some of those who have received and still receive that bounty were once the wealthiest and best bred, and the most accomplished, and sometimes reputed the wisest people in this region. By the calamities of war they are reduced to want; but God forbid that they or any one should by any calamity be stripped of their right of manhood and brutalized down to that slavery from which we have been, by God's providence, all emancipated.

The minority also cited from the minority report in the case of Foster v. Covode.

On the face of the returns the sitting Member received 41 majority. After the settlement of questions of law and fact the majority found that in reality there should be a majority of 72 for the contestant. The minority, on the other hand, found that the sitting Member had a majority of 28 votes.

The report was debated in the House on April 13,[1] and on that day the resolution declaring Mr. Reading not entitled to the seat was agreed to, yeas 114, nays 45. Then the resolution declaring Mr. Taylor entitled to the seat was agreed to without division.

Mr. Taylor then appeared and took the oath.

877. The Senate election case of John P. Stockton, from New Jersey, in the Thirty-ninth Congress.

A committee report that in the absence of any law, State or national, a joint meeting of the two houses of a legislature may prescribe that a plurality vote shall elect a United States Senator was reversed by the Senate.

In 1865[1] the Senate considered the right of a legislative joint convention to adopt a plurality rule for the choice of a United States Senator. The case is thus stated in a report[2] of the Judiciary Committee, submitted by Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of John P. Stockton, claiming to have been elected a Senator from the State of New Jersey for six years from the 4th day of March, 1865, together with the protest of certain members of the legislature of said State against the validity of his election, submit the following report:

The only question involved in the decision of Mr. Stockton's right to a seat is whether an election by a plurality of votes of the members of the legislature of New Jersey in joint meeting assembled, in pursuance of a rule adopted by the joint meeting itself, is valid. The protestants insist that it is not, and they deny Mr. Stockton's right to a seat, because, as they say, he was not appointed by a majority of the votes of the joint meeting of the legislature.

The legislative power of the State of New Jersey is vested by the State constitution in a senate and general assembly, which are required, for legislative purposes, to meet separately, but which, for the appointment of various officers, are required to assemble in joint meeting; and when so assembled are, by the constitution itself, styled the "legislature in joint meeting."

The constitution of New Jersey does not prescribe the manner of choosing United States Senators, as, indeed, it could not, the Constitution of the United States having vested that power, in the absence of any law of Congress, exclusively in the legislature; but it does constitute the two houses one body for the purpose of appointing certain State officers. The statute of New Jersey declares that "United States Senators, on the part of that State, shall be appointed by the senate and general assembly in joint meeting assembled;" but it does not prescribe any rules for the government of the joint meeting nor declare the manner of election.

The practice in New Jersey has been for the joint meeting to prescribe the rules for its own government.

In 1794 fifteen rules were adopted, the first two of which are as follows:

"1. That the election of State officers during the present session be viva voce, unless when otherwise ordered, and that all officers be put in nomination at least one day before their election.

"2. That the chairman shall not be entitled to vote except in case of a tie, and then to have a casting vote."

The other thirteen rules related chiefly to the method of conducting the proceedings. Each joint meeting which has since assembled has adopted its own rules, usually those of the preceding joint meeting, sometimes, however, with additions or exceptions.

In 1851 the following additional rule was adopted:

"Resolved, That no person shall be elected to any office, at any joint meeting during the present session, unless there be a majority of all the members elected personally present and agreeing thereto."

In 1855 the joint meeting, after adopting the fifteen rules of the preceding joint meeting, added the following:

"That all candidates for office, upon receiving a majority of the votes cast by this joint meeting, shall be declared duly elected."

The joint meeting of 1861 adopted the rules of the preceding joint meeting for its own government, among which were the following:

"1. That the election of State officers during the present session be viva voce, unless when other wise ordered.

[2] Report No. 4, First session Thirty-ninth Congress.

"15. That in all questions the chairman of the joint meeting be called upon to vote in his turn as one of the representatives in the senate or assembly, but that he have no casting vote as chairman.

"16. That all candidates for office, upon receiving a majority of the votes cast by this joint meeting, shall be declared to be duly elected."

The same rules were adopted by each joint meeting from 1861 to 1865.

The joint meeting which assembled February 15, 1865, and at an adjourned session of which Mr. Stockton was appointed Senator, adopted, at its first meeting, the rules of the preceding joint meeting, except the sixteenth rule, in lieu of which the following was adopted:

"Resolved, That no candidate shall be declared elected unless upon receiving a majority of the votes of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature."

After having appointed various officers under the rules which had been adopted at the assembling of the joint meeting, the following rule was adopted:

"Resolved, That the vote for county judges and commissioners of deeds be taken by acclamation, and that the counties in which vacancies exist be called in alphabetical order."

Acting under this rule, quite a number of officers were appointed by acclamation. Not completing its business the joint meeting adjourned from time to time till March 15, when the following rule was adopted:

"Resolved, That the resolution that no candidate shall be declared elected unless upon receiving a majority of the votes of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature be rescinded, and that any candidate receiving a plurality of votes of the members present shall be declared duly elected."

Every member of both houses, 81 in all, was present and voting when the above resolution was passed, and it was carried by a vote of 41 in the affirmative, of whom 11 were senators and 30 representatives, to 40 in the negative, of whom 10 were senators and 30 representatives. The joint meeting then proceeded to the election of a United States Senator, with the following result:

Hon. John P. Stockton, 40 votes; Hon. J. C. Ten Eyck, 37 votes; J. W. Wall, 1 vote; P. D. Vroom, 1 vote; F. T. Frelinghuysen, 1 vote; H. S. Little, 1 vote.

Whereupon John P. Stockton, having received a plurality of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected. The joint meeting then proceeded to the election of various other officers, having completed which, it rose.

The credentials of Mr. Stockton are under the great seal of State, signed by the governor and in due form. No objection appears to have been made at the time to the election. Its validity is now called in question by a protest dated March 20, 1865, and signed by 8 senators and 30 members of the general assembly. The Constitution of the United States declares that the Senate of the United States "shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof," and that "the times, places, and manner of holding election for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The right to choose United States Senators in a joint meeting of the two houses which compose the legislature of a State has been too long and too frequently exercised to be now brought in question. This has been the manner of election in some States from the beginning, and is now the manner in most of them.

For the purpose of choosing United States Senators the joint meeting of the two houses is regarded as the legislature, and especially would this be so in New Jersey, where the joint meeting is by the constitution of the State denominated a legislature. It has uniformly been held that when the two branches of a legislature meet in joint convention to elect a United States Senator they are merged into one and act as one body, so that an election may be effected against the entire vote of the members of one house if the person voted for receive the requisite number of votes from members of the other. It being, then, settled that the two houses of a legislature in joint meeting assembled constitute the legislature, vested by the Constitution of the United States with authority, acting as one body, to elect a Senator, the question is: Did the joint meeting of the senate and general assembly of New Jersey, duly convened in pursuance of a resolution previously concurred in by each house separately, choose John P. Stockton United States Senator?

That it was competent for a plurality to elect, if a law to that effect had been prescribed by competent authority, will hardly be questioned. This is the rule very generally, if not universally, adopted in the election of members of the House of Representatives, who are "chosen every second year by the people of the several States," and no one questions the validity of the election of a Representative by a plurality vote when the law authorizes a plurality to elect. It is, however, insisted, and truly, that no law of New Jersey authorizes a plurality to elect. The laws of New Jersey are silent on this subject, but they do authorize a joint meeting of the two houses of the legislature to appoint a Senator, and it has been the uniform practice of this joint meeting since the foundation of the Government to prescribe the rules for its own government. These rules as to the number of votes necessary to effect an election have varied at different times, sometimes requiring a majority of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature, sometimes a majority only of those present, and in the case under consideration only a Plurality

Suppose, under the rule fast stated, but 79 members had been present in the joint meeting, and 40 had voted for the same person, would he have been elected; and if not, why not? Seventy-nine out of 81 would have constituted a quorum, and 40 would have been a majority of those present. The only reason why such a vote would not have made an election would be the existence of the rule adopted by the joint meeting, declaring that "no candidate should be elected unless receiving a majority of the votes of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature." While that rule was in force no presiding officer would have thought of declaring a candidate elected, nor would any candidate have supposed himself elected because he received a majority of the votes cast, unless such majority was a majority of all the members elected to the legislature. Under the other rule, "that a person receiving a majority of the votes of those present should be declared elected," who would doubt the validity of an election by 31 out of 60 votes if only so many had been cast? If the joint meeting had the right to prescribe at one time that it should require a majority of all elected to the legislature to elect, at another time that a majority of those present might elect, and at still another time that elections might be had by acclamation, it had the right to prescribe that a plurality should elect; and when any candidate received a plurality he thereupon became elected, not simply by the will of those who voted for him, but by the will of the joint meeting, which had previously, by a majority vote, resolved that such plurality should elect.

It might be urged in this case, with much plausibility, that inasmuch as the constitution of New Jersey recognizes the two houses in joint meeting as a legislature, that such joint meeting was the very body on whom the Constitution of the United States had conferred the power to prescribe "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators;" but your committee prefer placing the authority of the joint meeting to prescribe the plurality rule on the broader ground that in the Absence of any law, either of Congress or the State, on the subject, a joint meeting of the two houses of a legislature, duly assembled and vested with authority to elect a United States Senator, has a right to prescribe that a plurality may elect, on the principle that the adoption of such a rule by a majority vote in the fast instance makes the act, subsequently done in pursuance of such majority vote, its own.

The committee recommend for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That John P. Stockton was duly elected and is entitled to his seat as a Senator from the State of New Jersey for the term of six yews from the 4th day of March, 1865.

On March 23[1] this resolution was considered, and was agreed to by a vote of yeas 22, nays 21; but on March 26[2] objection was made that Mr. Stockton had been one of those voting in the affirmative, and that he should not have voted. So the vote was reconsidered. And on March 27 the resolution was amended so as to declare Mr. Stockton not entitled to the seat, and then was agreed to, yeas 23, nays 20.[3]

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1870 TO 1875

878. The Ohio election case of Eggleston v. Strader, in the Forty-first Congress.

No fraud being shown, the House sustained the election returns, although a de facto election officer, of partisan bias and irregular conduct, officiated a portion of the time.

Distinction between election officers de jure and de facto and mere usurpers.

The Elections Committee examined a question raised in the notice of contest, although it had not been insisted on in the argument of contestant.

A small excess of votes in the box over names on the poll list does not justify rejection of a poll, no fraud being shown.

Rude conduct on the part of election officers does not necessarily constitute intimidation sufficient to vitiate the poll.

On May 23, 1870,[4] Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, from the Special Committee of Elections, submitted the report in the Ohio case of Eggleston v. Strader. The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 211 votes. The main issue in the contest was over the poll of the First Ward of Cincinnati, where sitting Member received a majority of 350 votes. If this poll should be rejected, as demanded by the contestant, the result would be changed.

There was no evidence that fraud was committed, but a person who presided as one of the judges was undoubtedly disqualified by reason of irregular election. The report says:

The polls were opened at about half past 6 o'clock a. m., James W. Fitzgerald, Republican, and James Malloy, Democrat, members of the city council, being present as judges of election ex officio. Mr. Fitzgerald took the lead in the proceedings, and, under his charge, Charles W. Rowland, Democrat, was chosen by the electors present, viva voce, to be the third judge of election. Three clerks were duly chosen, and the election proceeded.

The testimony shows that John C. Fiedelday, an active Democratic politician, was present at or about the polls from the time they were opened.

Between 10 and 11 o'clock Mr. Malloy left the polls because of duties elsewhere and requested that Fiedelday should act in his place. This was assented to, and he was sworn in. The substitution was confessedly irregular, there being no law authorizing such procedure. The report says:

Mr. Fitzgerald says that Fiedelday acted as judge in the absence of Malloy during the time when from five-eighths to three-fourths of the entire vote was polled, and that in disputed cases he, Fiedelday, united with Rowland, the other Democratic judge, in receiving Democratic votes to which he, Fitzgerald, believed there were valid objections; but he fixes the number of these at not over 25, to the best of his knowledge and belief, and he thinks that few or none of the proper Republican votes were rejected.

The conduct of Fiedelday during the day is shown to have been undignified, irregular, and unbecoming an officer taking any charge of an election. When he was not acting as a judge he mingled in a crowd and electioneered for Mr. Strader. He took a bet of $50 offered by one John Kissick, who rather rashly ventured his money on Mr. Eggleston. He left the polls and called back James Riley, who had once been rejected and whose right to vote was doubtful, and induced the other judges to receive the vote. He engaged in an altercation with Mr. Fitzgerald, the Republican judge, gave and took the lie, and showed a familiarity with profane language by no means commendable. He was evidently in no very judicial frame of mind.

But the committee find no proof nor even suspicion of fraud in his.conduct, nor, indeed, in the entire conduct of the poll. It was clearly conducted in a generally peaceable manner.

The contestant claimed that the whole day's proceedings were invalid, that there was no good or sufficient election board, that Fiedelday was no judge, and that his acts were the acts of an usurper.

The committee conclude:

That Fiedelday was not legally elected a judge of the election, and that he could not have held the place as against Malloy, who was an officer de jure, is clear.

But it is well settled in law that, so far as the public is concerned, the acts of one who claims to be a public officer, judicial or ministerial, under a show of title or color of right, will be sustained. Such a person is an officer in fact, if not in law, and innocent parties or the public will be protected in so considering and trusting him. This principle will not be questioned, it is believed. The highest authorities and courts have maintained it.

In case of public officers who are such de facto, acting under color of office by an election or appointment not strictly legal, or without having qualified themselves by the requisite tests, or by holding over after the period prescribed for a new appointment, as in case of sheriffs and constables, their acts are held valid as respects the rights of third persons who have an interest in them and as concerns the public to prevent a failure of justice. (2 Kent's Com., p. 295; Bouvier's Law Dictionary, de facto).

In Wilcox v. Smith (5 Wendall, p. 233) the court says: "The principle is well settled that the acts of an officer de facto are as valid and effectual when they concern the public or third persons as though they were officers de jure. The affairs of society could not be carried on on any other principle." To the same effect is the case of The People v. Cook (14 Barb. N. Y. Rep., 259). Numerous other citations from reports and elementary writers could be given if needed.

But the contestant claims that Fiedelday was not an officer or judge de facto, and his counsel has made an ingenious argument before the committee on the ground that Fiedelday was an intruder or usurper without color of right, basing his argument largely upon the view that there was no vacancy in the office of judge of elections and that there is no such officer known in Ohio as temporary judge. But he seems for the time to lose sight of the distinction between an officer de facto and an officer de jure, and some of the cases that he cites relate to the rights of claimants to offices as against other claimants which involve the question as to an officer de jure and not de facto. It takes but little to constitute an officer de facto as affects the right of the public. The exercise of apparent authority under color of right, thus inviting public trust and negativing the idea of usurpation, is sufficient.

There need have been no vacancy in the office claimed to be holden; indeed, no such office may have ever existed. The supreme court of Massachusetts decided, in Fowler v. Beebe (9 Mass. Rep., p. 231), that the appointment by the governor as sheriff of a county that does not exist is a colorable appointment, and makes the appointee an officer de facto, as to the public, and this though the appointment was absolutely void and not simply voidable.

It has been decided in Maine that the acts of a magistrate, under apparent right of office, will be sustained, although they were long after the commission of the magistrate had expired. (Brown v. Lunt, 34 Maine Rep., 423.) To constitute an individual an officer de facto he must not be a mere intruder, but must be in colore officii. There must be some color of an election or appointment, or such an exercise of the office, and an acquiescence on the part of the public, as would afford a reasonable presumption of at least a colorable election or appointment. In the case of the People v. Cook (14 Barbour, New York Rep., 289) the entire question as to what will constitute an officer de facto is discussed.

The report, after discussing the case in question, refers to certain Ohio cases, and then proceeds to refer to cases of the House itself. The committee admit that the House has sometimes apparently departed from the strict rule, but it is pointed out that in such cases the element of fraud was always present. The report concludes:

On these decisions, and seeking to give effect to the expressed voice of the people, as shown in the whole vote of the First Ohio district, the committee are dearly of the opinion that the poll in the First Ward in Cincinnati should not be thrown out. To disfranchise 1,700 voters, who cast their ballots in good faith at a peaceable election where no fraud is shown, upon irregularities in the constitution of the board of election, is what this committee is not prepared to recommend.

If the House of Representatives has ever, moved by partisan bias, established a precedent opposed to this conclusion, the committee have no hesitation in saying that it declines to be governed by any such precedent. It has been shown that if such precedent can be found it is also true that the contrary principle has been more than once recognized and acted upon. Even if this were not so, it is never too late to do justice. That requires that the poll in the First Ward shall be sustained notwithstanding the irregularities attending it.

A question of less importance was considered as to another ward:

The counsel for the contestant, in his oral argument before the committee, did not raise any question as to the Thirteenth Ward in Cincinnati; but as objection is taken to its poll in the contestant's. notice and in the printed brief of his counsel, the committee have fully considered the points there raised.

It is claimed that more votes were put into the ballot box than there were names on the poll book. The testimony shows that there was such an excess of 9 votes; but so far from suggesting any fraud, all, or nearly all, of the witnesses account for it by the great rush upon the polls in the morning, at noon, and at evening, causing a rapidity of voting so great that the clerks could not take down all the names. The witnesses for both contestant and sitting Member testify to this.

It is also set forth in contestant's notice that the judges of the election in this ward prevented persons from voting for contestant by rude and threatening language and conduct, driving legal voters away from the polls, and otherwise intimidating them. The committee have carefully read all the testimony bearing upon this charge, and fail to find any such violence or force as impairs the integrity of the poll. At times there was loud talk about the ballot box, and the crowd would become excited to some extent in its movements, calling for some effort on the part of the officers to keep the way to the polls clear. Several witnesses testify that they believe that voters were kept from voting by the course pursued by the judges of election, but the number stated is very small, varying from three to five or eight, while policemen present, and other well-known citizens, state that there was no such intimidation.

The committee, in accordance with their conclusions, reported resolutions declaring contestant not elected and confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

On December 21, 1870,[1] the resolutions were agreed to in the House without debate or division.

879. The Kentucky election case of Barnes v. Adams in the Forty-first Congress.

The House declined to find persons disqualified as voters because they had formerly borne arms against the Government.

The State law providing, with affixed penalty, that both political parties should be represented in boards of election officers, the House declined to reject the returns for noncompliance with this law.

The House held a duly appointed election judge to be an officer de facto, although not possessing a required qualification as to former loyalty.

In the absence of fraud the failure of an election officer to be sworn does not destroy the effect of his acts as an officer de facto.

On May 23, 1870,[2] Mr. George W. McGrary, of Iowa, from the special Committee of Elections, submitted a report in the case of Barnes v. Adams, of Kentucky. The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 462 over the contestant.

The committee found the settlement of the contest to depend on several questions of law:

(1) As to the right of ex-Confederate soldiers to vote in Kentucky, the committee found:

There is no law of the United States or of the State of Kentucky disfranchising the persons who were common soldiers in the rebel army. It is well known that these persons are legal voters under the laws of most of the States of the Union. They are clearly entitled to vote under the constitution and laws of Kentucky for members "of the most numerous branch of the State legislature," and are, therefore, entitled to vote for Members of Congress under the provisions of section 2, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which declares:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

In the case of McKee v. Young, in the last Congress, the House rejected the votes of certain rebel soldiers, but it was done upon the ground that at the time of the election at which they voted they were in actual organized, armed hostility to the United States. Although the rebel soldiers who voted were at home on parole, they were held to be actually in the rebel army, and it was insisted that to allow them to vote would be equivalent to saying that an army, organized for and engaged in an effort to destroy the Government of the United States, might vote for Members of Congress. The case now before us is, however, very different. When this election took place, more than three years had elapsed since the close of the rebellion, and the armed hostility to the Government had long since ceased. With the policy of disfranchisement those who took arms against the Government the committee has nothing to do. It is simply a question of law, concerning which we can entertain no doubt.

[2] Second session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 74; 2 Bartlett, p. 760.

(2) The law of Kentucky provided as follows in regard to the appointment of election officers:

Be it enacted by the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That hereafter, so long as there are two distinct political parties in this Commonwealth, the sheriff, judges, and clerk of election, in all cases of elections by the people under the Constitution and laws of the United States and under the constitution and laws of Kentucky, shall be so selected and appointed as that one of the judges at each place of voting shall be of one political party, and the other judge of the other or opposing political party; and that a difference shall exist at such place of voting between the sheriff and clerk of election: Provided, That there be a sufficient number of the members of each political party resident in the several precincts, as aforesaid, to fill said offices. And this requirement shall be observed by all officers of this Commonwealth who have the power to appoint any of the aforesaid officers of election, under the penalty of a fine of one hundred dollars for each omission, to be recovered by presentment of the grand jury.

The committee thus discuss a failure to conform to this law:

We inquire, in the next place, what was the effect of a failure to divide election officers equally between the two political parties. We are altogether unable, consistently with our views of the law, to hold that such failure of itself avoids the election. What we have said, and what we shall hereafter say, about the validity of the official acts of officers de facto applies here, for such officers are clearly of that class. Besides, the statute which we have quoted, requiring an equal division of election officers between the two political parties, itself provides the penalty which shall be incurred by the persons appointing these officers, if the statute is disregarded. It declares that the penalty shall be a fine of $100 for each offense of the kind. It does not declare that the election shall be set aside in such cases. It will be seen hereafter that this point is not material to the case of contestant, inasmuch as by throwing out all the polls where the election officers were not equally divided politically he would lose more than he would gain.

(3) An act of 1862 qualified the above act by providing that—

SEC. 1. That in construing the act approved February 11, 1858, to which this is an amendment, those who have engaged in the rebellion for the overthrow of the Government, or who have in any way aided, counseled, or advised the separation of Kentucky from the Federal Union by force of arms, or adhered to those engaged in the effort to separate her from the Federal Union by force of arms, shall not be deemed one of the political parties in this Commonwealth within the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment.

The committee conclude that the above provision was intended to prevent the recognition of the secession party of 1862 in Kentucky, and operated upon that party as a class and not upon individuals. The secession party had ceased to exist and therefore the provision was inapplicable. In the debate on the floor this construction of the law was disputed.

The committee observe, however, that if the statute should be construed as applying to individuals rather than to a party, and should be construed as forbidding the appointment of such persons, nevertheless if they were "de facto officers, acting under color of authority, and not mere usurpers, then their acts are not (in the absence of fraud) void as to third parties." The committee say:

These judges of election, under the law of Kentucky, are appointed by the county courts in the several counties. They are to consist of two justices of the peace, if so many there be, or of one justice of the peace and one other suitable person. In case of a disagreement between the judges, the sheriff acts as umpire. It seems clear to the committee that even if the acts above named were construed as claimed by contestant, it could only follow that the county courts in Kentucky had failed in some instances to do their duty in selecting election officers, and had thus subjected themselves to the penalty provided by those statutes, to wit, "a fine of $100 for each omission," and not that all votes cast at the elections held by such officers should be thrown away. An officer appointed by competent authority, having all the other qualifications requisite, save only that of loyalty during the rebellion (where that is required), would certainly be an officer de facto, clothed with color of authority, at least.

On a question arising from the charge that certain election officers were not sworn, the doctrine of de facto officers is considered further:

There is, however, a principle of law which your committee believe to be well settled by judicial decisions, and most salutary in its operations, which is conclusive of this point, as well as of several other points in this case. It is this: That in order to give validity to the official acts of an officer of election so far as they affect third parties or the public, and in the absence of fraud, it is only necessary that such officer shall have color of authority. It is sufficient if he be an officer de facto and not a mere usurper. This doctrine has been recognized and enforced by many of the highest courts of this country.

The report cites the cases of The People v. Cook (N. Y., 4 Selden, 67), Taylor v. Taylor et al. (10 Minnesota, 107), Baird v. Bank (Penn., 11 S. and R., 414), Pritchett v. The People (Ill., 1 Gilm., 529), The People v. Ammons (5 Gilm., 107), St. Louis County Court v. Sparks (10 Mo., 121), etc.

The report further reviews the Congressional cases of Jackson v. Wayne, McFarland v. Culpepper, Easton v. Scott, Draper v. Johnston, Howard v. Cooper, Delano v. Morgan, Milliken v. Fuller, Clark v. Hall, Flanders v. Hahn, and Blair v. Barrett, and concludes:

The question, therefore, regarded in the light of precedent or authority alone, would stand about as follows: The judicial decisions are all to the effect that the acts of officers de facto, so far as they affect third parties or the public in the absence of fraud, are as valid as those of an officer de jure. The decisions of this House are to some extent conflicting; the point has seldom been presented upon its own merits, separated from questions of fraud; and in the few cases where this seems to have been the case the rulings are not harmonious. In one of the most recent and important cases (Blair v. Barrett), in which there was an exceedingly able report, the doctrine of the courts, as above stated, is recognized and indorsed. The question is therefore a settled question in the courts of the country, and is, so far as this House is concerned, to say the least, an open one.

Your committee feels constrained to adhere to the law as it exists and is administered in all the courts of the country, not only because of the very great authority by which it is supported, but for the further reason, as stated in the outset, that we believe the rule to be most wise and salutary. The officers of election are chosen of necessity from among all classes of the people; they are numbered in every State by thousands; they are often men unaccustomed to the formalities of legal proceedings. Omissions and mistakes in the discharge of their ministerial duties are almost inevitable. If this House shall establish the doctrine that an election is void because an officer thereof is not in all respects duly qualified, or because the same is not conducted strictly according to law, notwithstanding it may have been a fair and free election, the result will be very many contests, and, what is worse, injustice will be done in many cases. It will enable those who are so disposed to seize upon mere technicalities in order to defeat the will of the majority.

In the debate this position was assailed.

880. The election case of Barnes v. Adams, continued.

Contestee having objected when certain evidence was taken that it was not covered by the notice, the Elections Committee sustained the objection.

The returns from an election precinct not being certified in any manner whatever, they were rejected by the House.

Persons working on a railroad and intending to leave on its completion were held not to have such residence as to make them voters.

Where elections were viva voce the Elections Committee required contestant to prove the want of residence of such persons as he claimed voted illegally.

An entire poll should not be rejected when it is possible to purge it of illegal votes.

Threatening notices posted before an election and not resulting in deterring voters from going to the polls do not justify rejection of the polls.

(4) A further point was thus considered:

The act of Congress regulating proceedings in cases of contested elections, and under which this proceeding was instituted, provides as follows:

"Whenever any person shall intend to contest the election of any Member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of said election shall have been determined by the officers or board of canvassers, give notice in writing, to the Member whose seat he designs to contest, of his intention to contest the same, and such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." (See Brightley's Digest, vol. 1, p. 254, sec. 14.)

As in this case there is nothing in the notice of contest in relation to the failure of election officers to take the oath prescribed by law, contestee objects to all the evidence upon that subject, and did so object, as the record shows, when the same was taken. The committee are of the opinion that the objection is well taken. The language of the statute is specific and admits of but one construction. The grounds of the contest which are to be insisted upon must be stated in the notice. This, of course, is to the end that the contestee may be fully advised of the nature of the case which he has to meet. The notice is the only pleading required of contestant; it is the foundation upon which the whole proceeding rests, and if the contestant could introduce one new cause of contest not mentioned therein he could introduce any number, and the contestee could never know in advance of the taking of the testimony what issues are to be tried. When we add to this the consideration that the time for taking testimony in these cases is, as compared with ordinary litigation of equal importance in the courts of the country, necessarily brief, and that if a contestant may go outside of his notice at all he may do so just before the time for taking testimony expires and thus cut off his adversary from the privilege of taking rebutting testimony, the great importance of adhering to the law will be apparent to all.

(5) Certain returns were thrown out because of the omission of necessary formalities:

We have already said that the Glades precinct, No. 11, in Pulaski County, must be rejected, because it is not certified to be correct by any officer. This objection is substantial and not technical. The paper purporting to be a poll book for this precinct proves nothing whatever. To admit such a, paper as evidence would be to set aside all rules and open wide the door for fraud.

In four other precincts the returns are rejected because "the poll books are not certified in any manner whatever."

(6) As to the qualifications of certain voters:

No person is a legal voter under the constitution of Kentucky unless he be a resident of the State, county, and voting precinct. A temporary sojourner is not a resident within the legal sense of that term. A person who goes to a place for a specified purpose, and with the intention of leaving it when that purpose is accomplished, does not gain a residence, however long he may remain. It follows that such persons as went into any of the precincts in question for the purpose of working on the railroad, and with the intention of leaving when the road should be completed, had no right to vote. The testimony is not as dear as it might be as to the number of votes which ought to be thrown out under this ruling. The committee are of the opinion that the following rule should govern in determining what votes to reject: Whenever it appears that a person came into the precinct for the purpose of working on the railroad, that he resided in a temporary habitation, and was generally regarded as a temporary inhabitant, and that he actually left very soon after the road was completed, and soon after the election, his vote should be rejected.

(7) It being charged generally that in a certain precinct certain disqualified railroad hands voted, the report says:

That there were illegal votes cast by some of these persons we think is beyond question, but the presumption is always in favor of the legality of a vote which has been admitted by the proper officers; and since all elections in Kentucky are viva voce, and since the record shows how each person votes, it would not, we think, be too much to require contestant to prove the want of residence of such persons as he claims illegally voted for contestee.

As to another precinct where a similar charge was made:

The vote at this precinct should undoubtedly be purged of a number of illegal votes, but the evidence is not sufficient to authorize the rejection of the entire poll, especially in view of the fact that it was within the power of contestant to show the facts in relation to each person who voted for contestee, and thus purge the poll of all illegal votes. The rule is well settled that the whole vote of a precinct should not be thrown out on account of illegal votes having been cast, if it be practicable to ascertain the number of illegal votes, and the person for whom cast, in order to reject them and leave the legal votes to be counted. Legal votes are not to be thrown out in order to get rid of illegal votes, unless necessity requires it as the only means of preventing the consummation of a fraud upon the ballot box.

(8) In one precinct intimidation was alleged. It was proven that preceding the election threatening notices promising that certain Republicans should be lynched had been posted, and several persons had been lynched and one or two murdered in the vicinity a short time previously. But the only result of this seemed to be that both parties appeared at the polls armed. There was no violence at the polls, and a full vote was given, no one being prevented from voting as he chose. The report says:

It is not to be doubted that an effort was made to intimidate the Republican voters at this precinct by posting up threatening notices and otherwise; but it is also clear that it was wholly unsuccessful. The Republicans went to the polls determined to maintain their rights, and they were not molested. The vote of this precinct can not be rejected.

In accordance with the principles set forth above the committee found the majority of sitting Member to be 332, and reported a resolution confirming his title to the seat.

On July 5 [1] the report was debated at length. A motion to recommit the report with instructions that the case be reexamined was disagreed to—yeas 21, nays 121.

The resolution of the committee was then agreed to without division.

881. The Indiana election case of Reid v. Julian in the Forty-first Congress.

Discussion of the reasons justifying the rejection of an entire poll.

Election officers not being residents of the precinct as required by law, the poll was rejected.

A person not possessing the qualifications required for an officer de jure may not be an officer de facto.

Discussion as to the principles on which a fraudulent return is rejected.

On July 6, 1870,[1] Mr. John Cessna, of Pennsylvania, from the special Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the Indiana case of Reid v. Julian. The minority views, presented by Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, gives the most succinct statement of the real issue in the case. The official ascertainment of the result in the district had given to Mr. Julian, the sitting Member, a majority of 116. The minority views thus explain:

> This result was reached, as the evidence shows and as is admitted by the contestee and contestant, in consequence of the clerk of Wayne County, in reporting the aggregate vote of that county, leaving out of his report the aggregate vote of the south precinct of Richmond City, a poll or precinct of Wayne County, at which Mr. Reid obtained 676 votes and Mr. Julian received 475 votes, as returned by the judges of election; thus giving Mr. Reid a majority of 201 votes over Mr. Julian at said poll or precinct; but which was rejected by the board of canvassers of Wayne County, Ind., and which was not counted by the county clerk in his return to the secretary of state, and consequently was not included by the latter in his aggregate of votes as certified to the governor. If this poll and vote had not been rejected by the board of canvassers of Wayne County, then Mr. Reid would have received a majority of 85 votes on the total vote over Mr. Julian and, as a matter of right, would have been entitled to the certificate of the governor.

This not being a prima facie case the committee did not review the action of the board of canvassers, but passed at once to consider the case on its merits and to consider the justice of sitting Member's claim that the entire poll in the precinct in question should be rejected.

The majority say:

> It has long been held by all the judicial tribunals of the country, as well as by the decisions of Congress and the legislatures of the several States, that an entire poll should always be rejected for any one of the three following reasons:
> 1. Want of authority in the election board.
> 2. Fraud in conducting the election.
> 3. Such irregularities or misconduct as render the result uncertain.
> We are clearly of opinion that the first and third reasons were sufficiently shown in this case.
> If the second reason has not been established against the officers conducting the election, it has been abundantly shown that these officers afforded the opportunity for someone else to commit the fraud, if they did not do so themselves.
> This House has, in very many cases, rejected the entire polls for the several reasons before stated or for either one of them. These decisions commenced many years ago, and have continued regularly until the present time. Jackson v. Wayne, 1792 (Contested Elections, vol. 1, p. 47); McFarland v. Purviance, 1804 (same vol., p. 131); Easton v. Scott, 1816 (same vol., p. 272); McFarland v. Culpepper, 1807; Draper v. Johnson, 1832 (same vol., p. 710); Howard v. Cooper (2 vol. Contested Elections);

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 116; 2 Bartlett, p. 822; Rowell's Digest p. 253.

Blair v. Barrett (2 vol. Contested Elections, p. 308); Knox v. Blain (2 vol. Contested Elections, p. 521); and other cases therein cited.

Both volumes of contested election cases in Congress are full of such precedents. Delano v. Morgan, Myers v. Moffat, Covode v. Foster, and numerous other cases not yet reported, are to the same effect.

The majority also quote at length the decision of the court in the Pennsylvania contested elections of 1867. (1 Brewster, 171.)

As to the want of authority in the election board, the law is quoted with its requirement that the judges selected should be "two qualified voters of the precinct." Then as to the southern precinct of Richmond the majority say:

On the morning of the election in October, 1868, S. W. Lynde appeared at the poll of the southern precinct and claimed to act as inspector of elections. After some slight controversy, M. M. Lacey and John S. Lyle were declared elected as judges. Mr. Lynde claimed to act as inspector, because he was one of the board of registry for the township of Wayne. He acted as a sort of president of the meeting at the organization of the board, and put to vote the motions made. Mr. Lynde swears (pp. 8 and 9) that he was not a resident in, nor a citizen of, the southern precinct; that he was a citizen of the northern precinct, and that he did on that day vote at the poll in said northern precinct.

Mr. Lacey testifies to precisely the same thing in regard to himself (p. 14), and Mr. Lyle does the same (pp. 9, 10, and 11). Several other witnesses bear similar testimony in regard to the residence of these three officers of the election board of the southern precinct. It is not denied by anyone, nor in any place, that the three officers of this board were nonresidents in the precinct where they held the election, and all of them voted on that day at a different poll.

The majority continue:

Elections should not be set aside for want of mere form, for innocent or unintentional irregularities. On the other hand, all the mandatory provisions of the law must be observed, or the election can not and should not be sustained. These questions have often been considered by the courts of the country, by this House, and by the legislatures of the several States of the Union.

On behalf of the contestant, however, it is urged that these persons were officers de facto, although it is conceded that they were not officers de jure. A large number of authorities have been cited to this point. It is freely admitted that the distinction between officers de facto and de jure is not well defined. The decisions of the House, and even the decisions of courts, on this question are somewhat inconsistent and conflicting. While we admitted that party spirit and surrounding circumstances have produced such apparent inconsistency in the decisions of the House, yet we venture to assert that in no case has it ever been held that persons were officers de facto who did not possess the qualifications requisite for officers de jure.

In the case of Delano v. Morgan even the minority of the committee (Democratic) reported in favor of excluding the entire poll of Blue Rock Township, and gave as a reason for so doing that the polls had been closed by the officers for about one hour so as to enable them to take dinner. To sustain this decision they quote the opinion of Judge Brinkerhoff, of Ohio, and yet in that case there was no pretense that the ballot box was tampered with, but that the judges rather acted in ignorance of what their duties were. This case (Delano v. Morgan) is directly in point in regard to the distinction we have attempted to make as to officers de facto. One of the officers of the Pike Township election was disqualified; the poll was rejected. The debates on this case are full to the point, and the conclusion is full and complete in favor of the distinction we make. One may be an officer de facto who has been irregularly or improperly appointed or selected, and his acts may be binding on third persons; but in a case of personal disqualification of the officer for reasons which could not be cured by a change in the manner of his selection, the rule is universal that he can have no jurisdiction, and all his acts are void from the beginning for want of authority.

This view as to an ineligible person claiming to be an officer de facto was held of importance in the debate, and was indorsed by Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont,[1] who had given much attention to election cases.

The minority antagonized this theory:

The evidence shows that those officers acted with permission of all the voters present at the opening of the poll, had their sanction and approval as such, and, as far as is known or the testimony discloses, without a single objection during the day of the election from anyone. I hold, therefore, although they may not have been officers de jure, they were officers de facto, and as such their acts were valid so far as they concern the public and protect the rights of third persons, although they may have had no legal right to exercise the duties of such election officers, and should stand. They clearly should stand in the absence of fraud.

As to the second and third questions, that of frauds and irregularities, the majority report says:

We are aware of the fact that it is often argued in defense of irregularities, bad faith, and even fraud in conducting elections, that it is hard to disfranchise the honest voter by reason of the mistakes or misconduct of election officers. This view has been so completely answered by the judges, in the opinions already cited, that little more need be said on this point. It might be well, however, to add that no legal voter is disfranchised by throwing out a fraudulent poll. The only effect of such action by the proper tribunal is to destroy the prima facie character of the return, and to deny to the official acts of such officers the legal presumption of correctness usually accorded to the conduct of faithful agents

882. The case of Reid v. Julian, continued.

Votes proven aliunde by persons swearing that they were qualified, and that they voted for the contestee in the election in question.

Votes may be proven aliunde by evidence of third persons as to how the voters cast their ballots.

Where votes are proven aliunde, the voter, in swearing to his vote, need not identify the ballot.

When votes are proven aliunde by one party to a contest, the residue are not allowed to the other party.

As to the specific acts, the majority enumerate a series which are explained or disputed by the minority.

A question arose in regard to the proceedings of sitting Member to purge the poll by evidence aliunde. The South Richmond returns gave Mr. Julian 475 votes and Mr. Reid 676 votes. As to the evidence aliunde, the majority say:

We find that Mr. Julian has called 508 persons who swear that they were voters in that precinct; that they voted in October, 1868, at that poll, and that they voted for said Julian. In the judgment of the committee, the evidence of these witnesses is as full, complete, and reliable as it is possible for human testimony to be given. It would be received in any court of justice in the country, and held sufficient to establish any fact in a civil, or even criminal, case. These names are appended to this report and contained in statement marked "Paper A." In addition to these he has called 22 other persons who give similar testimony in regard to themselves, and corroborate these by calling 22 witnesses who gave them tickets and saw them vote. For this list see Paper B, hereto attached. He has also produced a list of other persons voting at said poll, being 21 in number, whom he also claims as having voted for him. Eight of these were examined personally and 13 witnesses examined as to the others. While the evidence in regard to this list is not so entirely conclusive and unanswerable as in regard to the other two lists, yet it is altogether satisfactory and sufficient to establish a fact before any legal tribunal. For this list see Paper C.

Mr. Julian claims to have proved that he is entitled to 29 other votes cast at this poll. See Paper D, hereto attached. The evidence in regard to these 29 persons is such as to render it highly probable that they did vote for Mr. Julian, yet, as we think, insufficient to establish the fact as a legal conclusion. The weight of evidence and probabilities, however, are so largely in favor of this theory as to add greatly to the uncertainty of the return of this poll.

In this precinct the returns gave to Mr. Julian 475 votes and to Mr. Reid 676. Had this vote been counted by the county board Mr. Reid would have had a majority of 85 votes in the district, making 90 with the credit of 5 votes hereinbefore allowed him.

Mr. Reid makes several objections to Mr. Julian's attempt to purge this poll. He says that in several cases of the 551 persons claimed by Mr. Julian it is not shown by the witnesses that such persons were legal voters. In point of fact this is true of some 30 or 40 names. In the judgment of the committee no such proof was necessary in this case. The poll is either valid or void as a return of election. If void no effort to purge it is necessary. If the officers who held this election had authority, and if they could conduct it, then every vote which went into the box is presumed to have been given by a person duly qualified. The legal presumption in favor of the right of the voter is all that can be required.

The minority say:

The contestee, not contending that any direct fraud has been proven by him against anyone, asserts that, as one of the badges of fraud, he has proven by the oral testimony of over 500 witnesses that this number of ballots were actually voted for him, and that by the evidence of some 40 more persons they either voted for him or intended to do so; and hence the ballots in the ballot box must have been changed by some other person or persons, as there were only 475 votes returned for him by the judges, instead of over 500 votes, as should have been; but against the oral testimony of these witnesses there is the evidence of the analyzation of the actual tickets voted, and a complete recount of their number, made in the presence of the contestee's counsel, sworn to by the inspector of the south Poll as being true, and the tickets voted and counted at the election; and this testimony is confirmed by the township trustee and others, who had charge of the tickets from the close of the election until they were counted by the contestant, which analyzation shows 670 votes for the contestant instead of 676, and 479 votes for the contestee instead of 475 votes, with 32 ballots scratched or which had no name on them, 31 of which appeared to be Republican tickets and 1 a Democratic, making in all 1,181 tickets instead of 1,183, the number returned by the judges, and also that which the poll book shows.

The contestant had objected to the evidence by which the votes were proven aliunde, citing the case of Wheat v. Ragsdale (27 Ind., 203) to show that the witness should first be asked if he could identify his ticket, and then a search should be made for it. The majority say:

It does not appear that the tickets were before the notary swearing the witnesses, or before the witnesses being sworn. We therefore agree with the court in saying that the question supposed to be indispensable would have been of little practical importance. There were 1,151 tickets in this box for Congress, and it would be almost absurd to suppose voters could identify their tickets from such a number after a lapse of several months.

It was claimed in the debate[1] that in the absence of positive fraud, which vitiated and corrupted the whole poll, the contestant should be credited with the residue of votes after the allowance to sitting Member for what he had proven. But the majority did not allow this contention.

The majority of the committee found as a result of minor corrections and the purging of the South Richmond poll a majority of 602 for Mr. Julian, and reported resolutions declaring contestant not elected and that sitting Member was entitled to the seat.

On July 15[2] the report was debated in the House, and on that day a substitute of the minority declaring contestant elected was decided in the negative without division. Then the resolution declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat was agreed to, yeas 127, nays 50.

883. The Missouri election case of Shields v. Van Horn, in the Forty-first Congress.

Where a canvassing officer had without doubt wrongfully rejected a decisive return, it was held that the burden of proof should be on the wrongfully returned member.

Where the registration on which the vote depended was fraudulent, the House rejected the entire return.

On July 15,1870,[1] John C. Churchill, of New York, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority in the case of Shields v. Van Horn, of Missouri. The report, after stating the vote of the district, says:

That this is a correct statement of the vote cast at that election is not questioned by either party, and it shows a majority for the contestant over the sitting Member of 983 votes. The secretary of state, to whom, by the law of Missouri, the returns of votes cast for the several candidates for Representative in Congress in each county are made by the clerk of the county court in each county, rejected the returns from the counties of Platte and Jackson, whereby a majority of 867 votes in the eight remaining counties was shown in favor of Robert T. Van Horn, to whom he give a certificate of election in due form, upon which he was admitted to the seat. The supreme court of Missouri, in two cases arising in different parts of the State at this election of 1868, have decided, in accordance with the general current of authority in this country, both legislative and judicial, that the action of the secretary of state was not authorized by law; that his sole duty was to add together the votes returned to him as cast for each candidate in the several counties, and to give the certificate to the person to whom, upon such addition, it appeared that a majority of votes had been given. (The People v. Rodman, 43 Mo., 256; The People v. Steers, 44 Mo., 224,228.)

The action of the secretary of state, therefore, does not aid us in deciding this contest upon the merits of the case, and is only referred to to explain the attitude of the different parties to this contest.

The minority[2] of the committee contend:

It being in proof, and in point of fact not denied by the contestee, that Shields received a majority of votes cast at the election and duly certified to the secretary of state, the commission, of right and in law, belongs to him. In contemplation of law and by virtue of the vote cast Shields is in Congress and Van Horn out, thus reversing the legal status of the parties to this contest, and changing the burden of proof from the contestant Shields to the contestee Van Horn. The consequences of this position of parties are important and bear on the whole question of testimony, its application to and value in the case. The contestee says, "Congress possesses original and exclusive jurisdiction in extending the right of parties to seats in Congress." Without questioning this rule, it maybe remarked that it is in entire harmony with the foregoing suggestions as to the status of the parties; and that it is plainly at war with the usurpations of the secretary of state as a canvassing officer, in assuming a jurisdiction belonging "exclusively" to Congress. With just as much support in law might the secretary assume all the powers of Congress, and pass upon the qualifications of Members, as to assume to judge of their election and returns.

The legal consequence therefore is that in order rightfully to hold the seat he now occupies in the House by usurpation of the secretary of state, and which seat prima facie belongs to the contestant, the burden of proof is upon the sitting Member to show that a majority of the qualified votes cast at the election in the whole district, Platte and Jackson included, were cast for him, and not, as returned by the several clerks, for Shields, the contestant.

The committee found that the returned vote of Platte County should stand, since the sitting Member, although he had attacked it in his answer to the notice of contest, had presented no e-evidence to sustain the allegations of his answer.

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, House Report No. 122; 2 Bartlett, p. 922.

[2] Views presented by Mr. Albert G. Burr, of Illinois.

Therefore the only question left was as to the vote of Jackson County. This vote the sitting Member had attacked, and taken evidence to sustain the attack.

The basic facts in this case were substantially the same as in the case of Switzler v. Dyer, already decided at this session,[1] the oath of loyalty being required before registration, and it being charged that this requirement had been rendered inoperative by the corrupt acts of a superintendent of registration named Phelan, in the county of Jackson. The majority regarded this charge as proven, and say:

> The officers of election also have no discretion in the receiving or rejecting of votes. They are governed by the registration, and it is made a penal offense for them to receive the vote of any person not registered or to reject the vote of any person registered. It is of the first consequence, therefore, that the registration be honest and pure, for without that the purity of the election can not be maintained. and if the registration be rejected the whole election falls. We think that the evidence in this case establishes: That the removal of the first board appointed by Phelan, and the appointment of their successors, who made the registration, was the result of a corrupt agreement to that effect, made by Phelan with Charles Dougherty and others, and was made in the interest of one of the political parties in the county of Jackson (pp. 20, 21); also that the registrars appointed were parties to that corrupt agreement, or cognizant of it; and, further, that the registration was conducted contrary to law and with the purpose of carrying that corrupt agreement into effect.
> In the case of Switzler v. Dyer, decided by this Congress, the majority of the committee did not believe the fraudulent agreement in that case charged to have been established by the evidence, made, and therefore reported in favor of the contestant. The House, however, reversed the finding of the committee in this report; rejected the vote of Monroe County, which was in question, and gave the seat to the contestee. In this case the majority of the committee find the corrupt agreement established by the evidence, and upon the authority of the case just quoted, as of many other cases, reject the registration of Jackson County as fradulent, and with it reject the vote of that county, which was the result of that fradulent registration.
> This conclusion makes it unnecessary for the committee to consider the irregularities shown to have occurred at the election, where persons not on the list of registered voters were allowed to vote upon the certificate of a single member of the board of registration (pp. 35, 36, 42), nor the defects in the poll books returned by the judges of election to the clerk of the county court (pp. 42, 43, 53). The rejection of the vote of Jackson County makes the vote of Robert T. Van Horn 5,964 and of James Shields 5,352 and elects the former by a majority of 612. The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:
> "Resolved, That James Shields is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-first Congress from the Sixth Congressional district of Missouri.
> "Resolved, That Robert T. Van Horn is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-first Congress from the Sixth Congressional district of Missouri."

The resolutions were considered in the House on February 21, 1871,[2] and were agreed to without debate or division.

884. The Tennessee election case of Sheafe v. Tillman, in the Forty-first Congress.

A decision as to what constitutes the determination of result within thirty days of which the notice of contest is to issue.

The action of a State executive in throwing out votes was disregarded by the House.

The governor of a State, as canvassing officer, is not justified in rejecting votes duly cast and returned.

[2] Third Session, Forty-first Congress, Journal, p. 388; Globe, p. 1474.

An election officer appointed without authority of law was held not to be an officer de facto.

There being evidence of both fraud and intimidation, the failure of election officers to be sworn vitiated the returns.

On January 10, 1871,[1] Mr. G. M. Brooks, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Elections, presented the report of the majority in the Tennessee case of Sheafe v. Tillman. At the outset a preliminary question was settled, the minority concurring in the view set forth by the majority:

Before proceeding to a consideration of the merits of this case, a question, preliminary in its nature, first should be disposed of. The contestee in his answer claims that contestant did not serve notice of his intention to contest his seat within the time required by statute, and his specification is as follows:

"First. Because contestant did not file his notice or deliver a copy of the same in time. Respondent's certificate is dated and was issued on the 31st of December, 1868; and contestant's notice, or a copy of it, was not served on or delivered to respondent until the 19th of February, 1869, more than thirty days after the date and issuance of the certificate to respondent."

The United States statute of February 19, 1851, provides that—

"Whenever any person shall intend to contest an election he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice in writing to the member whose seat he designs to contest, etc." (9 Stat. L., 568.)

To decide the question raised, it becomes necessary to ascertain at what time the result of the election in the Fourth Congressional district was determined by the officers "authorized by law to determine the same."

Section 880 of the Code of Tennessee, page 232, provides that—

"The governor and secretary of state shall, as soon as the returns are received, in the presence of such electors as choose to attend, compare the vote in these several cases (among others for Members of Congress) and declare the person receiving the highest number of votes duly elected."

From this provision it would seem that it was the intention of the law that the governor and the secretary of state should personally meet and, in the presence of such electors as choose to attend, make a comparison of the votes. From the evidence introduced, it does not appear that this requirement of the statute was ever complied with by a comparison of the votes by the governor and the secretary of state being personally present together and performing this duty. The secretary of state in October, 1869, testified that he had not seen the governor for nearly two years; that this provision of the code had been treated as only directory by the State officers, and was understood only to require a comparison of the duplicates which ought to be in each office, and that even this had never been done by the governor and secretary of state together to his knowledge. Without deciding the question whether the above officers should personally compare the returns, unquestionably the governor and the secretary of state, by the Code of Tennessee, constitute the officers referred to in the United States statute of February 19, 1851, above cited, and until they have made a comparison of the votes, and definitely and finally acted upon the matter, the result of the election can not be determined in such manner as to bring a contestant within the provisions of the United States statute last above cited.

The committee found that the governor by proclamation of February 11, 1869, had stated that he awarded the certificate to Mr. Tillman, The report says:

The committee are of the opinion that if the provisions of section 880 of the Code ever had been complied with, according to the construction given to the section by the secretary of state, yet there had been no such determination of result of the election as required by the United States statute of February 19, 1851, until after the issuance of the commission to the contestee after February 11, 1869, and therefore the notice, being given on February 15, 1869, was within the time required by statute.

On the count of votes returned the contestant, Mr. Sheafe, had a majority of 1,156 votes; but the governor had assumed to reject the returns of one entire county and parts of another county, thereby causing a plurality of 432 votes to result for Mr. Tillman. The committee was unanimous as to the following conclusion:

There is no law of the State of Tennessee that gives authority to the governor to reject the vote of any county or part of a county; his duty is only to compare the returns received by him with those returned to the office of the secretary of state, and, upon such comparison being made, to "deliver to the candidate receiving the highest number of votes in his district the certificate of his election as Representative to Congress." (Code of Tennessee, sec. 935, p. 239.) If illegal votes have been cast, if irregularities have existed in the elections in any of the counties or precincts, if intimidation or violence has been used to deter legal or peaceable citizens from exercising their rights as voters, to this House must the party deeming himself aggrieved look for redress. This great power of determining the question of the right of a person to a seat in Congress is not vested in the executive of any State, but belongs solely to the House of Representatives. (Constitution United States, Art. I, sec. 5.)

The action of the governor, so far as he has thrown out the votes of counties or parts of counties, is to be disregarded, and the matters in dispute are to be settled upon the actual returns and the evidence introduced, independent of the doings of the executive.

In determining the actual result of the election the committee consider, first, the county of Lincoln, which returned for Tillman 5 votes, and for Sheafe 554. The statutes of the State provided that the governor should appoint a commissioner of registration for each county of the State, and also that—he is hereby fully empowered to set aside the registration of any county in this State, or any part thereof of said registration, when it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the governor that frauds and irregularities have intervened in the registration of voters in such county. The governor shall make known such fact, and set aside said part or whole of said registration, when frauds are shown to have been committed, by proclamation.

Some time prior to the November election in 1868 the governor by proclamation did "set aside and declare null and void all that part of the registration of our county of Lincoln made by A. H. Russell, late registration commissioner."

The governor not making any other appointment, it was generally assumed in the county that no legal election could be held, since the statute provided that the commissioner of registration should appoint "the judges and clerks of all elections," and "hold all elections." But on the day preceding the election the county court of Lincoln County appointed one C. S. Wilson to open and hold the election in the county, and the said Wilson did in fact hold elections in seven of the twenty-five districts in the county, and made returns thereof, signed by himself as coroner. The report concludes as to this act of Wilson:

It is not necessary to discuss the question of the constitutional powers of the governor to set aside a registration, for if this act of his was unconstitutional, and he had no power to set aside a registration and remove a commissioner, then there was no vacancy; the commissioner had not been deprived of his office, and he was the only person by law authorized to hold the election. But if this act of the governor did have the effect of removing the commissioner, the county court had no right under the statute to appoint an election officer; the act of February 26, 1867, chapter 26, section 2, above referred to, vested the appointing power of these officers wholly in the executive, and repealed all laws in conflict therewith. Wilson, therefore, held his office under no color of legal authority; was not even an officer de facto, but was a mere usurper, and all acts done by him as such officer were illegal and void; and when it appears that Wilson was appointed by the court only the day prior to the election, so that it would have been impossible that due notice of his appointment or of the election could have been given; that elections were held in only seven of the twenty-five districts of the county; that it was generally understood that there was no officer legally appointed to hold the elections, and that voters did not attend the polls on that account; and when it further found that there existed in the county organizations of men mounted, armed, and disguised, and known by the name of the Ku-Klux Klan, banded together for political purposes, who, by their threats and violence, intimidated and deterred voters from attending the polls, there could not have been and was not such a full and free expression of the will of the voters as is deemed necessary to constitute a fair election. The committee, therefore, is of the opinion that this election had no semblance of legality, and that the entire vote of Lincoln County should be rejected.

The minority [1] claimed that the action of the governor was void as to the registration, and that the coroner was the proper officer to hold the election under the old law, the repeal of which was not admitted. The intimidation alleged by the majority was also denied.

The majority of the committee further find that in Marshall County previous to the election there was intimidation by the Ku-Klux so that there was not a free expression of public sentiment at the polls. For this reason, and for the reasons set forth below, they recommended the rejection of the poll. The report says:

The commissioner of registration of this county in his return states that in the districts numbered 1, 4, 7, 13, and 15, which gave Tillman 9 and Sheafe 559 votes, "no oath accompanied the poll box, but all certified to be held according to law." And the evidence introduced does not disclose that the oath required by statute was taken and subscribed in the above districts in conformity to law.

The committee adheres to the principle enunciated in the contested election cases of Barnes v. Adams, second session of this Congress, viz, that it is not essential to the validity of an election that the officers should be sworn, or should in all things be held to the strict requirements of the law, so far as their qualifications for the office which they hold are concerned. If it appears that there was no fraud in the election, that it had been fairly conducted, and that there was an opportunity for a full expression of the will of the voters at the ballot box, the mere fact of the omission of an officer to take the oath prescribed by law will not vitiate an election. But if, on the other hand, the election was not fairly conducted, if there was fraud in the ballot, if it should appear that there was an organized attempt of a class of persons in the county to prevent citizens of one particular political belief from depositing their votes freely and peaceably, if intimidation was used to control the voters, and by these means there was not a full, fair, and free expression of the will of the voters at the ballot box, then, in such voting precincts where the requirements of law were not complied with, the vote should be rejected.

The report also approves the rejection of the returns of the first district of Franklin because of intimidation exercised before the election, and also because neither judges nor clerks were sworn according to law. The report says:

In the first district, in which Tillman received 3 and Sheafe 293 votes, the poll book was among the papers in evidence; no oath accompanied the same, and no statement or certificate appeared that any of the officers were sworn; testimony was introduced showing that all the officers were sworn except the one who held the election. It also appeared in evidence that some persons voted without proper certificates, and that the frauds perpetrated at the election were so flagrant that the crowd about the ballot box regarded it as a huge joke and seemed to enjoy it as such. It also appeared that the Ku-Klux visited this district at times during the spring and summer of 1868, in various numbers.

The majority of the committee recommended resolutions declaring contestant not elected, and sitting Member entitled to the seat.

On February 14, 1871,[2] the resolutions were taken up in the House and were at once agreed to without debate or division. But it appeared that there was some understanding, and on a motion to reconsider, the report was debated at length. Then, on a motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, there was a division, the motion being tabled—yeas 123, nays 60. So the report of the majority of the committee was sustained.

885. The Pennsylvania election case of Cessna v. Meyers, in the Forty-second Congress.

When a voter's qualifications are objected to the burden of proof is on the objecting party to show that the person voted for the competitor and was disqualified.

Evidence of hearsay declarations of the voter is receivable only when the fact that he voted is shown by evidence aliunde.

Declarations of the voter as to his vote must be clear and satisfactory and clearly proven.

Discussion of the value as evidence of a party's declaration as to his vote, whether a part of the res gestae or not.

Discussion of the English and American rules of evidence as applied to the declarations of the voter.

Discussion of the status of the voter as a party to the proceedings in a contested election case.

As to the application of technical rules of evidence in an election case, which is a public inquiry.

On February 7, 1872,[1] Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections submitted the report in the Pennsylvania case of Cessna v. Meyers. The sitting Member was returned by an official majority of 15 votes. Contestant charged that a large number of illegal votes were cast and counted for sitting Member, and sitting Member also charged that illegal votes were similarly cast and counted for contestant.

The committee passed upon two questions as to evidence:

(a) The State constitution prescribed the qualifications of voters, and as to evidence the report says:

> Under these constitutional provisions, the burden of proof, when either party insists that a vote should be deducted from those cast and returned for his competitor, is upon that party to show that the person whose vote is in question voted; that the vote was for the competitor; that the voter lacked some one of the following qualifications.

(b) As to the effect and sufficiency of certain testimony of voters, the report says:

> Another question of importance which has arisen in the discussion of the cause is the question whether evidence of the declarations of alleged voters, made not under oath, in the country, should be received to show the fact that they voted, or for whom, or that they were not legally entitled to vote.
> Some of the committee think that such evidence ought in no case to be admitted, except, of course, so far as declarations made at the time of the party's intent or understanding as to his then present residence, or his purpose in a removal, is admissible as part of the res gestae. All of the committee are of opinion that such evidence is to be received with the greatest caution, to be resorted to only when no better is to be had, and only acted on when the declarations are clearly proved, and are themselves clear and satisfactory. As this question has been quite fully considered, it may be proper briefly to discuss it here.
> While the practice of the English House of Commons is not uniform, the general current of the precedents is in favor of admitting the declaration of voters as evidence.
> The opinions of several American courts and of some text writers of approved authority are the same way. The correctness of this practice has been earnestly questioned in this House, and there is one decision against it; but, on the whole, the practice here seems to be in favor of its admission. In England, where the vote for members of Parliament is viva voce, the fact that the alleged voter voted, and for whom, is susceptible commonly of easy proof by the record. In one case, however, where the poll list had been lost, the parol declaration of a voter how he voted seems to have been received without question. In State v. Olin (23 Wis., 319) it is stated that the declaration of a voter is admissible to prove that he voted, and for whom, as well as to prove his disqualification. The general doctrine is usually put upon the ground that the voter is a party to the proceeding, and his declarations against the validity of his vote are to be admitted against him as such. If this were true, it would be quite clear that his declarations ought not to be received until he is first shown, aliunde, not only to have voted, but to have voted for the party against whom he is called. Otherwise it would be in the power of an illegal voter to neutralize wrongfully 2 of the votes cast for a political opponent—first, by voting for his own candidate; second, by asserting to some witness afterwards that he voted the other way, and so having his vote deducted from the party against whom it was cast.

But it is not true that a voter is a party in any such sense as that his declarations are admissible on that ground. He is not a party to the record. His interest is not legal or personal. It is frequently of the slightest possible nature. If he were a party, then his admissions should be competent as to the whole case—as to the votes of others, the conduct of the election officers, etc., which it is well settled they are not. Another reason given is that the inquiry is of a public nature and that it should not be limited to the technical rules of evidence established for private causes. This is doubtless true. It is an inquiry of a public nature and an inquiry of the highest interest and consequence to the public. Some rules of evidence applicable to such an inquiry must be established. It is nowhere, so far as we know, claimed that in any other particular the ordinary rules of evidence should be relaxed in the determination of election cases. The sitting Member is a party deeply interested in the establishment of his right to an honorable office. The people of the district, especially, and the people of the whole country are interested in the question who shall have a voice in framing the laws. The votes are received by election officers, who see the voter in person, who acts publicly in the presence of the people, who may administer an oath to the person offering to vote, and who are themselves sworn to the performance of their duties. The judgment of these officers ought not to be reversed and the grave interests of the people imperiled by the admissions of persons not under oath and admitting their own misconduct.

The practice of admitting this kind of evidence originated in England. So far as it has been adopted in this country it has been without much discussion of the reasons on which it was founded. In England, as has been said, the vote was viva voce. The fact that the party voted, and for whom, was susceptible of easy and undisputable proof by the record. The privilege of voting for members of Parliament was a franchise of considerable dignity, enjoyed by few. It commonly depended on the ownership of a freehold, the title to which did not, as with us, appear on public registries, but would be seriously endangered by admissions of the freeholder which disparaged it. An admission by the voter of his own want of qualification was therefore ordinarily an admission against his right to a special and rare franchise, and an admission which seriously impaired his title to his real estate, an admission so strongly against the interest of the party making it would seldom be made unless it was true. It furnishes no analogy for a people who regard voting not as a privilege of the few, but as the right of all; where the vote, instead being viva voce, is studiously protected from publicity, and where such admissions, instead of having every probability in favor of their truth, may so easily be made the means of accomplishing great injustice and fraud, without fear either of detection or punishment.

It may be said that the principle of the secret ballot protects the voter from disclosing how he voted, and, in the absence of power to compel him to testify and furnish the best evidence, renders the resort to other evidence necessary. The committee are not prepared to admit that the policy which shields the vote of the citizen from being made known without his consent is of more importance than an inquiry into the purity and result of the election itself. If it is, it can not protect the illegal voter from disclosing how he voted. If it is, it would be quite doubtful whether the same policy should not prevent the use of the machinery of the law to discover and make public the fact in whatever way it may be proved. It is the publicity of the vote, not the interrogation of the voter in regard to it, that the secret ballot is designed to prevent. There would seem to be no need to resort to hearsay evidence on this ground, unless the voter has first been called, and, being interrogated, asserts his privilege and refuses to answer. Even in that case, a still more conclusive objection to hearsay testimony of this character is this: It is not at all likely to be either true or trustworthy.

The rule that admits secondary evidence when the best can not be had only admits evidence which can be relied on to prove the fact, as sworn copies when an original is lost, or the testimony of a witness to the contents of a lost instrument. Hearsay evidence is not admitted in such cases, and is only admitted in cases where hearsay evidence is, in the ordinary experience of mankind, found to be generally correct, as in matters of pedigree and the like. But a man who is so anxious to conceal how he voted as to refuse to disclose it on oath, even when the disclosure is demanded in the interest of public justice, and who is presumed to have voted fraudulently—for otherwise, in most cases, the inquiry is of no consequence—would be quite as likely to have made false statements on the subject, if he had made any. To permit such statements to be received, to overcome the judgment of the election officers, who admit the vote publicly, in the face of a challenge, and with the right to scrutinize the voter, would seem to be exceedingly dangerous.

The action of the House heretofore does not seem to have been so decided or uniform as to preclude it from now acting upon what may seem to it the reasonable rule, even if it should think it best to reject this claw of evidence wholly. But as both parties have taken their evidence, apparently with the expectation that this class of evidence would be received, and as, in view of the numerous and respectable authorities, it is not unlikely the House may follow the English rule, we have applied that to the evidence, with the limitation, of the reasonableness of which it would seem there can be no question, that evidence of hearsay declarations of the voter can only be acted upon when the fact that he voted has been shown by evidence aliunde, and when the declarations have been clearly proved, and are themselves clear and satisfactory.

886. The case of Cessna v. Meyers, continued.

Discussion of the meaning of the words "residence" and "domicile" as related to the qualifications of a voter.

Persons working on a railroad and expecting to go thence on the completion of the work may nevertheless be considered as having a voting residence.

Sojourners in a place for the sole purpose of study at a college may or may not have a legal residence therein.

Discussion of the law of residence as applied to paupers.

On the merits of the case the committee settled certain legal principles, as determining the result. The constitution of Pennsylvania provided as follows:

Article III, section 1. In elections by the citizens every (white) freeman of the age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State one year, and in the election district where he offers to vote ten days immediately preceding such election, and within two years paid a State or county tax, which shall have been assessed at least ten days before the election, shall enjoy the rights of an elector. But a citizen of the United States who had previously been a qualified voter of this State, and removed therefrom and returned, and who shall have resided in the election district and paid taxes as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote after residing in the State six months: Provided, That (white) freemen citizens of the United States, between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-two years, and having resided in the State one year and in the election district ten days as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote although they shall not have paid taxes.

Interpreting this constitution the committee took the following grounds as to the law of domicile:

It is claimed by the contestant that a considerable number of those who voted for his competitor lacked the qualification of residence in the election district. The largest number to whom this objection applies came into the election district for the purpose of working upon a railroad in process of construction therein, were employed in building said railroad, and were not proved to have formed any intention to reside in the district after its completion. The length of time which the completion of the road would be likely to occupy was not distinctly proved, but it was shown that persons who were in fact at work upon it continued in the district for a longer period than eighteen months. The committee have carefully considered the legal question which is thus raised.

The word "residence" used in the constitution of Pennsylvania in describing the qualification of voters is equivalent to "domicile," not in the sense in which a man may have a commercial domicile or residence in one country while his domicile of origin and of allegiance is in another, but in the broadest sense of the term. As it is upon the meaning of this word that the case chiefly turns, it will be well to consider it a little more fully.

The word "domicile," or "residence," as used in law, is incapable of exact definition. Inquiries into it are very apt to be confused by taking the tests which have been found satisfactory in some cases and attempting to apply them as inflexible rules in all. Probably the definition which is most expressive to the American mind is that a man's domicile is "where he has his home." Two or three rules, however, are well established. A man must have a domicile somewhere; a domicile once gained remains until a new one is acquired; no man can have two domiciles at the same time. With these exceptions, it will, we believe, be found that nearly every rule laid down on the subject in the books, even if generally useful, fails to be of universal application, and would be opposed to the common sense of mankind if extended to some states of fact that may arise. For instance, Vattel defines domicile to be a fixed residence in any place with an intention of always staying there. On this Judge Story (Conflict of Laws, sec. 43) well remarks:

"This is not an accurate statement. It would be more correct to say that that place is properly the domicile of a person in which his habitation is fixed without any present intention of removing therefrom."

But certainly Judge Story's definition is not much better. A man's domicile remains after he forms the intention of removing therefrom, and sometimes even after he removes, until he gets another. A man may acquire a domicile, if he be personally present in a place and elect that as his home, even if he never design to remain there always, but design at the end of some short time to remove and acquire another. A clergyman of the Methodist Church, who is settled for two years, may surely make his home for two yews with his flock, although he meant, at the end of that period, to remove and gain another. So of the principle upon which the contestant most relies in the present case.

He claims—and many expressions can be found used by commentators and in judicial decisions which seem to support the claim—that personal presence in a place with intent to remain there only for a limited time and for the accomplishment of a temporary purpose, and to depart when that purpose is accomplished, will not constitute a residence. This is true as a general rule. It is true of those persons, probably the greater number, who, while so present and engaged in business, have some other principal seat of their interests and affections elsewhere. Most men have some permanent home, the claim of which outweigh those of a place of temporary sojourn. The place where a man's property is, where his family is, the place to which he goes back from time to time whenever no temporary occasion calls him elsewhere, the domicile of his origin, where the permanent and ordinary business of his life is conducted—that is to the ordinary man the place of his home. But we are now dealing with a claw of persons who have no property, who have no family, or whose family moves with them from place to place, who have no place to return to from temporary absences, the domicile of whose origin is in another country, and has been in the most solemn manner renounced, and the ordinary business of whose life consists in successive temporary employments in different places.

Suppose a man, single, with no property, to come from Ireland and be employed all his life on railroads or other like works in different places in succession. If he does not acquire a residence he can never become a citizen, because he never would reside in this country at all. It seems to us that to such persons the general rule above stated does not apply. But where a man who has no interests or relations in life which afford a presumption that his home is elsewhere, comes into an election district for the purpose of working on a railroad for a definite or an indefinite period, being without family or having his family with him, expecting that the question whether he shall remain or go elsewhere is to depend upon the chances of his obtaining work, having abandoned, both in fact and in intention, all former residences, and intends to make that his home while his work lasts—that will constitute his residence, both for the purpose of such jurisdiction over him as residence confers and for the purpose of exercising his privileges as a citizen. Of course the intent above supposed must be in good faith and an intent to make such district the home for all purposes. The party's intent to vote in the district where he is, he knowing all the time that his home is elsewhere, will not answer the law.

The rule is stated by Chief Justice Shaw, in Lyman v. Fiske (5 Peck, 234) as follows: "It is difficult to give an exact definition of habitancy. In general terms, one may be designated as an inhabitant of that place which constitutes the principal seat of his residence, of his business pursuits, connections, attachments, and of his political and municipal relations. It is manifest, therefore, that it embraces the fact of residence at a place with the intent to regard it his home. The act and the intent must concur, and the intent may be inferred from declarations and conduct. It is often a question of great difficulty, depending upon minute and complicated circumstances, leaving the question in so much doubt that a slight circumstance may turn the balance. In such a case the mere declaration of the party, made in good faith, of his election to make the one place rather than the other his home, would be sufficient to turn the scale."

The article in the appendix to volume 4 of Doctor Lieber's Encyclopedia Americana, title Domicile written by Judge Story, is, perhaps, the best treatise on this subject to be found. He says: "In a strict and legal sense, that is properly the domicile of a person where he has fixed his true, permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning." It is often mere question of intention. If a person has actually removed to another place, with an intention of remaining there for an indefinite time and as a place of present domicile, it becomes his place of domicile, notwithstanding he may have a floating intention to go back at some future period. A fortiori would this be true if his "floating intention" were to go elsewhere in future and not to go back, as in such case the abandonment of his former home would be complete.

In the Allentown election case (Brightly's Lead. Cases on Elections, 475) it is said: "Unmarried men, who have fully severed the parental relation, and who have entered the world to labor for themselves, usually acquire a residence in the district where they are employed, if the election officers be satisfied they are honestly there pursuing their employment, with no fixed residence elsewhere, and that they have not come into the district as 'colonizers,' that is, for the mere purpose of voting, and going elsewhere as soon as the election is held." "The unmarried man who seeks employment from point to point, as opportunity offers, and who has severed the parental relation, becomes a laborer, producing for himself, and thus adds to the productive wealth of the community in which he resides, being willing not only to enjoy political privileges, but also to assume and discharge political and civil duties." A fortiori would this reasoning apply to the married laborer who takes his family with him.

The habits of our people, compared with many other nations, are migratory. To persons, especially young men, in many most useful occupations the choice of a residence is often experimental and temporary. The home is chosen with intent to retain it until the opportunity shall offer of a better. But if it be chosen as a home, and not as a mere place of temporary sojourn, to which some other place, which is more truly the principal seat of the affections or interests, has superior claim, we see not why the policy of the law should not attach to it all the privileges which belong to residence, as it is quite clear that it is the residence in the common and popular acceptation of the term.

The case of Barnes v. Adams (3 Con. El. Cas., 771) does not, when carefully examined, conflict with these rules. The passage cited from that case is not a statement of the grounds on which the House or even the committee determined the case, but a concession to the party against whom it was decided. It therefore, if it bore the meaning contended for, would not be authority in future cases. But the language taken together, it seem to us, means only that going into an election precinct for a temporary purpose, with the intent to leave it when that purpose is accomplished, no other intent and no other fact appearing, is not enough to gain a residence. In this view, it is not in conflict with the opinion here expressed.

It is true that, as was remarked in the outset, a former residence continues until a new one is gained. But in determining the question whether a new one has been gained, the fact that everything which constituted the old one—dwelling house, personal presence, business relations, intent to remain—has been abandoned is a most significant fact.

The above principles are then applied.

(a) To a class of railroad laborers and contractors—

The cases of the railroad laborers and contractors should be disposed of by the following rules:

1. Where no other fact appears than that a person, otherwise qualified, came into the election district for the purpose of working on the railroad for an indefinite period, or until it should be completed, and voted at the election, it may or may not be true that his residence was in the district. His vote having been accepted by the election officers, and the burden being on the other side to show that they erred, we are not warranted in deducting the vote.

2. Where, in addition, it appears that such voter had no dwelling house elsewhere, had his family with him, and himself considered the voting place as his home until his work on the railroad should be over, we consider his residence in the district affirmatively established.

3. On the other hand, where it appears that he elected to retain a home, or left a family or a dwelling place elsewhere, or any other like circumstances appear, negativing a residence in the voting precinct, the vote should be deducted from the candidate for whom it is proved to have been cast.

(b) As to certain students—

The principles applicable to the students are not dissimilar. The law, as it applies to this class of persons, is fully and admirably stated by the supreme court of Massachusetts, in an opinion given to the legislature, and reported in Fifth Metcalf, and which is cited with approbation in nearly all the subsequent discussions of the subject. Under the rule there laid down, the fact that the citizen came into the place where he claims a residence for the sole purpose of pursuing his studies at a school or college there situate, and has no design of remaining there after his studies terminate, is not necessarily inconsistent with a legal residence, or want of legal residence, in such place. This is to be determined by all the circumstances of each case. Among such circumstances the intent of the party, the existence or absence of other ties or interests elsewhere, the dwelling place of the parents, or, in the case of an orphan just of age, of such near friends as he had been accustomed to make his home with in his minority, would of course be of the highest importance. (See Putnam v. Johnson, 10 Mass., 488.)

(c) As to paupers—

The case of the paupers presents greater difficulty. Under the laws of Pennsylvania it is conceded they may be entitled to vote. In several contested election cases cited by the contestant it is stated by the committee that, in the absence of statute regulations on the subject, a pauper abiding in a public almshouse, locally situated in a different district from that where he dwells when he becomes a pauper, and by which he is supported, away from his original home, does not thereby change his residence, but is held constructively to remain at his old home. (Monroe v. Jackson, 2 Elect. Cas., 98; Covode v. Foster, Forty-first Congress; Taylor v. Reading, Forty-first Congress.)

And there are some strong reasons for this opinion. The pauper is under a species of confinement. He must submit to regulations imposed by others, and the place of his abode may be changed without his consent. Having few of the other elements which ordinarily make up a domicile, the element of choice also in his case almost wholly disappears. There are also serious reasons of expediency against permitting a class of persons who are necessarily so dependent upon the will of one public officer to vote in a town or district in whose concerns they have no interest. On the other hand, the pauper's right to vote is recognized by law. It can practically very seldom be exercised except in the near neighborhood of the almshouse. In the case of a person so poor and helpless as to expect to be a lifelong inmate of the poorhouse it is, in every sense in which the word can be used, really and truly his residence—his home. And it is important that these constitutional provisions as to suffrage should be carried out in their simplest and most natural sense, without the introduction of artificial or technical construction. It will, however, be unnecessary to determine this question, as will hereinafter appear.

In accordance with these conclusions the committee reported that the sitting Member, Mr. Meyers, was entitled to hold his seat, and a resolution to that effect was presented.

On March 12 [1] the report was debated and the resolution of the committee was agreed to without division.

887. The Alabama election case of Norris v. Handley in the Forty-second Congress.

The House can not be precluded from going behind the returns by the fact that a State law gives canvassers the right to reject votes for fraud or illegality.

[1] Journal, p. 495; Globe, p. 1610.

The decision of a board of canvassers as to the legality of votes, made in pursuance of State law, is regarded as prima facie correct.

It is an extraordinary and dangerous policy for a State law to lodge in canvassing officers the power to reject votes.

General testimony that voters were deceived by false tickets, etc., does not, in the absence of specific proof, justify the rejection of a poll.

General intimidation may not be proven solely by hearsay and general reputation without specific testimony of the voters.

A comparison of the votes cast with the population may be admitted as bearing on the question of intimidation.

On March 14, 1872[1] Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, from the Committee of Elections, presented the report of the committee in the contested case of Norris v. Handley, of Alabama. The sitting Member had been returned by a certified majority of 3,142. The contestant alleged that this majority had been procured by fraud, violence, and intimidation.

At the outset the committee discuss a question as to the power of canvassing officers:

> The statute of Alabama, defining the powers and duties of the board of county canvassers or supervisors of elections, provides as follows:
> "That it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors of elections, upon good and sufficient evidence that fraud has been perpetrated or unlawful or wrongful means resorted to to prevent electors from freely and fearlessly casting their ballots, to reject such illegal or fraudulent votes cast at any such polling place, which rejection so made as aforesaid shall be final unless appeal is taken within ten days to the probate court." (Acts of 1868, p. 277, sec. 37.)
> Another section provides that this "board of supervisors of elections "shall be composed of the judge of probate, sheriff, and clerk of the circuit court in each county.
> In the opinion of the committee it is not competent for the legislature of a State to declare what shall or shall not be considered by the House of Representatives as evidence to show the actual votes cast in any district for a Member of Congress, much less to declare that the decision of a board of county canvassers, rejecting a given vote, shall stop the House from further inquiry. The fact, therefore, that no appeal was taken from the decision of the board of canvassers, rejecting the vote of Girard precinct, can not preclude the House from going behind the returns and considering the effect of the evidence presented.

The committee in another place comment again on this power lodged with the board of canvassers:

> Although this is an extraordinary, not to say a dangerous, power when placed in the hands of a board of this character, with such inadequate facilities for obtaining legal evidence and deciding upon questions of fraud, yet it is believed by the committee that the action of such a board, under the statute in question and in pursuance of the power conferred thereby, is to be regarded as prima facie Correct, and to be allowed to stand as valid until shown by evidence to be illegal or unjust.

Having thus discussed the powers of the canvassing officers under the law, the committee considers their action in rejecting certain returns from Macon County.

> The testimony of but one witness has been taken in relation to the rejection of these votes in Macon County, and that is the testimony of J. T. Menafee, judge of probate, and ex officio one of the board of canvassers. He testifies that the board spent several days in the work of revising the vote of the county.
> They had no evidence before them, however, except the registration list and the poll list. The former is shown to have been exceedingly imperfect and unreliable and can not be considered such

[1] Second session Forty-second Congress, House Report No. 33; Smith, p. 68.

"good and sufficient evidence" as the statute requires to justify the board in rejecting the votes in question.

The presumption is strongly in favor of the legality of a vote which has been received by the officers provided by law for that purpose; and the question is whether this presumption can be overcome by evidence so unsatisfactory as that upon which the board acted. The board were empowered by the statute we have quoted to obtain evidence of the alleged illegality and fraud practiced at the precincts named, and they were not limited to an examination of the registration list and the poll list. Since no evidence was taken it is our opinion that the decision of the officers of election at the various precincts, admitting the votes in question, is entitled to greater weight than the action of the board of canvassers in throwing them out. The former had the voters before them and the power to examine them as to their qualifications, while the latter, in our judgment, had no reliable evidence before them upon which to act.

The contestant had asked that 325 votes be stricken from sitting Member's return for Silver Run, Russell County, on the ground that 325 voters who would have voted for contestant were deceived into voting for sitting Member. In support of this several witnesses testified what they had heard or read in the newspapers; others gave their opinions as to the proportion of black and white people who voted. One witness swore that he saw tickets of sitting Member's party headed with the name of contestant's party and believed that the freedmen were deceived thereby. As to this the committee say:

When, however, an attempt is made to say, from the evidence before us, with anything like accuracy, how many voters, if any, were in this manner deceived, it will be found impossible. If the facts be as contestant claim, it was within his power to prove them by evidence, at least, reasonably satisfactory. He should have proven the number of votes cast, and for whom cast, by the returns, or a certified copy thereof. He should have shown the names of the persons who voted by the poll list, and he should have called the voters themselves, or some of them, to prove how many and who intended to vote for him and were defrauded by being furnished a ticket resembling the Republican ticket, but containing the name of the sitting Member as a candidate for Congress. As the evidence is presented to us, it would not justify any action unless it might possibly be the rejection of the vote of the precinct, which would vary the general result by only 140 votes. If there was a fraud perpetrated, and we are inclined to the opinion, from the scanty evidence before us, that there was, it is utterly impossible to determine how many votes contestant lost and his competitor gained thereby.

In accordance with the principles set forth as above, the committee purged the returns, but found that there still remained a majority of nearly 2,000 votes for sitting Member.

There remained, then, a question as to violence and intimidation, alleged by contestant, which became the material question of the case. The committee say at the outset:

Upon this subject it is to be observed, in the first place, that the evidence is exceedingly vague and unsatisfactory. It would seem that if over two thousand electors were deterred from voting by violence, threats, or intimidation, some of these electors could be found to come forward and swear to the fact. Your committee think that it would establish a most dangerous precedent to allow a fact of this character, so easily established by the direct and positive testimony of so many witnesses, to be proven solely by hearsay and general reputation. We have not forgotten nor overlooked the fact that the same state of things which would make men afraid to vote for a particular party might also make it difficult to secure testimony in behalf of that party. But in many parts of the district where testimony, was taken there is no pretense that witnesses were intimidated; and, besides, if the contestant had shown to the satisfaction of the House that witnesses needed the protection of the Federal Government in order to be safe in testifying fully and freely, that protection would have been afforded at any cost. In the volume of testimony taken to prove the fact of general and wide-spread intimidation, not one witness is found who testifies that he himself was prevented from voting by reason of intimidation. They all testify to what they have heard others say, to the common rumor, and general reputation. There can be no doubt that testimony of this character ought to be held insufficient of itself to establish the fact of intimidation. It ought at least to be corroborated by other facts, such as the unexplained failure of large numbers of those alleged to have been intimidated, to vote, before the House could safely act upon it.

Nevertheless the committee considered the evidence, and determined that it fell short of sustaining the contestant's allegations. It appeared that there was no phenomenal suppression of the vote in the district, since a comparison of the vote with the population, tested in the light of the usual ratio of voters to population, showed that the total vote fell short of what might have been expected by only 581 persons. This effectually disproved, taken with the weakness of the direct testimony, the contention that 2,000 or more voters were deterred from voting. In conclusion the committee say:

It must not be supposed that the committee have overlooked or failed to consider the fact that gross wrongs and outrages are shown by the evidence to have been inflicted upon some of the freedmen in the district in question. Threats were undoubtedly made against this class of voters of personal injury or dismissal from employment in case they voted the Republican ticket, and these threats were carried out after the election, in several instances at least, in the brutal whipping of a number of freedmen in the night time by disguised men, and by the dismissal of others from employment. Several churches, occupied by freedmen for worship, were prior to the election burned down. Several cases of apparently unprovoked murder are in proof, and several cases of shooting and wounding. A white woman, who had been a teacher among the freedmen, was compelled to flee in the night time from her home, and a freedman who was a preacher among his people was at the same time brutally murdered. Other cases similar in character are in proof, and it does not appear that the perpetrators of a single one of these outrages have ever been tried or punished, or that any vigorous or determined effort has been made to apprehend or punish any of the criminals. These crimes were well calculated to alarm and intimidate the colored people, and it must be said to their great credit that, in spite of all the dangers and difficulties, the great body of them did in fact exercise their right to vote, many of them traveling 10, 15, and even 20 miles from their homes for that purpose. These outrages, therefore, do not invalidate the election, because they did not intimidate the freedmen. We call attention to them now, to denounce them as most infamous, and to show that they have not escaped our attention.

The committee therefore, in view of the conclusions reached by them, recommended a resolution declaring:

Resolved, That W. A. Handley is entitled to retain his seat in this House as Representative from the Third district of Alabama.

On April 4 [1] this resolution, after an explanatory speech by Mr. McCrary, was agreed to without division.

888. The Indiana election case of Gooding v. Wilson, in the Forty-second Congress.

Official and formal counts should be set aside on subsequent, informal, and unofficial counts only when the ballots are inviolably kept and the subsequent count is safeguarded.

A vote being admitted should not be rejected on evidence that merely throws a doubt on it.

Should the fact that judges of election are not freeholders as required by law impair their acts as de facto officers?

[1] Journal, p. 631; Globe, p. 2172.

Does the absence from the returns of certificates prescribed by law vitiate an election of which the result may be known from other legal returns?

As to the sufficiency of ballots bearing only the last name of the candidate.

On April 9, 1872,[1] Mr. Aaron F. Perry, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority of the committee in the Indiana contested case of Gooding v. Wilson. The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 4 votes. Contestant assailed this result on two grounds: The correctness of the count and the legality of certain votes.

(1) As to the correctness of the count, the majority report says:

> The proof of these mistakes, all except one, consists in evidence of subsequent informal and unofficial counts, made at a considerable time after the election; and as to the one exception, the proof, if such it can be called, is even less satisfactory.
> On examination of precedents, it does not appear that this House favors the setting aside of official and formal counts, made with all the safeguards required by law, on evidence only of subsequent informal and unofficial counts, without such safeguards. No instance was cited at the hearing where the person entitled by the official count was deprived of his seat by a subsequent unofficial count. On principle it would seem that if such a thing were, in the absence of fraud in the official count, in any case admissible, it should be permitted only when the ballot boxes had been so kept as to be conclusive of the identity of the ballots, and when the subsequent count was made with safeguards equivalent to those provided by law. In the absence of either of these conditions, the proof, as mere matter of fact and without reference to statutory rules, would be less reliable and therefore insufficient.
> In the present case both of these conditions are wanting. The ballot boxes were not kept in a way to be conclusive of the identity of the ballots, nor were the subsequent counts conducted in a way to entitle them to credit as against the official count.
> The statute of Indiana requires at each poll, in addition to other officers, an officer called an inspector, who is required to preserve the ballots, one poll book, and a tally paper six months after the election, except when such election is contested; then they shall be preserved, subject to the order of any court trying such contest, until the same is determined. The official count appears to have been a careful one. The three unofficial counts differed each from the other, and all differed from the official one. Neither of the unofficial counts was made under circumstances to command confidence as against the official count.

In the debate[2] Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, elaborated this more fully:

> I do say that there is great danger in setting aside the official count and substituting for it an unofficial count in any case. * * * In the first place, if the law provides an officer whose duty it is to hold possession of the ballot boxes and the ballots themselves after the polls have been closed, I think that no recount should ever be allowed unless it appear that the ballot boxes and ballots had remained in the custody of that officer during the interval between the election and the recount. That ought always to be one of the prerequisites, and without it there can be neither certainty nor safety. * * * It must appear that the ballots have been securely kept, that they have not been exposed, and that there has been no opportunity to tamper with them. This ought to appear affirmatively. * * * If the law provides the mode of preserving the ballots, and of having them recounted, that mode should in every case be strictly followed. * * * Now, in the State of Indiana there is such a law. * * * Now, Mr. Speaker, this law was violated in the case of every one of these recounts. They should have subpoenaed before the court trying the contest in this case the inspector of the election, who was the legal custodian of the ballot box, and should have shown by his testimony that the ballot box had remained in his possession, and had been so securely and carefully kept that it could not have been tampered with. The identity of the ballots must always be shown by the legal custodian of them. * * * The House can not depend upon a recount made by any outsider who goes surreptitiously or otherwise and gets possession of the ballot box. It must be done in the presence of the court or of an officer. * * * In this case neither of the things has been done.

---

The minority views, presented by Mr.,W. E. Arthur, of Kentucky, did not argue this point at length, but in the debate,[1] Mr. Arthur went into the precedents of the House at length to justify the recounts. In reply it was asserted that while committee reports had sometimes justified an unofficial count, the House had never acted upon the result of such recount.[2]

There was also a difference, of opinion as to the sufficiency of the testimony on the custody of the ballots and the carefulness of the unofficial recount.

A second question related to legality of certain votes cast for sitting Member. The majority of the committee thus dispose of this point:

Most of the questions were questions of residence or nonresidence. Evidence which might have been sufficient to put the voter to his explanation, if challenged at the polls, is not deemed sufficient to prove a vote illegal after it has been admitted. Nor has the mere statement by a witness that a voter was or was not a resident, without giving facts to justify his opinion, been considered sufficient to throw out such a vote. The testimony shows a number of instances where a witness would state positively the residence or nonresidence of a voter on some theory of his own, or some mistake of fact, when other testimony would show with entire clearness that the vote was legal. The adoption of laxer rules of evidence would affect both sides, and change the result very little, if at all. After a vote has been admitted, something more is required to prove it illegal than to throw doubt upon it. There ought to be proof which, weighed by the ordinary rules of evidence, satisfies and convinces the mind that a mistake has been made, and which the House can rest upon as a safe precedent for like cases. In regard to most of the alleged illegal votes on both sides, the proof, however plausible, falls short of the requirement.

In accordance with the principles set forth in its report, the majority of the committee find for sitting Member a clear majority of 8 votes.

This did not render it necessary for the majority of the committee to investigate certain objections made by the sitting Member to returns and votes affecting the poll of the contestant.

The minority, as part of their argument—

(1) The minority views say:

Contestee has alleged and proved that some one or more of the acting judges of election at the following-named precincts were not at the time freeholders; that they were therefore ineligible; and that the entire vote and return of such precincts must be rejected, to wit: [Here follows an enumeration of 20 precincts.]

And contestee has insisted that the question of ineligibility involved in these specifications is decisive of the case in his favor. By excluding the entire vote of the legal voters of those 20 precincts he claims his majority will then be more than 300 over contestant, even if "other matters attempted to be proven for contestant be taken in his favor."

The officers all acted under appointment; all acted in good faith; were all sworn; no objection at the time was raised; no other person claimed the position, and the entire people acquiesced in their official acts.

The law of Indiana required that every judge of election should be a freeholder.

Under the circumstances above recited, if a person acted as a judge of election who at the time was ineligible to that position, for want of the qualification required by the statute, must the election of that precinct for that cause be held void, and the votes and returns be set aside and rejected?

[2] Speech of Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, Globe, p. 2667.

Contestee says yes, and appeals to the law and the precedents. We say no; and we go further, and say that the great preponderance of both law and precedent is on the side of the negative of that question. The result of a very patient investigation of the election cases of this House is the conclusion on our part that the rule is substantially that—

Ineligibility or want of statutory qualification on the part of an officer of election, otherwise capable, and acting in good faith, and with the acquiescence of the voting public, will not, of itself, vitiate or impair the poll or return. (Barnes v. Adams, Dig. El. C., 760; Eggleston v. Strader, ibid., 897.)

(3) As to the certificate of a certain precinct:

1. Contestee alleged and proved that the law of the State of Indiana required the board of judges of the election to make out an attested certificate in written words of the number of votes each person received, etc., and return the same, together with the list of voters, and one of the tally papers, to the county board; and that the board of judges of West precinct, township of Hendricks, county of Shelby, failed to return such certificate. The proof shows that this failure was an innocent inadvertence. The poll lists, tally papers, and ballots were all properly returned, and are unimpeached.

Contestee insists that the omission of that certificate vitiates that poll, and that the returns and votes of that precinct should be rejected from the count. And he insists upon it with great confidence, and cites authorities in support of the position, all of which we have carefully examined.

We respectfully submit that his authorities do not sustain his position in this case. And these, when carefully considered, along with those numerous other authorities directly in point, to which he has not referred, have brought us to a conclusion directly the opposite of that insisted on by contestee.

Is such a certificate indispensable? We say it is not, and so say the authorities. The rule as established by the courts and by the precedents of the House is substantially as follows:

In the absence of the certificate prescribed by law, recourse will be had to the poll lists, the ballots, or other returns; and if from these, or any of them, the result can be ascertained, and there is no taint of fraud, effect will be given to the result precisely as though the certificate was present. (Chrisman v. Anderson, 2 El. C., 331–334; Blair v. Barrett, 2 El. C., 315.)

(4) As to the sufficiency of a ballot:

At the precinct in the township of Brandywine, county of Shelby, two ballots were counted for contestee which had on them for Congress merely the letters "Wilson." On their face the ballots were ambiguous and unintelligible. The defect was curable by extrinsic evidence to explain and apply them; it has not been offered, and the defect is fatal to both ballots, and they are deducted from contestee's vote in this count.

The minority, in accordance with their conclusion, found for contestant a majority of 17 votes, and accordingly recommended the following as a substitute for the resolution of the majority:

Resolved, That Jeremiah M. Wilson was not duly elected and is not entitled to the seat in the Forty-second Congress from the Fourth district of the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That David S. Gooding was duly elected and is entitled to the seat in the Forty-second Congress from the Fourth district of the State of Indiana, and should be admitted to his seat.

On April 22[1] the report was debated at length, and the proposition of the minority was negatived, yeas 64, nays 105. Then the majority resolution was agreed to without division, and sitting Member retained the seat.

889. The election case of Burleigh and Spink v. Armstrong, from Dakota Territory, in the Forty-second Congress.

The House rejected votes cast at a precinct on an Indian reservation which was by law excluded from the domain of a Territory.

The House counted votes cast at a precinct within a military reservation tion of which the title and jurisdiction were temporarily with the United States by Executive order.

On April 12, 1872,[1] Mr. M. M. Merrick, of Maryland, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Burleigh and Spink v. Armstrong, of Dakota Territory. The official returns gave Spink 1,023 votes, Burleigh 1,102, and Armstrong 1,198. Accordingly the certificate was issued to Mr. Armstrong, and he was sworn in.

The first question which arose was as to the legality of certain votes cast upon United States military reservations:

> By the law organizing the Territory of Dakota (12 Stat. L., p. 239) it is provided that the Territory of Dakota shall not include any territory which, by treaty with any Indian tribe, is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the Territory of Dakota until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included in said Territory, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulations respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent for the Government to make if the act had been passed. It is quite apparent from the terms of this organic act that it was not competent for the authorities of the Territory to hold an election or exercise any other jurisdictional act within any part of the Indian reservations embraced within the exterior bounds of the Territory, and the proof establishing the fact that the Buffalo, or Fort Thompson, precinct was established, and the election there held within an existing Indian reservation, the committee have excluded all the votes cast there from their computation. But with regard to the election held within the military reservations of Fort Sully and Fort Randall (or the Ellis precinct), the committee have reached the conclusion that there is nothing in the terms of the organic act nor in the general policy of the law forbidding an election to be held at such places. The contestants have insisted that the rule which disqualifies persons from voting within any State, who reside within forts or other territory to which the title and jurisdiction has been ceded by the State to the Federal Government, applies to the military reservations which have been designated by the Executive within the Territories belonging to the United States. But forasmuch as there is no conflict of sovereignty between the Government and the Territory, and the latter holds all its jurisdiction in subordination to the controlling power of Congress, and the military reservations are not permanently severed from the body of the public lands, but are simply set apart and withheld from private ownership by an Executive order to the Commissioner of the Land Office, and may be and often are restored to the common stock of the public domain, when the occasion for their temporary occupancy has ceased, at the pleasure of Congress, and which requires no concurrent act of any State authority to give it efficacy, the residents upon such reservations, although abiding thereon by the mere sufferance of the United States authorities, do not in any just sense cease to be inhabitants or residents of the Territory within which such military reserve may be situated. Such residents seem to the committee to have that same general interest in the welfare of the community in which they live and the same right to vote there as any of the workmen at the arsenal or navy-yard in Washington City, who may be allowed to sojourn within their limits, have to vote at elections within the District of Columbia for officers of its Territorial government, or for a Delegate in Congress from that District.

As to charges of illegal voting by Indians and nonresidents, the committee found evidence of great irregularities, but the testimony failed to show that one candidate had profited more than another by them.

Therefore the committee reported a resolution confirming the title of sitting Delegate to the seat.

On January 22, 1873,[2] the resolution reported by the committee was agreed to without division.

890. The Florida election case of Niblack v. Walls in the Forty-second Congress.

Instance wherein the time of taking testimony in an election case was twice extended.

A return impeached by the evidence of an election officer is rejected as worthless and is not received for any purpose.

Returns impeached on their face and forwarded irregularly were not, counted by the House until explained by evidence.

The law requiring a return to be signed by three officers, at least two must sign to make the certificate evidence.

On January 21, 1873,[1] Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, from the Committee of Elections, submitted the report in the Florida case of Niblack v. Walls. The State canvassers had so certified the result as to show a majority of 629 for the sitting Member, but had reached this result by rejecting the returns from 8 counties, where the returns had given contestant a majority of 821 votes. By admissions and waivers the returns from 5 of these counties were admitted before the committee, so there were left in issue the counties of Lafayette, Manatee, and Brevard, where the returns gave contestant 335 votes and sitting Member 3 votes.

The time for taking testimony was twice extended—once on February 9, 1872,[2] so as "to take testimony within the period of sixty days after the passage of this act," and again on May 29, 1872,[3] in accordance with the resolution recited later.

(1) The first question which the committee considered arose from the returns of Lafayette County, which gave 152 votes for contestant and none for sitting Member. The county canvassers had rejected three of the precincts of the county and counted but two. Of the returns from this county the report says:

> This return is rendered worthless by the testimony of William D. Sears, sheriff of LaFayette County, and a member of the board of county canvassers.
> This witness swears that at New Troy precinct, which is one of the two precincts counted, there were at least 42 votes cast and counted out for the sitting Member; a fact he knows from having been present at the counting of the vote, and yet by the return every vote is given to contestant.
> The same facts, in substance, are shown by the evidence of Redden B. Hill, another member of the board of canvassers. (See pp. 11 to 14, inclusive, of evidence.)
> Other objections are raised to this return, but they need not be considered, for this testimony successfully impeaches it, and shows that it is tainted with fraud, and must therefore be rejected.
> We are left, then, to the inquiry, What votes have been proven by evidence outside of this return?
> Upon looking into the evidence upon this point, we find that there is no proof whatever as to the actual state of the vote at the precincts of New Troy and Summerville, which are the two which purport to have been included in said return, except the proof, already mentioned, that the sitting Member received at New Troy at least 42 votes. The vote of these two precincts, in which contestant claims 152 votes, must therefore be rejected, because the return is shown to be void for fraud, and no secondary evidence is offered to take its place.
> It is suggested by counsel that we might allow the 152 votes which, according to this return, were cast for contestant, and also allow the sitting Member the 42 votes which are shown to have been cast for him and not returned. But the committee hold that, it having been shown that the return is fraudulent and false in a matter so material as the suppression altogether of the whole of the sitting Member's vote, it can not be received for any purpose.

(2) As to Manatee County:

The returns from this county were thrown out for the following reasons:

First. Because the returns made by the county board, which by the statute are required to be duplicates, are not such. One return states that the board met and canvassed the votes "on the 29th day of November, 1870," while the other states that the board met and canvassed the vote "on the 1st day of December, 1870," and the former is dated November 29 and the latter December 1.

Second. Because the vote of said county was not canvassed and the returns made out and forwarded to the State officers authorized to receive them within twenty days from the day of election, as required by statute.

Third. Because said returns were not forwarded by mail, addressed to the secretary of state and governor, as expressly required by statute, but were in fact sent in an envelope addressed to contestant, by a private messenger, and delivered to, and opened by, one W. H. Pearce, of Polk County, who afterwards placed it in the hands of the board.

These objections were considered by your committee at the last session of Congress, and it was considered by the committee very desirable to obtain more reliable evidence as to the actual vote cast in this county.

It was thought that it would be unsafe to establish a precedent of accepting as evidence a return which, instead of being transmitted from the county to the State board by mail, as the law requires, was sent by the hand of a private individual, and by him delivered to one of the candidates, to be by him delivered to the State board.

Accordingly, your committee recommended and the House, on the 29th of May last, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the contested-election case of Niblack v. Walls be continued until the next session of this Congress, and that in the meantime the parties have leave to take further evidence as to what was the true vote cast in the counties of Brevard and Manatee, and Yellow Bluff precinct, in Duval County, and also as to whether the election in said counties and in said precinct was conducted fairly and according to law."

Under this resolution the sitting Member has taken no evidence, but the contestant has called and examined E. E. Mizell, county judge, and John F. Bartholf, clerk of Manatee County, and who were two of the three canvassing officers for that county.

These witnesses each identify a paper shown them as a true copy of the return as made out by them as canvassing officers.

The copy is identical with the return which was rejected by the State board, the difference of one day between the dates of the two papers filed as duplicates being considered immaterial.

This evidence seems to be sufficient to show that the returns from this county were not tampered with, and that, notwithstanding the irregular and illegal mode adopted for their transmission from the county to the State board, they are, in fact, correct and reliable.

This return is also certified (as well as sworn to) by the clerk of the county, who, by the statute of that State, is the legal custodian of the original record of the canvass.

(3) As to the signing of the returns of Brevard County:

The statute of Florida requires that the returns shall be signed by the judge of the county court, the clerk of the circuit court, and one justice of the peace.

The return from this county relied upon as proof of the vote of the county is signed by but one of these three officers, the county judge.

The committee are of opinion that where the law requires the certificate to be made by three officers, a majority at least must sign to make the certificate evidence.

This is not a merely technical rule; it is substantial, because the refusal or failure of a majority of the board to sign the return raises a presumption that it is not correct.

It is fair to infer that if it had been free from objection a majority of the board at least would have signed it.

It is enough, however, to say that the law requires the certificate of the three officers, and all the authorities agree that at least two must certify or the certificate is inadmissible.

Therefore, as contestant did not prove the vote, the committee declined to, count the votes alleged to have been cast.

891. The case of Niblack v. Walls, continued.

The rejection of an entire poll for intimidation on behalf of contestant may add to the injury if the return gave contestee a majority.

Evidence showing that a voter's due effort to vote was thwarted by intimidation on the vote should be counted as if cast.

Evidence tending to show intimidation may be disproved by the ratio of votes cast to population.

To justify the rejection of a poll for intimidation, the evidence should be specific, not general.

Disturbance at the polls does not in the absence of specific evidence as to the effect of intimidation justify rejection of the poll.

Instance of the seating of a contestant belonging to the party in minority in the House.

(4) A question as to intimidation arose as to several precincts. The evidence convinced the committee that there was an organized effort of contestant's friends at Quincy precinct, and that it was partially successful, to intimidate voters who proposed to vote for sitting Member. This intimidation was exercised at the polls on the day of election. The contestant insisted that the only remedy was the rejection of the poll. The report says, however:

> This remedy in the present case would only add to the injury, inasmuch as the sitting Member received a majority, and this shows the necessity of some other remedy.
> This is to be found in the rule, which is well settled, that where a legal voter offers to vote for a particular candidate, and uses due diligence in endeavoring to do so, and is prevented by fraud, violence, or intimidation from depositing his ballot, his vote should be counted. The principle is that the offer to vote is equivalent to voting.

In two other precincts there was some evidence tending to show intimidation, but as from the ratio of votes cast to population, no unusual decrease of vote appeared, the allegations were disproved. At Lake City there was some shooting the night before election, but no actual violence at the polls. The committee say:

> It is thought by some of the witnesses that a number of voters, principally colored men, were afraid to go to the polls on election day because of these disturbances of the previous night; but as to the number of persons thus deterred, and as to what, if any, efforts they made to exercise their right, the evidence is wholly unsatisfactory. One witness puts the number at "several," while another estimates it at 40. The number who were intimidated (with or without sufficient reason) was evidently not so great as to justify the rejection of the entire poll. By the use of proper diligence the sitting Member could have called the voters themselves, or some of them, and could have thus shown their number and the facts as to their intimidation and offer and efforts to vote.

In Marianna there were disturbances, but the committee conclude:

> There were disturbances at the polls in Marianna, where three polls were opened, and where the whole county voted. One or two personal collisions occurred, some harsh language was used, and some persons were doubtless frightened away; but as to the number who left, and as to whether they left without voting, and as to the candidate for whom those who left without voting intended to vote, the evidence is wholly unsatisfactory. Several witnesses are called on the part of the sitting Member, who testify that, in their opinion, from 100 to 200 colored persons were deterred from voting; but this is a mere conjecture, and the census, already referred to, shows that it is wholly incorrect. By the census report of 1870, it appears that at the time the census was taken (which was but a short time prior to the election) there were in the county of Jackson 1,879 male citizens over the age of 21 years, and the returns before us show that 1,752 votes were actually cast, leaving only 127 voters who failed, from all causes, to exercise their right. This is an exceedingly small percentage, being less than 10 per cent, and shows conclusively that the allegation that some 400 voters were intimidated, and thereby deprived of the privilege of voting, is not true. On the contrary, we must conclude, in view of the unusually large vote polled, that nothing can be deducted from the vote returned for the contestant on the ground of intimidation in this county.

In conclusion, in accordance with the principles set forth, the committee found a majority of 137 for Mr. Niblack, the contestant, and recommended the usual resolutions declaring sitting Member not elected, and seating contestant.

The report was considered in the House on January 29, 1873,[1] and the resolutions of the committee were agreed to without division.

Mr. Niblack then appeared and took the oath.[2]

892. The Arkansas election case of Gause v. Hodges, in the Forty-third Congress.

A return shown by testimony of the returning officer to have been made up on data rendered insufficient by theft was rejected.

The fact that a return has been accepted and acted on by State authorities does not cure its inherent defects.

Fraud will not be presumed simply from an unusual ratio between votes and population.

At the organization of the House on December 1, 1873, the Clerk did not enroll any Representative from the First district of Arkansas.[3] On February 4, 1874,[4] the House, without division, seated Mr. Asa Hodges as having the prima facie title, leaving open the right to contest.

On February 24, 1875,[5] Mr. Austin F. Pike, of New Hampshire, submitted the report of the majority of the committee on the merits of the contest of Gause v. Hodges. Mr. Edward Crossland, of Kentucky, submitted minority views. The majority and minority considered, besides questions of fact, certain questions of law.

(1) The majority reject the returns of Poinsett County, saying:

The clerk who made the certificate rebuts by his testimony (Record, pp. 342, 343) any presumption of the validity of the vote which his certificate might raise. The returns, poll books, tally sheets, and votes were all stolen from his office. He never made an abstract of the votes as required by the law of the State (acts of Arkansas, 1868, sec. 39, p. 322), and of course never made a copy of it and sent the same to the secretary of state, as required. (Ibid., p. 323, sec. 42.) He only sent a certificate founded on the affidavits of the judges of part of the voting precincts in the county. This away of making a return is substantially defective, and such a certificate can furnish no evidence of the correctness of its contents. No precinct returns and no other evidence was before the committee.

The minority say:

There are five townships in this county. The election was fairly held in all of them. The returns were made to the clerk and were stolen from his office on the Friday night after the election. The judges made certificates under oath in each precinct. These were presented to the clerk, and he made the following abstract and certificate.

---

[1] Journal, p. 269; Globe, pp. 949–952.

[2] It should be noticed that contestant belonged to the party in the minority in the House and the contestee to the majority party.

[5] Second session Forty-third Congress, House Report No. 264; Smith, p. 291; Rowell's Digest, p. 299.

Having quoted the abstract and certificate, the minority continue:

This was forwarded to the secretary of state, and he accepted it, acted on it, and counted the votes for Mr. Gause. The committee changed their opinion of the conclusive effect of a certificate that has been accepted and acted on by the State authorities" and refuse to count the vote of this county. The testimony on which the certificate was based was the best attainable after the returns were stolen from the clerk's office, was legally secondary evidence, and the committee ought to have followed the "State authorities" and given Mr. Gause the vote of this county.

(2) As to Crittenden County the following ruling is made in the majority report:

It is urged that the percentage of the voting population in this county is too large as compared with other counties, and therefore ask that fraud may be presumed. This can not furnish any reliable test, as it is well known that the proportion of the voting population in different counties and localities, as well as in States, is widely different.

The minority say:

In conclusion, we invite attention to the evidence in regard to the election in the county of Crittenden. By the census of 1870 the population of this county was 3,831 souls; in 1872 there were given 2,183 votes, of which Mr. Hodges claimed to have received 1,889. This is certainly a very uncommon ratio of voters to the population, strongly indicating fraud.

893. The case of Gause v. Hodges, continued.

Objection to the legality of the constitution of an election district not raised in the notice of contest was not considered.

An election district being established illegally, but all parties participating in the election in good faith, is considered as having a de facto existence.

The right to vote not depending on registration, and returns showing prima facie that an election, was duly held without registration, the Elections Committee counted the votes.

(3) Contestant objected that the court which, under the law, divided the county of Lincoln into election districts had no authority to act, as a quorum was not present. There seems to be no doubt that less than the legal quorum acted; but the report shows that contestant did not raise the objection in his notice of contest, and so the right to object was not open. Furthermore, the majority say:

Even if it were, it ought not to prevail. This order of the court establishing these precincts seems to have been acted on, on all hands, as a valid order. The clerk of the court acted on it and made the abstract required by law. The precincts were duly registered, officers of the election duly appointed, and an election duly held, and the returns thereof duly made. All the votes polled in these precincts for State, county, district, and municipal officers have been counted. We thin the vote for Congressmen ought not to be an exception, especially when upon the pleadings no such issue was raised. These precincts must be regarded as established under color of law and as having a de facto existence.

(4) In Monroe County a question arose as to counting votes from precincts where registration had not been completed under an order of the governor setting aside one registration and ordering a new one. The report says:

The vote of only three precincts—Troy, Pecan, and Monroe—is regarded as valid by the secretary of state. A registration was commenced; it was set aside on the ground of the alleged disturbed and violent condition of the people, and a new one ordered. Only the three precincts above named were registered under this new order. The vote of these is the only one counted by General Hadley.

The clerk of this county (p. 286 of the Record) makes an abstract of returns from the townships of Scott, Chickasaba, and Canadian, giving Gause 239 and Hodges 2.

The question presented by the pleadings and evidence is whether only these precincts are entitled to have their votes counted.

By the registration law of Arkansas (Laws of 1868, see. 23, p. 59) it is provided that—

"In any county of this State where, for any reason, a proper registration has not been made previous to any general election, the governor, when notified of the fact, shall cause a new registration to be made."

And by section 39 of chapter 73, page 222, Laws of 1868, it is provided that—

"On the fifth day after the election, * * * or sooner if all the returns have been received, the clerk of the county court shall proceed to open and compare the several election returns which have been made to his office, shall make abstracts of the votes given for the several candidates for each office on separate sheets of paper. Such abstracts, being signed by the clerk, shall be deposited in the office of the clerk, there to remain."

By section 41 of the same act the clerk is made guilty of a misdemeanor if he refuse to count the vote on any poll book returned to him.

Poll books and returns were returned for the rejected townships as well as for those counted. (See pp. 279 and 286 of Record.) It appears that there was not time to complete the new registration in all the county.

The authority of the election officers appointed by the first board of registration is not set aside by the mere order for a new registration, and their power ought to continue at least until successors are appointed by the new board. The right of a man to vote does not depend upon his registration. It does not follow, then, that there might not have been a legal election in the precincts not registered anew. The clerk's certificate is prima facie evidence that there were such elections, and the committee decide to count all the votes of this county.

894. The case of Gause v. Hodges, continued.

The return of a canvassing officer is given prima facie effect although he may have omitted from it the votes of certain precincts.

Returns made by volunteer officers at "outside polls" of votes cast by persons of unknown qualifications were rejected.

(5) As to the vote of Van Buren County, the minority views present the following statement of fact:

The device by which Gause was deprived of the vote of this county is novel and interesting. There are 19 precincts in this county. The actual vote cast, returned, and counted by the clerk was as follows: Hodges, 208; Gause, 527; whole vote, 735; majority for Gause, 319. The returns from all the precincts, except Mountain, which contained only 3 votes, were duly returned to the clerk, counted by him, and abstract made as required by law; but before he mailed it to the secretary of state he suppressed it and made another, in "obedience to instructions received from the attorney-general." Under these instructions he suppressed the vote of 11 precincts, counted only 7, giving Mr. Hodges 131 and Mr. Gause 141, making in the whole county 272 votes.

The "instructions" purported to give a rule as to votes admissible under the law. The minority say:

Admit that the instructions contained a correct interpretation of the law, the clerk does not swear that he made the alteration because he discovered irregularities in the manner the election was conducted, but made it solely because he was instructed to do it. By what data, under what evidence, he assumed that the voters of certain precincts ought to be disfranchised he does not tell us. But we insist that the clerk had no power to adjudicate upon the subject of irregularities in the precincts. All that he was authorized to do was to receive and count the votes as they were returned from the precincts and make the "abstract;" his powers began and ended with the performance of these duties. He had no authority to examine, hear, or act on any other evidence than that contained in the returns from the precincts. The majority of the committee carefully abstain from any expression of approbation in regard to what this clerk did, and insist only that he having made this second abstract and forwarded it to the governor, and the "governor and secretary of state having acted on it," it becomes the only legal evidence of the vote of the county.

The majority of the committee contended that the paper actually transmitted by the clerk, and not the other paper relied on by the contestant, was the prima facie evidence of the vote of the county. The majority say:

The committee think that the only official proof furnished by this clerk is the paper acted on by the secretary of state and the governor.

It was upon the contestant to show what the vote was in the other precinct in this county, he claiming the benefit of it. The paper he relies on does not show it for the reasons above stated.

Here, then, are certain precincts which were not returned, and which might be set up by competent proof if they were legal polls. Neither copies of the election returns or the depositions of the election officers are produced. Whatever papers were sent the clerk were rejected by him as returns, and there is no evidence what they were.

A similar question arose as to Conway County, the minority making violent objection to the decision of the majority.

(6) In Independence, Jefferson, and Woodruff counties the question of "outside polls 2" arose. The majority say:

In each of these counties, at one or more voting places, persons considering that they had a right to vote, which right had been denied them at the regular polls, and perhaps others who simply desired to vote, organized what has been called "outside polls." The persons assuming to act as officers at these outside polls made returns to the clerk of the county, and the contestant claims that the votes thus returned shall be counted.

The committee is unable to find any authority for such a proceeding in either State or national law.

The national law provides a way in the election of Congressmen and Presidential electors by which persons having the right to vote can make that right available to them when it is denied them at the regular poll. These persons did not think proper to pursue this course. They resorted to this new scheme outside the law, subversive of the purity of elections and revolutionary in the extreme.

It can not be urged that the persons making these returns are election officers. Their certificate, then, can have no legal force and can furnish no evidence that what they certify to is correct.

There is no evidence that a single one of these participants at the outside voting had any legal right to vote, and the whole claim for the allowing of the vote rests simply upon the certificate of these self-constituted and illegal officials.

The minority questioned the facts assumed by the majority, and contended that the outside polls were the legal polls.

(7) In Greene County the majority held to the following decision:

The registration was set aside in this county and no new one made. There were elections held in many or all of the precincts of the county under the registration rejected by the governor and by the officers appointed by that board of registration. The clerk of the county refused to receive the returns brought to him, and he never made any official abstract of them. He says they were "stolen."

The governor has authority to set aside a registration, but the committee does not think that a fair construction of this law can give the governor the authority to disfranchise a county by setting aside the registration.

By section 23 the governor was authorized to cause a new registration to be made only in the same manner in which the old registration was made. He was not authorized to set aside the old registration, except by making a new one. And the new one must be "governed in all respects as other regular registrations under this act" (sec. 23)—that is to say, the new precinct registration must be made between the 60th and 10th days preceding the election, and the new review must be made between the 16th and 10th days preceding the election.

In conclusion, the majority found a majority of 1,143 votes for Mr. Hodges, the sitting Member, and presented resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

The minority found a majority of 799 for Mr. Gause.

In the few remaining days of the session the report was not acted on.

895. The Georgia election case of Sloan v. Rawls, in the Forty-third Congress.

A doubt as to whether or not an election precinct existed or had been abolished did not vitiate a vote duly cast and returned.

An election being properly conducted, the House counted a return made by a portion of the election officers, the others having declined to act.

On February 27, 1874,[1] Mr. Ira B. Hyde, of Missouri, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Georgia case of Sloan v. Rawls. The officially tabulated vote of the district had given Mr. Sloan 6,979 votes and Mr. Rawls 8,319. But an abstract of votes actually cast, as made up by the secretary of state, showed a total of 8,350 votes for Mr. Sloan and 8,338 votes for Mr. Rawls.

The majority of the committee, besides correcting some errors and deciding certain questions of fact, joins issue on certain questions of law.

(1) The law of Georgia provided—

SECTION 1312. Such election shall be held at the court-houses of the respective counties, and if no court-house, at some place within the limits of the county site, and at the several election precincts thereof, if any, established or to be established. Said precincts must not exceed one in each militia district. Such precincts are established, changed, or abolished by the justices of the inferior court, descriptions of which must be entered on their minutes at the time.

At three precincts in Chatham County, where Sloan received 1,239 votes and Rawls 2, the returns were rejected. The majority of the committee say that these precincts should be counted.

There is no evidence tending to show that the election at these precincts was not fairly and legally conducted and the returns made and forwarded to the county managers within the time and in the manner required by the laws of Georgia; but, on the contrary, the testimony of King S. Thomas (p. 55), Avery Smith (p. 57), and James Porter (p. 58), together with the exhibits of the names of the voters referred to in their testimony, and which are printed on pages 148 to 174, inclusive, established the fact, in the opinion of the committee, that the election at these precincts was fairly and legally conducted; but it is claimed by the sitting Member that these voting precincts had no legal existence, and he gives that in his brief as the reason for the rejection of the returns from them. He says:

"The consolidators of the Chatham election refused to receive and count these votes, because they considered that there were no such precincts existing by law in Chatham County, etc."

The question of law at issue in regard to the legality of these voting precincts is simple, and may be briefly stated.

It is admitted on both sides that the ordinary of the county was authorized by the laws of Georgia to establish or abolish voting precincts by an order entered of record in his court.

And it is also admitted that these precincts were established on the 22d day of October, 1868, by the ordinary of Chatham County sitting as a court of ordinary by an order duly entered of record.

A certified copy of said order is printed on pages 174 and 175 Mis. Doc. No. 20.

Said order is as follows:

Court of ordinary, Chatham County, sitting for county purposes:

"OCTOBER 22, 1868.

"It being necessary that election precincts should be established in the county in order to facilitate the election to be held on the 3d day of November next, it is therefore ordered that election precincts be, and they are hereby, established at Cherokee Hill, in the eighth militia district, embracing the whole of said district, at Chapman's house, in the seventh militia district, embracing the whole of said district, and on the Isle of Hope, embracing the whole of the fifth and sixth militia districts.

"HENRY S. WETMORE,
"Ordinary C. C."

In the judgment of the committee, no order abolishing these precincts had been made until about a month after the election in November, 1872.

But it is claimed by the sitting Member that the order of October 22, 1868, by which these precincts were established, applied only to the election for the year 1868, and that it does, by its terms, limit their establishment to that election.

And that appears to be the reason for the rejection of the returns from these precincts by the managers who consolidated the returns of Chatham County.

The committee is clearly of the opinion that such was not the effect of said order; that the words "it being necessary that election precincts should be established in the county in order to facilitate the election to be held on the 3d day of November next," only expressed a reason for action at that time, but did not in any manner limit the terms of the order, and much less did they have the effect of abolishing those precincts on the 4th day of November following.

It is proper to state in this connection that the sitting Member produces the testimony of the ordinary (see p. 284, Mis. Doe. No. 20), in which he states:

"It was my intention when I established these precincts to have them in force only for the election referred to."

But certainly such evidence can not be admitted to contradict or change the records of courts.

Judgments and orders of courts of record would be of little value as evidence, or for any purpose, if they could be contradicted, changed, and set aside by the testimony of the judge taken five years after the record was made.

The action of this same ordinary in abolishing these precincts in December, 1872, about a month after the election, shows how little confidence he has in his own opinion thus solemnly expressed.

It also appears by the evidence that United States supervisors of the election at all of these three precincts were appointed on November 1, 1872, by the judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Georgia. (See p. 179, Mis. Doc. No. 20.)

And that all of said supervisors acted, except the Democratic supervisor appointed for the Isle of Hope precinct

The argument of the minority that an act of the. legislature of Georgia had abolished these precincts is answered by the statement that this law was applicable only to one election, and did not affect the election in question.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. R. Milton Speer, of Pennsylvania, argued that the precincts had been established only for the election of 1868, and asserted that at subsequent elections these precincts had not been used.

(2) At Lawtonville the managers were all of sitting Member's party, and refused to make out and forward the return of the precinct, or even to conclude the count. But one of the managers and the clerk afterwards made out the vote and forwarded it. Testimony indicated that the election was properly conducted, and that the returned result was true. The majority held that this return, which had not been credited in the county tabulation and which showed a majority to contestant, should be counted.

The minority contended that the vote, which had not been formally returned or canvassed, should not be counted, and contended that the testimony relied on by the majority was not worthy of confidence.

896. The case of Sloan v. Rawls, continued.

There being a discrepancy between the return and the vote proven to have been cast, the House corrected the return.

Kind of proof accepted to prove votes additional to those returned for contestant at a precinct where his supporters were unable to read or write.

There being no evidence of fraud and some evidence of the correctness of the vote, the House counted a return whereon the election officers did not subscribe to the oath.

A defective precinct return, irregularly transmitted, was counted, there being no evidence of fraud and some evidence of its correctness.

(3) Contestant alleged fraud in the return from Liberty Hill, as there was a discrepancy between the vote returned for him and the vote proven to have been cast. The majority report says:

> The committee is of the opinion that this does not constitute such proof of fraud as to require them to reject the return, but that they might properly add to it such votes as the contestant proves were cast for him above the number returned.
> In the case of Washburn v. Voorhees, reported February 19, 1866, this identical question arose in relation to Jefferson Township, and the report in that case, which was adopted by the House, did not reject, but corrected, the return by giving the contestant the benefit of the votes proved in excess of those counted in the return.
> The evidence relied upon to prove the number of votes actually cast for Mr. Sloan at this precinct is as follows:
> First. A list of Republican who voted at this precinct on the day in question. This list contains 67 names, and is printed on page 129.
> Second. The deposition of Edmund Harper (p. 100), who was questioned, and answered as follows:
> "Question. Have you any knowledge of the number of Republican votes actually put in the box that day?—Answer. I saw and counted 74 that were given out to men who took them and went to the box to deposit them-"
> Third. The depositions of 60 Republican voters, who swear that they voted at this precinct at the election in question, receiving most, if not all, of the ballots from the vice-president or secretary of the Grant and Wilson Club, and that they all voted the Republican ticket, and all but 5 swear that they intended to vote or did vote for Mr. Sloan.
> As these voters were unable to read or write, the evidence is as conclusive as could be obtained under the circumstances, and the committee are of the opinion that at least a part of these votes should, if it were necessary to decide the contest, be counted for Mr. Sloan. But, in view of the length of the testimony, the few votes in issue in this precinct, and the further fact that in the judgment of the committee they could in no view of the case change the result, the committee have thought it unnecessary to make a count of them

The minority contend that the testimony relied on by contestant to prove the vote cast was unreliable because of the ignorance of the witnesses.

(4) The canvassers rejected the returns of precinct 259 of Scriven County because the managers did not subscribe to the oath. It appears that the copy of the precinct return was defective and was transmitted to the secretary of state in an irregular way. While admitting that the strict rules of law would require its rejection, the committee say that as there was no evidence of fraud and some evidence of the correctness of the vote, they would count it. This precinct gave 31 for Rawls, the sitting Member, and 4 for contestant.

(5) The majority and minority disagreed as to the vote of Jefferson precinct, the minority holding that the precinct had been abolished, and the majority contending that under proper construction of the law it could not be held to have been abolished. Considering it a legal polling place, the majority counted the vote.

897. The case of Sloan v. Rawls, continued.

Precinct returns being impeached only by the fact of suspicious custody, they were counted in spite of gross irregularities in the consolidated returns therefrom

The use of several ballot boxes, with alleged object of defeating the purpose of the Federal inspection law, did not cause rejection of the returns.

(6) The majority decided to accept the result of the precinct returns of Bullock County although the officials who consolidated the return at the county seat acted irregularly. The majority report says:

In the case of Howard v. Cooper (Bartlett, 275) the committee laid down the following rule in relation to cases of fraud:

"When the result in any precinct has been shown to be so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deducible therefrom, then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents, as well as the evident requirements of truth, not only sanction, but call for the rejection of the entire poll, when stamped with the characteristics here shown."

This same doctrine has been repeatedly laid down by committees, and has received the sanction of the House. (See Washburn v. Voorhees, Contested-Election Cases, 1865 to 1871, and cases there cited.)

The laws of Georgia, heretofore cited, require that—

"The superintendents, to consolidate the vote of the county, must consist of all those who officiated at the county seat, or a majority of them, and at least one from each precinct."

The consolidated return for Bullock County (see p. 257) has the names of six managers signed to the return and certificate, which states that—

"We do certify that we have this day met and consolidated the returns of the other voting places with the court-house, and that the following is the result, etc."

But the testimony of these men, whose names are signed to the consolidated return (see pp. 72–79), discloses the fact that not one of them ever signed or ever saw the consolidated return, or had anything whatever to do with the consolidation of the returns from that county.

Not one of them is able to tell anything about the making up of the consolidated returns; and two of them, De Loach and Proctor, decline to answer questions on the ground that the answers might tend to criminate them. This consolidated return was made up by one C. A. Sorrier (Mis. Doe. 20, pt. 2, p. 2), who was not a manager, and had no legal connection whatever with the election, and had no right to handle any of the papers.

Yet, strange as it may seem, all of the precinct returns were handed over to him as soon as they reached the court-house, and continued in his exclusive possession for many days.

He swears that he made up the consolidated return without the assistance or supervision of anybody, and signed the names of the managers to it. That consolidated return is dated on the 5th day of November, and yet it was not mailed to the executive department until the 19th of November, as appears by the testimony of the secretary of state, who examined the postmark (p. 139).

And instead of being sent by mail from Bullock County, it was, on the 11th or 12th of November (see p. 51), in the hands of one Sims, who delivered it to some party in Savannah.

It appears to have been held back until the returns from all the other counties had been received.

Another most significant fact in this connection is the failure to turn over the ballots, returns, tally sheets, and lists of voters to the clerk of the superior court, as required by the laws of Georgia before referred to.

In spite of the unlawful making up of the consolidated returns and the suspicious custody of the precinct returns, the majority concluded to count them. They gave Rawls 493 votes and Sloan 0.

The minority say on this point:

The contestant denied the irregularity of the county canvass or consolidation for Bullock County; but inasmuch as the sitting Member does not rely upon this county canvass or consolidation, but upon the precinct returns themselves, and these precinct returns, establishing the vote of the county beyond question, are presented on pages 32 to 39 of the small pamphlet, duly authenticated by the secretary of state, and wholly unimpeached, the undersigned do not see that it is material to inquire into the regularity of the canvass or consolidation. At the same time they find no such irregularity as would, under the statutes of Georgia, invalidate this canvass, even if it were the only evidence of the vote before the House. There is no testimony tending to show that the precinct officers did not sign the precinct returns. No attempt was made to show this, although an attempt was made to show that they did not make a consolidation at the county site. The contestant complained that the ordinary, Mr. Sorrier, after considerable delay, sent these returns to the secretary of state by way of Savannah. But however this may be, it would not affect the case; for his testimony, on pages 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the small pamphlet, shows how the delay occurred and why the consolidation was sent by way of Savannah; so that even if there was proof that the precinct returns accompanied the consolidation to the office of the secretary of state that would not impeach them under the evidence here.

(7) The law of Georgia, as already quoted, provided that there should not be exceeding one voting precinct in each militia district. The majority say in relation to the city of Savannah:

And it is claimed by the contestant that, in violation of this provision, four voting places were established in different parts of the court-house in Savannah.

The evidence is positive upon this point and is undisputed; four ballot boxes, at four different voting places in the court-house, were used, and were presided over by four distinct sets of managers and clerks. They were so disconnected that no man could superintend the voting at more than one box at the same time. Two of these voting places were from the streets on opposite sides of the court-house, and two were from the main passageway through its center. (See plan, p. 279.)

The act of Congress approved February 28, 1871, provides for the appointment in certain cases of two United States supervisors for each election precinct, to superintend the election.

Under that act and the act amendatory thereto, two supervisors were appointed to superintend the election at the court-house precinct in the city of Savannah.

Section 5 of that act requires the supervisors to "attend at all times and places for holding elections" and "for counting the votes," to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, shall doubt; to be and remain where the ballot boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until each and every vote cast at said time and place shall be counted," etc.

Section 6 of the same act requires the supervisors to—

"take and occupy and remain in such position or positions from time to time, whether before or behind the ballot boxes, as will in their judgment best enable them or him to see each person offering himself for registration, or offering to vote, and as will best conduce to their or his scrutinizing the manner in which the registration or voting is being conducted; and at the closing of the polls for the reception of votes, they are, and each of them is, hereby required to place themselves or himself in such position in relation to the ballot boxes for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots in said boxes contained as will enable them or him fully to perform the duties," etc.

It is therefore evident that if four ballot boxes, separated as these were, can be used at one precinct, it will be impossible for the United States supervisors to perform the duties required of them by the act of Congress above referred to, and that the act can anywhere, by the managers of elections, be annulled and disregarded.

If four ballot boxes in four separate places can be legally used in one voting precinct, so can 40 or 100 in as many different places in the precinct, and any attempt at supervision would be impossible.

And it is also evident that the use of four ballot boxes, in four separate places, and with four complete sets of election officers, in what could legally be only one voting precinct, was in violation of the spirit and intention, as well as the letter, of the law of Georgia.

The committee can not refrain from noticing the attempt which was made by the authorities of Chatham County to set aside all the other voting precincts, and thereby compel the voters of the entire county either to come to the court-house or to lose the opportunity of voting.

Such a law practically disfranchises large numbers of voters, and ought to be the subject of additional legislation, so far as the election of Members of Congress is concerned.

As the rejection of the vote of the city of Savannah would not change the result in this case, the committee have not deemed it necessary to pass upon its legality, and they therefore count it as it was officially returned.

The minority say that the number of ballot boxes to be used was not prescribed by law, and that four ballot boxes had been used at this precinct for many years. The minority continue:

The use of four ballot boxes was an absolute necessity, for the statute of Georgia provides only one voting place in the entire city of Savannah; nor had any additional voting place been established by the ordinary of the county; and unless several boxes had been used at that place between 5,000 and 6,000 ballots must have been deposited by voters of the city in one box before 3 o'clock p.m., which, of course, would have been an impossibility. The contestant's proposition, therefore, disfranchises a large proportion of the voters of his district, whichever horn of the dilemma they may see fit to take. If they do not all vote in one box, they are to be disfranchised, but if they attempt to vote in one box, large numbers of them are virtually disfranchised, because they can not all vote in a single ballot box. There is an additional reason why the voters of Savannah should not be disfranchised on account of these ballot boxes. It is found in section 1362 of the Code of Georgia.

"1362. Election not void by reason of formal defects. No election shall be defeated for noncompliance with the requirements of the law if held at the proper time and place by persons qualified to hold them, if it is not shown that by that noncompliance the result is different from what it would have been had there been a proper compliance."

No attempt has been made to show anything of this kind in the case of the Savannah vote.

Moreover, the law of Georgia did not limit the number of managers. The minority further say:

Obviously there was the same imperative necessity for additional managers as for additional boxes. All the electors of Savannah were obliged to vote at the court-house, and unless more than one ballot box had been used, the election could not have been held at all. These boxes could not have been properly superintended by three managers. The boxes were arranged in a straight line in one hall and at intervals of from 10 to 16 feet, with no partition or wall or screen between them. It seems to have been the best and fairest possible arrangement to enable the citizens to vote and the managers and supervisors to perform the duties prescribed by law.

It was suggested that the use of additional ballot boxes and the employment of additional superintendents seemed to be a device to evade the acts of Congress known as the "enforcement acts," but the proof shows that this practice obtained in Savannah many years before the passage of the enforcement acts; and, besides, it is manifestly no part of the object or effect of those acts to prescribe the number of precinct officers or ballot boxes.

The report was debated in the House on March 20 and 24.[1] On the latter day the proposition of the minority that Mr. Rawls, the sitting Member, was elected and entitled to his seat was defeated, yeas 77, nays 131.

The question recurring on the resolutions of the majority, seating contestant, there appeared, yeas 135, nays 74.

Thereupon Mr. Sloan appeared and took the oath.

898. The Virginia election case of Thomas v. Davis, in the Forty-third Congress.

Instance of refusal of sitting Member's request for further time to take testimony.

On March 5, 1874,[1] the House agreed to a report from the Committee on Elections, submitting resolutions unseating Alexander M. Davis, of Virginia, and seating Christopher Y. Thomas .

The minority views, signed by Mr. L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, did not dissent from the conclusion, but held that—as the testimony of the contestant was taken after the time allowed by law, and for this reason the contestee did not take the testimony which he alleges he otherwise would have taken, we are of the opinion that his request for further time should have been granted.

The resolutions were agreed to without division, and Mr. Thomas appeared and took the oath.

899. The Kentucky election case of Burns v. Young, in the Forty-third Congress.

Proof of mere irregularities in the administration of the election law does not justify the rejection of the votes.

The prefix "Hon." with a candidate's name is not such distinguishing mark as will justify rejection of the votes.

Where canvassing officers acted arbitrarily, although not fraudulently, the House corrected their result by the precinct returns.

On April 6, 1874,[2] Mr. Edward Crossland, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Burns v. Young, of Kentucky. The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 188 votes. Contestant alleged irregularities and fraud. The committee concluded as follows:

This was the first election held under the statute of Kentucky requiring elections for Representatives in Congress to be by ballot, as directed by the act of Congress approved February 28, 1871.

The directing provisions of the act of the Kentucky legislature are very elaborate, and were not in every instance strictly complied with by officers who conducted the election. Many irregularities occurred in precincts in which contestee received majorities, and exactly similar irregularities occurred in precincts which gave majorities for contestant. And if proof of mere irregularities is sufficient to vitiate the vote in these precincts and these only counted where there was strict conformity to the Kentucky statute, the majority of the contestee would be increased. In some instances the county boards, in compliance with a provision of the statute which directs that the ballots shall have on them the name of the person voted for and no other distinguishing mark, threw out ballots cast for contestant because the word "Hon." was prefixed to his name on them. The committee are of opinion that the ballots thrown out for this reason ought to have been counted for contestant. In the county of Bracken there were thrown out because of the prefix "Hon." 36 ballots for contestant. In the county of Mason, according to the certificates of the precinct officers, Young received 1,663, Burns 1,347. The county board certify for Burns 1,338 votes, or 9 votes less than the precinct certificates aggregate. These 9 votes the committee believe ought to be counted for Burns, for the reason that the county board refused to allow any person except the members of the board to be present when the ballots were counted. Witness

Hutchens swears that he asked that permission to remain in the room while the board were counting the votes and was refused by a member of the board.

The said witness Hutchens testifies that the members of said board are men of integrity and veracity; nevertheless the committee consider the practice reprehensible and dangerous and believe that contestant Burns ought to have corrected for him all the votes certified by the precinct officers, viz, 1,367.

In conclusion the committee say:

In conclusion, the committee are of opinion that, concerning the precincts wherein the irregularities were of so grave and important a nature as to affect the validity of the returns, the secondary proof of the actual votes cast shows a result not differing from that shown by the returns. In other precincts the irregularities complained of on both sides, though to be reprehended, are not of a nature to necessarily affect the validity of the returns.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That John D. Young, the sitting Member, was duly elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the Tenth Congressional district of Kentucky and is entitled to his seat.

On April 11[1] the resolution was agreed to by the House without debate or division.

900. The Arkansas election case of Bell v. Snyder, in the Forty-third Congress.

An affidavit of a voter as to how he intended to vote, made at the time the vote was rejected, was accepted as a valid declaration and part of the res gestae.

Oral testimony as to the making of affidavits by rejected voters was accepted as evidence of the fact and not as hearsay.

Testimony taken after the expiration of the legal time, and objected to at the time, was not admitted.

On December 23, 1874,[2] Mr. Horace H. Harrison, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Bell v. Snyder, from Arkansas. The official returns had shown a majority of 104 votes for sitting Member. Various irregularities were alleged, and the committee came to conclusions as to several questions relating to facts rather than principles. Only a single important question of law was discussed and actually passed on.

The statutes of Arkansas provided for a registration to be made in each county by a board. After quoting these statutes, the report says:

It will be perceived that by virtue of these provisions every person who holds a certificate is entitled to vote until his name is stricken from the original list and his certificate revoked.

The board, when in session as a court of review, ascertain and determine who is entitled to vote, subject to appeal to the supreme court, and when they close the registration and adjourn on the sixth day they are to make fair copies of the list for the clerk of the county and for the judges of election. The original list never goes to the judges of election. The board of review exercises an arbitrary power to strike names from the list on their own knowledge of disqualifying acts and to revoke certificates already issued, but every name which is on the list when they close the registration, so as to be ready to make copies is, under the statute, a legal voter, and no power on earth can deprive him of the legal right to vote. After that no action of the board as a whole, or of any member of the board, or of any other authorities or persons can invalidate that right.

Section 30 of the election law of July 23, 1868, is in these words:

"All persons who present certificates of registration, and whose names appear on the registration books, shall be entitled to vote at any and all elections authorized by the laws and constitution of this State, and no challenge shall debar such person from voting at any election."

[1] Journal, p. 761; Record, p. 3009.

[2] Second session Forty-third Congress, House Report No. 11; Smith, p. 247.

The proof showed that certain voters duly registered and having certificates of registration, whose names were on the original registration lists and were not stricken therefrom by any competent authority, but whose names did not appear on the precinct lists, were refused the right to vote. The committee say:

Under the law every person holding a certificate was entitled to vote until his name was stricken from the original list and his certificate revoked. The position contended for by contestant, sustained by the authorities, cited that where names appear on original registration books, but do not appear on copies furnished precinct judges, it is an error to reject the votes of such electors and that their votes are to be counted (Hogan v. Pile, 2 Bartlett, 285); and that votes of qualified electors should be counted (Delano v. Morgan, 2 Bartlett, 170; Vallandigham v. Campbell, 1 Bartlett, 231; Niblack v. Walls, Forty-second Congress) is undoubtedly correct, but in this case we are to consider the conclusiveness or sufficiency of the proof as to which of the candidates the electors who are shown to have been registered and to have held certificates would have voted for and what constitutes competent proof thereof.

The committee found it proven that certain men were duly registered and had certificates, and offered and attempted to vote for contestant, and that they made affidavit and again tendered their ballots and were refused. The affidavits made by the excluded voters were in form as follows:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Ashley:

I, Jason C. Wilson, of the county and State aforesaid, do solemnly swear that I am a male person over 21 years of age, and have been a resident of the State of Arkansas more than six months previous to this date, and an actual resident of Ashley County, in the State of Arkansas, and am not disqualified from registering and voting by any of the subdivisions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of section 3 of article 8 of the constitution of the State of Arkansas; and that, on the 10th day of October, 1872, I presented myself for registration as a voter to C. W. Gibbs, president of the board of registrars for Ashley County, in said State, duly appointed by the governor of said State, and acting, and at Hamburgh, the place designated by the advertisements of the said president of said board for the registration of the voters of Carter Township, in said county, and on the day and between the hours designated in said advertisement, and did take the oath prescribed by section 5 of article 8 of the constitution of the State of Arkansas, and that I was registered by said board of registrars as a legal voter for said township, in said county, and that my name has been improperly stricken from the registration books.

JASON C. WILSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, an acting and duly commissioned justice of the peace for Ashley County, in the State of Arkansas, this 5th day of November, 1872.

THOS. J. WELLS, Justice of the Peace.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Ashley:

I, Jason C. Wilson, of the county and State aforesaid, do solemnly swear that, upon the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872, at the general election for Representatives in Congress and Presidential electors, held at said time, I did present before the judges of election for the precinct of Carter, county of Ashley and State of Arkansas, the affidavit hereunto annexed, and upon said affidavit I did offer to vote the ticket thereunto attached; and that said judges of election in the precinct aforesaid did reject and refuse to receive the same, and to record my said vote thereunder.

JASON C. WILSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, an acting and duly commissioned justice of the peace for Ashley County, in the State of Arkansas, this 5th day of November, 1872.

THOS. J. WELLS, J. P.

A copy of the ticket was presented therewith.

The committee say that the case of Vallandigham, v. Campbell shows that the declaration of a voter as to how he voted or intended to vote. made at the time, is competent testimony on the point.

The statement contained in the affidavits amounted to a declaration of the voter which brought it within the rule of the case above cited. The committee continue:

> These declarations are valid as a part of the res gestse; and these declarations are supported by the testimony of the supervisor, who states the fact that nearly all of these 19 voters made these affidavits when they presented their certificates, and with their ballots attached, and that they deposited them with him, as supervisor, on the day of election.
> The objection that this is hearsay evidence, and that the deposition of each particular voter is the only competent evidence of the fact sought to be proven, is not well taken. The witness Butler does not prove what these 19 voters said to him, but what they did. There is a marked distinction between proof of what a party said and proof of acts of the party or facts connected with what he did. In the one case it may be hearsay testimony; in the other it is testimony as to facts which the witness observed, which is just as competent as the testimony of the voter as to facts in which he was an actor.

So the committee count for contestant the votes not received by the election officers.

In Hempstead County a person claiming to be county clerk sent in a return, which was carried into the abstract of the secretary of state. Another return from this county by a person shown by the testimony to be the legal clerk and in possession of the office, was made and showed a different result from the first return. Furthermore the evidence showed that the second return was based on a canvass of the precinct returns, while the person making the first return did not make such a canvass, and never had possession or control of the precinct returns. But the committee do not disturb the first returns for the reason—

> And the committee, if there was not an insuperable objection to the admissibility of the testimony showing what has hereinbefore been stated as to this vote in Hempstead County, and in the absence of any rebutting testimony, would be inclined to put the vote of this county down as showing a majority of 315 votes for Mr. Snyder, instead of 696, as it is in the abstract certified by the secretary of state; but the testimony, showing the grounds for reducing Snyder's vote 381 votes, was taken by Mr. Bell, the contestant, after the expiration of the forty days allowed him by law for taking proof, and Snyder entered and filed his formal written protest at the time; and the committee can not sanction a practice in violation of the law, especially when exception was taken at the time to the taking of the testimony. It will be seen hereinafter that even if this proof, as to the vote in Hempstead County, was admitted (which the committee do not feel justified in sanctioning), Snyder's majority would simply be reduced.

In Drew County there were various irregularities in the precinct returns, such as failure to sign or swear to the poll books, delivery of ballots unsealed, etc. But the committee do not find it necessary to pass on the question involved, as it would not change the result.

They find as a result of their examination a majority of 462 votes for sitting Member. Therefore they recommend resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member and declaring contestant not elected.

On December 23,[1] the report was considered in the House, and the resolutions were agreed to without debate or division.

901. The Arkansas election case of Bradley v. Hynes, in the Forty-third Congress.

The notice of contest being served after expiration of the legal time and the testimony taken without regard to the statute, the committee did not examine the case.

Payment of the expenses of a contestant by sitting Member, on condition of latter's withdrawal, was not held as a corrupt obtaining of the seat.

On June 16, 1874,[1] Mr. Austin F. Pike, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the Arkansas case of Bradley v. Hynes. Contestant had charged that sitting Member had corruptly caused the returns to be so falsified as to reverse the true result of the election, and had further paid him (the contestant) a sum of money to abandon the contest.

Mr. Hynes denied this in a statement made under oath before the committee; but admitted that he had reimbursed contestant for his expenses when the latter proposed to withdraw.

The committee report that there was no evidence to show that contestant had been elected, but, on the contrary, there was evidence that sitting Member was entitled to a larger majority than the returns gave him. The report continues:

> His certificate of election was given him December 14, 1872, and the notice of contest was not made until the 28th of January after, and many days out of time.
> So, too, the depositions which Bradley had taken were commenced several days after his time had expired and with a total disregard of the statute in nearly every other particular. All of which would seem to indicate that he had something in view other than a serious contest for a seat in Congress.

As to the payment of money by sitting Member, the report says:

> While the committee regard this agreement as an act on the part of Mr. Hynes which they can not approve, they do not find that it was made for the purpose of securing his seat in Congress corruptly, nor that he had any cause to fear the result of the contest.
> The committee can not but regard the conduct of the memorialist as dishonorable and mercenary. If he believed he had any merit in his case, he betrayed the rights of those who gave him their suffrages. If he did not believe his contest was meritorious, his demand for money was most dishonorable.
> The committee have instructed me to report the accompanying resolution:
> Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be discharged from further consideration of the case of John M. Bradley against William.T. Hynes, a Member of this House from the State of Arkansas.

This report was agreed to by the House on June 16,[2] without debate or division.

Chapter XXX.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1758 To 1880.

902. The Florida election case of Finley v. Walls, in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Election officers fraudulently chosen and acting illegally were held to be intruders and not de facto officers.

Fraud having been commited by election officers, no reliance was placed on their returns, and they were rejected.

Where returns are rejected, the vote may not be proven aliunde by the opinion of a person who kept a tally sheet.

On March 23, 1876,[2] Mr. Charles P. Thompson, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Finley v. Walls, of Florida. As returned by the State canvassers, the sitting member had a majority of 371 votes, which the contestant sought to overcome by proving frauds and irregularities. While a large number of allegations were made, the decision was universally conceded in the debate to depend on the disposition of the returns from the Colored Academy precinct, where sitting member received 588 votes and contestant 11. This disparity was not of itself a suspicious circumstance, since under the laws of Florida the voter might cast his vote at any precinct in the county, and the white and colored people quite generally sought different polls.

The law of Florida provided:

> The polls of the election shall be opened at 8 o'clock a.m. on the day of the election.

And also—

> The county commissioners shall * * * appoint a board of three discreet electors to be inspectors of the election for each place designated for voting within the county.

And—

> In case of the death, absence, or refusal to act of any or all of the inspectors appointed by the county commissioners, the electors present at the time appointed for opening the election may choose, viva voce, from the qualified electors, such a number as, together with the inspector or inspectors present, if any, will constitute a board of three, and the persons so chosen shall be authorized to act as inspectors of that election. The inspectors shall, before opening the election, choose a clerk, who shall be a qualified elector, and said inspectors and clerk, previous to receiving any votes, shall each take and subscribe an oath or affirmation in writing that they will perform the duties of clerk or inspectors of election according to law, and will endeavor to prevent all fraud, deceit, or abuse in conducting the same. Such oath may be taken before any officer authorized to administer oaths or before either of the persons chosen as inspectors, and shall be returned with the poll list and the returns of the election to the clerk of the circuit court. One of the inspectors shall be chosen as chairman of the board.

[1] Also Lee v. Rainey, South Carolina (Vol. I, sec. 641).

[2] First session Forty-Fourth Congress, House Report No. 295; Smith, p. 367; Rowell's Digest, p. 305.

The majority of the committee say in regard to the Colored Academy precinct:

At this precinct your committee find that there was a conspiracy to commit a fraud upon the election. That the conspirators were Dr. E. G. Johnson, who was a candidate for State senator in Columbia County and was voted for at this precinct, together with Charles R. King and John W. Tompkins, who acted as inspectors, Charles A. Carroll, who acted as clerk, and one Duval Selph, a supporter of Doctor Johnson. Carroll and Selph were at Doctor Johnson's during the night previous to the election, and King took breakfast with him in the morning. They all, except Selph, left the house of Doctor Johnson in the morning, a little after daylight, and proceeded to the place where the election was to be held, and, in pursuance of the object of the conspiracy, opened the polls at about 7 o'clock in the morning, an hour before the time at which the meeting was notified and an hour before the duly appointed inspectors were called upon to be present and an hour before the election could be held according to law. No one of the duly appointed inspectors, unless it was Aleck, Hamilton, was present or acted at this precinct. Tompkins and King had been requested to be present by Doctor Johnson and act as inspectors, and Charles A. Carroll had been requested by him to act as clerk, and these several persons were either nominated by, or acted at the request of, Doctor Johnson. They were not legally elected, as there was no regular meeting of the electors having power to choose inspectors before Tompkins and King undertook to act as such, and without legally appointed or chosen inspectors no legal clerk could be chosen or appointed, so that the election at this precinct was conducted by persons not legally authorized, with the exception of Hamilton, and by persons who were ready and willing to violate the election laws of the State, and who did violate them.

The committee then go on to quote testimony that there was fraud at the precinct, persons voting who had voted at other precincts and others voting who had not conformed to the legal requirements. And the committee insisted that there was fraudulent collusion on the part of the election officers. They say:

Your committee are satisfied that the irregularities at this precinct were not the result of ignorance, inadvertence, or carelessness, but were the result of fraud, and that there were no legally appointed inspectors nor a legally appointed clerk at this precinct; that Johnson took the entire charge of the polls through persons who, by his procurement, acted as inspectors and clerk. They can not stand better than mere intruders, having no official character; intruders not for the purpose of aiding in conducting an election fairly, but for the purpose of carrying into execution a previously arranged fraud upon the ballot box. It is clear that the pretended clerk, Charles A. Carroll, arranged with Doctor Johnson to commit a gross fraud at this election, and although he did not do the particular acts it was arranged he should do, still the evidence is clear that Doctor Johnson himself carried out the fraud planned with the clerk, of putting illegal votes into the ballot box with the knowledge of the clerk.

In conclusion the majority say:

The law is, that where fraud is proved to have been committed by the officers of an election in conducting the election, no reliance can be placed upon any of their acts and their return must be rejected as wholly unreliable. The party claiming under the election must prove the actual vote in some other way. The only evidence as to what the vote was is from John V. Brown (p. 79), one of the challengers, a Conservative, who says: "Finley got 11 and Walls 588, 1 think. I derived my information from being present and keeping a tally sheet." This certainly can not establish the vote, as his testimony at most can only be evidence of the actual number of votes cast, but one of the principal objections is that illegal votes were cast, and this, too, with the guilty knowledge of the officers of the election. There being proof that such illegal votes were cast and the real number of legal votes not being proved, there is nothing upon which the true vote can be ascertained, and, therefore, the entire poll must be rejected; and your committee so find and determine.

The minority dissent from the majority's views as to the facts, deny that fraud is proven, and hold:

As these men acted as inspectors and clerk, and as no proof is given to show that they were not, in fact, appointed, and as it is now claimed that their return went into the Columbia County return, counted by the State board, and found at page 23, and as it is now sought to deduct this vote from the State count, these inspectors and clerk must be taken to be officers de facto, and full faith, prima facie, is due to their acts.

The committee considered at length other objections of the contestant, and came to conclusions thereon:

903. The case of Finley v. Walls, continued.

Persons actually registered but omitted from the copy of the list in use at the polls were held to have cast valid votes, although a required oath was not administered when they voted.

Where the nature of illegal votes had not been determined the Committee on Elections deducted a proportionate number from the poll of each candidate.

(1) At the Gainesville precinct about 60 persons voted whose names were not on the certified copy of the registration list. The majority say:

It is clear by the election laws of Florida that a person, in order to be entitled to vote at any election, must, six days prior thereto, be duly registered as a voter in the clerk's office of the circuit court in the county. If, on offering to vote, his name is not on the certified copy of the registry list at the voting precinct, he may then, if he takes the oath prescribed in section 16 and the additional oath required by section 9, which is "that his name has been improperly struck off from the list of registered voters," be entitled to vote. And the taking of the oath in section 9 is indispensable to the right of the person to vote whose name is not upon the registration list. The officers presiding at the election have no right to receive his vote without this oath. But it also appears by the evidence that, although the names of these 60 voters were not on the certified copy of the registration list furnished for this poll, still a large number of the names were actually on the registration list in the clerk's office of the circuit court. Your committee, in view of this fact, although the inspectors were in fault in allowing the persons to vote whose names were not on the list furnished them by the clerk of the circuit court, still, as their names should have appeared on such list, and they were deprived of the legal right to vote without taking the oath in section 9, by the neglect of the clerk of said court in not providing a correct list of the voters of said precinct, have arrived at the conclusion that, they having voted, their votes should be counted when their names are found to have been on such registry list at the clerk's office. This leaves the poll to be purged of 12 votes. "In purging the polls of illegal votes, the general rule is that, unless it is shown for which candidate they were cast, they are to be deducted from the whole vote of the election division, and not from the candidates having the highest number." "Of course, in the application of this rule such illegal votes would be deducted proportionately from both candidates, according to the entire vote returned for each." (Am. Law of Elec., sec. 298.) Although this is the rule to be applied where it can not be ascertained for whom the illegal votes were cast, and in this case there is nothing to show that it might not have been ascertained for whom the illegal votes were cast, as the names of the unregistered voters could have been ascertained by comparing the poll list and the registry list, and the evidence of the illegal votes taken as to whom they voted for, and the poll purged in this the more regular mode; still, as this has not been done, your committee, unwilling to reject the entire poll, there being not evidence sufficient to prove actual fraud on the part of those having charge of the election, have determined to purge the poll of the 12 illegal votes by subtracting from each of the candidates a proportionate number of the illegal votes, according to the entire vote returned for each.

904. The case of Finley v. Walls, continued.

An entire poll is not to be rejected except after the fullest attempt to purge it of illegal votes.

Where election officers did not follow State law and draw out an excess of ballots, the Elections Committee deducted proportionately.

Failure to swear the election officers, combined with other irregularities, was, by a divided committee, held not to require rejection of the poll, actual fraud not being shown.

Failure to return the poll book to the county officer, as the law required, was not held in the absence of proof of fraud to vitiate the election.

(2) As to sheriff's office precinct the report says:

> There was at this precinct a grave omission on the part of the officers of election in their failure to purge the poll, as directed by the law of Florida. It appears from the testimony of Albert A. Ellenwood, one of the inspectors (pp. 96, 97), that there were only 298 names on the poll list while there were 309 votes cast and counted.
> There appearing to be 11 more votes than names on the poll list, it was the duty of the inspectors to replace the ballots in the box and have one of their number publicly draw out and destroy, unopened, so many of such ballots as were equal to such excess. (Sec. 22, above.)
> This not having been done, it becomes a difficult problem to determine what shall be done with the poll. The statute having prescribed the method of and the person by whom the poll should have been purged, can it be purged in any other manner? Your committee, upon a careful consideration of the question, regarding it as settled that an entire poll is not to be rejected except after the fullest attempt to purge the poll of illegal votes, and, to ascertain the real vote by all reasonable means, have decided to regard this statute of Florida as providing a principle upon which, as well as a mode by which, the poll in such a case should be purged; and, as the method was omitted without fraud, have not regarded its omission an act of such a character as to compel the rejecting of the entire poll, but have decided to apply the principle established by the law, viz: that the excess of votes shall be regarded as thrown proportionately for both candidates, according to the entire vote for each, and that the drawing out in the manner provided by law would draw a proportionate number for each candidate. Your committee have taken from each candidate a proportionate part of said 11 votes.

Certain members of the committee who concurred in the majority report generally advocated more severe treatment of this poll, Mr. J. S. C. Blackburn, of Kentucky, insisting that it should be thrown out altogether.

(3) At Archer precinct, besides the voting of certain persons whose names were not on the lists and the presence of a few more ballots in the box than there were names on the poll list, the committee found other irregularities:

> At this poll other and serious informalities are found to exist, such as a failure to swear the inspectors, the concealment of the ballot box from public view during the adjournment for dinner, being about a half hour (Geiger, p. 56), not opening of the poll until about half past 9 o'clock, and the keeping it open after sunset. There was also an improper interference with the election by W. U. Saunders, United States marshal, both in meddling with the ballots and controlling the order of voting, so that several conservatives could not vote at all. These irregularities are grave ones and might, with much reason, be adjudged sufficient to vitiate the poll; still, your committee are unwilling to reject an entire vote where there is not proof of actual fraud and the poll may probably be purged of its illegal votes. They have, therefore, allowed the returns to stand as certified by the inspectors, deducting only the 35 illegal votes proportionately from each candidate, which will leave the vote 260 for Walls and 23 for Finley, instead of 293 for Walls and 25 for Finley.

Mr. Blackburn and three other members of the majority of the committee considered the decision too lenient.

(4) As to irregularities in Alachua County, the report says:

That said election at precinct No. 3, at Gainesville, within the county of Alachua, and within said Second Congressional district of Florida, was irregularly and illegally conducted, and was null and void, and I hereby notify you that I will ask that all the votes cast at said precinct be rejected on the following grounds, viz: First. Because no poll book or list of the names of the electors voting at said precinct was returned to the judge of the county court or to the clerk of said county, with the certificates of the election at said poll, as the law requires, but a paper list of names was found eight days after said election, unsigned by any of the officers of the election at said precinct; second, because a large number of illegal votes at said election were received and counted at said poll, viz, about 58 votes not registered, and 5 not checked, as the law requires, were received at said poll, and changed the result of the election at said poll, and only 3 appeared to be sworn, and because the oath administered to the unregistered voters who voted at said poll was not such as the law prescribes.

To which the contestee answers in substance that it is untrue that said election was irregularly and illegally conducted, or was null and void. He admits that the poll book was not returned to the judge of the county court nor to the clerk of the county with the certificate of the election at said precinct, but alleges that the same was found eight days after said election, and that this irregularity is not such as will affect the rights of the contestee. He also objects to proof of any illegal votes, as it does not appear from the contestant's said specifications for whom said illegal votes were cast. A poll may be purged of illegal votes without it being proved for whom they were cast. (Am. Law of Elec., sec. 298.)

The not returning of the poll list, although an irregularity which might, connected with other irregularities, be entitled to very considerable weight, still, in this case, it being shown that the poll list used at this precinct was found and used by the county canvassers in canvassing this precinct, and there being no evidence that it had been tampered with, or was by reason of fraud not returned in the ballot box, the committee have not regarded it as a sufficient reason for rejecting said poll.

The majority of the committee concluded, from an application of the principles set forth, that the true result showed a majority of 343 votes for Mr. Finley, the contestant, and reported resolution giving the seat to him.

The report was debated at length on April 18 and 19,[1] the debate being confined almost exclusively to the Colored Academy precinct. On the latter day the resolutions of the minority, confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat, were offered as a substitute, and were disagreed to, yeas 84, nays 135.

Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to without division.

The contestant, Mr. Finley, then appeared and took the oath.

905. The Alabama election case of Bromberg v. Haralson, in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Illustration of a specification in a notice of contest condemned as too general.

Testimony taken after the time allowed by law was rejected.

Original testimony, taken on notices stating that witnesses were to be examined in rebuttal, was rejected.

On March 23, 1876,[2] Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Bromberg v. Haralson, of Alabama. The contestant alleged fraud and intimidation sufficient to overcome the majority of nearly 2,700, by which sitting Member had been returned.

Two preliminary questions were discussed and passed on in relation to the vote of the district, especially of Wilcox County.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 294; Smith, p. 364; Rowell's Digest, p. 303.

(a) The report quotes one of the specifications:

Twelfth. That illegal and undue influences were employed by United States and State officials, or by persons representing themselves to be such, adherents of the Republican party, to prevent voters in this district from voting for me (the contestant), or inducing or intimidating voters into voting for you (the contestee), by threats of prosecution and otherwise, by the presence of detachments of United States troops at or near the polls, and by the illegal distribution of provisions donated by act of Congress to sufferers by the overflow of the Tombigbee and Alabama rivers in 1874.

And says:

The twelfth specification is too vague and uncertain to be good. The statute requires that the contestant, in his notice, "shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in his contest." (Rev. Stat., pp. 17, 18, sec. 105; McCrary, sec. 343; Wright v. Fuller, 1 Bartlett, 152.)

It is impossible to conceive of a specification of the grounds of contest broader or more general in its terms. It fixes no place where any act complained of occurred. It embraces the whole district in one sweeping charge. This specification embraces three general grounds of complaint, not one of which possesses that particularity essential to good pleading; but it can subserve no valuable purpose to pursue the question of legal sufficiency of this specification further, because there is another ground upon which the whole evidence of the contestant, relating to the election in this county, must be rejected.

(b) As to the notice of contest and validity of certain testimony, the committee say:

The sitting Member served his answer to the notice of contest on the contestant on the 23d of December, 1874. The statute gives ninety days next after the service of the answer in which to take the testimony. (See act of February, 1875.) This period is to be divided as follows: The contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days, the returned Member during the succeeding forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal only during the remaining ten days of said period. (Rev. Stat., p. 18, sec. 107.) During the first forty days the contestant took no testimony in Wilcox County or elsewhere to sustain any specification in his notice of contest affecting the election in said Wilcox County. His entire evidence was confined to the election held in other counties. During the succeeding forty days the returned Member did not take any testimony in Wilcox County or elsewhere relating to the election held in said county of Wilcox; and yet, on the 15th and 16th days of March, 1875, the contestant caused notices to be served on the attorney of the returned Member that on the 22d of March, 1875, he would take testimony in said county of Wilcox. Both notices specify that the witnesses therein named "will be examined in rebuttal of the testimony taken" by the returned Member. Knowing that he had taken no testimony in relation to the election in Wilcox County at all, and hence that there was nothing to rebut, the returned Member did not attend the taking of the testimony of contestant in said county. In violation of the statute, and contrary to the terms of the notices served upon the attorney of the sitting Member, the contestant took a large number of ex parte depositions or affidavits for the purpose of proving the truth of the general charges embraced in the twelfth specification above quoted. The whole of the testimony taken in Wilcox County is directed exclusively to the proof of the contestant's original case, and no portion of it is directed to the rebuttal of the proofs adduced by the returned Member. The rules of law and the principles of common fairness alike require that the whole of contestant's testimony relating to the election in Wilcox County should be entirely rejected, first, because the time within which the contestant could lawfully take testimony to prove his original case had long previously expired; and, second, because the notices explicitly state that the witnesses were to be examined in rebuttal, and under such notices, in the absence of the returned Member, it would be to give sanction to a surprise to allow any other than rebutting testimony to stand. And, in addition thereto, the contestee would have no right or opportunity to introduce evidence in answer to the original evidence thus taken during the ten days prescribed by law for taking of rebutting testimony.

906. The case of Bromberg v. Haralson, continued.

Clear and satisfactory proof of fraud or mistake is required to remove the legal presumption in favor of the correctness of the acts of sworn election officers.

Isolated cases of violence or intimidation do not justify a rejection of the poll.

The mere presence of United States soldiers in the neighborhood of the polls, unaccompanied by disorderly or threatening conduct, does not vitiate the poll.

As to the merits of the contest, several considerations were involved:

(1) Extensive frauds were alleged in the city of Mobile through the agency of a club organized for the purpose of encouraging fraudulent voting.

The committee discuss at length the quality of the evidence required for proof of such a charge:

> The burden of proof is always upon the contestant or the party attacking the official returns. The presumption is that the officers charged by law with the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result have discharged that duty faithfully. (Am. El. L., secs. 306, 394, subdiv. 10.)
> The action of a board of supervisors of election, when in due form, is prima facie correct, and it must stand until it is shown by extrinsic evidence to be illegal and unjust. The presumption is always the commission of a fraudulent or illegal act, and in favor of the honesty and correctness of the official acts of a sworn officer. The rule on this subject is thus stated in the New Jersey cases, 1 Bartlett, 25:
> "It is not sufficient that there should exist a doubt as to whether the vote is lawful or not; but conviction of its illegality should be reached to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt before the committee are authorized to deduct it from the party for whom it was received at the polls."
> The true rule is believed to be one which, while it may not require the exclusion of all reasonable doubt, does require clear and satisfactory proof of fraud or mistake before the legal presumption in favor of the correctness of the acts of sworn officers shall be nullified. The testimony of a conspirator swearing to his own infamy and implicating others in the same crime is always jealously scrutinized, and unless corroborated in material points by evidence coming from uncontaminated sources, can not generally be received as sufficient to establish a litigated fact. And if in addition to this, such conspirator declines to submit to a full, thorough, and searching cross-examination upon the whole subject-matter testified to by him in his examination in chief, this circumstance casts additional suspicion upon his testimony. And if to this be also added the fact that such conspirator is at the time he so testifies the paid agent of the party producing him in ascertaining and arranging the evidence for his employer, this circumstance is one calculated to cast additional doubt and suspicion upon his testimony. There was a period in the history of both English and American jurisprudence when the paid attorney or counsel of a litigant party would not be heard to testify in behalf of his client.
> Bearing in mind these salutary rules, there can be found no reliable evidence to sustain the charges of fraud and overcome the legal presumption in favor of the returns. It would seem upon its bare statement incredible that, in the city of Mobile, at an election where the contestant polled 6,497 votes, mostly cast by the intelligent and lately master race, a number nearly 2,000 in excess of the entire vote polled for the sitting Member, such a conspiracy to repeat, if it existed, could have been consummated. It demands large credulity to believe that in the presence of 6,500 white voters, intelligent, alert, jealously watching their rights, 250 colored men, with the aid of a few white leaders, could have polled about 2,000 votes, or in the neighborhood of 1,700 fraudulent votes. There are nine witnesses who were examined to prove that such a fraud was consummated.

The witnesses, however, did not testify to any specific acts of illegal voting, and the report concludes:

> This evidence given by these conspirators is so vague, indefinite, and contradictory that if it came from purer and less suspicious sources it would furnish no safe or reliable basis upon which to act.

To undertake to purge the poll upon such evidence would be impossible. No man can safely say how many illegal votes, if any, were cast. There is no basis furnished by the evidence from which it can be determined whether there was 1 or 1,000 illegal votes cast. Admitting that there is evidence that there were some illegal votes cast, still, no reliable data are furnished to show how many there were. The result in such case would be that the whole poll would have to be thrown out. The rule is thus stated in Howard v. Cooper, 1 Bartlett, 275: "When the result in any precinct has been shown to be so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deducible therefrom, then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents as well as the evident requirements of truth not only sanction but call for the rejection of the entire poll when stamped with the characteristics here shown." The application of this rule would end the contestant's case if every other charge of fraud were admitted, and it is therefore safe to say that he will concede that the proper rule is not to reject this poll.

(2) As to intimidation:

The report says:

As to the violence, intimidation, and deception alleged to have been practiced by the Republican voters in Mobile County, the evidence is so meager and unsatisfactory that it can serve no useful purpose to enter into an analysis of it. While there doubtless were isolated cases of violence and intimidation, the election seems in the main to have been orderly, full, and fair. All the witnesses, with perhaps one single exception, testify that they were amply protected in voting as they pleased. This evidence presents a case which the precedents concur in showing can not affect the poll. (McCrary, secs. 416, 424, 586; Harrison v. Davis, 1 Bartlett, 341; Brown v. Loan, ib., 482.) Nor is there anything in the argument that the colored vote polled was so large as to suggest the existence of illegal voting. The census of 1870 shows the population of Mobile County to have been 49,311, divided by races as follows: Whites, 28,195; colored, 21,107. The evidence tends to show that there has been little increase in the population since that time, and that the races maintain about the same relative proportions. The contestant, in 1874, received 6,497 votes, and the sitting Member 4,753. It may be safely inferred that each race voted about equally solid for the candidate of its own color and blood. On this basis the contestant received 1 vote for every 4.34 inhabitants, while the sitting Member received only 1 vote for every 4.44 inhabitants, thus showing a larger vote polled in proportion to the population by the white than by the colored people. Hence it seems clear that the poll of Mobile County ought not to be disturbed.

(3) In Monroeville, in Monroe County, both bribery and intimidation by soldiers were alleged. Of the latter charge the report says:

There was a small squad of United States soldiers stationed at Monroeville, and on the day of the election they were in the neighborhood of the polls. But the evidence fails to show any disorderly or threatening conduct on their part, and it is apparent that no man of ordinary firmness was or could have been thereby intimidated from voting. The allegation that the presence of this small squad of soldiers intimidated a large number of Democratic voters and kept them from voting the Democratic ticket is not sustained. Indeed, in the year 1872 the contestant received, at the Monroeville precinct, 214 Democratic votes only, while in 1874, at the same precinct, he received 218 votes.

907. The case of Bromberg v. Haralson, continued.

The Elections Committee leaned to the view that a promise of general distribution of food to voters was a corrupting influence justifying purging of the poll.

Discussion as to validity of English rule that to justify rejection of votes bribery must be practiced by the candidate or agent.

It is not safe to assume voting by nonresidents on mere testimony as to migrations of large numbers of persons.

(4) The above precinct of Monroeville was attacked on other grounds, however. The report says:

It is established by the evidence before the committee that a report was industriously circulated among the colored voters that in order for them to obtain bacon they would have to vote the straight

Republican ticket; that if they received bacon, and afterwards neglected or refused to vote the Republican ticket, they would forfeit their legal rights; that they should come to Monroeville on election day, and that Perrin would give them a big barbecue and meat enough to last them a year. It seems that no effort was made by the Republican leaders to correct these reports and disabuse the minds of the colored voters of their truth. It is testified by Perrin and many others that, in their opinion, the belief in the truth of these reports induced the colored voters to cast for the sitting Member at least 800 votes more than he would otherwise have received. The evidence fails to connect the sitting Member with these reprehensible practices. But it is apparent that these corrupt practices did have an influence to swell the vote of the sitting Member at this precinct. There are but a few voters who are shown to have been directly influenced to vote otherwise than they would have done by these means. It is apparent that more were corrupted than can be distinctly proved to have been influenced. It is probable that the truth has between the extremes. On the one hand it is claimed that at least 800 votes were obtained for the sitting Member by corruption and bribery; on the other hand it is claimed that this estimate is proved by the mere opinions of witnesses, and that the evidence does not point distinctly to more than 10 or 12 voters who are shown to have been thus corrupted. It perhaps would be fair to assume that the whole vote cast at this precinct in excess of the vote of two years before, when no such influence existed, was cast by voters who came there under the influence of the corrupt practices and promises disclosed in the evidence. At the Congressional election held in that precinct in 1872, the total vote polled was 516, and at the Congressional election in 1874 the total vote polled was 848. The excess in 1874 over the vote of 1872 is thus shown to be 332. The practice indulged in by Perrin and others to corrupt the colored voters in this county is of a most shameless and reprehensible character. It strikes at the foundations of republican government, and poisons the very sources whence all legitimate authority flows. No system of government can long endure where public opinion tolerates such conduct. Its general prevalence must lead to anarchy and bloodshed, and loosen the very ligaments binding society together. It strikes a fatal blow at the social compact. It overturns all just distinctions between honesty and corruption in the delegation of authority to the representatives of the people. No language can too strongly express our disapproval of the practices indulged in to corrupt the purity of the ballot box, at Monroeville, in particular. Votes thus obtained, even if cast by legal voters, it would seem ought to be rejected as illegal and void, even though it is not shown that the candidate who received them knew or consented to the corrupt practices whereby they were obtained. Such is the rule of law laid down in the unanimous judgment of a highly respectable court of last resort in one of the States of the Union. In that cue it is said:

"In our form of government, where the administration of public affairs is regulated by the will of the people, or a majority of them, expressed through the ballot box, the free exercise of the elective franchise by the qualified voters is a matter of the highest importance. The safety and perpetuity of our institutions depend upon this. It is therefore particularly important that every voter should be free from any pecuniary influence. For this reason the attempt by bribery to influence an elector in giving his vote or ballot is made an indictable offense. * * * Can a vote thus obtained, in direct violation of the statute, be considered a valid or legal vote? If it can, then the very object of the statute, which is that it should not be so obtained, is defeated. We are of opinion that such votes are illegal, and that the judge was right in directing the jury to disregard them. This conclusion is sustained by the authorities, so far as we have been able to find any." (State ex rel. Hopkins v. Olin, 23 Wis., 326.)

The Lex Parliamentaria of England seems to require that the bribery which will justify the rejection of a vote shall be practiced by the candidate to be affected, or by his agent. It is not necessary to the decision of this case to determine which rule should be applied in election cases depending before this House, and hence the committee express no judgment upon it. If it should be held that 332 votes cast at this precinct should be thrown out, or that every vote cast for the sitting Member should be rejected, it would not affect the result at which the committee have arrived.

Further on the report says:

No sufficient evidence has been produced to warrant the rejection of any votes cast in Monroe County except at the Monroeville precinct.

(5) Changes were made that in Dallas County 1,000 votes were cast by persons not residents of the county. The report says:

There was a large body of testimony produced before the committee which tended in some degree to raise an inference that a large number of votes had been cast by nonresidents of the county. This testimony is susceptible of being grouped into two general classes:

1. The testimony of a large number of witnesses showing quite a large emigration of colored people from this county since the year 1869.

In the opinion of the witnesses the number was from 2,000 to 3,000, of whom it is estimated that from one-half to three-fourths were colored voters.

2. The second class of testimony is that of railroad officers, steamboat men, and other persons engaged directly or indirectly in procuring and sending away colored laborers into Western States, particularly Mississippi and Louisiana.

It is quite apparent that it would be unsafe to hold that illegal votes had been cast on deductions drawn from testimony so infirm. The number of persons removing into the county would have to be ascertained; also how many of those who went abroad to seek labor went away temporarily and afterwards returned would have to be determined; and, in addition to this, it would be necessary to determine how many who were minors in 1869 had attained their majority in 1874. With so many elements of uncertainty the committee do not realize the force which the contestant attached to this class of proofs.

Therefore the committee held that the charge was not made out.

In conclusion the-committee found:

In conclusion, and without entering into any recapitulation of the votes rejected by the committee in the several precincts in this district, the committee content themselves with the statement that when all such illegal votes have been rejected, it still lacks much of overcoming the majority of nearly 2,700, which the sitting Member received; and it is believed no beneficial purpose would be subserved by any more minute analysis of the votes which we agree should be rejected.

And your committee have unanimously agreed to report to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Frederick G. Bromberg was not elected a Member of the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That Jere Haralson was elected a Member of the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States and is entitled to a seat in this House.

On April 18[1] the House agreed to the resolutions without debate or division.

908. The Illinois election case of Le Moyne v. Farwell, in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Where rejection of the poll (although undoubtedly merited) would accrue to advantage of the offending party, the House purged by deducting the illegal votes from the latter's poll.

On April 10, 1876,[2] John T. Harris, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Illinois case of Le Moyne v. Farwell. The official returns gave sitting Member a majority of 186. The contestant alleged fraud and irregularities. Three questions arose, the first two being of essential importance.

(1) In the first precinct of the Twentieth Ward of Chicago the returns gave sitting Member a majority of 171 votes. It was admitted by the whole committee that these returns were entirely unreliable. The minority say:

In reference to this precinct the committee are all agreed that the election was thoroughly corrupt; that an organized effort was made to commit fraud, commencing with a false registration list and ending in the polling of hundreds of illegal votes. Unless these votes can be eliminated and the poll purged, we must reject the entire returns, as the number of fraudulent votes cast was clearly sufficient to change the majority. We clearly recognize the duty to follow the rule, that the exclusion of an entire poll is the very last resort, and that it must never be done where there is any rational means by, which the illegal votes can be eliminated and we be enabled to arrive at the truth. In this case no such means exists. The evidence clearly shows not only fraud, but that the judges of the election were parties to it, that they were corrupt and dishonest, and so conducted the election that frauds might be and were committed. They would not respect challenges nor allow challengers in the room; they numbered the ballots so that no one can tell who cast them, although under the Illinois law it was their duty to place on the ballot cast by each voter a number corresponding to that opposite his name on the poll list; and when the ballots were produced from the clerk's office, it was found not only that the ballots were not so numbered, but that on a count there was a discrepancy of 48 against Farwell between the returns of the officers and a count of the ballots. These facts destroy the prima facie character of the returns, the judges are impeached, and their returns become as blank paper.

The only question which arose, then, was as to the disposition of the poll, whether it should be wholly rejected or purged. While the majority of the committee—seven in all-sustained the whole report, which recommended purging, yet two of this seven indorsed their dissent and favored the entire rejection of the vote. The four minority members also favored the rejection of the vote, so on this branch of the case the report submitted by the majority of the committee actually represented the opinion of a minority.

The report makes this argument:

Presumption is raised against contestee from the fact of his receiving a large majority in the precinct. It is also proven that one person who was furnishing names to illegal voters was providing them with tickets bearing contestee's name, and that the four men who made out the fraudulent registry, who, with one addition, constituted the judges and clerks of election, all voted for contestee. All the testimony proving illegal voting in this precinct is adduced by contestant. The contestee has called no witness nor made any attempt to show an illegal vote in the precinct, nor does he claim that there was any fraud practiced therein by contestant, but in his answer says that there was no illegal votes given for him in said precinct, and only asks to have the whole vote of the precinct thrown out, after the number of illegal votes proven by contestant to have been given to contestee exceeds his (contestee's) majority in the precinct. Contestee's majority in the precinct is 171. The number of illegal votes proven to have been given him in the precinct is 252, so that a rejection of the whole poll would give to contestee the advantage of the difference between these numbers, or 81 votes. "No man shall be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong," is one of the plainest and best settled of legal principles. The law says, "A wrongful or fraudulent act shall not be allowed to conduce to the advantage of the party who committed it." The old rule is, "At law fraud destroys rights. If I mix my corn with another's, he takes all." If contestee can have the whole vote of this precinct rejected because of the fraud perpetrated by his own supporters and in his own interest, as proven in the record and not denied, then he is rewarded to the extent of 81 votes for the perpetration of said frauds. The proposition appears to be inequitable and illegal, bordering too closely upon absurdity to admit of argument.

By the law of elections it is held (American Law of Elections, sec. 304):

"Nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of the votes were given ought to vacate an election."

Again, section 305, page 231:

"It is the first duty of the tribunal trying the contest to purge the poll of the illegal votes, if this can be done."

This rule is particularly applicable in a case where it is proven that illegal votes were received and counted, rather than in cases where from the proof of irregularities upon the part of the judges it was to be presumed that the count and returns were illegal. The method used in this election was such that had fairness and honesty been observed, the poll of this precinct could have been purged with certainty and without difficulty. Every voter's name was entered upon the poll book as he voted. Opposite his name was written the street and number of his residence, as given by himself; also a poll-book number, and the testimony of the judges shows that the same number as that opposite his name on the poll book was written on the ballot of every voter before it was put into the box, so that when proof is made that any name on the poll book is fictitious, or not the name of a legal voter, it is only necessary to select the ballot bearing the corresponding number, and thus identify the candidate from whose vote the deduction should be made. In this case the proof shows that after the election was closed, the ballot box was taken off by one of the judges to the house of a candidate on the same ticket with the contestee, and there left for two days before the official returns were made, and that the friends of contestee having charge thereof withheld their returns until the other precincts were heard from; that when said official returns were made the ballots were sealed and returned to the county clerk, and were not again opened until in taking the testimony in this case they were produced and opened in the presence of the parties to this contest or their attorneys and the officers taking the testimony. Then great irregularity appeared in the numbering of the ballots. There were found 183 names on the poll book for which no ballots were found, 198 ballots of duplicate and triplicate numbers. There were only 673 names on the poll book, but there are ballots numbered 674, 675, 675, 676, and 677. It is clear that the ballot box had been tampered with, but it must be remembered that the box was in the custody of the friends and supporters of contestee, which raises the presumption that whatever alterations or changes were made were in his interest and to his advantage. It must be to the disadvantage of contestant to be forced to purge this poll of fraudulent or illegal votes, after the ballots had been thus manipulated by the friends and in the interest of contestee. In such a condition of things, would it be inequitable or unfair to hold that whenever an illegal vote was proven it should be charged to contestee, whether a ballot bearing a corresponding number was found for him or not? In the case of Duffey (4th Brewster, p. 531), the court held, "Upon notice, etc., that fraudulent votes had been received, the burden of proof falls upon the candidate advantaged by the count, to show that the person so voting was a legal voter or voted for his opponent; otherwise it will be presumed that they were polled and counted for him, and the poll will be purged by striking the whole number of such votes from his count." This ruling was no doubt based upon the presumption that the party receiving the majority is responsible for the fraud, and upon which presumption the court felt warranted in throwing the burden of proof on him, and thus purging the poll. But the application of this rule, which might be claimed to be stringent, is not asked or contended for in this case. Here it is only proposed to deduct from the returned vote of the contestee the number of illegal votes, with ballots bearing numbers corresponding to the names of the illegal voters proven to have been received by him in this precinct (there are 84 names in addition to these proven to be of illegal voters, for which there are no ballots, and we disregard them), and it is held that the adoption of this method for the purging of said poll will necessitate the deduction of 252 votes from the returned votes of contestee.

The minority views,[1] after quoting section 442 of McCrary's American Law of Elections, say:

> Returns which are impeached are good for no purpose whatever; they prove nothing; and to us the result seems inevitable that if it is admitted, as it is by every member of the committee, that the judges of the election were corrupt and the election fraudulent, that then the whole of the return becomes valueless, does not import verity, and can be used for no purpose whatsoever. The rule of the law, falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, applies and we have no middle course except to admit all or reject all; and we shall not attempt to argue the absurdity of taking ballots from the same source, numbered by the same hands, and which are proved to be numbered wrongfully, and from these numbers and ballots determine who the illegal voters cast their ballots for. The rule is a safe one; no one is injured by it; it deprives no one of a single legal vote; for when returns are excluded, it is always in the power of the candidate who believes he has a majority of the legal votes to call the voters and prove whom they cast their ballots for.

In the debate it was urged[2] that the officers of the election were not the agents of either party, but were officers of the law, and there was no presumption one way or the other on account of their acts. Legal authorities on this point were adduced.

909. The case of Le Moyne v. Farwell, continued.

Illustration of a vague and uncertain specification in a notice of contest, which was nevertheless considered.

Discussion by a divided committee as to the status of paupers at a poorhouse with reference to question of residence.

Discussion as to the evidence required to reject votes of alleged paupers received and counted by the election officers.

The House declined to be bound by a decision of a State court on an analogous question, but not the identical question of qualification of voters.

(2) The majority report thus sets forth a question as to the residence of certain alleged paupers:

> Norwood Park: At this precinct the contestee received 51 and contestant 94 votes.
> The contestee, in his answer, charges:
> "Third. That a large number of illegal voters, to wit, over one hundred, who temporarily were inmates of the poorhouse in the town of Norwood Park, and who were not legal voters of said town, were allowed to cast their votes for you, which were counted and returned for you."
> This charge is very vague and uncertain, and leaves the reader in ignorance of any other objection to these voters than the simple fact that they are paupers. But as the law of Illinois allows paupers to vote, it is evident that the objection, as disclosed by the testimony and the brief of the contestee, is to the residence of these supposed paupers.

The report criticises the evidence presented to prove that these were paupers as negative and not the best evidence when the law of Illinois required a list of persons admitted to the poorhouse to be kept as a public document.

The votes of the alleged paupers were received in accordance with all the precautions of the law as to challenges. Therefore the majority report argues:

> No fraud being proved, or attempted to be proved, in the officers who received the votes, the question recurs, what degree of proof, as to the illegality of these voters, ought to obtain to justify this committee in excluding votes thus received, counted, and duly certified?
> In the celebrated New Jersey cases (1 Bart., p. 25) the committee say:
> "It is not sufficient that there should exist a doubt as to whether the vote is lawful or not, but conviction of its illegality should be reached to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt before the committee are authorized to deduct it from the party for whom it was received at the polls."
> In Rogers's Law and Practice of Election Committees, page 116, it is said:
> "So in petitions against candidates on the ground of want of sufficient qualification, although a negative is to be proved, it is the usage of Parliament that the party attacking the qualification is bound to disprove it."
> So run all the authorities, that a vote once legally cast can not be set aside except upon proof so strong as to produce the certain moral conviction that the said vote was illegal. The burden of proof is on the party assailing the vote. See Cessna v. Myers (McCrary, p. 426), wherein Judge Hoar, in behalf of the committee, says, "The burden of proof, when either party insists that a vote should be deducted from those cast and returned for his competitor, is upon that party to show the person whose vote is in question voted, and that he voted for his competitor, and that he lacked some one of the qualifications to constitute him a voter."
> Admit, for the argument, that the law of Illinois disqualifies paupers from voting in that State, is the testimony in this case sufficient to satisfy the judgment that those "employees," as they were called, were paupers? We think not, though, secondarily, the weight of evidence is that they were a class employed by the superintendent of the poorhouse by order of the board to do work upon the county farm an about the premises, and to receive their clothing and food as a compensation. We know the human heart revolts at being called a pauper, and that there are many, many poor persons in every county who would gladly work the remainder of their days for their food and clothing rather than be called paupers. To this class, it seems to your committee, these voters belong. Therefore, in the light of the authorities and the evidence, your committee could not strike off these votes, even if the law prohibited paupers from voting. But the law of Illinois does allow paupers to vote, and the contestee attacks, in his evidence and the brief of his very learned and able counsel, the residence of these parties. This brings us to consider the law of residence within the meaning of the constitution of Illinois so as to allow the exercise of the election franchise.

No question has been more discussed and to less purpose than the definitions of "residence" and "domicile." No two authors precisely agree in their attempt to define them. But all agree upon the universal principle that every man must have a domicile. We can well understand why a strict rule should apply in the definitions of these terms, as has ever been and will be, in regard to domicile where the rights of property, the law of descent and distribution, the law of the duty of the citizen or the subject to his government, are involved. We can as readily see, in regard to suffrage, why the strictness of the rule should not apply in our Government. While the extent to which suffrage may be carried is under the control of the law power of the several States, conferred by their constitutions, yet suffrage in some form is inherent in our Government and forms its very basis. Without the free and legitimate exercise of this right, we can have no republican government; and all laws passed by the States requiring its exercise in particular localities and requiring a residence are not to abridge the sacred right, but to guard and protect it from abuse and violation.

The report then goes on to quote Vattel, Story, the American Cyclopedia, Bouvier, and the House cases of Monroe v. Jackson, Covode v. Foster, Taylor v. Reading, and Cessna v. Myers, and concludes:

Upon this brief summary of these cases, it is evident that the weight of authority is to the point that paupers at a poorhouse do acquire there a residence within the meaning of the election laws prescribing a residence as a requisite to suffrage.

There had been in Illinois decisions of the court (Paine v. The Town of Durham, 29 Ill., 125; Freeport v. Supervisors, 41 Ill., 41) that paupers did not lose their residence in the towns from which they went, nor did they acquire a residence at the poorhouse. The report calls attention to the fact that the law of Illinois allowed the towns to take care of their own poor or to have them cared for at a county poorhouse. It was therefore evident that had the court authorized the contrary doctrine, the town where the county poorhouse was located would become responsible for all the county paupers. The report points out that these decisions have reference to a police matter merely and have "no reference or bearing upon the constitutional provision in regard to suffrage." Therefore the majority of the committee decline to be bound by the decisions of the court.

The report quotes the constitution of Illinois:

Every person having resided in this State one year, in the county ninety days, and the election district thirty days shall be entitled to vote.

A law passed by the legislature also provided as quoted and commented on in the report:

"A permanent abode is necessary to constitute a residence within the meaning of the preceding section."

Certainly it will not be contended that the legislature had a right to change the constitution, or so to construe it as to enlarge or restrict the right of voting. It can do neither, and their act on the subject of residence is null and void; and we must decide this question as if it had never passed, and look alone to the constitution for our guide. By that constitution we find "every person having resided," etc. This is certainly putting the question of residence in its mildest form, and rebuts the presumption that the constitution means that a man, before he can vote in Illinois, must have a domicile in the sense of the old and strict construction of that word when applied to contracts, distribution, etc. In the opinion of your committee, "having resided" simply means that a man shall, in good faith, have lived in Illinois for twelve months, not as a mere itinerant or visitor, but that he shall have been substantially engaged in business there during that time. Given the construction contended for by contestee, then there is a very large class in that State who do not dwell in poorhouses who would be disfranchised. The law of Illinois is rather singular in this. It requires the relatives of a poor person, if they are able, first to support them, in the following order: First, children shall support their parents; next, parents support their children; next, brothers and sisters; next, grandchildren; next, grandparents. And it is made the duty of the State's attorney for the county to apply to the court for judgment and award of execution such relative for the support of his pauper kinsman; for the statute recognizes all persons as paupers who are not able to support themselves. Will it be contended that these poor persons, living in the family of their relatives, do not acquire a home, a residence there, because they are placed there in obedience to the law? Surely not. If so, we would witness the painful spectacle of disabled soldiers and some of the most intelligent citizens disfranchised because of poverty and because they live in the family of their relatives, away from the town in which they had previously lived.

This is as much their poorhouse under the law as the county building is the poorhouse of those who have no relatives within the degree able to support them. If the home of the family in which he lives is not his, then he has none—no home on earth. So with the pauper at the poorhouse. It is his home, his residence; he has none other. It is idle to say his residence is a restrained one. It is not. He can leave when he pleases. He is there for no offense; paying the penalty of no violated law. His only crime is poverty, and he is there to receive the bounty of his county or his town, as the most convenient place. It is a necessity that compels him to go there, but it is not the necessity of duress which deprives him of his volition and his intent. Unlike the lunatic, the infant, and feme covert, he is a free agent, to think and act for himself, except so far as he is restrained by poverty. The humblest citizen in his little hut, living perhaps on one meal a day, is restrained by poverty, yet he is a freeman and a voter. That necessity which compelled them to go to the poorhouse will compel them to remain; and if there be one class above another whose homes, whose residences, are fixed, it is this class of persons. We presume but few go animo revertendi, but they go with the expectation of spending the remainder of their days there. Then admitting these persons to be paupers, which we do not, in the opinion of this committee, their home, their residence, their permanent abiding place is at the poorhouse, and they have a right to vote in the Norwood Park precinct, in which the poorhouse is.

The minority views combat the above argument:

Norwood Park is a small country precinct, casting outside the poor farm only eighty-four votes. In such a precinct every man knows and is acquainted with his neighbor, and especially is this true of the officers and business men in such a place; and when these come up and testify that they do not know these men, and have never known them there, the evidence seems to us very conclusive. In speaking of this class of testimony Mr. McCray says (American Law of Elections, sec. 356):

"This kind of evidence is admissible for what it is worth, but it is manifest its value must depend upon circumstances. If the district or territory within which the voter resides is large or very populous, and the witness has not an intimate and extensive acquaintance with the inhabitants, the evidence will be of little value, and, standing alone, will avail nothing. But on the other hand, if such district or territory be not large or populous, and if the witness shows his acquaintance with the inhabitants is such that he could scarcely fail to know any person who may have resided therein long enough to become a voter, his evidence may be quite satisfactory, especially if it further appears that soon after the election the alleged nonresident voter could not be found in the district within the limits of which all voters must reside. Proof of this character must at least be regarded sufficient to shift the burden upon the party claiming that the vote of such alleged nonresident be counted and require him to show affirmatively that he is a bona fide resident."

The evidence in this case of Winship, justice of the peace; Corse, town clerk; Pennoyer, an old resident of ten years; Ball, who had lived in the town since it was organized and had been through it three times within two years in assessing and collecting taxes, and of Stockwell, certainly is sufficient to change the burden of proof and throw upon Mr. Le Moyne the duty of showing such prior residence. But instead of attempting this, Mr. Kimberly, the warden of the poor farm, and Mr. Le Moyne's only witness, directly testifies that he does not know that these men had been residents of Norwood Park, and if corroborative evidence was necessary that they had no residence in the town except at the poor farm, it is found in the fact that John Walsh, deputy warden of the poor farm, signs all the affidavits as witness, showing in itself that the men were not acquainted in the town. Now, if these men had no prior residence at Norwood Park could they have obtained one by being inmates of the poorhouse? To us the answer is plain—that as employees they could; as paupers they could not

The minority then examines the authorities, after which they consider the status of the alleged paupers, coming to the following conclusions:

We believe every rule of evidence would require us to come to the conclusion that the seventeen men whom Mr. Kimberly will not attempt to prove to be employees were paupers; for certainly their place of residence, their appearance, the manner in which they were brought to the polls, and the manner in which they were voted would raise that presumption, and, in the language of Mr. McCrary, at least shift the burden of proof upon the contestant.

Were the others not also paupers? Mr. Kimberly, the warden of the poor farm, testifies that they belonged to a class of employees "to whom, in lieu of money, I allow payment in the way of extra clothing, board, and accommodation and liberties"—persons who were not on the pay rolls, but employed as "assistants in the bakery, cooks in the kitchen, men in the washhouse and soup house, men in care of the wards of the almshouse, nurses, teamsters, men in care of the stock, and men on the farm—gardeners." They are paid in "extra board, accommodations, clothing, and are allowed small perquisites, liberty." The same witness stated that he could not state where the men came from, but presumes "most of them were convalescent patients from the hospital, and that they came on physicians' certificates in the city, and that, as a general thing, they came to the institution as paupers;" that, "generally, this extra employment was given to the inmates of the institution." He also states the regular corps of employees consisted of twenty-one men and twenty-three women. We submit that this evidence of Mr. Kimberly is conclusive that these men were paupers, and came there mostly from the city. The manner in which such institutions are usually conducted is, to have a regular force of persons hired and paid to take charge, and that the assistants are always paupers; that the very object of having such an institution on a farm is to furnish such employment as the inmates may be capable of performing, so that they may, in part, make the institution self-supporting; and we do not understand that the mere fact that paupers labor, that a system of rewards is established to encourage them to labor, that thereby their status is changed. The very evidence of Kimberly calling their pay "extras" shows that without this employment they would receive ordinary fare. Notice his language: "Extra board," "extra clothing," "privileges at first table," "extra diet,' "in the winter time an extra meal," "extra allowance of clothing," "privilege of selecting their own ward," "small perquisites." The evidence is so convincing that we hardly feel that we need go beyond Kimberly's testimony to show that these employees were paupers from the city; but we have, besides, conclusive evidence as to their status. Comparing the lists we have made of persons who called themselves paupers and those whom Kimberly calls employees, we find that the names of Thomas Sage, Hugh Gallagher, Daniel McFarland, I. A. Hipwell, John Campbell, Daniel Boyle, and M. A. Kinsella appear on both lists, showing that these men did not conceive these extras changed their status, and that they were not paupers, supported by the county, as they stated they were. If ever a witness was contradicted, Mr. Kimberly is, by the very facts he testifies to, and by the statements of the very men whom he claims as his employees. The conclusion, to our mind, is irresistible, that these persons were never residents of Norwood Park, and were paupers; and we reject the votes of each and all of the forty-seven voters named on our two lists.

A return made up "irregu1arly from ballots that had not been properly kept" was rejected.

Affidavits given by nonregistered voters need not be signed; but the jurat must appear or the votes are rejected.

(3) The report rejects the returns from the third precinct of the Eighteenth Ward of Chicago "as wanting in regularity and certainty." After the election had closed the ballot box, ballots, and all papers pertaining to the election were taken to a saloon and left over-night in inadequate custody of one who was not an officer of election or authorized to have care of the ballot box under the law. On the day after the election some of the election officers with others unauthorized took charge of the box and papers, made a count, and drew up a return, which was claimed to be an official return.

(4) The report further says as to another precinct:

> Contestee objects to a number of affidavits furnished by nonregistered voters, because of their not being signed by the affiants, though properly certified to by the officer taking the same. We hold that said affidavits are clearly sufficient. In this precinct contestant objects to seven affidavits furnished by voters for contestee, upon the ground that they do not appear to have been sworn to before any officer. There is no jurat thereto; it is agreed that the same are fatally defective, and 6 votes therefore should be deducted from contestee.

As a result of their reasonings the majority report finds contestant elected by a majority of 106 votes, and presents resolutions unseating sitting Member and seating contestant.

The report was fully debated in the House for three days, and on May 3 [1] resolutions declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat offered by the minority as a substitute, were disagreed to, yeas 89, nays 129. Then the resolutions of the majority, seating contestant, were agreed to without division.

911. The Minnesota election case of Cox v. Strait, in the Forty-fourth Congress.

The State legislature having included a county within a Congressional district, the House did not examine whether or not it was technically entitled to be so included.

County commissioners having established election districts at a special meeting when the law specified a stated meeting, the action was void.

The election district having been illegally constituted, the votes cast therein were rejected.

On April 12, 1876, [2] Mr. John Harris, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the case of Cox v. Strait, from the Second district of Minnesota. The election in question was held on November 3, 1874, and the official canvass showed a majority of 221 votes for sitting Member. The contestant sought to prove sufficient fraud and irregularities to overturn this result. The questions examined were:

(1) In the vote of the Second district was included that of Kandiyohe County, to which the legislature had in 1870 added what had formerly been Monongalia County. And as the districting act had left to the Third district all counties not specifically enumerated as in the First or Second district, and as Monongalia County was not especially mentioned as in the First or Second district, it was urged by contestant that contestee was not entitled to the majority of 188 votes returned for him from the territory of Monongalia County. The ground of the contestant for making this claim was that the consolidation of the two counties was unconstitutional and void. The report says:

Section 1, article 11, constitution of Minnesota, is as follows:

"The legislature may from time to time establish and organize new counties, but no new county shall contain less than four hundred [square] miles; nor shall any county be reduced below that amount; and all laws changing county lines in counties already organized, or for removing county seats, shall, before taking effect, be submitted to the electors of the county or counties to be affected thereby, at the next general election after the passage thereof, and be adopted by a majority of such electors. Counties now established may be enlarged, but not reduced below four hundred square miles."

The contestant claims that the clause which prohibits the reducing of the counties then existing below 400 square miles, and the provision that counties then existing may be enlarged, but not reduced below 400 square miles, prohibit the extinguishing of the county of Monongalia by consolidating it with the county of Kandiyohi, and that the act of the legislature of Minnesota consolidating those counties is unconstitutional and void, and that Monongalia is now in fact a county, and not being included by name in either the First or Second district, belongs to the Third district instead of the Second. It appears that the object sought to be accomplished by that section of the constitution is to prevent the reducing of the original counties below 400 square miles, and the formation of new counties with a less amount of territory than 400 square miles, and to prevent the changing of county lines in counties then organized without the consent of the electors of the counties to be affected thereby. The legislature certainly has the right to consolidate counties formed subsequent to the adoption of the constitution. There is no direct prohibition to the consolidating of original counties, and thereby forming a new county. The only direct prohibition is that the county so formed shall not contain less than 400 square miles. The power to form new counties without specifying the territory out of which they may be formed certainly gives the right to form a new county by consolidating counties, whether original or otherwise, unless the prohibition relative to reducing the original counties below 400 square miles shall be held to forbid the extinguishment of a county by consolidating it with another county. This does not seem to be the mischief designed to be remedied. In fact, the consolidating of counties might be a remedy for the evil and in manifest futherance of the object of this constitutional provision, viz, to avoid the existence of small counties. Constitutional restriction upon legislation must be plain and certain. A State legislature has supreme power of legislating except where it is restricted by the constitution, and everything will be presumed in favor of the power of the legislature. The courts will not declare an act unconstitutional unless it is clearly made so by an express provision of the constitution. Your committee are strongly of the opinion that the act consolidating those counties is constitutional, but have not deemed it necessary to decide that question in this case. The real question is, What territory was included in the Second district? The representative districts are formed of contiguous territory. In 1872 the legislature of Minnesota set off a certain amount of territory as the First district, a certain amount of territory for the Second district, and then enacted that all the territory of the State not included within the First and Second districts should compose the Third district. The legislature designated the territory to be comprised in the Second district by in naming the counties to be included in it, and it must be assumed that it included the territory which the legislature itself had determined belonged to said counties. The legislature passed the act of 1870 consolidating Monongalia and Kandiyohi counties, and the same was made effectual by the methods provided in the act. The consolidation of the counties was recognized in the division of the State into senatorial and representative districts in 1871 (chap. 20), and it is plain that the legislature when it designated the county of Kandiyohi as a part of the Second district designated it as it was formed by itself and did include in it the territory which formerly composed the county of Monongalia. Your committee, therefore, find that the majority of 188 votes canvassed for the sitting Member was rightly canvassed, and ought not to be deducted from his majority of 221.

(2) As to the illegality of certain voting precincts, the report says:

Second. It is provided (p. 220, Stat. L., see. 19) that the board of commissioners shall meet at the county seat of their respective counties, for the purpose of transacting such business as may devolve upon or be brought before them, on the first Tuesday of January and September in each year, and may hold such extra sessions as they deem necessary for the interest of the county; such extra sessions shall be called by a majority of the board, and the clerk shall give at least ten days' notice thereof to the commissioners, but no regular session shall continue longer than six days, and no extra session longer than three days.

Page 233, section 31: The commissioners of such county (any county not divided into towns) shall, at their stated meetings in January and September, upon the petition of not less than 10 legal voters not residing within 10 miles of any established election district, create and establish within said county an election district at such point as will be most convenient for the persons so petitioning; but no place of holding elections shall be located in said election districts within 10 miles of any other place of holding elections previously established, nor shall the commissioners create any election district except at the time of their stated meetings, and then only in compliance with the request of 10 or more legal voters residing not less than 10 miles from any established election district. The election districts of Southeast, Blaen Avon, Michigan, South, Ceresco, East, and Northeast were not established at a stated meeting of the county commissioners, but at a special meeting holden October 5, 1874 (pp. 50, 51, record), and were therefore not legally established. The action of the county commissioners was without authority of law, and null and void, and no legal election could be held at either of said districts; therefore 111 votes must be deducted from the majority reported for the contestee—that being the majority he received in said districts which was wrongfully canvassed for him.

912. The case of Cox v. Strait, continued.

Although election officers left the ballot box unguarded while adjourned for dinner, the returns were not rejected in the absence of evidence of fraud.

Although de facto officers presided and returns were transmitted unsealed by an unauthorized person, the House did not reject the return.

As to the evidence required to establish a charge of bribery.

Irregularities unaccompanied by fraud do not vitiate the return.

(3) In the town of West Newton the election judges closed the polls for about an hour while they took dinner, the ballot box being left in the election room, which adjoined that in which the dinner was taken. After quoting the evidence, the report holds:

Your committee regard the conduct of the judges of election at this place in leaving the ballot box for the space of an hour unsealed and unguarded as highly reprehensible. It is of the highest importance that the ballot box should be guarded and protected in the most careful manner; that all the provisions of law made for the security of the ballot should be strictly obeyed. There should not be the least opportunity for tampering with the ballots. It is certainly a serious question whether such an irregularity as this ought not to vitiate the election; but your committee under all the circumstances have not felt compelled to reject this entire poll, there being no evidence that the ballot box was actually tampered with, but, on the contrary, there is some negative testimony showing that it was not tampered with. Your committee would, were there any facts tending to show that the ballot box had been tampered with, have decided to reject the returns from this poll. The adjournment for dinner has frequently been decided not to be sufficient to vitiate an election. The law of the State of Minnesota provides that no election returns shall be refused where there has been a substantial compliance with the law.

Section 40, election law of Minnesota:

"Sec. 40. No election returns shall be refused by any auditor for the reason that the same are returned or delivered to him in any other than the manner directed herein; nor shall the canvassing board of the county refuse to include any returns in their estimate of votes for any informality in holding any election or making returns thereof, but all returns shall be received and the votes canvassed by such canvassing board and included in the abstracts, provided there is a substantial compliance with the provisions of this chapter."

The fact ought also to be considered, in determining what should be done with the votes at this place, that the contestant did not in his notice of contest claim that the ballot box was tampered with, or even left unguarded, but rested his claim to have the vote excluded upon the sole and untenable ground of the adjournment of the judges of election for an hour at noon.

(4) As to West Newton precinct certain questions were settled thus:

It does not appear from the evidence that the ballot box was not all of the time in sight of some one of the election officers during the adjournment for dinner, and we apply the same rule here as in the case of the town of West Newton. It does not appear that any unnaturalized person voted, and the officers who presided at the election were de facto officers, and there is nothing shown which so impeaches their action as to vitiate the poll on that account. The returns should have been conveyed to the county auditor by one of the judges of the election sealed, but were conveyed by the witness, an unauthorized person, and were unsealed. This is a grave irregularity, but the evidence is that he delivered the returns to the county auditor just as he received them from the town canvassers, and this testimony is not impeached. The committee do not, therefore, reject the returns from this town.

(5) As to a charge of bribery:

Sixth. The contestant claims that 200 votes given for the contestee should be deducted for bribery. The evidence shows that Ph. Stelzer received a check for $25 in a letter which purported to be from the contestee, and requesting Stelzer to use his influence in the election for the contestee (pp. 38, 39). Also Julius Christianson received $2 from one J. B. Sackett the day before election, and was promised $2 on election day, "to peddle Republican tickets with H. B. Strait's name on." The $2 promised was paid the day after election. A. J. Lamberton testified that "common report was that J. B. Sackett and William Beckel were distributing a great deal of money for the purpose of buying and influencing votes for H. B. Strait for Member of Congress." But he had no personal knowledge of a dollar having been spent for that purpose. Your committee find the evidence wholly insufficient to establish the charge of bribery.

(6) As to irregularities not accompanied by charges of fraud:

The contestee makes counter charges, alleging irregularities in a large number of voting precincts which gave a majority for the contestant. These voting precincts are in the counties of Carver, Le Sueur, Sibley, and Dakota, but the irregularities, where any are shown to exist, relate to the manner of returning the votes, the swearing of the election officers, and adjournment for dinner, and are not of that nature and character and extent which, unaccompanied with fraud, will vitiate the returns.

In conclusion the committee found:

The committee do not make any deductions from the votes of the contestant, and only deduct from the contestee the majority of 111 votes which were canvassed for him in those precincts in Lyon County which were not legal voting precincts. The returns as corrected give Horace B. Strait 110 majority, instead of 221. Your committee find that he was elected by that majority, and recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Horace B. Strait was duly elected, and is entitled to retain the seat which he now holds from the Second Congressional district of Minnesota.

On June 23 [1] the resolution of the committee was agreed to in the House without debate or division.

913. The Louisiana election case of Spencer v. Morey.

The making of essential tally-lists by unsworn volunteers, combined with other irregularities, caused the rejection of return, although no fraud was shown.

The record of a trial in a State court as to a title to a State office is not competent evidence in an election case, although relating to the election in question.

On April 27, 1876,[1] Mr. John F. House, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Louisiana case of Spencer v. Morey. It was admitted that the result was not impeached in any parts of the district except in the precincts of Carroll Parish and in the Fifth precinct of Concordia Parish. Outside of this contested territory Mr. Spencer, the contestant, received a majority of 1,396 votes. Therefore the sitting Member's majority depended on the disposition of the questions relating to the disputed territory. The examination of the case is naturally divided into two main branches:

(1) As to the fifth precinct of Concordia Parish.

The law of the State provided:

That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election, the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting place shall proceed to count the votes. * * * The votes shall be counted by the commissioners at each voting place immediately after closing the election and without moving the boxes from the place where the votes were received, and the counting must be done in the presence of any bystander or citizen who may be present. Tally lists shall be kept of the count, etc.

SEC. 45. Be it further enacted, &c., That any civil officer or other person who shall assume or pretend to act in any capacity as a commissioner or other officer of election to receive or count votes, to receive returns or ballot boxes, or to do any other act toward the holding or conducting of elections, or the making returns thereof, in violation of or contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not to exceed three years nor less than one year, and by a fine not exceeding three hundred dollars nor less than one hundred dollars.

Of the conduct of the commissioners of the parish the majority report says:

In view of the specific requirements of the law upon the subject, it must be admitted that the conduct of the commissioners in totally disregarding its plain provisions is somewhat extraordinary. The law required them not to remove the ballot box from the place where the election was held until they had counted every vote in it in, the presence of such of the voters as saw fit to be present and witness the counting. This counting they were required to commence immediately on the close of the polls, and their returns were to be made out and delivered to the supervisor of registration within twenty-four hours after the voting ceased.

Instead of doing this, after the close of the election, between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening, they took the ballot box and started with it to Vidalia, the parish site, a distance of some 16 miles from the voting place. Dameron, one of the commissioners, who is sworn by both parties, in his testimony says when the polls were closed the box was locked, and he took the key and gave the box to Robert H. Columbus, another commissioner. They started to Vidalia on horseback, and when they arrived at the store of one Witherspoon, the suggestion was made that Dameron should get into a buggy with one Irvine and take the ballot box in the buggy with him. They then proceeded to Vidalia, one of the commissioners riding in front and the other in rear of the buggy, on horseback. They reached Vidalia between 11 and 12 o'clock that night, and finding the court-house occupied by the officers of election at Vidalia, they went upstairs into the room of the tax collector, opened the box, and commenced counting the votes. They counted until half past 2 o'clock that night, when, being fatigued, they adjourned for the night. When the box was closed, Dameron says he locked it and gave the key to Columbus, and took the box himself with him to the hotel, where he and William C. Yorger, United States supervisor, occupied the same room for the balance of the night. The box was placed under the bed during the night. The next morning, Dameron says, he took the box with him to the table when he went to breakfast. After breakfast they again met in the upstairs room of the court-house, opened the box, and commenced counting, and after counting there a while went down into the court room. They completed their returns on Wednesday night, November 3, between 10 and 11 o'clock, and made their returns to the supervisor of the parish on the next day, 4th November, between 12 m. and 1 o'clock p.m. Dameron further says that during the time they were counting the votes in the tax collector's office there were several spectators present; the tax collector's office was considered a public office; says when he went to his meals, during the counting, he left the box in the court room in charge of his co-commissioner Columbus, and took the key himself, and when Columbus went to his meals he took the key, leaving the box in Dameron's custody. Columbus and Jefferson, the other two commissioners, being colored men, did not take their meals at the same place Dameron did.

The minority views call attention to the fact that Dameron, who was most prominent in the action, represented the political party friendly to contestant. The former law had required the election commissioners to go to Vidalia to count the vote, and they appeared to consider the requirement still in force. The minority views continue:

No other presumption can arise out of this evidence than that they supposed and believed the law required them to go to Vidalia, the parish seat, and there count the votes, and that this was done by them in order to conform with the law, as they supposed it to be, and not with the intent to commit fraud in connection with the election; especially when we understand that the election laws of Louisiana, in force at the last election prior to this one, and for some time prior thereto, provided that "at the conclusion of the election, at each poll, the boxes containing the ballots shall be securely locked and sealed, and taken immediately by the commissioners of election to the parish seat, where they shall be counted out by the said commissioners, in the presence of the supervisors of registration and election of the parish." It certainly would be a violent presumption to presume anything else than this from the evidence before us. There is not a scintilla of evidence proving fraud of any kind, nor is any attempt made to prove fraud by contestant, nor was it urged in argument that any fraud was committed; but it was urged that the mere fact of removing the box gave an opportunity for fraud.

The evidence shows that the box was never out of the hands of the lawful custodians until the votes were counted and the returns made. Until the contestant proves some act showing fraud on the part of the commissioners, or some one of them, or some act from which fraud will, be presumed, the law is that their acts must be taken as having been honestly performed. The legal presumption is against fraud on the part of the officers of election, and that nothing but the most unequivocal proof can destroy the credit of official returns. (See Goggin v. Gilmore, 1 Bart., 70; Little v. Robbins, same; p. 130.) The burden of proof is upon contestant to prove the fraud. We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities to establish this legal proposition. We conclude therefore that, as there is no evidence proving fraud, or any evidence from which fraud can be presumed in connection with this box, the committee will not, in the absence of such proof, conclude that because there was an opportunity for fraud that therefore fraud was committed. Certainly this would be a monstrous violation of the legal presumption in regard to legal acts, viz, that all persons are presumed innocent until proven guilty, that officers are presumed to have performed their duties, and to have performed them honestly, and that the mere opportunity to commit a crime, in the absence of other evidence, will. not be taken as a presumption to establish the fact that a person committed the crime. The evidence regarding this box, taken all together, does not even raise the presumption of fraud.

The majority of the committee say on this point, and on a second question raised as to these returns:

Whatever may be thought as to whether those portions of the law are mandatory or directory which require the votes to be counted at the place where they axe polled, without removing the ballot box, in the presence of such voters as may see fit to witness the count, and the commissioners to make their return to the supervisor of the parish in twenty-four hours after the close of the polls—all of which provisions were intentionally violated or ignorantly disregarded by the commissioners—we assume that there can be no two opinions on the proposition that that part of the law which requires the commissioners to make a correct count of the votes cast is certainly imperative. Before entering upon their duties, as we have seen, they are required to swear that they will "carefully and honestly canvass" the votes. How were the votes at this box counted? How did these commissioners discharge their duty in this respect?

The keeper of the tally list, to all intents and purposes, makes the only record from which the votes can be counted. If his list is correct, the number of votes cast can be correctly ascertained; if his list is erroneous, the returns based on it are necessarily incorrect. The tally keeper is, then, the party who counts the votes. The marks he makes on the paper determine how many votes each candidate has received. It is not pretended, and indeed can not be, that these commissioners had any other mode or means of determining the result of the election than from the tally sheets kept by parties "picked up"—to use Dameron's expression—at random in the court-house to tally the vote. Can sworn commissioners, whom the law places around the ballot box as guardians of its purity, and charges with the duty of "carefully and honestly" canvassing the votes at an election, delegate to unsworn and irresponsible parties the delicate task which the law imposes upon them alone? The law of Louisiana expressly requires tally sheets to be kept; and when properly kept they are authority upon the state of the vote. Says McCrary, in his Law of Elections, section 291:

"In the case last named it was held that the tally sheet kept by the officers of the election is competent evidence, in an election contest, to show the true state of the vote. It is good until impeached, and affords prima facie evidence of the votes cast for such candidate." This gives to the tally sheet kept by officers of the election the same dignity and authority as the returns themselves, and properly so; for the returns are based on the tally sheets, and unless the latter are correct the former can not possibly be so, or import verity. Who were Connell, Joyce, and Nutt, the three parties picked up in the court-house to work upon these tally sheets? All we know of them is their names. They were not officers of the election, and were not sworn to discharge their duties faithfully. By the law of Louisiana it is made a felony for any person not an officer of election to assume to act as such in receiving or counting votes, or doing any other act toward the holding or conducting elections, or making returns thereof; clearly prohibiting all unofficial hands from touching anything connected with holding elections or counting the votes. No legal presumption of correctness attaches to their acts. If the tally sheets kept by them can stand at all, they must stand on extrinsic evidence of their truth, as they can lean on no legal presumption for support. It is no extenuation of such a proceeding as this for witnesses to swear, as Dameron does, that the election was all fair. Of what avail is a fair election with a dishonest or uncertain count of the votes?

But, in addition to the absence of any legal presumption to support such a count, Dameron says, in positive disparagement of the manner in which the tally sheets were kept, "I don't think the tally lists were very regularly kept, as we had no regular tally keepers, and had to pick them up as we could get them. I believe the tally lists were kept as correctly as they could have been kept under the circumstances." Not "very regularly kept," but "I believe" they were "as correctly kept as they could have been kept under the circumstances!" The law required him and his cocommissioners to keep them regularly. They had been sworn to do so, and they were required to know of their own personal knowledge that they were correctly kept, and yet this sworn officer admits they were not very regularly kept, but excuses the irregular manner in which they were kept by saying the commissioners had to pick up such persons as they could get to keep them. Why did they have to pick up anybody to discharge a duty which the law imposed on them and them alone?

The minority [1] thus answer the above argument:

It is further urged by contestant, however, that the fact that the tally keepers were not sworn officers throws suspicion upon the count. All the evidence on this subject is as follows: Dameron says: "I do not think the tally lists were very regularly kept, as we had no regular tally keepers, and had to take them about as we could get them. I believe the tally lists were kept as correctly as they could have been kept under the circumstances." It can not be urged that this statement would throw suspicion upon or impeach the returns, for Dameron swears that they proceeded to make out the returns, and tally lists in accordance with law. The law of Louisiana requires that the election returns shall be sworn to by the commissioners, and Dameron and the other commissioners took and subscribed to the following oath: "Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, duly appointed and qualified, commissioners of election of poll No.—, election precinct of the parish of—, for the general election held November 2, 1874, who, being duly sworn, depose and say that they received the ballots cast at the said poll of the said precinct, and that the above is a true return of the vote cast at the said poll on the said day.

[1] Minority views were submitted by Mr. G. Wiley Wells, of Mississippi.

It is not presumed that Mr. Dameron would be willing to swear and subscribe to that which was untrue. And it is a conclusive legal presumption that he was satisfied at the time when the return was made that it contained a correct statement, as he swore. Nor does Mr. Dameron swear that the return is not correct, nor is there any evidence tending to disprove the return. The return, therefore, stands, taking all the evidence in regard to it, as unimpeached. The law is well established, and this House has repeatedly held that the introduction of persons who were not sworn to assist in holding the election will not of itself vitiate the return of the officers, without evidence of fraud. (Eggleston v. Strader, 2 Bart., 897.) The evidence in this case proves that all the officers were regularly appointed and sworn, but that the commissioners requested some bystanders to assist in keeping tally lists while counting the vote. It can not be maintained for one moment that, in the absence of any proof of fraud or irregularities, the legal returns should be rejected for this reason. There remains but one other ground that can be urged against the receiving and counting of these returns from this box, viz, the removing of the box from the poll before the vote was counted. Taking the evidence altogether, we are of the opinion that it established only an irregularity, and the only question to be determined in regard to this poll is whether the ballots cast at this poll shall be thrown out on account of the votes not having been counted at the poll before it was removed.

The minority further call attention to the fact that the supreme court of Louisiana (case of Burton et al. v. Hicks et al.) had declared the Louisiana law providing the regulations as to the manner of conducting and holding an election as directory merely. The minority say also:

Even without the opinion of the supreme court, we are satisfied that the law in contested elections sustains us in asserting that these clauses are directory and not mandatory, and must be interpreted, in view of the evidence, as directory in this particular case, for the reason that the evidence does not tend to show that the actual merits of the election were affected by a noncompliance with their provisions.

But the majority of the committee say:

The commissioners disregarded an imperative provision of the law without the observance of which there can be no safety or certainty in elections.

The integrity of their returns and their prima facie character are therefore destroyed. There being no proof outside of the returns of the vote of this ward or poll, it must be excluded from the count.

(2) The second branch of the case referred to the election in various precincts of Carroll parish. The law of Louisiana provided that at each polling place after the close of the polls the commissioners should count the votes—and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn, to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all such commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling places, to consolidate such returns to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns with the originals received by him to the returning officers provided for in section two of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section twenty-six of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally lists used in making the count and statement of the vote.

If the returns, poll lists, etc., were deposited with the parish clerk as required they nevertheless were not found there, and had disappeared in some way. The testimony was conflicting as to whether they were ever brought there.

A question of evidence is thus discussed by the majority:

Contestant offers in evidence in this cause a record in the cause of Burton et al. v. Hick et al., a proceeding instituted by certain parties who were voted for, the State or county officers, at the election in Carroll Parish on November 2, 1874, to test the validity of said election. To this suit neither contestant nor contestee is a party. Contestee objects to the introduction of said record in this cause because it is res inter alios acta. It is true the validity of the same election at which contestant and contestee were voted for is involved in the cause, yet neither of them being parties to the same can be bound thereby. We therefore sustain the objection to the introduction of the record, and exclude it as evidence in this case.

The minority views say on this point:

We think it will need no argument to satisfy the committee that this evidence should be excluded. We are of the opinion that it should be excluded on the grounds assigned by contestee, that it is "res inter alios acta" (p. 331, record).

914. The case of Spencer v. Morey, continued.

An election officer being detected in fraudulent acts, a return in due form signed by him and two unimpeached associates was not accepted as evidence of the vote cast.

Returns having been lost or destroyed, testimony of election officers being conflicting, and the voters not having been called, the vote was not counted.

The election (distinguished from the return) was set aside when the best obtainable evidence showed the vote only approximately.

The returns of a decisive portion of the district having been lost and the vote not being proven aliunde, the House declined to declare the seat vacant or examine further before seating contestant.

The legal returns of the parish not being available, questions arose as to the votes of several precincts:

(a) From the precinct of the First Ward the returns were missing with all the others from the clerk's office. The majority report says:

The only returns produced of the election at this poll is a paper purporting to be signed and sworn to by the three commissioners, David Jackson, T. B. Rhodes, and E. M. Spann. This paper is produced by the witness, R. K. Anderson, on his examination, who seems to have been a commissioner of election at Ward 3, in Carroll Parish, and to have had no connection whatever with Ward No. 1. Says he received it from the clerk of the court. How the clerk came to give it to him, how long he had it in his custody, are questions on which Mr. Anderson furnishes no information, and on which, strange to say, neither the contestant nor contestee asks him to furnish any.

After discussing the testimony, the majority report continues:

The paper produced by Anderson seems on its face to be in due and proper form as a return. The names of the persons voted for, the number of votes received by each, the position for which each was supported, the whole number of votes cast, the number rejected, and the reasons given therefore, are all stated, and, as before shown, the paper duly signed and sworn to by the three commissioners. The depositions of Spann, Rhodes, and Jackson, the commissioners, are taken, the paper produced by Anderson exhibited to them, and they all swear positively that the paper shown them is the original of one of the duplicate returns made out and sworn to by them after the election, and that it contains a true statement of the result of that election.

The question arises, Can this paper be received and treated as a legal return of the election held at this ward on the facts disclosed in the record, some of which have been already adverted to, and some of which will be noticed hereafter?

If we assume, according to the statement of Spann, that the ballot box and election papers were properly deposited in the office of the clerk, it would seem a hardship to make the candidates for office suffer the consequences of a loss by fraud, in which they had no agency, and for which they are not, therefore, responsible. On the other hand, it might appear dangerous to allow a paper to stand as a valid return which comes from the pocket of a party not entitled to its custody, his possession of it unexplained, and the paper unaccompanied by its legal companions, the ballots, tally sheets, etc., and no account given of their whereabouts, or how they happened to disappear entirely, while the returns are permitted to see the light when an election contest comes up. The law, as before shown, requires that after the ballots are counted they shall be replaced in the box, and the returns and the ballot box shall be deposited in the clerk's office. By the ballots the truth of the returns can be tested and their correctness verified. A paper purporting to be the returns comes to light unexpectedly from a depository unauthorized by law, but the written evidence provided by law to test its accuracy, in case of a dispute or a contest, is missing. But there are other infirmative considerations which enter into the question as to whether this paper shall be received and treated as a legal return.

Burton, the ex-sheriff of Carroll Parish, swears that he detected David Jackson, the commissioner who received the ballots from the voters on the day of election, changing the votes handed him by the electors for others which he put into the box instead of the ballots of the voters. He says he charged him with it and complained to him of its unfairness. "He (Jackson) tried to bluff me out of it, but I showed him the tickets he had dropped lying on the floor." On cross-examination, Burton says he could not swear to more than one ticket, which he saw Jackson change, but there was another on the floor in the same position, but he does not know that this one was changed. Jackson is not recalled, nor did contestee offer to recall him to deny this statement.

Caesar Jones and Noah Lane both swear that they saw Jackson hand greenbacks out at the window to voters. Lane says he saw him do it several times. Jones says he saw him pass money out to voters several times with their registration tickets as they were returned. Jackson denies having handed out any money to voters, and swears he would not believe Caesar Jones on oath.

David Jackson, the commissioner of election in the First Ward precinct, was also the clerk of the parish, one Galbraith being his deputy in charge of the office. The majority conclude that Jackson's honesty is impeached by the testimony and by the disappearance of the returns from his office, to the extent that no confidence can be placed in the returns which had been in his custody. The majority further say:

It may be said that the names of the other two commissioners being to the return makes it sufficient and valid as a return. It is true, as a general rule, when the law requires a certificate to be made by a board of officers composed of three or more persons, it is sufficient if a majority of such board join in the certificate; but this rule was never intended to be applied, nor could it be properly applied, to a case where one of them had been guilty of fraudulent acts. Who can tell how far the fraudulent acts of Jackson entered into that election? It is impossible to tell; just as impossible as it would be, if poison were dropped into a basin of water, to select the drops infected from those that remained pure. The good faith of the other two commissioners can not purge the ballot box of Jackson's fraud. It is for this reason that the law holds, and wisely and justly holds, that fraud vitiates everything into which it enters. It is for this reason that McCrary says that no confidence can be placed in the contents of a ballot box which has been in the custody of an officer detected in the perpetration of a deliberate fraud. This position is strengthened in this case from the fact that the ballot box, for a great portion of the day, was placed in a room through the window of which the votes were received. This window was 6 feet from the ground. The weight of proof shows that the voter could not see what became of his ballot when he reached it up to the window to the commissioner with his hand or on the end of a stick, nor could the commissioners see the voter. The law required that the commissioner should put the ballot in the box in plain view of the voter. The object of this provision was to prevent just such fraud as Jackson was detected in perpetrating. The law further gives the voter the right to deposit his ballot in the box with his own hand. This box was placed beyond his reach, and he was practically denied thereby this right.

And finally the majority conclude:

Upon the whole, we conclude that the paper produced by Anderson can not be received as a valid return, and therefore reject it as such. There being no proof aliunde of the vote at this poll, it must be excluded.

The minority consider the evidence conclusive that the ballots were properly deposited in the clerk's office, and explain their disappearance by the fact that no law required their preservation beyond the term of the district court and by the further fact that the grand jury actually did investigate the election in Carroll Parish and found nothing to require their action.

The minority put full confidence in the return, and say:

We therefore have the actual return made, which is the best evidence of the vote cast at this poll. But the return is supported by three witnesses. Contestant has wholly failed to show any legal reason why this return should be rejected.

It may be argued that because the return was found in the possession of an unauthorized person therefore it should be rejected. This certainly can not be urged or supported upon any legal principle governing contested elections. The officers discharged their duties, made their returns, and deposited them in compliance with law. It certainly would not be contended, if a thief had invaded the office of the clerk and abstracted the returns, and they were found afterwards in the possession of some person unauthorized, that it would be as much a return as before it was stolen, provided the officers who made the return should swear to its identity. But, further, on pages 111 and 112 of record, E. M. Spann, the Democratic commissioner, on November 23, 1874, makes an affidavit in which he gives the actual vote cast, and in that affidavit he states that Morey received 569 and Spencer 33 votes, corroborating in every particular the return, as well as the parol evidence of Jackson and Rhodes. But the evidence before us does not leave us in any doubt as to where this return came from. R.K. Anderson (p. 49, record) swears that he received this return from the clerk of the court, and Galbraith, as before stated, certifies to that fact. The return, the moment that it is fully identified as one of the originals made by the board, becomes the highest evidence that can be adduced as to the result, and must be received as such until impeached by evidence. We therefore accept the return as giving the correct result at poll No. 1, Carroll Parish, of the votes cast for Members of Congress.

The minority contend that the evidence fails to show that the election was not lawful, or that there were any irregularities in pursuance of an intention to defraud in the conduct of the voting, and find that the returns should be accepted as true.

(b) As to the second precinct of Carroll Parish, the minority views present a statement of the case and the contention of sitting Member:

It is admitted by both parties—contestant and contestee—that as to this ward there are no official returns, ballots, or ballot box to be found, except a poll list. They have been either abstracted or destroyed.

The first question to be determined is, What evidence is necessary to establish the vote cast at this poll? We are of the opinion that the best evidence to establish the actual vote cast at this poll is the evidence of the commissioners of election, and if it can not be established by them, then by such other evidence as can be procured, and we are clearly of the opinion that the commissioners' evidence as to the vote cast at this poll is competent. We are sustained in this opinion by the action of this House in the case of Adams v. Wilson, Clark and Hall, 375, decided December 8, 1823, wherein the committee and the House held "that the testimony of the board of inspectors is competent and ought to be received to correct any mistakes that may have occurred in returning the votes given at said election." If the commissioners' evidence is competent to alter or change the returns certainly their evidence is competent to establish what the returns were at the poll. The best evidence, viz, the returns, having been lost or destroyed, secondary evidence is then admissible to establish what were the contents of the written instrument, viz, the returns. We understand the rule governing the admissibility of secondary evidence with respect to documents to be that proof of their contents may be established by secondary evidence, fast, when the original writing is lost or destroyed; secondly, when its production is a physical impossibility, or at least highly inconvenient. Before, however, secondary evidence can be introduced there must be evidence showing that the documents once existed and are lost or destroyed. In this case the proof establishes the fact that a search for the returns has been made where, by law, they ought to have been found and that the search has been unsuccessfully made. This evidence was introduced by contestant, and the testimony of Galbraith, deputy clerk, shows that the returns from Carroll Parish, poll 2, are not on file in the clerk's office, the legal depository of them. Taylor, in his excellent work on evidence, says (sec. 401): "If the instrument ought to have been deposited in a public office or other particular place it will generally be deemed sufficient to have searched that place, without calling the party whose duty it was to have put it there, or any other person who may have access to it." Again (sec. 405): "The law does not require that the search should have been recent or made for the purposes of the cause and therefore where a search was made among the proper papers three years before the trial this was held sufficient." But in this case Galbraith's testimony (p. 28, record) is as follows:

"Q. Have you not been the principal deputy clerk of the court, and as such having the entire control of the said office during your occupancy?—A. I have, since July 26, 1873."

This election was held November 2, 1874. This evidence was given April 27, 1875. In answer, whether any of the tally sheets, returns, ballot boxes, or other legal documents relating to the election had been on file or were on deposit at that time in the clerk's office, he says:

"There have been none, except the tally sheet handed me by the commissioner for the other ward, which tally sheet was afterwards taken out of my office and carried away."

The next interrogatory propounded to the witness is to this effect:

"Q. Has diligent search been made for these ballot boxes by yourself and others?—A. There has been.

"Q. Do you know where these ballot boxes and papers are?—A. I do not."

The minority regard it proven that proper search was made for the returns, and that not being found it was proper to proceed to secondary evidence. The minority produce the poll lists of the commissioners as evidence of the act of voting, and this is primary evidence as to who voted, the commissioners having duly certified the list. The minority views continue:

There is no evidence contradicting this poll list, but it stands as admitted evidence of the number of votes cast at this poll, which was 713. It is not contended by contestant that a single man upon this list who voted was not a legally qualified elector, nor has any testimony been adduced tending to prove that these 713 persons did not vote on November 2, 1874, at poll No. 2, in Carroll Parish. We understand that the elections are simply the method whereby the citizens of the country may manifest their choice or preferences, and when they have proceeded in accordance with law, and manifested through legal forms their choice or preference by the ballot box, their right and privilege so to do will not be taken away from them as long as their preference or choice can be ascertained. Did these 713 electors, at poll 2, Carroll Parish, November 2, 1874, in accordance with law, express their choice or preference? Secondly, can that choice or preference be ascertained by the evidence before us? The law governing this subject, as laid down by all writers, is "that to set aside the returns of an election is one thing; to set aside the election itself is another and a very different thing. The returns from a given precinct being set aside, the duty still remains to let the election stand. The return is only to be set aside, as we have seen, when it is so tainted with fraud or with the misconduct of the election officers that the truth can not be adduced from it. The election is only to be set aside when it is impossible, from any evidence within reach, to ascertain the true result; when neither from the returns nor from other proof, nor from all together, can the truth be determined. It is important to keep this distinction in mind."

In support of this view the minority cite, from Brightley the cases of Chadwick v. Meldin, and State v. Steers; from Brewster's reports the case of Weaver v. Given; and of House cases Flanders v. Hahn, McHenry v. Yeaman, Covode v. Foster, Blair v. Barrett, Barnes v. Adams.

The minority then say:

As to the first proposition, viz: "Did these 713 electors of Carroll Parish, on November 2, 1874, express their choice or preference for Member of Congress?" the evidence of both contestant and contestee proves that they did. There can be no dispute on this point. It remains, then, to answer the second proposition, viz: "Can that choice or preference be ascertained from the evidence before us?" And, thirdly, was the election free and fair? Assuming that the evidence of the commissioners and those employed in holding and conducting the election is competent, we now proceed to present all the evidence, both of contestant and contestee, as to the number of votes polled.

After citing testimony to show how the vote was divided, the minority views continue:

By an examination of all the testimony introduced it will be observed that all the evidence as to the actual vote cast at this poll, with the exception of that of one witness, was introduced by contestee. Montgomery, contestant's witness, swears that he signed all the papers that he believed were necessary according to law. He swears positively that he signed the poll list, heretofore commented upon, and nowhere is this poll list contradicted. We, therefore, have the evidence uncontradicted that 713 persons did vote at this poll. The highest number of votes which contestant can possibly claim by the evidence is 65, which is sworn to by W. A. Blount, the United States supervisor at that poll, who says that he took a memorandum of the vote for Spencer at that poll, and that the vote was 65. This witness is contradicted by three other witnesses, to wit, Benham, one of the commissioners, who swears that he counted all the votes, says that Spencer's vote was 49 or 50; and is corroborated by W. B. Dickey, appointed by the commissioners to keep the tallies (as Montgomery testifies), Dickey swearing positively that Spencer received 49 votes at this poll; and B. H. Lanier swears that Spencer's vote was 49 or 50. It certainly cannot be claimed by contestant that he is entitled to any more votes than the highest number that he has proven. Notwithstanding this witness, who testifies that Spencer received 65 votes, is contradicted by three other witnesses, we concede contestant 65 votes. Benham swears that there were 4 blank votes cast. Adding the 4 blank votes to the 65 votes conceded to Spencer, we have 69 votes to be deducted from 713, which leaves the number sworn to and admitted by contestant's evidence, viz, 644, the lowest number which can possibly, from the evidence, be counted for Morey. Contestant does not attempt to disprove that these votes, 644, were cast for Morey.

The minority then examine the evidence as to the fairness of the election of this ward, and find in favor of its fairness on the question of fact.

The majority of the committee decline to count the vote of the precinct, for the reason that "there are no reliable data from which the result can be ascertained." The majority regard the evidence as showing that the commissioners at this poll failed to sign any returns at all, a certain return presented before the board of State canvassers being a forgery. The authenticity and regularity of the poll list is admitted; and the majority say that the voters should be called to show how they voted. As to the evidence relied on by the minority, the majority say:

Although not differing very widely in their figures, no two of the witnesses agree as to the number of votes cast or the number received by each candidate. The uncertain memory of two or three witnesses as to the result of an election six months after it took place cannot be permitted to take the place of the testimony of the voters themselves, and in this case, to the frailty of memory are added the uncertainty and unreliability of the source from which the facts to be remembered were derived. Montgomery says W. B. Dickey, M. A. Sweet, J. D. Therrell, and S. T. Austin kept the tally list, by consent and request of the commissioners, alternately, while keeping the lists to relieve each other. The habit of officers of election in calling in unsworn bystanders to keep tally lists, and thus virtually to count the vote has been already alluded to and animadverted upon in considering the vote at poll 5, Concordia Parish, and need not be here repeated. Benham, who is contradicted in several essential particulars in the testimony given in this cause, and who is shown to be the author of the forged returns that were delivered to the State board, occupied the important position of calling out the votes from the tickets to unsworn tally keepers, and it is from this source that Dickey and other witnesses who speak of the result of the election get their information. There are other objections made to the vote at this poll, but as enough has already been stated to show that there are no reliable data from which the result can be ascertained, it is deemed unnecessary to further prolong the examination. The vote can not therefore be counted.

(c) As to the third precinct the minority find no frauds or irregularities, and the same general conditions as in preceding precincts. The minority views say:

As to the vote cast, one of the commissioners, R. K. Anderson, testifies that there were 550 votes cast in all. There were 7 votes cast for Spencer for Member of Congress, and 2 blanks, the balance for Morey. This evidence stands unimpeached. Spencer can not claim that he received more than 7 votes. He nowhere attempts to contradict the evidence of Anderson.

The majority decline to accept such testimony as conclusive, and hold that the vote cannot be counted.

(d) The majority find the votes of the Fourth and Fifth wards satisfactorily shown and count them.

In conclusion the majority find:

We have already seen that, excluding the contested territory, Spencer had, by agreement of the parties, a majority of 1,396. The Fifth Ward of Concordia Parish, and the First, Second, and Third wards of Carroll Parish, being excluded by this report, that majority still stands, to be affected only by the vote at the Fourth and Fifth wards of Carroll Parish. Adding to the majority (1,396) with which Spencer entered the contested territory, the majority of 12, which he received at the Fifth Ward, would make his majority 1,408, from which is to be deducted 93 votes, the majority received by Morey at the Fourth Ward, thus electing Spencer by a majority of 1,315 votes.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Frank Morey was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress from the Fifth district of Louisiana.

Resolved, That William B. Spencer was elected and is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress from the Fifth district of Louisiana.

Four of the minority favored resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member, but Mr. John H. Baker, of Indiana, preferred that the seat should be declared vacant. The minority views also contend for declaring the seat vacant if it should be found that sitting Member was not elected:

If the House, after having considered all the evidence in this case, are willing to adopt the rule that a minority candidate can by some frivolous pretext obtain a seat to which he is not entitled or elected by rejecting the suffrages of electors after the election had been fairly held, the votes counted, and the returns made, because these votes and returns have been abstracted, they will place it in the power of all malicious and evil-disposed persons to destroy the evidences of an election, and by that means defeat the will of the majority. Nowhere has Mr. Spencer introduced an iota of evidence tending to establish the fact that on account of the irregularities mentioned in the evidence was he deprived of a single vote, nor does he in his notice contend that on account of these irregularities mentioned in his notice he would have received a greater vote in the fifth precinct of Concordia Parish or in Carroll Parish; but the entire evidence establishes the fact that of the actual votes cast (and it is admitted by contestant) Morey received a majority. It is further conceded by contestant that, if the actual vote polled in the fifth precinct of Concordia Parish and in Carroll Parish is counted, Morey unquestionably is elected. Therefore, admitting that he (Spencer) is the minority candidate, we contend that if the committee should arrive at the conclusion that the fifth precinct of Concordia Parish and the whole of Carroll Parish are to be rejected under the rule governing contested elections, established by this House, the seat cannot be awarded to Mr. Spencer, but the election will have to be remanded again to the people, and both Morey's and Spencer's claims are to be rejected.

The report was debated at length on May 24 and 31, 1876.[1] On the latter date Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, proposed a resolution to recommit the report with instructions that the poll of Concordia Parish be counted, that the time for taking testimony be extended sixty days, within which time testimony should be taken as to the election in the first, second, and third precincts of Carroll Parish. This resolution was disagreed to, yeas 76, nays 101.

The first resolution of the minority, declaring Mr. Spencer, the contestant, not elected, was disagreed to, yeas 74, nays 99. The second resolution of the minority, declaring sitting Member entitled to his seat, was disagreed to without division.

Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to without division, and so the contestant was seated.

915. The election case of Fenn v. Bennett, from the Territory of Idaho, in the Forty-fourth Congress.

The use of the prefix "Hon." with the name of a candidate does not justify rejection of the ballot.

The canvassing of votes by an illegal board, while important to returning officers, does not prevent the House ascertaining the result from precinct returns.

The vote is not vitiated by failure to observe a directory law as to method of tabulation of returns.

On June 5, 1876,[2] Mr. John F. House, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Fenn v. Bennett, from the Territory of Idaho. Three questions were involved in this report:

(1) The report says:

> The reason alleged by the Territorial board of canvassers for rejecting 246 votes for S. S. Fenn in the county of Oneida is that there was the prefix "Hon." to said votes. The sitting Member, at the hearing, waived the objection to the counting of those votes from Oneida County, and they are accordingly counted for the claimant.

(2) The report further says:

> The returns from the county of Nez Perces were rejected by the Territorial canvassers for the reason that the votes of the county were canvassed under the law of 1864, which gave the canvassing of the votes to the clerk of the county commissioners, and two county officers to be selected by the clerk, and not under the act of 1869, which gives the county commissioners jurisdiction to canvass the votes of the several precincts of the county. Although the question as to the proper board to canvass the precinct returns is a very important one for the Territorial canvassers to consider, your committee do not regard it of much importance in coming to a decision in this case, as the question for the House to consider is, who, in fact, received the highest number of votes, and the precinct returns are proved, which very clearly show that the actual vote cast in this county was 423 for S. S. Fenn and 37 for T. W. Bennett; and although the Territorial canvassers acted rightfully in rejecting the returns from this county, as they were not canvassed by the county commissioners, your committee, from the precinct returns, find that 423 were, in fact, given for S. S. Fenn, and should now be counted for him, and 87 votes were, in fact, given for T. W. Bennett, and should be counted for him.

(3) The report also says:

> The vote of Idaho County was rejected on the ground that the returns for the Delegate to Congress were not on a separate sheet of paper. The law of the Territory * * * provides that the clerk of the county commissioners shall make an abstract of the votes for Delegate to Congress on one sheet, the abstract of votes for members of the legislative assembly on one sheet, and the abstract of votes for district officers on one sheet, and the abstract of votes for county and precinct officers on another sheet. The returns from this county had all of the votes for the several officers voted for on the same sheet; but your committee regard the law in this matter as merely directory, and do not find that the vote is thereby vitiated, but count the votes from this county for the parties for whom they were cast.

On June 23 [1] the House, without debate or division, agreed to the report, which seated the contestant on the finding that he had a plurality of 105 votes.

916. The Massachusetts election case of Abbott v. Frost, in the Forty-fourth Congress.

There being evidence raising a suspicion of fraud the House rejected a return made in disregard of the requirements of law and by the hands of unauthorized persons.

Discussion as to whether or not a law was directory or mandatory.

On June 10, 1876,[2] Mr. Early F. Poppleton, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Massachusetts case of Abbott v. Frost. The sitting Member was returned by an official majority of 210 votes.

In the debate Mr. Poppleton insisted mainly on one point in the case, the rejection of the returns of the Fourth Ward of Chelsea. As sitting Member received in that ward a majority of 470 votes it is evident that this decision was decisive of the case.

The sixth specification of contestant's notice was:

Sixth. That the votes and check list, and the result of the counting of the votes in Ward 4, in said city of Chelsea, at said election, were not returned forthwith by the warden of said ward to the clerk of said city of Chelsea by any constable in attendance at said election, or by any ward officer, as required by law, and, in fact, were not returned to said city clerk until the morning following the election.

The majority report thus states the requirements of the Massachusetts law:

All the laws of the State of Massachusetts on this subject are embraced in sections 40 to 43 of chapter 376 of acts of 1874, viz:

"SEC. 40. In all elections in cities, whether the same be for United States, State, county, city, or ward officer, it shall be the duty of the warden, or other presiding officers, to cause all ballots which shall have been given in by the qualified voters of the ward in which such election has been held, and after the same shall have been sorted, counted, declared, and recorded, to be secured in an envelope, in open ward meeting, and sealed with a seal provided for the purpose; and the warden, clerk, and a majority of the inspectors of the ward shall indorse upon the envelopes for what officer, and in what ward the ballots have been received, the date of the election, and their certificate that all the ballots given in by the voters of the ward, and none other, are contained in said envelope.

"SEC. 41. The warden, or other presiding officer, shall forthwith transmit the ballots, sealed as aforesaid, to the city clerk, by the constable in attendance at said election, or by one of the ward officers other than the clerk; and the clerk shall retain the custody of the seal, and deliver the same, together with the records of the ward and other documents, to his successor in office."

Section 42 provides for the preservation of the ballots for a specified time, and authorizes a recount of them by the board of aldermen.

Section 43 provides for the preservation of the check lists.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 653; Smith, p. 594; Rowell's Digest, p. 314.

This statute seems to have been enacted the same year the election took place, and, as is to be presumed, the object was to render more certain and reliable the returns of the officers of elections generally in the cities of the State, and no one can doubt for a single moment that a strict observance of all of its provisions and directions would render frauds, by tampering with the check lists and ballots after the closing of the polls (a most convenient mode, and often resorted to for the perpetration of the greatest frauds) almost impossible.

After quoting testimony the report summarizes thus:

This testimony, we think, clearly shows that very many of the plainest and most important provisions of the law were recklessly disregarded if not purposely disobeyed by the officers having in charge said election. The votes of Ward 4 were not returned to the city clerk forthwith, as was required by the law, but were, upon being sealed and indorsed by the officials, placed in the hands of a police officer, an official unknown to the election statute, and by him taken and placed in the hands of a night watchman, away from the polling place, and at an entirely different locality from the city clerk's office, he being a person in no way authorized by the law to hold or have the custody of the votes for a single moment, in whose possession they remained until about 7 o'clock the next morning—a period of some seven hours—when the votes again passed into the possession of the policeman, who, accompanied by the clerk of the ward, which is strictly forbidden by the statute, arrived at the office of the city clerk and deposited with him the envelopes containing the votes, which were afterwards counted by the board of aldermen, and by them certified as the vote of the Fourth Ward, Chelsea, upon which the governor and council of the State acted officially. We are clearly of the opinion that the provisions of the statute, which have been so totally and unblushingly disregarded in this case, are not merely formal and directory, but vital and essential, in order to render the election fair and free from fraud, or the suspicion of fraud; for we hold it to be the duty of election officers to so conduct the election, and everything thereunto appertaining, as to as carefully guard against suspicion of or opportunity for fraud as fraud itself. Nothing short of this will satisfy either the spirit or letter of a statute made and enacted to protect and maintain the purity of elections, as was the unquestioned purpose of the law under consideration.

This principle is most fully recognized in the case of Chaves v. Clever (2 Bartlett, 467), and in the case of Gooding v. Wilson, decided in the Forty-second Congress, it is held that no recount of votes should be allowed unless the forms of the law for the preservation of the ballots, etc., have been strictly followed. In this case, in order to retain the vote of the Fourth Ward of Chelsea, it is necessary to approve of a recount made by the board of aldermen some four days after the day of election, and that, too, when there is no pretense that the provisions of the law have been followed as to the management of the votes, their legal custody, etc., during the night succeeding the election.

Your committee are fully of the opinion that this ought not to be done, and that we would be establishing a dangerous precedent, opening the door wide to the perpetration of fraud, were we to give our approval to a recount of votes under such circumstances. In this opinion we are strongly supported by the authorities.

The majority report also finds that the evidence gives "serious reasons for suspecting that actual fraud was committed in favor of the returned Member in this ward." After quoting testimony tending to show that suspicion might be raised by the delay of the returns, the report says:

When the votes and returns are out of the legal and proper custody, it must be proven that while illegally held they were not tampered with. Notwithstanding this well-recognized rule of law, Daniels, the night watchman in whose custody the votes and check lists were during the night after the election, is not called, and no reason is assigned for the omission to call him. He, of all other persons, best knew whether the clerk or any other person or persons meddled with the votes, or opened the bundle, or had anything to do with them during his illegal custody. Neither was the warden, whose duty it was to seal up the ballots, called, nor either of the three inspectors; and we are therefore left to guess as to the extent of their information and knowledge of the subject under examination. There being no proof aliunde of the vote at Ward 4, Chelsea, your committee is of opinion that the entire vote must be excluded from the count.

The minority views, presented by Mr. John H. Baker, of Indiana, after examining the testimony, say:

The most that can be claimed for this testimony is that it tends to prove that the ballots and check list were not returned so promptly as they might have been, and that they were brought by a police officer to the office of the city clerk, instead of by a constable. The provisions of the statute above quoted must be construed as directory under the precedents of this House and the decisions of the courts. A slight delay in the return of the ballots and check list, or their being carried by a police officer instead of a constable, would not of itself vitiate the poll. The returns of the election appear to have been constantly in the custody of the clerk of the election, their rightful custodian, from the time they were made out until they were delivered to the city clerk. No suspicion is cast upon the returns, and we have them before us. They corroborate the testimony of the witness, Bassett, in proving that the packages containing the ballots and check list had not been tampered with. On a recount they agreed with the returns.

The testimony of the witnesses examined by the contestee, James A. Dinning and Jeremiah Norris, fully establish the fact that the ballots, check list, and returns were not tampered with, and that they were delivered to the city clerk in the identical condition in which they left the hands of the officers who held the election, and without unnecessary delay.

In the debate Mr. Baker urged that the returns were in the custody of an officer "invested with the power and authority" of a constable, but gave no authority in support thereof.

917. The case of Abbott v. Frost, continued.

Unnecessary employment of men in a navy-yard preceding election, some on recommendation of a candidate, was held a condition on which to predicate a rejection of votes for bribery.

Employment for the purpose of controlling a vote, such object being known and acquiesced in by the voter, throws on the party naturally profiting the onus of proving that the vote was not influenced.

If an elector enters into an express or implied agreement as to his vote, the presumption is created that he votes in accordance with the agreement.

Discussion of the evidence required to prove charges of bribery.

A specification in notice of contest defective in specifying the number of illegal votes and where they were cast was, nevertheless, regarded.

Certain other questions were discussed and determined, although apparently not vital if the rejection of the Chelsea vote should be sustained.

(1) As to alleged bribery the report of the majority says:

The third specification charges "That many votes were cast and counted at said election for you in said Fourth Congressional district by persons who were induced to cast said votes by paying, giving, and bestowing upon such voters gifts and rewards, and by promising to pay, give, and bestow to and upon such voters gifts and rewards." All of which is denied by the contestee. The statutes relating to the offense charged in this specification are as follows:

"Whoever, by bribery, or threatening to discharge from his employment, or to reduce the wages of, or by a promise to give employment or higher wages to a person, attempts to influence a qualified voter to give or withhold his vote in an election, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding three hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail or house of correction for a term not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court." (Mass. Gen. St., ch. 7, see. 31.)

"If any person shall pay, give, or bestow, or directly or indirectly promise, any gift or reward to secure the vote or ballot of any person for any officer to be voted for at any national, State, or municipal election, the person so offending, upon conviction before the court having jurisdiction of such offense, shall be punished by a fine of not less than fifty nor more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the house of correction not less than sixty days nor more than six months, or by both, at the discretion of the court." (Mass. Acts, 1874, ch. 356, sec. 2.)

The charges in this specification relate to the giving of employment to a large number of voters in the United States navy-yard at Boston, formerly Charlestown, for the purpose of inducing them to vote for the sitting Member. The question is new and very important in its character; it touches the very foundation stone of representative government; of the free and uncontrolled exercise of the elective franchise and the counting of votes influenced. by a consideration. The rules of law which we think should govern in the consideration of this case are embodied in the following declarations:

1. If the giving of employment to the voters immediately prior to the election was for the purpose of inducing them to vote for the contestee, and such object was in any manner made known to the voter, and he accepted or continued in such employment after obtaining such information, he thereby became a party to the transaction, accepted its terms, and the onus of showing that he did not carry it out in good faith is on the contestee.

If it be shown that an elector enters into an agreement or understanding, direct or indirect, for a consideration to vote a specified party ticket or for a particular candidate, it is fair to presume that he casts his ballot in accordance with such agreement or understanding, and unless the contrary be made to appear such presumption becomes conclusive.

Ballots thus obtained we hold to be illegal and ought to be disregarded. To count them in the general canvass is to place them on the same footing with the votes cast by the honest, free, and independent voter. To seat a Member upon majorities obtained through such influences is to defeat the very object for which the statute was created.

The punishment of the briber and the bribed avails nothing toward purifying the ballot box; the vote is there all the same, whether punishment be inflicted or not, and if counted, the fraudulent and corrupt purpose for which it was cast is obtained, and the candidate thus securing success is foisted upon the country contrary to the wishes of the legal electors of the district.

The only remedy against such illegal votes is to throw them out and disregard them in the general count or canvass. The establishment of any other rule would render it useless to contest the seat of a sitting Member, even in the most flagrant cases of bribery.

The report cites in support of this view the following cases: Malcolm v. Parry (Law Reports, 9 C. P., 610), King v. Isherwood (2 Kenyon, 202), Felton v. Easthorpe (Rogers' Law and Practice of Elections 221), and continues:

The doctrine that the bribing of voters by the agent or those managing or controlling the election in the interest of a candidate will render his election void is clearly recognized in 3d Douglass, Election Cases, page 157.

Admitting the foregoing propositions of law to be correct, the only remaining question is, to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to lead the mind to the conclusion that these electors, or any number of them, were given employment for the purpose of influencing their votes.

In a great majority of cases it is impossible to prove a charge of bribery by direct and positive testimony.

From the very nature of the case the only sources from which such testimony can come is from the briber and the bribed, both of whom are criminals. Although in this case we must depend to some extent upon circumstantial evidence, yet it is so strong in itself, so strengthened and corroborated by declarations of confederates in the fraud, as to exclude all other reasonable theories than that of guilt.

It is established by the evidence that immediately prior to the election in 1874 an increase of more than 300 voters from the Fourth Congressional district in Massachusetts was added to the force employed in the navy-yard at Boston.

It is clearly shown, by the correspondence here inserted, that the object of the Navy Department at Washington, and Hanscom, Chief of Bureau of Construction, was to secure a sufficient number of votes to insure the election of the sitting Member.

After quoting the letters, the report goes on:

It is evident from this extraordinary correspondence that the Department at Washington knew of no proper or legitimate reason for the increase, otherwise the inquiry of Hanscom, of date December 2, 1874, as to the cause of the increase, would have been unnecessary. There can be no doubt that the political influence of those high in authority was brought to bear to cause the additional employment of men, and that the avowed purpose was thereby to secure the election of the contestee.

It was made against the protest of the commandant at the navy-yard, and every effort on his part to prevent this corrupt increase "was frustrated by some outside influence more powerful than his own." It must be observed that the source from which this influence emanated was the honorable Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of the Bureau of Construction.

Again, it appears that the committeemen and managers of the election in Boston entered heartily into the conspiracy, and exerted all their influence in soliciting and recommending men for employment in the navy-yard, the sitting Member himself recommending a large proportion.

In fact, with one or two exceptions, all the persons recommending men for employment were active politicians, who, during the campaign, worked earnestly for the election of the contestee.

The report then quotes correspondence and evidence to show that political managers of sitting Member's party were active in recommending men for employment; that the increase of force began immediately prior to the election; that more men were employed than there was work for; that a reduction began the day after election; that an enlisted man of the navy was active in distributing tickets to employees at the polls; that the check lists showed that the employees voted; and concludes that 300 votes should be deducted from sitting Member's poll, saying:

From all the testimony in this case, the committee are forced irresistibly to the conclusion that employment was given to those men as part consideration and that they entered into and accepted such employment with the full understanding that they were to vote for the contestee, and, by the application of the rules of law heretofore laid down, the votes of all such must be disregarded.

It is a species of bribery. If tolerated and encouraged, strikes at the foundation of republican government and poisons the very sources from whence all legitimate authority flows. No system of government can long endure where public opinion tolerates such conduct. Its general prevalence must lead to anarchy and bloodshed and loosen the very ligaments binding society together. It strikes a fatal blow at the social compact. It overturns all just distinctions between honesty and corruption in the delegation of authority to the representatives of the people.

The minority assail the majority's conclusions in two ways:

(a) On the pleadings:

The only portion of the notice of contest under which any question can arise as to the vote of the employees in the navy-yard is the third specification. It is in these words:

"Third. That many votes were cast and counted at said election for you (the returned Member) in said Fourth Congressional district by persons who were induced to cast said votes by paying, giving, and bestowing upon such voters gifts and rewards, and by promising to pay, give, and bestow to and upon such voters gifts and rewards."

The act of Congress to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections provides, among other things, that the contestant shall, "within thirty days after said election, give notice in writing to the Member whose seat he intends to contest, and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds on which he relies in such contest." Much discussion has arisen as to what is to be understood by the words, "shall specify particularly the grounds of contest on which he relies." It may be doubted whether any definition can be formulated which will accurately fix the limits of these words so as to determine by such definition whether the ground of contest is in substantial conformity to the statute or not. It is evident that it was the purpose of the framers of the law to require the averments in the notice of contest to be as certain and definite as the facts of the case would permit. The notice ought to be sufficiently specific as to the time, place, and nature of the charge, to put the returned Member on notice and enable him to prepare his defense and thus prevent any surprise.

In Amer. Law of Elec., section 344, it is said:

"It seems settled by the decisions of the House of Representatives that a notice is good under the law if it specify the number of illegal votes polled, for whom polled, when and where polled, without specifying the names of the illegal voters. (Wright v. Fuller, I Bartlett, 152; Vallandigham v. Campbell, 1 Bartlett, 223; Ottero v. Gallegos, 1 Bartlett, 177.)"

This author declares that it is settled as the law of this House that such notice must at least specify the following facts to be good:

1. The number of illegal votes polled.
2. For whom they were polled.
3. When and where they were polled.

(a) The notice in this case does not specify the number of votes which were procured by paying, giving, and bestowing gifts and rewards upon such voters. It simply alleges that "many votes were cast and counted" which were thus procured. "Such an allegation may mean 5 or 10, or 20, or 500; it is uncertain and not particular. This point was expressly ruled in the case of Lelar, sheriff of Philadelphia, in 1846. The courts say they will require of the party complaining of illegal votes to state the number, for instance, thus: 20 voted under age; 15 voted who were unnaturalized foreigners; 10 who were nonresidents, etc. This particularity the courts of Pennsylvania say they will require, because otherwise they would be converted into a mere election board for the purpose of counting disputed ballots. They do not require the names of the illegal voters to be given." (See Wright v. Fuller, supra, p. 161.) We think no reputable lawyer will be found who will contend that the averment "that many votes were cast" is sufficient to raise any issue. The authorities, it is believed, are all one way. As well contend that a declaration by A alleging that B owed him "many dollars" would be good. Such averments are always treated as nugatory. In this case we can treat it as a "sufficiently particular statement" only by overruling the statute and running against the current of all the authorities.

As to the second point, the allegation as to "whom they were polled" is admitted to be sufficient; but as to "when and where they were polled" the notice was criticised as defective as to the place, since not one of the 13 voting precincts of the district was specified particularly as the place.

The insufficiency of the notice is dwelt on at length. The sitting Member could not obtain from it the information needed for his defense. The parties might not waive objection to this defect, since the returned Member could not waive the rights the people have in the contest; nor could the House, with due regard to the public interests, permit a contestant to disregard utterly a plain requirement of law so necessary to a proper trial.

The majority of the committee, while not specifically, meeting this question, disregarded it by sustaining the objections of the contestant.

(b) As to the question of bribery, the minority say:

The statute of this Commonwealth touching bribery is as follows:

"If any person shall pay, give, or bestow, or directly or indirectly promise, any gift or reward to secure the vote or ballot of any person for any officer to be voted for at any national, State, or municipal election, the person so offending, upon conviction before the court having jurisdiction of such offense, shall be punished by a fine of not less than fifty nor more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the house of correction not less than sixty days nor more than six months, or by both, at the discretion of the court." (Mass. Acts, 1874, chap. 356, sec. 2.)

The rule is well settled that penal statutes are to be strictly construed. This statute neither disqualifies the voter to vote nor the person voted for to hold the office, even if convicted of bribery in a judicial tribunal. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Commonwealth v. Shaver (3 Watts. & Serg., 338), thoroughly examined the question of bribery by a candidate as affecting his qualification to hold office. Their unanimous judgment was: "That the trial and conviction of a sheriff of the offense of bribing a voter, previously to his election to the office, does not constitutionally disqualify him from exercising the duties thereof."

We believe the true rule is this: Where a voter is shown to have been bribed by a candidate, or by a duly authorized agent, to vote for him, and he has so voted, that such vote ought to be struck from the ballots cast for such candidate.

The minority then quote at length the English case "In re Boston Election Petition, Malcolm v. Parry Law Reports, 9 C., p. 610), and concludes:

The only ground upon which the charge of bribery rests is that Mr. Frost and his political friends gave recommendations to a number of voters, asking the proper officers in the navy-yard to give such persons labor. It appears that persons who were not voters were employed. No questions were asked and no conditions imposed on the persons who entered the service. It is abundantly proven that no influence, no inducement, no suggestion, even, was held out by Mr. Frost or any other person to affect or influence any elector in giving his vote. If any elector had been influenced, coerced, or even a suggestion had been made to him as to his vote, the contestant could have shown it. The law required him to prove it. The fact that he did not venture to enter upon this line of proof clearly shows that he knew it would prove unavailing, because his charge was untrue. He fails to show that one solitary elector from the force employed in the navy-yard was improperly or illegally induced or influenced to vote for Mr. Frost. He fails to show that a single person from that force cast an illegal ballot for the returned Member. No man's opinion or vote is shown to have been changed or influenced by the circumstance of his employment in that yard. There is not one word of evidence in the record to show that of that increased force a single man actually voted for Mr. Frost. The probabilities are that the most of the applicants for labor belonged to the party who had the labor in its gift. This presumption runs into every department of the Government. The contestant is the last man to object to the application of that standard canon of the Democratic confession of faith: "To the victors belong the spoils." We admit that the maxim is odious in principle and demoralizing in practice. But who ever before seriously contended that a voter who asked the influence of a Member or candidate for Congress to aid him in obtaining Government employment was thereby disqualified to vote? Who ever before claimed that it came within the prohibition of the statute of bribery? The fair presumption is that the employees of the navy-yard were Republicans—were employed because they were Republicans, and that they voted uninfluenced, according to their convictions. We believe the law is undoubted that the contestant is bound to show that in consequence of this increased force he lost votes which he otherwise would have received, or that Mr. Frost received votes which he otherwise would not have received. This he has not done nor even attempted to do. A certain number of men, legal residents of the Fourth Congressional district, were employed in the navy-yard between the 1st of September and the day of the election. It is not shown how these men voted. Nay, it is not shown that they voted at all. It is shown that they were legal voters, and that no influence, inducement, or dictation was used upon any voter; and it is not shown that a single one of them voted contrary to his free and uninfluenced convictions. The contestant does not prove that a single one of this increased force in the navy-yard was bribed by Mr. Frost or anyone acting on his behalf to vote for him. He does not prove that anyone of this increased force in the navy-yard actually voted at all at that election. He does not attempt to show how anyone of this increased force in said navy-yard voted. He asks the House to infer that every man of this increased force was bribed, because they were recommended and employed by Republicans; that they voted, and that their votes were cast for the returned Member. No rule of law can be found which will justify the indulgence of such presumptions to disfranchise electors otherwise duly qualified.

918. The case of Abbott v. Frost, continued.

In determining qualifications of voters the House follows the strict letter of the law, and not local usage in disregard of law.

There being no doubt for whom votes were intended, the House did not reject ballots bearing very imperfect names.

(2) The committee unanimously agreed that two votes cast for the sitting Member in the town of Winthrop should be deducted as illegal. The minority set forth their views at length on this point:

The contestant contests the legality of the votes cast by Charles A. Stevens and Frank Tuckerman at the election in the town of Winthrop. The law of Massachusetts (Stat. 1874, chap. 376, sec. 6) permits a person who is not assessed on the 1st day of May of any year to be assessed upon presenting to the assessors, on or before the 15th day of September, a written application, containing a true statement of his taxables, and satisfying them that he was on the 1st of May liable to be assessed in the town in which he makes the application. The list of persons thus assessed must, by the same statute, be deposited with the city or town clerk on or before the 1st day of October. In order to be a legal voter at any election, a person must, in addition to possessing the other legal qualifications of an elector, have paid a poll tax, legally assessed upon him, in the State within two years previous to the election at which he claims to vote.

The right of these two men to vote was challenged on the grounds (1) that they were not residents of the State and town where they offered to vote, as required by law; (2) that they had not paid any poll tax legally assessed upon them in the time and manner provided by law within the two years next preceding the election at which they offered to vote. They took the required oath and each was permitted to and did vote for the returned Member. In our judgment there is no sufficient evidence to overcome their declarations on oath, when challenged, that they were residents of the town of Winthrop, so as to be eligible to vote if otherwise qualified. They were young unmarried men. Their residence was largely a matter of intention. It seems to us that there is no evidence which rebuts their sworn declarations on the question of residence.

The other question is one which involves no inquiry into intention. Their application for assessment was made upon the 2d of November, 1874, and they were both assessed upon that day and not before. Their names were put upon the list of voters when they presented themselves to vote. To hold that such assessment and payment of poll tax were a substantial compliance with the statute, would operate to defeat its obvious purpose. It is suggested that these votes ought not to be struck off, because they were allowed to vote in accordance with the universal usage in that town, permitting persons to be assessed, pay the tax, and vote, as these two men did. The sufficient answer is that it is our duty to ascertain and apply the law as we find it. If the usage exists and its wisdom commends it to the legislature of that Commonwealth, it will doubtless be enacted into law. Then only can it be successfully invoked as a rule for our decision. For this reason we agree with the majority in striking off the votes of these two men.

(3) The full name and residence of sitting Member was "Rufus S. Frost, of Chelsea." Certain votes were offered bearing the names: "Benjamin Frost, of Chelsea," "Rufus S. Frost," "Frost, of Chelsea," "Rufus S. Frost, of Boston," and "R. S. Frost, of Chelsea." The full name and residence of contestant was "Josiah G. Abbott, of Boston," and certain votes were cast for "Judge Abbott," "Josiah G. Abbott," "Josiah G. Abbott, of Chelsea," "Abbott, of Chelsea," "P. G. Abbott," "J. G. Abbott," "Abbott," "J. G. Abbott, of Chelsea." The committee unanimously agreed that these votes, which were relatively few and of no effect on the result, should be counted for sitting Member and contestant, respectively.

The minority say:

It is admitted that Josiah G. Abbott, of Boston, and Rufus S. Frost, of Chelsea, were the only persons who were candidates for election to Congress in this district at the election held in November, 1874. There can be no serious doubt that the votes above referred to were intended to be cast for them. It was not claimed by either party on the argument that those votes should be excluded from the count in settling the contest in this case. We therefore agree with the majority of the committee that the 23 votes above mentioned should be counted for Josiah G. Abbott, of Boston, and the 8 votes above mentioned should be counted for Rufus S. Frost, of Chelsea.

(4) The committee unanimously cast out fraudulent and illegal votes cast for sitting Member in Ward 5, of Boston.

The majority of the committee found, as the results of the application of the law which they contended for, that contestant had a majority of 712 and presented resolutions giving to him the seat.

On July 14 [1] the report was debated in the House, and on that day a substitute proposed by the minority confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat was disagreed to, yeas 79, nays 102.

The resolutions of the majority, seating contestant, were then agreed to without division.

919. The Louisiana election case of Breaux v. Darrall in the Forty-fourth Congress.—On July 12, 1876,[2] Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the contested-election case of Breaux v. Darrall, of Louisiana, reported a resolution declaring Mr. Darrall entitled to the seat. This was agreed to without debate or division.

920. The South Carolina election case of Buttz v. Mackey in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Gross frauds perpetrated in such a way as to show connivance of election officers caused rejection of the returns of all the precincts of a city.

One-third of the votes of a district being rejected, the House did not seat contestant, but declared the seat vacant.

Both parties having proceeded under misapprehension of the law, the evidence was admitted.

On July 13,1876,[3] Mr. Charles P. Thompson, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the South Carolina case of Buttz v. Mackey. The official returns gave sitting Member a majority of 2,537. The report thus states the case:

> The city of Charleston gave 10,404 votes, 7,976 of which were for the contestee and 2,428 for the contestant, making a majority for the contestee of 5,548. The contestant alleges in his notice of contest that frauds were committed in most of the voting precincts of the city of Charleston, and at the hearing before the committee he, without objection, introduced evidence that frauds were committed in all of the voting precincts of that city by the partisans of the contestee through an organized system of repeating, and that persons entitled to vote and desiring to vote for the contestant were prevented from voting for him by violence and threats and induced to vote for the contestee; also that a large number of persons, through bribery, were induced to vote for the contestee, and that this was done with the approval of the managers of the election. The contestee denies all the material allegations of the contestant, and alleges that many of the allegations are irrelevant and immaterial. Although there are allegations of irregularities at other precincts than those in the city of Charleston, your committee have not thought it necessary to consider them, as the decision they have arrived at with reference to the vote of the city of Charleston is conclusive of this case.
> The evidence clearly shows that most gross frauds were perpetrated at the voting precincts in the city of Charleston through repeating, bribery, intimidation, and violence, and that the same were carried on under such circumstances as to satisfy the committee that they must have been done with the knowledge and assent of the officers of the election.

This evidence showed that repeaters were taken from poll to poll and voted in large numbers. After quoting from the testimony the report says:

> The whole evidence, of which the above is a fair specimen, clearly shows the character of the election in the city of Charleston, and must, we think, satisfy the House that such an election ought not to be sanctioned or tolerated. To allow the returns from such voting precincts to be canvassed is to encourage fraud and corruption, and your committee have unanimously come to the conclusion that the whole vote of the city of Charleston must be rejected, as fraud was committed by, or assented to by, the managers of the election as well as by other parties, and it is impossible to ascertain how many legal votes were cast. Your committee have had not a little difficulty in determining what ought to be done under the circumstances of the case. The district outside of the city of Charleston gives a large majority for the contestant. Still we are of opinion that he ought not to be declared elected, as it is impossible to determine who received a majority of the legal votes of the district. And the votes of so large a proportion of the district have been rejected and the people thereby disfranchised that justice to the district requires that a new election shall be had and an opportunity given the legal voters to hold an election to determine who shall represent the district.

The total vote of the district was 30,965, and the vote of the city of Charleston was 10,404.

A preliminary question as to evidence was thus determined:

The contestee claims that all the evidence taken by the contestant after the 18th of February, 1875, should be stricken out, as the forty days from the time of the serving of the answer of the contestee expired on that day. It appears that both parties proceeded in ignorance of the act of 1873 concerning contested elections, and the contestant gave notice and took evidence under the law as it existed prior to that date. And your committee are of opinion, as both parties proceeded under a mutual misapprehension of the law, that neither ought to take any advantage of the other on that account, but that the evidence must be regarded as having been taken by mutual consent, waiving the provisions of law, and that this rule will apply until one party or the other declined to proceed under this arrangement. It appears that no objection was made to this mode of proceeding until March 1, 1875, during the taking of the evidence of one Henry P. Dart, who appears to have been the first witness examined on that day. Your committee have, therefore, not considered any of the evidence taken subsequent to that of Dart's (p. 47). The contestee, although having full opportunity to take evidence, declined to take any evidence, and your committee are compelled to pass upon this case upon the evidence of the contestant alone.

The committee recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That neither C. W. Buttz nor E. W. M. Mackey was lawfully elected to the Forty-fourth Congress from the Second Congressional district of South Carolina, nor is either of them entitled to a seat in said Congress.

On July 19,[1] after short debate, the House agreed to the resolution without division.

921. The Virginia election case of Platt v. Goode, in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Overruling its committee, the House declined to deduct proportionately from the two candidates unidentified votes cast by disqualified persons.

Contestant having neglected to show for whom votes impeached by him were cast, they were deducted from his poll.

While State canvassers are justified in requiring returns to be technically perfect, the House in judging final right looks rather to the substance.

On July 17, 1876,[2] Mr. William R. Brown, of Kansas, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of a bare majority of the committee in the Virginia case of Platt v. Goode. The official returns had given the sitting Member a majority of 131 votes over contestant.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 762; Smith, p. 650; Rowell's Digest, p. 318.

A number of questions arose in the determination of this case:

(1) The returns from Prince George County were rejected by the State board of canvassers because they lacked the attestation of the county clerk. That is, the words "Attest, Robert Gilliam, clerk," were omitted.[1] The majority report state the case, with copies of the full returns, as follows:

The returns before the State board were as follows:

"Abstract of votes of the election held in the county of Prince George, on the third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, for a Representative from the Second Congressional district of Virginia, in the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States of America.

"James H. Platt, jr., received nine hundred and eighty-seven (987) votes.

"John Goode, jr., received five hundred and sixty-two (562) votes.

"Given under our hands this fifth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four.

"B. J. PEEBLES,
"T. A. LEATH,
"WM. D. TEMPLE,
"CHARLES T. ROBERTSON,
"Commissioners.

"STATE OF VIRGINIA,

"County of Prince George, to wit:

"I, Robert Gilliam, sr., clerk of the county court of Prince George, in the State of Virginia, do certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the return of the election for a Representative from the Second Congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States.

"In testimony whereof I have hereto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said court this 5th day of November, A. D. 1874, and in the ninety-ninth year of the Independence of the United States.

"[SEAL.]

RO. GILLIAM, SR., Clk."

The statute of Virginia, after providing for a board of commissioners to act as county canvassers, provides: "The said commissioners shall determine the persons who have received the greatest number of votes in the county or corporation for the several offices voted for at such election. Such determination shall be reduced to writing and signed by said commissioners, and attested by the clerk, and shall be annexed to the abstract of votes given to such officers, respectively. As soon as the commissioners aforesaid shall have determined the persons who have received the highest number of votes for any office, the clerk shall make out abstracts of the votes in the following manner: * * * which abstracts, being certified and signed by such commissioners and attested by the clerk, shall be deposited in the office of the latter, and certified copies of abstracts, * * * under the official seal of said clerk, shall be placed in separate envelopes * * * and forwarded to the seat of government by mail."

The abstract is a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute, and, except in lacking the formal attestation of the clerk, is sufficient. And showing as it does that it was the act of the commissioners, by the certificate of the clerk duly attached, it seems to us an arbitrary and unjustifiable course for the State board of canvassers to have rejected it merely because the same officer who had certified to its correctness had failed to make assurance doubly sure by attesting it.

The statute further provides: "If from any county, city, or town no such abstract of votes shall have been received within twelve days next after any election by the secretary of the commonwealth, he shall dispatch a special messenger to obtain a copy of the same from the proper clerk." This he failed to do; and in spite of the fact that the county seat of Prince George County is within three hours' ride of Richmond, and in spite of the fact that Mr. Platt at the time presented a duly attested abstract to them, the State board did not have a messenger sent, and adjourn over till his return, but rejected the abstract and gave Mr. Goode his certificate.

The minority views, presented by Mr. J. S. C. Blackburn, of Kentucky, uphold the action of the State canvassers, but do not insist that the House should be bound by the results of the act:

The returns from the county of Prince George were fatally defective. The law required that the returns should be certified by the board of county commissioners and attested by the clerk under his official seal. Neither of these requirements was complied with. We are of opinion that the board of State canvassers acted properly in refusing to take notice of what purported to be the returns from said county of Prince George, as the law only required them, in fact only authorized them, to canvass such returns as might be found in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, properly certified by the board of county commissioners, their determination reduced to writing, and attested by the clerks of the several counties with their official seal. It will not be necessary to determine whether said board of State canvassers erred in refusing to receive and canvass the amended returns from Prince George County. We, in the exercise of the power belonging to the House of going behind the action of all boards, State or county, and even behind the returns of the election officers, are convinced that the returns from the precincts of Bland and Rives, in the county of Prince George, should be rejected.

The minority, whose views prevailed, counted all of this county except the Bland and Rives precincts.

922. The case of Platt v. Goode, continued.

As to whether the House should count ballots illegally but not fraudulently cast and properly rejected by the election officers.

As to whether an unnaturalized foreigner may be a de facto election officer.

Question as to whether or not a law requiring returns to be transmitted sealed should be considered mandatory or directory.

It is presumed that elections officers who are partisan of the objecting party have not intentionally erred against his interest.

(2) In Nansemond County certain returns were rejected, as described in the minority views:

As to the 206 votes cast for contestant in Nansemond County, and rejected by board of county commissioners, 193 of them had printed upon them the name of contestant and the words "Against constitutional amendments;" 13 of said ballots had each a second ballot folded within them, upon which were printed the words "Against constitutional amendments." Under the general election law of Virginia and the act of assembly providing for the taking of the sense of the people upon the constitutional amendments submitted for their ratification, it is clear that such ballots were not cast as required by law. The county commissioners for Nansemond County, in our judgment, did not err in rejecting and refusing to count said ballots, which, under the law, they were not permitted to receive; but we do not feel that this committee or the House should be restricted to such a rigid observance of the technical requirements of the statute as will do violence to the equities involved. We therefore feel disposed to go behind the action of the board of county commissioners of Nansemond County and allow to contestant the 206 votes deducted from his count.

The majority report that the statutes of Virginia with regard to casting of ballots were directory, and that the words "deposit a ticket or ballot" as applied to the constitutional amendment did not necessarily mean that the ballot must be separated from the general ticket. The fact that 13 detached tickets on the constitutional amendment were folded into tickets for Mr. Platt and voted in the same box showed an evident mistake. The law did not require separate ballot boxes and no claim was made that illegal votes were cast.

(3) The majority report discusses Bland and Rives townships:

These two townships, in Prince George County, gave Mr. Platt 408 majority. The allegation of Mr. Goode in reference to them is as follows:

"Seventh. I shall maintain and insist that the entire vote cast at the precincts or voting places in Rives and Bland townships, in the county of Prince George, should be rejected as illegal and void, because the poll books and ballots at said precincts were not sealed and were not returned to the clerk's office, as the law directs; because, at the precinct in Bland Township, one John Palmer acted as clerk of election, he being at the time a subject of Great Britain, and not a naturalized citizen of the United States, and because a large number of colored persons, at least one hundred, whose names are unknown to me, were imported into the said townships in the said county of Prince George from Petersburgh and other places in the adjoining district, and allowed to deposit their ballots for you at the said election, thus placing upon the polls at the said precincts such a taint of illegality and fraud that the result can not be clearly ascertained."

In reference to the charges, except upon the point the poll books and ballots were not sealed, the evidence is totally insufficient. Even if it were true that John Palmer was a foreigner and unnaturalized, it could make no difference, as we have always decided. If not de jure he was a de facto officer, and his acts valid. C. T. Robinson, a judge of election in Rives Township, a Conservative, testifies that the election was fairly, faithfully, and honestly conducted, and that to his knowledge no man was allowed to vote who was not entitled to. Robert B. Batte, one of the Conservative judges in Bland Township, says that the judges of election did their duty as far as they could. Robert E. Bland, who was at Bland Township, swears that he does not think the election was conducted as the law directs, but saw nothing that looked like corruption, criminality, and bad intent. One man voted illegally in Bland Township and one in Rives, and this is the whole testimony. The poll books and ballots were returned unsealed, and this is the only irregularity we need to consider.

The report further says:

The evidence shows that five out of the six judges of election in these two precincts were Democrats. Both judges who carried in the returns were Democrats, and the county clerk to whom they were delivered was a Democrat; and it will be noticed that in his brief the sitting Member claims no irregularity, except that "several colored persons" illegally voted, and this leaves but the one question, Was the failure to seal the poll book and ballots fatal? Mr. Goode correctly quotes the law in his brief above quoted, and it will be noticed that no negative words are used making the election invalid unless the judges sealed the returns.

The report quotes McCrary's Law of Elections at length in support of this view, and declares that there is neither proof nor suspicion of fraud. The election officers were partisans of Mr. Goode, and the report says:

In the case of Farwell v. Le Moyne the majority of the committee went to the length of deciding that where fraud is proved it must be presumed as having been committed in favor of the party controlling the polls. We still hold to the doctrine to the length that the presumption is that Democrats will not intentionally commit frauds to help Republican , nor vice versa.

The minority views take issue as to the poll of these precincts:

The statute of Virginia requires that one of the poll books of election shall be put under cover and seal and sent to the county or corporation court clerk, together with the ballots, inclosed and sealed. There can be no question as to the mandatory character of this statute. Its object is to prevent fraud in tampering with the ballots or alteration of returns. In these two precincts the law in this regard was wholly ignored and violated. The rule laid down and supported by a number of adjudicated cases and applied in several instances by this House does not require that positive proof shall be adduced showing that the ballots have been tampered with. It is sufficient to show that opportunity for such tampering has been afforded. The burden of proving that this has not been done devolves upon the party insisting upon the count. We can not but conclude, in the light of the testimony, under the application of the law, as stated, that the vote of Bland and Rives townships, in the county of Prince George, should be rejected.

In the debate, however, Mr. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, speaking in favor of sitting Member, Mr. Goode, said as to these two precincts, "We yield all claim to them, and based his argument on other features of the case." [1] 923. the case of Platt v. Goode, continued.

Bribed votes being given, but their separation being impossible, the whole poll was rejected.

Employment for the purpose of controlling a vote, such object being knowingly acquiesced in by the voter, throws on the party naturally profiting the onus of proving that the vote was not influenced.

If an elector enters into an express or implied agreement as to his vote, the presumption is created that he votes in accordance with the agreement.

(4) A question as to votes cast by persons alleged to have been illegally registered, and the method of purging the poll of such votes, were discussed by the majority, and the rule set out in the case of Finley v. Walls, that in the absence of fraud the illegal votes were to be divided proportionately between the candidates in accordance with the vote received by each, was approved:

The statute of Virginia provides for registration of voters as follows: "Ten days previous to the November election the registrar shall sit one day for the purpose of amending and correcting the lists." And this is the last time provided by statute for registering prior to an election, and registration is prerequisite to having a right to vote. The evidence shows illegal registration and voting in several precincts, as follows: At Sussex Court-House Township, in Sussex County, 13. Here the vote stood, Platt 293, Goode 83, which, dividing proportionately, makes the vote stand Goode 3, Platt 10. At Stony Creek precinct 26 persons registered and voted for the first time on the day of the election. The statute provides—

"Whenever a voter changes his place of residence from one voting precinct to another, it shall be lawful for him to apply for in person or in writing, and it shall be the duty of the registrar of his former voting district at any time, whether it be in a township, ward, or voting place, to furnish a certificate that he was duly registered, and that his name has since his removal been erased from the registration books of said voting district, which shall be sufficient evidence to entitle him to register; and the name of every such person shall be entered upon the registration book of the township, ward, or voting precinct to which he has removed, by the registrar at any time, or by one of the judges on the day of election: Provided, That in cities or towns containing over 2,000 inhabitants the name of such person shall only be entered by the registrar on the days provided in the ninth section of this chapter."

The evidence shows that 25 of these 26 voters were registered on the day of election on transfers, as provided in this section, and that the judges were satisfied that they had resided in the election district three months. We find, therefore, that but one of these votes was illegal, which we subtract from Mr. Platt.

In Jamestown Township, James City County, 16 illegal votes were cast. The vote stood, Platt 136, Goode 78; dividing in the same proportion gives Platt 10, Goode 6. In Bruton Township 3 illegal votes are proved. The vote stood, Platt 203, Goode 88; and dividing in the same proportion gives Platt 2, Goode 1. In Guilford Township the evidence shows that about 20 persons illegally registered the Saturday before election. Eight only are identified by the witness, and these 8 voted and were illegal voters. Because a man illegally registers on the Saturday before an election is no evidence that he voted on the Tuesday following; hence, we can only consider 8 as illegal. The vote stood, Platt 265, Goode 189; and divided in same proportion gives Platt 5, Goode 3. In Nelson Township, York County, 15 illegal votes were cast. The vote stood, Goode 49, Platt 160, Norton 189; dividing in same proportion the illegal votes would stand, Platt 2, Goode 6, Norton 7. Six illegal votes are also proved in different townships, one or two in a place; being unable to divide, as in most if not all of the precincts Mr. Platt got more votes than Mr. Goode, we subtract all from Mr. Platt, which would make the illegal vote stand, Platt 40, Goode 15.

This conclusion of the majority is combatted by the minority:

Under the law of Virginia no man is a legal voter who has not been duly registered, and such registration must be had ten days before the election. The testimony shows that at all the precincts named persons were registered on the day of election, or within the ten days next preceding the election. There can be no doubt of the validity of a statute requiring the registration of voters. McCrary says (American Law of Elections, p. 12):

"It being conceded that the power to enact a registry law is within the power to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise and preserve the purity of the ballot, it follows that an election held in disregard of the provisions of a registry law must be held void."

This rule has been repeatedly applied by this House. (See Howard v. Cooper, Contested Election Cases, p. 275; also, Reed v. Julian, p. 822; Myers v. Moffitt, p. 564, and many others.) It is not to be objected that the honest voter should not be disfranchised by reason of the mistakes or misconduct of election officers. Every candidate has the right to bring forward and prove the legality of every vote cast at a precinct which has been appealed.

At Sussex Court-House Township precinct there were 13 illegal votes cast—8 white and 5 colored. At Stony Creek Township there were 18 illegal votes cast—2 white and 16 colored. At Jamestown Township, in James City County, there were 16 illegal votes cast—1 white and 15 colored. At Guilford Township precinct, in Surry County, there were about 20 illegal votes cast, principally colored. At Nelson Township precinct, in York County, there were 15 illegal votes cast—2 white and 13 colored. At Bruton Township precinct, in York County, there were 2 illegal votes cast. At Rives Township, in Prince George County, there was 1 illegal vote cast—colored. At Bland Township, in Prince George County, there was 1 illegal vote cast—colored—exclusive of those voting at Bland and Rives precincts brought from other precincts and other counties, of which several are proven in the record. At Blackwater Township, in Prince George County, there was 1 illegal vote cast—colored. At Sherman's Cross-Roads precinct, in Prince George County, there was 1 illegal vote cast—colored. At Brandon Township precinct, in Prince George County, there was 1 illegal vote cast—colored. At Suffolk precinct, in Nansemond County, there were 2 illegal votes cast—both colored-making an aggregate, at all the precincts named, of 90 illegal votes. What is to be done with these illegal and fraudulent votes?

The rule in certain cases is to divide the fraudulent or illegal votes between the candidates in proportion to the whole vote received by each; but on page 225, American Law of Elections, it is held:

"Let it be understood that we are here referring to a case where it is found to be impossible, by the use of due diligence, to show for whom the illegal votes were cast. If in any given case it be shown that the proof was within the reach of the party whose duty it was to produce it, and that he neglected to produce it, then he may well be held answerable for his neglect, and because it was his duty to show for whom the illegal votes were cast, and because he might, by the use of reasonable diligence, have made this showing, it may very properly be said that he should himself suffer the loss occasioned by deducting them from his own vote."

We see no reason why this fair and well-established rule should not be applied in this case. Contestant had the opportunity to make this proof and failed to do so or to attempt it. The eighty days allowed both contestant and contestee for taking testimony in chief had expired before these illegal and fraudulent votes were discovered to be upon the several polls; but, after such discovery, contestant then had by law ten days in which to take testimony in rebuttal. These polls and the legality of the votes cast thereat having been put in issue by the answer of contestee, such testimony might have been competent; at any rate, the contestant might have relieved himself of the burden of proof imposed by the law by an effort in these remaining ten days of his time to show for whom these illegal votes were given.

It clearly appears from the record that, should this rule be not applied, but these illegal votes deducted from both candidates in proportion to the whole number of votes received by each at the several polls, the majority of contestee would be still further increased beyond the final summary hereafter given; but as such action would not change or affect the final result of the contest, we do not deem it necessary to state the exact number to be taken from each.

In debate [1] Mr. Tucker argued against the rule proposed by the majority of the committee, saying:

> The question is how those illegal votes which are found in the ballot box, without its being known for which candidate they were cast, are to be disposed of. And I would say that at these several precincts the evidence shows, in the aggregate, that Mr. Platt gets a majority of some 400 to 600.

After quoting the passage of McCrary cited by the minority, he contended that the onus was on contestant to show that the 92 illegal votes did not go to constitute his majority of 500, and as he had not proven this they should be stricken from his majority. To use the proportionate rule was merely guessing at the result. The rule was arbitrary and not founded on reason. It appeared further on that Mr. Tucker was influenced by the fact that the proportionate rule would require the assumption that a certain number of colored voters had cast their ballots for Mr. Goode, an assumption which in this case he seemed to consider against reason. Mr. Tucker held that the disposition of the 92 illegal votes in the way advocated by him showed the election of Mr. Goode, and was really decisive.

(5) Certain charges of corruption were made as to the use of navy-yard influence at Norfolk in behalf of contestant. The majority report of the committee did not consider that the exclusion of three affected precincts, where contestant's majority was 441, could overcome the majority which they found him entitled to in the district, and so did not enter fully into the discussion. The majority report says:

> The evidence is vague and indefinite. No effort was made by the sitting Member to particularize. He acted in reference to this matter as in reference to others, that where illegal votes are proved, be they few or many, the effect was to vitiate the whole election, and he endeavors, both in his proof and argument, to make us determine that some illegal votes were cast, so that we may exclude the returns of entire precincts. We believe that bribery can be committed in the employment of voters in a navy-yard, but the mere fact of employment alone does not prove bribery. If employment is given to make men vote contrary to what they would do, it would be bribery, but there must be proof, first, that men were employed in order to cause them to change their politics, and, second, that they voted and voted in favor of the party giving the employment. The presumption is in public service that Republicans employ Republicans, that Democrats employ Democrats. The presumption is almost conclusive that men obtaining employment in places controlled by Democrats are Democrats and in places controlled by Republicans are Republicans, and the employment does not change their politics. If any presumption arises when a man obtains employment in a navy-yard it is that he is a Republican, and if that be so, the employment does not affect either his vote or the result. Here the employment is the whole evidence of bribery, and is extremely weak—only a link in the chain to prove the charge. Our duty is to act on evidence, not on surmises; to seek fixed data, not make wild guesses, and hence we decline to throw out any portion of the navy-yard vote.

Two members of the committee, who sustained generally the majority report, Messrs. Charles P. Thompson and John F. House, dissented from the conclusion as to the navy-yard precincts and believed they should be rejected. Thus an actual majority of the committee were against the report in this particular.

The minority views found that large numbers of men had been employed in the yard for partisan purposes, on condition that they should vote the ticket of contestant's party, and that espionage was resorted to to make sure that the employees voted in accordance with the arrangement. The minority views contend that the presumption was that the voter complied with his obligation and executed his contract by giving his vote as promised. The onus of proving the contrary rested on the contestant in this case, as it was in his interest that the acts were done. Therefore the minority views (and evidently a majority of the committee actually sustained them) hold:

> These bribed votes should not be counted. The record furnishes no method for their elimination. Their acceptance can only be avoided by applying the rule of law, so well known and of such general adoption that it need scarcely be repeated here, that when illegal or fraudulent votes have been proven, and the poll can not be purged with reasonable certainty, the whole vote must be rejected. Such, we think, is the case in these three precincts, viz, Third and Fourth wards of Portsmouth, and Hall's Corner precinct, in Norfolk County.

The majority report counted the Prince George vote, added 200 Nansemond votes and 12 Norfolk votes for Platt, and deducted from him 40 illegal votes and 15 illegal votes from Goode. This left a majority of 487 for Platt in the district.

Therefore the majority reported resolutions giving the seat to contestant.

The two dissenters from the majority report subtracted the navy-yard precincts and also 64 illegal votes from Platt and 29 from Norton, leaving Platt a plurality of 24 in the district.

The minority views added the Prince George and Nansemond votes, but excluded Rives and Bland precincts, and rejected the navy-yard precincts. This gave sitting Member 349 majority. This summary "waived the question of illegal voting by reason of fraudulent or unlawful registration," on which Mr. Tucker had laid so much stress, and rejected the Bland and Rives precincts, which he had waived. The minority views conclude that Mr. Goode is entitled to his seat.

The case was debated at length on July 25, 26, and 28,[1] and on the last day the minority resolution was substituted for the majority proposition by a vote of yeas 105, nays 98. The majority resolutions as amended were then agreed to, yeas 107, nays 95. So the majority of the committee were overruled and the sitting Member retained the seat.

924. The Louisiana election case of Acklen v. Darrall in the Forty-fifth Congress.

The House, respecting a written agreement of the parties, counted a return which State canvassers had rejected as forged.

Form of agreement between parties in an election case as to counting certain votes.

A poll unauthorized by law, taken at a place different from the legally appointed place under control of partisan officers, was rejected.

A recount honestly made of ballots preserved inviolate is valid, although circumstances rendered impossible a technical compliance with law.

Instance wherein the House in an election case accepted its own historic knowledge in lieu of evidence.

An honest recount of ballots kept inviolate was sustained, although the authority which ordered it was questioned.

At the organization of the House on October 15, 1877,[2] the name of Mr. C. B. Darrall, of Louisiana, was on the roll of Members-elect presented by the Clerk.

When Mr. Darrall was about to take the oath, he was challenged; but in October 16 the House voted that he be sworn in and that the credentials and papers of J. H. Acklen, a contestant, be referred to the Committee on Elections.

On February 8, 1878,[1] Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, from the committee, presented the report in the case of Acklen v. Darrall.

The preliminary facts as to this election are thus set forth in minority views submitted by Mr. Hiram Price, of Iowa:

On the 7th day of November, 1876, an election was held in this Congressional district for a Member of the Forty-fifth Congress, and after the election, and after the votes at the polls at all the parishes had been counted by the legally authorized officers, and the returns made as required by law, the following certificate of election was issued:

"STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,

"Third District of Louisiana, New Orleans, December 28, 1876.

"Be it known that at an election begun and held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, for Members of Congress, Chester B. Darrall received 15,626 votes, and Joseph H. Acklen received 13,533 votes.

"Now, therefore, I, William Pitt Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that Chester B. Darrall received a majority of the votes cast at said election, and is duly and lawfully elected to represent the Third Congressional district of the State of Louisiana in the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States.

"Given under my hand and the seal of the State this 28th day of December, A. D. 1876, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and first.

"WM. P. KELLOGG.

"By the governor:

"[SEAL.] P. G. DESLONDE,

"Secretary of State."

From which it appears that Chester P. Darrall was legally elected as a Representative to the Forty-fifth Congress from the said Third district of Louisiana.

Subsequent to this, and after the inauguration of the Nicholls government, a law was passed creating a new returning board, and this new board, created under a new law, proceeded to a recanvass of the same returns for the same office for the same district, and after a full canvass, Governor Nicholls issued the following certificate of election:

"UNITED STATES OR AMERICA,

"EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF LOUISIANA.

"This is to certify that at general election begun and held in the State of Louisiana, and in the Third Congressional district of said State, on the 7th day of November, 1876, it being the first Tuesday after the first Monday in said month, and the day prescribed by the laws of the United States and the said State of Louisiana for the election of Representatives in Congress from the said State, C. B. Darrall and Joseph H. Acklen appear from the returns of said election, filed in the office of the secretary of state, within and for said State, to have been the only persons voted for in the Third Congressional district of said State for Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States from said State; and that it further appears from said returns on file and of record in said office that C. B. Darrall received 15,786 votes and Joseph H. Acklen received 14,692 votes for Representative as aforesaid in said district; and that C. B. Darrall having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative from the Third district in said State of Louisiana, in the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States of America at said election, has been duly, lawfully, and regularly elected to represent said Third district of said State in the aforesaid Congress of the United States, in accordance with the laws of the United States and of the State of Louisiana.

FRANCIS T. NICHOLLS,

[1] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, House Report No. 147; 1st Ellsworth, p. 124.

"We, Francis T. Nicholls, governor of the State of Louisiana, and Oscar Arroys, assistant secretary of state of said State, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing declaration of the result of the election begun and held in the Third Congressional district of the State of Louisiana on the 7th day of November, 1876, is a true copy of the original certificate, as recorded in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Louisiana, by the secretary of state, and signed by the governor.

"Witness our hands and the seal of the State of Louisiana, at the city of New Orleans, this 27th day of February, 1877.

"FRANCIS T. NICHOLLS,
"Governor of the State of Louisiana.

"OSCAR ARROYS,
"Assistant Secretary of State."

From which it appears that Chester B. Darrall, the same man for the same office, was elected.

By the Kellogg returning board Darrall's majority is 2,093, and by the Nicholls returning board it is 1,094.

The majority of the committee disregarded the return of the Kellogg board, and the minority practically did the same, the consideration of the case being based on the computation of the Nicholls board. Speaking of the latter board, the majority report says:

They adopt the count of the votes as declared by the present legal board of canvassers in all the parishes except those of St. Martin, Lafourche, and Iberville. That board counted the vote actually cast, and returned it without the exercise of judicial powers and without disfranchising any portion of the people. It is composed of men of high character, Republicans and Democrats, and there is every reason to give full faith and credit to its official acts.

The Nicholls board omitted from the count the vote of St. Martin's Parish, holding the returns to have been forged. The committee found no proof of that fact, and counted that return in accordance with the following agreement:

Great Seal In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused to be affixed—E

JOSEPH H. ACKLEN

v. Before the Committee on Elections, House of Representatives.

CHESTER B. DARRALL.

It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the parties contestant and contestee that, in the consideration and determination of the above-entitled case, the committee shall allow to the contestant 1,027 votes as having been lawfully cast, counted, and returned for him in the parish of St. Martin, in the State of Louisiana, and to the contestee 1,095 votes as having been lawfully cast, counted, and returned for him in said parish, and that said parties respectively lawfully received, and are entitled to the benefit of, the number of votes aforesaid on account of said parish.

J. H. ACKLEN.
C. B. DARRALL.

In Lafourche Parish the whole committee united in rejecting the poll of precinct No. 17, where sitting Member had 86 votes and contestant none, the majority report thus setting forth the reasons:

The evidence, however, goes to show that the vote of poll 17, where 86 Republican votes were cast and not one Democratic vote, which was held at a place unauthorized by law, and about 1 mile from the place legally appointed, with no Democratic commissioners present, and appears to have been so held for the express purpose of preventing any Democrats from voting there, should be rejected and not counted.

The report quotes the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana on this poll:

We have been unable to find, and have been referred to no case, where votes cast under similar circumstances have been counted to determine an election.

These questions disposed of, only the parish of Iberville is left. Without Iberville the result was very close. Contestant had a majority of 63 votes in all the other parishes. The returns of Iberville Parish, both in the Kellogg and the Nicholls canvass, gave Darrall, the sitting Member, a majority of 992. So it is plain that Iberville Parish is decisive.

The returns of 5 of the 11 precincts in Iberville are not impeached. These 5 gave Darrall 677 votes, and Acklen 430 votes, or a majority of 247 for Darrall. This overcame Acklen's majority of 63 in the remainder of the parishes, and gave Darrall a net majority of 184 in the entire district except the 6 impeached precincts of Iberville.

The Nicholls canvass gave in the 6 impeached precincts a majority of 745 votes for Darrall.

But a recount was made at the instance of contestant, and the result of this was to destroy the 745 majority for Darrall and substitute a majority of 292 for contestant. This result would overcome sitting Member's majority of 184 in the rest of the district, and leave a final majority of 108 for contestant in the entire district.

It is evident, then, that the recount is decisive.

The law of Louisiana provided as to custody of ballots:

> The votes shall be counted by the commissioners at each voting place immediately after closing the election and without moving the boxes from the place where the votes were received, and the counting must be done in the presence of any bystander or citizen who may be present. Tally lists shall be kept of the count, and after the count the ballots counted shall be put back into the box and preserved until after the next term of the criminal or district court, as the case may be; and in the parishes, except Orleans, the commissioners of election, or any one of them selected for that purpose, shall carry the box and deliver it to the clerk of the district court, who shall preserve the same as above required; and in the parish of Orleans the box shall be delivered to the clerk of the first district court for the parish of Orleans, and be kept by him as above directed. (Act 98, 1872, p. 174.)

The following certificate was given to show when the next term of court met:

> STATE OF LOUISIANA, Parish of Iberville.
> CLERK'S OFFICE, FIFTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT COURT.
> I, Charles H. Gordon, clerk of the fifth judicial district court of Louisiana, in and for the parish of lberville, do hereby certify that the first term of said district court for the present year was held in Iberville Parish on Tuesday, the 2d day of January, A. D. 1877, as the first Monday was the 1st and a dies non, his honor James L. Cole presiding.
> Witness my hand officially and the impress of the seal of said court at the parish of Iberville this 8th day of May, A. D. 1877.
> [SEAL.]
> C. H. GORDON, Clerk.

The recount was made March 6, 1877, after the date of the session of the court, as given by the clerk's certificate.

Several questions arose as to this recount:

(a) As to the legal preservation of the boxes.

The majority report says:

> Another objection to the consideration of the recount urged by contestee is that the time between the election and the recount was some four months, and that the time for the preservation of the boxes by the clerk, under the laws of Louisiana, had expired. Section 13 provided in substance that the clerk of the court should safely keep the ballot boxes, after delivery to him by the officers of election, until after the next regular term of the district or criminal court for said parish. Contestee urges that the next regular term of the district or criminal court for the parish of Iberville was in January, 1877, two months after the election, and that after the lapse of said term, the law no longer obligating the clerk to safely keep the ballot boxes, a recount of such boxes or their contents was illegal. The facts are that the time for holding the term of the regular district court was in January, but no court was held. There were two claimants to the office of district judge. One of these claimants (and the one, too, who was afterwards declared not to be the judge) went through the form of holding court; but no business whatever was transacted, and no regular term of court was held until the month of April. But, granting the fact that the term of court had elapsed between the time of the election and the recount, would that fact abridge the power of Congress in determining the rights of claimants to seats in its body to take the ballot boxes, no matter what might be the lapse of time; and if satisfied that the boxes had not been tampered with, and that the ballots contained in them were the identical ballots cast at the election, to open the boxes, count the ballots, and decide in accordance with the result of said recount? But the committee find, after thorough examination, that contestant could not have obtained the recount at a date earlier than it was effected. The election took place November 7, but the Wells-Anderson returning board did not declare any result until nearly two months afterwards. After that declaration the contestant gave notice of contest, which was given within the time required by law. During this time, and until the Nicholls government was established in Louisiana, the state of affairs was such that few or no courts transacted business, and it was not until the month of February that the board of canvassers under the Nicholls government declared any results. And thus awaiting final action of these two boards of canvassers were any proceedings by contestant delayed; and, further, the answer of the contestee to notice of contest bears date "Washington, D. C., January 20, 1877," and appears to have been served some time thereafter. Thus the recount, which took place early within the first forty days, granted the contestant by law was effected at as early a date as the case permitted.

In the course of the debate it was admitted that the fact as to Judge Cole being an usurper, and in fact holding no real court, was known rather "from the general knowledge of the condition of affairs in Louisiana" than from any evidence in the record of the case.[1]

The minority views, presented by Mr. J. N. Thornburgh, of Tennessee, said:

The annexed certificate from the clerk of the district court shows that the first term of court was held January 1, and the said recount was not had till March. After that the clerk is not responsible for safe-keeping of either boxes or ballots, and no law requires that the ballots shall be longer preserved, and it is no offense to tamper with or change the ballots after that time.

In the debate[2] this question was discussed at considerable length, it being urged on behalf of the majority that the object of the law was not to keep the ballots until a certain date; but until they could be examined if need be at a session of court. The minority insisted that it must be concluded that after the date set the clerk would not feel himself responsible for the safe-keeping of the ballots.

(b) As to the authority by which the recount was ordered.

The minority views say:

This recount was ordered to be made by James Crowell, parish judge of Iberville, on an application made to him by contestant in an oral argument, as contestant says in his brief. It was had against the protest of the contestee's representative, and the judge gave his authority for so ordering the recount, section 123, Revised Statutes of the United States. Neither that section or any other law of the United States or of the State of Louisiana authorizes this recount.

This point was further discussed in the debate[3] the authority of the judge to order the recount being denied by the minority. The majority contented themselves with holding that the conduct of the recount was unquestioned, whatever might be the authority to order it.

[3] Record, pp. 1218, 1219.

(c) As to the custody of the ballots preceding the recount.

The majority report, after discussing the evidence, concludes:

> The rules of law governing recounts of ballots are plain and positive. Before courts or legislative bodies will give weight to results of recounts of ballots it must be shown absolutely that the ballot boxes containing such ballots had been safely kept; that the ballots were undoubtedly the identical ballots cast at the election; and when these facts are established beyond all reasonable doubt, then full force and effect are given to the developments of the recount. After full examination of the evidence your committee found no difficulty whatever in arriving at the conclusion that in this case the ballot boxes had been preserved; that they had never been tampered with, and that the ballots found in them were the identical ballots cast at the November election.
> Suffice it to say that the evidence is conclusive that the ballot boxes had been safely kept, and had not been tampered with between the time of the election and that of the recount.
> Such being the case, the presumption follows that the ballots found in the boxes when the recount was made were the identical ballots cast at the election.

The minority deny that the evidence shows conclusively that the boxes were properly kept.

(d) While both parties were represented on the election boards in the various precincts, it would seem impossible that the official count could be so far wrong as the recount showed. This was explained by the fact that a member of sitting Member's party who controlled the distribution of many tickets put forth a deceptive ballot containing either contestant's name or a blank, and that many of these tickets were counted as straight tickets.

As a result of their conclusions, the majority of the committee reported resolutions seating contestant. The minority held that sitting Member should retain the seat.

The report was debated at length on February 19 and 20, 1878[1] and on the latter day a motion to substitute the proposition of the minority was disagreed to, yeas 115, nays 139. Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to without division. Mr. Acklen, the contestant, thereupon took the oath.

925. The South Carolina election case of Richardson v. Rainey in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Irregularities found to be infractions of directory provisions of law do not justify rejection of the poll.

Discussion as to whether the distribution of United States soldiers in the neighborhood of the polls justified rejections of returns for intimidation.

Discussion as to whether or not undue influence must be shown to have affected the result materially to justify rejection of the returns.

Discussion of social, business, and religious influences as forms of intimidation in elections.

Over half the vote being rejected because of undue influence, the committee, in an inconclusive case, favored declaring the seat vacant.

On October 15, 1877,[2] at the organization of the House, objection was made to the administration of the oath of office to Mr. Joseph H. Rainey, of South Carolina; but on October 16 the House voted that Mr. Rainey be sworn in, and he accordingly took the oath.

On May 18, 1878,[1] Mr. E. John Ellis, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Richardson v. Rainey.

Sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 1,528 votes. Contestant made various allegations, from which the following questions arose for the consideration of the committee:

(1) Numerous objections to the counting of various polls. The majority report thus enumerates and discusses them:

> A failure of one or more precinct officers to take the oath of office prescribed by law; a failure of one or more of the precinct officers to file the official oath in the office of the secretary of state; a failure to appoint a clerk of election according to law; a failure of the precinct officers to organize as a board; a failure to keep a poll list according to law; a failure to open the polls at the hour fixed by law; a failure of the clerk to take the oath of office prescribed by law; the fact that a ballot box contained more than one opening; the circumstance that but one United States supervisor attended the election; an adjournment of the polls during the day; a failure to keep a tally list; a failure to count the ballots immediately after the close of the poll; a failure to administer the oath prescribed by law to the electors; the fact that the poll list, ballot boxes, and statements of results were not delivered to the county canvassers by the chairmen of the precinct boards; the refusal of the county canvassers to entertain and decide upon protests presented by electors; the fact that the election was conducted by two instead of three precinct officers, and the fact that the county canvassers opened the ballot boxes when they canvassed the votes.
> These objections are most elaborately set forth and discussed by the contestant and the counsel for contestee. It will be observed that most of the objections relate to violations of the election law that are purely directory in their character. Their violation, if no fraud be shown to have resulted therefrom, can not vitiate an election. It is wholly different when mandatory provisions of an election law are violated. In the latter case the election is void.
> But the voter is not to be deprived of his right, and the citizens are not to lose the result of an election fairly held because of some unimportant omission of form, or of the neglect, carelessness, or ignorance of some election officer, or the failure to carry out some unimportant direction of the law. (Vide McCrary's Law of Elections; Cooley, Const. Limitations; Botts v. Jones, 1 Bartlett, 73; People v. Cook, 4 Selden, 67; Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Minn., 107; People v. Cook, 14 Barbour, 259; Barnes v. Adams, 2 Bartlett, 764; Blair v. Barrett, 1 Bartlett, 313; Cox v. Strait, decided in Forty-fourth Congress, and other authorities.)
> Your committee find that the irregularities complained of, even if true in every particular, are infractions of directory provisions of the law and are unaccompanied by proof of fraud, and ought not, therefore, to vitiate the election of themselves.

(2) It was objected that the presence of United States soldiers at the polls had prevented a free, fair, and peaceable election.

The governor of South Carolina had, on October 7, 1876, preceding the election which was held on November 7, 1876, issued a proclamation declaring certain irregular military organizations unlawful and commanding them to "abstain from all unlawful interference with the rights of citizens and from all violations of the public peace," and commanding them to disband. On October 17, 1876, the President of the United States issued a proclamation reciting that whereas it had been shown that "insurrection and domestic violence exist in several counties;" and whereas the executive of the State had made application for Federal aid, and that, therefore, he commanded all persons engaged in such unlawful and insurrectionary proceedings to disperse. Later the following order was issued:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, October 17, 1876.

GEN. W. T. SHERMAN,

Commanding United States Army.

SIR: In view of the existing condition of affairs in South Carolina, there is a possibility that the proclamation of the President of this date may be disregarded. To provide against such a contingency, you will immediately order all the available force in the Military Division of the Atlantic to report to General Ruger, commanding at Columbia, S.C., and instruct that officer to station his troops in such localities that they may be most speedily and effectually used in case of any resistance to the authority of the United States. It is hoped that a collision may thus be avoided, but you will instruct General Ruger to let it be known that it is the fixed purpose of the Government to carry out the spirit of the proclamation, and to sustain it by the military force of the General Government, supplemented, if necessary, by the militia of the various States.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

The majority of the committee cite much evidence to show that the presence of these soldiers, distributed at various points through the district, had the effect of preventing many colored voters from supporting contestant. The majority say:

There can not remain a doubt in the impartial mind that the sending of the troops of the United States into South Carolina and the uses made of their presence did produce a marked and controlling effect upon the result of the election, amply sufficient of itself to justify your committee in declaring the election null and void.

But even had no effect been proven, we are not prepared to say but that their very presence at the polling places, the mere fact of their being sent, without proof of effect, would of itself be sufficient to set aside and annul the election. Our English ancestors, from whom our laws and ideas of constitutional freedom are derived, have been wisely jealous of the slightest tampering or interference with an election by the Government, and especially through its armed forces.

The report then quotes the English statute, 100 years old, requiring troops to be moved out of any place where an election was to be held, cites Blackstone's Commentaries also to the same effect, and refers to a precedent of Parliament:

At an election held for member of Parliament for Westminster, over one hundred and thirty years ago, by order of three magistrates a body of English troops were marched up and halted in the churchyard of St. Paul, Covent Garden, very near the polls, where the balloting was proceeding. Upon being informed of this fact by the Speaker, the House of Commons passed unanimously the following resolution:

"That the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this Kingdom."

And by the order of the House the three offending magistrates were arrested and brought to its bar and compelled to kneel, in which position they were reprimanded by the Speaker for the breach of English liberty in daring to procure the presence of troops at an election for member of Parliament.

The majority further say in their report:

But we are asked by contestee's counsel to go into a critical examination of the testimony and to endeavor to ascertain the exact results of the intimidating influences. He contends that undue influence in an election must be shown to have affected the result materially. In this he is in the main correct. In the entire district over 34,000 votes were polled. Only about 500 witnesses were examined, and many of these in regard to facts other than the subject of intimidation. It is impossible to tell the exact change produced by the intimidating influences, nor is it essential. It is sufficient that 300 witnesses, white and colored, Democratic and Republican, and some of them men of the highest character, swear positively to the general widespread and powerful influence and change produced by the intimidating influences. McCrary's Law of Elections lays down the rule, page 326, which we regard as correct: "If the violence and intimidation have been so extensive and general as to render it certain that there has been no free and fair expression by the great body of electors, then the election must be set aside, notwithstanding the fact that in some of the precincts or counties there was a peaceable election." And in the Canada case, already quoted from, Justice Ritchie said, in delivering his opinion: "And though I have no means of computing or ascertaining the exact extent of the terror or undue influences, it was still, in my opinion, such and so great an interference with the freedom of the elections as demands that the election should be annulled." That these undue influences were general and powerful and caused the greatest change is admitted by the counsel for contestee, himself a Carolinian and a gentleman of great attainments.

The minority [1] deny that the Federal troops were a source of intimidation.

It is not claimed that the troops coerced, intimidated, or persuaded; that an officer or soldier did or said aught indicating a personal preference for one side or the other.

They were stationed usually, so far as the evidence discloses, out of sight, and in no case immediately at the polls; 250 or 400 yards are given as their nearest approach to the polls.

An officer and 29 men were divided between Sumter Court-House and Lynchburg, places 10 miles apart, in Sumter County.

As we have already stated, it is not alleged the soldiers did anything to influence the election; that is, committed any overt act. Located as aforesaid, it appears they were silent and passive spectators of the scenes, without expressing preference in the result of the election. And it is claimed these men coerced the colored voters to a support of the Republican ticket.

We grant their presence emboldened the theretofore despairing black man to dare to exercise a freedman's right and vote his choice.

The majority report advises us there was no violence before the troops came. We grant there was none, because terrorism had stamped out resistance, threatened starvation had crushed the souls of these men, and when the Federal soldiers appeared upon the scene, and it was understood the rifle clubs and saber clubs, while they would valiantly frighten negroes, did not want a conflict with Federal authorities, we assert, these freedmen to a great extent took courage to enjoy their highest privilege and right.

The proposition of the majority is, a police force detailed by the Federal authorities, that simply enables the citizen to enjoy his rights, is illegal, and renders that enjoyment illegal and void.

The proposition of the majority is, that a community terrorized into a course of involuntary action, or subjugated to the extent of being unable, through fear of violence, to take their lawful part in an election, if from the presence of troops they are relieved of their apprehension, and exercise their rights as electors, such exercise is illegal and void.

The minority also cite the law and the Constitution to show that the troops were properly sent to the State.

(3) It was objected by contestant that the colored militia of the State and the religious and social organizations of the colored people were also agencies of intimidation. The majority report charges that the process of intimidation—by Republican organizations against colored Democrats was to be effected, first, by threatening, intimidating, and maltreating them, and terrorizing them by means of armed colored organizations, and, secondly, by bringing to bear upon them the fear of social and religious ostracism.

After condemning such modes of electioneering as against the principles of free institutions, and after citations from McCreary and Cooley, the majority continue:

The laws of the States and of the United States, the spirit of popular government, the laws and precedents of England and English courts all tend to the principle that the elector shall vote and vote according to the dictates of his judgment, untrammeled and uninfluenced by any improper influences. Not only has intimidation by violence and threats, or the presence of armed troops at or near the polls, or of armed men other than troops, and bribery, the promise of advancement, the treating of electors to influence their votes been held as causes that interfered with the freedom and purity of elections, but most of the States have laws which forbid courts to be held, or process served on election day, or militia musters to take place, accounting that these might be used as means of intimidation or of improper influence. A great English lawyer, who is standard authority upon the common law, has written that "it is essential to the very existence of Parliament that elections should be free; wherefore all undue influences on electors are illegal." (1 Blackstone, p. 177.) And in a recent case which arose in Canada Mr. Justice Ritchie said:

"The rights of individual electors are the rights of the public. The public policy of all free constitutional governments in which the electoral principle is a leading element (at any rate in the British constitution) is to secure freedom of election. * * * A violation of this principle is equally at variance with good government and subversive of popular rights and liberties." (Brassard et al v. Langevin, Supreme Court, Canada. Decided January, 1877.)

This case was one of controverted election. It arose from the county of Charlevoix, in which an election for member of the Canadian Parliament was held in January, 1876. The respondent was declared elected. His election was contested upon the ground that "undue" spiritual or religious influence had been exercised by the priests of certain parishes in the county, under the ninety-fifth section of the election act of 1874. The section is as follows:

"SEC. 95. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, makes use of, or threatens to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflicts or threatens the infliction, by himself or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any manner practices intimidation upon or against any person, in order to induce or compel such person to vote or to refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, at any election, or who by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent devise or contrivance impedes, prevents, or otherwise interferes with the free exercise of the franchise of any voter, or thereby compels, induces, or prevails upon any voter to give or refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be deemed to have committed the offense of undue influence."

The proof was that the respondent was supported by all the priests of the Roman Catholic Church, and that from their pulpits one priest had declared that to vote against respondent and for his opponent "was a grave sin, a matter of conscience." Another priest characterized such a vote as a "mortal sin." Another said that with "that party (the party opposed to respondent) in power, we would wade in the blood of priests; that the horrors of the French revolution would be reenacted; that, to prevent these misfortunes, liberalism must be crushed by the people and the clergy." Another declared to his flock "that it was a sin to vote for the liberal party, and that at the hour of death those who voted for that party would regret it." Another said, "Whoever votes for Mr. Tremblay (the opponent of respondent) would be guilty of a grave sin, and if he died after so voting he would not be entitled to the services of a priest." There was no proof that respondent had incited these sermons. But the court had no difficulty in determining the question of agency, and said:

"Decisions in England, the election law of which is identical with ours, and those rendered in Ontario and Quebec, lay down the principle that every person who, in good faith, takes part in an election for a candidate with his consent, becomes ipso facto an agent of the candidate. Upon that point there can be no doubt; and the election of a prominent member of Parliament was annulled in consequence of the excessive zeal of his agents.

"All these sermons [said the court], accompanied by threats and declarations of cases of conscience, were of a nature to produce in the mind of a large number of electors of the county, compelled to hear these things during several consecutive Sundays, a serious dread of committing a grievous sin and that of being deprived of the sacraments. There is here an exerting of undue influence of the worst kind, inasmuch as these threats and declarations fell from the lips of the priest speaking from the pulpit in the name of religion, and were addressed to persons of little instruction, and generally well disposed to follow the counsels of their cure's. I can conceive that these sermons may have had no influence whatever on the intelligent and instructed portion of the hearers; nevertheless, I have no doubt but these sermons must have influenced the majority of persons void of instruction, notwithstanding that by reason of the secrecy in voting by ballot it has not been possible to point out more than 6 or 8 voters as having been influenced to the extent of affecting their will. According to the testimony of over 15 witnesses, a very large number changed their opinion in consequence of this undue influence. I may here state that in like cases, to annual an election a large number of cases of undue influence by a candidate, or an agent, is not required and that one single case, well proved, suffices, although the candidate availing himself of it may have had an overwhelming majority."

Taking, the evidence as a whole, it appears clear that a general system of intimidation was practiced; that as a consequence undue influence was exercised and the electors did not consider themselves free in the exercise of their elective franchise. (Vide Mayo election case, 1857; Longford election case; Galway cases; case of county of Bonaventura.)

The principle of all the decisions in all these cases is that the priest must not appeal to the fears of his hearers, nor say that the elector who votes for such a candidate will commit a sin or incur ecclesiastical censures or be deprived of the sacraments. And the court annulled the election and declared it void.

The committee have quoted extensively from the decision in this case, inasmuch as the principle it lays down, as well as the principle of the authorities it cites, is applicable to some extent to the case at bar.

The majority report then goes on to say that the colored militia organizations were agencies for intimidation:

The evidence is clear that throughout the district, and in nearly every precinct of the district, these organizations existed. They were armed with the State arms for the most part, but many had private arms. They went to their political meetings with arms in their hands, and at many of the polling places they appeared on election day in organized force.

So intolerant were they against individuals of their own race who differed with them politically that they uttered against them the most terrible threats, and, in some cases, resorted to actual violence. They denied the right of free speech; they tore tickets from the hands of voters and substituted others; they interfered with the domestic peace of colored Democrats by persuading their wives to leave them, and left no device that could intimidate unemployed to coerce men of their own color into voting the Republican ticket. Evidence clear and indisputable is found in the record of this state of facts, and of the widespread influence which this mode of electioneering produced in the minds of the colored voters.

It will not suffice to meet these facts by saying that both sides resorted to this system of tactics. The record does not sustain the charge of intimidation generally against the Democratic party of South Carolina. The proof is clear that they pursued the policy of conciliation for the most part. Especially was this the course that characterized the campaign of contestant.

The report further cites evidence to show that the religious and social organizations of the colored people joined in this course of intimidation. The preachers threatened to turn out of the church those who voted for contestant. Social ostracism was also invoked.

The minority, after examining the evidence, say in their views:

There is nothing in the record to show either social ostracism or fear was preventing the colored voters from supporting Hampton. On the contrary, the "policy" we have described, according to the evidence of General Hampton, according to all the witnesses called by the contestant, according to the majority report, was "conciliating" them, and they were promising to support the Democratic candidates until Governor Chamberlain's proclamation appeared.

It is true that there were some members of the State militia still in possession of State arms, but there is nothing in the case evidencing, an improper use of them.

We submit there is nothing in this case to justify the expulsion of Mr. Rainey upon the score of intimidation or social ostracism.

The minority further call attention to the following:

The Democratic committee called upon the supporters of General Hampton to adopt the following pledges:

"SUMTER, S. C., October 25, 1876.

"The Democratic executive committee recommend the adoption of the following pledge:

"J. D. BLANDING,
Chairman Democratic Executive Committee.

"A. W. SUDER, Secretary.

"We, the undersigned, citizens of Sumter County, hereby pledge ourselves (each for himself) that we will not assist or extend any favor to any person of either race or color who shall vote for the Republican State or county ticket at the election on 7th November next; and that we will, in all business transactions, give the preference to such persons as shall vote the Democratic State and county ticket at said election."

"EXHIBIT A."

"DARLINGTON COUNTY,———TOWNSHIP:

"We hereby pledge ourselves to each other that we will not rent or let lands or houses, nor advance supplies on credit, to any person who shall vote the Radical ticket at the election to be held on the 7th of November next; nor will we employ as a mechanic any person who shall so vote at said election, or keep in his employment those who do so vote; nor will we employ in any capacity such persons as may be designated by the executive committee of the Democratic party for this county, in a list to be furnished by said committee."

This, in the opinion of the minority of the committee, was sufficient when coupled with the fact that armed bands of contestant's supporters were riding about the country, to justify intolerance among colored men toward their fellows who supported the oppressors of their race.

(4) The majority report thus disposes of the claim of contestant that he should be declared elected:

But contestant, whose pacific and manly course during the election, as shown by the record, and whose consummate ability in the management of his cause, or rather the cause of his people, has won the highest respect and sympathy of the committee, sets forth and shows that the intimidating influences set on foot by the Republicans did not reach or affect the entire district; that troops were sent into but four of the eight counties that constitute the district, and he contends that the intimidated counties and precincts should be thrown out and the peaceful counties and precincts counted, which, being done, would elect him and entitle him to the seat. And he cites the cases of Wallace v. Simpson, Sheldon v. Hunt, Sypher v. St. Martin, Darrall v. Bailey, 2d Bartlett, pp. 699 to 754.

It is very true that these cases were decided by a Republican Congress. They do lay down the doctrine contended for by the contestant. Party expediency might now suggest that the Republican party that made these precedents ought to be bound by them. If we should treat these decisions as containing the true doctrine of elections, if we could regard them as other than expressions of partisan intolerance, there would be no difficulty in reporting a resolution awarding the seat in contest to the contestant.

But in the first place the undue and illegal influences exercised by the Republican upon the colored people through their social, religious, and semimilitary organizations extended nearly throughout the entire district; and in the next place we find troops sent into four counties the aggregate vote of which is 21,691, while in the other four weaker counties, where there were no troops, the vote was but 12,987. To exclude 21,691 votes out of a total of 34,678 votes and count the residue and declare a result would be to permit an election by a minority. This is admissible, it is true, where the election was fair, and all had an opportunity to vote as they chose and failed only through apathy. Such is not the case here where 34,678 voters cast their ballots. But a very large portion of these, sufficient to have changed the result, cast their ballots under such undue and illegal influences as to utterly destroy the fairness and freedom of the election. Under such circumstances we can not admit that it would be right to permit a minority to elect. In the case of Sypher, cited above, the report of the committee which laid down the doctrine of minority elections was expressly overruled, vide McCrary's Law of Elections, pp. 324, 325, 326.

The true rule in such cases seems to your committee to be, that a minority can only elect where the majority, with full opportunity and facility to vote as they choose, unrestrained and untrammeled by undue influence, refrained through apathy or neglect from voting. But when undue influence, terrorism, intimidation, or illegal influences have been brought to bear upon the great mass of the voters, and they have been influenced, and have voted subject to these influences, although the full and accurate extent of such influence can not be arrived at, the entire election should be voided, although a minority may have voted, free from such influences, and for this reason: The entire people in such case evinced a desire to vote. The right of the majority to rule is fundamental. In such a case the will of the majority is defeated, not from apathy, but from undue influence. The true remedy is to void the election, remove the undue influences, and give the majority that opportunity to rule which is its undoubted right.

In accordance with the reasoning of their report the majority of the committee recommend the following:

Resolved, That there was no free, fair, and peaceable election in the first Congressional district of South Carolina in November, 1876, and that neither Joseph H. Rainey nor John S. Richardson is entitled to the seatr from said district in the Forty-fifth Congress by virtue of said election, and that said seat is hereby declared vacant.

The minority favored resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

On June 13[1] the report was called up, but the House refused to consider it. Again, on June 17, the House refused to consider—yeas 103, nays 126. So Mr. Rainey remained in possession of the seat.

926. The South Carolina election case of Tillman v. Smalls in the Forty-fifth Congress.

The removal of the poll from the place prescribed by law was a violation of a mandatory provision justifying its rejection.

Discussion as to whether or not the mere presence of United States troops near the polls constituted undue influence justifying rejection of the return.

Nearly half the votes of a district being rejected, the Elections Committee, in an inconclusive case, favored a declaration that the seat was vacant.

On June 8, 1878,[2] Mr. Thomas R. Cobb, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the South Carolina case of Tillman v. Smalls.

The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 1,438 votes, but the correction of an admitted error increased this to 1,738 votes.

Contestant attacked this election on the same general grounds urged by the contestant in the case of Richardson v. Rainey.

Certain peculiarities in this case may be noticed, however:

(1) "At one precinct," says the majority report, "the law in its mandatory provisions was clearly violated by the removal of the voting place a half mile from the place where it had been fixed by the commissioners of election under the law. And this was done by the two Republican commissioners without the consent of the other member of the board, who was a Democrat. The legal notice of the election had been published for about two weeks in the county newspapers, informing the public that Edgefield, box No. 2, would be held at the county treasurer's office. The Democratic manager and supervisor of the election at box No. 2 had no notice of the removal until the night before the election. This illegal act upon the part of Republican election officers was done, as the evidence shows, for the fraudulent purpose of enabling colored Republicans to repeat their votes. This poll should be thrown out." The majority base this conclusion on section 114 of McCrary's Law of Elections.

[1] Journal, pp. 1285, 1286.

[2] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, House Report No 916.

The minority views, presented by Mr. John T. Wait, of Connecticut, denied that the voting place had been changed without proper notice.

(2) The majority report quotes the report of the adjutant-general of the Army to show that Federal troops were stationed at polling places where were cast an aggregate of 15,622 votes, or nearly one-half of the entire number of votes polled in the district. The majority say:

> Your committee believe that under the rules of law to which we have referred, and the principles which should govern in the decision of such cases, that the election at these 22 precincts where troops were at or near the polls on the day of election should be declared void. * * * If your committee is correct in its conclusions, and the votes of these 22 precincts are thrown out, no one will contend that this election ought to stand. It will not be insisted, we presume, that when nearly one-half of the votes cast at an election for a Member of Congress are thrown out for the causes herein alleged, that the remainder of the votes should be looked into and the election determined by them. For, as in this case, when the evidence shows that a large class of the voting population which voted at other precincts in said district than those at which troops were stationed were more or less influenced by the presence of said troops within the county where they so voted, there is no way by which you can determine the will of a majority of the voters. Therefore the entire election should be set aside.

The minority of the committee call attention to the fact that the exclusion of all the precincts where troops were stationed would still leave a majority of 452 votes to sitting Member. But the minority decline to admit that the returns of the precincts in question should be thrown out, saying:

> Circumstantial evidence tending to show intimidation would be competent, and evidence that troops were stationed in the vicinity of the polls would be competent as tending to show intimidation; and where this is shown as one fact tending to prove intimidation, less evidence aliunde will be required to establish the fact that intimidation actually existed. But intimidation and violence to such an extent as to set aside an election can not be presumed in this country from the simple fact of organized bodies of troops being stationed near the polls. But if this evidence was followed by other evidence showing that but a portion of the vote in such precincts was polled, or that a considerable number of the electors did not vote by reason of fear of military interference, a case would be presented where the House, to say the least, would have to carefully consider the question whether the election must be set aside on account of intimidation.

The majority of the committee in this case, as in the case of Richardson v. Rainey, reported a resolution declaring the seat vacant; but the case was never reached in the House and Mr. Smalls continued to hold the seat.

927. The California election case of Wiggington v. Pacheco in the Forty-fifth Congress.

State canvassers being a court of record, their signed record, approved by the State courts, gives prima facie title, although at variance with their formal proceedings.

Ex parte affidavits were not admitted to impeach the legal record of canvassing officers in determining prima facie title.

On October 17, 1877,[1] the House decided that Romualdo Pacheco of California, should be sworn in as a Member, and that the papers in his case and that of the contestant should be referred to the Committee of Elections.

On January 31, 1878,[2] Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the case of Wiggington v. Pacheco. The official returns had given to sitting Member a majority of one vote over contestant. Several questions of law arose.

(1) As to the prima facie title: By the law of California the returns of the various voting places were returned to the county clerk at the county seat, where they were required to be canvassed by the board of supervisors. The report says in regard to the functions of this canvassing board:

This board of supervisors is not a board simply created for the purpose of canvassing the returns of an election, and which ceases to exist upon that duty being discharged; but it is an official body of a continuing character, required to keep a record of its proceedings, holding sessions day after day—on one day signing and attesting the proceedings of the day next preceding, etc. Its character is sufficiently shown in the opinion of Mr. Justice Rhodes, at the beginning of that opinion, on page 34, part first, of the record. As to this there can be no doubt, and it is an important fact to be noted.

The duties of this board touching the matter of elections are thus defined by the statute:

"SEC. 4046. Subdivision 3. To establish, abolish, and change election precincts, and to appoint inspectors and judges of elections, canvass all election returns, declare the result, and issue certificates thereof.

"SEC. 4030. Subdivision 1. The clerk of the board must record all the proceedings of the board.

"SEC. 4029. The clerk of the county is ex-officio clerk of the board of supervisors. The records must be signed by the chairman and the clerk. The clerk must be paid such compensation as is provided by law in full for all services as clerk of the board."

This board having this jurisdiction, the statute further provides as to the manner of canvassing the returns in the following sections:

"SEC. 1281. The canvass must be made in public, and by opening the returns and estimating the vote of such county or township for each person voted for, and for and against each proposition voted upon at such election, and declare the result thereof.

"SEC. 1282. The clerk of the board must, as soon as the result is declared, enter on the records of such board a statement of such result, which statement must show—

"1. The whole number of votes cast in the county.

"2. The names of the persons voted for and the proposition voted upon.

"3. The office to fill which each person was voted for.

"4. The number of votes given at each precinct to each of such persons, and for and against each of such propositions.

"5. The number of votes given in the county to each of such persons, and for and against each of such propositions."

Here, then, we have an official board, having a jurisdiction defined by law, required to keep a record, which is to be signed by its chairman and the clerk.

The supreme court of California, in the litigation over this very case, said of this record thus made (see p. 34 of the record in this case):

"A record kept and authenticated in the manner provided by those two sections (4030, 4029) is the evidence of the proceedings of the board, and is the only evidence thereof in cases where the proceedings are required to be entered of record."

Then the statute further provides that this record shall be certified to the secretary of state, as will appear by the following sections:

"SEC. 1344. The clerk of each county, as soon as the statement of the vote of his county at such election is made out and entered on the records of the board of supervisors, must make a certified abstract of so much thereof as relates to the vote given for persons for Representative to Congress.

[1] First session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal pp. 24, 25.

[2] Second session, House Report No. 118; First Ellsworth, p. 5.

"SEC. 1345. The clerk must seal up such abstract, indorse it 'Congressional Election Returns,' and, without delay, transmit it by mail to the secretary of state."

And from the certified copies or abstracts of these records from the various counties the secretary of state makes his certificate to the governor, showing the person having the highest number of votes in the district.

The contestant claimed that in the county of Monterey the return of the clerk, which gave him 986 votes, should have given him 988 votes. In proof of this the contestant offered certain affidavits which the committee disregarded because they were ex parte.

But there existed as a part of the record in the case an affidavit, introduced by the sitting Member, from the county clerk, wherein that official set forth that the board of canvassers met, tabulated the returns for Congressman, giving contestant a total of 988 votes, ascertained the results for county officers, passed an order directing the clerk to issue certificates to said officers, and then adjourned sine die. About an hour after adjournment, and before the pencil minutes of the result had been transcribed on the records of said board of canvassers, the following occurred, as described in the affidavit of the clerk:

Mr. St. John, a member of said board, returned to the office and stated to me that he thought a mistake had been made in the vote for Congressman; that Mr. Scott and Mr. Carter only had 986 votes for Mr. Wigginton. We looked over the figures which I had made and found that they had been added correctly. I then gave to Mr. St. John a copy of my figures of the vote for Congressman, and suggested to him that he compare the same with the figures of the vote as the same had been kept by Mr. Scott, and said that he would in that way find out where or in which precinct the difference was, and if there was a mistake, we would correct it in the morning.

After supper that night I wrote up the minutes and transcribed the statement made in pencil to the minute book. On the morning of November 14 Mr. J. W. Leigh and myself were in the clerk's office. Mr. St. John came in and stated to me that the difference in the figures was in San Lorenzo precinct. I got the tally list from San Lorenzo precinct, and Mr. St. John, Mr. Leigh, and myself examined the same. We found that Mr. Wigginton had only received 27 votes, whereas the tabulated statement and the minutes, as they stood then, had allotted to Mr. Wigginton 29 votes in said precinct. The tally list was in all respects regular. The 27 was in marks in figures twice and written twice.

We all three felt fully convinced that Mr. Wigginton had received in the precinct only 27 votes, and the clerk had made a mistake in putting down 29. I then and there changed the vote, as entered on the minutes, from 29 to 27, and the total vote from 988 to 986, and thereafter, and on the same day, the chairman of said board signed the minutes.

That on or about the 15th day of November, 1876, I made an abstract of statement of so much of said vote as related to persons voted for for Representatives to Congress, and duly certified the same to the secretary of state of California; that said statement so certified as aforesaid only gave Mr. Wigginton 27 votes in said San Lorenzo precinct, and only gave him 986 in the county; that the minutes of said board, in relation to said vote, have not been changed since the same were signed by the chairman as aforesaid; that said minutes had not been changed since I made and forwarded the abstract as aforesaid; that the minutes of said board now show 27 votes in San Lorenzo precinct and 986 votes in the county for Mr. Wigginton, and that said abstract of statement, so forwarded as aforesaid, contains a full, true, and correct statement of the vote for Representative of Congress, as the same appears entered in the records of said board of supervisors at the present time.

The committee thus discuss the statement of the clerk:

From this it will be seen that the 2 votes in question occurred in putting down the vote of San Lorenzo precinct; that in making a pencil memorandum, to be transcribed to the record, the clerk put down for contestant 29 votes, and afterward changed it to 27 votes in the manner described in the affidavit, and for the reasons therein set forth.

It must be borne in mind that the contestant nowhere attempts to prove, in the manner pointed out by the statute in reference to contested elections, that he received 29 votes in San Lorenzo precinct. He relies upon the evidence disclosed in the mandamus proceedings in the supreme and district courts of California to prove that the count made by the board of supervisors showed that he received 29 votes in that precinct. The president of the board and the clerk having signed a record showing only 986 votes in Monterey County for contestant, and this record having been duly certified to the secretary of state, and the supreme court of California having decided, after a careful examination of all the facts as they appeared in contestee's petition and contestant's answer, that the record thus certified to the secretary of state must stand, under the laws of California, until set aside or shown to be erroneous by a contest, under the statute in such cases made and provided, your committee are of the opinion that the truth or falsity of the clerk's return is not put in issue in this contest, and that the record thus certified by the clerk in the manner required by the law of California must stand. If contestant had felt himself injured by that record it was his duty and privilege to show its falsity in the manner pointed out in the statute.

The committee contend that the record "imports verity," although they say—

We do not contend that the committee or the House can not go behind it and ascertain the real facts; but we do contend that it must be presumed to be correct until the contrary is proven; and it is incumbent on the contestant to prove that it is not correct.

This proof contestant had not submitted in a satisfactory manner. The minority of the committee in their views announce their concurrence in this portion of the report; but Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, who signed the report of the majority, filed dissenting views giving reasons why the vote should be counted as actually canvassed rather than as returned by the clerk.

928. The case of Wiggington v. Pacheco, continued.

The vote of a person residing without a precinct was rejected.

As to the degree of evidence required to justify rejection of a vote for disqualification on account of residence.

A person does not acquire a legal residence in a place by being stationed there while in the military service of the United States.

(2) Questions of law arose as to the qualifications of certain persons who voted either for contestant or sitting Member:

(a) The majority of the committee rejected the vote of Charles Gilbert, who they thought undoubtedly voted for sitting Member, because he resided for thirty days preceding the election at Alvah Mitchell's house, and Alvah Mitchell was not allowed to vote in the precinct because he did not live therein. A witness swore that he knew the line and that the Mitchell house was not in the precinct.

The minority quote the testimony, which did not attempt to fix Gilbert's residence except in connection with living in the Mitchell house, and say:

But this is not sufficient to prove residence at Mitchell's house. The rule of law on this subject is this:

"Nor has the mere statement by a witness that a voter was or was not a resident, without giving facts to justify his opinion, been considered sufficient to throw out such a vote. The testimony shows a number of instances where a witness would state positively the residence or nonresidence of a voter on some theory of his own, or some mistake of fact, when other testimony would show with entire clearness that the vote was legal."

What constitutes a legal residence is generally imperfectly understood by witnesses. It is not sufficient for a witness to say that a man resides in this or that place, but facts should be given to show that the place named was the actual legal residence. It is very easy for witnesses to mistake the place where a man may be staying temporarily for his actual residence; or, in other words, to speak of the place where he may be temporarily at work as his residence, his home, or where he lives. This kind of evidence is not and never should be regarded as sufficient to prove a man an illegal voter, and hence we contend that this evidence is wholly insufficient to prove Gilbert to have been an illegal voter.

(b) The majority set forth a second question, as follows:

Charles Waterman voted at Mayfield, Santa Clara County. He was a single man. He lived in Mayfield four or five years. Six or eight months before the election he sold his interest in the hotel business; said, "the people of Mayfield might go to thunder; he wanted nothing more to do with them, and left there. He said, "he left this town for good." He took employment in a circus, and traveled from place to place in California and Oregon. He returned to Mayfield on the morning of the election. His vote was challenged. He swore it in, and left the town on the same day. It is conclusively shown that he voted for Mr. Pacheco. The law of California says, "that place must be considered and held to be the residence of a person in which his habitation is fixed, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning." Waterman having left Mayfield "for good," as he declared when he took his departure, if he should afterward conclude to return, he must acquire his residence again the same as if he had never resided in the place. Under the law of California, and by his own declaration, he was not a resident of the precinct in which he voted. His vote must be rejected.

The minority strongly dissent:

There is absolutely nothing to indicate any purpose on his part to change his residence, other than the statement of a witness that he said he left this town "for good" when he went with the circus in the spring. To permit this loose kind of testimony, an attempted repetition of what a person said eighteen months before, to have the effect to disfranchise a voter, and perchance to determine the right to a seat in the House of Representatives, will not do. Such a precedent or rule can only work mischief. Such testimony is considered by courts and authors to be the most unreliable and least worthy of consideration, and for reasons which are too familiar to need to be repeated here. Waterman, as before stated, was challenged as a voter. He was sworn and interrogated touching his right to vote. He knew where his residence was, what his intentions were when he went away with that circus, and upon his sworn statements, coupled with the fact that notoriously he had been a resident there for years, his vote was received. Now it is proposed by the majority to say that that was an illegal vote, with no other evidence to warrant it than the statement of a witness, made eighteen months after he professed to have heard it, that Waterman said about the time he went away with the circus that he was going "for good."

If this man's vote can be held to be illegal, it will be the declaration of a principle that will practically disfranchise hundreds of men who temporarily leave their homes to follow pursuits requiring them to travel from place to place. Such men habitually go home to vote, especially at Presidential elections. They will travel hundreds of miles to exercise that privilege, and are too honest to vote where they can not legally do so. This is manifestly one of this class of cases, and there are others like it which appear in this record.

(c) The vote of Moses Atkinson also caused division in the committee, as he divided his residence between a ranch and a hotel, and this raised a question as to the words in the statute as to residence of one who came into a precinct for "temporary purposes only."

(d) The law [1] of California provided:

A person must not be held to have gained or lost residence by reason of his presence or absence from a place while employed in the service of the United States or of this State.

F. C. Kelley, in the signal service of the United States Army, came to Campo in March, 1875, in the course of that service, and voted on November 7, 1876.

[1] Art. II, sec. 4, of California Const. of 1879 has a provision like this.

He had never been to California until he went there in the United States service. The report says:

Aside from the statutory provision, the well-recognized rule of law governing in cases of this kind is this: "That the fact that an elector is in the Army does not disqualify him from voting at his place of residence; but he can not acquire a residence so as to quality him as a voter by being stationed at a particular place while in the service of the United States. (People v. Riley, 15 Cal., 48; Hunt v. Richards, 4 Kans., 549; Biddle v. Wing, Clark & Hall, 504; McCrary, see. 41.)

The person in question, having gone to California in the military service of the United States, his legal residence remained at the place of enlistment, and he could not acquire a residence in California while in that service. His vote must be rejected. He testified that he voted for Mr. Pacheco, and upon this point there is no dispute.

The minority did not dissent from this conclusion.

929. The case of Wiggington v. Pacheco, continued.

A person brought to a place. by committal to jail and followed by his family nevertheless did not acquire a voting residence.

Regular naturalization papers, attacked by parol proof that they were obtained by fraud, were held to justify the vote given by the bearer.

As to the degree of evidence required to prove the ballot of a disqualified voter who does not testify to his own vote.

It being impossible to prove how a disqualified voter cast his ballot, the vote was not deducted.

(e) A similar principle is invoked in the case of Pedro Parris:

Pedro Parris voted in Ventura precinct, Ventura County. On the 9th day of June, 1876, he was a resident of Ojai or Cañada precinct, in that county. Was there arrested, charged with grand larceny, and on the 14th day of June was committed to the county jail, in default of bail, to await the action of the grand jury. The jail was in Ventura precinct, where he voted. After he was committed to jail his family moved into Ventura precinct. He was released from jail within fifteen days prior to the election. His vote was challenged but sworn in. It is clear that he voted for Mr. Pacheco. The principle must be applied to this person as was applied to Mr. Kelley already referred to.

(f) Thomas S. Methvin, a former resident, had moved to Arizona, with his family, and the minority claim, that as he had gone there with no purpose of returning, he had lost his residence and his vote should be rejected. The majority, while admitting doubt as to residence, found doubt also as to how he voted, and declined to reject his vote.

(g) contestant asked that the vote of John Peterson be rejected because he was an alien, his naturalization papers having been fraudulently procured. The fact that the papers were fraudulently obtained appeared in testimony given by Peterson himself in the course of this contest. The majority say:

His papers were issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, were regular in every respect, and upon the evidence before the court at the time the court decided rightly. Your committee are of the opinion that papers issued in this manner can not be attacked in a collateral proceeding. And if this could be done, Peterson's oath would have little weight in such a contest, for he either swore falsely before the court or in the contest. He was corroborated before the court, but his evidence in the contest denying his citizenship stands unsupported.

The minority join issue sharply, saying:

Now, here is a clear, palpable case of procuring fraudulent naturalization papers. In the majority report the singular doctrine is asserted that because these papers were issued by a court of competent jurisdiction and were regular on their face, they can not be "attacked collaterally;" that is to say, if, by means of perjury, a man can commit a fraud upon the court and upon the law, and thereby get his papers, he can get the benefit of that fraud, and when he presents himself as a voter his vote must be received. Just what is meant by the majority by saying that the papers can not be attacked collaterally is not very clear. We can conceive of nothing that can be meant except that somebody would have to go into court and in a direct proceeding set aside the papers for fraud. We can not believe that this House will ever indorse such a preposterous doctrine. The rule of law is stated by McCrary, section 21, just the reverse of what is here ruled by the majority. Parol evidence is competent to prove the fraud, and when it is proven the vote is rejected. This was dearly an illegal vote for Wigginton and must be rejected.

(3) Certain questions arose as to how sundry voters cast their votes, it being essential to determine from whom to deduct the illegal votes.

(a) As to Charles Gilbert, a witness testified that Gilbert always said he was a Republican, asked for a Republican ticket, took one, folded it as the law required, and, in witnesses's "honest belief," voted it. The majority say:

In the absence of the voter's own evidence, it would be difficult to prove more certainly than is done in this case for whom a person voted. A person can not be compelled to state for whom he voted; and the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided that where a witness can not be compelled to answer he need not be called. (6 Peter's Repts., 352, 367.) But Mr. Pacheco might have called the voter, and if he had not claimed his privilege he could have made it clear for whom he did vote. Mr. Pacheco not having done so, nor having shown his inability to procure his deposition, we may infer that Gilbert, if produced, would have corroborated the witness whose deposition is in the record. Gilbert did not reside in the precinct where he voted, and his vote must be rejected.

The minority dissent.

Again, this evidence does not prove that Gilbert voted for Pacheco. The substance of the evidence is that he associated with Mitchell, a Democrat; that he took a Republican ticket and folded it up, and the witness says he honestly believes he voted, although no witness testifies that he did vote.

The logic of the majority on this subject in respect of this vote is, to say the least, singular. There is an evident feeling that the proof is weak and needs propping to make it stand, and this singular argument is presented: "The contestant could not prove how the voter voted any better, except by calling him as a witness; but if he called him as a witness, he was not bound to testify for whom he cast his vote. If he could not be compelled to answer, he need not be called." Then the majority proceed to say: "But Mr. Pacheco might have called the voter, and if he did not claim his privilege, he could have made it clear for whom he did vote." And not having called him, the inference is drawn that Gilbert would have corroborated the witness whose deposition is in the record. It is unnecessary to comment on this. It is quite as fair to infer that, from the fact that contestant did not call Gilbert, he knew that Gilbert would not corroborate the other testimony as to residence or voting, and it is certainly quite as incumbent on the contestant to produce the voter as a witness as upon the contestee—more so, indeed, for on the contestant rests the onus.

Hence we say that there should not be deducted from Pacheco a vote on account of Charles Gilbert.

(b) The minority held that the evidence did not show for whom J. A. Scott voted, and that for this reason, as well as the reason that his residence was established, urged that his vote should not be deducted. He was on the register of voters, and the minority held that the evidence was not sufficient to show that he was not a legal voter.

But the majority held otherwise.

1. He was not a legal voter. It was stated in the evidence that he was a Republican, and was "voted" by those who were working for Mr. Pacheco. Mr. Scott's deposition was taken by Mr. Pacheco's attorney. He was not asked how he voted. The proof that he voted for Mr. Pacheco is sufficient to shift the burden upon the party seeking to sustain his vote, and inasmuch as the elector was produced and sworn and no effort was made to show for whom he voted, it may be assumed from all the evidence that he voted for the sitting Member. (McCrary, secs. 293, 294; Cushing's American Parliamentary Law, secs. 199, 210.)

(c) An issue was joined as to how Jesus Yorba voted. The majority say:

Jesus Yorba voted in San Diego, but was a resident of Los Angeles. It is alleged that he voted for Mr. Wigginton. It is proven that he had not resided in the precinct where he voted thirty days previous to the election. But the evidence is conflicting as to the candidate for whom he voted. Yorba, was a Democrat and went to the polls and voted with one Angle Smith, also a Democrat. Yorba was what is called "a native Californian," and Smith was a half-breed American and Californian. It was proven that the native Californians, as a class voted for Mr. Pacheco, including those who claimed to be Democrats, and were unwilling to acknowledge that they would vote for a Republican. And one witness gave it as his opinion that Jesus Yorba, voted for Mr. Pacheco. In the midst of this conflicting evidence it is not certain for whom he did vote. His vote, although illegal, can not be deducted from the vote of either of the parties. (Record, pp. 99, 100, 101, 104, 107.)

The minority contended:

The proof is that he was a Democrat and was voted by Angle Smith, a strong Democrat, who was actively supporting Wigginton, and electioneered for Wigginton all day. According to all rules on the subject this would be sufficient to establish that he voted for Wigginton. Certainly, according to the ruling of the majority in some of the cases presented by the contestant, it is amply sufficient. The reason given by the majority for holding that the proof will not warrant finding that he voted for Wigginton is that he was a native Californian, and it is asserted that they as a class voted for Pacheco. But that will not suffice, for it does not appear that they as a clam we Democrats. If that were clearly proven, the proposition would not be without some force. But even then it is fully answered by the fact that Angle Smith, who was a Democrat, who voted for Wigginton and electioneered for Wigginton and went to the polls with Yorba, was one of these same natives—a half-breed American and Californian.

This is an illegal vote for Wiggington, and should be deducted.

(d) Witnesses testified that Gustave O. Perret, who voted without being naturalized, was in consultation with Democratic leaders just before he cast his ballot, that a distributor of straight Democratic tickets gave him his ballot, but could not swear that he cast that ticket. The minority, without arguing the question, held that this vote should be rejected from among the votes credited to contestant.

The majority report contended that while there was doubt about Perret's right to vote, it was not shown for whom he voted.

930. The case of Wigginton v. Pacheco, continued.

The entry of the fact of challenge on a ballot by election officers was not held to be a distinguishing mark justifying rejection of the ballot.

Discussion as to what constitutes a distinguishing mark when made by the voter on his own ballot.

Violation of a law that no tickets should be folded or exhibited near the polls did not invalidate the election.

A voter may not, by subsequent oral testimony, contradict the plain expression of the ballot, although circumstances corroborate the testimony.

Ex parte affidavits were not admitted, even to prove lost testimony valid in form.

(4) As to distinguishing marks on ballots, certain questions arose.

(a) The majority thus set forth a position from which the minority do not dissent:

The law of California on the subject of marked ballots is as follows:

"SEC. 1206. When a ballot found in any ballot box bears upon the outside thereof any impression, device, color, or thing, or is folded in a manner designed to distinguish such ballot from other legal ballots deposited therein, it must, with all its contents, be rejected."

There were six ballots voted for Mr. Pacheco upon which the judges of election indorsed the names of the voters and the words "Challenged because not in the precinct thirty days—challenge disallowed," and then signed one or two names of the inspectors of the election. While the strict letter of the law would exclude these ballots, yet the spirit of the law is evidently otherwise. If the voter had placed this indorsement upon the ballot, or any mark whatever by which it could be distinguished from other ballots, they should be rejected. The law was made to protect the voter, and not to disfranchise him.

(b) In a similar case the majority say:

George M. Clark voted for Mr. Wigginton at San Diego. He wrote his own name on the bottom of the ticket with a lead pencil. (Record, pp. 100–105.) The law of California in reference to marked ballots is as follows:

"SEC. 1206. When a ballot found in any ballot box bears upon the outside thereof any impression, device, color, or thing, or is folded in a manner designed to distinguish such ballot from other legal ballots deposited therein, it must, with all its contents, be rejected.

"SEC. 1207. When a ballot found in any ballot box bears upon it any impression, device, color, or thing, or is folded in a manner intended to designate or impart knowledge of the person who voted such ballot, it must, with all its contents, be rejected."

These provisions were evidently intended to secure to the voter absolute secrecy as to his ballot, and to place it within his power to vote a ballot which could not be distinguished by the election officials, the challengers, or outsiders from any other ballots that were being voted. Section 1206 relates wholly to marks on the outside of the ballot, and can not be applied to the ballot in question, as it is conceded that this voter wrote his name on the face of the ballot. And it is very doubtful whether the strict letter of the other section (1207) applies to Clark's ballot. There was nothing on the face of the ballot "to designate or impart knowledge of the person who voted such ballot." The inspectors were not authorized to presume that Clark voted this ticket merely because they found his name upon it. If any presumption is to be indulged in, it is this: That the name written on the ballot was intended to be voted for, instead of the printed name next above it. Hence this ballot had nothing on it to designate or impart knowledge of the person who voted it. The person who voted it could identify it, and so could every voter identify his ticket if he had scratched one name and written another upon it. He would recognize his own handwriting. But the statute was not intended to place it out of the power of each voter to recognize his own ballot. It was intended to protect the voter in his right to vote a secret ballot. If there were any doubt as to the letter of the law, there can be none as to the spirit of it. There is no charge or suspicion of fraud, intimidation, or improper influences being exerted over the voter. It would certainly be perfectly legal for the voter to publish how he voted. The evidence in this case fails to disclose what was done by the inspectors with Clark's ballot. Nothing is said as to whether they counted or rejected it.

The minority take issue with this position:

This man wrote his name on his ballot for the express purpose of imparting knowledge of the fact that he voted that particular ballot. It is clear that under the statute of California that ballot should have been rejected. We quote the statute:

"SEC. 1207. When a ballot found in any ballot box bears upon it any impression, device, color, or thing, or is folded in a manner to designate or impart knowledge of the person who voted such ballot, it must, with all its contents, be rejected."

The evidence that he voted for Wigginton is distinct and emphatic. It was a marked ballot, Clark having written his name on it, so that it could be known that he voted it.

The following uncontradicted testimony makes these things clear:

"Q. Do you know George M. Clark, of the first ward?—A. I do.

"Q. Please state whether or not George M. Clark voted at the first ward precinct in this city on the 7th November, 1876.—A. He did.

"Q. For whom did he vote for Congressman?—A. For P. D. Wigginton.

"Q. If there was any mark upon his ballot at the time he voted which would distinguish it from other ballots after it was deposited in the box, please state what that mark was.

"(Objected to by attorney for Wigginton, on the ground that it presumes that the witness knew whether or not the ballot had a private mark on it at the time it was deposited in the ballot box, and on the ground that there has been no evidence offered or given tending to show that the witness possessed any such knowledge or information.)

"A. There was; his name was written on the bottom of the ticket.

"Q. If Clark said anything about it at the time he deposited the ballot, tell what he said.—A. He did. He had come to the polls two or three times to vote, and when near the polls James McCoy took him away; he came again just before the polls closed and voted; he then said that he had written his name on the ticket so that old Jim would know that he had not voted against his wishes.

"Q. If you were acting in any official capacity on that day, please tell what it was.—A. I was; I was one of the judges of election."

Thus it is apparent that this voter put this mark, his name, on the ticket for the express purpose of imparting knowledge of the person who voted it, bringing the case exactly within the provisions of the statute above quoted.

But the majority say that the name was written on the face of the ballot. Now, read again the statute and see if that makes any difference. The statute is, "when a ballot found in any ballot box bears upon it any impression," etc. It makes no kind of difference where that impression is placed. When such a ballot is found it must be rejected. If the device or impression were upon the back, as would seem to be the interpretation of the majority, then the ticket need not find its way into the box because it could be detected or seen before it went in; but it is clear that no matter where it is placed on the ballot, when such ballot is found it is to be rejected.

(5) As to certain irregularities the majority say, apparently with the concurrence of the minority:

The contestant alleges that there were such illegal practices at this precinct as to invalidate the whole poll. The law of California requires that no tickets shall be folded or unfolded or exhibited within 100 feet of the polls. This was done during the whole day at this precinct. But while the parties who violated the law may be punished, the law was not intended to provide that such conduct should invalidate the election. We can not see any good reason for rejecting this poll.

(6) As to the validity of a ballot the majority, apparently with assent of the minority, find as follows:

Pablo Rios voted at Wilmington, Los Angeles County. He arrived at the polls late in the day, and fearing they would soon be closed, took the first ticket he could find. It was a Democratic ticket, but he did not desire to vote for any person on that ticket except for George Hinds for supervisor of the county. He erased all other names on the ticket, and wrote Mr. Pacheco's name on the top at the right-hand side, opposite the names of the Presidential electors, which were erased. The judges returned this ballot as a vote cast for R. Pacheco for Presidential elector, and did not count it for him for Representative in Congress. Rios was called, and testified that he intended to vote for Pacheco for Representative in Congress. The evidence is that the names on the ballot, except that of Hinds, were erased, but there is no evidence that the words "for Presidential electors," or the words "for Representative in Congress," were erased. Upon the face of the ballot, according to the evidence, Mr. Pacheco was voted for for Presidential elector. There is no ambiguity about this. The law of California, in reference to counting obscure ballots, is as follows:

"SEC. 1201. No ballot or part thereof must be rejected by reason of any obscurity therein in relation to the name of the person voted for, or the designation of the office, if the board, from an inspection of the ballot, can determine the person voted for and the office intended."

An inspection of this ballot would show that the name of R. Pacheco appeared after the words "for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States." Can such a ballot be counted for the contestee for Representative in Congress, or is it admissible for the voter to explain or contradict such ballot by final evidence after it has been cast? Mr. McCrary, in his work on elections (sec. 407), states the rule which should govern in cases of this kind as follows:

"While it is true that evidence aliunde may be received to explain an imperfect or ambiguous ballot it does not by any means follow that such evidence may be received to give a ballot a meaning or effect hostile to what it expresses on its face. The intention of the voter can not be proven to contradict the ballot or when it is opposed to the paper ballot which he has deposited in the ballot box." (See also People v. Seaman, 5 Denio, 409; State v. Goldthwait, 16 Wis., 552; People v. Fegurson, 8 Cowen, 102; People v. Cook, 14 Barbour, 259.)

When a ballot clearly designates the office to be filled and the name of the person voted for, no court has ever permitted the voter to contradict his ballot by evidence that he intended to vote for a different person, or for the same person for a different office.

Your committee do not feel at liberty to depart from the unbroken line of precedents in cases of this kind, although it is conceded in this case that the rule works a hardship to the voter. It is sometimes necessary to sacrifice the merits of a case in order to maintain an inflexible legal rule. This ballot seems to present such a contingency.

(7) The report thus disposes of a question of evidence:

The contestant alleges that two persons by the name of Smock and another whose name is not given voted at Bakersfield, Kern County, for Mr. Pacheco, who were not residents of the precinct for thirty days preceding the election. Depositions were taken in regard to these persons, in pursuance of notice in the contest, in due time, attorneys of both parties being present, and such depositions were properly forwarded by mail to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. But these depositions have never been received by the Clerk or any officer of the House. The contestant has obtained the ex parte affidavits of E. E. Calhoun, who was contestant's attorney, and of Samuel L. Cutter, who was contestee's attorney, at the taking of these depositions (Record, pp. 94, 95, and 96), which affidavits, sworn to October 18, 1877, after the assembling of the special session of Congress, set forth the substance of the lost depositions. If we were to consider as legal evidence these ex parte affidavits, one of them made by Mr. Pacheco's attorney, we should be compelled to reject the votes of these three persons. But we are not permitted to consider ex parte affidavits as a part of the evidence in the case.

The report further says that if the lost depositions were essential to the decision of the case, the contestant's remedy would have been to retake the depositions, giving due notice to the opposite party.

Thus this case turned principally on the disposition of 10 votes over which there was a division in the committee. The majority, as a result of their conclusions, found a majority of 4 votes for contestant, and reported that he was entitled to the seat.

The minority [1] found for sitting Member a majority of 6 votes.

The report was debated at length in the House on February 6 and 7, 1878 [2] and on the latter day a proposition of the minority to confirm the title of sitting Member was disagreed to, yeas 126, nays 137.

Then a proposition to declare the seat vacant was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the resolutions of the majority giving the seat to the contestant, they were agreed to, yeas 136, nays 125.

The contestant, Mr. Wigginton, then appeared and took the oath.

931. The Massachusetts election case of Dean v. Field, in the Forty-fifth Congress.

[1] Minority views filed by Mr. Sohn T. Wait, of Connecticut. The differences over the 10 votes were not on strictly party lines.

[2] Journal, pp. 379, 384–387; Record, pp. 803, 826–837.

There being no doubt for whom the ballots were intended, the word "fourth" instead of "third," in the description of the Congressional district, did not invalidate the votes.

If the count of election officers is to be set aside by a recount, the petition for the recount should set forth specifically the reasons.

Discussion as to whether or not a result corroborated by Federal supervisors might be set aside by a recount by State officials.

Discussion as to the clause of the Constitution under which Federal supervisors of elections acted.

On February 21, 1878,[1] Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the contested election case of Dean v. Field, of Massachusetts. This report, so far as its reasoning was concerned, was not concurred in by all the majority of the committee, since Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, chairman of the committee, and Mr. J. N. Williams, of Alabama, while sustaining the conclusion, expressly withheld assent to all the propositions therein set forth. Their dissent referred especially to the position taken in the report as to Federal supervisors.[2]

Sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 5 votes over contestant.

As a part of that majority, but not involved in controversy, were 25 ballots thus discussed in the majority report:

> In the Eighteenth Ward of the city 25 ballots were cast designating the Congressional office and candidate as follows:
> "For Representative in Congress, Fourth district, Walbridge A. Field, of Boston."
> The election was held in the Third district, and Mr. Field resided in the district in which he was a candidate. Ought these ballots to be counted for the sitting Member? The questions involved in this point were ably discussed by counsel on both sides, and the authorities do not agree to such an extent as to leave the question entirely free from doubt. But your committee are of the opinion that a liberal interpretation of the law in the interest of enlarged suffrage and the honest intentions of electors would warrant us in counting these ballots for the candidate for whom they were evidently intended.
> The election was in the Third district. The electors of that district had no legal right to vote in the Fourth district, much less to vote in the Third district for a Representative for the Fourth district. We must assume, then, that the persons who cast these ballots intended no violation of law, but that they were acting in good faith and were honestly endeavoring to express a choice for a Representative in Congress in the district in which they were entitled to vote. The office to be filled was that of "Representative in Congress." That is what the voter must have looked to when examining his ballot. The words "Fourth district" do not constitute a part of the legal designation of the office, and in this case we are inclined to regard the erroneous designation of the number of the district as surplusage.

The minority took the same view:

> In the Eighteenth Ward of the city 25 ballots were cast designating the Congressional office and candidate thus:
>
> "For Representative to Congress, Fourth district, Walbridge A. Field, of Boston."
> These 25 ballots were counted for Mr. Field as Representative to Congress from the Third district, both by the ward officers and the board of aldermen, and are necessary to the election of Mr. Field. The contestant avers that these votes were improperly and illegally counted for Field. They were legally counted if they clearly indicate the office for which the person is designed, and the intention of the voter as to that person can be ascertained from the ballot. Evidence may not be received to contradict the ballot nor to give it a meaning when it expresses no meaning of itself; but if it be of doubtful import, the circumstances surrounding the election may be given in evidence to explain it and get at the intent of the voter. (McCrary's Law of Elections, p. 299.) The office to be filled was Representative in Congress. The words "Fourth district" constitute no part of the designation of that office. The way it happened that the words "Fourth district" had been printed upon these ballots was explained by the person printing them, that he had neglected to take from his printing press the type containing these words, which had been used for printing ballots for Representative in Congress in the adjoining Fourth district. Walbridge A. Field was the candidate for Congress in the Third district; he resided in that district. There was no other Walbridge A. Field residing in that district or in the city of Boston. The ballots were cast in the Eighteenth Ward and Third district, and by law could only be cast by persons residing in that ward and district. Clearly, then, from these ballots and the evidence showing by whom they were cast, and the circumstances under which cast, it appears that they were cast for Walbridge A. Field, one of the candidates for Congress in the Third district for Representative in Congress from that district. The words "Fourth district" not rendering uncertain the office intended to be designated or the person voted for, we think that these 25 votes were legally counted for Field as Representative to Congress from the said Third district.

The issues in this case arose entirely over a recount of the votes by a committee of the Boston board of aldermen.

The Third district was situated entirely within the city of Boston. On the evening of election day the ballots were counted by the officers of the several wards in accordance with law. The results were then transmitted, with all the ballots and papers, to the city clerk. The majority report says:

These provisions of the law were strictly complied with, and there is no allegation of fraud, illegality, or irregularity of proceedings in conducting the election up to and including the canvass of the votes and transmission of the result by the ward officers. But it is alleged that the ward officers committed errors in making the count, and on account of these alleged errors the contest arises in this case.

There were three counts of the votes cast for Representative in Congress from the district in question. The first count was that made by the ward officers; the second was that made by the United States supervisors of election, appointed in pursuance of sections 2011 and 2012 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and the third count was made by a committee of the board of aldermen of the city of Boston.

We have already pointed out the manner in which the first count was made. The second count was made by two supervisors of election appointed for each ward by the circuit court of the United States for the circuit in which the city of Boston is situated. These supervisors were appointed upon the recommendation of the respective candidates for Congress, or their friends, and were "of different political parties," as the law of Congress requires. They attended the election in each of the wards and personally supervised the election and the count of the votes, and counted those cast for Representatives in Congress. Section 2017 of the Revised Statutes of the United States makes it the duty of supervisors of elections to attend the election, count the votes, and remain with the ballot boxes until the count is wholly completed. They performed their duty and made return of the result to the chief supervisor of the election, as required by law.

The counts made by the ward officers and the United States supervisors substantially agree.

The count of the ward officers and the United States supervisors gave Dean, the contestant, a majority of 7 votes over Field. The count of the committee of the aldermen reversed the result, and found a majority of 5 votes for Field.

This recount by the aldermen was based on the following statute of Massachusetts:

SEC. 4. If within three days next following the day of any election ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing that they have reasons to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error, said city clerk shall forthwith transmit such statement to the board of aldermen or the committee thereof appointed to examine the returns of said election. The board of aldermen, or their committee, shall thereupon, and within five days, Sunday excepted, next following the day of election, open the envelope and examine the ballots thrown in said ward, and determine the questions raised; they shall then again seal the envelope, either with the seal of the city or a seal provided for the purpose, and shall endorse upon said envelope a certificate that the same has been opened and again sealed by them in conformity to law; and the envelope, sealed as aforesaid, shall be returned to the city clerk. Said city clerk, upon the certificate of the board of aldermen or their committee, shall alter and amend such ward returns as have been proved to be erroneous, and such amended returns shall stand as the true returns of the ward.

In accordance with this law a recount was had in response to a petition as follows:

To the city clerk of the city of Boston:

The undersigned, qualified voters of Ward 13, in the Third Congressional district, hereby state that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers of said ward for Member of Congress in said Congressional district, at the election of November 7, 1876, are erroneous, in that all the ballots cast for Walbridge A. Field as Member of Congress were not counted and credited to him, and that more ballots were credited to Benjamin Dean as Member of Congress than were cast for him; and they ask for a recount of the vote of said ward for Member of Congress, in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of chapter 188 of the acts of the year 1876.

(Signed by 15 voters of the ward.)

The recount was made by a committee of three aldermen, two of whom were of the political party to which contestant belonged, and they found enough of what they considered errors to change the result of the ward counts.

This recount was objected to for two main reasons:

(1) Because it was not properly procured under the laws of Massachusetts, in that the petitioners did not specify wherein they deemed the returns in error.

The statement required by the 10 qualified voters must specify wherein the returns are in error. It is not sufficient to allege generally that the count made by the ward officers was not correct, or that they counted more votes for one candidate than he was entitled to, or less votes for another than he received.

This petition constitutes the jurisdictional fact in the case, and unless it complies with the statute no jurisdiction is conferred on the board of aldermen, or upon their committee, and all proceedings by them not founded on a petition which complies with the statute are utterly void and of no effect. The rule of law applicable in such cases is well established. McCrary, in his treatise on the American law of elections (sec. 280), says: "An application for a recount of ballots cast at an election will not be granted unless some specific mistake or fraud be pointed out in the particular box to be examined. Such recount will not be ordered upon a general allegation of errors in the count of all and giving particulars as to none of the boxes." (Kneass's case, 2 Parsons, 599; Thompson v. Ewing, 1 Brewster, 67, 97.)

In Skerret's case (2 Parsons, 509) the court of common pleas of Philadelphia held that the true rule "regulating such proceedings should be defined, so as to advance on the one hand substantial and meritorious and to arrest on the other futile and querulous complaints. It is not sufficient to state generally that A received a majority of votes, while the certificate was given to B, and therefore the complainants charge that there was an undue election. This is but a conclusion, and it is not for the pleader to state conclusions, but facts from which the court may draw conclusions. If fraud is alleged, the petition must state the manner in which the fraud was committed, the number of votes fraudulently received or fraudulently rejected. (See Carpenter's case, 2 Parsons, 537; Lelar's case, 2 Parsons, 548; Kneass's case, 2 Parsons, 553.)

It was held also by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Gibbons v. Shepherd (2 Brewster, p. 2), that certainty to a common intent was required, that the petition should not be so loosely drawn as to permit the powers of sworn officers chosen by the people to be inquired into without well-defined cause. McCrary, in section 283 of his work, says: "The same rule should be applied to a pleading of this character that is applied to all other similar pleadings. It should state in a legal and logical form the facts which constitute the ground of the complaint. Nothing more is required, nothing less will suffice." The supreme court of Illinois (1 Breese, 285) held "that an affidavit for a writ of attachment which does not comply with the statute confers no jurisdiction, and all subsequent proceedings are void." As the fourth section of the Massachusetts act is held to confer the jurisdiction upon the board of aldermen to count these votes upon the filing of a petition specifying the errors, if such petition does not comply with the statutes no jurisdiction is conferred.

The right of the board of aldermen or their committee to examine the ballots is not to be exercised except in certain cases and in the manner provided by the law above referred to. The statute gives no general right to substitute an aldermanic count for a ward count.

The majority further quoted a report of the city solicitor of Lynn, the Massachusetts legislative cases of Morse v. Lonnergan, etc.

The minority hold that the language of the petition was sufficient.

The complaint to be made is not as to the manner in which the election by the ward officers has been conducted, it does not go to any wrongful act of these officers, but is directed specifically to the ascertained result, the returns made by these officers. The object to be accomplished is to have an examination and count of the ballots by the board of aldermen. The complaint can only be as to the result of the count of the ballots by the ward officers.

This specification of error is to be by persons who were in no way connected with the count of the ballots; by persons who cast the ballots and who have reason to believe that there has been error in their count.

Statements by such persons could hardly be more specific than those filed in this case, "that all the ballots cast for Walbridge A. Field had not been counted and credited to him, and that more ballots had been credited to Benjamin Dean than were cast for him."

It is the opinion of your committee that these statements were sufficient in law to authorize the examination and count of the ballots cast in the several words by the board of aldermen.

(2) Because the Federal election law was supreme, and the result of the supervisor's count might not be reversed by the intervention of a recount authorized and conducted solely under State law.

The majority report went quite fully into this branch of the case, but there was dissent among the majority members on the committee, and also on the floor by members of the majority party in the House. A member of the minority party, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, however, espoused on the floor the contention in favor of the constitutionality and binding effect of the Federal canvass.[1]

The majority report says:

Congress, in pursuance of its constitutional power to make regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, or to alter State regulations on these subjects, enacted the foregoing provisions. They must be held valid and binding upon all the States. From the moment of the enacting of these provisions (February 28, 1871) they become a part of the election law of the State of Massachusetts, overriding all opposing State statutes made or to be made by the State, and the passage of the State law of April 20, 1876, authorizing an aldermanic count, so far as it provided for the taking of the final count of the votes for the Representative in Congress out of the supervision and scrutiny of the United States supervisors of election was an evasion if not a nullification of the Federal law. After Congress had provided for the appointment of two supervisors of election for each voting place, and had required such officers to count the votes for Representative in Congress, and to remain with the ballot boxes until the count was wholly completed, and the certificates made out, it is not competent for any State to provide another board of canvassers, who may take possession of the ballot boxes, exclude the Federal officers, and secretly count the votes and declare a different result.

[1] On this point, see speeches of Messrs. Candler, Mills, Walsh, and Butler, Record, pp. 1792, 2039, 2046, 2084.

As the counting of the votes is now admitted to be the most important function to be performed in reference to an election, laws relating to this part of the election machinery must be strictly construed and rigidly enforced. The count made by the aldermen was made in secret, three or four days after the election, partly in the nighttime, and the United States supervisors and all other persons except the three aldermen were excluded from the room and were not permitted to see what was being done. A count made under such circumstances is in derogation of the acts of Congress and is of no validity whatever.

The minority, after quoting the sections of the Revised Statutes (secs. 2011–2019) which were enacted as amendments to the act of May 31, 1870, "to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes," [1] say:

These provisions of law were not enacted by Congress in pursuance of its constitutional power to "make or alter" regulations as to the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress.

They are not certainly to operate even to the supervision of an election for a single polling place in a city or county which may constitute only a part of an election district, but shall only operate when a certain number of citizens shall make known in writing to a United States judge their desire to have the election "guarded and scrutinized."

The manner of holding such an election is in no way regulated.

These officers are designated as "supervisors of elections." They are appointed by the judges of the Federal courts as instruments in the process of "enforcing the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States;" not managers of an election, but guardians and scrutinizers of an election managed by others, officers of the States.

They are to attend at all times and places for holding elections for Representatives in Congress and for counting the votes at such elections in order that they may challenge votes and inspect and scrutinize the manner in which the voting is done, but they are not to receive or decide upon the legality of any vote or regulate the manner in which the voting is done. On the day of election and at the places of holding the election they are to take, occupy, and remain in such position as will best enable them to see each person voting, scrutinize the manner in which the voting is being conducted, and at the closing of the polls they are to put themselves in such a position in relation to the ballot boxes, for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots, as will enable them to fully perform their duties in respect to such canvass herein provided, but they are not to be in position enabling them to receive a vote, conduct an election, or control a ballot box.

Each of these supervisors is required "personally to scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district cast;" not as a board of election managers, to ascertain the number of ballots cast and for whom cast, and as such board to make returns thereof to the State officer who shall certify that result, or the House of Representatives, who shall judge of that return; but each one personally is to scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot cast in his voting precinct, and make "such certificate and return of all such ballots" as may be directed and required by the chief supervisor from whom he received his appointment. They make returns only of what they have seen in the management of the election to the chief supervisor appointed by the judge of the circuit "in order that the facts may become known." "Become known" through these supervisors, these witnesses for the courts having jurisdiction of the offenses created in these acts, enacted to "enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes."

Further than the returns made, which do not in terms show a count made by these supervisors, except as to the returns from the Eighteenth Ward, the evidence does not show that the supervisors counted the votes in the wards comprising the election district. So that, in the determination of the value of those returns as evidence in this case, their only value is in their official character.

The undersigned, believing that they are not counts made and results ascertained in pursuance of any law made "to regulate the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress," hold that they are insufficient to set aside the result found in this case according to the law of the State of Massachusetts, the certified return of the board of aldermen.

[1] The Federal election laws have since been repealed.

(3) The majority of the committee also endeavored to show that the committee of aldermen did not follow the law in making their recount; but the minority joined issue on this question of fact.

In accordance with their conclusions the majority reported resolutions declaring contestant entitled to the seat.

The report was debated at length in the House and with a considerable breaking of party lines on March 14, 15, 26, and 27, 1878,[1] and on the latter day the question was taken on substituting the minority resolutions, which affirmed the title of sitting Member, for the majority resolutions, which proposed to award the seat to the contestant. On this vote there appeared yeas 120, nays 119, whereupon the Speaker voted in the negative, and the vote stood yeas 120, nays 120. So the motion to substitute failed.

On March 28 the question recurred on the resolutions proposed by the majority, and there appeared yeas 123, nays 123, whereupon the Speaker voted in the affirmative, making yeas 124, nays 123, so the resolutions were agreed to.[2]

Thereupon Mr. Dean, the contestant, appeared and took the oath of office.

932. The Florida election case of, Finley v. Bisbee in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Officers of election being guilty of frauds and forgeries, the returns were rejected.

Returns being rejected for fraud by election officers, no act of the said officers may be admitted as proof aliunde of the vote.

Returns being rejected, the evidence of the voters as to how they voted is not always accepted in proving the vote aliunde.

A contestee was not allowed the votes he proved aliunde when contestant, because of uncertainty of proof, could not be credited with any of the votes he undoubtedly received.

Both the returns and the vote were rejected in a case wherein contestee's proof aliunde gave him a greater vote than was returned by a dishonest election board favorable to him.

The testimony of a voter as to what ballot he cast depends for its value on the intelligence of the witness.

On February 5, 1879,[3] Mr. Thomas R. Cobb, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Florida case of Finley v. Bisbee. In the first session of the Congress, at the organization of the House on October 15, 1877,[4] the Clerk had announced that while there had been certain legal proceedings in regard to the returns, Mr. Bisbee plainly had the prima facie certificate, and therefore had been enrolled.

The precinct returns were conceded by both parties to show the election of the contestant, Finley, by a majority of 5 votes, but the canvassing board had found from the returns a result favorable to Mr. Bisbee, and the certificate had been issued to him.

[4] First session, Record, p. 52.

Three main questions arose in the determination of this contest, the first of which was of especial importance. Indeed, in the reports and debates it was quite generally claimed that this point was decisive, although this was not admitted by all who discussed the question. The points were:

(1) As to the vote of Archer precinct, No. 2, in Alachua County, both parties to the contest admitted that the return was false and forged, and that the officers of election were guilty of the frauds and forgeries; and hence the committee were unanimous that these returns should be rejected.

The returns being rejected, a question arose as to how the true vote should be ascertained, provided it could be ascertained.

The contestant introduced testimony to show that the actual vote was 180 for Bisbee and 141 for Finley. The sheriff of the county was present when the tally sheet was made up, and therefrom made a memorandum which showed that result. Also announcement was publicly made by an election officer of the vote for governor, showing a similar party division. On the other hand, the clerk and one of the inspectors of the election testified that the vote for Bisbee was 398 and for Finley 137. The actual poll lists were extracted from the county offices between the time of the canvasses of the votes and the investigation of the case by Congress. The returns also disappeared. The majority say:

> At all events, they are not to be found; and in the opinion of your committee they were destroyed by some of the conspirators to cover up their crime. The poll list, tally sheet, and the return belonging to said poll are gone.
> Your committee is clearly of the opinion from the evidence that the election at this poll is tainted with frauds, the returns false and forged, whereby they showed that contestee got some 200 or 300 more votes than were actually cast for him, which were canvassed and counted for him by the returning boards.
> Your committee is therefore compelled to go behind these fraudulent returns and examine the evidence in the case, and ascertain the true vote, if it can be done, from the evidence.

In view of the conflicting testimony, neither the majority nor the minority believe that the state of the vote can be ascertained from the testimony of witnesses as to the footings of the tally sheets or the announcements of election officers. The minority thus voice the position on this point:

> We can not say that the officers of an election were false to their trust—guilty of gross frauds—and for that reason reject their returns, and at the same time say that the vote canvassed by them for Mr. Finley, as shown by a tally sheet kept by them, is sufficient proof, or any legal proof, that he received 141 votes at that poll. We think that this position of contestant can not be maintained on any principle of law or evidence. We cite the following authorities on this question:
> "When fraud or grow culpable negligence on the part of the officers of an election is shown, all their acts and doings are rendered unworthy of credit and must be disregarded." (See McCrary, sec. 303.)
> "We repeat, therefore, the opinion expressed in a former chapter, that a willful and deliberate fraud on the part of such an officer being clearly proven, should destroy all confidence in his official acts irrespective of the question whether the fraud discovered is of itself sufficient to change the result. The party taking anything by an election conducted by such an officer must prove his vote by evidence other than the return." (McCrary, sec. 431.)
> "Where the conduct of the election officers is such as to destroy the integrity of the return, and to avoid the prima facie character which they ought to bear as evidence, due and adequate proof must be demanded of each vote relied on." (Opinion of the court in Mann v. Cassada, 1st Brewster, p. 60. See also Thompson v. Ewing, a case from Pennsylvania courts, reported in 1st Brewster, 107; Weaver v. Given, 1st Brewster, 140; Givens v. Stewart, 2d Brewster, p. 2; Jenkins v. Hill, N. H. Reports, p. 144.)

These well-settled principles show that contestant in a case like this can not rely upon unofficial statements of the vote proven to be false, or a tally sheet also proven to be false, to establish his vote. Indeed, they go further and show that the returns being rejected for gross fraud on the part of the election officers, he can not rely upon any act of theirs, official or otherwise, to establish his vote.

A "tally sheet" is not mentioned in the laws of Florida. No such paper is required to be kept or returned. If such a paper was produced, it would be inadmissible as evidence, even if no question was made of its having been falsely kept.

But contestant seeks to establish his vote at this poll by the evidence of a witness who looked over such a paper and took down certain figures from it. When he insists, and the committee concurs, that the officer who kept it was so false to his trust and fraudulent in his conduct that his return of this poll can not be accepted as the truth, and when other and reliable evidence clearly shows that the figures on said tally sheet were false, certainly nothing in the rules of law and evidence will permit this.

A witness, Fleming, a member of contestant's political party, stood at the poll with pencil and paper noting those who voted. His evidence led the majority of the committee to believe that about 318 votes were cast. The list of Fleming was put in evidence by contestant. The minority views, signed by Messrs. Jacob Turney, of Pennsylvania, and J. N. Thornburgh, of Tennessee (one a member of contestant's party and the other belonging to the party of sitting Member), say:

Mr. Bisbee, having this list before him (the poll book at this precinct was lost or mislaid), called 283 voters on Fleming's list, who swear they, together with 8 others on this list, voted the full straight Republican ticket, including for Congress Mr. Bisbee. This would leave Mr. Finley 14 votes had he called the remainder of Fleming's list, and they had sworn they voted for him. The testimony does not show that there was but one Democrat among all the colored voters at this precinct, and he was appointed inspector at this poll. This clearly shows that the announcement made at the close of the poll, that Mr. Finley received 141 votes, Mr. Bisbee 180, is not true.

In fact Mr. Bisbee produced in all witnesses to show that 308 voters cast ballots for him. Mr. Finley, the contestant, proved no votes in this way.

Therefore sitting Member claimed 308 votes at this precinct. The minority views supported this claim strongly.

But the proof shows that an election was opened and held at a time and place established by law by officers legally appointed to hold an election at Archer poll, No. 2, and that many legal voters were there and voted. In such cases we find that we are remitted to such other evidence as may appear in the record to ascertain the vote for contestant and contestee. We cite the following authorities on this point:

"When a return is rejected, legal votes are not lost; they may be proven by secondary evidence, and when thus proven maybe counted." (McCrary's Law of Elections, sec. 302.) "In which case each candidate must prove, by calling the voters as witnesses or otherwise, the number of votes received by him." (Ibid., sec. 391.)

This rule was adopted, and the testimony of the voters held conclusive, in the following cases: Reed v. Julian (2d Bartlett, 823, 828, 832); Washburn v. Voorhees (idem, 54, 60, 62, and 64); Lloyd v. Newton, Clark's & Hall's R., 520; Vallandigham v. Campbell (1858) (1st Bartlett, 223, 228, 229, and 230). See also report of Mr. Lamar, which was adopted by the House; Reed v. Kneas (Brightly, 366, 371, 372).

In the case of The People ex rel. Judson v. Thatcher, reported in 7th Lansing N. Y. Reports, the court held that the testimony of the voters was higher evidence than the returns (pp. 280, 281, 282, and 286).

In the case of Washburn v. Voorhees, Hamilton Township was returned voting as follows: Washburn, 143; Voorhees, 498. Washburn called the voters themselves and showed that 27 more votes were cast for him than were returned; the returns were set aside, and the evidence of the voters taken establishing his vote. Mr. Voorhees, who received according to the returns 498 votes, made no effort to establish his vote. The evidence incidentally showed that four persons voted for him; these only were counted for him. The committee, in citing the authorities upon which they base their decision, say:

"But the rejection of a return does not necessarily leave the votes actually cast at a precinct uncounted. It only declares that the return having been shown to be false shall not be taken as true, and the parties are thrown back upon such other evidence as is in their power to show how many voted and for whom. So that the entire vote, if sufficient care be taken and the means are at hand, may be shown and not a single one lost, notwithstanding the return is rejected. It is found, as has already been stated, that 170 votes were cast at this precinct for Mr. Washburn. There was also the testimony of four persons that they voted for Mr. Voorhees."

In Reul v. Kneass, 584 (Brightly's L. Cases, 366, 372), the court, in answering an objection urged to testimony of voter, said:

"Let the doctrine be once established as constitutional law that an elector can not be heard in such a case to prove how he voted in order to establish the falsity of an election return, and the suffrage of every man in the country is placed under the control of the election officers, who may make him appear to have voted exactly as they please. According to this doctrine, if 500 out of 600 voters in a given district should vote for one candidate and their votes should all be returned as given to another, no adequate means exist in any body, legislative or judicial, in the Commonwealth to relief against so crying a wrong; for refusing to hear the testimony of electors to prove how they voted, the establishment of fraud in such a case would be impossible." (Brightly's L. Cases, 371, 372.)

In Vallandigham v. Campbell (1858) there were three reports, and the report submitted by Lamar and signed by four Members was finally adopted by the House. (1st Bartlett R., 223, 228, 229, 230.)

In this report of Lamar's there is an elaborate review of all the authorities, English and American, upon the questions of the admissibility of the declarations and testimony of voters as to their qualifications and for which candidate they voted. (Id., 230.)

The majority of the committee combat this position.

But there is still another view of this question assumed by the contestee. He insists that he has proven by 308 persons that they voted for him at Archer, No. 2. He claims that he has proven this by the mouths of the voters, outside of the returns, and that therefore he is entitled to have them counted for him in case the returns are set aside for fraud. And as the contestant has failed to introduce any witnesses to testify that they voted for him at said poll, that therefore he, contestant, is not entitled to have any votes counted for him at said poll, thereby giving contestee 308 majority at said poll instead of 258 majority fraudulently returned for him by his political friends, thus enabling him and them to succeed by their own wrongs to a greater extent than their criminal acts standing alone would justify. But the statements of these 308 witnesses will hardly sustain this assumption by the contestee. A large number of them do not testify that they voted for contestee, but that they voted the Republican ticket; many of them could not read, as we have already said, and therefore they had to depend upon others for the kind of tickets they voted, and were liable to be deceived; but however this may be, your committee is of the opinion that this view of the case can not be sustained under the proof. The proof shows that contestant did get votes at said poll, and that he probably got somewhere from 136 to 141. Your committee admits that if there was no evidence other than the returns, they being fraudulent and void, proving that the contestant received votes at said poll, then it would be unquestionably right to count the vote clearly proven to have been cast for contestee. But when the proof shows that a large number of votes were, in point of fact, cast for one candidate, as for the contestant in this case, but the number not being sufficiently certain to enable them to be counted, it seems to your committee to be manifest injustice to count the votes of his opponent, thereby increasing his majority to the full number of votes so counted. There is no rule of law or equity that will justify such action, but it would be a clear case of uncertainty in the proof, and stands in the same position as to uncertainty as the other positions assumed, and the entire vote must be rejected.

Your committee has therefore come to the following conclusions as to this precinct:

First. That the result of the election as shown by the returns is false and fraudulent.

Second. That from the other evidence in the case it is impossible to ascertain the true vote of said poll.

The vote must therefore, in the opinion of your committee, be entirely rejected.

The majority insist that as the poll was in charge of election officers, a majority of whom belonged to sitting Member's party, it was not probable that the true vote for contestant was swelled in the returns.

The minority views maintain that the evidence of the voters is sufficient as to how they voted. Although illiterate, they recognized the Republican ticket by the way the flag was placed on it, the flag on the Democratic ticket being placed in a different way. Also the tickets were given to them by officers of their political clubs, and these officers distributed none but straight Republican tickets, bearing Bisbee's name.

933. The case of Finley v. Bisbee, continued.

A voter being qualified as to naturalization, his vote was not rejected because he did not produce his papers at the polls as required by the State constitution.

The acts of election officers being presumed to be correct, a vote should not be rejected unless it is positively proven that the voter was disqualified as to registration.

(2) A question arose as to the votes of certain foreign-born persons, which were received without the production of naturalization papers. The majority report thus states the case:

The qualifications of voters in Florida are prescribed and defined in section 1 of Article XIV of the constitution of that State, as follows:

"SECTION 1. Every male person of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, of whatever race, color, nationality, or previous condition, who shall at the time of offering to vote be a citizen of the United States, or who shall have declared his intention to become such in conformity to the laws of the United States, and who shall have resided and had his habitation, domicile, home, and place of permanent abode in Florida for one year, and in the county for six months next preceding the election at which he shall offer to vote, shall in such county be deemed a qualified voter at all elections under this constitution." (See acts of 1868, containing the State constitution, p. 211.)

The third section of the same article of the constitution, and the one on which the contestee relies, does not create any additional qualifications for voters, but only prescribes a regulation. It reads as follows:

"SEC. 3. At any election at which a citizen or subject of any foreign country shall offer to vote under the provisions of this constitution, he shall present to the persons lawfully authorized to conduct and supervise such election a duly sealed and certified copy of his declaration of his intention, otherwise he shall not be allowed to vote. And any naturalized citizen offering to vote shall produce before said persons lawfully authorized to conduct and supervise the election the certificate of naturalization, or a duly sealed and certified copy thereof, otherwise he shall not be permitted to vote." (Acts of 1868—constitution, sec. 3, pp. 211–212.)

In the opinion of your committee it is clear that section 1 of Article XIV prescribes and defines all the qualifications of voters, and equally clear that section 3 does not create any additional qualification.

The qualification prescribed by section 1, in regard to foreign-born persons, is, that at the time they offer to vote they shall either be citizens of the United States, or shall have declared their intention to become such; while section 3 does not create any additional qualification, but only undertakes to prescribe the mode of proof, in case the right of such persons to vote shall, at the time they offer to vote, be disputed.

Such is the reasonable interpretation of these two sections of the constitution of Florida, when taken and construed together.

Moreover, this is the construction given by the first legislature in the State of Florida, which convened under the constitution of 1868, and it is to be observed that very many of the members of said legislature were also members of the convention that formed the constitution, and your committee are advised that this construction has been acquiesced in by every legislature that has convened since that time.

The legislature of 1868 treated and construed the third section of Article XIV of the constitution as being merely directory, as will be seen from the sixteenth section of the act of August 6, 1868, which provides as follows:

"SEC. 16. If any person offering to vote shall be challenged as not qualified, by any inspector or by any other elector, one of the board shall declare to the person challenged the qualifications of an elector. If such person shall claim to be qualified, and the challenge be not withdrawn, one of the inspectors shall administer to him the following oath: 'You do solemnly swear that you are twenty-one years of age; that you are a citizen of the United States (or that you have declared your intention to become a citizen of the United States according to the acts of Congress on the subject of naturalization); that you have resided in the State one year, and in the county six months next preceding the election; that you have not voted at this election, and that you are not disqualified to vote by the judgment of any court;' and if the person challenged shall take such oath he shall be allowed to vote." (Pamphlet acts 1868, p. 5, sec. 16.)

It is shown by the testimony in this case that none of these alien-born voters, except one, were challenged; that their naturalization papers were not demanded; that they were allowed to vote without question, and that they were in fact (with the exception of 7), at the time they voted, either naturalized citizens of the United States, or had declared their intention to become such, as required by section 1 of Article XIV of the constitution of the State. And your committee are of the opinion that, as they are proven to have possessed the qualification of citizenship or of having declared their intention to become citizens as required by the constitution, their votes should not be rejected.

The majority say it is the settled law of elections that where persons vote without challenge they are presumed to be entitled to vote and that the election officers receiving the votes did their duty properly and honestly. The section requiring the presentation of a certificate prescribed only a regulation, and according to McCrary "the right to vote must not be impaired by the regulation." Furthermore, the evidence showed that the larger portion of these aliens had been naturalized, and therefore section 1 of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution guaranteed that no State law should "abridge the privileges or immunities" of these naturalized citizens.

The minority combat this proposition, saying in their views:

Now, contestant concedes that a vote cast by a person not registered is illegal. And it is too well settled to be disputed. Registration is a "necessary prerequisite" to be complied with by the voter before he can legally vote. The constitution of Florida makes another "necessary prerequisite" of a foreign-born person before he shall vote. It tells him he shall present to the officers of the election his duly certified and sealed "naturalization papers" or his "declaration of intention" (where he has not taken out his final papers), "otherwise he shall not be allowed to vote."

And it seems to us that the same principle must be applied in the case of foreign-born persons who did not present their papers, as the law required, to the officers at the election that we have applied to unregistered voters. The requirement of the constitution is mandatory. It requires a certain thing to be done by a foreign-born person, "otherwise he shall not vote."

It is urged by contestant that they were not challenged, and had they been required so to do, that in most cases they could have produced the papers the constitution required. We might say the unregistered voters were not challenged. They, too, could have registered if they knew the law required it and they desired to do so. Each has failed to do what the constitution of the State has commanded before they can legally vote.

This is not something the law requires of the officers of election. It is a requirement of the citizen to qualify him to vote. The constitution of the State challenged his vote unless he complied with the supreme law of the State.

"The right of suffrage is not a natural right nor is it an absolute unqualified personal right. It is the right derived in this country from constitutions and statutes. It is regulated by the States, and their power to fix the qualifications of voters is limited only by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, which forbids any distinction on account of 'race, color, or previous condition of servitude.'" (McCrary, sec. 3, and cases therein cited.)

"But the election franchise, like other rights, is not that of unrestrained license. In a government of law, the law must regulate the manner in which it must be exercised. The time and occasion and mode of voting are to be prescribed by the legislature, except in so far as the constitution has a voice of its own on the subject, and therefore it is that laws have been created for election officers, regulating the hours of the day during which the election shall be held, and the proof necessary to establish the right to vote. * * * The elector's privilege is not, therefore, a mere constitutional abstraction, but it is to be exercised in subordination to law, and on proof of title of the person claiming its exercise. The right, however well founded in fact, may be lost for want of such evidence of titles as the law demands." (Opinion of court in case of Batturs v. Megary, Brewster Rep., vol. 1, p. 171; see also 2d Bartlett, 831.)

In Pennsylvania persons not assessed for taxes were required by the laws of the State to answer certain questions under oath, concerning tax, age, and residence, and also to prove their residence by the oath of a qualified voter.

In the following cases it was distinctly held that a vote cast without complying with the statute was illegal and could not be counted. (Mann v. Cassady, 1st Brewster, p. 12; Myers v. Moffett, 1st Brewster, p. 230; Weaver v. Given, 1st Brewster, p. 141; Sheppard v. Gibbons, 2d Brewster, pp. 117–129.)

In Brightly's Leading Cases, p. 492 (note), the author says:

"Votes received from electors whose names do not appear on the assessment list without the preliminary proof required by law were formerly held to be prima facie illegal and to be rejected from the count unless adequate proof were made on the trial of the legality of such vote. (Mann v. Cannada and Weaver v. Given.) But the modern and better opinion seems to be that such votes being illegal when received can not be made legal by the production of evidence of qualification on the trial which ought to have been but was not produced to the election officers."

He cites Sheppard v. Gibbons and Myers v. Moffett.

In the case of Sheppard v. Gibbons, the court says:

"A vote prima facie illegal must be disallowed if the voter did not at the time of offering it produce the preliminary proof required by law. (Brightly, p. 558 and 572. See Covode v. Foster, 2d Bartlett, 600 et seq., and Wright v. Fuller, ibid, 159 and 160.)

Again, the statutes of Wisconsin provide that no person, not registered, should be allowed to vote unless he produced his own affidavit and the affidavit of a householder of the district of his residence in the district. In a case reported in 21st Wisconsin, page 566, it is held that the affidavits must be produced or the vote is illegal and must be thrown out.

This is an important case, and all the principles arising under section 3, article 4, constitution of Florida, concerning foreign-born voters are decided.

The minority further cite the case of Bancroft v. Slumpf (23d Wis., 630), and urge that the 74 votes of foreign-born persons, who voted without complying with the conditions of the constitution, should be deducted from contestant's vote.

934. The case of Finley v. Bisbee, continued.

As to the sufficiency of certified copies of registration lists as evidence of the qualifications of voters.

Until the contrary is proven, election officers are presumed to have tested the voter's qualifications by a required oath.

Criticism of the rule of proportionate deduction of illegal votes the nature of which is unknown.

Evidence is not admitted on a point as to which there was a total failure to plead in the answer.

(3) As to the votes of certain persons who were not registered.

The law of Florida provided for a registration of the legally qualified voters in each county, and that "no person not duly registered according to law shall be allowed to vote." Also further sections of law provide:

SEC. 8. No person shall be entitled to vote at any election unless he shall have duly registered six days previous to the day of election.

Section 9 provides:

That the county commissioners shall meet at the office of the clerk of the circuit court within thirty days preceding the day on which any election shall be held and examine the list of registered electors, and erase therefrom the names of such persons as are known or may be shown to their satisfaction to have been dead, or ceased to reside permanently in the county, or otherwise become disqualified to vote; Provided, That if any person whose name may be erased shall on offering to vote at any election declare on oath that his name has been improperly struck from the list of registered voters, and shall take the oath required to be taken by persons challenged, such person shall have the right to vote.

Section 10 provides for furnishing the election officers at each precinct with a revised list of the registered voters of the county.

On these provisions of law the sitting Member based an objection thus set forth in the minority views:

The sitting Member insists that a large number of persons at various polls in eleven of the counties of the district voted, never having been legally registered. He introduces, first, the poll list, showing who did vote at each of the polls where such illegal votes were cast; then produces either a certified copy of the original registration book, including the names of all persons who had been striken off, or he produces a copy of the revised list of registration, together with a list of the names striken off; thus presenting a certified copy of the names of all persons who have ever been registered since the adoption of the new constitution in 1868. By comparing the poll list with the list of registration so produced, we find that many persons have voted who have never been registered. If they were sworn at the polls as the statute demands, and took the oath that they had been registered and had been improperly stricken off, then they must have sworn falsely, for the record itself, the highest evidence, shows that they never were on the registration book and hence were never stricken off. The contestant in this case was the contestant in the Forty-fourth Congress, in the case of Finley v. Walls. He was given his seat upon a decision that the votes not found on the revised list were not sworn as the law directs. In this case they never were registered, and such oath, if taken, would have been false. Their votes could not be received even if sworn. In that case the officers of the election were called and proved how many persons voted at each poll who were not on the revised registration list supplied by the clerk. In this case the voters, as shown by record evidence, never did register. In the former case, where it was not ascertained for whom the legal votes were cast, they were deducted from the vote each candidate received, according to a rule which seems now well established. It is proper here to notice an objection made by contestant in regard to the evidence concerning the names that had been "stricken off." He insists that this is no longer a record, and cannot be introduced as evidence. This might be true if in "striking off" or "erasing" the name of a voter from the "registration book" it was so obliterated that the name could not be ascertained; but such is not the fact. The name "stricken off" is not so defaced that it can not be made out. In fact, we find in some cases the only striking out that is done is the writing at the end of the name the words "removed," or "dead," or "convicted of felony," etc. (See Record, pp. 708–728.) Again, the proof shows in regard to the county of Alachua that the clerk of the circuit court, in order to prepare the revised list for the officers at the various polls at this election, handed his "registration book" to the printer to prepare the revised lists necessary. But instead of printing a revised list, he printed the names of those who were stricken off as well as those who had not been stricken off. A pen had been drawn through the names of those stricken off, but they were still legible. (See evidence of Clerk Webster, Record, p. 137.)

The clerks of the circuit courts furnish in the record of this case lists of names of all persons who have ever been registered in their county since the adoption of the new constitution in 1868. They certify that they are true and correct; they include the names of those who had once been registered, but are dropped or "stricken off" when revised lists are prepared to send to the officers holding an election. We think this evidence legitimate and proper. From these registration lists and the poll lists we can, by comparison, clearly ascertain the names of all persons who have voted but have never been registered. We also hold that persons who have never been registered could not legally vote. Upon this question we cite the following authorities:

Finley v. Walls, Forty-fourth Congress:

"If election officers receive a vote without preliminary proof, which the law makes an essential prerequisite to its reception, such vote is as much an illegal one as if the voter had none of the qualifications required by law."

Brightly's L. Cases, 453, 492, note.

State v. Hilmoutel, 21st Wis.. 566.

State v. Stumpf, 23d Wis., 630.

16 Mich., 342.

Registration is, under the constitutional laws of Florida, an essential prerequisite before voting. The law tells the elector, unless you are registered you shall not vote. It tells the officers of election they shall not receive it. Hence, such illegal votes cannot be counted either by the courts or by unbiased legislative bodies, even after they are put in the ballot box.

The majority in their report do not admit the legality of the contestant's argument, and say:

The contestee offers in evidence the certified copies of the registration lists of the counties; also the poll lists of the precincts of said counties; and he invites a comparison of the names on the poll list with the names found on the registration list, and insists that the votes of all persons whose names appear on the poll list as having voted, but whose names are not found on the registration list, be declared void, for the reason that such votes are illegal.

Your committee does not agree with this view of the question. If a person vote in a county in Florida, having all the qualifications of a voter of said county except that his name has never been registered in said county, his vote, in the opinion of your committee, would be illegal, or if the name of such person having once been on the registration list of said county, but having been erased therefrom by the board of commissioners, afterwards cast his vote without having first taken the oath that his name had been improperly stricken "off from" the list of registered voters, his vote would also be illegal. But suppose we examine the poll list and find the name of a voter thereon as having voted, and we then turn to the registration list and find his name is not on that, can it therefore be said that he voted illegally? Certainly not. If a person votes at an election, his vote is presumed, under the law, to be legal until the contrary be proven in a legal way, for the reasons—

First. That the acts of an officer or officers of an election within the scope of this authority are presumed to be correct and honest until the contrary is made to appear, and therefore that they as such officers would not receive an illegal vote.

Second. That the presumption is always against the commission of a fraudulent or illegal act, and therefore that a man would not cast an illegal vote. (McCrary, sec. 87–440; Little v. Robbins; Gooding, v. Wilson.)

The majority further say that while the certified copy of the poll list is evidence that the voter cast his vote, a certified copy of the revised registration list was not evidence that his name had never been on the registration list for it might have been erased. The law of Florida did not provide for making a record of names of persons erased from the registration lists.

The fact can not be proven by the record, and certainly can not be proven by the certificate of the clerk attached to what purports to be a copy of a record which has no legal existence, for the clerk can only certify to records in such case, and his certificate to a fact in this case, outside of the records legally in his custody and of which he is legally authorized to give certified copies under his hand and seal, amounts to no more than the certificate of a private individual to a given fact.

The sitting Member introduced the evidence of two witnesses who had examined the poll lists, registration lists, and other papers, and who gave the results of their examinations. The majority say:

These statements made by the witness are inadmissible. The papers themselves are the best and only evidence of what they contain, if they are admissible for any purpose. The committee must make the comparison and can not take the statements of the witness as to the result of his comparison.

Your committee is of the opinion that this proof is insufficient to prove that these persons voted illegally whose names are not found on the registration lists of their respective counties. If they took the oath that their names had been improperly erased from the registration list—and the proof thus far is insufficient to overcome the presumption that they did—their votes are legal. The contestee undertakes to overcome the presumption in favor of the legality of this class of votes in another way. On some of the poll lists of the precincts in these counties is found at the end of some of the names of the persons voting these words, "Not sworn." At the end of others the word "Sworn." Now, it is contended by contestee that whenever you find a name on the poll list of any precinct with the words "Not sworn" written after it, which name is not found on the registration list of the respective county, that the vote of such person is illegal. This position can not be maintained, for reasons which we have heretofore stated. But we will further say that the law does not authorize the election officers, or either of them, to write the words "Not sworn" or "Sworn" on the poll list after the names of the voters who have voted and whose names are not found on the registration list of the county in which they vote, whether such persons were sworn or not before they voted. The writing of these words are therefore unofficial acts, and not a part of the poll list under the law, and not evidence, and can not be made so by a certified copy of the poll list, as is here attempted to be done. It would be a very dangerous rule, indeed, which would permit everything which appears on the face of a record to become evidence, whether placed there by authority of law or by the unofficial acts of irresponsible persons. How these words came to be written on these poll lists or by whom they were so written the evidence does not show. But it is enough for your committee to know that they were not placed there pursuant to any law and can not be considered as evidence.

Your committee is, therefore, of the opinion that the evidence does not prove that the votes cast by persons whose names were not found on the registration lists of the counties in which they voted are illegal. The evidence does not prove that they did not take the oath required by law in such case.

The minority, holding that the votes in controversy should be deducted, laid down this rule:

Where the proof shows for whom such illegal vote was cast, we deduct it from the candidate who received it. Where it is not shown for whom such illegal votes were cast, we adopt the well-settled rule which was followed in the case of Finley v. Walls, Forty-fourth Congress. This rule is laid down by Mr. McCrary in his Law of Elections, section 298 (see authorities there cited), as follows:

"In purging the polls of illegal votes the general rule is that, unless it be shown for which candidate they were cast, they are to be deducted from the whole vote of the election division, and not from the candidate having the largest number."

Of course, in the application of this rule, such illegal votes would be deducted proportionately from both candidates, according to the entire vote returned for each.

The majority report says:

In purging the polls of illegal votes the general rule is that, unless it be shown for which candidate they were cast, they are to be deducted from the whole vote of the election division, and not from the candidate having the largest number. (McCrary on Elections, p. 223; Shepherd v. Gibbons, 2 Brewster, 128; McDaniel's Case, 3d Penn., L. F., 310; Cushing's Election Case, 583.)

Of course, in the application of this rule, such illegal votes would be deducted proportionately from both candidates, according to the entire vote returned for each. (McCrary, p. 223.)

This is, perhaps, the best rule that can be adopted in such case. It is manifest, however, that it may sometimes work a great hardship; for the truth might be, if it could be shown, that all the illegal votes were cast for one of the candidates, while it is scarcely to be presumed that they would ever be divided between the candidates in exact proportion to their whole vote. But the rule that would deduct them all from either one of the candidates, in the absence of proof as to how the illegal votes were cast, is much more unreasonable and dangerous. The above rule is perhaps the safest one to be adopted in a court of justice, where there is no power to order a new election, and where great injury would result from declaring the office vacant. But it is manifest, as we have already said, that it might work a great hardship. And in a legislative body, having the power to order a new election, it is safer, in the opinion of your committee, and more conducive to the ends of justice, to order such new election than to reach a result by the application of such a rule. (McCrary, pp. 224, 225.)

A question as to pleading is thus disposed of by the majority report:

Contestee undertakes to prove that certain devices were resorted to in this county by certain persons to compel persons to vote the Democratic ticket by numbering tickets which they gave to said voters, with threats that if they did not vote the Democratic ticket they would be discharged by their employers, etc. There is nothing in the answer which will justify such proof. There is no allegation in the answer that can under any rule of pleading known to your committee be construed so as to admit such evidence. We are disposed to extend the rule in this case as far as possible, in order to let in all the evidence, but when there is a total failure to plead, as is the case here, we can not consider the evidence in determining a fact which tends to change the vote of either candidate. Your committee will say, however, that the proof on this point wholly fails to sustain such an allegation were it averred.

In accordance with their conclusions, the majority of the committee recommended the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Horatio Bisbee, Jr., is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress from the Second Congressional district of Florida.

Resolved, That Jesse J. Finley is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress from the Second Congressional district of Florida.

The minority reported in favor of sitting Member.

The report was fully debated on February 20, 1879,[1] and on that day the question was tried on the majority resolutions, which were agreed to, yeas 131, nays 122.

Thereupon Mr. Finley, the contestant, appeared and took the oath.

935. The Missouri election case of Frost v. Metcalfe in the Forty-fifth Congress.

On so difficult a question as that of residence strong testimony is required to destroy the presumption that election officers have permitted none but qualified electors to vote.

The Committee on Elections declined to count votes of persons prevented from voting by an erroneous dropping of their names from the registration.

The Committee on Elections declined to reject or purge a poll because of the bad conduct of United States marshals.

On February 25, 1879,[2] Mr. John T. Harris, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the unanimous report of the committee (the minority concurring in the conclusions) in the Missouri election case of Frost v. Metcalfe.

Sitting Member had been returned by an official plurality of 19 votes. Contestant sought to overturn this result by a number of objections. Certain of these involved questions discussed, as follows:

(1) Contestant alleged that 6 illegal votes were cast by negroes not residents of Missouri. The report says:

They do not regard the proof as sufficient to show that the 6 votes in question were not legal voters. It wholly fails to show that the residence of these colored men was not at their place of voting. Neither does the evidence show that they voted for contestee. It would be a dangerous doctrine to the right of election to permit the solemn act of the sworn officers of the law to be set aside upon such testimony. It is to be presumed that they did their duty. A majority were of the same politics of the contestant, and the evidence shows they sought to be watchful and careful in the discharge of their duty. It may be, and often is, difficult to determine the home or domicile of a boatman, or one who is constantly engaged in steamboating or on railroads, but as the law contemplates every man has a domicile or residence, it is often only known to the party himself. It is a question of intent, known alone to the party. It is to be presumed the election officers sifted these voters and came to correct conclusions. The evidence is not sufficient to show they did not.

(2) While considering the question of defective registration lists the report says:

While on this branch of the subject your committee will dispose of the complaint made by contestant that by reason of the errors in copying the registration list he lost many more votes than contestee. To count votes which were never offered at any poll is carrying the doctrine further than we ever knew it. To authorize this committee to count a vote, four things are requisite—first, the person offering to vote must have been a legal voter at the place he offered to vote; second, he must have offered his vote; third, it must have been rejected; and, fourth, it must be shown for whom he offered to vote. These requisites do not exist in these cases; therefore your committee will not further consider them.

(3) Contestant alleged:

That the conduct of judges and United States supervisors and marshals at said precinct No. 77, in handling and tampering with the ballots and the tallies, tainted the return from that poll with fraud, and rendered the result so uncertain that said poll must be wholly rejected.

The committee say:

The contestant asks that the whole poll at No. 77 be set aside and discarded, because the return was tainted with fraud by handling and tampering with the ballots and tallies.

The only evidence on this subject is given by the deputy United States marshal, Wortman. The contestant does not call any of the judges or officers conducting the election, a majority of whom were Democrats, to sustain this charge. As before said, the law presumes public officers did their duty. The returns are in due form and were duly counted. According to the showing of this witness, the falling out of the ballots was purely accidental. Then why not have called some of the officers to prove these facts if they existed? The failure to call them raises the presumption that they would not sustain the charge. They do not occupy the position of parties charged with fraud testifying in their own behalf, but they are presumed to be impartial and disinterested, or, if partial, a majority of them are presumed to lean toward contestant, therefore would have been willing to tell the truth in his behalf.

To set aside a formal and regular return made by sworn officers of both political parties, upon such evidence, would set a dangerous precedent and render popular elections but a name and a mockery.

(4) Contestant alleged:

That said marshals were wholly unnecessary and were appointed solely for the purpose and in number sufficient to make reasonably certain the election of Metcalfe.

Eighth. That the money promised them by the Government was used simply as a bribe for votes for Metcalfe. That many of them were Democrats, who, to obtain the position, were compelled to promise and pledge that they would vote for Lyne S. Metcalfe.

The committee said:

Your committee deprecate the appointment of United States marshals under any pretext. If they are intended as conservators of the peace, the power of the State is ample for that purpose. If they are in any manner to interfere in the elections, it is clearly a violation of the laws of the States for them to do so. But the law of the United States warrants the appointment of deputy marshals, and the same must be respected until altered or repealed. It does not limit the number. The question in this case is, Was the conduct of the marshals such as to invalidate the whole election? It can not with any strong reason be urged that this committee shall make an estimate from conjecture how many voters they changed by their conduct. Nor would it be safe or warranted that the parties alleged to have been bribed, would, but for such bribe, have voted the other way. If the conduct of these deputy marshals was such as to pollute the whole vote of the district, then the committee could not sift the good from the bad voters and declare a result, but would be compelled to find there had been no fair expression of the popular will, and that no legal election had been held.

The testimony of the witnesses called by the contestant to prove bribery and fraud on the part of those marshals is very vague and unsatisfactory. Some 8 were introduced, who do prove that they were appointed with the promise expressed or implied that they would vote for Metcalfe, but 5 admit they voted for Frost; 2 say they voted for Metcalfe, but they preferred him and were in no way influenced by the office. One did not vote at all. So that the evidence, so far as it goes, tends to repel the presumption that the 728 deputy marshals were influenced in their votes by reason of their appointments. To say the least of it, the testimony is not very reliable, coming as it does from men who confess their own abasement and degradation.

There is nothing in this evidence that would justify your committee in transferring any votes from Metcalfe to Frost or deducting any from Metcalfe; much less would it justify them in setting aside the whole election.

In accordance with their conclusions, the committee reported resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

On February 25, 1875,[1] this report was presented in the House, but was not acted on then or thereafter.

Chapter XXXI.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1880 AND 1881.

936. The Arkansas election case of Bradley v. Slemons in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Interpretation of the law limiting the time of taking testimony in an election case.

Testimony taken after the legal time, objections to which were part of the record, was rejected.

A party to an election case may object to testimony as it is completed, although he may have appeared and cross-examined.

On March 8, 1880,[3] Mr. Samuel L. Sawyer, of Missouri, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the Arkansas case of Bradley v. Slemons.[4]

The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 2,827 votes.

At the outset the committee disposed of a question as to time of taking evidence:

At the very threshold of our inquiry we are met with an objection by the contestee to the consideration of any portion of the evidence taken by the contestant in the counties of Chicot and Hempstead, for the reason that the forty days allowed by law to contestant in which to take testimony in chief had expired before the taking of evidence in said Chicot and Hempstead counties commenced.

Protests of contestee were duly entered on the record against the taking of such testimony. Contestant, however, contends that, as he commenced taking testimony on the 18th day of February, 1879, the forty days allowed him commenced running from that day, and this view, if correct, will entitle him to the benefit of the testimony taken in those two counties.

Section 107 of the Revised Statutes provides that the time allowed for taking testimony shall be ninety days, and it shall be taken in the following order: The contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days, the returned Member during the next forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal only during the remaining ten days of said period.

[4] All the committee concurred in the conclusions of this report and the law except Mr. James B. Weaver, of Iowa, who filed minority views.

In order to settle definitely from what time the forty days allowed to contestant in which to take his testimony in chief should begin to run, it is provided by the act of Congress upon the subject of contested elections, approved March 2, 1875, that section 107 shall be so construed as to require that, in all cases of contested elections, the testimony shall be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned Member is served upon the contestant. (Statutes 1875, chap. 119, sec. 18, p. 338.)

The answer of contestee to contestant's notice of contest was served on contestant on the 29th day of January, 1879 (p. 6). The time, then, for taking contestant's testimony in chief expired on the 10th day of March following. The taking of testimony by him in Chicot and Hempstead counties was commenced in Chicot County on the 20th day of March, ten days after the expiration of the time allowed to him, and was closed in Hempstead County on the 28th day of March. The provisions of the statutes referred to can not be disregarded, and contestant, without leave of the House, was unauthorized to take further testimony in chief after the 10th day of March, when his time for that purpose expired.

The law is intended to, and does, furnish each party ample opportunity for taking testimony, if ordinary diligence is used; and especially is this the case, when it is considered that a party may take testimony at two or more places on the sameday. This wise provision of the law furnishes a strong reason against an extension of time in ordinary cases like the present. (Boles v. Edwards, second session Forty-fifth Congress; Vallandigham v. Campbell, Thirty-fifth Congress; Carrigan v. Thayer, Thirty-eighth Congress.)

No application was made to the House by contestant for an extension of time, and the question is now clearly presented whether, without any cause whatever being shown therefor, the testimony thus taken out of time shall be admitted and considered. Another important fact may be considered in this connection. It appears from an examination of the record of the testimony that the time actually consumed by contestant in taking the entire testimony returned, including that taken beyond the time allowed by law, was only eighteen days; thus establishing the fact beyond controversy that he could, by the use of ordinary diligence, have taken the entire testimony within the time allowed him by law without trespassing upon the time allowed to contestee. In view of these facts, no reason exists why the committee should consider the testimony taken in Chicot and Hempstead counties, or should recommend that it be considered by the House.

The minority views dissented as follows:

The evidence taken in Chicot and Hempstead counties was taken after the forty days from the service of contestee's answer on the contestant had expired, but no protest was entered or made by contestee, so far as it appears in the record, until the depositions had all been taken, signed, and certified. Contestee appeared and cross-examined the witnesses without making objection. He entered his objection just as the depositions were ready to be sealed and transmitted. I submit to the House whether contestee by his appearance and cross-examination, without objection, did not waive all right to object to the testimony on this ground.

As to the merits of the question the committee discussed questions of fact principally; but a few questions of law were involved.

937. The case of Bradley v. Slemons, continued.

Abandonment of the polls by intimidated judges was not of itself considered sufficient to invalidate a poll.

Failure to hold an election in two townships, no reason being ascertained for such failure, did not affect the general result.

Election officers being robbed of the ballot boxes and returns by unknown masked men, the general result was not affected therefor.

(1) As to the vote of Melton Township, the following appeared:

The testimony shows that a short time before sunset, the time fixed for closing the polls, one of the judges of the election, J. D. Currie, was threatened with an arrest by a United States deputy marshal unless the polls were then closed and the votes counted; that quite a number of colored men crowded around the polls, some with guns in their hands and others having them stacked within a convenient distance, a guard being placed over them; that such was the demonstration the judges considered it unsafe to remain and accordingly left, the ballot box having been thrown out to one of the colored men, a supervisor of the election for that precinct, which was afterwards returned to its place upon the table. After the judges had proceeded a short distance they concluded to return and endeavor to count the votes. Upon their return it was ascertained the deputy marshal had left, that the ballot box was in the possession of the colored men, who asserted their intention of retaining it, and such was the excitement it was believed to be unsafe to remain longer, and the judges accordingly left. (Pp. 85, 86, 88, and 89.) Mr. Nixon, one of the judges of the election at this precinct, estimates the vote cast at about 115.

There is no pretense that the election was an unfair one, or that the voters were intimidated, nor is there a particle of evidence connecting contestee or any of his friends with the transaction. The county clerk, Mr. Nivens (p. 36), testifies that the ballot box was brought to him by a United States deputy marshal securely locked, and still remains in that condition. It is not pretended that the ballot box had been tampered with, and the vote could easily have been ascertained had the proper exertion been made.

(2) As to failure to hold elections or failure to make a return, the report says:

It also appears there were no returns from Barraque or Dunnington townships, the inference from the testimony being that no election was held in either of those townships, and no reason is assigned for the failure to hold an election. It will not, however, be seriously contended that the result of the election can in any manner be affected by the failure of these townships to hold an election.

In Washington Township it appears from the evidence that an election was held, and that the judges, while on their way with the ballot box to make return, were assaulted by masked men and the ballot box was taken from them. It does not appear who those men were, nor what their party affiliations, nor can any presumption arise from the relative strength of the political parties to which, if to either party, those desperadoes belonged, as the testimony shows (p. 192) that the strength of the Democratic and Republican parties in that precinct was about equal. Hence neither party can be held responsible for the disgraceful and criminal act, nor can the result be in any way affected.

938. The case of Bradley v. Slemons, continued.

The circulation of fraudulent posters among the voters does not, in the absence of proof of effect or of complicity of the opposing party, justify rejection of the poll.

Judges of election not appearing and the voters neglecting to choose others, the House declined to take into account the preferences of the said voters.

The pleadings in an election case should be free from personalities.

(3) The report thus sets forth the facts as to the main point in the case:

We come now to the consideration of the most important point made by contestant in his brief and argument, the circulation of false and fraudulent posters in Chicot County a few days before the election, announcing John A. Williams, a well-known Republican, as the candidate of that party for Congress in that district. The object was evidently to deceive the Republican party in that county, and thus induce that vote to be cast for Williams, and to lessen the vote it was supposed would otherwise have been cast for contestant. It was a shallow device, dishonorable to those engaged in the transaction, and deserves the emphatic condemnation of every friend of free and fair elections; and if the testimony was sufficient to establish the complicity of contestee with an act so dishonorable, and we were satisfied that its effect upon the voters produced a result different from that which otherwise would have occurred, we would not hesitate to recommend that the election be set aside and a new one ordered.

After examining the evidence, the report concludes:

This evidence fails to satisfy us that the circulation of the posters produced any considerable effect upon the voters; certainly not to the extent of preventing any great number from voting. The general apathy and indifference to the result, testified to by contestant's witnesses, clearly and satisfactorily indicate the reason for the smallness of the vote, and, in connection with the testimony of other witnesses heretofore alluded to, afford the only satisfactory answer to the question why contestant, claiming to be the Republican candidate, received so cold a support from the party, The total vote received by Williams was cast for him in Chicot County and reached the number of 90.

Suppose we assume (which is by no means certain) that the 90 votes cast for Williams would otherwise have been given to contestant. We have no means of computing the number who were so much confused as to prevent them from voting for contestant, as the testimony affords no light whatever upon the subject. It is entirely a matter of conjecture, a mere guess, as liable to be wrong as right, and in view of this state of the evidence contestant insists it is the duty of the committee to find that the confusion of the voters was so great as to prevent 1,265 Republicans from voting for him who would otherwise have done so, which, added to the vote he claims he should have received in Jefferson and Hempstead counties, would be sufficient to overcome the majority returned for contestee; not only that, but to count for him a number of votes that were never cast sufficient for the purpose, and to accord to him the seat now occupied by the sitting Member.

(4) The report, while not admitting the validity of the testimony as to Hempstead County generally, considers one question raised as to that county:

We now come to the testimony taken in Hempstead County, which it will be remembered is subject to the same objection heretofore mentioned. The evidence, however, shows (pp. 57, 58) that the judges of the election were not present at polling place No. 2 in Ozan Township, and that the voters there assembled erroneously concluded there could be no election; that 350 voters, with tickets for contestant in their hands, expressed a desire to vote for him; that at Saline precinct the polls were not opened for the same reasons; that 204 voters, having tickets for contestant, expressed their wish to vote for him, making 554 votes which contestant contends should be counted for him.

We concede there may be circumstances under which a legal voter being deprived of the privilege of casting his ballot, it may nevertheless be counted. Judge McCrary, in his work on elections (p. 99) says: "To require each voter belonging to a class of excluded voters to go through the form of presenting his ballot, and having a separate ruling in each case, would be an idle and useless formality." But the present class is not of the character entitling their votes to be counted. The voters assembled at the two precincts, in the absence of the judges of election, as has been shown, could have elected judges and proceeded with the election. It was, partially at least, their own neglect, arising perhaps from an ignorance of the law, which prevented an election being held in each of the precincts named.

No fraud, intimidation, or other misconduct being alleged or shown, preventing the holding of an election, if the voters in the absence of the regularly appointed judges fall to avail themselves of the privileges the law affords, their votes can not be counted.

In accordance with the principles thus set forth the committee, with but one dissenting voice, recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That William F. Slemons is entitled to retain the seat he now occupies as Representative from the Second Congressional district in the State of Arkansas in the Forty-sixth Congress.

The report was debated in the House on March 30 and 31[1] and on the latter day the proposition of the minority, that the seat be declared vacant, was disagreed to, ayes 30, noes 152, the yeas and nays being refused. The question then recurring on the resolution of the committee, it was agreed to, ayes 149, noes 21.

At the outset of this case the report thus treats of a subject not strictly involving the merits of the case:

Before commencing the discussion of the merits of the controversy, we deem it proper to express our disapproval of that portion of contestee's answer to contestant's notice of contest which indulges in personalities. The practice itself is unbecoming the dignity of the House, and we regret the necessity has arisen of imposing on the committee the duty of calling attention to the subject.

939. The Pennsylvania election case of Curtin v. Yocum, in the Forty-sixth Congress.

The State constitution providing that no elector should be disfranchised because not registered, the House refused to reject votes cast by nonregistered persons without certain affidavits required by statute.

Discussion of mandatory and directory law as related to the acts of voters and election officers.

On May 8, 1880,[1] the House began consideration of the Pennsylvania contested election case of Curtin v. Yocum.

Sitting Member had received an apparent majority of 80 votes, as shown by the division returns. The contestant's efforts to overcome this majority rested entirely on the disposition of certain votes cast by persons in violation of the registration law of Pennsylvania. The constitution of Pennsylvania, newly adopted and not yet construed by the courts, provided qualifications of voters as to age, citizenship, residence, and payment of taxes; and further provided:

SECTION 1. All laws regulating the holding of elections by the citizens, or for the registration of electors, shall be uniform throughout the State; but no elector shall be deprived of the privilege of voting by reason of his name not being registered.

A registration law of the State also provided for making of registration lists by the assessors, and as follows:

And no man shall be permitted to vote at the election on that day whose name is not on said list, unless he shall make proof of his right to vote as hereinafter required.

SEC. 10. On the day of election any person whose name shall not appear on the registry of voters, and who claim the right to vote at said election, shall produce at least one qualified voter of the district as a witness to the residence of the claimant in the district in which he claim to be a voter for a period of at least two months immediately preceding said election, which witness shall be sworn or affirmed and subscribe a written or partly written and partly printed affidavit to the facts stated by him, which affidavit shall define clearly where the residence is of the person so claiming to be a voter; and the person so claiming the right to vote shall also take and subscribe a written or partly written and partly printed affidavit stating—

After specifying what these affidavits shall set forth the law continues:

The said affidavits of all persons making such claim , and the affidavits of the witnesses to their residence, shall be preserved by the election board, and at the close of the election they shall be inclosed with the list of voters, tally list, and other papers required by law to be filed by the return judge with the prothonotary, and shall remain on file therewith in the prothonotary's office, subject to examination as other election papers are. If the election officers shall find that the applicant possesses all the legal qualifications of a voter he shall be permitted to vote, and his name shall be added to the list of taxables by the election officers, the word "tax" being added where the claimant claim to vote on tax and the word "age" where he claims to vote on age; the same words being added by the clerks in each case, respectively, on the lists of persons voting at such election.

SEC. 12. If any election officer shall refuse or neglect to require such proof of the right of suffrage as is prescribed by this law, or the laws to which this is a supplement, from any person offering to vote whose name is not on the list of assessed voters, or whose right to vote is challenged by any qualified voter present, and shall admit such person to vote without requiring such proof, every person so offending shall, upon conviction, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be sentenced for every such offense to pay a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to undergo an imprisonment not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

[1] Second session Forty-sixth Congress, House Report No. 341; 1 Ellworth, p. 416.

SEC. 13. * * * Whenever a place has been or shall be provided by the authorities of any city, county, township, or borough for the safe-keeping of the ballot boxes, the judge and minority inspector shall, after the election shall be finished, and the ballot box or boxes containing the tickets, list of voters, and other papers have been securely bound with tape and sealed, and the signatures of the judge and inspectors affixed thereto, forthwith deliver the same, together with the remaining boxes, to the mayor and recorder of such city, or in counties, townships, or boroughs to such person or persons as the court of common pleas of the proper county may designate, at the place provided as aforesaid, who shall then deposit the said boxes and keep the same to answer the call of any court of tribunal authorized to try the merits of such election.

This being the state of the law, it appeared that many persons whose names did not appear on the registration lists voted. It also appeared that none of the required affidavits of the said persons were on file in the required place, the prothonotary's office; but it did appear that some such affidavits had mistakenly been placed with the tickets and lists of voters in the ballot boxes, which, under the law, went to a depository other than the prothonotary's office. It further appeared that these votes in question were far more than enough to overcome sitting Member's majority, were it shown that they had generally been cast for him.

Several questions were discussed in connection with this state of facts:

(1) Was a vote cast by an unregistered person who did not give the affidavits required by the law, nevertheless a legal vote.

The majority report, presented by Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, and concurred in by seven of his associates, held that such votes were not legal, since the law was mandatory:

The authorities are uniform to the effect that all statutes are mandatory which can not be disregarded without ignoring the legislative intent. The will of the legislature can not be carried out unless this provision of the statute is complied with and to disregard it is to disregard one of the safeguards which the law-making power of Pennsylvania deemed necessary for the protection of the ballot.

It is contended by counsel for the sitting Member that the requirements of sections 3 and 10 above set forth are merely directory, and a disregard of them does not invalidate the vote cast without compliance with its provisions. But your committee can not agree to this view of the law. The true line of distinction as to whether a statutory provision is mandatory or merely directory in its nature is laid down in Smith on Statutes and other well known authorities.

The report then quotes Smith, Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, and People v. Schoemerhorn (19 Barb., 558). There being no Pennsylvania decisions since the adoption of the new constitution the report reviews decisions under the old constitution and then says:

Now, with all due respect for those who differ with us, we submit that there can be no directory provisions in a statute in regard to that which the statute itself forbids being done at all.

"Construction can never abrogate the text; * * * it can never fritter away its obious sense; * * * it can never narrow down its broad limitations; * * * it can never enlarge its natural boundaries." (Story on Constitution, sec. 407.)

"The right rule of construction is to intend the legislature to have meant what they have actually expressed, unless some manifest incongruity would result from doing so, or unless the context clearly shows that such a construction would not be the right one." (Jackson v. Lewis, 17 Johnson, 475.)

The result of all the authorities is that all constitutional provisions in statutes defining what the voter himself must do, both as to qualifying himself as an elector and furnishing the quality and quantity of evidence thereof which the law demands, is mandatory, jurisdictional, and in the nature of conditions precedent, while those which merely relate to the conduct of the election officers may or may not be directory according as they may or may not appear to affect results, and according as they may or may not seem to have been regarded by the law-making power as essential and necessary safeguards against the mischief the statute was intended to prevent. Thus in Morris v. Haines (2 N. H., 246), where the statute required State officers to be chosen by a check list, and by delivery of the ballots to the moderator in person; and it was held that the requirement of a check list was mandatory, and the election in the town was void if none was kept. The decision was put upon the ground that the check list was provided as an important guard against indiscriminate and illegal voting, and the votes given by ballot without this protection were therefore as much void as if given viva voce.

The following is the concluding portion of the opinion:

"If, at an election of Representative, the check list be flung aside and votes are indiscriminately crowded into the ballot box without an inspection by the moderator it must be obvious to all observing citizens that every evil which the statute was designed to remedy is likely to happen, and that two prominent provisions of it will be trampled under foot. Votes so given and received are neither given nor received in conformity to the essential requisitions of the statute, and such requisitions being violated the votes must be void. They would be no more void if given viva voce rather than by ballot. If such a neglect of the statute will not render the whole proceedings void, what neglect will have that operation? The whole balloting, therefore, in this manner is vitiated. No Representative can thus be duly elected."

A portion of the minority, in views signed by Messrs. W.A. Field, of Massachusetts, E. Overton, jr., of Pennsylvania, and J.H. Camp, of New York, also agreed that the statute was mandatory:

To the general reasoning of the report of the minority of the committee we assent. We think, however, that the registry law of 1874 is a valid law under the constitution of 1873. We think also that the requirements in that law of affidavits from persons not on the registry list in order to enable them to vote are mandatory, and that the requirements for the return of papers, affidavits, etc., are directory; that as it is made a crime on the part of the election officers to permit a non-registered person to vote without requiring the legal proof of qualifications, the strong presumption is, in the absence of evidence, that such officers have properly performed their duties in that respect.

The general minority views, signed by Messrs. W.H. Calkins, of Indiana, J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, and J.B. Weaver, of Iowa, contended that the law was directory merely:

We do not believe that the provisions of the constitution relating to the registry of voters is mandatory in so far as it affects the right of a nonregistered voter to vote if he is otherwise qualified. The clause of the constitution in terms excludes any such conclusion. The words "but no elector shall be deprived of the privilege of voting by reason of his name not being registered," found in section 1, article 8, to my mind settles the question. They are plain and admit of but one interpretation, and, applying the acknowledged rule to them that the ordinary import of words shall be taken to be their meaning, leaves no room for doubt.

But the law passed to carry out the section seems to be imperative, and it is a matter of some difficulty to decide whether it is repugnant to that clause which would seem to limit the power of the legislature to disfranchise an elector for nonregistration who is otherwise qualified. Now, we admit that registry laws are salutary and ought to be maintained in all proper cases and by all proper methods, but to maintain them constitutional restrictions must not be disregarded.

The foregoing clause of the constitution is, in our judgment, a limitation on the power of the legislature of the State, and it can not pass a registry law whereby a voter shall be deprived of suffrage, if otherwise qualified, by reason of nonregistration. This, it seems to us, was the very purpose of the clause. If left out, the section would be perfect. It was to prevent the legislature from disfranchising qualified voters that it was inserted.

The new constitution of Pennsylvania was made whilst all the adjudicated cases respecting the old constitution and the laws passed thereunder were in full force and well known to the members composing the constitutional convention. It must be conclusively presumed that it was in the light of these past judicial constructions that the convention acted in framing the new constitution, and in all cases where the provisions of the old were adequate they were ingrafted into the new; but where they had been found to be deficient, and did not meet the will or wish of the people, they were taken down, altered, or amended.

A glance at the constitution of 1838 and its amendments shows that it was silent as to registry laws. Article 3, sections 1, 2, and 3, of the old constitution are among the changed and altered provisions of the new, and it must be presumed that the old constitution, and the judicial constructions given it on the subject of suffrage and elections, were not in harmony with the sentiment of the people of the State. Hence the provisions relating to registration. This is the only material change made. In view of this the act of 1839, section 65 et seq., referred to in the majority report, is not in point and can have no weight in determining the question before us, because the whole power relating to registration under the old constitution resided in the legislature; it was unrestricted by constitutional barriers; if it saw fit, as it did, to make an imperative registration law, there was no limitation on its power under the constitution of 1838. This was held in the case of Patterson v. Barlow (60 Penn. St. Rep., 54). This case expressly overrules Page v. Allen (58 Penn. St. Rep., 338), holding otherwise.

In the case of Patterson v. Barlow, supra, the supreme court of the State held the rule announced by Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, in the case of Capon v. Foster (12 Pick., 485), namely, that an imperative registration law, not forbidden by the constitution, was a reasonable regulation, under which the right to vote might be exercised, and was not therefore an additional test to the qualification of electors. (See Brightly Contested Election Cases, No. 2, p. 51.)

The new constitution expressly fixes and determines the right of all qualified nonregistered voters to vote by saying, "But no elector shall be deprived of the privilege of voting by reason of his name not being registered." We therefore conclude that all provisions of the law set out in the majority report and cited in this, so far as it attempts (if that is held to be its proper construction) to hold the elector responsible for the act or omission of election officers regarding registration, or so far as it restricts his right to vote if he is otherwise qualified, is an additional test of his right to vote, is repugnant to that sacred privilege reserved to each citizen.

The minority then quote Cooley and State v. Smith (67 Maine, 328), and conclude that the law was directory merely so far as the voters were concerned. "It is the duty of the election officers to comply with this law," says the views. "It is imperative on them, and if they fail they subject themselves to the penalties provided in section 12 of the registry law." But to allow a nonregistered voter to vote without requiring him to comply with the law, if he is otherwise qualified, is quite a different question. If he refuses to comply on being requested then it is clearly the duty of the officers to refuse his vote, because he refuses to obey a reasonable regulation prescribed by the legislature and he hurts no one but himself. But if he is allowed to vote without being required to file the affidavits, and is otherwise qualified, his vote is not an illegal one."

The minority considered that the Pennsylvania case of Wheelock (1 Norris, 297–299) sustained this view, but the majority denied this.

940. The case of Curtin v. Yocum, continued.

Failure of an election officer to perform a certain duty does not establish the presumption that he has failed as to other duties.

The showing prima facie by contestant of enough illegal votes to change the result does not shift the burden of proof to contestee.

Contestant having prevented the evidence by which contestee sought to answer contestant's charges, the House declined to permit contestant to profit thereby.

(2) The minority thus set forth the next question arising:

The contestant assumes that having shown a discrepancy between the registry lists and the poll lists, and the further fact that affidavits were not on file in the prothonotary's office corresponding to the excess of names on the poll lists, therefore all persons thus voting were prima facie illegal voters. In other words, that it must be presumed the officers of election failed to perform all their duties by the failure to return affidavits of nonregistered voters to the prothonotary's office.

The rule of law is that a public officer is presumed to do his duty the contrary not appearing. Under the law there were several acts required to be done by the officers. The first one was to ascertain whether a person offering to vote was registered; if he was not, to require an affidavit of himself and also of a registered voter to certain facts; to see that it was subscribed and sworn; to take and keep it till the election was over, and then return it to the prothonotary's office with certain other papers. To show that the last act was not performed does not show that the rest were left undone or that proof of failure in this one particular is proof of a failure in all. It doubtless does overcome the presumption as to the particular act, but we doubt whether it can be extended any further. We are not ready to assent to the proposition that because the election officers failed to return the required affidavits to the office of the prothonotary therefore they must be presumed not to have required them at all.

Happily, however, it appears in the testimony submitted that in nearly every instance direct proof was made that the officers did require the affidavits, but that they mistook their duty and, instead of returning them to the prothonotary's office, sealed them up in the ballot boxes with the tickets, and deposited the boxes with the nearest justice of the peace to the polling place, as required by law.

At this point an important and interesting question of evidence presents itself, namely, as to whether the burden of proof shifts from the contestant to the contestee after contestant has shown prima facie a sufficient number of illegal votes thrown which, if cast for contestee, would wipe out his majority

We can not perceive that the well-known rule contended for applies. To illustrate it we admit that in a case where A is sued on a promissory note by B—plea, payment. To support his plea A offers proof that on the day of or a day subsequent to the maturity of the note he paid B a sum of money equal to the amount due. B admits the receipt of the money, but alleges it was paid for another purpose. The burden now shifts to B, and he must show by preponderating evidence that it was applied on some other debt or for some other purpose than the payment of the note.

But the declaration in contestant's notice is that the contestee received a sufficient number of illegal votes to more than counterbalance his returned majority. Proof that tends to show a number of illegal votes cast in excess of the returned majority for the contestee is not of itself evidence that contestee received them. It does not even raise a presumption to that effect; and when contestee is disconnected with such vote—when he has no lot or part in bringing it about and exerts no influence in having it cast—he certainly can not be placed in the position of being compelled to prove a negative in order to maintain his seat. Such a doctrine simply overturns all rules of evidence. We can conceive of cases which might be different, but these cases are not applicable to the one at bar.

(3) Evidence showed that in many precincts the affidavits of the nonregistered voters were placed in the ballot boxes, so that the truth as to how the voters in question cut their ballots might have been ascertained by an inspection of these ballots. But the time during which the ballots were required to be preserved expired during the time allowed contestant for taking testimony and before the time when sitting Member could legally take testimony. But when sitting Member asked the court for an order for the further preservation of the ballots, counsel of contestant appeared and opposed this motion, "and procured the court to deny the prayer thereof," in the words of the minority views. The minority say further:

In the face of these facts, and knowing the necessity of preserving the papers contained in the ballot boxes so that the truth might be ascertained, what excuse can be urged for the contestant in resisting and defeating their preservation? Did not his act compass their destruction? Is he not here asserting the illegality of this vote and asking the House to unseat the sitting Member, when he himself was a party to the destruction of the very evidence which would have settled the question? Does he not stand in the position of the spoliator of documentary evidence asking to take advantage of his own wrong? How can we say the result is left in doubt when the contestant himself contributed largely thereto? We think it safe to stand on the elementary rule that one asking equity must do equity.

The majority dissented from this, implying that the extraordinary diligence of contestant in endeavoring by other evidence to supply the facts met this objection.

941. The case of Curtin v. Yocum, continued.

The House declined to declare the seat vacant because illegal votes, cast at a few precincts, but decisive of the general result, could not be segregated.

Where the nature of illegal votes could not be shown, the House preferred to reject the precinct poll rather than apportion pro rata.

Objections to the pro rata method of purging the polls of unsegregated illegal votes.

(4) The majority, in view of the difficulties of the situation, proposed the following solution:

It is true that the record fails to disclose for whom these persons voted, and if the failure is to be charged to anyone, the contestee is equally at fault with the contestant. They are, therefore, both in such default that neither has the right to claim the seat when it appears that there are illegal votes in the returns unaccounted for which are greater in number than the returned majority of the sitting Member. The people of the district have rights which can not be compromised by any failure, whether avoidable or unavoidable, either of the contestant or the contestee. They have the right to be represented by the person, and no other, who has received a majority of the legal votes of the district.

It having been determined that a large number of persons voted at the election who did not comply with the statute as to the proof of their right to vote, and the number of such ballots cast being largely in excess of both the returned majority of the sitting Member or the revised majority which he claims in his briefs, and the evidence not showing for whom such votes were cast, we must determine upon what rule the polls must be purged of such illegal nonregistered votes. McCrary, in his Treatise on Elections, section 300, page 225, lays down the following rule:

"It would seem, therefore, that in a case where the number of bad votes proven is sufficient to affect the result, and in the absence of any evidence to enable the court to determine for whom they were cast, the court must decide upon one of the three following alternatives, viz:

"1. Declare the election void.

"2. Divide the illegal votes between the candidates in proportion to the whole vote of each.

"3. Deduct the illegal vote from the candidate having the highest vote.

"And it is clear also that where in such a case no great public inconvenience would result from declaring the election void and seeking a decision by an appeal to the electors, that course should be adopted."

It will be seen from all the authorities that where a new election can be held without injury it is the safest and most equitable rule to declare the election void and refer the question again to the people in all cases where there are a greater number of illegal votes proven, but for whom they voted does not appear, than the returned majority of the incumbent. In this case, it appearing that a number of votes many times greater than the official majority of the sitting Member were illegally received, counted, and returned, in violation of the constitution and mandatory statutes of Pennsylvania which were adopted for the purpose of securing the purity of the ballot box and preventing frauds at elections, and the true result of the election by the legal voters of the district has not heretofore been ascertained, and can not, from the nature of the case, be ascertained upon the facts presented in the record, your committee recommend that the election be declared void, in order that the people of the Twentieth Congressional district of Pennsylvania may have an opportunity of again expressing their choice for a Representative in Congress.

The minority views join issue on this view:

Referring to the point that because at certain polls and precincts 1,000 and more illegal votes were polled—being illegal because they were not registered, and no affidavits were filed as required by law—that therefore the vote at all of the other precincts must be set aside, is a doctrine we can not assent to. Admitting for the sake of argument that those votes were illegal, we maintain that the true rule is, where illegal votes have been cast, to purge the poll by first proving for whom they were thrown, and thus preserve the true vote; if by the use of due diligence this can not be done, and the result is still left in doubt, then to throw the poll out entirely. We think this is a safer rule to maintain the purity of the ballot box than the other one, which apportions the fraud between the parties. This rule ought to be applied in all cases where the fraudulent vote is considerable and permeates the whole poll, and not in cases where it is scattering and inconsiderable. In those cases it may be justly inferred that the result would not be affected by retaining the poll unpurged. The authorities cited by the majority of the committee, and an almost unbroken line of authorities in Pennsylvania, support this view.

During the forty days which the contestant had for taking testimony he could have introduced in evidence every ballot cast at the polls of which complaint is made. He could, by an inspection of the contents of the ballot boxes, have ascertained whether the affidavits had been filed as required by law; by making a comparison between these and the registry lists and the poll list he could have ascertained the exact truth; and as each ballot was numbered, he could have ascertained for whom each illegal vote was cast. He did not do this, but actually aided in the destruction of all these papers, so that the contestee could not show the true state of affairs. He can not, therefore, be said to be within the rule of having used due diligence to purge the polls of illegal votes. He can not bring himself within the McCrary rule of deducting pro rata the illegal vote at each poll, for this would increase the returned majority of contestee by many hundreds. He can not insist on the true rule we have laid down, for that would leave a large majority of polling precincts throughout the Congressional district unchallenged, and would increase the contestee's majority to near 600.

He is therefore driven to the last resort, that of asking that the election be declared void because of the uncertainty of the result, as he claims, in certain specified polling districts. This can not be allowed, according to my view, for the reasons stated.

If the rule contended for by contestant is adopted, we maintain it must be applied to the polling precincts where contestant alleges the fraud occurred. Then each party is left to prove his vote by calling the voters in the rejected precincts. If they do not, they must stand on the vote of the other unchallenged precincts, and can not be heard to complain of their own negligence.

To apply either of these rules, as we have seen, confirms the title of contestee to his seat as a Member.

The majority of the committee presented a resolution declaring the seat vacant; but in the debate the first speaker for the majority side intimated that this solution was proposed when it was thought that the case might be decided in season to have the new election at the time of the local election in February in Pennsylvania. But as this time had passed, and a new election would be inconvenient, it seemed to him that the contestant should be declared elected.[1] The majority members did not generally concur in this idea, however.

The minority reported a resolution confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

The report was debated at length on May 8, 10, and 11,[2] and on the latter day the question was taken on substituting for the majority proposition the following proposed by the minority:

That Seth H. Yocum is entitled to retain his seat in the Forty-sixth Congress as a Member from the Twentieth Congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, and that Andrew G. Curtin is not entitled thereto.

Mr. William M. Springer moved to insert the word "not" after the words "Yocum is," and on that question the yeas were 75, the nays 114.

Then the minority substitute was agreed to, yeas 113, nays 75.

Then the majority proposition as amended was agreed to.

So the minority views prevailed.

942. The New York election case of Duffy v. Mason, in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Illustration of a notice of contest deficient in the particularity of its specifications.

Participating in a subsequent agreement as to evidence the contestee was held to have waived his objections to the sufficiency of notice.

On May 21, 1880,[1] Mr. Walpole G. Colerick, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the case of Duffy v. Mason, from New York. Sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 736 votes.

At the outset a preliminary question arose as to the sufficiency of the notice of contest. The report quotes the notice and discusses it:

NOTICE OF CONTEST.

Hon. JOSEPH MASON,

Hamilton, Madison County, New York.

SIR: Please take notice that I shall, in the manner provided by law and the rules and precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States, contest your election and your certificate of such election as a Member of the Forty-sixth Congress of said United States from the Twenty-fourth Congressional district of the State of New York, on the following grounds, to wit:

First. That you did not receive a majority of the legal votes cast at the election held in said Congressional district on the 5th day of November last, but, on the contrary, that I did receive a majority of such votes.

Second. That your election was effected and procured by force, fraud, intimidation, promises of favor, corruption, the buying of votes and voters, and other corrupt and illegal means used by you and in your behalf; and that your certificate of election as such Member of Congress was and is based upon and the result of such force, fraud, intimidation, promises of favor, the buying of votes, and other corrupt and illegal means used by you and in your behalf.

Third. That your election was procured by illegal votes and illegal voting in your behalf, and by your procurement or the procurement of those interested in your election.

Fourth. That your certificate of election is invalid for the reasons stated in the second specification herein.

Fifth. That I was, on said 5th day of November, 1878, legally elected as such Member instead of yourself, and am entitled in your stead to a seat in said Forty-sixth Congress.

Dated Pulaski, December 23, 1878.

SEBASTIAN DUFFY.

The contestee insists that the grounds of contest are not stated with that precision and certainty required by the statute which authorizes and regulates the procedure in contests of this nature. The objections urged by the contestee are presented in his answer, as follows:

"II. Your notice in writing served upon me December 26, 1878, is insufficient and incomplete under the statute and practice in such case made and provided, in that it does not specify particularly the grounds upon which you rely—that is to say, your charges that my election was procured by force, fraud, intimidation, promises of favor, the buying of votes and voters, and other corrupt and illegal means used by me and in my behalf, and that my election was procured by illegal votes and illegal voting, and by my procurement or the procurement of those interested in my election, and grounds of contest therefor, respectively, do not state who was forced to vote for me, and what fraud contributed to my election, and who was intimidated, or in what manner, place, town, city, or county such intimidation was had, and to whom or in what manner promises of favor were made, and what votes and voters were bought or where and when such votes or voters were so bought, and what other corrupt and illegal means were used by me and in my behalf, and by what illegal votes and illegal voting by my procurement or the procurement of those interested in my election you were prejudiced, and who were so interested, and in what election district, town, city, or county such persons reside and perpetrated such acts complained of."

The statute provides:

"SEC. 105. Whenever any person intends to contest an election of any Member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice, in writing, to the Member whose seat he designs to contest, of his intention to contest the same, and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." (U.S. Rev. Stat., p. 18.)

McCrary, in his Law of Elections, section 343, referring to this statute, says:

"A good deal of discussion has arisen as to what is to be understood by the words 'specify particularly the grounds on which he relies.' It is evident, however, that these words are not easily defined by any others. They are as plain and clear as any terms which we might employ to explain them. Cases have arisen, and will again arise, giving rise to controversy as to whether a given allegation comes up to the requirement of this statute, and it must be for the House in each case to decide upon the case before it. It may be observed, however, that this statute should receive a reasonable construction, one that will carry out and not defeat its spirit and purpose. And perhaps the rule of construction which will prove safest as a guide in each case is this: A notice which is sufficiently specific to put the sitting Member upon a proper defense and prevent any surprise being practiced upon him is good, but one which fails to do this is bad." (Wright v. Fuller, 1 Bartlett, 152.)

"The Houses of Congress when exercising their authority and jurisdiction to decide upon 'the election returns and qualifications' of Members are not bound by the technical rules which govern proceedings in courts of justice. Indeed, the statutes to be found among the acts of Congress regulating the mode of conducting an election contest in the House of Representatives are directory only, and are not and can not be made mandatory under the Constitution. In practice these statutory regulations are often varied and sometimes wholly departed from. They are convenient as rules of practice and of course will be adhered to, unless the House in its discretion shall in a given case determine that the ends of justice require a different course of action. They constitute wholesome rules not to be departed from without cause." (Ibid., sec. 349.)

While it is true that this statute should receive a liberal construction, yet it will not do to permit parties to disregard its provisions. The House, in sanctioning in its violation in cases heretofore determined, has created precedents that are now frequently and pertinently cited to justify similar infractions. This practice, if tolerated, will finally result in the virtual abrogation of the statute. The only safe course to pursue is to require at least a substantial compliance with its provisions. We think that the notice of contest in this case is clearly insufficient. It is too indefinite and uncertain in its allegations. As was said in the case of Bromberg v. Haralson (Smith's Digest of Election Cases, p. 355)—

"It is too vague and uncertain to be good. The statute requires that the contestant in his notice 'shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in his contest.' It is impossible to conceive of a specification of the grounds of contest broader or more general in its terms. It fixes no place where any act complained of occurred. It embraces the whole district in one sweeping charge. This specification embraces three general grounds of complaint, not one of which possesses that particularity essential to good pleading."

But the contestee in this case is justly estopped by his own act and conduct from assailing the sufficiency of the notice of contest, and its defects have been by him waived. The record contains the following agreement:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

In the matter of the contested election of Joseph Mason, Representative-elect to the Forty-sixth Congress from the Twenty-fourth Congressional district, State of New York:

It is hereby stipulated and agreed, by and between Sebastian Duffy and Joseph Mason, contestees, through their respective attorneys, that all affirmative evidence heretofore given or which may hereafter be given be, and remain, in this contest as a part of contestant's case, and that contestee, in consideration of this consent and stipulation on his part, have sufficient time after the expiration of the statutory limit of ninety days in which to give evidence in answer to such new matter so put in evidence, to the end that simple and exact justice be done to all parties, and that contestant have reasonable time to put in evidence in rebuttal only to such evidence as the contestee may give after said ninety days shall have expired. * * *

Dated April 10, 1879.

S.D. WHITE,

Attorney for Duffy.

JOHN J. LAMOREE,

Attorney for Joseph Mason, Oswego County.

D. N. WELLINGTON,

Attorney of Joseph Mason for Madison County.

That such defects may be waived has been determined by at least two decisions of the House. (See Otero v. Gallegos, 1 Bartlett, 178; Bromberberg v. Haralson, Smith's Digest of Election Cases, p. 356.)

If these defects had not been waived we would feel fully justified, by reason of the insufficiency of the notice, in dismissing this case or excluding the evidence offered in support of the alleged grounds of contest.

943. The case of Duffy v. Blason, continued.

Evidence of the unsworn declarations of voters as to their intimidation is hearsay and inadmissible.

Rumors that certain employees have been intimidated are not considered in an election contest.

Legal voters may not be disfranchised because members of political committees may have violated the law in assisting said voters to reach the polls.

The committee therefore proceed to investigate the grounds of contest, the following questions being developed:

(1) It was charged that a certain employer of labor had improperly influenced the votes of his employees. All the witnesses except three admitted that they had no personal knowledge of the existence of such a system, and that their only information was derived from rumors.

The committee say:

It is our duty to reject all the evidence that has been offered relative to the existence of the rumors to which we have alluded, as it is clearly incompetent, and we must, for the same reason, discard all evidence relating to voluntary statements made by persons not under oath or witnesses, as all such hearsay evidence is inadmissible.

The rule that we apply in rejecting this evidence is stated in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, page 115, thus:

"Hearsay evidence is uniformly incompetent to establish any specific fact which in its nature is susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge. That it supposes something better that might be adduced in the particular cases is not the only ground of its exclusion. Its intrinsic weakness, its incompetency to satisfy the mind as to the existence of the fact, and the frauds which may be practiced under its cover, all combine to support the rule that hearsay evidence is wholly inadmissible."

None of the evidence excluded by us comes within any of the exceptions to the rule above stated, and this rule has often been applied by the House of Representatives in cases of this character.

The application of this rule results in the rejection of all the evidence introduced by the contestant in support of the first ground of his contest, save that rendered by Daniel Sweeney, Alexander Lemmon, and Hiram Hammond, all of whom were, at different times prior to 1878, employed in the factory, and who claim that they were discharged from their employment by reason of their political sentiments and affiliations.

Daniel Sweeney testifies that in the fall of 1862, eighteen years ago, he was discharged by Kingsford because he refused to vote for Wadsworth, the Republican candidate for governor of the State of

New York; that he had worked in the factory for fourteen years continuously, and it was the only occasion that he was ever spoken to by Kingsford on the subject of voting. (See Record, p. 202.)

Alexander Lemmon testifies that in 1873 or 1874 he was requested by Kingsford "to go to the polls and peddle tickets for him," and that he was discharged from his employment because he was accused of "peddling Democratic tickets with the Republican heads on." (See Record, p. 144.)

Hiram Hammond testifies that in 1876 Kingsford expressed his desire that witness should vote for Hayes for President, which he promised to do, but voted for Tilden, and that in the latter part of December, 1878, at the close of the year's work at the factory, he was discharged from his employment. (See Record, p. 987.) That he had worked at the factory "off and on" for fourteen years, and that the occasion to which he alludes is the only time that Kingsford ever talked to him on the subject of politics (p. 993).

These are the only instances, extending over a period of sixteen years, where it is shown by competent evidence that Kingsford or any other person interfered in any manner with the employees of the factory in the free and unrestrained exercise by them of the elective franchise. There is no evidence in the record that we have discovered showing a single instance of such interference on the part of Kingsford or any other person connected with the management of the factory relating to the election in controversy.

There was also evidence to show that the four were discharged for other than political causes.

The committee say as to the alleged system of improper influence:

If we accept as true the rumors that prevailed as to its existence, still the evidence is incomplete, as it wholly falls to furnish any data by which the number of voters affected by it can be ascertained; and, even excluding the ballots of all the voters then employed at the factory, which are estimated by witnesses at 150 to 200, it would not affect or change the result of the election.

(2) A statute of New York forbade any candidate or other person to promote the election of such candidate by furnishing entertainment to meetings of electors, by paying for the attendance of voters at the polls, or by contributing money for any other purpose intended to promote an election, except for defraying the expenses of printing, etc., or for conveying the sick, poor, or infirm electors to the polls. The report thus discussed the point made by the report in this connection:

The contestant seeks to hold the contestee responsible for the acts of the members of the committees representing the Republican party in the district who violated this statute, and in the absence of any proof showing, or tending to show, that the contestee directed or authorized the expenditure of the money contributed by him for the purposes forbidden by the statute. A principal is not liable for the illegal acts of his agent unless done at his instance or with his knowledge and assent. Good faith and innocence are always presumed. If A intrusts B with money to be used by him for certain lawful purposes, and B, without the knowledge and consent of A, diverts the money from the purposes to which it was to be applied and uses it for immoral and illegal purposes, A can not be held liable for the misconduct of B. That the contestee had the right to contribute and pay to these committees money to be used by them for purposes authorized by the statute is not controverted by the contestant, and in the absence of opposing proof the presumption exists that he did not authorize its expenditure for purposes prohibited by the statute. If the statute was violated, its offenders are by the provisions of the statute subject to punishment. Under the rigid, illiberal, and unreasonable construction placed upon this statute by the contestant it is even unlawful for a candidate or his friends to rent a hall for a political meeting, procure music, or employ a, speaker to discuss the political issues, because it may tend to promote the election of the candidate; and if such a meeting is held, in disregard of this statute, the legal voters who attended it are subject to punishment therefor by the forfeiture of their votes, regardless of the result that may have been produced by the charms of the music or the eloquence of the speaker; or if a legal voter, who is too indifferent or indolent to attend the election, is conveyed to the polls in a carriage provided for that purpose by the committee of the party of which he is a member, it affords sufficient cause for challenging his vote to show that he was neither "sick, poor, or infirm," and that he was able to walk or pay for his ride to the polls. To so construe the statute is absurd. If the person who attends such meeting or is so conveyed to the polls is a legal voter, his vote must be received and counted. We can not punish legal voters by disfranchising them because members of political committees have possibly violated the statute, as construed by the contestant. The evidence wholly fails to show that the money was used to corrupt or improperly influence the voters. The supreme court of New York, in the case of Hurley v. Van Wagner, 28 Barb., 109 (1858), in construing this statute, said:

"A person who pays money for his board, or railroad or steamboat fare, while going to or from a political meeting, or who pays for the use of a room for such meetings, or for the lights or attendance thereat, in one sense contributes money to promote the election of a particular ticket or candidate. But is it a contribution of money in the sense intended by the act? Did the legislature intend to prohibit and punish as a misdemeanor every expenditure of money which might indirectly promote or be intended to promote the election of particular candidates? Public meetings, large assemblies of the people, constant and almost universal intercommunication, one with another, and journeys from one part of the country to another, are the usual and customary means by which the election of particular candidates is made, and they necessarily involve the expenditure of large sums of money which may be said to be contributed. Is this the evil that the act was designed to suppress? If it was, it may be safely said to have utterly failed of its object, for during the twenty-nine years it has been upon the statute book hardly one attempt has been made to enforce it; and the evil practice, if it be one, has gone on and gained additional strength with each additional year. I infer, therefore, that these are not the contributions in money forbidden by the act. If the payment of a sum of money for the use of a room in which to hold a public meeting for political objects, or for the lights used thereat, or for the attendance of a person to prepare such room and keep it in proper order, is a contribution of money to promote an election within the meaning of the statute, so is the money a man may expend upon himself in the payment of tavern bills and the expenses of transportation, in going to and returning from such meetings, equally a contribution of money to promote an election; because all such expenditures tend to the same result, and the money is disbursed for the same object, and that is to aid in the election of a particular candidate or ticket. It is not possible to discriminate between them, so that to adopt the construction claimed is to impute to those who framed the law the most absurd intentions, or to give it an effect which they could not have contemplated."

Even if the law justified us in excluding the ballots of those voters who were conveyed to the polls, although neither "sick, poor, and infirm," yet we would be unable from the evidence to compute their number or determine for whom they voted; nor could we ascertain from the evidence whether the orators, under pay, who addressed public meetings in rented halls, converted lukewarm Democrats or indifferent Republicans into "stalwarts," and, if so, what ones, or how many.

944. The case of Duffy v. Mason, continued.

In absence of evidence to te him, a returned Member is presumed innocent as to acts of agents of his party.

Improper acts by a candidate's friends without his participation are of effect only so far as they are shown to have actually affected the result.

Discussion of the qualification as to residence of students who voted in the college town.

(3) Contestant charged that votes were bought in the interest of sitting Member; but the evidence on this point consisted mainly of proof as to the existence of rumors. One witness named Hollingsworth did state to different persons, as appeared from the evidence, that he received money for voting for sitting Member. But the committee say that even conceding Hollingsworth's statement to be true, it did not affect the contestee, as the evidence failed to connect him in any manner with the transaction.' "A candidate can not and ought not," says the report, "to be held responsible for all the imprudent and censurable acts of indiscreet friends, who, in the zealous advocacy of his election, resort to improper means of securing that result without his knowledge, and which he, if consulted, would condemn, unless the voters affected by such means are sufficient in number to change or render uncertain the result of the election."

(4) The contestant insisted that certain students at Madison University voted illegally at Hamilton. The report cites and discusses the constitution of New York on this point:

"SECTION 3, ARTICLE 2. For the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the service of the United States, nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of the State or of the United States, or of the high seas, nor while a student of any seminary of learning, nor while kept in any almshouse or other asylum at public expense; nor while confined in any public prison."

Prior to the election in controversy a case was tried before Judge Wallace, of the United States district court, at Syracuse, N.Y., wherein a student at St. Bonaventure College, at Allegany, Cattaraugus County, New York, was indicted for illegal voting. Judge Wallace, in referring to the provisions of the constitution above cited, said:

"Of course, the defendant was not a resident of both Orleans County and Cattaraugus County; he could reside in one county only for the purpose of exercising the right of suffrage. It appears indisputably that until September, 1875, he was a resident of Orleans County, and was a legal voter there. Now, the presumption of the law is that he continued to be a resident of that county, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, and the whole case may therefore be determined by ascertaining whether or not he acquired a new residence in Cattaraugus County—whether the evidence adduced overcomes the legal presumption to which I have referred. And it is at this point that the bearing and effect of the constitutional provision found in section 3 of article 2 of the constitution of this State becomes important. The language there employed is: 'For the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while a student of any seminary of learning.' By force of this language it is clear that defendant neither lost his residence in Orleans County nor gained a residence in Cattaraugus County merely because of his appearance in the latter place as a student at the college. Now, I do not pretend to instruct you that this constitutional provision precludes a student from acquiring a residence at the place where he is attending college, but the fact must be established by evidence other than that which is afforded by this sojourn in the place as a college student. A change of residence may be effected by a change of location with the intent to make that location a new home, as distinct from an intent to return when some temporary purpose is accomplished. But a change of residence is not effected by intention alone, nor by change of location alone. Both must occur. And the intent must be evinced by consistent acts which denote an abandonment of the former residence and the selection of a new home. You may find here that defendant never intended to return to Orleans County as his home, from his declarations and his conduct, but you must also find, before you can decide that he can acquire a new residence, that he intended to make Cattaraugus County his future home, and evinced that intent by corroborative acts. It therefore follows, if the evidence does not disclose any circumstances which distinguish his case from that of the ordinary one of a college student, intent upon prosecuting his studies, but who has left the paternal roof to mark out his own future for himself, it fails to meet the requirements of the law for the acquisition of a new residence, and the main question in the case will turn upon your conclusion upon the subordinate one. In conclusion, it is appropriate to remind you that, although the defendant may have conscientiously believed he had acquired a residence in Cattaraugus County, and was exercising a lawful right in voting there, his violation of the law is not thereby purged of the criminal intent which is the essential element of every crime. Every citizen is presumed and required to know the law." (See Record, p. —.)

The evidence in this case shows that it has been customary for many years for the committees of the different political parties in Madison County to secure the attendance of these students of Madison University at the polls as voters. (See Record, p. 714.) Some years as high as 75 students or more of the university voted at the village of Hamilton (Record, p. 710), while the number who voted at the election in dispute was 14. One of the witnesses, Edward D. Van Slyck, testifies that the reduction in number at the election in controversy was due to Judge Wallace's opinion, above set forth, "which was taken as the guide and became the decisive ground upon which they claimed their right to vote," and that the contestee advised the students "that no one should vote unless he was perfectly satisfied that he was a legal voter, and advised them to keep strictly within Wallace's opinion." (See Record, p. 710.)

The report continues to the effect that although the burden of proving that these students whose votes had been received were not legal voters was on the contestant' he had introduced no testimony tending to establish that fact. After the election several of the students were arrested and arraigned before C. M. Dennison, United States Commissioner. He discharged them. The evidence convinced him that each had absolutely and entirely severed his connection with his former home, and had gone to Hamilton with the intention of making that his only home and residence, at least while in attendance at the university, and had so remained there the time required by law to become a voter. The commissioner thereupon gave the opinion:

In my opinion there could be no question but that each of these young men would have been a legal voter at Hamilton had he gone there in the manner in which he did and performed the same acts which he did, were it not for the fact that they came within the classes of persons enumerated in article 2, section 3, of the constitution of this State, and that the determination of these cases turns wholly upon the meaning of that section. It is claimed by the prosecution that this section of the constitution is prohibitory, and that no person can possibly gain a residence while a student of any seminary of learning. I can not concur in this doctrine. This section of the amended constitution is the same as in the constitution of 1840, and, substantially, in my opinion, a simple enunciation of the common law, and meant rather as a protection than as a prohibition, and is not intended to prevent any class of persons from changing their place of residence and gaining a new voting residence, but rather to protect persons who shall leave their actual permanent residence with an intention of going temporarily in some of the occupations or callings in said section enumerated, and at the completion of said purpose to return to their actual residence, and being thereby disfranchised during such absence. In my opinion this section of the constitution is not intended to disfranchise any citizen of the State of New York, but rather to protect every citizen of the State in the full exercise of the right of elective franchise. It is further claimed by the prosecution that these cases are parallel and at all fours with the case of "The United States against McCarthy," decided by Judge Wallace January, 1878. The defendants in these cases had the opinion of Judge Wallace in that case and examined the same carefully and took legal advice thereon before offering to vote, and upon such examination and advice concluded that their cases did not come within that decision, and that there was nothing contained therein which would prevent their voting, and they all voted after challenge and took the oaths required by law. These defendants are all candidates for the ministry, and, in my judgment, acted conscientiously and with great care, and, as I construe the law, were entirely correct in their conclusion that they were legal voters of the place where they voted. It is ordered that each of the defendants be, and they are, discharged." (See Record, pp. 1170, 1171.)

The committee concluded that the evidence was wholly insufficient to authorize them to determine that the students in question were illegal voters.

As a result of their conclusions the committee reported resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

The House, without debate, agreed to the resolutions.[1]

945. The Minnesota election case of Donnelly v. Washburn, in the Forty-sixth Congress.

A committee being unable to reach a decision, this fact was reported, with accompanying minority views.

[1] Record, p. 3636.

Discussion of the degree and kind of evidence necessary to prove bribery in an election case.

On June 16, 1880,[1] the results of the investigation into the Minnesota contested election case of Donnelly v. Washburn were presented to the House from the Committee on Elections. The committee did not come to a conclusive result. Ten of the fifteen members supported a resolution declaring that Ignatius Donnelly, the contestant, was not entitled to the seat; but a resolution declaring William A Washburn, the sitting Member, entitled to the seat had the support of only seven out of the fifteen members.

No report was made from the committee; but two sections of the committee were authorized to present views.

Mr. Van H. Manning, of Mississippi, presented views in favor of seating the contestant. These views were signed also by Messrs. S. L. Sawyer, of Missouri, R. F. Armfield, of North Carolina, F. E. Beltzhoover, of Pennsylvania, and W. G. Colerick, of Indiana, while it was announced that Mr. E. C. Phister, of Kentucky, concurred in a portion of the propositions set forth in the views.

Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, presented views sustaining the proposition that sitting Member was entitled to the seat, and these views were signed also by Messrs. E. Overton, jr., of Pennsylvania, W. H. Calkins, of Indiana, John H. Camp, of New York, and W. A. Field, of Massachusetts.

The case was not acted on, Mr. Washburn retaining the seat through the Congress.

The discussion in the two "views" involved not only a large number of questions of fact, but also the discussion of several important law questions.

(1) Contestant charged widespread and extensive bribery. The evidence of this consisted of testimony like the following:

Charles Berens, a Democrat, the postmaster of the village of North Prairie, Morrison County (situated about 100 miles from Minneapolis), testifies (p. 300, printed testimony) that prior to the election of November 5, 1978, he wrote and mailed a letter directly to the sitting Member, Washburn, in which he said that he would give his support at the election to him, Washburn, for $50. This letter evidently reached the sitting Member, for Berens testifies that he received a letter in reply to it from Keith, the postmaster at Minneapolis, a political friend of the sitting Member, in which Keith said "he was glad that Berens would work that way." He, Keith, further stated that he would give Berens's letter to J. V. Brower, one of the Republican United States land officers at St. Cloud, and that Brower would attend to the matter. J. V. Brower testifies (p. 246):

"Charles Berens wrote a letter to Minneapolis demanding $50 for which he was to support General Washburn [the sitting Member]. The letter was sent to me by some one in connection with the campaign; I can't say whether by the committee or by General Washburn or by some one for them."

Brower admits the receipt of $50 from Washburn or his committee, and may have got more. Berens (p. 300) and Brower (p. 246) both agree that Brower visited North Prairie, Morrison County, and called on Berens. Berens says: "Brower said I should work for Washburn and he would see me all right." He says Brower did not pay him any money because he, Brower, did not trust him—he thought he was supporting Donnelly. Brower testifies:

"I advised General Washburn [the sitting Member] or some one for him, after I had been advised that no arrangements of that character could be entered into [that is, the purchase of Berens's support for $50], or words to that effect, that he should not enter into such arrangements with Charles Berens, or anyone else."

Here it is clearly established that there was a negotiation between a Democratic voter and Mr. Washburn, the sitting Member; the one to sell his vote (for his vote is implied in his "support") for $50 and the other to buy it. The letter is answered for Washburn by Keith, his friend; the proposition is accepted with thanks, and the letter is delivered to a Federal official, who goes, with the letter and with Washburn's money, or the money of Washburn's committee, in his pocket, to see the party and consummate the transaction. The offense of bribery was complete when one party offered to sell his vote and the other agreed to buy it. (See Russell on Crimes vol. 1, p. 159; Hardinge v. Stokes, I M. & W., 233.) Brower reports to Washburn, or some one for him, that the "arrangement" could not be entered into.

There is no denial of this testimony and no attempt to impeach Berens or Brower.

Certain wood choppers voted practically unanimously for sitting Member, and it was alleged that they were bribed by one of their employers, who was also paymaster of a railroad controlled by sitting Member. The views favorable to contestant say:

The testimony of George C. Morton (p. 125), John Mulvey (p. 120), Arthur. T. White (p. 305), and E. P. Webster (p. 297) shows that these 80 or 90 wood choppers were urged and requested by Webster and White, the wood contractors, to vote for Washburn; they were told that if they voted for Washburn they would be paid (p. 125) from $1.65 to $2.20 each for their votes; they did vote, and they voted for Washburn, and they were so paid; and they refused to vote at all unless they were paid (p. 297). The total sum paid by Webster and White to these men for their votes was $160 or $170 (p. 307). It further appears, by the admission of Webster, that the contractors expected to be repaid this money (p. 297) so paid out for these votes.

It also appears (see p. 121) that in addition to the 80 or 90 wood choppers so bribed to vote for Wasburn, the contractors Webster and White gave two trappers their board for a week on condition that they would vote for Washburn; and they did so vote.

George C. Morton testifies (p. 126) that White told him in the presence of Webster that they, Webster and White, were to get $200 for their services at the election in behalf of Washburn. The money paid out by them for votes was repaid to White, one of the firm (see p. 127), by Main Hale, of Minneapolis, the business manager of the contestee, Washburn, eight days after the election, by a check for $182; and the check was cashed for White by one George B. Webster, the paymaster of the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, of which the contestee, Washburn, was and is president. White admits (p. 307) that he was repaid the sum of $168 or $172, being the money so paid for these 80 or 90 votes, by said George B. Webster, paymaster of contestee's railroad company. There was no connection between the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad, for which the wood was cut, and the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railroad, of which contestee is president.

There was also the case of one Shagren, who testified that he was given money in sitting Member's office to vote and work for sitting Member. The money was given by the business manager of sitting Member, and in the presence of sitting Member's brother.

Also Bernard Cloutier, whose experiences are thus described:

Cloutier went to Washburn's office, and there met Charles W. Johnson and Doctor Keith (the postmaster at Minneapolis, and the same party who thanked Charles Berens for his offer to sell his support to Washburn for $50). Johnson wanted Cloutier to go out and electioneer for Washburn. Cloutier said he would do so if he was paid for his time and expenses. Thereupon Johnson told him to start out. The next day Johnson met Cloutier at the post-office and paid him $30. The following Wednesday Cloutier met Johnson again at Washburn's office. "I told him I wanted some more money. He asked me how much I wanted, and I told him I wanted $20. He [Mr. Johnson] went into the next room and commenced talking with Mr. Washburn, the sitting Member. He came back and handed me $20."

The witness, Cloutier, states in his cross-examination that he was in favor of Mr. Washburn in the first place; but it appears by his examination in chief that he had made up his mind to take no part in the election, because he had been previously promised bribes which were not paid; and thereupon he was paid $50 to convert him from that position of neutrality and indifference into a warm supporter of the sitting Member. In other words, the payment of that sum of money secured to Mr. Washburn a support and influence which he would not have had without it.

The views favorable to the contestant also give a ŕesuḿe of much other testimony tending to show bribery, the voter sometimes acknowledging that he received money, and sometimes others testifying that they had heard him make such acknowledgment, and conclude that bribery is proven.

The views favorable to sitting Member deny that the testimony shows what it is claimed to show, and thus speak of it:

It will be found by an examination of the record that there is very little, if any, testimony which would be received or considered in any court of justice in this or any other civilized country. The testimony may be, generally, denominated hearsay. In so far as it relates to the question of bribery or illegal voting, very little of it rises even to the dignity of hearsay when scrutinized. It is understood that certain members of the committee, in order to arrive at the conclusion reached by them, have considered all, or very nearly all, of such incompetent testimony found in the record. With the single exception that in the case of a voter who has voted for the sitting Member, declarations of the voter are inadmissible. There are authorities, though they even are doubted, to the effect that the declarations of a voter, though hearsay evidence, are competent to prove his want of qualification to vote. It is seldom, if ever, proper to regard hearsay statements as competent evidence. Regarding the testimony as affecting the voter, and no other person, his statement as to his qualification to vote may be taken as an admission against him. The ordinary rules of evidence apply as well to election contests as to other cases. (See McCrary's American Law of Elections, see. 306.) We do not think it necessary to cite many authorities in support of this proposition.

There follow citations from Cushing (see. 210) and the Congressional cases of White v. Harris, Ingersoll v. Naylor; New Jersey case, Reid v. Julien. The views favorable to sitting Member then continue:

It is proper to observe that much of the hearsay evidence relied upon consists only of conclusions drawn from conversations held after the election, which are always unreliable, and, as a general rule, even though the testimony would otherwise be competent, are regarded as very dangerous, if at all admissible, in a court of justice. Of this latter class of testimony, a learned judge has said:

"No class of testimony, perhaps, is more unreliable, and a more frequent cause of error in courts of justice, than the narration of conversations, real or pretended. The meaning and intention of a person in a conversation often depend much upon gesture, attitude, mode of expression, or peculiar attending circumstances, known, perhaps, to but few present. A conversation may not be fully heard by the witness, imperfectly recollected, or inaccurately repeated, when the omission or addition of a single word, or the substitution of the language of the witness, under color of bias or excitement, for the words actually used, might change the sense of an entire conversation. This is apparent from the irreconcilable contradictions daily manifested in the narration of the same conversations from the mouths of different witnesses. The liability to error in this kind of testimony would be greatly increased by allowing witnesses to add their own conclusions, or understandings, from the conversation related, or their inferences as to the understanding of the parties to the conversation. Such latitude would break down an important barrier which protects judicial investigation from error and falsehood. The understanding or inferences of witnesses are very frequently formed from bias, inclination, or interest. And a witness's understanding or inference from a conversation or transaction rests entirely in his own mind, and his consciousness of falsehood would be incapable of proof, so that there could be no possibility of convicting a witness of perjury on the ground of such evidence." (Judge Bartley, 3d Ohio St., p. 412.)

It may be further noted that the charge of bribery, like that of fraud, must be proved and not presurned. This is a universal rule of law when it is sought to convict a party of a crime. There is a difference of opinion among members of the committee as to what rule should prevail in a contested election case in proving the crime of bribery. Some members of the committee maintain that it should be proved, as in criminal cases, "beyond a reasonable doubt." Others are satisfied with the rule which requires the testimony to be "clear, satisfactory, and convincing," but all should agree that so serious an offense as bribery should be proved and not presumed.

The views favorable to contestant say:

It must not be forgotten that bribery is a secret crime; both the parties to it are equally interested in keeping it secret; and when detected, both are ready to give ingenious explanations of it. If they have acknowledged to third parties the receipt of the bribe, they are ready to declare, when called to the witness stand, that they were in favor of the bribe giver before the money was offered, or that they voted for his opponent, or that the money was paid by some one else, some nameless party, for some other purpose. Under these circumstances, when it is shown that in an election over 300 cases of bribery and attempted bribery are proven, the presumption is not violent that for every case that was, by accident or the indiscretion of the parties, brought to the light, there were others that were never revealed.

946. The election case of Donnelly v. Washburn, continued.

Should participation of returned Member in bribery unseat him, although the bribed votes be not enough to change the result? '

Argument that bribery on the part of a returned Member does not constitute a disqualification justifying his exclusion.

May a returned Member, already sworn but found disqualified, be excluded by majority vote?

Discussion of English and American election law as related to bribery.

Distinction between qualifications and returns and election as related to jurisdiction of the Committee on Elections.

(2) As to the effect of the bribery alleged, the views favorable to contestant take the following position:

It is a clearly established principle of law, both in England and the United States, that bribery committed by the sitting Member, or "by any agent of the sitting Member, with or without the knowledge or direction of his principal, renders the election void." (See Felton v. Easthorpe, Rogers's Law and Practice of Elections, 221.)

"In England bribery is an offense of so heinous a character and so utterly subversive of the freedom of elections, that, when proved to have been committed, though in one instance only and though a majority of unbribed voters remain, the election will be absolutely void." (Cushing's Par. Law, p. 70, sec. 189; St. Ives, Douglass, 11, 389; Coventry, Peckwell, 1, 97; Maine on Elections, 345.)

"Freedom of election is violated by external violence, by which the electors are constrained, or by bribery by which their will is corrupted; and in all cases where the electors are prevented in either of these ways from the free exercise of their rights the election will be void without reference to the number of votes affected thereby." (Cushing's Par. Law, p. 68, sec. 181.)

The same doctrine was affirmed by the House of Representatives in the recent case of Platt v. Goode, Second Congressional district, Virginia. (See Contested Elections, 1871–1876, p. 650.)

The report, adopted by the House, declares:

"The bribed votes should not be counted. The record furnishes no method for their elimination. Their acceptance can only be avoided by applying the rule of law, so well known and of such general adoption that it need scarcely be repeated here, that when illegal and fraudulent votes have been proven and the poll can not be purged with reasonable certainty, the whole vote must be rejected."

But your committee do not think it necessary to rest the decision of this case upon this principle of law, although they believe that the evidence shows conclusively not only that bribery was committed in a multitude of instances, but that a great number of these cases were traced home to the sitting Member. They are of the opinion that the evidence shows that the contestant had a majority of the legal votes cast and returned.

The views favorable to sitting Member thus discuss the question:

As it is not claimed, even by the contestant, that enough bribed votes were cast to change the result of the election in the district unless all numbered ballots (2,282) cast for contestee are rejected because they were numbered, and unless the entire vote (538) cast for him in Isanti County and the total vote (832) given for him in Polk and Kittson counties are thrown out on account of alleged defective returns, it would seem to be unnecessary to go into the question of bribery, save for the purpose of vindicating the sitting Member.

As it is very clear, and it will be admitted that the polls can be purged of all the alleged bribed votes or the entire vote of certain voting precincts wherein the alleged bribery occurred can be thrown out without affecting Mr. Washburn's majority, the rule contended for and quoted by the author of the majority report of the committee (p. 16), taken from the minority report in Platt v. Goode (Con. Elec. Cases, 1871–1876, p. 650), would still give Mr. Washburn his seat.

The English cases cited from Cushing's Parliamentary Law (p. 70, sec. 189, and p. 68, sec. 181) do not go to the extent, as we apprehend, of holding that the whole election in a district where there are several voting places is void because of the bribery at one of those places of an insufficient number of votes to affect the result, but they do go to the extent of holding that an election in a particular voting place may be declared void.

The rule undoubtedly is in this country that where bribery, fraud, or intimidation is so interwoven with the vote of any voting precinct that it can not be eliminated from the aggregate vote cast with certainty, the whole vote of the precinct may, and perhaps should, be rejected. The unassailed votes in other voting places would, however, still stand. Fraud or bribery does not vitiate what it does not impregnate.

If bribery were proved (as it is not) and brought home to the contestee, we should not draw any fine legal distinctions to save him his seat.

The American cases cited in contestant's brief (Abbott v. Frost, Con. Elec., 1871–1876, p. 594, and Platt v. Goode, supra) are all to the effect that before a Member can be unseated by reason of his own bribery of voters it must appear that his majority was obtained by such means.

To find that a candidate received an untainted majority of the votes cast, and on that find that he was not elected for the reason that other votes were rejected on account of bribery or other cause, would be a bold absurdity. In a contested election case in either branch of the Congress of the United States the sole question is one of fact in the light of the law, viz, Who of the parties to the case was elected, if either? The question in no possible case can involve the fitness of the sitting Member to hold his seat. In England, where there is no written constitution on the subject of expelling a member, it may be found that the practice has grown up of inquiring into the whole conduct of a Member in the course of a contestation, and if he is found unworthy, or rather ineligible, to hold his seat from any good cause, he may be unseated or kept out of a seat, notwithstanding he may have received a clear majority of the honest votes cast in the election. This under some circumstances would only be another mode of expulsion.

Our Constitution provides the mode, and it is the only one pointed out, for purging the House of a Member who, for crime or other cause, is unfit or unworthy to hold his seat. The Constitution provides that the House may "with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a Member." (Con., Art. I, sec. 5, par. 2.)

Bribery or other crime committed by a Member, and which did not affect or influence the result of his election, could in no sense be construed to render his election void. Such has been the holding in several of the States. (3 Watts & Serg., 338; Brightly's Elec. Cases, 134; McCrary on Elec., sec. 229.) Cushing, in his work on elections, questions the application of the English rule in this country in relation to the effect of bribery by the candidate or his agent in an election on the right or power to declare an election void (sec. 190). An examination of the English rule as stated by Cushing in his work on elections will make it clear that the principle the Parliament proceeds on in declaring an election void is not that the sitting member was not duly elected, but that by his evil conduct he has rendered himself unworthy of being elected and of holding a seat in the British Parliament. The election of a member under such circumstances is declared void as a punishment to the member and as a mode of condemning evil practices, and also to preserve the purity and freedom of elections in that country generally. (Cush., p. 70, secs. 189, 190, 191.)

Most, if not all, of the English cases put the rule on the ground that bribery works a disqualification of the Member to be elected to and to occupy a seat in the body to which he was elected. The basis of the English rule which allows in a contested-election case arising over the election of a member of the House of Commons a finding, where it is proved that the person actually receiving the highest number of votes was guilty by himself or his agent of bribing only a portion of his majority, that he was not elected, must be kept in view to enable a clear distinction to be drawn between the rule which obtains in England and the true rule in the American Congress.

At common law bribery at elections of members of Parliament was a crime. (Rex v. Pitt, 3 Burrows, 1335, etc.; 1 Russell on Crimes, 155.) The punishment at common law for such bribery was found inadequate, and hence the passage of the statute known as "the treating act," of 7 W. III, chap. 4 (1695), which provided that if any candidate, after the issuing of the writ for an election, should give or promise any money or entertainment to any elector he should be incapable to serve for that place in Parliament—that is, upon that election. The punishment provided by this act was fixed to remedy the defects of the common law, which, while it punished bribery, etc., in elections, provided no disqualification to hold an office, and such had been the holding of courts and legislative bodies.

It appears from good authority—Jacobs (author of the Law Dictionary), who, after citing statutes, 2 Geo. II, c. 24 (1731); 9 Geo. II, c. 38; and 16 Geo. III, c. 11, which attached some penalties to election bribery in the shape of fines, says: "But these statutes do not create any incapacity of sitting in the House. That depends solely upon the treating act above mentioned," referring to the act of 7 W. III, c. 4. (See Jacobs's Law Dictionary, title Parliament, VI (B3), vol. 5, p. 76, ed. 1813; see Russell on Crimes, 155, 159*a*, ed. 1845.)

The act of 5 and 6 Vict., c. 102, extends the treating act of W. III, and makes it include the acts of the agents of the candidate as well as of himself, and makes such acts, whether of himself or of his agents, "directly or indirectly," sufficient to disqualify. The agent is a well-known and recognized element in British Parliamentary elections of which we know nothing in this country. The candidate selects him in that country, and hence there is no hardship in holding the principal responsible for his acts; otherwise all amenability for criminal conduct at elections there would be avoided.

There are other English statutes upon the subject of treating, etc., at elections, and making candidates responsible for the action of their agents as well as their own acts, which must be kept in mind in reading Rogers, Douglas, and other English authorities whose comments are upon cases, governed by these statutes, which are not authority for us.

That bribery by a candidate for an elective office (in the absence of a statute making it a disqualification) does not disqualify to hold the office at the common law was held by the Court of Queen's Bench in Regina v. Thwaits, 18 Eng. Law and Eq. Reports, 219, 221, in a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto to try the title to an office, where acts were shown which were by the court held to amount to bribery, but which did not affect votes enough to change the majority, and the respondent was therefore held entitled to retain his seat as a member of a municipal council.

The same doctrine is held in Pennsylvania as to a sheriff, in Com. v. Shaver (3 Watts and Sergeant, p. 338).

The English rule laid down by Cushing in his excellent work, without giving either the origin or reason of the rule, is calculated to mislead persons in this country.

It is quite demonstrable that the rule owes its existence to disqualifying statutes of England, and can have no application to questions arising in the Congress of the United States under our present Constitution and laws.

In the Galway election case (2 English Reports (Moak's ed.), pp. 711, 723), where it was argued that bribery, treating, and undue influence were not disqualifications at the common law, and that the act of 17 and 18 Victoria, chapter 102, repealed all the earlier acts making them a disqualification, and itself only made these acts a disqualification by the thirty-sixth section, "after they had been found guilty of the acts by an election committee," the court, taking a different view, gave the opinion, not that the common law made these acts a disqualification, but that, to quote from the opinion of the judge announcing the decision of the court—

"The true construction of the statute itself is that the commission of any of these offenses ipso facto disqualifies the candidate from being elected, or annihilates his status as a candidate."

The theory of the English cases is that a candidate is for the particular election in which the candidate or his authorized agent violates the disqualifying statutes ineligible to an election. No such rule obtains under the Constitution and laws of the United States as to Representatives in Congress.

An examination of all the cases cited in Rogers, Douglas, and other English authorities where a member of Parliament has been unseated for bribery, treating, etc., by himself or his agents, where the votes thus affected were less in number than his majority, will show that in every case the decision rests upon special English statutes, with which we have nothing to do.

Bribery in procuring an office is made a disqualification for holding the office by the constitutions of the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Maryland, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, California, and Florida.

Bribed votes should undoubtedly be rejected, but unless they are numerous enough to change the majority the candidate receiving the majority should be declared elected. (See 3 Arch. Cr. Pro., 470[4]–570[10].)

It is said that in some of the States in this country where bribery in elections is made by constitutional provision a disqualification to hold an office, and bribery is proved against the candidate receiving the highest vote, the election should be declared void, even though the bribery did not affect the result. (Cush., secs. 190, 191.)

In some of the States it is held that prior conviction of the disqualifying crime is necessary before such a rule can be applied by a legislative assembly. It is not admitted that either the organic act of a State or its legislature can prescribe disqualifications of any kind for a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States, but it may be proper to state here that the constitution of Minnesota (sec. 15, art. 4) gives full power to the legislature of that State to render ineligible to hold office any person guilty of crime, and that legislature has not made bribery of voters a disqualification to hold office, but it has only made it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment in the county jail (Stat. Minn. 1878, p. 5, sec. 66.)

It may be observed that under no provision of the Constitution of the United States does crime committed by a Member in his election disqualify him from taking and holding his seat.

The reason for the English rule wholly fails in the case of a Member of the House of Representatives.

Justice Johnson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in an early case, in speaking of distinctions between American and English legislative bodies, said:

"American legislative bodies have never possessed or pretended to the omnipotence which constitutes the leading feature in the legislative assembly of Great Britain, and which may have led occasionally to the exercise of caprice, under the specious appearance of merited resentment." (6 Wheaton, 231.)

No case has been found in this country where any such rule (in the absence of an express constitutional provision) as is claimed to exist in England has obtained in the House of Representatives of the United States, or in any of the States of this Union, but there are a number of cases, as already appears, where the rule is entirely disregarded.

McCrary in his excellent work on American Law of Elections does not refer to or recognize any such rule, but all through his work it is taken for granted that no such rule has ever had any application to a contest in the House of Representatives of the United States.

It is true the Constitution of the United States makes "each House the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members." (Art. I, sec. 5.)

In judging of the election of a Member, the House deals alone with the question of the number of votes the Member received, and if it appears that he has a majority of the votes cast, excluding all illegal and void votes cast, and a full and fair election has been held by which such majority has been obtained, or at least the majority would not have been affected by any unfairness or improper practices in the election, then the conclusion is irresistible that such Member has been duly elected.

In judging of the returns of its Members, the House deals with the formal returns, at least preliminarily, on which a Member is expected to be admitted to a seat in the first instance.

In judging of the qualifications of a Member, neither the question of election nor returns is involved. The qualifications of a Member of the House of Representatives are fixed by the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." (Art. I, sec. 2.)

Of these prescribed qualifications the House is the exclusive and final judge.

If before a person has been sworn in and taken his seat the House were to decide that he did not possess the constitutional qualifications, he could not be admitted to a seat. Even if sworn in as a Member it would probably not require an expulsion to vacate his seat if the House were to adjudge him without requisite constitutional qualifications entitled to hold a seat.

The power to expel a Member is given to meet cases of Members admitted to seats who would, under the Constitution, be qualified to sit, but for other than constitutional causes would be disqualified or unworthy to be a Member of the legislative body in the judgment of two-thirds of the House. (Art. I, sec. 5.)

The Committee on Elections, under the rules of the House, have only jurisdiction to consider such petitions, etc., touching elections and returns as shall come into question. Such has been the rule of the House since November 13, 1789.

We here quote the rule adopted at that date with a slight amendment of date of November 13, 1794:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials, of the Members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns as shall or may be presented or come into question and be referred to them by the House." (Con. Manūal] and Digest (Smith), Rule 75.)

Under the above rule this case was referred to the Committee on Elections.

It will be observed that under it the committee is given no power to consider questions of disqualifications of a Member to hold his seat where it appears that he has been duly elected.

The new rule of the House, adopted March 2, 1880, relating to the powers of the Committee on Elections, is as follows:

"All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, viz: Subjects relating (1) to the election of Members; to the Committee on Elections." (Rule XI.)

By neither the old nor the new rules, it will be seen, has the Committee on Elections any power except such as relates to the election of Members.

The conclusion is irresistible that the committee has no right to report against a sitting Member who, as in this case, two-thirds of the committee find in effect was duly elected.

947. The election case of Donnellyv. Washburn, continued.

Does a numbering of the ballots by election officers who know it to be illegal justify rejection of the poll for intimidation?

Decision that the word "ballot" means secrecy of the vote.

Argument that right of a State to regulate time, place, and manner is derived from the Federal and not the State constitution.

Argument that intimidation should be shown from testimony of persons affected thereby and not from favoring conditions.

(3) Contestant alleged intimidation whereby many voters who would not otherwise have done so were caused to cast their votes for sitting Member.

The views favorable to the contestant describe the method:

In seven precincts of Minneapolis the judges of election placed a number on the back of each ballot to correspond with the number of the voter on the poll list. Let us consider the purpose of this numbering of the ballots.

At the session of the legislature of Minnesota in January and February, 1878, a special law had been enacted, providing that in cities containing more than 12,000 inhabitants the ballots should be numbered. This law applied, and was intended to apply, only to the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis, where the workingmen were very numerous, and where alone the required population existed. It was felt by many that this provision of law was oppressive and unconstitutional, and at the spring election in St. Paul, held immediately after the law was passed, a party offered to vote without having his ballot numbered; he was refused, and he brought an action at once in the district court of Ramsey County, in which St. Paul is situated, to test the validity of the act. The court decided (see Brisbin v. Cleary et al., printed testimony, p. 74) that the act was unconstitutional, inasmuch as the constitution of Minnesota, section 6, Article VII, provides that "all elections shall be by ballot;" that the ballot implies secrecy, and that this law requires every man "to vote, in effect, a ticket with his name indorsed on it;" and in case of a contest the ballots are to be made public. "This law," says the court, "furnishes the means of ascertaining exactly how every elector voted; that is its acknowledged purpose."

This decision of the district court of Ramsey County was the unanimous decision of a full bench of three judges; it was appealed to the supreme court, and was affirmed by the supreme court subsequently to the election. (See Northwestern Reporter, vol. 1, p. 75, foot p. 825, Brisbin v. Cleary et al., being an appeal from the district court of Ramsey County, in the same case referred to above.) The supreme court sustain the decision of the district court of Ramsey County, and say:

"The statutory provision with regard to the numbering of tickets, above quoted, clearly interferes with and violates the voter's constitutional privilege of secrecy. It is therefore an unconstitutional provision. The voter can not be required to submit to its application the ticket offered by him. * * * The defendant's demurrer was properly overruled, and the order overruling the same is accordingly affirmed."

This decision was made subsequently to the election in controversy, but it is not retroactive in its effect upon this case.

It declares that the word "ballot" means secrecy and absence of every external mark whereby the elector who has cast the same can be identified. A ticket identified by placing the voter's name, or a number indicative of his name upon it, is not a "ballot" in the sense of the constitution, and has therefore no right to be placed in the ballot box. When the court decided that such identified tickets were not "ballots," it certainly follows that they are not entitled to be counted as "ballots."

The views also allege that the numbering was done for a corrupt and fraudulent purpose. The election judges in the two cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis decided not to number the ballots, but in the precincts in question the judges reversed the decision. Of the twenty-one judges in these seven precincts only one was a friend of contestant. The views continue:

If the numbering of the ballots had been the result of an innocent mistake on the part of the judges of these seven precincts; if they had been ignorant of the decision of the district court of Ramsey County declaring such numbering unconstitutional; if there was no evidence to show fraud or intimidation, we should not be in favor of casting out the votes of these precincts simply for the reason that the ballots had been numbered. This was the view taken by the election committee in the case of McKenzie v. Braxton, seventh district Virginia (Contested Elections, 1871–1876, p. 20). The committee (McCreary, chairman), says:

"Although it would be possible, from the numbering of the ballots, to ascertain how each person voted, it is not claimed in this case that this was done, or that the tickets were voted for any such purpose, or for any improper or unlawful purpose whatever".

The question of intent therefore is the true question at issue, and all the circumstances in the case under consideration point to a corrupt intent:

1. A cloud of bribery surrounds the vote of the whole city, which the contestee has made no effort to dissipate.

2. There is evidence showing a widespread conspiracy among the employers of labor to corrupt and, where they could not corrupt, to intimidate their workmen.

3. The testimony shows that the workmen were intimidated, and that they believed that they would lose their means of subsistence if they voted against Washburn.

4. The judges of election knew that the numbering of the ballots had been declared unconstitutional by a court of record second only to the supreme court in dignity, by the attorney-general of the State, by the city attorney of St. Paul, and by the county attorney of Ramsey County, and even by the attorney who had defended the constitutionality of the law in the district court had advised judges of election not to number the ballots.

5. They had been told by their own law officer, whose opinion they had requested, that it would be unconstitutional to number the ballots, inasmuch as it violated the secrecy of the ballot.

6. They knew that the supporters of Mr. Donnelly believed that the numbering of the ballots would prevent a free and fair election, and would result in the intimidation of the workmen.

7. They had deliberately voted by a large majority not to number the ballots.

There can be but one explanation of the intent with which they reversed this deliberate action. It was done to prevent a fair election and to give the employers of workingmen an opportunity to still further intimidate them by preserving a record of how the men voted whose means of life depended upon the good will of those who employed them. The workingmen well knew that the ballot boxes could be opened at any time in any real or pretended contest and the character of their votes revealed.

The views favorable to contestant proceed to quote statistics to show that this numbering of the ballots actually effected a loss to him, and conclude by citing with comment the following:

"In William v. Stein (38 Ind. Rep., p. 90) the court held that numbering of the votes cast violates the secrecy of the ballot as much as if the law had required the voters to vote viva voce, and McCrary (American Law of Elections, sec. 446) says: 'Votes must be cast in the manner provided by law. Under a statute requiring that the manner of voting shall be by ballot, votes given viva voce can not be counted."

"Upon an elaborate review of the authorities the conclusion is reached, upon what seems to be good ground, that in this country the ballot implies absolute and inviolable secrecy, and that this doctrine is founded in the highest considerations of public policy; that the term 'ballot' implies secrecy, and that this mode of voting was adopted mainly to enable each voter to keep secret his vote is clear." (McCrary on Elections, sec. 413, p. 112, and authorities there cited; Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, pp. 506, 507, and 604.)

"The chief reason for the general adoption of the ballot in this country is that it affords to the voter the mean of preserving the secrecy of his vote. And this enables him to vote independently and freely, without being subject to be overawed, intimidated, or in any manner controlled by others, or to any ill will or persecution on account of his vote. The secret ballot is justly regarded as an important and valuable safeguard for the protection of the voter, and particularly of the humble citizen against the influence which wealth and station may be supposed to exercise. * * * All devices by which the secrecy of the ballot is destroyed by means of colored paper used for ballots, or by other similar means, are exceedingly reprehensible, and whether expressly prohibited by statute or not should be discountenanced by all good citizens." (McCrary on Elections, see. 194; People v. Pease, 27 N.Y., pp. 45 and 81.)

We have therefore reached the conclusion that the votes cast in the seven precincts where the ballots were numbered should be deducted, not alone because they were so numbered, but because such numbering was corruptly done, with an intent to intimidate the workingmen residing in those precincts, and because it was part of a general conspiracy of the friends and supporters of Mr. Washburn to prevent a free and untrammeled expression of the preferences of the voters.

The minority, favorable to sitting Member, antagonized the above conclusions:

Your committee need not, for the purposes of this case, turn aside to consider whether this law is unconstitutional or not, and it may be regarded, so far as the election of State, county, and municipal officers in the State of Minnesota are concerned, as unconstitutional. But we hold, first, that in so far as this law related to the judges of the election in the election of a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States it was constitutional; and, second, whether it is to be regarded as constitutional or not constitutional, the numbering of the ballots affords no reason, in the light of the law and the precedents, for rejecting the vote as cast. The legislature of a State does not acquire its right or power to make a law regulating the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress from the constitution of the State, but this right and power is derived exclusively from the Constitution of the United States. Section 4, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

This provision of the Constitution of the United States has been under consideration in a very recent case in the Supreme Court of the United States (exparte Seibold).

An examination of the opinions delivered by Judges Bradley and Field, the former for the majority of the court and the latter for the two dissenting judges, will show that on the question of the derivation of the power of the legislature to make laws regulating the manner of holding elections for members of Congress, all the judges agree that the legislature obtains its power from, and solely from, the provision of the Constitution just quoted. The State legislature is not responsible to the State, nor controlled by the State constitution, in its action in regard to the manner of holding Federal elections. In case of a conflict between the act of a legislature and the constitution of the State in matters purely of a Federal character the act of the legislature will prevail, provided it is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. This point was distinctly decided in the contested election case of Baldwin v. Trowbridge (Contested Election Cases in Congress, 1865 to 1871, p. 46).

The syllabus of that case reads as follows:

"Where there is a conflict of authority between the constitution and legislature of a State in regard to fixing the place of elections, the power of the legislature is paramount."

The case arose over the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of the State of Michigan, passed February 5, 1864, which undertook to give to Michigan soldiers, while in the service of the United States during the late war, the right to vote at all elections authorized by law, whether at the time of voting they were within the limits of the State of Michigan or not. The constitution of the State of Michigan in express terms required the electors to reside in the State three months and in the township or ward in which they offered to vote ten days next preceding such election. The act of the legislature was declared by the Michigan courts unconstitutional, and yet Mr. Trowbridge, the sitting Member in that case, was allowed to retain his seat, although be was elected by the the vote of soldiers who were absent from the State, and who voted in accordance with the act named.

The views further contend that although numbered the votes should be counted, citing McCrary (see. 312) and the cases of Giddings v. Clark, McKenzie v. Braxton, and Finley v. Bisbee. The views further say:

There is not an iota of testimony in the whole record which it can be pretended tends to show that one of the electors in such precincts was influenced by reason of the ballots being numbered. The industry of contestant would have discovered some such evidence if the fact existed. The testimony does show that one eccentric or cowardly man, a lawyer (Robinson), refused at the polls to vote because the judges proposed to number the ballot (pp. 135, 137–138). This man disclosed the fact that he was a sort of Democrat, and that he did not want any person to know for whom he voted. The conclusion from his testimony is irresistible that he wanted to maintain his standing as a Democrat and at the time vote for Mr. Washburn, and that by this means Mr. Washburn lost the vote of one cowardly lawyer.

All of the alleged testimony in the record on the subject of intimidation, if, indeed, any of it could be called competent testimony, is so utterly shadowy that it does not deserve a critical review here.

We should, in the consideration of the charge of intimidation, keep in mind the salutary rule of law, repeatedly affirmed by the House of Representatives, that where it is alleged that a large number of persons have been deterred from voting by violence or intimidation, the testimony of those persons should be produced, or at least some of them. The opinions and impressions of others are not sufficient (McCrary's Election Laws, 430–441; Norris v. Handley, 42d Cong.).

The rule of law universally recognized where elections are held by the people is, that those who may have voted, and yet did not when they could have done so, are bound by the result (McCrary's Election Laws, secs. 445–448; 10 Minn., 107).

The attempt on the part of members of the committee to work out some sort of demonstration from a comparison of the votes cast on different years in the city of Minneapolis is exceedingly farfetched, and hardly deserves notice.

948. The election case of Donnelly v. Washburn, continued.

As to the validity of a supplemental return proven by the election officers and not by the best evidence, i. e., the ballots themselves.

Discussion of the validity of a return made by a canvassing board irregularly organized.

Was an official acting without authority of law on a canvassing board an intruder or a de facto officer?

If the contestant shows a return illegal, does the burden fall on contestee to prove the vote when contestant has not attacked it in his notice?

(4) A question as to supplemental returns:

Through an error of the secretary of the State of Minnesota, in not furnishing the proper blanks to the election officers, there were a number of instances where the votes polled for candidates for Congress were not returned and counted by the county canvassing boards (p. 320). The omission to make full returns occurred in Minneapolis, and in Steam, Morrison, and Douglas counties. The contestee does not dispute the right of the contestant to count the votes cast in the counties of Stearns and Morrison, in each of which counties the contestant received a majority. Nor do we understand that any serious objection can be made to counting the vote in Leaf Valley precinct, in Douglas County (p. 270), where the contestant claims, to have received all the votes.

Supplemental returns were made on the 12th day of November, 1878, by the election officers of the precincts in the city of Minneapolis, where they had omitted to make the returns for Member of Congress immediately after the election. These precincts were first precinct, First Ward; second precinct, Second Ward; and third precinct, Fourth Ward. The majority for Washburn in these precincts was 714 (pp. 348, 349). We see no valid objection to these supplemental returns. They were made by the proper officers and within the time required by law to canvass and make returns. The supplemental returns from the three precincts of Minneapolis were duly canvassed by the county canvassing board (pp. 348–351); but it is hardly necessary to waste time in considering the validity of these supplemental returns. They were put in evidence by the contestant (pp. 58–63). The testimony clearly and unmistakably, independent of the supplemental returns, shows the vote as cast for Member of Congress in these precincts. It must be observed that all the witnesses who testified on the subject of the vote in these precincts agree that the vote for Member of Congress was duly canvassed, though not returned.

Asa R. Camp, one of the judges of the election of the second precinct of the Second Ward in the city of Minneapolis, testifies to the vote cast for Congress in that wad (p. 322). And he testifies also that the supplemental return, as made, is true in all respects (p. 323).

Isaac McNair, one of the judges of the election in the same precinct and ward, testifies that the vote was canvassed by the judges of election for Member of Congress; and he also gives the vote from recollection and memorandum, as it appears by the supplemental return (pp. 323, 324).

Thomas F. Andrews, another one of the judges in the same precinct, swears to the same state of facts (pp. 325, 326).

John M. Williams, one of the clerks of election of the second precinct of the Second Ward, testifies to the same facts stated by the judges of election (pp. 326, 327).

Charles Thielen, a judge of the election of the first precinct of the First Ward of the city of Minneapolis, testifies to the canvass of the votes in that precinct and to the correctness of the supplemental return (pp. 327, 328).

Other election officers proved the vote in the same way. The views favorable to sitting Member say:

Some complaint is made that the contestee did not have the ballots counted in the ballot boxes, and offer proof of the result of such count in this contest; and certain members of the committee think this would have been the best and highest evidence of how the vote stood. The contestee has given the vote as cast in these three precincts, as found by the officers who held the election, on an actual count of the ballots made by them as soon as the polls closed. It is hard to conceive how it is possible for a new count of the ballots by unauthorized persons long after the election would constitute higher evidence of the true state of the vote in these precincts than we have already given. It would be exactly the same character of evidence, but given by persons not authorized under the law to make the count.

The views favorable to contestant say:

It is very clear that the election officers of the precincts had performed their duties on the night of the election; had dissolved, and were functus officio, and had no right to make any such supplemental returns. Mr. Washburn claimed majorities in each of these precincts, and he therefore undertook to prove the votes cast aliunde. In strictness of law it was his duty to have proved the votes cast by the best evidence, to wit, by counting the ballots in the ballot boxes; and he took some preliminary steps to that end, issuing a subpoena duces tecum, to the officers who had charge of the ballot boxes to appear at a time named, in order that the ballots might be counted; but * * * for some reason he refused to count the ballots.

(5) A question as to the legality of the canvassing board.

The views favorable to contestant said:

The statutes of Minnesota (see. 19, p. 58, revision of 1866) provide that the county canvassing board of each county shall consist of the county auditor and two justices of the peace, to be by him selected.

In the case of Isanti County the canvass was made, the votes counted, and the return made by the county auditor, one justice of the peace, and the judge of probate of the county. (See p. 69, printed testimony.) It is true that subdivision 3, section 1, title 1, chapter 3, volume 1, Bissell's Statutes of Minnesota, provides that "words purporting to give a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons shall, be construed as giving such authority to a majority of such persons or officers." If the county auditor had selected two justices of the peace and one had failed to attend, then the majority present might, under this law, have gone on and acted; but in the case of Isanti County the county auditor did not select two justices of the peace as the law required. The board of canvassers therefore was never constituted as required by law, and never having had a legal existence, there could be neither majority nor minority of it.

In the contested-election case of Howard v. Cooper, of Michigan, Thirty-sixth Congress (see Contested Elections, 1864–65, p. 282), the Committee on Elections say:

"Your committee have rejected the vote of the township of Van Buren. The law requires that the board of inspectors shall be constituted of three persons in number. The proof is clear that there were but two. And as there w no board of inspectors known to the law, your committee see no way by which any legal effect can be given to the returned vote. They have therefore deducted it."

In this case it was shown that there was a statute of the State of Michigan precisely the same as that just quoted from Minnesota, giving a majority of a board the power to act for the whole board; but the committee did not consider that it was sufficient to permit them to receive and count the return.

But if we will suppose that the board of county canvassers of Isanti County had been duly constituted as required by law, and that a majority had the power to act for the whole board, nevertheless the return could not be received, for it appears upon its face that a third party, not a member of the board, a stranger not qualified to act, an usurper without color of authority, intruded himself into the deliberations of the board and acted as one of them, and in all cases where the county auditor and the justice of the peace differed in opinion he gave the casting vote, and thus decided the action of the board. The statutes of Minnesota show that a judge of probate has none of the functions of a justice of the peace, and the constitution of the State (sec. 7, Art. VI) provides that a probate court "shall have no other jurisdiction except the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship." There is no testimony to show that this judge of probate was at the same time a justice of the peace, and if he had been, his exercise of the office of justice of the peace would have been incompatible with the spirit of the constitution of the State.

The views go on to cite the cases of Jackson v. Wayne, Easton v. Scott, and Sloan v. Rawls. The views further cite the English case of The King v. The Corporation of Bedford Level (6 East., 368) to show that the principle of the de facto officer does not apply in this case, and the views say:

Here the judge of probate did not claim to be a justice of the peace; he did not exercise the duties of the office under color of law; he did not exercise them at all; he distinctly claimed that he was a judge of probate and nothing else. It has never been pretended, in any court in the world, that when A B asserts himself to be the incumbent of one office a presumption of law arises that he holds another, an entirely different and (as in this case) an incompatible office.

A party claiming to be a judge of an election precinct, or a sheriff, or a judge may deceive and mislead innocent third parties to their damage; and hence the law wisely says that he who deals with such officers shall not be required to go back and inquire into every particular of their title. But in this case there is no pretense that anyone was or could have been misled by the declaration of the judge of probate that he was the judge of probate.

The views further say:

Neither is this a collateral proceeding between third parties. The validity of the return itself and the right of the judge of probate to act are the very questions in issue. The canvassing board of Isanti County was part of the machinery by which the votes cast for Member of Congress in that district is to be brought to the knowledge of the House of Representatives, "the sole judge of the election returns of its Members."

The views further show that in the Congressional cases already cited the boards impeached were only precinct boards. The case was therefore much stronger in the case of a county canvassing board. The case of Delano v. Morgan is further cited. The views then conclude:

It became the duty of the sitting Member to prove by a counting of the votes in the ballot boxes that the votes were actually cast as claimed by him and by proper testimony that they were duly counted by the precinct officers. As he has failed to do this, the presumption of law is that he was unable to do it. There was no obligation upon the part of the contestant to prove or disprove votes that had no existence before the committee in any legal return, while Mr. Washburn well knew that the fact of any such vote being cast in the county was denied by contestant and that the burden of proof was on him to prove it. The committee has no way to ascertain the votes cast except by the official return, and, where this is manifestly void, by testimony showing what the vote really was.

The views favorable to sitting Member antagonize this position:

There is nothing in the evidence offered by the contestant tending to show that the vote of this county was not cast as returned, was not counted as returned, or was not canvassed as returned, except what appears on pages 68 and 69 of the record. There it is made to appear that there was a complete abstract of the vote made as cast in the several election districts of the county, and duly certified to by the auditor of the county and district, whose certificate is attested by one A. B. O'Dell, who designates himself judge of probate, and Jonas Burch, who signs himself as justice of the peace. Had O'Dell signed and attested the auditor's certificate as justice of the peace there would have been no objection to counting this vote. This is a mere irregularity, which does not vitiate the returns; and if it did, the vote is not to be rejected unless the contestant shows it to be illegal. (McCrary's Election Laws, sec. 302, and cases there cited.)

The statute of Minnesota (Bissel's Revision, vol. 1, p. 172, sec. 28) provides:

"The county auditor and two justices of the peace of his county, by him selected, constitute the county canvassing board, and on or before the tenth day after the election said board shall proceed to open and publicly canvass the several returns made to the auditor's office."

Section 40 of the same Revision of the Statutes (p. 176) is as follows:

"The abstracts of the votes for Members of Congress and electors of President and Vice President shall be made on one sheet, and, being certified and signed in the same manner as in case of abstracts of votes for county officers, shall be deposited in the said county auditors office, and a copy thereof, certified as aforesaid, shall be inclosed, directed to the secretary of state, and indorsed on the outside of the envelope with these words: 'Abstract of votes for (naming the officers) returned to the auditors office of (inserting the name of the county) county,' and the said auditor's signature; and the said auditor shall forward the same to the secretary of state within eleven days after such election."

The statutes of Minnesota require nothing of the county canvassing board but to compile the returns made to the auditor of the county, and the auditor to certify to the same. The justices of the peace selected by the auditor to constitute with him the county canvassing board are not required to do anything more toward certifying to the truth of the abstract than to attest the signatures of the auditor. The statutes of Minnesota provide a form for the abstract and for the certificate, and in that form the two justices of the peace sign their names under the word "attest" to the left of the signature of the auditor. (See Bissells Statutes, p. 174; also Young's Minnesota Statutes, 1878, p. 46.) The real purpose of selecting justices of the peace as a part of the county canvassing board and to assist the auditor of the county is doubtless that they shall be present to prevent the auditor in making up the abstract of votes, if so disposed, from committing any fraud. The board has no authority either to accept or reject any returns made to the county auditors, in their estimate of the votes, for any informality in holding an election or making returns thereof. The following is the law of the State on this subject:

"No election returns shall be refused by any auditor for the reason that the same are returned, or delivered to him, in any other than the manner directed herein; nor shall the canvassing board of the county refuse to include any returns in their estimate of the vote for any informality in holding any election, or in making any returns thereof, but all returns shall be received and the votes canvassed by such canvassing board and included in the abstracts; provided there is a substantial compliance with the provisions of this chapter." (Sec. 37, Bissel's Statutes, p. 175.)

For an authoritative construction of this section see 18 Minn., 351.

The views further say that it nowhere appears that the man who signed himself as judge of probate was not in fact a justice of the peace, and continue:

The most that can be said for this certificate to the abstract of the vote is that it is informal, and this the statute of Minnesota, in express terms, provides shall not be a good ground for setting it aside. We quote from the section of the statute which prescribes the form of an abstract of votes for county canvassers:

"The following is the form of the abstract of votes provided for herein to be used by all county canvassing boards, but no election shall be set aside for the want of form in the abstracts, provided they contain the substance." (Sec. 33, Bissel's Statutes, p. 173.)

See also form of abstract and certificate, Young's Minn. Stat., 1878, page 46.

This single item of evidence against counting the vote of Isanti County is that the auditor's certificate has not been duly attested. It can not be said that the abstract of the vote was not canvassed by the proper officers and in accordance with the law of the State. But if it even appeared that but one justice of the peace acted with the county auditor in making up the abstract and canvassing the vote of the county there would be no legal objection to it under the laws of that State. Subdivision 3, section 1, title 1, chapter 3, Bissel's Statutes, page 118, reads as follows:

"Words purporting to give a joint authority to three or more public officers, or other persons, shall be construed as giving such authority to a majority of such officers or persons."

We do not think it is even important to rely upon this excellent provision of the statute of Minnesota. But if there should be any doubt about it, the general principle of this statute makes it clear. It has frequently been held, in the absence of such a statute as we have just quoted, that where a certificate is by law required to be made by a board of officers composed of three or more persons, it is sufficient for a majority of such board to join in such certificate. (See McCrary's Law of Elections, sec. 158, where the subject is discussed; also Niblack v. Walls, Forty-second Congress, where it was held that if less than a majority sign the certificate is not good.) In the case of Niblack v. Walls the committee say:

"The committee are of the opinion that where the law requires the certificate to be made by three officers, a majority at least must sign to make the certificate valid."

Much stress is laid upon the fact that one of the attesting witnesses to the certificate of the abstract of votes was a mere intruder. While it may be true that where an intruder into a board, which had a duty to perform requiring some judicial action, and it appeared that such intruder participated in the determinations of such board, and was allowed a voice in the deliberations of the board, would render the acts of such board invalid, yet, as in this case, where the alleged intruder is not shown to have performed any duty, or attempted to perform any duty, other than to sign his name in the place of a justice of the peace, as a mere witness to the certificate of an officer, attached to an abstract of votes not shown to have been illegal or improperly made, it is hard to conceive how such signature could invalidate the acts of the other officers, who had legal authority to act.

The case of Delano v. Morgan (2 Bartlett, p. 171) is said to be in point, and to sustain the claim of the contestant that this certificate to the abstract of votes is not good, and that the whole vote should be thrown out. There is no possible analogy between the two cases.

The views then discuss the cases of Delano v. Morgan and Howard v. Cooper, and then say:

It has already been made to appear that the notice of contestant does not directly attack the vote of this county. If, in the notice, the contestant intended to charge that the vote was not cast, it was his duty to offer proof in support of the charge. The record is silent. If he, by his notice, intended to Claim that the vote was not counted, he should have proved that claim. If, by his notice, he intended to allege that the votes of the several voting districts of the county were not returned by the county canvassing board, it was his duty to have offered proof of that. If, by his notice, he intended to deny that the vote of this county was not canvassed, on him rests the burden of proof of that. He contents himself by simply claiming that there is a failure to have a suitable number of duly authorized persons sign the certificate to the abstract by way of attesting it.

The defect in the returns from Morrison County, where the county auditor wholly fails to sign the certificate, and only one justice of the peace signs it, is not regarded by the committee (pp. 284, 304).

Before leaving this subject it may be proper to go further into the question of the duties of canvassing officers. Such duties, under the statute as it exists in the State of Minnesota, are purely ministerial. The canvassing board has only the right to cast up the votes as they appear from the returns of the officers of the different precincts of the county. They have no judicial power. In the case of the State v. Stearns (44 Missouri, p. 223) the court, after holding the duties of such canvassing board to be purely ministerial, say:

"When a ministerial officer leaves his proper sphere and attempts to exercise judicial functions, he is exceeding the limits of the law and guilty of usurpation. To permit a mere ministerial officer arbitrarily to reject returns at his mere caprice or pleasure is to infringe or destroy the rights of parties without notice or opportunity to be heard; a thing which the law abhors and prohibits."

McCrary, in his work on Elections (sec. 82), says:

"The true rule is this: They must receive and count the votes as shown by the returns, and they can not go behind the returns for any purpose, and this necessarily implies that if a paper is presented as a return and there is a question as to whether it is a return or not they must decide that question from what appears upon the face of the paper itself. Thus in New York it has been held that the duties of the canvassers were "to attend at the proper office and calculate and ascertain the whole number of votes given at any election and certify the same to be a true canvass." This is not a judicial act, but merely ministerial. They have no power to controvert the votes of electors.

In a case in 22 Barbour (p. 77), the following language is used:

"They (the canvassers) are not at liberty to receive the vote of anyone outside of the returns themselves; their duty consists in the simple matter of arithmetic."

McCrary also says that the doctrine that canvassing boards and return judges are ministerial officers, possessing no discretionary or judicial power, is settled in nearly or quite all of the States of the Union.

It has been directly settled by decisions in the State of Minnesota. (2 Minn., p. 180; 10 Minn., p. 107; 18 Minn., p. 351.)

See McCrary's Law of Elections, sections 81, 82, 83, 84, and 85.

Even though the return must be set aside the election must stand unless the party who attacks it shows fraud or other illegality in the election. (McCrary's Election Laws, secs. 306 and 364–369.)

It is hard to conceive how a mere ministerial board of officers can be rendered illegal and all its acts declared to be void simply because one person does not sign himself as an attesting witness to a certificate annexed to an abstract by such designation as to show affirmatively that he was a proper officer to do so.

The views further contend:

We do not admit, but deny that the burden was at all under the notice of contestant thrown upon the contestee to prove the vote of Isanti County. The contestee has, however, himself made the proof. As already appears, the notice of contestant does not attack the fact that the vote was cast. He simply undertakes to allege that it was not cast, etc., as provided by law, leaving the fact of its being cast to remain unchallenged. The contestant, moreover, directly admits in his brief, in effect, that the vote was cast as returned and counted. While he says the burden rested upon the contestee to prove this fact, and that the contestee declined to do so, he does say, quoting his exact language, "Had he done so the contestant was prepared to show the grossest irregularities in the conduct of the election in said county." He thus admits that the vote was cast, but seems to think that when contestee offered proof of the fact, which he himself has already proved (as well as the contestee), that it would open the door for him to offer proof of the grossest irregularities in the conduct of the election in that county, notwithstanding the fact that there is not a word in his notice of contest which indicated any kind of irregularities in the election in that county, but he failed to do so. This county gave to the contestee, Mr. Washburn, a majority of 401, nearly 200 in excess of the majority which certain members of the committee find was the majority of the contestant after rejecting all the votes as indicated in its views. It is thus made to appear that on what could not be dignified as a technicality of the law it is proposed to unseat the sitting Member and to seat a man who was not, as is admitted by himself in his printed argument, elected.

It should be noted, in conclusion, on this point, that the law makes it the duty of the committee or the House to send for and tabulate the original precinct returns if the true vote can not be ascertained from the return. (McCrary, etc., sec. 345.)

(6) A question arose as to certain unorganized counties, but it involved only a construction of the law of Minnesota.

In accordance with the above discussions one party in the committee found a majority of 230 for Donnelly, the contestant; the other party found that at most the majority of sitting Member could not be reduced below 2,232.

949. The Massachusetts, election case of Boynton v. Loring, in the Forty-sixth Congress.

A notice of contest being defective, but objections thereto not being pressed, the committee examined the case.

A voter having cast a ballot he would not otherwise have voted in order to free himself from a prosecution, the vote was rejected.

In absence of evidence for whom a man voted or that he was improperly influenced, the House declined to reject the vote because of a suspicious remark of the voter.

On December 20, 1880,[1] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the Massachusetts contest of Boynton v. Loring. Eleven members of the committee concurred in the result, while one member dissented. Mr. J. B. Weaver, of Iowa, filed minority views.

At the outset a preliminary question arose as to the specifications in the notice of contest, the committee stating that had the objections alleged against the notice of contest been pressed before the committee they would undoubtedly have been sustained. As it is, the committee content themselves with reaffirming the view taken in the recent case of Duffy v. Mason.

As to the merits of the case, several questions of fact were examined; and also a few questions of law were discussed, as follows:

(1) As to a vote given under duress, the report says:

> As to the vote of Sheedy MacNamara, he probably voted under the idea that he would be able to enlist the active support of certain prominent citizens of the town in his behalf in getting him discharged from a prosecution for the violation of some of the laws of Massachusetts then pending against him. If his testimony is to be considered of sufficient weight to establish anything, it would seem to show that he applied to one or more of the select men for their influence in getting the prosecution dismissed, and offered for this influence to vote a certain ticket. Giving this testimony due weight, if it shows anything it shows simply that he voted a ticket that he would not have voted had he been free from the charge thus hanging over him. We do not think we could count his vote for the contestant, but would rather throw it out entirely as being tainted and not a perfectly free ballot.
> It is claimed that some man as he voted said, "Here's a vote for Sheedy." It is also claimed that Sheedy MacNamara influenced certain of his friends, this being one of them, to vote the ticket upon which the name of the contestee was printed, under the idea that by so doing Sheedy was to escape prosecution, and that therefore the vote of the man who shouted at the time he voted "Here's a vote for Sheedy" should be counted for the contestant. In this view of the case we can not agree. The evidence is entirely insufficient to establish the fact that the man voted, or if he did vote, for whom he voted, or that he was improperly influenced to vote as he did.

Mr. Weaver, in his minority views, deducts not only the vote of MacNamara, but also of his brother-in-law, who, as he voted, said: "Here is a vote for Sheedy."

950. The case of Boynton v. Loring, continued.

Persons not possessing the constitutional qualification of electors may not complain of a technical illegality by which registration officers keep their names off the lists.

The presumption that sworn officers did their duty must obtain unless it is clearly shown that erasures from the ballot were made by them.

(2) Among the qualifications of voters was one that the voter should be able to read and write in the English language; and the registry law of 1874 was designed to more effectually carry out this provision of the constitution. The majority thus set forth a point developed in this connection:

We have nothing to do with the policy of the law, but simply to enforce that which the people of Massachusetts enacted into statutes for their guidance. It is strenuously urged that persons whose names had been upon the registry lists previous to the general election of 1878, and had been recognized as voters, and had voted at several preceding elections, could not be subjected to the test of being required to read and write in the presence of the registration officers as a condition to being registered. We can not agree to this construction of the law relative to the duties of the registration officers. We think that it is a reasonable regulation that the officers in charge of registration should see to it that persons offering to vote possess the necessary qualifications; and we can not see that, because persons not qualified to vote have been allowed to violate the law on one or more occasions, they can be heard to plead such violation as a bar to the enforcement of the law against them thereafter. Whenever the disqualification of voters appears, it is clearly the duty of the registration officers to refuse to register them. If the registration officers refuse in an illegal way to register this class of persons or give a wrong reason for their refusal, still this would give such persons no right to vote while they admit that they are clearly disqualified under the constitution. We therefore hold that all persons who could not read and write, as required by the constitution of Massachusetts, were not legal voters, and can not be heard to complain of any technical violation of law by the registration officers, whereby they were deprived of registration while admitting at the same time that they did not possess the constitutional qualifications of electors.

(3) In Haverhill 42 printed ballots were found with Boynton's name erased. The report says:

We do not think the evidence sufficient to justify us in finding that the votes were originally thrown for Mr. Boynton and afterwards corruptly changed. The presumption that the sworn officers of the law have done their duty must obtain until the contrary clearly appears.

951. The case of Boynton v. Loring, continued.

Discussion as to what constitutes a compliance with a mandatory law that the designation of the office shall appear "clearly" on the ballot.

As to the extrinsic evidence which sustains the sufficiency of the designation of the office on a ballot.

Reference to a discussion of alleged disfranchisement under the educational qualification of a State.

(4) A question as to the sufficiency of certain ballots is thus discussed in the report:

It is admitted that 138 ballots were counted for the contestee, the designation upon which ballots was as follows: "For Representative, sixth district, George B. Loring, of Salem." It is claimed that under the law of Massachusetts this was not a sufficient designation of the office, and that the ballots should not have been counted for the sitting Member as votes for the office of Representative in Congress from the Sixth Congressional district of Massachusetts.

The law of Massachusetts, chapter 7, section 13, is as follows: "No vote shall be counted which does not clearly indicate in writing the office for which the person voted for is designed." The word "writing," as it occurs in that section, under another statute of Massachusetts is allowed to include printing, as well as any other mode of representing words and letters. We do not think the law of Massachusetts changes the general rule with reference to the designation which must appear upon all ballots in order to make them effectual. The words, "No vote shall be counted which does not clearly indicate," etc., adds nothing to the general rule of law, which requires the election officers to reject any vote when either the name of the person intended to be voted for or the office which the voter intended the person voted for to fill does not appear from the ballot itself. That is to say, where there is such ambiguity in the writing or printing of the name of the person voted for, or of the office for which he is a candidate, that it is impossible to tell from the ballot itself what the name of the person intended to be voted for is, or the office which the voter intended him to fill, the ballot must be rejected, and no extrinsic evidence can be heard to supply the defect.

The public law of Massachusetts created the Sixth Congressional district. There was no other "sixth district" in which any of the voters of Groveland lived except the "Sixth Congressional district," nor did they live in any other sixth district, nor was there a Representative office to be filled in any sixth district in which the town of Groveland was situated except the Sixth Congressional district.

So it seems to us, in the light of the public law of Massachusetts creating this Sixth Congressional district, and the geographical location of Groveland, and the ballot itself, with the designation of "Representative sixth district," all considered together, makes the designation sufficient on the ballot to indicate the office which the voter designed when he cast the ballot, and is within the true interpretation and meaning of the law of Massachusetts, when it declares that "the ballot shall clearly indicate the office for which the person voted for is designed."

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, lays down the following general proposition as being the law relating to this subject:

"Every ballot should be complete in itself, and ought not to require extrinsic evidence to enable the election officer to determine the voter's intention. Perfect certainty, however, is not required in these cases. It is sufficient if an examination leaves no reasonable doubt upon the intention, and technical accuracy is never required in any case. The cardinal rule is to give effect to the intention of the voter whenever it is not left in uncertainty.

* * * * * * *

"The name on the ballot should be clearly expressed and ought to be given fully. Errors in spelling, however, will not defeat the ballot if the sound is the same; nor abbreviations, if such are in common use and generally understood, so that there can be no reasonable doubt of the intent. * * *"

The report then quotes Cooley on the subject of extrinsic evidence. Evidence of such facts as might be called the circumstances surrounding the election—who were the candidates, their residence, etc.—would be evidence of this kind.

The minority views say as to the ballot in question:

It is claimed, and we think with much propriety, that under the laws of Massachusetts this was not a sufficient designation of the office, and that the votes should not have been counted. The law of Massachusetts, chapter 7, section 13, is as follows: "No vote shall be counted which does not clearly indicate in writing (or printing) the office for which the person voted for is designated." The plain meaning of this law is this: The office must be "clearly indicated" on the ballot itself, and can not be made to appear by other and extrinsic testimony. The law is clearly mandatory, and the counting of such ballots is inhibited.

(5) The minority views discuss at length alleged disfranchisement under the educational qualification of the Massachusetts constitution. In the debate, also, this feature of the case was the subject of much discussion.

In accordance with their conclusions as to fact and law, the majority of the committee reported a resolution confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

Mr. Weaver, with his views, presented a resolution declaring contestant entitled to the seat.

The report was debated January 20 and 21, 1881,[1] and on the latter date the proposition of the minority was disagreed to, only 13 voting aye.

The resolutions reported by the majority were then agreed to without division, the yeas and nays being refused.

952. The Florida election case of Bisbee v. Hull, in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Instance wherein the House unseated a returned Member belonging to the majority party and seated a contestant belonging to the minority party.

The House does not reject an unassailed return because the State canvassers may have refused to count it.

The parties having agreed that a return should be counted, and testimony being unsatisfactory, the House refused contestant's claim that the canvasser's rejection should be approved.

Returns counted on mandamus of a State court; and unassailed, were counted without regard to the jurisdiction of the court to order the canvass.

The numbering of ballots through an honest blunder of election officers does not cause their rejection in absence of evidence of intimidation.

On January 18, 1881,[2] Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the Florida case of Bisbee v. Hull.[3] In the original canvass by the State board of canvassers Mr. Hull, the sitting Member, had been returned by a majority of 12 votes. The report thus states the facts in this case:

> The first canvass was made on December 21, 1878, by the State canvassing board, composed of the secretary of state, the comptroller, and the attorney-general of the State of Florida; and thereupon, on the same day, the governor of that State issued to Noble A. Hull a certificate of election. (Record, p. 500.) By virtue of this certificate Mr. Hull was admitted to a seat in the House.
> It will be noted that in this first canvass the vote of only 15 of the 17 counties was canvassed; that the vote of Brevard and Madison counties was not canvassed.
> The State canvassing board met again on January 8, 1879, and, in obedience to the mandate of the supreme court of Florida, again canvassed the vote of the second district of Florida and included in the canvass the returned vote from the county of Madison, no return being before the board from poll No. 4 of Madison County.
> The vote thus canvassed from Madison County was, Hull 938, and Bisbee 1,151; majority for Bisbee, 213. The result of this second canvass showed Mr. Bisbee's majority to be 201, the State board of canvassers having found and certified Mr. Hull's total vote to be 10,578 and Mr. Bisbee's total vote 10,779. (Record, pp. 218–220.)
> The opinion of the supreme court of Florida, pronounced by the chief justice, on the question of canvassing the vote of the county of Madison, will be found in the record (p. 221).
> On this final canvass Mr. Bisbee applied to the governor of Florida for a certificate of his election, which was referred by the governor to the attorney-general of the State, who, on January 10, 1879, gave his opinion to the governor favoring in most emphatic language Mr. Bisbee's right to such certificate. (Record, p. 228.) Mr. Bisbee's application was, however, refused.

[1] Record, pp. 797, 827–835.

[2] Third session Forty-sixth Congress, House Report No. 86; 1 Ellsworth, p. 315.

[3] There had been a question over the prima facie right to this seat. (See sec. 57 of Volume I of this work.)

The vote of Brevard County was never canvassed by the State canvassing board, for reasons assigned in writing by the board on December 23, 1878. (Record, p. 220.)

Parties and their attorneys agree that poll No. 4, Madison County, was never returned to the county canvassing board, and hence it was never canvassed; and it is in like manner agreed that the true vote cast at this poll was, Hull 129, and Bisbee 186; majority for Mr. Bisbee, 57. (Contestee's brief, p. 14; and Record, pp. 25, 27, 28.)

It is also proved, as admitted, that there was no return of the votes cast at Cow Creek precinct, Alachua County, and that the true vote cast there was, Hull 24, Bisbee 2; Hull's majority, 22. (Record, p. 242; and contestant's brief in reply, p. 4.)

It is also an admitted fact in the case that at Long Swamp or Whiteville poll, Marion County, 93 Democratic ballots were fraudulently substituted for a like number of Republican ballots, thereby making a difference in the vote as canvassed of 186 votes against Mr. Bisbee.

The contestee (brief, p. 37) agrees that this fraud was committed, and that at this precinct "134 votes should be counted for contestant and 41 for contestee."

The vote returned and canvassed was 134 for contestee and 41 for contestant.

An agreed statement fixes the vote of Brevard County at 116 for Hull and 41 for Bisbee. (Record, p. 487.)

The committee therefore found contestant's majority to be about 350.

The committee discuss the following questions:

(1) As to Madison County—

Without deciding the question of the jurisdiction of the supreme court to issue a mandamus to compel the State canvassing board to canvass the vote of Madison County, the committee, on the returns and testimony now before it, find that the board had no legal right to reject the returned vote of the county in their first canvass, and that Mr. Bisbee is now entitled to have such vote counted for him.

The testimony discloses no objection to the returns and none is known to exist. The returned vote of Madison County was rejected by the State canvassing board on the sole ground that one of the precincts (poll No. 4) had made no returns.

No case can be found where in a contest before the House of Representatives the vote shown by an unassailed return has been rejected on the ground of a failure of some other body to canvass it.

The vote of poll No. 4 having been ascertained indisputably, it must of course be counted.

(2) As to Brevard County—

While it is true that the contestant insists that the vote of this county should now be wholly excluded, as it was by the State canvassing board, in view of the agreement signed by the parties and also on account of the unsatisfactory character of the testimony the committee conclude that the vote of this county should be counted and as fixed in said agreement. (Record, p. 487.)

(3) Objection was made to counting the vote of three precincts in Alachua County. This vote was put in evidence by sitting Member, who nevertheless objected to it. The report says:

They are signed by all the officers of the election; they are perfect in form, clear and explicit in the statement of votes cast, and have all been adjudged by the unanimous opinion of the supreme court of Florida, in a case before it, to be good and valid returns of the election at these polls. They are by law the primary legal evidence of the votes cast and unless assailed are conclusive. The counsel for contestee, in their brief, have not assailed these returns, nor sought to impeach them upon any ground whatever. They argue that they should not be counted simply because the county canvassing board, in their first count, did not count them, and that the supreme court, under whose orders they were canvassed, had not jurisdiction to compel the board to canvass them. In answer to this it is sufficient to say that the returns, being unassailed, are conclusive evidence before this committee; and it is our duty to count them, no matter whether the supreme court of Florida had or had not jurisdiction to order them counted. The assault here made is not upon these returns, but upon the jurisdiction of the court, which we are not called upon to maintain or defend. We therefore overrule this objection to these three polls, and hold that the votes returned from them must be counted.

There is nothing in the testimony which in the least seeks to impeach the regularity of these returns.

And a certificate of election made in obedience to a writ of mandamus has the same legal force as in any other case. (McCrary on Elections, secs. 335, 345.)

Besides, the county canvassing board of Alachua County were expressly prohibited by statute from rejecting these returns, and the supreme court of Florida so held.

(4) Sitting Member averred that at Arredonda pollballots for contestant were marked by the election officers—and that the act of marking the ballots rendered them illegal and intimidated voters from voting for contestee. (Record, p. 6.)

Counsel for contestee, in their brief, have not alluded to this objection, and it is therefore fair to presume that in their judgment it could not be sustained. In their oral argument it was suggested that if the contestee was injured—that is, lost votes by reason of the marking of the ballots—the returns should be rejected, while they admitted that the marking of the ballots did not, per se, vitiate them. We are unable to find any evidence in the record that contestee was injured by numbering the ballots. He received the highest vote that any of the local candidates on his ticket received at that poll.

Two of the election officers were sworn, and their testimony is, in substance, that they numbered the ballots to correspond with the numbers opposite the names on the poll list at the request of a United States supervisor because the latter thought it was necessary to make the election legal, and they did not know to the contrary, and without any improper motives. (Record, pp. 231–233, 235–236.)

Counsel for contestee admitted before the committee, in argument, that the ballots were not marked with the design or purpose of affecting the fairness of the election to the injury of contestee. It is evident that such was not their intention. It does not appear that it was generally known among the electors that the ballots were being marked, nor is there any evidence this contestee lost a single vote by it. Only one voter is called as a witness (except the inspectors) to prove that the numbering of the ballots influenced his vote, and he testifies that it did not influence his vote. (Testimony of Aaron Huey, Record, pp. 483–484.)

It can scarcely be claimed that the evidence is sufficient to prove that the contestee was injured by the numbering of the ballots. On the other hand, the return shows that contestant ran behind his local ticket 31 votes at this poll (Record, p. 488); and Inspector Tucker, a Democrat, and sheriff of the county, testified that contestant received less votes than the local ticket. (Record, p. 233.)

We therefore conclude that the contestant has as much cause to complain of the numbering of the ballots as the contestee.

The same objection is made to one poll in Orange County by contestant, and testimony was adduced to sustain it. But we think the testimony insufficient to prove that contestant was injured, if any person, by the marking of the ballots at this poll.

In accordance with these conclusions the committee reported the following:

Resolved, That Noble A. Hull is not entitled to retain his seat as a Member of the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States as a Representative of the Second Congressional district of the State of Florida.

Resolved, That Horatio Bisbee, jr., is entitled to a seat as a Member of the Forty-sixth Congress as Representative of the Second Congressional district of the State of Florida.

The case was debated very briefly in the House on January 21 and 22, 1881,[1] and on the latter day the resolutions were agreed to without division, and Mr. Bisbee appeared and took the oath.

It may be noticed that Mr. Hull, who was unseated, was a Member of the majority party in the House, and Mr. Bisbee was a member of the minority party.

[1] Record, pp. 836, 837, 865.

953. The North Carolina election case of Yeates v. Martin, in the Forty-sixth Congress.

A true return should be counted, although delivered by an election registrar when the law specifies one of the judges.

An election being opened after the legal hour and evidence showing only half the registration as voting, the poll was rejected, although essential harm was not shown.

On January 25, 1881,[1] Mr. Emory Speer, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the North Carolina case of Yeates v. Martin.

The certificate of the secretary of state showed that sitting Member had received 51 votes more than contestant.

But the committee were unanimously of the opinion that the county convassing board had wrongfully rejected the returns of Providence Township, which gave contestant a majority of 39 votes. The majority report says:

> The action of this board seems to have been arbitrary and unjustifiable. There was no allegation of fraud or irregularity in the conduct of the election. It was not disputed that Mr. Yeates received a majority of 39 votes at this precinct, but the canvassing board for the county refused to count this return because the registrar of the election at Providence Township delivered the returns to the county canvassing board when the friends of the contestee insisted that one of the judges of the election was the proper party to deliver those returns. The judges of the election in this case appointed the registrar, who carried up the returns and delivered them conformably to law. To reject this return in this county was manifestly illegal, and the evidence shows that the contestant is entitled to have 39 votes added to his aggregate vote by the rectification of this error, this being contestant's majority in that precinct. Indeed, it is distinctly admitted by the contestee, on page 29 of his brief: "We do not regard this objection sufficient to justify the rejection of the return."

The minority views, presented by Mr. W. A. Field, of Massachusetts, give the same opinion more fully:

> Section 21, chapter 275, acts of North Carolina of 1877, is:
> "The judges of election in each township, ward, or precinct shall appoint one of their number to attend the meeting of the board of county canvassers as a member thereof and shall deliver to the member who shall have been so appointed the original returns, statement of the result of the election in such township, ward, or precinct; and it shall be the duty of the members of the several township, ward, or precinct boards of election to attend the meeting of the board of county canvassers for such election in the county in which they shall have been appointed as members thereof."
> And by section 23 a majority of the members shall be sufficient to constitute such board. While for certain purposes the registrar and judges of election act together as a board of election, yet there are certain duties which by statute pertain to the registrar alone and certain others which alone can be performed by the judges of election. If the registrar refuses or neglects to perform his duties, the justices of the peace may remove him and appoint another in his place; but if the judges of election fail to attend, the registrar shall appoint some discreet person to act as such. We think , therefore, that section 21 requires the judges of election to appoint one of their own number to attend the said meeting of the board of county canvassers and deliver the returns; that the registrar is excluded, and that a registrar could not act as one of the board of county canvassers and is not the person designated by law to deliver the original returns to such board.
> But if the returns be delivered by any person, and it be shown to be the true return, we know no reason why it should not be counted, and it is not disputed that the returns from Providence Township truly showed that Mr. Yeates had 39 votes over Mr. Martin. We think these votes should be counted for Mr. Yeates.

---

[1] Third session Forty-sixth Congress, House Report No. 123; 1 Ellsworth, p. 384.

The counting of Providence Township left to sitting Member a majority of 12 votes. The remaining questions in the case caused generally sharp divisions in the committee.

(1) The majority of the committee decided that the returns of South Mills precinct, where sitting Member received a majority of 64 votes, should be rejected, for the following reasons:

(a) Because the election was not commenced until three hours after the time fixed by law. The report says:

> McCrary on Elections lays down the general principle that if the deviation from regular hours is great, or even considerable, the presumption will be that it has affected the result, and the burden will be upon him who seeks to uphold the election to show affirmatively that it has not. Under the circumstances of this case we hold that the statute of North Carolina was so far disregarded as to vitiate the election at that precinct. The obvious purpose of the law is to give all voters an opportunity of costing their ballots. Not only were the voters of that precinct deprived of two-fifths of the time allowed them by law, but the evidence discloses the fact that only about one-half of the vote of the precinct was polled at the election, the registration of that precinct being 764 and the vote cast only 390.

The report further quotes Parson's Select Cases and Chadwick v. Melvin, from Brightley's election cases, in support of this contention. In the debate [1] Mr. Speer elaborated this question more fully. The report also advances this reasoning:

> The soundness of this rule is indisputable; otherwise the door is opened for unmeasured frauds. Suppose, for instance, in a heated election, one party should by accident be prevented from polling its heavy vote until late in the afternoon, how easy would it be for a partisan board of managers to defeat a man who otherwise would be the choice of the people. And, again, by refusing to open the polls at the time fixed by law in the forenoon of election day, and by delaying for three or four hours and systematically challenging the voters, and consuming as much time as possible with each voter, it would be easy to procrastinate, so that the hour of closing the polls should arrive and a large vote remain unpolled.

The minority say:

> When polls are closed before the hour prescribed by law, it may be that voters, without any fault of their own, are excluded from voting, because they have a right to expect that the polls will be kept open according to law; but when polls are not opened at the hour required by law, but are opened in season to give ample time to any voter to vote, and the delay has arisen from the fact that all the election officers have not attended, and some time is necessary to fill these vacancies according to law, and there has been no manifest abandonment of the attempt to hold an election, it is the duty of a voter to wait until the polls are opened. To hold otherwise would invite a minority to bring about a delay in opening the polls, in order to invalidate the election. Such laws necessarily imply that some time must be taken on election day to fill such vacancies, and the voter has no right under either the Constitution and laws of the United States or of the State to deposit his ballot immediately on reaching the polling place, and no rights of his are violated by compelling him to wait until the polls are opened in the lawful manner, provided there is time enough left for all to vote who desire to vote. No case has been shown to the committee in which a failure to open the polls at as early an hour as the law requires has been held to affect the election at such polling place. The cases all relate to closing the polls too soon. This election at South Mills ought not to be declared void on account of the delay in opening the polls. The only direct injury proved by the delay in opening the polls is: John C. Linton, pages 30, 31, testifies that he waited for the opening of the polls; that his business called him away, and he left; he would have voted for Yeates. He had heard of one other person who would have voted for Yeates if the polls had been seasonably opened. The last is hear say, which we reject. We reject Linton because he should have waited if he desired to vote.

Mr. Field elaborated this argument more fully in the debate.[2]

[2] Record, pp. 974, 975.

954. The case of Yeates v. Martin, continued.

As to what constitutes a majority of election officers competent to hold a valid election.

Election officers being sworn by an unauthorized sheriff, who was an officious intruder, the poll was rejected.

A State law forbidding a candidate to act as election officer, participation of contestee as an acting officer, was occasion of a division of opinion in the Elections Committee.

The State law forbidding a device on the ballot, the words "Republican ticket" were held sufficient to cause its rejection.

Evidence to justify counting of rejected votes should be the best, i.e., of the voters themselves.

(b) Because a quorum of the board of election officers was not present. Two judges of the four were present, and the report points out that two is not a quorum of four.

The minority say:

By section 9, chapter 275, acts of North Carolina, 1877, already quoted, the judges, with the registrar, "shall open the polls and superintend the same until the close of the election."

"Sec. 20. When the election shall be finished, the registrars and judges of election, in presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, shall open the boxes and count the ballots, etc."

The registrar and judges of election constitute a board for the purposes of opening the polls, superintending the election until the close of it, and for counting the ballots. And on general principles a majority of this board could act upon the matters on which they are authorized to act together, and the registrar and two judges are a majority of this board. Besides, if the third inspector is held to have acted under the authority of the registrar, this, so far as the rights of these persons are concerned, should be taken as an appointment, and three judges are a majority of four, even if the four judges be taken to be a board separate from the registrar.

Chapter 108, Battle's Revised Laws of North Carolina, section 2, clause 2, is:

"All words purporting to give a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons shall be construed as giving such authority to a majority of such officers or other persons, unless it shall be otherwise expressly declared in the law giving the authority."

(c) Because the election officers were not sworn.

The majority say:

The law requires that the inspectors should be sworn by some person authorized to administer an oath. They were not so sworn, but the sheriff, who was a mere intruder and who made himself extremely officious on that occasion, presumed, outside of his limited powers, to administer the oath. The returns were signed and certified by persons who really were not election officials under the laws of North Carolina, and any other citizens present had the same right with them to receive votes and certify and send up a return.

The minority admit that the officers were not properly sworn; but state that there is no evidence that any of these officers acted unfairly or improperly except in the adjournment for dinner and testimony that one judge had taken liquor. The minority views say:

The officers acting must be taken to be de facto officers. The omission to take the oath will not vitiate the election. (Sec. 79, McCrary on Elections, and cases cited.) The principle is well established that the acts of public officers being in by color of an election or appointment are valid so far as the public is concerned.

In the debate [1] the cases of Howard v. Cooper, Jackson v. Wayne, and Easton v. Scott were cited by the majority in favor of their rejection of the returns.

(d) It was objected that the board adjourned an hour for dinner, the box being given over to the charge of one of the election officers who had been imbibing spirituous liquors, and that bribery and intimidation were resorted to. The majority did not consider it necessary to consider these objections as controlling, the other objections being sufficient to justify rejection of the vote.

(2) The majority report of the committee rejected the returns of Hamilton precinct, where sitting Member received a majority of 64 votes. But only 7 Members concurred in this. Thus this view did not command a majority, the committee being 15 in number. Messrs. William G. Colerick, of Indiana, and Samuel L. Sawyer, of Missouri, who were among the 9 Members concurring in the majority report, expressly dissented from the proposition to exclude the vote of Hamilton precinct. The majority report says:

At Hamilton precinct likewise the contestee received a majority of 64 votes, and the contestant objects to the vote being counted, for the reason that the contestee acted as the registrar of the election. The law of North Carolina (Laws of 1876–77, sec. 5, p. 517) is mandatory on this subject. It declares "that no person who is a candidate for any office shall be a registrar, or judge, or inspector of an election." It is impossible for us to conceive of a provision more distinct in its terms or one which is from necessity more mandatory than this. It is conceded by the contestee in his brief that he did for a time act as registrar at this precinct. In the interest of the purity of elections, the committee are compelled to reject the vote of a precinct where a practice so reprehensible has been adopted by the claimant of this honorable and responsible office. No man should be permitted to be judge in his own case or take advantage of his own illegal act. The evidence fails to show that the conduct of Mr. Martin was justifiable, fair, and impartial while acting in this important official character; and even if it should be held that this conduct on the part of the contestee did not of itself vitiate the result of the poll at that precinct, it will be admitted that the contestee, who conducted his own election in this way, must have affirmatively shown that no illegal advantage was taken because of his action.

The minority views objected to this view:

It is not contended that Mr. Martin was appointed either registrar, or judge, or inspector of elections. So far as appears, these offices were all filled by other persons, who were present and performing their duties. Mr. Martin acted in the presence of the poll holders. Mr. Carraway was the acting registrar. Mr. Martin checked off some names on the registration book when on the side of the counter where the people came to vote, and at one time came around the counter where the judges of election were, but did not check off any names while there. Then it seems that he did not act corruptly, and that the election was fairly conducted, and that he took no part in receiving votes or keeping the poll book, and there is no evidence that any person was permitted to vote who was not entitled to vote, or, being entitled, was prevented from voting, or that any votes were improperly received or counted, or that Mr. Martin's conduct had any effect whatever upon the election. This conduct of Mr. Martin may have been an act of indiscretion, but, in the absence of any evidence that it produced any effect upon the election, we do not think that any weight should be attached to it.

(3) The committee declined to count for sitting Member 108 votes rejected at Merry Hill precinct because the words "Republican ticket" were printed on them. This portion of the majority report on this question was actually written by Mr. Field, who was also author of the minority views.[2]

The law of North Carolina provided:

The ballots shall be on white paper and may be printed or written, or partly written and partly printed, and shall be without device.

---

[1] Record, p. 1046.

[2] This appeared in the debate. Record, p. 973.

There was also the provision that any ticket which "shall have a device upon it" shall "be void."

The counsel for contestee had cited an Indiana case, Napier v. Mahew (35 Indiana, 275), to show that these votes should be counted. But the Indiana law required a ballot to be folded by the voter, and that it should be put into the box unopened. Therefore, words on the inside of a ticket specifying the party were not on the same basis with words on ballots not required to be folded. The majority report says:

> The North Carolina statute is express that the ballots shall be without device, and that if the ticket shall have a device upon it, it shall not be numbered in taking the ballots, but shall be void. This difference in the statutes renders the Indiana decisions inapplicable, and the sole question is, Are the words "Republican ticket" on the inside of a ballot a device within the meaning of the North Carolina statute? With the policy of the statute we have nothing to do; one purpose of the statute may have been to prevent bystanders from knowing from observation how the voters voted. No statute can altogether prevent this; experts can easily distinguish between different kinds of white papers, and the printing of the ballots of the opposite parties would ordinarily be done at different printing offices with different type and ink, and the arrangement of the names of the persons and of the office, the punctuation, and the place on the ticket of the printed matter would ordinarily be different and apparent to a well-trained eye. The intention of the statute could be easily evaded if it did not also prescribe the size of the ticket and the size of the type, which the North Carolina statute has not done. Still the statute, such as it is, must be enforced, even if some provisions have been omitted that are necessary completely to appreciate its intention.
> Another purpose of the statute may have been to compel, as far as is possible, the voter to select the persons he votes for independently of any contrivances on the ticket calculated to inform or misinform him of the opinions of the persons voted for, because devices are often contrived to mislead. Either way, we think that words prominently printed on a ticket and intended to designate or describe it, and which have a distinct meaning in themselves, such as, if untrue, might mislead the voter, and whether true or untrue would render the ticket easily distinguishable, must be held to be a device within the meaning of the law. (McCrary on Elections, sec. 401.) These votes were rejected by the State authorities, and we think rightfully.

The minority views do not antagonize this view, but on the floor in debate it was urged that the printing of the words "Republican ticket" on the ballots was procured fraudulently by contestant's friends, and therefore that the rejection of the ballots sustained that fraud.[1]

(4) Sitting Member claimed that 154 votes which the managers at Goose Nest precinct had declined to receive should be counted. The division of opinion as to these votes arose from the terms of the registration law, the majority taking one position on this question of fact, and the minority the opposite position.

The sitting Member had offered the testimony of one William A. Johnson, a by stander, who declared that he saw 154 ballots offered for sitting Member and rejected by the judges. The committee do not fully credit the testimony, and point out that sitting Member should have supported his case with the best evidence, which would have been the testimony of the men whose ballots were refused. So the majority declined to count the votes.

In accordance with their reasoning the majority of the committee find for contestant a majority of 156 votes, and report resolutions declaring him elected.

[1] Record, p. 1040.

The report was debated in the House on January 27 and 29, 1881.[1] On the latter day a substitute proposed by the minority and confirming the title of sitting Member was disagreed to, yeas 110, nays 117.

Then the majority resolution declaring sitting Member not elected was agreed to, yeas 117, nays 106. The resolution seating contestant was agreed to, yeas 115, nays 103.

Thereupon Mr. Yeates appeared and took the oath.

955. The Senate election case of Lapham and Miller in the Forty-seventh Congress.

A legislature is not precluded from its constitutional power to elect a Senator by the fact that it may not do so on the date fixed by law.

The fact that less than a quorum of one house of a legislature is present in the joint meeting does not prevent the election of a Senator under the act of 1866.

A quorum being actually present in a joint meeting of a legislature for election of a Senator, it is not necessary that a quorum actually vote.

Conviction under sections 1781 and 1782 of the Revised Statutes, and not merely accusation, is required to raise a question of qualification against a Senator-elect.

The allegation of mere rumors of bribery is not sufficient to cause the Senate to investigate the election of a Senator.

In 1881[2] the Senate considered the case of Elbridge G. Lapham and Warner Miller, of New York. On October 11, 1881, the day on which Messrs. Lapham and Miller took their seats, a memorial was presented remonstrating against their admission until certain allegations affecting their elections had been investigated. October 21 the memorial was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. December 12 the committee reported back the memorial and asked that it lie on the table, and that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. It was so ordered December 13. The statement of Mr. Hill, in the nature of an oral report, shows the nature of the allegations of the memorial and the reasons for the action of the committee:

> I am instructed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report back to the Senate certain memorials from members of the legislature of New York affecting the right of the present Senators from that State to occupy seats in this Chamber and to ask that the memorials lie on the table and the committee be discharged from their further consideration.
> In deference to the memorialists, and at the special request of some of them, it is proper that I should state briefly and generally the reasons which authorize this conclusion.
> The memorials set forth five reasons as grounds why these gentlemen should not be allowed to sit here. The first alleges that the legislature did not proceed in separate bodies to vote upon the question until the third Tuesday after notice of the vacancy was communicated by the governor. The facts are such as to create some controversy as to whether they did proceed on the second Tuesday or the third Tuesday after the notice; but, in any view, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that the legislature was not deprived of its constitutional right to elect Senators to this body.
> The second allegation is that at one of the joint sessions of the general assembly a quorum of the State senators was not present. It is not alleged that there was not a quorum present of each body on the days the respective elections took place, but it is alleged or claimed that under the act of 1866 the failure of either body to be present with a quorum on any day deprives the legislature of the right to elect. The committee differ with the memorialists in that view. We think that one body of the legislature could not deprive the legislature of the right to elect by such absence, if unquestionably on the day of the election a quorum of each body of the legislature was present and voting. We think the reason alleged in this ground is not sufficient to invalidate the election.

[1] Record, pp. 971, 1036–1052.

[2] Election Cases, Senate Doc. No. 11, special session Fifty-eighth Congress, p. 697; First session Forty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 70, 71.

The third ground alleged is that there was not a majority of the whole legislature actually voting for the Members chosen. In our opinion that is not necessary. There was a quorum of each house present in the joint assembly; there was a majority of that quorum actually voting for the Members chosen. In our opinion that was a valid election

It is alleged specifically in the memorial that the Stockton case is a precedent to the contrary. On examination it will be found that the Stockton case is not a precedent to the contrary. Mr. Stockton, of New Jersey, in the celebrated case so well known, was chosen, not by a majority, but he was chosen by a plurality vote, the legislature in joint session having declared before the election that a plurality should elect. The Senators now occupying the seats in question, from New York, were not chosen by a plurality vote; they were each chosen by a majority, a quorum of each body being present and a majority of the joint assembly voting. I will state that if the cases from New York were like the case from New Jersey, I do not think at this day any gentleman would regard the Stockton case as a precedent. Unquestionably the body that elects has a right to prescribe that a plurality may elect, and I think the report made by Senator Trumbull on that occasion is not only correct, but conclusive of the law of the case. The committee therefore are of the opinion that the ground is not sufficient to invalidate the election.

The fourth ground relates to Hon. W. Miller, and alleges that he is guilty of certain conduct in violation of section 1781 and section 1782 of the Revised Statutes which disqualify a Member from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States Government. It is sufficient to say that the Senator from New York has never been convicted of a violation of those sections of the Revised Statutes, and a simple inspection of the sections shows that it is conviction that disqualifies and not allegations by outsiders or third persons who do not prosecute. Therefore the committee overrule that ground and think it insufficient, conceding the facts alleged to be true for argument; we do not know anything about them.

The last ground is one of fact. Before I have alluded to what are called legal grounds or allegations that by legal operation the election is void. The last ground alleges that there were rumors of bribery in procuring the election of these gentlemen. The allegation of mere rumors of bribery is not sufficient, unaccompanied with evidence, to require investigation at the hands of the Senate or of its committees. It is alleged in this memorial that one State senator of New York is under indictment in that State for offering a bribe to a member of the house to vote in the Senatorial election. It is due to the Senators holding the seats that the committee should say that the indictment is not for a bribe offered to vote for either one of the present Senators. It is due also to state that while we find by reports that have been sent to us and investigations had that there were a great many scandals in connection with the Senatorial election in New York during the late session of the legislature, most of these scandal occurred before the two gentlemen now holding seats became even candidates before that body.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES IN 1882.

1. Cases in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. Sections 956–971.[1]

956. The Iowa election case of Cook v. Cutts in the Forty-seventh Congress.

A resolution granting further time for taking testimony in an election case was admitted as privileged.

Form of resolution providing for taking additional testimony in a case wherein contestant alleged that with due diligence he could not complete the evidence within the legal time.

A contestant desiring additional time for taking testimony presents his application by memorial.

On February 13, 1882,[2] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, to whom had been referred the Iowa contested case of Cook v. Cutts, as a question of privilege, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the contestant be granted further time to take testimony in this contest upon the following terms and conditions, namely:

First. Upon giving contestee notice of time and place and names of witnesses proposed to be examined not less than thirty days exclusive of day of service.

Second. Contestant shall then have ten days to take the testimony hereafter mentioned.

Third. Contestee shall then have fifteen days in reply.

Fourth. Contestant shall then have five days in which to take testimony in rebuttal; all periods allowed being exclusive of Sundays and holidays.

The testimony of contestant shall be confined exclusively to the examination of witnesses who may now be in possession of the books and pay rolls mentioned in contestant's subpoena duces tecum, heretofore served on W. A. McNeill, who testified on the 9th day of March, 1881, in this case as contestant's witness, and one Major Shoemake, who is mentioned in contestant's memorial as having knowledge of the same facts, which testimony has, as alleged, been discovered by him since his time expired to close his testimony, and which by the use of reasonable diligence contestant alleges he could not have ascertained in the time allowed by law.

When this testimony is taken the contestant may then take evidence tending to show for whom any illegal voter voted, which may have been disclosed by the testimony first herein allowed to be taken. All the evidence taken shall be directed and confined to the point above indicated.

This resolution was in response to a memorial of John C. Cook, the contestant, presented in the House by a Member on January 30,[1] and referred to the Committee on Elections.

957. The case of Cook v. Cutts, continued.

Report of an Elections Committee is sometimes presented by a Member belonging to the minority party in the House. (Footnote.)

Unidentified votes cast by disqualified persons were proven by testimony as to party affiliations of the persons and circumstances attending the voting.

As to validity of an answer with no proof of service except an ex parte affidavit.

On February 19, 1883,[2] Mr. F. E. Beltzhoover, of Pennsylvania,[3] presented the report of the majority of the committee, finding that contestant was entitled to the seat.

The sitting Member had been declared elected by a majority of 9 votes.

Both majority report and minority views assumed that the result of the contest really turned on the disposition of certain votes, 23 in number, alleged to have been polled at Muchikinock coal mines by colored miners who had not been in the State the six months required by the constitution of Iowa. The testimony was voluminous and somewhat conflicting. The majority of the committee felt confident that it sustained contestant's claim. The minority views, presented by Mr. William G. Thompson, of Iowa, opposed this contention.

Aside from this question of fact, the report develops the following question of law:

To prove for whom these votes were cast contestant issued subpoenas for all these men. The returns on the subpoenas show that only a very few (three) could be found. (Rec., 306, etc.) All those who appeared either under summons from contestant or as witnesses for contestee declined to disclose for whom they voted when asked by contestant; and all those who came in the May crowd refused to say whether they voted or not. (Rec., Geo. W. Lewis, 334; Jesse N. Carroll, 335; James Martin, 612; Geo. W. Lewis, 633; Hugh Lee, 643.)

It is shown generally that the men who employed these miners were favorable to Mr. Cutts; that they were brought to the polls by Republicans; that their votes were challenged by Democrats and Greenbackers (contestant's friends), and their votes urged and directed by Republicans. Republicans and men distributing Republican tickets gave them their ballots, etc. (Rec., 112, and from 326 to 391, inclusive.)

"When the voter can not, by reasonable diligence, be found, or, being found, refuses to state for whom he voted, it may be shown by circumstances. And here great latitude must be allowed." (McCrary on Elections, p. 306.)

---

[1] Journal, p. 421.

[2] Second session Forty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 1961; 2 Ellsworth, p. 243.

[3] It may be noted that Mr. Beltzhoover was a member of the minority party in the House.

By the above circumstances the contestant has shown all that can be shown in any case, that these colored miners all voted the Republican ticket, on which was contestee's name.

In addition to this it is shown by a colored man who went with the last crowd that voted at Harrison Township poll that he and another man supplied the whole lot with tickets that were voted, and that they were Republican tickets; and this is nowhere denied. (Rec., 367.) This crowd voted just before the polls closed, as shown by the poll list (Rec., 349), beginning with No. 320 and ending with No. 388. This includes James Usher, James Byers, John Clark, Wm. H. Hues, Spencer James, John W. Jackson, Andrew Lewis, G. W. Randall, Hardin White, Joseph James, and D. F. Woodard, eleven in number.

In addition to this it is shown that these illegal voters all were Republicans, and in the celebrated "New Jersey cases" it was held that this alone was sufficient to warrant the conclusion that they voted their party ticket.

It is further shown by evidence and the poll list that all the colored men from the coal mines voted together, there being two crowds brought to each poll at different times; and to illustrate the testimony on this point we take the testimony of Thomas S. Barton (Rec., 712):

"Well, they came up in a wagon, with fifteen or twenty in it, a white man driving—a Republican—whooping and hallooing, 'Hurrah for Cutts!' They would get out of the wagon, march them up to a couple of men who had tickets for them—Republican tickets. After they got their tickets they would go up to the window where they voted, and they would vote just as fast as they could be sworn in, and then they would load them up and start back with them after another load, and went through the same performance next time."

The same is shown by numerous witnesses as to all the colored men at both polls; and that when Greenback or Democratic tickets were offered they were refused.

The testimony is voluminous and uncontradicted, and no one can read it without being convinced that all the colored miners voted for contestee.

We have no hesitation in concluding that twenty-three votes should be deducted from the contestee on account of the colored vote from Muchikinock.

As to certain other votes, claimed by contestee not to have been cast by qualified electors, the report holds first:

The contestee claims that certain persons not qualified voters voted for the contestant in various parts of the district.

There is a technical objection to this claim which, under former decisions, rests upon a valid foundation.

There is in the record no answer to contestant's notice. There is on file an answer, but no proof of service except ex parte affidavit, and this shows no personal service on contestant. It has been expressly held in Follett v. Dellano and in Boyd v. Kelso that this can not be accepted as proof of service. (2 Bartlett, 121.)

958. The case of Cook v. Cutts, continued.

As to efficacy of voter's admissions to prove an illegal vote.

An unofficial recount of ballots not kept inviolate is of no force.

As to the counting of ballots found in the box for township officers and not in the Congressional box.

The House is disinclined to give force to a point raised in debate but overlooked both in the report and views of the Elections Committee.

Instance wherein a returned Member belonging to the majority party was unseated and a contestant belonging to the minority party was seated.

Assuming, however, that the above objections were waived, the report thus discussed the objections:

(1) As to some of these votes there is no proof whatever that they voted except hearsay. As to others, there is no proof for whom they voted, except the voters' admissions, which, according to McCrary and the recent case of Cessna v. Myers, is insufficient.

In nearly all of them the proof relied on by the contestee consists of some statement of the voter made in casual conversation to a witness under circumstances making them neither competent nor reliable.

But even if the evidence be accepted as competent and sufficient to prove the facts claimed, in no case would the facts thus established be sufficient to show the vote illegal.

(2) The contestee claims that two votes should be added to his and two deducted from contestant on account of error in official count in Washington Township, Appanoose County.

All the evidence upon this point is that one witness, on April 18, 1881, counted the ballots then in the box, and found this change from the official count.

There are two insurmountable objections to this: First, there is not the slightest proof that the ballots counted April 18, 1881, were those cast November 2, 1880.

Under the authorities quoted in contestant's reply brief, page 2, being McCrary on Elections, and Gooding v. Wilson, decided in 1872, and we may add the recent case of People v. Livingston, 79th New York Court of Appeals, 289, all directly in point, this must be affirmatively shown before this second count can be received as evidence.

Not only this, but it appears affirmatively that the box was exposed, and, so to speak, in the possession of a party unfriendly to contestant, and not an officer, with the key in the box, until April 16, and that before this recount he predicted accurately the change that a recount would disclose.

The ballots were counted by one individual, and not produced and publicly counted before the officer taking the deposition.

Three of the election officers appear and testify to the correctness of the official count.

In accordance with their conclusions the majority found contestant elected, and reported resolutions seating him.

The minority views found sitting Member entitled to retain his seat.

The report was debated in the House on March 2, 1883.[1] During this debate Mr. A. A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, a member of the committee concurring in the minority views, advanced the proposition that the report and views had overlooked a controlling feature of the case, viz, the counting for contestant by the precinct officers of 34 ballots found in the box for township officers, whereas they should have been deposited in the box for Congressman. Mr. Ranney pointed out that the rejection of these votes would be decisive of the case in favor of the sitting Member, and held that they should be rejected. It might be that those casting these ballots had also voted for Congressman in the congressional box, in which case there would be a double vote. The cases of Washburn v. Ripley and The People on the Relation of Michael Hayes v. George Bates (11 Michigan) were cited, as well as McCrary, to show that the ballots in the wrong box should be rejected unless it had been affirmatively proven that they were put there by mistake.

Considerable stress was laid on this point by supporters of the minority views; but the supporters of the majority report were not inclined to accept as justified by the evidence a point which had escaped notice until after the case had been made up for the House.

On March 3, 1883,[2] the resolutions of the majority, unseating Mr. Cutts and seating Mr Cook, the contestant, were agreed to by the House, yeas 154, nays 81.

Mr. Cook thereupon appeared and took the oath. It may be noted that Mr. Cutts belonged to the majority party in the House, while contestant belonged to a minority party.

959. The Mississippi election case of Lynch v. Chalmers, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

[1] Record, pp. 3638–3649.

[2] Journal, pp. 566–568.

A printer's dash separating the names was held not to be a distinguishing "device or mark" within the meaning of the State law.

The House does not consider itself necessarily bound by the construction which a State court puts on the State law regulating times, places, manner., etc.

The courts of a State have nothing to do with judging the elections, qualifications, and returns of Representatives in Congress.

Statement of the true doctrine as to construction of election laws as mandatory or directory.

Discussion as to whether State laws prescribing times, places, and manner become in effect Federal laws as to election of Congressmen.

On April 6, 1882,[1] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Mississippi case of Lynch v. Chalmers.

The vote returned by the county inspectors of election to the secretary of state showed a majority of 3,779 votes for sitting Member.

Contestants objections involved the discussion of several important and interesting questions of law:

(1) As to the form of certain ballots. The law of Mississippi provided:

SEC. 137. All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain white printing newspaper, not more than two and one-half, nor less than two and one-fourth, inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the ensure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

In Warren County 2,029 ballots were thrown out by election officers, most of them being because of the dashes in the ticket as printed:

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL TICKET.
For President,
JAMES A. GARFIELD.

For Vice-President,
Chester A. Arthur.

For Electors for President and Vice-President,
HON. WILLIAM R. SPEARS.
HON. R. W. FLOURNOY.
DR. J. M. BYNUM.
HON. J. T. STETTLE.
CAPT. M. K. MISTER, JR.
DR. R. H. MONTGOMERY.
JUDGE R. H. CUNY.
HON. CHARLES W. CLARKE.

For Member of the House of Representatives from the 6th Congressional District, JOHN R. LYNCH.

[1] First session Forty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 731; 2 Ellsworth, p. 338.

The majority of the committee find that there was no intentional violation of the law in the printing of these ballots or in the use of them. The report further says:

It is also proved that tickets precisely similar to those that are questioned in this contest, in so far as the printer's dashes are concerned, were printed and furnished to the opposing party in at least one of the counties in the Sixth Congressional district of Mississippi, and were unquestionably voted without a suspicion that they were obnoxious to the law. To further illustrate the entire good faith with which these tickets were printed and used, and how they would be regarded by practical printers, the testimony of Charles Winkley, one of contestee's witnesses, becomes very important; it is as follows:

"Cross-interrogatory 2. Are you a practical printer, and have you critically examined the "marks" so called, on the tickets of Lynch, rejected from Warren County? If so, were not these only the usual printer's dashes to be found generally in newspaper articles and upon tickets generally?

"Answer. I am a practical printer; I have not critically examined the tickets, but the dashes used are such as any printer of taste would either put in or leave out, according as he wanted to lengthen or shorten the ticket to suit the paper, or otherwise.

"Cross-interrogatory 3. If you were called upon generally to print tickets, without any special instructions, is it likely that you would have printed the tickets similar to those complained of and rejected from Warren County?

"Answer. I might or might not, just as it might have seemed to strike me at the time.

"And further deponent saith not." (Rec., p. 261.)

It further appears that printer's dashes, such as were used on the tickets in this case, are universally known among printers as punctuation marks; in fact most of the characters which appear upon these tickets are set down in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary under the head, "Marks of punctuation." It is known to the most casual reader of print that printer's dashes frequently occur in books, newspapers, and publications of all kinds, and to the common understanding to argue that they are of themselves "marks or devices" would not meet approval.

We have already found that they were not used or placed upon the tickets for the purpose of distinguishing them from any other ballots, nor as a device for that purpose, and not being of themselves devices we can not say that they are inimical to the statute. It is true that printer's dashes may be intended and used as a mark or device, and so may different kinds of type, or punctuation marks of different kinds. Arrangement of names and heading of tickets may also be made "marks and devices," and it seems to us that the reasonable interpretation of the law would be, first, in the use of these appliances, which are ordinarily used in printing, were they so arranged as that they become "marks and devices" and were they so used and arranged for that purpose and, secondly, was the unusual manner of their being used such as might or ought to put a reasonably prudent man on his guard?

This view of the law would be the extreme limit to which we think we would be justified in going under well-established principles of construction is like cases. No case has been called to our notice which goes this far.

What we have here remarked does not, of course, apply to the marks or devices ordinarily used on tickets, such as spread eagles, portraits, and the like; those would be considered "marks and devices" of themselves, and not necessary in the ordinary mechanical art of printing.

The majority further quote the California case of Kirk v. Rhoades (46 Cal., 398) to show that such small departures from the exact rule should not be allowed to defeat the will of the voter. The report dissents from the conclusion of the majority in the case of Yeates v. Martin.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Gibson Atherton, of Ohio, affirm adherence to the decision in the Yeates v. Martin case, and say:

The first and leading case on the subject of marked ballots was in Pennsylvania in the case of The Commonwealth v. Woelper (3 S. and R., 29). The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Tighlman and concurred in fully in separate opinions by Justices Yeates and Gibson, and they all held that the law should be strictly construed as written. The court said:

"The tickets in favor of those persons who succeeded in the election had on them the engraving of an eagle. The judge who tried the case charged the jury that these tickets ought not to have been counted. The case is certainly within the words of the law. The tickets had something more than the names on them. But is it within the meaning of the law? I think it is. This engraving might have several ill effects. In the first place, it might be perceived by the inspector, even when folded. This knowledge might possibly influence him in receiving or rejecting the vote. But in the next place, it deprived those persons who did not vote the German ticket of that secrecy which the election by ballot was intended to secure to them. A man who gave in a ticket without an eagle was set down as an anti-German and exposed to the animosity of the party. Another objection is that the symbols of party increase that heat which it is desirable to assuage. We see that at the election some wore eagles on their hats. The case thus falling within the words and practices of this kind leading to inconvenience, I think the court ought not exercise its ingenuity in support of these tickets. Let us at least prevent future altercations at elections by laying down such plain rules for the conduct of inspectors as can not be mistaken. I am for construing the by-law as it is written, and rejecting all tickets that have anything on them more than the names. This objection strikes at the root of the election, for the evidence is that all the tickets in favor of the defendants were stamped with an eagle. Whatever, therefore, may be the law on other points, it is clear, upon the whole, that the defendants were not duly elected."

The precise same doctrine was held in Oregon. The court says:

"Section 30, page 572, of. the Code provides that 'all ballots used at any election in this State shall be written or printed on a plain white paper without my mark or designation being placed thereon whereby the same maybe known or designated.' The voter in this instance is conclusively presumed to have had knowledge of this requirement and to have had it in his power to comply with it by using a proper ballot. It was a matter entirely under his own control, and if he chose to disregard the law, he cannot complain if the consequence was that his vote was lost." (The State v. McKinnon, 8 Oregon, 500.)

This fully sustains the Mississippi decision, even if we admit the distinction taken by the majority report that the voter is only bound to observe so much of the law as he could by the exercise of proper diligence in matters under his control. The California case cited by the majority, though it differs from the case of Perkins v. Carraway recently decided in Mississippi, as to the spaces between the names on the ticket, sustains Oglesby v. Sigman as to the marks. The court say:

"There are, however, other requirements of the Code within the power of the elector to control, and these, if willfully disregarded, should cause his ballot to be rejected. He can see, for instance, that his ballot is free from every mark, character, device, or thing that would enable anyone to distinguish it by the back, and if, in willful disregard of law, he places a name, number, or other mark on it, he cannot complain if his ballot is rejected and he loses his vote." (Kirk v. Rhoades, 46 Cal., 398.)

Also the Alabama case of Plato v. Damus was quoted; and the minority consider that a strict construction of the State law is best.

(2) But the supreme court of Mississippi had passed on the validity of these ballots; and thereby arose a question as to whether or not the House should be bound by the construction which the State court put upon the law. In the case of Oglesby v. Sigman the court held that the commissioners of election had the authority to reject the ballots in question; and that the ballots were properly rejected:

If the device or mark is external, and observed by the inspectors, they should not receive the ballot. If it is received, and on being opened is discovered to be of the kind condemned as illegal, it is not to be counted; but if the inspectors count such ballots in disregard of law and their duty the commissioners of election, assembled at the court-house, with time and opportunity afforded to scrutinize and correct, as far as may be done by the data furnished by the face of the returns, without a resort to evidence aliunde, should reject, as the inspectors should have done, ballots which the law says shall not be counted. The only safe guide as to what ballots are illegal because of devices or marks is the statute. It excludes any mark or device by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another. A distinction between ballots by means of devices or marks instead of by means of the names on them is what the statute aims to prevent, and we are not at liberty to confine the broad language of the statute to any particular description of devices or marks, for ingenuity would evade any Bach limit. The law should be enforced as written.

Two questions arose in regard to this decision:

(a) Was it an actual decision, or merely an obiter dictum.

The circumstances leading up to it were as follows:

On November 16, 1880, the contestant applied to one of the judges of the supreme court of Mississippi for an injunction to restrain the secretary of state from declaring contestee duly elected, basing the application on the allegation that certain unlawful deductions had been made from his vote. The judge declined to grant the injunction for the reason that the House of Representatives was the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members. This decision was rendered November 17.

The report further shows, as a later development:

By the Revised Code, 1880, of Mississippi, the following provision is made relative to the writ of mandamus:

"SEC. 2542. On the petition of the State by its attorney-general, or a district attorney, in any matter affecting the public interest, or on petition of any private person who is interested, the writ of mandamus shall be issued by a circuit court commanding any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, officer, or person to do or not to do an act the performance or omission of which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station, and where there is not a plain, adequate, and speedy remedy in the ordinary course of law."

Under this section the district attorney of Tunica County filed his petition in the circuit court of that county against the election commissioners to compel them to reassemble and reject 506 ballots which had been counted for the contestant, Mr. Lynch, and which were claimed to be illegal because they contained marks and devices in violation of the election laws. The petition was denied, and an appeal was taken to the supreme court of the State.

The case was submitted by counsel without brief or oral argument. In the debate attention was called to the fact that Lynch was not a party to the record and could not be heard.[1] The court passed upon the legality of the ballots, declaring that they were illegal because of the marks, and concluded:

We do not think that the commissioners of election can be required to meet and recanvass the returns of the election. Having made their canvass and declared the result, and transmitted a statement of it to the secretary of state, their connection with the returns ended. Any error committed by them is not to be corrected by requiring them to reassemble and correct it. The legality of their action may be the subject of judicial investigation in cases in which provision is made for contesting the election by an appeal to the courts of the State, but only in those cases.

The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

This case might properly have been disposed of without considering any of the questions made by the record except that last mentioned, but the attorney-general informs us from the bar that doubts exist as to the proper interpretation of the election law of 1880, and that criminal prosecutions have been instituted against the commissioners of election of some of the counties for supposed violations of the law in reference to their duties, and we have complied with his request in declaring our view of the several questions presented by the record.

[1] Speech of Mr. Calkins, Record, p. 3446.

The majority contended that the court did not have jurisdiction of the question as to the ballots, the proper persons to give it jurisdiction not being parties, and that the decision was a mere obiter dictum. The minority of the committee deny these positions:

But before proceeding to the consideration of that question we wish to dispose of two points of objection made by the majority report to the case of Oglesby v. Sigman (58 Miss. R.). They are, first, that the decision is a mere obiter dictum; and the second, that it is confessedly without jurisdiction. An obiter dictum is an expression of opinion by way of argument or illustration, and rendered without due consideration as to its full bearing and effect. To show the want of authority of an obiter dictum the majority quote from Carroll v. Carroll (16 How., 286–287).

The court say: "If the construction put by the court of a State upon one of its statutes was not a matter in judgment, if it might have been decided either way without affecting any right brought into question, then, according to the common law, an opinion on such a question is not a decision. To make it so there must have been an application of the judicial mind to the precise question to be determined to fix the rights of the parties and decide to whom the property belongs." There can be no doubt about the judicial mind being directed to the construction of the Mississippi election laws. The court say they considered them, and that they were asked to consider them. This decision is, therefore, not obiter as to the marked ballots, because it is one of the very points carefully considered and directly decided.

An obiter dictum is exactly what its term imports—a saying of the judge outside of and beyond the point decided. Therefore it can not be said that the decision of one of the very questions submitted, and to which the judicial mind was especially directed, is obiter.

But the majority say—

"First. The court declared in terms it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter embraced in the first and second grounds stated in the opinion; but the court, after remarking upon its want of jurisdiction on the first two points stated in the beginning of its opinion, and having disposed of the third on the ground that the official duties of the election officers were at an end and that they could not be reassembled, proceeded to construe the law relative to distinguishing marks, and decide what were such by the terms of the Mississippi Code so far as it could do so, the same being confessedly not before them."

This is neither legally nor historically true of this decision. The court did not anywhere admit its want of jurisdiction, nor did it, after admitting that a decision of one point in the case might have been sufficient to decide the whole case, proceed to decide the other two points first stated. Historically, it decided first the two first points, and then the third. It is a general rule that where a court has decided one point which is decisive of a case it will not decide others, but this rule is by no means universal. (See Ram on Legal Judgments, 258–259, and the cases there cited.) But it is an unheard-of proposition to say where there are several distinct and vital points in a case, and the court decides them all, the opinion is not authority except on one point, if that would have been decisive of the case.

Thousands of cases can be found where all the points presented are decided, though the decision of one might have been sufficient. The most notable instance is the case of ex parte Siebold (10 Otto).

Continuing, the minority say:

The court was called on to compel, by mandamus, the election commissioners to make right a wrong they had committed. The first thing to be settled was whether he had done any wrong. If the court had decided that the commissioners did right in counting the marked ballots, that would have ended the case, and it would have been unnecessary to go further.

The court held, however, that the commissioners did do wrong, but that it had no power to make them reassemble and right that wrong.

It might be said the court could have stopped short with this declaration, but it did not. It proceeded to show what was the proper remedy for the wrong. It said the remedy was in a contested election. That in State cases this contest must be made before State tribunals and in Congressional elections before Congress.

To claim that this election can have no weight in a contested election before Congress because the court said Congress must settle Congressional contests would lead to the conclusion that it could have no weight in a contest before a State tribunal, because it said the State tribunal must settle State contests.

This question as to the nature of the decision was also much discussed in the debate.[1]

(b) What was the binding effect on the House of the decision of the State court construing the statute of the State?

The majority report says:

It is seriously contended by the contestee that the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi construing the sections of the election laws of that State ought to be followed by Congress, and that it is against the settled doctrine of both Congress and the Federal judiciary to disregard the decisions of State tribunals in construing their own local laws. This is too broadly asserted, and can not be maintained. It is true that where a decision or a line of decisions has been made by the judiciary of the States, and those decisions have become a "rule of property," the Federal judiciary will follow them. Not to do so would continually place titles to property in jeopardy, and disturb all business transactions. The rule as to all other questions is well stated in Township of Pine Grove v. Talcott (19 Wall., 666–667), as follows:

"It is insisted that the invalidity of the statute has been determined by two judgments of the supreme court of Michigan, and that we are bound to follow these adjudications. With all respect for the eminent tribunal by which the judgments were pronounced, we must be permitted to say that they are not satisfactory to our minds. * * * The question before us belongs to the domain of general jurisprudence. In this class of cases this court is not bound by the judgment of the courts of States where the cases arise; it must hear and determine for itself."

There is still another reason why Congress should not be bound by the decisions of State tribunals with regard to election laws, unless such decisions are founded upon sound principles, and comport with reason and justice, which does not apply to the Federal judiciary, and it is this: Every State election law is by the Constitution made a Federal law where Congress has failed to enact laws on that subject, and is adopted by Congress for the purpose of the election of its own Members. To say that Congress shall be absolutely bound by State adjudications on the subject of the election of its own Members is subversive of the constitutional provision that each House shall be the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own Members, and is likewise inimical to the soundest principles of national unity. We can not safely say that it is simply the duty of this House to register the decrees of State officials relative to the election of its own Members.

The foundation of this contention is that if the Congress of the United States fails to enact election laws, and makes use of State laws for its purposes, it adopts not only the laws thus enacted, but the judicial construction of them by the State courts as well.

We do not agree that this is the rule except as it may apply to a "positive statute of the State, and the construction thereof, adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character." (Swift v. Tyson, 16 Peters, 1–18.) As to matters not local in their nature, the Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held that the decisions of the State courts were not binding upon it.

Election laws are, or may become, vital to the existence and stability of the House of Representatives, and to hold it must shut itself up in the narrow limits of investigating solely the question as to whether an election has been conducted according to State laws as interpreted by its own judiciary would be to yield at least a part of that prerogative conferred by the Constitution exclusively on the House itself.

It may be stated generally that the House of Representatives will, as a general rule, follow the interpretation given to a State law regulating a Congressional election by the supreme court of a State, where decisions have been continued and uniform in such a way and for such time as to become the fixed and settled law of a State. The processes of determining the election and all questions relating to the honesty and bona fides of ascertaining who received the highest number of legal votes must of necessity forever reside exclusively in the House.

Where decisions have been made for a sufficient length of time by State tribunals construing election laws so that it may be presumed that the people of the State knew what such interpretations were would furnish another good reason why Congress should adopt them in Congressional election cases. But this reason would be of little weight when the election had been held in good faith before such judicial construction had been made, and where there was a conflict of opinion respecting the true interpretation of a statute for the first time on trial.

There is still another cogent reason why this House may, and perhaps should, disregard the decisions of State courts when such decisions are made in cases where there is confessedly no jurisdiction in the court to pass upon the question which it assumes to pass upon, or where the court assumes to pass upon questions not properly involved in the case before it.

We can not express in better language the effect which obiter dictum in judicial opinions should have on future decisions than that employed by Mr. Justice Curtis in Carroll v Carroll (16 How., 279–287). After considering the maxim at common law of stare decisis, the learned judge proceeds to discuss the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act in connection with the maxim, and then says:

"And therefore this court, and other courts organized under the common law, has never felt itself bound by any part of an opinion in any case which was not needful to the ascertainment of the right or title in question between the parties."

Citing some cases, he continues:

"And Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said: 'It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used.' If they go beyond the case they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its full extent; other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in their relations to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated. The cases of Ex parte Christy (3 How., 292) and Jenness et al. v. Peck (7 How., 612) are in illustration of the rule that any opinion given here or elsewhere can not be relied on as binding authority unless the case called for its expression. Its weight of reason must depend on what it contains."

There is abundance of authority running through all the reports of the judicial opinions of the various States, and also through the reports of the Supreme Court opinions of the United States, that they will not be bound by the obiter of their own decisions, much less that of other courts. And where there is a conflict in the decisions of a State supreme court, other State courts and the Supreme Court of the United States will adopt, not the later, but that line of decisions which best speaks the reason and common sense of the proposition elucidated, except in those cases purely local, as pointed out in Swift v. Tyson, supra.

Another suggestion in argument needs greater amplification than we can give it now, which is: That by adopting the machinery of the States to carry on Congressional elections this House stands in the nature of an appellate court to interpret these election laws so far as they relate to Congressional elections; that it ought not in this view to be bound by the decisions of the State courts at all, unless the reasons given by them are convincing to the judicial mind of the House while acting in the capacity of a court.

It need, however, hardly be added that a line of carefully considered cases in the States, in which such courts have undoubted jurisdiction, so far as they would apply in principle, would go a long way toward settling a disputed point of construction in any State election law. In fact it may be said that it would probably be the duty of Congress to follow the settled doctrine thus established.

It now becomes necessary to review the opinion of the supreme court of Mississippi in Oglesby v. Sigiman. As will be seen by an examination of the case it was a mandamus proceeding, under a section of the Mississippi Code, to compel the commissioners of election in Tunica County to reassemble and recount the votes cast in that county on the 2d day of November, 1880, for Member of Congress in the Sixth Congressional district of Mississippi. The allegations, substantially, are that the election commissioners counted 506 ballots for the contestant in this case, Mr. Lynch, which had upon them marks and devices, and which were illegal under the provisions of sections 137, 138, 139, and 140 of the Mississippi Code, and ought to have been rejected instead of being counted as they were. A fac simile of the ballots challenged is set out on the record, and on the ticket is found certain printers' dashes which are similar to those challenged in the pending contest, and which are the distinguishing marks complained of. The Oglesby-Sigiman case "was submitted by counsel without brief or oral argument," as we are informed by the contestee's brief. The judge who delivered the principal opinion in this case closes the opinion of the court with this remark:

"The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

"The case might properly have been disposed of without considering any of the questions made by the record except that last mentioned, but the attorney-general informed us from the bar that doubts exist as to the proper interpretation of the election law of 1880, and that criminal prosecutions have been instituted against the commissioners of election of some of the counties for supposed violations of the law in reference to their duties, and we have complied with his request in declaring our view of the several questions presented by the record."

The point, as remarked by the judge, on which the case might have been disposed of, was as to whether the official life of the election commissioners was functus officio, and they were therefore incapable of being brought together to perform official duties; which being determined in the affirmative, the court had nothing to do but to dismiss the petition, as it did when it refused to entertain a petition on behalf of Mr. Lynch, made on the 9th day of December, 1880, to prevent the governor of the State from issuing to the contestee a certificate of election as Member of Congress from the Sixth Congressional district of Mississippi, on the ground that it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

Had the Mississippi supreme court stopped here the question of how far the decision of State courts in construing their own election laws ought to bind this House would be free from embarrassment; but the court, after remarking upon its want of jurisdiction on the first two points, stated in the beginning of its opinion, and having disposed of the third on the ground that the official duties of the election officers were at an end and that they could not be reassembled, proceeded to construe the law relative to distinguishing marks, and decide what were such by the terms of the Mississippi Code so fax as it could do so, the same being confessedly not before it.

It is sufficient to say that if the argument sustaining the conclusions reached by the Mississippi court met our views of the true construction of the law, a further analysis of the opinion would be unnecessary, but, as we can not agree with the argument or the conclusion of the court, it becomes necessary to give some of the reasons why we do not concur and why we do not feel bound by it.

First. The court declared in terms it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter embraced in the first and second grounds stated in the opinion. The third ground does not involve a construction of the law, and of course can not be considered in determining the question raised in the pending contest.

It is with great hesitation and reluctance that we feel compelled to disagree with the eminent gentleman who concurred in the opinion, and we do so in no spirit of unjust criticism, for we would much prefer to follow rather than dissent from it. Had the opinion been rendered before the election of 1880, or become one of settled law of Mississippi, we do not say but that it would have such weight with us that, though we might disagree with it in logic, we might feel compelled to follow it. We think that the decision is against the current of authority and contrary to the well-settled doctrine heretofore discussed; that it can be regarded as obiter dictum merely, and as the opinion of eminent gentlemen learned in the law, but not as a judicial construction of the code. It may happen, should the supreme court of Mississippi adhere in the future to the reasons advanced in this case, in cases where it has jurisdiction, that this House will adopt them; but until the happening of this event we can not say that the reasons given in the Oglesby-Sigiman case are controlling.

The general doctrine in construing election statutes is that they are to be construed liberally as to the elector and strictly as to the officers who have duties to perform under them. A statute directing certain things to be done by election officers ought to be followed by them with a high degree of strictness, but duties to be performed by the electors, as declared by statute, are directions merely, which, if not observed, it is true, may in some instances defeat his ballot; but when there is an honest intention to obey the law, and the voter is not put in fault by any laches or negligence which he, by the use of reasonable diligence, might or could avoid, or where there is no palpable intention of violating the law apparent, in order to maintain the inestimable right of voting, courts have generally adopted the most liberal construction.

In an almost unbroken line of precedents, from the foundation of the Government, in all the States this rule has been declared. (McCrary on Elections, sec. 403; Kirk v. Rhoades, 46 Cal., 398; Prince

v. Skillen, 71 Me., 493; People v. Kilduff, 15 Ill., 492; Millholland v. Bryant, 39 Ind., 653; The State ex rel. v. Adams, 65 Ind., 393; Pradut v. Ramsey (5 Morris), 47 Miss., 24, and many other cases not necessary to cite.)

In the debate Mr. Calkins, who drew the report, said:

While I am a Member of this House, whether short or long, wherever the State courts have construed their election laws so that they have become a part of the system of election laws in a State, I will follow them * * * even though I can not agree to the reasoning.

The minority views thus discuss this phase of the case:

If any rule of law can ever be regarded as settled, certainly the rule that Federal authorities would follow the construction of State statutes by State courts must be regarded as settled by a long line of able and unbroken decisions. The only exceptions made to this rule by the Supreme Court of the United States are where the State courts have made conflicting decisions, as in the case of the City of Dubuque, (1 Wall., 175), or in cases arising under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act.

From the time of the case of Shelby v. Gray (in 11 Wheaton, 361), through Green v. Neal (6 Peters, 291), Christy v. Pritchett (4 Wallace, 201), Tioga Railroad v. Blossburg Railroad (20 Wallace, 137), down to Elmwood v. Macey (2 Otto, 289), an unbroken line of decisions will be found.

The court say, in the case of Green v. Neal:

"The decision of this question by the highest tribunal of a State should be considered as final by this court, not because the State tribunal, in such a case, has any power to bind this court, but because a fixed and received construction by a State in its own court makes it part of the State law."

In the case of the Tioga Railroad Company v. The Blossburg Railroad (in 20 Wallace, 143) the court uses the following language:

"These decisions upon the construction of the statute are binding upon us, whatever we may think of their soundness on general principles.

"See Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly (1 Black, 443); Gut v. The State (9 Wallace, 37); Randall v. Brigham (7 Wallace, 541); Secomb v. Railroad Company (23 Wallace, 117); Polk's Lessee v. Wendell (9 Cranch, 98); and Nesmith v. Sheldon (7 Howard, 818). Numerous other adjudications of that court could be cited to the same effect."

It is now maintained that this doctrine applies only as a rule of property. The only excuse for this new idea to be found in the decisions in the Supreme Court is where the court say they will not follow the last decision of a State court changing the construction of its laws after the first decision has become a rule of property; otherwise the Supreme Court of the United States would follow the new construction given by the State court. To say that the Supreme Court of the United States will only follow a State court "on a rule of property" is a total misconception of the principle announced by the court. But whatever may be the rule in the Supreme Court of the United States, Congress has in every case, without exception, followed this rule, and in the Tennessee cases in the Forty-second Congress, and the Iowa cases in the Forty-sixth Congress, extended the rule to following the construction of the State laws given by the governor of a State. The same rule was followed, and on the question of marked ballots, in case of Neff v. Shank in the Forty-third Congress and Yeates v. Martin in the Forty-sixth Congress. The game rule was followed in Bisbee v. Hull, and the doctrine broadly laid down as correct in Boynton v. Loring in the same Congress. We cite the Language of the committee in these cases.

This rule was first established in the Forty-second Congress in what is called the Tennessee cases, when the report was made by the Ron. G. W. McCrary:

"In a report from the Committee on Elections, adopted by this House April 11, 1871, in the matter of the Tennessee election (Digest of Election Cases, compiled by J. M. Smith, p. 1), the committee say:

"'It is a well-established and most salutary rule that where the proper authorities of the State government have given a construction to their own constitution or statutes that construction will be followed by the Federal authorities. This rule is absolutely necessary to the harmonious working of our complex government, State and national, and your committee are not disposed to be the first to depart from it.'"

This decision was cited with approbation in the Forty-sixth Congress in the Iowa cases, and in the report on these cases, signed by Messrs Field, Keifer, Calkins, Camp, Weaver, and Overton, they say:

"We are not disposed to be the first to depart from it, and we certainly think that such a decision, made in good faith and acquiesced in at the time by the people of the State, and followed by a full and fair election, should not be overthrown or questioned, except for the gravest reasons, founded on an undoubting conviction that it was plainly an error, and that the error had worked some substantial injury."

In the same case Mr. Beltzhoover says:

"2. The question whether the constitution of the State of Iowa 'must be amended in order to effect a change in the election of State officers,' is one which it is the exclusive right of the State to decide. The persons to whom the constitution and laws of Iowa confide this decision have made it, and their determination is a finality and is conclusive on all parties. The committee have not the right to review the decision."

The case of Curtin v. Yocum, in the Forty-sixth Congress, turned upon the construction of the constitution of Pennsylvania, and the minority report, which was made by Mr. Calkins and signed by Messrs Keifer and Weaver, relied upon the construction of the State court, and used this emphatic Language, speaking of an unregistered voter:

"We think this question, under the present constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, not an open one. The highest court of judicature of the State has decided it; at least, it has given a construction to that part of the new constitution under consideration, and we quote therefrom."

This minority report was adopted by Congress, and a Greenbacker was permitted to retain his seat in a Democratic House.

In the case of Bisbee v. Hull, in the Forty-sixth Congress, the decision of the supreme court of Florida was held to be conclusive by the committee and the House. When the admission of Mr. Hull, who held the governor's certificate, was under discussion, Mr. Calkins said:

"How can this certificate stand, even as establishing a prima fade right, when the basis upon which it rests has been swept away by a decision of the supreme court of the State of Florida?"

When the case was considered on its merits, the committee unanimously followed the decision of the supreme court of Florida, and a Democratic House unseated a Democrat and seated a Republican under it.

The report made by Mr. Keifer uses this emphatic language:

"The opinion of the supreme court of Florida, pronounced by the chief justice, on the question of canvassing the vote of the county of Madison, will be found in the Record, page 221.

"* * * 'As already stated, duly certified copies of these returns were put in evidence by the contestee; they are signed by all the officers of the election; they are perfect in form, clear and explicit in the statement of the votes cast, and have all been adjudged by the unanimous opinion of the supreme court of Florida, in a case before it, to be good and valid returns of the election at these polls.'" (17 Florida Rep., p. 17.)

Again, in the case of Boyntonv v. Loring, the report, which was prepared by Mr. Calkins, and signed by every member of the committee except Mr. Weaver, contains this clear and explicit announcement of the doctrine we contend for. It says:

"But it is not necessary for us to decide this question, and we do not, much preferring that the courts of Massachusetts shall first construe their own statutes, and when they have undergone judicial construction we would follow the decisions of the courts of that State."

The Committee on Elections is as much a continuing body in contemplation of law as a court, and should have as much respect for its own rulings as a court has for its decisions, and "stare decisis" should be our rule. Under the rule that Federal authorities follow the construction given by State authorities to their own statutes, two Tennessee Republicans were seated in the Forty-second Congress; Shanks, a Republican, was seated in the Forty-third Congress; Yocum, a Greenbacker; Bisbee, from Florida, and three Republicans from Iowa were seated in the Forty-sixth Congress. To undertake now to change this rule or limit it to a rule of property, may subject us to the same severe rebuke for oscillation administered to a State court by the Supreme Court of the United States. To say in one Congress we will follow the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts in construing its statute when made, and in the next Congress refuse to extend the same rule to the supreme court of Mississippi, is glaring inconsistency or invidious distinction between States. If we have respect for ourselves, we should make no radical change of ruling that may subject us to the charge that we "immolate truth, justice, and law because party has erected the altar and decreed the sacrifice."

LIMITATIONS ON THE RULE.

But while the majority of the committee have expressed some views looking to a change in this rule, said to be essential to the preservation of our complex system of government, they do not go to that extent. They say:

"It need, however, hardly be added that a line of carefully considered cases in the States, in which such courts have undoubted jurisdiction, so far as they would apply in principle, would go a long way toward settling a disputed point of construction in any State election law. In fact, it may be said that it would probably be the duty of Congress to follow the settled doctrine thus established."

We have here two new limitations on the old rule. First, it must not be a single decision, but "a line of carefully considered cases." Second, the court must, in the opinion of Congress, when collaterally considering the subject, have had jurisdiction of the case. It is a new and somewhat startling proposition that the opinion of a supreme court is not to be considered authority until it has been repeated. If the citizens of a State acquiesce in a decision of their own supreme court it may and often does happen that the court is not called on to reaffirm its opinion, because no one doubts or disputes its first ruling on the subject, and yet Congress is now asked not to regard as authority anything less than a line of well-considered cases.

DO STATE LAWS BECOME FEDERAL LAWS?

Again, the majority report says:

"Another suggestion in argument needs greater amplification than we can give it now, which is, that by adopting the machinery of the States to carry on Congressional elections this House stands in the nature of an appellate court to interpret these election laws so far as they relate to Congressional elections; that it ought not in this view to be bound by the decisions of the State courts at all, unless the reasons given by them are convincing to the judicial mind of the House while acting in the capacity of a court."

The suggestion made in argument was that the State election laws became Federal laws when Congressmen were elected under them, and therefore Congress had the same right to review the decision of a State court in construction of these laws that the Supreme Court of the United States had to review the decision of a State court on any question arising under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act. This was an ingenious suggestion, but it is completely refuted by the Supreme Court of the United States in ex parte Siebold (10 Otto). The court say, "The objection that the laws and regulations, the violation of which is made punishable by the act of Congress, are State laws and have not been adopted by Congress, is no sufficient answer to the power of Congress to impose punishment. It is true that Congress has not deemed it necessary to interfere with the duties of the ordinary officers of election, but has been content to leave them as prescribed by State laws." Again, "the paramount character of those made by Congress has the effect to supersede those made by the State, so far as the two are inconsistent, and no further." The great question in this case was whether Congress could make a law to punish a man for the violation of State election laws in Congressional elections, and the able opinion of the court would have been wholly unnecessary if the new theory now advanced were true, that the State laws become Federal laws simply because Congressmen are elected under them. Such an idea is wholly repugnant to the Constitution, which expressly provides that the States may make laws for the election of Congressmen while Congress may make, alter, or amend them.

The debate on this branch of the case was especially well considered and occupied a large share of the attention of the House.[1] 960. The election case of Lynch v. Chalmers, continued.

Although an uncertified return was rejected by the State canvassers the House counted it, sitting Member not having denied in his answer that the vote was cast as claimed by contestant.

Neither the House nor the Elections Committee is bound by the technical rules of the courts as to the admission of evidence.

[1] Especial notice should be taken of speeches by Messrs. Robson, Carlisle, and Calkins. Record, pp. 3427, 3433, 3442.

Certificates of canvassing officers, supplemented by certified transcripts by a chancery clerk, were held prima facie evidence of the votes at a poll whereof the primary returns were rejected.

Reference to a discussion of the return of United States supervisors as evidence of the vote cast.

(3) The commissioners of election of Bolivar County sent to the secretary of state a report in obedience to the following statute:

SEC. 140. The commissioners of election shall, within ten days after the election, transmit to the secretary of state, to be filed in his office, a statement of the whole number of votes given in their county for each candidate voted for for any office at such election, etc.

This return, which was duly signed by the three commissioners, gave Lynch 979 votes and Chalmers 301:

The following statement accompanied the foregoing returns:

"ROSEDALE, BOLIVAR CO., MISS.,
"November 4, 1880.

"TO HON. HENRY MYERS,

"Secretary of State, Jackson, Miss.:

"DEAR SIR: We have this day duly met and canvassed the returns of this county and complied with the law in every respect, as we construed the same after duly consulting the best legal authority in the county, and we now inclose to you our certified report of the same. We have thrown out the Australia precinct box, 30 Democratic and 192 Republican votes, because the returns were not certified to by the inspectors or the clerks. We have thrown out Holmes Lake precinct, because the box was not opened nor the ballots counted by the inspectors and numbered by the clerks and no returns nor tally sheet made. We have thrown out the Bolivar precinct, 45 Democratic and 311 Republican votes, because there was no certified return from the inspectors and clerks. The tally sheets sent in the box show the names of the electors of the Democratic and Republican parties of James R. Chalmers, John R. Lynch, G. B. Lancaster, M. Roland, James Winters, Fleming, and James White, but does not show for what office they were voted for. The tally is kept on four different sheets of paper. The total can only be guessed at and not ascertained correctly. We have rejected the Glencoe precinct vote—27 Democratic, 233 Republican votes—because the vote was counted out in part by all the inspectors and clerks and then discontinued until next day, when the count was finished by one inspector and one clerk and a very imperfect tally sheet and return sent in by those two not certified to.

"JNO. H. JARNAGIN,
"RILEY ROLLINS,
"W. A. YERGER,
"Commissioners of Election."

The majority of the committee determined to count the rejected vote of Australia and Bolivar precincts on the strength of the statement made by the commissioners, saying:

This duty being enjoined by statute, their certificate is evidence of the fact that the number of votes which they certify were given.

The minority assail this action of the majority:

But to accomplish even this reduction of the proper majority of Chalmers the votes claimed by contestant in Bolivar County at Australia and Bolivar precincts are counted. The returns of these precincts were rejected by the commissioners of election because they were not certified to. In other words, the commissioners had no legal evidence that the ballots returned in these boxes were ever cast by voters. They might have been stuffed in by anyone on the road from the precinct to the court-house. That returns not certified to can never be counted is stated by every writer on election cases.

After quoting McCrary the minority continue:

The majority of the committee do not deny this principle of law, but they contend that the votes, though rejected by the commissioners for a lawful reason, must now be counted, because the commissioners in their certificate to the secretary of state show how many votes were rejected.

"Under section 138 of the Mississippi code the inspectors of elections are required to send up to the commissioners the whole number of votes cast at the poll, and the commissioners, under section 140 of the code, are required to 'transmit to the secretary of state, to be filed in his office, a statement of the whole number of votes given in their county for each candidate.'

"This duty being enjoined by statute, their certificate is evidence of the fact that the number of votes which they certify were given."

The majority are mistaken in this statement of the duty of the inspectors under the law of Mississippi. Their duty under section 138 is not "to send up to the commissioners the whole number of votes cast," but "a statement of the whole number of votes," etc.; and by section 139 it is required that the statement shall be certified as correct by both the inspectors and their clerks. (See secs. 138 and 139, above set out.)

Now, it is clear that the certificate is essential to identify and make certain the return and that without the certificate it is no legal return and can not be counted or considered as evidence in any way.

Without the certificate the commissioners, who know nothing of their own knowledge as to the election, can certainly make no statement of the votes that would import verity as to the result.

The minority further say:

If these commissioners had undertaken to count and to transmit to the secretary of state a statement of votes not certified by the inspectors to them, this would have been clearly illegal, and yet when the commissioners of Bolivar County refused to receive and count returns not certified to them, and in the appendix to their statement to the secretary of state stated that they had rejected these votes because not certified, Congress is asked to count them without any other proof that they are good and valid votes except the appended statement of the commissioners as to the number of votes rejected and for whom they purported to be cast.

In the debate on the floor [1] Mr. Calkins called attention to the fact that in the case of Bolivar precinct—against which strong arguments had been directed by Mr. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky [2]—the election was admitted on both sides to have been peaceable, orderly, and quiet; the officers counted the votes and sent the count, together with the tally lists and all the papers and ballots, to the commissioners, as the law required. But the returns were thrown out because the certificate of the result was not made by the election officers. The sitting Member, who had made the statement of the vote a part of his answer, did not deny that the vote was cast as claimed by contestant. It was true that the statement of the commissioners merely said that so many Republican and so many Democratic votes were rejected; but as Lynch was the only Republican candidate for Congress and Chalmers the only Democratic candidate for that office, it was presumable that these tickets contained each all the candidates of the party. Mr. Calkins admitted that the proof as to what votes Lynch got and what Chalmers got was not the best proof, but it stood uncontradicted. If not true, the other party could have shown its falsity. The friends of contestee had launched their whole argument against the machinery, not against the immutable facts.

(4) As to a precinct in Issaquena County, Hays Landing, a question arose which the minority views state thus:

Will Congress receive and count votes of which there is no evidence except the certificate of a chancery clerk as to what purports to be a transcript of election returns of record in his office, when there is no law in Mississippi authorizing any record to be made of election returns by any officer and when neither the chancery nor circuit clerk nor any other officer in Mississippi is by law made the custodian of the election returns after they have been counted by the commissioners of election?

[1] Record, p. 3444.

[2] Record, p. 3435.

The majority in their report say of Issaquena County:

There are two statements in the record, which, taken together, enable us with reasonable certainty to arrive at the vote cast in three of the four rejected precincts of this county. The first is the certificates of election made by the commissioners of election to the secretary of state, and found on page 17 of the record.

HAYS LANDING.

They say with regard to this poll that they find 75 votes reported by the election officers; on four of the ballots all the names are scratched off, and they reject the poll because there was no separate list of voters kept. At page 89 of the record, Richard Griggs, clerk of the chancery court for Issaquena County, certifies, under the seal of said court, that the paper appearing on that page of the record is a true and correct transcript of the election returns made by the election officers as appears of record in his office, by which it appears Lynch received 34 votes and Chalmers 29 votes for Member of Congress. The commissioners of election for that county certify to the secretary of state that they rejected this precinct return, and the clerk of the court certifies that that return is on file in his office, a copy of which he gives. The two statements taken together are prima facie evidence of the vote received at that poll. The highest number of votes appearing on the tally list as certified by the clerk agrees with the number the commissioners say were returned from that poll. The commissioners are authorized by law to certify as a fact the number of votes cast; and the clerk of the court is authorized by law, as the keeper of public records, to give certified transcripts thereof.

For the reasons given in reference to Hays Landing precinct, we also count Ben Lomond and Duncansby precincts, by reference to which it will be seen that Lynch's vote was 332 and Chalmers's 20 in the former (Record, pp. 17 and 90), and 371 for Lynch and for Chalmers 45 in the latter.

The minority say:

Now, it is clear that the certificate of the commissioners to the secretary of state is not of itself sufficient to prove the votes rejected in this county, and the majority do not so pretend. It is equally clear that the certificate of the chancery clerk, if it was evidence for any purpose, would fully prove the vote by itself without any aid from the certificate of the commissioners, but the majority do not claim this for that certificate. But because the number of votes stated by the commissioner to have been rejected corresponds with the pretended certificate of the clerk we are asked to receive this as corroborating evidence. But in order to reach this conclusion the majority say that "the clerk of the court is authorized by law, as the keeper of public records, to give certified transcripts thereof." That is true when the clerk is "keeper of the record," but the election returns form no part of any public records in Mississippi, and therefore neither the chancery clerk nor any other officer is the keeper of election returns after they have been counted, and can give no certified transcripts thereof.

The law of Mississippi provided:

SEC. 105. The books of registration of the electors of the several election districts in each county and the poll books as heretofore made out shall be delivered by the county board of registration in each county, if not already done, to the clerk of the circuit court of the county, who shall carefully preserve them as records of his office, and the poll books shall be delivered in time for every election to the commissioners of election, and after the election shall be returned to said clerk.

After quoting the law the minority say:

From this it will be seen that neither the circuit clerk nor chancery clerk is the keeper of any public record which contains election returns, and that the certificate of Griggs in this case is a nullity. The law on that subject is as follows:

The law is well settled that statute certifying officers can only make their certificates evidence of the facts of which the statute requires them to certify, and when they undertake to go beyond this and certify other facts they are unofficial and no more evidence than the statement of an unofficial person. (Swetzler v. Anderson, 2 Bartlett, 374.) This rule of course applies to election returns and to all certificates which are by law required to be made by officers of election, or of registration, or by returning officers. They can only certify to such facts as the law requires them to certify." (Am. Law of Elections, sec. 104.)

In the United States district court, in the case of the United States v. Souder, it was held:

"In New Jersey a copy of the return of the township election filed with the clerk of the county and sent to the office of the secretary of state, accompanied by the clerk's certificate that it is a full and perfect return of said election as filed in his office, is not so made and certified and does not come from such a source as to constitute it an official paper." (2 Abbott, C. C. Rep., 456; 1 Greenleaf, sec. 498, "Certificates.")

In regard to certificates given by persons in official station, the general rule is that the law never allows a certificate of a mere matter of fact, not coupled with any matter of law, to be admitted as evidence. (Willes, 549, 550, per Willes, Ld. Ch. Justice.)

If the person was bound to record the fact, then the proper evidence is a copy of the record duly authenticated.

But as to matters which he was not bound to record, his certificate, being extra official, is merely the statement of a private person, and will therefore be rejected. (Oakes v. Hill, 14 Pick., 442, 448; Wolfe v. Washburn, 6 Cowen, 261; Jackson v. Miller, 6 Cowen, 751; Governor v. McAffee, 2, Dev., 15, 18; United States v. Buford, 3 Peters, 12, 29; Childers v. Cutter, 16 Miss., 24.)

In the debate Mr. Calkins [1] displayed an executive document of Mississippi to show that in this case the offices of circuit clerk and chancery clerk were held by the same person. This also was admitted by the minority. He held that under the law the ballot boxes came into the office of this clerk, citing a section of law not quoted in the minority views. The circuit clerk, being the legal custodian of the papers, could certify them.

At the beginning of his speech, evidently with this question in mind, Mr. Calkins had said: [2]

Neither this House nor its Committee on Elections is or ever has been bound by the technical rules of the admission of evidence such as is applied in the courts. I announce this as a principle settled in the early Congresses, followed all the way down, and acted upon not only by the present Committee on Elections but by every one that has preceded it.

He then referred to the cases of Donnelly v. Washburn and Vallandigham v. Campbell, especially noticing the remarks of Mr. L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, in that case.

(5) There was a question of fact as to Kingston precinct, in Adams County, over which there was some division.

In accordance with the above conclusions the majority of the committee found that Lynch had a majority of 385 votes, made up as follows:

The corrected vote of the parties will stand thus:

	Lynch.	Chalmers.
Returned vote	5,393	9,172
Add rejected votes:
Warren County	2,029	20
Deadmans Bend	85	15
Palestine	231	17
Australia	192	30
Bolivar	311	45
Hay's Landing	39	24
Ben Lomond	332	20
Duncansby	371	45
Rodney	247	92
Stoneville	315	60
	9,545	9,540
From which we deduct	.....	190
And add that number to Lynch's vote to correct the returns in Kingston precinct, Adams County	190	.....
Which makes total	9,735	9,350
Majority for Lynch	385	.....

[1] Record, p. 3445. Also Mr. Carlisle in opposition, p. 3436.

[2] Record, p. 3443.

Both the majority and minority discussed the effect of the returns of United States supervisors of election as evidence, but the decision of this was not considered essential.

In accordance with their conclusions the majority reported resolutions seating contestant.

The report was debated at length on April 26 to 29[1] and on the latter day[2] the question recurred on the first resolution of the majority, declaring sitting Member not elected.

As a substitute for this a resolution declaring contestant not elected was offered and disagreed to, yeas 104, nays 125.

Then the first resolution was agreed to, yeas 125, nays 71.

Then the second resolution of the majority, declaring contestant elected, was agreed to, yeas 124, nays 84.

Thereupon Mr. Lynch appeared and took the oath.

961. The Alabama election case of Lowe v. Wheeler in the Forty-seventh Congress.

A numbering of districts placed unnecessarily before names of candidates for Presidential electors was not held to be such distinguishing mark as to vitiate the ballot as to Congressman.

As to whether a distinguishing mark as to candidates for one office on a ballot invalidates the ballot as to other offices.

Reference to the Federal statute as to voting by ballot in its relation to State laws prescribing time, place, and manner.

On May 17, 1882,[3] Mr. George C. Hazleton, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Alabama case of Lowe v. Wheeler.

Upon the face of the official returns Mr. Wheeler had been declared elected by 43 majority, and received the certificate of election. The majority report thus sets forth the salient points of the case:

It is conceded that a much greater number of votes were received for Lowe than appears upon said certificate of the secretary of state, and it is practically admitted that if all the votes cast and received for Lowe had been counted and returned by the inspectors of the election the result would have shown the election of Mr. Lowe by a large majority.

As the case is presented to the committee, two leading and controlling questions arise for consideration and determination: First, as to the proper and legal form of the ballot; and, second, as to registration. The evidence discloses that in order to declare Mr. Wheeler elected by 43 majority the inspectors of the election at 14 out of nearly 200 precincts in said district had to reject and did reject in the count 601 ballots cast for the contestant.

The number of ballots so rejected is assumed in the arguments of contestee's counsel at about 515.

Several questions are discussed at length, both by majority and minority.

(1) As to the form of ballot.

The law of Alabama provided:

The ballot must be a plain piece of white paper, without any figures, marks, rulings, characters, or embellishments thereon, not less than 2 nor more than 2½ inches wide, and not less than 5 nor more than 7 inches long, on which must be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, only the names of the persons for whom the elector intends to vote, and must designate the office for which each person so named is intended by him to be chosen; and any ballot otherwise than described is illegal, and must be rejected.

Certain ballots were cast in this form:

FOR ELECTORS FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT:
State at large.
JAMES M. PICKENS.
OLIVER S. BEERS.
District electors.
1st District—C. C. MCCALL.
2d District—J. B. TOWNSEND.
3d District—A. B. GRIFFIN.
4th District—HILLIARD M. JUDGE.
5th District—THEODORE NUNN.
6th District—J. B. SHIELDS.
7th District—H. R. MCCOY.
8th Distfict—JAMES H. COWAN.
For Congress—Eighth district.
WILLIAM M. LOWE

These ballots were rejected, and the majority contend that they should be counted:

The contestee in this case insists that the expressions "1st district," "2d district," which appear on said ballot, do of themselves render the ballots illegal under said section 274, as amended.

This statute provides that the "ballot must be a plain piece of white paper, without any figures, marks, rulings, or embellishments thereon." We are unable to conceive how this form of ballot infringes upon either the letter or spirit of the statute. If we are to adopt the narrow and strained construction of this statute presented by the contestee, then we must assume that the legislature of Alabama intended to impair and destroy the integrity of the legal voting power of the State instead of securing it in its proper rights, because it would be impossible to prepare a ballot that would stand the test of such a construction and that could not be rejected at the caprice of a party inspector of elections for a reason as valid and strong as that presented in this case. Such a construction means simply disfranchisement of the citizen, and makes the law itself a fraud upon the freeman's boasted right of franchise. We quote with favor the following extract from the contestant's brief on this point:

"Does the use of the numerals or figures 1st, 2d, etc., make the ballot illegal? The intention of the statute is to be looked for before construing it. The word 'figures' must be construed in connection with the words 'marks, rulings, characters, embellishments.' If a construction so literal as that suggested by this objection be given this statute, no legal ballot can be written or printed, because the literal meaning of the word 'character,' for instance, would force one to print or write his ballot without making a letter, for a letter is literally a 'character.' A rejection of those ballots because they contained the letter 'o,' the 'figure' of a circle, used in spelling contestant's name, would not have been further from a correct construction of the statute than the one which holds that the numerals 1st, 2d, etc., are 'figures' within its meaning. The meaning is clear. The word 'figures' refers to 'embellishments, characters,' designs, pictures, or prints that would deprive the ballot of its secrecy. The ballot must not contain a flag, an eagle, or other device. It must be on plain white paper."

It has been a long-standing custom throughout the South, as well as the North, and especially in Alabama, to designate and form electoral tickets in just this way, and no one ever claimed before that it impaired the secrecy of the ballot or was subject to the feeble objection now made against it.

The act to amend 276 of the Code of Alabama declares that—

"One of the inspectors must receive the ballot, folded, from the elector, and the same passed to each of the other inspectors, and the ballot must then, without being opened or examined, be deposited in the proper ballot box."

The act to amend 286 of the Code of Alabama provides that—

"In counting out, the returning officer or one of the inspectors must take the ballots, one by one, from the box in which they have been deposited, at the same time reading aloud the names written or printed thereon and the office for which such persons are voted for; they must separately keep a calculation of the number of votes each person receives and for what office he receives them; and if two or more ballots are found rolled up or folded together so as to induce the belief that the same was done with a fraudulent intent they must be rejected; or if any ballot containing the names of more than the voter had a right to vote for, the first of such names on such ticket to the number of persons the voter was entitled to vote for, only must be counted."

We conclude, from reading and construing these sections together, that the rejected ballots were legal, and should have been counted.

Mr. Webster, in the Rhode Island case, stated admirably the two governing principles of the American system of suffrage:

"The first is that the right of suffrage shall be guarded, protected, and secured against force and against fraud.

"The second is that its exercise shall be prescribed by previous law; its qualifications shall be prescribed by previous law; the time and place of its exercise shall be prescribed by previous law; the manner of its exercise, under whose supervision (always sworn officers of the law), is to be prescribed. And then again the results are to be certified to the central power by some certain rule, by some known public officers, in some clear and definite form, to the end that two things may be done:

"First, that every man entitled to vote may vote; second, that his vote may be sent forward and counted, and so he may exercise his part of sovereignty in common with his fellow-citizens."

In a spirit as broad as this the bill of rights of the constitution of Alabama (sec. 34) declares that "the right of suffrage shall be protected by laws regulating elections," and prohibiting, under adequate penalties, all undue influences, etc.; and the constitution (art. 8, sec. 2) declares that "all elections by the people shall be by ballot."

The right of suffrage thus guaranteed by the constitution of Alabama can not be imperiled or destroyed by any legislative enactment whose construction makes this great constitutional right of the freeman to hang upon the caprice or whim of the partisan inspector of elections, which, if exercised, as in this case, must inevitably and for all time sacrifice all the substantial rights of citizen franchise to doubt, shuffling, and uncertainty.

The style in which they were printed does not violate the secrecy of the ballot. They were printed on plain white paper, without anything whatever upon them to betray their character or contents.

It is contended by the contestant that this peculiar construction of the law of Alabama had its origin in the following circular, issued and placed in friendly hands by the chairman of the Democratic committee, just before and on the day of election. The notice is at least significant:

"DEAR SIR: As soon as the polls are closed, inform the inspectors of the election that the Lowe tickets with Hancock electors on them are illegal. They contain the figures 1st, 2d, etc., designating the district. These are marks or figures which are prohibited by the election laws (see acts 1878–79, p. 72), and all such tickets should be rejected when the votes are counted, after the polls are closed.

[Indorsed on back in writing:]

"To be shown only to very discreet friends."

But we beg leave for a moment to refer to the bearing of the laws of the United States upon this question. Congress has the power (art. 1, sec. 4) "to make or alter" State regulations as to "the manner" of holding Congressional elections. In section 27, Revised Statutes, Congress has enacted that "all votes for Representatives in Congress must be by printed or written ballots." This provision as to the ballot is exclusive and supreme so far as it goes. The State can not alter it. See also sections 2012, 2017, and 2018 of the Revised Statutes. These sections relate to the appointment of supervisors and to the definition of their powers and duties in national elections.

The majority of the committee found that contestant had proven 601 votes as rejected in the manner discussed above.

The minority views, presented by Mr. F. E. Beltzhoover, of Pennsylvania, held:

If the legislature had merely prescribed the form of ballot, without declaring those cast in any other form to be illegal, or commanding their rejection, then, of course, it would be a question whether the requirement of the statute, that the ballot must contain only the names of the candidates and the designations of the offices, is directory or mandatory. And to the decision of that question such authorities as in McKenzie v. Braxton, Smith, 19, would be applicable. But when the law makes a ballot not cast in a prescribed form illegal and requires its rejection, there is no place for the question whether the statute is mandatory or directory. The ballot which is not in the prescribed form is illegal, and must be rejected, because the law in terms declares it to be illegal and commands its rejection.

The legislature of Alabama, exercising a power expressly conferred by the Federal Constitution, had prescribed the mode of choosing Presidential electors as follows:

"On the day prescribed by this code there are to be elected, by general ticket, a number of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States equal to the number of Senators and Representatives in Congress to which this State is entitled at the time of such election."

Under this statutory provision there could be no choice of "district elector" for the "first district" or "second district" or for either of the other eight districts designated. The ballots in question each contained the designations of eight different offices unknown to the law; that is to say, the offices of district electors for the eight districts of the State. They were deposited in the ballot boxes in violation of the requirement of the statute that the ballot shall contain only the names of the candidates and the designations of the offices.

It is submitted, as an incontrovertible proposition, that this statutory provision, for the choice of Presidential electors, makes the office of each and every Presidential elector an office for the State at large, and that the office of district elector is unknown to the law of Alabama. It is submitted, as a second incontrovertible proposition, that the ballots in question were ballots for two electors from the State at large, and for eight district electors, one for each of eight districts. If these two propositions are correct, so also must be the conclusion that eight of the offices designated on these ballots are unknown to the laws of the State, and that the designation of these eight offices was a violation of that requirement which excludes from the face of the ballot everything except the names of the candidates and the designation of the offices voted for, and that therefore, under the law, it was the duty of the inspectors to reject these ballots.

The minority contend that this provision for the law requiring the electors to be chosen by general ticket is peculiar to Alabama; and also claims that by the evidence the figures in question were shown to be in fact distinguishing marks.

Mr. A. A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, one of the majority, filed individual views, in which he says, in regard to the alleged distinguishing marks:

To sustain the objection made to the ballot by contestee would shock both the moral and the legal sense of every fair-minded man.

My conclusion is that the course pursued was a perversion of the statute, and the objection was seized upon as a pretext and induced by outside manipulation.

In any event, it would seem that the part which relates to the candidate for Congress may be regarded as a separate ticket.

A New York statute once required State and county officers to be voted for on separate ballots. At an election held under that statute a large number of ballots were cast for "Cook, for State treasurer," which had at the bottom of them "for county judge, Ezra Graves." These ballots were alleged to be illegal and the election contested. The supreme court in passing on the question said:

"I have not been able, after the most deliberate consideration of the objection raised, to perceive that there is anything in it. The ballot for every office on a ticket containing the names of more than one officer must be regarded as a separate ballot." (People v. Cook, 14 Barbour, 259, 299.)

The case was carried to the court of appeals and there affirmed. The court said: "The Speiman ballot, headed 'State,' had at the bottom 'for county judge, Ezra Graves.' Whatever effect this had on the candidate for county judge, it had none on the candidates on the State ticket." (People v. Cook, 8 N.Y., 4 Selden, 68, 85.)

962. The case of Lowe v. Wheeler, continued.

A vote received by election officers is presumed to be legal and is not to be impeached by a question of registration except on indubitable proof.

Instance wherein the minority views proposed that the poll should be purged of illegal votes by deductions pro rata.

(2) Sitting Member claimed that several hundreds of persons who were not registered as required by law voted, and that on this account 1,846 votes should be deducted from contestant's vote and 852 from his own vote.

The majority report thus discusses this question:

In regard to the registration of voters the facts as shown by the testimony do not sustain the claims made by the contestee. His testimony does not establish what he alleges it does. It is largely secondary and of a hearsay character at the best. The fact is that in many instances where he claims registration was not made it was made, and in few instances, if any, does he establish the identity of the voter wherein he claims nonregistration.

But whatever may be the facts upon this question of registration, we are clearly of the opinion that the constitution of Alabama does not make registration an absolute condition or prerequisite of voting, nor do the statutes of the State.

The provisions of the Alabama constitution (art. 8, sec. 5) in regard to registration is subject to two constructions: One making registration constitutionally essential to voting and the other making registration essential only "when it is so provided" by law. The latter construction is the one taken by contestant. It is the plainest and most satisfactory construction that can be derived after giving full force to all the words in the section. On the contrary the construction given by the contestee would eliminate the words "when it is so provided" and make the section read as follows:

"The general assembly may, when necessary, provide by law for the registration of electors throughout the State or in any incorporated city or town thereof, and no one shall vote at any election unless he shall have registered as required by law."

This reading of the section with the words "when it is so provided" eliminated is the construction given by the contestee to the entire section. But these words can not be properly eliminated. They stand out in the section to qualify and limit its meaning. They must be given due consideration. They declare, in effect, not that registration shall be a prerequisite for voting, but that, when the general assembly shall so provide, no person shall vote unless registered—meaning that the legislature may make registration a prerequisite for voting, and that when "it is so provided" no person shall vote without being thus registered.

But the legislature has not seen fit to make such provision. Registration is not a prerequisite. It is not compulsory. It is not even put down as one of the qualifications of an elector.

The registration law of Alabama contains the following provision:

"SEC. 233. Registration on election day, and certificate.—The assistant registrars shall be present at the voting precinct or ward for which they are respectively appointed, on the day of election, to register such electors as may have failed to register on any previous day in their precincts or wards, which registration must be done, in every respect, according to the form prescribed; and the assistant registrar shall furnish to each elector who may register on the day of election a certificate of registration, which shall be in the following form:

"I, _____, assistant registrar, do hereby certify that _____ has this day registered before me as an elector.

"(Signed) _____, Registrar.

"Which certificate, signed by the registrar, shall be sufficient evidence that such elector is registered; and in case such assistant registrar, for any cause, is unable to attend, or there be a vacancy in the office of assistant registrar for such precinct or ward, the county registrar shall appoint some competent person as assistant registrar for that day; and if no appointment be so made by 10 o'clock of that day, then the inspectors of election may appoint an assistant registrar, who may qualify and act as such for that day; but this section shall not apply to incorporated towns or cities having a population of more than five thousand inhabitants, except as is hereinafter provided by this chapter."

Every voter that complied with this condition complied with the requirements of the registry law of Alabama, and was as much entitled to vote as though he had been registered days before the election. In the face and eyes of such a provision, and in the absence of such proof as would show that the officers who had registration in their charge had deliberately violated their oaths, how are we to assume that this provision of law was not complied with in all cases of voters not embraced in the general registry? As to the presumption that the officers of the law charged with a duty performed it, we cite McCrary on Elections, page 231; to the election case of Finley v. Bisbee, volume 1, third session Forty-fifth Congress, House Reports.

We conclude, therefore, and we think rightfully, that the votes which the contestee claims should be thrown out on account of alleged nonregistration can not be deducted from contestant's votes; and, besides, that they could not be taken pro rata from the whole vote cast, because there is no evidence which establishes definitely and identically for whom they voted. It was held in Curtin v. Yocum, volume 2, House Reports of Forty-sixth Congress, where an elector votes without challenge, his vote can not afterwards be rejected, because his name may not be found on the registration list, but that it will be presumed the officers of the election did their duty till the contrary is proven.

Mr. Ranney, in his views, says:

There seems to be no decision of the State courts on the point raised, and the question becomes immaterial, unless the necessary basis of facts is first established. I am inclined, however, to the opinion that, under the constitution and the statutes passed thereunder (both being in harmony), that registration was designed as a reasonable regulation, although not prescribed as a qualification.

The question is not free from doubt, but, considering the object and purposes subserved by a system of registration, I am inclined to so hold.

It is quite doubtful whether the law of Alabama renders void a vote of a nonregistered elector when once cast and received. But for the purposes of the present case I may safely assume that registration was intended as a prerequisite, and so regard it.

Analogous questions were discussed in the case of Finley v. Bisbee in the Forty-sixth Congress and in Curtin v. Yocum in the Forty-sixth Congress. They furnish, however, no substantial authority beyond the general doctrine discussed, as the constitution and statutes of those States differ materially from those of Alabama.

While, for the purposes of this case, I assume that registration is a prerequisite in Alabama as a reasonable regulation, I find that the proof does not sustain the charge made by the contestee.

After quoting from documents to show the great interest in the election and the care exercised by sitting Member's party, Mr. Ranney says:

It is hardly probable that so many persons would openly violate the law or be allowed by sworn officers to do so. The penalty prescribed for the fraudulent voter is severe under the laws of Alabama, although it is said to be quite light comparatively as regards the officers of election. They had with them in each precinct, as must be assumed under the provisions of the law cited, full certified copies of the registration lists with the names of the electors alphabetically arranged thereon, and the assistant registrar of the precinct was required to be present at the polls with papers ready to register all electors who had not been registered prior to that day, and it may be assumed that he was present or that some other person was appointed by the inspectors to attend to that duty in his absence.

The vigilance exercised generally is illustrated by what was done in regard to the so-called marked ballots already considered. Similar activity is probable in respect to the registration and challenging.

It is not now claimed or shown that any of those who voted were not in fact qualified voters and entitled to vote otherwise or that any of them were challenged. No one of them is called as a witness to prove his identity or failure to register.

All this renders the claim of contestee very improbable. It would require proof of an indubitable character.

"It is the settled law of elections that where persons vote without challenge it will be presumed that they were entitled to vote, and that the sworn officers of the election who received their votes performed their duty properly and honestly, and the burden of proof to show the contrary devolves on the party denying their right to vote." (Report in Finley v. Bisbee, Forty-fifth Congress.)

We call attention to the case of Perry v. Ryan, 68 Illinois, 172.

"Where a person votes at an election without having been registered and without any proof of right, if it does not appear he was challenged or any objection made to his vote the presumption must be that he was a legal voter and was known to the judges of election."

In 83 Illinois, 498, where a registry law very similar to the law now under consideration was construed by that court, it was held:

"The presumption of the legality of a vote in no way depends upon the omission to challenge or object to it or any presumed knowledge of the judges of election, but it arises from the fact of its having been deposited in the ballot box. When once deposited, it will be presumed to be a legal vote until there is evidence to the contrary."

Mr. Ranney thus states his objections to the evidence:

Now let us see what the proof adduced is.

Contestee has procured and put in evidence certain papers certified to by the probate judges in five several counties, respectively, purporting to be copies of the registration lists for the precincts involved, and also of papers called the poll lists from the same precincts. His claim is that he produces certified copies of all the registration lists of these precincts, which show all the persons registered and qualified to vote in the same, and poll lists showing the names of all those who did vote as written down by the clerks at the election. By comparing these papers in each precinct named in his table, cited hereinbefore, he finds, as he says, and as witnesses who have compared them swear, 2,698 names in the aggregate on the poll lists which are not on the registration lists, and he contends that it follows that they were not registered, and their votes illegal.

The minority of the committee, in their report (p. 27) in Bisbee v. Finley, an analogous issue, said that "the evidence relied on was wholly inadequate, being altogether inferential." But we go further:

Now, in order to have this proof satisfactory and sufficient it must at least be shown by affirmative, competent, and credible evidence that the records contain copies of all of the original and supplementary lists of registration made out by the registrars and assistant registrars since 1875 and before the election of November 2, 1880, together with all that were made on election day at the polls by the assistant registrars, or those appointed in their place by the inspectors in the absence of the registrar. Unless we have copies of all the registration books and lists, we have not got the proper basis for comparison.

We must next have all of the requisite poll lists duly proved and properly authenticated.

Upon examining the copies certified to, we do not find, save in a few cases, what answers these requirements.

After showing wherein the registration and poll lists were defective as evidence, Mr. Ranney concludes:

We are asked to presume that all registrars did their duty; that judges of probate had all the papers which the law provided should be sent to them; that the poll lists not signed were the genuine and true ones, when they could be so easily manipulated without complicity on the part of the judges, in order to overcome all the presumption in favor of the legality of the votes cast. I can not do it in the face of so much evidence as appears to weaken those presumptions invoked by contestee.

There is another consideration which ought to be noted as a very strong reason at least why contestee should be held to the strictest rules of evidence, if not as justifying the claim that the ballots of voters not on the registration lists apparently should not now be rejected after they were offered and deposited without challenge or objection at the time. Under the law of Alabama, as already stated, any qualified voter, if not on the copy of registration lists with the inspectors conducting the poll, and challenged, may register at the time and on the spot, or take the requisite oath and then rightfully vote. If he is not challenged, and is allowed to vote without doing this, the failure of duty on the part of the registrar or inspectors may unjustly deprive the elector of his vote. The case would perhaps come within the spirit, if not the strict letter, of section 2007 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The remarks of Mr. Calkins in case of Curtin v. Yocum, although not in all respects applicable to this case, are pertinent and forcible, and we quote them:

"I call the attention of the Members of the House especially to the conclusion reached by Judge Briggs in construing this law. He says: 'By accepting the vote,' referring to the nonregistered voter who presents himself at the polls without an affidavit, etc.—'by accepting the vote without demanding the proof they deprive the voter of the opportunity of furnishing it.' To construe the law as contended for by my friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. Beltzhoover) makes it a mere trap, for the reason that the voter presumes, or he has a right to presume, that he is registered. He has lived in the precinct the time required by law; he has paid his tax; the assessor has been to his house; he knows his name ought to be on the registry list, and he goes up to the ballot box with the ballot in his hand. They take his ballot and deposit it in the ballot box, and afterwards, when he can not furnish the proof, it is contended his vote is an illegal one, while if the election officers had called his attention to it at the moment he could have supplied the evidence required and established his right to vote to the mode prescribed. But that evidence was not demanded. He voted knowing that he had a legal right to vote, but the legal evidence of his right was not required of him by the election officers. And applying the same doctrine as in Wheelock's case, 'you can not deprive the legal voter of the right to vote by reason of the failure of the officer to do his duty,' and it seems to me that the position is unassailable."

Regulations may be merely directory, and if the officer of election or the voter does not follow them they do not necessarily vitiate the vote when deposited and received.

The present case is a very strong one for the application of that rule, in the absence of any statute making registration a prerequisite, and where the system of registration is so imperfect and loosely managed.

The minority views contend that the majority have misconstrued the constitution:

It will be observed that the language of the constitution is that "the general assembly may, when necessary, provide by law for registration, * * * and when it is so provided no person shall vote unless he shall have registered as required by law."

Now, what do these words, "so provided," refer to? Plainly to registration. That is to say, the general assembly was authorized to provide by law for registration; to determine the mode and requisites of registration generally and particularly. The registration had reference to persons who were entitled under the constitution to vote. It has nothing whatever to do with the qualifications of the voter, because those qualifications are fixed by the constitution itself, and could not be interfered with by any act of the legislature. And therefore the concluding words of this section are unmistakable in their meaning, "no person shall vote at any election unless he shall have registered as required by law;" and that meaning is that the constitution having fixed the qualifications of the voter, this registration law was intended to furnish the evidence of the right of the party to vote, to wit, his being registered as a voter according to the forms and requirements of this act of the legislature. This act of the legislature was provided for by the constitution, not to determine the qualifications of the voter, but to furnish the qualified voters with the evidence that they were qualified and entitled to cast their ballots; and the constitution simply provides, and no other rational meaning can be attributed to it, that registration, and that alone, shall be evidence of the fact that the party is a qualified voter, and therefore any person who is not registered is clearly an illegal voter under the constitution and laws of the State of Alabama. Registration is the act of the voter. If he fails to register, it is his own fault, and he can not complain, nor can anyone else, if his right to vote is lost by reason of nonregistration.

After a careful examination of the testimony in this case, we believe that it conclusively shows that not less than 2,400 persons voted in this district who were not registered, and that not less than 1,000 of them voted for the contestant.

The minority views further say that if it be conceded that there was doubt as to how the nonregistered voters voted, the law from McCrary afforded a solution:

In purging the polls of illegal votes, the general rule is that, unless it be shown for which candidate they were cast, they are to be deducted from the whole vote of the election division, and not from the candidate having the largest number. (Shepherd v. Gibbons, 2 Brewst., 128; McDaniel's case, 3 Penn., L. F., 310; Cushing's Election Cases, 583.) Of course, in the application of this rule such illegal votes would be deducted proportionately from both candidates, according to the entire vote returned for each. Thus, we will suppose that John Doe and Richard Roe are competing candidates for an office, and that the official canvass shows:

	Votes
For John Doe	625
For Richard Roe	575
Total vote	1,200
Majority for Doe.

But there is proof that 120 illegal votes were cast, and no proof as to the person for whom they were cast. The illegal vote is 10 per cent of the returned vote, and hence each candidate loses 10 per cent of the vote certified to him. By this rule John Doe will lose 62½ votes and Richard Roe 57½ votes and the result, as thus reached, is as follows:

	Votes
Doe's certified votes	625
Deduct illegal votes	62½
Total vote	562½
Roe's certified vote	575
Deduct illegal votes	57½
Total vote	517½
Majority for Doe.

Applying this principle, we here submit a table showing the number of votes cast for contestant and contestee at various precincts, the number of nonregistered voters, and the pro rata of deductions from each party on account of the nonregistered voters.

The minority deny that the poll lists and registration lists are inadequate as proof.

963. The case of Lowe v. Wheeler, continued.

Discussion as to the evidence required to justify taking into account ballots rejected wrongfully by election officers.

As to the use of heavy type as a distinguishing mark on ballots.

In regard to minors and nonresidents as voters, the mere opinion of a witness, who does not state facts to justify it, is insufficient.

In regard to convicts as voters, the record of conviction is the only evidence acceptable to the House unless the record has been destroyed.

(3) The minority in their views objected strongly to the testimony by which the majority determined the number of ballots rejected, because of the figures designating the districts of the Presidential electors:

We think that none of the evidence by which he attempts to prove these facts is legal. The witnesses merely give their recollection on the subject. Many of them made out returns one or more days after the election was over, and in many cases they admit that even these returns were made out from hearsay, and many of them show by their evidence that their entire knowledge on the subject is hearsay.

The law of Alabama (see Code, par. 288, printed p. 1215 of the record in this case) provides that all rejected ballots shall be rolled up by the inspectors and labeled as rejected ballots, and that they shall be sealed up together with the other ballots, and securely fastened up in the box from which said ballots were taken when they were counted. The answer of the contestee distinctly alleged that where votes for William M. Lowe were discarded it was so stated in the returns made by the inspectors. In no instance did the contestant put these returns in evidence or give any reason for not doing so. Nor did he put the ballots which he claimed were rejected in evidence, nor does the record show that he gave any reason for not doing so.

Furthermore, not one of the 49 depositions was in any way certified by any commissioner.

None of the depositions has any certificate of any kind whatever.

It is provided in the Revised Statutes of the United States as follows:

"SEC. 127. All officers taking testimony to be used in a contested election case, whether by deposition or otherwise, shall, when the taking of the same is completed, and without unnecessary delay, certify and carefully seal and immediately forward the same, by mail, addressed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, DC."

The contestee objected to these depositions at the commencement of the present session of Congress on the ground that they were not certified according to law, and has persisted in that objection until the present time.

Again, none of these alleged depositions was reduced to writing in the presence of the notary.

The provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States is:

"SEC. 122. The officer shall cause the testimony of the witnesses, together with the questions proposed by the parties or their agents, to be reduced to writing in his presence and in the presence of the parties or their agents if attending, and to be duly attested by the witnesses respectively."

The corresponding provision of the judiciary act of 1789 is in the following words:

"And every person deposing as aforesaid shall be carefully examined and cautioned and sworn or affirmed to testify the whole truth, and shall subscribe the testimony by him or her given after the same shall be reduced to writing, which shall be done only by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by the deponent in his presence."

The provision that the deposition must be reduced to writing in the presence of the officer is common to the contested election law and the judiciary act of 1789. It is obvious therefore that decisions of the Federal courts on the provision of the judiciary act for the writing out of the deposition will be authorities in cases which may come before this committee under the corresponding provision of the statute relating to contested elections.

In Bell v. Morrison, 1 Peters, 351, Judge Story, delivering the opinion of the court, held that under section 30 of the judiciary act a deposition is not admissible if it is not shown that the deposition was reduced to writing in presence of the magistrate.

The same doctrine is maintained by the following authorities: Edmondson v. Barret, 2 Cranch C. C., 228; Pettibone v. Derringer, 4 Wash., 215; Rayner v. Haynes, Hempst., 689; Cook v. Burnley, 11 Wall., 659; Baylis v. Cochran, 2 Johns. (N. Y.), 416; Summers v. McKim, 12 S. & R., 404; United States v. Smith, 4 Day, 121; Railroad Co. v. Drew, 3 Woods C. Ct., 692; Beale v. Thompson, 8 Cranch, 70; Shankriker v. Reading, 4 McL., 240; United States v. Price, 2 Wash. C. Ct., 356; Hunt v. Larpin, 21 Iowa, 484; Williams v. Chadbourne, 6 Cal., 559; Stone v. StillweU, 23 Ark., 444.

(4) Sitting Member also set up a counterclaim that a large number of ballots cast for contestant had his name, "William M. Lowe," printed in type so much heavier than the other names as to constitute, in fact, a distinguishing mark. The minority sustain this contention, saying:

The question here presented is a new question. It was not considered by the Committee on Elections in the Mississippi case of Lynch v. Chalmers. The differences between the statutory provisions of Mississippi and Alabama and between the ballots in the two cases are such that a decision in one of the cases will not necessarily furnish a precedent for the other. The Mississippi statute is in the following words:

"All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain, white, printing newspaper, not more than 2½ nor less than 2¼ inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or designated from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted."

As we have seen, the Alabama provision is that——

"The ballot must be a plain piece of white paper, without any figures, marks, rulings, characters, or embellishments thereon, not less than 2 nor more than 2½ inches wide and not less than 5 nor more than 7 inches long, on which must be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, only the names of the persons for whom the elector intends to vote, and must designate the office for which each person so named is intended by him to be chosen; and any ballot otherwise than described is illegal and must be rejected."

The provisions of the Mississippi law applicable to the case of Lynch v. Chalmers are: (1) That the ballot shall be without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket, and (2) that a ticket different from that prescribed shall not be received or counted. The provisions of the Alabama statute applicable to the case now on trial are: (1) That the ballot must be without marks and must contain only the names of the persons for whom the elector intends to vote and the designations of the offices, and (2) that any ballot otherwise than as described is illegal and must be rejected. In the Mississippi case the grounds of objection to the ballots were that certain printer's dashes separated different headings of the ticket. In this case the grounds of objection are that the ballots contained the designations of eight offices unknown to the law and that they were so marked, by the use of peculiar paper, ink, and type, as to be readily distinguished from other ballots, even when folded. The differences between the two cases are too palpable to require or justify any comment.

What we have said is sufficient to show that these ballots are illegal, but there is other evidence in this case which makes their rejection still more imperative.

The evidence shows that Mr. Lowe's supporters used the marked ballots, together with violence and terrorism, to destroy secret voting.

The evidence shows clearly that the using of these ballots in the precincts where it is claimed they were rejected was for the unlawful purpose of preventing a secret ballot.

It is evident that with these ballots secrecy was impossible and that such ballots could be identified in the hands of the voters.

It is certain that when voters are abused, terrorized, and ostracized for not voting as their leaders dictate, the weaker classes will hesitate before going to the polls with ballots different from those ordered by their leaders.

(5) The sitting Member charged that certain persons not qualified as electors voted for contestant. The majority of the committee thus ruled on this point:

In regard to minors and nonresidents, the mere statement of a witness that an elector is one of this class seems to be the sole reliance of the contestee. This is not sufficient. The witness must give facts to justify his opinion.

In regard to convicts, the record of conviction is the best evidence and the only evidence to be accepted by the House, unless the loss or destruction of that record is shown. In no instance has the contestee produced the record or sought to account for its absence.

964. The case of Lowe v. Wheeler, continued.

The law providing for representation of both parties on the board of elections officers being violated and the vote being impeached, the House rejected the return.

The return being rejected, votes were proven aliunde on testimony of the voters, corroborated by a witness who saw them vote.

Confidence in the integrity of the poll being destroyed, the returns are rejected.

The returns being rejected, the vote aliunde was proven entirely by the testimony of the voters.

Instance wherein a return was rejected and count aliunde admitted without request for the same in contestant's notice.

(6) At Meridianville precinct every State officer was a member of sitting Member's party, in violation of the law, which provided for a representation of both parties. The box gave contestant 47 votes, but a witness, who was partially corroborated, presented a list of 67 names of voters whom he saw take tickets for contestant and vote them. Also 55 voters testified that they voted for Lowe. So the majority consider that the evidence of fraud was such as to require the rejection of the return, and they credit the contestant with the 55 votes proven aliunde.

(7) As to Laniersville the majority report says:

> At this precinct, as at Meridianville, all the State officers, sheriffs, and clerks were ardent partisans of the contestee; the contestant had no friends among them. The poll list shows that 188 persons voted at this box. Yet, the inspectors, in defiance of law and mathematics, counted for contestee 142 votes and for contestant 57 votes, making 199 votes, or 11 more ballots in the box than names on the poll list. The blundering fraud is apparent on the face of the returns.
>
> The inspectors certify that on counting the ballots after the election there were 11 more ballots in the box than were names on the poll list, and that they deducted 2 Republican ballots and 9 Democratic ballots, because they were found folded together. But the certificate of the probate judge, also a partisan of the contestee, shows the vote cast and counted at this box as follows:
>
> "Ballots counted for Wm. M. Lowe, 56; ballots counted for Joseph Wheeler, 142."
> If this be the truth, there must have been not only 199 ballots, an excess of 11, but there must have been 210 ballots, an excess of 22 ballots. The fact, however, remains that only 188 names are upon the poll list, and that, therefore, only that number of voters could have legally voted and only that number of ballots could have been honestly counted. The inspectors, nevertheless, after deducting 11 votes in excess of the poll, return 57 for the contestant and 142 for the contestee. Who can give this return a fair and honest explanation?
> But the show of fraud on the face of the returns is made apparent, if not conclusive, by the evidence that the box was stuffed in the interest of the contestee, and the integrity of the election at that poll substantially destroyed.

The contestant called the voters, and 128 swore that they voted for contestant. So the committee credit him with that number. The minority object:

> The majority of the committee, however, reject this box, without a request to that effect in the contestant's notice, and then, still without a request, and without a particle of legal evidence, count for Mr. Lowe 128 votes, and give Mr. Wheeler none, although 132 votes were cast and counted for him, and Mr. Lowe's own witness swears that some 30 votes were cast for Mr. Wheeler.

In accordance with their conclusions as to law and fact, the majority of the committee find that the contestant actually received a majority of 847 votes, and accordingly report resolutions giving to him the seat.

The report was debated at length on June 2 and 3, 1882,[1] and on the latter day[2] a motion to recommit, with instructions to examine with reference to certain tissue ballots, was disagreed to, yeas 90, nays 129. Then the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee were agreed to, yeas 148, nays 3, not voting 140—the minority evidently attempting obstruction by refraining from voting.

Mr. Lowe thereupon appeared and took the oath.

965. The Alabama election case of Smith v. Shelley, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Instance wherein votes of previous elections and nature of population were cited to establish a presumption as to the political preferences of the district.

When by a conspiracy of officials ignorant election officers were installed and then their imperfect returns rejected contestant was permitted to prove the vote aliunde by oral evidence of inspectors, etc.

Distinction between proof required to set aside returns of sworn officers and that which will establish a vote aliunde when returns do not exist.

A contestant dying after a report in his favor, the House unseated the returned Member and declared the seat vacant.

Form of resolutions when a contestant who is entitled to the seat dies before the case is heard by the House.

On June 27, 1882,[1] Mr. W. G. Thompson, of Iowa, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of that committee in the Alabama case of Smith v. Shelley. At this election there had been three candidates, but the contest had been between sitting Member and contestant, the former being seated by a returned majority of 2,651 over contestant.

After reviewing the condition of the district, which had been constituted to relieve other districts of a preponderating colored population, and was therefore largely dominated by that class of population, the majority report claims that the colored voters were almost entirely Republican, and that the voters of the district were Republican by a large majority. Figures of the votes in other elections are cited to prove this, although the minority views, presented by Mr. F. E. Beltzhoover, of Pennsylvania, denied that any such assumption might be made.

The majority report charges a conspiracy, developed as follows:

> And your committee can not escape the conviction, from the testimony, that a thoroughly organized and preconcerted plan and purpose had been made and understood by and amongst the Democratic partisans and supporters of Mr. Shelley, that in all the precincts where the Republican majorities were large and Democratic voters very few that the Democratic inspectors of such precinct should fail and refuse to open the polls on the day of election, and thereby leave the work of so doing in the hands of colored voters whose education was such as to make it quite probable that some clerical error would occur, so as to furnish an excuse for rejecting the box entirely.
> Strong corroborative evidence of this is found in the further fact that the county supervisors refused to appoint any Republican in such precincts selected by the Republican county committees, but invariably selected one who was unable to read or write, or who, however honest in intention, would not be competent to make out the required returns in a proper and legal manner, or technically correct in all particulars, and the evidence conclusively shows that the Democratic supervisors, composed of the sheriff, probate judge, and clerk of the court of the county, did not fail to find a pretext for refusing to count such boxes, where, by sacrificing one vote for the Democrat, they would destroy 360 for the Republican. This the committee, however much they may admire the heroic effort for a fair vote and honest count, can not in this case allow the sacrifice.

This alleged conspiracy was operative at fourteen precincts, seven in Dallas County, four in Loundes County, and one each from the counties of Wilcox, Perry, and Hale. In these fourteen precincts the majority of the committee found that 4,029 votes were actually cast for Mr. Smith, and 282 for Mr. Shelley.[2]

It was by rejecting the returns of these votes that the canvassing officers of the several counties so changed the aggregate of votes in the district as to give an official majority for sitting Member.

[1] First session Forty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 1522; 2 Ellsworth, p. 18.

[2] See remarks of Mr. Ranney, Appendix of Record, p. 627.

The conditions leading up to this rejection are thus set forth in the views of Mr. A. A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, one of those concurring in the majority report:

Under the election law of Alabama it is made the duty of the judge of the probate court, the clerk of the circuit court, and the sheriff of each county, thirty days previous to any election, to designate three inspectors to hold an election in each voting precinct, two of which shall be members of opposing political parties. The sheriff is made county returning officer, and it is made his duty to send to each of the precincts in the county ballot boxes for the purposes of the election, and he is the peace officer who is to be present, in person or by deputy, at each election precinct. (Ala. Code, sec. 258, art. 2; sec. 259.)

It appears that the judge of the probate court, the clerk of the circuit court, and the sheriff, whose duty it was to appoint precinct inspectors of election, in all of said counties, were Democrats in politics and supporters of the contestee; and the same officers are by law made the county supervising board to canvass the returns made by the precinct inspectors of election appointed by themselves.

The legal questions arising are satisfactorily shown in the following passage from Mr. Ranney's views descriptive of the proceedings in Dallas County:

It appears that previous to the election the officers whose duty it was to appoint precinct inspectors in Dallas County, one of whom should be of the opposing political party, were notified in writing and requested to obey the election law of Alabama in this respect, and give an opportunity to suggest some suitable men to act for the Republican party, but they refused to do so. One of them (the sheriff) stated "that if he received forty such notices he would pay no attention to them." (Depositions of Roundtree and Judge Wood.)

It appears that in seven precincts of Dallas County, to wit, Pine Flat, River, Mitchell's, Chillatchie, Cahaba, Martin's, and Lexington, about which testimony has been taken, and for each of them three inspectors were appointed, two of whom were white Democrats and one a negro, who was supposed to be a Republican on account of his color; that of the two white Democratic inspectors for each of the seven precincts it appears that they were not present on the morning of the election to open the polls, and the white Democratic inspectors, appointed by county authority, failing to be present, the colored electors present, under the election statute of Alabama, opened the polls and held elections in said precincts; that the returns made of the result to the board of county supervisors in Cahaba, Pine Flat, Mitchell's, River, Lexington, and Martin's were not in statutory form, and were for informality rejected, and the vote not counted by the board of county supervisors, and that the sheriff, the returning officer, refused to receive the ballot box from Chillatchie precinct because it was a cigar box, and it was not before the supervising board. (Record, p. 133.)

It appears that no box was furnished as required by law. (Record, p. 141.) The sheriff swears that he sent boxes. If he did the Democratic inspectors had them probably and did not produce them, as they did not act.

The returns being informal, irregular, and insufficient, and therefore defective, went for nothing, and the votes cast not being counted for the contestant or the contestee, and the ballot box from Chillatchie not being received, evidence is resorted to prove the actual vote, under the well-recognized and settled rule stated by McCrary in his work on Contested Election Cases (sec. 302, pp. 268 and 269; Littlefield v. Green, 1 Chicago Legal News, 230); Brightley's Election Cases, 493; McKenzie v. Braxton, Forty-second Congress; Giddings v. Clark, Forty-second Congress. (See sec. 304, p. 270, and sec. 81, p. 104, McCrary on Contested Election Cases.) In Alabama, where this contested election case arose, the supreme court of that State lay down the law of contested elections as follows:

"It is the election that entitles the party to office, and if one is legally elected by receiving a majority of legal votes, his right is not impaired by any omission or negligence of the managers subsequent to the election. (State ex rel. Spence v. The Judge of the Ninth Judicial Circuit, 13 Ala. Rep., 805.)

"Nor will a mistake by the managers of the election in counting the votes and declaring the result vitiate the election. Such a mistake may and should be corrected; the person receiving the highest number of votes becomes entitled to the office. (State ex rel. Thomas v. Judge of the Circuit Court, 9th Ala. Rep., 338.)"

The returns from Pine Flat, River, Mitchell's, Cahaba, Martin's, and Lexington precincts of Dallas County being declared irregular and informal, as not coming up to statutory requirements, were not counted by the board of county supervisors for either candidate for Congress, and the ballot box from Chillatchie precinct being refused by the sheriff was not before the board of county supervisors and was not counted by them; therefore, in such a case each candidate was required to prove the actual number of ballots east for him.

The contestant introduced evidence as to the votes cast for him at the seven precincts; but sitting Member introduced no proof whatever to rebut the proof made by contestant in this respect.

The method by which contestant sought to prove the vote cast was by taking the testimony of the inspectors, supervisors, and others who were present at the polls, saw the ballots cast, counted and tallied, and knew whereof they spoke.[1]

There were generally two or three witnesses to the main facts, and the vote as proved accorded with the reports of the United States supervisors; but these reports were not relied on as substantial evidence, and the competency of it was questioned somewhat in the committee.

The minority assailed this evidence:

As the returns from the precincts mentioned were rejected, and therefore not included in ascertaining the vote of the county, it was clearly competent for the contestant or contestee to establish the vote by evidence if at any of them a lawful election was held. The contestant attempts to establish his vote, and it is for us to ascertain whether or not he has succeeded.

As the sitting Member held the seat by a title prima facie sufficient, it is incumbent on the contestant to affirmatively prove this title defective. This rule is well stated in the celebrated New Jersey case (1 Bartlett, pp. 24 and 26):

"Before a Member is admitted to a seat in the House something like the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction has been pronounced on the right of each voter whose vote has been received, and in order to overturn the judgment it must have been ascertained affirmatively that the judgment was erroneous. * * * When the polls are closed and an election is made, the right of the party elected is complete; he is entitled to the returns, and when he is admitted there is no known principle by which he can be ejected, except upon the affirmative proof of the defect in his title. Every effort to oust him must accomplish it by proving a case. The difficulties in his path can form no possible reason why the committee should meet him half way. The rule of reason requires that he should fully make out his case even though it require proof of a negative, and such is also a rule of Parliament in analogous cases."

The burden of proof being upon the contestant, by what character of evidence should he be required to prove his case? The ordinary rules of evidence must of course apply to election contests as well as to other cases. (McCrary on Elections, sec. 306.) One undeviating rule of evidence is that the best evidence must be produced of which the nature of the case will admit; that secondary can not be substituted for primary evidence unless it be shown that the litter is not within the power of the party, and the former should certainly not be substituted for the latter when it is apparent that the primary evidence is within the reach of the party and is by the law placed within his power.

Now, there are certain documentary evidences of the election which the law of Alabama provides should be preserved for the sole purpose of furnishing evidence of the vote in case of contest; these are the ballots which were cast at the election. The ballots cast at each voting place, together with one poll list, are required to be carefully sealed up in the ballot box and delivered into the custody of one of the inspectors, who is required to retain it for sixty days intact, and then to destroy the contents of the box, unless he is notified that the election of some officer for which the election was held will be contested, in which case he must preserve the box for such election until such contest is finally determined, or until such box is demanded by some other legal custodian during such contest. (Sec. 298, Code of Alabama.)

It will be seen that the ballots are required to be preserved expressly for the contestant. These are the evidences of the result of the election which the law provides. In addition to this the certified poll lists statements, etc., which are returned by the board of inspectors of each precinct and the county board of canvassers, are required to be retained intact in the office of the judge of probate. (Sec. 293, Code of Alabama.)

Now, if the returns are made by the board of inspectors and are attacked, or if insufficient or defective returns or no returns are made, will it be denied that these ballots are the best evidence of the result of the election, especially where it must be admitted from the nature of the case that the ballots in the box retained by law for the purpose of evidence are the genuine ballots which were cast at the election? And if it be true, as it is, that the ballots from the election at each of these precincts in Dallas County were placed in the custody of the Republican inspector by the Republican, that they were received from the hands of the voter by Republicans only, counted by Republicans only, placed in the box and sealed up by the Republicans only, will it be gravely contended that the contestant should be permitted to offer secondary and inferior evidence to prove what the vote was at the several voting places without having attempted to put these ballots in evidence, or furnish any reason or excuse whatever for his failure to do so? In no instance is any inquiry made for the ballots, nor is any effort made to produce them, not even where the testimony itself shows to whom the ballots were committed, and even in those cases where the person who had the ballots in his custody, as shown by the testimony, appeared and was examined as a witness by the contestant. Without showing that the ballots were not in his power to produce, contestant resorts to oral evidence. This he clearly could not do. Oral evidence can not be substituted for any instrument which the law requires to be in writing, and no proof can be substituted therefor so long as the writing exists and is in the power of the party. (Greenleaf on Ev., sec. 86, Vol. 1.)

In the contested election case of Spencer v. Morey (Smith's Digest, p. 449) it was admitted by both parties that no official returns could be found, because they had been abstracted or destroyed. This being the case, the minority of the committee say:

"The best evidence, viz, the returns, having been lost or destroyed, secondary evidence is then admissible to establish what was the contents of the written instrument, viz, the returns. We understand the rule governing the admissibility of secondary evidence with respect to documents to be that proof of their contents may be established by secondary evidence, first, when the original writing is lost or destroyed; second, when its production is a physical impossibility, or at least highly inconvenient (p. 480)."

In this case it is not shown that any of these conditions existed to justify the introduction of oral testimony. We can only conjecture why contestant failed to have the ballots produced, but we can not avoid the suspicion which the law itself creates that the failure to produce the ballots was because they would not conform to the imperfect returns or the unreliable testimony of the witnesses for the contestant. If this plain principle of law be not disregarded, it is unnecessary to further consider the testimony in relation to these precincts; but we think that an examination into the testimony produced will show that contestant has failed to establish the vote by satisfactory evidence.

As to a question of fact the majority contention, as voiced by Mr. Ranney, was—

It was contended at the hearing that inasmuch as the statute of Alabama provides that the ballot boxes with the ballots shall be kept by the inspectors for sixty days for use in case of a contest, contestant was bound, as his best evidence, to procure and put in evidence the ballots themselves when proving what the actual vote was. It is claimed, or appears, however, that in many, if not most, of the instances where there was occasion to do this, if important, the boxes had not been kept as required by law, but had gone and been allowed to go into other hands. Whatever may be the rule otherwise, it certainly could not apply in such a case.

I find that several of the parties named in this report, and charged with frauds upon the election law in the election in question, were duly presented to the grand jury and indicted for the same. Some of the boxes in question had been taken and used before the grand jury in their investigations. There is no record of any conviction or acquittal of the parties indicted. The fact of indictments having been found is of course no competent evidence to impeach the parties as witnesses, and the committee have not so considered it.

As a question of law, Mr. Ranney, in debate,[1] said:

It must be remembered that this is not a case, so far as regards the 14 precincts now being considered, where the contestant is attempting to overthrow and control the returns of sworn officers of elections, as against presumptions of verity. The rule of law is quite different in such a case.

In general, so far as the 14 precincts were concerned, the minority denied that conspiracy was shown and attacked the character of testimony offered to prove the vote. Many issues of fact arose, and there were apparently some attempts to defraud; but the essential legal principles of the case are the same throughout.

Contestant died before the case came to a hearing in the House, but there was no serious question about the following resolutions, as proposed by the majority, affording the right course of procedure:

Resolved, That Charles M. Shelley was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, and is not entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in the House.

Resolved, That James Q. Smith was duly elected as a Representative from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama to the Forty-seventh Congress, and, having deceased, the seat is declared vacant.

The minority recommended resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member.

The report was debated in the House on July 20,[2] and on that day the resolutions of the majority were agreed to, yeas 145, nays 1, not voting 144. The minority evidently undertook to break a quorum, hoping to delay decision.

966. The Alabama election case of Strobach v. Herbert, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Time and place of an election being fixed by law, the failure of officials to give a required notice was held not to justify rejection of the returns.

There being no doubt of the intent of the voter, the wrong spelling of a candidate's name does not vitiate the ballot.

The returns of the regularly constituted authorities will not be disturbed by presumptions raised by a census of voters by races.

On June 27, 1882,[3] Mr. Ambrose A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the Alabama case of Strobach, v. Herbert.

The case involved the following points:

(1) It was claimed on behalf of contestant that the entire vote of Escambia County, where sitting Member received 634 majority, should be thrown out. The report thus disposes of this claim:

As to Escambis County, by the law of Alabama it is the duty of the sheriff, judge of probate, and clerk of the circuit court to give notice of an election and appoint managers. This duty the sheriff, judge of probate, and clerk of the circuit court of Escambia County failed to perform. But by the statutes of Alabama it is provided that when for any cause managers and other officers of election are not appointed the qualified electors present may elect them. It appears that this was done and the election held; and it further appears that on the 30th day of October, 1880, the chairman of the Congressional executive committee of the Democratic party gave contestant notice that this course would be pursued, and invited him to name the persons he desired as managers to represent them at the different boxes. Under these circumstances, as the law is well settled that when time and places of holding an election are fixed by law no notice by the officials is essential, your committee can see no good ground upon which to exclude the vote of Escambia County.

(2) It was claimed on behalf of contestant that 1,190 votes should be deducted from sitting Member's vote in Pike County, because the name was spelled Hebert instead of "Herbert." The report holds:

As to the alleged misnomer in Pike County, your committee find that the evidence does not establish that more than 50 votes were cast in which Mr. Herbert's name was spelled Hebert. They further find that these ballots were intended to be cast for Herbert; that they were printed Hebert by mistake of the printer; that no person of like name except contestee was being voted for or was a candidate, and they believe that under the law and the precedents these votes were rightfully counted for contestee. Indeed, Mr. Ingersoll, one of contestant's counsel, admits they should be so counted.

(3) Counsel for contestant claimed that certain votes should be deducted at two precincts in Butler County, but the report denies this claim:

The vote at these boxes is not assailed in the pleadings or by the evidence further than by a comparison with the census returns. This comparison does not show that the vote was unduly large, but simply that Herbert received more than the white vote and Strobach less than the colored vote. Your committee can not consent, for such reason as this, to disturb the returns of the regularly constituted authorities.

967. The case of Strobach v. Herbert, continued.

To vitiate the election of returned Member a general scheme of fraud must be proven both to have existed and to have been effective.

The Elections Committee felt bound to follow a State law as it stood, although inadequate to secure honesty from election officers.

The House sometimes determines an election case by permitting the contestant to withdraw his case.

Form of resolution permitting a contestant to withdraw his case.

(4) As to frauds the report says:

The only doubt which the committee has had in regard to this case is whether the irregularities and frauds alleged and appearing in evidence were not sufficient to render the election of contestee void.

Contestant has arrayed the schemes of fraud conceived and executed in the election held in August, 1880, and claims that the same practices were resorted to in the November election of that year. The committee have scrutinized closely the proof and evidence in this regard, and are impressed with the fact that this seems to have been so to a considerable extent. But applying the rules of law which obtain in election cases, it is not satisfactorily proved that there was any such general scheme of fraud which appears to have been successfully practiced in a sufficient number of cases as to change the general result.

(5) As to a final point:

The statute law of the State of Alabama has also been arraigned as wholly insufficient and inadequate to secure an honest election, and as a safeguard against fraudulent practices which seem to be so rife in that State. With this the committee have nothing to do, as a general principle. But it may be permitted to say that the charge seems to be true to a lamentable degree. The law seems to be quite severe as against the elector, but as regards the officers and managers of election there appears to be no adequate provision to insure fidelity and honesty of action or to punish derelictions of duty.

The committee have felt bound, however, to follow the law as it stands.

So the committee recommended the following:

Resolved, That contestant be allowed to withdraw his contest without prejudice.

This resolution was agreed to by the House.[1]

968. The South Carolina election case of Smalls v. Tillmmui, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Discussion as to the sufficiency of returns and the validity of the State canvass based thereon.

The driving of voters from the polls by armed force in the majority of the precincts of a county caused the rejection of the returns of the entire county.

It being impossible to determine from the evidence what votes had been returned in the few honest precincts of a county, the entire county returns were rejected.

On June 29, 1882;[2] Mr. John T. Wait, of Connecticut, submitted from the Committee on Elections the report of the majority of that committee in the South Carolina case of Smalls v. Tillman.

At the outset the majority discussed a question as to the sufficiency of the returns and canvass on which the certificate of sitting Member was based; but did not assume to determine the case on the conclusions which they reached.

The South Carolina law of 1868 provided for a board of State canvassers, and three sections of that law provided:

SEC. 24. The board, when thus formed, shall, upon the certified copies of the statements made by the board of county canvassers, proceed to make a statement of the whole number of votes given at such election for the various officers, and for each of them voted for, distinguishing the several counties in which they were given. They shall certify such statements to be correct, and subscribe the same with their proper names.

SEC. 25. They shall make and subscribe, on the proper statement, a certificate of their determination, and shall deliver the same to the secretary of state.

SEC. 26. Upon such statements they shall then proceed to determine and declare what persons have been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to such offices or either of them. They shall have power, and it is made their duty, to decide all cases under protest or contest that may arise when the power to do so does not by the constitution reside in some other body.

Sitting Member claimed that under the above law "the certified copies of the statements made by the board of county canvassers" were the only legal data necessary to enable the State convassers to declare the result.

The majority report says:

Under the act of 1868 the precinct non delivered the boxes containing the ballots and the poll lists to the county board of canvassers within three days after the election, and this board counted them upon the following Tuesday and made up their statements, transmitting them by mail, one each to the governor, comptroller, and secretary of state.

In view of a contest before the House these provisions became the subject of severe animadversions, and in 1872 an act was passed providing that all elections shall be regulated and conducted according to the rules, principles, and provisions therein and "all conflicting" acts are repealed.

Now the principal provisions of this law are:

First. That the ballots shall be counted by the precinct managers as soon as the polls are closed, and that the boxes containing the ballots shall be sent to the county board; and, second, that a statement of the county board of canvassers should be sent by a special messenger, with the returns, poll lists, and all papers appertaining to the election, addressed to the governor and secretary of state. Under the law of 1868 the ballots were liable to be tampered with after the polls closed and during the interval before they were counted, and the county board of canvassers was wholly without check upon their statement.

The act of 1872 takes from the county board the counting of the votes and devolves that duty upon the precinct managers, and requires that it be done publicly at the closing of the polls. It also places a check upon the aggregated statement of the county board by requiring that the returns, poll lists, and all papers appertaining to the election be sent by a special messenger, addressed to the governor and secretary of state. To use the terms of the act itself, the "principle" contained in this "provision" is a check upon the opportunity of the county board to perpetrate fraud, and all acts in any way conflicting with the rules, principles, and provisions are repealed. It is unquestionable that if the State board is to make up its statement of the vote of the district solely upon the statements of the county boards, aggregating the votes of each of the counties, there is no check whatever upon the statements of the county boards, and the "rules and principles" are defeated, and there is no purpose whatever in sending by a special messenger "the returns, poll lists, and all papers appertaining to the election" to the governor and secretary of state. This provision is a part of a remedial statute, and is to be liberally construed, and all acts "in any way conflicting with its rules, principles, and provisions" are repealed. By no canon or rule of construction can this provision of the remedial amendatory act be thrown away.

But if the section 24 of the act of 1868 is not thereby repealed, the two acts must be construed in pari materia, and the State board of canvassers should make up their statement of the vote of the district from the certified copies of the statements made by the board of county canvassers, and from the precinct "returns, poll lists, and all papers appertaining to the election."

These, then, become together the data upon which the State board of canvassers make up their statement whereon the certificate is based. If it is based upon anything else, or only upon a portion of the data prescribed by law, it is without legal validity as regards the election of a Member of Congress; and this, wholly independently of the question as to whether this is done fraudulently, ignorantly, or is a mere casus omissus.

The party relying upon such a certificate must prove his vote aliunde. In this case there is a peculiar and most forcible illustration of the wisdom of this requirement that the precinct return and poll list shall accompany the statement of the board of county canvassers, for this board has no judicial authority. This is admitted by counsel on both sides. Yet in two counties they have assumed to exercise judicial powers in throwing out entire boxes and in not counting the vote polled for Congress at others, and without any pretense of cause. And in consequence of the failure of the county boards of these counties to send to the governor and secretary of state the precinct returns and poll lists, as they are specifically required to do by law, the official data is wanting upon which to add the vote at these several boxes. In the three counties of Edgefield, Colleton, and Barnwell the legal data by which the frauds of county boards of canvassers is intended to be detected and corrected, and which forms an important part of the basis on which the Member's certificate of election is based, has been deliberately withheld and suppressed. There is no official data by which to fix the vote at polls which have been fraudulently omitted from the count, in contravention of the plain letter of the statute, and the construction placed thereon for years past by the court of last resort in that State. And, on the other hand, there are polls which should be rejected from the count for gross illegalities and fraud in the management thereof and others for violence and intimidation; but, in consequence of the illegal suppression of the data required by law, it is impossible to ascertain how these polls were counted in the statement as made up by the State board from the aggregate furnished by these three county boards.

The principle is correct and sound, and is well settled, that when the reliability of the official statement is destroyed, whether for fraud, for ignorant neglect of legal duty, or because made up from insufficient, illegal, or fraudulent data, it must be disregarded as evidence. But the vote of the electors is not lost because the pretended statement of it is defective, illegal, and unreliable, but it may be proven aliunde.

It is clearly established that the State board had not "the precinct returns, poll lists, and all other papers appertaining to the election" before it at the time it made up its statement on which the certificate of election was given to contestee; and it is equally well established that that board made up its statement merely from the aggregated statement of the county board, without any of the legal data with which to correct their errors or detect their frauds. It is strenuously claimed for the contestant that these returns, poll lists, etc., were essential factors, and that the want of them destroyed the validity of the statement of the State board absolutely, whilst for the contestee it is urged that the law of 1868 remains unchanged as to the State board.

The committee has not deemed it necessary to decide this legal question, as there are other questions, both of law and fact, which enter into the case, and, as they think, control it.

The minority [1] do not agree to this, either as to fact or theory;

Our colleagues, the majority of the second subcommittee, will find themselves to have been wholly misled as to the facts in their statement at page 3 of their report, that these boards "assumed to exercise judicial powers in throwing out entire boxes, and in not counting the vote polled for Congressman at others, and without any pretense of cause." They did not throw out a single box, nor did they fail to canvass the vote for Congressman of any precinct from which the managers sent up any return to be canvassed.

The contestant's third charge is that from the three counties of Barnwell, Colleton, and Edgefield the returns and poll list were not forwarded to the governor and secretary of state by the chairman of the boards of county canvassers of those counties, as directed by law; and that this omission upon the part of the chairmen, whether originating in fraud or in ignorant neglect of legal duty, destroyed the reliability of the official statements by those boards of the result of the election in those counties, from which statements the board of State canvassers made up their statement of the result of the election in the Fifth Congressional district.

Strictly speaking, there is no competent evidence that there was any such omission as charged. As a matter of fact, however, it appears that the election officers in some counties of the State, having construed the requirements to forward the returns and poll list "to the governor and secretary of state," as imposing the duty of sending one set of those papers to the governor and a duplicate set to the secretary of state, the latter officer, just prior to the election, issued a circular to the effect that it was not necessary to send poll lists to the secretary of state, which instruction, it would seem, was understood by the chairmen of the boards of canvassers in the three counties named as dispensing with the necessity of sending up such papers at all.

If it be conceded, however, that these papers were not sent up from the three counties in question, as directed by law, and even if it were held—though there is no shadow of testimony to that effect—that the omission was willful, there are two propositions which, to the undersigned, appear to be too clear to admit of an intelligent difference of opinion as to them, viz: (a) That such omission can not be held to have the effect of invalidating the reliability of the official statements of the result of the election made by the county boards of canvassers, as contended by the contestant; and, (b) That such omission could not possibly have in any manner affected the rights of the contestant, for the reason that the State board of canvassers could not have considered those papers had they been sent up as directed.

(a) By reference to section 4 of the amendment to the election law of South Carolina, of March 17, 1872, quoted above, it will be seen that the duty of forwarding the papers in question is imposed, not upon the county board of canvassers, but, after its final adjournment, upon the individual who had been its chairman. Upon what possible principle can it be said that any omission of duty, whether fraudulent or merely negligent, upon the part of such individual, after the board of which he was chairman has finally adjourned and gone out of existence, shall destroy, or in any manner invalidate the reliability or legal effect of the concurrent, unanimous, official act of the entire board, Republican and Democratic members alike?

(b) The papers in question, it will be further observed, are directed to be forwarded, not to the State board of canvassers, but to the governor and secretary of state. The governor is not even a member of the State board; and, although the secretary of state is, yet not only is there no direction that the papers in question shall be submitted to, or considered by, that board, but as will be seen by reference to the law prescribing the duties of the State board, quoted above, they are expressly and specifically required to make up their statement "upon the certified copies of the statements made by the board of county canvassers," and upon those statements it is enacted that they shall "proceed to determine and declare what persons have been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to such offices," etc.

Upon these grounds, therefore, we hold it to be clear, beyond the possibility of an intelligent difference of opinion, that the omission of the three individuals who had served as chairmen of the boards of canvassers in the three counties of Edgefield, Colleton, and Barnwell to send the returns and poll lists from those counties, after the adjournment of their respective boards, to the governor and secretary of state, is not even an element to be considered in this case. It has absolutely no possible bearing, either one way or the other, upon the rights of either of the parties to this contest. The sending of them up could not have benefited either, nor can the omission to do so justly injure either.

The majority appear rather to base their decision on other features of the case.

The sitting Member had received, by the official returns, a majority of 8,038 over contestant in the six counties of the district. The majority of the committee found that in fact contestant had received a majority of 1,489.

The following decisions brought about this result:

(1) The rejection of the entire returns of the county of Edgefield, which gave 6,467 votes to sitting Member and 1,046 to contestant.

The majority cite testimony to show that the partisans of sitting Member, who were the white voters principally, took possession of polls at precincts in this county, and by force and arms prevented contestant's supporters, who were largely colored men, from voting. Eleven precincts are enumerated where there was violence, varying from browbeating of voters at one poll while the local military company stood by, to the driving off of voters by squads of armed men at another poll. One supporter of contestant was killed. At two precincts the papers and poll lists of the supervisors were taken away. The report thus summarizes the action as to five other precincts, and to the county as a whole:

With the boxes containing the ballots, and from all but one of them the poll lists also, before them the county board refused to count or include in the statement the vote of five precincts, to wit, Etheridges Store, Perrys Crossroads, Colemans Crossroads, Caughmens Store, and Liberty Hill. In this they clearly transcended their powers under the law. The testimony most conclusively shows that in the county the whites were Democrats and the colored people were voting or trying to vote the Republican ticket. The testimony shows that 3,020 Republicans were at the polls in this county anxiously trying to vote and who were prevented by force from doing so. The contest was to keep the colored people from voting, for the nature of their vote was unquestionable. The census taken the year of this election shows whites over 21 years, 3,553; colored, 5,648. Yet it is claimed the contestee received 6,467 votes and the contestant only 1,046. Had every white voter in the county, therefore, actually voted for the contestee he could not have gotten this vote by 2,877, and the utter absurdity of the proposition that this or any considerable number of colored people voted for the contestee is fully established by the testimony; and this fact also illustrates the conclusiveness of the proofs which have induced your committee, after a thorough and careful consideration of the testimony, to conclude that there was no legal and valid election held in the county of Edgefield on the 2d of November, 1880; that the will of the electors was suppressed by violence and intimidation, and that the pretended count and canvass of the vote is involved in an inextricable confusion of fraud, and that the records which should establish the truth in regard to it have been illegally suppressed.

In the debate it was claimed by the minority that the majority had, by rejecting the whole county, rejected certain precincts, nine in number, against which there was no insinuation of irregularity. In answer to this it was replied that there was not a particle of evidence before the committee or the House, or returned by the managers, to show how any one of the nine precincts voted.[1] So, it being impossible to purge the county vote, the whole was thrown out.

The minority denied that the testimony showed what was claimed by the contestant.

969. The case of Small v. Tillman, continued.

Evidence showing that a county was divided politically on the color line, incompatibility between the returns and the census was admitted to impeach the election and the returns.

Instance wherein returns of a former election were cited to corroborate proof of intimidation and fraud.

(2) By purging the vote of Aiken County. The official returns in this county had given Tillman 4,980 votes and Smalls 1,467. The majority, after making corrections, found this vote to be: Tillman, 3,409; Smalls, 1,058. This result was brought about by rejecting the returns of four precincts where intimidation was shown.

Thus, at Aiken Court-House red pepper was thrown in the eyes of voters, some were cut with knives, a piece of artillery was trained on the voters, and the local military company, either as an organization or as individuals, acted with the mob. There was evidence also that the ballot boxes were stuffed. At other places voters were driven off, ballots for contestant forcibly confiscated, shots were fired, and supervisors representing contestant's party were driven off.

The majority conclude as to this county:

> The statements represent this county as casting 6,447 votes, whereas by the census of the same year there were only 5,985 males over 21 years of age, so that if every elector had voted there are 562 more votes than voters, and this, too, in the face of the fact that hundreds of voters were excluded from the polls. The testimony shows that in this county the vote was essentially upon the color line, and according to the census of the same year there were only 2,873 white males over 21 years old, so that if everyone had voted for contestee it would require 2,107 colored votes to have given the contestee the 4,980 votes claimed for him.
> In 1876 both parties had a full national, State, and county ticket in nomination, and the campaign is historic, yet the whole vote of this county that year was only 4,820. The pretended vote of 1880 is an increase of 1,627, indicating an increase of more than 25 per cent of votes for a campaign in which only a national ticket was run, and yet as an illustration it may be noted that at Silverton precinct in 1880 not a single Republican vote is reported, while in 1876 it counted 232 for the present contestant and only 182 for present contestee. In 1876, at Aiken Court-House, the contestant received a majority of 327 over the present contestee, whilst in 1880 the present contestee is reported to have received a majority of 336.

(3) For similar reasons the majority rejected the returns of four precincts in Hampton County, where intimidation and fraud were considered to be proven. As to this county the majority conclude:

> It is a curious and very contradictory fact that, whilst it is claimed and certified that 4,165 votes were polled and counted in this county, the census shows that there were only 3,828 males over 21 years. This, too, in the face of the testimony that a large number of voters were driven from the polls without voting. By the census the white males 21 years old were only 1,381, whilst the vote certified for the contestee is 2,590, and this, too, when his friends and adherents were riding over the county on the night previous and on the day of election, uniformed and armed, threatening, beating, and shooting the colored people to prevent them from voting the Republican ticket.

[1] See debate, Record, p. 6216.

There is absolutely no testimony of colored men voting the Democratic ticket which will in anywise explain the statement. The only attempt at an organization of colored Democrats is shown in the testimony of George Bellinger (p. 557), in which he says the largest number ever answering were 22, and in his statement of the officers is Daniel Platts, as vice-president, who testifies (p. 412) that he did not vote that ticket and joined a Republican club, in which he remained during the campaign. The utter failure of the colored Democratic club is fully shown on page 416. Indeed, it would be most extraordinary if any number of colored people should vote the Democratic ticket, in view of the overwhelming testimony of the lawless violence of "the red-shirt Democracy, "not only in this county but in four others of this district.

The only way by which such a statement of the vote of this county can be explained is by the method illustrated so well at Brunson's, as to the facts of which the Democratic manager and supervisor, as well as Republicans, testify. On the first count this box contained "something over 500;" the excess over the poll list "was near 200" (see testimony of Democratic supervisor, p. 101), whilst the manager (Democratic) who drew them out says, "that excess was about 232" (p. 100). And yet this box is certified to as containing 356 legal votes, and it is on such official statements that the contestee has received the certificate and now occupies a seat in the House as the Representative from this Congressional district.

(4) For intimidation Allendale precinct, in Barnwell County, was rejected.

970. The case of Small v. Tillman, continued.

The Elections Committee corrected a return wherein testimony of bystanders showed that partisan election officers had acted unfairly in drawing from the box an excess of ballots.

The House corrected the act of local canvassers who, without judicial power, threw out a poll.

The House took into account the loss occasioned by failure of election officers to open a poll at a regular polling place.

Polls being illegally closed, the House took into account the injury resulting to contestant thereby.

Although fraud and intimidation in a district had been very extensive, the House preferred seating contestant to declaring the seat vacant.

(5) The official returns of Colleton County had given Tillman 3,475 and Smalls 2,776. The conclusions of the majority of the committee were that Tillman was entitled to 3,385 and Smalls 3,760. The reasons for these changes are given in the report:

The testimony shows conclusively that the mode of managing this poll was most unfair; that the managers were under control of the Democratic county chairman, who was also chairman of the commissioners of election, who appointed all of the managers from one party, and appeared also as the attorney for the contestee. The following extracts show something of the methods resorted to:

Testimony of William A. Paul (p. 336):

"At the opening of the ballot box the managers found the box to contain 1,036 ballots; at the closing of the polls the amount of the poll list was 895 ballots; the excess found in the box was 141, according to my account. After the box was opened the managers were quite undecided as to how they would stir the votes up, and they were for some time devising a plan how they could mix them so as to take out the excess over the poll list and to take out a majority of Republican ballots if possible, which they succeeded in doing; and I found after they had commenced to draw the ballots from the box when they would draw out two Democrat ballots and destroy them they would draw out from five to six Republican ballots and destroy them also; and one of the managers was blindfolded who was required to draw the ballots, and turning his back to the table upon which the box was placed, the box being set into a large stick basket, the box not being able to hold the ballots after being thoroughly stirred, they then stirred the ballots into this basket, from which they drew the excess of the poll list. The manager who was required to do the drawing deliberately passed the ballots through his hands; by so doing one ballot was easily distinguished from another; they succeeded nicely in carrying out their premeditated plan."

Also the testimony of Daniel Sanders (p. 370):

"Then came the confusion about the votes; both Republicans and Democrats crowded around the box; the box was opened in the presence of all; the law was furnished the managers how they should proceed before counting votes; the box was so full that the ballots could not be mixed according to law. The box was set into a stick basket; one of the managers tried to mix the votes in the box, and he failed to mix them, and then emptied the votes into the basket. Then the managers got confused how they would mix them; they stirred them up; they brought two-thirds of the tickets, as well as I could see; to the top were Republican tickets; then the managers commenced drawing; they drew for a while from the top, and, as well as I could see, the manager sometimes would draw from the bottom. All this occurred after counting the number of ballots in the box. There was, to my recollection, 140 ballots in excess of the names on the poll list; then the ballots were put back into the box—130 drawn out, to the best of my recollection. While drawing, or before drawing, they were stirred up again in the same basket; then one of the managers was blindfolded; he drew out about 20 Democratic ballots—would not be positive to that number—and the balance were Republican ballots."

It is clear that there were from 90 to 110 votes illegally taken from the contestant at this poll, and the same number illegally given to the contestee.

The entire conduct of the election in Colleton is most discreditable to those who had it in charge. Except one Republican on the county board, appointed by the governor, and who was outvoted by the other two, every election officer was appointed from the contestee's partisans, save one manager at Green Pond poll, and their sole purpose, apparently, was to subserve his interests. Three large Republican precincts—Adams Run, Ashepoo, and Bennetts Point—having been abolished, this vote was thrown to Gloversville and Jacksonborough. The Democratic managers at Gloversville did not open the poll on the day of election, and to Jacksonborough the commissioner sent the smaller of two sizes of boxes. At 1 o'clock this box was full of ballots.

It contained 618, and the managers refused to use another, though over 100 Republican voters were standing at the polls waiting to vote, and others were in sight approaching. Whilst neither the county nor State board had under the plain wording of the statute, which has been construed by the State court of last resort, any judicial power as to the vote for Congressman, yet they threw out this box, depriving the contestant of not less than 618 votes, and without any assigned, known, or apparent reason the board failed to canvass the 276 votes polled for contestant at Horse Pen. (Record, pp. 353–357, and 378, and following.)

Besides the failure to open the Gloversville poll, whereby contestant lost 400 votes, the testimony shows that he lost 700 more by the failure to open the Summerville poll, where a large number were actually present and listed; besides more than a hundred votes were lost by illegally closing the poll at Jacksonborough.

At Delams, also, the manager failed to open the poll, whilst at Sniders Cross-Roads, Smoaks Cross-Roads, and Carters Ford the supervisors were hindered and obstructed in the discharge of their official duties. At Maple Cane 26 Democratic ballots were stuffed into the box and 25 Republican were withdrawn, whereby the contestant lost that number of legal ballots, and the same number were left to be, and were, counted for the contestee.

At Bells Cross-Roads 31 of contestant's votes were withdrawn and a like number of fraudulent ones counted for the contestee. In this county alone it is shown that from 1,400 to 1,800 Republican voters were deprived of an opportunity of voting by failure to open and illegally closing polls, whilst 223 fraudulent ballots were stuffed into the boxes.

The minority in this county, as in other counties, take exceptions to the conclusions which the majority draw from the testimony. They also say:

The election law of South Carolina, as quoted above, provides that if more votes are found in the ballot box than there are names on the poll list all the ballots shall be returned to the box and thoroughly mixed together, and that one of the managers, or the clerk, without seeing the ballots, shall thereupon draw therefrom and immediately destroy as many ballots as there are in excess of the number of names on the poll list. At a number of precincts in the Fifth Congressional district of South Carolina excessive ballots were found in the boxes and were drawn out by a blindfolded manager, as required by law. And the only testimony in the record tending to prove the above charge on behalf of contestant is the allegations of some of his witnesses that discrimination was made in drawing out this excess of ballots at certain precincts, through which the contestant lost more than his due proportion of the votes cast for him. On the other hand, as to every precinct save one against which this charge is made, the officer who drew out the excess, and one or more of the other officers who witnessed it, were produced, and testified that the drawing was in strict conformity with the requirements of the law, done publicly, without seeing the ballots, without discrimination, and with perfect fairness. And whether tested by their means of knowledge, their intelligence, their social standing and character, or any other of the tests which are applied in nonpartisan, fair, judicial investigation, where the witnesses irreconcilably differ, no man who will read the record can hesitate to believe that the witnesses produced on behalf of the contestee are entitled to superior credit. There is absolutely no unpartisan, nonpolitical test which can possibly lead to any other conclusion.

It is to be further observed here that there is no testimony whatever tending to fix the responsibility for the excess of ballots upon the contestee's adherents. Republicans charge it upon the Democrats, and the Democrats charge it upon the Republicans; but there is no proof, nor anything which is offered as proof, by either side upon the subject. No single witness on either side claims to have either seen or heard of a "tissue ballot," or any other device for the purpose of creating an excess.

In accordance with their conclusions, the majority reported these resolutions:

Resolved, That George D. Tillman was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in this House.

Resolved, That Robert Small was duly elected as a Representative from the Fifth Congressional district of South Carolina in the Forty-seventh Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

The minority declined to concede that the election of contestant could be shown.

The report was debated on July 18 and 19, 1882,[1] and on the latter day a substitute amendment proposed by the minority and confirming the title of sitting Member was rejected, without division.

The question recurring on the first resolution proposed by the majority, it was agreed to, yeas 145, nays 1, the minority generally refraining from voting, to break a quorum, and the Speaker voting to make one.

Then the second resolution was agreed to, yeas 141, nays 5.[2]

Mr. Smalls then took the oath.

971. The Maine election case of Anderson v. Reed, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

There being no suggestion that sitting Member was implicated in alleged bribery, and the amount alleged not being decisive, the House did not give weight to the charges.

The House will not overrule the decisions of honest election officers on conflicting testimony as to qualifications of voters.

Common rumor of an indefinite amount of intimidation of workingmen by employers was disregarded by the House.

[2] Among those voting in the negative on the second resolution was Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Elections. This may be taken as an indication that he thought the seat should be declared vacant, but it does not appear that he gave any reasons.

On July 18, 1882,[1] Mr. George C. Hazelton, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the Maine case of Anderson v. Reed.

Sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 123 votes over contestant. The three objections urged by contestant were thus discussed by the committee:

(1) As to the charge of bribery, the report says:

No suggestion or intimation is made of any complicity or even knowledge on the part of the sitting Member. Whoever was bribed voted for the Member of Congress simply because his name was on the general ticket. The number of cases alleged by the contestant seem to be but 7, of which 1 is proved by the statement of the man bribed, which are not contradicted. The rest are in dispute and rest on rather vague evidence.

(2) As to the admission and rejection of certain votes. The law of Maine made it an essential prerequisite to the right of voting that the voter's name should be on the check list, which is the registry of the names of voters. The report says:

The contestant claims that a number of voters voted for Reed who had no right to, and another number who would have voted for Anderson were not allowed so to do. These numbers if added together he claims would overcome the 123 plurality.

It is to be observed in regard to all these cases that there are no allegations of fraud or willful wrong, only that the selectmen erred in judgment. It is an appeal from those who, especially in the towns, were perfectly conversant with the status of every voter to Congress, on evidence taken in depositions.

The nature of some of this evidence may be inferred from the following extracts from contestant's brief:

"At Falmouth it is both affirmed and denied that Dayen, Stone, and True, who voted for Reed, were nonresidents or paupers, and that the votes refused to Anderson of Murray, Reynolds, and Black were lawful ones (pp. 131 to 133, and 206–207, 215–217, and 293–294). The officials to decide were partisans of Reed.

"At Standish, McKenzie, a nonresident, voted for Reed. Cotton voted for Reed, and says he was not bribed (p. 291); though his father supposed it to be an admitted fact that he was (p. 150). Merrill, of Washington, voted for Reed at Brighton, where his residence is both denied and affirmed (pp. 160–162 and 315, 348, 364).

"At Westhook the evidence sharply conflicts as to the right of Hoegg and others to vote for Reed (pp. 117 and 249–250).

"At Otisfield, Pike and McNeil voted for Reed. It is positively affirmed and denied that they were nonresidents (pp. 51 and 330–335).

"At Gorham, Ney, Rowe, and Shaw, nonresidents, voted for Reed (p. 163). And Bacon and Hall's votes refused to Anderson (p. 162). An attempted explanation will be found on page 297. Ney's name was added on election day; and a witness says Hall admitted he was not a voter (p. 222)."

These examples will be found on pages 10 and 11 of contestant's brief.

An examination of the testimony will show that every case is a disputed one which has been settled on testimony more or less conflicting by men who, as selectmen of the town, were thoroughly familiar with all the facts, and in the open town meeting, in the presence of men who also knew all the facts. To overrule such decisions in the absence of any suggestion whatever of bad faith would need something more than conflicting evidence. There was another class of cases in Portland where it does appear that a small number of voters lost their rights because of a failure to look after their registry. But this is shown on both sides, and was evidently the result of carelessness on the part of the voter and such accidents as must occur in a registry of more than 7,000 votes.

It should be added that cases of similar proof were shown on the part of the contestee, both as to the class of omitted voters and as to the cases of bribery, but we have not deemed it necessary to particularize, because the contestant on the testimony does not make out his own case.

(3) "As to intimidation," says the report, "the evidence falls far short."

Third. As to the chance of intimidation, the evidence falls far short of substantiating the charge. It consists mostly of hearsay and rumors, and does not disclose a single instance of violence or even threatened violence. A common report "that men would lose their job" if they did not vote as their superiors directed, and the testimony generally referred to in contestant's brief (pp. 4 and 5) hardly constitute such an overthrow of men's wills and determinations as can be taken notice of by the law.

Therefore the committee recommended resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat. The resolutions were agreed to by the House without division on debate.

972. The Mississippi election case of Buchannon v. Manning, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Illustration of specifications so vague as to destroy the validity of the notice of contest.

Although insufficiency of the contestant's notice might preclude an award of the seat to him, it might not preclude declaration of a vacancy after examination of the testimony.

On January 29, 1883,[2] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Mississippi case of Buchanan v. Manning.

In his reply to the notice of contest sitting Member had objected—that said notice is so insufficient and defective that I need not deny or admit the allegation therefor, for the reasons, to wit, said notice does not specify particularly the grounds upon which you rely and gives no reasons for failing to do so.

Second. The allegations are only conclusions of law and general averment of wrongdoing in some undefined portions of the district, by unnamed election officials of precincts not specified, in unnamed counties, or by persons not named or described, and in places and by means not specified, and in violation of laws and the rights of others not designated.

Third. Your allegations are so vague and uncertain that I am not informed as to the persons or officials whom you accuse of crimes, nor where committed, nor do you aver that such wrongdoings were not instigated by you, or that they were known to or acquiesced in by me, or that the result of the election was changed by reason of the matter set forth.

The first specification in contestant's notice was:

That in a portion of the counties comprising said district such persons were not appointed, neither was such representation given to the different political parties in said counties, in the appointment of county commissioners of election, as was designed and required by law.

Jones v. Shelley, Alabama. (Vol. I, sec. 714.)

[2] Second session Forty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 1891; 2 Ellsworth, p. 287. It appears that the minority views received a number as a separate report (No. 1890) when presented in the House, Journal, p. 328.

The majority in their report seem to consider this specification as admissible:

The machinery of elections by the Mississippi code is placed in the hands of the governor. He appoints the county commissioners of election, who in turn appoint the precinct election officers. The precinct officers make return of the vote cast in the different precincts to the county board, who in turn make their report to the secretary of state.

By section—of the Mississippi election law the different political parties are to have representation on said board. It ought to be carried out in good faith, and the different political parties ought to be represented on the election board. It is a duty incumbent upon the executive to see that this provision of law is carried out. It has been found in many of the States of the Union that a provision in the election laws similar to this is a safeguard against frauds and ballot-box stuffing.

The second specification was:

That in a portion of the counties comprising said district, election districts were abolished and other election districts established, without complying with and in violation of law.

The majority report says:

This allegation is clearly insufficient, as being too vague and general. It would have been an easy matter to have named the precincts, and pointed out how the acts complained of tended to prevent a fair election.

The third specification—

That in a portion of the counties comprising said district the registration of voters was not conducted as required by law, thereby depriving a large number of persons (of lawful right) of the privilege of registering and voting.

is condemned by the report as "uncertain, vague, and wholly insufficient." The fourth specification is condemned for similar reasons.

The fifth specification:

That in several of the counties comprising said district a large number of persons lawfully entitled to register were refused registration, and that the registration and transferring of voters was discontinued many days prior to the time contemplated by law, thereby depriving a large number of persons lawfully entitled to register (or to transfer) from the right of registering and transferring and voting; and that in a portion of said counties the registration books were for a time removed from the place designated by law for their keeping, thereby depriving a large number of persons (of lawful right) of the privilege of registering (or transferring) and voting.

The report says of this:

This allegation is too general. The particular places and the acts complained of should have been specifically set out. The same may be said with reference to the sixth allegation in the notice of contest.

The seventh:

That at many of the voting places United States supervisors of election were not permitted to exercise the duties of their office, being prevented therefrom by the unlawful interference of other officers of election, or from other sources, in violation of law, and to such an extent as to prevent their ascertaining the result of the election and from performing other duties required of them by law; that no separate lists of the names of voters were kept by the clerks of election, as was required by law; that the polls were not opened at the time required by law, were not kept open continuously from 9 a.m. till 6 p.m., as required by law, and that upon the closing of the polls the counting of the vote and making up of returns was not done at the voting places nor at the time required by law.

The report concludes as to this specification:

The seventh ground of contest alleges that at many of the voting places United States supervisors of election were not permitted to exercise the duties of their office, and were prevented therefrom by unlawful interference by the other officers of election (we presume State officers). This charge is general, and it does not specify any particular voting place in the district where these acts occurred; but, perhaps, if any such unlawful interference is shown to have existed at any of the voting places, the committee would be justified in considering the allegation amended so as to make it conform to the proof, unless it were shown that thereby an injustice because of the insufficiency had accrued to the contestee.

The eighth:

That at many of the voting places ballots were received and counted that were not lawful ballots in form and print; that inspectors of election rejected and refused to count ballots that were lawful after the same had been lawfully deposited in the ballot boxes; that inspectors of election (with knowledge of the fact at the time) permitted ballots to be voted that were not lawful ballots; that during the hours prescribed by law for voting, voters were harassed and disturbed in such manner as to prevent their voting in a free, fair, untrammeled, and peaceable manner.

This is also condemned:

The eighth ground of contest challenges the form and print of the tickets, but it is not pointed out specifically in what the illegality consisted. And the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth grounds of contest are open to the same objections.

The majority therefore hold that with the single exception stated, "under the uniform rulings of this committee and the House," and in accordance with the precedent in the case of Duffy v. Mason, "the notice of contest would be held clearly insufficient."

"We prefer, however," says the report, "not to rest our decision of this case upon the sufficiency of the pleadings, for if the testimony taken in the case develops the fact that the sitting Member was not elected, it would be our duty to so report, although the contestant might not be entitled to his seat, having failed to comply with the law with respect to the sufficiency of his notice."

The minority views, presented by Mr. William G. Thompson, of Iowa, also say on this point:

It will be observed that in the beginning the contestee claimed that the notice of contest was insufficient, and has insisted for that cause that the case should be dismissed.

In whatever manner any failure of proper notice might affect the right of contestant in this case (for insufficiency of pleading), if upon examination of the facts in the case it appear that the sitting Member is not entitled to a seat it is the duty of the committee to so report.

973. The case of Buchanam v. Manning, continued.

Discussion as to kind and quality of evidence needed to establish a general conspiracy against a ballot box in a district.

Discussion of the validity of census tables as creating presumptions in a case involving a constituency divided politically on the color line.

The proof of one corrupted vote going into a ballot box does not invalidate the whole.

The House is reluctant, on allegations of general conspiracy of election officers, to reject unimpeached returns because other returns are shown to be fraudulent.

Although illiterate election officers seemed to have been appointed purposely, yet the House was reluctant to reject their returns when the safeguard of Federal inspectors had existed.

As to the merits of the case, it appeared from the official returns that the vote of the district was divided among three candidates, as follows: Manning, 15,255; Buchanan, 9,996; Harris, 3,585.

The minority of the committee, who recommended resolutions declaring neither contestant nor sitting Member entitled to the seat, found from the census that there was probably a majority of 2,600 colored voters in the district, as compared with white voters, and became satisfied from the evidence that colored voters belonged to contestant's party, while the white voters were divided between sitting Member and the third candidate. The minority views say:

It is further clearly proven that quite a number of white voters did not go to the polls. (See evidence, Howze, p. 19; Newsom, p. 22.)

It is further proven that contestant received a number of white votes, and yet, according to the returns, the contestee is credited with 15,215 votes, which is manifestly impossible under the circumstances.

On the other hand, the contestant is credited with only 9,996 votes, while there are 19,800 colored voters in the district, who, according to the proof of contestee's own friends, were all solid for contestant, and came to the polls and voted or offered to vote.

This again is a manifest impossibility. This at once throws suspicion on the fairness of the count, and when the whole of the election machinery was in the hands of contestee's friends the burden of showing the fairness of the count should be upon him when a reasonable doubt of fairness has been established by the proof.

The minority conceive that a conspiracy existed, made possible by the appointment of election officers almost entirely of sitting member's party, although the other parties asked representation, and carried out through corrupt administration of the registration laws, through intimidation, through fraud aided by connivance with election officers, through establishment of new polling places, by the appointment of illiterate men to represent contestant's party on boards of election officers. The minority thus sum up:

First. The appointment of illiterate officers of election is such a manifest disregard of duty and violation of statute law as to render void the whole appointment of election officers. One of the essential duties of county commissioners and precinct inspectors is to sign and certify the returns, and their duty can not be performed by a person who can not read and write. Where three persons are named in a statute as necessary to perform an official duty, all must be appointed and all must act, though a majority may control. (See Ballard v. Davis, 2 George's Miss. Reports; also authorities heretofore cited.) Hence the appointment of illiterate inspectors and commissioners of election would vitiate the whole appointment and destroy the election.

Second. But we do not wish to rest our report on so technical a ground, and hence we hold that the appointment of illiterate inspectors and commissioners takes away from the return of the election officers that presumption of truth which otherwise it would have, and a party claiming a seat on the return of such officers must show the utmost good faith in the election.

Third. In the case before us, first, the action of the governor and State board, their refusal to allow the opposition party to name any of the election commissioners; second, the same action of the part of the county commissioners in appointing the precinct inspectors; third, the appointment of corrupt and illiterate officers; fourth, the systematic adjournments of the election without sufficient cause; fifth, the premature closing of the registration books, and refusal to register Republican voters, the erasing of names of Republican voters already registered, and the forgery of poll books; sixth, the failure to openly count the vote at the closing of the polls; seventh, the changing of polling places; eighth, the abandonment of ballot boxes during adjournment, and of their carrying off to private houses during adjournment; the interference with and exclusion of United States supervisors; ninth, the fact that these practices were in counties having large Republican majorities, are conclusive evidence of a conspiracy to defraud.

This being a conspiracy to defraud, there being proof of fraud at a number of precincts, and the illiterate inspectors leaving the door open to unlimited fraud, and there being no proof by contestee of good faith in the election, it must be set aside.

The majority of the committee do not agree to such propositions:

It has been strenuously contended that there is some evidence uncontradicted and which tends to establish a conspiracy among the Democrats of the district, which resulted in the returning of the vote as heretofore given for Manning, and the suppression of the true vote given for the contestant and Mr. Harris, the Greenback candidate. This is founded upon the fact that the colored vote in the district exceeded the white vote, and that it was solidly Republican, and that it was cast, or ought to have been cast, for Mr. Buchanan; that the white vote was divided between the sitting Member and the Greenback candidate, Mr. Harris. To establish this, census tables have been resorted to, and other evidence has been introduced tending to show that there was a general turnout of Republican at the election, while there was much indifference on the part of Democratic voters.

The case of Spencer v. Morey, decided in Forty-fourth Congress, Miscellaneous Cases, Volume V, page 438, adverted to by contestant in his brief, can not be regarded by us as an authority in this or any other case. So far as we have been able to study it, it stands alone in the line of contested election cases. We do not believe that proof of one corrupted vote going into a ballot box is like "a drop of poison in a bowl of water, which contaminates the whole of it, and can not be separated from that which remains pure."

The duty of the House is to separate the honest from the dishonest vote; to purge all ballot boxes of illegal votes; to administer a rebuke to the voters of any precinct who permit the voice of the people to be stifled or suppressed; and to enable the House to do this a contestant should produce testimony of specific acts in order to show the wrong which he complains of. It can not be done by general, vague, and uncertain allegations and charges. There is some proof introduced to establish these various points, but it is very general, and consists largely of the opinion of witnesses, and is not of such a character that the committee feel justified in finding that a general conspiracy against the ballot box was practiced. It seems to your committee that if any such practice prevailed the United States supervisors appointed for the purpose of preventing such frauds could and would have given information whereby they could have been specifically proven.

Your committee have not hesitated to recommend to the House the throwing out of all the boxes where frauds, intimidation, or ballot-box stuffing have been proven, but it would be unsafe to assume from the testimony in this case that other frauds had been committed by the election officers not specifically shown or proven in any tangible or definite manner.

As to illiterate election officers, the majority say:

There is no doubt in our minds, from the evidence in this case, that many of the Republican precinct inspectors were appointed as such because they could neither read nor write. This is, in our judgment, a clear abuse of the law, and without the supervisors' law, which enables the opposing party to have men of their own selection to guard the polls as supervisors, we would be strongly inclined to apply a corrective for this manifest abuse of power.

With tickets exactly similar in all respects, or as nearly so as they can be printed, and on the same kind of paper, it would not be a hard task for election officers, if they were so disposed, to cheat an illiterate man, who could neither read nor write, both in the vote and in the count. All good people ought to discountenance and cry down evil practices of this kind. We indulge the hope that it will not be repeated in the future.

974. The case of Buchanan v. Manning, continued.

Although many electors have suffered by arbitrary refusal of registration officers to do their duty, yet the House requires a contestant to show specifically the resulting harm.

Disregard of a law requiring party representation on election boards may contribute to establish conspiracy, but does not do so of itself.

Change of the place of an election may cause such confusion as to defeat the popular will.

Periodical firing of a cannon at a polling place during an election was held to be intimidation justifying rejection of the poll.

Instance wherein a contestant was granted leave to withdraw.

As to the registration, the majority report holds:

It appears in the evidence that very many electors in the various counties of this district were deprived of the right of voting because they were not registered. The registry law of Mississippi provides the manner in which registration shall be made. An unlawful refusal on the part of the registration officers to register a qualified elector is a good ground for contest; but in order to make it available the proof should clearly show the name of the elector who offered to register; that he was a duly qualified voter, and the reason why the officer refused to register him, and, under the statutes of the United States, if he offered to perform all that was necessary to be done by him to register, and was refused, and afterwards presented himself at the proper voting place and offered to vote and again offered to perform everything required of him under the law, and his vote was still refused, it would be the duty of the House to see to it that he is not deprived of his right to participate in the choice of his officers. Unfortunately, in this case the proof falls far short of that which is required to enable the House to apply the proper remedy. That there were many instances in which the officers of the registration arbitrarily refused to do their duty is apparent. That many electors were deprived of their right to vote in consequence of this action is also apparent; but in going through the testimony in this case the number thus refused registration and refused the right to vote if added to contestant's vote would not elect him. Neither is it shown sufficiently for whom the nonregistered voters would have voted had they been allowed that right.

As to the partisan election boards, the majority say:

We are not willing to go as far in this case as the majority of the committee did in the Forty-sixth Congress in the case of Donnelly v. Washburn.[1] It was there held—

"The very fact that in these seven precincts Mr. Donnelly had been deprived by the city council of Minneapolis of all representation among the officers conducting the election is, in itself, a very strong proof of conspiracy and fraud."

We may remark that there is abundance of testimony in this case showing that nearly one-half of the polls in some of the counties were under the exclusive control of the party friends of the contestee; and it is stoutly maintained by the contestant that the refusal to register qualified Republican voters, and that the appointment of incompetent Republican election precinct officers at other polling places, and various other acts and omissions on the part of the partisan friends of the contestee, taken in connection with the fact that at many of the precincts only Democrats were appointed election officers, afford a strong reason why the rule laid down in the Washburn-Donnelly case should apply in this.

The appointment of managers of election, in fairness and common decency, should be made from opposite political parties. A refusal to do so in the face of a statute directing it to be done may in some instances be evidence of fraud, and it might form an important link in the chain of circumstances tending to establish a conspiracy.

We are not satisfied that the evidence in this case establishes such a conspiracy.

As to changes of polling places, both majority and minority say:

There is evidence tending to establish the fact that some of the voting places were changed just prior to the election, and that much confusion was thereby caused among the voters. Many of them were not aware of the change, and in some instances they did not know where the new polling places were established. Just how far this affected the result of the election we are unable to tell from the evidence. We can, however, readily imagine how a resort to changing the polling places just before an election in a county would cause such confusion and unfairness as would defeat the popular expression of the will of the people through the ballot box.

The majority reject a precinct for the following act of intimidation at North Oxford precinct:

B. P. Scruggs testifies that he was United States deputy marshal on the 2d of November, 1880; that he lives in Oxford, State of Mississippi; that he was present at the election held there on that day;

[1] It is hardly accurate to speak of anything as decided by this case, where there was no report indorsed by a majority of the committee and no action by the House.

that within 20 steps from the entrance of the court-house, where the voting was being carried on, Mr. Keyes, a prominent Democrat of that place, and a member of the board of aldermen, was in charge of a cannon which was being fired, and that the witness protested against the firing of it; that he was told by Mr. Keyes that he had orders to fire it; that it was none of his business who gave him such orders; that they continued to fire the cannon until late in the afternoon; that the cannon was a regular 6-pound field piece. Witness also testifies that the Republicans were prevented from celebrating the victory gained by them because they were told by two prominent Democrats, Mr. Crawford and Mr. Skipwith, in the presence of Mr. Baker, chairman of the Democratic county central committee, that "they might have the right to do so, but they did not have the might," and to prevent a bloody collision, they abandoned it.

The minority found 11,715 votes which they considered so tainted as to justify setting aside the whole election.

The majority found only 1,994 votes for sitting Member and 1,455 for contestant cast in polls which ought to be rejected. So they recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the contestant have leave to withdraw his papers without prejudice.

On March 2,[1] after brief debate and the reading of the report, the resolution of the majority was agreed to without division.

975. The Missouri election case of Sessinghaus v. Frost in the Forty-seventh Congress.

The House counted the ballots of qualified voters who were prevented from voting by conditions arising from a registration established by a city government.

May the State delegate to a municipality the power to regulate the manner of holding an election?

Officers of election having wrongfully denied qualified voters the right to vote, the House counts the rejected votes.

On February 17, 1883,[2] Mr. Samuel H. Miller, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Missouri case of Sessinghaus v. Frost. The sitting Member had received a plurality of 197 votes on the face of the returns.

The objections of contestant involved two leading questions:

(1) A number of persons—155 in all—who were shown to have all been qualified voters under the laws of the State of Missouri, and who tendered votes for contestant, were refused the right to vote because their names had been stricken from the registration lists under the provisions of an ordinance of the city of St. Louis, which provided for a board of registration to be appointed by the mayor, and—whose duty it shall be to meet with the recorder of voters, at his office, twenty days before each general, State, or municipal election, for the purpose of examining the registration, and making and noting corrections therein as may be rendered necessary by their knowledge of errors committed, or by competent testimony heard before the board; a majority of said board shall be necessary to do business, and the mayor shall be ex officio president thereof. They shall strike from the registration, by a majority vote, names of persons who have removed from the election district for which they registered, or who have died, and shall note the fact opposite the name of any person charged with having registered in a wrong name, or who for any reason is not entitled to registration under the provisions of this ordinance, which person shall be challenged by the judges of election when presenting himself to vote, and rejected unless he satisfy said judges that he was entitled to register, and said board shall also place on said books the names of such persons as in their judgment have been improperly rejected by the recorder of voters.

[1] Journal, p. 545; Record, pp. 3590, 3593–3606.

[2] Second session Forty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 1959; 2 Ellsworth, p. 381.

After a discussion of the terms of the constitution and laws of Missouri, the majority of the committee found that the ordinance was of no binding effect:

The Constitution of the United States having declared that the legislatures of the several States shall provide for choosing Members of Congress, and the constitution of Missouri having authorized the general assembly, and that alone, to enact a registration law, we hold that the above ordinance has no binding force or effect, and is invalid.

We therefore rely upon the language of McCrary, section 11, that—

"In the absence of any positive law making registration imperative as a qualification for voting, it is a very plain proposition that the wrongful refusal of a registering officer to register a legal voter who has complied with the law and applies for registration ought not to disfranchise such voter. The offer to register in such a case is equivalent to registration. This would be held to be the law upon the well-settled principle that the offer to perform an act which depends for its performance upon the action of another person, who wrongfully refuses to act, is equivalent to its performance.

Mr. A. A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, a member of the committee concurring in the majority report, filed views which discussed the point more fully:

I should ordinarily hesitate long and deliberate with care, lest I might be mistaken, before I could decide against the validity of the city ordinances in question and under which the board of registration seem to have acted and which have been apparently in force and acted upon in the city and State so long. But the question is raised and argued on both sides with great ability. And I am forced to the conclusion that the acts of the board in striking off the names of the parties in question was unauthorized, illegal, and void; that under the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 4, the State legislature alone had power to prescribe the manner of holding elections, subject to alteration and regulations made by Congress. That this power includes the whole machinery of elections, registration laws, etc., is too well settled to require argument.

I am unable to find any act of the legislature of Missouri which prescribes registration as a qualification or regulation and which was in force at the time in question and applicable to the city of St. Louis. Apparently the legislature recognized this as the state of the law and accordingly, as appears in the argument, passed an act to remedy the defect and provide for it in the year 1881. The charter of the city of St. Louis must be confined in its provisions to matters municipal, and it would be a great stretch of language and principles of law to hold that it extended beyond that and embraced authority to regulate the manner of holding elections in matters of State and Federal officers, so the city authorities could establish registration laws and prescribe the qualifications of voters and limit the right of exercising the elective franchise. It is more than doubtful whether the legislature, which is alone invested with authority of this kind, could thus delegate it any way.

The minority contended that the St. Louis ordinance was framed in conformity with the constitution and laws of Missouri and was valid.[1]

The majority further found:

But conceding (which we do not in this case) that the city ordinance relative to registration was constitutionally and legally enacted, and its provisions applicable to this election, we contend that these 155 votes should still be counted, and for the following reasons:

The oath prescribed for and taken by the judges of election precluded them from hearing or determining the case of any voter whose name is not on their list; therefore as to that class of voters they are not really judges of election. The law in that case has provided another set of judges, whose duty it is to hear competent testimony concerning the case of each and every man whose name is suggested by anyone should be stricken off, and after judicially hearing the case they shall by a majority vote determine whether that man is a voter or not.

[1] Minority views filed by Mr. Samuel W. Moulton, of Illinois.

So we say that if the judges of election could not receive the votes of these men they are not the judges of their qualifications to vote in any sense, their place for that purpose being filled by the board of revision. We hence conclude that if the only officers recognized by the city charter who had a right to judge of the qualifications of these 155 men have improperly, wrongfully, and fraudulently denied them the right to vote, that this House should remedy that wrong and count their votes for him whose name was on their ballots.

As to the propriety of counting these votes, the majority say:

The testimony shows that all of the above 155 men were legal and qualified voters, many of them being old residents, and that they did all in their power to entitle them to vote.

We hold that their votes should now be counted by the House. The said voters had done everything the law required of them; they had exhausted their remedy; they had registered and gone to the polls and offered to vote, but their names having been stricken off they were not allowed to vote.

The principle is well established and was adopted by this committee in the case of Bisbee v. Finley (present Congress) that where judges of election improperly refuse a qualified voter the right to vote his vote will be counted here. We submit the reason of that rule will apply as well to this case where the voter has done everything in his power and the primary wrongful act was committed by the registration officers.

McCrary on Elections, sections 10, 11, and 383, fully sustains this view in the following language:

"A case may occur where a portion of the legal voters have, without their fault and in spite of due diligence on their part, been denied the privilege of registration. In such a case if the voter was otherwise qualified and is clearly shown to have performed all the acts required of him by the law, and to have been denied registration by the wrongful act of the registering officer, it would seem a very unjust thing to deny him the right to vote. In elections for State officers, however, under a constitution or statute which imperatively requires registration as a qualification for voting, it may be that the voter's only remedy would be found in an action against the registration officer for damages." (See also secs. 11 and 383.)

It will be observed that Judge McCrary, after stating the general doctrine, says that—

"In elections for State officers, however, under a constitution or statute which imperatively requires registration as a qualification for voting, it may be that the voter's only remedy would be found in an action against the registration officer."

This refers exclusively to State officers, while the office for which it is intended to count these votes is not a State office, that the United States Constitution has given this body full control over the question as to who are its Members; and in the State of Missouri neither the constitution nor any statute in force in St. Louis makes registration an imperative prerequisite or qualification.

Also the majority find another reason:

Furthermore, these votes should be counted on another ground, following a well-established principle of law.

The proof in this case shows that the board of revision by whom the above voters were disfranchised acted at the outset and throughout their entire proceedings in absolute violation of not only the spirit but the letter of the law which gave them authority. The ordinance explicitly says that this board shall meet—

"For the purpose of examining the registration and making and noting corrections therein as may be rendered necessary by either their knowledge of errors committed or by competent testimony heard before the board, a majority of said board shall be necessary to do business."

By a resolution adopted at the beginning (heretofore cited) they declared they would neither hear testimony nor act upon the knowledge of the board. Thereafter names of voters were stricken off the list without even being read to the board, and merely upon the recommendation of an individual member, who, in many cases, as the proof shows, adopted without question, knowledge, or examination the reports of his unsworn and unauthorized deputies.

976. The case of Sessinghaus, v. Frost, continued.

As to what constitutes on a ballot a caption designed to deceive the voter.

The House counted ballots rejected by election officers under an erroneous construction of the law.

The intent of the voter being certain, the omission of a candidate's given name does not vitiate the ballot.

A small number of voters being driven from the polls by intimidation, the House counted their votes but declined to reject the whole poll.

(2) The majority determined to count certain votes for contestant for the following reason:

There were 23 ballots cast for contestant, but not counted, having this caption, viz, "Chronicle Selected Ticket," a ticket made up of names of persons on both the Republican and Democratic regular tickets. It was not, in the language of the law (see p. 1681), a ticket designed to deceive the voter. It showed plainly what it was, viz, a ticket selected by the Chronicle, an independent daily newspaper published in St. Louis. (See pp. 945–946.) This ticket had contestant's name on it for Congress from this district, and was, in some of the precincts, thrown out by the judges and not counted.

The supreme court of Missouri, in the case of Turner v. Drake (71 Mo., 285), construed this statute as follows:

"This is a proceeding instituted in the county court of Carroll County, contesting the election of defendant as recorder of deeds of said county. The county court quashed the notice of contest on the motion of defendant, from which action plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, where, upon a trial de novo, judgment was rendered for defendant, the notice of contest quashed, and the proceedings dismissed, from which plaintiff has appealed to this court.

"The only ground for contest alleged in the notice is that all the ballots cast for defendant, at the election which was held on the 5th day of November, 1878, were fraudulent and void because the caption of said ballots contained the words, 'Republican, Independent, Greenback.' The following is the form of the ballot as to State and county officers: 'Republican, Independent, Greenback; supreme judge, Alexander F. Denney,' etc.

"The claim that the ballots cast for defendant, of which the foregoing is a type, were fraudulent and void, is based upon section 1, acts of 1875, page 15, which is as follows:

"Each ballot may bear a plain written or printed caption thereon, composed of not more than three words, expressing its political character, but on all such ballots the said caption or headlines shall not in any manner be designed to mislead the voter as to the name or names thereunder. Any ballot not conforming to the provisions of this act shall be considered fraudulent, and the same shall not be counted.'

"We cannot, from the mere face of the ballot, declare, as a matter of law, that the words used in the caption were, in any manner, designed to mislead the voter as to the name or names thereunder. The words employed would indicate to the voter that he would find among those to be voted for Republicans, Greenbackers, and Independents, or persons who were candidates without party indorsement. We think the evident purpose of the legislature in the above enactment was to prevent one political party from using, as a caption to its ballots, the name of any other political party from that mentioned in the caption. A ballot with a caption using the words 'The Republican Ticket' which contains only the names of persons who represented the Democratic ticket would fall within the class of ballots interdicted by the law.

"The design of the statute is to prohibit the use of any words in the caption to a ballot which do not truly indicate the political character or party affiliation of the persons to be voted for, and any ballot which represents by the words used in the caption that it is the ticket of one party when in truth and in fact the persons whose names are contained in the body of the ballot represent another and different party is under the statute fraudulent and void."

Under this and similar decisions, it seems to us there can be no doubt that contestant is entitled to have counted for him these 23 votes.

(3) The majority also ruled as follows:

Evidence on pages 952 and 897 of the Record, which is uncontradicted, will be found showing that 10 votes cast for contestant were thrown out and not counted by the judges, merely upon the ground that the contestant's given name was not on the ballots. The proof shows that no other man by the name of Sessinghaus was a candidate at that election in that district for any office.

Hence we follow the unbroken chain of authorities as cited by McCrary and hold that these 10 votes should be counted for contestant.

(4) As to intimidation, the majority report that 20 votes should be counted for contestant for this reason:

As to precinct No. 39, the contestant urged persistently * * * that this precinct should be thrown out, but we are constrained to differ with him. We find that the evidence of intimidation hardly comes up to the standard provided by the precedents cited by McCrary, and hence we conclude that it must stand. We find, however, that 20 men (all colored) who were qualified and legal voters and duly registered, and who had done all that the law required of them, who were entitled to vote at that poll, went there and offered to vote, but were refused for various trivial reasons, many of them being frightened by abuse and driven from the poll.

(5) On questions of fact certain votes are counted for contestant because wrongfully excluded by election officers.

In conclusion, as a result of their decisions, the majority find a plurality of 172 for contestant, and report resolutions for seating him.

The minority concluded that sitting Member was entitled to retain the seat.

The report was debated in the House on March 2,[1] and on that day the resolutions of the majority were agreed to,[2] yeas 126, nays 110.

Accordingly Mr. Sessinghaus appeared and took the oath.

977. The Florida election case of Bisbee, jr., v. Finley in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Contestant's testimony being delayed by dilatory action and intimidation, the House considered a portion taken after the legal limit.

Discussion as to certain testimony alleged not to be strictly in rebuttal.

On February 19, 1883,[3] Mr. Ambrose A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of that committee in the Florida case of Bisbee, jr., v. Finley.

At the outset consideration may properly be given to a preliminary question concerning the taking of evidence. Contestee claimed before the committee that a portion of the contestant's evidence was taken after the expiration of the first forty of the ninety days allowed by statute for the taking of testimony, and that some of that which was taken during the ten days allowed for rebuttal was not strictly in rebuttal, and that all such should be rejected and not considered by the committee. The majority report finds that during the first forty days contestant took testimony as fast as he could, but that much time was consumed on the part of sitting Member by useless and dilatory cross-examination. Also violence and disorder prevented contestant's attorney from going into some parts of the district.

[2] Journal, pp. 551, 552.

[3] Second session Forty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 1066; 2 Ellsworth, p. 172.

Therefore contestant, without prejudice to sitting Member, continued to take testimony after the expiration of the forty days. But sitting Member's counsel would not remain during the talking of this testimony, although contestant offered to give his opponent all the time he wanted for answering the testimony objected to. The majority report further says of sitting Member's attitude:

He knew of the other facts stated and of the illness of counsel which had delayed the taking of the evidence entirely within the first forty days. And the committee think that a fair-minded man would have been most likely to enter into an agreement allowing further time, and he must be presumed to know the previous practice of the Committee on Elections to exercise discretion in such matters.

It is also evident that most and probably all of the evidence to which he now objects did not admit of an answer, as his attempt to answer other evidence of the same kind to which he does not object proved ineffectual. That taken during the last ten days was such from its nature that it could not be contradicted or its force impaired by any counter evidence.

It is Manifest, therefore, that contestee did not suffer and was not prejudiced by any delay or the acts complained of.

No complaint is made or pretense set up that the evidence was not fairly taken and accurately reported. He had full opportunity to cross-examine if he desired to do it, and also to answer it after the same was taken. But he did not choose to do so and preferred to take the risk of its being considered. After the case was referred to the committee and printed he did not appear or make any motion to strike out the evidence objected to, so that it might be supplied if the motion was granted, but took the objection for the first time at the argument.

The committee are clearly of the opinion that the evidence taken after the expiration of the forty days should be received and considered, and they have considered it; that the evidence taken in rebuttal should also be considered. All of the evidence was taken within the ninety days allowed by statute, so that in that respect the statute was literally complied with, and the forty days allowed contestee was more than sufficient for his purposes, as he did not begin until about two weeks after contestant had finished, and then occupied but sixteen days, while he had the offer of all the more time which he desired.

It is manifest that contestee did not believe he could answer the evidence and, in the spirit manifested by his cross-examination, designed apparently to use up the time, so as to get beyond the forty days, and by leaving when the forty days were up, and when he knew contestant was going on to finish his list of witnesses, he was seeking some technical advantage if he could get it. The testimony in rebuttal, also taken within the ten days, appears to have been proper and competent, and should be, and has been, considered. The course of the committee seems fully justified by good precedents.

No statute can tie the House down to any rules of procedure.

Its provisions are directory, constituting only convenient rules of practice, and the House is at liberty, in its discretion, to determine that the ends of justice require a different course. (McCrary, pp. 353, 358, 359.)

In 1 Bartlett (Rep., 223, 224), a Democratic committee held that if either party desired further time to take testimony after the time had expired, it was his duty to give notice to his opponent and proceed and take it and present it to the committee, which would, on good reasons being shown, receive and consider it.

So, too, in regard to rebutting evidence; that rests in the discretion of a court always, even if not strictly in rebuttal. (Reed v. Kneeas, Brightley's Election Cases, 416; Richardson v. Stewart, 4 Birney, 197.)

The minority say:

The record shows that all the evidence taken in the counties mentioned below by contestant was taken as rebutting testimony, after the expiration of the time allowed by law for taking original testimony; that neither contestant nor contestee had taken any testimony in any of these counties during the forty days allowed to each, and that consequently there was nothing to rebut; that the contestant disregarded the act of Congress, which says that "the contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days, the returned member during the succeeding forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal only during the remaining ten days of said period" (of ninety days).

The following are the counties where contestant took such original testimony in the ten days allowed him for rebutting testimony only, and where contestee had taken no testimony; and where there could not therefore possibly have been anything to rebut, viz: Brevard, Bradford, Columbia, Hamilton, Putnam, Orange, St. Johns, Suwanee, and Volusia counties.

The record shows that no evidence in chief was taken in or concerning the election in any of these counties, and none whatever by the contestee during his forty days, and that all of contestant's testimony therein was taken after contestee's time had elapsed and after the contestant's time for rebuttal had commenced. See Vallandigham v. Campbell (1 Bartlett, p. 223); Brooks v. Davis (1 Bartlett, 244; McCrary on Elec., secs. 347, 348); Bromberg v. Haralson (first session Forty-fourth Congress, vol. 5, Index to Miscellaneous Documents Digest of Election Cases, p. 364).

It is claimed that all this testimony should be rejected.

Against all the evidence taken by the contestant in the above-mentioned counties the unanimous report of the Committee on Elections in case of Bromberg v. Haralson, first session Forty-fourth Congress, is cited. It appeared in that case that in Wilcox County the contestant, Bromberg, the Democratic candidate, undertook to violate the election law, just as the contestant in this case has done, and that his testimony so taken was rejected. (See Bromberg v. Haralson, supra.)

All the testimony in the above counties is ex parte in behalf of contestant. The notices served by contestant on contestee for taking this testimony in all those counties informed contestee that contestant would proceed to take testimony in rebuttal. The contestee, knowing that no original testimony had been taken in any of these counties, and that there could be nothing to rebut, declined to attend such examinations of witnesses. The contestant, instead of taking rebutting testimony, proceeded to take original testimony.

The minority quote McCrary, with comment:

The statute as it now stands (see sec. 108, Rev. Stat.) affords an opportunity for investigation, so ample and complete that it is believed that it will seldom happen that the House will find it necessary to depart from its provision in order to do the most complete and perfect justice, and it will no doubt be adhered to as furnishing the best possible guide for instituting and carrying forward inquiries of this character.

We have considered almost all the testimony thus irregularly and illegally taken, but we earnestly protest against the admission of such evidence unless great injustice would be done by rejecting it. We prefer to adhere to the law. The above-mentioned counties should stand as returned, however, both from the fact that all the testimony taken by contestant to assail them is unwarranted and because the testimony itself, as shown by the record, is insufficient to warrant the committee in rejecting the official returns and thereby disfranchising hundreds of legal voters.

978. The case of Bisbee, Jr., v. Finley, continued.

A vote offered by an elector and illegally rejected should be counted as if cast.

Electors having made affidavit of their qualifications and as to the ballots they intended to cast and the same being corroborated orally, the House counted the rejected votes.

As to the evidence which should be produced at the poll to justify rejection of a vote tendered by alleged convict.

As to the merits of the case, it appeared that sitting Member had a majority of 1,003 votes on the face of the official returns.

The examination of the objection raised by contestant involved a discussion of several questions of law:

(1) A question as to the counting of votes tendered but not received by the officers of election. The majority report holds:

The contestant avers and claims that many electors duly offered to vote for him, and their votes were illegally rejected, and insists that all such votes so tendered and refused shall be counted as if cast.

As a question of law we do not understand it to be controverted that a vote offered by an elector and illegally rejected should be counted as if cast. It was so held in the case of Niblack v. Walls (Smith's Reports, p. 104, reported by McCrary, who was then chairman of the Committee on Elections); again, in Bell v. Snyder (Smith's Reports, 251, 252, and in Martin v. Yates (Forty-sixth Congress). McCrary, in his work on contested elections, regards it as a settled principle (sec. 423), and your committee have so regarded it in this controversy.

In the appendix to this report, Exhibit A, will be found the name of every voter whose vote was tendered for contestant and rejected which we have allowed and counted for him, except a few votes in Madison County. This exhibit gives not only the name of the voter, but the page of the record where the testimony will be found establishing his right to vote and that his vote was tendered and rejected.

In the county of Marion, in which a large number of electors were deprived of the right to vote without any fault or neglect on their part, the electors in many instances, after being denied the right to vote, went before a United States commissioner and made an affidavit to the fact of their qualifications as electors and of their offering to vote, to which they attached the identical ballot which they tendered to the election officers. The figures in the column of Exhibit A headed "Affidavit" refer to the pages of the record containing such affidavits. In the case of Bell v. Snyder (Smith's Reports, pp. 251, 252) such affidavits were considered sufficient evidence of the voters' intention to vote for the officers whose names were on the ballot attached to the affidavit, and on such evidence their votes were counted.

But contestant has not only put in evidence the affidavit of the voters with their ballots attached, but has in most instances taken the testimony of the voter whose vote was refused, and where the voter is not called as a witness it is shown by the testimony of other witnesses, officers of the election and other persons at the polls, that his vote was tendered and refused.

Your committee find from the evidence that there should be added to contestant's vote 268 votes on the ground that they were tendered for him and illegally rejected, and should now be counted.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Frank E. Beltzhoover, of Pennsylvania, say on this question:

The contestee's counsel denies that these votes should be added to the contestant's majority in this county, and states the law on the subject to be as follows, viz:

"In order that a vote not cast shall be counted as if cast it must appear that a legal voter offered to vote a particular ballot, and that he was prevented from doing so by fraud, violence, or an erroneous ruling of the election officers."

The burden of proof of all these facts is upon the party who seeks to have the votes not cast counted for him. It devolves upon the contestant, therefore, to prove that each one of these voters was a legal voter, and that his vote was illegally rejected.

The ground upon which it is claimed and admitted that these 122 votes not cast were rejected was because they had not registered, or their names were not found on the registration list.

The election law of Florida requires registration at least ten days before the election. The law is as follows:

"No person shall be entitled to vote at any election unless he shall have been duly registered at least ten days previous to the day of said election, nor shall any one be permitted to vote at any other voting place or precinct than that of the election district stated opposite his name on the county registration list." (See act of legislature of Florida, 1877, pam., p. 69, sec. 3.)

Prima facie, all persons whose names are not found on the registration list are not legal voters, and in order to entitle them to vote, their names not being on the list of registration, it is incumbent on them to make every preliminary proof which the statute requires.

But whether these votes were rejected properly or improperly, it is very plain that, having been rejected, under the law they can not be counted unless each voter has adduced in the contest the same proof in every respect which would have entitled him to vote at the polls on the day of election. What, then, would have been required of each one of these voters whose names did not appear on the registry list? The law says that each one "shall, on offering to vote at the voting place or precinct in such election precinct, be required to state under oath: (1) That he is 21 years of age; (2) that he has resided in the State of Florida one year; (3) and in the county six months, (4) that he was duly registered at least ten days before the election; (5) and that he has not changed his place of residence to any district other than the one in which he was living when registered, (6) or if he has changed his place of residence since such registration that he has notified the clerk of the circuit court of the fact of such change. These are six requirements which are necessary and indispensable to the legal qualification of any person whose name is not on the registration list. The testimony is not very clear what the rejected voters in this instance offered to do at the time they proposed to vote on the day of election. If they were ready and willing to swear to all these six matters, then they should have been allowed to vote. There is no doubt about this. But having been refused by the election board, although wrongfully, can they be counted now unless they have subsequently made the same proof during the contest and have it now before the committee? We think not. The proof which has been offered in all the various cases does not in any case, so far as we have been able to discover, come up to the requirements of the law. These votes, therefore, although it is possible they may have been and are now legal votes, must be rejected. We can not ignore any one of the muniments of the electoral privilege, which should be guarded as well to keep out illegal votes as to insure the right to those who are entitled to vote under the law.

(2) As to the proof required to refuse a vote where there is a disqualification because of conviction for crime, the majority report says:

It is urged by contestee that the votes of some of the persons named had been disfranchised by conviction of crime.

It appears to have been a rule with the election officers, not only in this but in other counties, to refuse to receive the vote of any person whose name was on a list—called by some of the witnesses a convicts' list—which had been prepared by the political associates of contestee and placed in the hands of the officer of election. It further appears that the votes of such persons on the said list were refused, without evidence of indentity, and without the production of any record of conviction, at the polls.

We have excluded from our count the votes of all persons where the evidence is satisfactory that the person alleged to have been convicted is the same person whose vote was offered and refused, though the record of conviction is not in evidence, and to designate them have placed the letter C opposite their names on said exhibit.

We do not mean to be understood, however, as holding that the record of conviction in such cases should not be produced as the proper evidence of disqualification. The question is an immaterial one in this case.

979. The case of Bisbee, jr., v. Finley, continued.

Where the law requires a citizen of foreign birth to produce his naturalization papers at the time of voting, a failure so to do destroys the vote even after it has been received.

A vote admitted without presentation of required evidence at the polls is not validated by production of the evidence during the investigation.

(3) The constitution of Florida provided:

At any election at which a citizen or subject of any foreign country shall offer to vote, under the provisions of this constitution, he shall present to the persons lawfully authorized to conduct and supervise such election a duly sealed and certified copy of his declaration of intention, otherwise he shall not be allowed to vote, and any naturalized citizen offering to vote shall produce before said persons, lawfully authorized to conduct and supervise the election, the certificate of naturalization or a duly sealed and certified copy thereof; otherwise he shall not be allowed to vote.

The majority report contends that the production of the evidence when the vote is offered is peremptorily enjoined, and cites the case of State v. Hilmontel (21 Wis. R., 574–578) and the Congressional cases of Myers v. Moffett, Weaver v. Given, and Covode v. Foster, etc., and continues:

Here the constitution of the State makes every voter of this class an agent to execute it, and places the burden upon him to furnish the prerequisite evidence of his right to vote. The constitution does not say that he shall be required to produce his naturalization papers only when his vote is challenged. By that instrument he is informed and challenged in advance of the election itself, and he must approach the polls armed with such evidence as the supreme law commands him to produce as a condition precedent of his right to exercise the franchise of an elector. Our attention has not been directed to any judicial authority in conflict with the authorities cited. On the other hand, we find the principle to have been uniformly applied, and we are therefore of the opinion that it should be applied to this case.

The principle must likewise be maintained that the production of this evidence at the trial will not change the legal status of the voter and thus make these votes in question legal votes. Such a decision would be at variance with a well-established principle of law which forbids the making of an act valid at a subsequent period which at the time of its commission was void because prohibited by law.

Votes illegal when received can not be made legal by evidence offered at the trial which should have been produced before the vote was cast. (Shepperd v. Gibbons, 2 Brewster, p. 129; Myers v. Moffett, I id., p. 230.) The principle is again established in the following:

"If election officers receive a vote without preliminary proof which the law makes an essential prerequisite to its reception, such vote is as much an illegal one as if the voter had none of the qualifications required by law." (Brightly's Law Cases, 453–492, notes; also, 21st Wisconsin, 566; 23d Wisconsin, 630; 16th Michigan, 342.)

The principle is self-evident. Voting is a single act commanded to be performed within a particular time, on a particular day, and in conformity with law. There can not therefore be a valid performance of the requirements of the law at a period subsequent to the day on which alone the law commanded the act to be performed. The question at issue is not whether such evidence as required by law to establish their right to vote could have been furnished, but whether such evidence was furnished. If they did not produce it, the supreme law prohibited their voting, and an act prohibited by law can not be valid.

The committee being of the opinion that all votes cast by persons of foreign birth who failed to produce their naturalization papers or papers declaring their intention to become citizens, as required by the constitution of Florida, are illegal and void. We proceed to state the number of such votes which from the testimony should be deducted from the count.

The evidence introduced and to be relied upon is, first, the testimony of the voter himself that he did so vote without producing such evidence of his right to vote; secondly, his own admission, under oath, that he voted for contestee; and, thirdly, where the voter refuses to testify for whom he voted when called and sworn by the contestant, the testimony of other witnesses that he adhered to and supported the principles of the Democratic party and was a Democrat. This is a well-settled principle: "When a voter refuses to testify for whom he voted it is competent to resort to circumstantial evidence, such as that he was an active member of a particular political party." (McCrary, sec. 293.)

We find from the evidence that 74 votes should be deducted from contestee's vote on the ground that they were cast by persons of this class.

The minority oppose this contention, citing the case of Finley v. Bisbee, in the Forty-fifth Congress, and Curtin v. Yocum, in the Forty-sixth Congress, and a decision by Judge Briggs (Leg. Int., July 19, 1878), holding in the case of Gillin v. Armstrong:

That unregistered voters having voted without making the affidavits, the law presumes that they are legal, and it can not be permitted to show that they were not so legal.

980. The case of Bisbee, jr., v. Finley, continued.

An election held without proper registration., under laws requiring registration, was held to be illegal.

The honesty of election officers being impeached, the testimony of the voters as to their own votes was admitted to destroy the return and prove the vote aliunde.

The ballot box not having been kept inviolate, an unofficial recount is of little value to substantiate impeached returns.

As to the weight of testimony required to overturn the presumption that sworn agents of the law have acted rightly.

(4) The laws of Florida required a registration of the electors, and the constitution of the State commanded:

That no person not duly registered according to law shall be allowed to vote.

Because of disregard of this provision the majority of the committee rejected the returns of the entire county of Brevard:

The law requires one general registration book for each county, and also another registration book for each election district into which the county is divided; and these district books are the original books of registration, in which each voter must write his name, or have it written by the registrating officers, and take the oath of allegiance to the State and to the United States, which oath is to be printed or written at the commencement of the book. Opposite the voter's name must appear, in proper order, the number of the election district in which the voter resides, and the day, month, and year of his registration.

The law provides for copying by the clerk of the circuit court the names on the district books into the general registration book. This clerk is the registrating officer for the election district in which his office is located, and he appoints a registrating officer for each of the election districts of the county.

The registration must be closed ten days before the day of election, and a certified copy of the district book is to be delivered by the sheriff to the election officers, which copy is the legal evidence to the officers of the election of the fact of registration, and of the qualification of the electors whose names are on such copy.

The contestant asks that the entire election be set aside in this county, and that no votes shall be counted for either party, on the ground that the election was held without any registration in conforming to the law.

The evidence relied upon consists of the testimony of one James A. McCrory, the deputy clerk of court, who had charge of the clerk's office, and who performed, as it appears, such duties as were performed in this county preparatory to the election. (Record, pp. 403–405.)

This deputy clerk was a Democrat, and was examined as a witness on behalf of contestant. It is proven by his testimony that no registration books were provided or used in this county, and that the only semblance or pretense of registration of the electors consists of "loose sheets of paper" containing the names of citizens, which were brought into the clerk's office by the registrating officers from eight election districts.

The whole number of such districts was twelve, and from the other four this deputy clerk testifies that even such lists of names "on loose sheets of paper" were not made and brought to the clerk's office. McCrory can only name one district from which such irregular lists of names were returned that contained oaths required by the law to be taken and subscribed by the elector and registration officers. (Record, p. 405.)

It has been called to the attention of your committee that it was proven by the clerk of the court, and other witnesses, in the contested election ease of Bisbee v. Hull, that there were no registration books provided or used in this county at the election of 1878.

It also appears that by a statute of Florida, passed in 1879, a considerable portion of the territory of the adjoining county of Volusia was added to this county, Brevard, consequently it can not be claimed that any of the citizens residing within this portion of the county had the right to vote by reason of any prior registration. And this new part of the county is included in that containing the eight election districts in which these lists of names "on loose sheets of paper" were made and delivered.

The registration books, under the laws of Florida, are public records, and the clerk of the court is the legal custodian of them. This deputy, who had charge of the office, could not well be ignorant in regard to the subject-matter of his testimony, and he evidently testified with some reluctance, which may be accounted for from the fact that he was a political associate of contestee,

According to this testimony it is manifest that the entire foundation for a legal election in this county was wanting. As to the four districts in which not even the irregular lists of names "on loose sheets of paper" were made, there can be no pretense that there was any registration of any kind whatever. From these four districts 63 votes were returned for contestee and 12 for contestant.

As to the other eight election districts, it can hardly be claimed that "loose sheets of paper" are registration books such as the law requires. They could be manufactured, abstracted, and substituted at pleasure, with slight risk of detection.

To sustain this as a legal registration would do violence to the provision of the constitution and laws of Florida, would destroy all the safeguards against the frauds at elections which the registration laws are intended to prevent, and would, we think, furnish greater facilities for fraud than the absence of any registration at all.

Your committee therefore hold that the election in this county must be set aside as illegal and void.

The principle is so well settled that an election held without registration, under laws requiring registration, is illegal, that the citation of authorities is deemed unnecessary.

The returns from this county give the sitting Member 222 votes and the contestant 74 votes, which are excluded from the count.

The minority contend that the evidence does not establish the claim of the majority, and say:

It shows that there was a substantial compliance with the registry law, and that the voters should not, therefore, be disfranchised, because of the neglect of the officers who may have failed to furnish in all cases the proper registration lists. This is the law plainly laid down in Wheelock's case (1 Norris, 297), which was decided in Pennsylvania under a statute like the one in Florida. In Wheelock's case it appears that the general registration list had been made, and was on file in the commissioner's office, but there was no registration list at all at the polls. In that case the supreme court say:

"To disfranchise all the voters of a township, as we are asked to do in this petition, the facts on which we are required to act should show a case free from legal doubt. If we, by our decision, should permit the carelessness or even the fraud of officers whose duty it is to furnish a list of voters at the elections to defeat the election and deprive the people of the county of the officer who was elected by a majority of their votes, we would thus make the people suffer for an act in which they did not participate and which they did not sanction. In so doing, instead of punishing an officer for the violation of the election law we practically punish the voters of the county by defeating their choice of a county officer as declared at the election. A decision of this kind would be fraught with danger by inciting unprincipled or unscrupulous persons on the eve of an important election to recreate or destroy the list of voters or other important papers in a township in which the majority may determine the result in the county. Rules applicable to contested elections, like other legal rules, must be uniform, and the results and consequences of decisions therefore determine their correctness."

(5) Over Arredonda, poll, in Alachua County, a sharp division arose. The returns from this poll gave Finley 172 votes and Bisbee 69.

The majority report shows that in former years the vote of this precinct had shown a vastly different party division, and says:

The return is impeached and destroyed as evidence by the testimony of the electors themselves. Contestant has called and sworn as witnesses 259 voters, each of whom testifies unreservedly that he voted for contestant, and it is established by other evidence that another elector, deceased before the testimony was taken, voted for contestant, making 260 votes cast for him at this poll, instead of 69 given him by the returns.

The testimony of these electors will be found in the record, pages 68 to 218, inclusive. Their names are on the poll list made and returned by the election officers (all of whom were the partisan friends of the sitting Member but one, who was under the influence of liquor on election day), and it can not therefore be disputed that the 260 shown to have voted for contestant were legal electors, nor have your committee any doubt they voted for contestant.

As to the testimony of some of these voters, the criticism is made that they could not remember the names of all the candidates, State and national, for whom they voted.

We do not consider it remarkable that five months after the election an elector could not name all the candidates he voted for out of a dozen or more on his ballot, while he would be likely to remember the name of his candidate for Congress who had been his candidate for Congress for three elections in succession.

Any considerable number of voters proven for one candidate in excess of the number returned for him has always been regarded as evidence of fraud and a legitimate method of impeaching the return.

Here it is established that 191 more votes were actually cast for contestant than were returned for him. We think it is sufficient to exclude the return from the count, without further evidence.

One provision of the statute is that "the ballot box shall not be concealed from the public," and section 21 (of pamphlet compilation furnished the committee at the argument of the case) reads as follows: "As soon as the polls of an election shall be finally closed the inspectors shall proceed to canvass the votes cast at such election, and the canvass shall be public and continued without adjournment until completed."

Your committee find from the evidence that these provisions of the statute were violated, and without any reason being assigned for so doing.

Both the witnesses for contestant and contestee testify that after the polls were closed the officers of the election took the ballot box away from the polling room to a house in which they took supper, two or three hundred yards distant from the building in which the election was held, and the ballot box was carried inside of the supper house.

The report further holds that the ballot box was not kept with the security demanded by the law during this adjournment, and that it was surrounded by suspicious circumstances, impeaching the integrity of the election officers, and says:

Without any further statement of the evidence touching the action of the election officers on this branch of the case, your committee are of opinion that the disregard of the mandatory provisions of the election laws was willful and with a dishonest purpose of securing an opportunity to commit fraud, which such laws were intended to prevent, and that the conduct of these officers was such as to render their acts unworthy of credit and to entirely destroy the prima facie character of their return as evidence of the result of the election at this poll.

For this reason, as well as for the reason that the return is impeached and destroyed by the testimony of the electors, your committee have excluded this return from the count. The testimony with regard to this poll taken in behalf of the sitting Member will be found in the record, pages 378 to 394, inclusive, and the testimony in behalf of contestant other than that of the voters from pages 186 to 196.

The precedents for excluding a return in such a case as this are numerous, and the principles of law which we have followed are well settled. We refer, however, to McCrary on Elections, sections 302, 303; Brightly's Leading Cases, page 493; 1st Brewster's Reports, pages 66, 107; Washburn v. Voorhies (2d Bartlett, 54); Reed v. Julian (2d Bartlett, 822); Finley v. Walls (Smith).

The sitting Member took the testimony of the clerk of the circuit court of this county, to whom the ballot boxes were delivered after the election.

This clerk, nearly six months after the election, produces the box, opens it, examines the ballots in it, and testified that there were in the box 85 Republican ballots, counting no name for Member of Congress; that there were but 68 ballots for contestant, though the return gives him 69; 148 ballots for Republican Presidential electors, whereas the return gives them 150; and that there were but 140 ballots for Republican candidate for governor, though the return gives him 143. (Record, p. 399.)

It is claimed that these ballots in the box are better evidence of the result than the testimony of the voters.

As to the testimony of this clerk, it is sufficient to say that there is no law in Florida providing for the preservation of the ballots for the purpose of being used as evidence; the ballots are not evidence sufficient to overcome the testimony of the voters where the question of fraud and tampering with the ballot box is raised. (McCrary on Elections, sec. 276; id., 439; Washburn v. Voorhies, 2d Bartlett, 54.)

McCrary says in "such a case the ballots might sustain the fraud." (McCrary, sec. 439; also Reed v. Julian, 2 Balt., 822.)

These ballots can not be entitled to much weight as evidence of the result of the election, where it has been shown that the acts and conduct of the election officers are unworthy of credit and their returns set aside and regarded as unreliable. Having created for themselves, in violation of law and their official oaths, opportunities for tampering with the box, it is legitimate to infer that they would endeavor to put ballots in the box that would support the return.

Finally the majority conclude:

Your committee decide that the contestant is entitled to have 260 votes counted for him at this poll, or 191 in addition to his returned vote; and as contestee has not proven any votes for himself, none can be counted for him.

The minority analyze the evidence and conclude that, while the adjournment was irregular, yet no chance for fraud was shown, and cite evidence to show that there were divisions in contestant's party to explain the increase in the vote for sitting Member. As to the proof of the vote the minority say:

But there is a grave objection to the testimony of voters to show the true state of a poll in such a case as this, and surrounded by such circumstances. The voters were mostly illiterate and could not read their tickets, and the Dennis Republican ticket did not have Mr. Bisbee's name on it. How could they say any more than that they voted the Republican ticket? Besides, not only are political leaders liable to conceal their cutting a party ticket, but ignorant voters, who would incur the odium of their neighbors for admitting a deviation from the party paths, are also likely to deny the fact, and particularly when they have the additional shield for their consciences that they may not and perhaps can not know certainly how they voted.

The views also quote McCrary and other authorities to show that the rejection of a poll is a last resort:

The case of Biddle and Richard v. Wing, supra, is also cited as giving the correct doctrine, which holds: "Indeed nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of votes were given ought to vacate an election." (See also McCrary, pp. 436, 437, 438.) Under the law, as laid down in these citations, does the evidence justify the rejection of this poll? Have all the provisions of the election law been entirely disregarded by the election officers; and are the returns utterly unworthy of credit? Is it impossible to ascertain with reasonable certainty what the true vote is, and is it necessary to exercise the dangerous power of rejecting the poll, which the law says should only be done in extreme cases? We think not. But in addition to the provisions of the law, which declare what kind and amount of proof of fraud and illegality are required to reject a poll, the contestee very properly refers also to those presumptions which the law always throws around sworn officers, and those equally important presumptions of law, which are always in favor of innocence and right and against fraud and wrong. It is a well-settled and fundamental principle of law that in all cases and at all times all presumptions are against fraud and in favor of fairness. Fraud is never presumed, even from suspicious circumstances. When charged it must be proved. It is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of this. What is done by sworn officers in the pursuit and discharge of their duties is always presumed to be rightly done, and nothing but clear and convincing and unequivocal proof can destroy the credit and validity of their official acts. (See McCrary, sec. 87, etc.; see also Skerrett's case, Brightley's Leading Cases on Elections, p. 820 and p. 333, where the court holds this language: "What has been done by the sworn agents of the law is always to be presumed rightly done; and those who seek to impeach the acts of these functionaries must not expect to be entertained if, instead of bringing positive, tangible, and direct changes, they content themselves with general, argumentative, and theoretic imputations.")

981. The case of Bisbee, jr., v. Finley, continued.

Returns of a poll being rejected, the vote proven aliunde by one party is counted and nothing is credited to the other party unless he also prove aliunde.

The ballots in the box exceeding the names on the poll list, and the returns being impeached by the testimony of voters, the poll was rejected.

Instance wherein the House purged and did not reject a poll whereof the election officers had acted unfairly in drawing out of the box excess ballots.

Instance of the rejection of a poll for intimidation participated in by an election officer and general disorder.

The House deducted on account of an uncertified precinct return, although only the parol evidence of a single witness showed that it was included in the county canvass.

The House, on the testimony of one witness, assumed that county canvassers had improperly included an uncertified return.

(6) As to Newtonsville poll the majority report says:

The charge is made that fraud was committed at this poll by stuffing the ballot box with Democratic ballots. Two hundred and ninety-six votes were returned, 150 for Bisbee and 146 for Finley. (Record, p. 19.)

By the electors called and sworn as witnesses it is proven that 168 votes were cast for contestant; 18 in excess of the number returned. (Record, pp. 23–65 and pp. 296–313.)

It is also clearly proven that when the polls closed there were 29 more ballots in the box than names of electors on the poll list, which excess was drawn out and destroyed (Record, pp. 31, 182, 185); that Democratic ballots were found in the box folded together, which were counted; that before the ballots were counted a Democratic officer stirred or mixed the ballots up with his hand (Record, p. 183); and, after drawing out and destroying 21 ballots, on a second count 8 more in excess of the poll list was discovered, which were drawn out by the Republican inspector.

It is proven that 5 of the 8 so destroyed were Republican ballots, and that the greater portion of the other 21 were also Republican ballots. We conclude from the evidence that this excess was caused by the voting of two or more ballots by one voter, and that this was done by the supporters of contestee.

The report concludes:

On the part of contestant it is insisted that the return should be rejected, and only the votes otherwise proven counted. And our attention is called to the case of Washburn v. Voorhees (2d Bartlett's Reports, p. 54), where returns were rejected on proof of an excess of votes proven for one candidate over his returned votes of about 8 per cent, and at one poll of 4 per cent of the total vote returned.

McCrary says (sec. 371), "It is very clear that if the returns are set aside no votes not otherwise proven can be counted." The supreme court of New York, in 7 Lansing, 274, and other authorities, have declared and applied this as a settled principle, which we do not propose to overrule.

Another well-settled principle is that no poll shall be entirely set aside if the return can be corrected with reasonable certainty. The only correction of the return which, from the evidence, could possibly be made would be to count 174 votes for contestant and 121 votes for contestee. While we think this would approximate the probable true state of the vote at this poll we can not say from the evidence that such a result is reliably proven. The only other disposition that can be made of this poll is the rejection of the returns and count no votes save the 168 proven for the contestant, and from the views we have taken of the whole case it is not material to the final result which alternative is adopted.

The minority challenge the competency of the evidence and fall back on the presumption that the sworn officers have done their duty. It was also argued in the debate that, as the law provided for drawing out the excess of ballots, the proceedings were regular.

The majority also set aside the Parker's store poll:

There were but 306 votes returned for Representative in Congress, 151 for Bisbee and 155 for Finley. (Record, p. 262.) There are 336 names on the poll list. (Record, p. 374.)

It is satisfactorily proven by the electors sworn as witnesses for contestant that 179 votes were cast for him instead of 151 returned, an excess of 28 votes. (Record, pp. 323–371.) There were ballots in the box at the close of the election in excess of the poll list to the number of 6 or 7 (Record, p. 355), and 5 votes tendered by Republicans and rejected, which are included in Exhibit A of the appendix.

This excess of 28 votes proven for contestant over the number returned for him is not explained in any manner by the testimony. Whether it is the result of fraud in the officers of election or of gross carelessness in the count there is no proof to show, but upon the testimony adduced it must have been one or the other. In counting so small a number of votes it is wholly improbable that the election officers innocently made the mistake of suppressing 28 votes for contestant—nearly one-sixth of the total vote cast for him. Contestee has not taken any testimony with respect to this poll, and we are required to dispose of this question upon the evidence in the record.

There is no evidence by which the return can be corrected. The return is proven to be unreliable as evidence of the true vote, and the latter can not be ascertained by any other evidence.

"We think, therefore, that this return should be set aside and that no votes not otherwise proven should be counted.

It may be claimed that it would be proper to credit contestee with the difference between the returned total vote and the number proven for contestee, but this would be an assumption without evidence and an evasion of the rule that when a return is rejected each candidate must prove his vote by other evidence.

If legal votes were cast for contestee he had an opportunity to prove them, but he neglected to do so.

(7) In Madison County the majority report finds evidence of wholesale fraud, whereby excess of ballots over the poll lists were created, and then in the drawing out the ballots for contestant were deducted. But violence in this county prevented the contestant taking testimony fully. The report says:

To detail at length all the occurrences in this county as disclosed by the evidence would enlarge the report beyond proper limits, and therefore the statement will be condensed as much as possible.

It is in evidence that the Democratic ballots voted in this county were not more than half the size of and of finer quality of paper than the Republican ballots, and could be readily distinguished from the latter by even the sense of touch. This fact is established by the testimony of the witnesses of both contestant and contestee, and by specimens of ballots in evidence, and it is unnecessary to further allude to the evidence on this point. Likewise, upon the question of an excess of ballots, and of two or more having been folded so that one would be partially inclosed in another, and in such manner as when handled or shaken they would separate, there is no disagreement between the witnesses of the contestant and contestee.

The committee find that the sitting Member did not examine any witnesses with regard to any of the polls in this county except polls Nos. 1 and 2 in the town of Madison, and that his witnesses support the testimony adduced by contestant concerning difference in ballots, excess over poll lists, and the folding together of the same; that the contestee did not interrogate any of his witnesses as to the character of ballots drawn out and destroyed, whether they were Democratic or Republican; and as it was a very material thing to be established, the inference to be drawn is, that the contestee's attorney was aware of the fact that in the main they were Republican ballots, and that the testimony on behalf of contestant, taken before contestee examined his witnesses, establishes the fact that they were Republican ballots thus drawn out and destroyed. From this evidence the committee concludes that the following Republican ballots were drawn from the ballot boxes and destroyed, to wit: At the Greenville poll, 52; at the Madison poll No. 1, 52; at Madison poll No. 2, 14 votes, and that 20 more in excess on the second count were counted, which added that number illegally to contestee's vote; at Cherry Lake poll, 14 votes, and at Mosely Hall, No. 4 poll, not less than 10 votes.

The committee are therefore of the opinion that the fraud thus committed at the five polls last mentioned should be corrected by adding 142 votes to the contestant's vote and deducting 162 votes from contestee's vote. By thus correcting and purging the polls in question the contestant's majority at the five polls will be increased 304 votes.

The minority views say:

It is contended in behalf of contestant in regard to the Newnansville poll, in Alachua County, that the following language (quoted from McCrary) gives the true rule of law, viz:

"It is very clear that if the returns are set aside no votes not otherwise proven can be counted.'

This we admit is the true rule of law, and it is a gross inconsistency that would apply it to Alachua

County and would wholly depart from it in Madison County and attempt to set up an entirely new rule for which there is not an authority or precedent in the books.

The only way known to the law of disposing of such a case is either to accept the returns or to reject them in toto and put both parties upon the proof of their respective vote aliunde. But the contestant seeks to establish an entirely new rule, unknown to the law.

The law can not bend to suit the purposes of either party to the contest.

There is no principle of law more clearly established, says McCrary.

"And the safe rule probably is that when an election board are proved to have willfully and deliberately committed a fraud, even though it affect a number of votes too small to change the result, it is sufficient to destroy all confidence in their official acts and to put the party claiming anything under the election conducted by them to the proof of his votes by evidence other than the return." (See McCrary on Elec., p. 174.)

McCrary, on page 372, says:

"If the fraud be clearly shown to exist to such an extent as to satisfy the mind that the return does not show the truth, and no evidence is furnished by either party to a contest, and no investigation of the committee to enable them to deduce the truth therefrom, then no alternative is left but to reject such a return.

"To use it under such a state of facts is to use as true what is shown to be false." (See Washburn v. Voorhees, 2 Bartlett, 54.)

This statement of the law is peculiarly applicable to all the precincts attacked in Madison County.

There are but two ways known to the law of disposing of Madison County—either to let the returns stand as officially made or to discredit them altogether. For if they are false they can not be used for any purpose.

(8) Contestant impeached poll No. 3 in Hamilton County because of violence and disorder. The report finds:

Your committee find from the evidence that these charges are substantially sustained, and that the election at this poll was not, in any just sense, a free and fair election.

It is proven by a number of witnesses that the political supporters of contestee in several instances led colored men to the polls in a state of intoxication, which they had designedly, produced, and forced them to vote a Democratic ticket; and that from the efforts of Republicans to prevent such conduct and to secure the right of each elector to vote a free ballot violent quarrels ensued in front of the polling window, and that the immediate vicinity of the polls was a scene of disorder, lawlessness, and threats of personal violence, continuing a considerable portion of the day, and that by such means the result of the election at this poll was effected.

It was also proven that the officer of election who received the ballots sat in the window of the poll with a revolver exposed on his person, and that he rejected votes illegally. The deputy marshal was compelled to abandon efforts to maintain order, and several witnesses testified that in their opinion twenty or thirty votes were changed from contestant to sitting Member by the methods used. The committee conclude the poll should be set aside.

(9) The return from Fort Christmas was not signed by the election officers, and the report holds such return illegal and rejects it.

The minority say:

It is claimed that the whole vote of this poll should be rejected on the ground that the precinct return does not show that it was signed by the inspectors of this poll. There is no fraud alleged as to this omission.

The contestant makes the proof by the parol evidence of a single witness that the returns from this poll were included in the county canvass. This is not the best evidence, yet, if we take it as admissible evidence, the presumption of law is that the county canvassers properly and legally admitted the returns from this poll in the absence of proof to the contrary. The election laws of Florida require that the poll list, the oaths of the inspectors and clerk, and the registration list of the precinct be returned, as well as the certificate of the vote, by the precinct officers. From some or all of these papers it might well appear to the board of county canvassers that the returns from any given precinct were authentic.

It would be against the well-established law to reject this poll on that ground. Nothing can be more familiar than the rule laid down by McCrary, sections 87 and 91:

"It is well settled that the acts of public officers within the sphere of their duties must be presumed to be correct until the contrary is shown."

It is presumed that the county canvassing board properly canvassed the vote of this poll, no evidence to the contrary being produced.

(10) Other irregularities were discussed and decision reached on questions of fact largely.

In conclusion, the report summarizes and concludes:

Which deducted from the last stated result gives for Finley 12,309; Bisbee, 12,954, and a majority for Bisbee of 645.

Now, concede to contestee at the two polls of Newnansville and Parker's Store, Alachua County, the difference between the total returned vote for Representative and the votes proven for contestant, and 255 votes would be deducted from Bisbee's majority, leaving him 390 majority. And even if the polls in Brevard County No. 3, Hamilton County, and Fort Christmas poll, Orange County, were not rejected, contestant would still have a majority of 147 votes.

In any view to the case founded upon the law and the evidence, the contestant has a majority of the legal votes cast.

Accordingly the majority reported resolutions declaring contestant elected and entitled to the seat. The minority found sitting Member elected.

The report was debated at length on June 1,[1] and on that day the resolutions of the majority were agreed to, yeas 141, nays 9, the minority refraining generally from voting for obstructive purposes.

Mr. Bisbee then appeared and took the oath.

982. The South Carolina election case of Lee v. Richardson, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Discussion as to the degree of intimidation which will justify the rejection of an entire poll.

The House expressed the opinion that the storing of guns adjacent to the polls and the presence of disorderly persons who might naturally use them constituted effective intimidation.

Instance wherein the Committee on Elections purged and did not reject a poll whereof the election officers had withdrawn excess ballots unfairly.

On February 24, 1883,[2] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority of the committee in the South Carolina case of Lee v. Richardson. On the face of the returns sitting Member had a majority of 8,468 votes, but contestant alleged in substance that this was a dishonest majority, obtained by fraud and intimidation.

The committee examined the charges, precinct by precinct, and a minority of seven members of the committee, headed by Mr. A. H. Pettibone, of Tennessee, found enough changes justified, in their opinion, to create a majority of 284 votes for contestant. In reaching this conclusion the minority rejected the returns of

[1] Record, pp. 4421–4445; Journal, pp. 1388, 1389.

Darlington precinct, where 1,271 votes were returned for Richardson and 117 votes for Lee.

Mr. Calkins, in the report, states that in the main he agrees with the minority views, but differs as to Darlington, which is decisive, for unless it be rejected the contestant can not overcome sitting Member's majority:

The main difference of opinion is with reference to Darlington precinct. At that precinct Richardson received 1,271 votes and Lee received 117. I do not think the evidence is sufficient to reject this return; it is purely a question of evidence, and I can not bring myself to believe that the evidence is sufficient to justify its rejection. There is no evidence in the record tending to prove how the vote would stand on the theory of contestant, if the return was rejected. I think the evidence with reference to this precinct fairly establishes two propositions, viz: First, that the colored voters, on the morning of election, in large numbers, took possession of the market house where the elections were usually held. For some reason, not apparent, the poll was opened at the court-house, instead of the market house, and the white voters at the opening took possession of it. Attempts were made by the colored voters, early in the day, to force their way to the box to vote, which seems to have been prevented by the white voters crowding the stairs leading to the box. This led to crimination and recrimination and considerable confusion and excitement, and a rumor seems to have prevailed among the colored voters that several stands of arms had been brought to the town the night before the election by the white Democrats, and that they were concealed in the courthouse and in Early's store. Whether this was so or not is immaterial in the view which I have taken of the testimony. There was no physical display of the guns on the day of election, and I find as a matter of fact that probably as early as 10 o'clock, and certainly not later than 11 o'clock on the day of election, the colored voters, under the advice of one Smith, who was a leader and man of influence among them, dispersed and did not attempt again to vote on that day at that poll. The danger of bodily harm was not sufficiently imminent to warrant this course, and there was an entire lack of diligence on the part of these voters to maintain their right to vote. As a matter of law these voters had a right to vote at any precinct in the county; there was another voting precinct not many miles from Darlington, and there is no reason given why they might not have voted at that precinct if they were driven away from Darlington. For these and other reasons I am persuaded that Darlington should remain, and therefore submit the following resolutions, in which a majority of the committee concur:

Resolved, That Samuel Lee have leave to withdraw his papers, and this case is dismissed without prejudice.

The minority say:

But it is very evident from the testimony that intense excitement prevailed at Darlington on the day of the election. The polls were held at a different place from the usual one.

The witness McCall, a county commissioner of election (Record, p. 111), admits that the place was less convenient. It was up in the second story of the court-house, 15 feet above the ground, with two stairways leading up to the ballot box.

It appears from all the testimony that the Democrats, dressed in red shirts and caps, took possession of the polls from the outset.

J. A. Smith (Record, p. 106) states that from 700 to 800 Republican were prevented from casting their votes by reason of intimidation. He says:

"I made three attempts to reach the ballot box-myself and others; I found it impossible to do so without a collision with the Democrats and red-shirts, who had the steps packed from bottom to top."

Aimwell Western, Jr. (Record, p. 92), states that from 800 to 1,000 Republicans left the polls without voting. He also states that on the night before the election two wagons loaded with guns came on the back street and they were carried down the street next to the court-house. A portion was placed in a store of one Early and "some were put in the court-house where the ballot box was."

On Record, page 94, he gives the names of the men who unloaded those wagons: Moses Bishop, Sam Hinds, Rosser Hart, and Charlie Bishop. He states that Moses Bishop and Sam Hinds carried a portion of those guns upstairs where the ballot box was. It appears from his testimony that guns were brought on the train about 12 o'clock at night, which train neither blew a whistle nor rung a bell. The guns were tied up in blankets in large bales.

None of the persons who handled the guns were called as witnesses to deny the statement. A great many witnesses were called by Mr. Richardson who did not see any guns and did not see any intimidation.

After quoting from testimony, the minority continue:

The depositions of 240 witnesses appear in the Record, who swear they were present at the Darlington poll and desired to vote for Mr. Lee, but were prevented from so doing by threats or intimidation. Convinced they could not vote without danger of riot and bloodshed, hundreds withdrew from the poll. There is counter testimony in the Record, but it is from the very parties complained of, and from comparatively few other witnesses.

Your committee are compelled to say, from all the evidence, that the case of Darlington poll falls within the principle laid down by McCrary, as follows:

"Sec. 416. The true rule is this: The violence or intimidation should be shown to have been sufficient either to change the result or that by reason of it the true result can not be ascertained with certainty from the returns. To vacate an election on this ground, if the election were not in fact arrested, it must clearly appear that there was such a display of force as ought to have intimidated men of ordinary firmness."

Here it is proper to remark that up to 1878 Darlington precinct always was largely Republican.

A few years ago the Republicans used to poll 1,200 to 1,300 votes at that poll. See testimony of John G. Gatlin (Record, p. 79), John Lunney (Record, p. 81), Jordan Lang (Record, p. 95).

At the election in 1880 Mr. Richardson is credited by the schedule, which purports to be certified to by the clerk, Garner, but which he testifies he did not certify, as having received 1,271 votes to 117 votes for Mr. Lee; and from the impossibility of ascertaining how the actual vote stood at Darlington poll, by the disregard on the part of the county commissioners to forward the returns and Poll list to the secretary of state, in violation of a plain provision of law, and from the fact that intimidation and violence prevented hundreds from voting, your committee reject Darlington poll from the count.

The only issue joined in the report or in the debate is as to Darlington precinct. As to the ruling in the minority views, relating to other precincts, whereby such reductions were made as to enable Darlington to be decisive, it is to be inferred, perhaps, that a majority of the committee might have approved them had it been necessary. They involve the treatment of fraud and irregularities, of which a few sample cases are:

(1) Santee, Sampit, and other polls, at some of which honest elections were held, and at all of which it was possible to reach a true result, and where contestant had large majorities, were thrown out by the county commissioners because the boxes were "sent without a written certificate authorizing the bearer to deliver it." The minority views held this reason flimsy and counted the polls.

(2) At Upper Waccamau the minority disposed of a question which is typical of a class in this contest:

This precinct was rejected by the Democratic county commissioners for the same reasons—purely technical. The managers who held the election were all Democrats (Record, p. 810). They were Mr. Richardson's political friends, and ought to have seen that no fraud was perpetrated, as against him at least. But Bently Weston and R. F. Johnson, the two supervisors, one a Democrat and one a Republican, reported (Record, p. 814) and Johnson swears that there were 432 names on the poll list; that an excess of 50 ballots were found in the box. This excess was drawn out and destroyed by a Democratic manager, but by a singular perversity of fate 48 of the ballots were Republican and only two Democratic. And, as a specimen, let the following testimony of R. F. Johnson show:

Question. How many, if any, Democratic ballots were found together in one at the counting of the ballots at the close of the poll?—Answer. Twelve in one."

After this manipulation the Democratic managers gave to Mr. Lee 341 votes and to Mr. Richardson 90, which gave Mr. Lee 251 majority, and this was rejected by the Democratic county commissioners and utterly cast away.

Reversing this process of gross and palpable fraud, even the Democratic managers, whose business it was to see justice done, admitted and certified to a majority for Mr. Lee of 251, and remembering that 48 honest votes given to Mr. Lee were drawn out and 48 votes not honestly given to Mr. Richardson were left in the box, thus taking from Lee 48 votes which belonged to him and adding to Mr. Richardson's vote 48 votes which did not belong to him, Mr. Lee's vote is swelled to 341 plus 48, which makes 389, and Mr. Richardson's is 90 less 48, which gives him 42 votes; and this clearly gives Mr. Lee at this poll a majority of 347 votes, instead of 251.

983. The case of Lee v. Richardson, continued.

The Elections Committee reversed the action of local canvassers who had rejected returns transmitted by an election officer of doubtful appointment.

The Elections Committee declined to ratify the rejection of a poll because it had been closed too early, no injury being shown.

The resolution before the House providing that a contestant have leave to withdraw, the mere adoption of an amendment to seat contestant does not thereby decide the case.

After an amendment in the nature of a substitute is agreed to, the question must then be taken on the original proposition as amended.

(3) As to Rafting Creek precinct the minority made this ruling:

Here, as usual, all the managers appointed by the county commissioners were Democrats. One of them, however, Mr. McLeod, did not serve by reason of a broken arm. (See Record, p. 34.) Prince A. James, a colored am, was chosen by the other two managers, both Democrats, to fill his place. (See Record, p. 15.) A fair election appears to have been held, by all the testimony given in evidence. The result was that for Lee were cast 313 votes, and for Richardson, 51 votes. This gave to Mr. Lee 9, majority of 262 votes. (See Record, pp. 33 and 249.)

The returns and ballot box were placed by the managers in the hands of Prince A. James to be delivered to the county commissioners. But on the pretext that James had not been appointed by them as one of the managers, these sternly righteous commissioners refused to count the vote at all, and threw out the entire poll. (See testimony of D. J. Winn, pp. 7 and 8, and E. P. Ricker, pp. 47 and 48.)

Your committee believe that an immense majority of all honest American would say at once, since no one questioned the integrity of the election at Rafting Creek poll, Mr. Lee's majority ought to be counted for him. Your committee feel that they are compelled so to count the vote; and Mr. Lee's majority of the honest votes, honestly cast, honestly counted, honestly returned, but rejected by the county commissioners, was 262 votes.

(4) As to the rejection of the poll of Midway precinct by the county commissioners, the minority ruled:

The only objection to this poll is that the managers, all politically opposed to Mr. Lee, closed the polls at too early an hour.

J. J. Morris, one of these managers, swears that this was done on the suggestion of Mr. Mouzon (Record, p. 717), while Mr. Mouzon swears (Record, p. 493) that it was done "at the suggestion of some of the managers." Your committee thinks that even if Mouzon gave bad advice the managers were not bound to take it, and since the contestee does not even pretend that anyone was deprived of voting at this poll by reason of its too early closing, your committee can not agree on such a technicality that the poll should be thrown out and Mr. Lee deprived of his majority of 83 votes. It is true that one witness, R. K. Hurst, swears (Record, p. 717) that Henry Williams, a colored man, told him he intended to vote the Democratic ticket, but after Hurst voted and left he voted the other way. As Williams was not called, and the testimony is purely hearsay, your committee can not agree that this poll should be thrown out.

The minority, as the result of their conclusions, recommended the following:

I. Resolved, That John S. Richardson was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States from the First Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to occupy a seat in this House as such.

II. Resolved, That Samuel Lee was duly elected as a Representative from the First Congressional district of South Carolina to the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States, and is entitled to his seat as such.

The report was debated on March 3, 1883,[1] and on that date the question was taken[2] on a motion to substitute the minority resolutions for those of the majority; and there appeared, yeas 124, nays 111. So the motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the resolution of the majority as amended by the minority substitute, and there appeared, yeas 128, nays 6—not a quorum voting.

Two other roll calls resulted the same way. Then a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered on the pending resolution as amended, and another motion to lay the first motion on the table. On the latter motion no quorum voted, although five roll calls were had.

And this was the state of the question when the House adjourned sine die.[3]

Chapter XXXIV.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1884 AND 1885.

1. Cases in the Forty-eighth Congress, section 984–999.[1]

984. The election case of Manzanares v. Luna, from the Territory of New Mexico, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

As to what constitutes a sufficient service of notice of contest when the returned Member is absent from home.

Instance wherein the census and returns of previous elections were referred to as creating a presumption against a return.

It being impossible to separate the good from the bad vote, the poll was rejected.

On March 5, 1884,[2] Mr. Thomas A. Robertson, of Kentucky, submitted the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Manzanares v. Luna, from the Territory of New Mexico.

Sitting Delegate had been returned by an official majority of 1,419 votes.

At the outset of the case the committee thus dispose of a preliminary question:

That on the 29th day of November, 1882, the acting governor of the Territory of New Mexico issued his certificate of election in due form to the sitting Delegate; that on the 23d day of December, 1882, the contestant served a copy of his notice of contest on the wife of the contestee at his residence in the Territory of New Mexico, the contestee not being found at home; that on the 20th day of December, 1882, the contestant sent a copy of his said notice of contest by express to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States to be served on contestee, and on the same day sent by mail, by a registered letter, another copy addressed to contestee, directed to the city of Washington, where contestee was then in attendance upon the session of Congress. That the contestee answered in full on the 29th day of January, 1883.

The contestee claimed that the notice was not served in time, but your committee are of opinion that the notice was ample, and served in time, and in accordance with the statute law of New Mexico; and for the further reasons that the sheriff who served the notice of contest upon contestee's wife testified contestee was absent from the Territory of New Mexico, and besides he mailed a registered letter containing notice of contest to contestee at the city of Washington, where contestee was, and that the letter reached the city within the time prescribed by law for the notice to be served.

[2] First session, Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 667; Mobley, p. 61.

As to the merits of the case, the committee investigated chiefly questions of fact. As to these frauds the report holds:

In the county of Valencia your committee think it is clearly proven that frauds were committed in several of the precincts, and were such as to compel your committee to throw out the whole vote of said precincts; the fraud being so great and the returns so entirely in disregard of law and fair conduct on the part of the election officers that it is impossible to separate the good from the bad vote.

Before going into any detail of the evidence, your committee will state that the census of 1880 shows the whole number of male adults capable of voting in that county to be 2,636, while the vote certified and counted for contestee is 4,193. Moreover, while the certificate from that county gave the contestee that remarkable vote, it did not give even one to the contestant, although the returns before them showed he had received 66 votes. Your committee deem it appropriate to refer the House to the vote for Delegate in Congress of the two political parties in this Territory from 1873 to 1882, inclusive.

The committee, after citing the returns, say:

These are very pregnant evidences of fraud, taken in connection with the evidence, which shows no increase of population from 1880 to 1882.

The report then examines the various precincts, and finds an actual majority of 938 for contestant. Therefore they recommended the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Tranquilino Luna was not elected a delegate to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Territory of New Mexico, and is not entitled to the seat he now holds.

Resolved, That Francisco A. Manzanares was duly elected a Delegate to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Territory of New Mexico, and is entitled to be sworn in as such.

The resolutions were agreed to, without debate or division.[1]

985. The Virginia election case of O'Ferrall v. Paul, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Instance wherein a contest was maintained and contestant seated, although the returned Member had resigned before taking his seat.

Payment of a capitation tax being a prerequisite for voting, the votes of persons who had not paid were rejected.

Instance wherein the number of disqualified voters was fixed by testimony of a single witness as to his mere comparison of poll lists with delinquent tax lists.

Instance wherein the vote of a disqualified voter was proven by the fact of his color.

Instance wherein the House rejected votes as disqualified without ascertaining the names of the voters or the precincts wherein they voted.

A report of a committee is sometimes authorized by the affirmative votes of less than a majority of the whole committee, some Members being silent or absent.

On April 30,1884,[2] Mr. Robert Lowry, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Virginia contested case of O'Ferrall v. Mr. Paul had been credited with an official majority of 205 votes, and had received the certificate. But he never qualified and sent his resignation to the governor in August, 1883, on being appointed to the bench of the United States court. No special election having been ordered, the seat had been vacant from the first.

In Virginia the payment of a capitation tax was a prerequisite to the right to vote. The majority of the committee, finding as they claimed, that in one county of the district 557 persons who had not paid the capitation tax had voted for contestee, arrived at the conclusion that contestant was elected:

We base our conclusion that 676 votes were cast by persons delinquent in the payment of their capitation taxes in Albemarle for contestee, and that 557 of these were clearly illegal, upon the following facts:

By section 57, chapter 33, of the Code of Virginia, the commission of the revenue were required to state in their assessment lists the color of all male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years. The treasurer, in making his return of delinquents to the auditor of public accounts, gave the color of all delinquents in accordance with the commissioners' books. So that the white delinquents were classified in one list and the colored in another list.

The contestant filed certified copies of the delinquent lists (white and colored) of Albemarle County. (Record, 75–91.)

These lists showed the names and color of all delinquents for the year 1881—the year for which the capitation tax was required to be paid before the day of the election in question.

There is contention between the parties as to whether the auditor of public accounts of Virginia could appoint certain collectors of delinquent taxes, and whether these collectors and their deputies could then legally collect these delinquent capitation taxes.

Assuming for the purposes of this case that the auditor of public accounts could appoint collectors of delinquent taxes, and that these collectors could appoint deputies (both of which questions are held in reserve), then, under the law, the clerks of the county and corporation courts of the Commonwealth and the special collectors appointed by the auditor and their deputies were the only parties by whom receipts could be issued for delinquent capitation taxes in the various counties and cities.

The principal question on which we rest this case is, whether certain tax receipts issued by these collectors (so-called) and their deputies were issued without being paid for.

The contestant, to show the number of receipts issued and to whom by both the clerk of Albemarle and special collector, filed a certified list of the names of delinquents for 1881, to whom receipts had been issued by the clerk of Albemarle County. (See Record, 73–75.)

After thus ascertaining the names of these parties who had clerk's receipts, it followed as a necessary consequence that all delinquents who voted whose names were not on the clerk's list, voted on the collector's receipts. Then to ascertain what delinquent voters cast their votes, and upon whose receipts, it was only necessary to compare the poll books of the county with the delinquent lists.

Contestant introduced a witness (Record, 71) who testified—and whose testimony remained uncontradicted—that he had compared the clerk's list with the poll books and had designated all the delinquents who voted on the clerk's receipts by the letters "H. B. B." opposite their names on the delinquent lists; that he then designated all the delinquents who voted and who did not have the clerk's receipts by the name of the precinct at which they voted opposite their names on the delinquent lists. It was thus found that 676 delinquents voted who did not have the clerk's receipt, and presuming that the judges of election did their duty and required the production of receipts, as required by law, these 676 voted on the collector's receipts. Of this number 655 were colored.

James T. Wayland, a strong and active partisan of the contestee, was appointed a special tax collector of delinquent taxes for Albemarle County by the auditor of public accounts, who belonged to the same party as the contestee, and was a State canvasser of that party. This special tax collector appointed persons whom he called deputies in said county; he issued unlimited numbers of blank receipts for delinquent capitation taxes to these so-called deputies, who were all partisans of the contestee, and these deputies filled these receipts without receiving any money, and delivered them to the voters. These deputies paid no money to the collector for the receipts at any time, either before or after the election; the collector only received, and that in bulk, without being applied to individual cases, for all the receipts issued by him, $125 before the day of election. Each receipt issued represented $1.05, so that, even assuming that this $125 was a valid payment for so many receipts, the said sum of $125 only paid for 119 receipts. There were 676 votes cast upon the receipts issued by this special collector, so that after deducting said 119 receipts there were 557 votes cast upon collectors' receipts for which no money had been paid at the time the votes were cast or before the day of election, as required by the constitution of Virginia, and therefore these 557 votes were illegal.

The system of appointing these special collectors was inaugurated for political purposes by the auditor of public accounts of the State, who belonged to the party of which the contestee was the nominee; all of his appointees were active partisans of his party, and in many instances the chairman or secretary of the county committee, or a member of the State committee of that party, or an United States internal-revenue officer.

After quoting testimony, the majority report goes on:

This evidence shows as conclusively as circumstantial evidence could well show that the colored vote was cast with almost perfect unanimity for the contestee, and when it is taken in connection with the fact that 655 colored delinquents voted on collectors' receipts issued only to Readjuster voters, the conclusion naturally follows that these 655 colored delinquents voted for contestee.

What is proof? It is that degree of evidence which convinces the mind and produces belief.

Can any reasonable mind in the light of this evidence fail to believe that these votes were cast for contestee? Is not the weight of evidence on the side of the contestee? In fact, does it not exclude even a reasonable doubt?

There is no evidence nor any attempt to controvert this, and is not that another circumstance which goes to strengthen the belief? In the case of Smith v. Shelley the last House held that the testimony of two witnesses that 95 to 97½ per cent of the colored vote of a Congressional district was Republican was sufficient in the absence of controverting testimony. Here are 21 witnesses, of both political parties and both colors, who were present at the polls, working in the interest of the respective candidates, or observing as interested parties the movements, actions, and expressions of the voters, and with a knowledge of their political affiliations and associates, who testify that the colored vote of a county (not a Congressional district) was cast with approximate unanimity in a certain direction and for a particular candidate. It was not mere opinion, as in the case of Smith v. Shelley, but facts drawn from direct observation and participation at the polls, and from knowledge of political proclivities and associations.

Our conclusion is that these 557 persons had not complied with this constitutional provision, and were not therefore qualified to vote, and their votes must be deducted from the vote of the contestee. How, then, will the vote stand?

Returned vote for contestant, O'Ferrall	.....	11,941
Returned vote for contestee, Paul	12,146	.....
Deduct the illegal votes above	557	.....
		11,589
Majority for contestant, O'Ferrall	.....	352

But in this county Porter's precinct was thrown out by the board of county commissioners for mere irregularity. We think it ought to be counted. It gave contestee 104 majority. Deduct, then, 104 from 352, and it leaves a clear majority of 248 votes for contestant.

Therefore the majority reported resolutions declaring that Mr. Paul was not elected, and that Mr. O'Ferrall was elected and entitled to the seat.

Mr. Samuel H. Miller, of Pennsylvania, presented the views of the minority, assailing this conclusion. At the outset he stated the following:

The resolutions appended to the report of the Committee on Elections, submitted by Mr. Lowry, of said committee, received the approval, by a yea and nay vote, of 6 members out of 12 present at the time the vote was taken—2 members present declining to vote. Of the absent members, all 3 had expressed themselves opposed to the resolutions declaring Mr. O'Ferrall elected and entitled to the seat. We state this as showing that at the time said resolutions were adopted by the committee they only had the endorsement of 6 of the 15 members.

The minority then proceed to assail the method of proof adopted by the majority:

The utter unreliability of this testimony arises from the fact that the witness, Bennett T. Gordon, who testified on page 71 of record, did not pretend to know the parties whose names were on the poll books or on the clerk's list of delinquents. He simply performed a mechanical act, which any member of the committee or the House can do by taking up the two lists, and when he finds a name on the poll lists and a name on the delinquent lists which are the same check it off on the assumption that there could not be two men of the same name in the county.

OVER 6,000 NAMES ON THE DELINQUENT LISTS AND POLL BOOKS.

There are over 2,000 names of colored persons on the delinquent lists of Albemarle County and 4,133 names of white and colored on the poll books. There is no law in Virginia requiring the election officers to keep a record of the color of voters. Then, on the delinquent lists we find numerous instances where the same name is common to a number of persons. We find 3 Charles Burleys; 3 John Browns, Jack Brown, John A. Brown, and John W. Brown; 5 Nelson Browns; 4 James Johnsons and 1 Jim Johnson; 4 Wm. Johnsons; 5 Hy. Johnsons and 1 Henry Johnson; 3 Sam. Johnsons and 2 Saml. Johnsons, and an almost equal repetition is found throughout the alphabet. To assume that a stranger could take two lists, one containing over 4,000 names in twenty different books, and the over 2,000 names in two lists, neither of which have any distinguishing marks, and from these 6,000 names select the number of colored persons who voted on delinquent tax receipts and figure them out at 655 is to assume an impossibility. It is not pretended that the election officers kept a record of either the whites or blacks who voted on delinquent tax receipts. The proof is utterly unreliable. In short, it is no proof whatever, for, as heretofore stated, any member of the committee can take the lists and the twenty poll books and as correctly arrive at the same conclusion.

We contend that the only reliable and competent evidence would be the testimony of the alleged delinquents, or a sworn copy of the list of such as paid their tax made out by the collector to whom the tax was paid and by whom the receipts were issued. If the latter could not be obtained then the delinquent voters alone could testify correctly. Every man whose name was on the delinquent list and who voted is presumed to have had a tax receipt, and consequently his ballot can not be rejected except upon competent evidence.

It is on the evidence of Bennett T. Gordon, which will be found in the appendix, that the committee find that 655 colored delinquents voted in Albemarle County. The witness Gordon does not pretend that he has any personal acquaintance with any of these 655 men; does not pretend that he has any personal knowledge of whether they were delinquent or not; does not pretend that he has personal knowledge of whether they are colored or not; does not pretend that he has personal knowledge of whether they are the same men or not. All he testifies is that he finds the name of John Brown on the delinquent county list, and the name of John Brown on some poll list for the same county; therefore the two men are one and the same.

FOR WHOM WERE THESE 655 VOTES CAST?

Unless the House adopts the hypothesis of the majority report that Bennett T. Gordon could with absolute certainty pick out from over 6,000 names these 655 voters, then they are unnamed and unknown. But two of all are called, and three others only are identified. But if their identity is established, then there is not a single witness who testifies for whom they severally voted. Twenty-one witnesses, living in 16 of the 20 election precincts, testify as to whom the colored people as a class voted for. In 4 of the precincts, in which 66 of the alleged delinquents voted, there is not a line of testimony as for whom the colored people as a class voted.

But we contend that a still more important question is:

WHAT ARE THE NAMES OF THE 557 VOTERS who cast the ballots which the majority report declares to be illegal, and which the committee deduct from contestee's vote, and which must be deducted from contestee's vote in order to seat the contestant?

The committee concede that of the 676 persons who it claims voted on collectors' receipts, 119 (of whom 21 were white and 98 colored) were entitled to vote. What are the names of these 119? It is admitted by the majority report that Collector Wayland had at least $125 before the election, and that this would qualify 119 voters. Who are they? At what precinct did they vote? How many of them voted at Batesville? How many at each of the other 20 precincts? If it is impossible to say who the 119 voters are, how can the committee name the 557 voters whose ballots it deducts from contestee?

Did any court investigating an election case ever reject a ballot for the sole reason that the person casting it had not paid a tax required by law as a prerequisite for voting and deduct it from one of the candidates without naming the voter who cast the ballot? How is it possible to decide that the ballot is illegal unless the name of the person casting such ballot is known?

Can the majority of the committee name the 557 voters whose ballots it deducts from the contestee in order to seat the contestant? Can the contestant name them? Can anyone tell us the number rejected at each of the 20 precincts? If not, why not?

The minority also asserted, as a fact shown by the testimony, that the collector had a draft for the taxes alleged not to be paid, which was indorsed about three weeks after the election.

In the debate it was insisted that as the object of the law was revenue, and as the State had the revenue, the voters who had paid it should not be disfranchised.[1]

The report was debated on May 5,[2] and on that day a resolution proposed by the minority declaring Mr. O'Ferrall not elected was disagreed to, yeas 83, nays 139.

Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to, ayes 128, noes 73.

Mr. O'Ferrall thereupon appeared and took the oath.

986. The Ohio election case of Wallace v. McKinley in the Forty-eighth Congress.

A report of a committee is sometimes authorized by the affirmative votes of less than a majority of the whole committee, some being absent.

A divided committee once held that canvassers, not having judicial authority, should count votes returned under variations of name in determining prima facie right.

It being determined that contestant had actually been entitled to the credentials, the burden of proof was shifted to the returned Member.

On May 14, 1884,[3] Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority of the committee in the Ohio case of Wallace v. McKinley.

The minority views, presented by Mr. A. A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, called attention to the division in the committee:

The learned chairman of the committee has prepared and shown to us the report which he proposes to make to the House, in behalf of the six members who constituted the majority, voting in favor of the resolutions appended thereto, as against five other members voting otherwise. It is to be regretted that this case proceeded to a vote in committee during the necessary and enforced absence of four of its members. The minority feel it to be their duty, not only to dissent from the majority report and its conclusions, but to assail it, as failing to present the case fully and properly for the determination of the House.

The sitting Member had received his certificate on an official plurality of 8 votes.

[1] Record, p. 3812.

[2] Record, pp. 3800–3819; Journal, pp. 1178–1181.

[3] First session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 1548; Mobley, p. 185.

As to the question of prima facie right and the burden of proof, the report says:

The State canvassing board, consisting of the governor and secretary of state, treated Jonathan H. Wallace, John H. Wallace, Major Wallace, Wallace, W. H. Wallace, W. W. Wallace, Jonathan Wallace, Maj. Wallace, and J. H. Wallace as distinct persons, and in that way awarded the certificate of election to the sitting Member. Under this treatment of the returns the sitting Member has a plurality over the contestant of 8 votes.

On the argument the concession was made that the votes certified for "Major Wallace," "Wallace," "Jonathan Wallace," "Major Wallace," and "J. H. Wallace," 16 in number, should be counted for contestant. Conforming the figures to this addition, the positions of the parties are reversed, and the contestant has a plurality over the sitting Member of 8 votes on the face of the returns. In this state of the case the burden is cast upon the sitting Member to contest the election of Mr. Wallace. Indeed, there can be no doubt that the certificate of election should have been issued to the contestant, and he should have been the occupant of the seat with its honors and emoluments. Logically, we assign him nunc pro tunc his true position in the controversy, and the onus is shifted to his adversary.

The proof shows that the contestant was the only candidate at the election bearing the name of Wallace, and under the weight of authority we think that the ballots certified to have borne the names John H. Wallace, W. H. Wallace, and W. W. Wallace, 7 in all, in the absence of any other evidence, should be also counted for the contestant.

The minority deny the principles above set forth.

The majority report goes so far as to say that the certificate of election ought to have been issued to the contestant on this account, and proceeds to treat him in advance as duly elected upon the final returns alone. Nothing, in our judgment, can be more clearly erroneous than this finding and statement. It is against every principle and rule of law, and all precedent. It can not be justly denied that, under the laws of Ohio, the State board are merely ministerial officers, invested with no power to meet the parties and hear evidence; and had they attempted to do it, it would have been a clear violation of duty. The precinct officers (the judges of election) had presumably counted the votes in question as cast for different persons, and they had been so returned to the county canvassers, and by them in turn to the State board. The State board had no right or authority to assume that votes for John H. Wallace, Major Wallace, Wallace, W. H. Wallace, W. W. Wallace, Maj. Wallace, and returned as if for different persons, were in fact intended for Jonathan H. Wallace. The State board had no legal authority whatever to hear evidence and determine that issue of fact. If they had, they should not have stopped there, but proceeded to hear other controverted issues of fact.

The board followed the rule uniformly laid down in the decided cases. (McCrary on Elections, secs. 211, 81, 82, 83; 27 Barb., 77; 25 Ill., 328; 4 Wis., 779; 10 Iowa, 212; 22 Mo., 224. Clark v. Board, etc., 126 Mass., 282; 64 Maine, 596; 71 Maine, 371; 59 Ind., 152.)

No authority to the contrary can be found, except in cases where the statutes gave the board greater authority than do the statutes of Ohio. The House can go behind the returns and hear evidence and get at the facts which the State board had no power to do.

In this investigation, therefore, we are to assume that contestee rightfully obtained his certificate, and that he has a prima facie title to the seat, with all of the usual presumptions that attach to the same. It is incumbent upon the contestant to overthrow that title and right. If, in attempting to do so, he shows, or it appears otherwise, that contestee got more votes than were counted and returned for him those must be overcome also. If the evidence nullifies any of the votes counted and returned for contestant, he can not have the benefit of them in maintaining his claim of a majority. It is erroneous to assume that the burden shifts from the contestant to the contestee, by proving one item of his claim, which alone considered might change the result.

There was also a question as to an error of 10 votes in the footings whereby sitting Member suffered; but this was denied by the minority, and sitting Member waived the claim.

987. The election case of Wallace v. McKinley, continued.

Ballots whereon the name of a candidate was spelled grotesquely, and rejected by the election judges, were counted on oral evidence sustained by a recount after the box had been in illegal custody.

Discussion as to admissibility of oral evidence to contradict a ballot.

Ballots with a different given name, and others with different initials, were counted without proof of intent of the voter.

A vote for "Kinley" was counted for "William McKinley" on proof of voter's intent.

A vote apparently for "Walce," and rejected by the judges as undecipherable, was counted for "Jonathan H. Wallace" on slender evidence.

The House declined to reverse the action of election officers who had returned for "Jonathan H. Wallace" votes cast for "J. Wales" and "Jonathan H. Walser."

Proceeding from the question of prima facie right, the report proceeds with the claims of contestant and of sitting Member. In brief, it may be said that recounts and reexaminations had so resulted as to enable contestant to claim a plurality of 30 votes, while sitting Member proposed to overcome this by showing the illegality of 55 votes alleged to have been cast for contestant. Individual votes being dealt with, a number of principles were involved in important relations to the decision of the case.

(1) The question as to the proper spelling of the name of the candidate.

Besides the variations discussed in the consideration of prima facie right, the majority proposed to count certain ballots found under conditions as follows:

In Fairfield Township, Columbiana County, a number of ballots bearing the surname of the contestant, or some approximation to that name, though improperly spelled, were omitted from the count and were not included in the return. An effort was made to ascertain the number and character of these ballots by a reexamination of the box. Although the persons charged with the custody of the box and the key of the box deny on oath that they had tampered with the box or its contents, it appears that for a short time the box and the key were in the possession of the same person, contrary to the law of the State. An opportunity was thus afforded for casting suspicion upon the integrity of the box. It also appears that on a recount of the ballots, which had been counted and strung and placed in this box, a different result was reached from the result certified by the judges of election.

But from the testimony of the judges of election and others there can be no doubt that at this precinct ballots of the character described were voted at the election and excluded from the count. Carpenter, Democratic judge of the election, in his evidence states the number of these uncounted ballots to have been from 7 to 15. Hum, a Republican judge of the election, in his evidence estimates the number at from 2 to 13, and his impression seems to have favored the latter number. Shields, another Republican judge, in his testimony places the number at 5. Augustine, Republican clerk of the election, states that there were 13 or 14 of these uncounted ballots. And others testify on the subject with more or less variant results. In the box at the recount just mentioned were found 11 ballots for "Major Wallace," "Ma. Wollac", Wolac," "Mag. Wolac," "Wollac," "Wallace," "Woloc," "Mage. Wolac," and "Wolloc." This species of ballots the judges say they rejected from the count. We adopt this number, and think they ought to be counted for contestant.

In Washington Township, Stark County, the judges of election cast out a ballot on which the sitting Member's printed name was erased, and the name "Walce" was written in pencil under the erased name. The reason given by one of the judges for the rejection of this vote was that "it lacked the Christian name or initials." We think it ought to be counted for contestant.

The minority views contend strongly that the custody of the box had not been in accordance with the law of Ohio, and that upon the person offering the box was cast the burden of proof of showing that it was intact. In this case four months had elapsed, and it appeared (and in debate was admitted by the majority) that there were 5 less votes in the box than at the time of the official count. The minority say:

The majority report virtually abandons the claim as based upon the recount, and appears to find that the evidence establishes, independently of the recount, that 11 more votes were cast for him than were counted. A careful examination shows that the evidence falls far short of proving this. The mixing up of the recount, when it is discredited, with what evidence is furnished by witnesses orally, is most remarkable. The oral evidence alone is not enough to prove distinctly the claim, either as to the number of the ballots not counted or to give an intelligible description of them.

As to the ballots for "Waiac," "Ma. Wllac" "Mag. Wolac," "Walor," "Mage Wolac," and "Waloe," and others (if proved), they neither indicate the proper name of contestant nor any name by which he was ever known.

The oral testimony describes no such ballots.

The judges of election made no return of such, as scattering or otherwise. Whereas if it was true that there were so many such irregular votes, as is now pretended, they would have been returned as was done at other places, in the county of Columbiana, and as the statute absolutely required. It is more probable that they are mistaken now than that they were guilty of any such misconduct.

To count them in any event for the contestant involves a contradiction of the ballots, they having been cast for names different from any by which the contestant has ever been known.

It seems perfectly well settled that no evidence can be received to contradict a ballot; it must be sufficiently certain upon its face, that when read in the light of the surrounding circumstances it appears to be manifestly for the candidate claiming it.

The minority then quote Cooley and Cushing in support of this doctrine.

The minority further discuss on their merits other questions as to ballots bearing variations in the names.

We now come to the 23 names returned from Columbiana County, which contestant claims and which the majority report finds. Upon the evidence that he was a candidate and was known and went by the name of Major Wallace and Jonathan Wallace, contestee very liberally concedes him 16 of the votes, and we need not discuss that matter.

As to 7 ballots, reading:

W. H. Wallace	2
John H. Wallace	4
W. W. Wallace	1
Total	7

There is no ambiguity, and the names designate other persons. There is no evidence to show the intention of the voter, as in case of the ballot for "Kinley." It is not safe to go into the region of guess, surmise, or conjecture. The intention can beagot only from the ballots themselves. There were other Wallaces in the district eligible to the office. There was a John Wallace. There was &good deal of scratching and independent voting, by Republicans especially. When this is done, third persons, not regular candidates, are often voted for. There were in fact some four different candidates at least, and numerous scattering votes, the names not being given.

We can not allow these ballots as proved to have been cast for contestant.

MOUNT UNION PRECINCT, STAR COUNTY.

The majority report allows contestant 1 vote not counted at Mount Union. The ballot is in evidence, marked Ex. A, A. L. Jones. An inspection of the same shows that it is impossible to read more than the first three letters, which are probably W-a-l. Beyond this it is impossible to decipher any letters. It is printed in the record "Walce." It is written in pencil under name of contestee erased in pencil. (Rec., p. 97.)

The judges, including Rakestraw, Democratic judge, were unanimously of the opinion at the time that the name could not be deciphered, and rejected the ballot at the time of the count. In his evidence he now pretends that it was because the initials were wanting. But the evidence of the other witnesses (entirely ignored by the chairman in his report) completely refutes this pretense now. We find that this should not be allowed for contestant with all the presumptions against it, and upon the evidence.

An opportunity to examine the same further, and call witnesses about this ballot, was denied contestee and his counsel, as already herein before stated. (Rec., p. 98.)

This would have been a good occasion for the chairman to have applied the principle, which he enunciates, as to the force which is to be given to the action of the election officers, and on this case "refuse to reverse their judgment."

There was also cast a ballot marked "Kinley," and it was conceded that this should be counted for sitting Member.

The minority also call attention to the following:

In Mount Union precinct, Washington Township, a ballot was cast for "J. Wales," which was counted and returned for Mr. Wallace. The name is not that of the contestant by any possible manner of spelling. It is a well-known name in Stark County, the proof showing that a gentleman of this surname was once a candidate for Congress in the district.

To count the vote for him contradicts the ballot.

In Osnaburgh precinct of Osnaburgh Township a ballot for Jonathan H. Walser was counted and returned for Mr. Wallace. The proof shows that there was a John Walser in Stark County, a prominent Democrat and candidate for office. In any event, the name Walser is not that of the contestant. If intended for him it was a mistake of the voter, which can not be corrected. (A. Smith, Rec., p. 361; M. Miller, p. 363; G. Holben, p. 364; B.F. Sullivan, p. 365.)

There is no evidence adduced from which the intention of the voter in the last two cases can be inferred, save the ballots themselves and the mere fact that contestant was one of the candidates.

The majority report declines to reverse the action of the judges and count the votes.

988. The election case of Wallace v. McKinley, continued.

The House counted a ballot rejected by election judges because of distinguishing marks, on testimony that the marks were made by inadvertence.

Evidence of declarations of voters after the election as to how they voted was rejected as hearsay.

Discussion as to whether or not the voters are parties to an election case in the sense that their declarations are admissible to prove their votes.

Discussion of an election case as a public inquiry, admitting a liberal rule of evidence.

Does the fact that an election case is instituted by a memorial instead of on pleading under the law justify a different rule of evidence?

Discussion as to the applicability of English decisions to American election cases.

(2) A question arose as to a marked ballot. The majority say:

In Lee Township, Carroll County, a ballot for contestant was not counted by the judges, because it had a name and some figures on the back of it. It is claimed by the sitting Member that this ballot is obnoxious to the statute of Ohio which forbids any mark or device by which one ticket may be distinguished from another. The evidence shows that this ticket was voted in the condition described by accident or inadvertence. We do not think that it is within the mischief intended to be prevented by the statute, and count it for this contestant.

The minority held:

The majority report allows a ballot which was rejected by the judges of election in Lee Township, Carroll County (Rec., p. 177). It was not counted, because on the back of it was written in ink, "H.—W. J. McCauseland," and then two columns of figures under the letters R. and D., respectively. The ballot was clearly in violation of the statute supplement to Revised Statutes, section 31. It provides:

"That all ballots voted at any election held in pursuance of law shall be written on plain white paper, or printed with black ink on plain white news-printing paper, without any device or mark of any description to distinguish one ticket from another, or by which one ticket may be known from another by its appearance, except the words at the head of the ticket, and that it shall be unlawful for any person to print for distribution at the polls, or distribute to any elector, or vote any ballot printed or written contrary to the provisions of this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name, by pencil mark or otherwise, upon the face of the printed ballot."

The ballot had clearly on the back of it what made it a mark which served to distinguish it from other ballots. (McCrary, sec. 403; Hirk v. Rhoades, 46 Cal., 398.) 'We do not think the ballot should be allowed contestant.

The chairman, in his report, seems here to forget his purpose to allow all reasonable presumptions in favor of the action of the judges of elections, as availed of in the instances of J. Wales and J. H. Walser.

(3) An important question, lying at the foundation of much of the testimony by which sitting Member tried to prove illegal votes cast for contestant, related to testimony of persons to whom voters had made declarations. The majority say:

The sitting Member insists that declarations of voters made long after the election, not under oath, are admissible to prove how they voted. Even if this evidence were competent, we could not under the rule just cited add more than 10 to the votes involved in doubt; in any view, therefore, the contestant's plurality can not be overcome. But we believe that these unsworn declarations of voters made after the election are hearsay and inadmissible for any purpose. It has been attempted to justify the admission of this species of evidence upon the pretext that the voters are parties to the case. They are not served with notice; they have no right to appear in the contest in their own right, either in person or by counsel; they can not of their own motion even present themselves as witnesses. They are as much strangers to the case as the men of the district who did not vote or the women and children of the district or the other people of the United States.

It is also urged that this is a public inquiry, and therefore a more liberal rule of evidence ought to prevail. But we fail to discover in this suggestion any good reason why a controversy involving the right to represent 150,000 people and to make laws for the entire Union should be adjudicated upon evidence which the courts have always rejected in other causes.

In the early cases of contested elections they originated in the House, and the witnesses were examined in the presence of the Committee on Elections or of a subcommittee detailed for that purpose. Under this practice there was possibly more significance in this suggestion of "a public inquiry," many of the cases arising upon memorials of private citizens. It was during the prevalence of this practice that the celebrated New Jersey case arose. Cases in the English House of Commons were originated and conducted in a similar manner. But since Congress passed the act governing contested elections they are instituted upon regular pleadings like any other suit, the proofs taken by the parties before designated officers, and all the proceedings are conformed to judicial precedents. We respectfully submit that it is greatly to be desired that these cases should be adjudicated upon the principles as well as the forms which prevail in the courts.

The vicious tendency of hearsay evidence in election cases needs no demonstration. An unlawful vote may be cast for one party, and then upon the unsworn statement of the voter it may be deducted from the other party.

And we deny that the weight of authority is in favor of the admission of this class of testimony. On the contrary, we affirm that the overwhelming weight of authority supports the view which we have taken.

In the debate this point was much controverted, and Mr. Turner [1] insisted that the House should not follow the English precedents, which were originally established when voting was viva voce and when the voter's declaration, being as to qualification, and therefore being against his own competency, was received. But the American cases were the other way, and he referred to Letcher v. Moore, and especially to Farlee v. Runk, where such testimony as "He told me he voted for Mr. Runk" was not approved. The case of Cessna v. Myers was also cited as a main authority. Bell v. Snyder and Newland v. Graham were also referred to, while it was denied that the case of Vallandigham v. Campbell was as cited by the minority.[2]

The minority views contend:

The case of Cessna v. Myers (Contest. Elect., 1871–1876, p. 60) has been supposed to be authority opposed to the admission of this class of testimony. While the report discusses the question, and it is stated that some of the committee think that such declarations are only admissible when part of the res gestse, and all agree that such evidence should be received with caution, only to be acted on when declarations are clearly proved and in themselves satisfactory (p. 65), the committee and the House did consider the testimony and act upon it in deciding the case. So, notwithstanding the discussion of the subject and the expression of the opinion of the member of the committee who framed the report, the case is an authority in favor of the admissibility of such testimony, holding "evidence of hearsay declarations of the voter can only be acted upon when the fact that he voted has been shown by evidence aliunde, and the declarations clearly proved and are themselves clear and satisfactory" (p. 67).

Cook v. Cutts, Forty-seventh Congress, ought to be mentioned perhaps. What is said on the subject in the report of that case, as the writer of this report knows, was not the result of a decision by the committee. The question was not essential to the determination of the case, but that turned upon other grounds.

This subject was most elaborately discussed in the case of Vallandigham v. Campbell, and the conclusion reached sanctioned by the House, was that such declarations are admissible.

The report has distinguished names attached to it, such as Mr. Lams, (now Senator), from Mississippi, and Ex-Governor J. W. Stevenson, of Kentucky.

This case is cited and approved in People v. Pease (27 N. Y., 51).

The doctrine contended for is upheld in State v. Oliver (23 Wis., 319, 327).

The person assailing the right of the voter and charging against him moral turpitude and crime in the unlawful exercise of the franchise should not be compelled to make this alleged dishonest adversary his own witness, thus giving validity to his testimony. The doctrine is well settled that it is not necessary in such cases to first call the voter:

"It was not done in any of the cases decided in the British Parliament. It is not necessary in settlement cases, where the declarations of the parishioner may be given in evidence, and the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided that where a witness can not be compelled to answer he need not be called. (1 Greenleaf on Ev., 175; 6 Peters, 352–367. Vallandigham. v. Campbell, supra.)"

Wigginton v. Pacheco (Cases 1876, p. 10).

The common-law rule as to hearsay evidence can not be made to apply. If so, it would apply and exclude the evidence just as much after the voter had been called and refused to testify as before.

The suggestion of the chairman of the committee that the rule of admitting the declaration of voters as to how they voted originated in the House in the early cases of contest, when witnesses were summoned and testified personally before the Committee on Elections, in no sense destroys the force or reason for the rule. If competent in one case it must be dearly competent in the other. He fails to state, what is the fact, that the rule has been followed since Congress passed the act governing contested elections. Notably in the case of Vallandigham v. Campbell in 1858, and in the very recent case of Wigginton v. Pacheco in 1877, and in other cases. The fact that election cases are tried upon pleadings now instead of upon a memorial can not be justly held to change the rule in question. This does not make the contest any more a proceeding, inter partes than it was before. The public has the same interest and rights in the contest as they ever had.

989. The election case of Wallace v. McKinley, continued.

To reject votes cast by persons alleged not to have lived within the precinct, the best evidence regarding precinct lines should be produced.

Discussion as to the qualifications of paupers residing in an alms house.

Where returned Member's name was written on an opposition ballot under contestant's, with the latter not scratched, the vote was counted for returned Member.

The fact that a voter was registered in a county infirmary as an idiot, did not avail to cause rejection of his vote as illegal under the law.

The vote of a person under guardianship for lunacy was sustained on testimony that he was employed in a position of some responsibility.

(4) As to votes alleged to have been cast by persons not living within the precinct, the majority say:

In this list there are 5 votes alleged to have been cast for contestant in wards of the city of Canton in which the voters did not reside, and 2 votes said to have been cast for contestant in townships in which it is claimed the voters did not reside. In these cases a dispute arose as to the boundaries of these voting subdivisions, and if the highest evidence should be required on this question, the municipal ordinances or official action of the local authority having jurisdiction and establishing these boundaries should have been produced. In the city of Canton it is alleged, and not denied, that a very recent change of ward limits had been made.

The minority say:

John Rigler, Frank Walters, M. Zilch, Daniel Winkleman, Celestin Jourdain, are proved to have voted in the wrong wards in Canton. They each admnt this, and say upon oath that they voted for Mr. Wallace.

It is expressly provided by the constitution of the State of Ohio, article 5, section 1, that to be an elector requires residence in the State for one year, and of the "county, township, or ward, in which he resides such time as may be provided by law."

Section 2945 Revised Statutes of Ohio, 1880, provides that—

"No person shall be permitted to vote at any election unless he shall have been a resident of the State for one year, resident of the county for thirty days, and resident of the township, village, or ward of a city or village for twenty days next preceding the election at which he offers to vote, except where he is the head of a family and has resided in the State and in the county in which such township, village, or ward of a city or village is situate the length of time required to entitle a person to vote under the provisions of this title, and shall bona fide remove with his family from one ward to any other ward in such city or village, or from a ward of such city or village to a township or village in the same county, or from a township or village to a ward of a city or village in the same county, or from one township to another in the same county, in which cases such person shall have the right to vote in such township, village, or ward of a city or village without having resided therein the length of time above described to entitle a person to vote."

Moreover, it is made a crime by the laws of Ohio to vote in a ward or election precinct in which the voter has not actually resided for more than twenty days preceding the election. (Rev. Stats. of Ohio, 1880, § 7047.)

This precise question was passed upon in the case of Vallandigham v. Campbell (Contested Election Cases, 1834–865, p. 232):

"Of nonresidents of the ward or township, two votes are disputed by the returned Member and none by the contestant. It is not denied that both of these voters were legal electors of the county; but having voted (though not fraudulently, but by mistake) out of their proper wards, the undersigned find the votes illegal and deduct them from the poll of the contestant. (Report Vallandigham v. Campbell, supra. See also Cushing's Law and Pr. Leg. Assemb., 9th ed., § 24. Cook v. Cutts, 47th Congress. Wigginton v. Pacheco, Contested Elections, 1876.)"

The same is true of John Moriarty, who voted in the wrong precinct in Alliance, Stark County. (Rec., p. 400; J. W. Coulter, p. 401.)

Jos. Bittaker.— He voted in Sugar Creek Township for Mr. Wallace. The testimony shows that he resided with his father in Franklin Township, Tuscarawas County. He recognized the fact that he had no right to vote in Sugar Creek Township, and said he would offer to vote, and, if challenged, would go away.

The evidence is that he was a Democrat in politics. It is not denied by contestant in his brief that he was a Democrat, and no question is made apparently about his having voted the Democratic ticket.

In the debate [1] it was not denied that the votes should be deducted if they were shown to have been cast by persons proved legally to have lived out of the precinct; but it was objected that the testimony was not conclusive, since no competent evidence was produced that the ward lines were changed, and the testimony of a voter that he finds by a map (not adequately proven as official) that he lived out of the precinct was not admissible.

(5) The minority laid stress on certain votes of paupers:

It appeared in evidence that Charles Ducatry, M. Stimler, B. Waldecker, and Joseph Frickert were inmates of the Stark County Infirmary, situate in Plain Township. Ducatry voted at Louisville, Nimishillen Township; Stimler voted in Washington Township; Waldecker and Frickert in Canton Township, and all voted for Mr. Wallace.

An inmate of a county infirmary, who has adopted the township in which the infirmary is situated as his place of residence, is a resident and voter in the township in which the infirmary is situated. (Sturgeon v. Korte, 34 Ohio St., 525.)

Each of these persons states, unequivocally, that he regarded the poorhouse as his home, had no other home, and never expected to leave the infirmary. They said they voted in the townships to which they were taken to vote because they were told to do so. Frickert said he voted in Canton because he got his papers there. None of them, owing to poverty, great age, and infirmity, had any expectation of living elsewhere. They had a right to vote in Plain Township, and nowhere else.

The majority report does not consider this question specifically; but in the debate [2] it was shown that these four voted at this election in their old homes as they had done before, and it was claimed that the decision of the supreme court of Ohio did not go to the extent of compelling them to vote in the precinct where the institution was located. They had a right to elect, on the theory put forth on behalf of the majority.

(6) The majority concluded that votes should be counted under these circumstances:

Again, a recount was also had in Austintown Township, Mahoning County, at the instance of the sitting Member, and 2 ballots were found in the box which had not been counted by the judges of election. On one of these ballots the name of the contestant was written under the printed name of the sitting Member, and on the other the name of the sitting Member was written under the printed name of the contestant, and the printed name on each had not been erased. These ballots should, we think, have been counted according to the written names appearing on them.

The minority say:

The ballot shown to have been voted in Selem Township, Washingtonville precinct, and not counted, was a regular Democratic ticket, with Mr. McKinley's name written in full under the name of Mr. Wallace as a candidate for Congress, the name of Mr. Wallace not, however, being scratched. The writing should prevail, and the ticket not having been counted should be added to Mr. McKinley's Poll.

[2] Speech of Mr. Adams, Record, pp. 4536, 4537.

(7) As to certain alleged incompetent voters the minority views say:

Samuel Thompson was a Democrat, and always voted that ticket; he voted at the election in this township, and unquestionably voted for Mr. Wallace. He is an inmate of the county infirmary, and registered there as an idiot, and if the proof shows that he is an idiot, under the constitution of the State he is not a legal elector. (Constitution of Ohio, art. 5, sec. 6.)

(Thos. H. White, Rec., p. 163; Craig D. Filson, Rec., p. 165; Wm. Davidson, Rec., p. 168; Horace P. Hessin, Rec., p. 170; A. J. Cowan, Rec., p. 443; Jas. Brubeck, Rec., p. 446.)

Michael Higgins voted at the election in Leetonia precinct. He was an insane person, under guardianship as such, and, his own declarations show, was not of sufficient intelligence to know how he voted; although there is some conflict in the testimony, we do not think there is sufficient evidence to overcome the presumption arising from the inquisition of lunacy and the appointment of the guardian, which is shown.

The only proof of the person for whom he voted is the testimony showing that he came to vote with his fellow railroad-track hands, who were Democrats, was living with his brother, who was a Democrat, and was understood to be a Democrat; but we think the evidence is sufficient on the authority of the case of Vallandigham, v. Campbell, supra, and the authorities there cited. (See pp. 233, 234.)

In the debate [1] it was claimed on behalf of the majority that these two votes were competent, Higgins being employed as a railroad hand to act as watchman at a crossing. His employers testified that he was competent for that responsible service.

(8) The minority set forth in their views this rule, which they conceived should prevail:

The House will please observe that the evidence adduced by contestee, and the substance of which has been given or referred to in his report in support of his claim as to the said list of 55 alleged illegal voters for contestant, stands substantially without contradiction or conflict. Evidence in rebuttal was introduced by contestant only in a very few instances, and none at all as to the votes in Liverpool Township. In the few cases where evidence in rebuttal was taken it served only to confirm the evidence in chief. If the evidence was not true contestant had the means and an ample opportunity to refute it and show how the facts were. When the legality of votes is assailed, upon notice and answer, and the issue is formed, that issue is to be fairly heard and tried upon evidence. When one party adduces apparently credible evidence, sufficient of itself to maintain the issue, the opposite party is called upon to meet it; and if he does not do it, with the means at hand, there can be but one reasonable conclusion, and that is that there was no answer to it. The committee adopted such a rule in the case of Manzanares v. Luna, decided at the present session.

The majority report does not discuss this subject.

(9) The remaining questions involved in the report were largely as to facts and the credibility of testimony.

The majority of the committee, in accordance with their reasoning, concluded that contestant was elected, and proposed these resolutions:

Resolved, That William McKinley, jr., was not elected a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That Jonathan H. Wallace was elected a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress and is entitled to a seat in this House.

The minority contended that sitting Member was elected by 67 majority.

The report was debated at length on May 26 and 27,[2] and on the latter day a motion to substitute a proposition of the minority declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat was disagreed to, yeas 108, nays 158.

The resolutions of the majority were then agreed to without division.

Mr. Wallace thereupon appeared and took the oath.

990. The Indiana election case of English v. Peelle, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

The House reluctantly sustained a report holding that the use, with fraudulent intent, of very thick paper for ballots, constituted a distinguishing mark.

The House reluctantly sustained an unauthorized recount made incidentally during a legal recount for a State office.

The House rejected votes cast by prisoners brought from the jail to the polls and voting under duress.

The House rejected the votes of paupers who were carried to the polls by officers and compelled to vote contrary to their party affiliations.

On May 14, 1884,[1] Mr. George L. Converse, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Indiana contested case of English v. Peelle. Sitting Member had been returned elected by an official majority of 87 over the contestant.

The entire controversy was confined to the single county of Marion, and principally to the city of Indianapolis.

The majority report at the outset charged that all but two election precincts in the city were under control of sitting Member's party, and that the other party had but one out of 56 election inspectors. But in the minority views and the debate[2] it was pointed out that at each and every precinct contestant's party was represented by a judge, a clerk, and a watcher. The law of Indiana required this representation, and the law was complied with.

The majority report charged, and it does not appear to have been denied, that the police force was controlled by sitting Member's party.

The examination of this case involved the discussion of several points.

(1) The alleged destruction of the secrecy of the ballot.

The report says:

> The work of the police and other Republican officials in intimidating and unduly influencing voters was no doubt facilitated by tickets that were used by the Republicans in Marion County at this election, commonly called "springback tickets," because printed on a material that would spring open when lightly folded, thus facilitating double voting. These tickets were printed on a material called "plate," such as is generally used by lithographers. It was bought and billed to the party who printed the tickets as "plate." This material is not plain paper such as is ordinarily used for printing, and especially for printing election ballots. The witnesses say they never knew such material to be used for election tickets before. It is a thick, heavy material, of such finish, bulk, and texture as to be easily distinguishable from tickets printed on ordinary paper, and for that reason contestant claims that it is in violation of the Indiana statute, which reads as follows:
> "All ballots which may be cast at any election hereafter holden in this State shall be written or printed on plain white paper of a uniform width of 3 inches, without any distinguishing marks or other embellishments thereon except the names of the candidates and the offices for which they were voted." (Sec. 4701, Revised Statutes of 1881.)

---

[1] First session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report 1547; Mobley, p. 167.

[2] Record, p. 1343.

And also that it is in violation of the spirit of the constitution of Indiana, which provides that all elections by the people shall be by ballot. (Art. 2, sec. 13.)

In William v. Stein, 38 Indiana, page 89, the supreme court construed the provisions of the constitution above referred to. It was there decided that the word "ballot," as used in the constitution, "beyond doubt * * * implies absolute and inviolable secrecy, and that the principle is founded in the highest consideration of public policy." (P. 95.)

The court quotes from Cooley's Con. Lim., 604, as follows:

"These statutes are simply declaratory of the constitutional principle that inheres in the system of voting by ballot, and which ought to be inviolable, whether declared or not. In the absence of such a statute, all devices by which party managers are enabled to distinguish ballots in the hands of the voter, and thus determine whether he is voting for or against them, are opposed to the spirit of the constitution, inasmuch as they tend to defeat the design for which voting by ballot is established."

The evidence is conclusive that these tickets could be, and were, distinguished in the hands of the voters from 15 to 30 feet distant, and the secrecy of the ballot guaranteed by the constitution and laws of a sovereign State was thus destroyed in Marion County. One of the Republican managers, who was instrumental in getting up the tickets, stated that they were gotten up as "a scheme to beat the Democrats." Another prominent Republican admitted on the day of election that the tickets were fraudulent and gotten up for fraudulent purposes. (Rec., pp. 103–121.) The fraudulent intent is apparent. There were 12,551 of these fraudulent tickets voted at that election in Marion County, and it is shown that the Democrats formally protested against receiving and counting these tickets. (Rec., pp. 67, 124, 126, 121.)

Your committee hold that the object of the ballot system is secrecy; that when the constitution of Indiana said her citizens should vote by ballot it meant a secret ballot; that when the legislature said that the ballots should have no embellishments or other distinguishing marks it meant that the ticket should be such that it could not be known for whom the voter was casting his ballot; that any ticket printed on material, plain white in color though it be, yet so thick as to be readily distinguished from ordinary paper in use for such purposes, is as much a distinguishing mark and as much in violation of law as if it had the photograph of the candidate printed on it. The evidence discloses in this case a deep-laid and cunningly devised scheme to avoid the statute and to compel the poor and humble voter to "show his hand" to his party and his employer. The fact appears that some voters came to the polls to vote, and on discovering the character of the ticket refused to vote and went away. Others undoubtedly were constrained to vote by these mean and the circumstances surrounding them against their will. The fraud on the part of the friends of contestee is glaring and so well established that if there were no other facts in the case than those connected with the "spring-back tickets" your committee would find no difficulty in setting aside the election and but little in recommending the seating of the contestant.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Alphonso Hart, of Ohio, dissented from the above view.

There is nothing in the statute of Indiana declaring either a penalty for the violation of this law or declaring that ballots on any other kind of paper are invalid.

There is no doubt, indeed it is admitted, that the ticket used by the Republicans at that election and upon which the name of Mr. Peelle appeared conforms strictly to the letter of the foregoing statute. It was a ticket printed upon plain white paper; it was of the length and width required by the statute; it had no mark or device upon it such as is prohibited by the statute, and the only claim that is made against the ticket at all is that, although it was of plain white paper and of the proper length and width, it was of greater thickness than that which is ordinarily used, and that by reason of this thickness the ticket could be detected in the hands of the voter and distinguished from the other tickets that were cast. It seems to us that it as clearly complies with the requirements of the statute as the two other tickets that were in the field. They were all of plain white paper and of the proper length and width. The Republican ticket is printed on No. 2 book paper, the Democratic ticket is printed on No. 3 book paper or a high grade of newspaper, and the National ticket on common newspaper. But no two of the tickets, either the National or the Democratic or the Republican, were exactly alike in thickness, and in weight of paper. Which of these should be the standard? If they had all three been of the same kind, whether of the thickest or the thinnest, they would have complied with the statute and no objection could possibly have been made; it is only upon the ground that one is thicker than the other, or that one is thinner than the other, that exception is taken. If it be contended that the Republican ticket could be identified because it was thicker than the Democratic ticket, it can with equal force be charged that the latter can be detected because it was thinner than the Republican.

From the testimony which appears in the record there certainly can be nothing said against the validity or the legality of the ticket in question. It as clearly complied with the provisions of the statute as the others, and it would be an extraordinary position to take after a ticket had been cast by as many thousand voters as is found to be the case in this instance with the character of the ticket well known, to say that all of these voters should be disfranchised in consequence of the single fact that the ticket, although complying strictly with the provisions of the law, was a little thicker than in the judgment of the friends of Mr. English it ought to have been.

It is claimed by the majority report that the purpose of the Republicans in using this kind of paper was to enable persons to identify the ticket in the hands of the holder. This is wholly unwarranted. The proof shows that the only object was to prevent the ticket from being counterfeited, and also to prevent the tickets, when in bunches, from sticking together, and all intention to violate or evade the law is expressly denied.

The law was not violated. It not only complies with the statute, but is fully sustained by the judicial authority of Indiana, not only in this particular instance, but in other cases where the principle is involved.

It appears from the record that after the November election a contest arose in the courts of Indian as to the matter of sheriff in Marion County. J. W. Hess was the Republican candidate and D. A. Lemon the Democratic candidate. Hess was shown by the returns to be elected by 12 votes. Lemon contested the election. A recount of votes was had, resulting in increasing the majority of Hess over 40. The tickets upon which Mr. Hess was elected were the same as that upon which the name of Mr. Peelle appeared.

One of the points made was the legality of the ticket.

If the ticket was illegal as to Peelle—that is, if it was on the wrong kind of paper—then it was equally so as to Hess, and yet in the election contest for the sheriffalty the court sustained the validity of the ballot upon which the name of Hess appeared, and thereby gave its sanction to the one upon which the name of Peelle appeared, they being the same. It follows from this that in the judgment of the court of competent jurisdiction no objection can be made or was made to the character of the ballot that was used.

This is, to a certain extent, an adjudication of the matter. But, beyond this, a still more important consideration arises. What was the character of the law of Indiana designating the kind of ballot which was to be used, and the paper upon which the ticket was to be printed? Was it directory or mandatory; was it a penal statute or otherwise? If it was merely directory, or even if it was intended to be a penal statute, then the penalty as well as the wrong must attach only to those parties who printed the tickets. It can not attach to the voter, and it would be a matter of very great injustice to deprive the citizens of the State of Indiana who voted this ticket of the right to be heard through the ballot box, simply because the paper upon which the ticket voted by them was printed is alleged not to be strictly of such a character as is required by statute. The whole theory of a Government which is to be managed and controlled by the people exercising the elective franchise is that their will, when fairly and honestly expressed, shall be the law and shall be respected by all the authorities. There can be no doubt but that the voters of the seventh district, in the use of the ticket to which attention has been called, honestly intended to express their judgment as to who should be chosen for the respective offices named. We think, therefore, for this reason, as well as for the other reasons already given, that this vote should stand as the expression of the will of the people of the seventh district and of the State of Indiana.

In the debate the question of the illegality of the tickets was treated as of importance, and it was argued that they were illegal, although no attempt was apparently made to ascertain their number, and no specific reduction or rejection of the poll was proposed.

(2) The value of an unofficial count in determining the true state of the vote, the official return being alleged to be impeached.

The majority report declares that the credit due to the returns of the several precinct officers is greatly impaired by the fact "that 54 of the 56 voting places in the city were controlled by partisan officers who were more or less parties to the general fraudulent intent which pervaded the Republican managers." "And it is further impaired," says the report, "by the fact that it has been officially determined by a Republican board, who, under the law of the State and by the appointment and approval of a Republican judge, made a recount of the votes for sheriff at the same election, that the official returns were false and unreliable as to sheriff." The report then continues:

When once the taint of fraud or unreliability is attached to the official count its value is gone, and we must look to other sources for better information. The law of Indiana in regard to the preservation of the ballots is as follows:

"As soon as the votes are counted, and before the certificate of the judges, prescribed in the foregoing section, is made out, the ballots, with one of the lists of voters and one of the tally papers, shall in the presence of the judges and clerks be carefully and securely placed by the inspector, in the presence of the judges, in a strong and stout paper envelope or bag, which shall then be tightly closed and well sealed with wax by the inspector, and shall be delivered by such inspector to the county clerk at the very earliest possible period before or on the Thursday next succeeding such election, and the inspector shall securely keep said envelope containing the ballots and papers therein, and permit no one to open said envelope, or touch or tamper with the said ballots or papers therein; and upon the delivery of such envelope to the clerk, said inspector shall take and subscribe an oath, before said clerk, that he has securely kept said envelope and the ballots and papers therein; and that after said envelope had been closed and sealed by him in the presence of the judges and clerks, he had not suffered or permitted any person to break the seal, or open said envelope, or touch or tamper with said ballots or papers, and that no person has broken such seal or opened said envelope, to his knowledge, which oath shall be filed in said clerk's office with the other election papers. The clerk shall securely keep said envelope so sealed, with the ballots and papers therein, in the same condition as it was received by him from the inspector." (Rev. Stat., 1881, secs. 4713, 4714.)

It will be seen the law required the ballots to be carefully sealed up and delivered to the clerk. In this case the clerk, D. M. Ramsdall, is the same person who was chairman of the Republican county committee, and who selected the "plate "for and aided in getting up the illegal "spring-back "ticket. (See his deposition, Rec., pp. 365–367.) On the same day of the election for Congress a sheriff was to be elected for the county. There was a contest, and the circuit court, presided over by a Republican judge, under the laws of Indiana appointed a commission to recount the ballots cast for sheriff. This commission consisted of two Republicans and one Democrat. These commissioners executed the order of the court and reported thereto unanimously that the ballots showed that the returns made by the election officers and board of canvassers were not correct; on the contrary were full of errors, amounting in the aggregate to 49 votes. (See Rec., pp. 86, 403, 410.)

Hon. Austin H. Brown, one of these commissioners, an experienced and able expert, and a gentleman of the very highest character and standing, testified that at the same time he carefully examined and counted every vote for English and Peelle for Congress; that the returns were full of errors as to the vote for Congress, as well as sheriff; that the errors amounted in the aggregate to 99 votes in favor of English, and that English was certainly elected.

After calling attention to Mr. Brown's testimony, the report continues:

This testimony of Mr. Brown, one of the commissioners appointed by the court to count the ballots for sheriff, also shows he counted the ballots at the same time for Congress. He conclusively proves that the errors amounted in the aggregate to 99 votes in favor of contestant.

The value of the recount made by him must turn upon the capacity of Mr. Brown to make the count and his veracity in testifying in regard to it. If these are both established, as much weight should be given his count as if he had been directed by the court to make it. That they are fully established let the following testimony, both as to his integrity and capacity, bear witness.

The report also cites testimony to show the reliability of the witness and his capacity as a man of affairs, able and skilled to make a recount.

The minority views assail this recount, saying of the commissioners:

They were not instructed to make the count as to any other candidate. They were sworn to make the count upon the matter of sheriff honestly and truly, and this was the extent of their authority and duty. A short time, perhaps a clay or two, before the count began by these three commissioners, William H. English, the father of the contestant, approached Mr. Brown and employed him to make also a count as to the votes received by the respective candidates for Congress. This was a private arrangement, the service to be rendered by Brown for a consideration to be paid by English. No other member of the commission was spoken to upon the subject. Nine wards were counted during the first and second days. Brown claims that while counting the vote upon sheriff he also counted the vote upon Congress for those nine wards. It is an admitted fact that he did not communicate to anyone what he was doing. On the second day Mr. Byram, one of the other commissioners, became aware of the fact that Brown was making the count upon Congress, and from that time afterwards, during the remainder of the count of Marion County, they together kept count as to the Member of Congress. At the end of the count, according to the testimony of Mr. Byram, Peelle had gained so that his majority in Marion County would have been 767 instead of 640, a gain of 127. But Mr. Byram. did not claim that this count was absolutely correct, but that it was as nearly correct as could be made under the circumstances, he doing the best he could.

The minority call attention to the fact that Mr. Brown testified that in his opinion the ballots had been tampered with, since the ticket which he himself voted in a certain precinct he had marked, but could not find it when the recount was made.

Say the minority:

If it is to be granted as a fact that the ballots in Marion County, after the election and before the count made for sheriff by these commissioners, had been tampered with, then according to all the authorities upon the subject, without an exception, the subsequent count made by Brown, or by anybody else, is wholly unreliable and never can be considered or treated as overcoming the original official count. The contestant, by making this claim, entirely admits away his case. Outside of the statement of Mr. Brown there is no evidence, so far as we know, that any improper action had been taken in regard to these ballots. They had been from the time of the November election up to the time of the count in the custody of the proper sworn officers. But he claims, and his counsel insist, that the ballots had been tampered with, and we answer, if this be so, then it furnishes a reason why the count made by Brown can not be relied upon to overcome the official returns.

But there are other reasons still stronger why no reliance whatever can be placed upon his action in this matter.

First. He was the hired agent and employee of William H. English, a party interested in disturbing the count and making a ground of contest. He would naturally, almost inevitably, be inclined to take such action and make such a report of his proceedings as would favor the purpose had in view by Mr. English, his employer.

Second. The count made by him in the beginning was secretly made, and made with the evident purpose of accomplishing something which it was not intended anybody else should have knowledge of.

Third. Mr. Brown, upon his examination on the witness stand, is unable to give any intelligent statement of the condition of the vote in a single precinct in Marion County. He claims that, as he made the count of the first nine wards, he took a memorandum of the vote that was cast for each of the candidates for Congress, and that at the end of his count, from the data thus gathered, he made an estimate, and that the estimate which he made decreased the majority of Peelle 99. It is a very singular circumstance that when he is placed upon the stand all of these memoranda which he swears were taken at the time, and which if taken would indicate the character of the vote in the respective precincts, are missing. He is not able to produce a single scrap of paper showing the condition of the count in the precincts. He does, however, produce a paper in which he claims to have summed up the result of his investigation and which is put in the form of a declaration showing that there is a gain for Mr. English and a corresponding loss for Mr. Peelle of 99 in that county. He claims that the other memoranda which he took are lost.

Under the circumstances the disappearance of these papers, which every man of ordinary intelligence must have known would be very important, is a strange and a suspicious circumstance, affecting the integrity of Brown's deposition. In his examination he is unable to swear to anything save the final result as he claims he figured it out. He can not even tell the number of votes that were received by Peelle, or the number of votes that were received by English. He can not tell the number of votes given for either of these candidates in any ward or precinct. He can not give an intelligent statement of the condition of the vote either in the county as a whole or in any portion of the county.

Fourth. There is another circumstance which is of very great significance in the consideration of Brown's testimony. After his associate commissioners, who were helping him count the vote upon sheriff , had discovered what Brown was at there is no further increase of the vote of English, but, on the contrary, an increase of the vote of Peelle from that time forward.

Fifth. When the commissioners appointed, as we have stated, to count the vote upon sheriff in Marion County had concluded their work, the subject of the vote upon Member of Congress was talked over between them. In that conversation the remark was made by Byram and Adams that a recount of the vote upon Members of Congress would result in increasing the majority of Mr. Peelle, and the testimony is that all three of the commissioners, including Brown, concurred in this statement. The testimony further is that Mr. Brown at that time made the declaration that "there was nothing in a recount for Mr. English," and that he should so report to Mr. William H. English, his employer. These facts are testified to by Byram, Adam, and Hawkins.

In view of these facts, what possible weight can be given to the testimony of Mr. Brown? The count which he made was an unsworn and unauthorized count; it was a count made not under oath; it was made under circumstances wherein if he did the best he could it would be very difficult to be accurate, for the reason that his work as commissioner to count the vote upon sheriff would necessarily require his attention, and the matter of count upon Member of Congress would be only incidental.

Then again, as already appears, his inability to give an intelligent statement of the condition of the vote, and his admission that there was nothing in the count which would benefit Mr. English, will surely destroy his testimony. Now, the question comes, shall we permit the testimony of Brown, given under these circumstances and so thoroughly impeached by circumstances and by contradictory statements made by himself, to overcome the sworn official statement and returns of the inspectors and judges of election, made under oath and in the performance of their duty? To this inquiry there can be but one answer. It seems to us that no just-minded person will permit an election to be overturned upon so flimsy a pretense.

(3) The majority report also charges that about 34 or more prisoners from the county jail were taken to the polls and compelled to vote for contestee. But it appears from the minority view that "there were seven inmates of the jail who voted. They were shown to be legal voters in that precinct. Two others offered to vote, and their votes were challenged and rejected."

The majority report also asserts that 51 paupers from the county poorhouse were carried to the polls by the officers of the institution and compelled to vote for Peelle, and that two-thirds of them were proven to be Democrats. The minority say it was admitted that these persons were entitled to vote, and that there was no evidence that they were prevented from voting for the person of their choice. Not one of them was called as a witness.

(4) It was also claimed on behalf of contestant that 100 votes were lost to him because the police officers intimidated voters who approached the polls, and deterred them from voting.

The minority report says on this point:

In this connection it may not be improper to refer to the position taken in the report of the majority upon this point. It is claimed that about 100 persons were kept from the polls. There is not a particle of testimony in the whole record justifying any such conclusion. There are less than 350 voters in the precinct in question, and the returns show that 309 persons voted. The witnesses for contestant were able to give the name of but one man whom they claimed was rejected, while the inspector of election swears that not a single person who made the proper affidavit was denied his vote.

In the debate [1] much stress was laid on the fact that the names of these 100 men were not given; that none of them had been called to testify. Six witnesses who were called estimated that a hundred men who would have voted for contestant were kept from voting. Mr. Hart in debate asserted that it would be a most remarkable thing to count 100 votes for contestant by putting these 100 unknown names on the poll.

The majority thus recapitulated their conclusions:

To recapitulate:

(1) The correction of the error in counting the vote in Marion County gives contestant 99 additional votes.

(2) The fraud and coercion practiced upon the 51 paupers, 34 of whom were Democrats and compelled to vote for contestee, would, if corrected, add to contestant's vote 68 additional votes.

(3) The fraudulent jail vote counted for contestee makes in the result a difference of 34 additional votes.

(4) The 12 counterfeit tickets which were counted for contestee, and should have been counted for contestant, make in the result 24 additional votes.

(5) Votes of naturalized citizens, and others fraudulently rejected, 100 additional votes. Total, 325 votes.

(6) The destruction of the secrecy of the ballot by contestee's friends in the use of the springback tickets undoubtedly made a difference in his favor of several hundred more votes in the final result to which he is not entitled.

Your committee are therefore clearly of the opinion that the contestant, William E. English, was duly elected and is entitled to the seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-eighth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of Indiana, and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Stanton J. Peelle was not elected a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress of the United States from the Seventh Congressional district of Indiana, and is not entitled to the seat he now holds.

Resolved, That William E. English was duly elected a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress of the United States from the Seventh Congressional district of Indiana, and is entitled to his seat.

The minority reported a resolution declaring Mr. Peelle entitled to retain the seat.

The report was debated on May 20 and 21,[2] the most important questions in the view of the House being the thick ballots and the authority of the recount.

On May 21 [3] the vote was taken on substituting the minority proposition for that of the majority, and there appeared yeas 121, nays 117. Then, by a vote of 119 to 118 the House adjourned, after a motion to reconsider had been made.

On May 22 a motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was disagreed to, yeas 132, nays 132. Then the motion to reconsider was agreed to yeas 133, nays 130.

Thereupon Mr. Thomas M. Browne, of Indiana, moved to recommit the subject to the Committee on Elections "with instructions to make a recount of the ballots cast for the contestant and contestee * * * at the several precincts in the county of Marion."

This motion was disagreed to, yeas 124, nays 134.

Then the question recurring on the substitute proposed by the minority, it was disagreed to, yeas 128, nays 129.

The resolutions of the majority were then agreed to, yeas 130, nays 127.

Mr. English thereupon appeared and took the oath.

991. The Ohio election case of Campbell v. Morey, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Full discussion of the status of college students as having or lacking the residence qualifications of voters.

Persons within a precinct as students, for a transitory or temporary purpose, without the interests or burdens of citizens, and going elsewhere for vacations, were held not to have voting residence.

Discussion as to what constitutes lunacy and idiocy justifying rejection of a vote.

Discussion as to the residence of paupers living in a public institution.

As to the principle of deducting unsegregated illegal votes by a system of computation.

Journeyman mechanics were recognized as having residence within the precinct where they lived for the statutory time.

A person may not vote in a precinct wherein he does not live, although required to preside therein as an election officer.

On June 16, 1884,[1] Mr. Robert Lowry, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Ohio contested election case of Campbell v. Morey.

The sitting Member had been returned by an official plurality of 41 votes.

Various questions were involved, but the essential point, dwelt on in the report and the debate, was as to the rights of certain students as electors.

The majority thus state the case of the students:

Ninety-six undergraduate college students voted in the precincts where the colleges are located. Twelve voted for contestant and 84 for contestee. With few exceptions they were not lawful voters. The statute of Ohio reads as follows:

"A person shall not be considered to have gained a residence in any county of this State, into which he comes for temporary purposes merely, without the intention of making such county his home."

This statute, and all other Ohio laws bearing on the subject of residence, are fully discussed in a case decided in the Ohio senate as recently as April 12, 1884, which seem to us to be a well-considered case upon the status of college students as electors in Ohio. It is the case of Mickey v. Loomis, to be found in the appendix to the journal of the Ohio senate for the session just ended. The following is the agreed statement of facts:

"It is agreed by the whole committee that, under the testimony, the decision of this contest shall depend upon the question as to whether certain students at Oberlin College, coming under the class described in the following agreed statement of facts, had or had not the right to vote at the October election in 1883. The following is the agreed statement of facts above referred to, viz: The following is a substantial statement of the evidence concerning the right of students at Oberlin College to vote, and who, it is claimed, voted for Timothy G. Loomis:

"(1) Said voters were students at Oberlin College, in Russia Township, Lorain County, Ohio.

"(2) They voted there at the October election in 1883.

"(3) They claimed that Oberlin was their residence at that time.

"(4) They went to Oberlin for the purpose of acquiring an education, and at the time of voting were at Oberlin for that, purpose alone. They came there from other counties and States, and had been there long enough to acquire a residence.

"(5) They left the home of their parents, and never intended to return and make it their home.

"(6) They claim that they have no other place of residence than Oberlin.

"(7) They claim they have no place in view as a place of residence after their education is completed.

"(8) These student voters had never been married.

"(9) They were not assessed for tax purposes, and paid no tax in Oberlin.

"(10) It is admitted as true that Harrison J. Mickey, contestant, is entitled to his seat in the senate of the sixty-sixth general assembly, if, upon the facts hereinbefore stated, a student at college is not entitled to vote at the place where the college is located."

This statement is decidedly more favorable to the Oberlin students than the facts developed in the present case are to most of the students who voted in the seventh district of Ohio, yet under it the senate held that these students were disqualified, and rejected their votes.

The subjoined portion of the report is so clear that we quote it:

"In this connection let us look to section 2940 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, which prescribes how judges of election shall proceed when a person offering to vote is challenged as unqualified, on the ground that he is not a resident of the county or precinct where he offers to vote. One of the questions required to be put to the person offering is this: 'When you came into this county did you come for a temporary purpose merely, or for the purpose of making it your home?' And here it may be remarked, in passing, that in this question, in the words 'or for the purpose of making it your home' is to be found the legislative definition of the word 'residence.' For the wording of questions 1 and 2 required to be put by the judges, when the person is challenged on the ground that he is not a resident, is as follows:

"'(1) Have you resided in this county for thirty days last past?'

"'(2) Have you resided in this precinct for twenty days last past?'

"But when they come to ascertain the purpose of the voter in coming into the county the question is, 'Was it for a temporary purpose' or 'for the purpose of making it your home?'

"There they use the word that has but one meaning; that word—the only one—which is understood by all men alike—a word which is as dear to the savage as to the civilized man—home.

"In quoting to the senate these rules for the guidance of judges of elections in Ohio—rules that are a part of the statutes of the State—we might well close our report with our recommendation alone, but we prefer to support it by authorities, which are conclusive against the 'student vote' as agreed upon in the statement."

We find much the same idea carried out in all the more recent decisions in other States. Dale v. Irwin (78 Ill., 170) is a very fine case; the language of the court is:

"These students were undergraduates of Shurtleff College, subject to its rules and regulations, and, so far as testimony shows, taking no part in town affairs, and paying no taxess, and not assessed on their personal property for taxation to aid in defraying expenses of the town. Some of them paid a road tax on labor, the street commissioners demanding this on a residence of ten days.

"As a general fact, however, undergraduates of colleges are no more identified with residents of the town in which they are pursuing their studies than the merest stranger, and should all the seats of learning in the United States be polled, not more than one student in twenty would be found to possess the proper qualifications of a resident of the town."

In Vanderpoel v. Jones (53 Iowa, 246), the court held that "one who becomes a resident of the county for the purpose of attending college, and who has formed no intention of remaining after the completion of his college course, is not entitled to vote in said county."

In Fry's election case (71 Pa. St., 302), known as the "Allentown case" (see Brightly's Leading Cases on Election, pp. 468–479), it is held that "students at a college living at the place in which it is located, whether supported by themselves and emancipated from their fathers' families, with no intention to return to their homes, or supported by their parents, who visit their home in vacation, and may or may not return after graduating, have not such residence as will entitle them to vote in the district where the college is."

Yet these students were assessed and paid taxes at the college town, and had lived from one to three years there, all claiming it to be their home. It is also held in the same case that "very few, if any, students, while residing at the college, acquire a new home or change of domicile, and they are, therefore, not entitled to vote. In the early history of our colleges, while the true meaning of the State constitution was fresh in the minds of the framers of that instrument, it was never pretended that the student acquired a residence at the college so as to become a qualified elector, to be liable to taxation, and to the performance of municipal duties. In those days, when the purity and freedom of elections prevailed, the parental home, or the locality from whence the student came, was universally accepted as the district in which he was entitled to vote."

It was also held that, in the opinion of the court, a "careful examination of the testimony leads to the conclusion that none of these students, whose votes are contested, were qualified electors at the last October election."

The court in this case draws the true distinction between students and laborers, and uses this language:

"Students being here for the sole purpose of being educated, and not coming animo manendi, but intending to go elsewhere as soon as graduation takes place, do not fall within the same category with unmarried men who seek employment from point to point, as opportunity offers. The student is in a preparatory condition, in a state of tutelage, and nonproductive, not yet able or willing to enter the world to engage in business or in the productive pursuits of life nor fully prepared to assume civil and political rights and duties. The unmarried man who has severed the parental relation becomes a laborer, producing for himself, and thus adds to the productive wealth of the community in which he resides, being willing not only to enjoy the political privileges, but also to assume and to discharge political and civil duties."

In Massachusetts there have been four cases, but none recently. The only one in any degree favorable to students is the very early case of Putnam v. Johnson (10 Mass., 488), where counsel for plaintiff especially based his claim upon the plea that his client was not an ordinary college student. His language (pp. 493 and 494) is:

"This case has been compared to that of students at college, but it more resembles the case of resident graduates or instructors, who have always voted in the town where the college is situated in which they reside."

All the later decisions, however, refuse to go so far, and are uniformly against the claim that undergraduate students are entitled to vote. Another case is Granby v. Amherst (7 Mass., 1, A. D. 1810), wherein Chief Justice Parsons says of a college student that he "was abroad merely for his education; during the vacations he was at home in Belchertown, and on receiving his degree he continued his residence in the same place. His absence was occasional and for a particular purpose, and we are satisfied that within the intent of the statute there was no change of his domicile. His home was at Belchertown; it was his place of residence, although from home for the purpose of instruction."

Another is the case in 5 Metcalfe, 587, where the court say:

"But in such case [i.e., residing at a university town] his right to vote at that place would depend upon all the circumstances connected with such residence. If he has a father living; if he still remains a member of his father's family; if he returns to pass his vacations; if he is maintained and supported by his father; these are strong circumstances repelling the presumption of a change of domicile. So, if he have no father living; if he have a dwelling-house of his own, or real estate of which he retains the occupation; if he have a mother or other connections with whom he has before been accustomed to reside, and to whose family he returns in vacation; if he describe himself of such place and otherwise manifest his intent to continue the domicile there, these are all circumstances tending to prove that his domicile is not changed."

The last Massachusetts case is in Cushing's Contested Election Cases (p. 346), in which the legislative committee uses this language:

"The requirements of the constitution and laws are not satisfied by merely abiding or remaining within the Commonwealth and town where the individual claims to vote. He must go there with the intent, bona fide, to make it his home—to obtain a domicile. If his home is in another State, or in another town in this State, and he is a sojourner for temporary purposes merely, intending when those purposes are accomplished, sooner or later, to leave the State or town and return home, he is not liable to the duties nor entitled to the privileges of a citizen of the town he sojourns in. This is a question of fact in each case, and the party who avers that he has abandoned his domicile of origin and taken up a new one is bound to prove it."

The latest and best known case in Congress, where this question has arisen, is Cessna v. Meyers (McCrary on Elections, p. 496), in the Forty-second Congress, which follows the Massachusetts decisions, and which is strengthened and extended in its scope by the foregoing Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa cases. There were also two very early Congressional cases which are clearly distinguishable from these later ones, in which it was held that certain students, under peculiar circumstances, were legal voters. One was the case of Letcher v. Moore (1 Bartlett, 750, A. D. 1833), in which especial stress is laid upon the fact that a student who had voted was a practical printer, working at his trade in the college town, and belonged to the local militia. The other case was Farlee v. Runk (1 Bartlett, 87, A. D. 1846), where the students paid taxes at the college town and in many other ways assumed the liabilities of citizens. We cite these cases to show the advance continuously made toward the rule that but few college students acquire a domicile and a right to vote in the college precinct. The estimate of lawful voters amongst them, as made by the court in Dale v. Irwin, above quoted—that of one in twenty—seems to us to be a very close approximation to accuracy. In the present case, however, we adopt no general rule, but predicate our conclusions upon the testimony. In weighing such testimony we have regarded as especially applicable in such cases the doctrine of Keith v. Stetler (25 Kans., 100), where it is held that "A man's acts and conduct are more to be considered in determining the question of a change of residence than any mere declaration of intent."

We have carefully examined the testimony in the case now before us, and, in our judgment, but 7 of the 96 students who voted were lawfully entitled to do so. They are S.I. Lindsay, J.G. Stewart, I.M. Burgan, S.J. Stahl, G.W. Branch, Tony Perry, J.A. Greene, J. Tillman, G.M. Tillman, D. Turner, F.D. Scott, E.A. Palmer, and G.W. Fairchild (who voted for contestee), and J.W. Scott (who voted for contestant). We have some doubts as to several of these, but give them the benefit of the doubt.

The following is a list of 71 students whom we find to have voted illegally for contestee: W. C. Houser, E. C. Hoover, W. A. Galloway, A. L. Glendenning, C. S. Spangler, J. U. Moore, K. C. Kunkle, Evan Griffiths, J. W. Smallwood, John Wardlow, E. G. Zimmer, G. F. Osler, W. R. Butcher, J. A. Beery, G. M. Brown, W. E. Bowman, P. E. Cromer, L. G. Cromer, J. B. Fairchild, J. L. Plummer, H. W. Gibson, Richard Foote, D. J. McMullen, E. S. Keeney, J. W. Freas, Simon Barr, S. N. Bousman, H. E. Miller, S. H. Darbyshire, H. C. Gibbs, W. S. Whitacre, U. H. Williams, M. J. Sanford, John Zell, W. F. Hague, L. Huston, J. H. Lansinger, W. T. Anderson, G. W. Prioleau, N. A. Banks, J. R. Scott, J. J. Bass, B. F. Morris, G. W. Nicholson, W. T. Young, W. H. Coston, C. N. Crosby, J. A. Kirke, Z. Roberts, S. C. Stewart, C. N. Williams, L. M. Beckett, P. M. Alexander, E. L. Bell, Aaron Brown, G. W. Hamilton, G. S. McElroy, C. A. Buck, W. I. Brooks, W. C. Lawther, W. J. Graham, W. J. Golden, J. S. Colvin, J. McNaugher, J. C. Gibney, H. T. Jackson, A. Gordon, L. W. Williamson, W. G. Martin, J. H. Bailey, and T. O. Baker.

Those students who voted illegally for contestant, 11 in number, are G. A. Crisman, A. E. McLaughlin, T. M. Smith, T. M. Lombard, J. A. Wiley, William Weber, G. E. Krout, A. M. White, S. E. Kirkpatrick, M. Benn, and J. R. Flowers.

Want of adequate time and space prevents comment on, or quoting in detail from, the depositions of the foregoing students. We call especial attention to what may be termed the general testimony bearing on each of the four colleges in the district. A careful perusal of that will greatly aid a just and intelligent judgment of the case. The general testimony bearing on the National Normal University will be found in the record, part 1, pages 493 to 495, 583, 584, 641, and 642. Reading this, in connection with the individual depositions of the students, it will be found that the university has an enormous annual attendance, and scarcely one student in a thousand settles or remains in the village where it is located; that these students, unlike the ordinary collegians, do not attend for a course of four years, but for merely for one or more sessions of eight or ten weeks each; that many are schoolteachers, living elsewhere, who come just long enough to attain proficiency in such branches of study as they may be teaching, and are soon off to their homes and employment; that, in a word, they are there for a transitory and temporary purpose only. At this school many are young, the average age of those voting being only 23 years, although a few are quite matured. All have matriculated from distant places. None showed any act to indicate an intention to make Lebanon their home. They describe themselves from other places; went elsewhere in vacation, etc. None worked the roads nor paid taxes. None took such interest in public affairs as citizens ordinarily do. Out of the 35 who voted there illegally for contestee 10 had left the school during the short interval which elapsed between the election and the beginning of this contest. It is also shown that many of the Republican students at this university had been preparing themselves for examination as witnesses in this case by a systematic course of study, and had requested the faculty to especially instruct them upon their rights as witnesses in a contested election case, and that on the Saturday prior to the October election in 1882 they held a meeting in University Hall, at which outside parties addressed them and advised them to vote at the approaching election, regardless of the fact that they had not paid taxes, worked the roads, etc.

The general testimony relating to Wilberforce University would be found in the record, part 1, pages 280 to 283, 292 to 300, 357 to 359, 443, and 444. This institution is situated in the country, away from any village or city. It is attended only by colored people, the male students preparing to be ministers and teachers. They come mainly from distant States, only 6 out of the 20 illegal voters at that school having matriculated from the State of Ohio. There is but little difference between them and the normal students above referred to, except that their average age is higher, being 25 years, owing to the fact that their race, previous condition, and lack of early advantages had retarded their education. They never paid any taxes nor discharged any other civil obligations; they never worked the roads (with very trifling exceptions) until after the election in controversy; they have no means of getting employment in the country at Wilberforce, either in teaching, preaching, or other professional occupation; they are very transitory, coming and going as their exceedingly limited means admit. Five of those voting illegally had left the school before this contest began, two of them leaving the State. They were not called together by the faculty and other political leaders and instructed how to testify, but just one day before their examination Mr. A. G. Wilson, attorney for contestee, and chairman of the Republican county committee, published an article of his own writing in a Republican newspaper upon the topic "Rights of students—where should they vote?" He procured 500 copies of the paper, and every colored student in Greene County admitted receiving or seeing marked copies of the newspaper containing this article. Attention was also called to the article by a professor at public prayers in the presence of these witnesses.

The students at the Xenia Theological Seminary also read the foregoing marked copy of this newspaper, and, although studying theology, do not in any respect differ from the Wilberforce and Normal students, except that they generally remain a stated term of two or three years. They matriculated from distant places—see the following extract from the matriculation book, which is just as they signed it, and is, substantially, similar to the matriculation books of the other. colleges:

Names.	Post-offices addresses.	Presbytery.
W. I. Brooks	Northwood, Ohio	Sidney.
C. A. Buck	College Corner, Ohio	First Ohio.
W. J. Golden	Scroggsfield, Ohio	Steubenville.
J. C. Gibney	Odell Guernsey County, Ohio	Muskingum.
W. J. Graham	Scroggsfield, Ohio	Steubenville.
R. T. Jackson	New Concord, Ohio	Muskingum.
Albert Gordon	Hanover, Ind	Indiana.
W. C. Lawther	Wattsville, Ohio	Steubenville.
John McNaugher	Allegheny, Pa	Allegheny.
L. W. Williamson	Xenia, Ohio	Xenia.
Jesse S. Colvin	Chicago, Ill	Chicago.
W. G. Martin	Irondale, Jefferson County, Ohio	Steubenville.

They were all credited to distant presbyteries, where they retained their membership and church connection, and by which many of them were partially supported. They neither paid taxes nor worked the roads. Some of them took so little interest in local and municipal affairs that they could not tell which ward of Xenia they had voted in.

The majority say that in their opinion the student vote is decisive of the case:

To overcome contestee's majority contestant claims that 80 persons who were students unlawfully voted for contestee, and that 11 persons who were students unlawfully voted for contestant, making a net gain of 69 votes for contestant on the so-called student vote. The wholesale setting aside of this large number of votes, without reference to the merits of each individual case, is not justified by any known authority or precedent, and is inadmissible upon any view of the case. The desperate character of this case is demonstrated by this extravagant claim.

There have been four cases before Congress in which the legality of votes cast by persons who were at the time following the occupation of students were assailed, and in neither case were these votes held to be illegal. They are the cases of Letcher v. Moore, from Kentucky; Farlee v. Runk, from New Jersey; Koonts v. Coffroth, from Pennsylvania; Cessna v. Myers, from Pennsylvania.

McCrary, in his work on Contested Elections, reviewing the leading authorities, uses the following language, paragraph 41:

"It will be found from an examination of these authorities, and from a full consideration of the subject, that the question whether or not a student at college is a bona fide resident of the place where the college is located, must in each case depend upon the facts. He may be a resident and he may not be. Whether he is or not depends upon the answer which may be given to a variety of questions, such as the following: Is he of age? Is he fully emancipated from his parents' control? Does he regard the place where the college is situated as his home, or has he a home elsewhere, to which he expects to go and at which he expects to reside?"

Putnam v. Johnson (10 Mass., 488–502); Vanderpool v. O'Hanlon (53 Iowa, 246); Fry's Election Case (71 Pa. State, 302); Dale v. Irwin (78 Ill., 170); opinion of the judges (5 Metcalf, 587); Cushing's Election Cases (437), all support the view that each case must be determined on its facts.

The Ohio statute is as follows:

"Sec. 2946. All judges of election, in determining the residence of a person offering to vote, shall be governed by the following rules, so far as the same may be applicable:

"(1) That place shall be considered the residence of a person in which his habitation is fixed, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning.

"(2) A person shall not be considered to have lost his residence who leaves his home and goes into another State or county of this State, for temporary purposes merely, with the intention of returning.

"(3) A person shall not be considered to have gained a residence in any county of this State, into which he comes for temporary purposes merely, without the intention of making such county his home."

In the statute the words "residence" and "home" are used as convertible terms; both are defined in the statute itself as "that place in which his habitation is fixed." Habitation is "a place of abode;" fixed means "established."

"RULE 1. The residence or home, then, of a person is 'where his place of abode is established,' not forever, but for the time being, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning.'

"RULE 2. A residence is lost by leaving the home or "place of abode" and going into another State or county in this State, even for a temporary purpose, without the intention of returning.

"RULE 3. A person may gain a residence in any county in this State into which he comes for temporary purposes merely, if he does so with 'the intention of making such county his home,' his place of abode, not forever, but for the time being." (McCrary, par. 39; Sturgeon v. Korte, 34 Ohio St., 525–537; Miller v. Thompson, 118; and Pigotte Cases, 463, 2 Cong. Election Cases.)

The question of intention is of the highest importance, and is held by all authorities to be decisive whenever there is doubt as to which of two places is the residence of the voter.

In his testimony the contestant has set forth the portions of the student's register or matriculation book of each of the educational institutions, showing the names, address, etc., of each student as recorded on first entering college. With exception of a few names he repeats these lists in his brief, for the purpose of proving such students to be nonresidents. This whole question of matriculation books, as evidence in regard to residence of students, was very fully discussed and effectually settled in the contest of Letcher v. Moore, of Kentucky, in the Twenty-third Congress (1 Bartlett, 750). The contest involved, among other things, the right of students of Danville, then a part of Mercer County, to vote there. The Committee on Elections divided, the majority reporting adversely to the right and the minority favorably. The college register at Danville showed the names of students entered after this manner: (1) David McKee, Harrison County, Kentucky. (2) Robert McKeown, Jefferson County, Kentucky.

The minority committee, in its report, says:

"Under the last resolution, the names of D. D. McKee (and other students mentioned), were stricken from the poll book by a majority of the committee. We think the committee erred in this decision. In order that our opinions may be the better understood, we will give the substance of the testimony laid before the committee in regard to each of the persons above named."

The students and the officers all say that the address does not indicate residence, but simply where the student came from.

After recounting the testimony, which in its general features does not differ materially from that in the present case, the committee goes on to say:

"The persons whose names we have mentioned as being stricken from the poll books were students at Centre College. Their votes were received by the officers of the election; this would be prima facie evidence of their being legal votes. He who denies their right must prove satisfactorily that they did not possess it. The register proves nothing but the place from which they originally came and the time of their entrance into college. It does not prove, nor purport to prove, even the time they came into the State or county. They performed all the duties of citizens, and could not be denied the rights of citizens. By the constitution of Kentucky there are three requisites to entitle a man to vote: He must be a free male citizen; he must have attained the age of 21, and he must have resided in the State two years and in the county one year next preceding the election. This age and residence give a position and vested constitutional right; of this right he can not be deprived without a palpable violation of the constitution. * * * His employment forms no part of his qualifications, nor is it material how long he intends to reside in the county after the election. The right is founded in prior residence, and his intended future residence neither gives nor tends to defeat it. Those persons were all 21 years of age. They had been in the State or county the length of time prescribed by the constitution, and actually resided in the county at the time of election. This is all the constitution requires, and it is not for us to require more. We think the majority of the committee erred in rejecting their votes."

The House sustained the minority report, and refused to seat the contestant.

The case of Farlee v. Runk, in the Twenty-ninth Congress (1 Bartlett, 87), is directly in point upon this question. The whole contest was based upon the denial of the right of students at Princeton, N.J., to vote in the college town. The constitutional qualification for voting in New Jersey was almost identical with the Ohio statute. The voter must be a male citizen of the United States, 21 years of age, a resident of the State for one year and of the county five months next preceding the election.

Mr. Farlee, in his memorial, represented that Mr. Runk's nominal and apparent majority of the votes of said district was obtained by his receiving the votes of thirty-six individuals specified in his memorial who were, at the time of his election, students of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N.J., and of five who were students in the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, and all in the Third Congressional district, which were unlawful votes, and ought to be rejected, because, although the above-named students were living at Princeton for the time being merely for the purpose of obtaining their education, they were not residents of the district, and could not legally vote at said election.

The committee reported in favor of the legality of the votes of these students, and stated the reasons on which they based their report as follows:

"But it is contended by Mr. Farlee, the contestant, that they were not residents, as contemplated by the Constitution, but students, merely living at Princeton for the purpose of obtaining an education. The depositions of nineteen persons, students of the college and theological seminary, appended to this report and marked 'D,' taken at the instance of Mr. Farlee, the contestant, have been examined, and your committee are of the opinion that they were legal voters. They swear that they were more than 21 years of age; nearly every one swears that he came to Princeton without any intention of returning to the place he came from, and with the intention of remaining there until he accomplished the purpose for which he came either to the college or the theological seminary, and then of going wherever he could find occupation, if he did not find it in Princeton, or wherever he felt it his duty to go.

"It will be observed on reading the depositions that these individuals had all been in Princeton more than one year, and most of them had been there several years before the election; and that although they were in pursuit of an education, either in the college or theological seminary, they had, many of them, been of age and enjoying the privileges of freemen many years."

Here follows, in a report, a synopsis of the depositions of the students, the main features of which disclose a state of facts very similar to the student branch of the present contest.

The House adopted the report of the committee and refused to seat the contestant.

In the case of Putnam v. Johnson (10 Mass., 488–502) the court decided the vote to be legal, and in so doing used the following language (p. 500):

"A residence at the college or other seminary for the purpose of instruction would not confer a right to vote in the town where such an institution exists, if the student had not severed himself from his father's control, but resorted to his house as a home and continued under his direction and management. But such residence will give a right to vote to a citizen not under pupilage, notwithstanding it may not be his expectation to remain there forever."

In Fry's election case (71 Pa. Stat., 302), relied on by contestant, it is conclusively admitted as a matter of fact that these students always had a fixed intention to leave the college town. In the very language of the court, they "may or may not return" to their fathers' homes, excluding the idea of abandonment of the old homes and the adoption of new ones.

Contestant quotes copiously from the Allentown election case (Brightly's Digest, 468–479), and says: "It is probably the most complete, exhaustive, and decisive case reported," oblivious of the fact that it is the same case as Fry's election case (71 Pa. Stat.), described by him on the same page (18) of his brief, as "another and very strong case." His quotation shows that the students in that case "are under the pupilage of their parents, receiving all their support from them, and in no sense whatever are they emancipated from the parental domicile."

In Dale v. Irwin (78 Ill., 170) the court says:

"The permanent abode prescribed by the Revised Statutes of 1874, as the criterion of residence required to constitute a legal voter does not mean an abode which the party does not intend to abandon at any future time. In the sense of the statute, a permanent abode means nothing more than a domicile, a home which the party is at liberty to leave as interest or whim may dictate, but without any present intention to change it.

"The undergraduates of a college, who are free from parental control, and regard the place where the college is situated as their homes, having no other to which to return in case of sickness or domestic affliction, are as much entitled to vote as any other resident of the town pursuing his usual avocation. It is pro hac vice the home of such students, the permanent abode in the sense of the statute."

After a full consideration of the merits of each particular vote in question the court admitted a part of the student votes as legal and rejected a part as illegal on the principle announced in the case that the legality of each vote must be determined by the facts relating to it alone.

In the case of Cessna v. Myers (McCrary on Elections, 496, Forty-second Congress), involving student votes, the committee, speaking of evidence, says:

"It is often a question of intention. If a person has actually removed to another place with an intention of remaining there for an indefinite time, and as a place of present domicile, it becomes his place of domicile, notwithstanding he may have a floating intention to go back at some future period. A fortiori would then be true if his floating intention were to go elsewhere in future, and not to go back, as in such case the abandonment of his former home would be complete.

"The fact that the citizen came into the place where he claimed a residence for the sole purpose of pursuing his studies at a school or college situate there, and has no design of remaining there after his studies terminate, is not necessarily inconsistent with a legal residence in such place. This is to be determined by all the circumstances of each case."

In the opinion of the judges (5 Metcalfe, 587) the following language is used:

"But if, having a father and mother, they should remove to the town where the college is situated, and he should remain a member of the family of the parent, or if having no parent, or being separated from his father's family, not being maintained or supported by him, or if he has a family of his own and removes with them to such town, or by purchase or lease takes up his permanent abode there, without intending to return to his former domicile, if he depends on his own property, income, or industry for his support; these are circumstances, more or less conclusive, to show a changed domicile, and the acquisition of a domicile in the town where the college is situated. We do not consider this circumstance (i.e., 'having means of support from some place elsewhere') of much importance in determining the domicile. If, indeed, a young man, over 21 years of age, is still supported by his father or mother, it is a circumstance concurring with other proofs to show that he is still a member of the family of such parent, and so may bear on the question of domicile. But if he is emancipated from his father's family and independent in his means of support, it is immaterial from what place his means of support are derived."

In Cushing's Election Case (p. 437) the committee on the judiciary of the legislature says that a right of a student, or of other persons, to vote is a constitutional right qualified only by the constitutional requirement of age and residence. "He has the same right to employ himself in obtaining a literary education as in learning or exercising a trade, an art, a profession, or agricultural pursuits."

The minority views, presented by Mr. S. H. Miller, of Pennsylvania, took issue with the position of the majority:

It is claimed "that a student must prove his domicile of origin to have been abandoned." This is not the law." The vote having been received by the election officers, the burden is on the other side to show that they erred." (Cessna v. Myers, McCrary, p. 501; Letcher v. Moore, Election Cases, p. 829; Botts v. Jones, Election Cases, p. 74; Contested Election Cases, vol. 5, p. 79; Contested Election Cases, vol. 3, p. 407.)

It is claimed that the students in Xenia and Lebanon did not work the roads nor pay poll tax. Neither did any other citizen, the care of the streets in both of these corporations being provided for out of the corporation funds. At Wilberforce the colored students worked the roads with quite as much regularity as other people, as many as twelve ministers offering to work, but being excused, under the impression of the supervisor that they were exempt. But whatever the fact be, there is no such prerequisite to voting in Ohio.

It is clear from the authorities cited that persons whose occupation is that of student, teacher, or preacher have the name right to change their residence as people pursuing other occupations and that their place of residence must be determined by the same rules which are prescribed by the legislature of Ohio for all the people of the State.

The case of Mickey v. Loomis, recently decided in the Ohio senate, is much relied on to show the illegality of student votes in Ohio. The agreed state of facts in that case is much less favorable to the students than the facts in this case. They were not self-supporting, as in this case. They came to college directly from their parents' homes and had not been out in the world for years, as in this case. They were not teachers, preachers, etc., and of the average age of 27 years, as in this case, and yet even they were clearly legal voters. The elections committee in that case consisted of five Democrats to two Republicans. The vote against the students was five to two in the committee, and in the senate it divided exactly on party lines. It can hardly be accepted to overthrow four cases (and the only cases) in this House in favor of the legality of such votes.

THE COLORED VOTERS OF WILBERFORCE; XENIA TOWNSHIP.

It is claimed that 28 students of Wilberforce voted for contestant.

The town of Wilberforce and Wilberforce College and Academic and Theological School for colored people are situated in Xenia Township. It is a settlement of colored people, and is surrounded by colored settlements on every hand. In Greene County alone there are several thousand colored inhabitants, while in Greene and in the adjoining counties of Clarke and Clinton is one-fourth part of the entire colored population of the State. The men who voted at Xenia Township who were students at Wilberforce were but 28 in number of all the students in that great university. They were men advanced in years, far beyond the age of majority. Their average age when they voted was 29 years—running all the way from 23 to 35 years. They had lived at Wilberforce, respectively, from one to five years. They were all self-supporting, and had been engaged in useful, productive occupations, such as laboring, teaching, preaching, etc. At the time of the election, October 10, 1882, twelve of these men were licensed preachers, with settled charges at Wilberforce and at the neighboring colored settlements. Most of their parents were dead. All of them had for years been away from the early family hearthstone and from under the parental roof. One of them, a type of them all in most of the facts which distinguish him, was born a slave. He left his home in North Carolina in 1869, without education and poor in purse. He labored on the railroads in Tennessee and Kentucky; lived at Evansville and Terre Haute; voting at both places, and in 1876 settled in the town of Wilberforce, where he has ever since lived and where he has voted at every election for five years prior to October 10, 1882, except at one election, when he had charge of a church in another county in Ohio. Eighteen of these voters had voted at previous elections in Xenia Township; five of them at eight previous elections at least; eight of them at three or four previous elections; five of them at two previous elections.

A brief statement of each case and the testimony supporting the same will be found in Appendix H to minority report. The object of the law is not to disfranchise, but to enfranchise. There was no place in the world where these men could lawfully vote on October 10, 1982, except at Xenia Township, where they did vote and where many of them had been voting for years. Their abandonment of all former houses was complete and their adoption of Xenia Township manifest.

THE THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS.

Of all the students at the theological seminary, Xenia, twelve only voted for contestee. They, too, were men advanced in years far beyond the age of majority, their average at the time of election being over 26 years. They had all completed their academic education, had been attached to presbyteries, and had become in fact a part of the clergy of their church. They were in nearly every instance poor men, who had been compelled since their majority to become teachers or engage in other industrial pursuits for their own sustenance and support. Of those who were interrogated on that point two had voted there at five previous elections; five had voted there at three previous elections; one had voted there at one previous election. Their uncontradicted testimony is that they had abandoned their former homes and had adopted Xenia as their residence, without any present intention of removing therefrom. They, like all preachers, were subject to go where the exigencies of their profession might call them. It has always been held in Ohio that a minister of the Gospel is entitled to vote where he has resided for the statutory period, notwithstanding he may move the next year to take another charge. Much stress is laid upon the fact that these students signed a college register, giving their addresses and the presbyteries to which they were credited. All the witnesses testify that the address merely indicates where the student came from, and in no sense indicates residence, and that the giving the name of the presbytery is merely for the information of the officers of the college, that they may know what body has jurisdiction over his spiritual walk and conduct. Rev. J. G. Corson, the secretary of the board of managers, explains the whole matter. He says:

"The name of the presbytery under the care of which the student is does not indicate anything in regard to his residence, as it is in a great measure a matter of convenience, as, for example, a number of the students coming from distant parts of the country put themselves under the care of Xenia presbytery, in whose bounds the seminary is located, because more convenient for being examined by and delivering discourses before such presbytery."

Much stress is also laid on the fact that several of these men had completed their course at the time they were examined as witnesses. Some of them had appointments to be examined and to deliver their trial discourses before their presbyteries. The law required that they should have five days' previous notice of their examination. They simply asked, in order to avoid delay, that they might be examined at once and go to their presbyteries for that purpose alone. Where they would thereafter make their homes or whether they would ever abandon their homes in Xenia were matters for the future, to be determined by the exigencies of their lives, just as the place of residence is determined in the case of every other voter.

A brief statement of the facts in each case will be found in Appendix H to this report.

THE NORMAL UNIVERSITY.

Contestant claims that 36 students at the National Normal University at Lebanon voted illegally for contestee. These men were mechanics and farmers and teachers; principally the latter. Their ages are from 21 to 31 years. Most of them were advanced far beyond the age of majority; all had been severed from their parental homes and had been out in the world fighting their own battles for years.

At the time of the election the witnesses put the number of students at from 450 to 1,300. The best informed persons say that there were about 300 adult males there at that time. Out of these 300, 36 only voted for contestee—about 1 in 10.

These students did not, as has been claimed, vote in a body, nor as a class. Only such as were qualified by age, residence, and intention to reside there presumed to vote, and this after careful discussion of the requirements for voting. A large number of them had been voting for a number of elections previous to October 10, 1882. Seven had voted at three previous elections; 8 had voted at one or more previous elections.

The university is not a preparatory school for youth, but it is a school for teachers. It is the headquarters of teachers in Ohio. Many teachers make Lebanon their home because the university is there. From there they go out to teach or follow other occupations as they have opportunity.

Certain other questions as to the qualifications of voters were disposed of:

(1) As to the votes of certain idiots, the majority say:

We find that three hopeless idiots, from the infirmary in Greene County, voted for contestee. They are Berry Valentine, Samuel Scott, and William Morris, and we deduct these votes from contestee's poll. He attacks a number of persons as idiots, lunatics, and imbeciles and claims that they voted for contestant. We find the mental condition of A. M. Apple to be far above the average of voters. We find the following persons to be of fair intellect, to wit: George Robb, Charles Beebe, Warren Lytle, John Killeen, Harlan Duke, Aaron Cosad, William Dill, and William Hawkins. We find the following to be persons of small intelligence, but not idiots, to wit: Noah Potts, David Norris, and Dennis Morris. We might add that there is no testimony to show how some of them voted, nor any to show how the following persons voted, they being very weak-minded, to wit: John H. Nichols, John Kitchel, John Fleck, and Thomas Reiley. The case of Dennis Morris, a man over 80 years of age, merits special notice. He was not a weak-minded person in his prime. His right to vote in his old age is preserved to him by the supreme court of Ohio, which held, in the case of Sinks v. Reese (19 Ohio Statutes, 307), that "the vote of a man otherwise qualified, who is neither a lunatic nor an idiot, but whose faculties are simply greatly enfeebled by age, ought not to be rejected."

The minority say:

Idiots and insane persons are excluded from the elective franchise in Ohio by the constitution. By the statute an imbecile is defined to be an idiot, so that the disqualification extends to imbeciles. There are 6 persons of this class who voted for contestant. Two of them have been adjudged by the courts of competent jurisdiction to be idiots; 4 to be insane, and 2 to be imbeciles, and each and all of these 6 were under guardianship, both of their persons and estates, and, by the law of Ohio, their guardians are ex officio guardians of their minor children. They are not competent to exercise any civil or political right.

Upon a careful examination of the testimony in these cases and of the records of the courts, wherein 6 of them have been adjudged insane, idiots, and imbeciles, it clearly appears that the following persons come within the provisions of the constitution and are disqualified to vote; that they voted for contestant; that their 6 votes ought to be deducted from contestant's poll and that number added to contestee', majority: Thomas Reiley, John Fleck, John Killeen, Noah Potts, William Hawkins, Charles Beebe, Warren Lytle, John H. Nichols. A brief statement of the facts in these cases, with testimony bearing on the same, will be found in "Appendix B" to this report.

(2) As to the votes of certain paupers, the majority say:

Certain inmates of the Butler County Infirmary voted. They had a right to do so, as there is no pretense that they voted through any intimidation. There is no testimony to show how any of them voted. None were called as witnesses. Their rights are guaranteed by the supreme court of Ohio, which held, in Sturgeon v. Korte (34 Ohio Statutes, 525), that—

"(1) An inmate of a county infirmary who has adopted the township in which the infirmary is situated as his place of residence, having no family elsewhere, and who possesses the other qualifications required by law, is entitled to vote in the township in which said infirmary is situated.

"(2) Such inmate is not under such legal restraint as to incapacitate him from adopting the township in which the infirmary is situated as his place of residence."

We can see no grounds for the claim that 17 votes should be deducted from contestant on this account.

The minority say:

Thirty-one inmates voted, Nos. 9, 13, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 70, 71, 93, 126, 215, in the poll book; they were, with a few exceptions, taken to the polls in the infirmary wagon; all but five were admitted from other townships than Fairfield, wherein the infirmary is situated. One, George Leonard, came from Lemon Township, October 4, 1882, only six days prior to the election. His vote was illegal for that reason alone. The legal residence of a pauper is the place from which he entered the almshouse. (McCrary on Elections, 42; Paine v. Town of Durham, 29 Ill., 125; Freeport v. Supervisors, 41 Ill., 41.) The same rule is adhered to in Sturgeon v. Korte (34 Ohio, 525–537).

The court found, however, "that while such inmates they severally did adopt said Falls Township (where the infirmary was situated) as their permanent residence, and by such act of adoption and selection and not otherwise did change their residence." It was claimed that an inmate was under such restraint as to be incapacitated "from forming a purpose or intent to change his residence."

The court was in doubt even on this question, and said: "While the question is not free from doubt, we incline to think he is not" [incapacitated].

Contestant did not attempt to show that either of these inmates from other townships did even "select or adopt" Fairfield Township (where the infirmary is situated) as their residence.

The law conclusively fixes their residence at the places from which they were received into the infirmary. Here, then, are 26 illegal votes.

(3) The minority, claiming that the votes of the paupers should be deducted, propose that it be done on evidence as follows:

Mr. Ross, the Democratic superintendent, swears to giving them tickets—20 Democratic and 3 Republican. Taking the view most favorable to contestant, we will suppose that he gave 5 Democratic tickets to the five inmates who lived in Fairfield Township; that would leave 15 Democratic and 3 Republican tickets voted by nonresident inmates, leaving it in doubt as to how the eight other nonresident inmates voted; charge the 15 Democratic ballots to contestant, and the 3 Republican ballots to contestee, and divide the eight remaining votes between contestant and contestee according to the vote received by each in the precinct, and we find contestant's net loss on the infirmary vote to be 17 votes. Upon every principle of law these 17 votes must be deducted from contestant's poll, and that number be added to contestee's majority in the admitted case.

The majority in the debate [1] vigorously combated the proposition that the distribution of the tickets under the conditions stated was evidence sufficient to determine how the persons voted.

(4) The majority report thus decides a question of domicile:

John Estel was attacked because he voted in a precinct where he lived apart from his wife. The testimony is that he had been separated from her for many years.

The rule of law, that a man whose wife has abandoned him can and does acquire a domicile other than hers, is too well known to be elaborately cited. In addition to this, nobody pretends to say that Estel voted for contestant.

(5) Another question of domicile is thus disposed of by the majority:

Michael O'Gara and P. J. Cook were journeymen mechanics; they belong to that class of laborers who are always recognized as having a home in the precinct where they have lived the statutory time. As far back as 1833, in the case of Letcher v. Moore, the House decided to admit "the votes of journeymen mechanics, and all other laborers having no fixed and settled residence, but remaining for the time where they could get employment."

(6) A question relating to voting out of the precinct was determined:

Newton Long and G. W. Turner were also attacked by contestee, and their cases are peculiar. The townships of Madison, in Butler County, and Stonelick, in Clermont County, are each divided into two voting precincts. The law requires the three trustees of the township to act as judges of the election, but provides for dividing them between the precincts when there is more than one. The statute reads:

[1] Record, pp. 5406, 5407.

"In every township containing more than one election precinct each trustee shall act as judge in the precinct in which he resides unless they all reside in the same precinct, when two only can so act therein, and the other trustee shall act as judge in any other precinct."

In Stonelick Township, G. W. Turner, being a judge at the precinct at which he did not live, went over into his own precinct and voted. In Madison Township, however, Newton Long was obliged to sit all day as a judge in the precinct in which he did not live, and voted there. We think there is no provision authorizing him to vote outside of the precinct in which he lived, and that this vote should be deducted from contestant. It is clear, however, that Turner's vote was cast at the right place.

992. The election case of Campbell v. Morey, continued.

As to what constitutes the determination of result on which the serving of a notice of contest is predicated.

The admission to naturalization being the function of a judge, a performance of this function by a clerk is void.

The exact size of the ballot is immaterial.

As to ballots in language other than the English.

The House deducted an excess of ballots proportionately, although the State law did not justify bringing them into the count.

A ruling that the law prohibiting a distinguishing mark on a ballot did not apply to pencilings; by the voter himself.

Ballots spelled wrong or lacking the initials were counted.

The writing of the name of a candidate for a State office beneath the name of the candidate for Congress was held not to render uncertain the intent of the voter.

The House corrected the ballot of a voter shown to have been deceived into voting otherwise than he intended.

Certain other questions were discussed, as follows:

(a) As to notice of contest, the majority held:

Contestant served notice of contest on the 11th of January, 1883. The law is that—

"Within thirty days after the result of the election in a district has been determined by the proper authority the contestant must serve the returned Member with notice of contest. * * * It is no doubt true that for the purpose of fixing the time when the thirty days begins to run there must be not only a decision but a promulgation of the result."

The decision and promulgation of the result were, in our opinion, both made December 14, 1882, which is less than thirty days before notice was served. Such is the date of the official record of that decision. Contestee having disputed the date of the finding, signing, and promulgating of the foregoing decision, contestant called witnesses to sustain the accuracy of the record, but no witness was called to impeach it. George K. Nash, then attorney-general, and now a judge in Ohio, was a member of that canvassing board, and testified as follows:

"Upon the afternoon of the 14th the court adjourned until the 2d of January, 1883, without passing upon the motion in the mandamus proceeding. When the action of the court was made known to the board it signed the abstract and certificate now on file in the office of the secretary of state. This signing, as I have before indicated, took place on the 14th of December, 1882."

Alexis Cope, chief clerk to the secretary of state, was called, and testified as follows:

"Q. Third. State who made out or prepared the abstract and finding made by the State canvassing board of Ohio in December, 1882, of the election held October 10, 1882, and when the same was so made out and prepared.—A. I made out the abstract and findings and certificate attached thereto under the direction of the board. The abstract, I think, was completed on the 7th; the certificate of the findings, according to my recollection, in the form in which it now appears, was not completed until the 14th, the day on which I recollect it was signed."

There is nothing whatever in law or fact to justify contestee's allegation that notice of contest was not served within the required time.

(b) Contestant denied the sufficiency of certain naturalization papers on the ground that they were not issued by the judge of the probate court, but by the deputy clerk thereof. The majority say:

The function of deciding whether an alien has proven his claim to be admitted to citizenship must be exercised by the judge only, and if exercised by any other officer of the court the judgment rendered is void; but the judicial function extends no further. The execution of the certificate, the swearing of witnesses, and even the examination of witnesses, if in the presence of the judge who is hearing and deciding the cause, may all be done by the clerk, and are merely ministerial duties. The leading case is Re Cristern et al. (43 Superior Court, New York, 523), in which it is held that when the judge delivers the examination papers to the clerk the judicial function is completed, and the subsequent acts, such as issuing and filing papers, are ministerial only, the allowance is the judgment itself; and that no journal record need be made nor entry in a book.

The minority agree as to the law, but disagree as to facts:

In Ohio the probate court only is provided with records for the admission of aliens to citizenship. The probate judge is ex officio his own clerk and is entitled to a deputy clerk. It is further admitted by contestant in his brief that the admitting of an alien to citizenship is a judicial function, which can only be performed by the judge, and that papers granted on a hearing by the deputy clerk are void.

(c) As to the sufficiency of a certain ballot the majority rules:

In the Fifth Ward of Hamilton a written ballot, in the Spanish language, of the uniform width of 2⅞ inches, was voted for contestee. The law of Ohio is that a ballot shall be "not more than two and one-half nor less than two and three-eighths inches wide." The exact size of a ballot has been held to be immaterial. The law is laid down thus in McCrary on Elections (p. 347):

"The supreme court of California has very recently had occasion to consider the force and effect of a statute regulating the size and form of ballots, the kind of paper to be used, the kind of type to be used in printing them, etc. The court held, and we think upon the soundest reason, that as to those things over which the voter has control the law is mandatory, and that as to such things as are not under his control it should be held to be directory only."

We consider this ballot to have been properly counted.

The minority say:

Contestant claims that there was a ballot in the Spanish language, which was a little more than 2⅕ inches wide, was cast for contestee in the Third Ward, and that it is illegal. We submit that this is a substantial compliance with the law of Ohio, and as such the ballot is legal. If it is not, then a large number of German ballots for contestant in the same ward of unlawful width are in the record and must be deducted from his poll.

(d) The majority rules against the contestant on a question of the width of certain ballots:

Contestant claims that 49 ballots which were voted for contestee in Sugar Creek precinct (and which are attached to the manuscript testimony in this case) are unlawful under the laws of Ohio. They were cut off close to the name of a candidate on said ticket, and no space was left to scratch or alter the ticket, as provided in the following section of the statute:

"SEC. 2948. All ballots shall be written on plain white paper, or printed with black ink with a space of not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, * * * and it shall be unlawful for any person to print, for distribution at the polls, or distribute to any elector, or vote any ballot printed or written contrary to the provisions hereof; but this section shall not be considered to prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name, by pencil mark, or with ink, upon the face of the printed ballot."

The object of leaving a blank space of the fifth part of an inch was to provide for changing the ballot, as named in the latter part of the section, and it is claimed that any printed ballot without such space can not be lawfully voted or counted. Such is the claim made by contestant in his brief, but as a mere legal proposition only. In his oral argument he disclaimed any desire to have these ballots deducted from contestee's poll. He puts this disclaimer on the ground that, while in his judgment the ballots are unlawful, yet he does not desire to disfranchise any voter on account of a technicality over which the voter himself had no control, We agree with him that, whatever may be the effect of this on other candidates on said ballots, the question involved does not properly arise here.

(e) A question arose as to an excess of ballots, the majority saying:

The law of Ohio provides for tallying only as many ballots as there are names on the poll books, leaving the residue, if any, to be preserved but not counted. The Revised Statutes, section 2957, reads thus:

"SEC. 2957. Any ballots in the box in excess of the number of names on the poll books, together with the ballots strung as aforesaid, shall be deposited in the box."

The design is to preserve but not to string or tally the excessive ballots. However, the judges did string and count them in several precincts, as follows:

Precinct.	Number.
Oxford, Butler County	2
North Madison, Butler County	1
Fourth Ward, Xenia, Greene County	4
Fifth Ward, Xenia, Greene County	1
Franklin Warren County	3
Total	11

Desiring to dispose of this excess equitably, the following table is prepared in conformity to the rule laid down in the People against Cicott (16 Mich., 283), where the court held that "the adoption of the principle of allotment is the most sensible and practical measure which could be devised," and in the syllabus they lay down the rule of allotment as follows:

"When ballots are found in any ward or township in excess of the names on the poll book, and the inspectors fail to draw them out, as required by section 62, Comp. L, they should, on the trial of the cause, be so apportioned that each candidate shall have deducted a share of them, proportioned according to the whole number of votes in his favor, the probability being that the legal and illegal votes have been cast ratably for the several candidates."

The majority therefore found a net loss of 3 votes for contestee.

The minority contend that the Michigan authority was predicated on an entirely different statute. In Michigan it was the duty of the election officers before proceeding to canvass the votes, if the number of ballots exceeded the number of names on the poll lists, to draw out and destroy unopened a number of ballots equal to the excess. But if the election officers failed to destroy, such excessive ballots, and counted and returned them, their loss on a contest must be determined by allotment, because the ballots which would have been drawn out and destroyed could not be identified. There was no such difficulty about the Ohio law. The ballots last found in the box in excess of the names on the poll lists were by law deemed fraudulent, and they could always be identified whether they were counted and strung or not.

(f) As to certain marked ballots: The law of Ohio provided that ballots should be "without any mark or device by which one ticket may be distinguished from another, except the words at the head of each."

The majority say:

The object of this statute was to guard against frauds upon the voter.

And therefore the majority hold that ballots pencil marked by the voters themselves, who voted them, after being printed and distributed according to statutory requirement, did not fall within the requirements of the statute.

The minority contended that the object of this statute was to preserve the secrecy of the ballot, and that the ballots in question should be rejected because it was shown that the voters marked them to let their employers or party friends know how they voted.

(g) One ballot was found with sitting Member's name written "W. R. Moorey" and another simply "Morey." Also, there were other ballots where the candidates' names were spelled wrong. All these were counted.

On several ballots a name similar to the name of a candidate for sheriff was written beneath the name of the candidate for Representative to Congress. The majority say:

> We think these ballots ought not to be disturbed for the reason that William McLain was a candidate for sheriff at said election, and the voters, when writing the names on said ballots, merely erred in putting some in the wrong place thereon. There is no doubt as to the intention of the voters to be gathered by inspection of the ballots. We follow the rule laid down by contestee himself in these words:
>
> "The intention of the voter ought to prevail whenever it can be ascertained by an inspection of the ballot, and if the ballot is ambiguous the intention of the voter may be shown.

(h) As to a deceived voter the majority hold:

> Robert Wilson voted for contestee in Ross precinct under the supposition that he was voting for contestant, having been deceived by a Republican who gave him the ballot. His vote should be deducted from the poll of contestee and added to that of contestant.

In accordance with their conclusions of law, and also certain conclusions as to questions of fact, the majority of the committee found for contestant a majority of 44 votes, and reported resolutions declaring him entitled to the seat.

The report was debated at length on June 19 and 20,[1] and on the latter day the proposition of the minority, confirming the title of sitting Member was disagreed to, yeas 62, nays 139.

Then the resolutions reported by the majority were agreed to without division.

Mr. Campbell then appeared and took the oath.

993. The Virginia election case of Massey v. Wise, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Where a capitation tax is a prerequisite to the right to vote, the collection of such tax by unauthorized agents should not invalidate the vote.

A Member who was appointed to assist a United States attorney in certain cases was held not to be disqualified as a Member of the House.

Discussion as to what constitutes "a person holding office under the United States," within the meaning of the Constitution.

On June 30, 1884,[2] Mr. Mortimer F. Elliott, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Virginia case of Massey v. Wise.

---

[1] Record, pp. 5371, 5404–5426; Journal, pp. 1486, 1497, 1499.

[2] First session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 2024; Mobley, p. 365.

The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 5,808 votes; but contestant claimed that sitting Member received many illegal votes, and also that he was disqualified.

(1) As to the illegal votes:

The law of Virginia provided for the payment of a capitation tax of $1 prior to the day of election as a prerequisite to the right of the citizen otherwise qualified to vote. Many thousands of citizens failed to pay the capitation tax to the officers first intrusted with the collection of the same.

A short time prior to the election of 1882 the auditor of public accounts appointed special collectors, who issued capitation-tax receipts to the number of 15,000 or 16,000.

The majority report thus concludes as to this branch of the question:

It is impossible for the committee to state who or how many persons voted on the tax receipts, as the evidence utterly fails to show these facts. We are satisfied, however, that several thousand votes were cast upon these receipts, and probably a greater number than contestee's returned majority.

We are of opinion that the votes cast on receipts issued by the tax collectors appointed by the auditor of public accounts, which were paid for by the voters or other persons for them prior to the day of election, were legal votes, and were properly received and counted by the election officers.

It may be doubted whether the auditor of public accounts had authority to appoint these collectors under section 29 of the revenue laws of Virginia. It was his duty, however, to supervise the collection of the delinquent personal and capitation taxes certified to him by the respective county clerks, and under the law to place them in the hands of one or more sheriffs, sergeants, constables, or collectors for such purpose; and if, as it is contended by the contestant, he was not authorized to select private persons as collectors, still we think such persons so appointed to receive the delinquent taxes were acting under color of office, and the taxpayers were not bound, at the peril of losing their votes, to know whether the auditor had exceeded his powers in appointing them. The purpose of the law was to compel the payment of the tax, and that was accomplished and the money reached the treasury through these collectors, the accredited agents of the auditor, and to hold that the citizens who endeavored to qualify themselves to vote by paying the taxes assessed against them to the persons who were held out to them as proper and lawful collectors by the head of the revenue department of the State would be establishing a rule manifestly unjust.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, say on this point:

We do not believe that the section of the State statute (sec. 29) under which these appointments were made (and cited in the report of the majority) created such officers or authorized their appointment. If collectors of arrears of taxes had been appointed under section 34 of the same statute, with the approval of the governor, there would have been good reason to think that the auditor could have placed the lists of delinquent capitation taxes in their hands for collection.

But we concede that the tax system of Virginia, taken as a whole, is somewhat obscure, and we will not under the circumstances reverse the decision of that department of the State government which is charged with its administration. The practice of making these special appointments seems to have been inaugurated by the contestant while auditor of public accounts of the State; and while we do not think that the principle of estoppel applies, we admit that this circumstance would greatly embarrass a decision on this point in favor of contestant.

There can be no doubt that many capitation tax receipts were issued in blank, that many were issued on the day of election, and that many were issued in gross and then distributed. And it is claimed, with much force, that any payment of taxes for delinquent voters without their authority previously given, especially when made by political agencies, approximates bribery. But we can not say that the evidence is clear that a sufficient number of votes, illegal for any cause, were cast for the sitting Member to justify the rejection of his majority. We therefore forbear to pursue these painful details.

(2) As to alleged disqualification, the majority report says:

It is claimed by the counsel for the contestant that if the contestee was duly elected that he has since disqualified himself from holding the office of Representative in Congress.

Article I, section 6, last clause, Constitution of the United States, is as follows:

"And no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

It is claimed by contestant that the contestee, after his term of office commenced, we appointed by the Attorney-General to an office under the United States, which he continued to hold until after he was sworn as a Member of the House.

There is nothing in the record to show the facts alleged, and all the committee had before them was the admissions made by the contestee during the argument of the case. He stated that on the 5th day of March, 1883, he was employed by the Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster, Attorney-General of the United States, to assist the United States district attorney of Virginia in the trial of certain enumerated cases then pending in the United States district court of Virginia; that the cases had not all been disposed of at the time this case was argued before the committee, and that he expected to assist in the trial of the case then undisposed of when they should come on to be heard. The contestee, by his agreement with the Attorney-General, was to receive for his services as special counsel in said cases not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, as the Attorney-General should afterwards determine.

Under these facts, admitted by the contestee, was the contestee appointed to an office under the United States, and did he hold such office at the time he took his seat as a Member of this House?

The contestee was employed by the Attorney-General under section 363 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

"The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain in the name of the United States such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorney and counselor the amounts of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings."

What authority is given the Attorney-General by the section quoted? We think the section so plain that it construes itself. He is authorized, "Whenever in his opinion the public interests require it, to employ and retain," attorneys and counselors at law on behalf of the United States to assist the regular law officers of the Government in the trial of particular cases. The duties of an attorney so employed depend upon the contract made between the Attorney-General and himself, and are not defined by law. He is retained to try a particular cause, and when that service is performed his contract is at an end.

He has no right to perform the general duties of a district attorney, but is confined to such services as the Attorney-General has stipulated for in the contract of hiring. If it had been the purpose of Congress to authorize the Attorney-General to appoint the attorney to an office under the United States, would the words "retain" and "employ" I have been used? Would not the word "appoint" have been used instead? If an attorney employed by the Attorney-General to assist the district attorney in the trial of a single case is an officer of the Government, what is his official name? Is he to be known during the trial of that cause as assistant district attorney and as ex-assistant as soon as the verdict is rendered? Does the office as well as the officer die with the cause the attorney was retained and employed to try? Must it not be a singular office when the compensation to be received by the appointee depends upon a bargain to be made between the Attorney-General and the officer?

The report refers to the Pennsylvania case of Bache v. Bums (17 S. and Rawle, 234) and to the decisions of the United States courts in the cases of United States v. Hartwell (6 Wallace, 385) and United States v. Germaine (99 U. S. Reports, 508).

The last-quoted case was that wherein a United States pension examining surgeon, paid by fees, was held not to be an officer of the United States, because "the duties are not continuing and permanent, and they are occasional and intermittent."

Therefore the majority concluded that sitting Member was not disqualified, and recommended a resolution confirming his title to the seat.

The minority views took issue on this point:

But we feel it to be our duty to inform the House that the sitting Member holds another position which, in our opinion, forfeits his right to a seat. The last clause of the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution is as follows:

"And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

The precise position of the sitting Member is defined in the two sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States following:

"SEC. 363. The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain in the name of the United States such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorney and counselor the amount of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

"SEC. 366. Every attorney or counselor who is specially retained under the authority of the Department of Justice to assist in the trial of any cause in which the Government is interested shall receive a commission from the head of such Department as a special assistant to the Attorney-General, or to some one of the district attorneys, as the nature of the appointment may require, and shall take the oath required by law to be taken by the district attorneys, and shall be subject to all the liabilities imposed upon them by law."

Some strew is laid on the words "employ and retain" in the first section cited; but it is respectfully submitted that those words mean no more than the word "appoint" would imply in the same connection. At any rate, they are to be construed in pari materia with the subsequent section. Attorneys or counselors at law occupying the position of Mr. Wise are designated "special assistants to the district attorneys;" they receive a commission (the position is called an "appointment" in the statute); they are required to take the oath prescribed for the district attorneys, which is an oath of office, strictly so called; they are subject to the supervision of the Attorney-General in their conduct and proceeding; they are to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties; they are subject to all the liabilities imposed upon the district attorneys by law, and they are paid out of the Treasury of the United States. This enumeration seems to exhaust the highest badges of office known to us. The power of the Attorney-General to fix the compensation of these special assistants to the district attorneys can not affect the question, except to indicate the possibility of greater subserviency on that account.

The constitutional provision before cited was manifestly intended to exclude from Congress all persons under the official influence of the Executive. It is public policy, solemnly declared in the fundamental law. It is our duty firmly to execute the Constitution according to its plain intent and spirit if we would preserve the independence of Congress.

The cases decided by the courts, while not based on the precise question here raised, confirm by clear analogy, the view we have presented.

We therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That John S. Wise, one of the Members of this House, having continued to hold the office of special assistant to the district attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia after he was qualified as a Member, has thereby forfeited his right to his seat, and that said seat be declared vacant.

The report in this case does not seem to have ever been acted on by the House. Mr. Wise retained his seat, of course.

994. The election case of Botkin v. Maginnis, from Montana Territory, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

No wrong or injury being shown, polling places established without entire adherence to the law were approved.

Instance wherein a law providing method of establishing polling places was construed as directory rather than mandatory.

The mere fact that a voter is a soldier does not necessarily imply disqualification.

On July 5, 1884,[1] Mr. A. A. Ranney, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Botkin v. Maginnis, from Montana Territory.

Mr. Maginnis had been returned by an official majority of 1,484 votes. Contestant assailed this majority on several grounds, some involving issues of fact and others of law. The committee, in settling the question, passed on the following:

(1) As to the legality of certain polling places:

The committee concludes that the polling places established in the counties of Custer, Dawson, and Missoula were without authority of law. We regard the statute prescribing that precincts shall be established at the regular meeting immediately preceding the general election to be directory rather than mandatory in its character. And following the familiar rule in such cases, we do not hesitate to say that their designation at another time, in the interest of a free and convenient ballot, was such an exercise of power as the commissioners might well indulge in. However this may be, the committee do not find that there was any wrong or injury done, or that there was any fraud in the matter.

The statute referred to is as follows:

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the commissioners of the several counties, at their regular session immediately preceding said general election, to appoint three discreet and capable persons possessing the qualifications of electors to act as judges of election in each township or precinct; and said board shall designate one or more of said judges, whose duty it shall be to post up or cause to be posted up in each precinct or township, notices of election in the manner hereinafter provided. Said board of commissioners shall also set off and establish at said meeting townships or precincts when the same my be necessary. And the clerk of said board shall make out and forward by mail, immediately after the appointment of said judges, a notice thereof in writing directed to each of said judges so appointed. In case there shall be no post-office in any one or more of the townships or precincts in any county, then in that event the clerk shall forward notices of such appointment by mail to the post-office nearest to such precinct or township, directed to the judges as aforesaid. If in any of the townships or precincts any of said judges refuse or neglect to serve, the voters of such township or precinct may elect a judge or judges to fill vacancies on the morning of the election to serve at such election.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 14. It shall be lawful for any elector to vote for Delegate to Congress at any place of holding elections in this Territory; and for members of the legislative assembly and all other officers at any place for holding elections within the particular limits for which such member of the legislative assembly and such other officers are to be elected: Provided, That an elector qualified to vote for part and not all of the officers to be chosen at any election shall vote an open ballot, and the judges may determine the legality of such vote."

(2) As to the legality of the votes of certain soldiers:

There is some proof tending to show that "soldiers" voted at this election. In the opinion of witnesses these "soldiers" were from 40 to 150 in number. We do not feel that we are justified in presuming that because the contestant and his witnesses have seen fit to designate these persons as soldiers that they are therefore necessarily incompetent as electors.

In his description of them, and of their qualifications as electors, contestant has contented himself with saying they were soldiers. There is no evidence that they were not residents of the Territory; that they had not been residents of the Territory long prior to any enlistment in the United States service, if it is claimed that they were in the United States service—a proposition by no means clear in the light of the proofs. But if it is admitted that they were enlisted men of the United States Army, and are therefore incompetent as electors, the committee are still left in doubt as to how and for whom these incompetent electors cast their ballots.

In conclusion the committee reported this resolution:

Resolved, That Martin Maginnis was duly elected as a Delegate from the Territory of Montana in the Forty-eighth Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such Delegate.

The resolution [1] was agreed to by the House without debate or division.

995. The Alabama election case of Craig v. Shelley, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Being satisfied by extrinsic evidence that returns rejected by State canvassers for informalities were correct as to the result, the House counted them.

Instance wherein the House unseated a member of the majority party.

On July 5, 1884,[2] Mr. L. H. Davis, of Missouri, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of that committee in the Alabama case of Craig v. Shelley.

The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 2,724 votes over contestant; but this result had been reached by the action of the returning boards in throwing out townships in the district which had returned a total of votes sufficient to change the result. The committee, after reviewing the law of Alabama in regard to elections, say:

The supreme court of Alabama has decided that it is the election that entitles the party to office and if one is legally elected by receiving a majority of legal votes his right is not impaired by any omission or negligence of the managers subsequent to the election. (State, ex rel. Spence, v. The Judge of the Ninth Judicial Circuit, 13 Ala. Rep., 805.)

It has further been held that a mistake by the managers of the election in counting the votes and declaring the result will not vitiate the election. Such a mistake may and should be corrected. The person receiving the highest number of votes becomes entitled to the office. (State, ex rel. Thomas, v. The Judge of the Circuit Court, 9 Ala. Rep., 338.)

The precincts rejected by the county boards of supervisors were rejected for sundry reasons. The rejection of the precincts in Dallas County, according to the evidence of James S. Diggs, an attorney at law, of Selma, was for the following reasons:

"The voting precincts in Dallas County are numbered from 1 to 36, but by consolidation of some of the beats there are really, I think, but 30. I was present at the count of votes of Dallas County made by the board of supervisors, which board is composed of the probate judge, the clerk of the circuit court, and the sheriff of said county. The board was all present at said count. I think there were either ballot boxes or returns for 23 or 24 of said precincts before said board. I think they only counted the votes from the following precincts, viz: Woodlawn, Valley Creek, Cahaba City, Marion Junction, one of the Lexington boxes, one of the Summerfield boxes, Burnsville. I do not now recollect of any other boxes that were counted. There were 14 or 15 boxes that were rejected or that they refused to count. These boxes are as follows: Plantersville, because the poll list was not signed and there was no statement of the vote in the box; Harrals Crossroads, because there was nothing in the box but a lot of loose ballots; Martins, because it was said that the polls were not opened until after 9 o'clock a.m.; Orrville, because there was no statement of the vote in the box; River, because the names of the inspectors signed to the returns appeared to be in the handwriting of one person; Pine Flat, because the poll list was not signed; Union, because the returns were in an envelope, directed to J.W. Dimmick, and they said they had no authority to open it; Chelatchie, because the poll list was not signed; Browers, because the statement of the vote was not signed by the inspectors; Smyleys, because there was an irregularity in the poll list, and also because the box, which was nailed up and sealed, did not have a lock on it; the box was so securely nailed that it had to be pried open; Elm Bluff, because the statement of the vote was not signed by the inspectors; Bykens, because the poll list was not signed, and because the box, though securely fastened and sealed, had no lock upon it; Mitchells, because the election was not held in the place in which they had been accustomed to hold the election, and because there was some evidence the tickets were numbered before the board."

The precincts rejected in the other counties were for reasons very similar to those in Dallas.

The committee has counted no rejected precinct, except where the evidence of contestant clearly shows that the election was honestly and fairly held. It does not criticise the action of the board of supervisors in the several counties in rejecting these precincts. They were rejected for technical reasons in the main. The committee, holding that mistakes and errors of the election officers in declaring the result and making the returns will not vitiate the election, have corrected or rather overlooked these errors and mistakes when satisfied by extrinsic evidence that the return made, although possibly informal, was correct as to the result. In doing this it has not only followed the precedents established by the House of Representatives, but the decisions of the supreme court of Alabama.

So the committee reported a resolution declaring Mr. Shelley not elected and Mr. Craig entitled to the seat.

After brief debate and without division the resolutions were agreed to on January 8, 1885,[1] and Mr. Craig appeared and took the oath.

Mr. Shelley was a member of the majority party in the House.

996. The Missouri election case of McLean v. Broadhead, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

May a registry law establish a qualification as to residence within a ward which the State constitution does not establish?

Should the House defer to a decision of a State court applicable to the case in issue as to its reasoning, but only analagous as to facts?

On February 18, 1885,[2] Mr. Mortimer F. Elliott, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority of the committee in the Missouri case of McLean v. Broadhead. The sitting, Member had been returned by a majority of 102 votes.

The investigation of the contest involved the settlement of several questions of fact, and the following question of law:

The only other claim made by the contestant which can possibly affect the result in this case is that 50 legal voters who offered their ballots at their proper polling places, which ballots contained contestant's name for Congress, were denied the privilege of voting because their names were not found on the lists furnished the judges and clerks in the respective precincts; their names having been illegally and improperly stricken off the registration list.

We have stated the position of the contestant upon this question in almost the exact language of his brief.

The constitution of Missouri, adopted in 1875, article 8, section 5, provides as follows:

"The general assembly shall provide by law for the registration of all voters in cities and counties having over 100,000 inhabitants, and may provide for such registration in cities having a population exceeding 25,000 and not exceeding 100,000, but not otherwise."

The city of St. Louis, in which the Ninth Congressional district is located, had, at the time of the adoption of the constitution of 1875, a population of more than 100,000.

In 1881 the general assembly of Missouri passed a registry law, the first two sections of which are as follows:

"SECTION 1. There shall be a registration of all the qualified voters in cities having a population of 100,000 inhabitants or more, which registration shall be had under the provisions of this act, and not otherwise.

"SEC. 2. Every male citizen of the United States, and every person of foreign birth who may have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, according to law, not less than one year nor more than five years before he offers to vote, who is over the age of 21 years, who has resided in this State one year next preceeding the election at which he offers to vote, and during the last sixty days of that time shall have resided in the city, and during the last ten days of that time in the ward at which he offers to vote, who has not been convicted of bribery, perjury, or other infamous crime, nor directly interested in any bet or wager depending upon the result of the election, nor serving at the time in the regular Army or Navy of the United States, shall be entitled to vote at such election for all officers, State or municipal, made elective by the people, or at any other election held in pursuance of the laws of this State; but he shall not vote elsewhere than in the election precinct where his name is registered and whereof he is registered as a resident."

The constitution required the general assembly to pass a registry law. The legislature obeyed the command of the constitution, and to enforce its provisions provided that the citizen should "not vote elsewhere than in the election precinct where his name is registered, and whereof he is registered as a resident."

There is no misunderstanding this provision of the law. No citizen, although otherwise qualified, has the right to vote unless at the time he offers his ballot he is properly registered at the precinct where he resides. It may be said that the general assembly exceeded its power when it imposed the penalty of temporary disfranchisement upon the citizen for omitting to be registered in the manner and within the time limited by the provisions of said law.

The constitution commands the general assembly to enact a registry law, and in order to compel obedience to the law the legislature clearly had the right to say that the failure to register should be conclusive evidence that such person was not a legal voter.

Registration is not a qualification, but is made the necessary evidence that the person offering to vote possesses the qualifications prescribed by the constitution of Missouri.

The legislature, we think, had the right to go that far under the mandatory provisions of the constitution of Missouri requiring the passage of a registry law.

Without such a provision the registry law would be a nullity. If a person offering to vote is allowed to make proof at the polls that he possesses all the qualifications of an elector, then the registry law affords no protection against fraud and false swearing. Even if the board received the ballots of persons who were not registered, and such persons possessed all the qualifications of electors prescribed by the constitution, such votes should not be counted.

The majority call attention to the Pennsylvania case of Martin McDonough (Legal Intelligencer, vol. 41, p. 234), and then say:

It is not necessary in this report to go into the details of the registration law. It is sufficient to state that the registration is not completed until five days prior to the election, the board of revision being required to sit until that time for the purpose of striking off and also restoring names improperly stricken off by said board.

The recorder of votes is required on the day prior to the election to deliver to the judges of election two copies of the corrected registration lists of their respective precincts alphabetically arranged, together with a copy of the law regulating elections.

These lists were furnished the judges at the election out of which this contest arises.

Of the 50 persons who it is alleged offered to vote, and, if they had been permitted to do so, would have voted for the contestant, not more than 6 were on the lists furnished the judges of election, and there is no evidence that they were on the original registry list after the board of revision had concluded its labors. These lists were required to be furnished for the guidance of the election officers, and they are presumed to be correct until the contrary is shown by competent testimony. The only competent evidence to prove the incorrectness of these lists is the original registration from which they were taken. There has been no effort to put in evidence the registration as it stood five days prior to the election, the time when the power of the board of revision over it ceased.

The evidence before the committee thus shows that only 6 of those 50 persons were registered, and as they were not registered their votes were properly rejected, and can not now be counted for the contestant.

After a somewhat careful consideration of the case, we have reached the conclusion that James O. Broadhead, the sitting Member, was duly elected.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Alphonso Hart, of Ohio, took issue with the position of the majority:

The constitution of Missouri has the following provision upon the subject of the election franchise:

"ARTICLE VIII.

SEC. 2. Every male citizen of the United States, and every male person of foreign birth, who may have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States according to law, not less than one year nor more than five years before he offers to vote, who is over the age of 21 years, possessing the following qualifications, shall be entitled to vote at all elections by the people:

"First. He shall have resided in the State one year immediately preceding the election at which he offers to vote.

"Second. He shall have resided in the county, city, or town where he shall offer to vote at least sixty days immediately preceding the election.

"SEC. 3. All elections by the people shall be by ballot; every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it shall be received, and the number recorded by the election officers on the list of voters, opposite the name of the voter who presents the ballot. The election officers shall be sworn or affirmed not to disclose how any voter shall have voted, unless required to do so as witnesses in a judicial proceeding: Provided. That in all cases of contested election the ballots cast may be counted, compared with the list of voters, and examined under such safeguards and regulations as may be prescribed by law.

"SEC. 5. The general assembly shall provide by law for the registration of all voters in cities and counties having over 100,000 inhabitants, and may provide for such registration in cities having a population exceeding 25,000 inhabitants and not exceeding 100,000, but not otherwise."

The provision is explicit and easily understood. The qualifications of a voter are four in number:

(1) He must be a male citizen of the United States. or, if of foreign birth, must have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States not less than one nor more than five years before he offers to vote.

(2) He must be over the age of 21 years.

(3) He must have resided in the State one year immediately preceding the election.

(4) He must reside in the county, city, or town at least sixty days preceding the election.

The foregoing are all the qualifications named as requisite to the exercise of the elective franchise. The constitution has, however, in sections 8 and 11, denied the right to vote to occupants of poorhouses and persons confined in public prisons, and to all officers, soldiers, and marines in the Regular Army or Navy of the United States. By section 10 it has also provided that the general assembly may enact laws excluding from the right of voting all persons convicted of felony or other infamous crimes or misdemeanors connected with the right of suffrage. The provision in regard to the registry law does not in any manner change these qualifications or prohibitions named in the Constitution.

Suppose the legislature should neglect or refuse to pass any registration act, would that operate to disfranchise all the inhabitants of Missouri? Could no election be held; or, if held, would it be a nullity? Certainly not. It is not in the power of the legislature to deprive any man of the right to vote, provided he possesses the above-named constitutional qualifications and is not included in any of the above named prohibitions. Any law passed by the legislature which in terms or in effect makes any additional requirements, whether it be done under the name of a registry law or not, is to that extent unconstitutional and void. The general assembly can neither add to nor subtract from the constitutional requisites.

After quoting from the registration law, the minority contend that it attempts to add to the qualification of voters, and hold:

The whole registration act is in violation of the constitution, and any registration made under it is an absolute nullity. There is another feature of the statute deserving attention: The law provides that each year, a certain time before the election, a board of revision shall be appointed to examine the registry lists and make corrections of the same. They shall strike from the list, by a majority vote, the names of all persons who have removed or have died, or who, for any reason, are not entitled to registration under the provisions of this act. This revisory board are to execute the unconstitutional provisions of section 2, and hence their action is based upon and infected with the same infirmity as that of the recorder. Since the hearing of this case before the subcommittee our attention has been called to an opinion delivered by the St. Louis court of appeals on the 13th of May, 1884, upon an appeal from the St. Louis circuit court, in the case of Ewing v. Hoblitzell, in which certain portions of the registry law are declared unconstitutional. The particular points which we have discussed were not involved in that case and the judgment of the court was not invoked upon them. The inquiry arose upon another branch of the statute. We are justified, however, in saying that the reasoning of the court in the case referred to, if applied to the statute, would have the effect to invalidate the entire action of the recorder of voters, and also the action of the revisory board. By the charter of St. Louis the power of appointing the recorder of voters, the board of revision, and also the judges and clerks of election is lodged with the mayor. The registration act to which we have referred and the amendments made to it require the appointment of the recorder of voters to be made by the governor, and the judges and clerks of election and board of revision are appointed by the recorder. The court in the case referred to holds that the recorder of voters had no authority to appoint judges and clerks of election, and that the law giving him that right was invalid, as an invasion of the chartered rights of the city of St. Louis and its mayor. The same doctrine would hold good as to the appointment of the recorder of voters. The court also, in the above case, holds that the registry law is invalid for the further reason that it is such special legislation as is prohibited by the constitution of Missouri.

We thereupon submit that the registration law of Missouri is invalid and void.

If, however, we assume that the registration law is a constitutional and valid act, there still remains another important question for consideration: Is the action of the board of revision which is provided for in the law final, or have the judges of election the right to review their proceedings and pass upon the qualifications of voters after the revisory board have acted?

The sitting Member contends that the board of revision is a judicial body, and from its decision there is no appeal, and that there is no redress-from any wrong it may commit. This view is expressly contradicted by the statute itself, for in section 6 it is provided that even though the name of a person offering to vote is upon the registry list, "he may be challenged, and it shall be the duty of the judges of election to try and determine in a summary manner the qualifications of every person challenged; and if they find he is not a voter, then his vote is to be rejected." If the action of the revisory board is not final in the case of men whose names are on the list, why should it be as to men who are not on the list?

After commenting on the manner in which the registry lists were revised and the alleged lack of care and fairness, the minority conclude:

We are of opinion that these votes should have been received by the judges of election, it having been clearly shown that they were legal voters on the 7th of November, 1882, that their names had been upon the registry list, and that they were stricken off or left off by mistake. But one conclusion can be arrived at. All election laws should be construed liberally and in favor of the largest privilege to the voter. Our conclusion upon this branch of the subject is, first, that the entire registration was invalid, being in conflict with the constitution of Missouri; and further, that even admitting its validity, the registration and revision of the registry lists was characterized by fraud and mistake as to the names of at least 35 of the persons whose votes were rejected for want of registration.

Therefore the minority concluded that contestant was elected.

The report was not acted on by the House.

997. The Iowa election case of Frederick v. Wilson, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

The State law providing for preservation of the votes as a record but not for a recount, the House corrected the returns by an unofficial recount which it deemed correct.

As to the sufficiency of a recount which justifies a disregard of the returns of the sworn election officers.

On February 19, 1885,[1] Mr. Risden T. Bennett, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Iowa case of Frederick v. Wilson.

The sitting Member had been declared elected by the State canvassing board by a majority of 23 votes.

The principal issue in the case was as to the validity of certain recounts of votes. The recount in Tama Township, which was one of several, is thus discussed by the majority report:

Contestee criticizes this recount as not having been made pursuant to law. The laws of Iowa in no manner provide for a recounting of the ballots. It simply provides that the clerk shall preserve them until after the time for contesting the election has expired. He is not required to keep them in any box or in any particular way. They are a record with the township clerk. Under the statutes of Iowa and the laws of the United States there is no technical rule surrounding them. The only question before the committee is, Are they the same ballots as cast and what is the correct count? The manner of the recount and the time of the recount are immaterial. These ballots were strung by the judges and left with the township clerk. While contestant's testimony was being taken the township clerk opened the box in the presence of three men and counted the ballots for Representative. All testify, and it is not questioned, that the clerk alone handled the ballots and they were in no manner changed or mutilated. Afterwards the ballots were also brought before the commissioner and publicly counted. Both these recounts agree and give the result before stated.

The clerk who thus examined the ballots was a partisan friend of Wilson and Frederick was not connected with it. The clerk violated no law, as the ballots are not required to be kept secret; manifestly it would be wrong to deprive contestant of this evidence, and the objection to the recount is without weight when it appears that not only were the ballots kept as required by law, but it is conclusively shown that the ballots were not tampered with nor could they have been changed. The election officers of this precinct were all partisan friends of Wilson. A request to have a Democrat appointed on the board was refused.

In this township we attach much importance to the fact that the return upon its face impeaches itself; the 4 votes returned in excess of the ballots actually cast, added to the discrepancy of 5 between the tallies of the two clerks, makes precisely the number changed by the recount. Not only this, but the evidence shows that the count on the night of the election was made under circumstances rendering it highly probable that mistakes occurred. Here again we base our conclusion upon the general evidence, accepting the recount as confirmatory proof. If there was nothing suspicious on the face of the return, and no proof showing the original count incorrect, and fairly showing the recount as giving the actual vote, we should not feel justified in disturbing the official count and return; but, in the light of all the testimony, we have no hesitation in concluding that 9 votes too many were certified up for Wilson, and we on this account deduct 9 votes from him.

The minority views, presented by Mr. S. H. Miller, of Pennsylvania, object to the validity of the recounts:

In Iowa the ballot boxes are left by law with the township clerk, who by law is ex officio a clerk at the election, and they are directed to be placed in some convenient condition for preservation and deposited with the township clerk, who is to keep them until the time is passed for contesting the election of any officer voted for. The law is as follows:

"SEC. 629. One of the poll books containing such returns with the register of election attached thereto, in cases where such register is required by law, shall be delivered to the township clerk and by him filed in his office. The other poll book, with its returns, shall be inclosed, sealed, and superscribed, and delivered by one of the judges of the election within two days to the county auditor, who shall file the same in his office.

[1] Second session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 2623; Mobley, p. 401.

"SEC. 630. When the result of the election is ascertained, the judges shall cause all the ballots, including those rejected, with the tally list, to be placed in some convenient condition for preservation and deposited with the township clerk, who is to keep them until the time is passed which is allowed for contesting the election of any officer voted for."

As contestant can not, under any claim or view, be seated unless by the benefit accruing to him under the alleged recount, we desire to call the attention of the committee to the law governing recounts of ballots, published herewith.

A brief history of these recounts need but be given to stamp them as worthless. What is that history? After the returns of the district were all in and contestee was elected by a small majority, contestant hired agents to secretly go round the district to hunt up the ballot boxes and examine the ballots to see what they showed. One witness, C.W. Stone, in behalf of contestant, admits he was a hired agent, by the day, of contestant. That in two counties alone he opened the boxes of about thirty precincts, without authority of law or color of right, and examined, inspected, and professed to have assisted in counting the ballots. He was twenty-one days engaged in this work without the knowledge of contestee or notice to any friend of his, laying the foundation for this contest. His testimony is found on pages 77 and 78 of the record. This witness is brought in to prove he did not change the ballots, but only touched them with the rubber end of his pencil.

Thomas Stapleton is another hired agent (p. 338). The extent of his area "was Iowa County and some others." He admits freely he handled the ballots.

William A. Palmer (p. 218) was engaged by a Democratic editor to visit Cedar Township, Johnson County. He got the poll book from the ballot box and took it to Iowa City and kept it two weeks. At Highland Township, Tama County, "Mr. Frederick and a man from Gilman came over, "and Cunningham—all friends of contestant—and "Mr. Frederick strung the ballots." (See p. 141.)

There is not a ballot box which, on a recount before the notary who took the testimony, gave an increased majority to contestant or a decreased majority to contestee but what had been previously, opened by unauthorized persons between the official count on the night of election and the recount before the notary. Some of the boxes had been opened as often as three times.

The minority also quote the cases of Kline v. Myers, Cook v. Cutts, and the textbook of McCrary; and finally concludes:

The issue in this case, as presented by the majority report, is: Will an official count, made by sworn officers immediately upon the closing of the polls, be set aside upon proof that an alleged recount, made by unauthorized persons, including the paid agents of the contestant, and made without the knowledge of contestee, showed a different result from the official count?

To seat the contestant in this case imperils every Member's seat in the future where majority does not exceed 25 votes.

Once establish the precedent that a defeated candidate can hire an agent to open the ballot boxes in the district and tamper with the ballots before a recount is had before the legal authorities in pursuance of law, and no man's election will be safe.

In the language of Judge Cook (quoted from McCrary on Elections, p. 209), a Member of this House, and a member of the Committee on Elections, when he himself was a contestant in the Forty-seventh Congress.

"Before the ballots should be allowed in evidence to overturn the official count and return, it should appear affirmatively that they have been safely kept by the proper custodian; that they have not been exposed to the public or handled by unauthorized persons, and that no opportunity has been given for tampering with them."

Also the minority say:

The majority report gives the seat to contestant wholly and solely upon the grounds of pretended recounts of ballots in ten precincts, and in every instance but two the ballot boxes containing the alleged ballots had been opened by a hired agent of the contestant, hired by the contestant for the express purpose of traveling over the district and having the boxes opened and recounted without the knowledge of the contestee or pretended authority of law.

998. The case of Frederick v. Wilson, continued.

Naturalization by a court whose authority was unquestioned for years was sustained by the House.

As to what is meant by a common-law jurisdiction justifying a court to naturalize aliens under the act of Congress.

A paster which did not cover the name of the rival candidate was yet held to make certain the intent of the voter.

The election officers having received a made-up ballot of which voter had neglected to paste the two parts together, the House declined to overrule the action.

Various other questions were also considered in the determination of the case:

(1) As to naturalization:

Contestee attacks votes cast for contestant by men whom contestee claims were not naturalized. The fact is they were for the greater part naturalized in due form by the county court of Iowa. It is claimed that this court did not have jurisdiction to induct aliens to citizenship. It seems this court assumed jurisdiction and did grant naturalization papers in various counties, and these people have voted unquestioned for many years. After patient examination of the laws of Iowa and the decision of courts we are convinced that this court had the jurisdiction, and its action was valid. The authorities concur in this, that the State courts mentioned in the act of Congress as having common-law jurisdiction are such as exercise their powers according to the course of the common law. It was not meant they should have all common-law jurisdiction over every class of subjects, including all civil and criminal matters.

The minority concur in this:

Whether it had jurisdiction or not is a question we do not here pass on. As stated by the majority report:

"It assumed jurisdiction and did grant (some years ago) naturalization papers in various counties, and the persons thus naturalized have voted unquestioned for many years."

We count all these votes for the contestant, Mr. Frederick, amounting to nearly 60 in all.

(2) As to a defective ballot the majority hold:

In Marietta Township, Marshall County, a Republican ballot was cast having Frederick's name on a "paster," placed under the words designating the office of Representative, but not so as to cover the name of Wilson; this ballot was not counted for either. We think it should have been counted for Frederick. The same rule must apply here as where the name of one candidate is written and the name of the other is not erased. It is well settled that the name written must be counted and the printed name rejected, because the writing is the last act, and shows the intent of the voter to cast his ballot for the name written.

The minority say:

Here is a claim of one vote by reason of a paster. The paster was above Wilson's name, and of same size print. The judges, not knowing for whom the voter intended to vote, threw out this ballot and counted it for neither. (See Randall's testimony, Rec., p. 116.)

(3) As to another defective ballot the majority report says:

A voter handed in an open ballot consisting of the Democratic State, Congressional, and county ticket, the township being blank; on this he placed a township ticket filled out. The judges received this ticket openly, folded it up, and deposited it in the box without objection; afterwards it was not counted, on the ground that it was a double ballot. This was erroneous. It was not a double ballot; it was one full ballot in two pieces. Had it been pasted together no question would have been raised, but as it was openly received and folded together it was equally clear, and one vote must here be added to contestant.

999. The case of Frederick v. Wilson, continued.

Voters being deceived in casting a ballot not intended by them, the House corrected the error.

A return was corrected on the evidence of the tally list supplemented by oral testimony of an election officer and a recount of ballots.

Instance of obstruction on an election case which forced a compromise as to another matter of legislation.

(4) In Homer Township certain men were induced to vote a ticket containing sitting Member's name by reason of deceptive representations made by supporters of sitting Member. The majority of the committee favor a correction of the result on account of this deception.

The minority deny that the voters were deceived.

(5) The majority report thus discusses certain irregularities:

The State canvassing board, on the 11th day of December, 1882, declared James Wilson elected by a majority of 23 votes, and he was duly commissioned. The county canvassers of Marshall County refused to count the votes from Taylor Township; but it was afterwards irregularly certified to the State board, and by them counted in their canvass, contrary to and in total disregard of an injunction issued by a court of competent jurisdiction at the State capital.

The contestant assails the vote of said township for fraud, and he sets out as badges of the fraud that the ballots were handled and counted by the judges of the election during the progress of the voting some hours before the time for closing the polls; that the secrecy of the ballot was invaded and violated by the judges; and that more votes were cast for him than were counted or returned.

In the count by the State canvassers the contestant was given 8 votes and the contestee 48 from that precinct.

We find that the judges of election at this precinct were guilty of gross and flagrant irregularities. They began to count the votes before the polls were closed. They counted the votes before the hour prescribed by law for counting them was reached, and after they had thus counted, voters to the number of 10 or more voted and in effect were wholly deprived of that secrecy and shield which the law provides for and puts around the ballot. We, however, allow the canvass as made by State board to stand.

(6) As to the relative value of returns and the tally sheet:

In Buckingham Township, Tama County, the returns or certificate gave Mr. Frederick 43 votes in both the books, and in the book retained by the township clerk the tally sheet gave him 43 votes; but in the one sent to the county auditor the tally sheet gave him only 38 votes. The county canvassers disregarded the return before them (which gave him 43 votes) and based their return to the State canvassers on the tally list. This was of itself an error, because, under the laws of Iowa, the return is of higher evidence than the tally sheet. The clerk who kept the tally list which was 5 short testified that he made the mistake of 5 against the contestant, and swears that Frederick received 43 votes.

A recount of the votes by the township officers shows that the contestant received 43 votes. A mere examination of the two returns and the two tally sheets leaves no doubt that he received 43 votes; but when to this we add the testimony of the clerk and the recount the proof is simply overwhelming. We here add 5 votes to those for Frederick.

The majority concluded:

The leading question in the case is this: Will the House, by its constituted agents, go behind all certificates and returns to inquire into and correct all mistakes in elections brought to its notice by a contest legally made?

We submit to the House for adoption the following resolutions:

Resolved, That James Wilson was not elected as a Representative in Congress from the Fifth district of Iowa, and is not entitled to a seat on the floor of this House.

Resolved, That Benjamin T. Frederick was duly elected as a Representative in Congress from the Fifth district of Iowa, and is entitled to be sworn in as a Member of this House.

The minority proposed a resolution confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

The report in this case was called up on March 2 and 3, 1885,[1] in the closing hours of the Congress, and consideration was for a time obstructed by the minority. Finally, evidently by a compromise affecting the fate of another question, the report was considered and the resolutions proposed by the majority were agreed to without division or debate.

Mr. Frederick thereupon appeared and took the oath.

Chapter XXXV.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1886 TO 1888.

1000. The Ohio election case of Hurd v. Romeis in the Forty-ninth Congress.

The House declined to reject a vote on charges of general bribery sustained by hearsay testimony.

The House declined to reject a return because of irregularities on the part of election officers and the settlement of discrepancies between the ballots and the poll list by additions.

Proof of efforts to intimidate, unsustained by proof that it was effective, does not justify rejection of a return.

On March 31, 1886,[3] Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Ohio case of Hurd v. Romeis.

The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 295 votes, which contestant assailed on several grounds.

(1) Contestant claimed that the return of Precinct B of ward 8 of Toledo, which gave a majority of 220 for Mr. Romeis, should be entirely rejected, because of alleged bribery, fraud, and irregularities, claimed to be sufficient to taint the entire result.

(a) As to bribery.

The charges of contestant are thus set forth in the minority views: [4]

The testimony satisfies us that there was a conspiracy to corrupt the precinct by money in the interest of contestee, and that it was successfully carried out. The evidence of Gerstmann (pp. 115 and 128 of the record) shows the plan to defeat the contestant and the methods by which it was executed.

He testifies that he was agent of the Republican national committee, sent to Toledo for the purpose of finding the sentiment of people in certain districts before the October election of 1884. He, being able to speak the Polish and German languages, was assigned to this precinct, which was almost entirely inhabited by Germans and Poles. He was deputed to work in this precinct by Captain Brown, who was the chairman of the Republican committee in the city of Toledo, and also the attorney of contestee in the contest.

He visited the precinct in pursuance of his instructions and went through it to find the sentiment of the people. He found them all for Hurd.

After some consultation he learned from them that the sentiment might be changed by the use of money. They informed him that from $2,000 to $10,000 would be required to change the precinct.

After having obtained this information he reported to the local committee and then went to New York to report to the national committee. There he had an interview with S. B. Elkins, in which he reported the condition and the necessity of money for this precinct.

Mr. Elkins said that the election of Mr. Hurd was a nationally important question; that he was a free trader; and that it was necessary he should be defeated. He said also that the money needed would be sent through the regular channels. He was directed to go to Toledo and tell them to do all they could to defeat Hurd.

In the work of his agency Gerstmann returned to Toledo a few days before the election.

He visited the same persons and places he had visited before. He found the sentiment all changed. It was then against Hurd and for the contestee.

He learned from the voters there that the change had occurred through the use of money; that their wants had been satisfied; and he left Toledo before the election, as there was nothing more for him to do.

We call attention to the testimony of Gerstmann on page 128:

"4. Q. What was said, at your last visit to Toledo before the election, by Warnke and other voters in precinct B, in ward 8, as to money or other considerations having been satisfactorily furnished to the voters of that precinct to carry it for Romeis?—A. From the general conversations with Warnke and others living in that neighborhood there was no doubt in my mind that money and other materials were furnished to defeat Mr. Hurd in that precinct. There was no further use for me, and I left Toledo. My reasons for leaving, no doubt, are from the conversations which I had on that subject with Warnke and other voters of that precinct. I was satisfied in my own mind that Romeis would carry that precinct, notwithstanding at my first visit everything was for Hurd there. Had it not been for the use of money and other considerations used in the political machinery, Hurd would certainly have carried the precinct."

To corroborate Gerstmann the testimony of Louis Johns is offered, who swears that shortly after the election of Henry Gates, the vice-president of the Republican organization in that precinct, boasted that he had paid on the night of election at a saloon in that precinct 19 persons from $3 to $10 apiece for services as ticket peddlers.

Jones also heard others say that the money had been so paid.

We think that if the statements of these witnesses are to be accepted as true there can be no doubt that this precinct should be rejected.

If there were a conspiracy to send from $2,000 to $3,000 to a little precinct of less than 450 votes; if the voters were changed in sentiment, by their own confession, within two or three weeks by the use of this money; if the officers of the Republican organization, from the national down to the local committee, interested themselves to carry out this conspiracy, and if the corruption were so open and public that the local Republican manager in that precinct boasted shortly after the election that he had paid unusually large sums for a day's work, to many more men than the legitimate expense of an election could possibly have required, it would be an outrage upon justice and fair dealing to permit the returns from this precinct to be counted.

The only answer made to this evidence by the contestee is that (1) the witness Gerstmann is not credible, and (2) that the testimony is not competent, as it is hearsay.

As to the first part, we reply that Gerstmann declared himself to be the agent of the Republican committee to do the work to which he was assigned, and stated that he was deputed to the special work in this precinct by Mr. Brown, the chairman of the Republican committee, the very man who was cross-examining him. He mentioned the name of Mr. Elkins and Mr. Schenck, two Republican managers, who had engaged him and to whom he reported. How easy it would have been for one of them to have gone onto the stand and testify that he was not their agent. They knew his testimony and realized its importance, and yet not one man undertook to contradict him.

Neither was there any effort to impeach him.

His testimony remains uncontradicted and unimpeached. There is nothing to affect his credibility, unless it shall be found in his cross-examination, and after the more thorough examination of that we are satisfied that there is nothing in it to weaken the force of the statement he makes as to the great points of his testimony.

The only question remaining is, Is the evidence competent?

It is said it is not, because it is hearsay. We are not of this opinion. The rule as to evidence in contested election cases is stated in Cushing's Parliamentary Law, section 210:

"The same general rules by which courts of law are governed in regard to evidence in proceedings before them prevail also in the investigation of cases of contested elections; but inasmuch as a legislative assembly touching things appertaining to its cognizance is 'as well a council of state and court of equity and discretion as a court of law and justice,' the legal rules of evidence are generally applied by election committees more by analogy and according to their spirit than with the technical strictness of the ordinary Judicial tribunals."

"The testimony in this case" continues the minority, "is not offered to prove the bribery of individual voters, but to show the prevalence of corrupt methods in an election precinct. It is sought to throw out an election district because of general bribery. If individual acts were to be proved the poll could be easily purged by the elimination of the bribed votes, which would disappoint the object in view. It is as though one were attempting to show the general reputation to be bad. You can not do this by proof of individual acts of bad conduct. It must be done by proof of what people generally say. When you would impeach a precinct for general bribery you must prove by analogy to the rule of courts of justice the fact in the same way. The general sentiment of a community, the changing it, and the common reports of the method by which it is done, are all facts to be established as any other fact of common reputation."

The minority then cite several English cases in support of their contention, and consider a conspiracy to bribe proven.

The majority dismisses these claims as to bribery

He alleges "general bribery" against the election in precinct B, Ward 8, in the city of Toledo. To support this charge he relies on the evidence of S. Gerstmann. This witness does not attract confidence either by his antecedents or by the character of his testimony. But waiving these tests of his credibility, his testimony on the matter in issue is hearsay only, and even by that method of establishing this charge he proves nothing; in no way does he disclose either the bribers or the bribed.

It is also alleged that in this precinct on the night after the election one Gates, a Republican, paid 19 ticket peddlers from $3 to $10 each. However reprehensible this transaction may appear, the witness (Louis Johns) admits that he knows nothing of it "except from what Gates and others told him."

In the debate this question was discussed at length. In the first place the majority showed from Gerstmann's cross-examination that he refused to answer pertinent questions as to his past life, one of these questions being as to whether he had ever been in prison. Aside from attacking the credibility of the witness, the majority attacked also the nature of his testimony, as indefinite and belonging to the realm of opinion and hearsay rather than of fact.

(b) The minority assailed the return as inaccurate and invalid:

The falseness consisted in this, that there were five tickets short at the end of the count, and the judges ordered two votes to be added to every candidate, with no tickets in the box to correspond to the votes so added.

This of itself is enough to bring discredit upon this return, as no confidence is to be reposed in the acts of officers who are willing to certify under oath, in a solemn matter of that kind, that to be true which they know to be false. But with this standing alone, while we might hesitate to exclude this whole poll, we have no doubt on the subject when we consider the conduct of these officers in other particulars.

(2) Their irregularities were such as to leave the result in an uncertainty in which it is impossible to ascertain the true result. The following are the statutes of Ohio relating to the counting of the vote:

Page 2956: "At the close of the polls the poll book shall be signed by the judges and attested by clerks, and the names therein contained shall be counted and the numbers set down at the foot of the poll books in the manner hereinafter provided in the form of the poll books."

Page 2957: "Alter the poll books are signed, in the manner hereinafter provided for, the ballot boxes shall be opened, and the ballots therein contained shall be taken out, one at a time, by one of the judges, who shall read aloud distinctly, while the ticket remains in the hand, the name or names thereon contained, and then deliver it to the second judge, who shall examine the same and pass it to the third judge, who shall string it on a thread and carefully preserve it, and the same method shall be observed in respect to each of the tickets taken out of the ballot box until the number taken out of the ballot box is equal to the number of names in the poll books; and any ballots in the box in excess of the number of names on the poll books, together with the ballots strung as aforesaid, shall be deposited in the box and locked, and the box and contents delivered to the officer authorized to receive and keep the key or keys, and the box shall remain locked until the expiration of the time within which any legal notice of contest can be given, and if such notice be given shall remain locked until the trial of such contest."

The testimony shows that the poll books were not signed until after votes had been counted (p. 73 of the record). This made it impossible to do the counting as the statute prescribed. It was the intention of the law that the number of the vote should be ascertained before the counting began, in order that the judges might know the number of tickets to be taken out of the box. But in this case the number of votes was not attempted to be ascertained until the count had been finished.

The ballots were required to remain in the ballot box until the poll books had been signed and the total vote ascertained. Instead of that, immediately after the polls were closed the ballots were emptied onto the table in the room where the election had been held, and where there were 25 to 30 people present. That the ballots for several hours were away from the place in which, under the law, they ought to have been, out of the legal custody of the election officers, and exposed to the possibility of being tampered with, is clear. (See pp. 28, 29 and 68, 69 of the record.)

The statute required that the judges should take the tickets from the box one by one and read the name on each. Instead of this the tickets were arranged into four piles upon the table, from which the judges counted them by fives. The board also was illegally organized. Two of the judges were Republicans, while the third Democratic judge was a nonresident of the precinct. We think that a fair construction of the Ohio statute requires the judge to be a resident of the district in which the election is held. Both clerks were Republicans, while the law expressly provides that they should belong to different political parties.

From this it will appear that every important provision of the statute of Ohio as to conducting the election and counting the vote was violated.

It would have been singular if this misconduct had not brought confusion and uncertainty.

The majority report thus disposes of this contention:

It is also claimed that the returns from this precinct ought to be excluded because there was a discrepancy between the number of names on the poll book and the number of ballots in the box. There was one, and, perhaps two, informal counts of the votes by the judges of election, which were not satisfactory because the number of names on the poll book and the number of ballots were not equal. No two witnesses give the same estimate of this discrepancy, one putting it at 7 votes on the first count, and 3 votes on the second count; and another witness putting the difference at 4 votes. But when the votes were officially counted and tallied, it appeared that there were 4 or 5 votes short of the poll list. The judges then added 2 votes to each canditate. In this course they erred, as the committee think, but it was an immaterial error which did not affect the result.

It is also said that one of the judges did not reside in the precinct; but the statute of Ohio governing elections in the city of Toledo does not require the judges of election to reside in the precinct. It is also averred that the clerks at this precinct were not of opposite politics, but under some circumstances the two clerks may belong to the same party. The proof does not exclude this hypothesis.

It is further objected that the judges spread the tickets on the table and assorted and counted them by fives, instead of counting them one by one from the box as the statute of the State directs. But this was a mere irregularity, and could not void the election, in the absence of any evidence of fraud or corruption. We fbin that the majority of 220 returned for Mi. Romeis from this precinct ought to stand.

In the debate it was further urged on behalf of the majority that the statute as to counting the votes was mandatory rather than directory; that the officers of election were not skilled men at counting votes, and that the final discrepancy of 2 votes was not such as to demand the rejection of the entire poll of the precinct.

(2) As to alleged intimidation the majority report says:

Contestant seeks to have rejected the return from Kelleys Island, which certified a majority for his opponent of 60 votes. The ground on which this rejection is invoked is intimidation alleged to have been attempted by one Kelly towards his employees. We think the burden was on the contestant to prove that this attempt was effectual. To justify the disfranchisement of an entire precinct on this ground there ought to be some evidence to show its influence on the election. We fail to find such evidence.

The minority views say:

Section 7065 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio declares it to be a felony for an employer to threaten to withhold or reduce wages of or to dismiss from service any laborer in his employ with a view of influencing his vote.

The effect of intimidation upon the result of an election is stated in the report made by ex-Speaker Keifer in the case of Donnelly v. Washburn, already quoted.

"The rule undoubtedly is in this country that when bribery, fraud, or intimidation is so interwoven with the vote of any voting precinct that it can not be eliminated from the aggregate vote cast with certainty, the whole vote of the precinct may, and perhaps should, be rejected."

To show how the nature and extent of the intimidation practiced in this precinct, we call attention to the testimony of Norman-Kelly and the other witnesses.

Mr. Norman Kelly (p. 308):

"Q. Did you have any conversation with any of your men upon the subject of the contestant's (Mr. Hurd's) candidacy for Congress?—A. I did.

"Q. Did you have any conversation with your employees as to the subject of free trade and the effect which its adoption in this country would have upon their employment?-A. I (did, so far as my opinion on that question is concerned.

"Q. Did you say to your employees, or any of them, that the effect of the adoption of free trade would be, in your opinion, to embarrass the business in which you were engaged and they were employed?-A. I think I did.

"Q. Did you say to your employees, or any of them, that in the event of embarrassment coming to your business by the adoption of free trade and the consequent necessary reduction of the force you employed, the persons to be first discharged would be those voting for the advocates of free trade?—A. No, sir; I have never told anyone in my employ so, unconditionally.

"Q. Did you conditionally; and, if so, with what conditions?—A. I said to two or three of my employees that in case Mr. Hurd was elected to Congress and Mr. Cleveland was elected President, and if free trade was adopted in this country, the effect would to be materially injure our business, and in that event, in my opinion, we would undoubtedly require over or to exceed one-half and probably not over one-third of our present force of men, and that we thought the interest of our men was the same as our own.

"Q. What, if anything, did you say to these employees with whom you talked as to the discharge of employees in the event of a reduction being made necessary by the election of Hurd and Cleveland and the adoption of free trade?—A. I have not a distinct recollection of what I said.

"Q. Can you give it generally and in substance?—A. I said in the event of the adoption of free trade that our employees knowing that their interest was identical with our own, we would naturally expect to retain those who voted for our interest and their own."

The minority quote other testimony to show that Kelly was bitter against Hurd and that he electioneered among his men at the polls that day, and conclude:

We think this testimony clearly shows that Mr. Kelly intended to intimidate his employees, that he made the men acquainted with his purpose, and that he carried it out by his presence and conduct at the polls on election day.

It is urged by counsel for contestee that the proof does not show that the intimidation is not shown to have made the result different from what it otherwise might have been. It was claimed that contestant was bound to prove that the intimidation compelled the employees to vote for contestee.

We do not think this is the law. 'We axe of the opinion that where intimidation is practiced over men sufficient in number to affect the result the burden of proof is devolved upon him in whose interest the intimidation was done, to show that the intimidation did not affect the result. If this proof be not made, the intimidation is so interwoven with the vote that it is impossible to separate with reasonable certainty the good from the bad vote, and the whole precinct must be rejected.

The minority quote Cunningham on Elections and the Drogheda case (10 M. Hard., p. 255), The County of North Durham (20 Hard., p. 156), and the cases of Ford v. Abbott and Goode v. Platt in the House, saying of these two cases:

In these cases the poll of the precincts where the navy-yard vote was cast was thrown out on account of intimidation practiced by the officers in the yard. The burden of proof was held to be upon the contestee to show that the violation of the law had not affected the result.

The contestee has failed to show that the intimidation practiced in his interest did not affect the result, and as that intimidation was great enough to affect the majority in the precinct we are of the opinion that the return from this precinct should be excluded.

In debate it was urged in behalf of the majority report that there was no proof that the men of Kelly's force were naturally partisans of contestant or that any one of them intended to vote for him, no proof that they all did not vote for him, and no proof that a single man was influenced by Kelly's interference to vote otherwise than he would have done without it.[1]

Handling of the ballots by an unauthorized person during the count, no fraud being shown, does not vitiate the return.

In a city precinct testimony that certain names on the poll lists are unknown to the witnesses., does not justify an assumption that the voters are disqualified.

Discussion as to the proper method of deducting from the returns unsegregated illegal votes.

The House declined to declare a seat vacant on hearsay evidence as to general bribery and irregularities.

Instance wherein the House declined to seat a contestant belonging to the political party in a majority in the House.

(3) As to contestant's claim that the poll of another precinct should be rejected the majority report says;

Precinct C, Ward 3, in the city of Toledo, returned a majority of 166 for Mr. Romeis. Mr. Hurd asks that this return be excluded because he complains that one Bell, a Republican, took some of the ballots from the box and handed them to the judges while they were engaged in counting the vote. This complaint is supported by the evidence of one of the clerks of the election. It is negatived by the judges and flatly denied by BeIl. Bell had been one of the judges of election for that precinct for many previous years, and had been appointed to that office for the year of this election and had acted in that capacity at an election in the spring, but having moved out of the precinct he did not serve as judge at this election. His character seems to have been good, and he had the confidence of the judges of election. No evidence of the contestant impeaches his integrity. It is scarcely probable that he could have changed the tickets in the presence of the judges, the clerks, and of the public. It was a wrongful act or irregularity if it occurred, but under the circumstances we can not recommend the exclusion of this return.

The minority hold:

The only explanation of the conduct of Bell, as already stated, attempted was to show that the tampering with the box occurred in November. We are of opinion that contestee has failed in the explanation. The act of Bell is therefore without anything to extenuate or justify it.

In all elections the most important thing to be shown is that the votes counted were those cast. There can be no assurance of this fact, except that the ballots have been preserved in the exclusive custody of the officers charged with the duty of keeping them. Any interference with them by an unauthorized person, any handling or taking them into possession by others than the proper officers, whereby an opportunity to tamper with them and alter them has been given, will be fatal to the count unless the clearest and most satisfactory explanation has been made of the conduct of such persons. The burden is shifted to the contestee to show that what was done did not interfere with the ascertainment of the true result. This doctrine is declared in Duffy's case, supra, where it is said:

"Besides where the officers of an election board, as shown by the evidence in this case, have either, through design or ignorance, neglected to comply with some of the essential requirements of the law * * * presumption in favor of the legality, fairness, and regularity of the election predicated upon a return and tally sheet ought not to weigh heavily with a tribunal seeking to vindicate and administer the law. The burden of proof must be shifted to the other side. Those who are advantaged by such an election must show affirmatively its general fairness, otherwise it will become the duty of the court to throw it out altogether."

Here no proof was offered upon this point by contestee, except to attempt to show that the interference with the ballots by Mr. Bell occurred at the November election. This attempt having failed, the conduct of Mr. Bell remains without extenuation, indeed fuller of suspicion, because of the effort to set up a false explanation of it.

The rule of the law in disposing of a return made where the ballots have been taken from the custody of the proper officers is laid down in a case decided in the New York senate, hereafter cited.

The penalty for interference with ballots in Ohio before counting is very severe.

Section 7059 of the revised statutes provides:

"Whoever at any election, unlawfully, either by force, fraud, or other improper means, obtains or attempts to obtain possession of any ballot box, or any ballots therein deposited, while the voting at such election is going on, or before the ballots are duly taken out of such ballot box and enumerated by the judges of the election, according to law, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than three years nor less than one year."

The act here prohibited is not merely the fraudulent taking possession of ballots, but the illegal taking of them by any improper means. This shows the view in which the Ohio statute holds the giving of any opportunity to unauthorized persons to tamper with the votes.

The New York case above referred to is the case of Cary v. Twombly (New York Contested Election Cases, p. 474).

(4) The final objection of contestant is disposed of by the majority as follows:

The contestant insists that very many illegal votes were cast in the various precincts of the city of Toledo. Comparing the poll books of the October election, out of which this contest arose, with the poll books of the Presidential election in November (which were in the possession of the city clerk), he seems to have found the names of several hundred persons who voted in October but did not vote in November. With this information used as a basis of inquiry, he undertook to prove by certain witnesses that these persons were not known to the witnesses, or were not resident in the wards in which they seem to have voted. This mode of impeaching votes may be useful in country precincts, in small towns and villages, where each resident is known to almost every other resident, but in a busy and crowded city it can not be safe, however great the opportunities of the witnesses.

In the city of Toledo a large part of the population consists of foreigners. The officers of election, who in a given case may be native citizens, have to take the strange names of naturalized citizens, and in another case, naturalized citizens, acting as officers of election, have to take the names, equally strange to them, of native citizens.

The majority then go on to give illustrations of names misspelled on the poll books in such ways that the name of one man by the various spellings seemed to be the names of different men. And the majority conclude:

The poll books, it is obvious, under these conditions would be very misleading.

Much of the evidence on this branch of the case consists of statements and declarations of other persons, proven by the witnesses, and of conclusions drawn by the witnesses from these statements and declarations. The contestant contends that declarations of this character are competent to show the disqualification of voters, but not competent to establish their right to vote. Without commenting on this apparent inconsistency, we regard this evidence as hearsay and inadmissible for any purpose.

The contestant claims, as the result of this proof, that he has shown that 291 illegal voters cast their ballots in the city of Toledo, but admits that he has not shown for whom these unlawful ballots were cast. He insists, nevertheless, that these votes should be deducted from the majorities of the sitting Member and of the contestant in the various precincts, and by this arbitrary method he would take from Mr. Romeis 135 and from himself 56. By this process he reaches a result which makes a difference of 79 votes in his favor and against his competitor. We can not sanction this treatment of illegal votes. In the absence of any proof as to how they were cast, we think that they should not be deducted from either candidate, or, if deducted at all, should be taken from all the candidates, including the Prohibition candidate, in the several precincts where they were cast, in the proportion of the actual votes counted for each of the candidates in each precinct. This latter mode of elimination would not affect the result.

The minority say:

Lists were prepared of the names of these voters and put into the hands of people living in the precinct. These persons were placed upon the stand to testify as to whether those whose names had been given them were electors or not in the precincts where they had voted. The witnesses called upon from each precinct were persons who were residents, had in some cases lived many years there, and in many cases had been born there; were acquainted with the people; had been doing business with them, and had held offices, such as assessors and councilmen, among them. Besides, they had taken the lists and called in from the neighborhood a number of prominent persons from every part of it to consider the names. They made comparison with the directory, and in most cases went personally from house to house to learn whether the parties were voters.

With this information, possessed as to each precinct, the witnesses went upon the stand and testified that the 347 persons were not residents of the precinct at the time of October election and were not legal voters there at that time. This testimony will be found on pages 18, 20, 22, 24, 26, 31, 40, 47, 50, 53, 56, 60, 62, 64, 82, 84, 89, 93, 102, 106, 108, 111, and 113.

This testimony is entirely competent and always makes out a prima facie case against the votes claimed to be illegal. This doctrine is well settled.

After quoting from the case of Blair v. Barrett and McCrary, especially the latter, to show that proof of the above kind shifted the burden to the parties desiring the challenged votes to be counted, the minority continue by saying that sitting Member recognized the force of this rule and undertook to show that the votes were legal. The minority then say as to the votes alleged to be illegal:

It is admitted that there is no evidence to prove for whom these votes were given.

The question thus directly presented is, What disposition shall be made in a contested election of illegal votes where there is no proof as to how they were cast.

McCrary says that there are three methods of disposing of such votes. These are—

(1) To declare the election void; i. e., the election at the precinct where the illegal votes were cast; (2) to subtract the votes from each proportionally, and (3) to deduct them from the majority.

In disposing of these ballots we think that each precinct should take care of its own illegal vote. Where an election is declared void, it should be that held in the precinct where the illegal votes are cast. This is the rule laid down in the case of Goode v. Platt (p. 679):

"When illegal or fraudulent votes have been proven, and the poll can not be purged with reasonable certainty, the whole vote must be rejected."

When the illegal votes are not numerous enough to change the result in the precinct, they must either be subtracted from the candidates proportionally or deducted from the majority.

The first method is unsatisfactory. It is practically dividing the illegal votes between the candidates, upon the principle that the illegal voters have voted as the lawful voters did. This not a fair presumption, as from the fact that large numbers of illegal votes are cast in a precinct, it may well be inferred that it was intended by those who cast them to prevent the natural division of the votes from being effectual. Besides, when the majority in a precinct for a candidate is small, it would require a very large illegal vote to affect the result; i. e., under this rule large numbers of illegal votes could be cast with impunity, providing they left only a small majority for the successful candidate.

We think that the rule of deducting the votes from the majority candidate in each precinct is the correct one. It is on this theory only that the election can be avoided where there are enough illegal votes to affect the result.

It will make each candidate take care of his own precinct. It will make it for the interest of judges to prevent illegal votes which may injure their friends. It will cause that candidate to lose the votes who through his friends might have prevented their being cast.

This rule is approved in the case of Le Moine v. Farwell (Digest of 1871, p. 442), and Goode v. Platt (Digest of 1871, p. 686).

In Commonwealth v. McCloskey (Brightley's Cases, p. 211); in Marblehead case, reported in Cushing's Man. Election Cases, and in In v. Duffy (4 Brewster, p. 173).

The doctrine is also approved in Massachusetts Report of Contested Election, pages 52, 63.

In the recent case of In v. Barker (10 Phil., 596), the syllabus is as follows:

"When legal and illegal votes have been counted indiscriminately and a majority have resulted in various districts, embraced in the general return, whether for one candidate or the other, the only means whereby even approximate justice may be reached is to require him for whose advantages such majority inure to lift the curse which the law has imposed upon the illegal ballots; otherwise they will be deducted from his count."

Applying this rule, we find that contestee will lose 135 votes and contestant 56, making a total of 79 votes, after the polls are purged, to be deducted from the vote of the sitting Member.

In debate it was claimed on behalf of the majority contention that the presumption from all the facts was that the voters unaccounted for were actually legal voters, and because they could not be found five months afterwards in a large city was not conclusive evidence that they had not been there.[1]

In accordance with their conclusions, the majority of the committee reported resolutions declaring sitting Member entitled to retain the seat. The minority of four Members headed by Mr. Robertson proposed the following:

Resolved, That Jacob Romeis was not elected a Member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the Tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Frank H. Hurd was elected a Member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the Tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

Another minority of two Members, Messrs. Robert S. Green, of New Jersey, and Benton J. Hall, of Iowa, came to this conclusion:

Resolved, That neither Frank H. Hurd nor Jacob Romeis was lawfully elected to the Forty-ninth Congress from the Tenth Congressional district of Ohio, nor is either of them entitled to a seat in said Congress.

[1] Speech of Mr. Payne, Record, p. 3450.

The report was debated at length on April 13 and 14,[1] and on the latter day the question was taken on a motion to substitute the first resolution of those presented by Mr. Robertson for the majority proposition, and this motion was disagreed to—yeas 105, nays 168. The second proposition of Mr. Robertson was then rejected without division.

Then the resolutions of the majority, confirming the title of sitting Member, were agreed to without division.

The contestant, Mr. Hurd, was a prominent member of the majority party in the House.

1002. The Iowa election case of Campbell v. Weaver, in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Discussion of a registration law as mandatory or directory.

Discussion as to the nature of a judicial construction of a State law as bearing on the duty of the House to accept it in an election case.

Unregistered voters having voted on the production of affidavits prescribed by law for such cases, the affidavits should be kept inviolate as in the case of ballots for a recount.

An elector having in good faith presented an affidavit in lieu of registration, and the vote having been accepted, the House declined to reject the vote because the affidavit did not meet the legal requirement.

A vote deposited in good faith by the elector, supposing himself to be registered, should not be rejected upon subsequent discovery that he was not registered.

On April 12, 1886,[2] Mr. B. J. Hall, of Iowa, from the Committee on Elections submitted the report of the majority in the Iowa case of Campbell v. Weaver.

The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 67 votes. Contestant alleged various objections to the legality of this majority, and several questions of fact were decided by the majority report; but the report and the debate in the House shows that the decision of the case turned entirely upon a single question of law. The minority views, presented by Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, state fairly the conditions under which the question arose:

> The following are in substance the sections of the Iowa code which prescribe the manner in which the registry shall be made for each election:
>
> "The township trustees and clerk shall constitute the board of registry, and shall meet annually, * * * and shall make a list of all qualified electors in their township, which shall be known as the register of elections." (Code, sec. 595.)
>
> "The register of elections shall contain the names of the voters at full length, alphabetically arranged, with residence set opposite. It shall be made from the assessor list and the poll books of the previous election, and shall be kept by the township clerk, and shall at all times be open to inspection at his office without charge. He shall, also, within two days after the adjournment of the board, post up a certified copy thereof in a conspicuous place in his office, or in such other place as the board may direct." (Code, sec. 596.)
> The board shall meet on Tuesday preceding general election to complete registry. Must give previous notice by publication; at time of meeting "they shall revise, correct, and complete the register of election, and shall hear any evidence that shall be brought before them in reference to such correction." It further provides that names may be added or stricken from the register at this meeting. (Code, sec. 597.)

These sections seem to contemplate what would appear to be a most natural result from such a method of making up the lists in the first instamce—an incomplete list of the voters in a large precinct—unless the board were aided in their duties by the appearance before them of the voters themselves, who had neglected to vote at the last election, and who were not taxpayers in the district. But this registry law does not even require the presence of the voter at the place of registry, but his name may be placed on the register if any person shall make it appear to the registry board that he is a legal voter in that precinct.

But if the name of a legally qualified voter is left off the list he still is not deprived of his vote. The following section of the statute affords him an ample and a simple remedy:

"SEC. 618. The judges in election precincts where the registry law is in force shall designate one of their number to check on the register the name of every person voting; and no vote shall be received from any person whose name does not appear there, unless he shall furnish the judges his affidavit showing that he is a qualified elector, and a sufficient reason for not appearing before the board on the day for correcting the register, and shall also prove by the affidavit of one freeholder or householder, whose name is on the register, that such affiant knows him to be a resident of that election precinct, giving his residence by street and number, if in a city or incorporated town, as the same is in such cases required to appear on the register. Said affidavits shall be kept by the judges and by them filed in the office of the township clerk, and all such affidavits may be administered by either of the judges or clerks of election."

In Oskaloosa Township it seems that the Republican committee were diligent on the days for correcting the registry and saw that the voters belonging to their party were all registered. On the other hand, it appears that the committees for the Democratic and Greenback parties made no attempt to correct the registry or to see that the names of the voters of their party were put upon the lists before the election. The result was that about 200 of the members of those parties were not registered.

These unregistered voters presented affidavits, and it was not objected that these affidavits failed to show that each of those presenting them was "a qualified elector." But it was objected that the "sufficient reason for not appearing" did not appear in them.

These affidavits alleged to be defective were of two principal classes:

First, 31 affidavits, each of which gave no reason whatever for failing to appear before the board. The majority say as to these that they were not, when produced as evidence in the case, identified by the voters, the notary public, or the judges. They were simply produced by the township clerk, into whose hands they were placed after the election. The safe custody of them was not proven, and the majority reports imply that they should have been kept and identified with the same care as ballots for a recount. But the majority say that these 31 ballots are not decisive of the case.

Second, the following cases described in the majority report:

Thirteen cases where "neglect" is assigned, and 103 where "left off the register" is assigned for not appearing before the registry board. With one or two exceptions these affidavits were presented and used in the two Oskaloosa precincts in Mahaska County. The evidence shows very conclusively that the registry list in that township was not an honest one. In its preparation it was found in unauthorized hands and at unauthorized places. Out of a voting population of about 800, about 200 names, nearly all Democrats, were omitted. Old citizens who were property holders, and had voted there for many years, found themselves unregistered, although their names must have been upon the poll lists and assessment lists. On election day the fact that 25 per cent of voters' names was omitted, and nearly all of one political party, must have created a profound impression of neglect or fraud on the part of the registry board. The evidence shows that some of the electors were so indignant and humiliated that they refused to furnish the necessary affidavit and declined to vote. In such a state of affairs the words

"neglect" and "left off the register" are pregnant with meaning, and furnish "sufficient reason" to any unbiased mind. Those terms, as thus used, do not imply "neglect" on the part of the elector, but on the part of sworn officers in whose honesty and efficiency the electors were authorized by law to depend.

The minority views deny as a matter of fact that there was anything about the registry list that was dishonest.

Discussing the single question of law, the majority report says:

The question then presents itself whether the provisions of section 618 are directory or mandatory, or partly both. It is not a case in which the vote of a nonregistered elector was received without any affidavit or proof whatever, as directed in the statute. There is no claim or pretense that the elector was not in all other respects qualified. There is no claim or pretense that any of the alleged defects or imperfections in the affidavit were the result of design or of any intent to evade or defeat the statute.

But the case is where the elector, finding himself omitted from the registration list, resorts in good faith to the second method of qualifying himself as to the method of voting; attempts to prepare, subscribe, and swear to an affidavit in compliance with the statute; presents it to the judges for inspection and examination to satisfy them of the existence of the requisite qualifications and a satisfactory reason for not appearing before the registration board; the examination is made bona fide; the judges are satisfied and the vote received. Are all of these provisions mandatory; and can such a ballot be rejected because the reason for not being registered is omitted, or may not afterwards be satisfactory to some court or person who was not a judge of election, or because of some technical mistake, or clerical omission, which, if noticed at the time, could at once have been corrected, and all question as to the legality and regularity of the vote obviated?

Little aid is derived from decisions in Iowa or elsewhere. In the case of Edmunds v. Banbury (28 Iowa, 267), the plaintiff, insisting that the registry law was unconstitutional and void and being unregistered, tendered his vote without any attempt to make the required affidavit, which being refused, he sued the judges of the election. The court held the law constitutional and that the judges were justified in refusing his vote. This was correct whether the provisions of section 618 are directory or mandatory.

In a later case, Nefzger v. R. R. (36 Id., 642), at a special township election to determine whether property should be taxed to aid in building a railroad, held without any pretense of registration, the court held that the law requiring all elections to be conducted under the registry system was mandatory and that the election was void. But this does not reach the question, for there can be no doubt that a general statute which declares that all elections shall be held under a registry system is mandatory in its general sense.

The question has arisen as to the character of the statute, wherein it provides that no vote shall be received from any person whose name does not appear on the list, unless he shall furnish an affidavit, or proof, etc. In the cases of Doerflinger v. Helmantel (21 Wis., 566); in reelection of McDonough (105 P., 490), and cases in one or two courts of interior jurisdiction, provisions of this character have been held mandatory. It has been held directly otherwise in Illinois. (See Dall v. Irwin, 78 Ill., 170; Clark v. Robinson, 88 Id., 504.)

This identical question arose in the contested election case of Curtin v. Yokum in the Forty-sixth Congress.

The report also quotes the constitution of Iowa to show that the reasoning of the majority in the case of Curtin v. Yokum would apply here:

ART. 2. SEC. 1. Every male citizen of the United States of the age of 21 who shall have been a resident of this State six months next preceding the election and of the county in which he claims his vote sixty days shall be entitled to vote at all elections which are now or hereafter may be authorized by law.

The report also cites Wheelock's case (1 Norris, 297) and the case of Lowe v. Wheeler. Citing Wheelock's case, the report says:

The highest court of judicature in Pennsylvania has declared as follows:

"The State constitution gives to every citizen possessing the qualifications prescribed the right to vote; and section 7 of the same article provides that no elector shall be deprived of the privilege of voting by reason of his name not being registered. To disfranchise all the voters of a township, as we are asked to do in his petition, the facts on which we are asked to act should show a case free from legal doubt. If we by our decision should permit the carelessness or even the fraud of officers, whose duty it is to furnish a list of voters at the elections, to defeat the election and deprive the people of the county of the officer who was elected by a majority of their votes, we would thus make the people suffer for an act in which they did not participate and which they did not sanction. In so doing, instead of punishing an officer for the violation of the election law, we practically punish the voters of the county by defeating their choice of a county officer as declared at an election. A decision of this kind would be fraught with danger by inviting unscrupulous and unprincipled persons on the eve of an important election to secrete or destroy the list of voters or other important papers in a township in which the majority may determine the result in the county."

It can not be seriously contended that the right of a single individual citizen to vote is not as securely guarded by the constitutional guaranty as that of the electors of an entire township. And it must be held that if the fraud, mistake, or omissions of a board of registry or of the judges of election could not deprive the electors of a whole precinct of their right to vote, so it could not that of a single elector. Accordingly, after much consideration in the Curtin-Yokum case, the House, whose decisions in matters of such high privilege and affecting the constitution of the House itself ought to be the highest authority in the world, decided in favor of the sitting Member, and in effect held the registry law to be directory.

The same action was had by the House in the later cue of Lowe v. Wheeler, in the Forty-seventh Congress, where it was held that when electors who are not registered are permitted to vote without challenge, their votes can not afterwards be rejected, became to do so would perpetrate a fraud upon the elector and deprive him of his vote. Thus it will be seen that the question is not a settled one, and it may be very doubtful as to the weight of authority one way or the other. But may not this conflict be reconciled in a manner entirely satisfactory and in recognition of a just rule of interpretation?

It is difficult to escape the conclusion that where a registry law requires the production of an affidavit by an unregistered elector as the condition for his voting, it is many to a certain degree and for a certain purpose. It is mandatory so far as to require good faith in its observance and to prevent its willful evasion. But the whole scope and purpose of such a law is to defeat fraud, subterfuge, and evasion, and to enable every lawful and qualified voter to vote and have his vote counted in a canvass purged of all illegal votes. The moment the operation of the registration defeats itself, operates to defraud the legal elector and defraud him of his vote, it not only ceases to be mandatory, but is quoad hoc void.

To illustrate this more fully: The law requires the registry board to enter the names of all the electors on the list. The elector, when he approaches the polls to vote, has the right to presume omnia recte acta, and that his name is properly on the list. He can not know that it is or is not there. Even though he may have appeared before the board of registry and seen his name registered, it may have been subsequently erased upon showing or fraudulently. Hence, when he comes to vote, his offer to vote is itself an inquiry whether he is registered.

The list is in the possession of the judges, and an inspection of it alone can give answer to the inquiry. The elector can not inspect it, and the law makes it the duty of the judges to answer whether the elector is registered. They may answer "yes" verbally, or silently by signs and acts, in receiving the vote. It matters not whether the elector makes the inquiry aloud, or simply by tendering the ballot; or whether the answer is aloud or by silently receiving the ballot; the effect is the same. The judges may have been mistaken in the name, or may have made the answer in fraud, intending to cause the subsequent rejection of the ballot for want of registry. There can be no question that the elector in such an instance, if correctly informed that he was not registered, could still rectify that omission and secure his vote by presenting the requisite affidavit. And the failure to give him the true information, as above supposed, would not only be a direct violation of law and a fraud on him, but deprive him of that right, and, consequently, of his vote; and the result would be the direct and immediate consequence of the conduct of the judges.

It would be a gross fraud upon the elector and deprive him of the very right which it is the whole purpose of the law to protect and subserve. The law should not bear a construction which would permit such consequences. Indeed, to that extent the law would be unconstitutional. For it may be safely asserted that where the Constitution affirmatively confers the right to vote upon the citizen, the legislature has no power to prescribe regulations that would thus entrap him and deprive him of that right.

Not any of the cases cited go to this extent. The Wisconsin case—Doerflinger v. Hilmartel—and the Pennsylvania case, in reelection of McDonough, simply hold the general doctrine that in its general sense the statute is mandatory. They simply assert that where the elector is not registered and votes as a nonregistered voter without the additional affidavit or proof, his vote must be rejected. If they are to be deemed as going farther than this they are obiter dicta and of no authority.

The elector can not be deprived of his vote except by conviction of felony. A registry law is only reasonable when it puts the elector who does not comply with it in the attitude of remaining away from the polls or refusing to vote. To register or furnish an affidavit is a reasonable regulation accompanying the act of voting. If this act is omitted or refused it is equivalent to remaining away and refusing to vote. But when this same statute deprives of his vote an elector who comes in good faith and is advised by the authorities, and believes he is registered, and whose vote is received in such manner as to deprive him of his right to rectify the omission by affidavit, it violates directly the constitutional clause conferring the right, and is to that extent void.

Hence we insist that a vote deposited in good faith by the elector, supposing himself to be registered, can not be rejected upon subsequent discovery that he was not. But where the elector is advised or knows that he is not registered, no such consequences will follow. No such fraud can be perpetrated upon him. He is not deprived of any locus penitentiae in procuring an affidavit. He knowingly violates the law, and his vote is a fmudulent one.

This your committee believe to be the true rule, and announce it as a principle. Where the elector, acting in good faith and honestly supposing himself to be registered, deposits his vote, and the same is received by the judges, it is a valid vote. But where the elector does not act in good faith and knows he is not registered his vote should be rejected.

It is worthy of consideration that the statute in question is only so far mandatory as to control the action of the judges of election. While it is a negative statute it applies to and affects the judge only. "No vote shall be received" by the judges unless the elector is registered. But suppose they do receive it. The judges might be punished. But there is no provision affecting the elector. He is not to be punished or his vote cast out.

Under the rule or principle announced above, it may sometimes be a matter of some difficulty to establish the want of good faith on the part of the nonregistered elector whose vote has been received by the judges. But most unquestionably, in the absence of other evidence, the presumption of innocence and omnia recte acta prevails in such case. The burden of the showing want of good faith must necessarily rest upon the one challenging the vote and asking its rejection.

It is quite well settled that when the elector offers his vote he must establish all legal qualifications to justify its reception. But the act of the judges in receiving it is judicial. When it has been received every presumption is in favor of its regularity and legality. Whoever seeks to cause its rejection must assume the burden of establishing the disqualifications, even to proving a negative.

"Evidence which might have been sufficient to put the voter to his explanation if challenged at the polls is not deemed sufficient to prove a vote illegal after it has been admitted." (Gooding v. Wilson, Forty-second Congress.)

"Of course some weight is to be given to the decision of the judges of election, whose province it is in the first instance to admit or exclude votes. Their action is to be presumed correct until it is shown to have been erroneous." (McCrary on Elections, sec. 372; see also Id., sec. 294; New Jersey Cases, 1 Bartlett, 24; People v. Peare, 13 N. Y., 74.)

There can be no doubt that if the foregoing views are maintained they are conclusive of the question involved in the present case. For if a ballot received from an elector who in good faith believed himself registered as required by law would be voted, still more so would it be the case where he in good faith presented an affidavit in supposed compliance with the law and the judges accepted it as sufficient.

The distinction between the essential qualifications of the elector and the mere methods or machinery of election must not be confounded. The judges of election can not by receiving a ballot give qualifications to one who is not a qualified elector. The elector, when challenged, may take the required oath as to his qualifications, and the judges then admit his vote. This will not prevent his vote from being subsequently thrown out when it is shown he was not qualified. But suppose in administering the oath by mistake some important line or sentence of the oath was omitted by the judge, would that alone cause a rejection when it appeared the oath was taken in good faith?

So, too, if regularly registered, acceptance of his ballot does not establish his real qualification. Neither does it when he votes upon affidavit. All these things are mere preliminary proofs to enable him to deposit the ballot. They are not part of his real qualifications. Hence an error or mistake in the preliminaries, when the ballot is received, will not cause its rejection.

But the statute, in so far as it provides what declarations shall be set forth in the affidavits, is directory only. And in this particular the assumption, hereinbefore rebutted, that a vote received without registration is illegal, would not control the actual question in this case. It may well be held that an affidavit is necessary, and also that a failure to comply in respect of all the statements required would not render the affidavit void. There is no prescribed formula for the affidavit. It shall show that the elector is qualified and a sufficient reason for not appearing before the registry. He shall also prove by one freeholder who is on the register that he knows him to be qualified, giving residence, etc.

Suppose there are errors or omissions in the statement, but the vote is received by the judges. What shall the proof be that will subsequently reject the vote? That the elector was not in fact a qualified elector or that he failed to "say in his affidavit" that he was a qualified elector? Shall the substance give way to the shadow? There is no doubt that the affidavit is to be submitted to the judges. They are to pass upon its compliance with the statute. Here again we find the same method of perpetrating a fraud upon the elector. The judges are to aid the elector by carefully inspecting the affidavit in the discharge of their duty, and if it does not contain the necessary allegations to so decide and by pointing out the imperfections enable the elector to rectify and perfect his proof. The law providing for affidavits was intended as a means of securing the vote, not defeating it.

In other words, the judges of election have no power to pass upon the legal and essential qualifications of the elector. They have no right or power to hear evidence or pass upon that question; but as to whether the affidavits comply with the statute, whether they show a satisfactory reason for not appearing at the registry board and contain the necessary statements, is a matter addressed to their judgment and examination; and when that judgment has allowed and received the vote it is final. The proof has been sufficient to justify the reception of the ballot, and thenceforward the only question that can be raised must relate to the essential qualifications of the voter. Of course it is not necessary to add that this proposition may be modified by the proviso that the paper offered as an affidavit is intended as such in good faith, and is not palpably an evasion or subterfuge.

The minority contended that the courts of Iowa had passed on the registration law and declared it mandatory, and say:

Congress has never reversed the decision of a State court as to the constitutionality and force of its own enactment.

But in debate it was denied that this was so, a Member arguing for the majority report saying: [1]

The State of Iowa in dicta has so decided; but the direct question involved in this case was not presented for decision, otherwise I should feel bound to follow the judgment of that case.

The minority discuss the cases of Edmunds v. Barnburry (28 Iowa, 267); Nefzgar v. R. R. Co. (36 Iowa, 642); in re Election of McDonnough (105 Pa., 490); Doerflinger v. Helmantel (21 Wis., 566), and two Illinois cases (78 Ill., 170, and 88 Ill., 504); and conclude:

After a review of all the cases we find it impossible, as it seems to be "difficult" for the majority (p. 7, majority report), to escape the conclusion that this registry law, requiring the "furnishing of an affidavit "by an unregistered voter as a condition for his voting, is mandatory. And we believe that it is mandatory upon all. It is the condition precedent—"no vote shall be received," etc. There is no middle ground.

It is not denied that this rule may sometimes work hardships and even deprive the honest elector of his right of suffrage. What law is there which is not obnoxious to the same charge? Ignorance will pervert and set at naught the most perfect laws. If the plea of ignorance were allowed as an excuse many salutary laws would be practically annulled.

In Oskaloosa Township 31 voters presented affidavits, in which there were no reasons given for not appearing before the board on the day for correcting the registry. These affidavits are all in the same form, and the following is a sample of the whole:

STATE OF IOWA, Mahaska County, ss:

I, Walter Mitchell, on oath do say that I am a resident of West Oskaloosa Township, county of Mahaska and State of Iowa; that I am a citizen of the United States; that I am twenty-one years of age; that I have resided in the State of Iowa six months, and county of Mahaska sixty days last preceding this election; that I have not voted in this election, and the reason my name does not appear on the register list is Walter C. Mitchell.

In the same township 103 gave as a reason "left off the register." This is a sample of these affidavits:

STATE OF IOWA, Mahaska County, ss:

I, Walter Hunter, on oath do say that I am a resident of West Oskaloosa Township, county of Mahaska and State of Iowa; that I am a citizen of the United States; that I am twenty-one years of age; that I have resided in the State of Iowa six months, and county of Mahaska sixty days last preceding this election; that I have not voted in this election, and the reason my name does not appear on the register list is left off registry.

WALTER HUNTER.

It is conceded that all these affidavits were presented by Democrats, and upon them the affiants were permitted to vote. We maintain that all these votes should be deducted from the count of votes for the sitting Member. If we are right in our conclusions that this statute is mandatory, there cam be no doubt as to the rejection of the 31 votes where no excuse is given. But is it not equally true of the 103 voters who say that the reason they did not appear is "left off the register?" Can this, by any process of construction, be made to furnish an excuse? We will not go into the question as to who is to judge of the sufficiency of the excuse, or whether it is competent for the House to reverse a decision of the judges where any excuse is furnished; but in this instance we maintain that the words "left off the register" furnish no excuse for the nonappearance, and that there is nothing for the judges of election to act upon. It appears to us impossible to spell out an excuse from these words.

The majority of the committee, in their report, after a labored argument, at page 8 say:

"This your committee believe to be the true rule, and announce it as a principle: Where the elector, acting in good faith and honestly supposing himself to be registered, deposits his vote, and the same is received by the judges, it is a valid vote. But where the elector does not act in good faith and knows he is not registered his vote should be rejected."

But that principle, if correct, does not affect this contest. In this case the voter knew that he was not registered; hence his affidavit. He knew the law and that it was necessary to furnish the affidavit, presenting all the facts essential for the judges of election to act upon. He was not deceived by the judges as to any fact peculiarly within their knowledge; he knew that he was not registered as well as they; he knew that he must present a reason as well as they, for he was bound to know the law. And hence the reasoning in the majority report, as in the Illinois cases, is inapplicable to this case. It is impossible to work out any deception or fraud in this case from the evidence.

It is true that the unbiased mind must come reluctantly to a conclusion that would disfranchise a voter for the single reason that he had failed to comply with the registry law. And yet it is our duty to uphold the laws. Even were we convinced that the law was a bad one, our duty would be the same. But there are no more commendable laws upon the statute book than these same registry laws. No laws have done more to guard the purity of the ballot box than these same laws. In every State where they are in force they have thrown up a bulwark against fraud and dishonest voting that human ingenuity has seldom been able to compass. Any construction that weakens their force or construes away their mandatory character is a step backward and should not be adopted, unless plainly required by the well-settled rules of construction. It should be our aim to enforce these salutary measures to their full intent and meaning. If we enforce them in this case we can reach no other conclusion than that the contestant is entitled to the seat now held by the contestee.

In accordance with their conclusions the majority offered these resolutions:

Resolved, That Frank T. Campbell was not elected to a seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a Member from the Sixth Congressional district of the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That James B. Weaver was elected and is entitled to retain his seat in the Forty-ninth Congress as a Member from the Sixth Congressional district of the State of Iowa.

The minority presented resolutions declaring contestant elected.

On May 4[1] the report was debated at length, and then without division the minority resolutions were disagreed to, and the resolutions offered by the majority were agreed to.

1003. The Rhode Island election case of Page v. Pirce, in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Although a contestant had accepted and held a State office in violation of the State constitution if he were really elected a Congressman, the House did not treat his contest as abated.

Testimony being taken after the legal time against returned Member's protest, but under color of a disputed oral agreement of counsel, the House declined to dismiss the contest.

Where contestant had taken testimony irregularly, the House gave returned Member additional time to cross-examine witnesses who had already testified and to take rebuttal evidence.

On April 14, 1886,[2] Mr. R. S. Green, of New Jersey, presented the report of the majority of the committee in the Rhode Island case of Page v. Pirce. The law of Rhode Island required for election a majority over all other candidates.

The facts as to the phase of the contest involved in this examination were thus set forth in the minority views presented by Mr. Frederick D. Ely, of Massachusetts:

This contest concerns the Second Congressional district of Rhode Island. The election returns legally made show that Pirce received 7,746 votes; that Page received 5,995 votes; that Alfred B. Chadsey received 1,500 votes; and that other persons received 235 votes. Pirce received 1,751 votes over Page and 16 votes over all. Page does not appear in this case as a citizen claiming that the election was void, but as a contestant, claiming that he was duly elected in Congress from said district. At the date of the November election, 1884, Page was a member of the senate of Rhode Island, and continued to hold his seat in said senate and act and vote as a member of said senate after the 4th day of March, 1885, and after that date, in April, 1885, became a candidate for reelection, was elected a member of said senate, accepted the office, and has been since his said election, and during this session of Congress, acting and voting as a member of said senate, all in contravention and violation of the constitution of the State of Rhode Island, if he is and has been, since the 4th day of March, 1985, as he now claim and asks this House to declare, a Representative in Congress from his State.

It appears that Page served his notice of contest on Pirce within the time required by law, to wit, on the 5th day of February, 1885, and Pirce answered on the 5th day of March, 1885, and on that day served his answer on Page. Page took no testimony within the time required by law, but on the 12th day of June, 1885, did notify Pirce that he should begin to take testimony on the 25th day of June, 1885, and did between said date and the 20th day of July, 1885, in the absence of Pirce and against his written protest, examine certain persons, and the questions asked and answers given have been printed in this case, with the understanding and agreement that it should not affect, impair, or prejudice Pirce's rights. Said 25th day of June was seventy-two days after Page's time for taking testimony under the statute had expired, being one hundred and twelve days from the day on which the answer of Pirce, the returned Member, was served upon Page, the contestant.

[1] Record, pp. 4138–4147; Journal, pp. 1488, 1489.

[2] First Session Forty-ninth Congress, House Report No. 1623; Mobly, p. 475.

The law limiting the time for taking testimony in contested election cases in the House of Representatives is found in section 107 of the Revised Statutes, and section 2 of chapter 119 of the Statutes of 1875.

Section 107 of the Revised Statutes is as follows, viz:

"In all contested election cases the time allowed for taking testimony shall be ninety days, and the testimony shall be taken in the following order: The contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days, the returned Member during the succeeding forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal during the remaining ten days of said period."

Section 2 of chapter 119 of the Statutes of 1875 is as follows:

"That section 107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be construed as requiring all testimony in cases of contested election to be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned Member is served upon the contestant."

Page alleges and makes oath that he made in oral agreement with Stephen A. Cooke, Jr., the attorney of Pirce, on the 9th day of March, 1885, to the effect that the testimony might be taken at any time before the meeting of Congress in December, 1885. Said Cooke, under oath, denies that he made said agreement. Page supports his affidavit by the affidavit of Frederick C. Hull, and Pirce in reply to Hull's affidavit files the affidavit of Charles C. Gray, to the effect that Hull had for some years made his headquarters at Page's office, had been employed by Page in various capacities, and derived therefrom most of his support, and that prior to the election for Congress, 1884, Hull presented at the printing office of which Gray is superintendent a written copy of a spurious Republican ticket to be used at said election; that said ticket was set up at Hull's request, and the form taken away by Hull, the name of the candidate on said spurious ticket being William H. Pirce. These affidavits are attached to the printed record in this case. It also appears that in a correspondence between Page and Cooke, Cooke informed Page on the 28th day of April, 1885, that he never made the agreement now claimed by Page, and yet Page allowed fifty-three days thereafter to elapse before he attempted to take any testimony.

After Page served his notice to take testimony on Pirce, Pirce served, on the 23d day of June, 1885, his protest against and objection to taking such testimony on Page, and notified him that he should not appear during the taking thereof in person or by attorney. Pirce seasonably appeared before the Committee on Elections and moved that this contest be dismissed, because the testimony was not taken in time.

The majority of the committee, by an inspection of the returns, concluded that the actual majority of returned Member was only 3 instead of 16.

This being the state of facts, the majority of the committee concluded:

While the committee would be inclined in ordinary cases to require that parties should strictly observe the directions of the statute, the testimony presented in this case by the contestant discloses such wholesale and open bribery, implicating even the contestee personally, that the House, in justice to its own dignity, must, in the opinion of the committee, take notice of the me. As the contestee, relying on his understanding of the agreement, abstained from cross-examination of the witnesses and from the production of evidence to contradict the case made by contestant, we recommend that time be given, as provided in the accompanying resolution:

"Resolved, That William A. Pirce, sitting Member from the Second Congressional district of Rhode Island, be allowed thirty days from the passage of this resolution within which to resubpoena and cross-examine witnesses heretofore examined by Charles H. Page, the contestant, and to take any testimony he may desire, and that ten days thereafter be allowed to said Page to take evidence in rebuttal."

The minority favor the motion of Mr. Pirce that the contest be dismissed:

In our opinion this motion should be granted. Even if the agreement were made, as claimed by Page, he has no standing before this House. Whether we regard the statutes concerning contested elections as absolutely binding on the House or as rules of procedure, neither Page nor Pirce nor both could waive or abrogate them. The House alone can do that. If Page desires the time for taking testimony to be extended, or that testimony already taken be received and considered as if taken in time, it is his duty to apply to the House, and this he has not done or attempted to do. He should also allege and prove a sufficient reason for such indulgence to him on the part of the House. This he has failed to do. If any agreement, founded on mere convenience of counsel, be sufficient, which we deny, certainly an oral agreement is not. This was decided in O'Hara v. Kitchin, in the Fortysixth Congress, five years ago, and has never been overruled or even questioned. We make one or two brief quotations from the able report of the Committee on Elections in that case and earnestly approve them as wise and just. Democrats and Republicans all join in saying:

"The evils resulting from permitting the parties, at their own convenience, to regulate the time of taking testimony, without regard to the statutes or public interest, are too serious and obvious to require comment. In any case, if such agreements axe to be regarded, they should be in writing and signed by the parties or their attorneys."

And again—

"The misunderstandings that often honestly arise from oral agreements axe alone sufficient to justify courts in insisting that none but written agreements will, if questioned, be recognized. We think it of great importance in election cases that parties should understand absolutely that all agreements in contravention of the statutes of the United States in regard to the taking of testimony, to be considered at all, should be in writing, properly signed, and made a part of the record itself."

The minority cite the decision of the committee in the case of O'Hara v. Kitchin and declare that the convenience of counsel or parties is not a sufficient reason for postponing the time for taking testimony beyond the statute limit. Therefore the minority recommended a resolution declaring Mr. Page not entitled to a seat, and a further resolution providing for an investigation into the intimidation and bribery alleged by contestant.

The report was debated at length on May 4[1] and the minority modified their proposition so as to provide for allowing the sitting Member forty days from May 12, 1886, within which to cross-examine witnesses heretofore examined by Mr. Page, and that ten days be allowed contestant to take evidence in rebuttal.

This proposition was offered as a substitute and was disagreed to, yeas 99, nays 127.

The resolution proposed by the majority was then agreed to, yeas 117, nays 78.

On January 15, 1887,[2] Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, submitted the report of the majority of the committee on the merits of the contest.

The majority report claimed that the actual majority of sitting Member was not 16 but 3. The minority denied this and presented during the debate a certificate of the secretary of State of Rhode Island giving the majority as 16. Thereupon Mr. Turner said that he would concede that the majority should be considered 16.

1004. Case of Page v. Pirce, continued.

Affidavits of persons who did not appear at cross-examination because of failure of returned Member to pay witness fees were not rejected as ex parte.

There being direct testimony of voters that they were bribed to vote against their convictions for returned Member, this fact contributed to overcome the returned majority.

[1] Record, p. 4148–4161; Journal, pp. 1489–1493.

[2] Second session Forty-ninth Congress, Report No. 3617; Mobley, p. 489.

A tinted ballot was not rejected as having a distinguishing mark when voters were not supplied with envelopes as required by law.

Influence of a highway superintendent over his employees at the polls was held to be intimidation.

In Rhode Island, in 1886, a majority vote was required for election of a Representative in Congress.

The majority report discusses the only two issues in the case, the alleged bribery and intimidation practiced in behalf of sitting Member.

(1) As to bribery.

Ten witnesses swore that they received money for their votes, but afterwards they qualified this by saying that they received payment for their time. The testimony of Charles C. Gardiner is the most direct:

Charles C. Gardiner, having been sworn, testifies as follows:

1. Q. What is your name, age, residence, and occupation?—A. My name is Charles C. Gardiner; age, 48; Natick, R. I., is my residence; occupation, weaver.

2. Q. Were you a voter in the town of Warwick in the year 1884; if so, in which voting district?—A. I was; in district No. 1.

3. Q. Were you present at the election on November 4, 1884, and did you vote for Representative to Congress at that election?—A. Yes, Sir, I was present and voted for Representative to Congress.

4. Q. For whom did you vote?—A. For Pirce.

5. Q. Did you at that election receive any money for voting the Pirce ticket?—A. I did.

6. Q. How much money did you receive?—A. Two dollars.

7. Q. Did you receive this money from a person working for the election of Pirce for Congress?—A. I did.

8. Q. Was this person who paid you this money distributing Pirce tickets at that election?—A. He gave me one of the Pirce tickets, then saw me vote, and then gave me the money. I did not see this person distribute ballots to anyone else.

CHARLES C. GARDINER.

Cross-examination of CHARLES C. GARDNER, a witness called in behalf of Charles H. Page, contestant.

BY MR. COOKE:

1. Q. When you voted for Wm. A. Pirce, as you have stated in your direct examination, did you vote according to, or contrary to, your political convictions, in the election held November 4, 1884?—A. I voted the Republican ticket. I always have voted the Republican ticket ever since I have been a voter.

2. Q. Would you have voted for Mr. Pirce at that election for Representative in Congress if you had received no money?—A. I should have voted for Chas. Page if I had received no money.

3. Q. Why would you have voted for the Democratic candidate for Congress at that election, if you had always before that time voted the Republican ticket?—A. Because it was my choice in the man.

4. Q. Do you know for whom you voted for Representative in Congress at that election?—A. Voted for Pirce.

5. Q. Did you have a very decided choice in your candidate for Congress at that election?—A. I did at first. Some of the men around there told me to vote the straight Republican ticket, and I "done" so.

6. Q. Was your choice on account of personal or political considerations?—A. It was on the question: I liked Page better than Pirce, although I had never seen either one to know who he was.

7. Q. What did you know about either of them to cause you to wish to vote contrary to your party?—A. I did not know nothing about either of them. All it was they said that Page was the best man for Congress.

8. Q. So you voted for $2 against Page notwithstanding, did you?—A. Yes, Sir.

9. Q. Why so?—A. 'Cause I needed the money.

CHARLES C. GARDINER.

The testimony of William Wilcox was presented as showing not only how he had voted for money, but how others had been paid:

6. Q. Will you please state whether you received any money as an inducement to or as pay or reward for having so voted?—A. After I voted I received $3 for voting the ticket for Mr. Pirce.

7. Q. At the time you voted did you expect to receive money for voting the Pirce ticket which you would not have expected to receive had you voted for Mr. Page?—A. No, sir.

8. Q. State how and by whom the money was paid to you. Give the particulars.—A. I don't wish to give the name of the gentleman who paid me the money at present. It was paid in Atwood's Hotel, in Warwick, Kent County, R.I.; there were probably 100 voters there waiting for money. This gentleman whom I have spoken of, and whose name I do not wish to give, paid the money in greenbacks right out of his own pocket.

9. Q. Do you know if there were any voters paid at Atwood's Hotel who had voted for Mr. Page?—A. No, sir; there was no money paid there for Mr. Page; I don't know a man who got a dollar there for voting for Mr. Page.

10. Q. In whose interest and for whose election as Representative was the person who paid the money as you have stated working?—A. In the interest of Mr. Pirce; John H. Collingwood was the managing man for Pirce at that election in Warwick.

11. Q. How came you to go down to Atwood's Hotel and join the crowd of voters, as you have stated?—A. I was called there to get my pay for voting.

12. Q. When did you first understand that you would receive some money if you voted the Pirce ticket?—A. Soon after the polls were open-probably twenty minutes.

13. Q. From your knowledge and observation, about how many voters were paid for voting for William A. Pirce at that election in the town of Warwick?—A. In our district, which is the first voting district in the town of Warwick, there were probably from 100 to 125.

WILLIAM WILLCOX.

Jinks also testified:

5. Q. How much did you receive, and where, when, and from whom? State the particulars.—A. I got $3; I received it at the office in the barn of Atwood's Hotel that night after the polls closed. I am unwilling to state the name of the person who paid it. A number of voters went up there with me. All these voters that went with me voted for Pirce. I probably saw 100 people paid the same amount that I got. This person I have spoken of had a list of our names, called them off, and we answered them, and as we went up he paid us the money out of his pocket.

6. Q. When did you first know or when were you first given to understand that you would be paid if you voted the Pirce ticket at that election?—A. This man that I have mentioned came to me two days before the election, and told me to see him before I voted and he would give me as much as there was going. He said he knew there would be money going on the Pirce ticket, and he also said a man had been to him and hired him to buy voters to vote the Pirce ticket. I saw him on election day and he took my name as I went up and voted.

7. Q. To what political party do you belong, Republican or Democratic, and for whom would you have voted at that election if there had been "no money going," as you expressed it?—A. I am a Democratic man and I voted the Republican ticket that day because I got money for doing it; otherwise I should have voted for Mr. Page.

JESSE JINKS.

On testimony like the above the majority of the committee based their conclusions as to this portion of the case.

The minority [1] contended that only 8, or at most 10, could be found who testified to anything that could be construed as an admission of bribery. The testimony of Wilcox and Jinks as to the men paid at the barn at Atwood's stable was condemned as hearsay. The minority also criticise the evidence:

Instead of considering these ex parte affidavits as in the nature of information which might justify the House in entering upon an investigation, and requiring the evidence to be taken de novo,

[1] The minority views were presented by Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois.

so that it might be entitled to the credit due to evidence lawfully taken, the House upon the recommendation of the majority of the Elections Committee, simply authorized contestee to cross-examine the witnesses whose ex parte depositions were on file, and to take testimony in his own behalf, giving him thirty days in which to do so, and to contestant ten days in which to offer testimony in rebuttal.

When it is known that a large part of the so-called testimony was in the nature of hearsay, or opinions in cases where opinions are not allowable as evidence, and that the method of examinin the witnesses, the way of putting questions so as to shape the answer, would not be tolerated in a court of justice, the necessity of applying strict rules in considering the evidence is made apparent.

Under permission of the House, given as above recited, contestee proceeded to cross-examine such of contestant's witnesses as answered to his subpoena, and to examine witnesses in his own behalf.

Several of contestant's witnesses did not appear for cross-examination at all, although duly subpoenaed, and it is upon the testimony of some of these that the decision of the case is made to turn by the majority of the committee.

In debate it was stated on behalf of the majority that the failure of witnesses to appear for cross-examination was due to the fact that sitting Member declined to pay the witness fees.

The minority also assailed the character of the witnesses and denounced them as men whose word was not to be relied on.

(2) As to intimidation, two questions arose:

(a) As to the color of the ballots the majority report says:

The contestant has also alleged in his notice of contest, and proven incontestibly, that the party managers of Mr. Pirce's candidacy used ballots printed on tinted paper easily distinguishable at the polls, and contends with much force that this device violated the secrecy of the ballot, and operated greatly to his prejudice in a district in which there are many manufacturers belonging to Mr. Pirce's party.

The statutes of Rhode Island prescribe that voting shall be by ballot, but there is no express direction as to size or color of the ballot. But the law also requires that voters shall be supplied at the voting places with envelopes in which to inclose their ballots, and uniformity of the envelopes is prescribed. For this reason, largely, we decline to recommend that these ballots for Mr. Pirce should be rejected on account of their color, it not having been shown that the envelopes were not supplied, or their use discouraged or denounced.

(b) As to alleged intimidation by employers of labor.

majority rely on the following testimony principally:

JOHN GARLAND, having been duly sworn, testifies as follows:

1. Q. What is your name, age, residence, and occupation?—A. John Garland; age, 39 years; residence, Pawtucket; occupation, teamster and contractor.

2. Q. Were you, on November 4, 1884, a qualified voter in Pawtucket, R.I.; and, if yea, how long had you been such?—A. I was, and had been ten or twelve years.

3. Q. Were you present at the polling place in said Pawtucket on that day; and, if yea, how long did you remain there?—A. I was, and I remained all day.

4. Q. What was your business at that time?—A. Foreman on the highways.

5. Q. As such foreman, did you at that time have under your superintendence and control any considerable number of employees who were voters in said Pawtucket; and, if yea, about how many?—A. I did. I can't say how many; it might be 30; it might be 50; that or more, I can't remember.

6. Q. Did you at the election held at said Pawtucket, on said 4th day of November, 1884, work to secure the election of William A. Pirce to Congress; and, if yea, at whose request did you so work?—A. I did; at the request of the town committee.

7. Q. What was the color of the ballots used on that day at said Pawtucket in voting for William A. Pirce?

(Objected to as immaterial under the laws of this State by Mr. Cooke.)

A. I couldn't remember; there was two or three colors of tickets there.

8. Q. Did the use of such colored ballots then and there in anywise intimidate voters or prevent them from voting according to their political views?

(Same objections to this question as were made by Mr. Cooke to question 4 of Harley Howard's testimony.)

A. I think they might.

9. Q. Did you as such foreman exercise or attempt to exercise any influence upon the employees whom you superintended in said highway department in reference to their voting at said election, and if yea, in what manner did you exercise or attempt to exercise such influence, and with what effect?—A. No more influence than request them to vote, and I stayed at the polls all day to see that they did vote, as I voted, for Major Pirce.

10. Q. Were the majority of such employees, your subordinates, Democrats, and would they, to your knowledge or belief, vote the Democratic ticket if not influenced to the contrary?

(Same objection made by Mr. Cooke to this question as he made to question 8.)

A. They were most of them Democrats. I believe they would have voted the Democratic ticket.

11. Q. How, as a matter of fact, did said employees vote on that day?

(Same objection made by Mr. Cooke as above.)

A. They voted as I wanted them to at any election. They voted the Republican ticket on that day

12. Q. Did any person or persons furnish you with money to be used at said election in treating voters or otherwise improperly influencing them to vote the Republican ticket, and did you treat any such voters with the money so furnished?

(Same objection as to the previous question made by Mr. Cooke.)

A. No, sir.

13. Q. Did you treat any voters on that day?

(Same objection as above and as immaterial if not done for the purpose of influencing their votes.)

A. I did.

14. Q. For what purpose did you treat them?—A. I suppose for friendship.

15. Q. Was it to influence their votes or because they had voted as you desired, and was it for the purpose of retaining your influence over them?

(Objected to by Mr. Cooke for the same reasons included in objection to question 13, and also because witness has already stated the purpose of treating them without assistance of counsel.)

A. It was because they had voted as I requested and to have the influence with them again.

16. Q. Who was the chairman of the Republican town committee of the town of Pawtucket at the time?—A. Almon K. Goodwin.

17. Q. Were you not on said day, and on all election days while you were foreman of the highway department, employed by said Goodwin to work at the polls and to remain there for the purpose of seeing that laborers on the highways voted as the Republicans wanted them to vote?

(Objected to for reasons included in objection to question 13, and also as to all matters relating to any other day than November 4, 1884. Mr. Baker insists upon the answer for the purpose of showing that such laborers knew from past experience the purpose for which the witness was stationed at the polling place.)

A. Yes.

Witness also continued with testimony indicating that men who did not vote as he wished would be liable to lose their positions.

The minority do not consider this testimony as establishing actual intimidation.

The claim that a number of voters at Pawtucket were intimidated by their employer, the overseer of highways, amounts only to a complaint that the voters allowed themselves to be influenced by the wishes, of the overseer, expressed only by a simple request that the men should vote as he did.

This claim would overthrow, if allowed, all labor to secure votes for one party or another.

If one may not ask a voter to vote his ticket, he may not make a political speech, publish a political newspaper, or dare to express an opinion in the presence of voters.

As a result of their conclusions the majority proposed the following:

Resolved, That William A. Pirce was not elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the Second Congressional district of Rhode Island, and that the seat be declared vacant.

The minority proposed as a substitute:

Resolved, That William A. Pirce was elected a Representative to Congress for the Second Congressional district of Rhode Island at the election held November 4, 1884, and is entitled to retain his seat.

The report was debated at length on January 25,[1] and on that day the question on agreeing to the substitute was decided in the negative—yeas 108, nays 130.

Then the resolution of the majority declaring the seat vacant was agreed to—yeas, 130, nays 33.

1005. The Indiana election case of Kidd v. Steele, in the Forty-ninth Congress.

The fact that an election officer before he became such had made a bet from which he withdrew before acting did not vitiate the return.

The House requires very plain evidence to presume such an interweaving of bribery in the votes as to justify rejection of the poll.

On February 21, 1887,[2] Mr. John S. Henderson, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the Indiana case of Kidd v. Steele.

The sitting Member had been returned by a plurality of 54 votes.

Two questions were raised by contestant's objections:

(1) The report describes the first thus:

The contestant insists, however, that the returns from precinct No. 2, Liberty Township, Wabash County, must be rejected for the reason that George E. Vandergrift, inspector of election at that precinct, was disqualified to act because he had an interest to the extent of $50 in a bet of $100, which George T. Rowan is alleged to have made with Ben Sweetzer to the effect that the contestee, George W. Steele, a candidate for Congress against the contestant, would be elected. It is assumed that the statutes of Indiana prescribe that no person shall be eligible as a member of the board of elections if he has anything of value bet or wagered on the result of the election.

Mr. Rowan, a witness for the contestant, testified that he received $50 from Vandegrift about two weeks before the Ohio October election, and that this money was bet for Vandegrift." That was the intention at the time." On cross-examination he stated that about a week after the bet Vandegrift came to him and wanted to be let out of the bet, as he was going to be inspector of elections, and wanted him to assume it, and that he did so, and gave him his note for $50, which was afterwards paid. It is not proven, nor even alleged, that Vandegrift had any interest in the bet at the time of the election. The vote of this precinct was 182 for Steele and 66 for Kidd. The election appears to have been fair and free from fraud or corruption of any kind. The committee agreed that the returns of this precinct ought not to be rejected.

(2) A question as to bribery.

The report says:

The contestant also insists that the returns from the first, second, and third precincts of Center Township, Grant County, should be excluded because "the proof of bribery, of the almost open and shameless purchase of votes for money by Steele and his agents is full and conclusive." The contestee resides in Center Township. This allegation requires a careful and patient investigation. The returns of these precincts show the following votes:

	Kidd.	Steele.
First precinct	103	212
Second precinct	121	307
Third precinct	199	380

As to the testimony:

Andrew Sheron testifies that Amos Six, whom he supposed lived on sitting Member's farm, offered him $3 to vote the Republican ticket. Sheron testified that he declined the offer.

Robert H. Home testified that he saw Amos Six, with whom he was acquainted, pay James Havens $5 to vote for Steele, and that he marked Havens's ticket for him, knowing that he was to receive money for it. Havens was a Democrat.

William Odom testified in reference to a conversation with sitting Member just before the election:

He then called me out to one side and said, "Here, Bill, I know you are a Democrat anyhow;" and said, "If you will support me, here is a $5 note to get the drinks on." I said, "You just give it to me and I will get the drinks anyhow, and you can tell after the election whether I supported you or not." He then gave me the $5 note. He pulled it out of his pocket and handed it to me behind him. The next time I had any conversation with him was over here on the court-house steps, at the south end. Me and Mr. Pilcher were together, and I stepped up to him (Mr. George Steele) and asked him if he had a dollar to spare. He said, "It is owing to what it is for.' I said, "That don't make any difference to you, does it, George, so we get it?" He asked me who we was. I told him it was me and Mr. Pilcher; and he said that wouldn't do me no good, would it? I said, "I don't know." He said, "If you will not forget me to-morrow I will give it to you." He then just reached down in his pocket and pulled out a roll of bills and pulled a $1 bill off of it and handed it to me. This was the night before the election. The other time was a month or six weeks before the election.

Cross-examination:

Q. Then he did not give you the $5 because of any assurance of support by you?—A. I had promised him a few minutes before that to support him, but not right at the time he gave me the $5.

Q. What act or word on the part of Steele caused you to say to him that you would give him your support?—A. I don't know as I can say just what words were used there at that time when I told him that.

Q. Then whatever was said about the $5 and whatever was done with it was said and done after your promise of support?-A. Yes; he gave it to me after I promised him my support.

Q. Then all that was said about the $5 by Steele was said after you promised him your support?—A. No, sir; I asked him for the $5 before, and he wouldn't give it to me till I did promise him my support.

William Pilcher made affidavit:

That he is a resident of Grant County and State of Indiana; that on the 4th day of November he was in the town of Marion, in said county, and that he did on said day, between the hours of opening and closing the poll, see one Charles Parker, of Marion, pay James Maxwell money and one-half pint of whisky to vote the Republican ticket at said election. And he further says that he heard Charles Brown say on said day that he had $200 of Steele's money, but he had paid it all out, but would see him (Steele) and get more; and afterwards heard Brown say that he had $30, and heard him offer the same for 7 votes, if they would vote for Steele; and he further says that on said day and between the hours above stated, he heard George Steele say to William Hubbard, in reply to said Hubbard's proposition to vote for him (Steele) if he would pay him money, that he did not dare to handle any money himself, but see Chs. Brown, Steve Smith, or Chs. Parker, and they would fix it for him.

Later when cross-examined Pilcher affirmed that he saw Charles Parker pay James Maxwell money and whisky to vote the Republican ticket; declined to answer when questioned as to the alleged remark of Brown about Steele; declined to identify his signature to the affidavit, and declared that to the best of his knowledge he did not swear to the affidavit.

An affidavit similar to that of Pilcher was also presented as from George R. Cresswell, but on examination Cresswell repudiated the affidavit.

James F. McDowell testified to conversations with Cresswell about Pilcher, which tended to give the impression that either of them might repudiate an affidavit for money. McDowell's testimony tended, but not conclusively, to show that both had made the affidavits.

Both McDowell and David Overman gave testimony tending to show that Jacob Malott had acknowledged after election that he had been induced by money from Steele to change his support from Kidd to Steele. They did not know personally whether he had done so or not.

John L. Parker, otherwise known as Charles Parker, the individual referred to in Pilcher's testimony, swore that he did not pay any money to anyone to induce him to vote the Republican ticket; but declined to testify as to his use of money at election time.

The report says of this evidence:

> This evidence, if uncontradicted, would be sufficient to authorize the rejection of the returns of these three precincts. The witnesses Pilcher and Cresswell have not testified in a plain, straightforward way. Their statements are contradictory, and can not serve one side any better than the other. (See pp. 118, 123, 916, 921.) William Pilcher (979) swears that William Odom, since he testified before Samuel Babb, the notary, made a statement to John A. Kersey that the testimony he had given before Babb was false in every particular, and that he had been hired by Mr. Overman to make the statement. George R. Cresswell (980) also testified to the same effect. It is impossible for the committee to conclude, from an impartial examination of the testimony, that "bribery had been so interwoven with the vote of these precincts that the whole return thereof should be rejected." Bribery is a heinous crime, and those who practice it should be denounced and punished. But there is not sufficient evidence in this case to warrant the rejection of the returns from the first, second, and third precincts, of Centre Township, Grant County.

After examining certain questions of fact the committee say that the contestant has failed to satisfy the committee that he received a plurality of the legal votes duly cast, and therefore they report resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

February 24[1] the House agreed to the resolutions without division.

1006. The Kentucky election case of Thobe v. Carlisle, the Speaker, in the Fiftieth Congress.

Contestant not having used due diligence in taking testimony, the House declined to extend the time therefor.

House was disinclined to extend the time of taking testimony in order to procure testimony on points not referred to in the original notice of contest.

Contestant having presented ex parte affidavits in support of his motion for further time to take testimony, returned Member was permitted to rebut with ex parte affidavits also.

[1] Journal, p. 716.

As to what contestant must show to cause the House to reopen an election case for further testimony.

The mere fact that election officers are not divided as to party is not of itself proof that the law requiring such division has been violated.

Election officers belonging to one political party only, in violation of the requirements of law, are nevertheless de facto officers.

On January 17, 1888,[1] Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority of that committee in the Kentucky case of Thobe v. Carlisle.

The sitting Member had received an official majority of 825 votes.

The notice of contest and answer, also an amended notice and an answer to that, were duly filed in this case. Thus the issues were joined between the parties.

The majority report thus gives the history of the contest:

On the 15th day of February, 1887, contestant took the testimony of three witnesses; on the 16th, of one witness; on the 17th, of three witnesses; on the 25th, of one witness; on the 26th, of one witness; on the 2d March, of one witness; and on the 3d, of one witness. Contestee, through his counsel, cross-examined the witnesses of contestant, but took no testimony himself.

On the 6th day of January, 1888, the cause came on for a hearing before the committee, when counsel for contestant argued the case upon the record, and also moved that the committee recommend to the House the appointment of a special committee to proceed to the sixth district of Kentucky and investigate the case further, or that the case be opened so that testimony might be again taken under such rules as should be prescribed by the committee. In support of this motion contestant presented and filed certain affidavits, letters, etc., copies of which accompany this report as an appendix, marked "A."

Contestee addressed a letter to the committee asking time to file affidavits in answer to those presented by contestant, whereupon the further hearing was adjourned until the 14th day of January, 1888. On that day contestee appeared by counsel and submitted affidavits, letters, etc., copies of which accompany this report as an appendix, marked "B."

Your committee first considered the motions submitted.

To excuse his failure to take testimony sustaining his notice of contest, contestant charges his attorney, L. A. Wood, esq., with being unfaithful to him; says he misled and deceived him, and intimates, if he does not charge, that said Wood, for a money consideration, "sold out" to the friends of contestee. In support of this allegation he presents the affidavits of himself and one John J. Pearce. Contestee in reply submits affidavits of L. A. Wood, esq., of Charles A. Tinley, the notary before whom the testimony was taken in Kenton County, of L. E. Wood and of John A. Goodson, an examination of which will show that contestant signally fails to establish the charge made against Wood.

Contestant avers that the case should be opened to allow him to establish the following facts:

(1) That on the evening of the day after the election contestee admitted to Horace Cambron, esq., that he, contestee, was defeated, and that said admission was published in the Evening Telegram, a newspaper published in Cincinnati, Ohio.

(2) That John A. Goodson, brother-in-law of contestee, two days after said election, admitted to Charles Easton that contestee was defeated, and the next day, on meeting said Easton again, said that "things were shaping up right, and that Carlisle would get in."

(3) That on the second day after the election there was held in the Federal Building, in the city of Covington, a conference of the friends of contestee for the purpose of determining arrangements to override and disregard the result of said election of contestant, and to the end that contestee might be declared elected.

(4) That in most of the counties of the district no tickets bearing the name of contestee were distributed before the election.

[1] First session Fiftieth Congress, House Report No 48; Mobly, p. 523.

(5) That at midnight of the day after the election a hack drove from the direction of Covington toward the residence of A. S. Berry, esq., and in a few moments returned to the comer of York and Madison streets, and three men got out of said hack and went into the office of the Kentucky State Journal, and one of these men was contestee, and another was William Hanes.

(6) That on the poll books of seven of the eight precincts in Carroll County the register of names of voters are in the same handwriting, and that the signatures of the same election officers in many of the precincts are different upon the oath and to the certificate of election.

(7) That in certain other precincts and counties there were irregularities on the part of election officers.

It might be answered to all this, that the notice of contest fails to specify as grounds of contest the acts and omissions contestant now asks leave to prove, and therefore the evidence would not be competent, even if the case were reopened. Such is the well-established rule.

"Whenever any person intends to contest an election of any member of the House he shall, within thirty days, * * * give notice in writing, to the Member whose seat he designs to contest, of his intention to contest the same; and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." (U.S. Rev. Stat., sec. 105.)

"The language of the statute is specific and admits of but one construction. The grounds of the contest which are to be insisted upon must be stated in the notice. This, of course, is to the end that the contestee may be fully advised of the nature of the case which he has to meet. The notice is the only pleading required of contestant; it is the foundation upon which the whole proceeding rests, and if the contestant could introduce one new cause of contest not mentioned therein, he could introduce any number, and the contestee could never know in advance of the taking of the testimony what issues are to be tried." (Barnes v. Adams , Forty-first Congress.)

Again, to induce the House to order a new hearing of his case, contestant must show diligence in the use of the time allowed him by statute. (Giddings v. Clark, Forty-second Congress; Howard v. Cooper, Thirty-sixth Congress; Mabson v. Oates, Forty-seventh Congress, and authorities there cited.)

Contestant took testimony on only seven of the fifty days allowed him by statute; he made no efforts to procure evidence; he avowed that he never wanted to enter into the contest, and would like now to get out of it; that he did not want to pay out money in the matter; that the labor clubs had forced him into it; that he had only lost one day's work on account of the business, and he would not pay out any money but for the imputation that had been cast upon him by his own party that he and Wood had been bought up (see evidence, Tinley). In contestant's brief, beginning on page 17, will be found this statement:

"Contestant could, had he deemed it necessary, have proven every allegation in his notice and amended notice of contest; but when contestee in his answer admitted that 1,643 votes for himself and only 210 for contestant were improperly returned and counted by the returning officers of the State of Kentucky, contestant deemed any other action upon his part would be a work of supererogation, as the taking of these votes, thus admitted to be illegally counted, from the returns, would elect contestant."

In the opinion of your committee the laches of the contestant and his counsel have been such as to preclude him from asking further indulgence of the House.

Again, the case should not be reopened, unless it appear to the House that on a new hearing the contestant would probably be able to produce evidence which would entitle him to his seat. To do this he must produce the affidavits of some of the witnesses upon whom he relies, stating what facts are within witnesses' own knowledge (Giddings v. Clark, Forty-second Congress), and it must appear that such witnesses are credible, and have opportunity of knowing whereof they speak. Let us examine this case in the light of these rules.

The majority then analyze the showing made by the affidavits and conclude:

Very careful consideration of the papers of file satisfy your committee beyond all reasonable doubt that not one of the substantial averments of contestant could be established by satisfactory proof. The committee concede the right of the House to investigate the title of the contestee to a seat even if contestant has been guilty of such negligence as to preclude him as a party, but fail to see anything in the case before us calling on the House to institute an inquiry and investigation for its own vindication or to purge itself of a Member unelected, in fact.

Mr. J. H. Rowell, Of Illinois, who filed individual views supporting the conclusion of the majority, said:

I do not think it good practice to try disputed questions of fact upon ex parte testimony. In concurring with the recommendation of the committee, that the case ought not to be reopened, I do not give my assent to the proposition that all of the affidavits presented on behalf of contestee were legitimate matters for the consideration of the committee.

The serious charge made by contestant, and supported by affidavit as furnishing conclusive reason for reopening the case, was that the returns from seven out of eight election precincts in one county were in one and the same handwriting; or, in other words, that the returns were forgeries. Standing alone and uncontradicted this charge so supported would furnish ample ground for granting the motion of contestant.

In answer to this charge the original returns were brought before the committee and completely refuted it. No amount of testimony can change the appearance of these returns. In regard to them there can be no cross-examination to test the knowledge and truthfulness of witnesses. Regarding the attack upon these returns as the vital and material point raised in the motion to reopen the case for further testimony, and considering the presentation of the original returns as legitimate and not of the same character as a counter affidavit upon disputed questions of fact, I can not see any good reason to reopen the case in order that witnesses may be examined with reference to them.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Joseph Lyman, of Iowa, and concurred in by three other members of the committee, cite in full the motion:

Motion to investigate the conduct of the election held November, 1886, for Representative in Congress from the Sixth Congressional district of Kentucky.

(1) By select committee, as was done in the case of the First and Second Congressional districts of Ohio by the Forty-sixth Congress, first session.

(2) By resolution to reopen the case and take testimony, as was done in the Forty-third Congress in cases of Lawrence v. Sypher and Davidson v. Smith.

(3) By summoning witnesses before this committee.

And then say:

The minority then felt and now feel that a case involving such grave charges of fraud should not be settled in this hasty and off-hand manner, on the mere presentation of ex parte affidavits. They therefore felt obliged to urge a fitting investigation of the case, and failing in this, three of them felt unable to vote, as they would on every personal ground have been glad to do, in favor of the sitting Member's title to his seat and for the resolutions reported by the majority of your committee.

The single point is, whether when a prima facie case is made for reopening an election case, that prima facie case be rebutted by affidavits as was done, and for the purposes of this question, we may say completely done in this instance. The minority think that in a case of such gravity as this it is highly improper to try and decide the question on ex parte showings alone. But they believe that a reasonable showing having been made by contestant, he should, in all justice and fair dealing, be allowed to establish by legal and competent evidence, if he can, these allegations, by him made, of fraud and illegality in said election.

The minority cite the cases of Sypher and Butterworth and Young as sustaining their view; but in the debate these cases were analyzed to show their difference.

The question of reopening the case was the only one on which an issue was joined, either in the committee or on the floor of the House.

A question on which the committee were united was as to a certain allegation made by contestant in his notice of contest, and admitted by sitting Member in his answer.

The report says as to this:

Without expressing an opinion as to how far as a general rule the House should be bound by or act upon any admission of a contestant or contestee in a contested election case, your committee have accepted the admission of contestee, relied upon by contestant, as if the facts thus admitted were duly proven, and considered the case accordingly.

The fourth specification of contestant is in the following words:

"(4) And for the further cause that all the officers of the said election, at all the precincts or voting places of said Trimble County, and at each and every one of them, were selected and appointed from the Democratic party and belonged to one only of the political parties in this Commonwealth, to wit, the Democratic party; that said officers of election were not so selected and appointed as that one of the judges at each place of voting was of one political party and the other judge of the other political party, and that the like difference at each place of voting between the sheriffs and clerks of election at said precincts, and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that there were sufficient numbers of persons, discreet voters, to fill said offices, residing within said several precincts, of Republicans, from which said officers of election might have been selected and appointed, as the law provides and requires.

"Whereof said election so held in said Trimble County as aforesaid was and is illegal, invalid, and null and void, and the returns thereof are likewise illegal, invalid, and void, and I therefore object and protest against the counting of same in this contest."

The answer of contestee to this specification is as follows:

"(5) For the response to the fifth specification in said notice (numbered 4), it is true that all the officers of election in said county of Trimble belonged to one political party, to wit, the Democratic party, except the clerk and one judge at Barrows precinct, in said county; but I aver that the said election was legally and fairly held and that every vote cast for you in the said county of Trimble was counted for you. There were no qualified Republican resident in any of the other precincts of said county who were willing to accept the said offices or to serve therein."

This is the admission relied upon by contestant. The statutes of Kentucky provide:

"That hereafter, so long as there are two distinctive political parties in this Commonwealth, the sheriffs, judges, and clerks of elections in all cases of elections by the people under the Constitution and laws of the United States and under the constitution and laws of Kentucky shall be so selected and appointed as that one of the judges at each place shall be of one political party and the other judge of the other or opposing political party, and that a like difference shall exist at each place of voting between the sheriff and clerk of elections: Provided, That there be a sufficient number of the members of each political party resident in the several precincts, as aforesaid, to fill said offices.

"Should the court fail to appoint such judges or clerks, or either fail to attend for thirty minutes after the time for commencing the election, or refuse to act, the sheriff shall appoint a suitable person or persons to act in his or their stead for that election."

Under these statutes, the fourth specification of the notice of contestant, and the answer of contestee two questions arise:

(1) Whether it follows from the answer of contestee that the law of Kentucky as to selection of officers of election has been violated.

(2) Whether, if the law of Kentucky has been violated in the selection of officers of election, as claimed by contestant, the election is invalid.

As to the first question:

In certain contingencies the officers of election may, without violation of law, all belong to the same political party—i.e., "if there is not a sufficient number of each political party resident in the several precincts;" if the officers appointed do not arrive upon the ground and open the polls within thirty minutes of prescribed time. The legal presumption is that the appointing officers did their duty. (McCrary on Elections, sec. 87 and case cited.) That presumption remains until overcome by proof, and before the House will find against that presumption it must appear affirmatively that there were a sufficient number of each political party resident in the several precincts to act as election officers. Contestee denies this as to some of the precincts, is silent as to others, admits it as to none. In this state of the case it is incumbent on the contestant to make proof that the appointing officer might have complied with the law and did not.

Your committee are of the opinion that it does not follow from the admission of contestee that the law of Kentucky was violated in the selection of the officers of the election.

Should the House agree with the committee in their finding on this question it would not be necessary to proceed further, but inasmuch as the other question presented has been fully considered by the House heretofore, and determined after careful investigation, your committee feel that attention should be called thereto. In the case of Barnes v. Adams, from the Eighth district of Kentucky, Forty-first Congress, one of the questions was—

"Whether an election was valid under the first act named (the act now relied on by contestant), if the officers thereof were not equally divided between the two political parties in a precinct where there were a sufficient number of persons belonging to each party to fill said offices."

The report in the case was presented by Mr. McCrary, of Iowa, and is a very able one. The committee say:

"We inquire, in the next place, what was the effect of a failure to divide election officers equally between the two political parties? We are altogether unable, consistently with our views of the law, to hold that such failure of itself avoids the election. What we have said, and what we shall hereafter say, about the validity of the official acts of officers de facto applies here, for such officers are clearly of that class. Besides the statute which we have quoted, requiring an equal division of election officers between the two political parties, itself provides the penalty which shall be incurred by the persons appointing these officers if the statute is disregarded. It declares that the penalty shall be a fine of $100 for each offense of the kind. It does not declare that the election shall be set aside in such cases."

The report then proceeds to review the decisions of the courts of the various States as to the validity of the acts of an election officer who is in by color of authority, an officer de facto, and not a mere usurper. A long list of cases is cited sustaining the acts of such officers, and the report says:

"After a careful examination of the authorities the committee is satisfied that no principle of law is better settled by judicial decisions, and that no authority can be found emanating from a respectable court in conflict with those cited."

After referring to the conflicting decisions on this question by the House of Representatives, the summing up is as follows:

"The question, therefore, regarded in the light of precedent or authority alone, would stand about as follows: The judicial decisions are all to the effect that the acts of officers de facto, so far as they affect third parties or the public, in the absence of fraud, are as valid as those of an officer de jure. The decisions of the House are to some extent conflicting. The question is, therefore, a settled question in the courts of the country, and is, so fax as this House is concerned, to say the least, an open one.

"Your committee feels constrained to adhere to the law as it exists and is administered in all parts of the country, not only because of the very great authority by which it is supported, but for the further reason, as stated in the outset, that we believe the rule to be most wise and salutary. The officers of election are chosen of necessity from among all classes of the people; they are numbered in every State by thousands; they are often men unaccustomed to the formalities of legal proceedings. Omissions and mistakes in the discharge of their ministerial duties are almost inevitable. If this House shall establish the doctrine that an election is void because an officer thereof is not in all respects duly qualified, or because the same is not conducted strictly according to law, notwithstanding it may have been a fair and free election, the result will be very many contests, and, what is worse, injustice will be done in many cases. It will enable those who are so disposed to seize upon mere technicalities in order to defeat the will of the majority."

House adopted the report in Barnes v. Adams without dissent, and since that time the rule therein stated has been almost universally accepted and acted on. Your committee approve and adhere to it.

Inasmuch, therefore, as there appears nothing to impeach the fairness of the election of contestee, your committee present and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That George H. Thobe was not elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States from the Sixth district of Kentucky.

Resolved, That John G. Carlisle was duly elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States from the Sixth district of Kentucky, and is entitled to his seat.

The report was considered in the House on January 20,[1] and at the conclusion of the debate the question was taken on a proposition offered as a substitute by Mr. Lyman, that all the papers in the case be referred to a select committee, or a subcommittee of the Committee on Elections, with instructions to investigate the case carefully.

[1] Record, pp. 590–606, 610, 629; Journal, pp. 481, 489, 504.

This substitute was disagreed to—yeas 125, nay 132.

The question recurring on the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee, there appeared yeas 139, nays 3—no quorum voting. Thereupon the House adjourned.

On January 23 a quorum was obtained, and the resolutions were agreed to—yeas 164, nays 7.

1007. The Alabama election case of McDuffie v. Davidson, in the Fiftieth Congress.

The House declined to impeach a return on the testimony of a witness who distributed tickets and testified that he saw them voted in numbers greater than the returns credited.

The House declined to seat a contestant on the claim that, after rejecting the greater part of a district, he had a majority of the remainder.

As to what constitutes a general conspiracy justifying a rejection of the returns of a large part of a district.

On February 24, 1888,[1] Mr. Levi Maish, of Pennsylvania, presented from the Committee on Elections the report of the majority of that committee in the Alabama case of McDuffie v. Davidson. The vote in the district had been returned as follows: For Davidson, 14,913 votes; for McDuffie, 3,526; for Turner (colored), 2,519. The report states:

> The notice of the contestant contains seventy specifications of grounds of contest, each applying to a different precinct or polling place. No evidence was taken as to twenty-six of these precincts. Of the remaining specifications, thirty-three allege the same grounds of contest, and therefore they can be advantageously considered together.
> The grounds upon which the contestant relies in this group of precincts is that the votes were cast for the contestant but were fraudulently counted for the contestee. The several specifications vary slightly in language, but the gist of them all is that the inspectors did not count the ballots as they were cast by the voters.

The majority at the outset discuss a legal question which they hold to involve, if strictly construed, the decision of the case:

> It will be observed that in none of the specifications now under consideration is it alleged that the law has been violated in the manner of receiving the ballots, numbering them, depositing them in the boxes, sealing, or preserving them, nor that the poll lists were not properly made out and returned.
>
> It is virtually admitted that the election was fairly conducted until the officers proceeded to ascertain the result. Then it was, as is alleged, that the fraud was perpetrated.
>
> It is not pretended that the ballots were changed during the progress of the election, or afterwards, when they were counted, or that they were destroyed when falsely counted. The allegation simply is that they were so counted as to make it appear that they were cast for the contestee when they were, in point of fact, cast for the contestant.
>
> These statutes have been cited to show what provisions of law have been made in Alabama to protect the ballot box against frauds and the means of discovering them when perpetrated. It must be admitted that they are admirably designed to promote the purity of elections, and afford the best methods yet discovered for detecting frauds upon the ballot box.
>
> As will be seen, the names of the voters are written down and numbered as they vote, forming what is called the "poll list," and the ballots cast are correspondingly numbered with the number of each of the electors, so that it can easily be ascertained, when necessary, for whom the voter cast his ballot, or whether the officers of the election fraudulently substituted ballots for those cast by the voters.
>
> The statutes also provide that a statement of the number of votes received for each person, and for what office, must be made in writing and signed by the officers, and they must also accompany this statement with a certified poll list of the election and seal the same in the box furnished by the sheriff for such purpose. The ballots, also, after being counted out must be rolled up and securely sealed and labeled, and securely fastened up in the ballot box, which must also be sealed and labeled so as to show the nature of its contents and kept by one of the inspectors for the space of sixty days for the express purpose of being available as evidence in cases of contest.

All this elaborate machinery is prescribed for the express purpose of ascertaining the true result of the election and providing certain and effectual methods for discovering frauds upon the ballot box. It is, in other words, the preservation of the best evidence that the case admits of, they being the records made by the sworn officers of the election and the very facts in controversy. Yet it is a singular fact that the contestant failed to offer in evidence to establish the allegations of his notice the ballots thus preserved, and offers no reason or excuse for not doing so.

Cases of contest of election are governed by the ordinary rules of evidence. The burden of proof is upon the contestant. He can not introduce secondary evidence when primary evidence is within his reach. Especially is this so when the law expressly preserves the best evidence the case admits of for that purpose, and places it within the reach of the parties.

The majority then cite the New Jersey case, and People v. Holden (28 Cal., 123), in support of this contention, and conclude:

In regard to the precincts in question, as has already been stated, no charge was made that the ballots or poll lists were tampered with and, therefore, no evidence to impeach their integrity could lawfully be introduced under the authorities just cited. This would fairly and legally dispose of the contestant's case against him, if the errors alleged in the remaining precincts did not affect a sufficient number of votes to change the result of the election, and in a court of justice it would be so decided; but as this House, in the exercise of its constitutional power, does not always rigidly follow precedents, it was deemed proper to examine the case as if the evidence offered were admissible.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, say:

It would also seem from the character of the objections made by contestee to the examination of witnesses and from statements of counsel that it was intended to argue further that the official returns being the best evidence of the vote at an election all other testimony as to such vote is merely secondary and ought to be excluded as of no weight. The plenary power of Congress already alluded to is really a sufficient answer to this argument, which it seems hard to believe could be seriously advanced, but it may be added as entirely conclusive on this point that the precinct returns are merely prima facie evidence of the vote, and may of course be attacked, rebutted, or impeached by evidence from any source. There is, however, no need to resort to the plenary power of Congress in this case. The testimony is all regular and legal and would be admitted anywhere to rebut and impeach the official documents, for which purpose it is entirely competent.

In the debate this point was further examined. In the first place it was shown [1] that the majority report was in error in stating that the names of the voters and their ballots were numbered. This law had in fact been repealed, and therefore the minority pointed out that an important premise was removed from the argument of the majority that the ballots should have been produced. Furthermore, the minority argued that the honesty of the election officers was impeached, and that their count could not be verified by the production of ballots kept in their tainted custody.[2]

Proceeding next to the testimony which the majority consented to examine, although they had denied that it was the best evidence, and held it not to be strictly competent, it appears that the testimony on which contestant assailed the returns of the election officers was as follows:

At Liberty Hill the official returns gave Davidson 132 votes, McDuffie 31, and Turner 37. A witness, Tony Talbert, testified:

I now live in Perry County; at the time of the election I lived in Liberty Hill precinct, Dallas County. I had been living in Liberty Hill beat ten years. There was an election held in that beat on the 2d day of November, 1886, and A. C. Davidson was the Democratic candidate for Member of Congress and John V. McDuffie was the Republican candidate. I do not know who the inspectors were, or the clerks either. I reckon there was about 100 votes cast there that day. About 60 or 70 colored electors voted; the white electors were about 15 or 20.

Interrogatory. Who issued the tickets for the Republicans on that day at that beat? If you say that you issued them state how many of those tickets you issued, and state also whether or not you stationed yourself so that you could see the voter from the time that he took the ticket from you until he placed it in the hands of the inspector whose duty it was to receive it. And state how many of the identical tickets that you say you issued that you saw handed to the inspectors by the elector when he voted.

Answer. Martin Williams issued the tickets for the Republicans. I saw about 65 or 70 of those tickets issued; I did station myself so that I could see the electors from the time they received their tickets from Martin Williams until they placed them in the hands of the inspectors. I saw about 65 or 70 of the tickets issued by Martin Williams placed by the electors into the hands of the inspectors.

Interrogatory. Look at the paper handed you and say whether or not it is an exact copy of the tickets which you saw Martin Williams issue to the electors and which the electors voted. Read the paper handed you.

Answer. This is an exact copy of the ticket that Martin Williams issued, and so voted by the elector: "For Representative in the Fiftieth Congress United States, from the Fourth district of Alabama, John V. McDuffie."

Interrogatory. Do you mean to be understood as saying that, in your judgment, you saw 65 or 70 of the electors of Liberty Hill beat vote tickets the exact copy of the one that is shown to you?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Interrogatory. At what time did you go to the election on that day; and how long did you remain there during the day; and during the time that you said you were there, did you not see and converse with nearly every colored elector who voted there on that day? If yea, did you see or converse with any colored electors that day who expressed an intention to vote for any other person other than John V. McDuffie? If so, how many?

Answer. I went to the polls about 10 o'clock, and stayed there until night. I conversed with a good many of the colored electors—the most of them. I did not see or talk to any person who expressed a determination of voting for any other person than John V. McDuffie.

A witness testifying to a similar condition at Union precinct said that he was 40 or 50 yards away from the polls when he issued the tickets, but that he could and did see that they were voted.

The majority contended that such evidence was totally inadequate to overturn the presumption that the sworn officers did their duty. On the other hand, the minority showed testimony like the following:

The official returns of Valley Creek precinct gave Davidson 501, Turner 149, and McDuffie 35. W. H. Haynes testified as follows:

Q. What time did the polls open that day and what time did they close?—A. They opened between 8 and 9 and closed between 5 and 6.

Q. What were you doing there that day?—A. I was issuing Judge McDuffie tickets.

Q. How many tickets did you issue there that day, and did you see the parties to whom you issued tickets vote them?—A. I issued 100 McDuffie tickets and Alf Boyd issued 4; 1 saw 95 of the persons to whom I issued McDuffie tickets vote them, and I saw the 4 men to whom Alf Boyd issued tickets vote them.

Q. How far were you from the polling place when you gave the voters the McDuffie tickets and you saw them vote them?—A. I would meet the voters from 10 to 20 feet from the polls; ask them what ticket they wanted to vote; they would tell me they wanted McDuffie tickets. I gave them a McDuffie ticket, walked up to the polls with them, and saw them vote it, and when they voted I was not over 3 or 4 feet from the inspectors who took the tickets.

Q. Did anyone notice you watching the voters vote, and, if so, whom, and what did they say to you, if anything?—A. Mr. Ben Harrison noticed me and said to me, "Can you swear to all to whom you gave tickets voted them?"

Q. What did you say to him?—A. Very nearly all.

The supporters of the majority report, in the debate, insisted that the testimony was not sufficient, and urged that the contestant should have summoned the voters themselves to testify how they voted.[1]

The minority contended that the evidence showed a conspiracy to defraud the contestant of election, and attempted to show this by testimony to the effect that the nomination of Turner was brought about by corrupt connivance on the part of sitting Member's supporters, and that another prominent supporter of contestant had declared that they should carry the election, peaceably if they could, but by force if necessary, "and that arrangements had been made to do it."

The majority minimized the force of this testimony, and also held that it was not competent, having been introduced in rebuttal; also that no conspiracy was alleged in the notice of contest.

The minority also presented testimony to show that in some precincts more votes were cast than there were voters present or living; also that persons had voted on the names of dead men.

In conclusion the minority say:

This review of the testimony seems to the minority to show conclusively and overwhelmingly that a conspiracy to carry the election of November 2, 1886, in the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama existed and was carried out successfully in four of the five counties of the district. They have no doubt that if the vote had been honestly counted Judge McDuffie would have been returned by a large majority. Inasmuch, however, as it is impossible to tell what the exact vote was in the precincts where the returns are contested and obviously vitiated throughout by fraud, they believe that the vote from all such precincts should be thrown out and only the uncontested precincts of Lowndes County counted. Judge McDuffie lived in that county, and the conspiracy broke down among the neighbors of a man generally respected by all, without distinction of party. The uncontested precincts of Lowndes County give Judge McDuffie 2,014 votes and Davidson 362.

The minority is therefore of opinion that Judge McDuffie is entitled to his seat in the Fiftieth Congress.

The majority in the debate pointed out that the Lowndes County precincts were not the only ones unassailed, but that there were nine in Wilcox County, nine in Dallas, six in Hale, which were not assailed, and that these gave Davidson 3,385 votes, and McDuffie 208; and adding these votes to the unassailed Lowndes County vote, the sitting Member would have a majority of 1,425.[2]

It was also maintained on behalf of the majority[3] that the proposition of the minority to seat contestant on the unassailed Lowndes County vote, i.e., on a total of 2,376 votes in a district containing 20,000 voters, was an extraordinary proposition.

An election officer having committed a fraudulent act in counting ballots, the return was rejected and only votes proven aliunde were allowed.

The return being destroyed by a tampering with the ballots after the count, contestant was permitted to prove his vote aliunde by testimony of persons who saw the votes cast and tallied or estimated it.

Contestant was required to sustain charges against the correctness of the count by the ballots.

The ballots are higher and better evidence of the result than the poll lists.

Returns not signed or certified by the election officers are not admissible.

The majority of the committee made certain rulings in specific cases:

(a) As to Lowndesboro precinct:

In this precinct the evidence shows that one of the inspectors, whilst counting the ballots, put some of them in his pocket, saying as he did so that they were McDuffie tickets, and that "he was not going to let them pass." Although this allegation is not specifically set forth in the notice, the committee is of the opinion that it is substantially averred, and should have been met by the contestee, affecting, as it does, the integrity of the ballots. The official return, therefore, is set aside.

No evidence of a satisfactory character was produced to show what number of votes were cast for the contestant, excepting the few who testified for him, and stated that they were Republicans, qualified voters, and attended the election. And these, being 7 in number, are accordingly counted for him.

The contestee failed to establish his right to any votes in this precinct.

(b) As to uncontradicted evidence impeaching a return, and proof aliunde of the vote:

It is charged that at the Uniontown precinct, after the ballots were counted they were put in a bag and taken charge of by Alek Pitts, a nephew of the contestee and an officer of the election.

Pitts was not called to deny this charge, and no effort was made to controvert this evidence of tampering with the ballots. It is sufficient, in the opinion of the committee, to destroy the prima facie character of the returns. This being so, the parties were required to prove aliunde the number of votes they respectively received. The contestant called witnesses to prove certain facts, from which the committee was asked to infer the number of votes cast for him. George A. Clark testified that he issued 836 McDuffie tickets, took down the name of each voter as he delivered the ticket to him, and with the ticket held open in his hand the voter proceeded in the direction of the polling place. Other witnesses corroborated this testimony. The polls were more than 300 feet from the place where the tickets were issued by Clark, in a room on the second story of the city hall, and the inspector could not be seen receiving the ballots from outside the building. Fountain Hudson, an inspector at the election, testified that he saw about 400 of these tickets in the box. Eight colored witnesses were called who testified that they voted for the contestee. Though the evidence is very slender, yet it is the best that was produced. The committee finds, under the circumstances, that the contestant is entitled to 400 votes in this precinct and the contestee 8.4

(c) As to the comparative value of the ballots and poll list as evidence:

It was charged and established to the satisfaction of the committee that in the Walthall precinct there was a discrepancy between the poll list and the certificate of the inspectors of 21 votes. It is also charged that votes cast for the contestant were counted for the contestee. It has always been held that the ballots were higher and better evidence than the poll list [People v. Holden, supral]; and it was incumbent upon the contestant to sustain both charges in this specification by the production of the ballots. Under the evidence no additional votes can be given to the contestant in this precinct.

(d) As to St. Clair precinct:

In the St. Clair precinct the regularly appointed officers failed to open the polls, and after the hour of 9 o'clock the polls were opened by five qualified electors, one of whom was the regular inspector. The county canvassers refused to receive the returns of this poll, because the officers omitted to sign them. The action of the canvassers was in accordance with law. In the cases of Chrisman v. Anderson (1 Bart., 328) and Barns v. Adam (2 Bart., 760) it was held that returns not signed nor certified by the officers of the election were not admissible.

The evidence on which the above action was predicated was questioned by the minority in the debate.

In accordance with their conclusions of fact and law, the majority found that sitting Member had a majority of 8,890 votes over contestant, and, reported resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

The minority, apparently basing their conclusion on the uncontested precincts of Lowndes County, reported resolutions giving the seat to contestant.

The report was debated at length on March 5 and 6,[1] and on the latter day the question was taken on substituting the majority resolutions, and decided in the negative—yeas 122, nays 144.

Then the resolutions proposed by the majority were agreed to without division.

1009. The Illinois election case of Worthington v. Post in the Fiftieth Congress.

A mandatory State law providing in effect that the writing of the name of one candidate under the unscratched name of another should make the ballot void, the House did not count the vote.

The intention of the voter being clear, the House counted the ballot, although irregular in form.

A judgment of the court was held sufficient evidence that a person was disqualified as a voter by being a convict.

In determining qualifications of voter as to length of residence, either the first or last day is excluded from the reckoning.

On March 14, 1888,[2] Mr. Charles T. O'Ferrall, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the Illinois case of Worthington v. Post.

Sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 29 votes.

The objections of contestant involved the consideration of several questions of law and many questions of fact. As to the principles involved:

(1) As to irregular ballots:

The contestant claimed that there were 24 ballots which were not counted for him, either in the original count or recount to which he was entitled.

The statutes of Illinois provide that—

"If more persons are designated for any office than there are candidates to be elected * * * such part of the ballot shall not be counted for either of the candidates." (Ill. R. S., 1885, chap. 46, sec. 57.)

The committee construing this provision of the statutes of Illinois as mandatory, which construction is sustained by the decisions of the supreme court of that State, proceeded to examine the ballots referred to, 24 in number.

[2] First session Fiftieth Congress, House Report No. 1140; Mobley, p. 647.

On some of these ballots, under the words "For Representative in Congress, Tenth district," there were two names, the name of the contestee printed and the name of the contestant written with pencil. On others the name of the contestant was written under the words "For State superintendent of public instruction" and no name under the words "For Representative in Congress, Tenth district."

After a careful examination of all of these 24 ballots the committee found only 2 which, in its opinion, were legal.

One will be found on page 100 of the record, and is in the following form:

DISTRICT.

NICHOLOS E. WORTHINGTON.

The other will be found on page 104 of the record, and is in the following form:

[In pencil] NICHOLAS E.
For Representative in Congress, Tenth Congressional district.
[In pencil] WORTHINGTON.

The committee thought that the intention of the voters was clearly indicated by these ballots, and counted the same for the contestant.

(2) As to a convict's vote:

William A. Wright. He was a convict and had not been restored to citizenship. The contestant insisted in his brief that the entire record from the finding of the indictment down to the sentence must be produced. The contestee produced the judgment of the court and the committee thought that was sufficient.

(3) As to the time of residence of two men:

These men had not been in the election district thirty days before election. They did not move into the district until the 4th clay of October, 1886. The contestant says that both the 4th day of October and the 2d day of November ought to be counted. Your committee differ with the contestant, and exclude one day, which will give only twenty-nine days in district before election.

1010. The case of Worthington v. Post, continued.

Students who have left their parental homes and are relying on their own resources, with no fixed determination as to future abode, are legal voters in the college precinct.

A contestant having conceded certain votes on a construction of law at variance with the committee's, the votes were left to his credit.

An unregistered voter being required to produce an affidavit and an oral witness as to qualifications, the House, because of a defective affidavit, rejected a vote received by the election officers.

(4) As to the vote of certain students:

There were 18 votes cast by students of Knox College and Lombard University, which were claimed by contestant to be illegal; 14 of these votes were cast for contestee and 4 for contestant.

The committee, in passing upon the legality of these votes, was of the opinion that where young men had entirely severed their connection with the home of their parents, and were relying upon their own resources, efforts, and means, and had no fixed determination as to their future place of abode, they were legal voters at the point where these colleges were located; that to hold differently would be to deprive many worthy young men of the right to vote, and disfranchise them during the years they might be engaged in their laudable efforts to secure an education. With this principle in view the committee made a careful examination of each individual vote, and found that the votes of three persons, whose names are included in the above list of conceded illegal votes for contestee, did not come within the principle laid down.

(5) As to the effect of concessions by one of the parties in his brief:

The contestant in his brief conceded that 4 votes cast for him by students were illegal, but he made this concession upon a construction of the law which is not in accordance with the views entertained by the committee, and the committee has, therefore, left them to his credit.

(6) As to the technical competency of certain affidavits required of unregistered voters:

The qualifications of electors in Illinois are as follows:

"Who may vote.—Every person having resided in this State one year, in the county ninety days, and in the election district thirty days next preceding any election therein, who was an elector in this State on the 1st day of April, in the year of our Lord 1848, or obtained a certificate of naturalization before any court of record in this State prior to the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1870, or who shall be a male citizen of the United States above the age of 21 years, shall be entitled to vote at such election." (Ill. Rev. Stat., ch. 46, sec. 65.)

There is a registration provision, and where a voter presents himself and his name is not on the registry list, and his vote is challenged, the statute provides that he may make and subscribe an affidavit in the following form, which shall be retained by the judges of election and returned by them with the poll books:

"STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of ———.

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am a citizen of the United States (or that I was an elector on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1848, or that I obtained a certificate of naturalization before a court of record in this State prior to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1870, as the case may be); that I have resided in this State one year, in the county ninety days, and in this election district thirty days next preceding this election; that I now reside at (here give the particular house or place of residence, and if in a town or city, the street and number), in this election district; that I am 21 years of age and have not voted at this election; so help me God (or this I do solemnly and sincerely affirm, as the case (may be).

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this ——— day of ———, A. D. 18—.

"_____ _____."

(Sec. 69, chap. 46.)

It is also provided that—

"In addition to such an affidavit the person so challenged shall produce a witness personally known to the judges of election and resident in the precinct (or district), or who shall be proved by some legal voter of such precinct or district, known to the judges to be such, who shall take the oath following, viz:

'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am a resident of this election precinct (or district) and entitled to vote at this election, and that I have been a resident of this State for one year last passed and am well acquainted with this person whose vote is now offered; that he is an actual and bona fide resident of this election precinct (or district) and has resided herein for thirty days, as I verily believe, in this county ninety days, and in this State one year, next preceding this election.'" (Starr & Curtis's Statutes of Illinois, sec. 70, chap. 46.)

Again:

"No vote shall be received at any State election in this State if the name of the person offering to vote be not in the said register, unless the person offering to vote shall furnish to the judges of the election his affidavit, in writing, stating therein that he is an inhabitant of said district and entitled to vote therein at such election, and prove by the oath of a householder and registered voter of the district in which he offers to vote that he knows such person to be an inhabitant of the district, and if in any city, giving the residence of such person when in said district." (Part of sec. 145, chap. 46.)

There were 27 votes attacked by the contestant, cast by parties who were not registered and who were sworn in, upon the ground that the affidavits were defective. Twenty of these votes were cast for the contestee and 7 for the contestant.

The committee, after a careful consideration of these affidavits, was of the opinion that all but 5 of them were substantially within the requirements of the law. It has deducted from the vote of the contestee the 5 votes cast upon the five defective affidavits—in fact, five blank affidavits.

In accordance with their decisions the committee found a majority of 47 votes for sitting Member and reported these resolutions:

Resolved, That Nicholas E. Worthington was not elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States from the Tenth Congressional district of Illinois.

Resolved, That Philip Sidney Post was duly elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States from the Tenth Congressional district of Illinois and is entitled to a seat in the same.

On March 27 [1] these resolutions were agreed to by the House without debate or division.

1011. The Missouri election case of Frank v. Glover, in the Fiftieth Congress.

The House in determining its election cases passes on the validity of State laws under State constitutions.

On April 24, 1888,[2] Mr. John T. Heard, of Missouri, submitted the report of the Committee on Elections in the Missouri case of Frank v. Glover.

The sitting Member had a certified plurality of 100 votes.

The only question in the case was as to 249 ballots tendered for contestant, but rejected because the names of those tendering them were not on the registration lists. The report says:

The constitution of Missouri, which went into effect November 30, 1875, provides:

"The general assembly shall provide by law for the registration of all voters in cities and counties having over 100,000 inhabitants, and may provide for such registration for cities having a population exceeding 25,000 inhabitants and not exceeding 100,000, but not otherwise."

Article 9, section 7, constitution of 1875, provides:

"The general assembly shall provide, by general laws, for the organization and classification of cities and towns. * * *"

Pursuant to the above, by acts approved April 21, 1877, and May 23, 1877, the general assembly carried into effect the foregoing provision of the constitution of 1875.

"SEC. 1. All cities and towns of this State containing 100,000 inhabitants or more shall be cities of the first class."

Section 5 provides for any town becoming a city of the class to which its population would entitle it.

Session Acts, 1877, page 49, provides for registration in cities of the first class.

By Session Acts, 1877, page 250, the following law was enacted:

"SECTION 1. In all State, county, and municipal elections hereafter held in any city of this State having a population of 100,000 inhabitants or more no person shall be deprived of the right of voting at such election by reason of having failed to register: Provided, That in all cities where registration is required by law, the party offering to vote shall be, on the day of such election, registered by a special registrar of election, appointed by the judges of election for that purpose at each precinct, as a qualified voter, in a book to be kept for that purpose, and the ballot of such voter shall be received and counted at such election; and such registrar shall return to the registrar of voters of such city the list of such voters so registered within ten days after such election: Provided, The said registrars shall be sworn as provided for the recorder of voters, and the books shall contain the written or printed oath as required in the regular registration books.

"Approved March 30, 1877."

By an act "approved March 26, 1881," the general assembly provides, Session Acts, 1881, page 47:

"SECTION 1. That the act entitled 'An act to provide for the exercise of the right of voting by persons who have failed to register,' approved March 30, 1877, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

"SEC. 2. By reason of the frauds believed to have been perpetrated under the law this act seeks to repeal, and the near approach of an election in the city of St. Louis, an emergency is deemed to exist; therefore, this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

---

[1] Journal, p. 1333.

[2] First session Fiftieth Congress, House Report No. 1887; Mobley, p. 655.

The legislature of Missouri at the same session, to wit, Session Acts 1981, page 48, adopted a general registration law for the city of St. Louis.

The question really at issue is whether the registration law of 1881 is valid; the contestant's counsel claiming in the argument before the committee and in his brief that the law is unconstitutional and invalid.

Says McCrary on Elections, second edition:

"SEC. 6. While the legislature cannot add to, abridge, or alter the constitutional qualifications of voters, it may and should prescribe proper and necessary rules for the orderly exercise of the right resulting from these qualifications. * * *

"SEC. 7. The power to provide for the orderly exercise of the right of suffrage, which we have seen belongs to the State legislature, includes the power to enact registry laws and prohibit from voting persons not registered. It is now generally admitted that these laws do not add to the constitutional qualifications of voters, and are therefore not invalid. (Capon v. Foster, 12 Pick., 485; Brightley's Election Cases, 51; Hawkins v. Carroll Co., 50 Miss., 735; State v. Baker, 38 Wis., 71.)"

The committee being united in the opinion that the law is constitutional, do not consider it necessary to go further into the legal argument.

Therefore the committee reported:

Resolved, That Nathan Frank was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Missouri.

That John M. Glover was duly elected and is entitled to the seat he now holds in this House as a Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Missouri.

On June 12[1] the House agreed to the resolutions without division or debate.

1012. The California election case of Lynch v. Vandever, in the Fiftieth Congress.

In an election case the House disregards evidence in chief introduced during time for rebuttal testimony.

May 4, 1888,[2] Mr. James T. Johnston, of Indiana, submitted the report of the Committee on Elections in the California case of Lynch v. Vandever.

The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 55 votes.

The committee passed on only one question of principle:

As to the third charge, that is, the use of money by the friends of the contestee to improperly influence voters to vote for the contestee, the committee find that the evidence wholly fills to sustain the charge. The only proof offered by the contestant tending in that direction was offered in rebuttal when the contestee had no opportunity to contradict the same, and such evidence, besides being insufficient to sustain the charge, was offered in open violation of every known principle of the laws of evidence, and we hereby enter our protest against such practice before this committee in the future.

The committee recommended resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat, and on June 12[1] the House agreed to them without debate or division.

1013. The South Carolina election case of Smalls v. Elliott, in the Fiftieth Congress.

Contestant producing no legal evidence as to the return, and nothing to show that such return might not have been produced, parol evidence as to the vote was not considered.

On December 7, 1888,[3] Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, presented the report of a majority of the Committee on Elections in the South Carolina case of Smalls v. Elliott.

[1] Journal, p. 2122.

[2] First session Fiftieth Congress, House Report No. 2035; Mobley, p. 659.

[3] Second session Fiftieth Congress, House Report No. 3536; Mobley, p. 663.

The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 532 votes, which contestant assailed on the ground of frauds and irregularities. There were also countercharges of bribery and intimidation.

The examination of the case involved, besides the exploration of many questions of fact, a discussion of the following legal questions:

(1) As to the sufficiency of the proof of fraud at Pocotaligo and certain other precincts. As to Pocotaligo the report says:

> Contestant claims that there was an excess of ballots in the box when the count began of 105 or 148 votes; that only 143 votes were cast at the precinct; that the managers, after drawing out the excess in accordance with the law, returned to the commissioners of election, who are the county canvassers, the vote of this precinct as follows: Elliott, 87 votes; Smalls, 56 votes; and that the county board of canvassers in canvassing the vote of Beaufort County so counted it. Contestant then examined 118 witnesses, each swearing that he voted for Smalls, and claims from this that there was fraud on the part of the managers; that the return is impeached and should be disregarded, and that he should have counted for him the 118 votes of those sworn, and Elliott should have the remainder of 143, which, he says, was the total vote cast.
> Devaux, the Republican supervisor, and Bampfield, the son-in-law of contestant, swear they were present at the count by the managers, and that there was an excess of boots; that is, more ballots in the box than on the poll list. Bampfield says that he suggested to the managers that the proper way to do was to ascertain the number of ballots in the box, then mix them up and draw out enough to reduce the number in the box to the number on the poll list. This was done. Bampfield says the excess was 148. Devaux says the excess was 105. Devaux says that of the 105 drawn out 47 were Small's ballots. That would leave 58 Elliott ballots drawn out. There is no evidence as to who put the surplus ballots in the box. The managers were not examined. The law of South Carolina provides, "If more ballots shall be found on opening the box than there are names on the poll list, all the ballots shall be returned to the box and thoroughly mixed together, and one of the managers or the clerks shall, without seeing the ballots, draw therefrom and immediately destroy as many ballots as there are in excess of the number of names on the poll list." The drawing out of the excess of ballots seems to have been done in accordance with the law, in the presence of the Federal supervisors of election and the son-in-law of contestant, and at the suggestion of the latter.
> Contestee denies that there is any evidence as to what vote was counted by the county canvassers from this precinct.
>
> The law of South Carolina requires one of the managers of election, within three days after the election, to deliver to the commissioners of elections the poll list, the boxes containing the ballots, and a written statement of the result of the election in his precinct. The commissioners of elections, who are the county board of canvassers, on the Tuesday next following the election, after being duly sworn, shall proceed to canvass the votes of the county, shall make such statement thereof as the nature of the election requires, and shall transmit to the board of State canvassers any protest and all papers relating to the election, and, finally, after adjournment, shall by messenger transmit to the governor and secretary of state the returns, poll lists, and all papers appertaining to the election. These papers remain in the office of the secretary of state, who is the custodian thereof.
> It appears in the record that contestant offered in evidence a paper claiming it to be a copy of the poll list and return kept by the managers of election at Pocotaligo, precinct. Contestee objected to its introduction because it was not certified to be a copy of the poll list and return by any official and not proven by anyone to be such. We have this paper before us; it is clearly not the original, and is not certified by anyone as a true copy. There is no evidence in the record tending to prove that it is a correct copy. Under the circumstances your committee do not think this paper should be considered.
> The only evidence in the record as to the vote cast, counted, and returned at this precinct is that of Devaux and Bampfield. The highest and best evidence of the return, which is presumed to be on file in the office of the secretary of state, is a certified copy thereof, which was easily accessible. Your Committee are of the opinion that, in the absence of any evidence of the loss, destruction, or inaccessibility of the returns, parol evidence as to what the vote was should not be considered. This is the established rule of law, and the propriety of the rule is well illustrated in this case by the conflict in the testimony of the two witnesses by whom the number of votes cast is sought to be proven. In the absence of any legal evidence as to how the vote was counted from this precinct by the county canvassers in canvassing the vote of the county, the evidence of the voters as to how they voted is immaterial.

In the foregoing and one other precinct an excess of ballots was found. In South Carolina the voter deposits his own ballot in the box. The law says the opening in the box shall only be large enough to admit of the entry of one ballot at a time; but it is difficult to see how it could be so arranged as to prevent the voter from depositing two or more ballots at the same time if he desired to do so. The presumption is that the managers complied with the law in seeing that no ballots were in the boxes at the beginning of the election. There is nothing in the evidence that throws any light on the matter.

The minority views, signed by Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, and five others, take this position as to this precinct:

When the process of purging the box of the excess of votes was finished, the manager counted the 143 votes left and found 87 votes for Elliott (contestee) and 56 votes for Small (contestant). Now the curious part of the story comes. An examination of the record from pages 215 to 260 discloses the names and oaths of 118 men, each of whom swears he voted for Smalls. The poll list (Rec., p. 262) discloses the names of these identical 118 voters as having voted at Pocotaligo box. If 118 men whose names are on the poll list voted for Smalls, how is it that he received only 56 votes, or, in other words, how was it that 62 of his votes were stolen from him?

That the ballot box was stuffed is clear. One or two, or even a dozen surplus votes, out of a total poll of 143 votes, might by accident or carelessness get into the box, but here over a hundred extra votes were in the box. The box was stuffed. No one denies it. How was it done? Who had charge of it? Three Democratic managers, a Democratic clerk, two Democratic State constables. It was stuffed in order that the purging process might be resorted to. The fact that nearly double the proper number of ballots got into the box while in charge of the managers solely is proof so overwhelming of their deliberate fraud that their every act is tainted, and the presumption that the law ordinarily attaches to official acts, omnia proesumuntur rite acta esse, is destroyed and every act of these managers attainted with suspicion and fraud.

Why did not contestee put these Democratic officials upon the stand? Did he fear to do so? They were all within the jurisdiction. Contestee administered testimony within a stone's throw of them. Contestant charged them with fraud and crime and proved it; yet not one of them is put upon the stand to contradict or to defend. And if the sanctity attaching ordinarily to the acts of managers of an election is destroyed as to these officials, it is competent for contestant to establish the true return as best he may.

He proves 118 votes out of 143. The canvassing board gave him but 56. To his vote should be added 62 votes, and from Elliott's vote of 87 should be deducted 62 votes, leaving him 25 votes at Pocotaligo box.

1014. The case of Smalls v. Elliott, continued.

The regular returns being lost or invalidated, and not canvassed, the House took into account a statement of the United States supervisors as to the state of the vote.

As to votes received by election officers but rejected by canvassers because of mere informalities as to registration.

Although only one of the three election officers was sworn, the House overruled the State canvassers and counted the vote as cast.

Although irregularly chosen, an election officer was regarded as a de facto officer, whose acts were valid.

(2) As to proof aliunde in a case where the purity of the returns was impeached. This occurred at the Fort Motte and Adams Run precincts. The report of the majority says:

At these two precincts the election appears to have been properly held, the returns made out regularly and signed, the boxes locked and sealed, and in each case delivered to one of the managers to be carried to the county board. The Fort Motte box was carried to the office of Doctor Hydrick, a Democratic county politician, who was not one of the county canvassers, and in his absence left with a young medical student therein. Doctor Hydrick, upon his return, refused to take charge of the box. The young gentleman who had received it in his absence then carried the box to the president of the county board of canvassers, who refused to receive it because it was not delivered to them by one of the managers. The box was then deposited in the office of the probate judge of the county, where it now remains. The Adams Run box was taken by one of the managers to Waterboro, and left in the store or office of one Gruber, a man who had nothing to do with the election officially, and since that time the box: has been lost sight of. The county canvassers in making up the returns counted no votes from either of these precincts. It appears from the evidence that the supervisors at each of these precincts, at the time of the counting of the vote, made and mutually signed a paper showing the vote cast thereat.

After reproducing these papers the report says:

Your committee are of the opinion that under the circumstances of this case these returns should be received and counted.

The minority take the same view:

Of course, having no box, the canvassers made no return.

The question for the House is, Whether the fault or neglect or crime of one manager can deprive the citizens of their election and contestant of his rights under it? If so, the power of the people is gone and their right to rule through the honest ballot is lodged, in South Carolina at least, in the hands of a few men called managers. The law as laid down gives to the contestant the right to show by secondary testimony what the vote really was. (McCrary, Jaw of Elections, pp. 97, 131; 11 Mich., 362; 9 Kansas, 569.)

At this stolen box there were two Federal supervisors; one was a Republican (Bailey) and the other (Simmons) was a Democrat. These men each kept a poll list and made a return, and each signed the other's list and return.

This return is not denied. It is found at pages 531, 532, and is as follows:

"Return of the election held at Adams Run precinct, Colleton County, November 2, 1886.

"The whole number of votes given for Member of Congress was 214—of which Smalls received 177; of which Elliott received 37.

"We, the undersigned supervisors, certify that the above is a correct return of the votes cast at the election held at Adams Run precinct, of Colleton County, on the 2d day of November, 1886.

"M. W. SIMMONS,
"C. R. BAILEY,
"Supervisors."

These returns, official in their character, and attested by the Federal supervisors of each party, should be counted, and to contestant's vote must be added 177 and to contestee's vote 37.

To reject and refuse to count this return is to permit contestee to be benefited by the fault or crime of his own partisans. Nay, more, it is to permit the triumph of criminal neglect, designedly perpetrated in the interest of contestee, by which American citizens are cheated of their election. Who can afford to do this? Who can afford to be parties to it?

(3) The county and State canvassers rejected the poll at Brick Episcopal Church, under the terms of this law:

All electors of the State shall be registered as hereinafter provided; and no person shall be allowed to vote at any election hereafter to be held unless registered as herein required.

Each elector registered as aforesaid shall thereupon be furnished by the supervisor with a certificate which shall contain a statement of his age, occupation, and place of residence, as entered in the said registration book, and which certificate shall be signed by the said supervisor; and no person shall be allowed to vote at any other precinct than the one for which he is registered, nor unless he produces and exhibits to the managers of election such certificate: Provided, In case there shall be no election precinct within any township or parish, the supervisor shall designate in the certificate at which of the neighboring precincts the elector shall vote; and in case there be more than one precinct in any township or parish, the supervisor shall likewise designate in the certificate at which of the said precincts the elector shall vote. The certificate of registration shall be of the following form.

The majority quote the testimony of the supervisor of registration for the county to show that he held his books open and never refused a certificate of registration for Brick Episcopal Church, and never issued one, for there were no applications. Then the majority say:

This was a new polling precinct.

Section 5 of the act of the general assembly, No. 719, approved July 5, 1882 (17 Statutes of South Carolina, p. 1172), provides as follows:

"Whenever a new polling precinct is established by law, it shall be the duty of the supervisor of registration to transfer from the books of registration the names of such qualified voters registered at other precincts as should, under this act, register and vote at the new precincts so established, and who may request such transfer, and to make such changes as may be necessary in the certificate of registration issued to such voters, and such voters shall thereafter vote only at such precincts to which they have been thus transferred."

The chairman of the board of county canvassers says in his testimony that he refused to count the vote of this precinct "on the ground that the voters voting at that precinct were not registered there." This poll we think was properly rejected.

The minority find a state of fact which in their opinion modifies conditions:

In order to arrive at a correct understanding of the election at this box it is necessary to state that "Brick Episcopal Church" and the town of Mount Pleasant are both in Berkeley County, but 6 miles apart. The former is in the Seventh Congressional district; the latter is in the First. They are both in the same registration precinct. But voters in the town of Mount Pleasant voted there both for State and county officers, as well as for Congressman for the First district. But voters outside of the town had to vote for State and county officers at Mount Pleasant, and then go 6 miles to Brick Episcopal Church, where the polling place for Congressman from the Seventh district was held. The laws of South Carolina require separate boxes for State and county officers, and for Congressmen and Presidential electors. Sometimes these boxes axe placed conveniently near each other. In other cases, as in the one under review, the boxes were placed miles apart. Mount Pleasant and Brick Episcopal Church are in the same voting precinct, but the polling place for State officers for voters residing outside of Mount Pleasant is in Mount Pleasant, while they must travel 6 miles to vote for Congressman or President. The voter residing in Mount Pleasant is entitled to vote for State and county officers as well as Congressman at Mount Pleasant. But different registration certificates are not required. No voter is obliged under the law to have one registration certificate for Congressmen and another for State officers. He votes for all upon one certificate, though at separate boxes, often placed miles from each other.

The minority continue:

It is folly to contend that the mere establishment of a separate poll for the Federal election within the same precinct necessitated a change of registration certificate. The officer of registration should have made duplicate books containing the names of the registered voters of Mount Pleasant precinct, and one book should have been sent to Mount Pleasant for the State poll and one to Brick Episcopal Church for the Federal poll. He did not do so. He failed in his duty, and he was the partisan of contestee. He made one book, but it was retained at Mount Pleasant, where only 60 votes were cast, and denied it to Brick Episcopal Church, where 270 votes were cast. This was done by Mr. Kirk, the Democratic chairman of Federal elections. (Rec., pp. 94, 95.)

But the question for the House of Representatives to determine is whether the people shall be disfranchised for the fraud or neglect of officials. The testimony (Rec., pp. 96 to 99), shows that the managers were all Democrats; that they compelled every voter to show his certificate of registration; that no one was permitted to vote who did not produce his certificate, and that the election was fair and peaceable. We see no reason why the vote should not be counted. The certificate and not the book is the requisite. Mr. Kirk says they rejected the box "on the ground that the voters voting at that precinct were not registered for that precinct (Rec., p. 95), and in the very next breath almost admits that the "books for Mount Pleasant contained the names of those who should vote for Member of Congress at Brick Episcopal Church in the Seventh Congressional district;" and he could have taken that list in the book and compared it with the poll list from Brick Episcopal Church and verified and counted the vote as was his duty to do. Why he failed to do so we can only infer.

The vote should be counted, and to Smalls' vote should be added 267 votes, and to Elliott 3 votes.

(4) At Cedar Creek the county board rejected the box because only one of the managers was sworn. The vote was, Smalls 18, Elliott 0. The other managers were present and acting, and sitting Member admitted that the return should have been counted.

The minority views represent that only one manager failed to take the oath. The election is represented as fair and regular in all other respects. The minority consider the failure to take the oath immaterial and hold that the poll should be counted.

(5) At Griers, say the majority—the poll was opened by Jenkins, one of the managers, and two other persons appointed by the Federal supervisors. Grier was a regularly appointed manager, and reached the poll at 7 o'clock a.m. The poll was then opened; he took the place of one of the managers appointed by the Federal supervisor, and the election was thus managed to the close. The county canvassers rejected the poll because of this irregularity. It is not perfectly clear that this was wrong, but your committee are inclined to think that this poll should have been counted.

The vote was William Elliott, 4; Robert Smalls, 65.

The minority say:

The next rejected box is Griers precinct. The voting was fair, election regular; no complaint of it from any source. There were three managers, two regularly appointed and Alston, a third manager, sworn in and served in place of one who would not qualify. (See testimony of all the managers—Jenkins, p. 70–71; Grier, 666–668; Alston, 73–74; Johnson, 72–73.)

The minority further say that the third officer was a de facto officer, with color of authority.

1015. The election case of Smalls v. Elliott continued.

The House will not examine testimony as to a precinct not included in the notice of contest.

An informal poll, held by one election officer instead of three, and irregularly conducted, was rejected.

Only one legally appointed election officer presiding, and the voting being interrupted by disorder, the poll was rejected.

The House declined to order a new election because of a failure to open polls at a few places in a district, neither party being shown to be responsible therefor.

Because of a general condition of intimidation practiced by the dominant faction in a precinct, the return was rejected.

(6) As to Sandy Island, the majority say:

This precinct was not included in notice of contest, and hence the evidence referring to it should not be considered. It is well settled that a contestant can not make any points in his contest which are not in his notice of contest. (McCrary on Elections.)

(7) As to the box at Santee the majority say:

This box was rejected because only one manager held the election. The law was entirely disregarded. Poll was in open air under a tree, no space railed off, and everyone allowed to vote whether a legal voter or not. The evidence shows that the one manager allowed 25 men not registered and 34 who had changed their residence to vote. This box was properly rejected.

The minority say that not a syllable impeaches the fairness and regularity of the election, except the fact that two Democratic managers would not qualify, although they visited the polls during the day. The election was held by one regular manager, a clerk, and a Federal supervisor. The minority hold that the poll should be counted.

Discussing in full the four polls of Sandy Island, Cedar Creek, Griers, and Santee, the minority say:

But we contend that all of these votes should be counted. Let it be remembered that there is not an iota of testimony going to impeach the fairness and regular conduct of the election at these polls, the legal count, and proper return of the boxes. They stand rejected because of the failure of the full number of managers to qualify. In every instance the managers failing to qualify were the partisan friends of contestee. Now, the question is whether the voters at these boxes and the contestant shall be deprived of the result of the election because of the neglect or failure of some of the officers to do their duty. The law of South Carolina provides for three managers at each box. But it does not void the election because of the failure of three managers to serve. Hence it is only directory in so far as it provides for three managers. McCrary says:

"Irregularities are generally to be disregarded unless the statute expressly declares that they shall be fatal to an election, or unless they are such in themselves as to change or render doubtful the result." (McCrary, 2d ed., p. 186.)

The laws in relation to boxes, locks, the number of managers, clerks, etc., and the ordinary facilities of an election are mainly directory, unless the statute makes them otherwise, and an infraction of these directory provisions, in the absence of fraud, will not vitiate the election.

The minority then quote Judge Cooley, the cases of Arnold v. Lea, Cox v. Strait, and other authorities, and continue:

If South Carolina had intended that an election held by less than three managers should on that account be void, she would have said so in her statute. She did not say so; hence the law fixing the number of managers is simply directory. The State board of canvassers of South Carolina so held, because the record in this very case shows that both State and county boards canvassed and counted boxes at which there were not three managers. At Indiantown precinct, Williamsburg County there were two boxes (one for the sixth and one for the seventh district) and but two managers, or one manager for each box, yet the box was counted by both the State and county boards.

At Kingston, in the same county, there were also two boxes (one for the sixth, Dargan's district, and one for the seventh) and only three managers to the two boxes. Still it was counted by both State and county boards. At Cades precinct, the same county, was a similar state of affairs, and yet the box was counted. So much for construction by the State and county boards.

There is no proof of fraud at the four boxes under discussion—not even an allegation—nor is there a whisper of complaint that the result was affected by the fact that less than the prescribed number of managers were present.

Another fact is, that the manners who failed to serve were the partisan friends of the contestee. He now seeks to take advantage of the neglect of duty of his own friends, and that, too, without a single allegation or word of proof against the perfect integrity of the election at these boxes. He relies upon a bare technicality, occasioned by the willful neglect of duty by his own friends, and asks that hundreds of voters be disfranchised and deprived of the results of an election against the integrity of which he utters not a syllable of complaint.

Judge Cooley lays down the rule, quoted before, which he emphasizes, saying:

"This rule is an eminently proper one, and it furnishes a very satisfactory test as to what is essential and what not essential in election laws. And when a party contests an election on the ground of these or any similar irregularities, he ought to be able to show that the result was affected by them."

Now, what is the rule so recommended by this great lawyer?

"Any irregularity in conducting an election which does not deprive a legal voter of his vote or admit a disqualified voter to vote, or cast uncertainty on the result, and has not been occasioned by the agency of the party seeking to derive benefit from it, should be overlooked in a proceeding to try the right to an office depending upon the election." (Cooley, Const. Lim., pp. 618, 619.)

Now, test the question of counting these four rejected boxes by this rule. The irregularity upon which contestee asks their exclusion did not deprive a single legal voter of his right to vote, did not admit a disqualified person to vote, did not cast doubt or uncertainty upon the result, and was caused by the failure and neglect of the partisan friends of him who seeks to profit by it.

By every rule of law and of justice the votes of these four boxes should be counted, and to the vote of Smalls should be added 328 votes and to Elliott's 8 votes.

(8) A cognate question arises as to Brick Church precinct, of which the majority report says:

As to Brick Church it appears that managers were regularly appointed, but that two of them did not serve, one because he was sick, the other because he was afraid of being mobbed. Only one legally appointed manager conducted the election. It further appears that three times during the day this manager was compelled to close the polls for a time because of the riotous and violent conduct of contestant's friends; that the poll remained closed in all about thirty minutes. For these reasons both boards of managers rejected this poll.

The minority do not agree to the propriety of the rejection of this poll by the boards of canvassers, denying that there was riot or that the polls were in fact closed:

The statute of South Carolina requires the polls to be kept open from 7 a.m. to 6 p.m., "without interruption and adjournment." It does not void an election because of temporary adjournment. The purpose of the law is that all shall be given an opportunity to vote and that the eleven hours set apart for the exercise of that right shall not be curtailed. It is nowhere alleged or shown that the twenty-five minutes interruption deprived any man of the opportunity to vote or had the slightest effect upon the result of the election the one way or the other.

The law is clearly laid down in McCrary (p. 104, par. 142):

"1. If the statute fixing the hours during which the polls shall remain open expressly declares that a failure in this respect shall render the election void, it must be strictly enforced.

"2. But in the absence of such a provision in the statute it will be regarded as so far directory only as that unless the deviation from the legal hour has affected the result it will be disregarded.

"3. If the deviation from the legal hours be great or even considerable, the presumption will be that it has affected the result, and the burden to overthrow this presumption will be on him who upholds the election. But if the deviation be slight, the presumption will be that the result was not affected, and the onus will be shifted to him who attacks the election to show that the deviation did affect the result."

Such is undoubtedly the law.

In the case at bar the whole interruption was slight.

It is not pretended that the result was affected thereby.

The statutes of South Carolina do not void an election because of deviation from the hours fixed.

The evidence shows that the election was fair and peaceable.

Under this condition of law and fact, upon what principle the board of canvassers threw out the Brick Church box we are unable to see.

In argument before the committee contestee's counsel claimed that there was not a quorum of managers at Brick Church box.

This question was not raised by the contestee in his replication. But if it were we need only cite the law, which provides for three managers; that Tripp was one, and that he obtained authority to appoint others, and that under that authority he "appointed Gabriel Eddings, a Republican, and a good man." (See Tripp's testimony, Rec., 627.) Eddings served "under color of authority" at least, and was a de facto officer, and with Tripp constituted a quorum of managers present.

Up to the Forty-first Congress the authorities conflicted, but the weight of authority was as laid down in Jackson v. Wayne, to wit, that, when the law required three magistrates to preside at the election, a return by three persons, two of whom were not magistrates, was defective. In three other cases it had been held that a failure on the part of election officers to take the required oath voided the election. (McFarland v. Culpepper; Easton v. Scott; Draper v. Johnson.) In another case a precinct was thrown out because only two inspectors were present, the law requiring three. (Howard v. Cooper, I Bartlett, 375.)

The minority next quote Milliken v. Fuller, Clark v. Hall, Flanders v. Hahn, and Blair v. Barrett to show that in the absence of fraud the acts of a de facto officer of election are valid as to third persons and the public. And finally the minority quote the case of Barnes v. Adams as giving the settled law on this question.

(9) The majority thus discuss the failure to open polls:

It appears from the evidence that at several of the precincts in the district the polls were not opened, and contestant claims that such failure was designed by the political friends of contestee for the purpose of depriving him, contestant, of a large number of votes. Indeed, he claims that he was thus deprived of about 2,000 votes, and while contestant does not aver that this number of votes should be counted for him, he does insist that in the event that the committee finds that he has not a majority of the votes cast, that then a new election should be ordered. Out of the whole number of precincts in the district there was a failure to open the polls at only four. The registered voters of these precincts were but an inconsiderable part of the voters of the entire district, and unless the failure to open the polls there can be traced to the contestee, or it appears that such failure was the result of a design on the part of his political supporters to thus deprive legal voters of an opportunity to vote for contestant, under no rule of law with which your committee is acquainted could such failure of itself justify the ordering of a new election. We have very carefully considered the evidence bearing upon the points made, and find that contestee, the Democratic executive committee, and the appointing officers did all they could to secure the opening of the polls at each precinct. We further find that at some of these precincts there appear to be as many Democratic as Republican voters who were deprived of an opportunity to vote, and there is no satisfactory evidence of the number of either class who were thus deprived of the right of suffrage.

(10) The majority of the committee decided that the returned vote of Beaufort and Ladies Island precinct should be rejected because of intimidation practiced by friends of contestant. The report thus summarizes the evidence:

James G. Cole testifies, at page 542, that he was born at Woburn, Mass.; graduated at Harvard in 1862; moved to South Carolina in 1863; was Government superintendent of abandoned lands during the war, and has resided twenty-one years on Ladies Island, Beaufort County, S. C.; that ordinarily he is the only white voter on the island; that in 1886 the total vote was 206, of which 11 were cast by white men, and that contestant got 129 and contestee 77; that Ladies Island lies between Beaufort and St. Helena Island and is 1 mile from Beaufort; that most of the colored voters are landowners and taxpayers, and since 1886 have had a general tendency to vote the Democratic ticket in consequence of reduction of taxation by the Democrats, improvement of the public schools, and general security of their rights; that after the mass meeting at Beaufort in October, 1886, which the Ladies Island Democratic Club attended, and of which accounts are elsewhere given, most determined efforts were made by the Republican leaders to break up this club; that a club of women was organized to beat all men voting the Democratic ticket, and that many threats were made against Democratic men and women; that it had been announced that contestee would speak on the island the day before the election; but in consequence of many threats that he would not be allowed to speak the meeting was abandoned, although contestee was ready and anxious to attend; that prior to the election the Democratic voters were in a state of fear for their personal safety, and that there would specially be trouble on election day.

That in consequence of this, deponent distributed Democratic tickets on the night before the election himself—stayed all night with many of the voters at a house near the polls, so as to quiet their fears, and that all were instructed to be early at the polls, so as to vote as soon as the polls were opened, and to take Republican tickets from the runners for that party. That during election day many women were near the polls, armed with sticks, making a good deal of noise and disturbances, threatening talk, cursing, threats of what ought to be done and would be done with Democrats; that a Republican runner jerked from the hand of a voter a Democratic ticket which deponent had given him; that early in the campaign deponent had good reason to believe that Democrats would carry the poll, but that in consequence of this intimidation "numbers that intended voting the Democratic ticket did not vote at all, and others voted the Republican ticket." That the Democrats were specially fearful of trouble after the polls were closed, and many left the polls on that account, and for a month after the election many did not dare go out at night, and some so continued up to the date of witness's deposition; that in every contest between the parties for ten years past some Democrat had been beaten; that it required a great deal of nerve and courage, not only on Ladies Island, but at Beaufort and St. Helena (or Brick Church) for a colored man to admit that he was a Democrat,

After quoting evidence, the report continues:

The record contains much more evidence of this character, and it also contains much evidence submitted by contestant in rebuttal. Your committee find that at the precinct now under consideration almost all the voters were colored persons; that a large number of these voters were bitterly opposed to contestant, and had determined to vote for Colonel Elliott; that the leading supporters of contestant were very much incensed at this, and resorted to all means in their power to overawe and intimidate such voters and force them to vote for contestant. Colored men inclined to vote or expressing an intention to vote for contestee were rudely assailed and violently assaulted; they were threatened with expulsion from their churches; they were threatened with expulsion from the island, where many of them owned land; they were threatened with a denial of sexual intercourse with their wives; they were threatened with beating; they were cursed and abused; and this conduct on the part of the followers of contestant began early in the campaign and continued uninterruptedly down to the dosing of the polls on the day of the election. Smalls himself was a party to these acts; indeed he incited his followers to their perpetration.

After citing the testimony of those who heard contestant incite his followers to deeds of intimidation, the report calls attention to the fact that Smalls did not deny this, and continues:

Your committee venture the opinion that, in the whole history of election contests in this country, no case can be found where one of the candidates for election so openly and publicly advised and counseled his followers to perpetrate wrong and outrage upon those who supported his opponent. Without doubt many colored persons who desired to vote for Elliott were deterred from doing so through intimidation and fear of violence; how many it is hard to say. Men do not like to admit that they axe controlled by such influences, and yet we know they are. Beaufort County, the home of the contestant, was the theater of most of the violence and intimidation. The methods and practices resorted to in this county at the election in 1886 were of the same kind, only worse in character, as those resorted to by this same contestant in the same county at the election in 1876 (see Tillman v. Smalls, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, Report No. 916). Because of such violence, threats, and intimidation of voters by the contestant himself and his leading followers, your committee do not believe the vote returned at Brick Church, at Beaufort precinct, and at Ladies Island, in Beaufort County, should be counted. Your committee are reluctant to recommend the exclusion of a poll or polls, but in this case the ends of truth and justice, as well as the protection of the voter and the purity of the ballot box, imperatively demand it.

The majority, to account for the alleged fact that many colored voters wished to vote for sitting Member, brought in the fact that contestant had been convicted of bribery and alleged that he was unpopular with his race. The minority minimized all this and also the testimony tending to show intimidation, claiming that it did not bear out the contention of the majority.

In accordance with their reasoning the majority concluded:

According to the return as canvassed and declared by the State board, the vote was: William Elliott, 6,493; Robert Smalls, 5,961.

We give to Smalls and Elliott each the votes cast for them at Fort Mott, Adams Run, Cedar Creek, and Greer's precinct, and we deduct from Smalls his majority at Beaufort precinct, and at Ladies Island precinct, and the count stands as follows:

Returned vote for Elliott	6,493	Returned for Robert Smalls	5,961
Vote at Adams Run	37	Vote at Fort Mott	236
Vote at Fort Mott	58	Vote at Adams Run	177
Vote at Cedar Creek	0	Vote at Cedar Creek	18
Vote at Greer's precinct	4	Vote at Greer's	65
Total vote for Elliott	6,592	Total vote for Smalls	6,457

Deduct from Smalls:
Majority at Beaufort	136
Majority at Ladies Island	52
	.....	188
	.....	6,269
Total vote for Elliott		6,592
Total vote for Smalls		6,269
Majority for Elliott		323

Your committee find that the sitting Member was duly elected, and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Robert Smalls was not elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress from the Seventh district of South Carolina.

Resolved, That William Elliott was duly elected a Representative to the Fiftieth Congress from the Seventh district of South Carolina, and is entitled to his seat.

The minority recommended these resolutions:

Resolved, That William Elliott was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the Fiftieth Congress from the Seventh South Carolina district.

Resolved, That Robert Smalls was elected and is entitled to a seat in the Fiftieth Congress from the Seventh South Carolina district.

The report was debated at length on February 11, 12, and 13,[1] 1889, and on the latter day the question was taken on substituting the minority for the majority resolutions, and the motion was disagreed to, yeas 127, nays 142.

1016. The California election case of Sullivan v. Felton in the Fiftieth Congress.

Instance wherein the Elections Committee considered as a suspicious circumstance a variation from the vote of the preceding election.

Although a portion of the election officers were disqualified persons, corruptly appointed, the Elections Committee did not reject the poll, but corrected the return by a recount.

[1] Record pp. 1754, 1785, 1860–1878; Journal, pp. 537, 615.

Ballots tainted with bribery and distinguishable by a mark were deducted from the return.

Discussion of directory and mandatory requirements of law as applied to the ballot and in relation to the rights of the voter.

December 12, 1888,[1] Mr. J. H. O'Neill, of Massachusetts, presented the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the California case of Sullivan, v. Felton.

The sitting Member had been returned by a certified majority of 119 votes.

The examination of the various charges in this case brought out the following discussions of principles:

(1) In the eighth precinct of the forty-sixth assembly district of San Francisco the vote returned showed a change, as compared with the vote of the preceding election, which the majority of the committee consider suspicious. There was testimony, corroborated by a recount, tending to show that the judges miscounted, also that they were corruptly organized, as the majority report says:

The testimony as a whole shows that the election board was illegally organized, and in the light of all the evidence it is very plain that the illegal organization was in the interest of Felton. The law of California requires, in the city of San Francisco, that the election board shall be composed of an inspector and of two judges, and an additional inspector and two additional judges, six in all; that these inspectors and judges should belong equally to the parties casting the most votes; that all should be electors in the precinct where appointed. A man by the name of James Hughes was Democratic committeeman of this precinct, or Democratic "captain," as he was called. He it was that selected the Democratic or reputed Democratic members of the election board—D. D. Sullivan and Thomas J. Barden. His own evidence (see Record, p. 962) shows that he received Felton's money. He screens himself, however, under the plea that the money was distributed to certain parties, of whom he was one, who had suffered loss from fire. Most singular, other sufferers from that fire received none of it and heard nothing of it until it dropped out in the evidence of Mr. Hughes in this contest. When asked under oath how he voted, whether for Sullivan or Felton, he refused to answer.

The majority conclude that the men in question were not residents of the precinct, not legal electors therein, and for that reason not eligible as judges:

In short, no one can read the testimony in relation to the election in this precinct without being convinced that Hughes was hired to import, and did import, these men—D. D. Sullivan and Thomas J. Barden—for the purpose of having them placed on the election board to deliberately assist in counting Frank J. Sullivan out and Charles N. Felton in, and that had no recount been called for and had, the purpose would have been accomplished to the extent of a change of at least 92 votes.

The majority rule as to this precinct:

The organization of the election board and the manner of holding and certifying to the election in this precinct is so tainted with fraud as to warrant the throwing out of the precinct vote as returned in toto. The evidence in the case would fully justify such a course. That being done, under well-established rules of law (see McCrary on Elections, sec. 442) each party would have the right to prove his vote aliunde. Should this course be adopted Felton's entire majority of 119 would be more than overcome by this precinct alone. Sullivan called more than enough of the electors of this precinct and by them proved that they voted for him to overcome Felton's majority of 119, while Felton did not Call a single voter of the precinct to prove a vote for himself. By accepting the result as shown by the recount we think, under all the circumstances, the ends of justice will be best subserved. Hence we here deduct 92 from Felton's 119 majority.

[1] Second session Fiftieth Congress, House Report No. 3538; Mobley, p. 747.

The minority views, signed by Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, and five others of the committee do not place credence in the testimony as to this precinct and say of the recount:

This vote was not recounted until the last day of taking rebuttal testimony in San Francisco, with no opportunity to answer.

The ballots were not identified as the real ballots cast at the election, and there were strong indications that they had been tampered with.

(2) As to alleged bribery:

The majority report finds suspicious changes in the vote of the Fourth Ward of San Jose, when the vote for Felton is compared with the results of prior elections; and conclude from the evidence that the changes were brought about by the questionable use of money. The testimony of sitting Member admits that he sent money to the county, direct to one J. H. Barbour, the county committeeman; but Mr. Barbour declined to say how much he received or expended. After quoting the testimony the report says:

From the above it will be seen that Barbour testifies he received $250 from the Congressional committee, but refuses to say whether he received more than $250, or whether he received any money from Felton direct. Felton, however, testifies that he sent money to Barbour direct, but to some of the committee "less money than they thought was sufficient and necessary."

Now, let us inquire further into the methods practiced at this precinct. We find that one Bailer and one McKenzie hired a room on election day, in the Cosmopolitan Hotel, in which to buy up such of the purchasable vote as could be inveigled therein.

Then, as to the application of money in this ward, the report gives the testimony of Baler and others, and concludes:

A careful reading of Bailer's testimony, coupled with other testimony hereinafter referred to, shows that he (Bailer) and one McKenzie had a room rented in the Cosmopolitan Hotel, and within less than 100 feet of the polling place. To this room electors willing to make merchandise of their right to vote were invited and taken; that the price paid started at $2.50 per vote in the forenoon, and increased to $4 later in the afternoon. The tickets given to the voters in this room were, for the purpose of "branding" them, "marked" with a red pencil across the items:

31. For the Amendment No. 1; and
32. Against the Amendment No. 1.

Of this class of tickets, 53 were found in the ballot box, and were all Republican tickets, with the name of Charles N. Felton thereon. To say nothing of the fact that they were bought and paid for in a most shameful and unblushing way by Mr. Bailer and his friend, McKenzie, who would get around the voter "like a Sheeny," and "tote," "influence," and "soup" into him. The tickets are in contravention of section 1197 of the Political Code, which reads:

"No ballot or ticket must be used or circulated on the day of election having any mark or thing thereon by which it can be ascertained what persons, or what class of persons, used or voted it, or at what time in the day such ballot was voted or used."

Contestee insisted that to come within the purview of this statute the mark or thing must be placed on the back of the ticket, and that the object and purpose of the statute was to secure to the voter the right of a secret ballot, and to prevent intimidation by rendering it impossible for the looker on to determine how the elector, when depositing his ballot, was voting. If we could persuade ourselves that such was the only object and purpose of the statute we might so conclude. To hold that only on the back or outside of the ticket was contemplated would make it "permissible" to place a mark "on the inside of a ticket to indicate the person or class of persons who voted it," and thus encourage "combinations of voters engaged in the greatest of all outrages against the elective franchise and free government—selling their votes—and to make proof of their perfidy." (Note of the code commissioner to section 1197, Political Code, California.)

The majority report cite Kirk v. Rhoads (46 Cal., 404) to show that irregularities beyond the voter's control do not vitiate the ballot, and say:

A statute in relation to such irregularities, as want of uniformity in size, color, texture, or appearance of ticket, or something of that character, under the control of those clothed with the power and duty of providing tickets, would and should be construed as directory. But an irregularity in contravention of a statute intended to protect the purity of the ballot box against frauds, which irregularity is within the control of the voter himself, must not be tolerated. A statute applied to such irregularities is, by the courts, and of right should be, construed as mandatory. Mr. Bailer says these "marks" placed upon the tickets were placed there as a "brand," and that a memoranda was kept of them, but that the memoranda had been lost six months later, when he was testifying.

The report further finds that the law providing that there should be no interference with the voters within 100 feet of the polls was disregarded.

As to the witnesses the report says:

Much of the testimony of these witnesses is hearsay. Aside from the hearsay the facts testified about and of which the witnesses had knowledge, and properly constituting a part of the res gesta, sufficiently and abundantly establish, first, that a room within 100 feet of the polling place was being used to deal in "merchantable" votes, and that such voters were marched up and down and watched when depositing their ballots; and, secondly, that 53 marked Republican tickets are found in the box and that they were "fixed" in that room, and that when these tickets were being counted out they were so well understood that they were denominated the "McKenzie tickets," and when so denominated McKenzie, who was standing by, "smiled." (See Record, p. 780, testimony of Julius Kraig, a member of the election board.) As to these electors who voted these 53 tickets the testimony shows that most of them were Democrats.

1017. The case of Sullivan v. Felton, continued.

One candidate's name being scratched and another's written in with a pencil of illegal color for a corrupt purpose, the ballot was vitiated as to both names.

The Elections Committee knowing judicially that paupers could not, by reason of living in the county almshouse, have a residence in the precinct, and there being no proof that any did have a residence there, their votes were rejected.

The Elections Committee rejected returns tainted with fraud on the part of an election officer.

Instance wherein final action in an election case was prevented by obstruction.

(3) The majority find also in the Fourth ward of San Jose the following condition:

In addition to these 53 tickets there were, in this Fourth Ward of San Jose, 13 other tickets—Democratic tickets—with Sullivan's name erased with blue or red pencils, and with the same kind of pencil Felton's name written in place of Sullivan's. The testimony sufficiently shows that these tickets were likewise "fixed" in the Bailer-McKenzie room. Bailer testifies that when they (himself and McKenzie) could not induce an elector "to go the whole hog" by "toting influence" and "soup" into him they would get him to vote for Felton and as much of the ticket as possible.

To say nothing of the testimony showing the corrupt influence used to secure these votes, let us examine them in the light of the California statutes. Section 1191, specification 3, provides: "That the names of the persons voted for, and the offices designated, are printed in black ink." Section 1204 provides: "When, upon a ballot found in any ballot box a name has been erased and another substituted therefor in any other manner than by the use of a lead pencil or common writing ink, the substituted name must be rejected and the name erased, if it can be ascertained by an inspection of the ballot." * * * These requirements are that it must be printed in black ink, and when so printed all erasures must be made with lead pencil or common writing ink. Common ink is black ink. A ticket printed in red ink would not conform to the requirements of the statute, but as to a ticket so printed and furnished the voter by the authorities the statute might be construed as directory. But when the voter himself undertakes to change the uniformity of the ticket, then that is under his control, and the statute must be construed as mandatory. The letter and spirit of the statutes were intended to secure uniformity in the appearance of the tickets, and we think the tickets should be written and printed in common black ink or common lead pencil, and that all the erasures and substitutions should be made with like black ink or pencil.

Placinging this construction upon the intention of the law we might deduct 13 votes from Felton and give them to Sullivan, thus adding 26 more to the majority already found for Sullivan.

This accords with the justice of the case, because if 13 Democrats were bought to vote these tickets 13 were taken from Sullivan and given to Felton, making a difference of 26. We insist for that reason and for the reason that Sullivan's name was erased with red or blue pencil, and Felton's name substituted with such pencil, that they should at least be deducted from Felton's vote.

(4) In the county of San Francisco were two almshouses, and the majority report declares that 25 or 30 paupers, most of them shown to have been Democrats, voted for sitting Member, who was a Republican. The majority report takes the ground that these votes should be excluded, because the paupers were shown to have resided elsewhere than at the almshouse.

The law requires that the registration of an elector shall show the correct residence of the elector. These paupers were registered as residing at the almshouse. We judicially know that they did not reside there, because the constitution and laws of the State expressly provide that persons do not gain or lose a residence while residing in the almshouse at public expense. At whose expense does the evidence show these paupers were residing at the almshouse? At the public expense, of course. Then they do not gain any residence there, nor do they lose the residence from which they came. While residents, presumably, of the county, still under the laws of the State electors can not vote anywhere in the county wherein they reside, but must vote only in the precinct of the county wherein they reside. It would seem from the evidence in this case, and from the briefs of contestant and contestee as well, that these paupers are treated as residing at the almshouse.

Without any proof whatever on the point, we judicially know otherwise. Thus, by judicial knowledge, we know these paupers did not reside at, and could not be registered and vote from, the almshouse on account of any residence therein. Then, can it be presumed that these men were legal residents of the precinct in which the almshouse is located? We think not. From the evidence in the case, and by reference to the statutes of the State, it appears that there is but one almahouse in a county. That part of the county of San Francisco in this Fifth Congressional district, described in the record and the evidence as the southern half of the city and county of San Francisco, contains some 80 precincts. If the northern half contains as many that would make 160 in all. In view of these facts can we presume that these paupers, prior to being domiciled at the almshouse, all resided in the fifth precinct of the forty-eighth assembly district? We think not; and if not, when shown to have registered and voted from a place where they did not reside, does not that of itself shift the burden upon the other side to show that, notwithstanding they did not live at the almshouse, still that they lived in the precinct where the almshouse was located. We think the burden is thus shifted. There being no evidence offered on that point it is our duty to throw out these votes to the number at least of 25.

(5) In the second precinct of the forty-eighth assembly district of San Francisco the returns gave Felton 172 votes and Sullivan 117. The majority of the committee decided to throw out this return because it was tarnished with fraud. The report says:

To understand the merits of the controversy had before the board it will be necessary to refer to the statutes of California, which provide that in each precinct there shall be an inspector and two judges, an additional inspector and two additional judges, two clerks and two additional clerks. The inspector, additional inspector, judges, and additional judges—six in all—constitute the precinct board. At least four of these, a majority, must sign certain papers and returns hereinafter stated. As the election progresses the clerks make and keep a list of the voters as they vote and these lists are duplicates. At the close of the polls two tally sheets are made out. These are duplicates of each other. When the count is completed the tickets are placed in an envelope, provided for that purpose, sealed, and the board, or a majority—which requires at least four members—sign their names across this envelope, which has printed thereon "Envelope No. 1." One of the duplicate copies of the poll lists and tally sheets, and certain registration papers, are placed in a second envelope, which is sealed, and the names of the members of the board signed thereon, as on the first envelope. This envelope beam upon it the printed words "Envelope No. 2." The other tally sheet and poll list are placed in a third envelope, "Envelope No. 3" which is not required to be signed or sealed.

Envelopes numbered 1 and 2 the law requires the inspector to file with the county clerk within eighteen hours after the close of the count. The other envelope, No. "3," the inspector is required to retain.

The evidence before the board showed that so far as the signatures were concerned the names of all six members of the election board were placed on one of the poll books, one of the tally sheets, and lists attached. Doctor Humphrey and E. J. Morrison not being present, their names were signed by one of the clerks. Not a single one of the judges testify to having examined the poll books, tally sheets, and lists attached before or at the time of signing. They all, the four members who were there, testify that they signed envelopes Nos."1" and "2." The clerks likewise testify that the envelopes "1" and "2" were signed; Lincoln himself testifies to this. These envelopes and returns were then turned over to Lincoln, the inspector, who took them home with him. It was then 9.30 o'clock p.m. of Thursday, November 4, 1886. The next day, about 10 o'clock, Lincoln appeared at the office of the registrar to place on file that portion of the returns which it was incumbent upon him to so file. The clerk refused to receive envelope No. "2," because not signed. In fact, Lincoln or someone else had made away with envelope No. "2," and had substituted an unsigned No. "3" therefor.

The report goes on:

Lincoln went back to the polling place, got a No. "2" envelope, broke the seal of the No. "3," took out the contents and placed them in the No. "2," calling the attention of Strozynski, a shoemaker, and Jurgens, a groceryman, to witness the performance. He then sealed the No. "2," wrote his own name thereon, and coolly requested both Jurgens and Strozynski to sign the names of certain other members of the board under his own (Lincoln's) name. Jurgens, thinking he wanted his name as a witness merely, took the pen and innocently inquired, "Where do you want my name?" "Well," says Lincoln, "sign Sweeny's name first." (Sweeny was a member of the board.) "What" says Jurgens, "you don't want me to sign some other man's name? "Oh, yes," rejoined Lincoln, "it is nothing but a form." Jurgens thought otherwise.

A like request was made of Strozynski with a like result, both of these men telling him that it would be forgery, and for him to sign them himself. "No; it won't do for me to sign more than one name," said Lincoln. Later, Morrison, one of the members of the board, and one who up to this time had signed nothing, was hunted up and procured to sign it. The names of the other members of the board were thereafter signed by someone; by whom the evidence does not disclose. The members themselves testify that they were not signed by them, or by anyone by them authorized. The envelope No. "2," purporting to be signed by the members, was returned to the clerk's office, by him received and placed on record. In canvassing the returns, it was claimed before the board of election commissioners that their functions were simply ministerial and not judicial. This view seems to have been held by a majority of the board, for they failed to call attention to anything connected with the returns, or to go into any investigation further than to examine the signatures of the members of the precinct board. From the evidence, these names had been affixed in a most careless manner.

The report concludes that during Lincoln's custody, after the polls were closed, someone removed the envelope signed by the board and substituted another. Testimony showed Lincoln to be an unreliable man.

(6) The majority report also discusses reasons for supposing that in sitting Member's party there was a conspiracy to defraud, and cites circumstances suggesting intimidation, but as a matter of fact makes no definite rejection of votes for these reasons.

As a result of its conclusions, the majority find that sitting Member's majority is overcome by reasons of the following deductions:

(1) In the eighth precinct, forty-sixth assembly district, San Francisco, votes out of which Sullivan was counted, 92.

(2) In the fourth ward, San Jose, we find votes bought for Felton in a room within 100 feet of the polling place, and the tickets "branded" with a red pencil to the number of 53.

(3) In the same ward, and in the same room, 13 other votes bought and Sullivan's name erased and Felton's substituted, with red or blue pencil. These we think might not only be deducted from Felton, but counted for Sullivan, but we simply deduct them from Felton, 13.

(4) In the second precinct, forty-eighth assembly district, San Francisco, because of frauds, and uncertainty, we throw out the precinct, with its majority for Felton of 55.

(5) Illegal pauper votes bought for Felton, at least 25.

And the majority recommend these resolutions:

(1) Resolved, That Charles N. Felton, the contestee, was not elected a Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of California, and is not entitled to a seat on this floor.

(2) Resolved, That Frank J. Sullivan was duly elected to represent the Fifth Congressional district of California in the Fiftieth Congress, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The minority, who had denied the competency of the testimony and generally dissented from the conclusions of the majority, recommended the following:

Resolved, That Charles N. Felton was duly elected a Member of the Fiftieth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of California, and is entitled to retain his seat.

Resolved, That Frank J. Sullivan was not elected to the Fiftieth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of California.

An attempt was made to consider the report on February 18, and again on the 25th,[1] but in each case the purpose was defeated by dilatory tactics. So the sitting Member, Mr. Felton, continued to occupy the seat.

Chapter XXXVI.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1889 TO 1891.

1. Cases in the Fifty-first Congress. Sections 1018–1040.[1]

1018. The Arkansas election case of Clayton v. Breckinridge in the Fifty-first Congress.

An election case having been suspended by the assassination of contestant, the House directed the Elections Committee to inquire and report as to further proceedings.

A resolution relating to the prosecution of an election case was held to involve a question of privilege.

The House authorized an investigating committee to take testimony in a district wherein the contestant had been assassinated.

Where the taking of testimony was suspended by contestant's death, the House itself took additional testimony, but considered the original case continued.

A returned Member whose seat is contested is nevertheless eligible to appointment on any committee.

On December 16, 1889,[2] Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, rising in the House, and being recognized, offered the following:

Whereas, it is well known that a contest for a seat in this House was duly commenced by Hon. John M. Clayton, of Arkansas, against Hon. C. R. Breckinridge, a sitting Member; and

Whereas it is a matter of public notoriety that the said Clayton, while engaged in taking testimony in the said contest, was assassinated, and all further proceedings thereby suspended:

Resolved, therefore, That the Committee on Elections be, and is hereby, directed to inquire and report what further proceedings should be had in relation to the said case; and they are authorized to send for persons and papers if deemed necessary by them for the investigation of the said matter.

The Speaker[3] having ruled that this resolution involved a question of privilege, the House proceeded at once to its consideration, and the resolution was agreed to without division.

[3] Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, Speaker.

On March 10, 1890,[1] Mr. Lacey submitted from the committee the following report:

In pursuance of the directions contained in the foregoing resolution, the committee have obtained the notice of contest and answer of the contestee and all the evidence which had been taken up to the time of the death of Mr. Clayton. The attorney for Mr. Clayton has presented to the committee a memorial in relation to the said contest, which memorial has been submitted to Mr. Breckinridge, and he has presented to the committee a statement in his own behalf. We have directed that the foregoing papers be printed for the information of the House.

The committee have proceeded as far as they can under the said resolution, and they therefore report: [The following resolution is as adopted by the House, a slight amendment having been added by the House.]

"That, owing to the alleged assassination of Colonel Clayton, whereby the contest has been suspended, it is of the highest importance that the facts in the case should be thoroughly investigated, and recommend the passage of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a subcommittee of five be appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Elections to make a full and thorough investigation of the contested election case of Clayton v. Breckinridge; to take and report all the evidence in regard to the methods of said election; to the contest and all events relating thereto or arising therefrom after said election, and as to whether the contestant or the contestee or either of them was lawfully elected, and report such evidence to the Committee on Elections, and said committee will report said evidence and its findings to the House for further action.

"Said subcommittee is empowered to issue subpoenas for witnesses; to send for persons and papers; to employ a stenographer and deputy sergeant-at-arms, and to sit during session of the House. Said subcommittee may proceed to Arkansas, if deemed necessary by them, to take any part of said testimony.

"That all expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. That all vouchers or expenditures shall be certified by the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Elections. The Clerk of this House is authorized to advance the necessary funds to the chairman of said subcommittee upon his drafts therefor in sums not exceeding $1,000 at any one time, to be accounted for under the terms of this resolution, under the supervision of the Committee on Accounts."

This resolution was agreed to without division.

On August 5[2] Mr. Lacey submitted the report of the majority of the committee.

At the outset of the debate in the House on this report, a preliminary question was raised as to the nature of the proceedings. Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, raised the question that this case was not a statutory contest, but an investigation.[3] The contest of Mr. Clayton had by his death abated, and the existing proceedings were an investigation by the House to determine the "election" of the sitting Member. Therefore Mr. Breckinridge had not been charged with the duty of proving votes aliunde in precincts where returns were rejected for fraud. And it was further urged that in this case, where returns were rejected, the committee might not count votes proven aliunde for Mr. Clayton, and at the same time omit Mr. Breckinridge's vote, because he had not proven it.[4] It appeared that Mr. Breckinridge, after the investigation was over in Arkansas, had asked leave to take testimony in proof of his votes.

In reply to this contention it was argued[5] that the committee had obtained the notices of contest and answer of contestee and all the evidence taken up to the time of Mr. Clayton's death, also a memorial of Mr. Clayton's attorney. The pleadings were made up and the case defined. It mattered not how the testimony was taken, whether before a notary under the law or by the committee. In the case of Thoebe v. Carlisle it had been taken in part by the committee, but it did not cease thereby to be a contested-election case. There was nothing in the point that this was an investigation and not a contest. It was also pointed out [1] that the committee while in Arkansas had offered subpoenas to sitting Member and to his party friends on the committee to summon witnesses to prove the vote aliunde had he chosen so to do.

The report of the majority of the committee shows that sitting Member had received his certificate:

> The contestee received the governor's certificate by a majority certified as amounting to 846, and has not only taken part in the organization of the House, but has during this contest filled the exalted place of a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

1019. The election case of Clayton v. Breckinridge, continued.

The ballot box being stolen and no returns made, the vote was proven aliunde.

Where the law provided for identification of the ballot cast by a voter, and where 62 voters examined ballots credited to them and disowned them, the returns were rejected for fraud.

Fraudulent election returns are good for proof of no part of the vote, but both parties must resort to proof aliunde.

In a contested-election case involving alleged fraud by election judges the acquittal of those judges in the courts is not an adjudication binding on the House.

The contestant being dead, the swearing in of returned Member creates no estoppel to prevent further prosecution of the contest.

Discussion as to counting votes which would have been cast had there not been a failure to open the polls.

Forms of resolutions declaring a seat vacant in a case wherein the contestant has died.

The House declined to reopen an election case to enable returned Member to prove his vote aliunde at several precincts whereof the returns had been rejected.

After giving an account of the political conditions in the district, of the murder of Mr. Clayton, and other alleged murders which were presumed to have been connected with the investigation, the committee proceeded to consideration of the election itself.

(1) At Plummerville, which had of old been a disorderly precinct, the sheriff of the county raised a posse of partisans of sitting Member, ostensibly to guarantee a fair election. The report describes the proceedings:

> These men appeared upon the scene in time for the opening of the polls, which, under the Arkansas law, is 8 o'clock a. m. The judges of the election consisted of two Republicans and one Democrat. The Democrat, Thomas C. Hervey, had been appointed by the county judge in vacation, and to set at rest all questions as to the validity of his appointment the county judge had suggested that Mr. Hervey's appointment should be confirmed by the voters at the time of opening the polls. Accordingly, one of the Republican judges nominated Hervey as a judge of the election, and the assembled voters, regardless of party, voted for him and confirmed his appointment. Mr. Hervey then announced that this was an attempt to question his authority, and that he would also submit to the voters who the other judges should be, and nominated Mr. Hobbs and Mr. Palmer as judges, both Democrats, and put it to vote, calling for the affirmative and declining to put the negative, and at once declared the Republican judges ousted who had without question been lawfully selected by the county court.

[1] Record, p. 9621, speech of Mr. Lacey.

The Republican judges objected to this summary ejectment from office, and insisted on taking part in the election. The purpose and character of the deputy sheriffs at once became manifest. They took the matter in hand and prevented the two Republican judges from exercising their rights. The election was therefore held by three Democratic judges and two Democratic clerks.

There was, however, a Federal supervisor present, and of his acts the report speaks:

Mr. Wahl, the Federal supervisor, seems to have been a man of much nerve and presence of mind; he watched the box constantly and accompanied Mr. Hervey, the same am who had taken part in a previous trouble about the Plummerville ballot box and who was one of the judges, when he took the box to supper. Hervey complained that Wahl "watched him like a thief, "and subsequent events justified Wahl in his so doing.

The judges separated, and left Wahl and one of the judges in charge of the box. After dark some one came to the room where the box was and, looking into the door, asked if they had commenced counting. Mr. Wahl answered that they had not. Mr. Hobbs, the judge, whose back was turned at the time, asked Wahl who that was, and Wahl replied that it was O. T. Bentley.

This same Bentley is still the deputy sheriff of the county, and the duty of capturing the murderers of Clayton and thieves of the ballot box has been largely intrusted to him. He has been in a position to know all that the governor and other State officials have been doing to disclose the crimes in Conway County. A few minutes after Bentley, or the man whom Wahl recognized as Bentley, disappeared, four men with handkerchiefs over their faces and with revolvers in hand entered and took the ballot box and poll books away by force. Mr. Hobbs says that they had white faces, and there was no evidence to the contrary. In the light of these well-known facts it is strange that contestee should have charged that the ballot box with nearly 500 Republican majority was stolen by Republicans.

The committee found, by proof aliunde—no returns having been made or tabulated from this precinct—that Clayton received 560 votes and Breckinridge 125, a majority of 435 for Clayton. This testimony consisted principally of the testimony of the voters themselves, and it will be noted that in this precinct sitting Member's vote was proven.

(2) With the correction for Plummerville, there was left a majority of 411 for sitting Member in the district. There were four other disputed precincts, whence a majority of 422 votes had been returned for sitting Member. The committee threw out these returns for frauds, thereby leaving a majority of 11 for contestant in the district. But enough votes were proven aliunde for contestant in these precincts to make his majority in the district 459. The method of procedure as to these precincts is illustrated by the following from the majority report as to White River precinct:

The return shows:.

Breckinridge	210
Clayton	44

Under the laws of Arkansas the judges are required to mark a number on the outside of the ballot before putting it in the box, and such number corresponds with the number opposite the voter's name on the poll list. In this precinct 62 persons who swear they voted for Clayton deny that they cast the tickets numbered as having been cast by them. The original tickets were presented to them before the committee, and are shown to be the opposite of what they voted. These 62 tickets were evidently changed by or with the connivance of the Democratic judges of the election, and when corrected make a difference of 62 off of Breckinridge's vote and 62 to be added to that of Clayton.

These ballots had manifestly been substituted after they were deposited, and this could not have been done if the judges had not either permitted it or committed the act themselves This change of 124 invalidates the return. A fraudulent return of this character can have no effect, and as a matter of law we must deduct from—

Breckinridge's reported majority of	846
The votes so fraudulently returned	210
Leaving a majority of	636

In counting Clayton's vote, 44 votes were credited to him in making Breckinridge's original majority. The proof shows that he got 62 votes where the tickets were changed, 39 votes where his tickets were not changed, as shown by the voters themselves, and 5 others where the proof is that the voters were furnished with and cast Clayton tickets, and that the voters were Republicans. Total vote proved for Clayton, 106. He has already been credited with 44, so he should now be credited with the balance, 62. There were also two names of voters not on the book, who voted for Clayton. We will insert the names of all these voters in an appendix, which we think will be more convenient for reference than to incorporate them here.

In general as to this method the majority say:

Contestee complains that the committee may refuse to accept the impeached returns as of any validity, and thus work a hardship upon him.

If the returns have been falsified by the election officers, it is a well-settled rule of law that they cease to have any prima facie effect, and each party can only be credited with such votes at the box in question as he may show by other evidence. This rule is one of long standing, and one of which contestee, as an old Member of Congress, must have had notice. It works no hardship upon contestee which does not fall as heavily on the contestant. The contestant is required in the first instance to show the fraud in the return, and then must follow that up by proving his vote; or, in some instances, the proof of the fraud is connected with the proof of his vote.

In the present case the fraud is in a large degree shown by proving that votes cast for Clayton were substituted by ballots for Breckinridge, and in proving the fraud the votes for contestant are proved at the same time. Contestant is required to go outside of the returns to prove up his vote, because the judges of the election have falsified the returns. It is no more a hardship upon the contestee to prove up his vote by outside evidence than it is upon the contestant. If contestee's partisans had perpetrated no fraud, the returns would be accepted as true on both sides. His friends having falsified the returns and substituted his ballots for those of his opponent, there is no return at all of any legal effect. He might as well complain of the hardship of being compelled to prove up his vote at Plummerville, where his adherents stole the ballot box before the vote was counted. No doubt contestee received some votes at the boxes where the returns were falsified, which votes he wholly failed and neglected to prove whilst he had the opportunity in Arkansas.

If the holder of a promissory note alters the note and raises the amount from $1,000 to $2,000, he is met in court with the rule of law which prevents him from using the fraudulent instrument in evidence. It is not even good proof as to the $1,000. The same principle is applied to fraudulent election returns. Courts can not take the fraudulent statements of the election officers and analyze them and select the true from the false. The whole stream is sullied by the impurity, and all that can be done is to reject the returns altogether and seek other sources of evidence.

Speaking of their disposition of the four precincts, the majority say:

The above is the computation upon the settled rules of election law in this House. We will now state the return upon the most favorable view that contestee could claim, under the case of Jones v. Glidewell (supreme court of Arkansas, A. D. 1890). If we were to throw out the whole vote in the impeached precincts, and inasmuch as Breckinridge has not proved his vote there, to ignore the proof of Clayton's vote, it would show the following results:

Breckinridge's majority	846
Deduct Howard Township, Conway County, majority shown	435
Majority remaining	411

Now deduct the vote returned for both parties in the disputed precincts:

Precinct.	Breckinridge.	Clayton.
White River	210	44
Cotton Plant	186	132
Augusta	98	34
Riverside	197	59
Total	691	269

By thus considering the proof for the purpose of showing fraud alone, and not for the purpose of counting the votes, Breckinridge would lose the difference between 691 and 269, or 422, which would leave Clayton elected by 11 majority without taking into consideration Freeman Township. But this method, so favorable to contestee, is not the rule of this House, and we only make the computation in this form to show that by the most favorable method of calculation the contestee is not entitled to the seat which he holds after the proof is adduced as to the Plummerville box.

(3) The majority report also passes on the following question:

Contestee claims in his application for further time, and also upon the floor of the House, and more surprising still, his counsel, General Garland, also claims that the acquittal of the judges and others charged with frauds in this election is a fact binding upon this House and the committee; that such result in a criminal case before a jury is practically an adjudication that there was no such fraud, and that such adjudication should be so accepted by Congress. It is a common saying in criminal proceedings that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should be convicted.

All of the Woodruff County officials who were indicted were convicted. In fact, all the persons who were indicted were convicted, except the persons indicted for the crime against Wahl and those for the stealing of the Plummerville box. Two persons were indicted and convicted on one trial, and acquitted on a new trial. This only shows that the evidence in the cases of conviction satisfied the minds of the jurymen to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt. Upon the new trial when there was an acquittal, no one can say whether it was a difference in the evidence or a difference in the character of the jury. It is sufficient for us to determine this proceeding upon the evidence introduced before us, without speculating upon the causes that might have led an Arkansas jury to acquit or convict.

The distinction between the rules governing juries in criminal cases and those prevailing in civil proceedings is well known, and we can not but express surprise at the persistence with which the contestee and his counsel cling to this theory that the verdict of the Arkansas juries upon the indictments for violating the election law should be treated as an adjudication that contestee is entitled to his seat. It might as properly be contended in an action of replevin, brought by the owner of a stolen horse against a party claiming title through the thief, that the thief had been able to prove an alibi on a criminal trial, and that therefore this should be regarded as an adjudication divesting the true owner of his title, although the owner was not a party to the criminal proceeding, and had no right to cross-examine witnesses or produce testimony in his own behalf, nor to appeal from an adverse decision.

Such a legal proposition could only excite attention by its entire novelty in a court of justice, where rights of property were involved. But when it is seriously contended that a seat in Congress obtained by fraud and ballot-box stealing can not be contested unless the Government authorities have been able to convict the parties charged upon indictment, we can only express our surprise at the persistence with which contestee insists upon so evident an error. The rule contended for in behalf of contestee does not apply even in small matters, involving only the rights of property, and to allow the control of the legislative branch of the Government to be thus decided would be monstrous. The Constitution, in express terms, declares that Congress shall judge of the qualifications and election of its members; and the right to exclude from its body men whose title is procured by crime does not depend upon the ability of the Department of Justice to capture and punish the criminals.

The receiver of stolen goods, even though innocent of all guilty knowledge, can not claim title based upon the failure to catch or punish the thieves. Only the seriousness with which it is urged justifies any extended notice of so evident an error.

(4) Also the majority report passes on the following point:

Upon the hearing before the full committee the contestee presented a brief from ex-Attorney-General Garland. He claims that by reason of the swearing in of Major Breckinridge at the organization of the House some sort of an estoppel arises by which no contest can be afterwards carried on. Such is not the rule as to living contestants. They or their friends are neither required nor permitted to object to the swearing in of a Member who holds the formal certificate.

No estoppel will arise against the dead. Clayton could not object to Breckinridge taking the disputed seat. No one else had a right to appear for him. Other Members present at the time had no apparent title higher than that of Major Breckinridge. The House was in the process of organization, and the Members were sworn in by groups.

(5) Also the following case is discussed:

In Freeman Township, Woodruff County, no election was held. This failure was occasioned by the act of the Democratic sheriff in furnishing the poll books locked up in the ballot box and with no key. The Republican supervisor was informed that if he would break open the box they would hold the election, but not otherwise, as the act, it was suggested, involved a penitentiary offense. Though anxious to hold the election, the supervisor did not deem it prudent to incur this risk, and the election was not held. The precinct had been a very close one, according to the returns at the State election, but the Republicans claimed that with the aid of proper supervision, so as to insure a fair count, there would be a good majority for their ticket.

In fact but few Democrats of this precinct appeared at the polls, whether because they knew there would be no election or not does not appear, and the proof did not show how many Democrats were prevented from voting at this box by the failure of the election officers to hold the election. Eighty-three persons made proper effort to vote for the contestant and were prevented by the failure to open the polls. We attach a list with the other lists in the appendix. This state of facts raises an interesting question upon the law of elections, to which we have given some attention, and which, under the peculiar facts of this case, appears not yet to have been heretofore directly decided. It becomes, however, an important fact as bearing upon the issue of a concerted plan to prevent a fair election. If this vote claimed be counted it would only increase the majority of contestant, and its omission from the count would not change the result, and therefore we do not deem it necessary to pass upon the question.

In accordance with their conclusions the majority recommended the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Clifton R. Breckinridge was not elected to the seat which he now holds as Representative in Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That John M. Clayton was elected as Representative in Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Arkansas, and because of his death the seat is declared vacant.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Levi Maish, of Pennsylvania, dissented from the reasoning of the majority and recommended:

Resolved, That Clifton R. Breckinridge was elected to the seat which he now holds as Representative in Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Arkansas, and he is entitled to the same.

The report was debated at length on September 2, 3, 4, and 5,[1] and on the latter day the question was first taken on a motion to recommit with instructions for the committee to ascertain the vote cast for both parties in the four precincts where the vote of 2&. Breckinridge had not been proven aliunde. This motion was disagreed to, yeas 83, nays 111.

Then the motion to substitute the resolution of the minority for those of the majority was disagreed to, yeas 103, nays 141.

On agreeing to the resolutions of the majority there were, yeas 105, nays 62; so the sitting Member was unseated.

1020. The West Virginia election case of Atkinson v. Pendleton, in the Fifty-first Congress.

A recount, although authorized by law, does not avail to overthrow the count of the election officers unless the ballots are affirmatively shown to have been kept inviolate.

As to whether a correction of the returns changing the result may throw the burden of establishing his title on the returned Member.

On February 19, 1890,[1] Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the West Virginia case of Atkinson v. Pendleton.

The returns on which the governor of West Virginia gave the certificate to Mr. Pendleton showed for the latter a plurality of 19 votes. This result was brought about by a recount, the first count by the precinct officers having shown, when tabulated, a plurality of 7 votes for the contestant.

At the outset, then, there arose a question as to the competency of this recount; and then there arose a question also as to the legality of certain votes impeached on both sides.

(1) As to the validity of the recount.

The law of West Virginia provided:[2]

> They [the county court] shall, upon the demand of any candidate voted for at such election, open and examine any one or more of the sealed packages of ballots and recount the same, but in such case they shall seal up the same again, along with the original envelope, in another envelope, and the clerk of the county court shall write his name across the place or places where it is sealed, etc.

It was alleged on behalf of contestant that a recount which was made was untrue. The report says:

> The fraud complained of is alleged to have been committed with reference to the two precincts of Martin's schoolhouse and Archers Fork.
>
> The claim of the contestant is that after the ballots of these two precincts had been counted by the judges and clerks of election, and had been delivered with the poll books to the clerk of the county court, 14 ballots of those from Martin's schoolhouse and 10 ballots of those from Archers Fork were changed, or "scratched," by having the contestant's name erased, so that upon the recount by the county court the votes for the contestant at Martin's schoolhouse appeared to be 111 instead of 125 as returned by the election officers, and those at Archers Fork 148 instead of 158.
> Two of these "scratched" ballots not only had the contestant's name erased, but the contestee's inserted, so that 2 votes were thus improperly added to the aggregate for the contestee.
>
> If these 24 votes should be restored to the contestant and these 2 votes deducted from the votes for the contestee, and the other returns sent to the governor allowed to remain unchanged, the result would be

For the contestant	.....	19,242
Plus	.....	24

[2] See speech of Mr. Lacey, Record., p. 1742.

The rule has been announced over and over again that returns which are tainted with fraud can not be made the foundation of the title to a seat in the House. In the case of Washburn v. Voorhees (3 Congressional Contested Election Cases, 54) a number of authorities are cited in support of the rule which is there laid down, as follows:

"When the result in any precinct has been shown to be so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deduced therefrom, then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents, as well as the evident requirements of truth, not only sanction but call for the rejection of the entire poll when stamped with the characteristics here shown."

While all agree that where fraud is shown, the result of the fraud should be in some way avoided, there has been much discussion as to the manner in which this result is to be reached, and it may be regarded as settled that the poll will be "purged" of the fraud if that be practicable, and only rejected when no other alternative remains but to give effect to the fraud or to reject the poll.

In the present case it is unnecessary to enter into the discussion of this question, for the result will be the same whether the polls in the two disputed precincts be purged by a resort to the returns made by the election officers or be rejected altogether.

In order to authorize a recount of ballots in an election contest it must affirmatively appear that they have been kept as required by law, and that there has been no opportunity to tamper with them. (Paine on Elections, sec. 787.)

Before courts or legislative bodies can give weight to the result of a recount there must be absolute proof that the ballot boxes containing such ballots have been safely kept and that the ballots are the identical ballots cast at the election (Paine on Elections, sec. 776, and authorities cited). An impartial public count of the ballots by sworn officers made at the close of the polls is better evidence of what the ballot boxes then contained than a subsequent count made after a long exposure of the boxes to the tampering of dishonest partisans (Paine, sec. 787).

Taken together, the adjudications upon this question, judicial and legislative, establish conclusively the doctrine that the returns of election officers are to be held prima facie correct; that a recount changing the result will not be regarded unless it affirmatively appears that the ballots recounted are the same and in the same condition as they were when originally counted.

An opportunity to tamper with the ballots by unauthorized persons, or a failure to keep them as the law directs, will destroy the value of the ballots as evidence when recounted and a different result reached than the one returned.

Changing ballots by scratching or by substitution, after return made, is an old method of committing fraud to change the result of elections in cases of close contest.

Even when the ballots have been in the sole custody of sworn officers of the law, it has been found practicable for dishonest men to make such changes in such a secret way as to defy detection, and on that account laws have been enacted requiring the destruction of the ballots as soon as counted, so that they could not thereafter be used to overthrow the election returns. In large cities especially is it thought safer to risk the possibility of error in the original count than to take the chances of subsequent changes.

While in West Virginia the law makes provision for a recount, it does not dispense with the legal requirements of safekeeping of the ballots, pending the recount.

We now consider the facts as they appear in the record with reference to the recount in Wetzel County

The report goes on to quote testimony showing that the election officers of both parties in the precincts named testified as to the correctness of their count, while the ballots themselves, where they were alleged to have been scratched by the voters, bore suspicious signs of fraud. Furthermore the ballot box was shown not to have been kept properly, especially being accessible to a notorious man who was alleged to have offered for a bribe to give testimony discrediting the recount. The report says:

These two precincts were not recounted until after the president of the county court had procured an adjournment by telegram, referred to in the evidence and brief, known to him to be false and designedly used by him to deceive.

This telegram was by him shown to a leading Republican, Mr. McIntyre, engaged in watching the proceedings, and his opinion asked about going home. The judge talked quite a while about his wife's sickness and appeared to be much affected. (Record, pp. 214, 215.)

This, of course, was for a purpose, and designed to deceive. On the same day this judge had been in an upper room of a hotel in the town, in company with Wells, the sender of the false telegram, and of Lee Snodgrass, the deputy clerk. (Record, p. 224.)

Up to this time the plurality for Atkinson had not been overcome and the count was nearly completed.

Previously, at a late hour of the night, that same judge had entered the vault where those ballots were kept, with one Grail and the clerk of the court, on the hunt, as he says, of a bottle of beer.

Grail was staying around the court during the recount, and remaining after the work of the day was over, usually pretty drunk; a fit tool for dirty work, if he could be trusted, and this a fit opportunity to find just where the ballot box containing the ballots was located.

But Grail didn't sober up. Wells and Arnett visit the town. Judge Ernshaw and Lee Snodgrass have a private interview with them. Weils leaves town and sends a false telegram in another name, by previous arrangement. The court adjourns for two or three days, and then comes the recount with the extraordinary result. Ballots, too, which had been expressly forbidden to be resealed at the beginning of the recount by the same judge, over the protest of the attorney for Mr. Atkinson, who had asked that the ballots, after they had been opened on the first day of the recount, might be resealed until wanted during the recount.

The false telegram, sent by Wells in the name of Black, was dated November 21, 1888. The recount did not begin again until November 23 or 24.

The majority conclude:

The correctness of the original count is dearly established outside of the presumption in its favor, and therefore the committee adopt the returns as a correct statement of the vote in the two precincts of Wetzel County, and hold that contestant was elected by a plurality of 7 votes according to the correct returns.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Charles O'Ferrall, of Virginia, analyze the testimony, and do not consider that it impeaches the recount. They say:

To hold that the contestee shall be deprived of the gain he made by the recount would be to hold that an act done is fraudulent because some official connected with it and standing fair and unimpeached in the community at the time was guilty of conduct demanding censure at some period thereafter.

We believe the judges of the election at Martin's schoolhouse and Archer's Fork precincts in Wetzel County made mistakes in counting the ballots, and that the recount subsequently made by the county commissioners was correct and truly represented the actual vote cast at these precincts.

The majority of the committee also set forth this proposition, after they have concluded that contestant was elected by a plurality of 7 votes according to the corrected returns:

By this conclusion the burden shifts, and it now devolves upon contestee to establish his right to the seat which he occupies by affirmative evidence.

This he seeks to do by charging that illegal votes were cast and counted for contestant sufficient to overcome this apparent majority and to outnummber the illegal votes alleged to have been cast and counted for contestee.

The minority views do not discuss this, but in the debate [1] Mr. O'Ferrall argued on this point:

I have read the law on contested election cases to a very poor purpose indeed if I am mistaken in the assertion that the prima facie case is always with the man who holds the certificate issued by the governor. If that certificate is issued in accordance with the returns which are made to the governor,

[1] Record, p. 1736.

you can not go behind the returns and inquire whether those returns were right or not, whether the officers of election did their duty or not, whether there were illegal votes cast in this or that precinct, or whether any recount which may have been had after the returns were sent to the clerk's office was fraudulent or not. These are questions to be determined in a contest.

In support of this Mr. O'Ferrall quoted the case of Wallace v. McKinley.

1021. The case of Atkinson v. Pendleton, continued.

The law providing that employees of the State do not thereby gain a residence in the place where employed does not imply that presumption of nonresidence may not be overcome by proof.

It having been assumed for many years that a territory was included within a precinct, voters should not be disfranchised by discovery of a technical defect.

On a question of residence qualification of voters, ward lines in cities should be shown by record evidence of boundaries.

In determining qualifications of voters the presumption is in favor of actual residence as against a claimed intent to reside elsewhere.

A man does not necessarily retain his right to vote in his old home until he acquires a right to vote elsewhere.

Discussion as to method of determining the nature of unsegregated votes cast by disqualified voters.

(2) As to certain votes alleged to be illegal. A number of principles of law were discussed preliminary to the decisions in the individual cases:

(a) From Nos. 95 to 104, inclusive, are employees of the State asylum for the insane. We think the evidence shows that they have fixed their residence there and were entitled to vote.

The statute which declares that employees of the State shall not thereby become residents of the place where employed does not prevent their becoming residents if they so elect. The presumption of nonresidence can be overcome by proof, as in this case.

(b) From 120 to 154, inclusive, the voters voted at Braxton Court House, and it is insisted that the territory in which they lived had not been legally annexed to that voting district. An attempt had been made to so annex it, the residents had so voted for twelve years, and we do not think they can be disfranchised on account of technical neglect of the court, after years of acquiescence in what was supposed to be a legal order, and we hold the votes good.

From 159 to 194, inclusive, it is alleged that the voters voted out of their wards in the city of Wheeling. While from the oral evidence introduced it is quite evident that some 10 or 12 of these voters voted out of their proper wards, the committee are not disposed to include them in the list of illegal voters, for the reason that no record evidence was introduced as to ward boundaries, and while both parties seemed to concede the competency of the evidence introduced, we do not feel like going into the question in the absence of that better evidence which must have been easily accessible.

In country precincts common repute and generally acknowledged boundaries will suffice, but the boundaries of city wards, when disputes arise about them, ought to be proven by better evidence. But for this technical neglect the committee would be obliged to find at least 10 illegal votes in this list. According to our finding there were cast and counted for contestee 76 illegal votes, as above named. As to most of these votes there can be no doubt under the evidence. As to a very few there may be a question depending upon the weight attached to the evidence of different witnesses.

Also another case similar in principle:

The attacked votes from 13 to 85 voted at Wellsburg, where they have been in the habit of voting for the last eleven years. And it is charged that they lived in a portion of the town not belonging to the Wellsburg voting precinct.

The facts are well stated in contestant's reply brief at page 16:

"It seems that before the year 1887 the north line of the town of Wellsburg and the district of the same name have been coincident, and that immediately north of the town and in Cross Creek district lived a considerable population who vote at a precinct known as 'Harvey's.'

"In September, 1878, the circuit court of the county entered an order extending the corporate limits of the town of Wellsburg so as to include the voting precinct at Harvey's, and so as also to include the residences of those 73 voters. * * *

"The voting precinct at Harvey's was abolished and a new one opened, first at Devenney's and then at Lazarville, before the general election of 1878. This change was made because it was the understanding that the voters who resided within the recently included territory would vote in the Wellsburg district, and the old voting place needed not therefore to be retained for their convenience, and so from that time for eleven years the voters and the county authorities have treated the region included in the town as being also a part of the district of Wellsburg. The persons residing in this region have continuously and without objection voted in Wellsburg."

Officers were appointed from persons residing in this territory required by law to be residents of Wellsburg district.

In August, 1878, the county court established by an order of record a new precinct "in lieu of Harvey's, which is now within the boundaries of the district of Wellsburg," thus recognizing this territory as being within Wellsburg district.

It is not necessary to inquire whether all the forms of law have been complied with to take this territory into Wellsburg district.

The court and the people recognized the fact; it was accepted as something accomplished, and the addition has been accomplished as a matter of fact.

Voters are not to be disfranchised under such circumstances any more than the acts of de facto officers are to be held invalid in collateral proceedings. The committee hold that these votes were legally cast, and do not enter upon any investigation of the evidence as to who got the benefit of them.

(c) The committee have given the presumption in favor of actual residence, as against a claimed intent to return to an abandoned residence when the intent only appears by the act of voting.

We have refused to reject the votes of actual residence even when it appears that the voter had been in the habit of calling a former residence his home.

It is quite clear that at this election a strong effort was made to bring back to the State all absentees who had formerly resided in the district, and who had not lived abroad long enough to acquire a right to vote.

Some election officers seem to have adopted the erroneous view that a an retains his right to vote in his old home until he acquires a right to vote elsewhere.

Residence may be acquired in a day, but the right to vote may depend on the length of residence. There are several other illegal votes in the list challenged by contestant, but no evidence deemed admissible by the committee as to how they voted. These have been left out of consideration, the committee adhering to the rules laid down in Smith v. Jackson, reported at this session.

(d) The minority views set forth certain principles as to the determination of the candidate for whom an illegal vote was thrown:

These voters either testified themselves for whom they voted, or it was shown satisfactorily that they were pronounced in their political opinions at the time of the election, or that they declared on the day of election which ticket they had voted, or that they were accompanied to the polls by-well-known party workers, or that their votes were challenged by the supporters of one and their right to vote defended by the supporters of the other ticket, or like circumstances, raising a strong and legal presumption as to the ticket they voted and the candidate for whom they voted.

This was as much latitude as we believe the law as heretofore generally administered in this House would allow and, in our opinion, the extreme limit to which sound public policy, the security of elections, and the ends of justice in this case, as well as all others in this or future Congresses will permit.

As to another class of votes the minority say:

But we have not deducted any of these votes, for the reason that the proof as to how they voted does not come within the rule already stated. As to class 1, the testimony simply shows that they were considered or reputed to be Democrats, but when they had expressed themselves, or what opportunities the witnesses had for ascertaining their sentiments, does not appear. As to class 2, the testimony is of the same character, only differing in this, that they were considered or reputed to be Republicans.

In a country like this, where the political opinions of voters are constantly changing and new issues are constantly springing up, where party votes fluctuate from year to year and majorities shift from one side to the other, where each of the two great dominant parties strain every nerve in every campaign to convert those who have been in the ranks of its enemy to its policy, and the other weaker parties seek to gather strength from both, we think it would be dangerous, indeed, to hold that a Democrat or Republican in 1884, or even later, was presumptively a Democrat or Republican in 1888. Particularly strong does this reasoning apply, in our opinion, to the election of 1888. In that election a most important issue, which had been dormant at least for years, sprung into preeminent prominence and became at once the shibboleth of both the Democratic and Republican parties. In many sections former party lines were broken; Republican communities became Democratic, and vice versa. It is a well-recognized fact that it was an election of surprises to both parties.

But without pursuing this line of argument further, we think that the authorities are almost uniform in support of the proposition that mere proof that a voter was considered or reputed to belong to a particular party is not admissible to show how he voted at an election, and certainly not unless it appear conclusively no better evidence could have been procured.

The majority report did not bring these principles distinctly in issue.

The majority of the committee, in accordance with their conclusions, found a majority of 49 votes for contestant, and reported this resolution:

Resolved, That George W. Atkinson was duly elected a Representative to the Fifty-first Congress from the First Congressional district of West Virginia at the election held November 6, 1888, instead of John O. Pendleton, and that mid George W. Atkinson is entitled to his seat as such Representative.

The minority found a majority of 25 votes for contestant, and reported these resolutions:

Resolved, That George W. Atkinson was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the First Congressional district of West Virginia, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That John O. Pendleton was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the First Congressional district of West Virginia, and is entitled to his seat therein.

The report was debated at length on February 26 and 27, 1890,[1] and on the latter day the question was taken on substituting the minority for the majority proposition, and decided in the negative, yeas 142, nays 159. Then the resolution of the majority was agreed to, yeas 162, nays 0, the Speaker counting a quorum.

Then Mr. Atkinson appeared and took the oath.

1022. The Arkansas election case of Featherston v. Cate, in the Fifty-first Congress.

Forcible usurpation of county offices whereby the entire election machinery of the county was placed in the hands of one party, in violation of law, with subsequent fraudulent acts, constituted evidence of a conspiracy.

A county clerk having failed to forward certain returns to State canvassers, the House admitted a certified copy of the returns on file as evidence of the vote.

On February 19, 1890,[2] Mr. L. C. Houk, of Tennessee, presented the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Arkansas case of Featherston v. Cate.

[2] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 306; Rowell, p. 77.

The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 1,348 votes over contestant. The latter assailed this majority, alleging conspiracy, intimidation, and fraud. The examination of the case involved the discussion of several questions:

(1) The majority of the committee found evidence which they considered sufficient to establish a conspiracy to defraud in Crittenden County. Contestant was a member of a political association known as the "Wheel," and was supported not only by members of that order, but also by the Republican party. Sitting Member admitted that the Wheel had drawn many men from his own party—a sufficient number to make political conditions in the district uncertain. Crittenden County was one of the counties where contestant would naturally receive a large vote.

It appeared from the testimony that on July 12, 1888, a mob armed with rifles seized certain country officers and others, and drove them out of the county, it being asserted by members of the mob at the time that "this is a white man's country and we will control it. We been waiting for two years for this thing, and you got to get out." The report of the committee continues:

In determining the object of a conspiracy the law is that you may refer to the acts, words, and conduct of the conspirators to fathom and ascertain its existence and purpose, intent, etc. It is apparent from the evidence that a conspiracy existed and that the conspirators had made up their minds to wrest the political control of Crittenden County from the Republicans, who had held it for many years.

This could not be done by obtaining a majority of the votes, for it contained a Republican majority of at least 2,000, and there was no dissension in the party.

By examining the statutes of Arkansas in relation to elections it will be found that the county judge, the county court clerk, and the sheriff are important factors in conducting elections.

In the county judge is vested the appointment of all the judges of election. The clerk creates the county board of canvassers; and the sheriff, through his deputies, at every poll, is a power for good or evil they can faithfully execute the law and protect the ballot box, or they can wickedly violate the law and debauch the suffrage. That the conspirators seized upon and obtained these offices is not denied. It therefore becomes pertinent to inquire, as a means of ascertaining the purpose of the conspiracy, whether the power of these offices was exercised in accordance with the law or as a mean to aid the conspiracy to place the county under the political control of about one-sixth of its legal voters.

For this purpose we will now examine the laws of Arkansas relating to elections, and after quoting the law, try to ascertain whether it was complied with in good faith.

"HOW AND BY WHOM JUDGES ARE APPOINTED.

"SEC. 2654. The county court, at its last term held more than thirty days before any general election, shall appoint three discreet persons, in each township, having the qualifications of electors, to act as judges of election within the township." (Mansfield's Digest of Arkansas.)

Under this provision the judges of election must be appointed at the July term of the county court. It was in July the Democrats exiled the Republican county judge, with others.

"JUDGES SHALL BE OF DIFFERENT POLITICAL PARTIES.

"SEC. 2757. The judges of election appointed by the county court, or chosen by the assembled electors, under the provisions of this act shall, if practicable, be from different political parties, so that each party may be represented, and they shall, in addition to the qualifications required by the constitution and this act, be able to read and write." (Mansfield's Digest of Arkansas.)

At the time the Republican county judge was exiled he had appointed the judges of election according to law, so that each political party was represented.

After the exiling of the Republican judge and the office had been seized and appropriated by the Democrats, the Democratic county judge, who had come into possession of the office by reason of the conspiracy, revoked these appointments and appointed all of the judges of election from the Democratic party.

After quoting the law as to the providing of ballot boxes, poll books, etc., the report goes on:

Instead of the county court procuring the ballot boxes, as the law requires, the Democratic sheriff procured fraudulent ballot boxes, one of which is produced in evidence in this case.

Instead of delivering the poll books, as required by law, for the November election, he neglected to perform that duty, but left that matter to the wisdom and discretion of the Democratic sheriff.

There was also evidence that the partisans of sitting Member endeavored by corrupt means to keep their opponents from putting a county ticket in the field. In conclusion on this point the report says:

The lawlessness of the partisans of the contestee is fully shown; that the title to the office of the county judge, who appointed the judges of election of and from the Democratic party, was based on fraud and violence; that the county clerk, whose duty it was to certify the November vote to the secretary of state, obtained his office by the same and like means, and that the judges of election were chosen as agencies by and through which the frauds were to be committed and were committed does not admit of question, or they would not have used the fraudulent ballot box.

We have already said the evidence fully establishes the conspiracy.

The majority then proceed to consider results at several precincts in Crittenden County.

(a) The county clerk failed to certify to the secretary of state the votes cast for contestant in seven townships at which elections were held, and in which, as it afterwards appeared, contestant proved a majority of 531 votes for himself. The laws of Arkansas provided that the clerk of the county with certain assistants should canvass the votes, and further provided:

"SEC. 2699. Informality in the certificate of the judges and clerks at any election held in any township shall not be good cause for rejecting the poll books of said township." (Mansfield's Digest of Arkansas.)

"PENALTY FOR FAILURE TO COUNT THE VOTE.

"SEC. 2701. Should any clerk of the county court and the two accompanying justices, or householders, or either of them, under any circumstances reject or refuse to count the vote on any poll book of any election held by the people, such rejection or refusal by such clerk, etc., or either of them, shall be deemed a high misdemeanor," etc. (Mansfield's Digest of Arkansas.)

The report goes on:

"(In Patton v. Coates, 41 Arkansas.)

"These sections being under construction, the supreme court of Arkansas said:

"'The board of canvassers of an election have no judicial discretion whatever. They are merely for the purpose of a fair and correct computation of the votes, under public surveillance, presented to them by the clerk.'"

In view of these sections of the Arkansas election law, and the construction thereof by the highest court of the State, the failure of the clerk to certify the returns of the seven townships alluded to is simply a willful disregard of duty, but no greater than those indulged in by the county judge and sheriff.

For the purpose of procuring the evidence in relation to the vote of the seven townships, W. B. Eldridge, one of the attorneys of the contestant, went to the county seat of Crittenden County and obtained a certificate showing the returns were on file.

This certificate showed the vote of the seven townships and was signed by the clerk. As to this return and evidence of Mr. Eldridge the report quotes:

CLERK'S CERTIFICATE TO TRANSCRIPT.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Crittenden:

I, Saml. Keel, clerk of the circuit court, within and for the county and State aforesaid, do hereby certify that the annexed and foregoing pages contain a true and complete transcript of the above as therein set forth, and as the same appears of record, in my office at Marion, Crittenden County, Ark.

Witness my hand and official this 21st day of February, 1889.

[SEAL.]

SAML. KEEL, Clerk.

—— ——, D. C.

Q. I see from the face of the clerk's certificate that there is an assertion to the effect that the returns were not sworn to as the law directs. Please state the circumstances under which these words were put upon the face of the certificate.—A. It was dictated by Mr. Berry, the lawyer of Mr. Cate in this contest, to the clerk, who wrote it word for word at his dictation, and only gave me this abstract after mature consultation with Mr. Cate's lawyer. (Printed Record, pp. 227–228.)

The majority report considers this vote sufficiently proven, and ought to be allowed for contestant.

Returns being rejected for fraud, the statement of a witness who saw a definite number of votes thrown for contestant, corroborated by general testimony, was received as proof aliunde.

The friends of returned Member having prevented taking of testimony for contestant, the House did not require strict and technical proof in proving a vote aliunde.

Contestant having been prevented from proving his vote aliunde by intimidation, the House did not reject fraudulent returns made by partisans of contestee and giving contestant a plurality.

With no proof to show what the vote might have been, the House did not attempt to rectify the wrong caused by failure of election officers to open polls.

(b) The certificate of the clerk showed that in one of the seven townships, Scanlin, Mr. Cate received 61 votes and Mr. Featherston 2. After quoting testimony the report says:

It appears from this testimony that John Johnson saw 73 Republicans vote the Republican ticket, and that others voted after that; and that the Republican vote of the township was 112 or 113. E. B. Fields swears the judges were all Democrats and that they had the fraudulent tin box. Willis McGee swears that the judges were all Democrats, that there was a good turn-out of the Republicans, and that there was from 100 to 125 Republicans in the township. The return shows 2 votes for contestant.

On this state of proof the question is: How many votes should be allowed the contestant?

It was held in Bisbee v. Finley that—

"Where the evidence shows a return to be false, and not a true statement of the votes cast, such return is impeached and destroyed as evidence, and the true vote may be proven by calling the electors whose names are on the poll books as voting at such poll, and no votes not otherwise proven should be counted."

Under this rule, and we know of no exception to it, the return must be rejected.

The rejection of the return does not necessarily leave the votes actually cast at a precinct uncounted. It only declares that the returns, having been shown to be false, shall not be taken as true, and the parties are thrown back upon such other evidence as it may be in their power to produce in order to show how many votes and for whom; so that the entire vote, if sufficient pains be taken and the means are at hand, may be shown and not a single one be lost, notwithstanding the falsity of the returns.

The contestant shows that he received 73, and perhaps more, votes, and these, we think, should be allowed him. Deduct these from Cate's remaining majority and the vote stands thus:

Cate's majority	811
Deduct the	73
Leaving Cate's majority	738

The return having been overthrown, the contestee, having failed to prove any vote in the township, is not allowed the 61 returned for him.

(c) As to Cat Island precinct the report holds:

It appears from this testimony that the Republicans turned out well; that they did not scratch the ticket; that the fraudulent ballot box was used; that the Republicans before the election had met and agreed to vote their ticket at all hazards; that there were from 180 to 182 Republicans in the township; that the judges were all Democrats; that there were not more than 14 or 15 Democrats in the township; that there was a full vote by the Republicans; that the judges were not sworn; that the ballot box was so placed that the voter could not see it.

The return shows 120 for Featherston and 88 for contestee, and the question is, under the proof, what ought to be done?

The total vote cast is 208, and the proof is that there are but 15 Democrats in the township, and that the Republican did not scratch their ticket. By giving the Democrats their full vote, Featherston ought to have received 193 votes out of the 208, and he is returned as receiving 120.

In view of the conduct of the partisans of the contestee in Crittenden County whereby the contestant and his attorneys were prevented from taking testimony and which will be referred to hereafter, strict and technical proof will not be required.

We think the true rule was laid down in the case of Smalls v. Elliott (session of 1888–89), by the minority of the committee, where it is said:

"Contestee's partisan friends deliberately violate the law in suppressing the box, and contestee himself (acting through his counsel), by force and threat of violence, suppresses and hinders the judicial inquiry as to the box and its contents.

"Suppressio veri—suggestio falsi. All things are presumed against him who suppresses the truth and prevents inquiry.

"Shall contestee be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong and of the willful and criminal violation of the law by his partisan friends? Is the sin of the guilty to be visited on the innocent? Shall he who suppresses the best evidence by force, fraud, and violence stand up in the face of the court of last resort and insist that secondary evidence shall not be produced and admitted?"

In this case, assuming the testimony to be true, and we do not doubt but that it is true, it appears that before the election every provision looking to a fair and honest election was violated, and that after the election every attempt to show the true vote was suppressed by the partisans of the contestee.

We think the proof clearly shows that the contestee could not have received more than 15 votes in Cat Island Township, if that many. Therefore, we give to the contestant 73 votes more than were returned for him, and deduct 73 from the vote returned for contestee. These two changes aggregate 146. The result would then stand thus:

Cate's majority	738
Deduct the	146
Leaving Cate's majority	592

(d) As to Crawfordsville precinct the report holds:

It appears from this testimony that the fraudulent tin ballot box was used; that the judges of election were all Democrats; that there was a good turn out, the total vote polled being 395.

It was at this township the contestant went to take testimony and was prevented from so doing by the friends of the contestee.

The nearest approximation to proof of how the vote stood in that township is found in the testimony of E. D. Sanders (p. 200), where he says that the vote of the Republicans is about 6 to 1 of the Democrats, and when interrogated as to Crawfordsville he says that would not be a fair proportion for that township, nor does he say what would be.

The return from the township shows the following:

Cate	88
Featherston	147
Barrett	160
Total	395

It does not appear from the record who Barrett is, or what party put him in nomination, or whether there is any such man.

Had the contestant made proof of any vote received, as was done in Scanlan and Cat Island, we would set aside the return and give him the vote proven; but he has not done so. If we should set aside the return it would have to be done on suspicion, or from the fact that returns should not be regarded where the use of a fraudulent box is shown, and that the judges of election were all of the Democratic party in a strong Republican township. To set aside the return in a township where the contestant has a majority, but not as great as he claims it should be, in a case where he was prevented from making full proof of his vote, would be to reward the fraud complained of, and punish him for undertaking to expose it. Where there is no proof upon which we would be justified in setting aside the return, we therefore let it stand. As both parties have had credit for this vote, it having been certified to the secretary of state, it makes no change in the majority.

(e) As to failure to hold elections in two precincts the report rules:

The townships of Idlewild and Furgeson may be treated together. The proof shows that the judges of election at Idlewild were Democrats; that they failed to open the polls, and that the Republican majority in the precinct usually ranged from 100 to 125. It also shows that at Furgeson the judges of election were all Democrats; that they failed to open the polls, and that the Republican majority in the precinct is 115; i. e., this had been the usual Republican majority.

We know of no rule by which these votes can be counted under the state of proof as to these townships. The action of the Democratic judges in these precincts no doubt deprived the contestant of somewhere about 250 majority; but it is no worse, in fact not nearly so bad, as the conduct of the judges of election in Scanlan, Cat Island, and Crawfordsville in the use and manipulation of a fraudulent ballot box.

It is nearer on a level with the action of the county court clerk already referred to, who willfully failed to certify the vote of seven townships to the secretary of state. Nor is it quite as bad as the action of the county judge who appointed such creatures of a conspiracy as judges of election. But it does show that the conspiracy formed in July, 1888, to control the county of Crittenden politically, with less than one-sixth of the legal voters, was still alive and active in November in depriving the Republicans of their votes.

1024. The election case of Featherston v. Cate, continued.

The House, in an exceptional election case, admitted ex parte affidavits taken outside the district and State.

A question as to the making of a motion to suppress affidavits in the record of an election case.

The House may determine the vote of a county as settled by an agreement of the parties to the election case.

A recital of apparent facts in the notice of contestant, such as the figures, of a returned vote, may not be construed as a concession of the truth thereof.

Agents of contestee having intimidated contestant's witnesses, the House did not require the best evidence for proof aliunde of the vote.

(2) An important question arose as to the competency of the testimony taken as to Crittenden County. The report says:

There is objection to the testimony taken before Avery, a notary public at Memphis, Tenn., which testimony we have admitted and considered as competent in arriving at a conclusion in this case. The ground of objection is that the contestee did not have notice of the taking. The contestee does not deny that Berry, the person upon whom it is claimed notice was served, was his attorney, but his claim is the technical one that he was not his attorney for taking depositions outside of Crittenden County. The technical character of this objection is still more apparent when it is remembered that the record shows that Berry was employed to take the testimony relating to Crittenden County.

It appears from the testimony objected to that contestant with his attorneys went to Crittenden County and there met Berry, the attorney of contestee; that before going there an understanding existed that Berry should act as notary public to take depositions; that in the face of this agreement he declined to so act; that a justice of the peace was asked to take the testimony and refused; that there was danger of violence, and threats were made calculated to produce the belief that bloodshed would follow; that under that state of facts Berry was notified as the attorney of contestee that the testimony in relation to that county would be taken at No. 59 Madison street, Memphis, Tenn., at 9 o'clock, on February 25, 1889.

We think under this state of facts notice to Berry would be sufficient, for it related to the taking of the very testimony which he was employed to take. It will not do to say that Berry's employment ended when contestee's partisan friends had succeeded in preventing the taking of testimony in Crittenden County. W. B. Eldridge (pp. 226, 227) testifies:

"Q. Did you all go with Berry, the lawyer of Cate, and did he say anything about acting as notary public?—A. He said he would act as notary public, which he afterwards refused to do.

"Q. Did you all take any depositions there?—A. We did not.

"Q. What was the reason for not taking depositions?—A. We could not get a notary public; there was a magistrate there, but he refused to act, and Mr. Berry refused, contrary to his promise and our expectations."

After detailing his treatment at Crawfordsville, in Crittenden County, in response to a question he states:

"I notified L. P. Berry, the attorney of Mr. Cate, that Mr. Featherston would take proof in Memphis, Tenn., at my office, on the Congressional contest; and on February 24, Walsh (an attorney) and myself both notified Mr. Berry that we would begin taking proof at 59 Madison street, Memphis, Tenn., at 9 o'clock, February 25, 1889."

Contestee produces an ex parte affidavit from Mr. Berry, his attorney, denying notice to take depositions at Memphis, and now asks that these depositions be suppressed, and this request was made for the first time after the printing of the record.

The act of Congress of March 2, 1887, provides among other things that—

"Before the record is printed the Clerk of the House shall notify the parties to be present at a day named at the opening of the testimony, and of agreeing upon the parts thereof to be printed; that the depositions shall be opened in the presence of the parties or their attorneys, and that such portion of the testimony as the parties may agree upon shall be printed; that in case of disagreement between the parties, the Clerk shall decide what portion of the testimony shall be printed."

The intent and object of this statute is obvious. Had it been followed the testimony now complained of might not have appeared in the printed record. Had it been followed, the objection of the contestee, now interposed, would have been made known and the contestant would have been placed in a position to elect whether he deemed the testimony of sufficient importance to make application to the committee or the House for permission and time in which to retake it. Instead of pursuing that course no objection to the printing of the testimony now objected to appears to have been made. It is said that this testimony had not been filed at the time the parties appeared before the Clerk of the House. It does appear from the Clerk's record "that on account of the nonreceipt" of certain packages of testimony for contestant he was granted further time in which to file testimony.

It is not improbable, indeed it is probable, to say the least, that the attention of the contestee was at that time called to the character and contents of the testimony the contestant was thus granted leave to file.

In the case of Lowry v. White, Fiftieth Congress, after the record was printed, motions were filed by both parties during the consideration of the case by the committee to exclude certain portions of the testimony, and these motions were denied, and the attention of the parties was called to this statute, and in the syllabus this language is found:

"No part of the testimony submitted in a case will be suppressed where the parties fail to take advantage of the statutory provisions allowing parties to agree upon what portion of the record shall be printed prior to the hearing of the case."

In the case of a judgment by default the court will not set aside the judgment unless the defendant can show a good defense to the action.

In the case of a decree pro confesso the decree will not be set aside unless a meritorious defense is shown.

If the contestee had filed a motion to suppress the depositions, on the ground he was taken by surprise, and alleged that he could disprove the state of facts shown by them, he would stand in a much better light than he now does. He now makes an objection which should have been made under the act of March 2, 1887, before the record was printed. After the record was printed he must have had knowledge of these depositions. Had he then filed a motion to suppress them he would stand in a much better light, but he failed to do so and does not tender any excuse now for that failure. Had he notified the contestant, on the receipt of the printed record, of an intention to file a motion to suppress these depositions, if such was his intention, he would have performed a commendable act, and would have at that time placed the contestant on notice. Instead of doing so, however, he remained silent until after contestant filed his brief, and then, instead of filing a motion to suppress, contented himself until he could afterwards raise the question of a want of notice. Instead of coming here and insisting that he has a meritorious defense to the matters charged in relation to Crittenden County, and asking time to establish that defense by proof, he simply asks us to suppress the testimony taken by the contestant, showing and tending to show fraud, violence, and intimidation, before and at the election, and threats and danger of violence to those who proposed to make proof of the frauds.

It appears from the testimony of Eldridge, the attorney of contestant, that Berry, the attorney of contestee, was notified of the time and place at which the contestant proposed to take depositions, and it appears that a copy of the printed record was sent to the contestee on the 15th of September, 1889.

The long silence of contestee on the question of notice, after he received a copy of the printed record, and the neglect to exercise his right to object before the record was printed, and no tender of proof made to contradict what is shown by the testimony, are facts from which the inference arises that the testimony can not be contradicted, and is in the nature of a tacit admission of the existence of the state of facts shown by the depositions.

We find these depositions in the printed record, and find the contestee made no objection to them before they went there; we find that after they had appeared in the printed record he did not file any objection or protest with the Clerk of the House because they were placed there; we find that after he saw them in the printed record he failed to notify the contestant that he would object to them. Being a lawyer of experience, and having been a judge, contestee's silence and failure to offer more tangible defense than mere technical objections can only be accounted for by the assumption that he has no real defense.

In view of these facts we are of opinion that the testimony should not be suppressed. We are not deciding that testimony may be taken without notice, though there are authorities which, under the facts of this case, would justify the admission of ex parte evidence. We might quote, to sustain even this view, from Bisbee v. Finley, Buchanan v. Manning, and Thoebe v. Carlisle et al., but as we do not decide on the question of ex parte evidence, in the admission of the depositions in this case, it is unnecessary.

Under the broad provisions of the Constitution, making each House of Congress "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members," it would seem that we are not bound by the strict rules of evidence known to the "common law." But we are not deciding that question. What we are deciding is, that where depositions are found in the printed record, or where they appear in the printed record, and no objection is made to the Clerk of the House or to the opposite party, the party failing to object at the earliest opportunity, or at least within reasonable time, so as to put the opposite party on notice, will be deemed to have waived all question of notice, especially where there is no offer of proof to show a different state of facts than those shown by the depositions.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. J. H. Outhwaite, of Ohio, oppose this view:

We shall now discuss the question whether testimony taken as this was should be considered by the House, and weigh it for its worth. As we have repeated, it was taken without notice and in violation of law.

Act of March 2, 1875 (Laws 2, 43, p. 338): It is provided that the party desiring to take depositions under the provisions of this act shall give the opposite party notice in writing of the time and place when and where the same will be taken; of the name of the witness to be taken, and their places [his place] of residence, and of the name of the officer before whom the same will be taken.

To pretend not to evade these requirements of the law W. B. Eldridge says in his deposition:

"I notified L. P. Berry, the attorney of Mr. Cate, that Featherston would take proof in Memphis, Tenn., at my office on February 24, 1889. Walsh and myself both notified Berry that we would begin taking proof at 59 Madison street, Memphis, Tenn., February 25, 1889."

We here introduce the affidavit of Mr. Berry, which flatly contradicts Mr. Eldridge upon this point:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, County of Crittenden:

I, L. P. Berry, an attorney at law, resident at Marion, Crittenden County, Ark., being sworn, do state that I have before me a printed copy of the evidence in the case of L. P. Featherston v. W. R. Cate in the contest for a seat in the Fifty-first Congress of the United States from the first district of Arkansas, wherein it appears, on page 227 of said printed record, that one W. B. Eldridge states or testifies as follows: "I notified Mr. L. P. Berry, the attorney of Mr. Cate, that Mr. Featherston would take proof at Memphis, Tenn., at my office on the Congressional contest; on February 23 Mr. Henry Walsh and myself both notified Mr. Berry that we would begin taking proof at 59 Madison street, Memphis, Tenn., at 9 o'clock on February 23, 1889," and I further state that this statement is untrue and without any foundation in fact; that Mr. Eldridge and Mr. Walsh did not give me any such notice, nor either of them, as he states, and I never knew of evidence relating to Crittenden County until I saw it printed in the record, nor do I to this day know at what place said supposed evidence was taken.

I further state that I was only authorized to act for Mr. Cate as his attorney in said county so far as related to taking proof in Crittenden County, Ark., and had no authority to represent him or take proof elsewhere, or accept, receive, or waive any notice relative to taking proof elsewhere.

L. P. BERRY.

SAM'L KEEL, Clerk.

BY O. M. TUFTS, D. C.

If, however there were no questions of the truthfulness of Mr. Featherston's lawyer, it is clear that the notice could not have been in writing giving contestee the material facts concerning the witnesses to be examined. It was a plain violation of the law in that respect for some covert reason.

"The officer shall cause the testimony of the witnesses, together with the questions proposed by the parties or their agents, to be reduced to writing in his presence and in the presence of the parties or their agents, if attending, and to be duly attested by the witnesses respectively." (Rev. Stat., sec 122.)

The certificate of the notary, E. M. Avery (p. 185 of the record), shows that this provision of law was violated. Although he attempts to give the impression that the words of the witnesses were reduced to writing by typewriter and submitted to witnesses and attested by them, he says the shorthand reporter's notes are herewith transmitted, etc.

The performances with the witnesses he said occurred in February and early in March. His certificate is dated July 13, and upon the original papers on file in the committee room the names are all signed by typewriter, even of those who are represented as signing their own names, except Eldridge's and one other's.

"All officers taking testimony to be used in a contested election case, whether by deposition or otherwise, shall, when the taking of the same is completed and without unnecessary delay, certify and carefully seal and immediately forward the same by mail or express to the Clerk of the House of Representatives." (Act approved Mar. 2, 1887.)

This provision of the law is also disregarded. What good reason can be given for this unlawful course? In this case the legal time for taking testimony closed April 15. As required by statute the Clerk of the House of Representatives notified parties that they should appear before him June 28 for the purpose of being present at the opening of the sealed packages of testimony and of agreeing upon the parts thereof to be printed. They came here. Only part of the depositions were in the hands of the Clerk. None of those taken in Memphis were on file.

Contestant asked for further time, which was granted, and contestee remained here waiting until July 7; but these papers were not filed. On July 21 they were at last filed. Contestee never saw them or learned their contents until a printed copy of them reached his hands late in September. The contestant and his attorneys have never attempted any explanation or offered any excuse for this extraordinary, suspicious, and illegal delay. The contestee was without any opportunity to be present and see and hear these witnesses while they were telling their tales or to cross-examine them or to bring proof subsequently to explain or contradict their statements. Their record is full of the abuses which occurred under such circumstances.

(3) In four other counties of the district, Phillips, Cross, St. Francis, and Lee, certain questions arose, some like those already discussed and others different.

(a) The report says:

There is an agreement in the record as to the vote of Phillips County, whereby it is agreed that the contestant is to have 57 more votes than were returned for him, and that the contestee is to have 57 votes stricken from his returned vote, and that the contestant is to be credited with a majority of 18 in Hickory Ridge Township. These numbers added together make 132, which should be deducted from Cate's majority.

(b) As to Independence, in Lee County, this question is set forth in the report:

Here, then, is a case where we have 239 votes not counted for anyone for Congress, and this, too, in the face of testimony of witnesses saying the Republicans turned out well and were in the majority and voting the party ticket.

The contestee claims that the contestant has admitted that he received 224 votes in Independence Township and can not now invoke the protection of that rule where the return is overthrown and the parties put to proof.

The view we take of the matter renders it unnecessary to pass upon the question of estoppel.

What is claimed as a concession by the contestant, that the contestee received 224 votes in this township, is contained in the notice of contest on page 7, as follows:

"That at the precinct of Independence, in the county of Lee, in said district, at an election held on the 6th day of November, 1888, I received 397 votes and you received 224 votes; that the election officers of said township, who are partisans of yours, through fraud or mistake, returned that I received 89 votes, and that you received 224; that the votes as thus returned by the election officers of said township were by the county clerk of said county certified to the secretary of state, and by him laid before the governor of said State, and by him counted in determining the number of votes cast for each of us for Representative in said district. I shall therefore claim on contest that I be allowed 308 more votes than were returned and certified for me from said township."

This is not a concession that contestee received 224 legal votes, but is in the nature of a recital of the state of facts which he would be able to establish by proof.

This was at the inception of the contest, when contestant may not have had full information.

But be that as it may the recitals in the notice can have none of the sanctity and binding force of an agreement or stipulation and can not be construed into a concession.

The contestee did not treat this statement as a concession that he received 224 votes, but on the contrary he filed the following answer:

"As to the precinct of Independence, in the county of Lee, I deny all the charges of fraud and mistake, and say that the votes were correctly counted, returned, and certified. I deny that you received 397 votes, but you received 89 votes, and I received 244 votes in said precinct or township." (Record, p. 17.)

Instead of the record making a stipulation or concession that contestee had received 224 legal votes, the number of legal votes was not admitted by contestant, nor was the alleged concession accepted as such by the contestee in lieu of evidence, but he set up a claim to 244 votes instead of 224, which he now claims as having been conceded.

(c) Also the report rules as to testimony:

Only one witness was examined in Independence Township. The witness giving the testimony on leaving the stand was arrested for perjury and placed under $1,000 bond to answer to the State court. The attorney for contestee from that time on proclaimed he would cause the arrest of all persons who testified for contestant if he thought they testified falsely.

After that time testimony was taken in relation to that township outside of the county.

The conduct of the contestee's attorney could have but one object and effect, and that was to intimidate other witnesses. There is direct testimony from one witness, and no attempt was made to impeach him, showing that 92 votes went into the box for the contestant. The returns show 89 for Featherston and 224 for the contestee. There is enough evidence to impeach the return and put the parties to proof. The friends of the contestee in Independence Township, like his friends in Crittenden County, prevented fall proof being made, and can not complain if we apply the rule as to Independence Township that was applied to Scanlan and Cat Island, which we do. Full proof of the vote was not allowed to be made, and in such a case he who prevented it should suffer, if any one.

We have no hesitation in adopting this rule in relation to this township, because the contestee knew of the proof made by the contestant. He could have taken proof and shown his true vote. He elected to rely on intimidation of contestant's witnesses, and must abide the consequences of his election. He was at liberty to have shown that 319 of the persons voting at that election did not vote for either candidate for Congress, and thus have explained why it was that the contestant ran behind the Republican electors, but he has not done so.

The result is, that the contestee must lose 224 votes returned for him, and the contestant must be allowed 3 more votes than were returned for him.

In accordance with their reasonings, the majority found that the contestant was elected by a majority of 86 votes, and reported these resolutions:

Resolved, That W. H. Cate was not elected as a Representative to the Fifty-first Congress from the First Congressional district of the State of Arkansas, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That L. P. Featherston was duly elected as a Representative from the First Congressional district of the State of Arkansa to the Fifty-first Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

The minority considered that sitting Member was entitled to a majority of 595, and recommended resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

The report was debated at length on March 1, 3, 4, and 5,[1] and on the latter day the question was first taken on substituting the proposition of the minority declaring contestant not elected, and this was disagreed to, yeas 138, nays 144.

Then a motion to recommit with instructions that an investigation should be made in the district as to the elections was disagreed to, yeas 138, nays 147.

The question then recurred on the first resolution proposed by the majority, and it was agreed to, yeas 147, nays 138.

Then the second resolution was agreed to, yeas 145, nays 135.

Thereupon Mr. Featherston appeared and took the oath.

1025. The Alabama election case of Threet v. Clarke, in the Fifty-first Congress.

Evidence of a conspiracy of election officers to defraud may not be sustained by contradicted testimony of two or more persons who declare they saw more votes cast for contestant than were returned.

Voters being prevented by no fault of their own from obtaining the registration certificates required for voting, the House counted the votes as if cast.

---

[1] Record, pp. 1843, 1888, 1907, 1943–1955; Journal, pp. 306–308.

The illiteracy of election officers having prevented the ascertainment of any substantiated return, the House rejected the poll.

Failure to give party representation on election boards, when the same is required by law and practicable, is evidence of conspiracy to defraud.

Although there may be evidence establishing a conspiracy to defraud, it is still necessary to show effects in order to change the result.

On February 21, 1890,[1] Mr. Nils P. Haugen, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the Alabama case of Threet v. Clarke.

The report, after giving the table of the votes, says:

A plurality for contestee of 4,488 on the face of the returns. This plurality the contestant contends was obtained by systematic frauds on the part of the inspectors and clerks of election in counting votes in fact cast for contestant as having been cast for contestee in a number of precincts, large enough to have elected him (contestant) had the returns been honestly made. The contestant in his brief describes the method pursued by his party friends at the polls, and the evidence he relies upon to establish the charges of conspiracy to defraud him as follows:

"At every beat or voting precinct two or more leading Republicans would give out the Republican ballots to their Republican friends, and two or more trusted Republicans would watch and witness that they were voted; each kept an accurate account of the number of tickets he gave out and the number he saw voted. The contestant put these witnesses on the stand to prove these facts, and the vote proven was almost in the inverse ratio of the vote as counted by the precinct officers.

"Such is the status of the present contest and mainly the character of the testimony of the contestant."

The charges of contestant are confined to the four counties of Choctaw, Clarke, Marengo, and Monroe, and only to those precincts in said four counties hereinafter discussed.

It appears upon examination of the evidence that the contestant has strictly confined himself to the method of proof described in his brief.

The majority review the testimony taken after the above-described method, and while admitting that standing alone and uncontradicted it would overcome the prima facie character of the returns, yet is not sufficient to overturn the return when rebutted by testimony showing that the proceedings were fair and legal.

The report says:

If the results at all these polls were, as alleged by contestant, tainted by fraud and corruption to such an extent that the polls should be excluded, he has failed, in the opinion of your committee, to exercise that diligence which the law asks of every suitor before granting him the relief prayed for. Bearing in mind that the character and tendency of the proof is very similar in all these precincts, the contestant might reasonably have been expected to have, at least, in one or few of them, called in the body of the voters of the precinct and established his claim of fraud, if fraud existed, beyond question. He does not even pretend to have made an effort to do so in this contest, but tries to excuse his want of effort in this respect because, as he alleges, in some previous contest that course had failed.

To quote from his brief:

"To call the voters themselves was the best and surest means of successfully proving that the count was fraudulent. When this was attempted by the contestant the contestee would cross-examine each witness for three days, and in some instances a whole week, asking the witness all about the Bible and the history of the world from Adam down. (See testimony in the contest of McDuffie v. Davidson, Fiftieth Congress.) The object of this proceeding was to consume time, and as the contestant only had forty days allowed by law in which to take testimony in chief, it can be readily seen how difficult, if not impossible, it was to secure sufficient proof from the voters to establish the fraud, as only a few could be examined by reason of the obstructive tactics of the contestee."

---

[1] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 363; Rowell, p. 175.

It is only fair to the contestee to say that the evidence fails to disclose that any of the obstructive methods mentioned in contestant's brief were resorted to by him, and he can not be held responsible for the sins of his predecessors. A close examination of the record bears evidence that the taking of testimony was conducted in a very leisurely manner on the part of contestant, and that, although the number of his witnesses is relatively small, his side of the case was not closed until the middle of March.

In Jefferson beat he calls 3 witnesses to prove the alleged frauds; contestee calls 13 to prove the honesty and fairness of the election.

So in Linden, contestant calls 2 witnesses, contestee 12; in Macon, contestant 2, contestee 5; McKinley, contestant 4, contestee 3; Nixon's Store, contestant 2, contestee 3; Spring Hill, contestant 2, contestee 8; Shiloh, contestant 3, contestee 11.

In Choctaw County the majority of the committee decided to count certain votes tendered but not received at Mount Sterling beat:

The contestant charges that at this precinct he was deprived of 59 votes for the reason that the regularly appointed registrar refused to issue to that number of Republican voters proper certificates of their registration. It seems to be conceded by witnesses for contestee that 59 voters with tickets having the name of contestant upon them appeared and offered to vote, but were refused because they could not furnish certificates of registration, the registrar about 10 o'clock a.m. refusing to issue further certificates, stating that he was out of blanks, and shortly afterwards being called away; that several hours intervened before the inspectors offered to appoint another registrar, which they finally did, failing, however, to find any person willing to serve.

It is not charged that the registrar acted fraudulently in refusing to continue to issue certificates. His supply of blanks seems to have been exhausted, and he was called away to attend the sick bed of his father-in-law, who, in fact, died a few days later. The probate judge of the county, who was present according to his own testimony, between 3 and 4 o'clock p.m., with the consent of the inspectors, offered to swear, orally, those who had previously voted in the precinct, and the inspectors offered to receive the votes of those so sworn.

But there is no evidence showing how many of the 59 voters yet remained at the polls or how many of them, being legal voters, had previously voted at the precinct.

Section 2007, Revised Statutes of the United States, reads as follows:

"Whenever under the constitution or laws of any State, or the laws of any Territory, any act is required to be done by a citizen as a prerequisite to qualify or entitle him to vote, the offer of such citizen to perform the act required to be done, shall, if it fail to be carried into execution, by reason of the wrongful act or omission of the person or officer charged with the duty of receiving or permitting such performance, or offer to perform or acting thereon, be deemed and held as a performance in law of such act; and the person so offering and failing to vote, and being otherwise qualified, shall be entitled to vote in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had in fact performed such act."

Under this law the 59 votes at the precinct under discussion must be counted for contestant.

In Clarke County the majority rejected the poll of Gainesville precinct:

The returning officer was the only officer of election who appeared at the opening of the poles on the day of election.

He proceeded, at the instance of contestant's friends, to appoint three inspectors, who were chosen from the colored party friends of contestant. These appointed two clerks.

This was in pursuance of section 262, Code of Alabama, 1876. Two of these inspectors and one of the clerks testify on behalf of contestant, and from their testimony it appears that the election proceeded quietly until about 3 o'clock p.m., when during a lull in the voting and following a seemingly well-established custom in that precinct the election officers opened the ballot box and proceeded to count the votes cast. It then transpired that none of the inspectors could read the ballots. This broke up the election and the ballot box was carried off by the returning officer, seemingly without protest or objection.

One of the inspectors swears that 179 votes had been cast at the time the balloting was interrupted. His testimony also tends to show that 4 of these were white men and the rest colored. There is no evidence showing how these parties voted.

The voters were not called as witnesses, and no effort has been made to ascertain how the votes actually cast stood, and the committee can find no precedent for counting the 175 votes claimed by contestant for him. If these votes were cast for him, he has failed to show it, and the failure to have the true result declared was caused by no fault or fraud of contestee or his party friends, unless the failure of the regularly appointed inspectors of election to act be considered a fraud, but was occasioned wholly by the illiteracy of the party friends of contestant.

There can be no effective citizenship that is not based upon intelligence and education sufficient to take part in the active administration of the laws.

As to Monroe County the report says:

Section 259, Code of Alabama, provides:

"SEC. 259. Inspectors and precinct returning officers, how appointed.—The judge of probate, sheriff, clerk of the circuit court, or any two of them, must, at least thirty days before the holding of any election in their county, appoint three inspectors for each place of voting, two of which shall be members of opposing political parties, if practicable, and one returning officer for each precinct to act at the place of holding elections in each precinct; and it shall be the duty of the sheriff to notify such inspectors and returning officers of their appointment within ten days after such appointment."

The testimony of Anthony R. Davison, chairman of the Republican executive committee of Monroe County, is to the effect that he prepared lists of inspectors in the various precincts, one for each precinct who could read and write, and who were reputed to be good Republicans, and gave the list to the sheriff, and requested the board to appoint them. They were not appointed, but men were appointed in lieu of them who could not read and write, or were not Republicans, but they were all colored men, and some of them had been recognized by Republicans as being colored Democrats for years.

The majority of the committee hold that such conduct on the part of the appointing power "ought of itself to be considered evidence of conspiracy to defraud on the part of the election officers." But the contestant only took evidence as to two precincts in the county.

And as to the district, the contestant failed to show that the number of votes counted for contestee illegally or as the result of such frauds was sufficient to change the result of the election.

Therefore the majority reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That Richard H. Clarke was duly elected a Representative to the Fifty-first Congress of the United States from the First Congressional district of Alabama at an election held November 6, 1888, and is entitled to a seat therein, and that Frank H. Threet was not elected a Representative at said election.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, concurred in the recommendation of the report, but did not agree to the reasoning.

On March 7, 1890,[1] the resolution was agreed to by the House without debate or division.

1026. The Virginia election case of Waddill, jr., v. Wise, in the Fifty-first Congress.

The House decided that the votes of duly qualified voters, in line and ready to vote but fraudulently prevented, should be counted as if cast.

Votes received at an outside poll by a United States commissioner and confirmed by evidence of the voters themselves were counted by the House.

Discussion as to what constitutes a tender or offer to vote.

On March 31, 1890,[2] Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, from the Committee on [1] Record, p. 2007; Journal, p. 315.

[2] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 1182; Rowell, p. 205.

Elections, submitted from the majority of that committee the report in the Virginia case of Waddill, jr., v. Wise.

The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 261 votes.

The report states the issue involved:

The pivotal question in the case is as to whether certain votes in Jackson ward, in the city of Richmond, shall be counted. If these votes, or such of them as are clearly shown, should be counted for the contestant the contestant is entitled to the seat, but if the votes in question are not counted the contestant is not elected.

It is claimed by contestant that in Jackson ward 722 legal voters were wrongfully prevented from voting; that these voters were lawfully registered and qualified electors; that they presented themselves in line on the day of the election prepared to take their turns in voting, and had in their hands, ready to deposit, ballots properly prepared to cast for the contestant for Member of Congress.

That the partisans and friends of the contestee hindered and obstructed these voters by making frivolous challenges of lawful voters, and that the judges of the election colluded with and aided the challengers in delaying the casting of the ballots by entertaining such challenges, by consuming unnecessary time in hearing and taking action upon them, and by making needless explanations to the voters as to the effect of certain, constitutional amendments which were being voted on at the election; that by needless and fraudulent delays in receiving and depositing the ballots, these 722 voters were prevented from casting their votes for contestant. Contestant further claims that 557 of said voters thus prevented from voting remained in line at the time of the closing of the polls, and that thereupon United States commissioners prepared ballot boxes and received the ballots of such voters and deposited the same in the boxes and preserved the same, which ballots were in evidence before the committee.

The votes thus in controversy are confined to three precincts of Jackson ward. Of these voters 457 were examined as witnesses.

The evidence clearly shows that from 457 to 722 legal voters ineffectually attempted to cast their ballots for the contestant in Jackson ward. It will not be necessary to discuss the evidence as to the exact number, for if this class of votes is to be counted for contestant he would be entitled to his seat upon the smallest number that the evidence could be fairly held to show. We are of the opinion that at the least 457 of such votes are clearly shown, which is more than sufficient to overcome the majority of 261 returned for contestee.

The report goes on to quote testimony to show that the delay in the voting was in pursuance of a conspiracy entered into by the party friends of sitting Member, saying:

The plan complained of by Mr. Duncan was carried out fully by adherents of the contestee and resulted in the exclusion of more than enough votes for contestant to change the result. The object of the persons engaged in this mode of disfranchisement clearly appears when it is known that out of all the great number of voters who were prevented from voting none of them belonged to the political party of the contestee.

The voters were divided into two lines, white and colored, and the great majority of the voters were colored.

The colored voters and white voters took equal turns in voting. The white voters resident in the first precinct were 132 and colored 883; third precinct, white voters, 254, colored, 797; fourth precinct, white voters, 392, colored, 692. See record, 1635. By voting alternately the white voters were all enabled to cast their votes, leaving the excluded voters at the rear end of the long colored line.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, conceded that voters were prevented from voting, although denying that there was any conspiracy or improper conduct on the part of the officers of election. The principal issue was as to the treatment of such a case.

The majority believed that contestant should be seated:

It has been held in New York, Alabama, and California that a vote lawfully tendered and not received should not be counted, but if the result was changed thereby that a new election should be ordered. (See State v. Judge, 13 Ala., 805; Hartt v. Harvey, 19 Howard's Practice, N. Y., 245; Webster v. Byrnes, 34 Cal., 273.)

But this rule we think is not founded in reason and is against the weight of authority. It was seemingly though not directly sanctioned in the Nineteenth Congress in case of Biddle v. Wing, Clarke and Hall, 504.

The Revised Statutes of the United States, section 2007, provides:

"That whenever, by or under the authority of the constitution or laws of any State or the laws of any Territory, any act is, or shall be, required to be done by any citizen as a prerequisite to qualify or entitle him to vote, the offer of any such citizen to perform the act required to be done as aforesaid shall, if it fail to be carried into execution by reason of the wrongful act or omission of the person or officer charged with the duty of receiving or permitting such performance or offer to perform or acting thereon, be deemed and held as a performance in law of such act, and the person so offering and failing as aforesaid, and being otherwise qualified, shall be entitled to vote in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had performed such act."

The offer to perform the prerequisites to the right to vote is by this statute made equivalent to a performance of the act itself, where the wrongful act or omission of an officer prevents carrying such offer into execution.

This carries the doctrine of tender back one step further, and makes a tender of registration or other prerequisite sufficient to entitle the citizen to the right to vote. The doctrine that such votes should be counted is strengthened by this statute.

If the voter, in the language of the statute, "shall be entitled to vote," the right would be a very barren one if the vote tendered and refused could not be counted.

"So far as Congressional elections are concerned, the offer by a voter otherwise legally qualified to perform any act which is a prerequisite to voting will be in law a performance of the act." (Paine on Elections, p. 519.)

This House has uniformly, since the Nineteenth Congress, recognized the rule that a legal vote lawfully tendered and unlawfully rejected shall be counted and given the same force and effect as if actually cast. Whatever the rule may be in any of the States of the Union this principle is well settled as a rule of Congress.

The report then cites various Congressional cases, and the rule in England (Heywood, 5 ed., 500), and continues:

But it is claimed by a minority of the committee that under the facts of the present case there has been no such an offer to vote on the part of the several hundred voters as would entitle them to have their votes counted. This brings us to the discussion of what constitutes a tender or offer to vote.

It is eminently proper in approaching the polls where there are a large number of voters that the voters should form a line and take their orderly turns in voting. To prevent any race troubles it is not unusual in many places to form two lines, one white and one colored, approaching the polls in their order and casting their ballots in regular turns or rotation.

Is the ability to reach the window and actually tender the ticket to the judges essential in all cases to constitute a good offer to vote? A voter, who is at the polling place in due time, and has taken his place in line, ticket in hand, offering to vote, and by the wrong of the judges is prevented from reaching the window, surely has as much right on principle to have his vote counted as the voter who happens to be further up in the line and actually reaches the window and is there refused.

From the time the voter reaches the voting place and takes his position in line to secure his orderly turn in voting the elector has commenced the act of voting. It is a continuous act, and if by the wrongful act of fraudulent challenges unduly prolonged by the connivance and collusion of the judges of the election the voter is deprived of the opportunity to vote we think that the interest of our form of government and the purity of elections demand that the vote should be counted. If the fraudulent exclusion of votes would, if successful, secure to the party of the wrongdoer a temporary seat in Congress, and the only penalty for detection in the wrong would be merely a new election, giving another chance for the exercise of similar tactics, such practices would be at a great premium and an election indefinitely prevented. But if where such acts are done the votes are counted upon clear proof aliunde, the wrong is at once corrected in this House and no encouragement is given to such dangerous and disgraceful methods. Where an illegal vote is tendered and cast it is universally conceded that it should be excluded in a contest, and the result declared the same as if such vote had not been cast.

It is clear upon principle that where a legal vote is offered and excluded it should be counted upon furnishing proof as satisfactory as that upon which an unlawful vote is eliminated from the count. There is no more difficulty or uncertainty in the proof in the one case than in the other. We are not disposed in the present case to treat the deposit of the votes in the box of the United States commissioners as a casting of the ballots. But such fact is strong corroborating evidence and is entitled to weight in determining the purpose of the voters, and is further of value in preserving the ballots which the voters say they actually intended to have cast. These ballots were at once deposited in a safe receptacle and preserved until they were delivered into the custody of the House. Over 400 of the voters testified to the deposit of these ballots, and that they were the same ballots which they were prevented from casting.

If a number of persons desirous of making a tender of money at a bank should form in line during banking hours, with their money in hand, and the officers of the bank should purposely delay the transaction of business in such a way as to prevent a large number of the persons desiring to make the tender from reaching the receiving teller's window during banking hours, there would be no question, we apprehend, but that this would be a good tender of money. In the present instance the voters in depositing their tickets in a separate box in the custody of a United States commissioner were attempting to carry the analogy further by making their tender good.

The voter who was standing at the window, ticket in hand, and offering it at sundown when the window was closed in his face, had done no more to have his vote cast than the next man in the line or the other voters standing ready to the extreme rear of the line. They were all doing their best to exercise their constitutional rights.

It is the duty of the judges to afford every reasonable facility to the voters in casting their ballots. We think that all these votes were tendered or offered within the fair and reasonable meaning of the law and that they should be counted, and that the action of the judges in delaying the election was equivalent in law to a refusal to receive the ballots.

We therefore recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That George D. Wise was not elected as a Member of the Fifty-first Congress from the Third district of Virginia and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That Edmund Waddill, jr., was elected as a Member of Congress from the Third district of Virginia and is entitled to a seat therein.

The minority views contend:

The court of appeals of New York in Hartt v. Harvey (19 Howard Pr. Reports, p. 252), had before it the express question whether a vote not cast could be counted for the candidate for whom the voter intended or desired to vote, and uses the following language:

"The result of the election must be determined by the vote cast. If illegal votes can be ascertained they may be rejected; but votes not received can never be made available in favor of either party."

The supreme court of California in passing upon the same question, in Webster v. Byrnes (34 Cal., p. 276) say:

"The court below erred in counting for contestant the supposed votes of Gonsalves, Larkin, and Haas, under the pretense that they would have voted for him had they been allowed to vote. In all contests of this character the question is, Which candidate received the highest number of legal votes? The idea that the supposed votes of persons who did not vote, but who could have voted had they taken the necessary legal steps to entitle them to do so, should be counted for the candidate for whom they would have voted, is simply preposterous."

The supreme court of Alabama in the case of the State ex rel. Spence v. The Judge of the Ninth Judicial Circuit (13 Ala., p. 811) say:

"Smoot offered to vote at the election, but his vote was not received, and he would have voted for Spence. * * * It is perhaps unnecessary to inquire whether the managers should have permitted Smoot to vote or not, for he did not vote, and even if his vote could have had any influence in changing the result of the election, as in fact it was not given, it could only have authorized the circuit judge to have declared the election void, but could not authorize him to count it as actually given to Spence."

To the same effect see Newcum v. Kirtley, supreme court of Kentucky, reported in 13 B. Munroe, page 515.

It will thus be seen that the highest courts in the States of New York, California, Alabama, and Kentucky have held that even though a legal voter should tender his ballot to the managers of the election, and they should reject the same, yet such vote could never be counted for either party. The fact that the vote was illegally rejected, and that the voter declared under oath for whom he intended and desired to vote would not authorize the tribunal that must "judge" of the election to count such vote, the election must be determined by the votes actually cast; and if it appear that a sufficient number of votes to change the result were unlawfully or improperly rejected, the effect would be to render the election void. The undersigned have not had their attention called to, nor are they aware of any decision of any court in any of the States, or of the United States, which establishes or maintains any other or different rule from that here laid down.

After discussing the Congressional cases the minority continue:

The act of Congress referred to in the report of the committee refers only to qualification of voters and not to the act of voting. The citations from McCrary and Paine on elections, referred to in the report of the committee, are based upon the decisions of the House herein reviewed, and as we have shown are not sustained by any of the cases referred to except Niblack v. Walls, which is a departure from and contrary to the established rule and which stands alone, unsupported, so far as we have been able to learn, by a decision of any court or of any legislative body in this country.

It seems to us that the rule contended for by the majority in this case would open wide the door for fraud and invite false swearing, which the opposing party would have no means of refuting. To hold that anything short of an actual tender of the ballot to the election officers and a rejection by them was an offer to vote would be a most dangerous and uncertain rule, and one to which we can not give our sanction. Where the evidence plainly establishes the fact that a legal voter offers his ballot to the election officers and they unlawfully reject the same, under the precedents heretofore established such vote may be counted for the candidate for whom the voter offered to vote. Conceding for the purpose of the argument all that is claimed by the contestant in this case, to wit, that by fraud and intentional hindrance and delay a large number of voters who intended to vote for him were unable to reach the poll to tender their ballots, although they used diligence; that when the polls closed a large number of voters present on the ground desiring to vote for him had for such reasons been unable to do so, and that thus a sufficient number of voters were prevented from voting to have changed the result had they succeeded in voting; still, inasmuch as there was no actual tender of their votes and rejection thereof by the election officers, such votes can not be counted for contestant; they have not been offered and rejected, and the most that can be claimed under this assumed state of facts is that there has been no fair and full election within the meaning of the law, and that neither party shall be adjudged entitled to the seat.

In the case before us we have before said we do not believe there was any considerable obstruction of the voters in their right to vote; but it appears that at the time the polls were closed at three precincts of Jackson Ward there were a number of voters present at each polling place desiring and intending to vote who were prevented from doing so through no fault of their own, and it is possible that such voters were sufficient in number to have changed the result had they all voted for the contestant. Under these circumstances we have been somewhat embarrassed to determine what recommendation we should make to the House. As we have shown, under such a state of facts, the courts determine the result by the vote actually cast. The enforcement of that rule in this case would give the seat to the sitting Member.

But we are not satisfied of the justice of such rule. While it is true that neither the contestee nor his partisans can justly be held responsible for the failure of any of the voters to exercise their right of suffrage, yet we believe that some were deprived of the opportunity to vote and that the number might have been sufficient to change the result, and so believing, in the interest of fair play and complete justice, we are not inclined to hold the contestant responsible for the inefficiency of the Republican judge or the conduct of the Republican Federal supervisors, but are of the opinion that the ends of justice will be subserved by remitting the election to the people of the district, who can, unembarrassed by the constitutional convention question, freely declare their choice, and we therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the seat now held by George D. Wise as the Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Third Congressional district of Virginia, be, and the same is hereby, declared vacant.

The report was debated at length on April 11 and 12,[1] and on the latter day the question was taken on a motion to substitute the minority proposition for that of the majority. This was negatived, yeas 119, nays 133.

Then the first resolution of the majority, unseating Mr. Wise, was agreed to without division.

The second resolution, seating contestant, was agreed to, yeas 134, nays 120.

Mr. Waddill thereupon appeared and took the oath.

1027. The Virginia election case of Bowen v. Buchanan in the Fifty-first Congress.

The existence of a corruption fund and the use of it, even by county officers, does not vitiate an election beyond the actual votes shown to be affected.

Returns will not be rejected because returning officers informally make a necessary correction after they have formally made them up.

Temporary absence of the election judges, the voting being left under charge of honest election clerks, did not vitiate the poll.

Only preponderating testimony that there was no fraud saved from rejection a poll whereat the election officers adjourned for dinner and removed the ballot box illegally.

On April 3, 1890,[2] Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Virginia case of Bowen v. Buchanan.

Sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 478 votes.

In reaching a conclusion the report discusses several questions:

(1) As to bribery, the report says:

> In Russell County the existence of a corruption fund and a willingness to use it are clearly established. Several votes were purchased and attempts were made to purchase others. Enough appears to arouse suspicion that more votes were purchased than the evidence discloses. The committee, however, can only deal with the facts established by the evidence, however strongly they may suspect the existence of more extensive corruption than appears.

The report then enumerates the names of voters who were proven to have sold their votes, to the number of ten, including one man purchased by the sheriff of the county, who procured the satisfaction of a fine standing against the voter; and continues:

> These 10 votes were directly purchased, and no attempt is made to disprove the direct evidence establishing the fact. There is considerable circumstantial evidence tending to show that others were influenced in like manner in this county; the money was provided, the will to use it was not wanting, and if there were other corruptible voters in the county known to the corruptors they were undoubtedly reached in the same way and by the same representatives of the majesty of the law, the sheriff and State's attorney of Russell County. We can go no further than the evidence justifies and deduct these 10 votes from contestee's majority.

[2] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 1214; Rowell, p. 195.

In Dickinson and Wise counties inducements were held out to illicit distillers by United States revenue officers of immunity from prosecution for violation of the revenue laws in consideration of support to the Democratic ticket. Three or four voters are shown to have voted for contestee on account of this kind of pursuasive argument. If others were so pursuaded it does not appear in the evidence. Altogether some 20 votes were lost to contestant in the manner above stated.

(2) Contestant claimed that the returns of Giles County should be rejected. The report says:

Here it is claimed that the returns from the county should be rejected because the returning officers of the county corrected their abstract of the precinct returns after it had been made up and the board had adjourned.

It seems that in making up the abstract, by a clerical error, one precinct had been left out. Before the returns were transmitted to the secretary of the commonwealth the mistake was discovered and corrected. This was just what ought to have been done, and if this precinct return had been omitted it would have been the duty of the committee to include it in the total vote. The objection is technical and without merit.

(3) As to conduct of election officers:

It is further insisted that the return from Pembroke district should be rejected on account of the misconduct of the election judges.

Sometime during the day a fight took place near the polling place, and the judges of election ad went out to witness it, leaving the ballot box in the custody of the clerks, who were of opposite political faiths. During this temporary absence the Democratic clerk was seen to push a ticket into the box, and it is claimed that this circumstance proves that other ballots than those of the voters were deposited in the box. The circumstance is explained in a like manner quite consistent with the honesty of the clerk. Just as the fight commenced, one of the judges had received a ballot and attempted to deposit it in the box, but in his hurry did not quite succeed, leaving the ballot in the opening, and the clerk pushed it down with his pencil. During the absence of the judges no one interfered with the box, no one was prevented from voting by the delay, and there is no evidence to impeach the return. Two or three illegal votes were cast at this poll, but there is nothing to show unfairness on the part of the judges.

In Russell County also there was a question as to the conduct of the officers:

We are asked to reject the returns from Honaker precinct, Russell County, on account of alleged misconduct of the election officers. At this precinct the election judges adjourned for dinner and supper, and each time two of them took the ballot box from the polling place and carried it to a private house where they went for their meals. By this conduct the box was removed from the presence of the United States supervisor, in violation of the statute. The supervisor claims that he protested against the removal, but the preponderance of the evidence is against his claim. The majority for the contestee at this precinct was 89, a large increase over former elections. This illegal act of the judges gave opportunity for fraud, such fraud as the statute was designed to prevent. In the examination of other cues we have found that adjournment and removal of the ballot box from the presence of the supervisor is a common method resorted to when it is intended to change the ballots or the boxes. But for the strong affirmative proof that no wrong was intended or done in this case, the committee would unhesitatingly reject the return.

The increase in the Democratic majority is accounted for, to some extent, if not fully, by the existence of the corruption fund spoken of in this report.

1028. The case of Bowen v. Buchanan, continued.

Registry being required in towns of a certain population and the population of a town not having been determined accurately, votes rejected for lack of registry were counted by the House.

Indefinite and uncertain intimidation by employers of labor does not justify rejection of a poll.

An ascertained number of voters being intimidated by roughs, the House corrected but did not reject the poll.

Fighting at the poll, no injury resulting in the vote of either party, does not justify rejection of the poll.

(4) As to alleged illegal rejection of votes:

At Pocahontas precinct, Tazewell County, 40 votes tendered for contestant were, in our view, illegally rejected. By the statutes of Virginia it is provided that in all towns of over 2,000 inhabitants a transferred voter must have his transfer recorded at least ten days prior to the election. At all other precincts a transferred voter may vote without such registry. It was claimed by the election officers that Pocahontas was a town of over 2,000 inhabitants, and these 40 voters were denied the right to vote because they had failed to have their transfers registered. Pocahontas is a new mining town; no census, State or national, has disclosed the number of its inhabitants, and there is a difference of opinion among the inhabitants as to the number of people. In the absence of any legal determination of the number, we do not think the election judges had any right to decide that this town was within the exception.

Contestee lost 4 votes by the same ruling, and there was a net loss to contestant of 36 votes.

(5) As to intimidation:

At Loup or Johnson's Store precinct it is claimed that the returns should be rejected because of the undue and improper influence of the Stewart Land and Cattle Company over their employees, some 40 or 50 in number. The proof tends to show that at previous elections these employees had been given to understand that they must vote the Democratic ticket or lose their places. It was generally understood in the community that one of the conditions of employment by this company was that the men should vote the Democratic ticket. It is unquestionably true that many of the men believed that to vote otherwise would cost them their places, and that belief undoubtedly induced some of them to vote against their convictions; but there is no direct evidence implicating any of the members of this company in an attempt to control their employees at this election other than the presence at the polls of one of their foremen distributing tickets to the men. How many men were influenced, by the prevalent belief does not appear, and this supposed influence is too uncertain and indefinite to justify the rejection of this poll or other neighboring polls where some of the employees voted.

At Slate or Sander's precinct, in Buchanan County, where there were from 10 to 15 Republicans, a crowd of drunken roughs assaulted 6 or 7 Republican voters, and only 3 voted. These, while voting the National Republican ticket, voted for sitting Member as a measure of prudence. The report says:

The majority of the voters at this precinct were peaceably disposed, but a few vicious, drunken partisans of contestee deprived contestant of the Republican vote of the precinct. Were their number uncertain we would exclude the return, but as their number is not a matter of uncertainty, and as contestee would have had a considerable majority in this precinct in any event, it is not in accordance with the precedents to reject the return; if a sufficient number were so intimidated as to overcome the majority of contestee the committee would hold that he had no right to retain his seat.

At Colly and one or two other precincts there was fighting at the polls, but the evidence showed the full Republican vote to have been polled.

The committee also discussed several questions of fact, and concluded that sitting Member would still have a majority of over 200 votes after all deductions had been made. Therefore they recommended:

Resolved, That John A. Buchanan was duly elected to the Fifty-first Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Virginia, and is entitled to retain his seat.

Resolved. That Henry Bowen was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-first Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Virginia, and is not entitled to the seat.

The minority concurred in the conclusions, but dissented from some of the statements made in the report.

On April 16 [1] the House agreed to the resolutions without debate or division.

[1] Record, pp. 3451, 3452; Journal, p. 479.

1029. The Indiana election case of Posey v. Parrett, in the Fifty-first Congress.

Direct testimony taken in time of rebuttal and objected to at the time was not considered by the House.

When a student is in a place simply for the purposes of education, a presumption is thereby raised against his intent, and other proof as to residence is necessary.

Persons within a precinct as laborers must by proof establish the intention and other conditions of residence.

On April 3, 1890[1] Mr. C. A. Bergen, of New Jersey, submitted the report of the Committee on Elections in the Indiana case of Posey v. Parrett. The sitting Member, by the official returns, had a plurality of 20 votes.

The evidence by which contestant tried to prove bribery was deemed by the committee insufficient.

A preliminary question as to evidence was thus determined:

It is proper to observe here that much of the testimony in the case has been taken out of time, or to speak more accurately, in rebuttal, when by its substance it is evidence in chief. This is in violation of the act of Congress, and was at the time objected to on the part of the contestee, who, though present, also refused to cross-examine on that ground. No reasons for this course on the part of the contestant have been presented to the committee, and the committee has felt itself bound to exclude such evidence from its consideration of the case. It believes that the rights of the House under the Constitution are not abridged by the act referred to, but that each Congress in enforcing those rights will not depart from the terms of the act except for cause.

The remaining question in the case related to the qualification of certain voters in relation to residence, and is thus discussed by the committee:

There are two classes of voters brought in question in this case under the head of nonresident—those known as the St. Meinrad voters and the Kentucky voters, though the last description is not accurate, for not all included under it are spoken of as from Kentucky.

The St. Meinrad votes were 30 in number and were cast for the contestee by students of the college or seminary at St. Meinrad. These students were young men there solely for the purpose of an education in preparation for the priesthood. They had come mostly from Indiana, but many of them from other States and some of them from foreign countries. Their tuition and support were furnished to them by their respective bishops. They all testified that their residence was at St. Meinrad. It might well be doubted if they meant more by this than that they had been at that place the time necessary to make it their home. A proper cross-examination would probably have disclosed the misunderstanding of the witnesses. But we must consider the case as it is presented. No one doubts the evidence of these very respectable gentlemen that they had been at the institution most of the time for a number of years and sufficiently long to have gained a residence if that were the only requisite; but residence is a mixed question of fact and intention, the fact without also the intention is not sufficient of itself to establish a legal residence. And it is a well-settled principle of the cases that one who leaves his home to go to college for the purpose of an education does not from continuance there the required time gain a residence. On the contrary, the very object of his stay raises a presumption against such result. This is not because the law adopts a rule in the case of students different from that in other cases, but because it also reasons from analogy and must in all cases be consistent.

The votes of those who in this case have been described as "Kentucky voters" depend upon the same principles of law as those of the St. Meinrad students, and both depend upon solving the problem whether the individual voter ever in contemplation of law changed his place of residence from that last had to that now insisted upon or opposed.

[1] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 189; Rowell, p. 189.

The law places a child's residence with his parents, not because they are his parents, but because theirs is the home into which he is born; so, also, with his guardian if his is his actual home. There he has the right to vote the day he becomes of age and there he has the protection of law, the right of support if ill-health, misfortune, or poverty overtakes him whether in infancy or mature years; there a citizenship, which he has the right to prove and the flag to defend and against which simple actual absence, no matter how long, will be no defense. Nor does such residence depend upon the maintenance of the parental roof. (Fry's Elec. Cases, 71 Penn. St., 302.) It moves with it only when the law from other circumstances concludes the child is still a component part. The homestead may have disappeared and yet the legal right of the child or man be unaffected. The State will not disown its son, and it recognizes the family when a component part but not its sole dependence.

The intention of the voter is an important factor in determining the place of residence, and the proper way is to examine the surrounding circumstances to discover that intention. Plainly one who is a student at a college or toiler in Kentucky may be a voter, but he may not more than any other citizen have two places at either of which, according to whim or convenience, he may on election morning determine to vote. The law does not mean that a matter so vital to the rights of others shall be concealed and hidden within the single breast of one of the parties. Residence at the college, or in Kentucky, like residence at any other place, gives and takes away the right to vote, but when of a person simply for the purpose of an education, as in the case of the St. Meinrad students or of labor, as with many of the "Kentucky voters," it raises a presumption of want of bona fides and necessity for other proof to show that it was the intention of the voter it should have such effect.

The student voters were Catholics, and the form benefactions took with them was from the bishop, and from this it was argued that the bishop stood in loco parentis. Even if granted, it would not affect the question involved, nor have more to do with it than if the students had been in a Protestant college, there supported, as is commonly the case, by their churches for the Protestant ministry. The question would still be, not whether their residence was that of the church by which they were supported, but whether they had ever given up their last residence and undertaken to acquire another at the college. To do so, they must either directly have renounced their former home and assumed the obligations of citizens in their place of adoption, or done acts, open and acknowledged, inconsistent with the one and assertive of the other. Every one has a well-recognized right to change his place of residence, and may do so if he proceed in consonance with known principles.

Contestant's case must fail in regard to the students, not so much because in fact they were entitled to vote, as to use the language of the supreme court of Indiana, in Pedigo v. Grimes (112 Ind., 148), "because there is no evidence that this (their intention of making that place their residence) was not their intention formed and acted upon in good faith." Each party at the hearing relied upon this case to support his position. It is sufficient to say, while thus citing from it, that it will not bear the extreme construction put upon it by contestee. That would not only do violence to its language, but place it in opposition to the trend of decisions elsewhere upon which it claims to rest.

An application of these principles to the other votes brought in question shows that the following were improperly cast and counted for the contestee and should be deducted from his number, to wit, Solon Hedges, Neeley Borden, Samuel Bogan, J. Nickens, A. Nickens, Thomas Hampton, Harry Hampton, Dink Miller, Frank Wiseman, Homer Campbell, E. T. Conway, John Oaks, Thomas Crosnow, and Stephen Winters—total, 14; and that the following were improperly cast and counted for the contestant and should be deducted from his number, to wit, James Smith, James Eskridge, Alex. Boyd, Philip Dailey—total, 4.

This still leaves the contestee with a plurality of 10 (20–14+4=10).

The committee is of the opinion that the certificate of election was rightfully issued to William F. Parrett and that he is entitled to the seat. It therefore submits the following resolutions and recommends their adoption:

Resolved, That Francis B. Posey is not entitled to a seat in the Fifty-first Congress as Representative from the First Congressional district of Indiana.

Resolved, That William F. Parrett is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-first Congress as Representative from the First Congressional district of Indiana.

The report was debated on April 16,[1] and on that day the resolutions were agreed to—ayes 125, noes 4.

1030. The Alabama election case of McDuffie v. Turpin, in the Fifty-first Congress.

Instance wherein the history of previous elections in a district and common knowledge as to its political condition was held to raise a presumption against the returns.

A general plan of evasion of the law providing for boards of fair election officers combined with attempts to prevent examination thereof was considered proof of conspiracy to defraud.

Proof of a conspiracy to defraud may but does not necessarily require the returns to be rejected unless sustained by oral testimony.

There being evidence of a conspiracy of election officers to defraud, the returns were satisfactorily impeached by evidence falling short of the best evidence; i.e., the testimony of the voters themselves.

Evidence of declarations of voters when they took their tickets and went to the box availed to discredit returns of election officers of doubtful honesty.

On May 7, 1890,[1] Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections in the Alabama case of McDuffie v. Turpin.

Sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 13,153 votes. The report says:

> With such a returned majority for contestee it is apparent either that this contest is a huge farce or that this whole district is honeycombed with fraud.

The report then goes on to review the political history of the district, showing that in preceding years the House had found fraud enough to justify unseating the returned Member, and concluding:

> From this account of the action of the election officers and returning boards of this district it is clearly evident that there has existed a fixed determination on the part of the Democratic managers there that the will of the majority should be disregarded and a willingness to resort to any methods, however unlawful and criminal, to accomplish the defeat of their Republican opponents. The record in this case justifies and fully confirms the above conclusion and shows that the same conditions continue to exist.
> If the certified returns in this case are true, it follows (allowing for 500 increase in white voters since 1880, and 2,000 increase in colored) that all the white voters and at least 11,800 colored men voted for contestee, while only 5,625 voted for contestant and more than 11,500 did not not vote at all; that is to say, more than two-thirds of the colored men who cast their ballots voted for contestee and 43 per cent did not vote at all.
>
> In the light of history, and of that knowledge common to all well-informed men, it is not too much to say that such a report is a self-evident falsehood, unless there is a present condition of affairs in the Fourth district of Alabama taking that district out of the rule which prevails everywhere else.
>
> The record in this case demonstrates its falsity beyond a reasonable doubt. The evidence in this record, as in other records from the same district, shows conclusively that the great majority of the colored men there are Republicans and that when they vote they vote the Republican ticket.
>
> The evidence of the certified returns, on the other hand, shows that a large majority of them vote the Democratic ticket. The conflict is between the returns and the men who cast the ballots on which the returns purport to be based.
>
> The evidence also shows that in almost every voting district there are a few colored Democrats well known to both white and black. It also shows that where the whites are in a majority a greater number of colored men vote the Democratic ticket than in localities where the blacks greatly preponderate.

The evidence further discloses that the Republicans have kept up their party organization, that they continue to take great interest in elections, and, as a rule, are eager to exercise the right to vote. It further shows that at this election there was entire harmony in the ranks, the only exception being a so-called Republican paper of small circulation and less influence, which lent itself to the Democracy.

The evidence further establishes the fact that throughout the district there was a general belief among the Republicans that there would not be an honest count of the votes; that, whatever the actual result, contestee would be declared elected and that it would be necessary to prove the true vote by other means than the returns and to appeal to the House to correct the anticipated wrong to the voters. Such belief does not exist so universally without cause. The history of this district, the common knowledge of the mass of voters in it of announced results at former elections, and the action of county officers in appointing inspectors of election, fully justified the belief, and results prove that the belief was foreknowledge.

The report next reviews the law of Alabama relating to elections, especially on the following points:

The inspectors appointed by the probate judge, sheriff, and circuit clerk (or any two of them) must be appointed at least thirty days before the election; and, if practicable, must be of different political parties.

The sheriff must, at a given time, summon the probate judge and circuit clerk as a board of supervisors to ascertain and certify the result of the election. If these officers are all of the same political party, then this returning officer must summon three reputable householders, citizens and voters, of the opposite political party, to make up this returning board or board of supervisors. In connection with this section of the statute it may be remarked that all the officers made returning officers by law were of one political party, but nowhere was it deemed by them or the sheriff necessary to comply with the terms of the law and summon members of the opposite political party to act as supervisors. Such little formality, designed to secure honest returns, seems to have been entirely forgotten.

The following from decisions of the supreme court of Alabama have a bearing upon the case:

"It is the election which entitles the party to office, and if one is legally elected by receiving a majority of legal votes, his right is not impaired by any omission or negligence of the managers subsequent to the election. (13 Ala., 885.)

Nor will a mistake by the managers of the election in counting the votes and declaring the results vitiate the election. Such a mistake should be corrected; the person receiving the highest number of votes becomes entitled to the office." (9 Ala., 338.)

In considering the evidence with reference to particular precinct returns, it is first necessary to inquire by whom the election was held, in order to determine what weight should be given to the returns.

Returns are, as a rule, prima facie evidence of the result; but if the integrity of the inspectors is in any way impeached, either by showing that their character is such as to cast suspicion on their acts, or that their belief is that frauds upon elections are justifiable, or that the manner of their selection was such as to indicate a purpose to procure a false statement of results, then the returns lose much of the weight that would otherwise attach to them. (English v. Peele, Forty-eighth Congress.) In this case the committee says:

"When once the taint of fraud or unreliability is attached to the official count its value is gone, and we must look to other sources for better information."

In Lowndes County the precinct inspectors were appointed on the 25th day of September. A few days afterwards the contestee visited the county, and on the 6th day of October an entire change was made in the list of inspectors appointed to represent the Republicans. The first list was satisfactory, and made up in the greater part of intelligent men. The second list was made without any authority in the law, and its composition shows that the change was made for a dishonest purpose. Judge Coffey (Record, p. 745) says that the reason for this change was that the sheriff and several other gentlemen told him that the Republican inspectors, being school teachers, did not wish to serve and mix up in politics. Hence the change. Let us see whether that was the true reason.

After reviewing the several precincts the report concludes:

Twelve of the first list either served or tried to serve, and eight of the new list who served could neither read nor write. The reason for the removal of intelligent and trustworthy Republicans and replacing them with ignorant and unreliable men, in pretended compliance with the law, is evident from the foregoing statement, and the falsity of Judge Coffey's reason is made apparent.

That contestee had something to do with this change does not admit of much serious question.

When the law provides that each of the two political parties shall have representation on the election board of inspectors, it is a provision to prevent dishonest partisans from making false returns; and in such case the appointment of men incompetent to determine whether the return is honest or not to represent the party opposed to the appointing power, tends to prove an intent to prevent that watchfulness intended to be secured by the statute, and raises a strong suspicion (if it does not fully prove) of conspiracy to falsify the returns.

After showing that the inspectors appointed to represent the Republican party were generally ignorant and disloyal, the report continues:

Such uniform violation of the statute and such uniform pretense of complying with its terms by appointing colored Democrats to represent the party, or by appointing illiterate colored Republican show method in the action of the county boards, with dishonest designs behind the method.

Under these circumstances it would be safe to apply the rule adopted in regard to this district by the House Committee on Elections in the Forty-eighth Congress, and consider as trustworthy only such returns as are sustained by oral testimony. But the committee has not gone to that extent in this case.

It is worthy of remark that in almost every precinct in the fourth district there were reliable and intelligent Republicans, competent to discharge the duties of election inspectors and to protect the voters to the extent of securing an honest count and a correct return.

Another feature of the election, which can not be overlooked, was the precaution everywhere taken by the Republican to ascertain with accuracy the number of votes cast by them, showing a universal distrust of the precinct officers. In many precincts complete poll lists were kept by clerks selected for that purpose, voters going to the extent of refusing to vote unless such precaution was taken. On the other hand, vigorous efforts were made by the Democrats in many places to prevent the keeping of such lists, under the pretense that the keeping of such lists was intimidation. Deputy sheriffs were active in trying to suppress this attempt to keep a check upon the distrusted election officers.

In one instance the attempt of a deputy sheriff, acting under the direction of the sheriff of the county, to stop the further keeping of a poll and to secure possession of the one that had been kept, resulted in the murder of one Republican and the wounding of two others by the deputy and his supporters. The murderer has escaped even the formality of a prosecution.

These officials who were thus attempting to prevent the measures taken by the Republicans to preserve the evidence of the vote cast, well knew the purpose of these measures, for, only two years before, in the election contest of McDuffie v. Davidson, this kind of evidence had been used all over the district to show up the frauds in the election of 1886. The conclusion is inevitable that these acts of the Democratic officials and their aiders and abettors were done in furtherance of contemplated frauds.

The printed record discloses another unpardonable attempt to suppress testimony. This attempt was the deliberate act of contestee and his attorneys. Frivolous objections, covering whole pages of the record, and cross-examinations of witnesses which would disgrace a police court shyster, were the means by which contestee and his attorneys sought to use up the time allowed to contestant in which to take testimony to prove his allegations. This conduct resulted, beyond a reasonable doubt, from a deliberate purpose to suppress as much of contestant's evidence as possible, and prevent a disclosure of the whole truth.

These are some of the general features of the case proper to be considered in applying the specific evidence in regard to the various precinct returns brought into question.

The general method of proving charges of fraud in the several precincts was to show that more votes were cast for contestant than were returned for him, and was, as described in the debate,[1] to select intelligent men and let them stand as near the polls as they would be permitted to do, in order to distribute tickets among the electors, as they did, the colored or Republican elector in nearly every instance taking his ticket, and in some of the precincts carrying it over his shoulder, so that the man who gave him the ticket could watch him until he gave it to the inspector at the polls, who received it and deposited it in the box. Returning, to make assurance doubly sure, he would state to a list keeper that he had voted the Republican ticket that he received, and wanted his name taken down as a Republican voter.

Where this method showed a wide variance between the number of votes thus proven for contestant and the vote accorded him in the official returns, the majority of the committee did not reject the poll, but counted for contestant the number of votes proved by the tally keeper, and allowed to sitting Member such votes as were proven for him or conceded to him.

In many precincts there was found other evidence of fraud, such as names of voters arranged on the poll list alphabetically.

As to the method of proof the majority report says:

Here we have 170 voters declaring at, the polls their intention to vote the Republican ticket, taking the ticket from one chosen by them to issue tickets by prearrangement, holding their tickets in such a way that they could be seen until voted, and then having their names registered so as to be able to prove how they voted. These acts are a part of the res gestae of the election—the deliberate declaration of the voters while engaged in the act of voting, not only of how they voted but of their utter want of confidence in the election board, upon which they had no representation.

And also:

The violation of the letter and spirit of the law in the appointment of the election officers, so universal as to show deliberate intent, the universal knowledge of the purpose of such violation, and 0 the various acts of the partisans of contestee, including all the officials throughout the district, are what give weight and character to the evidence which shows the results in individual precincts, or beats, as they are called in Alabama.

The admissibility of this kind of testimony has been fully recognized by the courts, and its weight in this class of cases admitted.

Judge Howell E. Jackson, late a United States Senator and now a judge of eminence, in his charge to the jury in the recent trial of Tennessee election officers for violating the Federal election laws at Memphis, Tenn., used the following language:

"Said witnesses testified that the voting population of the fourth civil district of Fayette County on November 6, 1888, numbered between 490 and 500-say, about 500. That about 80 to 100 of such voters were white men or Democrats; the remainder, numbering about 400, were colored men and Republicans. That on the day of the election there was a large turnout of such voters. That the colored voters present exceeded 300 in number. John McGowan, the Republican chairman of the district, states that there were over 300 colored Republican voters present. That he directed many or most of them to go for their tickets to John C. Reeves, who occupied a position 10 or 20 steps from the voting place, and was distributing Republican tickets to Republican voters. That Reeves's position was in full view of the window at which the ballots were handed in to the officer. That he saw many of the tickets deposited or handed in to the officer holding the election, and can not swear to the actual number that voted that had Republican tickets. John C. Reeves testified before you that he was present. That he had in his possession Republican tickets, a sample of which is produced in evidence, having on it a full list of Republican candidates, from Presidential electors and Congressmen down to State and county officers. That he issued to the colored voters on that day, upon their application for the same, 325 of those tickets while at the voting place. That on his way home he met 4 or 5 other voters going to the polls, to whom he gave Republican tickets; the names of 2 of those voters he finds upon the poll list at Nos. 407 and 409. Reeves further states that he saw over 100 of those to whom he gave tickets go directly from him to the window where the votes were received and hand them in to the officer holding the election. He could not swear that they actually deposited the identical tickets received from him, but he saw no change of ticket or change of purpose on the part, of the voter after procuring from himself the Republican ticket. He recognizes on the poll list the names of about 100 of such Republican voters. Now, gentlemen of the jury, Reeves and McGowan are in no way impeached, nor are their statements in any wise contradicted. They stand before you as in every way credible witnesses, and their testimony is entitled to full faith and credit. If the case for the prosecution stopped with Reeves and McGowan, it would present a case of circumstantial evidence as to the vote actually cast having exceeded that which was counted and returned by the election officers and judges. When circumstantial evidence is relied on to convict, as counsel for defense has suggested, it should be of such conclusive character as to exclude any remote hypothesis of innocence."

It is to be remembered that the last remark has reference to the proof required to convict in a criminal case.

Speaking in regard to individual voters who had testified to their votes, he said:

"If the prosecution had simply shown that each one of these witnesses was seen going to the poll with a Republican ticket in his hand which he had received from Reeves, with a declaration of his intention to vote said ticket, such facts and acts would have constituted circumstantial evidence that they voted said ticket."

It is to be remembered that the evidence in this case is more direct and more certain than was the evidence upon which Judge Jackson's charge was based, and that the witnesses and voters take much greater pains to be able to know the exact facts.

The minority attack the evidence, both as to its credibility—a question of fact—and as to its competency, a question of law:

Section 265, before opening the polls the inspectors and clerks must take an oath to perform their duties at such election according to law.

"The return must stand until such facts are proven as to clearly show that it is not true." (McCrary on Elections, 438 and authorities there cited.)

The object of this investigation should be to ascertain the truth. In all such investigations each party should be required to produce the highest and best evidence attainable. This rule of evidence will not be disputed.

In the debate [1] it was urged on behalf of the minority by Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, who had presented the minority views, that the highest and best evidence was the testimony of the voters themselves, and that this had not been taken. The presumption in favor of the honesty of election officers and the testimony of the officers declaring the election honest were also urged.

In extraordinary cases, and where it appears that in no other way can the will of the voter be ascertained, resort to methods not technically legal may be justifiable.

An outside poll informally held and rejected by State canvassers may, under certain circumstances, be counted by the House.

The voters are not to be disfranchised by any neglect of the officers after the election if the correct vote can be ascertained.

The ballots not being counted at the close of the poll and the box being taken away in violation of law by election officers of doubtful honesty, the returns were rejected.

A question of a somewhat different nature was brought up in relation to Uniontown precinct in Perry County. The majority report says:

There were two boxes in this beat, and returns were made by the officials holding each election. At one the Republicans voted, at the other the Democrats. The return which was counted gave Turpin 210, McDuffie 2. The other return gave McDuffie 953. Dr. J. H. Houston's testimony (306) gives the history of the election where the Republicans voted, and shows that all the forms of law were complied with. The sheriff of the county (446) shows that the returns were presented to him and he refused to receive them. The box was retained and its contents counted in the presence of the commissioner taking the testimony.

There is a dispute about the time of opening the different polls, but in our view the question is not material in this particular case. That the two polls taken together constitute an honest statement of the result of the election, and show the exact state of the legal vote, we have no doubt. They also show that where there is an honest count the Republicans adhere to their party ticket.

The action of the election inspectors for this precinct at the election for the Fiftieth Congress justified the action of the Republicans. Indeed, it was apparently the only course left open to them to prevent their votes from being counted for the Democratic candidate. At that election the returned vote was:

Davidson (Democrat)	720
Turner (Independent)	203
McDuffie	65

The majority of the committee in that case found from the evidence such frauds as destroyed the return, and from the evidence gave McDuffie 400 and Davidson 8. The evidence indicated a Republican vote of over 800, but the majority of the committee found that only 400 were satisfactorily proved.

In extraordinary cases, and where it appears that in no other way can the actual will of the voter be ascertained, a resort to methods not technically in accordance with statutory direction may be justifiable, and upon proof that a full, fair, and honest election has been held by those only who are qualified voters, under these circumstances the returns from such an election, when duly proved, may be considered and counted.

None of those guards provided by statute to secure honest results should be neglected, but when statutory provisions designed to protect qualified voters in the exercise of their legal rights are made use of with deliberate purpose to suppress the will of the majority, such action will be regarded as fraudulent.

The minority say:

The election officers, two Democrats and one Republican, under oath returned that the vote cast was 201 for Turpin and 2 for McDuffie. The officers at this poll were regularly appointed by the proper officers, opened the polls at the proper time and place, and received all legal votes tendered. The officers properly certified the return; they were properly delivered to the returning board for county and counted.

Another box or poll was opened in a remote part of the town, not the usual place of holding elections, by persons unauthorized so to do, and in this box a number of tickets were deposited, one witness says 953, another 1,153, all for McDuffie. This box was not counted by the returning board, and should not have been; there is no pretense that the regular return was not correctly counted; the majority admit this second box or voting place was not authorized by any law or statute of the State, and the evidence shows that there was no mistake or misapprehension on the part of the voters. It was deliberately done, avowedly for want of confidence in the regularly appointed and acting officials of the election. Under no view of the law or facts can the tickets deposited in this box, even if we knew how many there were, be counted for either party.

The majority count this precinct: Turpin 210, McDuffie 955, thus including the illegal with the legal return. This can not be done, and the undersigned believe the return as made must stand.

A similar question arose as to Liberty Hill precinct, in Dallas County. The majority ruled:
